

1 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, John K. Rabiej. All Rights Reserved.

Severe ESI-Spoliation Sanctions -- Rimkus Response to Pension Committee

2010 Emerging Issues 5408

John K. Rabiej on the Rimkus Response to Pension Committee, Which Highlights Wide Divergence in Case Law Governing Imposition of Severe ESI-Spoliation Sanctions

By John K. Rabiej

November 18, 2010

SUMMARY: A party's conduct in losing or deleting ESI may be sufficiently egregious in itself to warrant an adverse inference instruction under certain circumstances. The topic was extensively addressed in Pension Committee of the Univ. of Montreal Pension Plan v. Banc of Am. Sec., LLC, and Rimkus Consulting Group, Inc. v. Cammarata.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: John K. Rabiej on the Rimkus Response to Pension Committee, Which Highlights Wide Divergence in Case Law Governing Imposition of Severe ESI-Spoliation Sanctions

Introduction

Proving that ESI - which was lost or allegedly deleted after preservation obligations have arisen but months before the filing of a case - is relevant and essential to a party's claims or defenses can be difficult and sometimes virtually impossible. Ordinarily, the party alleging ESI loss or deletion has the burden to prove by direct or circumstantial evidence that the lost or deleted ESI is relevant and essential to its underlying claim as a predicate justifying an ESI adverse inference instruction, which shifts the burden of proof from the "blameless" party to the party responsible for losing or deleting the ESI. Unless the party demonstrates both relevance and prejudicial effect, however, no adverse inference instruction is warranted. Nonetheless, a party's conduct in losing or deleting ESI may be sufficiently egregious in itself to warrant an adverse inference instruction under certain circumstances. The topic was extensively addressed in Pension Committee of the Univ. of Montreal Pension Plan v. Banc of Am. Sec., LLC, 685 F. Supp. 2d 456 (S.D.N.Y. 2010) and Rimkus Consulting Group, Inc. v. Cammarata, 688 F. Supp. 2d 598 (S.D. Tex. 2010). Designating which party has the burden to demonstrate whether lost or deleted ESI is relevant and essential to a party's underlying claim (or the opposite) can have outcome determinative consequences.

Pension Committee and Rimkus based their rulings on their respective circuit case law. These cases apply different standards in evaluating the extent of a party's culpability in losing or deleting ESI sufficient to warrant an adverse inference instruction, which shifts the burden of proof. Their holdings highlight the wide divergence in case law that governs the imposition of severe ESI-spoliation sanctions. Each opinion cites scores of cases and provides informative guidance in a treatise-like fashion on the standards governing the imposition of an adverse inference instruction as a sanction for failing to preserve ESI. The decisions apply two very different standards that courts have relied on in penalizing a party for failing to preserve ESI. They underscore the need for uniform standards, urged by the court in Victor Stanley Inc. v. Creative Pipe, Inc., 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93644 (D. Md. Sept. 9, 2010), a third treatise-like opinion discussing severe ESI-spoliation sanctions.

Background

The sanctioned plaintiffs in Pension Committee consisted of six individual groups of investors that filed a lawsuit on February 12, 2004, to recover losses of 550 million dollars from the liquidation of two hedge funds. They alleged claims under the federal securities laws and claims under New York law against former directors, administrators, the auditor, and the prime broker and custodian of the funds. The plaintiff in Rimkus is a forensic engineering contractor with 30 offices located in 18 states. It filed its lawsuit in January 2007. The sanctioned defendants in Rimkus were two former employees who allegedly breached non-competition and non-solicitation covenants in their written employment agreements and misused trade secrets and proprietary information in setting up a new company in competition with the plaintiff.

In both cases, the offending parties were sanctioned for failing to preserve relevant ESI when the parties were under an obligation to do so. But the Rimkus court required a higher level of culpability than the court in Pension Committee. The Rimkus defendants admitted that they intentionally deleted ESI, while the defendants suspected that the plaintiffs in Pension Committee deleted ESI caused by sloppy and careless preservation efforts.

Form of Adverse Inference Instructions

A court exercises broad discretion in supervising discovery. It can employ a wide range of sanctions in penalizing parties for ESI spoliation though its inherent authority to regulate the litigation process. Courts narrowly construe their inherent power when sanctioning a party, and their sanctions should be reasonable and proportional under all the circumstances of the case.

An adverse inference instruction is one of the most severe sanctions a court can impose on a party for failing to preserve ESI, when the party is under a duty to do so. Only outright dismissal of a case or a default judgment is more severe. The first two terminate a case, while litigants usually view the most severe form of an adverse inference instruction as case dispositive, with settlements typically ensuing in short order. These three types of severe sanctions are properly reserved only for cases involving particularly egregious conduct.

Pension Committee and Rimkus describe three forms of adverse inference instructions that a court can impose on the opposing party for failing to preserve ESI, which are based on the parties' culpability and prejudicial effect. In its most severe form, a court may instruct a jury that lost ESI must be deemed admitted and must be accepted as true. Under such an instruction, the opposing party cannot rebut the facts that are deemed to be true. In a less harsh form, a court may give a mandatory presumption instruction that lost ESI must be deemed admitted and accepted as true, subject to rebuttal from the opposing party. In its least harsh form, a court may give a permissive presumption instruction that shifts the burden of proof, instructing the jury that it may, but is not required, to presume that the lost ESI is relevant and favorable to the opposing party, subject also to rebuttal by the opposing party.

The Fifth, Seventh, Tenth, Eleventh, and D.C. Circuits have held that a party's negligence in losing or deleting ESI is insufficient to issue an adverse inference instruction. The First, Second, Fourth, and Ninth Circuits have held that bad faith is not required as a predicate to issue an adverse instruction, though the cases typically emphasize the party's bad faith and the party's egregious conduct. The Third Circuit balances the extent of fault and prejudice.

Divergent Approaches

The court in Pension Committee recognized that the "judgment call of whether to award sanctions is inherently subjective. A court has a 'gut reaction' based on years of experience as to whether a litigant has complied with its discovery obligations...." Both judges in Pension Committee and Rimkus awarded a permissive, rebuttable adverse inference instruction as a sanction against parties for failing to preserve ESI when the parties were obligated to do so. But the evidence sufficient to support the sanctions significantly varied. Rimkus applied a subjective standard, requiring a "bad faith" finding that the defendants intentionally had deleted ESI for the specific purpose of preventing its use in the litigation. Conversely, Pension Committee applied an objective standard, requiring a finding that the plaintiffs' conduct in failing to preserve ESI was "grossly negligent." Unlike Rimkus, a failure to conform to the grossly negligent standard in Pension Committee could be found even if the actions arose "from a pure heart and an empty head."

The sanction in Rimkus was conditioned on an additional finding. Rimkus left open the preliminary question of whether the defendants' intentional destruction of ESI was intended to prevent its use in the litigation, because the prejudice caused by the deletion was uncertain. That issue was also reserved for the jury's decision. In Pension Committee, the court, not the jury, made the preliminary finding that the plaintiffs were "grossly negligent" in failing to preserve ESI. The limited charge to the jury was solely to agree or decline to agree with the presumption that the lost or deleted ESI was relevant and favorable to the opposing party.

The difference between the parties' culpability that was sufficient to trigger an adverse inference instruction for failing to preserve ESI in each case was so markedly different that it prompted the court in Victor Stanley to call for uniform national standards.

Specific Examples of Party's Conduct Warranting Sanctions

The parties in Pension Committee and Rimkus received basically the same sanction, though the facts demonstrating the extent of their culpability varied substantially. Any analysis of spoliation case law is fact intensive, and evaluating the parties' conduct in fulfilling their discovery obligations in these two cases is no exception. In Rimkus, the defendants admitted that they were deleting ESI. They claimed, however, that the ESI was not deleted in bad faith for the purpose of gaining an advantage in the litigation. Rather, the deletions were made innocently as part of routine business practices. The court required a finding of scienter or bad faith in addition to a finding that the ESI was deleted as a condition for giving an adverse inference instruction. Though the overt actions of the Rimkus defendants in deleting ESI were manifest, the court declined to make the preliminary bad faith finding itself, which would have triggered the presumption. Instead it reserved the preliminary finding for the jury's consideration because it was unclear whether the lost ESI was, in fact, unfavorable to the opposing party.

In Pension Committee the defendants suspected that plaintiffs deleted ESI, because few emails were produced. The plaintiffs had failed to comply with several discovery obligations. The court found that plaintiffs' conduct in Pension Committee was sufficient to meet the "grossly negligent" standard as it interpreted the Second Circuit case law. And the court ruled that the plaintiffs' conduct failed to meet this standard.

Though the differences between the two standards applied in Rimkus and Pension Committee are significant, it is only when the actual sanctionable conduct of the parties is compared that the consequences of the differences between the objective gross-negligence and subjective bad-faith standards applied in both cases become apparent.

The initial lawsuit in Pension Committee was filed in the Southern District of Florida on February 12, 2004. Plaintiffs had retained counsel a few months earlier in November 2003, who promptly advised the plaintiffs "to begin document collection and preservation," noting that "emails and electronic documents should be included in the production." The court ruled that the plaintiffs' preservation duty arose in April 2003. Discovery was stayed in June 2004 pursuant to the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act. Discovery resumed in April 2007. Most of the plaintiffs' major discovery violations occurred during the 14-month preservation and collection period in 2003-2004, before the case was transferred to the Southern District of New York on October 25, 2005.

The nature of the sanctionable conduct of two of the six groups of plaintiffs in Pension Committee, namely the Chagnon and Coronation plaintiffs, emphasizes the modest level of culpability sufficient to warrant sanctions in this case. The Chagnon plaintiffs produced a small number of emails from 1998 through 2002 and they asked only four of twelve "key players" for documents during the 2003-2004 discovery. Defendants suspected that relevant emails favorable to them were not produced. In support of their contention, they identified three emails that should have been, but had not been, produced from this period. In addition, the plaintiffs' erroneously declared that "all" documents had been produced. Solely on the basis of these grounds, the court found the Chagnon plaintiffs' conduct to be grossly negligent, warranting an adverse inference instruction and shifting the burden from the defendants to the plaintiffs to affirmatively show that the ESI was not relevant or favorable to the defendants.

The opinion in Pension Committee did not address whether there were any extenuating circumstances explaining the reasons why the Chagnon plaintiffs failed to request the remaining eight employees to produce documents. The opinion noted, however, that when discovery was resumed in 2007, several of the eight key players who were not asked to produce ESI in 2003-2004 later said that they "had no documents or had only a few that had already been produced." Whether the ESI from these eight employees might not have been relevant or may have been duplicative of the ESI obtained from the four key players was not discussed.

The Coronation plaintiffs were sanctioned for conduct in their offices in London and Cape Town, South Africa. Plaintiffs relied on an employee situated in the office's "due diligence area" to conduct the search in 2003-2004, even though she had little experience conducting ESI searches, received no instructions, and had no supervision or contact with counsel during the discovery. She searched the investment team's drive and she limited her search to asking three of twenty investment specialists on the team who were most likely to possess relevant ESI to respond to discovery requests. The court found the actions to be grossly negligent because she searched only one network drive, permitted other employees to conduct their own searches, and delegated the Cape Town office search without follow up. In addition, the defendant identified 39 emails in 2003 that should have been, but were not, produced.

These examples show a pattern of sloppy and careless preservation and collection efforts when measured against today's standards developed by case law and rules. But the nascent ESI-discovery jurisprudence was not fully developed in early 2004 when the plaintiffs' conduct occurred, and the precise jurisprudential limits on discovery obligations often varied depending on the jurisdiction (some of the law remains unsettled today).

In rendering its decision in Pension Committee, the court relied on its final Zubulake opinion issued in July 2004, which enumerated certain conduct that met the court's definition of gross negligence in the rapidly evolving ESI-discovery jurisprudence. Many, but not all, courts have adopted similar definitions, and a large number of courts has not addressed the issue. Consistent with the final 2004 Zubulake opinion, the court found the following failures to preserve ESI to be grossly negligent: (1) to issue a written litigation hold; (2) to identify all key players and to ensure that their electronic and paper records are preserved; (3) to cease the deletion of email or to preserve the records of former employees that are in a party's possession or control; (4) to preserve backup tapes when they are the sole source of relevant information or when they relate to key players, if the relevant information maintained by those players is not obtainable from readily accessible sources. Though some fundamental ESI preservation and collection principles were firmly established in 2003-2004 when the plaintiffs' sanctionable discovery conduct in Pension Committee occurred, not every obligation listed in Zubulake was recognized or was less well defined in many jurisdictions other than the Southern District of New York. Significantly, the ESI-discovery amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure would not take effect until December 2006, more than two years after the disputed conduct in the case.

The court in Pension Committee acknowledged the uncertainties in some of the discovery obligations. For example, it found that the failure to issue a written litigation hold in a timely manner by several other plaintiffs to be grossly negligent, yet it found the failure to do so to be only negligent - a finding that does not trigger an adverse inference instruction. The court concluded that the "failure to institute a written litigation hold in early 2004 in a case brought in federal court in Florida was on the borderline between a well-established duty and one that was not generally required." But it ruled, nonetheless, that the plaintiffs should have been aware of the other discovery obligations listed in Zubulake, including identifying "all" key players and suspending recycling of backup tapes when the existence of relevant ESI located in other sources is unknown - findings that do trigger an adverse inference instruction.

Lessons

The judge in Pension Committee found that the party responsible for losing or deleting ESI in a grossly negligent manner should bear the burden of proving that the ESI was not relevant or favorable to the opposing party. The ruling reflects a policy position that a party who fails to comply with its discovery obligations and causes ESI loss or deletion should be responsible to demonstrate that the ESI was not relevant nor prejudicial to the opposing party. Consistent with this policy, the court's definition of what conduct constitutes gross negligence was relatively broad, compared with other courts' definitions. On the other hand, the judge in Rimkus found that the party alleging loss or deletion of ESI should bear the burden of proving that the ESI was relevant and favorable to it - unless the opposing party's bad faith was shown. This ruling reflects a policy position that is sensitive to the very real practical difficulties that parties encounter in preserving and collecting all ESI, and it also recognizes the inevitable loss of some ESI despite the parties' best efforts to preserve and collect it.

In other words, Pension Committee places a thumb on the scale in favor of a party whose interests may have been harmed through no fault of its own as a result of ESI loss caused by the opposing party, underscoring the principle that each party should bear the risk of its own negligence. Conversely, Rimkus places the thumb on the scale in favor of the party who lost or deleted the ESI, in light of the practical recognition that despite a party's best efforts some ESI will inevitably be lost or deleted and the opposing party should not be given a windfall based on mere suspicion that relevant and favorable ESI might have been included in the loss or deletion.

Until uniform national standards governing severe discovery sanctions are promulgated, jurisdictions will continue to apply different standards of care to the preservation and collection of ESI based on their circuit case law, which either favor: (1) a party who may suffer prejudice because of ESI loss or deletion, or (2) a party who loses or deletes ESI absent a showing of bad faith. The decisions in Pension Committee, Rimkus, and Victor Stanley explain in great detail the various standards and how they are applied in the various jurisdictions. Beyond reading and understanding these three cases, the careful lawyer should be mindful of the possibility that a case originally filed in one jurisdiction may be transferred to another jurisdiction, whose jurisprudence may impose a stricter standard of discovery obligation care - a predicament that the plaintiffs in Pension Committee encountered. The obvious difficulty in making this judgment call is exacerbated by the fact that compliance with the strictest standard of care in every case can substantially increase discovery costs and burdens.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004. The views expressed in the commentary represent Mr. Rabiej's opinions and do not necessarily reflect the views of the rules committees.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

2 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Fraudulent Misjoinder: In re Prempro Prods. Liab. Litig.

2010 Emerging Issues 5360

Fraudulent Misjoinder: In re Prempro Prods. Liab. Litig.

By Georgene Vairo

October 19, 2010

SUMMARY: In re Prempro Prods. Liab. Litig. addresses the doctrine of fraudulent misjoinder. The Eighth Circuit held that any misjoinder of claims by women and survivors of women who were allegedly injured by taking hormone replacement therapy (HRT) drugs manufactured by a number of different companies was not so egregious as to constitute fraudulent misjoinder.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Georgene Vairo on In re Prempro Prods. Liab. Litig.

Summary. In re Prempro Prods. Liab. Litig., 591 F.3d 613, 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 239 (8th Cir. 2010), addresses the doctrine of fraudulent misjoinder. This doctrine is used by removing defendants who argue that the citizenship of some parties should be ignored for the purpose of determining whether complete diversity exists. Without deciding whether to adopt the doctrine of fraudulent misjoinder, the Eighth Circuit held that any misjoinder of claims by women and survivors of women who were allegedly injured by taking hormone replacement therapy (HRT) drugs manufactured by a number of different companies was not so egregious as to constitute fraudulent misjoinder. Although the Eighth Circuit declined to take a position on the viability of the doctrine, it did provide guidance with respect to the contours of the doctrine.

The Lawsuits. This case involved three lawsuits asserting various state-law claims. The Kirkland case was brought by 57 women who allegedly developed breast cancer after taking hormone replacement therapy (HRT) drugs manufactured, marketed, and sold by one or more of 11 manufacturers. Fourteen of the Kirkland plaintiffs were citizens of the same state as at least one of the manufacturers, and three of those 14 asserted claims against manufacturers with the same citizenship. The Jasperson suit was brought by the trustee of the next-of-kin of six decedents who allegedly developed breast cancer as a result of taking HRT drugs manufactured, marketed, and sold by one or more of six defendants. One of the decedents was a citizen of the same state as three of the companies that manufactured and marketed HRT drugs that she took. The Allen suit was brought by 60 women who allegedly developed breast cancer as a result of HRT medications manufactured, marketed, and sold by one or more of eight defendants. Five of the plaintiffs were citizens of the same state as at least one of the defendants, and three of these five asserted claims against manufacturers who were citizens of the same state.

Procedural History. The suits were all filed in Minnesota state court. The defendants removed all of them, claiming the federal district court had diversity jurisdiction because the plaintiffs had fraudulently misjoined claims that did not arise out of the same transaction or occurrence in order to defeat diversity jurisdiction. All three cases then came before the United States Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation (MDL) and were transferred to an MDL court. The MDL judge remanded the claims of seven plaintiffs who had asserted claims against defendants from their own states. The judge denied remand for the other 116 plaintiffs, concluding that there was no reason for the joinder of the nondiverse plaintiffs other than to defeat diversity jurisdiction. He then dismissed these claims because they duplicated previously filed California claims. The Eighth Circuit reversed the district court's orders denying remand and vacated the orders dismissing claims.

Fraudulent Misjoinder Doctrine. Courts have long recognized fraudulent joinder as an exception to the complete diversity rule [see 16 Moore's Federal Practice § 107.14[2][c][iv]]. Fraudulent joinder occurs when a plaintiff files a frivolous or illegitimate claim against a non-diverse defendant solely to prevent removal [see Filla v. Norfolk & Southern Ry., 336 F.3d 806, 809 (8th Cir. 2003)]. When determining if a party has been fraudulently joined, a court considers whether there is any reasonable basis in fact or law to support a claim against a nondiverse defendant, a relatively easy bar for a plaintiff to meet when seeking a remand on the ground that no party was fraudulently joined.

The fraudulent misjoinder doctrine, in contrast, is of relatively recent vintage. Sometimes referred to as "procedural misjoinder," the fraudulent misjoinder doctrine prevents a plaintiff from defeating diversity jurisdiction through the misjoinder of parties. Pursuant to the doctrine, diversity jurisdiction survives when a diverse defendant is joined with a nondiverse defendant as to whom there is no joint, several, or alternative liability and the claim against the diverse defendant has no real connection to the claim against the nondiverse defendant. The fraudulent misjoinder doctrine was first adopted by the Eleventh Circuit [see Tapscott v. MS Dealer Serv. Corp., 77 F.3d 1353, 1360 (11th Cir. 1996), abrogated on other grounds by Cohen v. Office Depot, Inc., 204 F.3d 1069 (11th Cir. 2000)]. According to the Eleventh Circuit, if a plaintiff so egregiously misjoins a party as a procedural matter - i.e., in violation of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 20 - such misjoinder can amount to "fraudulent joinder." The Eleventh Circuit cautioned that "mere misjoinder" is not fraudulent misjoinder. However, the plaintiffs' joinder of two groups of unrelated defendants was "so egregious as to constitute 'fraudulent joinder.'"

Although no other court of appeals has adopted the doctrine of fraudulent misjoinder, it has been acknowledged by the Fifth and Ninth Circuits [see Crockett v. R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., 436 F.3d 529, 533 (5th Cir. 2006); In re Benjamin Moore & Co., 309 F.3d 296, 298 (5th Cir. 2002); California Dump Truck Owners Ass'n v. Cummins Engine Co., 2001 U.S. App. LEXIS 26228, at 6 (9th Cir. Dec. 5, 2001)]. District court opinions on the subject have been mixed [compare Reed v. American Med. Sec. Group, Inc., 324 F. Supp. 2d 798, 805 (S.D. Miss. 2004) (adopting doctrine) with Osborn v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 341 F. Supp. 2d 1123, 1127 (E.D. Cal. 2004) (rejecting doctrine)].

The Eighth Circuit had not yet considered the doctrine. After surveying the doctrine, and stating that it had "no judgment on the propriety of the doctrine in this case," it declined to take a position on the validity of the fraudulent misjoinder doctrine, concluding instead that even if it adopted the doctrine, the alleged misjoinder in this case was not egregious.

Commentary. The Eighth Circuit clearly wanted to avoid the debate about whether the fraudulent misjoinder doctrine is valid. The fraudulent misjoinder doctrine developed by the Eleventh Circuit in Tapscott is based on the idea that the plaintiff's joinder of parties failed to meet the standard of Fed. R. Civ. P. 20, which requires that the joinder of parties arise out of the same transaction or occurrence or series of transactions or occurrences, and involve a common question of law or fact. If the joinder fails that test, then the court can ignore the claims of the party involved and disregard that party for complete diversity purposes.

The Eighth Circuit aptly noted other courts' mixed reactions to the Eleventh Circuit's approach in Tapscott. Some district courts have adopted the doctrine to ensure defendants their statutory right of removal to the federal courts by precluding plaintiffs from preventing removal to federal court [see, e.g., In re Diet Drugs, 1999 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11414, at *16-*17 (E.D. Pa. July 16, 1999) (explaining that plaintiffs' egregious misjoinder "wrongfully deprives Defendants of their right of removal"); Reed v. American Medical Sec. Group, Inc., 324 F. Supp. 2d 798, 805 (S.D. Miss. 2004) (adopting the fraudulent misjoinder doctrine because "diverse defendants ought not be deprived of their right to a federal forum by such a contrivance as this"); see also Laura J. Hines & Steven S. Gensler, Driving Misjoinder: The Improper Party Problem in Removal Jurisdiction, 57 Ala. L. Rev. 779, 825 (2006) (explaining that fraudulent misjoinder doctrine protects access to federal courts)].

Other courts have criticized the doctrine, arguing that questions of joinder under state law should not implicate federal subject matter jurisdiction. These courts also typically note the axiom that federal jurisdiction is to be narrowly construed [see, e.g., Osborn v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 341 F. Supp. 2d 1123, 1127 (E.D. Cal. 2004) (rejecting fraudulent misjoinder because "the last thing the federal courts need is more procedural complexity"); Rutherford v. Merck & Co., 428 F. Supp. 2d 842, 851 (S.D. Ill. 2006) (holding that Tapscott is an improper expansion of federal diversity jurisdiction, and misjoinder should be resolved by a state court)].

Indeed, the doctrine is an unpredictable and complex jurisdictional rule. It requires courts to delve into questions of federal joinder, i.e., the extent to which the standards of Fed. R. Civ. P. 20 had been met, as opposed to the substance of the state law claim and or the validity of the joinder under state law as a procedural matter. Thus, it goes well beyond the reach of the original fraudulent joinder doctrine. As the Eighth Circuit pointed out, even the courts within the Eleventh Circuit have had a difficult time determining what constitutes fraudulent misjoinder. Thus, the Eighth Circuit's approach is a sensible one: to analyze what is or is not "egregious" misjoinder. Although, as discussed below, figuring out what that is will also be a difficult proposition, it is more sensitive to the idea that the plaintiff is the master of the complaint.

No Fraudulent Misjoinder. The Eighth Circuit pointed out that Fed. R. Civ. P. 20(a)(1) allows multiple plaintiffs to join in a single action if (1) they assert claims "with respect to or arising out of the same transaction, occurrence, or series of transactions or occurrences"; and (2) "any question of law or fact common to all plaintiffs will arise in the action." "Transaction" is construed very broadly by the Eighth Circuit, permitting all reasonably related claims for relief by or against different parties to be tried in a single proceeding [Mosley v. General Motors Corp., 497 F.2d 1330, 1333 (8th Cir. 1974)].

The Eighth Circuit concluded that the defendants did not meet their burden of establishing that the plaintiffs' claims were egregiously misjoined. The court noted that the claims arose from a series of transactions between HRT pharmaceutical manufacturers and individuals that have used HRT drugs; the plaintiffs alleged that the manufacturers conducted a national sales and marketing campaign to falsely promote the safety and benefits of HRT drugs and understated the risk of the drugs; plaintiffs contended their claims were logically related because they each developed breast cancer as a result of the manufacturers' negligence in designing, manufacturing, testing, advertising, warning, marketing, and selling HRT drugs; and some of the plaintiffs allegedly took several HRT drugs made by different manufacturers. Moreover, given the nature of the claims, common questions of law and fact, such as the causal link between HRT drugs and breast cancer, were likely to arise.

Thus, the court could not say that the claims had no real connection to each other, as required to invoke the fraudulent misjoinder doctrine. Finally, the manufacturers presented no evidence that the plaintiffs joined their claims to avoid diversity jurisdiction, as required by most courts that do subscribe to the fraudulent misjoinder doctrine. With no evidence of bad faith, the Eighth Circuit declined to conclude the plaintiffs egregiously misjoined their claims, which meant that the district court did not have diversity jurisdiction and should have remanded the cases to state court.

The Eighth Circuit also noted that courts applying the fraudulent misjoinder doctrine have disagreed with whether federal or state rules on joinder apply post-Tapscott [compare Tapscott v. MS Dealer Service Corp., 77 F.3d 1353, 1360 (11th Cir. 1996), abrogated on other grounds by Cohen v. Office Depot, Inc., 204 F.3d 1069 (11th Cir. 2000) (applying, without analysis, the federal rules of joinder to determine that the plaintiffs egregiously misjoined the defendants), and Brooks v. Paulk & Cope, Inc., 176 F. Supp. 2d 1270, 1274 (M.D. Ala. 2001) (applying the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure), with Osborn v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 341 F. Supp. 2d 1123, 1128 (E.D. Cal. 2004) ("[M]ost courts looking at this issue have applied the state rule. This seems the better choice since the question is whether the parties were misjoined in state court."), and Asher v. 3M, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42266 at *33-*34 (E.D. Ky. June 30, 2005) (unreported) (stating that more courts apply state procedural rules)]. However, the Eighth Circuit, like so many others, could decline to address that choice of law issue because the standards for joinder under Fed. R. Civ. P. 20 and the relevant state law rule [see Minn. R. Civ. P. 20.0] were identical in all significant respects, and application of the state joinder rules did not affect the analysis.

Commentary. The fraudulent misjoinder doctrine is another tool used by defendants who seek to remove a case to federal court. The problem with the doctrine is that it is contrary to the idea that the plaintiff is master of the complaint because it asks the federal court to ignore parties properly joined by the plaintiff under the state procedural rules in the state in which the lawsuit was filed. By refusing to adopt the doctrine and by issuing a rather limited view of what amounts to fraudulent joinder, the Eighth Circuit correctly positions the plaintiff's choice of forum over that of the defendant.

Having said that, there is one part of the Eighth Circuit's test that is problematic. Whether a plaintiff joins certain parties to defeat diversity jurisdiction, in and of itself, should not be viewed as inappropriate in the sense that it might provide a basis for removal. As long as the plaintiff plays by the state's rules for joinder, it ought to be able to join whatever parties it wishes. In terms of the choice of law debate, Fed. R. Civ. P. 20 should not apply to the question of which parties were properly joined for diversity jurisdiction purposes. If state joinder rules are broader, then all parties properly joined should count.

RELATED LINKS: For further information, see Moore's Federal Practice:

- 15 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) 102.21[5][a];
- 16 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) 107.14[2][c][iv][A]

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

3 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Expansive View of Twombly and Iqbal: Tooley v. Napolitano

2010 Emerging Issues 5311

Expansive View of Twombly and Iqbal: Tooley v. Napolitano

By Georgene Vairo

September 21, 2010

SUMMARY: Tooley v. Napolitano ("Tooley II") is a significant case because it shows how the Supreme Court's landmark and controversial pleading opinion in Ashcroft v. Iqbal can effect a plaintiff's ability to survive a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The court seems to have abandoned the quite restrictive view of Twombly taken in the Aktieselskabet case and adopted a more expansive view of Twombly and Iqbal.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Georgene Vairo on Tooley v. Napolitano

Summary. Tooley v. Napolitano, 586 F.3d 1006, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 25175 (D.C. Cir. Nov. 17, 2009) ("Tooley II"), is a significant case because it shows how the Supreme Court's landmark and controversial pleading opinion in Ashcroft v. Iqbal [556 U.S. -, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009)], can effect a plaintiff's ability to survive a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim.

Facts and Procedural Background. The plaintiff sued various federal governmental authorities for infringing on his rights. The district court dismissed the complaint, and the D.C. Circuit originally reversed in Tooley v. Napolitano, 556 F.3d 836 (D.C. Cir. 2009) ("Tooley I"). In Tooley I, the D.C. Circuit held that the plaintiff's allegations, stating that he had been subjected to illegal wiretapping and other government surveillance, were sufficiently "plausible" to survive a motion to dismiss. On motion for rehearing, the D.C. Circuit withdrew its Tooley I opinion and instead ruled that the district court had properly dismissed the allegations. The Tooley I court had reversed the district court's dismissal for failure to state a claim, holding that the plaintiff's allegations were sufficiently plausible even under the pleading standard of Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly [550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007)]. However, the D.C. Circuit granted a rehearing in light of the Supreme Court's opinion in Ashcroft v. Iqbal [556 U.S. -, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009)], and held that the plaintiff's allegations failed to state a claim.

Plaintiff's Allegations. Alleging violations of his constitutional rights, the plaintiff brought suit against the U.S. Attorney General, the Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, and the Administrator of the Transportation Security Administration, all in their official capacities.

According to the complaint, the plaintiff had phoned an airline to buy tickets. At the end of the call, after he had provided the airline with his name and contact information, the representative asked him if he had any comments, and he suggested that the airline screen "100 percent of everything that went into the airline." In response to a further question he stated that without proper security members of the traveling public were "less safe due to the potential that those who wish to harm American citizens could put a bomb on a plane." The representative became alarmed and placed him on hold, and after 20 minutes he hung up.

He alleged that about a year and a half later he began to notice problematic phone connections, including intermittent clicking noises, and he stated on information and belief that these telephone problems were caused by illegal wiretaps placed on at least nine phones: his residential landline phone, his landline phone at his former residence, his cellular phone, his wife's cellular phone, the phones of his father, brother, sister, and in[§8209]laws, and his family's phone in another state where he was visiting his mother. He alleged that these wiretaps were placed in response to his comments to the airline representative.

The complaint also alleged that the government monitored his activities using "radio frequency identification tags" placed on his and his wife's vehicles, and that he had been subjected to detention and strict searches whenever he traveled. Also, in the week before and the week of a presidential visit to his home city, an officer in a Ford Crown Victoria had sat out in front of his home for approximately six hours a day.

Allegations Were Not Plausible. In Tooley II, the D.C. Circuit reviewed these allegations, noting that the plaintiff claimed that a year and a half after a conversation with an airline representative, the government launched a massive surveillance program against him, involving numerous wiretaps, tracking devices, and other acts of surveillance. Moreover, the program as alleged was both sloppy (as the wiretaps could be detected by the clicking noises), well beyond state of the art, and that the alleged motivation was bizarre. "We recognize that in a nation of 300 million people, with millions of government employees, some are bound at any given moment to be acting unwisely, foolishly, counterproductively, mistakenly, maliciously, viciously, even inanely. But the particular combination of sloth, fanaticism, inanity and technical genius alleged here seems to us to move these allegations into the realm of claims" that are essentially fictitious. Because the allegations constituted patently insubstantial claims, the D.C. Circuit finally concluded that district court was correct in its judgment of dismissal.

Commentary: Iqbal Impact. In Iqbal, the Supreme Court reaffirmed and extended the "plausibility" pleading standard it first developed in Twombly. The defendant in Tooley therefore argued that Iqbal invalidated the restrictive construction of Twombly previously advanced by the D.C. Circuit. In an earlier case the D.C. Circuit had concluded that Twombly left the long-standing fundamentals of notice pleading intact, and did not require any higher threshold for pleading [see Aktieselskabet Af 21 v. Fame Jeans Inc., 525 F.3d 8 (D.C. Cir. 2008)]. There, the court stated: "Over the years, courts have tended to drift away from this standard by imposing various requirements of particularity. ... The Supreme Court has continually pruned back such requirements, with the admonition that we are not to impose heightened pleading requirements. ... After decades of such consistency, we will not lightly assume the Supreme Court intended to tighten pleading standards. ... Indeed, the Court has indicated quite clearly that it meant no such thing." [Aktieselskabet Af 21 v. Fame Jeans Inc., 525 F.3d 8, 16-17 (D.C. Cir. 2008) (Twombly was concerned with plausibility of inference of conspiracy, not with plausibility of claim)]. In Tooley I, the D.C. Circuit appeared to adopt that restrictive reading of Twombly. In Tooley II, the D.C. Circuit did not directly repudiate its Aktieselskabet opinion, but it stated that "[w]hile we do not reject the government's argument [that Iqbal invalidated Aktieselskabet], upon reflection we believe that we should affirm the district court in this case for reasons distinct from but not inconsistent with the holding in Iqbal."

Accordingly, while the court declined to say so directly, it seems to have abandoned the quite restrictive view of Twombly taken in the Aktieselskabet case and adopted a more expansive view of Twombly and Iqbal that provides greater leeway for the district court to dismiss.

The bottom line here is that the District of Columbia Circuit first took a restrictive view of Twombly, holding that it left the long-standing fundamentals of notice pleading intact, and did not require any higher threshold for pleading. In fact, in Tooley I, the plaintiffs survived Twombly [Tooley v. Napolitano, 556 F.3d 836, 839-841 (D.C. Cir. 2009) (plaintiff's allegations that he had been subjected to illegal wiretapping and other government surveillance were sufficiently plausible so that district court had erred by dismissing complaint)]. In Tooley I, the D.C. Circuit said that the complaint in Twombly was insufficient because it failed to meet the threshold requirement that the statement of a claim show that the pleader is entitled to relief, not because it failed to meet a higher requirement for allegations that were particularized. But, Tooley II shows the dramatic impact that Iqbal can have. In Tooley I, the District of Columbia Circuit held that the plaintiff's allegations that he had been subjected to illegal wiretapping and other government surveillance were sufficiently plausible under the Twombly standard. Then, after Iqbal was decided, the court granted rehearing and reached the opposite conclusion- that the allegations were not plausible, but constituted "patently insubstantial claims."

RELATED LINKS: For further information, see Moore's Federal Practice:

- 2 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 8.04[1][a]

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

4 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Plaintiff's Service Obligations in a Removed Case: Wallace v. Microsoft Corp.

2010 Emerging Issues 5313

Plaintiff's Service Obligations in a Removed Case: Wallace v. Microsoft Corp.

By Georgene Vairo

September 21, 2010

SUMMARY: Wallace v. Microsoft Corp. discusses the plaintiff's service obligations in a removed case. The Tenth Circuit held that a plaintiff whose case is removed to federal court before service is perfected in state court has 120 days from the date of removal in which to perfect service.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Georgene Vairo on Wallace v. Microsoft Corp.

Summary. Wallace v. Microsoft Corp., 596 F.3d 703, 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 3184 (10th Cir. Feb. 18, 2010), discusses the plaintiff's service obligations in a removed case. The Tenth Circuit held that a plaintiff whose case is removed to federal court before service is perfected in state court has 120 days from the date of removal in which to perfect service.

Facts and Procedural History. A former Microsoft employee was fired on May 27, 2005. He sued the company in a Kansas court for retaliatory discharge, breach of an employment contract, outrage, and various state and federal statutory claims. The petition was filed in state court on May 18, 2007, and served on Microsoft's registered agent on June 28, 2007. On August 15, having been served with the petition but not the summons, Microsoft removed the case to federal district court. On August 23, the plaintiff served a summons and another copy of the petition on Microsoft. The district court dismissed the common-law tort claims on the ground they were untimely under Kansas's two-year statute of limitation and granted summary judgment to Microsoft on the breach of contract claim. The Tenth Circuit affirmed the summary judgment on the contract claim but reversed the dismissal of the tort claims and remanded the case to the district court for further proceedings.

Analysis. Under Kansas law, the plaintiff had until May 27, 2007, to sue. Both the petition and the summons have to be served to "commence" an action in Kansas [Kan. Stat. Ann. § 60-304(e)], but if process is served within 90 days after the petition is filed, the filing date is deemed the date of commencement [Kan. Stat. Ann. § 60-203]. In other words, under Kansas law, the employee had until August 16, 2007, to serve the petition and summons on Microsoft. His actual service on August 23, 2007, was outside the 90-day grace period, so if the suit had stayed in the Kansas court, dismissal of the tort claims would have been required.

Unfortunately for Microsoft, its removal to federal court one day before the Kansas grace period expired changed the timetable for service. According to the Tenth Circuit, removed cases are governed by federal law with regard to procedural matters. Thus, the case was now governed by 28 U.S.C. § 1448, and Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 4(m) and 81(c). Section 1448 provides as follows [28 U.S.C. § 1448]:

In all cases removed from any State court to any district court of the United States in which any one or more of the defendants has not been served with process or in which the service has not been perfected prior to removal, or in which process served proves to be defective, such process or service may be completed or new process issued in the same manner as in cases originally filed in such district court.

Rule 81(c) states that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure "apply to a civil action after it is removed from a state court" [Fed. R. Civ. P. 81(c)]. Rule 4(m) gives plaintiffs 120 days to serve the defendant [Fed. R. Civ. P. 4(m)].

The Tenth Circuit agreed with Microsoft that service was not perfected when the case was removed, because the summons had not yet been served. However, the court agreed with the plaintiff that Section 1448 and Rule 4(m) gave the plaintiff an additional 120 days after removal in which to perfect service. Because the plaintiff's actual service on August 23, 2007 was within this 120-day period, the district court erred in dismissing the state law tort claims. The Tenth Circuit noted that had Microsoft waited one more day to remove the case, the tort claims would have become stale in the state court, and in that case, they could not have been revived by removal.

Commentary. The result here presents an important practical lesson to be learned. Microsoft did what many defendants do: it removed a state claim based case to federal court under its diversity jurisdiction. Had the case stayed in a Kansas court, the Kansas court surely would have found that the defendant was served well after the grace period had expired and would have dismissed the plaintiff's claims as barred by the statute of limitations. In other words, it is important for counsel to make sure that it is in a defendant's best interest to remove. At the very least, in this case, Microsoft could have removed the case after the grace period expired. As the Tenth Circuit pointed out, had Microsoft waited until August 16, 2007 to remove, a federal court would have dismissed the case as time-barred as well. It quoted a Third Circuit opinion: "§ 1448 cannot be utilized to breathe jurisprudential life in federal court in a case legally dead in state court" [see Witherow v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 530 F.2d 160, 168 (3d Cir. 1976); see also Marshall v. Warwick, 155 F.3d 1027, 1033 (8th Cir. 1998) ("[w]e do not believe that this section [§ 1448] can 'resurrect' a removed diversity case which would have been dismissed as time-barred had it remained in state court")].

Beyond the practical lesson, however, is the question whether the Tenth Circuit was correct to refuse to dismiss on Kansas statute of limitations grounds. It correctly determined that federal service rules applied under § 1448. However, the court did not deal with the implicit Erie issue. It is one thing to say that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure apply. It is another to say that application of a Federal Rule can trump a state rule with a substantive impact. With respect to this case, it is unquestionably true that federal methods for service of process, including the 120-day rule for completing service, apply [see Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460, 850 S. Ct. 1136, 14 L. Ed. 2d 8 (1965)]. However, the Supreme Court has held that the federal rule of civil procedure, Rule 3, regarding commencement of a lawsuit must give way to the state statute of limitations [see Walker v. Armco Steel Corp., 446 U.S. 740, 749-753, 100 S. Ct. 1978, 64 L. Ed. 2d 659 (1980)].

RELATED LINKS: For further information, see Moore's Federal Practice:

- 1-4 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 4.80;
- 14-81 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 81.04[3];
- 16-107 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 107.31[4 & 5];
- 17A-124 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 124.03[2][a]

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

5 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Plausibility Pleading as Applied to a Class-of-One Equal Protection Claim

2010 Emerging Issues 5314

Plausibility Pleading as Applied to a Class-of-One Equal Protection Claim

By Allan Ides

September 21, 2010

SUMMARY: In Ruston v. Town Board for Town of Skaneateles, the Second Circuit applied the "plausibility" pleading standard created in Ashcroft v. Iqbal to a complaint asserting a class-of-one equal protection claim. In upholding the district court's dismissal of the complaint, the appellate court underscored the difference between federal pleading standards pre- and post-Iqbal.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Allan Ides on Plausibility Pleading as Applied to a Class-of-One Equal Protection Claim

Introduction. In Ruston v. Town Board for Town of Skaneateles, 610 F.3d 55, 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 13920 (2d Cir. July 18, 2010), the Second Circuit applied the "plausibility" pleading standard created in Ashcroft v. Iqbal to a complaint asserting a class-of-one equal protection claim. In upholding the district court's dismissal of the complaint, the appellate court underscored the difference between federal pleading standards pre- and post-Iqbal.

Background. The plaintiffs brought a class-of-one equal protection claim against various local authorities - the Village of Skaneateles, the Town Board of Skaneateles, the Town Planning Board, and several individual members of these boards - alleging that the named defendants had frustrated plaintiffs' efforts to subdivide and develop a 27-acre lakefront lot. The complaint alleged that the defendants had raised a number of obstacles to the development and had delayed responding to their application until after a new zoning law went into effect. The application was then rejected under this new law, which plaintiffs alleged was specifically designed to block their proposed development. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim, citing the inadequacy of plaintiffs' pleading. The district court eventually dismissed the case, and the plaintiffs appealed.

A "Clarified" Pleading Standard. The Second Circuit began by observing that the pleading standards required to withstand a motion to dismiss had been "clarified" in Ashcroft v. Iqbal [- U.S. -, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009)] and Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly [550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007)]. In accord with those decisions, only a complaint that states a "plausible" claim for relief will survive. Determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief is a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense. Under this approach, legal conclusions must be supported by factual allegations. When there are well-pleaded factual allegations, a court should assume their veracity and then determine whether those factual allegations plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief.

District courts in the Second Circuit had differed as to the impact of this clarified pleading standard on class-of-one equal protection claims. This uncertainty, the court of appeals said, was attributable to the tension between the above Supreme Court precedents and DeMuria v. Hawkes [328 F.3d 704, 707 (2d Cir. 2003)], which had held (under the former pleading standard) that a class-of-one claim is adequately pleaded ("albeit barely" so) even without the specification of other persons similarly situated (an element of the claim).

The Second Circuit explained, however, that Iqbal's "plausibility" standard superseded DeMuria's "general allegation" standard. Under the new standard, a court may rely only on non-conclusory factual allegations in the complaint to determine whether the complaint plausibly suggests an entitlement to relief. General allegations would not suffice as to any element of the claim, for the surviving "factual allegations must be sufficient to support necessary legal conclusions."

Plaintiffs Failed To State Claim on Which Relief Could Be Granted. The plaintiffs argued that they had sufficiently alleged a class-of-one equal protection claim. On the merits, such a claim may succeed only when the plaintiff successfully establishes that she has been intentionally treated differently from others similarly situated and there is no rational basis for the difference in treatment. Village of Willowbrook v. Olech [528 U.S. 562, 564, 120 S. Ct. 1073, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1060 (2000)].

In the Second Circuit's view, however, the complaint failed to allege facts that plausibly suggested an entitlement to relief. The plaintiffs' argument was that the defendants had refused to consider their application while considering applications of other persons similarly situated. However, plaintiffs did not allege any specific examples of other proceedings by the Town, let alone any applications by other persons similarly situated. The plaintiffs also alleged that other properties were allowed to connect to the local sewer system, while their own requests were denied. The court was required to accept these factual allegations as true. However, the other properties plaintiffs identified were not sufficiently similar—they were individual homes or commercial properties. None was a development of the type the plaintiffs proposed. Class-of-one plaintiffs must show an extremely high degree of similarity, such that no rational person could regard the circumstances to differ to a degree that would justify the differential treatment. That was not the case here. As the plaintiffs had failed to allege that other persons or properties sufficiently similar to theirs were treated more favorably, plaintiffs had failed to plausibly state a class-of-one equal protection claim.

Commentary. Although the Supreme Court in Ashcroft v. Iqbal asserted that it was not adopting a new pleading standard, the reality appears to be otherwise. The decision in Ruston provides yet another example of the impact of the new plausibility standard. General allegations once deemed sufficient to support a class-of-one equal protection claim no longer suffice. Moreover, given the new standard's emphasis on the pleading of facts to support all "necessary legal conclusions," it appears that plausibility pleading tracks very closely the standards of fact pleading.

RELATED LINKS: For further information, see Moore's Federal Practice:

- 2-8 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 8.04

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Allan Ides is the Christopher N. May Chair at Loyola Law School Los Angeles. He has published extensively in the areas of constitutional law and federal procedure. His civil procedure casebook, co-authored with Christopher N. May - Civil Procedure: Cases and Problems (Aspen 2009) - is in its third edition.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

6 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Allan Ides on Intervention, Realignment and Supplemental Jurisdiction

2010 Emerging Issues 5315

Allan Ides on Intervention, Realignment and Supplemental Jurisdiction

By Allan Ides

September 21, 2010

SUMMARY: In Price v. Wolford, the Tenth Circuit held that the intervention of a state Medicaid agency to assert its right to a share of settlement proceeds from a medical malpractice case did not deprive the district court of diversity jurisdiction despite the fact that the agency was not a "citizen of a state" within the meaning of the diversity statute.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Allan Ides on Intervention, Realignment and Supplemental Jurisdiction

Introduction. In Price v. Wolford [608 F.3d 698, 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 12411 (10th Cir. June 17, 2010)], the Tenth Circuit held that the intervention of a state Medicaid agency to assert its right to a share of settlement proceeds from a medical malpractice case did not deprive the district court of diversity jurisdiction despite the fact that the agency was not a "citizen of a state" within the meaning of the diversity statute.

Facts and Proceedings. The plaintiffs' child was born with severe brain damage and other disabilities. As a condition of receiving Medicaid benefits for the child, the mother assigned the right to receive any payments from a third party for the child's medical care to the state Medicaid agency. In the first four years of the child's life, the agency paid $544,282 for the child's medical expenses.

In federal district court, the plaintiffs sued the doctor who delivered the child. Jurisdiction was based on diversity: the plaintiffs were residents of Oklahoma and the doctor was a resident of Maryland. The plaintiffs' expert estimated the cost of the child's lifetime medical care at just over $12 million. The parties then agreed to settle the malpractice claim for $1.1 million. Counsel for the Medicaid agency was present and did not object. However, when the plaintiffs and the doctor asked the district court to approve the settlement with an allocation of only $37,667 to the Medicaid agency in full satisfaction of its lien and another $30,000 to go to the father as reimbursement for expenses he had incurred in caring for the child, the agency objected.

The court allowed the agency to intervene so that it could file a brief with respect to the settlement. The district court increased the agency's share of the settlement by the $30,000 that the settlement agreement had allocated to the father, for a total award to the agency of $67,667. The agency asked the court to modify its judgment or dismiss the action on the ground its intervention destroyed diversity. The court refused, and the agency appealed. The Tenth Circuit held that the agency's intervention did not destroy the district court's jurisdiction, but reversed and remanded the case for further proceedings with respect to allocation of the settlement proceeds.

Agency's Intervention Did Not Destroy Diversity Jurisdiction. For purposes of the diversity discussion, the Tenth Circuit assumed that the agency was an alter ego of the State of Oklahoma and therefore not a citizen of a state for purposes of diversity jurisdiction. Hence, the agency could not sue or be sued in diversity. Nonetheless, the panel concluded that the agency's intervention in the lawsuit did not destroy the diversity jurisdiction that existed when the suit was filed.

The Tenth Circuit explained that a district court's jurisdiction ordinarily depends on the state of things when the action is brought, and there was no doubt that the district court had diversity jurisdiction when the malpractice suit was filed. Moreover, the court explained, once a district court has jurisdiction, additional claims and parties can be added to a suit under the supplemental jurisdiction statute as long as the claims "are so related to claims in the action within such original jurisdiction that they form part of the same case or controversy under Article II of the United States Constitution" [see 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a)]. A claim is part of the same case or controversy if it derives from a common nucleus of operative fact. The agency's claim for a share of the settlement proceeds clearly arose out of the same facts as the underlying tort claim.

There are exceptions to the exercise of supplemental jurisdiction with respect to claims by persons seeking to intervene as plaintiffs under Rule 24 or claims by plaintiffs against persons made parties under that rule [see 28 U.S.C. § 1367(b); Fed. R. Civ. P. 24]. But, as the court explained, neither exception applied because the agency intervened as a defendant, not as a plaintiff, and because the plaintiff did not make any claim against the intervening agency. In short, § 1367(a) permitted the exercise of supplemental jurisdiction over the agency's claim and § 1367(b) imposed no limits on exercise of that jurisdiction.

Agency Not Realigned as Plaintiff. Because an exception to supplemental jurisdiction might apply if the agency were realigned as a plaintiff, the Tenth Circuit considered whether realignment was required. [Note: Section 1367(b) provides that a district court may not exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a person seeking to intervene as a plaintiff under Rule 24 if doing so would be inconsistent with the jurisdictional standards of 28 U.S.C. § 1332. Both of these elements would be satisfied if the "non-citizen" agency were treated as an intervening plaintiff, i.e., intervention as a plaintiff under Rule 24 would combine with the destruction of complete diversity.] Citing Moore's, the court noted that there is a circuit split as to the test to use for determining whether to realign a party. Under the primary-purpose test, the parties must be realigned if there is no adversity with regard to the primary issue in dispute. Under the substantial-conflict-of-interest test, a party need not be realigned as long as it has an "actual and substantial conflict" with a party on the other side. This is so even if the conflict is not over the primary issue in dispute. As a third alternative, which is similar to the substantial-conflict-of-interest test, a party need not be realigned so long as there is a "collision of interests" with an opposing party. Again, this collision need not be over the primary issue in dispute.

The Tenth Circuit follows the substantial-conflict-of-interest test. Under that test, there was no reason to realign the agency. There was a substantial conflict between the agency and the plaintiffs, in that any amount going to the agency would be taken from the plaintiffs' recovery. Therefore, the Tenth Circuit concluded, it could not realign the agency as a plaintiff, and the district court retained jurisdiction over the entire suit after the agency's intervention as a defendant.

Commentary. The Tenth Circuit's application of the substantial-conflict-of-interest test is a textbook example of that test applied. Moreover, this approach to realignment (also followed by the Seventh and Eighth Circuits) offers an eminently sensible way to address the problem of realignment. It ensures an actual controversy between opposing parties and at the same time permits a flexibility in joinder that promotes a complete resolution of the underlying controversy. The same can be said of the very similar "collision of interests" test followed by the Second Circuit. By way of contrast, the "primary purpose" test (followed by the Third, Fifth, Sixth, and Ninth Circuits) is more difficult to apply, because it is not always easy to identify the primary purpose, which may change during the course of litigation, and because it is less likely to promote an efficient resolution of the overall controversy. Thus, the mechanics of the test might require dismissal when the logic of efficient resolution would not.

RELATED LINKS: For further information, see Moore's Federal Practice

- 15-102 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 102.16;
- 15-102 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 102.20;
- 16-106 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 106.05;
- 16-106 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 106.46.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Allan Ides is the Christopher N. May Chair at Loyola Law School Los Angeles. He has published extensively in the areas of constitutional law and federal procedure. His civil procedure casebook, co-authored with Christopher N. May - Civil Procedure: Cases and Problems (Aspen 2009) - is in its third edition.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

7 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

FDIC Removal Jurisdiction

2010 Emerging Issues 5303

FDIC Removal Jurisdiction

By Georgene Vairo

September 16, 2010

SUMMARY: Two recent cases out of the Fifth and Eighth Circuits involve the intersection between a special removal statute and the power or duty of a federal court to retain claims that were not the basis for removal under that statute. Taking sides on an issue that has divided the courts of appeals, the Fifth and Eighth Circuits have ruled that a district court has original jurisdiction over state-law claims, and must retain jurisdiction over them.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Summary. Two recent cases out of the Fifth Circuit [Adair v. Lease Partners, Inc., 587 F.3d 238, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 23847 (5th Cir. Oct. 28, 2009), cert. denied, 130 S. Ct. 3326, 176 L. Ed. 2d 1221, 2010 U.S. LEXIS 4355 (May 24, 2010)] and Eighth Circuit [Casey v. FDIC, 583 F.3d 586, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 22831 (8th Cir. Oct. 20, 2009), cert. denied, 130 S. Ct. 2062, 176 L. Ed. 2d 414, 2010 U.S. LEXIS 2858 (Mar. 29, 2010)] involve the intersection between a special removal statute and the power or duty of a federal court to retain claims that were not the basis for removal under that statute. Taking sides on an issue that has divided the courts of appeals, the Fifth Circuit and Eighth Circuit have ruled that a district court has original jurisdiction over state-law claims, and must retain jurisdiction over them, in a case that the FDIC removes to federal court even after the FDIC is dismissed from the case and even if there is no successor in interest to the FDIC. Jurisdiction over all the claims in such a case is original jurisdiction, and, therefore, the district court cannot exercise discretion under the supplemental jurisdiction statute to decline to exercise jurisdiction over the state law claims against parties other than the FDIC.

Facts and Procedural Background. In Adair, a group of pharmacies, pharmacists, veterinarians, and veterinary clinics sued a group of salespeople and financial institutions, in state court alleging state law fraud, negligence, breach of contract, and usury claims. After 11 years of litigation, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) entered the case as a receiver for a bank that was a successor to one of the original defendants. The FDIC removed the case to federal district court pursuant to 12 U.S.C. § 1819(b)(2). The plaintiffs then moved to dismiss all claims against the FDIC and to remand the remaining claims to state court. The district court granted both motions, finding that once the FDIC was dismissed, only supplemental jurisdiction supported the remaining claims and that it was not required to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over those claims. The defendants appealed the remand. The Fifth Circuit reversed, reinstating the state law claims in federal court. Section 1819(b)(2) provided original jurisdiction over all claims in the case, and, therefore, the exercise of that jurisdiction was mandatory for the district court.

In Casey, seven homeowners sued their mortgage lenders in state court, alleging that they engaged in the unauthorized practice of law by charging a fee for the preparation of loan documents by non-lawyers. The state court dismissed the claims against four lenders who were federal savings associations (FSAs) on the ground the claims were preempted by federal law. While that decision was on appeal, the FDIC was substituted for one of the lenders. The FDIC removed the case to federal district court pursuant to 12 U.S.C. § 1819(b)(2). The district court denied a motion by one homeowner to dismiss the claims against the FDIC, did not rule on a motion by the remaining homeowners to remand the appeal to the state court of appeals, adopted the state court's preemption decision, and transferred the appeal to the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals. The Eighth Circuit granted the motion to dismiss the FDIC, but denied the motion to remand the remaining claims and affirmed dismissal of those claims on the ground of preemption.

In sum, in both cases, the courts of appeals found that even after the FDIC is dismissed, there is continuing jurisdiction over all claims remaining against non-FDIC defendants. Both courts explored the extent to which a district court has discretion to dismiss, and found that there was no such discretion. The United States Supreme Court denied certiorari in both cases, letting stand in both cases an expansive interpretation of the exercise of federal judicial power under the FDIC removal statute.

FDIC Removal Statute. 12 U.S.C. § 1819(b)(2)(A) provides that "all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity to which the [FDIC], in any capacity, is a party shall be deemed to arise under the laws of the United States." 12 U.S.C. § 1819(b)(2)(B) further provides that the FDIC "may, without bond or security, remove any action, suit, or proceeding from a State court to the appropriate United States district court before the end of the 90-day period beginning on the date the action, suit, or proceeding is filed against the [FDIC] or the [FDIC] is substituted as a party." According to the Fifth Circuit in Adair, the statute creates a conclusive presumption that all suits to which the FDIC is a party, and all component claims in those suits, arise under the laws of the United States and, thus, are within the original subject matter jurisdiction of the proper federal district court [Buchner v. FDIC, 981 F.2d 816, 819 (5th Cir. 1993)]. Thus, the statute provides jurisdiction over suits whose causes of action may otherwise depend largely, if not exclusively, on state law and that may not otherwise be subject to federal question jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331, the general federal question statute.

Circuit Split as to Effect of FDIC Dismissal. The statute does not address what happens to the district court's jurisdiction over state law claims against remaining parties if the FDIC is dismissed as a party. The courts of appeals had split on the question whether the district court has discretion to exercise jurisdiction over such claims. The Fifth and Second Circuits hold that federal jurisdiction continues, and, therefore, that the federal court lacks the power to remand such claims [see FDIC v. Four Star Holding Co., 178 F.3d 97, 100-101 (2d Cir. 1999); Federal Sav. & Loan Ins. Corp. v. Griffin, 935 F.2d 691, 697 (5th Cir. 1991)].

Taking a different tack, the Third Circuit held that only supplemental jurisdiction remains over such claims [see New Rock Asset Partners, L.P. v. Preferred Entity Advancements, Inc., 101 F.3d 1492, 1494-1495 (3d Cir. 1996)]. If only supplemental jurisdiction remains, the district court has discretion to decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction [see 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c)]. And, the supplemental jurisdiction remand provision provides that an appropriate situation for refusing to exercise supplemental jurisdiction is if all claims in the court's original jurisdiction have been resolved [see 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c)(3)].

Before its decision in Casey, the Eighth Circuit had implicitly adopted the Third Circuit's reasoning in a case that was removed by the Resolution Trust Corporation (RTC) under an analogous statute. When the RTC was dismissed from the case, the district court remanded the case, and the Eighth Circuit reviewed the remand for abuse of discretion -- the standard applicable when determining whether the district court correctly exercised its discretion to remand under the supplemental jurisdiction statute [see Myers v. Moore Eng'g Inc., 42 F.3d 452, 455 (8th Cir. 1994)].

Fifth Circuit Holds Jurisdiction Continues. The Fifth Circuit based its analysis on earlier precedent. In Federal Sav. & Loan Ins. Corp. v. Griffin, the Fifth Circuit had held that the district court retains jurisdiction even after the FDIC is dismissed. The Griffin court based its holdings on two rationales. First, the power to remove is evaluated at the time of removal, so the FDIC's later dismissal cannot defeat jurisdiction. Second, federal policy interests favor recognizing jurisdiction over the FDIC's successor in interest [Federal Sav. & Loan Ins. Corp. v. Griffin, 935 F.2d 691, 696 (5th Cir. 1991)].

In Adair, the Fifth Circuit followed Griffin. The court reasoned that under Griffin, the jurisdiction retained by the district court after the FDIC was dismissed arose under § 1819(b)(2), which extends to all claims in the "suit," regardless of their state or federal origin. Thus, remand was inappropriate, because the district court retained original jurisdiction over all of the claims in the case.

Absence of FDIC Successor Irrelevant. The Fifth Circuit acknowledged that the Griffin court cited the existence of a successor in interest to the FDIC as part of its rationale for continued jurisdiction, and there was no federal successor in interest in Adair. However, the Griffin court relied on the time-of-filing rationale for recognizing federal jurisdiction under its interpretation of § 1819(b)(2), with the federal policy concerns cited only as "[f]urther" justifications. Moreover, other Fifth Circuit cases following Griffin cite only the time-of-filing rationale as the reason for recognizing original jurisdiction, and at least one of these cases recognized original jurisdiction based on § 1819(b)(2) when no successor in interest to the FDIC remained in the case [see Walker v. Federal Deposit Ins. Corp., 970 F.2d 114, 120 (5th Cir. 1992)]. Accordingly, the court concluded, after the FDIC was dismissed, original jurisdiction continued pursuant to § 1819(b)(2) even in the absence of a successor in interest to the FDIC.

District Court Exceeded Authority. The Fifth Circuit concluded that the district court exceeded its authority by remanding the case after the FDIC was dismissed. Even after the FDIC's dismissal, all claims in the case continued to "arise under the laws of the United States" pursuant to § 1819(b)(2). Therefore, the district court had original jurisdiction, exercise of which was mandatory. Because the court found original federal jurisdiction over all claims in the instant case pursuant to § 1819(b)(2), it did not address whether appellees' federally preempted usury claims also provided continuing federal jurisdiction, or whether the state fraud and negligence claims were "separate and independent" so as to otherwise be subject to remand under 28 U.S.C. § 1441(c).

Eighth Circuit holds that District Court Retains Jurisdiction After Dismissal of FDIC. In Casey, the homeowners argued that dismissal of the claim against the FDIC deprived the Eighth Circuit of subject matter jurisdiction over the state law claims against the remaining FSA lenders. Therefore, they argued, the case had to be remanded to state court under 28 U.S.C. § 1447(c), which requires remand of a case removed to federal court if it is determined at any time that the federal court does not have subject matter jurisdiction. The Eighth Circuit rejected this argument, concluding that it retained subject matter jurisdiction under 12 U.S.C. § 1819(b)(2)(A).

The Eighth Circuit had not previously considered whether remand is required when the FDIC has been dismissed from a case predicated on § 1819(b)(2) jurisdiction. However, the court harkened back to a Resolution Trust case that the Fifth Circuit had not discussed in Adair. In the earlier Eighth Circuit case, the court held that dismissal of the Resolution Trust Corporation (RTC) from a case predicated on 12 U.S.C. § 1441a(a)(11) jurisdiction does not deprive federal courts of subject matter jurisdiction over remaining state law claims for which no other basis of jurisdiction existed. In that case, the court had reasoned that under § 1441a(a)(11), once the RTC becomes a party to the case, the entire action is "deemed to arise under the laws of the United States" and, thus, is within the original jurisdiction of the district court [Kansas Pub. Employees Retirement Sys. v. Reimer & Koger Assocs., 77 F.3d 1063, 1067 (8th Cir. 1996)]. Because the language of § 1441a(a)(11) tracks that of § 1819(b)(2)(A), the Eighth Circuit concluded that the same reasoning applies to suits against the FDIC. Therefore, federal courts have "arising under" jurisdiction over all claims in a case to which the FDIC is a party, and dismissal of the claim against the FDIC does not require remand of the remaining claims to state court.

This ruling put the Eighth Circuit and the Fifth Circuit on par with respect to the continuing jurisdiction of the federal court, and set the table for other arguments regarding whether the district court had any discretion to dismiss the remaining claims. The Fifth Circuit analysis dealt with the question whether supplemental, as opposed to original, jurisdiction supported the remaining claims, thereby potentially making them subject to remand under § 1367(c). The Eighth Circuit dealt with a different set of objections to continuing federal jurisdiction.

Unanimity Not Required for FDIC Removal. The Eighth Circuit also rejected the argument that the failure of all defendants to join the removal motion required remand. The court acknowledged that when a case is removed under 28 U.S.C. § 1446(a), the rule of unanimity ordinarily requires remand unless all the defendants joined in the motion. However, the court held that under 12 U.S.C. § 1819(b)(2)(B), the FDIC may unilaterally remove a case, without regard to consent by other defendants. Reading a unanimity requirement into the statute would undermine the broad removal power granted to the FDIC, the Eighth Circuit concluded. In a case in which the FDIC was a plaintiff, the Second Circuit had similarly held that the unanimity rule does not apply to cases removed by the FDIC under § 1819 [Franklin Nat'l Bank Sec. Litig. v. Andersen, 532 F.2d 842, 846 (2d Cir. 1976)].

Discretionary Remand Under § 1441(c) Inappropriate. Next, the Eighth Circuit, like the Fifth Circuit had in Adair, rejected the argument that remand was appropriate as a matter of judicial discretion under 28 U.S.C. § 1441(c), which permits a federal court to "remand all [otherwise nonremovable] matters in which State law predominates" to state court when a case arising under federal law has been removed from state court. The court questioned whether § 1441(c) applies to a suit removed by the FDIC pursuant to § 1819(b)(2)(B). In any event, the court reasoned, state law did not predominate in the remaining claims, because the sole issue on appeal was whether a federal regulation preempts the Missouri laws on which the homeowners based their claims, and preemption is always a federal question [see Int'l Longshoreman's Ass'n v. Davis, 476 U.S. 380, 388, 106 S. Ct. 1904, 90 L. Ed. 2d 389 (1986)].

Burford Abstention Inappropriate. Finally, the Eighth Circuit held that Burford abstention was not appropriate. A court may abstain under Burford when a state has established a complex regulatory scheme supervised by state courts and serving important state interests and when resolution of the case demands specialized knowledge and the application of complicated state laws [Melahn v. Pennock Ins., Inc., 965 F.2d 1497, 1506 (8th Cir. 1992); see Burford v. Sun Oil Co., 319 U.S. 315, 63 S. Ct. 1098, 87 L. Ed. 1424 (1943)]. It is appropriate only with respect to equitable claims [Barzilay v. Barzilay, 536 F.3d 844, 850-851 (8th Cir. 2008)]. In this case, Burford abstention was inappropriate because (1) there was no indication that Missouri's prohibition of the unauthorized practice of law constituted "a complex regulatory scheme," and (2) the plaintiffs prayed for only monetary relief.

Commentary. Judge Jolly concurred in the Fifth Circuit Adair case. He argued that once the FDIC and its interests had been dismissed, there was no longer any federal character in the state claims. He concurred in the result, however, because federal usury claims and related state-law claims that could not be remanded remained in the case. It is important to consider his argument. There is no question that there was federal jurisdiction over all claims when they were removed by the FDIC. The question is whether supplemental or original jurisdiction supported federal jurisdiction because the answer to that question drives whether the district court has the power to dismiss the non-FDIC claims. In turn, that provides a basis for opining as to whether the Fifth and Eighth (and Second) Circuits' continuing jurisdiction approach is correct, or the Third Circuit's supplemental jurisdiction approach is correct.

To the extent that the Fifth and Eighth Circuits based their ruling on the black letter rule that federal jurisdiction is determined at the time of removal, it holds some water. However, this point begs an important question. It does not begin to explain the character of the state law claims as original or supplemental in character. Surely, as the court noted, the statute authorizing removal deems the state law claims to have arisen under federal law. However, it is beyond Congress' power to extend federal jurisdiction beyond the limits of Article III, § 2 [see Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137, 1 Cranch 137, 2 L. Ed. 60 (1803)]. Although the Supreme Court has held that it is within Congress' power to provide federal jurisdiction over a federally created entity, such as the a United States Bank, even when the claims against it are state claims [see Osborn v. Bank of United States, 22 U.S. 738, 9 Wheat 738, 6 L. Ed. 204 (1824)], some aspect "an essential ingredient" must in some respect arise out of federal law. And, if one such claim or ingredient of a case is present, then the federal court will have jurisdiction to hear related state law claims.

To the extent that the FDIC removal provision allows the FDIC to remove, and bring along with it all related state law claims, there is no constitutional issue. But to the extent that it deems state law claims against other defendants that would not otherwise have been federal in nature to be deemed as federal is constitutionally suspect [see Mesa v. California, 489 U.S. 121, 136, 109 S. Ct. 959, 103 L. Ed. 2d 99 (1989) (elimination of requirement that federal defense be present for removal of state action to federal court by federal officer under 28 U.S.C. § 1442(a) would raise serious doubt whether, in enacting § 1442(a), Congress would not have expanded jurisdiction of federal courts beyond constitutional bounds)]. A better fit, therefore, if the FDIC or its successors are dismissed from the case, is to characterize remaining state law claims that were related to the claims against the FDIC as supplemental claims. This would enable the federal court to decide whether it is better or not to retain jurisdiction rather than require it to do so.

Thus, Judge Jolly's concurrence in Adair gets at the nut of the issue. What, precisely, is the character of the remaining claims? If they are "federal" then it is correct to say that the claims are in the original jurisdiction of the federal court, and therefore not subject to remand. But how can the court be correct that the statute, as Judge Jolly put it, performed alchemy to turn what was once not a federal claim into a federal claim? As Judge Jolly did, it is possible to appreciate the efficient and judicially economical approach the majority took. However, its analysis is a stretch, and characterizing the claims as supplemental would enable the district court to keep the entire case in federal court if the district court thinks it appropriate, but remand state law claims against the remaining non-FDIC defendants if it thinks there are grounds to do so under the supplemental jurisdiction remand provision [see 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c)]. Unless one expects remaining defendants to fail and be taken over by the FDIC resulting in another round of removal, it is hard to see what sort of federal interest persists once the claims against the FDIC are dismissed. And, the district court could listen to an argument on a motion to remand that such a scenario is likely and refuse to remand under § 1367(c).

While it was clear that the court clearly had jurisdiction over the entire case, including all state claims, that fact does not in itself mean that the court lacked discretion to remand state claims. Citing another Fifth Circuit case, Judge Jolly noted that whether to remand is a discretionary matter subject to the abuse of discretion standard [see Regan v. Starcraft, 524 F.3d 627, 631 (5th Cir. 2008)]. Once the FDIC and its interests have been dismissed, there is no federal character in the state claims. Even in Griffin, the case upon which the majority relied [see FSLIC v. Griffin, 935 F.2d 691, 696 (5th Cir. 1991) (justifying continued federal-question jurisdiction based on presence of successor-in-interest to FSLIC)], because there was a successor in interest, the federal character of the case continued. Judge Jolly rightly noted that the FDIC removal provision provided original jurisdiction to cases in which the FDIC "is a party" [see 12 U.S.C. § 1819(b)(2)(A)]. The statute can not, "through some feat of alchemy, make the case's state-law claims federal-law claims."

While this may seem to be an arcane bit of procedural hair-splitting, it is an important matter. It is interesting to note that the Supreme Court declined to grant certiorari given the split. Whether it intended to or not, it has enhanced federal power over state law claims. Perhaps in this time of financial upheaval, there is some federal interest in doing so.

RELATED LINKS: For further information, see Moore's Federal Practice:

- 15 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 103.20;
- 16 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 107.15[7];
- 17A Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 122.04

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate

Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

8 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Removal and the "Last-Served" Defendant Rule

2010 Emerging Issues 5304

Removal and the "Last-Served" Defendant Rule

By Georgene Vairo

September 16, 2010

SUMMARY: In Barbour v. International Union, the Fourth Circuit rejected the traditional "first-served defendant" rule and adopted the "last-served defendant" rule. The traditional, first-served defendant rule is predicated on the "unanimity rule," which requires that all served defendants consent to and join in the notice of removal within 30 days. Under the "last-served" rule, the 30-day period for removal is calculated separately for each defendant.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Georgene Vairo on Barbour v. International Union

Summary. In Barbour v. International Union, 594 F.3d 315, 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 2389 (4th Cir. Feb. 4, 2010), consistent with a strong trend in other courts, the Fourth Circuit rejected the traditional "first-served defendant" rule and adopted the "last-served defendant" rule. When a case is removed under 28 U.S.C. § 1441(a), all served defendants must consent to removal. Under the unanimity rule, if the first served defendant failed to remove within 30 days after service, the case was deemed unremovable on the theory that the first defendant would not consent to removal if later served defendants sought to remove. Under the "last-served" rule, the 30-day period for removal is calculated separately for each defendant, thereby keeping the window open to removal. The Fourth Circuit also held that state-law claims for breach of fiduciary duty against a union are not completely preempted by the National Labor Relations Act.

Second-Served Defendant Removed Action Against Union. Several retirees sued their international union and two locals of that union in state court. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants provided the plaintiffs with false information about their eligibility to receive retirement incentive packages. The complaint included state-law causes of action for breach of fiduciary duties, negligent misrepresentation, and negligence.

The international union was served on March 20, 2008, and the first local was served on March 29, 2008. On April 28, 2008, more than 30 days after the international union was served, but within 30 days of service on the first local, and before service on the second, all three defendants filed a joint notice of removal. The ground for removal was that the plaintiffs' claims were completely preempted by § 9(a) of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA) [see 29 U.S.C. § 159].

The plaintiffs moved to remand, arguing (1) removal was untimely, and (2) there was no basis for federal jurisdiction. The district court refused to remand and granted the defendants' motion to dismiss on the ground the plaintiffs' claims were barred by the NLRA statute of limitation [see 29 U.S.C. § 160(b)]. The Fourth Circuit affirmed in part, holding that the removal notice was timely filed, but reversed in part with instructions to remand the case to state court because the district court did not have subject matter jurisdiction.

Thirty-Day Time Limit for Removal. The time limit for filing a notice of removal is set forth in 28 U.S.C. § 1446(b) as follows:

The notice of removal of a civil action or proceeding shall be filed by the defendant, through service or otherwise, of a copy of the initial pleading setting forth the claim for relief upon which such action or proceeding is based, or within thirty days after the service of summons upon the defendant if such initial pleading has then been filed in court and is not required to be served on the defendant, whichever period is shorter.

Circuit Split Concerning Later-Served Defendants. Section 1446(b) speaks only in terms of a single defendant. It does not explicitly address the timeliness of removal in cases involving multiple defendants. The circuits are divided with respect to how the 30-day limit applies to multiple defendants served at different times.

In Getty Oil Corp. v. Insurance Co. of North America, the Fifth Circuit adopted the "first-served defendant" rule. Under this rule, the 30-day removal period begins to run for the entire case as soon as the first defendant is served. All served defendants must join in the removal petition within 30 days from that date [Getty Oil Corp. v. Ins. Co. of N. Am., 841 F.2d 1254, 1262-1263 (5th Cir. 1988)].

More recently, the Sixth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits adopted the "last-served defendant" rule [Bailey v. Janssen Pharm., Inc., 536 F.3d 1202, 1205 (11th Cir. 2008); Marano Enters. of Kan. v. Z-Teca Rests., L.P., 254 F.3d 753, 757 (8th Cir. 2001); Brierly v. Alusuisse Flexible Packaging, Inc., 184 F.3d 527, 533 (6th Cir. 1999)]. Under this rule, the 30-day period begins for each defendant on the date that defendant is served. An earlier-served defendant may choose whether to join in a later-served defendant's motion, preserving the rule that removal requires the unanimous consent of the defendants [Bailey v. Janssen Pharm., Inc., 536 F.3d 1202, 1207-1209 (11th Cir. 2008)].

McKinney Decision. In McKinney v. Board of Trustees of Maryland Community College, the Fourth Circuit appeared to take a middle ground. Rejecting the first-served defendant rule, the court held that each defendant has 30 days from the date on which it is served to join "an otherwise valid removal petition" [McKinney v. Board of Trs. of Md. Cmty. Coll., 955 F.2d 924, 928 (4th Cir. 1992)]. However, the court did not embrace the last-served defendant rule, stating in a footnote that if a second defendant is served more than 30 days after the first defendant, the case may not be removed unless the first defendant petitions for removal within 30 days of service on that defendant [955 F.2d at 926 n.3].

The Fourth Circuit characterized its footnote in McKinney as non-binding dictum. In McKinney, the first-served defendant did file a timely notice of removal. The issue was whether the later-served defendants could join in that petition more than 30 days after service on the first-served defendant. The court was not faced with the question whether a later-served defendant could file its own removal notice more than 30 days after service on the first defendant. Moreover, the authority for that dictum is itself no longer good law, having been overruled by the Eighth Circuit [see Quick Erectors, Inc. v. Seattle Bronze Corp., 524 F. Supp. 351, 354 (E.D. Mo. 1981), overruled by Marano Enters. of Kan. v. Z-Teca Rests., L.P., 254 F.3d 753 (8th Cir. 2001) (citing Moore's)].

The Fourth Circuit also concluded that the McKinney dictum was undermined by the Supreme Court's decision in Murphy Bros., Inc. v. Michetti Pipe Stringing, Inc. [526 U.S. 344, 119 S. Ct. 1322, 143 L. Ed. 2d 448 (1999)]. In Murphy, the Court held that the 30-day time limit for removal is triggered by simultaneous service of the summons and complaint, or receipt of the complaint through service or otherwise, after and apart from service of the summons, but not by mere receipt of the complaint unattended by any formal service [526 U.S. at 347-348]. Although not directly on point, this holding suggests that the Court would permit a later-served defendant to remove a case within 30 days of service on that defendant even if the first-served defendant did not file a removal notice within its 30-day period. The Fourth Circuit agreed with the Eighth and Eleventh Circuits that Murphy "lends credible and persuasive support to the propriety of the last-served defendant rule" [see Bailey v. Janssen Pharm., Inc., 536 F.3d 1202, 1208 (11th Cir. 2008); Marano Enters. of Kan. v. Z-Teca Rests., L.P., 254 F.3d 753, 756 (8th Cir. 2001) (citing Moore's)].

Application to Facts of Case. In this case, under the first-served defendant rule, the second local would have been required to file a removal notice before it was served. Under either the first-served rule or McKinney's "middle ground," the second local's right to remove would have been waived by the international union's failure to file a removal notice within 30 days of service, even though the second local had not yet been served. The Fourth Circuit concluded that either result would violate the spirit, if not the letter, of Murphy's "bedrock principle" that "a defendant is not obliged to engage in litigation unless notified of the action, and brought under a court's authority, by formal process" [see Murphy Bros., Inc. v. Michetti Pipe Stringing, Inc., 526 U.S. 344, 347, 119 S. Ct. 1322, 143 L. Ed. 2d 448 (1999)]. Moreover, it would be inequitable for the first-served defendant's failure to remove the case to waive the other defendants' right to remove.

Last-Served Defendant Rule Adopted and Satisfied. The Fourth Circuit joined the Sixth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits in adopting the last-served defendant rule, holding that each defendant has 30 days from the date that defendant was served with formal process to file a notice of removal. Earlier-served defendants may join in the notice regardless of whether they have previously filed a removal notice. Accordingly, the joint notice of removal filed in this case was timely.

Dissent: McKinney Precludes Adoption of Last-Served Defendant Rule. In a concurring and dissenting opinion, Judge Hamilton accused the majority of improperly jettisoning McKinney, which he considered binding precedent. He argued that Murphy did not overrule McKinney because (1) Murphy did not involve multiple defendants, and (2) the concerns of Murphy were not implicated in this case. He would remand the case to state court on the ground removal was untimely under the "McKinney Intermediate Rule."

Commentary. The traditional, first-served defendant rule is predicated on the "unanimity rule," which requires that all served defendants consent to and join in the notice of removal within 30 days. The theory is that all served defendants must agree to removal, and because the notice must be submitted within 30 days of service on the first defendant, all served defendants must join in the petition no later than 30 days from the day on which the first defendant was served. This approach surely promotes unanimity among the served defendants without placing undue hardships on subsequently served defendants, because later served defendants may either accept the removal or exercise their right to choose the state forum by moving to remand.

The traditional view promotes two other considerations. First, the removal statutes are strictly construed against removal (see 16 Moore's Federal Practice, § 107.05). Second, the purpose of the time limits in Section 1446 is to ensure that the question of where the case will be litigated be put to rest as soon as possible. The problem with the approach is that it facilitated some gamesmanship on the part of plaintiffs who could first serve a defendant that would not want to remove or whose lawyers may fail to think about removal as an option.

To deal with this concern, courts began to develop a less-strict approach that provided later-served defendants the opportunity to remove. This "later-served defendant rule," prevents the unfairness of allowing the first-served defendant's failure to remove to deprive other unserved defendants—who may not know about the action—of their right to seek removal.

The last-served defendant rule is in some respects consistent with the rules adopted in some courts that an unserved defendant need not join in the notice of removal (see 16 Moore's Federal Practice, § 107.11[1][d]), and in some courts that an unserved defendant's citizenship may be disregarded when determining if the case is removable (see 16 Moore's Federal Practice, § 107.14[2][c][ii]). These courts argue that the goal of unanimity can still be served under the later-served defendant rule: the later-served defendant can be given 30 days from the date of service to file a notice of removal, but may only do so with the unanimous consent of the later-served defendant's previously served codefendants. The fact that the codefendants may not have chosen to file a notice of removal on their own within 30 days of service does not necessarily mean that they will not join the later-served defendant's motion. Moreover, some courts are reluctant to read "first-served" into the statute, as required under the "first-served" rule, when the statute as written can reasonably be read to allow each defendant to remove within 30 days of service on that defendant.

Additionally, the Fourth Circuit correctly looked to the Supreme Court's decision in Murphy Brothers, Inc. v. Michetti Pipe Stringing, Inc. As the Fourth Circuit explained, Murphy, in which the Supreme Court held that a defendant may not be required to take any action in a civil case until proper service has been made, will likely determine the result of this debate in favor of the later-served defendant rule. The last-served defendant rule is consistent with Murphy because it suggests that a defendant should not lose any procedural right until it is served. By elevating the importance of proper service in the removal context, however, the Court has implicitly rejected the policies that the removal statute be strictly construed and that the choice of forum be settled as soon as possible. Nonetheless, especially in light of Murphy, the removal right of later-served defendants should not be compromised before they are served and they ought to have the opportunity to persuade the earlier served defendants to join the removal notice. With the Eighth Circuit joining the trend towards the last-served defendant rule, it is likely that the fairness approach may well, and should, supersede the traditional approach in other courts.

State-Law Claims Were Not Completely Preempted. Under the complete preemption doctrine, some state-law claims are converted into claims arising under federal law, providing a basis for removal to federal court. The presumption is against complete preemption. This presumption is rebutted only when a federal statute indisputably displaces any state cause of action over a given subject matter [Lontz v. Tharp, 413 F.3d 435, 441 (4th Cir. 2005)].

To support removal on the basis of complete preemption, a defendant must show that the state-law claim is cognizable only as a federal claim and that Congress clearly intended the federal claim to provide the exclusive cause of action for claims of overwhelming national interest [Beneficial Nat'l Bank v. Anderson, 539 U.S. 1, 11, 123 S. Ct. 2058, 156 L. Ed. 2d 1 (2003)]. It is not enough that the state-law claims are subject to ordinary or defensive preemption. Ordinary preemption may be a defense to state-law claims, but it does not provide grounds for removal.

The Fourth Circuit noted that the plaintiffs pled typical state-law causes of action for violation of a fiduciary duty resulting from their membership in the union, causes of action that do not inherently represent an overwhelming national interest. The plaintiffs did not plead a claim against their employer, breach of a collective bargaining agreement, or breach of any duty owed by the union as their bargaining agent, and nothing in a collective bargaining agreement was relevant to their claims. The union did not direct the court to any language in § 9(a) [29 U.S.C. § 159] or in the legislative history showing a clear congressional intent that all state-law claims relating to all fiduciary duties owed to union members by virtue of their union membership are exclusively federal claims under that section. The Fourth Circuit concluded that a finding of complete preemption would undermine established concepts of federalism and contradict clear Fourth Circuit precedent strongly counseling against imputation to Congress of an intent to displace a whole panoply of state law absent some clearly expressed direction.

The Fourth Circuit distinguished § 9(a) of the NLRA from § 301 of the Labor Management Relations Act [29 U.S.C. § 185], which does completely preempt state-law claims. The court noted that § 301 not only provides federal courts with jurisdiction over employment disputes covered by collective bargaining agreements, it also directs federal courts to fashion a body of federal common law to resolve such disputes [McCormick v. AT & T Technologies, Inc., 934 F.2d 531, 534 (4th Cir. 1991)]. No such congressional imperative exists with respect to § 9(a) because the duty of fair representation is itself judicially created. Moreover, the Supreme Court has stated that the union's duty of fair representation is implied from its status as the exclusive bargaining representative of the bargaining unit workers [see Marquez v. Screen Actors Guild, Inc., 525 U.S. 33, 48, 119 S. Ct. 292, 142 L. Ed. 2d 242 (1998)]. Thus, holding state-law claims completely preempted by § 9(a) would require the court to find that Congress implicitly intended to preempt state law based on duties that are themselves implied from the statute. The court concluded that the doctrine of complete preemption did not apply and, therefore, there was no basis for removal to district court and no jurisdiction in that court.

Commentary. The Fourth Circuit correctly analyzed the complete preemption issue. In light of the Supreme Court's own ambivalence over the last several terms about whether Congress intended to preempt state law in drug and medical device cases, even defensively, it is not surprising that the Fourth Circuit would take a very narrow approach to a complete preemption argument that is even more repugnant to the idea of federalism.

RELATED LINKS: For more information, see Moore's Federal Practice:

- 16 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 107.30[3][a][iv][C];
- 16 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 107.14[4][b][v][A.1]

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

9 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Restraining Costs Incurred in Preserving ESI

2010 Emerging Issues 5300

Restraining Costs Incurred in Preserving ESI

By John K. Rabiej

September 15, 2010

SUMMARY: The 2006 amendments to the FRCP addressed discovery issues involving electronically stored information (ESI). The amendments deliberately left open the scope of a party's ESI preservation obligations. Parties continue to spend enormous sums to preserve ESI for discovery purposes. U.S. v. Louisiana Generating LLC offers one effective way to restrain unnecessary discovery preservation costs in certain cases.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: A party's discovery preservation obligations are set by common law, and they vary depending on the jurisdiction. The standards governing sanctions for failing to comply with these preservation obligations also vary depending on the jurisdiction. The result is that practitioners are faced with much uncertainty about the precise dimensions of preservation obligations, and they often err on the conservative side, taking expensive steps to preserve ESI when in doubt.

In general, a party is obligated to preserve all relevant ESI for discovery purposes when a law suit is filed. Depending on the jurisdiction, the preservation obligation may arise much sooner, when the party knew or should have known that litigation was imminent. The failure to preserve relevant ESI has led to severe sanctions, including adverse jury instructions and default judgments. To prevent such penalties, clients spend enormous sums ensuring that all their ESI is preserved, while careful practitioners devote substantial time preparing litigation hold letters, monitoring client's preservation actions, and reviewing ESI for relevancy and privilege. Yet the vast bulk of ESI in virtually all cases is not relevant or important.

Though the rules committees that draft the Federal Rules of Practice and Procedure recognized that preservation of ESI can raise many serious issues, the committees decided not to address them in the 2006 Civil Rules discovery amendments, with the exception of establishing a shallow "safe-harbor" provision in Rule 37(e). The committees concluded that preservation of ESI touched substantive law, which was outside the purview of its jurisdiction. That position, however, may be changing. During the 2010 Duke Law School Litigation Conference, prominent lawyers and academics advocated a rule-based solution to ESI preservation issues, based on existing rules that already address certain preservation issues. (A paper issued by one of the conference's panels contains a proposed "Elements of a Preservation Rule," which can be found at

http://civilconference.uscourts.gov/LotusQuickr/dcc/Main.nsf/\$defaultview/EAF7D6B2D709B78E8525770700487925/\$File/E‑

In light of the conference's discussions, the rules committees are reexamining their former position and exploring different rules-based approaches to handle ESI preservation issues. In the meantime, practitioners are faced with difficult practical decisions in assessing wide-ranging judicial rulings in an effort to determine what ESI must be preserved in individual cases. (See John K. Rabiej, Reasonableness Standard Governing Discovery Obligations and Preservation Duty, 2009 Emerging Issues 4250.) The lawyer's decision-making is made with the knowledge that a wrong decision in a particular case can be outcome determinative. Conservative approaches in preserving all ESI can be expected, though it results in enormous sums being spent for no benefit.

Alternative to Preserving All ESI: In United States v. Louisiana Generating LLC, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20207 (M.D. La. March 5, 2010), the parties themselves set the parameters of their discovery obligations to preserve ESI. In the case, the court approved the stipulation entered into by the Department of Justice on behalf of the Environmental Protection Agency and the defendant. The purpose of the stipulation was "to reduce the time, expense and other burdens of discovery of certain electronically stored information and privileged materials ... and to better define the scope of their obligations with respect to preserving such information and materials." Presumably, the stipulation reflects the Department's considered views on the appropriate way to handle ESI-preservation issues in a case where both parties have enormous amounts of ESI located in multiple media and places. The Department's stipulation offers a good model that parties in similar ESI-laden cases can consider and effectively use to reduce discovery costs and burdens.

Types of ESI Addressed by Stipulation: The stipulation in Louisiana Generating LLC does not address every ESI preservation issue, but it does address three important areas where substantial savings in time and money can be achieved. Most importantly the stipulation makes clear that neither party must preserve certain "not reasonably accessible ESI," including ESI on back-up systems, if such ESI is "routinely purged, overwritten or otherwise made not reasonably accessible in accordance with an established routine maintenance policy."

Preserving ESI located on back-up tapes can be extremely expensive and time-consuming. Retrieving deleted ESI also can be expensive and burdensome. Relieving a party from preserving and retrieving such ESI can substantially alleviate a party's discovery burden. The stipulation is subject to two major conditions. First, the deletion of the ESI must occur "in accordance with an established routine system maintenance policy." This condition is important to show that the ESI was deleted for reasons other than for purposes of the litigation. Second, if the party has a policy of retaining the ESI that supersedes its record-retention policy, then the ESI must be preserved.

How does the stipulation in Louisiana Generating LLC differ from: (1) the provision in Rule 26(b)(2)(B), which relieves a party from producing ESI from sources identified "as not reasonably accessible," or (2) the safe-harbor provision of Rule 37(e), which bars any sanction for failing to produce ESI if it was deleted "as a result of the routine, good-faith operation of an electronic information system"? In a word, the stipulation provides greater certainty than the rule provisions, which contain significant caveats. The stipulation eliminates the threat of wasteful satellite litigation interpreting the rule provisions, relieving discovery burdens and costs that a cautious party might assume.

Rule 26(b)(2)(B) is limited. It applies only to ESI located in sources that are not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or cost, an assessment which is subject to reasonable alternative interpretations. Determining what is an "undue cost or burden" in a particular case requires a normative judgment that weighs costs and benefits, which may be subject to disagreement among reasonable minds. Courts have routinely found ESI located on back-up tapes systems to be "inaccessible." But as back-up systems become cheaper and alternative storage devices are used placing recovery data on-line, making retrieval of ESI easier and cheaper, such routine assessments may no longer be valid. As a result, it is becoming less certain that Rule 26(b)(2)(B) will always apply to ESI stored on back-up systems. More importantly, Rule 26(b)(2)(B) does not relieve a party of any common-law preservation obligation. As explained in the Committee Note to the rule, "Whether a responding party is required to preserve unsearched sources of potentially responsive information that it believes are not reasonably accessible depends on the circumstances of each case." The bottom-line is that Rule 26(b)(2)(B) does not provide a practitioner certainty, but requires the practitioner to make difficult assessments that are subject to second guessing by the other party and the court.

Rule 37(e)'s safe-harbor is quite shallow. (See John K. Rabiej, Expert Commentary, How Shallow is the Rule 37(e) Safe Harbor?, 2008 Emerging Issues 2902.) It applies only when ESI is deleted in "good faith" as part of a routine operation of an electronic information system. Qualifying the protection by requiring an element of good faith leaves open the possibility of litigation challenging the party's intent in operating its electronic information system. For example, the rule does not apply when a party knows or should have known that ESI located in inaccessible sources is located nowhere else, e.g., when one of its employees deleted e-mails from the active database. Because of the potentially severe consequences for failing to preserve ESI on back-up systems in such cases when the ESI was deleted from the active database, prudent practitioners err on the conservative side and preserve all such ESI despite Rule 26(b)(2)(B) and Rule 37(e).

The stipulation in Louisiana Generating LLC does a good job in limiting the uncertainty about any obligation to preserve ESI on backup systems for discovery purposes. The parties agree that such ESI need not be preserved, eliminating the threat of litigation challenging its destruction. But is the stipulation good policy? The rationale supporting such a stipulation is solid. Discovery should focus on ESI located in active databases where relevant ESI is most often available. The likelihood of finding important evidence on a back-up system, which otherwise could not be found in active databases, is typically very low. In most cases, there is no further need to search ESI on inaccessible sources, including back-up tape systems. Compelling a party to always preserve ESI on back-up tape systems makes little sense.

In addition, case law is clear that a party need not change its record-retention practices solely to facilitate discovery in litigation, unless the ESI is otherwise not available. A party should not be forced to adopt a new policy retaining ESI that was not retained before litigation, unless a specific reason justifies the retention. Preservation of information should be driven by business, and not discovery, reasons. If a business has decided to routinely place certain ESI that it rarely uses to conduct its daily business in inaccessible sources for temporary periods of time for business reasons (e.g., less expensive storage), the business should not be compelled to create a new business practice solely for litigation reasons, e.g., to make discovery easier or retain the ESI indefinitely. As long as the inaccessible ESI is deleted in accordance with established and routine deletion maintenance procedures that were in effect before the litigation arose, there should be no new obligation to establish some new record-retention system or procedure retaining it solely for discovery purposes, unless some specific justification warrants retention.

The stipulation addresses another recurring ESI preservation issue, the handling of drafts of electronic writings. An employee can prepare multiple drafts of a document before finalizing it. Software programs capture every iteration, which can be retrieved with some cost. The stipulation in Louisiana Generating LLC makes clear that a party must only preserve drafts that are shared by the author with another person (by e-mail, print, or otherwise). The parties agree that "they need not preserve for discovery a document before and after every change made to it," so long as the draft document is preserved. This provision reflects a common-sense approach that was assumed in the former "paper" world, where an author's drafts of paper documents were thrown away with no hesitation.

The stipulation in Louisiana Generating LLC provides some limits on the preservation of ESI stored in mobile sources. Under the stipulation, electronic mail or pin messages sent to or from a Personal Digital Assistant (e.g., Blackberry Handheld) need not be preserved so long as the ESI "is routinely saved elsewhere." This coverage would apply, for example, when ESI messages are sent simultaneously to an employee's PDA and office computer.

Perhaps the most far-reaching provision of the stipulation in Louisiana Generating LLC, but one which should be adopted only after considerable thought, is the provision that ESI be produced only if it is specifically requested. If not requested, ESI need not be searched or produced. This protocol is designed to target only specific ESI for discovery, relieving the parties of the burden and cost of reviewing all ESI. The stipulation is inconsistent with Rule 34, which includes ESI in a request of any information. It is clear that the parties in Louisiana Generating LLC concluded that complying with the Rule 34 provision would not benefit them in their case. The parties presumably had a very good idea of the ESI that was important to their case, and they were not overly concerned about the possibility of missing some of it.

Lessons for Practitioners: The stipulation in Louisiana Generating LLC saved both parties time and money that would have otherwise been wasted on preserving irrelevant or not important ESI. It provided greater certainty to the practitioners on their preservation obligations than the existing rules, relieving them of burdens in retaining ESI and reducing costs. The stipulation reflected the parties' considered assessment of the costs and burden incurred in preserving all ESI, weighed against the possibility that relevant and important ESI, which was not located anywhere else, would be lost. Practitioners should consider entering a stipulation modeled on the one in Louisiana Generating LLC, especially if the need of both parties for ESI discovery is not asymmetrical, the parties are in a relatively similar bargaining position, and much ESI is located in multiple locations and media sources.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004. The views expressed in the commentary represent Mr. Rabiej's opinions and do not necessarily reflect the views of the rules committees.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

10 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Allan Ides. All Rights Reserved.

Internet Contacts and Personal Jurisdiction

2010 Emerging Issues 5267

Internet Contacts and Personal Jurisdiction

By Allan Ides

August 18, 2010

SUMMARY: In Tamburo v. Dworkin, a panel of the Seventh Circuit held that a district court could exercise specific personal jurisdiction over out-of-state defendants based on allegedly defamatory and harassing e-mails and messages posted on their public websites when this activity was expressly aimed at the plaintiff in the forum state and when defendants should have been aware that the brunt of the harm would be felt there.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Introduction. In Tamburo v. Dworkin, 601 F.3d 693, 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 7261 (7th Cir. Apr. 8, 2010), a panel of the Seventh Circuit held that a district court could exercise specific personal jurisdiction over out-of-state defendants based on allegedly defamatory and harassing e-mails and messages posted on their public websites when this activity was expressly aimed at the plaintiff in the forum state and when defendants should have been aware that the brunt of the harm would be felt there.

Facts and Proceedings. The plaintiff, an Illinois resident who operated a dog breeding software business in Illinois, filed suit in the Northern District of Illinois against several out-of-state defendants. His claims arose out of a dispute over the contents of a dog-pedigree software program he had developed using data collected from the defendants' websites. The defendants included residents of Colorado, Michigan, Ohio, Canada, and Australia, each of whom had had little or no contact with Illinois.

In his complaint, the plaintiff alleged that the U.S. and Canadian defendants engaged in a campaign of e-mails and postings falsely accusing him of stealing their data and urging dog enthusiasts to boycott his products. He further alleged that the Australian defendant reposted some of these messages on a private dog-breeder listserve. Plaintiff sought a declaratory judgment that he had not violated any federal law by incorporating the defendants' data, which he claimed was in the public domain, into his software. He also sought damages for federal and state antitrust violations and asserted state law claims for defamation, tortious interference with existing contracts and prospective economic advantage, trade libel, and civil conspiracy.

The defendants moved to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction and failure to state a claim. The district court dismissed the claims against all defendants for lack of personal jurisdiction.

Antitrust Allegations were Inadequately Pled under Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly. The Seventh Circuit affirmed the dismissal of plaintiff's antitrust claims on the alternate basis that those claims were inadequately pled under the standards announced in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly. In that case, the Supreme Court ruled that a formulaic recitation of the elements of an antitrust cause of action will not do—the factual allegations must be sufficient to raise a claimed right to relief above the speculative level [Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 556, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929, 2007 U.S. LEXIS 5901 (2007)]. The plaintiff's claims here, however, were pled in wholly conclusory terms and contained no factual allegations plausibly suggesting the existence of an antitrust conspiracy or antitrust injury. Accordingly, the court of appeals affirmed the dismissal of plaintiff's antitrust claims.

Specific Jurisdiction and the Calder Test. After dismissing the antitrust claims, the remaining question was whether the district court could exercise personal jurisdiction over the five defendants with respect to the state-law tort claims. The court explained that in cases involving allegations of tortious activity outside the forum state but causing an effect within the forum, the inquiry focuses on whether the conduct underlying the claims was "purposefully directed" at the forum. This is the "Calder (or Effects) Test." The Supreme Court's decision in Calder v. Jones suggests three requirements for satisfying this test: (1) intentional conduct (or intentional and allegedly tortious conduct); (2) expressly aimed at the forum state; (3) with the defendant's knowledge that the brunt of the harm would be felt—that is, that the plaintiff would be injured—in the forum state [Calder v. Jones, 465 U.S. 783, 790, 104 S. Ct. 1482, 79 L. Ed. 2d 804 (1984)].

The "Aim" and the "Brunt." The court noted that some circuits have read Calder's "express aiming" requirement fairly broadly, requiring only conduct that is targeted at a plaintiff known to be a resident of the forum state [see Bancroft & Masters, Inc. v. Augusta Nat'l Inc., 223 F.3d 1082, 1087 (9th Cir. 2000)]. Others have read it more narrowly to require that the forum state be the "focal point of the tort" [see Dudnikov v. Chalk & Vermilion Fine Arts, Inc., 514 F.3d 1063, 1074 n.9 (10th Cir. 2008)]. The present case involved both a forum-state injury and tortious conduct specifically directed at the forum, making the forum state the focal point of the tort. Thus, even under the narrower view, the "express aiming" element was met.

The individual defendants' use of their public websites to defame an Illinois-based businessman and exhort readers to boycott his products may be conceptualized as an electronic "entry" into Illinois for jurisdictional purposes, the court said. The individual defendants were each alleged to have published false and defamatory statements about the plaintiff, either on their public websites or in e-mails. In some of these messages, readers were encouraged to boycott the plaintiff's products; in others, the plaintiff's Illinois address was supplied and readers were urged to contact and harass him. The defendants engaged in this conduct with the knowledge that the plaintiff lived in Illinois and operated his business there. Thus, although they acted from points outside the forum state, these defendants specifically aimed their tortious conduct at the plaintiff and his business in Illinois with the knowledge that he lived, worked, and would suffer the "brunt of the injury" there. These allegations sufficed to establish personal jurisdiction over these defendants under either a broad or a more restrictive view of Calder.

This reasoning, however, applied only to the U.S. and Canadian defendants. The Australian defendant, a corporation, allegedly facilitated the posting of some of the individual defendants' tortious messages on its private e-mail listserve. The complaint did not say how many, nor did it describe the content of the messages that were reposted. Moreover, there were no allegations that anyone associated with this defendant acted with the knowledge that the plaintiff operated his business in Illinois or with the specific purpose of inflicting injury there. The allegations were therefore not sufficient to make out a prima facie case that this defendant "expressly aimed" its allegedly tortious conduct at Illinois. As such, the claims against this defendant were properly dismissed for lack of personal jurisdiction.

Injury Arose out of the Alleged Tortious Conduct. In a specific jurisdiction analysis, the plaintiff's injury must "arise out of" or "relate to" the conduct that makes up the defendants' contacts with the forum. The panel noted that the circuits have varied in their understanding of this element, with some courts requiring only a relatively loose "but for" relationship to others requiring a stricter proximate cause relationship (as well as a number of variations in between these two standards). The Seventh Circuit did not find it necessary to take a position in this conflict. Under even the most rigorous approach to the determination of whether the plaintiff's injury arises out of the defendants' contacts with the forum state, the plaintiff's injury here clearly did. The individual defendants had all expressly aimed their allegedly tortious conduct at the plaintiff and his Illinois-based business for the purpose of causing him injury there; these contacts with the forum state were both the cause in fact (or but for cause) and the legal (or proximate) cause of his injury.

Fair Play and Substantial Justice. Finally, the court determined that exercising personal jurisdiction over the individual defendant would not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. A court considers the following facts with respect to this element of the jurisdictional inquiry: the burden on the defendant, the forum state's interest in adjudicating the dispute, the plaintiff's interest in obtaining convenient and effective relief, the interstate judicial system's interest in obtaining the most efficient resolution of controversies, and the shared interest of the several states in furthering fundamental substantive social policies.

Here, Illinois had a strong interest in providing a forum for its residents and local businesses to seek redress for tort injuries suffered within the state and inflicted by out-of-state actors. The defendants lived in other U.S. states and in Canada—none of these locations had a substantial interest at stake here. It would be unreasonable to expect the plaintiff to file separate lawsuits to give each defendant the privilege of defending the litigation in his or her home state when jurisdiction was otherwise proper in Illinois. Rather, it was reasonable to conclude that the defendants should anticipate being haled into court in the plaintiff's home state. A single suit in Illinois also promoted the most efficient resolution of the claims.

Finding that the elements of the specific jurisdiction analysis were met and that the district court could properly exercise jurisdiction over the individual defendants, the court of appeals reversed the order dismissing the state-law tort claims against them.

Commentary. The Seventh Circuit's opinion provides an unusually detailed and lucid account of the Calder (or Effects) Test, which is universally used to measure personal jurisdiction over out-of-state defendants who engage in intentional activity directed at the forum state. The opinion is quite useful in that it presents an accurate account of that test, as well as a balanced discussion of recent cases developing and applying it. The opinion also includes a well-reasoned application of the Calder Test, to the facts before it, providing a contrast between those circumstances where the test would be satisfied (as to the defendants who aimed activity at the forum) and those where it would not (as to the defendant that did not so aim).

It is worth noting that the court did not apply the so-called "Zippo Test," which has sometimes been used as a measure of personal jurisdiction in Internet-related cases [Zippo Manufacturing Co. v. Zippo Dot Com, Inc., 952 F. Supp. 1119 (W.D. Pa. 1997)]. Instead, the Seventh Circuit panel observed, "[W]e hesitate to fashion a special jurisdictional test for Internet-based cases. Calder speaks directly to personal jurisdiction in intentional-tort cases; the principles articulated there can be applied to cases involving tortious conduct over the Internet." This judgment is sound. Zippo provides a way of considering whether specific Internet activity can be characterized as purposefully directed toward a forum state, but does not provide the ultimate measure of jurisdiction over the party engaging in that activity. At best, Zippo provides an estimation of potential jurisdiction.

RELATED LINKS: For further information, see Moore's Federal Practice:

- 16 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 108.42[3], [5], [7].

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Allan Ides is the Christopher N. May Chair at Loyola Law School Los Angeles. He has published extensively in the areas of constitutional law and federal procedure. His civil procedure casebook, co-authored with Christopher N.

May -- Civil Procedure: Cases and Problems (Aspen 2009) -- is in its third edition.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

11 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Allan Ides. All Rights Reserved.

The Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act and Individual Immunity

2010 Emerging Issues 5268

The Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act and Individual Immunity

By Allan Ides

August 18, 2010

SUMMARY: In Samantar v. Yousuf, the Supreme Court held that the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA) does not provide immunity from suit for officials of foreign governments. The Court did not, however, preclude the possibility that the petitioner would be entitled to common law immunity.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Introduction. In Samantar v. Yousuf, - U.S. -, 130 S. Ct. 2278, 176 L. Ed. 2d 1047, 2010 U.S. LEXIS 4378, 78 U.S.L.W. 4460 (June 1, 2010), the Supreme Court held that the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA) does not provide immunity from suit for officials of foreign governments. The Court did not, however, preclude the possibility that the petitioner would be entitled to common law immunity.

Facts and Proceedings. Natives of Somalia sued an ex-Somali official under the Torture Victim Protection Act of 1991 [106 Stat. 73, note following 28 U.S.C. § 1350] and the Alien Tort Statute [28 U.S.C. § 1350]. The defendant had been First Vice President and Minister of Defense of Somalia from 1980 to 1986 and Prime Minister from 1987 to 1990 and had been in charge of Somalia's armed forces before its military regime collapsed. He fled Somalia in 1991 and now lives in Virginia. The plaintiffs alleged that he exercised command and control over members of the Somali military forces, who tortured, killed, or arbitrarily detained the plaintiffs or members of their families; that he knew or should have known of the abuses perpetrated by his subordinates; and that he aided and abetted the commission of those abuses.

The district court dismissed the suit, concluding that the defendant was immune under the FSIA [Yousuf v. Samantar, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 56227, at *23-*46 (E.D. Va. 2007)]. The Fourth Circuit reversed, holding that the FSIA does not apply to individual foreign government officials, and remanded the case for further proceedings, including a determination of whether the defendant was entitled to immunity under the common law [Yousuf v. Samantar, 552 F.3d 371, 383-384 (4th Cir. 2009)]. The Supreme Court granted certiorari to resolve a circuit split on this issue [compare Yousuf v. Samantar, 552 F.3d 371, 381 (4th Cir. 2009), and Enahoro v. Abubakar, 408 F.3d 877, 881-882 (7th Cir. 2005) (both holding that FSIA does not govern immunity of individual foreign officials), with Chuidian v. Philippine Nat'l Bank, 912 F.2d 1095, 1103 (9th Cir. 1990), In re Terrorist Attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, 538 F.3d 71, 83 (2d Cir. 2008), Keller v. Central Bank of Nigeria, 277 F.3d 811, 815 (6th Cir. 2002), Byrd v. Corporacion Forestal y Industrial de Olancho S.A., 182 F.3d 380, 388 (5th Cir. 1999), and El-Fadl v. Central Bank of Jordan, 75 F.3d 668, 671 (D.C. Cir. 1996) (all holding that suit against individual official for acts committed in official capacity must be analyzed under FSIA)]. The Court affirmed the Fourth Circuit's decision and remanded the case for further proceedings.

Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. The FSIA provides that "a foreign state shall be immune from the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States and of the States. . . ." [28 U.S.C. § 1604]. FSIA defines "foreign state" as follows [28 U.S.C. § 1603]:

(a) A "foreign state" . . . includes a political subdivision of a foreign state or an agency or instrumentality of a foreign state as defined in subsection (b).

(b) An "agency or instrumentality of a foreign state" means any entity-

(1) which is a separate legal person, corporate or otherwise, and

(2) which is an organ of a foreign state or political subdivision thereof, or a majority of whose shares or other ownership interest is owned by a foreign state or political subdivision thereof, and

(3) which is neither a citizen of a State of the United States as defined in section 1332(c) and (e) of this title, nor created under the laws of any third country.

Text of FSIA Does Not Apply to Individual Defendants. Writing for the Court, Justice Stevens first analyzed the text of the statute. He pointed out that the term "foreign state" on its face indicates a body politic that governs a particular territory. The use of the word "entity" in the definition of "agency or instrumentality of a foreign state" provided further indication that individuals were not meant to be covered, because "entity" typically refers to an organization, not an individual. Moreover, the three components of the definition of "entity" do not appear to refer to individuals. Justice Stevens reasoned that (1) the phrase "a separate legal person" typically refers to the legal fiction that allows an entity to hold personhood separate from the natural persons who are its shareholders or officers; (2) it is awkward to refer to a person as an "organ" of a foreign state; (3) section 1332(c) and (e) refer to the citizenship of corporations and estates; and (4) a natural person cannot be "created under the laws of any third country."

The Court rejected the argument that an official can be included within the meaning of "foreign state" because § 1603(a) merely sets out a nonexhaustive list, not restricting the term to political subdivisions, agencies, or instrumentalities. The Court noted that even if the list were merely illustrative, it suggests that "foreign state" does not encompass officials, because the types of defendants listed are all entities. Moreover, Congress expressly mentioned officials elsewhere in the FSIA when it wished their acts to be considered equivalent to acts of the foreign state [see, e.g., 28 U.S.C. §§ 1605(a)(5), 1605A(a)(1), 1605A(c)], which suggests that officials are not included in the term "foreign state." The Court also noted various other provisions of the Act, including the provisions for service of process, which make no express mention of service of process on individuals [see 28 U.S.C. § 1608(a)], and the Act's remedial provisions, which specify different remedies with respect to different defendants [see 28 U.S.C. §§ 1606, 1610], all of which indicate individuals are not to be considered "foreign states" within the meaning of the Act.

Justice Stevens concluded that reading the FSIA as a whole, there is nothing in it that suggests "foreign state" in § 1603(a) should be read to include an official acting on behalf of the foreign state, and much to indicate that this is not what Congress intended. The Court was unanimous on this point.

Legislative History Confirms FSIA Does Not Apply to Individual Defendants. Justice Stevens also looked to the legislative history of FSIA for guidance and, based on that history, rejected the defendant's argument that the FSIA codified the common law with respect to immunity for individual state officials. The Court acknowledged that one of the primary purposes of the FSIA was to codify the restrictive theory of sovereign immunity, which Congress recognized as consistent with extant international law. A related purpose was codification of international law at the time of FSIA's enactment. However, there are differences between a state's immunity and that of a state official. Therefore, the Court concluded, there is "little reason to presume that when Congress set out to codify state immunity, it must also have, sub silentio, intended to codify official immunity." In fact, to the extent Congress did contemplate FSIA's effect on officials, it appears to have intended for the Act not to apply to officials.

Common Law May Still Bar Suit. The Court also rejected the argument that its decision would permit litigants to evade FSIA's restrictions by artfully pleading a cause of action against a state official instead of against the state. First, not every action could be successfully pleaded against an individual officer alone. Second, even when it could, the action might be barred by common law principles of immunity.

Concurring Justices Would Not Consider Legislative History. All of the Justices concurred in the Court's judgment, agreeing that the FSIA does not apply to individual government officials. Justices Thomas and Scalia concurred only in the judgment, objecting to the use of legislative history in the Court's analysis. Justice Alito concurred in the opinion and the judgment, but noted that he thought the citations to legislative history were "of little value."

Justice Stevens acknowledged that it may not have been "strictly necessary" to consult the legislative history for confirmation of its reading of the statutory text. Nevertheless, he defended the use of legislative history, quoting Justice White [Wisconsin Pub. Intervenor v. Mortier, 501 U.S. 597, 610 n.4, 111 S. Ct. 2476, 115 L. Ed. 2d 532 (1991)]:

As for the propriety of using legislative history at all, common sense suggests that inquiry benefits from reviewing additional information rather than ignoring it. As Chief Justice Marshall put it, "[w]here the mind labours to discover the design of the legislature, it seizes every thing from which aid can be derived." United States v. Fisher, 6 U.S. 359, 2 Cranch 358, 386, 2 L. Ed. 304 (1905). Legislative history materials are not generally so misleading that jurists should never employ them in a good-faith effort to discern legislative intent. Our precedents demonstrate that the Court's practice of utilizing legislative history reaches well into its past. See, e.g., Wallace v. Parker, 31 U.S. 680, 6 Pet. 680, 687-690, 8 L. Ed. 543 (1832). We suspect that the practice will likewise reach well into the future.

Commentary. Perhaps we are witnessing a trend toward the primacy of textual analysis in the realm of procedure. During the first week of June 2010, the Supreme Court decided two cases pertaining to federal procedure and in both cases relied largely on straightforward readings of the relevant text. See also Krupski v. Costa Crociere, S.p.A., - U.S. -, 130 S. Ct. 2485, 177 L. Ed. 2d 48, 2010 U.S. LEXIS 4567, 78 U.S.L.W. 3715 (June 7, 2010) (interpreting and applying Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(c)(1)(C)). And in both cases the Court rejected creative glosses placed on the relevant text by lower federal courts. If this is a trend, it is a welcome one since it might help bring clarity to the law of procedure. Cf. Ashcroft v. Iqbal, - U.S. -, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (torturing the text of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2)). There remains a debate on the role of legislative history in interpreting the text, but the Court appears to be unanimous in its emerging view that the critical question in statutory and rule analysis is to be discovered through a careful and sensible reading of the text. Let's hope.

RELATED LINKS: For further information, see Moore's Federal Practice:

- 15 Moore's Federal Practice (3d ed.) § 104.11[2].

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Allan Ides is the Christopher N. May Chair at Loyola Law School Los Angeles. He has published extensively in the areas of constitutional law and federal procedure. His civil procedure casebook, co-authored with Christopher N. May -- Civil Procedure: Cases and Problems (Aspen 2009) -- is in its third edition.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

12 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Allan Ides. All Rights Reserved.

Irrelevance of Whether a Counterclaim is Designated Compulsory or Permissive

2010 Emerging Issues 5269

Supplemental Jurisdiction and the Irrelevance of Whether a Counterclaim is Designated Compulsory or Permissive

By Allan Ides

August 18, 2010

SUMMARY: In Global NAPs, Inc., v. Verizon New England Inc., the First Circuit joined the Second and Seventh Circuits in ruling that 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a) gives federal courts supplemental jurisdiction over some permissive counterclaims. This ruling runs counter to the long-held view, which was well established prior to the adoption of § 1367, that permissive counterclaims require an independent basis of jurisdiction.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Introduction. In Global NAPs, Inc., v. Verizon New England Inc., 603 F.3d 71, 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 8929 (1st Cir. Apr. 29, 2010), the First Circuit joined the Second and Seventh Circuits in ruling that 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a) gives federal courts supplemental jurisdiction over some permissive counterclaims. This ruling runs counter to the long-held view, which was well established prior to the adoption of § 1367, that permissive counterclaims require an independent basis of jurisdiction. Essentially, the First Circuit concluded that § 1367(a) rendered that rule obsolete.

Facts and Proceedings Below. Global NAPs (GNAPs) sued Verizon, seeking to avoid paying internet-access charges to Verizon as ordered by the Massachusetts Department of Telecommunications and Energy (DTE). GNAPs also sought its purported share of reciprocal fees from Verizon. Verizon responded with a counterclaim for breach of the interconnection agreement (ICA) between the two companies, seeking the access charges owed under the DTE order. Suspecting that GNAPs was transferring assets to avoid paying an eventual judgment, Verizon also asserted a counterclaim alleging fraudulent transfer of assets, under which it sought to pierce GNAPs' corporate veil and hold GNAPs' owner and affiliates jointly liable ("alter ego counterclaim"). The district court entered a summary judgment for Verizon on its breach of contract counterclaim and a default judgment on its alter ego counterclaim, holding GNAPs, its owner, and three affiliates jointly and severally liable for nearly $58 million.

On appeal, GNAPs argued that the district court lacked subject matter jurisdiction over both counterclaims.

Supplemental Jurisdiction over the Breach of Contract Counterclaim. The appellate court first held that the district court had supplemental jurisdiction over the breach of contract counterclaim. The panel rejected GNAPs' argument that the Telecommunications Act divested federal courts of such jurisdiction. The court then explained that this counterclaim was "more than sufficiently related to GNAPs' complaint" to qualify for supplemental jurisdiction under § 1367, noting that both claims arose from a dispute over the same agreement and involved the same basic factual question: what fees the carriers owe each other. The latter ruling involved a straightforward application of § 1367(a)'s "same case or controversy" standard.

District Court had Jurisdiction over the Alter Ego Counterclaim. The First Circuit also held that the district court had supplemental jurisdiction over the alter ego counterclaim. Without defining the scope of § 1367(a)'s "same case or controversy" requirement, the court ruled that the alter ego counterclaim was "sufficiently related to the underlying litigation to fall within Article III's [and § 1367(a)'s] jurisdiction." The panel reasoned that the underlying dispute was about what fees the parties owe each other and involved efforts by both parties to collect claimed fees from a discrete and common body of calls. The alter ego counterclaim was part of Verizon's effort to collect those fees when GNAPs tried to avoid payment. The court noted that other courts have accepted supplemental jurisdiction over claims to pierce the corporate veil and similar claims [see, e.g., Bd. of Trs., Sheet Metal Workers' Nat'l Pension Fund v. Elite Erectors, Inc., 212 F.3d 1031, 1037 (7th Cir. 2000)].

The First Circuit added that there were no due process constraints on the exercise of federal jurisdiction over the alter ego counterclaim. In light of the years of litigation and the district court's familiarity with and expertise on the complicated claims at issue and with GNAPs' efforts to avoid paying access charges, it was sensible for the district court to try Verizon's claim to pierce the corporate veil with the rest of the litigation rather than sending it back to state court.

Permissive Counterclaims and Supplemental Jurisdiction. GNAPs argued that supplemental jurisdiction could not be exercised over the alter ego counterclaim since that claim was permissive only, i.e., not compulsory. The panel took the bait and addressed the question of whether supplemental jurisdiction could be exercised over a permissive counterclaim. This seems odd since the distinction between compulsory and permissive counterclaims was completely irrelevant to the question presented to the court. That question before the court simply asked whether the alter ego counterclaim was sufficiently related to the litigation such that it satisfied the "same case or controversy" requirement of § 1367(a). The compulsory or permissive nature of the claim was completely beside the point, and, in fact, was never resolved by the court.

In any event, the panel embarked on a discussion of the compulsory/permissive counterclaim jurisdictional thicket. It began by explaining that prior to the enactment of § 1367, some courts - actually, most courts - had held that a district court could exercise supplemental jurisdiction over compulsory counterclaims but not over permissive counterclaims, which needed an independent basis of jurisdiction. The panel reasoned, however, that this principle arose from case law distinguishing between pendent claims, which were brought by the plaintiff, and ancillary claims, which were brought by third parties. There was jurisdiction over a pendent claim if it arose from the same "common nucleus of operative fact" as the underlying claim over which the federal court had jurisdiction [see United Mine Workers v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715, 725, 86 S. Ct. 1130, 16 L. Ed. 2d 218 (1966)]. In contrast, there was jurisdiction over an ancillary claim if it arose "from the same transaction or occurrence."

In the panel's view § 1367 eliminated the relevance of the former categories. That section generally grants federal courts supplemental jurisdiction over claims that "are so related to claims in the action within such original jurisdiction that they form part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the United States Constitution." The statute does not use the terminology of "permissive" or "compulsory," and "nothing in § 1367 indicates a congressional intent to recognize, preserve, or create some meaningful, substantive distinction between the jurisdictional categories [the Court has] historically labeled pendent and ancillary" [Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Allapattah Servs., Inc., 545 U.S. 546, 558-559, 125 S. Ct. 2611, 162 L. Ed. 2d 502 (2005)]. The First Circuit concluded, therefore, that by its plain text, § 1367 governs supplemental jurisdiction over all counterclaims, superseding the pre-§ 1367 case law distinguishing between compulsory and permissive counterclaims. In so holding, the First Circuit joined the Second and Seventh Circuits [see Jones v. Ford Motor Credit Co., 358 F.3d 205, 212-213 (2d Cir. 2004); Channell v. Citicorp Nat'l Servs., 89 F.3d 379, 385 (7th Cir. 1996)].

Commentary. This coalition of the First, Second and Seventh Circuits may be hard to resist. Moreover, the prior and well-established rule that permissive counterclaims require an independent basis of jurisdiction may have unnecessarily entangled the rules of joinder with the principles of subject matter jurisdiction. Begin with Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 13. That rule gives a party the right to file a counterclaim against an opposing party, regardless of the claim's compulsory or permissive nature. Basically all counterclaims are allowed under the rule. The critical question once a counterclaim has been filed is whether that counterclaim satisfies the standards of subject matter jurisdiction, either independent or supplemental. If it does, the district may (or must) exercise jurisdiction over it. And it does not matter, and should never have mattered, whether that counterclaim was designated compulsory or permissive. This relatively simply structure is the true insight of the "coalition" approach. Simply put, one should ignore the distinction between compulsory and permissive counterclaims when determining whether the court has jurisdiction over any particular counterclaim, for the rules do not determine jurisdiction.

There is one wrinkle here. The approach endorsed by the First, Second and Seventh Circuits draws a distinction between the jurisdictional standards of § 1367(a) - "same case or controversy under Article III" or "common nucleus of operative facts" - and the standards of Rule 13(a) (and other of the federal rules) - "same transaction or occurrence." The former test is described as being somewhat broader than the latter test, such that a claim could theoretically be part of the same case or controversy for purposes of Article III and yet not arise out of the same transaction or occurrence that forms the "nucleus" of that case. One can expect that real-world applications of this same-case-but-different-transaction standard will be rare.

RELATED LINKS: For further information, see Moore's Federal Practice:

- 16 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 106.25[1].

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Allan Ides is the Christopher N. May Chair at Loyola Law School Los Angeles. He has published extensively in the areas of constitutional law and federal procedure. His civil procedure casebook, co-authored with Christopher N. May - Civil Procedure: Cases and Problems (Aspen 2009) - is in its third edition.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

13 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

The Scope of Relation Back Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(c)(1)(C)

2010 Emerging Issues 5229

The Scope of Relation Back Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(c)(1)(C)

By Allan Ides

July 30, 2010

SUMMARY: The unanimous Court in Krupski v. Costa Crociere endorsed an approach to relation back that carefully tracked and explained the text of Rule 15(c)(1)(C). In so doing, the Court eliminated a gloss on that text that imposed additional, non-textual burdens on the amending party and that inappropriately added to the complexity of the rule. In applying Krupski, however, it is important not to over-read the decision.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Introduction. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(c)(1)(C) governs the relation back for purposes of the statute of limitations of an amendment to a pleading that adds a new party. Prior to the decision in Krupski v. Costa Crociere, S.p.A., - U.S. -, 130 S. Ct. 2485, 177 L. Ed. 2d 48, 2010 U.S. LEXIS 4567, 78 U.S.L.W. 3715 (June 7, 2010), some circuits had held that an amending party's awareness of the existence of the party to be added prior to the filing of the original pleading constituted a "deliberate choice" not to name that party in the original pleading and thereby foreclosed the availability of relation back. In Krupski, the Supreme Court rejected this view and ruled that "relation back under Rule 15(c)(1)(C) depends on what the party to be added knew or should have known, not on the amending party's knowledge or its timeliness in seeking to amend the pleading." In so ruling, the Court adhered closely to the text of Rule 15(c)(1)(C) and usefully clarified the operational scope of that rule.

The Text of Rule 15(c)(1)(C). Rule 15(c)(1)(C) provides that an amendment to a pleading "that changes the party or the naming of a party against whom a claim is asserted" relates back for purposes of the statute of limitations if, consistent with Rule 15(c)(1)(B), "the amendment asserts a claim or defense that arose out of the conduct, transaction, or occurrence set out - or attempted to be set out - in the original pleading" and if, "within the period provided by Rule 4(m) for serving the summons and complaint, the party to be brought in by amendment (i) received such notice of the action that it will not be prejudiced in defending on the merits; and (ii) knew or should have known that the action would have been brought against it, but for a mistake concerning the proper party's identity."

Of particular relevance in Krupski, was subsection (c)(1)(C)(ii) and the question of what constitutes a "mistake" for purposes of that subsection.

Facts and Proceedings. Wanda Krupski brought this personal-injury suit after she was injured when she tripped over a cable aboard a cruise ship. Her ticket identified the carrier as "Costa Crociere S. p. A.," and required an injured party to submit written notice of any cruise-related claim to the carrier or its duly authorized agent within 185 days after the date of the injury. The carrier's sales and marketing agent was identified as "Costa Cruise Lines N. V." The ticket further required that any lawsuit on such a claim be filed against the carrier within one year after the date of the injury.

Krupski notified Costa Cruise, the sales and marketing agent, of her claims, and the two engaged in negotiations but were unable to reach a settlement. Three weeks before the one-year limitations period expired, Krupski filed a negligence action against Costa Cruise the U.S. District Court for the District of Southern Florida. In its answer (filed after the limitations period had expired), Costa Cruise asserted that it was not the proper defendant but merely an agent of Costa Crociere, the actual carrier and vessel operator. Costa Cruise later moved for summary judgment, again stating that Costa Crociere was the proper defendant.

The district court denied defendant's summary judgment motion and granted Krupski leave to amend her complaint to add Costa Crociere. After she did so, the district court dismissed Costa Cruise pursuant to the parties' stipulation. Costa Crociere then moved to dismiss the suit, contending that the amended complaint did not relate back under Rule 15(c)(1)(C) and was therefore barred as having been untimely filed. The district court, following Eleventh Circuit precedent, agreed and dismissed the case, explaining that Krupski's knowledge of the identity of the correct defendant precluded a finding that her decision to sue Costa Cruise was a "mistake" within the meaning of Rule 15(c)(1)(C)(ii). The Eleventh Circuit affirmed, concluding also that no mistake had been made given the information available to Krupski on the passenger ticket issued to her. Rather, in the appellate court's view, Krupski had made a deliberate choice to sue only Costa Cruise. As an alternative, the appellate court also held that the district court did not abuse its discretion in denying relation back because Krupski had delayed 133 days in seeking leave to amend her original complaint. The Supreme Court granted certiorari "to resolve tension among the Circuits over the breadth of Rule 15(c)(1)(C)(ii)."

Of Knowledge, Mistakes and Deliberate Choices. The Supreme Court began its analysis with the text of Rule 15(c)(1) and, after quoting that text, including subsections (A) through (C), immediately announced, "neither of the Court of Appeals' reasons for denying relation back under Rule 15(c)(1)(C)(ii) finds support in the text of the Rule." As to the "deliberate choice" rationale followed by the lower courts, the Court observed,

By focusing on Krupski's knowledge, the Court of Appeals chose the wrong starting point. The question under Rule 15(c)(1)(C)(ii) is not whether Krupski knew or should have known the identity of Costa Crociere as the proper defendant, but whether Costa Crociere knew or should have known that it would have been named as a defendant but for an error. Rule 15(c)(1)(C)(ii) asks what the prospective defendant knew or should have known during the Rule 4(m) period, not what the plaintiff knew or should have known at the time of filing her original complaint. (emphasis in original)

Information in the plaintiff's possession is relevant only to the extent "it bears on defendant's understanding of whether the plaintiff made a mistake regarding the proper party's identity. For purposes of that inquiry, it would be error to conflate knowledge of a party's existence with the absence of mistake." (emphasis supplied). A plaintiff, knowing of a party's existence, may make a mistake about that party's status or may misunderstand the role that party played in the occurrence giving rise to the claims. The question under Rule 15(c)(1)(C)(ii) is whether the party to be brought in knew or should have known that, absent some mistake, the action would have been brought against that party.

Costa Crociere argued that the key issue under Rule 15(c)(1)(C)(ii) was whether the plaintiff made a "deliberate choice" to sue one party over another. The Court agreed that making a deliberate choice to sue one party instead of another, while fully understanding the factual and legal differences between the two parties, would be the antithesis of making a mistake concerning the proper party's identity. This does not mean, however, that any time a plaintiff is aware of the existence of two parties and chooses to sue the wrong one, the proper defendant could reasonably believe that the plaintiff made no mistake. The reasonableness of the mistake is not itself at issue. Therefore, a deliberate but mistaken choice does not foreclose a finding that Rule 15(c)(1)(C)(ii) has been satisfied.

This reading, the Court said, is consistent with the purpose of relation back: to balance the interests of the defendant protected by the statute of limitations with the preference expressed in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in general, and Rule 15 in particular, for resolving disputes on their merits. "A prospective defendant who legitimately believed that the limitations period had passed without any attempt to sue him has a strong interest in repose, but repose would be a windfall for a prospective defendant who understood, or who should have understood, that he escaped suit during the limitations period only because the plaintiff misunderstood a crucial fact about his identity. Because a plaintiff's knowledge of the existence of a party does not foreclose the possibility that she has made a mistake of identity about which that party should have been aware, such knowledge does not support that party's interest in repose."

Plaintiff's Delay in Seeking Leave to Amend. The court of appeals had offered a second reason why the amended complaint did not relate back—the plaintiff had unduly delayed in seeking to file and in eventually filing an amended complaint. The Supreme Court rejected this rationale as well. In the Court's view, Rule 15(c) sets forth an exclusive list of requirements for relation back, and dilatory conduct is not among them. Moreover, the rule mandates relation back when the requirements are satisfied; it does not leave this question in the court's equitable discretion.

Similarly, Rule 15(c) does not require a plaintiff to move to amend the complaint or file and serve an amended complaint within the Rule 4(m) period. Rule 15(c) simply requires that the prospective defendant has received sufficient notice of the action within the Rule 4(m) period so that the defendant will not be prejudiced in defending the case on the merits. The notice need not be formal.

As Applied: Krupski's Amendment Relates Back. Applying the principles it had set out, the Court concluded that the district court and court of appeals erred in denying relation back. Costa Crociere had notice of the complaint within the Rule 4(m) period, and should have known that it was not named as a defendant only because of the plaintiff's misunderstanding about which "Costa" entity was in charge of the ship—clearly a "mistake concerning the proper party's identity."

Costa Crociere contended that because the original complaint referred to the ticket's forum requirement and presuit claims-notification procedure, the plaintiff was clearly aware of the contents of the ticket, and because the ticket identified Costa Crociere as the carrier and proper party for a lawsuit, Costa Crociere was entitled to think that the plaintiff had made a deliberate choice to sue Costa Cruise instead. However, while the plaintiff may have known the contents of the ticket, this did not foreclose the possibility that she nonetheless misunderstood crucial facts regarding the two companies' identities. The face of the complaint plainly indicated such a misunderstanding. Moreover, Costa Crociere had not articulated any strategy that it could reasonably have thought the plaintiff was pursuing in suing a defendant that was legally unable to provide relief.

The Court also noted that Costa Cruise and Costa Crociere were related corporate entities with very similar names. This interrelationship and similarity heightened the expectation that Costa Crociere should have suspected a mistake had been made when Costa Cruise was named in a complaint that actually described Costa Crociere's activities.

The Court concluded that Costa Crociere should have known that the plaintiff's failure to name it as a defendant in her original complaint was due to a mistake concerning the proper party's identity. The Court therefore reversed the judgment of the court of appeals and remanded for further proceedings.

Concurrence. Justice Scalia joined the Court's opinion except to the extent that the Court relied on the Advisory Committee Notes to Rule 15. These Notes, in Justice Scalia's view, are useful only to the same extent as any other scholarly commentary, but have no effect on a rule's meaning; rather, it is the text of the rule that controls.

Commentary. Krupski is a welcome decision. The unanimous Court endorsed an approach to relation back that carefully tracked and explained the text of Rule 15(c)(1)(C). In so doing, the Court eliminated a gloss on that text that imposed additional, non-textual burdens on the amending party and that inappropriately added to the complexity of the rule. In applying Krupski, however, it is important not to over-read the decision. The Court did not hold that the amending party's pre-filing knowledge of the existence of the "correct" defendant was irrelevant. Rather, it said that this knowledge was only relevant to the extent that it might demonstrate the reasonableness of that defendant's belief that the original decision not to sue him, her or it represented a deliberate, strategic choice, and, hence, was not a "mistake" within the meaning of the rule. Again, it is not the reasonableness of the mistake (or choice) but the reasonableness of the defendant's belief that plaintiff made a deliberate choice in not suing it.

RELATED LINKS: For further information, see Moore's Federal Practice:

■ 3 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 15.19[3][d]

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Allan Ides is the Christopher N. May Chair at Loyola Law School Los Angeles. He has published extensively in the areas of constitutional law and federal procedure. His civil procedure casebook, co-authored with Christopher N. May -- Civil Procedure: Cases and Problems (Aspen 2009) -- is in its third edition.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

14 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Kyle Bisceglie. All Rights Reserved.

Bisceglie on Pension Committee and Duty to Preserve

2010 Emerging Issues 5137

Kyle C. Bisceglie on Zubulake Revisited: Six Years Later -- Pension Committee and the Duty to Preserve in 2010 and Beyond

By Kyle Bisceglie

June 28, 2010

SUMMARY: Six years after her pivotal Zubulake decisions, Judge Scheindlin revisits e-discovery issues and reinforces the importance of the duty to preserve. Kyle C. Bisceglie, author of the LexisNexis Practice Guide New York e-discovery and Evidence, analyzes the impact of this decision and offers some suggestions for practitioners to ensure that they avoid the pitfalls that ensnared the plaintiffs.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Judge Scheindlin Identifies Gross Negligence in Failure to Preserve Relevant e-Discovery Evidence.

Judge Scheindlin (author of the pivotal Zubulake decisions) issued another important, thorough and widely-discussed e-discovery opinion on January 11, 2010, amended and revised on January 15, 2010 and May 28, 2010: Pension Committee of the University of Montreal Pension Plan et al. v. Banc of America Securities, LLC et al., 685 F. Supp. 2d 456 (S.D.N.Y. January 15, 2010) ("Pension Committee"). Therein she teaches us again that failure to comply with the duty to preserve and the resulting loss of evidence can have a dramatic impact on litigation. Significantly, the court found inter alia that, even without bad faith, the failure to issue a written litigation hold, preserve the documents of key players or preserve unique information on back-up tapes constitutes sanctionable gross negligence when evidence is lost.

January 15th and May 28th Revisions to Pension Committee. The January 15th amended opinion clarified ten or eleven points in the original decision, most notably with regard to backup tapes. Specifically, the court revised language and added footnote no. 99 to make clear that failure to preserve backup tapes constitutes gross negligence only if the backup tapes are the only source of relevant data from key players.

On May 28, 2010, the court revised a single sentence that had engendered some confusion, but fairly read in context of the entire decision does not change the implications of this case, prior Zubulake decisions or discovery obligations. The court struck and replaced this sentence on page 10, lines 7-10: "By contrast, the failure to obtain records from all employees (some of whom may have had only a passing encounter with the issues in the litigation), as opposed to key players, likely constitutes negligence as opposed to a higher degree of culpability." The court substituted: "By contrast, the failure to obtain records from all those employees who had any involvement with the issues raised in the litigation or anticipated litigation, as opposed to key players, could constitute negligence." This change reinforced both that (1) legal holds need only be issued to "key players" and not all employees and (2) that failure to obtain records from key players "could constitute negligence" rather than "likely constitutes negligence." This revision does not substantively alter the court's position in this case or prior Zubulake decisions but rather eliminates potentially misleading language about which commentators have speculated. See, e.g., Boehning, H. Christopher and Toal J., Daniel, In "Pension Committee," Judge Revisits Zubulake, N.Y.L.J. (February 2, 2010) ("Especially troubling is her suggestion that a failure to 'obtain records from all employees ... is likely negligent.' That would strike many experienced practitioners as an abrupt shift in the law. Discovery obligations require a search that is reasonable under the circumstances. Litigants thus have long been under a duty to search for responsive documents where they are reasonably likely to be found.").

Through these revisions, the court apparently recognizes just how closely read these opinions are. Indeed, in a colloquy of lawyers with Judge Scheindlin on May 27, 2010 in Washington, D.C., an attorney asked about this very sentence, fretting it meant that the records of all employees had to be preserved! Judge Scheindlin's response was that all of her opinions have been consistent that there is a duty to preserve only relevant evidence of key players and that this could be "one poorly drafted sentence." Dutifully, the court issued the revised opinion the next day.

What was involved in Pension Committee. In Pension Committee, a group of investors sued to recover $550 million lost in the liquidation of two hedge funds. The investors filed state and federal securities claims against former directors, administrators, auditors, custodian of the funds and prime brokers. The investors retained counsel in the fall of 2003 after the hedge fund manager ("Lancer") filed for bankruptcy in the spring of 2003. They filed suit in February of 2004 in the Southern District of Florida. The case was stayed under the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act, and then transferred to the Southern District of New York in September 2005. Discovery began in 2007. Following the close of discovery in October, 2008, the defendants sought sanctions against 13 plaintiffs for failing to preserve and produce documents, including ESI, and for submitting false declarations regarding their collection and production efforts.

The "continuum" of culpability. Much of the decision focused on the standards controlling applications for spoliation sanctions. The ruling makes clear that sanctions may be imposed for spoliation that is the result of negligent, grossly negligent, and willful and bad faith conduct. The court characterized these levels of culpability as residing on a "continuum" made via a "judgment call ... by a court reviewing conduct through the backward lens known as hindsight."

Applying this continuum to discovery, the court found as follows:

(i) A failure to preserve "is surely negligent, and, depending on the circumstances, may be grossly negligent or willful."

(ii) The intentional destruction of evidence after the duty to preserve has attached is "willful."

(iii) Possibly after October, 2003, when Zubulake IV was issued, and definitely after July, 2004, when the final Zubulake opinion was issued, the failure to issue a written litigation hold "constitutes gross negligence because that failure is likely to result in the destruction of relevant information."

(iv) The failure to collect and review resulting in loss or destruction of evidence is "surely negligent, and depending on the circumstances, may be grossly negligent or willful."

(v) As revised in the May 28th opinion, "the failure to obtain records from all those employees who had any involvement with the issues raised in the litigation or anticipated litigation, as opposed to key players, could constitute negligence."

(vi) "[F]ailure to take all appropriate measures to preserve ESI likely falls in the negligence category."

The court noted other decisions where (vii) the "failure to collect information from files of former employees that remain in the party's possession, custody, or control after the duty to preserve has attached" was gross negligence and (viii) "failure to assess the accuracy and validity of selected search terms" is negligence. These examples are illustrative only -- the court emphasized that its list is not definitive and "[e]ach case will turn on its own facts and the varieties of efforts and failures is infinite." Practitioners take note: there are additional ways to act with negligence or gross negligence in attempts to preserve evidence.

The most serious conduct -- willful and bad faith conduct -- is punishable with the most severe sanctions, including "terminating sanctions," such as dismissal of claims and entering of default judgments. In cases of negligence or gross-negligence, an adverse inference instruction or "less severe sanctions -- such as fines and cost shifting," may be imposed even without a showing that particular materials were lost. "Like many other sanctions, an adverse inference instruction can take many forms, again ranging in degrees of harshness. The harshness of the instruction should be determined based on the nature of the spoliating party's conduct -- the more egregious the conduct, the more harsh the instruction." 685 F. Supp. 2d 456, 471. The least harsh instruction -- which should be administered for mere negligence and termed a spoliation instruction -- "permits (but does not require) a jury to presume that the lost evidence is both relevant and favorable to the innocent party."

It appears that Judge Scheindlin applied sanctions under the Court's inherent power rather than under Fed. R. Civ. P. 37. Much can be said about the varying standards with respect to levels of culpability applied by different circuit courts to determine if an adverse inference instruction is warranted. In the Second Circuit, negligence is enough to warrant an adverse inference instruction if the prejudice is sufficient. See Residential Funding Corp. v. DeGeorge Fin. Corp., 306 F.3d 99, 108-109 (2d Cir. 2002). Not so in other circuits: some, like the Fifth and Eleventh, require bad faith and others, like the Eighth, require intent.

In Pension Committee, the court found some plaintiffs grossly negligent and others negligent. Most notably, Judge Scheindlin explicitly found gross negligence for the failure to issue a formal, written litigation hold at the time litigation is reasonably anticipated. Reasoning that the absence of a litigation hold will "inevitably result" in the spoliation of evidence, the court found that the failure to issue a written litigation hold is indicative of a high level of culpability, and that potentially severe sanctions are warranted. Additionally, Judge Scheindlin noted that "the following failures support a finding of gross negligence, when the duty to preserve has attached: ... to identify all of the key players and to ensure that their electronic and paper records are preserved; to cease the deletion of email or to preserve the records of former employees that are in a party's possession, custody, or control; and to preserve backup tapes when they are the sole source of relevant information or when they relate to key players, if the relevant information maintained by those players is not obtainable from readily accessible sources." 685 F. Supp. 2d 456, 471.

Lessons from Pension Committee. Much can be learned from the Pension Committee plaintiffs' efforts at preservation and the court's assessment of their efforts. Some of these lessons are related below; practitioners are encouraged to read the entire opinion.

The court described plaintiffs' efforts at preservation and production as follows: "Counsel telephoned and emailed plaintiffs and distributed memoranda instructing plaintiffs to be over, rather than under, inclusive, and noting that emails and electronic documents should be included in the production." The court found that:

It does not direct employees to preserve all relevant records -- both paper and electronic -- nor does it create a mechanism for collecting the preserved records so that they can be searched by someone other than the employee. Rather, the directive places total reliance on the employee to search and select what that employee believed to be responsive records without any supervision from Counsel. Throughout the litigation, Counsel sent plaintiffs monthly case status memoranda, which included additional requests for Lancer-related documents, including electronic documents. But these memoranda never specifically instructed plaintiffs not to destroy records so that Counsel could monitor the collection and production of documents.

The court expected the plaintiffs to maintain documents related to due diligence. The court noted the paucity of evidence and the admitted failure to preserve and the inexorable result: that relevant records were lost or destroyed.

Six plaintiffs were charged with gross negligence for a combination of the following:

- Taking "no action to collect or preserve electronic documents prior to 2007;" failing to oversee employees' collection of documents and misleading initial disclosures and declarations;
- Deleting emails after November 2003; failure to seek documents from a current and former employee who had knowledge of the subject of the dispute; and inconsistencies in deposition testimony and declaration;
- Using an employee with no search experience to handle document production without supervision from an attorney; failing to search files of 17 employees with knowledge; defendants could identify 39 relevant emails plaintiffs failed to produce;
- Failing to suspend recycling of back-up tapes; failing to ask 11 employees with potential knowledge; and failing to produce documents produced by other plaintiffs.

In contrast, the seven plaintiffs who were merely negligent engaged in much of the same behavior to a lesser degree and without the inaccurate and misleading declarations. The court observed that, while they did not initiate a litigation hold, they were merely negligent in significant part because the case was filed in the Southern District of Florida in early 2004 before that court had adopted a "well-established duty" to issue a written litigation hold (in contrast with the Southern District of New York -- via Judge Scheindlin -- which had done so in mid-2004). The court further identified as a factor for leniency that, by the time the case was transferred to New York in 2005, the electronic records from 2003 would have already been lost.

Even after a careful review of each of the court's findings it is difficult to state precisely the difference between negligence and gross negligence. Perhaps this illustrates the court's observation that these determinations are "fact intensive" and involve a "gut reaction based on years of experience as to whether a litigant has complied with its discovery obligations and how hard it has worked to comply." 685 F. Supp. 2d 456, 471. Negligent plaintiffs worked just a little harder than grossly negligent plaintiffs, apparently.

Significance of Pension Committee. This case may well be the most important e-discovery case of 2010 and is important reading given the subtitle Judge Scheindlin chose for the court's decision: "Zubulake Revisited: Six Years Later." Many clients and practitioners may continue to resist the issuance of a written litigation hold for fear that breaching it will make matters worse. Under Pension Committee, that is not advisable. The court suggested a bright-line rule for written legal holds (the failure to issue a written litigation hold constitutes gross negligence because that failure is likely to result in the destruction of relevant information. 685 F. Supp. 2d 456, 465) although the court appeared to undermine that rule at times, stating that sanctionable conduct "cannot be measured with exactitude and might be called differently by a different judge."

The practitioner should also be aware that the preservation obligation applies equally to plaintiffs and defendants. All parties have an obligation to preserve evidence, including ESI, that is relevant to current or to reasonably anticipated future litigations. "Identifying the boundaries of the duty to preserve involves two related inquiries: when does the duty to preserve attach, and what evidence must be preserved?" Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 220 F.R.D. 212, 216 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) ("Zubulake IV"). "The obligation to preserve arises when the party has notice that the evidence is relevant to litigation or when a party should have known that the evidence may be relevant to future litigation." 220 F.R.D. 212, 216. See also Fujitsu Ltd. v. Federal Exp. Corp., 247 F.3d 423, 436 (2d Cir. 2001) (obligation to preserve evidence arises when party has notice that evidence is relevant to litigation or when party should have known that evidence may be relevant to future litigation). This duty often arises first for the plaintiff, as "plaintiff's duty is more often triggered before litigation commences, in large part because plaintiffs control the timing of litigation." (In Pension Committee, the duty to preserve arose in April 2003 although suit was not filed until February 2004.) However, the mere existence of a dispute between two parties does not necessarily mean that a party should have reasonably anticipated litigation at that time and taken steps to preserve ESI. Treppel v. Biovail Corp., 233 F.R.D. 363, 371 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) (the company was on notice of preservation obligations only when it became aware that suit was about to be served).

The practitioner should note the importance of establishing an accurate and defensible position early on. Many of the plaintiffs in Pension Committee made submissions to the court that were later contradicted, found to be misleading based on their deposition testimony, and, most notably, resulted in lost evidence. Likewise, Pension Committee suggests that a practitioner should be careful about permitting a client to self-preserve without adequate attorney supervision. Practitioners must be careful about limiting the employees who receive the litigation hold and ensuring that former employees are included in preservation and collection efforts. Practitioners who need to establish and maintain a defensible and repeatable position on e-discovery must read the 88 page Pension Committee decision. While promising some flexibility such that courts "cannot and do not expect ... perfection," the standards Pension Committee applies seem to require something pretty close to perfection and will often be applied by hindsight, which can be harsh.

Practitioners may want to develop a comprehensive preservation plan with the client. Pro-active counsel should encourage clients to develop and implement a litigation preparedness plan in advance of the litigation. For a discussion of this topic, see Kyle C. Bisceglie, LexisNexis Practice Guide: New York e-Discovery and Evidence, §§ 16.06 to 16.12 (LexisNexis Matthew Bender).

Preservation after Pension Committee. Practitioners should strongly consider issuing a written legal or litigation hold taking into account the practitioner's prior experiences, the nature of issues raised, and the amount in controversy. The litigation hold should be issued to those key players who hold relevant evidence in a way that ensures they will, in fact, receive it. Counsel and client should use a generous definition of key player based on available facts to ensure preservation of all evidence. Counsel must monitor compliance with the litigation hold. The following general guidelines should be considered as part of the issuance of a litigation hold and other document preservation efforts:

1. Develop a pre-litigation action plan of steps to take in the event of a potential investigation, regulatory inquiry or litigation that necessitates preserving documents or ESI.

2. Issue a litigation hold at the time litigation is reasonably anticipated. That point will, in most cases, fall earlier for plaintiffs than for defendants. However, a defendant who is the target of threatened litigation should issue a litigation hold immediately and should not wait for commencement of a lawsuit. That hold should be in writing under Pension Committee. If your client will not issue a litigation hold in writing, ensure that the client is making such decision for sound reasons and document all steps taken to preserve evidence.

3. Re-issue the litigation hold periodically to ensure that its requirements are fresh in the minds of employees and known to new hires.

4. Designate a manager with knowledge of the client's document retention practices and policies to supervise the process of identifying and preserving potentially discoverable documents and ESI. Employees searching for relevant documents should be adequately supervised by the designated manager and counsel. At a minimum, counsel must understand the IT involved and the employees' role and provide the employee with adequate instruction on any role the employee plays in collection efforts.

5. Suspend routine overwriting and data destruction procedures that would affect relevant evidence. Turn over relevant backup tapes or other media containing relevant evidence to counsel, or store such materials in a segregated location, away from other materials available for use in the ordinary course.

6. Make meaningful efforts to identify all "key players" based on available facts and provide their names to counsel. Search for and retain all files for key players, including computer systems, emails, backup servers or tapes and hard copy documents.

7. Identify former employees and any third-parties that may have relevant evidence. If the party has the legal or practical ability to retrieve that evidence, extend the hold to those former employees and third-parties.

8. Keep a log of specific actions taken to identify and preserve potentially relevant documents. This log should be labeled "created at the request of counsel for use by counsel." Litigants are often called upon by the court or opposing parties to recount their efforts to comply with discovery obligations and the ability to provide all relevant information and witnesses is crucial.

9. A party need only preserve relevant evidence. Making the determination of what sources may or may not contain relevant information involves subjective judgment. In determining what sources of ESI may contain relevant evidence and whether to preserve, weigh the usually inconsequential cost of preserving evidence against the usually high consequences of failing to preserve it.

10. Promptly extend and expand the hold as new allegations or facts become known that suggest the possibility of additional relevant evidence that has not yet been preserved.

Kyle C. Bisceglie, Thomas J. Fleming, Jeffrey A. Udell, Client Alert: Preservation and Production of Electronically-Stored Information (February 8, 2010). Available at http://www.olshanlaw.com/docs/Client_Alert_1002.pdf.

The duty to preserve certainly may extend to third-parties where a party has a practical or legal right to obtain relevant evidence. See Gordon Partners et. al. v. Blumenthal (In re NTL, Inc. Sec. Litig.), 244 F.R.D. 179 (S.D.N.Y. 2007) (document production required when party has legal or practical ability to obtain them from third parties). "Control [does] not require legal ownership or actual physical possession; rather, documents [are] considered to be under a party's control when that party had the right, authority, or practical ability to obtain the documents from a non-party." SSangyong Corp. v. Vida Shoes Int'l, Inc., 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9101, at *9-10 (D. Colo. 2007) (defendant "retained control" over third-party administrator of pension plan and had authority and ability to obtain and produce requested data).

The Limitations of Pension Committee. While practitioners should heed the lessons of Pension Committee, it is unclear how many other courts will apply the same level of scrutiny to e-discovery as this court did. By its own estimate, the court and its law clerks spent approximately 300 hours resolving this single motion. See n. 56. At nine hours a day, 300 hours amounts to over 33 days of time spent exclusively on producing this opinion. Not every court can or will apply that amount of attention to every motion. All practitioners know that there are still many judges who are disengaged for one reason or another from day-to-day discovery battles and shortcomings under the theoretically self-executing nature of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Many courts rely on a heightened expectation of counsel that sadly is not always achieved in practice. Many jurists will certainly wade into palpable and obvious disputes that are well-articulated by counsel, but few will take anywhere close to 300 hours of time to sort out complicated, technical and fact-intensive e-discovery disputes.

Pension Committee should not be read literally, but with an eye to the facts of the specific case at hand. For example, although Pension Committee provides strong argument for the need for a written litigation hold, it is more important that the litigation hold be effective, whether written or oral, which may vary with the circumstances of the client. After all, at its core, Pension Committee was nothing more than a case about missing relevant evidence that should have been preserved. Practitioners are well-advised to focus on doing their job in preserving relevant evidence, and the rest will follow.

With respect to this unofficial "Supreme Court of e-Discovery," there are a series of federal judges playing a major role in developing law on electronic discovery issues including Judge Scheindlin, Magistrate Judge Andrew Peck also in the Southern District, Magistrate Judge John Facciola in the District of Columbia, Magistrate Judge Paul Grimm in the District of Maryland and Magistrate Judge David Waxse in the District of Kansas. Some of these judges have stated their practice of reading their brethren's judicial rulings on e-discovery to inform their own thoughts. Practitioners may wish to do the same.

RELATED LINKS: For further explanation of the duty to preserve, see

- Kyle C. Bisceglie, LexisNexis Practice Guide New York e-Discovery and Evidence, Ch. 10, Analyzing Duty to Preserve

For further discussion of litigation holds, see

■ Kyle C. Bisceglie, LexisNexis Practice Guide New York e-Discovery and Evidence, Ch. 16, Establishing Best Practices for Electronic Document Management

For additional information about e-discovery consult

■ Kyle C. Bisceglie, LexisNexis Practice Guide: New York e-Discovery and Evidence (LexisNexis Matthew Bender)

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Kyle C. Bisceglie, a Partner at Olshan Grundman Frome Rosenzweig & Wolosky LLP in New York City, maintains a national practice counseling corporations, partnerships and individuals with respect to complex commercial litigation, Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR), contracts, business advice and litigation avoidance. Mr. Bisceglie represents investment banks, hedge and private equity funds, merchant and credit card processors, software publishers, licensors of famous intellectual property, health, medical and dental instruments as well as entrepreneurial ventures and businesses in software, technology infrastructure, advertising, event production, insurance, chemical distribution, fashion and consulting fields. Representative clients include Marvel Entertainment, Atari, First Data Corporation, Credit Suisse, UBS Securities, DTE Energy, GE Commercial Finance, Inovio Biomedical Corporation, ADK and Guidance Endodontics. He has tried numerous cases without loss. Most recently, he won a $44 million verdict for his client, an endodontic manufacturer, against the largest dental instrument company in the world, and also has participated in the investigation of the worldwide derivatives trading practices of a New York based merchant bank, represented US policyholders in the largest insurance insolvency in North American history, and negotiated the transfer of a major beverage and spirit company's most valuable brand. In 2010, Mr. Bisceglie authored the LexisNexis Practice Guide: New York e-Discovery and Evidence, a 900 page treatise on New York state and federal e-Discovery, that has already become a widely-used reference guide for New York practitioners. He is Martindale-Hubbell AV rated by his peers and can be reached by phone at 212-451-2207 or by email at Kbisceglie@olshanlaw.com.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

15 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Perry v. Schwarzenegger and Mandamus Review

2010 Emerging Issues 5125

Perry v. Schwarzenegger and Mandamus Review

By Allan Ides

June 17, 2010

SUMMARY: In Perry v. Schwarzenegger, Perry II, the Ninth Circuit denied a petition for mandamus directed at a district court order that may have misinterpreted the legal standards established by the Ninth Circuit in an earlier mandamus proceeding in the same case, Perry v. Schwarzenegger, Perry I. Despite this potential misinterpretation, the Ninth Circuit concluded that the order did not technically violate the prior mandate.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: In Perry v. Schwarzenegger, 602 F.3d 976, 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 7492 (9th Cir. 2010) (Perry II), the Ninth Circuit denied a petition for mandamus directed at a district court order that may have misinterpreted the legal standards established by the Ninth Circuit in an earlier mandamus proceeding in the same case [Perry v. Schwarzenegger, 591 F.3d 1147, 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 170 (9th Cir. Dec. 11, 2009, amended Jan. 4, 2010) (Perry I)]. Despite this potential misinterpretation, the Ninth Circuit concluded that the order did not technically violate the prior mandate. Nor did any of the factors pertinent to mandamus review support granting the petition.

Background. In November 2008, California voters approved Proposition 8, an initiative measure that amended the California Constitution to provide, "[o]nly marriage between a man and a woman is valid or recognized in California." Perry v. Schwarzenegger involves a challenge to the constitutionality of this provision. When the state Attorney General declined to defend the suit, the official proponents of the ballot measure were allowed to intervene as defendants. In Perry I, those defendant/proponents sought mandamus review of a discovery order that compelled them to reveal internal communications of a political nature. The Ninth Circuit concluded that the order "would likely have a chilling effect on political association and the formulation of political expression." The appellate court further concluded that the plaintiffs had "not shown a sufficient need for the information." The writ was, therefore, granted and the district court was ordered to enter a protective order consistent with the Ninth Circuit's opinion.

In Perry II - the immediate proceeding, two organizations that had opposed Proposition 8, but were not parties to the litigation, sought relief from the district court's orders compelling them to produce documents they contended were protected by the First Amendment privilege established in Perry I. These "third party appellants" argued that the Ninth Circuit could exercise jurisdiction over their appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1291 or, alternatively, pursuant to a writ of mandamus.

No Appellate Jurisdiction. The Ninth Circuit quickly disposed of the appellants' assertion of jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291. As nonparties in the underlying litigation, the third party appellants could obtain direct review of the district court's order only by electing to ignore the order and then appealing any ensuing contempt citation. Since no such contempt order had been issued, the Ninth Circuit concluded that appellate jurisdiction was lacking.

No Mandamus Jurisdiction. The third party appellants contended in the alternative that the Ninth Circuit could exercise mandamus jurisdiction over this appeal to compel the district court to follow the mandate in Perry I. In Vizcaino v. United States District Court, the Ninth Circuit recognized that mandamus jurisdiction is available when a district court disregards a prior appellate mandate on remand [Vizcaino v. U.S. Dist. Ct., 173 F.3d 713, 718-720 (9th Cir. 1999)]. The Ninth Circuit concluded, however, that the present case was distinguishable from Vizcaino because the district court's orders here did not conflict with the earlier appellate mandate. The appeal in Perry I concerned the application of a First Amendment privilege to discovery requests between the parties to this litigation. The present appeal concerned subpoenas issued by parties to nonparties who had not been involved in the prior appeal (except as amicus curiae), asking for different documents from the ones involved in the previous appeal. Although the district court here purported to apply the Perry I First Amendment privilege and thus interpreted the Perry I opinion, the earlier mandate was not directly applicable to the order under review; instead, the opinion in Perry I was pertinent only as precedent. Under these circumstances, the Vizcaino principle did not apply.

The Ninth Circuit also concluded that mandamus was inappropriate under the five-factor analysis articulated in Bauman v. United States District Court [557 F.2d 650 (9th Cir. 1977)]. In Bauman, the court established five factors to determine whether mandamus is appropriate in a given case: (1) whether the petitioner has no other means, such as a direct appeal, to obtain the desired relief; (2) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in any way not correctable on appeal; (3) whether the district court's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (4) whether the district court's order is an oft-repeated error or manifests a persistent disregard of the federal rules; and (5) whether the district court's order raises new and important problems or issues of first impression [Bauman v. United States District Court 557 F.2d 650, 654-655 (9th Cir. 1977)].

As to the first two factors, the third party appellants could refuse to comply with the order and then appeal from any resulting contempt citation; if their appeal had merit, they could then obtain the relief they desired. Hence, neither of these factors supported granting the writ. Similarly, neither the fourth nor the fifth factor was implicated in this proceeding, there being no "oft repeated error" or "persistent disregard of federal rules" and no "new and important problems or issues of first impression." Only the third factor - whether the district court's order was clearly erroneous as a matter of law - arguably militated in favor of granting the petition. Yet, although the appellate court agreed that the district court may have misunderstood the scope of the Perry I's First Amendment standard, it was not clear "that the district court's ultimate conclusions were clearly erroneous as a matter of law." Hence, the Ninth Circuit denied the petition for a writ of mandamus.

Comment. The opinions in Perry I and Perry II provide useful guidance in assessing the availability of mandamus review.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Allan Ides is the Christopher N. May Chair at Loyola Law School Los Angeles. He has published extensively in the areas of constitutional law and federal procedure. His civil procedure casebook, co-authored with Christopher N. May - Civil Procedure: Cases and Problems (Aspen 2009) - is in its third edition.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

16 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Salazar v. Buono -- Scope of Review on Certiorari; Standing to Enforce Injunction

2010 Emerging Issues 5126

Salazar v. Buono -- Scope of Review on Certiorari; Standing to Enforce Injunction

By Allan Ides

June 17, 2010

SUMMARY: The basic questions presented in Salazar v. Buono were: 1) whether the Supreme Court, on certiorari, had jurisdiction to revisit questions resolved in an otherwise unreviewable final judgment entered earlier in the same case; 2) whether the plaintiff had standing to enforce the injunction; and 3) whether the district court properly granted the plaintiff's motion to enforce the injunction.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Introduction. The central point of controversy in Salazar v. Buono, 130 S. Ct. 1803, 176 L. Ed. 2d 634, 2010 U.S. LEXIS 3674 (April 28, 2010), was the propriety of a district court order enforcing a previously issued injunction. The basic questions presented were: 1) whether the Supreme Court, on certiorari, had jurisdiction to revisit questions resolved in an otherwise unreviewable final judgment entered earlier in the same case; 2) whether the plaintiff had standing to enforce the injunction; and 3) whether the district court properly granted the plaintiff's motion to enforce the injunction. There was no majority opinion. There were, however, majority views on three points. First, the Court unanimously held that it did not have jurisdiction to revisit the standing and Establishment Clause issues previously decided by the district court. Next, seven Justices, including four dissenting Justices, held that the plaintiff had standing to enforce the injunction. (All nine Justices agreed that party awarded an injunction has standing to enforce the injunction.) Finally, five Justices concluded that the district court's enforcement order was improper under the circumstances presented. The case was remanded for further consideration.

Facts and Proceedings Below. In 1934, the Veterans of Foreign Wars (VFW) erected a cross on federal land in the Mojave National Preserve as a memorial to soldiers who died in World War I. In 2001, a retired Park Service employee who makes regular visits to the preserve sued the federal government, claiming that the display of the cross on public land offended him and violated the Establishment Clause. The government challenged the plaintiff's standing to raise this Establishment Clause claim as well as the merits of his claim. The district court ruled in favor of the plaintiff on both points and entered an injunction requiring removal of the cross [Buono v. Norton, 212 F. Supp. 2d 1202, 1210-1216 (C.D. Cal. 2002) (Buono I)]. The Ninth Circuit affirmed [Buono v. Norton, 371 F.3d 543 (9th Cir. 2004) (Buono II)]. The government did not seek review of the Ninth Circuit's judgment. However, while the government's appeal was pending in the Ninth Circuit, Congress passed a statute directing the Secretary of the Interior to transfer to the VFW the government's interest in the land on which the cross stood in exchange for land elsewhere in the preserve that was owned by a private party. The statute specified that the property would revert to the government if not maintained "as a memorial commemorating United States participation in World War I and honoring the American veterans of that war."

After the Ninth Circuit affirmed the district court's judgment, the plaintiff filed a motion in the district court seeking enforcement or modification of the injunction to prevent transfer of the land pursuant to the statute. Concluding that the attempt to transfer the land was an attempt to keep the cross on the land, rather than a bona fide attempt to comply with the injunction, the district court granted the plaintiff's motion to enforce the injunction, denied as moot his motion to amend it, and permanently enjoined the government from implementing the land-transfer statute [Buono v. Norton, 364 F. Supp. 2d 1175, 1182 (C.D. Cal. 2005) (Buono III)]. Again, the Ninth Circuit affirmed [Buono v. Kempthorne, 502 F.3d 1069 (9th Cir. 2007) (Buono IV)]. This time, the government sought certiorari, and the Supreme Court granted the petition and reversed. There was no majority opinion.

The Scope of Review on Certiorari. The government argued that the scope of the Court's certiorari jurisdiction, which had been granted to review the Ninth Circuit's decision in Buono IV, included the authority to review the otherwise final proceedings in Buono I and Buono II. Specifically, the government asked the Court to reverse the district court's Buono I determinations that the plaintiff had standing to assert an Establishment Clause claim and that the display of the cross violated that clause. The Court unanimously - albeit in separate opinions - declined this invitation to expand the scope of its certiorari jurisdiction. All of the Justices agreed that both issues decided in Buono I (and affirmed in Buono II) were final and unreviewable. See Toledo Scale Co. v. Computing Scale Co., 261 U.S. 399, 418, 43 S. Ct. 458, 67 L. Ed. 719 (1923); Travelers Indemnity Co. v. Bailey, 129 S. Ct. 2195, 174 L. Ed. 2d 99, 110 (2009). The most surprising thing about this issue is that the government seems to have been unaware of this firmly established limit on the Court's certiorari jurisdiction.

Plaintiff's Standing to Enforce the Injunction. All of the Justices agreed that a party awarded an injunction has standing to enforce that specific injunction. The question here, however, was whether the plaintiff was, in fact, seeking to enforce the Buono I injunction or to extend it. In a plurality opinion, Justice Kennedy, joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito, concluded that the plaintiff was seeking only to enforce the prior injunction. "Based on the rights he obtained under the earlier decree - against the same party, regarding the same cross and the same land - his interests in doing so were sufficiently personal and concrete to support his standing." The government's argument to the contrary was, in the plurality's view, "properly addressed to the relief granted by the judgment below, not to Buono's standing to seek that relief."

The four dissenting Justices agreed with the plurality on the question of plaintiff's standing. Justice Stevens, joined by Justices Ginsburg and Sotomayor, concluded, "Plainly, respondent had standing to seek enforcement of a decree in his favor." Justice Breyer's dissent was to the same effect.

In an opinion concurring in the Court's judgment, Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Thomas, argued that the plaintiff did not have standing because rather than merely seeking to compel compliance with the original injunction, the plaintiff sought to expand it, to seek new relief. Justice Scalia reasoned that the original injunction, barring the government from "permitting" display of the cross at a particular location, makes sense only if the government owns the location. Therefore, properly read in context, the injunction merely proscribed display of the cross on federal land. The district court's later order purporting to enforce the earlier injunction went well beyond barring display of the cross on public property, and instead enjoined government officials from implementing the land-transfer statute. The plaintiff should have been required to establish standing to seek this new relief.

Justice Scalia then argued that the plaintiff failed to satisfy the actual or imminent injury aspect of standing with respect to the new relief. He explained that whether the VFW would continue to display the cross after taking possession of the land was merely speculative; under the statute, the land would revert to the government if it was no longer maintained as a war memorial, but maintenance of the cross at that location was not required. Moreover, the plaintiff's alleged injury was based specifically on the presence of the cross on federal property. His amended complaint averred that he was "deeply offended by the display of a Latin Cross on government-owned property," but he had "no objection to Christian symbols on private property." Thus, even if being "deeply offended" by a religious display and taking steps to avoid seeing it constitutes a cognizable injury, the plaintiff made clear that he would not be offended if the display were on private property, according to Justice Scalia.

Validity of the District Court's Order. As noted in the previous section, seven Justices concluded that the plaintiff had standing to enforce the judgment by seeking an order to prevent the transfer of the property. On the merits, four of those seven (the dissenters) concluded that the order prohibiting the transfer represented an appropriate means of enforcing the prior judgment, i.e., the order was not an abuse of discretion.

Three of the seven (the plurality) concluded that the district court abused its discretion by failing to consider adequately "the change in law and circumstances effected by the land-transfer statute." The plurality's conclusion seems to have derived in part from a particular perception of what the Establishment Clause permits and prohibits:

But a Latin cross is not merely a reaffirmation of Christian beliefs. It is a symbol often used to honor and respect those whose heroic acts, noble contributions, and patient striving help secure an honored place in history for this Nation and its people. Here, one Latin cross in the desert evokes far more than religion. It evokes thousands of small crosses in foreign fields marking the graves of Americans who fell in battles, battles whose tragedies are compounded if the fallen are forgotten.

In any event, the combination of the three-person plurality finding an abuse of discretion with Justice Scalia's two-person concurrence - plaintiff lacked standing to seek "new relief" - created a five-person majority requiring reversal of the district court's order.

On remand, the district court will be faced with an interesting dilemma. Four Justices would have affirmed the order (Justices Stevens, Ginsburg, Breyer and Sotomayor); two Justices would have reversed for reconsideration on the merits, presumably leaving open the possibility of a similar injunction being entered (Justice Kennedy and the Chief Justice); one would have reversed on the merits, leaving no possibility for a future order prohibiting the transfer (Justice Alito); and two expressed no view of the merits, having concluded that the plaintiff lacked standing (Justices Scalia and Thomas). Oh, and Justice Stevens has retired. Thus, if the district court were to enter a similar injunction against the transfer, three current Justices (the dissenters minus Justice Stevens) would likely affirm; three others Justices would likely reverse (Alito on the merits and Scalia/Thomas for lack of standing); and two others (Kennedy and the Chief Justice) remain in the middle, which is defined by Justice Kennedy's apparent views on the merits of the underlying controversy.

Comment. As to the scope of certiorari jurisdiction, the Court broke no new ground. While the exercise of certiorari jurisdiction does allow the Court review interlocutory decisions made earlier in a proceeding, certiorari jurisdiction does not authorize the Court to revisit aspects of a previously entered final judgment over which the time to file for certiorari has expired. Second, a plaintiff who has been awarded an injunction clearly has standing to seek relief enforcing that judgment. On the other hand, if the plaintiff seeks new relief, she must be able to satisfy the standards of injury-in-fact, causation and redressability. The difference between what constitutes enforcement and what constitutes new relief is one of interpretation and perception, resting primarily on the sound discretion of the district court. In this case, the battle over the scope of the Establishment Clause may have been a factor in the splintering of the Court.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Allan Ides is the Christopher N. May Chair at Loyola Law School Los Angeles. He has published extensively in the areas of constitutional law and federal procedure. His civil procedure casebook, co-authored with Christopher N. May - Civil Procedure: Cases and Problems (Aspen 2009) - is in its third edition.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

17 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Sinclair on Hutchins v. Talbert and City of Suffolk v. Lummis Gin Co.

2010 Emerging Issues 5099

Professor Kent Sinclair on Hutchins v. Talbert, 278 Va. 650, 2009 Va. LEXIS 98 (November 5, 2009) and City of Suffolk v. Lummis Gin Co., 278 Va. 270, 683 S.E.2d 549 (September 18, 2009)

By Kent Sinclair

June 7, 2010

SUMMARY: The Supreme Court of Virginia has in recent years addressed of what a "final judgment" is, and how other orders affect either the running of the "21-day rule" terminating trial court jurisdiction, or the 30-day appeal period. Two cases have clarified the effect of post-trial motions while deepening concern over the steps involved in "reserving jurisdiction" to take certain issues under submission in connection with a final order.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: In two recent decisions the Supreme Court of Virginia has attempted once more to alert the Circuit Court judges and litigating bar to the limits under Rule 1:1 of "reserving jurisdiction" and "suspending orders" issued in connection with disposition of a case, and the problem of ancillary issues that arise in connection with a "final judgment."

Nonsuit Orders and Finality Under Rule 1:1. In City of Suffolk v. Lummis Gin Co., 278 Va. 270, 683 S.E.2d 549 (September 18, 2009), a proceeding brought by a city under Va. Code §§ 58.1-3965 et seq. seeking to sell a parcel of land to satisfy delinquent real estate tax liens, the Supreme Court discussed whether a recent tax sale suit was the same cause of action the city had previously brought for delinquent taxes in 1995, and the nonsuit-related effects upon finding the new suit to be a different cause of action. After a hearing on the underlying issues in Circuit Court, the judge stated that he was "going to enter the nonsuit order [and] going to retain the case on the docket to [consider] the issue of fees and costs and whether this is a first voluntary nonsuit of right or whether it is the second nonsuit" under Va. Code § 8.01-380(B). On that same day the trial court granted the motion for a nonsuit without prejudice in an order that stated: "[t]his suit shall remain on the docket for the court to determine issues concerning attorney fees, costs and expenses incurred by [the heirs]." (emphasis added). The parties thereafter filed briefs and argued their positions before the circuit court, which much later entered a "Final Order" in favor of the individual defendants, finding that the present case is a second or additional nonsuit of the prior action, awarding attorney fees and costs, and rejecting the claim that pursuant to Rule 1:1 it lacked jurisdiction to decide the matters raised in the request for attorney's fees. The Supreme Court of Virginia reversed. In Lummis Gin Co. the Court found that an order of nonsuit is "sufficiently imbued with the attributes of finality" to be subject to the provisions of Rule 1:1, a Rule with "mandatory" provisions that control the subject matter jurisdiction of the circuit court to take further steps in a case.

■ Key Issue #1: The 21-Day Rule. Under traditional principles, once a final judgment has been entered and the 21-one day time period of Rule 1:1 has expired, the trial court is thereafter without jurisdiction in the case. Quoting from the leading case, SuperFresh Food Markets v. Ruffin, 263 Va. 555, 561 S.E.2d 734 (2002), the Court stated that "[o]nly an order within the 21-one day time period that clearly and expressly modifies, vacates, or suspends the final judgment will interrupt or extend the running of that time period so as to permit the trial court to retain jurisdiction in the case." SuperFresh had made it clear that neither the filing of post-trial or post-judgment motions, nor the trial court's taking such motions under consideration, nor the pendency of such motions on the 21st day after final judgment, is sufficient to toll or extend the running of the 21-day period for modifications allowed by Rule 1:1, applying the holding in Berean Law Group, P.C. v. Cox, 259 Va. 622, 626, 528 S.E.2d 108, 111 (2000).

Most troubling for Virginia practitioners today is the further conclusion the Supreme Court reached in Lummis Gin Co. that - notwithstanding the circuit court's attempt to preserve the nonsuit issues by including the statement: "[t]his suit shall remain on the docket for the [c]ourt to determine issues concerning attorney fees, costs and expenses incurred by [the heirs]" in its initial order -- the trial court still only had 21 days to resolve the issue before it lost jurisdiction. The Supreme Court found that order language insufficient to suspend the judgment, and thus the trial court lost jurisdiction to decide any issue in the action 21 days after entry of the nonsuit order. Its later order awarding attorneys' fees and costs to the heirs was a nullity.

Prior to Lummis Gin Co., many observers had assumed that SuperFresh meant that in order to prevent the 21-day window from expiring on what would otherwise be a final order, the judge needed only to make it clear in the order that the court was retaining control for some purpose, and thus there was "more to be done" in the action, with no specific language being required to reserve jurisdiction beyond 21 days. Lummis Gin Co. indicates, however, that SuperFresh is viewed as a case where the Final Order was so labeled, and had no qualifications whatsoever, holding that in that context only entry of a specific order suspending, modifying or vacating the prior order avoids the 21-day bar.

Earlier, in Concerned Taxpayers v. County of Brunswick, 249 Va. 320, 455 S.E.2d 712 (1995), it appeared that recitations by the trial court that issues were being held over for further rulings was sufficient. There the trial court dismissed a complaint in an order expressly stating that the trial court "would reconsider the . . . request to file an amended bill of complaint" and also granted "leave to file additional submissions and a Notice of Hearing upon their Motion for Sanctions within twenty-one (21) days after entry of this Order." A month later, the trial court in Concerned Taxpayers entered a second order, this time denying the motion for leave to file an amended bill of complaint and expressly stating that it "would retain jurisdiction" over the . . . request for sanctions." Then the following month, the trial court entered its last order in the case, in which it granted the motion for sanctions and entered judgment for legal expenses incurred in defending the claim. In SuperFresh the Supreme Court construed Concerned Taxpayers to represent the situation where "the trial court expressly reserved jurisdiction . . . in the two orders that preceded the final order." By using the term "retain jurisdiction," the trial court was therefore not attempting to interrupt the 21-day time period of Rule 1:1. Rather, it was expressly indicating that the order was not rendering a final judgment.

■ Key Issue # 2: Finality of Orders. In the recent Lummis Gin Co. decision the bench and bar are told that "[a]t the conclusion of the hearing, the circuit court articulated that it was 'going to enter the nonsuit order [and] going to retain the case on the docket to [consider] the issue of fees and costs and whether this is a first voluntary nonsuit of right or whether it is the second nonsuit contemplated by [Va. Code § 8.01-380(B)].'" On that same day the court entered an order granting the City's motion for a nonsuit without prejudice. The order further provided that "[t]his suit shall remain on the docket for the Court to determine issues concerning attorney fees, costs and expenses incurred by [the Baker heirs]." Thus, like some of the orders in Concerned Taxpayers - and unlike the order in SuperFresh which called itself the "Final Order" in the case - the nonsuit order did not have the appearance of complete disposition of all issues in the case in order to qualify as a final order in the first place.

The trial court's statement in Lummis Gin Co. that "[t]his suit shall remain on the docket for the Court to determine issues concerning attorney fees, costs and expenses incurred" appears to be the exact equivalent of language found sufficient in Concerned Taxpayers, but in the more recent case it was not enough to defer running of the 21-day period under Rule 1:1. Thus the standards have significantly tightened.

In the wake of Lummis Gin Co., law reform advocates have expressly questioned whether - in light of this strict interpretation - Rule 1:1 needs to be amended to add language assuring that an order expressly "reserving jurisdiction" to decide a then-pending motion acts as a suspension of the order. In the meantime, the only safe course is for the trial court order to state that it is "reserving jurisdiction and expressly suspends the entry of judgment."

Finally, a True "Sustaining Order" is Reviewed on Appeal. In Hutchins v. Talbert, 278 Va. 650, 2009 Va. LEXIS 98 (November 5, 2009), a further piece of the puzzle has fallen into place. In that medical malpractice action, an order denying a motion to set aside the verdict was held not to be a "final judgment" for purposes of the deadline for filing a notice of appeal, because the trial judge had rendered final judgment in a separate, previously entered order, which is not vacated, suspended, or modified by the later order ruling upon the motion to set aside the verdict. Because the notice of appeal filed in the case was therefore untimely, the appeal was dismissed.

At trial of the medical malpractice case in Hutchins, trial the jury awarded the plaintiff a verdict in the amount of $4 million, which was reduced by the circuit court to $885,000, taking into account an earlier settlement with other defendants and the application of the statutory limit on medical malpractice damages. On April 25 the circuit court entered an order entitled "Final Order" that rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for that amount, and it concluded: "AND THIS CAUSE IS ENDED." On that same date, the circuit court also entered a separate "Sustaining Order" providing that the final order was suspended for 14 days. The sustaining order stated:

It is ORDERED that the final Order be suspended for fourteen (14) days from this date. This tolls the running of the twenty-one (21) day provision in Rule 1:1, thus allowing a total of thirty-five (35) days for entry of an Amended Final Order.

The defendants filed a motion to set aside the verdict, but on May 28 the circuit court entered an order denying that motion that did not refer to the April 25 final order in any manner. The circuit court entered no other orders in the case thereafter. Defendants filed a notice of appeal on June 19th. That filing was timely only if the May 28th decision was the appealable "final order" but, unfortunately for plaintiff, the decision back in April was held to be the final decision and time to appeal had expired by the time the June notice of appeal was filed.

Definition of Time to Appeal. Rule 5:9(a) states that no appeal shall be allowed unless, within 30 days after the entry of final judgment or other appealable order or decree, counsel for the appellant files with the clerk of the trial court a notice of appeal and at the same time mails or delivers a copy of such notice to all opposing counsel. The effect of trial court orders in conjunction with final disposition is also controlled by Part Five of the Rules rather than the Part Three trial court rules for civil cases. Rule 5:5(a) declares the time prescribed for filing a notice of appeal to be "mandatory," and the Rule then prescribes:

The time period for filing the notice of appeal is not extended by the filing of a motion for a new trial, a petition for rehearing, or a like pleading unless the final judgment is modified, vacated, or suspended by the trial court pursuant to Rule 1:1 In any such case the time for filing shall be computed from the date of final judgment entered following such modification, vacation, or suspension

In Hutchins the circuit court entered final judgment for plaintiff on April 25, and that day entered an order "sustaining" the final judgment order for 14 days. In Virginia, the date of entry of any final judgment, order, or decree is the date the judgment, order, or decree is signed by the judge. However, in this case, as allowed by Rule 1:1 the circuit court suspended the entry of the final order for 14 days.

■ -- Key Issue # 3: Self-Executing - Self-Terminating - Suspension Orders. The Supreme Court describes the 14-day time period set forth in a sustaining order of the form used in Hutchins as "self-executing," and in that case the suspension expired by the terms of the order on May 9. When the suspension expired, two critical time periods started to run simultaneously against the losing party: the 21-day time period under Rule 1:1 during which the trial court could modify, vacate, or suspend the final judgment, and the 30-day time period under Rule 5:9 for filing a notice of appeal.

While the defendants in Hutchins filed a motion to set aside the verdict, and the circuit court entered an order on May 28 denying that motion, the Supreme Court holds in Hutchins that Rule 5:5(a) is clear in providing that the time period for filing the notice of appeal is not extended by the filing of a motion for a new trial, a petition for rehearing, or a like pleading unless the final judgment is modified, vacated, or suspended by the circuit court pursuant to Rule 1:1. Thus, the motion to set aside the verdict did not extend the period for filing the notice of appeal, or the time for filing a notice of appeal.

Safety Steps: Trial courts can avoid embarrassment, wasted effort, and unfairness to the parties by entering a written order that explicitly recites that a "final order" has been "suspended." Litigants can protect themselves in the absence of express "suspension" by filing protective notices of appeal. In Concerned Taxpayers, discussed above, the aggrieved party filed such notices at various points prior to the last ruling, and the Supreme Court found the appeal timely without specifying which of the notices was operative.

RELATED LINKS: Regarding finality of judgments and the "21-Day Rule" terminating trial court power to affect a final judgement, see

- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 21.04 (Modification, Vacation or Suspension of Judgment);
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 37.04 (Time Limits for Appeal);
- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 14.1 (Judgments);
- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 17.3 (Appealable Orders and Decisions))

Regarding nonsuit practice in Virginia, see

- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 14.2 (Nonsuit);
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 12.05 (Appeal and Nonsuit) (2007);
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 12.12 (Nonsuits and the 21-Day Rule) (2007);
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 12.05 (Appeal and Nonsuit) (2007);
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 12.12 (Nonsuits and the 21-Day Rule) (2007)

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Kent Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar and teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is Professor of Law and served for many years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). He is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He serves on the Boards of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Advance Court Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

18 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Sinclair and Harrison on Kellerman v. McDonough

2010 Emerging Issues 4940

Sinclair and Harrison on Common Law Duty of Supervision and Care Regarding Minors and Assumption of Duty Under Virginia Law

By Kent Sinclair and Gessner Harrison

June 5, 2010

SUMMARY: A landmark ruling by the Supreme Court of VA, Kellerman v. McDonough establishes that adults owe a common law duty of supervision and care for a minor whose parents have given them care of the minor for a social visit. The Court addresses related issues including scope of the duty, circumstances under which a specific duty of care arises, and whether a special relationship exists imposing a duty to protect against criminal acts of third parties.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Introduction. Parents who agree to host a social visit involving a minor who is a friend of their own child may frequently wonder what duties they owe to the visiting minor. In Kellermann v. McDonough, 278 Va. 478, 684 S.E.2d 786 (2009), a majority of the Supreme Court of Virginia clarifies that adults owe a common law duty of supervision and care for a minor whose parents have relinquished supervision and care to them for the duration of the minor's social visit. The Court also addresses important related issues, including the scope of this common law duty, the circumstances under which a specific duty of care with respect to the visiting minor may be assumed, and whether a "special relationship" exists so as to impose a duty to protect the visiting minor against the criminal conduct of third parties. The underlying facts in Kellermann, while undoubtedly tragic, emphasize the importance of recognizing that specific duties are owed to minors whose parents have entrusted their care to other adults.

Background. The defendant couple contacted the plaintiffs in North Carolina, seeking to arrange a visit between the decedent, aged 14, and their own daughter, also 14. On the agreed day, decedent and her father met the other girl and her mother Paula McDonough at a Virginia location approximately halfway between both families' homes. In discussing the girls' planned activities, decedent's father told Paula McDonough that his daughter was "not to be driven by any inexperienced drivers" and he emphasized that she "was not to be in a car with any young, male drivers, stating 'no boys with cars.'" Paula agreed to this request and stated, " 'don't worry, I promise we'll take good care of her.'" Paula later drove the girls to the shopping mall, dropped them off, and left. Later that day, when the girls called Paula, she permitted them to be driven home by a young minor male. Decedent and another friend made telephone calls seeking alternative transportation, to no avail, and reluctantly entered the young male's vehicle along with the defendants' daughter. He drove recklessly, causing an accident in which decedent was killed. Her parents brought a wrongful death action against host couple, alleging that they had a common law duty to supervise and care for decedent, that they had assumed a duty of reasonable care toward her, and that a special relationship existed imposing a duty on them to protect her from the conduct of third parties, including the young male driver. The defendants' demurrer was granted by the circuit court, and plaintiffs appealed.

Legal Principles. In resolving disputes over the existence of a common law duty of supervision and care, the assumption of a specific duty of reasonable care, and the existence of a "special relationship" between the defendants and the visiting minor in Kellermann, the Court provided encyclopedic citations for a number of core topics in Virginia practice:

■ Elements of actionable negligence claim. The prior holding in Delk v. Columbia/HCA Healthcare Corp., 259 Va. 125, 132, 523 S.E.2d 826, 830 (2000) was noted as authority for the familiar, well-established elements of a negligence claim under Virginia law: "a 'plaintiff who seeks to establish actionable negligence must plead the existence of a legal duty, violation of that duty, and proximate causation which results in injury.'" The Court also held that "[t]he issue whether a legal duty in tort exists is a pure question of law," and explained that "[i]f the allegations in a complaint are legally sufficient to establish the existence of a duty, then a jury, upon consideration of the evidence, must determine whether the duty has been performed."

■ Assumption of duty. Noting that the principle had been recognized in many prior cases, including Fruiterman v. Granata, 276 Va. 629, 645, 668 S.E.2d 127, 136 (2008), Didato v. Strehler, 262 Va. 617, 628, 554 S.E.2d 42, 48 (2001), Ring v. Poelman, 240 Va. 323, 326, 397 S.E.2d 824, 826 (1990), and Cofield v. Nuckles, 239 Va. 186, 192, 387 S.E.2d 493, 496 (1990), the Court, quoting Nolde Bros. v. Wray, 221 Va. 25, 28, 266 S.E.2d 882, 884 (1980), explained that "[i]t is ancient learning that one who assumes to act, even though gratuitously, may thereby become subject to the duty of acting carefully, if he acts at all." Referring to this as the "common law principle of assumption of a duty," the Court explained that the principle is embodied in Restatement (Second) of Torts § 323, which provides that "[o]ne who undertakes, gratuitously or for consideration, to render services to another which he should recognize as necessary for the protection of the other's person or things, is subject to liability to the other for physical harm resulting from his failure to exercise reasonable care to perform his undertaking, if (a) his failure to exercise such care increases the risk of such harm, or (b) the harm is suffered because of the other's reliance upon the undertaking. "

Proximate causation requirement. Moses v. Southwestern Va. Transit Mgmt. Co., 273 Va. 672, 679, 643 S.E.2d 156, 160 (2007) and earlier cases had stressed that issues of negligence and proximate causation are questions of fact for the jury's determination. Relying on the long-established definition of proximate cause most recently applied in Williams v. Le, 276 Va. 161, 167, 662 S.E.2d 73, 77 (2008), the Court in Kellermann then explained that " 'the proximate cause of an event is that act or omission which, in natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by an efficient intervening cause, produces the event, and without which that event would not have occurred.' " A key doctrine, enunciated in Williams, 276 Va. at 167, 662 S.E.2d at 77, Atkinson v. Scheer, 256 Va. 448, 454, 508 S.E.2d 68, 71 (1998), Panousos v. Allen, 245 Va. 60, 65, 425 S.E.2d 496, 499 (1993), and Coleman, 221 Va. at 131, 267 S.E.2d at 147, is that there may be more than one proximate cause of an event. In Kellermann, however, the Court noted that "[a] subsequent proximate cause may or may not relieve a defendant of liability for his negligence." In order to relieve a defendant of liability for a negligent act, the negligence intervening between the defendant's conduct and the injury "must so entirely supersede the operation of the defendant's negligence that it alone, without any contributing negligence by the defendant in the slightest degree, causes the injury. " Citing voluminous case law, the Court emphasized that "a superseding cause of an injury constitutes a new effective cause and operates independently of any other act, making it and it only the proximate cause of injury." However, it also noted that "not every intervening cause is a superseding cause,- specifying that "[i]n order to relieve a defendant of liability for his negligence, negligence intervening between the defendant's negligence and the injury must so entirely supersede the operation of the defendant's negligence that it alone, without the defendant's [negligence contributing] thereto in the slightest degree, produces the injury." A very important limitation on this doctrine, noted in Coleman, 221 Va. at 131, 267 S.E.2d at 147, Jefferson Hospital, Inc. v. Van Lear, 186 Va. 74, 81, 41 S.E.2d 441, 444 (1947) and Joynes, 278 Va. at 63, 677 S.E.2d at 264, is that "an intervening cause is not a superseding cause if it was 'put into operation by the defendant's wrongful act or omission."

● Protection against conduct of third persons. In Virginia law, a person generally "does not have a duty to protect another from the conduct of third persons." In Kellermann the Court acknowledged the exceptions recognized in several prior cases, summarizing: "this general rule does not apply when a special relationship exists between a defendant and a plaintiff that gives rise to a right to protection to the plaintiff or between the defendant and third persons that imposes a duty upon the defendant to control the conduct of the third person causing reasonably foreseeable danger to the plaintiff." Prior law has recognized several special relationships, including "common carrier-passenger, business proprietor-invitee, innkeeper-guest, and employer-employee with regard to the employer's potential duty of protecting or warning an employee. Indeed, the Court also noted that this "list" of previously recognized special relationships "is not exhaustive."

Key Issue #1: Do non-parent adults owe a general common-law duty in tort to supervise and care for a visiting minor whose parents have relinquished such supervision and care to them? If so, does the scope of that duty include the duty to exercise reasonable care in controlling the conduct of third parties to protect the visiting minor from harm?

The majority in Kellermann answered the first portion of this question in the affirmative, but refused to recognize, as a matter of law, the existence of a "special relationship" that would require the exercise of reasonable care to control the conduct of third parties so as to protect the visiting minor. Thus, based on authority from other states the Court holds that "when a parent relinquishes the supervision and care of a child to an adult who agrees to supervise and care for that child, the supervising adult must discharge that duty with reasonable care." On the question whether the Kellermanns had sufficiently stated a negligence claim based on this common law duty, the Court examined specific allegations in the plaintiffs' pleading and found that the "gist" of plaintiffs' claim was an this common law duty to supervise and care for decedent, a 14-year-old child who was dependent upon the defendants' care and supervision. Plaintiffs had pled a duty "to provide ordinary and reasonable care" including reasonable care regarding her transportation during her visit with the defendants. Thus the Court found that plaintiffs had pled a cognizable common law cause of action in negligence.

However, with respect to the scope of this common law duty of supervision and care owed by an adult to whom the supervision and care of a child has been relinquished, the majority in Kellermann emphasized that such an adult "is not an insurer of the child's safety," and specified only that "the supervising adult must discharge his or her duties as a reasonably prudent person would under similar circumstances."

Addressing the issue of whether a "special relationship" exists between such an adult and the child who has been entrusted to the adult, the majority, after examining its prior precedent regarding "special relationships," the Court concluded that it could "perceive of no reason to expand our jurisprudence regarding special relationships to include an adult who agrees to supervise and provide care to a minor." Accordingly, it held that the circuit court did not err when it sustained the defendants' demurrer on the "special relationship" theory. On the issue of proximate cause, the majority concluded that, based upon the principles established in prior case law, if the plaintiffs are able to prove at trial the factual allegations in the complaint, and the jury finds that the defendants breached their duty of care and supervision of the decedent, a jury could also find that their breaches of duty constituted a proximate cause of her death and that the young male driver's acts were not the sole proximate cause of her death.

The Court in Kellermann also concluded that if a jury were to find that the female defendant assumed a duty to exercise reasonable care to provide safe transportation for decedent, and to prevent her from riding in cars with young males and that this defendant breached that duty, the jury could also find that her breach of that duty was a proximate cause of the death -- rejecting the defense claim that the actions of the young male driver in driving recklessly and bringing about the victim's death were the sole proximate cause of death.

Key Issue #2: Under what circumstances will non-parent adults have assumed a duty to render services to a minor which they should recognize are necessary for the protection of the minor's person or things?

In addressing this question, the majority distinguished the conduct of Paul McDonough from that of Paula McDonough with respect to the conditions under which the plaintiffs had permitted their daughter to visit her friend. Applying the well established principles on the assumption of a duty as embodied in Restatement (Second) of Torts § 323, plaintiffs were held to have adequately pled that decedent's father specifically told Paula McDonough that decedent was "not to be driven by any inexperienced drivers" and that he had emphasized that she "was not to be in a car with any young, male drivers, -- in tragically prophetic language, " 'no boys with cars.' " The alleged promise of Paula McDonough given in response, to "take good care of her," was adequate to allege that she undertook a duty to render services to the decedent, that she breached this duty, and the breach was a proximate cause of the decedent's injuries and death. Paula's husband, however, was not present for this exchange, and the Court concluded that the complaint contained no allegations that would permit the finder of fact to find that that he assumed any duty of care.

Importance of Rulings. Kellermann is clearly informative to parents and other adults who are entrusted with the care of other people's minor children. It teaches that "when a parent relinquishes the supervision and care of a child to an adult who agrees to supervise and care for that child, the supervising adult must discharge that duty with reasonable care." Although it is not a unanimous decision on this point, only one of two dissenting and concurring Justices did not reach the issue of the existence of a common law duty of supervision and care, and the other Justice appeared to disagree only with scope and characterization of the duty, and not its existence. Accordingly, the question of the existence of the common law duty has largely been settled in Kellermann, but the issues of the specific contours and scope of this duty remain to be refined in future cases. Significantly, regardless of how the contours and scope of the duty are ultimately described, it is clear that three important principles--all of which enjoyed the support of all of the Justices participating in the decision--will ultimately be used to determine the extent of tort liability based on a breach of that duty. First, an adult, such as Paula McDonough, may assume specific duties with respect to a minor--such as the obligation to provide safe transportation and the obligation to prevent the minor from riding in a vehicle driven by a certain type of inexperienced driver--if the principles of assumption of duty as recognized in Didato and described in Restatement (Second) of Torts § 323 are satisfied. On this point, all of the Justices taking part in Kellermann agreed that a specific duty had been assumed by Paula McDonough, but not Paul McDonough, under the facts of the case. Second, no "special relationship" can exist as a result of the common law duty that would impose an obligation to protect the minor against the criminal acts of third parties. Finally, regardless of whether the question of liability depends upon the assumption of a specific duty of care, or the general common law duty, proximate cause principles will govern the analysis. Although the circumstances leading to the clarification in Kellermann of the issue whether a common law duty of supervision and care exists under Virginia law were indisputably tragic, it is just as indisputable that this important decision should help parents and adults recognize that they clearly owe such a duty to children entrusted to their care and that this recognition should serve to avoid such tragedies in the future.

RELATED LINKS: Regarding wrongful death and survival actions generally, see

- Charles E. Friend, Personal Injury Law in Virginia, Chapter 15: Wrongful Death (3rd ed. 2008);
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 25.02 (Negligence Actions for Personal Injuries) (2007);
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 25.04 (Survival of Actions) (2007);
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 25.05 (Wrongful Death Actions) (2007);
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 26.23 (Survival of Actions) (2007);
- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 2.2 (Survival and Assignment of Causes of Action) (5th ed. 2008);
- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 2.11 (Wrongful Death Actions) (5th ed. 2008);
- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 3.7 (Election of Remedies Rules) (5th ed. 2008);

- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 5.11 (Actions for Wrongful Death)) (5th ed. 2008);
- John L. Costello, Virginia Remedies, Section 17.07 (Wrongful Death) (2008)

Regarding damages recoverable for wrongful death, see

- Charles E. Friend, Personal Injury Law in Virginia, Chapter 15: Wrongful Death (3rd ed. 2008);
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 23.07 (Damages- Wrongful Death) (2007);
- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 2.11 (Wrongful Death Actions) (5th ed. 2008);
- John L. Costello, Virginia Remedies, Section 17.07 (Wrongful Death) (2008)

Regarding negligence claims and the existence of duties generally, see

- Charles E. Friend, Personal Injury Law in Virginia, Chapter 1: Fundamentals of Negligence Law (3rd ed. 2008);
- Charles E. Friend, Personal Injury Law in Virginia, Chapter 2: The Standard of Care (3rd ed. 2008);
- Charles E. Friend, Personal Injury Law in Virginia, Chapter 3: Breach of Duty (3rd ed. 2008);
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 25.02 (Negligence Actions for Personal Injuries) (2007);
- John L. Costello, Virginia Remedies, Section 17.14 (Negligence) (2008);
- Michie's Jurisprudence of Virginia & West Virginia, Negligence Sections 1-69

Regarding proximate cause and related concepts, see

- Charles E. Friend, Personal Injury Law in Virginia, Chapter 4: Causation (3rd ed. 2008);
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 25.02 (Negligence Actions for Personal Injuries) (2007);
- John L. Costello, Virginia Remedies, Section 17.15 (Causation) (2008);
- Michie's Jurisprudence of Virginia & West Virginia, Negligence Sections 20-23

Regarding actions to recover for injuries to minors generally, see

- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 26.05 (Actions for Injuries to Minors) (2007);
- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 2.6 (Injuries to Minors) (5th ed. 2008)

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Kent Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is Professor of Law and served for many years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). He is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Court Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges.

Mr. Gessner Harrison has experience as a judicial clerk and as a practicing attorney, and presently serves as Senior Staff Attorney in the office of the Reporter of Decisions for the Supreme Court of Virginia. Mr. Harrison plays a major role in the Model Jury Instructions program in Virginia, and is primarily responsible for the identification of all new developments in Virginia law, and the finalization of jury instructions for the electronic and looseleaf jury instructions volumes, published by Lexis Law Publishing, covering all areas of civil causes of action and criminal developments. He holds both J.D. and M.B.A. degrees, with advanced course work in legal research and information management, and is the author of multiple law review articles on subjects including criminal appellate procedure, constitutional law, crime victim's rights legislation, and environmental law. He has collaborated with Professor Sinclair on numerous projects in diverse areas of Virginia law.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

19 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

The Rooker-Feldman Doctrine and Intersystem Preclusion

2010 Emerging Issues 5076

The Rooker-Feldman Doctrine and Intersystem Preclusion

By Allan Ides

May 25, 2010

SUMMARY: In Dodson v. University of Arkansas for Medical Sciences, a panel of the Eighth Circuit held that one of plaintiff's claims was barred under the Rooker-Feldman doctrine. In so ruling, the panel majority applied Rooker-Feldman in a manner that gave the doctrine a generalized and broad sweep, essentially paralleling the doctrines of claim and issue preclusion.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Allan Ides on Dodson v. University of Ark. for Med. Scis. The Rooker-Feldman Doctrine and Intersystem Preclusion

Introduction. In Dodson v. University of Arkansas for Medical Sciences, 601 F.3d 750, 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 6924 (8th Cir. Apr. 2, 2010), a panel of the Eighth Circuit held that one of plaintiff's claims was barred under the Rooker-Feldman doctrine. In so ruling, the panel majority applied Rooker-Feldman in a manner that gave the doctrine a generalized and broad sweep, essentially paralleling the doctrines of claim and issue preclusion. A concurring opinion provided a careful analysis of Rooker-Feldman and explained why the subject claim was barred by rules pertaining to intersystem preclusion but not by Rooker-Feldman.

The Rooker-Feldman Doctrine. The Rooker-Feldman doctrine is a narrow jurisdictional doctrine that prohibits United States District Courts from exercising appellate jurisdiction over state court decisions in the absence of a congressional directive to the contrary. It is not a federal substitute for claim or issue preclusion. Nor is it an extension of abstention doctrines. In recent years, the Supreme Court has made it clear that Rooker-Feldman must be confined to its no-appellate-review foundation. In the Court's words:

The Rooker-Feldman doctrine . . . is confined to cases of the kind from which the doctrine acquired its name: cases brought by state-court losers complaining of injuries caused by state-court judgments rendered before the district proceedings commenced and inviting district court review and rejection of those judgments. Rooker-Feldman does not otherwise override or supplant preclusion doctrine or augment the circumscribed doctrines that allow federal courts to stay or dismiss proceedings in deference to state-court actions.

Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Saudi Basic Indus. Corp., 544 U.S. 280, 284, 125 S. Ct. 1517, 161 L. Ed. 2d 454 (2005). The Exxon Court left open one lingering question. The phrase "inextricably intertwined" had been used as descriptive term by the Court in District of Columbia Court of Appeals v. Feldman, 460 U.S. 462, 486-487, 103 S. Ct. 1303, 75 L. Ed. 2d 206 (1983), one of the cases from which Rooker-Feldman derives its name. Prior to Exxon Mobil, some lower federal courts had used that phrase to extend the scope of the doctrine beyond its original foundations. The Exxon Mobil Court used the phrase when describing the Feldman decision, but neither endorsed that phrase nor disavowed it. A question remains, therefore, whether "inextricably intertwined" has any operative value other than as a succinct description of the elements of the doctrine.

Facts and Proceeding in State Court. At issue was a dispute over the right to control the fate of cryogenically frozen embryos. Patricia Dodson and her then-husband had created the embryos through an In-Vitro Fertilization (IVF) program offered by the defendant state university. After the couple divorced, Ms. Dodson asked the university to implant the embryos into her, but the university refused to do so without the former husband's consent, which was not forthcoming. Dodson first sought relief from the state court that had entered the divorce decree (Dodson I). When that court denied relief, having concluded that Dodson had relinquished control of the embryos to the IVF program director, Dodson sued the university (and the IVF program and certain officials) in another state court, seeking to force the university to implant the embryos into her (Dodson II). That court also denied the requested relief on similar grounds. Dodson appealed, but the appellate court dismissed the appeal for failure to order a transcript of the trial-court proceedings.

Federal Lawsuit. Seven years later, Dodson brought the present action in a United States District Court. Again, the question presented involved the right to control the frozen embryos. Her suit named the university (and certain university programs and officials) and her ex-husband as defendants. The federal suit presented two counts: Count I asserted a claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for violations of her rights under the Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution and under the state constitution. Count II asserted a state-law cause of action based on activity occurring after the final judgment in the prior lawsuit. Dodson requested injunctive relief to prevent the university from interfering with her right to control the "potential life" and the disposition of the embryos.

The district court granted the defendants' motions to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction under the Rooker-Feldman doctrine, reasoning that Dodson's complaint was "inextricably intertwined" with the previous state-court proceedings because her claims "could succeed only upon a finding that the state courts wrongly decided the issues." Having dismissed the Count I federal claims, the court declined to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the Count II supplemental claims.

The Panel Opinion. The Eighth Circuit affirmed the district court's dismissal in a per-curiam opinion joined by two judges. The panel majority agreed with the district court that Rooker-Feldman required dismissal of Dodson's Count I claims. In the panel's view, "Any ruling in the case at bar in Dodson's favor, i.e., that the federal constitution demands the return of the embryos to Dodson, would wholly undermine" the ruling in Dodson I that she had relinquished control over the embryos. In addition, the opinion somewhat ambiguously suggested that the judgment in Dodson II, which was premised partly on sovereign immunity, would be undermined as well since the court in that case dismissed Dodson's lawsuit with prejudice after making findings against her position on the merits. The panel also affirmed the district court's discretionary dismissal of Dodson's Count II supplemental claims.

Judge Melloy's Concurring Opinion. Circuit Judge Michael Melloy filed a concurring opinion. He agreed that the dismissal of Count I should be affirmed, but on grounds of intersystem preclusion rather than Rooker-Feldman. His opinion provides a detailed and useful discussion of Rooker-Feldman that highlights the potential pitfalls of the majority's more generalized approach to the doctrine.

Judge Melloy agreed that Dodson's Count I could succeed only to the extent that the federal court arrived at factual or legal conclusions that differed with those of the Dodson I court. This case, therefore, presented the question whether, after the Exxon Mobil Court's attempt to cabin the Rooker-Feldman doctrine, the "inextricably intertwined" language has any independent significance. He then pointed out that a majority of circuits have held that the phrase "inextricably intertwined" language does not impose an independent test under the Rooker-Feldman doctrine (and especially so post-Exxon Mobil). See, e.g., McCormick v. Braverman, 451 F.3d 382, 394-395 (6th Cir. 2006); Davani v. Virginia Dep't of Transp., 434 F.3d 712, 719 (4th Cir. 2006); Bolden v. City of Topeka, 441 F.3d 1129, 1143 (10th Cir. 2006); States Res. Corp. v. Architectural Team, Inc., 433 F.3d 73, 79-80 (1st Cir. 2005); Hoblock v. Albany County Bd. of Elections, 422 F.3d 77, 86-87 (2d Cir. 2005); Noel v. Hall, 341 F.3d 1148, 1164 (9th Cir. 2003); GASH Assocs. v. Village of Rosemont, Ill., 995 F.2d 726, 728 (7th Cir. 1993).

In accordance with the view of the majority of circuits, Judge Melloy would have held that the Rooker-Feldman doctrine did not bar jurisdiction merely because a federal claim was "inextricably intertwined" with a state-court judgment, i.e., because the federal claim is premised on a position that contradicts a state court's decision. Under Judge Melloy's view, the district court erred by dismissing the complaint as "inextricably intertwined" with previous state-court judgments. Dodson did not request relief against a state-court judgment: significantly, the federal complaint alleged that the university defendants, not the state courts, were the source of Dodson's injuries. Thus, the Rooker-Feldman doctrine did not bar jurisdiction since Dodson was not "complaining of injuries caused by state-court judgments". Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Saudi Basic Indus. Corp., 544 U.S. 280, 284, 125 S. Ct. 1517, 161 L. Ed. 2d 454 (2005).

Judge Melloy went on to explain that claim preclusion barred Dodson's claim against her ex-husband, because it was the same claim as the one decided in Dodson I. In addition, issue preclusion barred relitigation of pivotal issues raised in Dodson's Count I claims against the university defendants since those issues were decided against Dodson in Dodson II. Judge Melloy also agreed that the district court properly declined to exercise jurisdiction over the supplemental Count II claims.

Comment. The approach adopted by the Dodson panel majority runs the risk of transforming Rooker-Feldman into a jurisdictional form of preclusion doctrine that bars jurisdiction over potentially precluded claims or issues whenever the federal case commences after the state court has entered a final judgment. It will almost universally be the case that the potentially precluded claims or issues would "wholly undermine" the state court decision or that they can be described as "inextricably intertwined" with matters decided in that case. This is precisely the type of substituted-preclusion approach the Court in Exxon Mobil was attempting to prevent. Of course, as Judge Melloy points out, preclusion doctrine itself accomplishes all that is necessary to avoid the potential federal interference with the state court's judgment. Simply put, unless the state-court loser is complaining of injuries caused by the state court judgment, Rooker-Feldman does not apply. Think preclusion.

RELATED LINKS: For further information, see Moore's Federal Practice:

■ 18-133 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 133.30[3][c][iii]

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Allan Ides is the Christopher N. May Chair at Loyola Law School Los Angeles. He has published extensively in the areas of constitutional law and federal procedure. His civil procedure casebook, co-authored with Christopher N. May - Civil Procedure: Cases and Problems (Aspen 2009) - is in its third edition.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

20 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Consequences of Failing to Impose a Timely Litigation Hold

2010 Emerging Issues 5021

John K. Rabiej on the Consequences of Failing to Impose a Timely Litigation Hold

By John K. Rabiej

May 6, 2010

SUMMARY: In Field Day v. County of Suffolk the plaintiff alleged that a substantial volume of ESI was destroyed because the defendant had taken no steps to preserve ESI when it became aware of the litigation. The plaintiff relied on Pension Comm'n of Univ. of Montreal Pension Plan v. Banc of Am. Sec., LLC, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4546 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 15, 2010), a recent opinion by Judge Scheindlin, author of the Zubulake ESI opinions, which held that the failure to issue a written litigation hold notice and implement a litigation hold constitute "gross negligence."

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: John K. Rabiej on the Consequences of Failing to Impose a Timely Litigation Hold

In Field Day v. County of Suffolk, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28476 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 25, 2010), the plaintiff alleged that a substantial volume of ESI was destroyed because the defendant had taken no steps to preserve ESI when it became aware of the litigation. The plaintiff filed a motion for sanctions seeking an adverse inference against the defendant for failing to implement a litigation hold to prevent the destruction of ESI in its control. The plaintiff relied on Pension Comm'n of Univ. of Montreal Pension Plan v. Banc of Am. Sec., LLC, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4546 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 15, 2010), a recent opinion by Judge Scheindlin, author of the Zubulake ESI opinions, which held that the failure to issue a written litigation hold notice and implement a litigation hold constitute "gross negligence." The consequence of this latter finding becomes critical in a case seeking severe sanctions because it has the effect of switching the burden of proof from the requesting party to the producing party to prove that any destroyed or missing ESI evidence is not relevant and would not prejudice the requesting party's interests. Because it is often extremely difficult to prove the prior existence of deleted ESI, let alone its relevancy or prejudicial effect, the burden shift can be significant.

Elements for Imposing Sanctions for Violating Preservation Duty: Ordinarily, a requesting party who seeks sanctions for destruction of ESI must prove three elements, including: (1) the producing party had control over the ESI and a duty to preserve it at the time that it was lost or destroyed; (2) the producing party acted with a culpable state of mind in destroying or losing the ESI; and (3) the destroyed or missing ESI was relevant and its loss prejudicial to the requesting party's claims or defenses. In many cases, the requesting party can demonstrate that the opposing party had control over and a duty to preserve the ESI that was destroyed or lost. It can also show that the opposing party was culpable in allowing the destruction or loss of ESI. But it is the third element that usually poses the greatest procedural hurdle. The requesting party frequently fails to prove by extrinsic evidence that the ESI was relevant or that the loss of ESI was prejudicial to its claims or defenses, which precludes the imposition of the severest sanctions. The showing is difficult to make because the requesting party typically has little or no knowledge of what ESI in the producing party's control actually existed before its destruction.

To be sure, case law recognizes certain types of circumstantial evidence that can help substantiate a finding that ESI was lost or destroyed and that it was relevant. If selected groups of documents were retained from a certain point in time, and not beyond, the inference can be drawn that the same documents existed during an earlier time but were deleted. Inferences can also be drawn from missing emails from email chains. See John K. Rabiej on the Requesting Party's Options When Little or No ESI is Produced in Discovery, 2009 Emerging Issues 3808. Though such circumstantial evidence can be helpful, it is not always available. In many cases, the requesting party simply has no clue what information was contained in the destroyed or lost ESI. The requesting party only knows that "some" ESI was destroyed either intentionally or through automatic purging programs and suspects that it was relevant and its loss prejudicial to its interests. Under these circumstances, meeting its burden to prove the relevance of lost or destroyed ESI in support of a sanctions motion is often impracticable. Judge Scheindlin describes the difficulty in the following words:

The third preliminary matter that must be analyzed is what can be done when documents are no longer available. This is not an easy question. It is often impossible to know what lost documents would have contained. At best, their content can be inferred from existing documents or recalled during depositions. But this is not always possible. Who then should bear the burden of establishing the relevance of evidence that can no longer be found? And, an even more difficult question is who should be required to prove that the absence of the missing materials has caused prejudice to the innocent party. Id. at *16.

Burden of Proof Shifts: Pension Comm'n of Univ. of Montreal Pension Plan addresses the burden of proof issue head on. Most courts limit a finding of gross negligence to relatively extreme conduct, typically involving the wilful and deliberate destruction of ESI, e.g., wiping clean a hard drive. But Judge Scheindlin's holding goes farther and finds that the failure to issue a written litigation notice and implement a litigation hold in accordance with well established ESI standards constitute "gross negligence." When a court makes this finding, the burden of proof shifts from the requesting to the producing party, at least in cases seeking severe discovery sanctions. Instead of the requesting party proving the relevance of lost or destroyed ESI and consequent prejudice to its claims or defenses, the producing party has the burden to rebut the presumption against it and prove that the lost or destroyed ESI is not relevant and would not have prejudiced the requesting party. Though the producing party typically is in a better position than the requesting party to prove the non-relevancy and non-prejudicial effects of missing or destroyed ESI, in many cases that task remains formidable.

The court agreed with the plaintiff in Field Day that the defendant failed to issue a written litigation hold notice and to implement a litigation hold. Despite recognizing the merits of the holding in Pension Comm'n of Univ. of Montreal Pension Plan, the court in Field Day declined to find that the defendant acted with gross negligence. It held that the defendant acted only with negligence. The court reasoned that the destruction of ESI in the case occurred prior to the 2006 amendments to the Civil Rules when the applicable case law on litigation hold notices and litigation holds was unsettled. As such, the defendant did not act willfully or in bad faith. Finding that the defendant "only" acted negligently, the burden to prove the relevancy and prejudicial effects of the lost or destroyed ESI remained with the plaintiff, who failed to meet its burden. As a result, the court declined to impose the requested severe sanction, an adverse inference, against the defendant. But the finding of negligence was sufficient to impose a monetary sanction of reasonable attorney fees and costs incurred in connection with the motion.

Litigation Hold Notices and Litigation Holds: Pension Comm'n of Univ. of Montreal Pension Plan underscores the critical importance of imposing a litigation hold in every ESI case. At a minimum, failure to issue a written litigation notice or to implement a litigation hold in such cases constitutes negligence. If adopted by other jurisdictions, Judge Scheindlin's shifting of the burden of proof when a litigation hold is not implemented could have profound consequences, especially because a large percentage of lawyers continue to fail to issue a written litigation hold notice and implement a litigation hold to prevent the destruction of ESI in the hands of their clients. See Rabiej, Litigation Costs and Delay Surveys Shed Light on E-Discovery Practices, 2009 Emerging Issues 4673. The defendant's failure to implement a litigation hold in Field Day did not shift the burden of proof. But the defendant's excuse for failing to implement a litigation hold will have no force for a party involved in more recent litigation. Consequently, the need to understand what a litigation hold notice should contain and how to implement an effective litigation hold has become more urgent because a failure to do so may lead to severe sanctions.

Lessons: Litigation holds should routinely be implemented in an ESI case. When litigation is imminent, a client should be advised to take steps to preserve evidence and to suspend any operation that automatically deletes potential evidence, like routine purging of emails. The litigation notice should be in writing and, depending on the context of the litigation, should:

- describe in plain English the nature of the issues in the lawsuit and the relevant time period, as derived from all the pertinent pleadings, so that everyone in the organization can understand it;
- define clearly in comprehensible terms the scope of the preservation obligation, including the criteria for identifying potentially relevant ESI;
- clearly instruct employees not to delete, modify, or alter any ESI subject to the litigation hold;
- identify the likely witnesses and "key" persons with knowledge of the relevant events;
- identify the specific types of ESI that must be preserved, including email and attachments, word processing documents, spreadsheets, images, databases, instant messages, etc.;
- identify the sources and storage media for relevant evidence that must be preserved;
- address whether metadata, deleted, or fragmented data must be preserved;
- inform the employees whether the ESI should be preserved in place or transmitted to a central repository using forensically sound methods.

The scope of the litigation hold will vary depending on the circumstances because it may be unreasonable to apply the same preservation requirements to all employees, especially in large organizations. Under the particular facts in a case, it may be more reasonable to apply strict preservation requirements only to "key players" involved in the litigation, while applying looser requirements to other employees who likely will not be participants in the litigation or possess relevant ESI. More aggressive measures should be taken to identify and preserve all ESI controlled by key custodians in various storage devices, including personal digital assistants and laptop computers. A reasonable balancing approach should be adopted.

To promote compliance with the litigation hold, the notice should contain a statement of the company's commitment to preserve evidence and to cooperate with judicial requests for information. The notice should also refer to the pertinent provision of the company's record retention policy, reminding employees of their specific preservation obligations.

The measures taken in the litigation-hold process to preserve evidence should be documented as evidence of the party's good faith and reasonableness in meeting its preservation obligations. The documentation will be useful in defending against any spoliation charges and any allegations of gross negligence.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004. The views expressed in the commentary represent Mr. Rabiej's opinions and do not necessarily reflect the views of the rules committees.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

21 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Power of a Federal Court to Impose Sanctions for Willful Litigation Misconduct

2010 Emerging Issues 4979

Allan Ides on Carr v. Tillery -- the Seventh Circuit Rules on the Inherent Power of a Federal Court to Impose Sanctions for Willful Litigation Misconduct

By Allan Ides

April 20, 2010

SUMMARY: In Carr v. Tillery, 591 F.3d 909, 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 685 (7th Cir. 2010), the Seventh Circuit, in an opinion by Judge Richard Posner, invoked the inherent common law authority of a federal court to impose sanctions on lawyers who engage in willful litigation misconduct.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Allan Ides on Carr v. Tillery - the Seventh Circuit Rules on the Inherent Power of a Federal Court to Impose Sanctions for Willful Litigation Misconduct.

In Carr v. Tillery, 591 F.3d 909, 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 685 (7th Cir. 2010), the Seventh Circuit, in an opinion by Judge Richard Posner, invoked the inherent common law authority of a federal court to impose sanctions on lawyers who engage in willful litigation misconduct.

Factual and Procedural Background. The plaintiff, a successful class action lawyer, became involved in a controversy with his former law partners over the distribution of fees earned prior to the break up of the partnership. In 2004, the plaintiff filed several lawsuits against his former partners and they, in turn, filed an action for declaratory relief against him. As a result of these suits, the parties entered a "Memorandum of Understanding" ("Memorandum") that specified how all fees would be allocated. The Memorandum also required that the pending suits be dismissed. In the declaratory judgment action, the plaintiff (there a defendant) filed a counterclaim alleging that he had been fraudulently induced to sign the Memorandum. The Illinois court rejected this counterclaim and entered judgment pursuant to the Memorandum, dismissing with prejudice all the pending suits. This judgment was affirmed on appeal.

In 2007, the plaintiff filed four separate fee-dispute lawsuits against his former partners in Illinois state courts. While those cases were pending, he filed the immediate case in federal court, alleging RICO violations and a supplemental state law claim; these claims too involved the same fee dispute and the same former partners.

In the federal proceeding, defendants asserted res judicata as an affirmative defense and filed a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. They also filed a motion for costs and attorneys' fees pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1927. The district court granted the motion to dismiss, but denied the motion for sanctions. Plaintiff appealed the dismissal, and the defendants cross-appealed the denial of their motion for sanctions.

The Seventh Circuit Affirms the Motion to Dismiss. The Seventh Circuit opinion began by holding that the claims in the federal suit were barred under the doctrine of claim preclusion. The complaint in the federal suit repeated many of the allegations from the 2004 suits, including the assertion that the plaintiff was fraudulently induced to sign the Memorandum. While the federal complaint now characterized the wrongful acts alleged in the earlier suits as predicate acts in support of the RICO claim, as the court explained it, a party is not entitled to maintain a suit arising from the same transaction or events underlying a previous suit merely by changing the legal theory. This is "claim splitting" and is barred by the doctrine of res judicata.

In addition, the court held that plaintiff's claims were also barred by the "one refiling" rule under Illinois state law. Under that rule, a plaintiff who voluntarily dismisses a suit "may commence a new action within one year or within the remaining period of limitation, whichever is greater" [735 Ill. Comp. Stat. 5/13-217]. Illinois courts interpret this to mean that a plaintiff who voluntarily dismisses a suit may commence only one new action. This is a rule of preclusion, like res judicata, and therefore bars refiling in federal as well as state court.

After the 2004 lawsuits were resolved, the plaintiff filed four more suits in state court, and then filed the present matter in federal court, after which he voluntarily dismissed the four state-court suits. All four of these cases arose from the same fee dispute. The court of appeals treated the first of these four suits as the first in a series of identical cases, so that the second suit was the "first refiling." Hence, the Illinois one-refiling rule barred the third and fourth state suits, and the present federal suit. The fact that the federal suit was filed prior to the dismissal of the first in the series was irrelevant as a matter of Illinois law.

This second group of suits, including the federal suit, did present one new claim, namely, the payment of fees due after the Memorandum was adopted. This claim would not be barred by res judicata, but was barred by the Illinois one-refiling rule. Thus, the district court had correctly dismissed the entire suit as barred, either by res judicata or by the Illinois statute.

RICO Claim Was Properly Dismissed as Without Merit. The Seventh Circuit also agreed that the RICO claim was without merit. The claim was so meritless, in fact, that it created doubt whether the federal courts had federal question subject matter jurisdiction over the case. The presumption, however, is that the dismissal of even a very weak case should be on the merits rather than because it was too weak to establish subject matter jurisdiction.

In the appellate court's view, the RICO claim was "a complete nonstarter." This was true mainly because the claims were barred by res judicata and the one-refiling rule. These, in general, are not appropriate grounds on which to base a conclusion that a suit is so frivolous as not to engage federal jurisdiction. They are, however, affirmative defenses that form the basis of a motion to dismiss on the pleadings under Rule 12(c), which results in a dismissal on the merits. In any event, the RICO claim was properly dismissed with prejudice.

Sanctions Should Have Been Granted Under Court's Inherent Power. In a cross-appeal, the defendants argued that the district should not have denied their motion for sanctions. That motion was based on 28 U.S.C. §1927, which provides, "Any attorney or other person admitted to conduct cases in any court of the United States or any Territory thereof who so multiplies the proceedings in any case unreasonably and vexatiously may be required by the court to satisfy personally the excess costs, expenses, and attorneys' fees reasonably incurred because of such conduct." Defendants charged that the plaintiff was harassing them with repetitive litigation, and that the present suit was part of that pattern. The difficulty with their motion, however, as the court of appeals explained, was that §1927 applies only to conduct occurring within the immediate case and, therefore, not to a previous pattern of litigation abuse, which was the basis of the defendants' motion.

The Seventh Circuit explained, however, that the relatively specific focus of §1927 on conduct in the pending case does not leave parties subjected to a pattern of vexatious litigation without a remedy. A litigant is not allowed to file repetitive, meritless suits with impunity. A court has inherent power to punish such misconduct by an award of reasonable attorney's fees or other monetary sanctions. A court may also enjoin future abusive filings by way of an injunction. Furthermore, §1927 does not in any manner limit this inherent authority.

The defendants had not invoked the inherent power to sanction as a basis for their motion, but neither had the plaintiff argued that §1927 was inapplicable. The court of appeals, therefore, saw no obstacle to relying on the inherent authority to impose sanctions, especially since the facts of the abusive litigation were fully presented to the district court in the §1927 motion and since "the common law principle, like its statutory counterpart, is as much concerned with protecting the courts from being overwhelmed by baseless litigation as with protecting litigants from harassment."

The court of appeals concluded that the lawsuit was groundless and motivated by a desire to harass. Accordingly, the panel directed the district court to assess a proper monetary sanction, and also to consider whether to enjoin the plaintiff from conducting further litigation arising from the same subject matter. The appellate court did note that such an injunction permits the person enjoined to ask the court's permission to lift the injunction for good cause; therefore, if in the future the defendants refuse to pay the plaintiff his share of fees on a ground not placed in issue in the present case or in any of the previous litigation, the plaintiff should be permitted to bring a new suit.

Comment. The Seventh Circuit broke no new ground in invoking the inherent power of a federal court to sanction willful litigation misconduct. Neither §1927 or any federal rule, including Rule 11, limits the authority of a federal court to impose sanctions on such willful misconduct, including the filing of repetitive meritless lawsuits. See generally 2 Moore's Federal Practice § 11.41 (Matthew Bender 3d Ed.) and Sanctions: The Federal Law of Litigation Abuse §§ 26-29 (4th Ed.).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Allan Ides is the Christopher N. May Chair at Loyola Law School Los Angeles. He has published extensively in the areas of constitutional law and federal procedure. His civil procedure casebook, co-authored with Christopher N. May - Civil Procedure: Cases and Problems (Aspen 2009) - is in its third edition.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

22 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Enforceability of Forum Selection Clauses in Diversity Cases

2010 Emerging Issues 4934

Wong v. PartyGaming Ltd. and the Enforceability of Forum Selection Clauses in Diversity Cases

By Allan Ides

March 30, 2010

SUMMARY: In Wong v. PartyGaming Ltd., 589 F.3d 821, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 27914 (6th Cir. Dec. 21, 2009), the Sixth Circuit joined six other circuits in holding that federal law governs the enforceability of forum selection clauses in diversity cases. The court also held that the doctrine of forum non conveniens was the proper vehicle through which to enforce a valid forum selection clause.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: In Wong v. PartyGaming Ltd., 589 F.3d 821, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 27914 (6th Cir. Dec. 21, 2009), the Sixth Circuit joined six other circuits in holding that federal law governs the enforceability of forum selection clauses in diversity cases. The court also held that the doctrine of forum non conveniens was the proper vehicle through which to enforce a valid forum selection clause.

Factual Background. Defendant PartyGaming, a Gibraltar-based company, operates an online poker business. According to the plaintiffs, PartyGaming represented on its website that it prevented collusion among players and that its "Collusion Prevention System" was able to detect multi-account players. PartyGaming also represented that it did not encourage gambling by minors or gambling addicts. In order to participate in its online poker games, customers of PartyGaming were required to register on the website and to consent to specified "Terms and Conditions of Use," including a condition that any disputes arising out of the agreement would be governed by the laws of Gibraltar and subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts of Gibraltar. Plaintiffs were active participants in PartyGaming's online poker business.

Procedural Background. Plaintiffs, all residents of Ohio, filed a diversity suit against PartyGaming in the Northern District of Ohio. They contended that PartyGaming's representations regarding collusion, multi-player accounts, and gambling by minors and addicts were false and in violation of Ohio consumer protection laws. Plaintiffs sought certification of a class of all similarly situated individuals, which the district court provisionally certified, consisting of all persons in the state of Ohio who paid a registration fee on PartyGaming's website. The plaintiffs also sought to extend the class to include PartyGaming customers in twenty-three other states.

PartyGaming filed a motion under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(3) to dismiss for lack of proper venue, citing the Gibraltar forum selection clause as the basis for that motion. The district court held that the forum selection clause was valid and dismissed the action sua sponte under the doctrine of forum non conveniens. Plaintiffs filed a timely appeal.

Legal Background. In M/S Bremen v. Zapata Off-Shore Co., 407 U.S. 1, 92 S. Ct. 1907, 32 L. Ed. 2d 513 (1972), the Supreme Court held that forum selection clauses in admiralty proceedings are presumptively enforceable as a matter of federal law. The clause at issue in Bremen designated the court of a foreign nation as the exclusive forum. Under the Bremen standards, unless the party objecting to the clause "clearly show[s] that enforcement would be unreasonable and unjust, or that the clause was invalid for such reasons as fraud or overreaching," or that "enforcement would contravene a strong public policy of the forum in which suit is brought," the clause must be enforced. M/S Bremen v. Zapata Off-Shore Co., 407 U.S. 1, 15, 92 S. Ct. 1907, 32 L. Ed. 2d 513 (1972).

The Court has taken a somewhat different approach to forum selection clauses that include a federal-venue option. In such cases, the proper motion is a motion to transfer to the selected forum under 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a). In this context, the forum selection clause is treated as one factor, albeit a substantial one, in the district court's discretionary determination of whether to transfer the case. Stewart Organization, Inc. v. Ricoh, Corp., 487 U.S. 22, 108 S. Ct. 2239, 101 L. Ed. 2d 22 (1988). The standards of 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a) apply in both federal question and diversity cases, state law to the contrary notwithstanding.

The question addressed in Wong v. PartyGaming Ltd. was whether federal law also governs the enforceability of a forum selection clause in a diversity case in which there is no federal-venue option, i.e., when transfer under 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a) is unavailable. Clearly, neither Stewart Organization (a transfer case) nor Bremen (an admiralty case) directly control. Yet, the trend among the circuits, to apply federal law, i.e., the Bremen standards, under such circumstances. The basic reasoning is this: Stewart Organization established that federal law governs issues pertaining to venue in all cases filed in federal court, and Bremen establishes the governing federal standard with respect to the enforceability of forum selection clauses when there is no transfer option.

Opinion From Sixth Circuit. Until its decision in Wong v. Party Gaming Ltd., the Sixth Circuit had not decided whether, in a diversity case without a transfer option, state or federal law governed the enforceability of a forum selection clause. Before answering that question, the court surveyed the law of other circuits and correctly noted that six other circuits had concluded that federal law governed under such circumstances. See Fru-Con Constr. Corp. v. Controlled Air, Inc., 574 F.3d 527, 538 (8th Cir. 2009); Doe 1 v. AOL LLC, 552 F.3d 1077, 1083 (9th Cir. 2009); Ginter ex. rel. Ballard v. Belcher, Prendergast & Laporte, 536 F.3d 439, 441 (5th Cir. 2008); Phillips v. Audio Active Ltd., 494 F.3d 378, 384 (2d Cir. 2007); P & S Bus. Machs. v. Canon USA, Inc., 331 F.3d 804, 807 (11th Cir. 2003); Jumara v. State Farm Ins. Co., 55 F.3d 873, 877 (3d Cir. 1995). One circuit remained undecided. Rivera v. Centro Medico de Turabo, Inc., 575 F.3d 10, 16 (1st Cir. 2009). And one circuit, the Fourth, had potentially conflicting decisions.

The Wong court adopted the majority approach, in part because of "the strong federal interest in procedural matters in federal court" and in part because of the value of "maintaining harmony among the Circuits on issues of law."

As to enforceability under the federal standard, the Wong court described the Sixth Circuit's approach as follows:

"When evaluating the enforceability of a forum selection clause, this court looks to the following factors: (1) whether the clause was obtained by fraud, duress, or other unconscionable means; (2) whether the designated forum would ineffectively or unfairly handle the suit; and (3) whether the designated forum would be so seriously inconvenient such that requiring the plaintiff to bring suit there would be unjust. The party opposing the forum selection clause bears the burden of showing that the clause should not be enforced." (citations omitted)

Applying these standards, the court concluded that nothing in the facts indicated any fraud, duress or unconscionable means used by Party Gaming; hence, the first factor was not satisfied. As to the second factor, the plaintiffs argued that in Gibraltar they would not be entitled to a jury trial or to proceed as a class action. The court held, however, that neither deficiency rendered Gibraltar "an ineffective or unfair forum." Finally, as to the third factor, despite the obvious inconvenience to the plaintiffs, the court explained, "plaintiffs have not carried their 'heavy burden' of showing that enforcing this forum selection clause would be unjust or unreasonable."

The panel does seem to have overlooked one aspect of the Bremen analysis, namely, the question of whether "enforcement would contravene a strong public policy of the forum in which suit is brought." For a recent application of this principle, see Doe 1 v. AOL LLC, 552 F.3d 1077, 1083 (9th Cir. 2009) (specific California policy against enforcement of forum selection clauses in particular context). In their brief on appeal, the Wong plaintiffs did argue that enforcement of the forum selection clause would violate Ohio's policy in favor of jury trials; the panel, however, disposed of this argument in its discussion of "an ineffective or unfair forum" - a somewhat different issue. The plaintiffs did not, however, identify any specific Ohio policy against the enforcement of forum selection clauses of the type at issue here.

Having concluded that the forum selection clause was enforceable as a matter of federal law, the court then explained that the proper method for enforcing the clause was, as the district court had done, through a forum non conveniens analysis. PartyGaming had filed a Rule 12(b)(3) motion dismiss, which, the court explained, was technically improper because a valid forum selection clause does not itself alter the propriety of the initial venue. However, given that the Rule 12(b)(3) motion brought the essential issues underlying forum non conveniens before the district court, the Wong court held it was not error for the district to raise and apply that doctrine sua sponte. [Note, the Wong court's use of forum non conveniens as the method of enforcement appears to be the majority approach, although some courts do enforce forum selection clauses under Rule 12(b)(3) or 12(b)(6) or even without reference to any particular rule. Under the forum non conveniens approach, there is a rough parity with the approach applied in § 1404(a) transfers since the forum selection clause, under both approaches, is treated as one factor, albeit a substantial one, in the analysis.]

The Wong court then examined the factors relevant to a forum non conveniens analysis and held that the district court had not abused its discretion in dismissing the suit.

One final point is worth considering. Since the federal law of forum selection clauses is judge-made, it falls within the general category of federal common law. As such, judges and lawyers must be attentive to potential conflicts with state law that may require an application of the Erie doctrine, the question being whether the choice between the federal and state standards is outcome determinative or affective within the meaning of that doctrine. Cf. Gasperini v. Center for Humanities, Inc., 518 U.S. 415, 116 S. Ct. 2211, 135 L. Ed. 2d 659 (1996).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Allan Ides is the Christopher N. May Chair at Loyola Law School Los Angeles. He has published extensively in the areas of constitutional law and federal procedure. His civil procedure casebook, co-authored with Christopher N. May - Civil Procedure: Cases and Problems (Aspen 2009) - is in its third edition.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

23 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Adequate and Independent State Grounds Doctrine

2010 Emerging Issues 4935

Florida v. Powell and the Adequate and Independent State Grounds Doctrine

By Allan Ides

March 30, 2010

SUMMARY: In Florida v. Powell, the U.S. Supreme Court reviewed a decision by the Florida Supreme Court involving a potential violation of Miranda v. Arizona and of parallel provisions of the Florida Constitution. The focus of this commentary is on the jurisdictional issue of whether, under the adequate and independent state grounds doctrine, the U.S. Supreme Court had jurisdiction to review the state court's decision.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: In Florida v. Powell, -- U.S. --, -- S. Ct. --, 175 L. Ed. 2d 1009, 2010 U.S. LEXIS 1898 (Feb. 23, 2010), the U.S. Supreme Court reviewed a decision by the Florida Supreme Court involving a potential violation of Miranda v. Arizona 384 U.S. 436, 471, 86 S. Ct. 1602, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1966), and of parallel provisions of the Florida Constitution. On certiorari, two issues were presented: whether, under the adequate and independent state grounds doctrine, the U.S. Supreme Court had jurisdiction to review the state court's decision; and, if so, whether the state court had correctly applied Miranda. On the jurisdictional issue, the U.S. Supreme Court concluded that it had jurisdiction since the state grounds of decision were not "independent" of the federal grounds. On the merits, the Court reversed and remanded, holding that no violation of Miranda had occurred. The focus of this commentary is on the jurisdictional issue.

Factual Background. Law enforcement officers arrested Powell, a previously convicted felon, in connection with a robbery investigation. In a search incident to his arrest, the officers discovered a handgun in the bedroom Powell appeared to have been using. After arresting him, the officers transported Powell to police headquarters where they informed him of his right to remain silent and of his "right to talk to a lawyer before answering any of our questions." The officers also told Powell that he could "use any of these rights at any time you want during this interview." According to the officers, Powell acknowledged and waived his rights and then made several incriminating statements regarding his ownership of the handgun. He was subsequently charged with unlawful possession of a weapon by a felon. Over his objection, the self-incriminating statements made by Powell during the interrogation were used against him at trial. The jury convicted him and he appealed.

Procedural Background. The essence of Powell's argument regarding the admissibility of his incriminating statements was that the warnings given him by the police were deficient as a matter of both federal and state constitutional law. Specifically, he argued that the warnings did not adequately inform him of his right to have counsel present during the entire interrogation. The trial court denied his motion to suppress, but an intermediate appellate court reversed. That court then certified the following question to the Florida Supreme Court:

"Does the failure to provide express advice of the right to the presence of counsel during questioning vitiate Miranda warnings which advise of both (A) the right to talk to a lawyer "before questioning" and (B) the "right to use" the right to consult a lawyer "at any time" during questioning?"

The Florida Supreme Court granted review. It described the issue presented as "whether the failure to provide express advice of the right to the presence of counsel during custodial interrogation violates the principles espoused in Miranda v. Arizona." The state high court's analysis of this issue began with a detailed examination of federal and state precedent. Much of that analysis interwove federal and state case law, and to the extent that state law was treated separately, that treatment suggested that the content of state law had been developed under the influence of Miranda's standards. The phrase "Miranda warnings" was used generically throughout the opinion to refer to both federal and state standards. Additionally, in applying these parallel federal and state standards to the particular facts of the case before it, the Florida court again interwove the applicable federal and state precedent. At no point in the opinion did the Florida Supreme Court expressly state that it was relying on state law as an independent grounds of decision. Indeed, the court ended its opinion with the following observation, "Both Miranda and article I, section 9 of the Florida Constitution require that a suspect be clearly informed of the right to have a lawyer present during questioning." On this basis, it affirmed the decision of the lower court.

Decision by U.S. Supreme Court. The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari [Florida v. Powell, 129 S. Ct. 2827, 174 L. Ed. 2d 551 (2009)], and in a 7-2 decision delivered by Justice Ginsburg, held that the advice given the defendant was sufficient under Miranda.

Before addressing the Miranda issue, however, the Supreme Court considered the defendant's contention that it lacked jurisdiction to hear this case because the state supreme court, by relying not only on Miranda but also on the Florida Constitution, rested its decision on an "adequate and independent" state ground.

A state ground of decision is deemed "adequate" if it fully sustains the result, regardless of what federal law requires and without itself violating any principle of federal law; a state ground of decision is deemed "independent" if the scope of the state-law principle is not in any fashion dependent on the state court's interpretation of what it thinks federal law requires. The combination of adequacy and independence insulates the federal question from review since a reversal on the federal question would not alter the result.

It is sometimes difficult to determine the extent to which a state ground of decision is both adequate and independent and this is particularly so when the state court's opinion interweaves the discussion of federal and state precedent. At one time, the Supreme Court would remand such cases to the state court for a clarification of the grounds on which the decision was made. Under standards developed in Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032, 1040-1041, 103 S. Ct. 3469, 77 L. Ed. 2d 1201 (1983), however, the Court no longer engages in this remand process. As the Long Court explained:

"[W]hen . . . a state court decision fairly appears to rest primarily on federal law, or to be interwoven with the federal law, and when the adequacy and independence of any possible state law ground is not clear from the face of the opinion, we will accept as the most reasonable explanation that the state court decided the case the way it did because it believed that federal law required it to do so."

The Long Court also advised as to how a state court might avoid the foregoing presumption: "If the state court decision indicates clearly and expressly that it is alternatively based on bona fide separate, adequate, and independent grounds, we, of course, will not undertake to review the decision" Id. at 1041.

The Court in Florida v. Powell easily concluded that the Florida Supreme Court's opinion triggered the Long presumption against adequacy and independence:

"Under the Long presumption, we have jurisdiction to entertain this case. Although invoking Florida's Constitution and precedent in addition to this Court's decisions, the Florida Supreme Court treated state and federal law as interchangeable and interwoven; the court at no point expressly asserted that state-law sources gave Powell rights distinct from, or broader than, those delineated in Miranda."

As the Powell Court saw it, the focus of the Florida Supreme Court's opinion was on "what Miranda demands, rather than on what Florida law independently requires." The Powell Court thus concluded, "We therefore cannot identify, 'from the face of the opinion,' a clear statement that the decision rested on a state ground separate from Miranda."

The Court's opinion represents an unremarkable application of the presumption adopted by the Court in Michigan v. Long. While one might doubt the wisdom of that presumption, any fair reading of the Florida Supreme Court's opinion leads to the inescapable conclusion that the federal and state issues were, at the very least, interwoven and that there was no clear statement in the state court's opinion of an intent to rely on an adequate and independent state ground in reversing the defendant's conviction. Justice Stevens was the only dissenter on this point and his dissent appears to be more of an effort to resist the logic of Michigan v. Long than to apply it. Perhaps the most notable thing about this decision is that the rest of the Court has completely embraced Michigan v. Long.

On the merits, the Court reversed the decision of the Florida Supreme Court, concluding that the advice given to the defendant reasonably conveyed his right to have counsel present during the entire interrogation within the meaning of Miranda. Justices Stevens and Breyer dissented on this point.

The case was remanded to the Florida Supreme Court, which, of course, remains free to re-instate its judgment on state law grounds so long as it makes clear the adequacy and the independence of any such state law determination. The state grounds are undoubtedly adequate since the enforcement of the Florida Constitution would fully sustain the result "a reversal of the defendant's conviction" and would not, under these facts, violate any provision of federal law. Whether the state law grounds are in fact independent is a question primarily of state law.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Allan Ides is the Christopher N. May Chair at Loyola Law School Los Angeles. He has published extensively in the areas of constitutional law and federal procedure. His civil procedure casebook, co-authored with Christopher N. May - Civil Procedure: Cases and Problems (Aspen 2009) - is in its third edition.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

24 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Court Adopts Novel Alternative ESI Cost-Shifting Approach

2010 Emerging Issues 4914

Court Adopts Novel Alternative ESI Cost-Shifting Approach

By John K. Rabiej

March 18, 2010

SUMMARY: In traditional paper-based discovery, the burden to pay photo-copying costs imposed a not insignificant restraint on parties from making excessive discovery demands. Technology has removed that modest restraint. Several approaches have been taken to take account of and replace this deactivated restraint. The approach taken in CBT Flint Partners to tax the collection, search, and production of ESI as costs presents one such alternative.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: As a general proposition, a party responding to a discovery request has the burden to pay the costs of producing discovery. But this burden does not include costs incurred in duplicating or photocopying documents. The requesting party typically has the burden to pay the photo-copying costs.

DUTY TO PRODUCE DISCOVERY:

Under Civil Rule 34(a), a responding party is required to give the requesting party only an opportunity to inspect, copy, test, or sample - not provide - discoverable documents. In paper-based discovery, a responding party typically provides photo-copies of discoverable documents, assessing a reasonable fee for the photo-copying costs. In the paper-based discovery world, the requesting party bears the cost of copying documents. In many of these cases, the total photo-copying fee, at about 10 cents -25 cents per page, is trivial. But in large-scale discovery cases, involving millions of pages of documents, the cost is significant. And in such large-scale discovery cases, a requesting party with not unlimited financial resources is faced with a tactical cost-benefit decision that sometimes results in a decision to limit discovery demands for documents having marginal value. The same restraint applies to a lesser or greater extent in all other paper-based discovery cases.

ELIMINATION OF PRACTICAL RESTRAINT:

The advent of ESI discovery dramatically alters the cost-benefit calculus. A party continues to be responsible under Rule 34(a) to allow an opposing party to inspect or copy discoverable information. But for the same reasons that a party declines to permit the opposing party to rummage through its cabinets containing paper files, parties do not typically permit opposing parties open access to their databases and computers. In fact, parties are loathe to permit the opposing party free access to their databases, which often indiscriminately commingle privileged and non-privileged information.

In lieu of providing open access to its databases or computers, a party must provide ESI in the manner in which it is ordinarily maintained or in a reasonably usable form or forms (Rule 34(b)(2)(E)(ii)). ESI jurisprudence is clear that scanning ESI and providing paper copies of ESI ordinarily are not sufficient to meet the rule's requirements because imaged documents do not contain all the information, e.g., omit metadata, and because much less expensive media for providing the ESI is readily available, e.g., CD-ROMs and hard drives. The effect of this jurisprudence has altered the traditional cost-bearing roles of requesting and producing parties. It also has removed the practical historical incentive, which served to limit requests of marginally valuable discovery. The consequences are magnified because the volume of today's discoverable ESI often dwarfs the volume of traditional paper-based discovery. And as a result, the costs incurred by the responding party in collecting, reviewing, and producing ESI have risen exponentially, while the requesting party's costs in obtaining discoverable ESI have relatively declined.

LIMITS IMPOSED BY RULES:

Of course, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure do not countenance limitless discovery. The rules impose certain restrictions on ESI discovery that are intended to restrain requests for excessive discovery. Only relevant ESI must be searched and produced in discovery. In addition, ESI that is not reasonably accessible, e.g., backup tapes, need not be searched nor produced, unless good cause is shown (Rule 26(b)(2)(B)). Most importantly, ESI discovery requests are subject to a Rule 26(b)(2)(C) proportionality test that limits requests of excessive or unreasonable discovery under a cost-benefit analysis. But its outcome is often uncertain because the application of the proportionality test involves an assessment of many competing factors, and, in many cases, the value or helpfulness of discoverable ESI is not known until it has been collected and produced. (See Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 217 F.R.D. 309, 316 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) and its progeny.)

Because the Rule 26(b)(2)(C) evaluation is fact intensive, its outcome may remain uncertain until the judge renders a ruling. Often, courts err on the side of the party requesting discovery and require the responding party to produce the requested ESI. In cases when the costs of discovery clearly exceed its value, some courts have limited e-discovery and others have shifted the discovery cost to the requesting party. But this latter option has been limited in many jurisdictions, particularly those that prohibit cost-shifting if the ESI is reasonably accessible. See e.g., Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 216 F.R.D. 280, 284 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (when a discovery request "seeks accessible data ... it is typically inappropriate to consider cost-shifting") and Peskoff v. Faber, 244 F.R.D. 54, 62-63 (D.D.C. 2007) (cost-shifting only possible if ESI is inaccessible). These courts permit cost-shifting only when the ESI is not reasonably accessible, e.g., backup tapes. Without fully knowing the value of discoverable ESI beforehand, it is not surprising that most courts are unwilling to limit discovery absent a strong showing that the discovery is unnecessary. In light of the jurisprudence favoring discovery and absent any countervailing practical restraint, a requesting party has little incentive to limit or moderate its discovery requests.

FACTS OF CASE:

CBT Flint Partners v. Return Path, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 121188 (N.D. Ga. Dec. 30, 2009) sets out a limited option that brings back some of the practical constraints that were in place when requesting parties were responsible to pay photo-copying costs in paper-based discovery. The case adopts a novel approach that is intended "to encourage litigants to exercise restraint in burdening the opposing party with the huge cost of unlimited demands for electronic discovery." Id. at *15. In CBT Flint Partners, plaintiffs in a patent infringement action "made overly broad discovery requests that required the production of 1.4 million electronic documents and 6 versions of source code." In a separate action, the court had already awarded the defendants $86,786.02 in attorney fees in litigating the discovery issue.

After prevailing in the underlying patent infringement action, the defendant in CBT Flint Partners filed a bill of costs that included $243,453.02 in fees for costs incurred by its e-discovery vendor in collecting, searching, identifying, and producing ESI. The defendant asserted that such services were essential components of "exemplification and copies" and qualified as taxable costs under 28 U.S.C. § 1920. The court acknowledged a "division of opinion as to whether these costs are recoverable under 28 U.S.C. § 1920 ... as being the modern day equivalent of 'exemplification and copies.'" In fact, though a few courts have treated costs incurred in scanning and imaging ESI as taxable "exemplification and copying" costs (see Kellogg Brown & Root Int'l, Inc. v. Altanmia Commercial Mktg. Co., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 44137, at *11-12 (S.D. Tex. May 26, 2009), only one other court has extended the reach of § 1920 to the wide-ranging types of services performed by the defendant's e-discovery vendor. (See Neutrino Dev. Corp. v. Sonosite, Inc., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23464 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 30, 2007), cited in Kellogg Brown & Root Int'l, Inc., supra, which provides an extensive discussion of the case law.) The holding's reach in CBT Flint Partners is significant because the e-discovery services used in the case are becoming routine in today's practice.

The court in CBT Flint Partners distinguished the seemingly conflicting rulings cited in Kellogg Brown & Root Int'l, Inc., supra. It concluded that the other courts correctly identified the applicable law. Costs should not be taxed if they involved tasks that were ordinarily performed by attorneys or paralegals. See id. at *15 (costs not allowed by these other courts "on the grounds that assembling records for production [was] ordinarily a task done by lawyers and paralegals and [was] not a recoverable cost." But unlike the courts that found such services to be attorney related, the CBT Flint Partners court held that the services performed by the defendant's e-discovery vendor were not the "type of services that attorneys or paralegals are trained for or are capable of providing." It found, unlike the other courts that addressed this same issue, that these services were the "21st Century equivalent of making copies." The court awarded the defendant $268,311.12 as taxable costs.

LESSONS:

The application of the ruling in CBT Flint Partners decision to other cases is limited. It applies only in cases in which a judgment has been entered when the court imposes costs (Rule 54(d)). Cases that are resolved by settlement are excluded. In addition, the award of costs is discretionary with the court. CBT Flint Partners also reflects a minority view, with most jurisdictions that have examined the question ruling otherwise. (See Kellogg Brown & Root Int'l, Inc., supra.) Though the reach of CBT Flint Partners may be limited, its rationale is attractive and may be adopted by other courts.

In addition, the rationale of CBT Flint Partners could be used as a springboard for yet another alternative approach restraining excessive discovery demands. If a court is not prepared to shift costs before discovery actually takes place, a party could request the court to defer making its cost-shifting decision until the discovery is completed, when the parties and the court are in a better position to assess accurately whether the cost of the ESI that was produced outweighed its benefit. This option, if prudently calibrated by the court, would reinstate the traditional cost-bearing roles of the requesting and responding parties. It would force the requesting party to make a practical cost-benefit decision that would demonstrate its confidence that the request was reasonable and not intended solely to elicit tactical advantages.

A court has wide authority to impose conditions on discovery under Rule 26. ("Under Rules 26(b)(2) and 26(c), a court is provided abundant resources to tailor discovery requests to avoid unfair burden and expense and yet assure fair disclosure of important information. The options available are limited only by the court's own imagination and the quality and quantity of the factual information...." Carmen Thompson v. U.S. Dept. Hous. and Urban Dev., 219 F.R.D. 93, 98-99 (D. Md. 2003).) There is nothing in the Civil Rules to prohibit a court from granting an ESI discovery request subject to a later cost-shifting evaluation. (See In Re Veeco Instruments, Inc. Sec. Litig., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23926, at *7 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 2, 2007) (court ordered defendant to produce ESI subject to later cost-shifting analysis).) Such an option seems especially attractive if the initial ESI discovery request appears excessive, but not sufficiently unreasonable under the Rule 26(b)(2)(C) proportionality test to be denied outright, like the one in CBT Flint Partners.

The suggested "taxing costs" option runs counter to the traditional presumption that the responding party has the burden to pay discovery costs, and it should not be considered in all cases. Yet in appropriate cases, requesting the court to defer its cost-shifting evaluation until after the production of discovery may be reasonable when discovery demands appear excessive, the responding party objects to the request, substantial evidence has been furnished earlier to the requesting party, and the ESI eventually produced turns out to have little value. It may also level the playing field and restrain excessive ESI discovery requests in future cases as contemplated by the court in CBT Flint Partners.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004. The views expressed in the commentary represent Mr. Rabiej's opinions and do not necessarily reflect the views of the rules committees.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

25 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Be Wary When Collaborating with the Opposing Party on Identifying Key Words

2010 Emerging Issues 4915

Why a Requesting Party Should Be Wary When Collaborating with the Opposing Party on Identifying Keyword Search Terms

By John K. Rabiej

March 18, 2010

SUMMARY: A party is encouraged to collaborate with the opposing party in identifying specific keywords for discovery ESI searches. Courts occasionally require the requesting party to identify search terms to be applied by the responding party. There may be good reasons to look warily at requests or orders to collaborate on identifying keyword search terms.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Keyword searching is used to locate a specific word or words in the ESI being searched regardless of context. Lawyers are familiar with the general technique, using it often in automated legal research. Keyword searching offers a useful tool to minimize the burden of reviewing ESI. It has become a standard ESI search procedure. In cases involving enormous amounts of ESI, keyword searching is indispensable.

Typically, a party responding to a discovery ESI request develops a list of keywords that will be used for search purposes. The list can be shared with the opposing party, who may raise objections with the party or the court about its effectiveness in identifying relevant evidence. Best practices recommend that parties make a good faith effort to collaborate on the use of searching methods, including agreement on the keywords. (See The Sedona Conference, Best Practices Commentary on the Use of Search and Information Retrieval Methods in E-Discovery 189, 211 (2007) ("Parties should make a good faith attempt to collaborate on the use of particular search and information retrieval methods, tools and protocols (including as to keywords, concepts, and other types of search parameters."); American Bar Assoc., Civil Discovery Standards (2004) (Standard 31 recommends that counsel consider stipulating, where appropriate: "The use of specified key terms or other selection criteria to search some or all of the potentially responsive data for discoverable information.") But a party is not obligated to accept keywords proposed by the other party. (See Treppel v. Biovail Corp., 233 F.R.D. 363 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) (party can reject list of keywords proposed by opposing party, but must proceed with its own word list rather than produce nothing.) Nor should a party rely solely on inadequate keywords stipulated by the opposing party to meet its discovery-production burden.

A handful of courts and individual judges have adopted a default discovery standard that requires the parties to agree on the method of searching, and the words, terms, and phrases to be searched. (See Local Rules, N.D. Ohio, LR-Appendix K; and Admin. Order 174, M.D. Tenn.; Order Governing Electronic Discovery, Judge Timothy Savage,

E.D. Pa.) On occasion, a court has required a party to use specific keywords to search ESI. (See In re: Direct Southwest, Inc., Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) Litig., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 69142, at *5-6 (E.D. La. Aug. 7, 2009) (court ordered defendant to search ESI using keywords supplied by plaintiff).

Fashioning a search protocol that has been mutually agreed on by the parties has much to recommend it. The scope of discovery is better defined. Wasteful searches of irrelevant evidence is minimized. The requesting party is less likely to suffer data dumps of largely useless information. It can be a win-win proposition for both parties. The benefits of these agreements are the reason why the practice has been championed as a best practice. Unless the agreement is carefully crafted, however, the practice can have a downside, which is suggested by a recent magistrate judge opinion in Edelen v. Campbell Soup Co., 2009 U.S. Dist LEXIS 125 466 (N.D. Ga. Nov. 20, 2009), adopted by district judge, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18693 (N.D. Ga. Mar. 2, 2010).

Facts of Case:

In Edelen, the plaintiff alleged that the defendant company practiced racial and age discrimination. Discovery was prolonged, and the defendant argued that the discovery request was overly broad. The court agreed and ordered the plaintiff to narrow the scope of its discovery as to time, people, and departments. During one of several discovery hearings, the defendant repeatedly requested plaintiff "to identify reasonable search terms and the date parameters." The court again agreed that the discovery request was too broad and ordered the plaintiff to narrow its scope. The plaintiff failed to propose search terms, contending that it was the defendant's burden to identify appropriate search terms. At a later hearing, the court ordered the plaintiff "to respond with a proposal containing narrowed search terms within five business days." The plaintiff submitted a list of 55 custodians and 50 search terms. The defendant objected to the list as too broad and offered an alternative list. The plaintiff did not object. The court ordered the defendant to produce discovery using the search terms and parameters that the defendant had proposed in lieu of those proposed by the plaintiff.

Shifting Discovery Burdens:

Edelen extends a trend that started with the acceptance of keyword ESI searching, then later developed into best practices encouraging parties to collaborate on identifying search terms, and now culminates in several opinions in which the court has required the requesting party to propose the search terms. In this last development, the extension moves into uncharted territory where the potential implications and consequences may not have been fully analyzed.

Traditionally, a responding party exercises exclusive control over "how" it identifies, collects, reviews, and produces information in response to a discovery request. It is in the best position to know what information in its control is responsive and which tools, methods, and resources it believes will be effective to respond to the discovery request. The requesting party is entitled to object to the results of the search if it fails to produce all relevant information responsive to the discovery request. But the requesting party typically is not entitled to compel the responding party to employ a particular search method, and it usually does not advise the opposing party on how it should perform its discovery duties.

Edelen and other cases like it are quietly shifting the traditional discovery burdens of parties in recognition of the realities and demands imposed by the unique nature and often voluminous size of ESI. Parties requesting discovery are increasingly being expected and asked to participate directly in the development of a search protocol, including identifying search terms. As their participation increases, so too does their responsibility for the results of the discovery, which raises a host of issues.

Assuming even partial responsibility for the operation of a keyword ESI search conducted by the opposing party can be perilous. In the first place, defining a list of search terms is difficult under the best of circumstances. Identifying keywords for ESI in the control of an opposing party without actually knowing what that information may contain is much more difficult. And even if both parties work in good faith to identify the keywords, the results are likely to be flawed.

Developing keywords to search ESI effectively is far from a precise science. As noted in an earlier commentary, keyword searches may be quick, but they are "inherently limited and can produce incomplete results that can have serious consequences." (See John K. Rabiej on the Risks Associated with Keyword Searches, 2009 Emerging Issues 3635. Studies have demonstrated the limited success performance of keyword searches. The most famous of the studies found that, though participating lawyers believed that their search captured 75% or more of the relevant ESI, in fact the results captured only 20%. Of course, substantial progress continues to be made in the improvement of keyword searches, including supplementing the searches with automated search techniques that rely on concept searches and linguistic analysis. Despite progress, the performance success of discovery performed exclusively by keyword searches is far from perfect.

Lessons:

When collaborating either voluntarily or under court order with the opposing party on developing appropriate search keywords, the requesting party must recognize the limitations of keyword searches, and it must ensure that any mutually agreed on or stipulated search protocol contains language that is sufficiently flexible to address these limitations. Inartfully drawn stipulated search protocols can have devastating effects, as shown in In Re: Fannie Mae Secs. Litig., 552 F.3d 814 (D.D. Cir. 2009), where the defendants were held bound to comply with the search protocol, though it required them to expend $6 million on discovery, approximately 9 percent of the defendant agency's entire annual budget.

It can be in the interest of the responding party to collaborate with the requesting party in developing keywords. Such collaboration makes it difficult for the requesting party to challenge the adequacy of a discovery search later because it itself had participated in formulating the keywords. In fact, the defendant in Yeisley v. PA State Police, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 25706, at *9 n.1 (M.D.Pa. Mar. 31, 2008), unsuccessfully attempted to coopt the requesting party from later challenging the results of an ESI discovery by obtaining the court's "imprimatur on the search criteria in order to obviate the need to conduct this search more than once." Before engaging in an effort to develop appropriate keywords with the opposing party, the requesting party should ensure that its collaboration will not be construed to constrain or otherwise waive its right to object subsequently to the results of the ESI discovery search based on flawed keywords.

The court in Clearone Communications, Inc. v. Chiang, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27617 (D. Utah Apr. 1, 2008) was sensitive to this possibility when it issued its order approving the plaintiff's request to enter a protocol governing the defendant's ESI discovery search, including specific keywords. A party should consider incorporating the caveats in the court's order in every mutually agreed on ESI search protocol based on keyword searches. The court said: "This order is not the last word on key words, either. If documents are discovered which suggest that other documents exist which were not identified as potentially responsive, or if a surprisingly small or unreasonably large number of documents is identified as potentially responsive, refinement may be needed. ... This first protocol may suffice, or it may in effect be a sampling which reveals the need for more -- or less -- or different -- key words." The court order provides prudent advice to every party contemplating keyword collaboration with the opposing party.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004. The views expressed in the commentary represent Mr. Rabiej's opinions and do not necessarily reflect the views of the rules committees.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

26 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

O'Sullivan on Schnall v. AT&T Wireless

2010 Emerging Issues 4895

Kathleen M. O'Sullivan on What the Washington Supreme Court Might Do With Schnall v. AT&T Wireless Services, Inc.

By Kathleen M. Sullivan

February 22, 2010

SUMMARY: Long-awaited Washington Supreme Court decision clarifies scope of Washington Consumer Protection Act and Washington's rules for certification of class actions, rejecting plaintiffs' proposed nationwide class against company "headquartered" in Washington.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Schnall v. AT&T Wireless: Washington Supreme Court Narrows Scope of Consumer Protection Act and Tightens Rules for Certification of Class Actions

Introduction. In a landmark and divided ruling, the Washington Supreme Court declined an invitation to turn Washington into "a locus of nationwide class action litigation" [*Schnall v. AT&T Wireless, Inc. (Jan. 21, 2010) 2010 Wash. LEXIS 61, 1].

Factual Background in Schnall. The Schnall case was filed by individuals who claimed that certain charges violated their contracts with AT&T Wireless (by increasing a charge without notice) and violated the Washington Consumer Protection Act (by misrepresenting the nature of the charge). Plaintiffs proposed that a class of AT&T Wireless's customers from across the country be certified on these claims. The trial court declined to certify such a class, and the Court of Appeals reversed that decision [see Schnall v. AT&T Wireless Services, Inc. (2007) 139 Wn. App. 280, 161 P.3d 395]. The Washington Supreme Court ruled that the trial court got it right, reversing the Court of Appeals [*Schnall v. AT&T Wireless, Inc. (Jan. 21, 2010) 2010 Wash. LEXIS 61, 2].

Choice of Law Clause Enforceable. The Washington Supreme Court first decided that the choice of law clause in the contracts-requiring disputes to be governed by the law of the state where the customer signed the contract-is enforceable. In so ruling, the Court rejected the notion that Washington law should apply to all of these customers, no matter where located, simply because AT&T Wireless is "headquartered" in Washington [*Schnall v. AT&T Wireless, Inc. (Jan. 21, 2010) 2010 Wash. LEXIS 61, 4].

Reach of Consumer Protection Act. Second, and of equal-if not greater-significance, the Court ruled that Washington's Consumer Protection Act (CPA) does not apply "extraterritorially," i.e., beyond the borders of the State of Washington. Thus, the Court ruled, simply because a company is based in Washington does not mean that Washington's CPA applies to the company's transactions with consumers across the country. Instead, the Washington CPA is limited to misrepresentations or other misdeeds against Washington residents [Schnall v. AT&T Wireless, Inc. (Jan. 21, 2010) 2010 Wash. LEXIS 61, *22].

Nationwide Class Not Certified. Third, the Court decided that certification of a nationwide class of AT&T Wireless's customers would be inappropriate. In so ruling, the Court relied on federal court decisions interpreting the federal class action rule on which Washington's rule is based [CR 23; see FRCP 23]. Both rules require that "common" issues of the class "predominate" over issues of individual class members to certify a class. The Court's conclusion that AT&T Wireless's customers' claims are governed by the law of their various home states was therefore the death knell of plaintiffs' quest for a nationwide class. Because a different body of contract law would apply to each state's citizens, the Court was not persuaded that use of "subclasses" or "special master's hearings" would make a 50-state class manageable. As a result, according to the Washington Supreme Court, such lawsuits should be litigated state by state, across the country. For plaintiffs' class action lawyers and the companies that they sue, this will greatly reduce the potential monetary damages and scope of other relief available in such a class action filed in Washington. But it may also increase the logistical burdens and costs on litigants if claims are litigated in multiple jurisdictions at once [Schnall v. AT&T Wireless, Inc. (Jan. 21, 2010) 2010 Wash. LEXIS 61, *8].

Evidence Required for CPA Violation. Finally, the Washington Supreme Court clarified the amount of evidence required to establish a violation of the Washington CPA, specifically proof that the plaintiff's alleged injury was caused by the defendant's misrepresentation or "unfair" act. This aspect of the ruling applies to and will significantly affect CPA claims in class action cases and in suits by individual private plaintiffs. Reiterating the Court's ruling in Indoor Billboard/Washington, Inc. v. Integra Telecom of Washington, Inc. [(2007) 162 Wn.2d 59, 170 P.3d 10], the Court confirmed that causation is not established by the mere fact that plaintiffs paid the charge they now complain about. Nor is causation established by evidence of a "mere capacity to deceive" [Schnall v. AT&T Wireless, Inc. (Jan. 21, 2010) 2010 Wash. LEXIS 61, *28].

Rather, under the Washington CPA, plaintiffs must show that they "were actually deceived" and that they would not have "purchased [the] service, or paid the [charge] but for" the defendant's representations (emphasis added) [Schnall v. AT&T Wireless, Inc. (Jan. 21, 2010) 2010 Wash. LEXIS 61, *30]. In light of this causality requirement, the Washington Supreme Court remanded the case to the trial court to determine whether such evidence of causation would be so individualized that even a statewide class would not be warranted on plaintiffs' claims that AT&T Wireless misrepresented the nature of a particular charge [Schnall v. AT&T Wireless, Inc. (Jan. 21, 2010) 2010 Wash. LEXIS 61, *32].

Impact of Schnall. Although the Court's decision may fall short of the "disaster for plaintiffs"-as the dissenting opinion characterized the result-it is a sea change for plaintiffs and defendants in class action and Consumer Protection Act litigation in Washington courts [Schnall v. AT&T Wireless, Inc. (Jan. 21, 2010) 2010 Wash. LEXIS 61, *51 (Sanders, J., dissenting)].

Disclaimer. This commentary is for informational purposes only and not for the purpose of providing legal advice. The opinions expressed in this commentary are the opinions of the individual author and may not reflect the opinions of Perkins Coie LLP or any other individual attorney at the firm. Perkins Coie LLP represented Integra Telecom of Washington, Inc., in the Indoor Billboard case discussed above.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Kathleen M. O'Sullivan is a partner in the Seattle office of the law firm Perkins Coie LLP. Ms. O'Sullivan is the co-chair of the firm's Appellate Practice Group and focuses her practice in the area of class action litigation, complex business litigation, and constitutional and appellate litigation. Ms. O'Sullivan received her J.D. from Georgetown University Law Center in 1996 and her B.A. from Yale University in 1991.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

27 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Rabiej: Preservation of Information Contained in Web Site Linked in ESI

2009 Emerging Issues 4765

Responsibility to Preserve Information Contained in Web Sites Linked to ESI Produced in Discovery

By John K. Rabiej

December 28, 2009

SUMMARY: ESI documents can contain URL addresses that serve as hyperlinks to relevant information posted on the internet. After ESI containing a hyperlink is produced in discovery, is the producing or the requesting party responsible to preserve the information contained in the web site? The commentary looks at what lessons can be learned from a recent case that addresses some of the issues that arise under such circumstances.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: INTRODUCTION: The defendants in Ferron v. Echostar Satellite, LLC, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66637 (S.D. Ohio, July 29, 2009) produced hundreds of emails with hyperlinks to web sites containing embedded images that were relevant to the underlying consumer sales practice complaint. The images were the only evidence of mail advertisements, which were sent allegedly in violation of Ohio law. When the plaintiff attempted to access the hyperlinked information on the internet, the linked web sites had been disabled and the information was lost.

The plaintiff moved for an adverse instruction sanction against the defendants for failing to preserve images contained in web sites with hyperlinks in 117 of the emails. The defendants responded that: (1) the web sites had been disabled before the preservation duty arose; and (2) they had no duty or ability to reproduce the images in the web sites, which were hosted by outside parties. In addition, the defendants turned the argument around and asserted that the plaintiff was obligated to preserve the web site images once the emails were produced. Plaintiff disagreed, contending that the defendants were obligated to preserve the images in the web sites.

COURT'S ANALYSIS: Sanctions under Rule 37 were not considered, because no court order had been entered requiring the defendants to preserve ESI. Alternatively, the court concluded that it had the inherent power to sanction a party for failing to meet its preservation duty under Chambers v. NASCO, 501 U.S. 32, 43-50 (1991). The court recognized that under Chambers it could sanction a party only on a finding of bad faith. The plaintiff in Ferron had the burden to establish that the defendants acted in bad faith. After reviewing the evidence, the court found that it was unclear whether the web sites had been disabled before the complaint was filed and the preservation duty arose. It was also unclear whether the defendants maintained all, some, or none of the web sites. The court ruled that the plaintiff failed to establish that the web sites were active at the time that the preservation duty arose, that the defendants maintained every relevant web site, or that they had the duty to maintain the web sites. Absent a record establishing the defendants' bad faith, the court denied the motion for an adverse instruction sanction.

PRESERVATION DUTY: In the paper world, a hard-copy document may include a notation at the end of the document, signifying that other hard-copy documents are attached or enclosed. A party responding to a discovery request for a document is required to produce any attachments or enclosures, if they are also relevant. Hyperlinks are the electronic equivalents of attachments or enclosures. They both serve the same purposes. The same preservation obligations that apply to hard-copy attachments and enclosures apply with equal force to hyperlinks. It follows that a producing party is obligated to take steps to preserve relevant information contained in a web site, which is hyperlinked to ESI produced in discovery.

Ferron poses the question whether a producing party's obligations to preserve information on a hyperlinked web site continue after it has produced the requested ESI containing the hyperlink. The defendants contended that once they produced the ESI with the hyperlinks the plaintiffs had access to the web sites and were obligated to preserve the information contained in them. The court in Ferron found that the plaintiff failed to establish that the web sites contained the relevant information at the time that the preservation duty arose. Because the web sites could have been disabled before the defendants' preservation duty arose, the record was insufficient to establish the defendant's bad faith. Absent a showing of bad faith, the court could not impose sanctions under its inherent power. The court went on to find that bad faith also was not established because the plaintiff failed to show that the defendants maintained the web sites, suggesting that a showing of bad faith could be made only if the defendants maintained and hosted the web site.

The court's ruling denying the sanctions motion because the record lacked sufficient evidence showing that the hyperlinked web sites were active at the time of the defendant's preservation duty was unremarkable. The suggestion that bad faith could not be found if the linked web site was maintained by a third party and not by the producing party, however, raises questions. In general, a producing party's preservation duty does not end when the information is produced to the other party. It continues until the end of the litigation. In addition, a party is obligated to preserve relevant information in its control. Though the ruling in Ferron suggested otherwise, it is not self evident that a producing party's access to relevant information contained in a web site hosted by a third party that was linked to one of its ESI documents did not represent control sufficient to establish a duty to preserve it. The producing party certainly had sufficient control to take steps to preserve it by copying it.

Though the failure to preserve the information contained in the linked web site may not have established bad faith under the particular facts in Ferron, the failure to preserve such ESI in other cases might not be excused. The court denied the sanctions motion in Ferron primarily because it relied on the plaintiff's failure to establish that the web sites were active when the preservation duty arose. The court's subsidiary finding that the defendants may not have maintained the web sites was a secondary consideration in absolving them, and its effect on future rulings is unclear. If the facts had been different and the web sites clearly disabled after the defendants' preservation duty arose, the results may have been different.

There is another consideration that may play a role in future cases involving hyperlinks. Ferron quite properly focused on a party's preservation duty. In addition to possible preservation violations, however, the failure to produce relevant information in a web site in an appropriate form or forms may raise ESI production issues. Under Civil Rule 34(b)(2)(E)(ii), the defendants in Ferron had the duty to produce relevant ESI in a "form or forms in which it is ordinarily maintained or in a reasonably usable form or forms." Unless the defendants in Ferron provided the emails in native file format, an unlikely event, the defendants were required to produce the emails in a reasonably usable form.

Whether production of ESI with hyperlinks is a reasonable form of production without also providing for some type of safeguard ensuring that the information can be accessed in the future is open to question, especially when the producing party knows that the web site is hosted by a third party. A decision to impose the preservation duty on the producing party may not be appropriate because the producing party may not have any control over the deletion or modification of a web site. At the same time, the requesting party can easily access the hyperlinked web site when it is initially produced. A decision to impose the duty on the requesting party, on the other hand, may not be appropriate because a web site can be easily disabled before the party ever has an opportunity to access it, which may be a long time depending on the amount of discovery produced that it must review.

LESSONS: The court in Ferron was not asked to provide precedential guidelines on preserving or producing ESI with hyperlinks to web sites. It dealt with a specific sanctions motion. So the direct lessons from Ferron are limited. But the case is instructional and highlights the potential problems that can arise with ESI that contain hyperlinks to web sites. When the lines of responsibility are not entirely clear, prudent counsel should collaboratively address these issues early in the case. Rule 26(f) conferences are designed to provide such an opportunity for mutual consultation. At these conferences, counsel can agree, for example, that if the producing party hosts the hyperlinked web site, it need only ensure that the site remains active and unaltered. If the producing party does not maintain the hyperlinked web site, counsel should agree on what steps should be taken to ensure that the information contained in the web site either will remain on the web site or, if that is not possible, that steps that must be taken to copy or otherwise preserve the information in the web site.

As with many other ESI issues, addressing this matter early in the case can eliminate difficult problems from developing later in the case. One practical solution is to include discussion of the preservation of hyperlinked web sites on the Rule 26(f) checklist.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004. The views expressed in the commentary represent Mr. Rabiej's opinions and do not necessarily reflect the views of the rules committees.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

28 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Georgene Vairo on In re Pharmacy Benefit Managers Antitrust Litig.

2009 Emerging Issues 4768

Georgene Vairo on In re Pharmacy Benefit Managers Antitrust Litig.

By Georgene Vairo

December 28, 2009

SUMMARY: To what extent does the law of the case doctrine apply after a case has been transferred by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation for coordinated pretrial proceedings? In In re Pharmacy Benefit Managers Antitrust Litigation, the Third Circuit considers the issue, and in this Emerging Issues Analysis, Professor Georgene Vairo evaluates the Third Circuit's approach.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Summary. In In re Pharmacy Benefit Managers Antitrust Litig., 582 F.3d 432, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 21125 (3d Cir. Sept. 24, 2009), the Third Circuit ruled that after transfer by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation, the transferee court's discretion to modify or vacate orders of the transferor court is limited by the law of the case doctrine. The Multidistrict Litigation statute does not provide a transferee court any special power to alter the rulings of the transferor court.

Facts and Procedural Background. This action was one of several antitrust actions transferred and assigned by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation to a district judge for coordinated pretrial proceedings [see 28 U.S.C § 1407]. The plaintiffs were a group of retail pharmacies that contracted with the defendant to provide prescription drugs and other services for drug benefit plans. They alleged that the defendant used the combined economic power of its plan sponsors to reduce the contractual amount it paid them below competitive market levels, and that their actions constituted an unlawful conspiracy among the defendant and its plan-sponsors in violation of antitrust law.

The contracts contained an arbitration clause, and before transfer the original court granted the defendant's motion to compel arbitration, and stayed the action pending arbitration. The plaintiffs filed a motion to lift the stay and dismiss the complaint so that they could pursue an appeal of the district court's orders and represented that they did not intend to arbitrate their claims, but rather desired to obtain appellate review of the orders compelling arbitration. Before the court could rule on this motion, the action was transferred by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation.

The transferee court heard argument on the plaintiffs' motion to lift the stay and dismiss the complaint, and vacated the orders compelling arbitration and staying the litigation. The transferee court explained that the transferor court's order compelling arbitration was clearly appropriate under the Federal Arbitration Act and the Congressional policies reflected in that statute. However, noting that the action of the Multidistrict Litigation Panel clearly assumed that the stay or proceedings did not preclude coordinated pretrial proceedings, the transferee judge reasoned that he could therefore diverge from the transferor judge's rulings to the limited extent of considering whether any useful purpose would be served in submitting all preliminary determinations to the arbitrator. To fulfill his role as transferee judge, the court decided that he ought expedite the decision which he thought would necessarily have been reached by the arbitrator. The transferee court then found that the case was not subject to arbitration, and the defendant appealed.

Appellate Jurisdiction. Before beginning its analysis, the Third Circuit noted that it had jurisdiction pursuant to Sections 16(a)(1)(A) and (B) of the Federal Arbitration Act, 9 U.S.C. " 16(a)(1)(A) and (B), which provide that appeals may be taken from orders denying motions to compel arbitration and denying stays of proceedings pending arbitration.

Law of the Case Doctrine. Rather than engage whether the transferor court got the question of whether the case was arbitrable correct, the Third Circuit ruled that transferee judge could not properly vacate the original judge's orders because of the law of the case doctrine. The Third Circuit delved into an extensive analysis of the law of the case doctrine.

It noted that "law of the case" is an amorphous concept that posits that when a court decides on a rule of law that decision should continue to govern the same issues in subsequent stages in the same case. Law of the case rules have developed to maintain consistency and avoid reconsideration of matters, once decided, during the course of a single continuing lawsuit.

Nonetheless, the law of the case doctrine is not absolute. It does not restrict a court's power, but rather governs its exercise of discretion. A court has the power to revisit prior decisions of its own or of a coordinate court, although as a rule courts should be loath to do so in the absence of extraordinary circumstances. Such circumstances exist when the initial decision was clearly erroneous and would work a manifest injustice.

Other extraordinary circumstances include when new evidence is available or when a supervening new law has been announced. Moreover, the law of the case doctrine does not preclude a court from clarifying or correcting an earlier, ambiguous ruling. Generally, a court should exercise its discretion to reconsider an issue and should exercise that discretion whenever it appears that a previous ruling might lead to an unjust result.

Finally, as a matter of process, if a court decides to change or explain an earlier ruling, it should state the reasons on the record and take appropriate action so that the parties are not prejudiced by reliance on the prior ruling.

The MDL Statute Does Not Provide an Exception to Law of the Case Doctrine. The transferee judge had announced that he had the authority to vacate the order compelling arbitration notwithstanding the law of the case doctrine because: "As a general proposition, a transferee judge under the Multidistrict statute may vacate or modify any order of a transferor court bearing upon pretrial matters." [Bellevue Drug Co. v. Advance PCS, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 91390, at *3 (E.D. Pa. Dec. 19, 2006)]. The Third Circuit disagreed, finding that there was nothing in the text of the Multidistrict litigation transfer statute [see 28 U.S.C. § 1407], authorizing a transferee judge to vacate or modify an order of a transferor judge.

The Third Circuit noted that Section 1407 does allow the Panel on Multidistrict Litigation to "prescribe rules for the conduct of its business not inconsistent with Acts of Congress and the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure," [see 28 U.S.C. § 1407(f)], but there is nothing in the rules it adopted that authorizes a transferee judge to vacate or modify the order of a transferor judge. Moreover, the Third Circuit stated: "we do not believe that Congress intended that a 'Return to Go' card would be dealt to parties involved in MDL transfers." Rather, the court must comply with law of the case principles.

Comment. To the extent that the transferee court based its decision to revisit the transferor court's ruling on the arbitration issue on the purpose of the Multidistrict Litigation statute, i.e., to promote pretrial efficiencies, its decision may be justified. However, the Third Circuit's analysis of the law of the case doctrine trumped any such justification. Although none of the law of the case opinions cited in the Third Circuit's analysis were multidistrict litigation cases, the rationale for needing extraordinary circumstances to revisit earlier rulings applies to MDL cases as well. Accordingly, the transferee judge should have looked to the recognized exceptions to the law of the case doctrine. Indeed, looking to the MDL statute as a basis for an expansion of the law of the case doctrine could actually undermine the efficiency purposes of the statute. As the Third Circuit put it: "If this broad interpretation were accurate, litigation could begin anew with each transfer," and, there could be an endless number of pretrial orders that would be fair game for re-litigation.

Manual For Complex Litigation 4th Does Not Provide Authority to Vacate Transferor Court Orders. The transferee court also believed that he had the authority to vacate the order based on the Manual for Complex Litigation, § 20.132 (4th ed. 2004), which states broadly that "the transferee judge may vacate or modify any order of a transferor court, including protective orders; unless altered, however, the transferor court's orders remain in effect." However, the Third Circuit reminds us that the Manual does not have the force of law. Additionally, the Manual's statement is based on In re Upjohn Co. Antibiotic Cleocin Prods. Liab. Litig. [664 F.2d 114, 118 (6th Cir. 1981)]. That case, the Third Circuit said, merely held that a transferee court can modify a transferor court's protective order when necessary to "harmonize activity relating to discovery." It does not, however, support a claim that a transferee court has the power to vacate or modify any order of a transferor court.

Additionally, Upjohn indicates that the power of the transferor court passes to the transferee court. Accordingly, if the transferor court is bound by the law of the case doctrine, the transferee court must be similarly bound. Nothing in the transfer statute suggests that Congress intended to confer more power on the transferee court than the transferor court would have had absent the transfer.

Transferee Court Erred by Vacating Orders. The transferee court did not rely on any of the recognized exceptions to the law of the case doctrine when it vacated the original judge's order compelling arbitration. Nor did the transferee court find any extraordinary circumstances that would have justified vacating the order. Additionally, as the Third Circuit pointed out, the transferee judge had noted that the transferor judge's order "clearly appropriate" under the FAA. And, it was also clear to the Third Circuit that the transferee judge had misread the transferor court's opinion in support of the order compelling arbitration.

The Third Circuit concluded that, absent "extraordinary circumstances" that would justify an exception to the law of the case doctrine, a transferee court simply does not have the power to vacate or modify an existing order. Because the order vacating the earlier order compelling arbitration violated the law of the case doctrine, the Third Circuit vacated it and remanded with directions to reinstate the order compelling arbitration and staying the case pending arbitration.

Comment. The Third Circuit is correct that the transferee court interpreted Upjohn far too liberally. Considering the multiplicity of parties and issues in a multidistrict litigation, construing the MDL statute to provide broad authority to revisit any order of either the transferor or transferee court could be counterproductive to the purpose of the statute and visit "havoc and potential delay and confusion . . . on parties involved in multidistrict litigation." Thus, it is not surprising that the Upjohn court cautioned: "The rule of the law of the case . . . is particularly applicable to multidistrict litigation." [664 F.2d at 119.]

RELATED LINKS: For further information, see Moore's Federal Practice

■ 17 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) " 112.07[1][b];

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

29 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Georgene Vairo on Bauman v. DaimlerChrysler Corp.

2009 Emerging Issues 4769

Georgene Vairo on Bauman v. DaimlerChrysler Corp.

By Georgene Vairo

December 28, 2009

SUMMARY: When can a United States subsidiary's contacts with the forum state be imputed to the foreign parent for personal jurisdiction purposes? The Ninth Circuit addresses this important question in Bauman v. DaimlerChrysler Corp., and in this Emerging Issue Analysis, Professor Georgene Vairo analyzes and critiques the Ninth Circuit majority's approach.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Summary. Clarifying its precedent on an increasingly important issue, the Ninth Circuit held that a United States subsidiary's contacts with the forum state cannot be imputed to its foreign parent for personal jurisdiction purposes unless the parent exerts "pervasive control" over the subsidiary. The majority opinion explained that to be subject to personal jurisdiction in the United States, a foreign parent corporation must exert control over its U.S. subsidiary that is so pervasive and continual that the subsidiary may be considered an agent or instrumentality of the parent [see Bauman v. DaimlerChrysler Corp., 579 F.3d 1088, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 19360 (9th Cir. Aug. 28, 2009)]. A strong dissent argued that the majority imposed an inappropriately stringent test.

Facts and Procedural Background. Residents of Argentina sued a German company in the Northern District of California under the Alien Tort Claims Act, alleging human rights violations by the defendant's subsidiary in Argentina. Another subsidiary of the defendant was a Delaware company, which had offices in California and was undisputedly subject to general personal jurisdiction in California. This subsidiary was responsible for marketing and distributing the defendant's automobiles in the U.S. The German company moved to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction on the ground that the U.S. subsidiaries' contacts with California could not be imputed to it for personal jurisdiction purposes. The district court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss.

The court's ruling, however, was tentative and it ordered limited jurisdictional discovery on two issues: (1) whether an agency relationship existed between the German parent and the U.S. subsidiary, and (2) whether the plaintiffs could pursue their claims in Germany or Argentina. In their response to the motion, the plaintiffs also argued that jurisdiction should be conferred upon the German parent because of its contacts with the United States as a whole, pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 4(k)(2). Plaintiffs also requested, in the alternative, that the district court transfer the case to Michigan if it found that it did not have personal jurisdiction over the parent.

The district court concluded that its earlier ruling was correct and granted the motion to dismiss, finding specifically that the U.S. subsidiary was not the parent's agent for the purpose of conferring general jurisdiction, and that both Germany and Argentina provided an adequate forum for appellants' claims. However, it did not reach the Rule 4(k)(2) and change of venue arguments because both exceeded the scope of its supplemental briefing order. The plaintiffs timely appealed.

Procedural Issues on Appeal. Besides the personal jurisdiction issue, the Ninth Circuit had to deal with a number of different procedural issues. First, the parties had disputed whether there was subject matter jurisdiction over the plaintiffs' claim pursuant to the Alien Tort Claims Act and the Torture Victims Protection Act [see 28 U.S.C. § 1350]. The district court held that it would resolve the question of personal jurisdiction first.

The Ninth Circuit appropriately ruled that this exercise of discretion was proper under the Supreme Court's rulings that provide the district courts with discretion in the sequencing of jurisdictional issues [see Sinochem Int'l Co. v. Malaysia Int'l Shipping Corp., 549 U.S. 422, 431, 127 S. Ct. 1184, 167 L. Ed. 2d 15 (2007); Ruhrgas AG v. Marathon Oil Co., 526 U.S. 574, 588, 119 S. Ct. 1563, 143 L. Ed. 2d 760 (1999)].

Next, the Ninth Circuit rejected the plaintiffs' assertion that the district court had improperly converted the defendant's motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction into a de facto dismissal on forum non conveniens grounds.

Then, the Ninth Circuit discussed the district court's failure to address the plaintiffs' assertion that the court had jurisdiction over the German parent pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 4(k)(2), and their request for transfer, because both exceeded the scope of the supplemental briefing order. The Ninth Circuit quoted a Local Court Rule: "once a reply is filed, no additional memoranda, papers or letters may be filed without prior Court approval" [see N.D. Cal. Civ. R. 7-3(d)].

Finally, the Ninth Circuit found that the plaintiffs had waived the opportunity to appeal these matters. If a party first raises an issue "in a motion which the district court refused to consider because it was untimely and in contravention of local rules," and does not appeal the district court's procedural ruling, the issue is waived. The Rule 4(k)(2) argument and request for transfer were made in contravention of the local rules, and because plaintiffs merely repeated their substantive argument rather than address the procedural ruling in their appellate brief, these arguments were waived.

Comment. The procedural aspects of the Ninth Circuit's opinion are important to keep in mind. While the court was correct on the procedural sequencing issue - the Supreme Court has provided district courts with considerable discretion to determine whether to tackle subject matter jurisdiction, personal jurisdiction or venue issues first - it is also true that by not adhering to the district court's local rules, and by not carefully preserving the right to appeal, the plaintiffs lost the opportunity to put forth what may have been a winning Rule 4(k)(2) argument or motion to transfer to another U.S. court as opposed to the dismissal.

Additionally, putting off the question of subject matter jurisdiction in favor of personal jurisdiction makes a great deal of sense. The contours of jurisdiction under the Alien Tort Claims Statute are murky at best.

Jurisdiction May Be Based on Agency Theory. The plaintiffs argued that the U.S. subsidiary's continuous and systematic contacts with the forum should be attributed to the defendant, its parent, because the U.S. subsidiary was the parent's agent for purposes of personal jurisdiction. The Ninth Circuit agreed that an agency relationship may provide the basis for personal jurisdiction. However, it also stated that the mere existence of a parent/subsidiary relationship is not sufficient to establish personal jurisdiction over the parent on the basis of the subsidiary's contacts with the forum.

Rather, the subsidiary's contacts may be imputed to the parent, under an agency theory, only if the plaintiff makes a prima facie showing that the subsidiary represents the parent by performing services sufficiently important to the parent that if it did not have a representative to perform them, the parent would undertake to perform substantially similar services [see Doe v. Unocal Corp., 248 F.3d 915, 928-931 (9th Cir. 2001)].

The Ninth Circuit noted that the Unocal court also distinguished an agency relationship between a parent and its subsidiary from that of a holding company and its subsidiary. A holding company parent involved in one business could hold another type of business as a subsidiary. Because the business of the parent is the business of investment, its subsidiaries do not conduct business as agents. On the other hand, according to the Ninth Circuit, when subsidiaries are created by the parent for tax or corporate finance purposes, there is no basis for distinguishing between the business of the parent and the business of the subsidiaries.

Agency doctrine supports the exercise of jurisdiction when the local subsidiary performs a function that is compatible with, and assists the parent in the pursuit of, the parent's own business. Therefore, appropriate parental involvement includes monitoring the subsidiary's performance, supervising the subsidiary's finance and capital budget decisions, and articulating general policies and procedures. Directors of a parent may serve as directors of a subsidiary without exposing the parent corporation to liability based on the subsidiary's contacts. Similarly, consolidated reports are not dispositive and do not necessarily establish an agency relationship.

Comment. There are two curious aspects to the Ninth Circuit's analysis. First, the question of the extent to which a subsidiary's contacts may be imputed to a parent is an important one in the domestic context and increasingly in the international context. It is laudable, therefore, that the Ninth Circuit seeks to clarify the applicable standards for imputing subsidiary contacts to a parent corporation. However, it is curious that it picked the Unocal case, another Alien Tort Claims statute ("ATS") case, as its guide. As discussed above, it made sense for the district court to defer consideration of the subject matter jurisdiction issues under the ATS. The use of the statute is controversial and one can easily understand why the federal courts would avoid discussions over its reach. However, the personal jurisdiction question raised in this case arises in all kinds of cases. Thus, to the extent that the Ninth Circuit takes a relatively restrictive approach to when the subsidiary's contacts count, one wonders whether the ATS was part of the driver of the strict approach.

This is important because under Rule 4(k)(1)(A), a federal court borrows the personal jurisdiction law of the state in which it sits. To the extent that the Ninth Circuit seeks to clarify the law on the agency theory of personal jurisdiction, it makes little sense for it to rely so heavily on another ATS case rather than California personal jurisdiction cases or other Ninth Circuit cases that involved commercial or other issues of broader application.

Second, one wonders whether Unocal analysis should lead to the opposite conclusion. Why should it matter what the form of the parent corporation is? Whether the parent is a holding company or not, the subsidiary exists as part of a whole. In either case, the subsidiary is engaging in some business that the parent would need to engage in itself if it chooses to profit from that business.

Parent Must Exert "Pervasive Control" Over Subsidiary. Additionally, the plaintiff also must establish parental control over the subsidiary to confer agency jurisdiction over the parent based on the subsidiary's contacts. The Ninth Circuit noted that its earlier decision in Doe v. Unocal Corp. had given rise to some confusion on this issue. That opinion had referred to the need for control, but had not discussed it further. Some district courts, therefore, had concluded that control was not required [see Modesto City Sch. v. Riso Kagaku Corp., 157 F. Supp. 2d 1128, 1133 (E.D. Cal. 2001)].

The court of appeals rejected this interpretation. "We write to clarify our law in the area of agency jurisdiction because the Modesto court misinterpreted Unocal. A determination of agency jurisdiction requires a two-step analysis. First, the parent must exert control that is so pervasive and continual that the subsidiary may be considered an agent or instrumentality of the parent, notwithstanding the maintenance of corporate formalities. Control must be over and above that to be expected as an incident of ownership. Second, the agent-subsidiary must also be sufficiently important to the parent corporation that if it did not have a representative, the parent corporation would undertake to perform substantially similar services."

The Ninth Circuit did not view this as a new rule. Rather, it noted that control has always been relevant to an agency determination. "[B]efore Unocal and consistent with it, this court had already indicated that a high degree of control is necessary to confer agency jurisdiction. . . . Secondly, under common law principles, control is the sine qua non of agency. Finally, other circuits considering the issue have held that the right to control is of consequence to agency jurisdiction, although the cases vary as to what precise role it plays."

Comment. The corporate structure and the degree of parental control required to establish agency for jurisdictional purposes has baffled the courts. Other circuits considering the issue have held that the right to control is of consequence to agency jurisdiction, but the cases vary as to what precise role it plays. For example, the Seventh Circuit requires the plaintiff to prove that the parent "exerts an unusually high degree of control [see Purdue Research Found. v. Sanofi-Synthelabo, S.A., 338 F.3d 773, 788 (7th Cir. 2003)]. The Second Circuit suggests that the concept of control is one of many factors to be balanced [see Jazini v. Nissan Motor Co., 148 F.3d 181, 185 (2d Cir. 1998)]. The Fifth Circuit conflates agency theory with alter ego theory, but requires an element of control no matter what theory is used [see Hargrave v. Fibreboard Corp., 710 F.2d 1154, 1160 (5th Cir. 1983)].

Parent's Control Was Insufficient to Confer Jurisdiction. Looking at the relationship between the German parent and the U.S. subsidiary, the court determined that the parent did not exert control that was so pervasive and continual that the subsidiary could be considered its agent. The subsidiary was required to provide detailed information and comply with certain general marketing standards, but these requirements were permissible as "monitoring" and "articulation of general policies." Furthermore, the contractual relationship between the two was terminable, the subsidiary's goals were negotiated, and title to the automobiles that were to be sold passed from the parent to the subsidiary in Germany. The parent had no control over the product's ultimate destination within the U.S.

Additionally, the plaintiffs failed to make a prima facie showing that the parent would undertake to perform substantially similar services in the absence of the U.S. subsidiary (although this question was close). The subsidiary was not owned merely as an investment, but performed functions that assisted the parent in its business, selling automobiles. However, there was some evidence that the parent had used independent distributors, which militated against a finding that without the U.S. subsidiary, the parent would personally market its automobiles in the U.S.

The court concluded that, because there was insufficient control and because the subsidiary did not serve as the parent's representative, the subsidiary's contacts could not be imputed to the parent and there was therefore no basis for jurisdiction over the parent in the California forum.

Comment. In addition to avoiding the ATS issues, the Ninth Circuit's opinions obviated the need to consider a related service of process issue that had been raised in the district court. Had the Ninth Circuit made it relatively easier to obtain personal jurisdiction over the German parent based on the U.S. subsidiary's contacts, future plaintiffs might be tempted to serve a foreign parent through its U.S. subsidiary. Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 4(h)(2) and (f)(1), a party served outside of the United States generally must be served under the provisions of the Hague Convention on Service Abroad. However, in Volkswagenwerk Aktiengesellschaft v. Schlunk, 486 U.S. 694, 108 S. Ct. 2104, 100 L. Ed. 2d 722 (1988), the United States Supreme Court held that when a foreign parent has a U.S. subsidiary, service on the subsidiary is proper in lieu of service under the Hague Convention. The saga of service in the Bauman case [see Bauman v. Daimlerchrysler AG, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31929 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 22, 2005)] shows why this is an important issue.

The plaintiffs originally believed that the German parent had its sole headquarters in Stuttgart, Germany. They used the procedures set forth by the Hague Convention for international service of process to serve the parent through the German courts. The German district court authorized service of process upon the parent, but the German appellate court halted service to determine whether service would violate Germany's sovereignty rights. If so, the requested service could potentially be refused according to the Hague Convention. The issue languished in the German high court in an unrelated case involving Napster and Bertelsmann AG, which posed similar issues.

Later, the plaintiffs learned from reading a proxy statement to shareholders regarding the 1998 merger of Chrysler Corporation with the parent, Daimler-Benz AG, that the parent purported to maintain operational headquarters at the subsidiary's headquarters in Michigan. The plaintiffs then applied for and were issued an amended summons for the parent at the Michigan location.

Plaintiffs' process server first attempted to serve the parent at the subsidiary's headquarters but was unsuccessful because the service of process paralegal for the subsidiary explained to the server that she and the subsidiary were not authorized to accept service of process on behalf of the parent. Other attempts resulted in similar lack of success. Ultimately, the plaintiffs' process server left the papers there for the parent, but the service papers were returned to plaintiffs' counsel.

Next, plaintiffs mailed copies of the summons and complaint, addressed to the CEO of the parent, to the subsidiary headquarters by registered mail, and also mailed copies to the Michigan Corporation Securities Bureau. The parent, in disagreement with the plaintiffs, contended that the CEO had no office in Michigan.

After all this maneuvering, the parent filed a motion to dismiss for insufficiency of service of process, as well as to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction. However, in response to plaintiffs' opposition, the parent withdrew its challenge to service of process, but continued on with its successful motion to dismiss the complaint for lack of personal jurisdiction.

Surely if the Ninth Circuit found that there was a sufficient agency relationship between the parent and the subsidiary, the service issue would have been simpler: Under Schlunk, the plaintiff simply had to serve the subsidiary as the agent for the parent. Such service would be valid for U.S. jurisdictional purposes. However, given the stance of the German courts, one wonders whether the German courts would have enforced an American judgment against the parent.

Additionally, the question remains whether the subsidiary remains the agent for service even if its contacts cannot be imputed to the parent for personal jurisdiction purposes. Even if so, however, plaintiffs seeking to avoid the difficulties of service that the plaintiffs faced in Bauman need to think twice: even if the service is deemed valid, will the foreign court enforce the judgment if it believes that service should have been made under the Hague Convention? In other words, plaintiffs should not be penny-wise and pound foolish.

Dissent. The dissenting judge characterized the majority's opinion as formulating "a stringent new test" for determining whether an agency relationship exists for the purposes of establishing personal jurisdiction. "Although the majority's goal of providing some clarity to our rather muddled case law on the subject is laudable, the test it imposes goes too far, requiring a much stronger relationship between parent and subsidiary than is necessary or desirable. The result is to shield foreign corporations from actions in American courts-although they have structured their affairs so as to reap vast profits from American markets-and to deprive plaintiffs, including those who allege grave human rights abuses, of access to justice."

The dissent argued that the majority had conflated two tests. Contacts of a subsidiary may be imputed to the parent if one is the "alter ego" of the other, and this test is predicated on a showing of control. The agency test, by contrast, is predicated on a showing of the special importance of the services performed by the subsidiary; that is, that the services are sufficiently important to the parent that it would undertake those duties if it did not have a subsidiary to perform them. "The majority's 'pervasive and continual' control standard compounds this confusion by conflating the alter ego and agency tests, with the result that it is difficult to conceive of a situation in which the subsidiary would be the agent of its parent and not the alter ego."

The dissent agreed that parental control should play some role, but when determining whether personal jurisdiction exists it should be a secondary one. The dissent explained that although control is a traditional element of agency under common law principles, even at common law, agents exercise a considerable amount of discretion in performing their functions. Not only is pervasive and continual control not a requirement, according to the dissent, at common law, the principal need not exercise control at all in order to preserve an agency relationship. Rather, the only relevant inquiry is whether the principal has the right to control.

The level of control required by the majority, the dissent said, was excessive even for purposes of considering liability under an agency theory, while the test for jurisdictional purposes should be less stringent. Jurisdictional tests are really shorthand devices for defining what constitutes "fair play and substantial justice." "Fairness is not well served in such cases by a stringent test based on a narrow, overly formalistic conception of day-to-day corporate control. . . . Our inquiry should be flexible enough to allow us to determine, on the basis of corporate realities rather than formalistic legal rules, whether it is fair to bring a parent company into court in the United States."

The dissent concluded that, under this more flexible approach, the degree of control the parent exercised over the subsidiary was more than sufficient for the purposes of establishing personal jurisdiction. The parent was involved in, and had the power to exert control over, key aspects of the U.S. subsidiary's operations.

The dissent also disagreed with the majority's formulation of the "sufficient importance" test for agency jurisdiction. "The law does not require that the parent would undertake to perform the services if they were no longer to be performed by a subsidiary. Rather the question is whether these important services would be performed by a representative if the company did not perform them itself." Because the services performed by the U.S. subsidiary were sufficiently important to the parent that it would undertake to perform them through other means if the subsidiary did not exist (whether through a non-subsidiary distributor or by using its own personnel) the agency test had been met. Thus, the majority's reliance on the fact that the parent had previously used independent distributors was irrelevant.

The dissent concluded that the parent had the necessary contacts with the forum to support personal jurisdiction because of the agency relationship, and that the exercise of jurisdiction was entirely reasonable and consistent with due process. "I would not have dismissed Bauman's claims for want of personal jurisdiction over DCAG. The majority's overly stringent test for agency in this context erroneously allows foreign corporations that benefit tremendously from American markets to evade judicial process through creative corporate structuring. It denies the plaintiffs, out of hand, a judicial forum and the opportunity to seek redress of grievous wrongs. There is a vast disconnect between the majority's decision today and the foundational principles of fair play and due process that underlie our personal jurisdiction doctrine. For these reasons, I dissent."

Comment. The dissent makes compelling points. One might argue that it is inefficient to separate the idea of agency in the jurisdictional context from the liability context. In other words, what good does it do the plaintiff if it can exercise jurisdiction in a U.S. court, but then cannot use agency to prove liability? There are several responses: First, in the context of a case like Bauman, the plaintiffs do not need to show an agency relationship to prove liability under the ATS. Second, as the dissent points out, in an increasingly complex and globalized economy, corporations such as the parent reap enormous profits from the sale of their goods in the United States, achieved through the use of distributors, frequently in the form of subsidiaries. Like many other multinational companies that organize their corporate structure and acquire subsidiaries for the sole purpose of obtaining a maximal benefit from the American market, the parent here earned 45% of its annual revenue from its sales in the United States, and 2.4% of its total sales in 2004 were in California.

Accordingly, given these realities, the dissent is correct to fault the majority's over-emphasis on control. Rather, given that the question is whether there is personal jurisdiction over the parent, the inquiry should be on whether it is fair to bring a parent company into court in the United States. As the dissent suggested, a layperson likely would think it absurd that our courts could not obtain jurisdiction over a billion dollar multinational which is exploiting the critical American markets. "The law ignores the common sense of a situation at the peril of becoming irrelevant as an institution."

RELATED LINKS: For further information, see Moore's Federal Practice
 ■ 16 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) " 108.41

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

30 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Reasonableness Std. for ESI: Rabiej on Bellinger v. Astrue Comm'r of Soc. Sec.

2009 Emerging Issues 4726

Reasonableness Std. for ESI: Rabiej on Bellinger v. Astrue Comm'r of Soc. Sec.

By John K. Rabiej

December 15, 2009

SUMMARY: Legal treatises, e-discovery instructional materials, and court discovery protocols provide extensive information on the potential locations of ESI, search techniques to ferret out all relevant ESI, and ESI production options. Why shouldn't a party be able to rely on these resources as a template for its discovery requests? Bellinger v. Astrue, Comm'r of Soc. Sec., offers an instructive decision highlighting some of the relevant considerations.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: INTRODUCTION: One of the many problems with the discovery of electronically stored information (ESI) is that it can be stored in many different places, which makes preserving it in all locations difficult and conversely susceptible to very broad discovery requests. For example, ESI that is located originally in an employee's personal computer may only be a starting point for a discovery search. The same ESI may have transmigrated into the company's network server, the company's back-up server, other employees' computers as an email, the employee's personal lap-top computer, personal data devices, like flash drives, and a host of other exotic places. Legal treatises, ESI standards developed by authoritative groups, and even some courts' local rules and discovery protocols catalogue in excruciating detail all the potential places where ESI may reside.

Lawyers are constantly warned to take affirmative steps as part of their professional responsibilities to safeguard and preserve relevant ESI in all places where it is located, and careful lawyers are urged to leave no stone unturned in ferreting out relevant ESI in all potential sites. The dual responsibilities require lawyers to make difficult judgment calls advising clients on what steps must be taken to preserve relevant ESI and how far they can force the other party to search all potential ESI sites.

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provide some guidance and protection. Rule 26(b)(2)(B) & (C) lay out familiar cost-benefit factors that limit the scope of discovery, and Rule 37(e) sets out a limited safe harbor for the routine destruction of ESI. But the provisions of these rules are subject to court interpretation, and are rendered after the fact, which gives the lawyers little comfort in making their initial judgment calls.

FACTS OF THE CASE: In Bellinger v. Astrue, Comm'r of Soc. Sec., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 71727 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 14, 2009), the plaintiff claimed that the defendant Social Security Administration discriminated against her because of her gender by promoting two less qualified males to Grade-13 positions instead of her. She filed a Title VII complaint and moved to compel answers to interrogatories requesting certain ESI information.

The interrogatories contained questions about ESI that are typically suggested in popular legal treatises and instructional materials. One set of interrogatories requested the identity and location of all computers, network servers, hard drives, mainframe storage media, backup tapes, disks, and every other type of storage medium used by five employee custodians during a nine-year period. In addition, the interrogatories requested detailed information about the ESI that was identified by the defendant, including the make-up of the records (type of documents, number of documents, dates, addresses, and subjects), each form of backup, the formatting of each data, the protocol followed to preserve the integrity of the data and prevent its deletion, the effect, if any, of any litigation hold in protecting against possible deletion, and any modifications or deletions to the data and, if so, by whom and when. A later interrogatory went further and requested information about the dates of use for each software and hardware identified, brand and version number of the network operating system in use, including the hardware server used for email system and all word processing documents, quantity and configuration of the network servers and work stations, identity of the person responsible for the operation, maintenance, expansion and upkeep of each network identified, the programs used to backup each user's email, and manner of backup for each network.

The court denied the plaintiff's motion to compel answers to the interrogatories because the burden was heavy and the likely benefit of the discovery slight. Substantial discovery had been provided earlier to the plaintiff consisting of about 10,000 documents, and the plaintiff failed to show any prejudice as a result of the defendant's failure to respond fully to the interrogatories. The court reprimanded the lawyers for the "manner in which counsel have litigated their repeated disagreements over the proper scope of discovery."

BOILERPLATE ESI DISCOVERY REQUESTS: The plaintiff in Bellinger argued that she was entitled to discovery of the requested information about ESI. Similar types of information are commonly found in model forms and interrogatories published in many legal treatises and standard ESI instructional materials. In fact, several courts have promulgated protocols governing ESI discovery, which contain similar, if not more comprehensive, informational ESI laundry lists. Perhaps the most prominent among the court protocols is the District of Maryland's Suggested Protocol for Discovery of Electronically Stored Information (www.mdd.uscourts.gov/news/news/ESIProtocol.pdf).

The enumeration of potential locations of ESI and descriptions of its creation, storage, and use in standard treatises and instructional materials were never intended to serve as model interrogatories for use in all cases. As in many other areas of discovery dispute, the scope of discovery must be calibrated under a reasonableness standard in light of all the circumstances in a particular case. (See 2009 Emerging Issues 4250, Rabiej, Reasonableness Standard Governing Discovery Obligations and Preservation Duty.)

The preamble to Maryland's Suggested ESI Discovery Protocol lists factors to be considered when applying this reasonableness standard: "While this Protocol is intended to provide the parties with a comprehensive framework to address and resolve a wide range of ESI issues, it is not intended to be an inflexible checklist. The Court expects that the parties will consider the nature of the claim, the amount in controversy, agreements of the parties, the relative ability of the parties to conduct discovery of ESI, and such other factors as may be relevant under the circumstances."

Determining what ESI must be preserved and how much effort should be expended in searching for relevant ESI under an objective reasonableness standard requires a certain degree of subjectivity and leaves a party vulnerable to second guessing of its decisions. Cautious lawyers may preserve or seek discovery of too much ESI, as happened in Bellinger. Absent a court order, however, there is only one way to be confident that a party's planned ESI preservation measures or a party's search for ESI are reasonable. That degree of confidence can only be attained when the parties discuss and agree among themselves what preservation and search measures are appropriate before discovery actually commences. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure establishes an ESI discovery framework that envisions such mutual cooperation and consultation between the parties in accordance with Rule 26(f) conferences.

One of the primary purposes that legal treatises, instructional materials, and court ESI discovery protocols provide extensive information on the potential locations of ESI and on search and production techniques is to facilitate discussions at a Rule 26(f) conference. These resources are designed to provide a comprehensive list that parties should consider during discovery, but should not necessarily pursue in every case. Parties, like the plaintiff in Bellinger, should not assume that the cataloguing of all potential ESI locations and searching techniques in these informational resources necessarily entitles the parties in every case to the full array of discovery catalogued in these resources. The extent is tempered by a reasonableness standard under all the circumstances of a case.

Notwithstanding Bellinger, there is evidence that lawyers are taking reasonable approaches to address and handle these difficult ESI issues at pretrial discussions. The Federal Judicial Center (FJC), the research and educational arm of the federal judiciary, issued a preliminary report of a national, case-based Civil Rules survey in October 2009. (See 2009 Emerging Issues 4673, Rabiej, Litigation Costs and Delay Surveys Shed Light on E-Discovery Practices.) It found that disputes over ESI were relatively uncommon, with about 75 percent of the respondents reporting no such disputes in their case. The moderate rate of ESI discovery disputes may be attributable in part to pretrial discussion of these matters. More than 30 percent of the survey respondents said that they discussed e-discovery issues at a discovery planning conference, which were held in about 80 percent of the cases in which some discovery was requested. In addition to considering these issues at discovery planning conferences, parties likely rely on informal exchanges of discoverable information, which may also explain the moderate rate of e-discovery disputes. Cooperation between parties is most likely in cases when both parties have discoverable ESI. Reaching an agreement in cases when only one side possesses the bulk of discoverable ESI may be more challenging.

LESSON: There is also a concern that many lawyers may still be unaware of the ESI implications and the potential for severe consequences, and that the moderate rate of ESI disputes may result more from this neglect than from conscious deliberations. The lesson in all cases is that parties should talk about ESI discovery issues as early in the case as possible to limit unnecessary discovery preservation and searching and to seek judicial intervention when necessary to resolve any conflicts.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004. The views expressed in the commentary represent Mr. Rabiej's opinions and do not necessarily reflect the views of the rules committees.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

31 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Litigation Costs and Delay Surveys Shed Light on E-Discovery Practices

2009 Emerging Issues 4673

Litigation Costs and Delay Surveys Shed Light on E-Discovery Practices

By John K. Rabiej

December 3, 2009

SUMMARY: Two recent surveys address the effects of e-discovery on litigation delay and costs. One survey paints an alarming picture of rising costs and growing disenchantment with the litigation process in general and discovery in particular. The other survey acknowledges problems with the litigation process, including e-discovery, but concludes with a positive overall assessment. What did these surveys find and can the findings be reconciled?

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: INTRODUCTION

The American College of Trial Lawyers Task Force on Discovery (ACTL) and the Denver-based Institute for the Advancement of the American Legal System (IAALS) collaborated on a joint project exploring problems with litigation and discovery. They issued an interim report on August 1, 2008, that contained the results of an extensive survey of American College members. A follow-up final report, which analyzed the survey results in the interim report, was issued on March 11, 2009, and revised on April 15, 2009. The reports can be found at www.actl.com. The Federal Judicial Center (FJC), the research and educational arm of the federal judiciary, issued a preliminary report of a national, case-based Civil Rules survey in October 2009. The report can be found at www.fjc.gov. The survey is similar to an earlier survey conducted by the FJC in 1997.

RESULTS OF AMERICAN COLLEGE AND ADVANCEMENT OF AMERICAN LEGAL SYSTEM INSTITUTE SURVEY.

ACTL and IAALS analyzed survey responses to questions dealing with many aspects of civil litigation from 1,494 American College of Trial Lawyer members. A majority of the responses indicated that: (1) though the civil justice system is not broken, it is in need of serious repair; (2) the discovery system is, in fact, broken; (3) judges should take more active control of litigation from the beginning; and (4) local rules are routinely described as "traps for the unwary."

The report's discussion of discovery noted that about 85% of the respondents believed that litigation, in general, and discovery, in particular, was too expensive. Sixty-four percent of the respondents said that law firms encouraged more discovery than was necessary. And nearly half (45%) of the respondents believed that discovery abuse occurred in almost every case. A majority (53%) of the respondents agreed that the effect of all the discovery-rule changes since 1976 did not reduce discovery abuse. An overwhelming majority of the respondents (87%) agreed that electronic discovery was too costly and 76% of the respondents noted that judges do not understand e-discovery issues well.

The survey contained specific questions addressing e-discovery issues. Nearly 60% of the respondents reported litigating a case that involved e-discovery. Though 66% of the respondents believed that the 2006 e-discovery rule amendments improved the efficiency and effectiveness of e-discovery, 87% of the respondents concluded nonetheless that e-discovery increased litigation costs. More than 75% of the respondents said that discovery costs, as a percentage of total litigation expenses, had increased disproportionately because of e-discovery. The use of outside vendors to facilitate e-discovery was viewed by 71% of the respondents as raising costs without providing commensurate value to the client. And 63% of the respondents claimed that e-discovery was being abused by counsel.

RESULTS OF FEDERAL JUDICIAL CENTER SURVEY.

Unlike the ACTL/IAALS survey, which questioned lawyers about their general experiences in federal court, the Federal Judicial Center survey questioned lawyers about their experiences in a specific case that they had recently completed. The FJC identified a sample of 3,550 civil cases closed in federal courts in the last quarter of 2008 and contacted lawyers involved in those cases. The FJC sent a survey to both plaintiff and defense attorneys asking detailed questions about their case and their litigation experience in it. They received responses from 2,690 lawyers, consisting of 836 lawyers representing primarily plaintiffs, 1,159 lawyers representing primarily defendants, and 634 lawyers representing both plaintiffs and defendants. The respondents represented a wide cross section of small and large law firms.

More than 30% of the respondents said that they discussed e-discovery issues at discovery planning conferences, which were held in about 80% of the cases in which some discovery was requested. More than half of the respondents (57%) said that they did not discuss electronically stored information (ESI) issues at the discovery planning conference. When ESI issues were discussed at discovery planning conferences, the most common issues discussed were:

- legitimacy of routine practices governing ESI retention (46% of plaintiff's lawyers and 55% of defendant lawyers);
- ESI preservation issues (36% of plaintiff's lawyers and 37% of defendant's lawyers);
- ESI production issues (34% of plaintiff's lawyers and 36% of defendant's lawyers);
- limiting scope of ESI discovery (32% of plaintiff's lawyers and 42% of defendant's lawyers);
- determining whether ESI was reasonably accessible (22% of plaintiff's lawyers and 15% of defendant's lawyers);
- ESI search methods, including key word searches (17% of plaintiff's lawyers and 19% of defendant's lawyers);
- phased ESI discovery (12% of plaintiff's lawyers and 10% of defendant's lawyers);
- culling techniques (8% of plaintiff's lawyers and 11% of defendant's lawyers), and
- ESI sampling (4% of plaintiff's lawyers and 6% of defendant's lawyers);

Disputes over ESI were not common (72% of plaintiff lawyers and 78% of defendant lawyers reported no disputes). (This result compares with 48% of the lawyers who reported discovery problems in the 1997 FJC study -- the data in that study was not broken down further to specifically identify e-discovery issues.) In the minority of cases in which an ESI dispute was reported, the most common disputes involved issues about:

- the burden of production, arising in 10% (reported by plaintiffs) and 12% (reported by defendants) of the cases;
- the specific production format, arising in 11% (reported by plaintiffs) and 7% (reported defendants) of the cases;
- challenges that the production format was not reasonably usable, arising in 9% (reported by plaintiffs) and 4% (reported by defendants) of the cases;
- challenges that ESI was not reasonably accessible, arising in 9% (reported by plaintiffs) and 8% (reported by defendants) of the cases; and
- spoliation claims, arising in 8% (reported by plaintiffs) and 5% (reported by defendants) of the cases.

In cases with one or more reported discovery event, 63% of lawyers representing plaintiffs said that their client did not place a "litigation freeze," while 37% of the lawyers representing defendants said that their client did not place a litigation freeze in the case. ESI was used most commonly to prepare and depose witnesses, interview client's employees, and evaluate settlement possibilities.

ESI production was requested in 36% of the cases by lawyers representing plaintiffs and in 39% of the cases by lawyers representing defendants. In the cases in which ESI production was requested, the study gives a rich account of the types of issues related to ESI production that were reported by plaintiff's and defendant's lawyers, including the following:

- ESI production format issues, e.g., TIFF, PDF, native format (51% of plaintiff's lawyers and 46% of defendant's lawyers);
- privileged ESI material (38% of plaintiff's lawyers and 36% of defendant's lawyers);
- type of media production, e.g., DVD, hard drive (32% of plaintiff's lawyers and 36% of defendant's lawyers);
- privilege log issues (29% of plaintiff's lawyers and 26% of defendant's lawyers);
- indexing or organizing production of ESI (14% of plaintiff's lawyers and 13% of defendant's lawyers);
- claw-back agreements (13% of plaintiff's lawyers and 17% of defendant's lawyers);
- production of metadata (11% of plaintiff's lawyers and 13% of defendant's lawyers);
- load files (11% of plaintiff's lawyers and 9% of defendant's lawyers); and
- quick-peek agreements (3% of plaintiff's lawyers and 2% of defendant's lawyers).

More than 60% of the respondents reported that discovery generated the right amount of information and more than half said that discovery costs were the right amount. A majority of the respondents said that they were able to reduce discovery costs and burdens by cooperating with opposing counsel. A majority of the respondents also concluded that the discovery costs had no effect on the likelihood of settlement.

The survey asked several questions about total litigation costs, which included discovery costs and attorney fees. The median total litigation cost was $15,000 for plaintiffs and $20,000 for defendants. The costs for plaintiffs ranged from $1,600 at the 10th percentile to $280,000 at the 95th percentile. The costs for defendants ranged from $5,000 at the 10th percentile to $300,000 at the 95th percentile. Median costs were higher in cases involving e-discovery.

The median estimate of the percentage of total litigation costs spent on all discovery was 20% for plaintiffs and 27% for defendants (compared with the results of the 1997 FJC study, which found that discovery expenses represented 50% of litigation expenses). E-discovery costs were 5% of total discovery costs at the median for plaintiff's lawyers and 10% at the median for defendant's lawyers. The median estimate of the stakes for plaintiffs was $160,000, ranging from $15,000 at the 10th percentile to nearly $4 million at the 95th percentile. The median estimate of the defendant's stakes was $200,000, ranging from $15,000 at the 10th percentile to $5 million at the 95th percentile. Plaintiff's lawyers spent 1.6% of the estimated stakes on discovery, including attorney fees, while defendant lawyers spent 3.3%. This last result is comparable to the results of the 1997 FJC study, which reported that discovery expenses represented about 3% of the amount at stake in the litigation.

More than 66% of the respondents agreed with the statement that "the procedures employed in the federal courts are generally fair," and a majority disagreed with the statement that "discovery is abused in almost every case in federal court." Plaintiff attorneys tended to disagree and defendant lawyers tended to agree with the statement that rules should be revised to limit electronic discovery.

RECONCILING THE RESULTS OF THE TWO SURVEYS

The results of the ACTL/IAALS survey raise serious concerns about the entire litigation process in federal courts and call for fundamental reforms. In fact, the IAALS is promoting such a fundamental reform movement based on the survey's results. On the other hand, the results of the FJC survey paint a more benign picture, supporting, at most, modest reform. Putting aside the effect of the differences in how questions were phrased in the two studies, the surveys' results appear to give inconsistent messages, making it difficult for rulemakers to act.

One possible explanation for the apparent inconsistencies is that the ACTL/IAALS survey asked lawyers about their general experience with litigation in the federal courts, while the FJC asked lawyers about a specific case. In recalling past experiences of many cases, the respondents in the ACTL/IAALS survey might have unconsciously focused on particular events or cases that colored their overall assessment. That phenomenon might explain some of the differences in the results found in the surveys.

An alternative, and more likely, explanation of the different results is suggested in one of the 1997 FJC survey findings. That survey found that "high levels of discovery problems and high expenses were more likely to occur in cases with high stakes, high levels of contentiousness, high levels of complexity, or high volume of discovery." The lawyers surveyed in the ACTL/IAALS study consist of some of the most prominent litigation lawyers in the country. Many of the lawyers routinely are involved in high-stakes cases, in the type of cases that the 1997 FJC survey identified as having the most problems. Conversely, the FJC survey involved lawyers dealing with cases of all stripes, including big and small cases, where e-discovery disputes were less common. The FJC survey may have painted a more benign picture because the litigation process in these smaller cases may, in fact, be functioning more smoothly, as found in the 1997 FJC survey.

The results of both surveys are being carefully analyzed by federal rulemaking committees. It is possible that e-discovery concerns raised by the ACTL/IAALS survey are mostly limited to "big" cases, while e-discovery is working relatively well in "smaller" cases. If so, the focus of any rule changes should be on the problematic cases.

But why are e-discovery problems less likely in smaller cases? One of the findings of the 1997 FJC survey suggests an answer. That survey found that "independent of the rules, there was a considerable amount of informal exchange of discoverable information." Perhaps there is greater cooperation between lawyers in such cases. Or perhaps a large segment of the bar remains unaware of ESI, its potential uses, and dangers. How else to explain the significant percentage of lawyers who fail to place a litigation hold on ESI and risk claims of spoliation? See Green v. McClendon, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 71860, at *18 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 13, 2009) (case law cited for the proposition that failure to implement litigation hold amounts to gross negligence). Still another possibility is that lawyers in smaller cases make a cost-benefit analysis and decide to ignore the e-discovery rules' requirements. Whatever the answers are, the two surveys provide a trove of data, which will be scrutinized along with other data being gathered at the Duke Law School conference on litigation reform hosted by the Judicial Conference's Advisory Committee on Civil Rules in May 2010. In addition, the two surveys provide a good picture of the extent, issues, and costs of federal litigation, and useful insights into today's e-discovery practice.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004. The views expressed in the commentary represent Mr. Rabiej's opinions and do not necessarily reflect the views of the rules committees.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

32 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Fraudulent Joinder: Georgene Vairo on Schur v. L.A. Weight Loss Ctrs., Inc.

2009 Emerging Issues 4556

Fraudulent Joinder: Georgene Vairo on Schur v. L.A. Weight Loss Ctrs., Inc.

By Georgene Vairo

November 10, 2009

SUMMARY: Schur v. L.A. Weight Loss Ctrs., Inc. resolves the somewhat confusing interrelationship of the fraudulent joinder doctrine, Fed. R. Civ. P. 15, and the standard for when a court may permit the joinder of additional parties under 28 U.S.C. § 1447(e). The Seventh Circuit ruled that fraudulent joinder is a factor in determining whether to permit a post-removal amendment to add a non-diverse defendant, but it is not necessarily dispositive.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Summary. Schur v. L.A. Weight Loss Ctrs., Inc., 577 F.3d 752, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 18238 (7th Cir. Aug. 14, 2009), resolves the somewhat confusing interrelationship of the fraudulent joinder doctrine, Fed. R. Civ. P. 15, and the standard for when a court may permit the joinder of additional parties under 28 U.S.C. § 1447(e). The Seventh Circuit ruled that fraudulent joinder is a factor in determining whether to permit a post-removal amendment to add a non-diverse defendant, but it is not necessarily dispositive. Additionally, it joined the Fifth, Fourth and Eighth Circuit's approach to deciding whether to permit joinder under 28 U.S.C. § 1447(e).

Facts and Procedural History. An Illinois woman died of liver failure after participating in a program at a weight loss center. On behalf of her estate, her sister sued the center in Illinois state court. The center, which was incorporated in Delaware and had a principal place of business in Pennsylvania, removed the case to the Southern District of Illinois on the basis of diversity jurisdiction.

A little over a year later, a magistrate judge granted leave to amend the complaint under Rule 15 to add claims against three additional defendants, including two center employees, both of whom were Illinois citizens. The newly added defendants did not move to dismiss for failure to state a claim and the center did not object to or otherwise challenge the magistrate judge's order permitting joinder. At that time, apparently neither the magistrate judge, nor the defendants, realized that the joinder of the two Illinois defendants had destroyed complete diversity. The estate then moved to remand the case to state court because the addition of the two employees as defendants destroyed diversity jurisdiction.

Applying the fraudulent joinder doctrine, the district court found that the non-diverse defendants had been improperly joined. It therefore struck the amended complaint and denied the motion to remand. The district court eventually granted summary judgment for the defendants. The Seventh Circuit vacated the district court's orders striking the amended complaint and granting summary judgment and remanded to that court with instructions to remand the matter to the state court.

Severing the Gordian Knot: Was it Proper for the District Court to Review the Magistrate Judge's Remand Order? Before beginning its analysis, the Seventh Circuit had to untangle the procedural history of the case. The plaintiff argued that by the time it moved to remand the case, the magistrate judge's order permitting joinder was final and, therefore, the district court had no choice but to remand the case.

The Seventh Circuit disagreed, noting that there was no indication that the magistrate judge conducted the appropriate jurisdictional analysis before permitting joinder of the non-diverse parties, and that the district judge had not had an opportunity to rule on the propriety of joinder either. Under the circumstances, the district judge was permitted to reconsider the order granting leave to add the non-diverse parties.

Although the magistrate judge possessed the initial authority to grant Schur's motion to amend -- a non-dispositive pretrial matter, [28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1); Fed. R. Civ. P. 72(a); S.D. Ill. R. 72.1(a)], a magistrate judge's recommendation on a dispositive matter is not a final order, and the district judge makes the ultimate decision to adopt, reject, or modify it [28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1); Fed. R. Civ. P. 72(b)(3)]. Moreover, upon objection, the district judge must review the relevant part of the magistrate judge's decision, but the standard of review varies depending on whether the matter was dispositive. If there are no objections to the magistrate judge's action, the district judge may simply accept it. But, because the district judge remains the final authority in the case, he or she may reconsider sua sponte any matter determined by a magistrate judge [see, e.g., Allen v. Sybase, Inc., 468 F.3d 642, 658 (10th Cir. 2006) ("[A] party's failure to seek timely review does not strip a district court of its power to revisit the issue.")]. This is particularly true when the issue involves subject matter jurisdiction.

The twist in Schur is that the magistrate judge permitted joinder of nondiverse parties, potentially destroying the court's diversity jurisdiction. And, the defendant did not oppose the motion to amend, nor did it object to the magistrate judge's order permitting joinder. The jurisdictional issue arose only when Schur moved to remand the case to Illinois state court. The Seventh Circuit ruled that the defendant's failure to object to the magistrate judge's order did not divest the district court of the power to do so sua sponte. Most importantly, the record indicated that the magistrate judge engaged in no meaningful analysis. Schur's motion to amend stated the names of the nondiverse parties. But, it did not, as Rule 8(a)(1) requires, allege their citizenship. The magistrate judge held no hearing on the motion's merits and did not actually make a joinder determination, as required by § 1447(e). The defendant L.A. Weight Loss should have known the citizenship of its own employees and objected. However, by failing to do so, it lost its right to request that the district judge review the order. But, that did not prevent the district judge from addressing the jurisdictional issue sua sponte.

The Seventh Circuit noted that other courts of appeals have reached a similar conclusion, namely that when a district court was previously unaware that joinder would destroy diversity, it may reconsider its prior decision granting leave to amend a complaint [see, e.g., Bailey v. Bayer Crop Science L.P., 563 F.3d 302, 307 (8th Cir. 2009); Mayes v. Rapoport, 198 F.3d 457, 462 n.11 (4th Cir. 1999); Hensgens v. Deere & Co., 833 F.2d 1179, 1182 (5th Cir. 1987)]. The Seventh Circuit correctly reasoned that if a district judge may reconsider his or her own order permitting joinder because the judge did not recognize the jurisdictional implications of an order, the judge may certainly reconsider a similar order by a magistrate judge.

Comment. The jurisdiction problem in Schur arose because nobody paid attention to subject matter jurisdiction. The plaintiff did not allege the citizenship of the parties she sought to join; the defendant's notice of removal apparently ignored the citizenship of its own employees; and the magistrate judge, apparently as a routine matter, with no analysis of the propriety of joining two non-diverse parties, decided to permit the joinder. The defendants could have objected within 10 days [see Fed. R. Civ. P. 72], but they did not do so. Moreover, the district court judge could have reviewed the magistrate judge's order sua sponte [see S.D. Ill. R. 73.1(a)], but did not consider whether there was subject matter jurisdiction until the plaintiff moved to remand the case to state court, after the non-diverse parties had been joined.

In other words, courts have a duty to determine whether they have subject matter jurisdiction. And, when parties are proposed to be joined in diversity cases, the courts need to consider whether complete diversity will be destroyed. Article III requires a federal court to satisfy itself of its jurisdiction over the subject matter before it considers the merits of a case [see Ruhrgas AG v. Marathon Oil Co., 526 U.S. 574, 119 S. Ct. 1563, 143 L. Ed. 2d 760 (1999)].

Notwithstanding Caterpillar Inc. v. Lewis, 519 U.S. 61, 117 S. Ct. 467, 136 L. Ed. 2d 437 (1996), in which the Supreme Court held that a district court's error in failing to remand a case improperly removed is not fatal to the ensuing adjudication if federal jurisdictional requirements are met at the time judgment is entered, the rule remains that a district court must remain vigilant regarding the basis for its subject matter jurisdiction. Indeed, in Grupo Dataflux v. Atlas Global Group, L.P., 541 U.S. 567, 124 S. Ct. 1920, 158 L. Ed. 2d 866 (2004), the Supreme Court again made clear that subject matter jurisdiction can not be taken lightly, and in Steel Co. v. Citizens for Better Environment, 523 U.S. 83, 118 S. Ct. 1003, 140 L. Ed. 2d 210 (1998), the Court adhered to the rule that a federal court may not hypothesize subject-matter jurisdiction for the purpose of deciding the merits. Recalling "a long and venerable line of our cases," Steel Co. reiterated that: "The requirement that jurisdiction be established as a threshold matter . . . is 'inflexible and without exception,'" [see 523 U.S. at 94-95] for "jurisdiction is power to declare the law," and "'without jurisdiction the court cannot proceed at all in any cause,'" [see 523 U.S. at 94]. In other words: we -- the court and the parties -- all need to pay attention to subject matter jurisdiction.

Two Options When Joinder Would Destroy Diversity. The Seventh Circuit then turned from one procedural quagmire to the next: whether the district judge, vested with authority to review the magistrate judge's decision, properly conducted the inquiry. If one seeks to amend to add parties when complete diversity might be an issue, 28 U.S.C. § 1447(e) should be considered, as well as Fed. R. Civ. P. 15. Perhaps the magistrate judge was correct to allow the amended complaint if the case had not been removed. But, because it had been removed, the court needed to consider § 1447(e). Section 1447(e) is designed to provide the court with only two options when a plaintiff seeks to amend a complaint that may destroy complete diversity: (1) deny joinder, or (2) permit joinder and remand the action to state court.

In deciding whether to permit joinder, the court should balance the equities, because the necessary result of permitting the joinder will be a remand to state court. The Seventh Circuit adopted the following list of factors for consideration in making the decision: (1) the plaintiff's motive for seeking joinder, particularly whether the purpose is to defeat federal jurisdiction; (2) the timeliness of the request to amend; (3) whether the plaintiff would be significantly injured if joinder were not allowed; and (4) any other relevant equitable considerations. The court expressly followed the approach of the Fourth, Fifth and Eighth Circuits [see Bailey v. Bayer CropScience L.P., 563 F.3d 302, 309 (8th Cir. 2009); Mayes v. Rapoport, 198 F.3d 457, 462 (4th Cir. 1999); Hensgens v. Deere & Co., 833 F.2d 1179, 1182 (5th Cir. 1987)].

Fraudulent Joinder Is Not Necessarily Dispositive in Post-Removal Context. A plaintiff typically may choose its own forum, but it may not join a nondiverse defendant simply to destroy diversity jurisdiction. [Schwartz v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 174 F.3d 875, 878 (7th Cir. 1999); Gottlieb v. Westin Hotel Co., 990 F.2d 323, 327 (7th Cir. 1993)]. The "fraudulent joinder" doctrine thus permits a district court "to disregard, for jurisdictional purposes, the citizenship of certain nondiverse defendants, assume jurisdiction over a case, dismiss the nondiverse defendants, and thereby retain jurisdiction" [see Mayes v. Rapoport, 198 F.3d 457, 461 (4th Cir. 1999) (citing Cobb v. Delta Exports, Inc., 186 F.3d 675, 677-678 (5th Cir. 1999))]. Because the district court had vacated the remand order because the plaintiff had "fraudulently joined" the additional defendants, the Seventh Circuit considered the role of the fraudulent joinder doctrine after a case has been removed. The court explained that the doctrine permits a district court to retain jurisdiction by disregarding, for jurisdictional purposes, the citizenship of certain non-diverse defendants, assuming jurisdiction over a case, and dismissing the non-diverse defendants. However, it is not clear how or whether the doctrine applies to post-removal joinder.

Some courts have held that the doctrine has no effect once the district court actually has jurisdiction, including after the case has been removed. For example, in a case in which the district court had the opportunity in the first instance to determine whether post-removal joinder was appropriate, the Fifth Circuit held that once the court permitted joinder of non-diverse defendants, it lost subject matter jurisdiction and had no power even to consider whether the defendants were fraudulently joined [Cobb v. Delta Exports, Inc., 186 F.3d 675, 678 (5th Cir. 1999)]. In a case in which the plaintiff added the non-diverse defendant after removal without court approval, because the original defendants had not yet answered, the Fourth Circuit held that the fraudulent joinder doctrine is not directly applicable after removal, but that it can be a factor in the district court's determination of the propriety of joinder under 28 U.S.C. § 1447(e) [Mayes v. Rapoport, 198 F.3d 457, 463 (4th Cir. 1999)]. The Seventh Circuit agreed with this approach, particularly with respect to cases in which the district judge did not have an opportunity to analyze the propriety of joining non-diverse defendants when the plaintiff amended the complaint.

Comment. The Seventh Circuit's approach is a sensible balance. Usually, when a plaintiff wants to amend the complaint, Fed. R. Civ. P. 15 is the operative rule. And, the standard for allowing the amendment is a liberal one -- leave to amend should be freely granted when justice so requires. When a case is commenced in federal court, that makes sense. When a case is removed to federal court, however, the equation changes a bit. By reminding courts that they must look to § 1447(e), which tells a district court what to do if a plaintiff seeks to add nondiverse parties, the Seventh Circuit ensures that the district court will balance the factors that the courts are applying when deciding whether to allow the joinder. Unfortunately for plaintiffs seeking a remand, the test enumerated by the Fourth, Fifth and Eighth Circuits, which the Seventh joins, may load the deck too far in the opposite direction because, among other things, it allows the district court to divine the plaintiff's motive for attempting to join the nondiverse parties.

However, by incorporating the fraudulent joinder doctrine as part of the balance, the Seventh Circuit actually helps to push the pendulum back towards the plaintiff. The bar is set quite high, as discussed below, for the defendant in persuading a court that a plaintiff is seeking to fraudulently join a party to destroy subject matter jurisdiction. To the extent that a defendant cannot prove that the standard for fraudulent joinder is met, it will be easier for the plaintiff to counter that its motive for joining the nondiverse party is a proper one -- i.e., to obtain a remedy.

Fraudulent Joinder Doctrine Misapplied by District Court. Next, the Seventh Circuit considered whether the district court properly applied the fraudulent joinder doctrine. The Seventh Circuit explained that a non-diverse defendant is not fraudulently joined if there is any reasonable possibility the plaintiff could prevail against the defendant under state law. The district court had concluded that the plaintiff could not prevail against the non-diverse defendants because the employer would be vicariously liable for their conduct and, therefore, they could not be held individually liable. This was incorrect. Under Illinois law, an employee may be individually liable for his or her own conduct even if the employer is also vicariously liable for that conduct. The Seventh Circuit concluded that the plaintiff sufficiently alleged that the defendants owed a duty to the decedent that was independent of the duties they owed to their employer. Therefore, the court could not conclude that the plaintiff had no reasonable possibility of success against the non-diverse defendants.

Motion To Amend Was Timely. Finally, the Seventh Circuit considered the timeliness of the plaintiff's motion to amend the complaint. The district judge had found that the timing of the motion weighed against granting it because the plaintiff knew the identity of the non-diverse defendants almost a year before she sought to join them. The Seventh Circuit disagreed, reasoning that the plaintiff did not learn of these defendants' roles in the events leading to the decedent's death until she obtained the center's discovery responses. She sought to amend the complaint to join the defendants within two months of learning of their roles, which actually supports her position rather than detracts from it.

Conclusion. The Seventh Circuit opinion is important because it:

(1) clarifies that a magistrate judge's ruling with subject matter jurisdiction implications is reviewable by the district court sua sponte;

(2) emphasizes that the operative rule when considering the joinder of nondiverse parties is 28 U.S.C. § 1447(e), and not the standard for allowing amended pleadings under Fed. R. Civ. P. 15;

(3) rules that § 1447(e) allows a district court only two choices -- allow the amended pleading and remand, or refuse to allow the amended pleading;

(4) requires a balancing of the plaintiff's motive for seeking joinder, specifically whether the purpose is to defeat federal jurisdiction, and the timeliness of the request to amend, with whether the plaintiff would be significantly injured if joinder were not allowed, and any other relevant equitable considerations;

(5) permits a proper consideration of the fraudulent joinder doctrine, which is not directly applicable to post-removal joinder.

The Seventh Circuit found that the district court improperly applied the fraudulent joinder doctrine by errantly concluding that Illinois law did not support at least some of the plaintiff's claims against the non-diverse defendants; and it also wrongly concluded that the motion to amend was untimely. As a result, the district judge improperly struck the second amended complaint and denied remand. The district court lacked jurisdiction to grant summary judgment and should have remanded the case to Illinois state court.

RELATED LINKS: For more information see Moore's Federal Practice

■ 16 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) 107.14[2][c][iv][D]

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

33 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Vairo on the Aftermath of Iqbal: Brooks v. Ross and Moss v. U.S. Secret Serv.

2009 Emerging Issues 4557

Georgene Vairo on the Aftermath of Iqbal: Brooks v. Ross and Moss v. U.S. Secret Serv

By Georgene Vairo

November 10, 2009

SUMMARY: Brooks v. Ross and Moss v. U.S. Secret Serv. are two cases that have been decided since the U.S. Supreme Court rendered its landmark pleading decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal. In this Emerging Issues Analysis Georgene Vairo, professor and author, takes a look at both of these recent cases and how the different Circuit courts interpreted Iqbal.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Summary. Brooks v. Ross, 578 F.3d 574, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 18711 (7th Cir. Aug. 20, 2009), and Moss v. U.S. Secret Serv., 572 F.3d 962, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 15694 (9th Cir. July 16, 2009), are two of thousands of cases that have been decided since the United States Supreme rendered its landmark pleading decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, ___ U.S. ___, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009). In Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007), the Supreme Court announced a new "plausibility" standard for pleading in the context of an antitrust case. And, it "retired" the venerable old Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 78 S. Ct. 99, 2 L.Ed.2d 80 (1957), "no set of facts" standard and set out a more stringent standard for evaluating the sufficiency of a complaint.

This term, Iqbal picked up where Twombly left off: the Supreme Court held that in deciding a motion to dismiss a complaint, a district court need not accept as true assertions that are no more than recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements. Rather, only well-pleaded factual allegations are entitled to an assumption of veracity, and a district court should then determine whether such allegations plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief. The 5-4 opinion significantly raised the Supreme Court's "plausibility" pleading standard that it had announced in Twombly, and expressly announced that the new standards apply in all civil cases, not simply antitrust cases.

In Brooks, the Seventh Circuit interpreted Ashcroft v. Iqbal as consistent with a liberal notice-pleading regime. Yet, it took a very strict look at the plaintiff's allegations and, relying on Iqbal, affirmed the dismissal of the civil rights claims alleged. In Moss, on the other hand, the Ninth Circuit, after reviewing the "plausibility" standard developed by the Supreme Court in Twombly and in Iqbal, concluded that the plaintiffs had not alleged a plausible claim of discrimination in violation of the First Amendment. However, it afforded the plaintiffs the opportunity to replead. Taken together, these decisions show that Iqbal is having a rather dramatic impact on plaintiffs' attorneys, significantly raising the bar as to what is expected from plaintiffs who hope to defeat a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim.

Although the Seventh Circuit is technically correct that notice pleading remains the rule -- Rule 8 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure has not been amended -- as a practical matter, these cases show that notice pleading is all but dead.

Brooks Background and Procedural History. A member of the Illinois Prison Review Board was indicted for official misconduct and wire fraud in connection with a parole hearing. He was acquitted, and later filed the present lawsuit alleging a variety of claims against various state employees who were involved in the proceedings against him. The district court dismissed all the claims for failure to state a claim.

The Seventh Circuit ruled that some of the plaintiff's claims were properly dismissed because they were barred by the statute of limitations. Other claims were barred by sovereign immunity under state law. This left only a § 1983 due process claim.

The primary ground on which the district court had dismissed the § 1983 claim was that the plaintiff had failed to plead personal involvement, as his complaint stated that "one or more of the Defendants" had engaged in certain acts or deprived him of his constitutional rights. The district court was correct, the Seventh Circuit said, that this language did not adequately connect specific defendants to illegal acts. Some parts of the complaint, however, did specify a particular defendant as having engaged in certain acts. The question before the court of appeals, then, was whether these factual allegations were sufficient to provide notice to the defendants of the plaintiff's claims.

Seventh Circuit's Take on Pleading Standards After Twombly and Iqbal. The Seventh Circuit began by stating that Rule 8 provides that a complaint must contain "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." The Seventh Circuit then stated the common understanding of Rule 8: that it reflects a liberal notice-pleading regime, intended to focus litigation on the merits of a claim rather than on technicalities that might keep plaintiffs out of court [citing Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 514, 122 S. Ct. 992, 152 L. Ed. 2d 1 (2002)].

Having stated the common understanding of what Rule 8 means, the Seventh Circuit then turned to the recent landmark Supreme Court pleading cases. Its purpose here was to explain how these decisions have affected the way that courts and litigators must now approach pleading practice. First, the court discussed Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly [550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007)], noting the "plausibility" standard the Court announced in the case. In Twombly, the Supreme Court had concluded that plaintiffs' "[f]actual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level." The claim need not be probable, but must be "plausible." Thus, the standard calls for the pleader to allege enough facts to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence supporting the plaintiff's allegations.

Looking to Erickson v. Pardus [551 U.S. 89, 93, 127 S. Ct. 2197, 167 L. Ed. 2d 1081 (2007)], a third recent Supreme Court pleading case, the Seventh Circuit explained that Twombly did not intend to repudiate the general notice-pleading regime of Rule 8. The Seventh Circuit noted that two weeks after Twombly, in Erickson, the Supreme Court had reiterated that "[s]pecific facts are not necessary; the statement need only give the defendant fair notice of what the . . . claim is and the grounds upon which it rests." The Seventh Circuit took Twombly and Erickson together to mean that "at some point the factual detail in a complaint may be so sketchy that the complaint does not provide the type of notice of the claim to which the defendant is entitled under Rule 8" [Airborne Beepers & Video, Inc. v. AT&T Mobility LLC, 499 F.3d 663, 667 (7th Cir. 2007)].

According to the Seventh Circuit, the Supreme Court's most recent pleading case, Ashcroft v. Iqbal, -- U.S. --, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009), then clarified that Twombly's plausibility requirement applies across the board, not just to antitrust cases. In addition, Iqbal gave further guidance to lower courts in evaluating complaints by noting that a court need not accept as true legal conclusions, or threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements. "We understand the Court in Iqbal to be admonishing those plaintiffs who merely parrot the statutory language of the claims that they are pleading (something that anyone could do, regardless of what may be prompting the lawsuit), rather than providing some specific facts to ground those legal claims, that they must do more. These are the plaintiffs who have not provided the showing' required by Rule 8."

Comment. Whether one is happy about the import of the recent Supreme Court pleading cases or not, the Seventh Circuit Brooks case provides a neat summary of the collective import of the cases and how those decisions ought to be implemented. As the Seventh Circuit put it: "So, what do we take away from Twombly, Erickson, and Iqbal? First, a plaintiff must provide notice to defendants of her claims. Second, courts must accept a plaintiff's factual allegations as true, but some factual allegations will be so sketchy or implausible that they fail to provide sufficient notice to defendants of the plaintiff's claim. Third, in considering the plaintiff's factual allegations, courts should not accept as adequate abstract recitations of the elements of a cause of action or conclusory legal statements."

This recitation confirms that notice pleading remains the rule, but it also confirms that much more than notice of a wrong will do. Notice means that the defendant must be provided with more specific facts constituting the wrong than had historically been deemed to be enough. This is another way of saying, and showing how important, that the venerable Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 78 S. Ct. 99, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1957), "no set of facts" standard has been retired. Rather than rely on the possible existence of facts to defeat summary judgment, a plaintiff must allege those facts when the plaintiff's story is "sketchy" or "implausible."

The problem, of course, is that what one court believes may be sketchy and implausible, would not be to another. Regardless of what the Supreme Court and the Seventh Circuit say, the Court's pleading cases have injected an element of subjectivity into the analysis. The district court judge becomes a gate-keeper in the sense that the court gets to decide which complaints merit more specific pleading. Instead of Rule 9(b) directing the district court to require heightened pleading, the Supreme Court has done so in the guise of providing the defendant with "notice."

Allegations Were Not Sufficiently "Plausible." So, how did the Seventh Circuit apply its iteration of the pleading cases to the case before it? The plaintiff had alleged that the defendants had engaged in a variety of activities such as producing investigative reports and being involved in interviews. However, the Seventh Circuit concluded that most of this alleged conduct was just as consistent with lawful conduct as with wrongdoing. Accordingly, without more, the allegations were too vague to provide notice to the defendants of the contours of claims. All such allegations could be ignored because they did not give the defendants notice of what they had done that amounted to a due process claim.

One paragraph, in contrast, did not suffer from such deficiencies. It read: "Plaintiff is informed, believes and alleges that the Defendants while acting in concert . . . did knowingly, intentionally and maliciously prosecute Plaintiff . . . in retaliation for Plaintiff . . . exercising rights and privileges under the Constitutions and laws of the United States and State of Illinois." Thus, in that paragraph, the plaintiff had specifically pleaded personal involvement by specifying all the defendants and describing the allegedly unlawful conduct. Nonetheless, the Seventh Circuit found that the paragraph failed under Iqbal because it was merely a formulaic recitation of the cause of action and nothing more. It did not put the defendants on notice of what they actually might have done to violate the plaintiff's rights.

Because the plaintiff had failed to ground his legal conclusions in a sufficiently plausible factual basis, the district court was correct to dismiss the claims. The court of appeals affirmed the judgment of the district court.

Comment. The Seventh Circuit's analysis makes clear that conclusory allegations of wrongdoing will not do. However, a plaintiff is left with a huge problem. The plaintiff will need to prove that he was fired in retaliation for expressing his view of support of a candidate for parole, a right that would appear to be protected by the First Amendment. To a layman, it would seem that the defendants ought to know what the plaintiff thinks they did wrong. The layman's response would be something like -- no: you were fired for other legitimate reasons. So, what more does the court want to see? And, more importantly, how can the plaintiff get that "more" without discovery into the materials that will lead to the thought process of the defendants?

The Seventh Circuit's articulation of the Supreme Court's cases is correct, and its application of them in Brooks is unsurprising given its articulation. In sum, therefore, what is most important about this case is that it shows that the Seventh Circuit will apply Twombly and Iqbal faithfully.

The Ninth Circuit's Take on Post-Iqbal Pleading. In Moss v. U.S. Secret Serv., 572 F.3d 962, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 15694 (9th Cir. July 16, 2009), the Ninth Circuit adopts an approach to the "plausibility" standard developed by the Supreme Court in Twombly and in Iqbal, and concludes that under this standard the plaintiffs had not alleged a plausible claim of discrimination in violation of the First Amendment. However, in contrast to the Seventh Circuit, it provides a bit more guidance in terms of how a plaintiff can comply with the standard, and also clarifies that courts should be sensitive to the need to provide plaintiffs with the opportunity to plead as they adjust to the post-Iqbal world.

Background and Procedural History. Moss was a civil rights class action under Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics [403 U.S. 388, 397, 91 S. Ct. 1999, 29 L. Ed. 2d 619 (1971)]. The plaintiffs alleged that U.S. Secret Service agents violated their constitutional rights when they forcibly relocated a demonstration critical of then-President George W. Bush, while leaving a nearby pro-Bush demonstration undisturbed. They claimed that the Secret Service agents acted pursuant to an official but secret policy. The complaint sought both damages and prospective relief.

The defendants filed a motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity, or in the alternative for summary judgment. The district court dismissed some of the claims and defendants, but concluded that the plaintiffs had pleaded a violation of clearly established First Amendment law by the individual Secret Service agents.

Pleading Standard Under Twombly and Iqbal. The Ninth Circuit began by reviewing the recent developments in the Supreme Court's pleading jurisprudence. First, it discussed Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, in which the Supreme Court held that an antitrust plaintiff must plead a set of facts "plausibly suggesting (not merely consistent with)" a Sherman Act violation to survive a motion to dismiss. The Court cautioned that it was not outright overruling Conley v. Gibson [355 U.S. 41, 78 S. Ct. 99, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1957)] but explained that Conley's oft-cited maxim that "a complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief," was "best forgotten" as an incomplete, negative gloss on an accepted pleading standard.

The Ninth Circuit then turned to Iqbal, which elaborated on Twombly's applicability in the context of a motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity. Iqbal made clear that Twombly's "plausibility" standard applies to pleadings in civil actions generally and is not limited to the antitrust context. The Ninth Circuit picked up on the Supreme Court's admonishment that bare assertions amounting to nothing more than a "formulaic recitation of the elements" of a cause of action are not entitled to the assumption of truth that is afforded the plaintiff's allegations when deciding a motion to dismiss. A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged. This standard asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully --facts that are "merely consistent" with a defendant's liability are not sufficient.

In sum, the Ninth Circuit said, for a complaint to survive a motion to dismiss, the non-conclusory "factual content," and reasonable inferences from that content, must be plausibly suggestive of a claim entitling the plaintiff to relief.

Claims Were Not "Plausible." The plaintiffs alleged that the agents engaged in unconstitutional viewpoint discrimination—that is, they were attempting to suppress a particular view about a subject—when they ordered state and local police to move the anti-Bush demonstrators. The question, then, was whether the plaintiffs' allegations that the agents ordered the relocation because of its message were "plausible." Following Iqbal, the Ninth Circuit began by "identifying pleadings that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth." The complaint here contained a bald allegation of impermissible motive that, standing alone, was conclusory. The same was true of the plaintiffs' allegation that, in ordering the relocation of the demonstration, the agents were acting under a secret policy of suppressing speech critical of the President. These allegations did nothing to enhance the plausibility of the viewpoint discrimination claims.

The complaint presented two separate non-conclusory factual allegations in support of the claims. First, the plaintiffs alleged that the agents ordered the relocation of their demonstration, but left a similarly situated pro-Bush demonstration undisturbed. However, the facts in the complaint showed that the agents instructed state and local police to move the anti-Bush protestors to a location situated about the same distance from the venue where the President was dining as the other demonstrators, thereby establishing a consistent perimeter around the President. This was not a plausible allegation of disparate treatment. The complaint also alleged that the demonstrators were subjected to abusive police tactics by the state and local police, but nowhere did the complaint allege that the federal agents had anything to do with this behavior. Second, the complaint alleged that diners and guests inside the dining venue were not subjected to security screening or asked to leave the premises, despite their close proximity to the President. However, differential treatment of diners and guests in the dining venue, who did not engage in expressive activity of any kind, offered little if any support for an inference of improper motive by the agents.

The Ninth Circuit concluded that the complaint failed to plead facts plausibly suggesting a colorable Bivens claim against the agents. The facts did not rule out the possibility of viewpoint discrimination, and thus were consistent with a viable First Amendment claim, but mere possibility is not enough under the Twombly/Iqbal standard.

Plaintiffs Were Granted Leave to Amend. The plaintiffs argued that, because intervening Supreme Court decisions had significantly changed pleading standards, they should be given leave to amend to meet the new standards. The Ninth Circuit agreed. Prior to Twombly, a complaint would not be found deficient if it alleged a set of facts consistent with a claim entitling the plaintiff to relief. Under the Court's latest pleadings cases, however, the facts alleged in a complaint must state a claim that is plausible on its face. This is a significant change, the Ninth Circuit said, with broad-reaching implications. Having initiated the present lawsuit without the benefit of the Court's latest pronouncements on pleadings, the Ninth Circuit appropriately allowed the plaintiffs to supplement their complaint with factual content required by Twombly and Iqbal.

Comment. Like the Seventh Circuit, the Ninth Circuit noted that the Supreme Court in Erickson had reiterated that notice pleading is still the rule. At the same time, however, the Ninth Circuit seems to take a somewhat more restrained approach to the scope of Iqbal and Twombly, than the Seventh Circuit had. Indeed, it stated that Twombly should not be read as effecting a sea change in the law of pleading. Perhaps the Moss case was an easier case for dismissal than Brooks in the sense that it might not have survived a motion to dismiss in the pre-Iqbal age. Looking at the facts, it appeared that the plaintiffs were treated no differently than other groups that turned out that day, thereby seriously undercutting their claims of unconstitutional conduct. Additionally, no facts linking the federal officials' conduct to the state officials' wrongful conduct were alleged. What other observable facts might be alleged that would not undercut the claims? Perhaps witnesses could have provided the facts such as that the federal officials were heard or seen ordering the state officials to act in certain ways. Or, perhaps they observed the state officials acting unlawfully but failed to take action to protect the plaintiffs.

Additionally, the Ninth Circuit opened the door to the possibility that the plaintiffs may be able to replead successfully by pulling out more facts that show viewpoint discrimination.

Nonetheless, just as it would be necessary to take discovery of the defendants to obtain the type of facts needed to draft a complaint that meets the new pleading test in Brooks, the plaintiffs in Moss might need such discovery as well. Thus, the conundrum confronting plaintiffs.

Putting it All Together. Perhaps Twombly and Iqbal can be seen as special cases where public policy considerations give rise to heightened concerns about ensuring the "plausibility" of the cases before letting them go forward. In Twombly, the concern was about the enormous resources involved in defending against an antitrust case. In Iqbal, it was national security concerns, and, perhaps, a judicial hostility to Bivens actions. It might have been possible to think that Twombly and Iqbal will affect only cases where these types of public policy considerations are in issue. However, district court judges now have an approach that enables them to play the gatekeeper by using their judgment that allegations are not sufficient to be entitled to the presumption of truth, and even if they are, they do not present a plausible claim for relief, or that they are "sketchy," as the Seventh Circuit put it.

Although both Brooks and Moss are civil rights cases, like Iqbal, it is noteworthy that Seventh and Ninth Circuits did not mention the types of policies that were enunciated by the Supreme Court. They were both rather short opinions. In that sense, they go beyond any limiting factor that could be gleaned from the Supreme Court's opinions. Now that the Supreme Court has endorsed a variable standard of specificity that depends on policy concerns, it is likely that any case involving intent, or any case in which important relevant evidence is in the hands of the defendant, may well fall prey to Iqbal and its progeny.

Iqbal and Twombly clearly appear to be a defendant's dream come true. Amendments to Rule 11 in 1983 had an impact on cutting back on frivolous cases, and the Supreme Court's 1986 Trilogy of summary judgment cases made it easier for defendants to get summary judgment. But, plaintiffs still had the opportunity for discovery. Moreover, some judges remained reluctant to grant summary judgment. Additionally, Rule 11 was watered down a bit again in 1993. So, the costs of discovery to defendants still loom large. The Supreme Court made clear in both Twombly and Iqbal that it believed that consideration of costs was relevant even at the pleading stage. The Court is saying -- why let plaintiffs take up defense and judicial resources when they aren't likely to win? The problem is that this approach turns the notice pleading/liberal discovery regime on its head. Stay tuned as the Court, the federal rule making process and Congress deal with whether we can still afford this regime.

RELATED LINKS: For more information see Moore's Federal Practice

- 2 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) 8.04[1];
- 2 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) 12.34[1]

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

34 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Baskauskas: Should a Pending State Appeal Prevent the Rooker-Feldman Doctrine

2009 Emerging Issues 4532

Edward L. Baskauskas on Why a Pending State-Court Appeal Should Not Prevent Application of the Rooker-Feldman Doctrine

By Edward L. Baskauskas

November 3, 2009

SUMMARY: The Eleventh Circuit has held that if an appeal from a state-court judgment remains pending in state court when the loser in the state trial court commences a federal suit, the Rooker-Feldman doctrine does not bar the federal suit. This holding ignores the basic principle underlying the Rooker-Feldman doctrine: the Supreme Court is the only federal court authorized to exercise appellate jurisdiction over state courts.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Rooker-Feldman Doctrine

The Rooker-Feldman doctrine embodies the general principle that lower federal courts lack jurisdiction over claims seeking review of state-court judgments. See District of Columbia Court of Appeals v. Feldman, 460 U.S. 462, 103 S. Ct. 1303, 75 L. Ed. 2d 206 (1983); Rooker v. Fidelity Trust Co., 263 U.S. 413, 44 S. Ct. 149, 68 L. Ed. 362 (1923); see also 28 U.S.C. §§ 1257(a), 1291, 1331 (among federal courts, only Supreme Court has appellate jurisdiction over state courts). In Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Saudi Basic Industries Corp., the Supreme Court described Rooker-Feldman as a narrow doctrine, confined to "cases brought by state-court losers complaining of injuries caused by state-court judgments rendered before the district court proceedings commenced and inviting district court review and rejection of those judgments." Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Saudi Basic Indus. Corp., 544 U.S. 280, 284, 125 S. Ct. 1517, 161 L. Ed. 2d 454 (2005).

Eleventh Circuit's Position

In two recent decisions, the Eleventh Circuit has held that, for Rooker-Feldman purposes, a state-court judgment is not "rendered before the district court proceedings commenced" if a state-court appeal remains pending when the state-court loser files a federal suit.

Nicholson v. Shafe, 558 F.3d 1266 (11th Cir. 2009), began with a state-court action seeking an accounting under state law of profits relating to a copyright claim. After the state trial court entered judgment for the defendants, the plaintiffs appealed. While that appeal was pending, the state-court plaintiffs filed suit in federal court, seeking an accounting under federal law. The district court dismissed the action sua sponte based on lack of jurisdiction, applying the Rooker-Feldman doctrine. A panel of the Eleventh Circuit reversed. The appellate panel noted that the Supreme in Exxon Mobil made it clear that, for Rooker-Feldman to apply, the state court must have rendered judgment before the district court proceedings commenced. In Exxon Mobil, it was easy to see that this requirement had not been met, because the federal action was filed before the jury verdict in the state-court action. In Nicholson, however, the federal action was filed after the state trial court had entered judgment but not before the end of the state appeal process. Stating that "the relevant inquiry is whether the state proceedings have ended," the Eleventh Circuit panel held that state proceedings have not ended for purposes of Rooker-Feldman if an appeal from the state court judgment remains pending at the time the plaintiff commences the federal-court action. Accordingly, because the proceedings in the state courts remained pending on appeal when federal action was filed, the Eleventh Circuit panel concluded that the Rooker-Feldman doctrine did not deprive the federal district court of jurisdiction. The court of appeals therefore reversed the district court's judgment of dismissal and remanded for further proceedings. Nicholson v. Shafe, 558 F.3d 1266, 1275-1279 (11th Cir. 2009).

A different panel of the Eleventh Circuit applied the same reasoning in Green v. Jefferson County Commission, 563 F.3d 1243 (11th Cir. 2009). In that case, a group of county employees filed suit in state court against the county and county retirement system, seeking declaratory and injunctive relief against the defendants' adoption of a resolution that reduced the plaintiffs' health benefits and sick-leave retirement credits. The state trial court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and the plaintiffs appealed to the state supreme court. While that appeal was pending, the plaintiffs filed suit in federal district court, again seeking relief from the defendants' resolution. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, citing the Rooker-Feldman doctrine as well as the Younger abstention doctrine. A panel of the Eleventh Circuit disagreed with the trial court on the applicability of Rooker-Feldman. Applying the holding of Nicholson, the appellate panel concluded that, because the state-court appeal was still pending when the Green plaintiffs filed their federal suit, "this case was not a de facto appeal from a final state court judgment and the Rooker-Feldman doctrine did not divest the federal district court of jurisdiction." Green v. Jefferson County Commission, 563 F.3d 1243, 1250 (11th Cir. 2009). (The appellate panel did, however, affirm the district court's judgment on res judicata grounds. Green v. Jefferson County Commission, 563 F.3d 1243, 1252-1254 (11th Cir. 2009).)

The First and Tenth Circuits had come to similar conclusions in cases cited by the Nicholson panel. See Guttman v. Khalsa, 446 F.3d 1027, 1031-1032 (10th Cir. 2006) (under Exxon Mobil, Rooker-Feldman does not bar federal suit filed before all state-court appeals have been exhausted); Federacion de Maestros de Puerto Rico v. Junta de Relaciones del Trabajo de Puerto Rico, 410 F.3d 17, 24-27 (1st Cir. 2005) (state proceeding ends for Rooker-Feldman purposes when (1) highest state court in which review is available has affirmed judgment and nothing is left to be resolved; (2) state action has reached point where neither party seeks further action; or (3) state-court proceedings have finally resolved all federal questions in litigation, and only state-law questions or purely factual questions remain to be litigated). An Eighth-Circuit case cited by the Nicholson panel had not really faced the same issue. See Dornheim v. Sholes, 430 F.3d 919, 924 (8th Cir. 2005) (Rooker-Feldman is inapplicable if state litigation is ongoing when federal plaintiff commences action; one state trial-court final judgment was entered on same day federal suit was filed, another state trial-court disposition was filed 13 days later, and both rulings were appealed).

The Problem with the Eleventh Circuit's Analysis

The Eleventh Circuit's analysis in Nicholson and Green overlooked the underlying principle (noted in both opinions, but not used in either panel's analysis) that the Supreme Court is the only federal court authorized to exercise appellate jurisdiction over state courts. See 28 U.S.C. § 1257(a). If a federal action truly alleges an injury caused by a state trial court's judgment and asks the federal district court to review and reject that judgment (in contrast to a federal suit that simply reasserts a claim that the defendant's conduct injured the plaintiff), then such review should be outside the jurisdiction of the federal district court, regardless of whether the state-court judgment is the subject of a concurrent state-court appeal. See 18 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 133.30[3][c][ii] (taking the position that lower federal courts lack jurisdiction to review interlocutory state-court decisions and judgments of lower state courts as well as judgments of state courts of last resort); see also Thomas D. Rowe, Jr., & Edward L. Baskauskas, "Inextricably Intertwined" Explicable at Last? Rooker-Feldman Analysis After the Supreme Court's Exxon Mobil Decision, 1 Fed. Cts. L. Rev. 367, 390 (May 2006) (same).

The Eleventh Circuit's formulation of the issue in Nicholson ("the relevant inquiry is whether the state proceedings have ended," Nicholson v. Shafe, 558 F.3d 1266, 1277 (11th Cir. 2009)) glosses over a subtle difference between two descriptions of the scope of Rooker-Feldman set forth in Exxon Mobil. The Supreme Court's Exxon Mobil opinion describes the limited scope of Rooker-Feldman twice, first referring to "state-court judgments rendered before the district court proceedings commenced" and later referring to the filing of a "suit in federal court after the state proceedings ended." Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Saudi Basic Indus. Corp., 544 U.S. 280, 284, 291, 125 S. Ct. 1517, 161 L. Ed. 2d 454 (2005) (emphasis added). It remains to be seen which of these descriptions more precisely captures the Supreme Court's meaning. However, the more plausible reading of Exxon Mobil would be that "state proceedings" (second description) refers to proceedings in the state trial court that culminate in a "judgment[]" of the trial court (first description). Under that reading of Exxon Mobil, a lower federal court would lack jurisdiction over a suit seeking to review and overturn a state trial court's judgment, whether or not state-court appeals are pending--a result that would be in keeping with the basic principle that lower federal courts have no appellate jurisdiction over state courts. See Field Auto City, Inc. v. General Motors Corp., 476 F. Supp. 2d 545, 552-553 (E.D. Va. 2007) ("Simply put, there is no sound reason to preclude the operation of Rooker-Feldman where a state trial court has rendered judgment, but state appeals are not yet complete when the federal action is filed.").

In both Nicholson and Green, the federal plaintiffs had also been the plaintiffs in state court, and in federal court they alleged injuries resulting not from the state-court judgments, but from the acts of the defendants. So in each case the Eleventh Circuit could have reached the same result simply by recognizing that the federal suit in each case was not an impermissible de facto appeal that would implicate Rooker-Feldman. See Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Saudi Basic Indus. Corp., 544 U.S. 280, 284, 291, 125 S. Ct. 1517, 161 L. Ed. 2d 454 (2005) (Rooker-Feldman applies only to federal actions complaining of injuries caused by state-court judgments).

Lesson

For counsel representing a federal defendant, Nicholson and Green illustrate the importance of making precise arguments tethered to the policies and principles underlying the Rooker-Feldman doctrine. Historically, the doctrine has not been well-understood by lower courts; the Supreme Court's Exxon Mobil decision was an attempt to clarify the doctrine and to rein in some of the lower courts' far-reaching and controversial applications of the doctrine. See Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Saudi Basic Indus. Corp., 544 U.S. 280, 283, 125 S. Ct. 1517, 161 L. Ed. 2d 454 (2005). But even though it emphasized the limited scope of Rooker-Feldman, Exxon Mobil did not erase the underpinning of the doctrine: Lower federal courts still lack appellate jurisdiction over state courts. Logically, therefore, Exxon Mobil should not be read as creating an opening for a lower federal court to hear a de facto appeal from a state trial-court judgment whenever a state-court appeal is pending.

Thus, when faced with a contention that Rooker-Feldman is inapplicable because of the pendency of a state-court appeal, counsel for the federal defendant should take pains to focus the district court's attention on the basic principle that lower federal courts have no appellate jurisdiction to review any state-court judgment. See 28 U.S.C. §§ 1257(a), 1291, 1331. Also, defendant's counsel should explain very clearly why the federal suit should be classified as a de facto appeal of the state trial court's judgment, i.e., a suit in which the plaintiff is essentially complaining of an injury caused by the state-court judgment, rather than an injury caused by the defendant's conduct and not remedied by the state court. See Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Saudi Basic Indus. Corp., 544 U.S. 280, 284, 291, 125 S. Ct. 1517, 161 L. Ed. 2d 454 (2005) (Rooker-Feldman applies only to federal actions complaining of injuries caused by state-court judgments).

For counsel representing a federal plaintiff, opposition to a dismissal motion under Rooker-Feldman is more solidly grounded if counsel can show that the federal action is not a de facto appeal, rather than focusing on whether a state-court appeal of the state trial court's judgment is pending. Counsel should explain, for example, that the federal suit complains of an injury caused by the defendant's conduct, rather than an injury caused by the state court's judgment.

This is typically the case when the federal plaintiff was also the plaintiff in state court.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Edward L. Baskauskas is Adjunct Professor of Law at Golden Gate University and a member of the California bar. He has contributed to various Matthew Bender and LEXIS-NEXIS publications since 1982.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

35 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Mark Vespole on Stengart v. Loving Care Agency, 408 N.J. Super. 54 (2009)

2009 Emerging Issues 4340

Mark Vespole of Tressler LLP on Stengart v. Loving Care Agency, 408 N.J. Super. 54 (App. Div. 2009): Employee Emails Through Personal Email Account Protected by Attorney-Client Privilege

By Mark Vespole

September 25, 2009

SUMMARY: What should an attorney do if, in the course of forensic preservation of electronic discovery for a pending lawsuit, communications between a former employee and his attorney regarding the very same lawsuit are discovered? According to Stengart, regardless of the existence or specific text of a published electronic communications policy, such communications will almost always be protected by the attorney-client privilege.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: What happens when a 20-year-old technology, electronic communication, clashes with a venerable 400+ year-old legal principle, the attorney-client privilege? In Stengart v. Loving Care Agency, 408 N.J. Super. 54, 973 A.2d 390, 2009 N.J. Super. LEXIS 143 (App. Div. 2009), appeal granted, 200 N.J. 204, 976 A.2d 382, 2009 N.J. LEXIS 922 (2009), the Appellate Division reversed a trial court ruling that a former employee had no expectation of privacy in email correspondence to her attorney from a personal, password-protected, web-based email account, because it was sent through her employer's computer and network server. This case has enormous ramifications, particularly in employment litigation.

Background. Plaintiff was the Director of Nursing for Loving Care Agency, a home care services company, from its inception in 1994 until December 2007, when she resigned from her position. In February 2008, plaintiff sued her former employer and several of its directors and officers for constructive discharge, based upon a hostile work environment. In April 2008, for the purpose of preserving potentially relevant electronic discovery, Loving Care's attorneys arranged to obtain a copy of the hard drive of the laptop computer that had been issued to plaintiff while she was an employee. The forensic imaging process disclosed the contents of temporary internet files, which included emails sent by plaintiff to her attorney before her resignation through her personal, password-protected Yahoo email account. The emails contained information about her anticipated lawsuit against Loving Care.

The employer's counsel took the position that these emails did not have to be disclosed and returned to plaintiff's attorney because of Loving Care's electronic communications policy, published in its employee handbook. That policy, among other things, stated that: "Email and voice mail messages, internet use and communication and computer files are considered part of the company's business and client records . . . [and] are not to be considered private or personal to any individual employee." The policy also stated that occasional personal use of email is permitted, except to solicit for outside business ventures. 408 N.J. Super. at 60.

Loving Care first disclosed its possession of plaintiff's emails to her attorney when answering plaintiff's interrogatories. In response to the disclosure, plaintiff's counsel asserted the attorney-client privilege and demanded the return and/or destruction of all copies of the emails between him and his client, in accordance with Rule 4.4 of the New Jersey Rules of Professional Conduct and N.J. Court Rules R. 4:10-2(e)(2). Citing to the employee handbook, Loving Care's attorney refused to return or destroy the emails, taking the position that plaintiff waived the attorney-client privilege by using the company's computer, notwithstanding her knowledge of the electronic communications policy. The issue came before the trial court on an Order to Show Cause filed by plaintiff's attorney, which was eventually converted into a notice of motion. The motion sought return and destruction of all copies of the attorney-client emails, the disqualification of Loving Care's counsel and sanctions.

Trial Court Decision: Privilege Waived. The trial court held on February 5, 2009 that "when an employee has knowledge of the employer's electronic communication policy which adequately warns that any and all internet use and communication conducted on the employer's computer is not private to the employee and warns that E-mail, internet use and communication and computer files are considered part of the company's business and client records, such communications are not protected by such attorney client privilege and are not considered to be private or personal to any individual employee." In support of its decision, the trial court relied upon decisions by New Jersey and New York courts holding that the attorney-client privilege does not apply to employees' email to their attorneys sent through an email account issued by their employer and over their employer's servers, if the employer has a policy warning employees that email from company accounts is subject to review. The trial court also relied upon a New York federal district court decision, which decided that employee/attorney email sent via a personal, password-protected, web-based email account, but through the employer's computer and server, is not protected by the attorney-client privilege, while acknowledging a contrary holding by a Massachusetts trial court. The employee's use of a personal, password-protected, web-based email account makes Stengart a case of first impression for any New Jersey court.

The trial court stated that "whether an employee has a reasonable expectation of privacy in a communication made on a work issued computer is based upon the degree of notice the employer has provided to its employee regarding their right to privacy in electronic communications." The trial court cherry picked snippets of Loving Care's electronic policy to support its conclusion that plaintiff had no reasonable expectation of privacy. The trial court found Loving Care's policy to be restrictive because, while not prohibiting personal use altogether, it put employees on notice that all internet based communications were not private, that the employer's technology resources were to be used for business related purposes, particularly during work hours, and specifically prohibited use of email to conduct job searches or other employment activities that were not company related.

Plaintiff argued on the motion before the trial court that she was not aware of the company's electronic communications policy, and that even if she was aware of the policy, it did not apply to executive employees such as herself. The trial court found, however, that plaintiff at least must have had constructive knowledge of the policy, because of her long tenure with the company since its inception, and based upon opposing certifications stating that plaintiff was partially responsible for creating, drafting and distributing the employee handbook. With regard to plaintiff's claim that she was exempt from any policy because it only applied to administrative staff, the trial court found this to be "implausible", based upon the absence of any language in the employee handbook exempting executive employees, and an opposing affidavit from the company's CEO that the employee handbook applied to all company employees.

Finally, the trial court addressed plaintiff's application for sanctions against the employer's law firm based upon its alleged noncompliance with N.J. R.P.C. 4.4. In light of its ruling that plaintiff's emails waived the attorney-client privilege by virtue of her knowledge of Loving Care's electronic communications policy, the Court found no basis for a violation of R.P.C. 4.4 or sanctions against the employer's attorneys. Specifically, the trial court held that this case did not present the kind of inadvertent disclosure of privileged documents contemplated by R.P.C. 4.4(b), nor did it encompass the kind of malicious method of obtaining evidence prohibited by R.P.C. 4.4(a).

Appellate Division Reverses. Undoubtedly given the gravity and novelty of the issues, plaintiff's motion for leave to appeal was granted by the Appellate Division, which reversed the trial court's ruling in a lengthy reported opinion on June 26, 2009. In short, the Appellate Division rather vociferously disagreed with the trial court on almost every issue. The Appellate Division tersely summed up the issue before it as well as its holding, as follows:

"In this appeal, we address whether workplace regulations converted an employee's emails with her attorney--sent through the employee's personal password-protected, web-based email account, but via her employer's computer--into the employer's property. Finding that the policies undergirding the attorney-client privilege substantially outweigh the employer's interest in enforcement of its unilaterally imposed regulation, we reject the employer's claimed right to rummage through and retain the employee's emails to her attorney." 408 N.J. Super. at 58-59.

The Appellate Division chastised the trial court reaching conclusions regarding disputed factual issues without holding an evidentiary hearing with live testimony. The Appellate Division decision recounted a significantly broader rendition of the facts than what was reported in the trial court opinion. The Appellate Division noted that the record on appeal included several drafts or versions of the company's electronic communications policy without any certainty as to which, if any, applied to the plaintiff. This scenario was found to support plaintiff's certification that there were at least 5 versions of the employee handbook, none of which had been adopted as of the date of her resignation. The Appellate Division was also bothered by the fact that the employer did not produce a signed acknowledgement from plaintiff that she had received and understood the employee handbook, which is a customary practice by employers. The Court acknowledged that while the current CEO submitted proof that the employee handbook applied to plaintiff, plaintiff produced a certification from a former executive which supported her contrary position.

Despite the Court's careful rendition of multiple factual disputes, it proceeded under the assumption that the electronic communications policy proffered by the employer was in effect and applied to the plaintiff, and went on to examine whether the policy applied to the emails at issue. Again, squarely rejecting the trial court's interpretation, the Appellate Division found that the policy's statement that email, computer files and internet use are not private or personal was irreconcilable with that portion of the policy which permitted occasional personal use of the company's email system. The Appellate Court further recognized that while many portions of the policy objectively vindicated legitimate business interests, there was nothing in the policy which clearly conveyed the proposition that emails on the company computer through a personal, password-protected, web-based email account become company property.

Despite its vehement disagreement with the trial court, the Appellate Division proceeded under the assumption that the lower court's interpretation of the electronic communications policy was correct, and determined the enforceability of the policy by weighing the employer's right to impose rules for conduct in the workplace against the public policy rationale for the attorney-client privilege.

The Court explored the relatively recent history of judicial enforcement of employers' unilateral rules and regulations by means of an employee handbook, and came to the conclusion that "the salutary nature of employee handbooks has never been limitless." Id. at 68. In order to be enforceable by New Jersey courts, the conduct sought to be regulated through an employee handbook must be reasonably related to the legitimate business interests of the employer. On this issue the Court held that:

"A policy imposed by an employer, purporting to transform all private communications into company property--merely because the company owned the computer used to make private communications or used to access such private information during work hours--furthers no legitimate business interest. . . . We thus reject the philosophy buttressing the trial judge's ruling that, because the employer buys the employee's energies and talents during a certain portion of each workday, anything that the employee does during those hours becomes company property. Although we recognize the considerable scope of an employer's right to govern conduct and communications in the workplace, the employer's interest in enforcing its unilateral regulations wanes when the employer attempts to reach into purely private matters that have no bearing on the employer's legitimate interests." 408 N.J. Super. at 72-73.

Finally, the Appellate Division balanced the employer's improbable interest in plaintiff's private communications against the attorney-client privilege. The Court concluded that when the attorney-client privilege applies, it must be given as broad a scope as its rationale requires. The Appellate Division found no basis for the trial court's conclusion that plaintiff's use of her employer-issued laptop constituted a waiver of the attorney-client privilege. Finding that the trial "judge exhibited inadequate respect for the attorney-client privilege" the Court held:

"Even when we assume an employer may trespass to some degree into an employee's privacy when buttressed by a legitimate business interest, we find little force in such a company policy when offered as the basis for an intrusion into communications otherwise shielded by the attorney-client privilege." 408 N.J. Super. at 74-75.

The Appellate Division remanded to the trial court to decide the issue of whether or not the employer's attorney should be disqualified or sanctioned for failing to abide by N.J. R.P.C. 4.4(b). The Appellate Court also ordered that Loving Care return all emails between plaintiff and her attorney, and delete all electronic copies of the emails.

As it turned out, shortly after the employment discrimination lawsuit was filed, there was a separate Chancery lawsuit filed by Loving Care Agency against Stengart and her new employer for engaging in a competing business in violation of a restrictive covenant. The Appellate Division took the somewhat peculiar step of specifically ordering that the remand issues be decided by the Chancery judge in the restrictive covenant case, because the motion judge on the attorney-client privilege issues "may yet retain a commitment to the determination she previously made on the issues we have now decided differently." 408 N.J. Super. at 77.

Motion for Leave to Appeal Granted. For defense counsel in this scenario, the moral of the story thus far appears to be that it is better to err on the side of compliance with N.J. R.P.C. 4.4(b) and disclose any attorney-client emails sooner than later. However, the New Jersey Supreme Court granted leave to appeal in Stengart on July 29, 2009, and thus we may not have heard the last word yet on the electronic communications policy vs. attorney-client privilege dispute.

RELATED LINKS: For additional discussion of employee emails and attorney-client privilege, see

- MB 1-2A Computer Law § 2A.12;
- Note: Clicking Away Confidentiality: Workplace Waiver of Attorney-Client Privilege, 60 Fla. L. Rev. 1179 (2008).

For additional LexisNexis Emerging Issues Analyses on this subject, see

- John K. Rabiej on Discovery of Employee Privileged Communications Sent or Stored Using Employee's Computer System, 2009 Emerging Issues 4195 (Sept. 1, 2009);
- Bisceglie on Privilege Issues in E-discovery under New York Law in Scott v. Beth Israel Medical Center Inc., 2007 NY Slip Op. 27429, 847 N.Y.S.2d 436, 2008 Emerging Issues 2112 (Aug. 7, 2008);
- Harrison and Ong on E-mail Monitoring, 2008 Emerging Issues 1949 (Feb. 26, 2008).

See also generally

- Mark R. Vespole, 1-7 LexisNexis Practice Guide New Jersey Civil Discovery § 7.06 (2009).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Mark R. Vespole is a partner in the Newark, New Jersey office of Tressler LLP, a national litigation and insurance services law firm. The author has litigated numerous commercial, insurance and securities matters in state and federal courts and before arbitration panels throughout the country. Mr. Vespole's practice includes insurance coverage and defense litigation arising out of first-party and third-party property and casualty, life and health, professional liability, employment practices and directors' and officers' liability policies, as well as corporate raiding, and securities arbitrations and compliance matters for broker-dealers and registered representatives.

Mr. Vespole has written and lectured extensively for a variety of insurance and securities trade publications and organizations covering a broad range of topics, including insurance coverage, bad faith, corporate raiding in the securities and life insurance industries, noncompete agreements, replacements of life insurance policies, contestability clauses, product liability and mold litigation. He is an Honors graduate of the University of Notre Dame and Seton Hall Law School, and is admitted to practice in New Jersey, the United States Supreme Court, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit and Third Circuit, United States District Court of New Jersey and the United States District Court for the Southern, Eastern, Western and Northern Districts of New York. Mr. Vespole has been certified by the New Jersey Supreme Court as a Civil Trial Attorney since 1988, and also is certified as a mediator.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

36 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Reasonableness Standard Governing Discovery Obligations and Preservation Duty

2009 Emerging Issues 4250

John K. Rabiej on the Reasonableness Standard Governing Discovery Obligations and Preservation Duty

By John K. Rabiej

September 10, 2009

SUMMARY: A standard of reasonableness should guide both lawyers in complying with ESI preservation duties and judges in ruling on disputes regarding the preservation of ESI. However, since there are no concrete standards governing the preservation duty, it is left to a judge's individual assessment of reasonableness. Two recent cases highlight the tensions involved in such high-stakes decision-making.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Case law is replete with holdings requiring parties to comply strictly with preservation duties. But preserving all non-privileged electronically stored information (ESI), especially ESI that is not reasonably accessible, like ESI on backup tapes, can be extraordinarily burdensome and costly. In recognition of the burden and the likelihood that not-reasonably-accessible ESI typically is marginally valuable, the federal rules block or temper the imposition of spoliation sanctions if: (1) the deleted ESI is not relevant; (2) the deleted ESI is available from other sources; or (3) the ESI is deleted in accordance with routine, good-faith business operations. Lawyers and judges are required to exercise much care when applying these three conditions in determining what ESI must be or should have been preserved. None of the three conditions sets out a bright-line test, and a "wrong" assessment of any of the three conditions, which is evaluated in hindsight, can have serious consequences. The two following cases highlight some of the tensions involved in such high-stakes decision-making.

Facts of Both Cases: In Southeastern Mech. Serv., Inc. v. Brody, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 69830 (M.D. Fla. July 24, 2009), the court denied defendant's request to impose a sanction of an adverse instruction on the plaintiff for failing to adopt an appropriate litigation hold and failing to suspend overwriting of its backup tapes. The defendant company claimed that the plaintiff's former employee deleted relevant emails immediately before leaving the company. The plaintiff's information technology manager testified at a deposition that he had examined the former employee's accounts a few days after the employee departed and noted that emails had been deleted from his computer. At a later proceeding, the plaintiff company admitted that all of the employee's Outlook email files had been deleted. The plaintiff also acknowledged that backup tapes on its company servers were automatically overwritten every two weeks. Though it should have been aware that the backup tapes would contain all emails deleted by the employee within two weeks of his departure, the plaintiff failed to take any steps to suspend the overwriting program, which would have prevented the permanent destruction of the employee's emails.

The court found that the former employee was a key player in the litigation, his deleted emails may have been relevant, and the plaintiff company had a duty to preserve relevant evidence at the time its employee departed. It further ruled that the plaintiff "should have put in place a litigation hold for key employees to ensure the preservation of relevant documents and to prevent the automatic overwriting of backup tapes every two weeks." Id. at *10. Nonetheless, the court declined to sanction the plaintiff because the defendant showed neither that the plaintiff acted in bad faith nor that any of the deleted emails contained crucial evidence. It also ruled that the defendant's later specific request to suspend the overwriting of backup tapes made several months after the employee departed was too late to demonstrate the plaintiff's bad faith because any potentially relevant emails deleted by the former employee would have been permanently lost two weeks after his departure.

The apparent lesson from Southeastern is that the defendant waited too long to request the plaintiff to suspend its overwriting program. It should have made the request soon after commencing the lawsuit. If it had done so promptly, the plaintiff would have been on notice, and its failure under those circumstances to suspend its overwriting program immediately would have demonstrated bad faith, making itself vulnerable to sanction.

Now we turn our attention to Bellinger v. Astrue, Comm'r of Soc. Sec., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 71727 (E.D. N.Y. Aug. 14, 2009). In Bellinger, the court denied the plaintiff's motion to compel a response to interrogatories and a motion to sanction the defendant for its failure to respond. Plaintiff was seeking detailed information on the location of ESI and information regarding the defendant's litigation hold. As part of its interrogatories, the plaintiff requested information on the defendant's protocol to preserve ESI. In particular, it asked the defendant whether it was aware of any deletion of ESI and, if so, what efforts were made to recover the deleted ESI--the same type of information that would have helped inform the defendant in Southeastern to demand that the plaintiff suspend its overwriting of backup tapes. The court in Bellinger declined to grant the plaintiff's motion for such information because, among other things, it found the information to be "both very detailed and technically complex and it is clear that responding to them would be extremely burdensome."

Tension between cases: The defendant in Southeastern was unsuccessful because it waited too long to notify the plaintiff of its duty to preserve and recover deleted ESI. The defendant learned too late that ESI on both active databases and backup tapes had been deleted. It should have requested information, similar to the information requested in Bellinger, about the plaintiff's computer systems and record-retention practices early in the litigation. The types of information requested in the interrogatories of the plaintiff in Bellinger would have informed the defendant in Southeastern of any ongoing deletion of ESI on active databases and backup tapes. In much the same way, this type of information would have helped the plaintiff in Bellinger decide whether potentially relevant ESI was being deleted and whether it should request the defendant to suspend its overwriting of backup tapes. But the court denied the plaintiff's motion to compel a response because the interrogatories requested too much information.

In Southeastern, the defendant could not demonstrate the plaintiff's bad faith in failing to comply with its preservation duty because it did not have sufficient information to request the plaintiff to suspend overwriting the ESI backup tapes of a key player. In Bellinger, the plaintiff's request for information that would have put it in a position to place the defendant on notice by explicitly demanding suspension of overwriting programs--sufficient to demonstrate bad faith had the defendant continued to proceed deleting relevant ESI--was denied. The juxtaposition of both cases suggests that a party must notify the opposing party promptly to suspend automatic overwriting programs despite being handicapped with little information on which to base the request.

The facts in each case support the respective holdings and explain the apparent anomaly. In Southeastern, the overwriting program was part of a routine business operation, subject to the protection of Rule 37(f). In addition, the defendant did not show that it suffered substantial prejudice from the deletion of the ESI. Moreover, no evidence was presented that showed when the ESI was deleted by the departing employee, who could have deleted it well before the preservation duty arose. In Bellinger, the plaintiff submitted extensive boilerplate interrogatories that requested virtually all information regarding the defendant's computer system and its operation. Such "standard form" interrogatories can be found in many treatises and manuals on ESI and reflect a comprehensive list of questions, many of which might individually be potentially valuable in any given case. But, as the court ruled, such comprehensive interrogatories were not appropriate in the instant employee sexual discrimination case, especially because the plaintiff had been provided extensive ESI from earlier discovery requests (amounting to more than 10,000 pages). The court suspected that the filing of the detailed interrogatories in this case was a tactical maneuver, reflecting an underlying antipathy between the parties. Because of these actions, the court went on to admonish the parties to act with greater civility toward each other.

Reconciling both cases: The separate holdings in Southeastern and Bellinger can be reconciled on the individual facts. Still, the juxtaposition of the two cases highlights the tension between a party's virtually absolute duty to preserve relevant non-privileged ESI and case law that requires the opposing party to specifically alert the other party to preserve selected ESI that is not reasonably accessible as a precondition to imposing a spoliation sanction. On the one hand, the deletion of ESI resulting from automatic overwriting of backup tapes may be proper as part of ongoing routine business operations as recognized under Civil Rule 37(f). On the other hand, the protection against sanctions afforded by the rule is significantly limited to overwriting of backup tapes done in "good-faith." Once a party becomes aware that relevant ESI of a key player on an active database has been destroyed and that the ESI is unavailable from other sources, the responsibility to suspend overwriting of backup tapes containing the ESI is part of its good-faith duty. How can the opposing party alert the party to suspend its overwriting operations without adequate information?

Suspending all or part of the overwriting of backup tapes can be burdensome and is not required in most cases. ESI available on active databases typically is sufficient to satisfy discovery requests and recourse to ESI that is not reasonably accessible, like backup tapes, is the exception. Accordingly, a party must have good reason justifying its request that the opposing party suspend the overwriting of backup tapes. But without adequate information about the other party's computer system and its record retention policies and operations, it may be difficult in many cases to make the proper showing. Bellinger and Southeastern highlight the tension between the parties' competing interests and duties and provide a fundamental lesson to the bar. Until the limits on a party's preservation duty are more clearly and explicitly delineated by law or rules, the key touchstone remains "reasonableness." And reasonableness can only be determined under the circumstances of each case, which will always vary.

The courts in both Bellinger and Southeastern applied a standard of reasonableness to decide the ESI issues before them. The information sought in the interrogatories in Bellinger can be found in model ESI guidelines of some courts, most notably the District of Maryland, which set out much the same information as the information requested in Bellinger. Such extensive information may be appropriate in a complex lawsuit involving large business adversaries, massive amounts of ESI, and potentially huge awards. But the court in Bellinger wisely applies a reasonableness standard to the plaintiff's interrogatories. It rejects the party's overly inclusive requests because substantial evidence had already been produced and no showing was made that the requesting party would be substantially prejudiced without receiving the requested information. In Southeastern, the plaintiff had a duty to suspend its routine operations overwriting the backup tapes of a key player whose ESI had been deleted on the active database. Sanctioning the plaintiff for failing to comply with its duty was not reasonable under the facts of the case because the plaintiff had not acted in bad faith and no showing was made that the defendant had been substantially prejudiced.

Lessons: Strict compliance with the common-law preservation duty in cases involving ESI can result in unreasonable requirements and unfair outcomes. A standard of reasonableness should guide both lawyers in complying with ESI preservation duties and judges in ruling on disputes regarding the preservation of ESI. It is true that some courts continue, however, to apply the rules governing preservation obligations strictly, resulting in significant awards or sanctions against lawyers who wrongly assess the case. It is very likely, for example, that any number of courts would have ruled contrary to the ruling in Southeastern under the facts of the case.

A serious national debate is emerging over the need to develop bright-line, concrete standards governing the preservation duty, instead of relying on an individual's assessment of reasonableness in a particular case. Until that debate is resolved, lawyers and judges will continue to be confronted with difficult judgment calls on what constitutes reasonableness when evaluating what ESI must be preserved and how much information can be asked in a discovery request. Because no bright-line tests have been uniformly adopted or followed, the developing case law of the jurisdiction in which a lawsuit has been filed will continue to be the dominant source of guidance on the meaning of "reasonableness."

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004. The views expressed in the commentary represent Mr. Rabiej's opinions and do not necessarily reflect the views of the rules committees.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

37 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Discovery of Employee Privileged Communications Using Employer's Computer

2009 Emerging Issues 4195

John K. Rabiej on Discovery of Employee Privileged Communications Sent or Stored Using Employee's Computer System

By John K. Rabiej

September 1, 2009

SUMMARY: Courts have developed an analytical framework to determine whether an employee's expectation of privacy in workplace e-mails is reasonable and sufficient to protect the e-mails from discovery. Sprenger v. The Rector and Bd. of Visitors of Virginia Tech used the analysis, but also included a twist that provides a cautionary tale to parties seeking production of an employee's e-mails subject to the confidential marital communications privilege.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Employees routinely send or store private e-mails using their employer's computer system. Some of these communications may be privileged and include confidential e-mails to an attorney, a spouse, or a physician. These communications may be subject to a discovery request in litigation involving the employee or, more likely, the employer. Sprenger v. The Rector and Bd. of Visitors of Virginia Tech, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47115 (W.D. Va. June 17, 2008), offers a good illustration of the issues and analysis that courts rely on to determine whether such employee communications are protected from discovery under the work-product doctrine or under an evidentiary privilege, including the attorney-client, spousal, or patient-physician privilege. It also contains a twist that arises in cases involving confidential marital communications.

Facts of the Case: In Sprenger, the plaintiff alleged that the defendant violated the Americans with Disabilities Act because it failed to provide adequate accommodations for her migraine headaches. The plaintiff moved to quash a subpoena issued under Civil Rule 45 for relevant electronically stored information "on all computers, laptops, PDA's, portable media or other devices" used by the plaintiff's spouse, including devices controlled by the spouse's employer, a public agency. The plaintiff asserted that her communications with her spouse were confidential and protected under the federal common-law spousal privilege. The court determined that the "confidential marital communications privilege" rather than the "adverse spousal testimony privilege" applied in the case.

Under established jurisprudence, marital communications are presumed to be confidential, unless the nature and circumstances surrounding the communications show that they are not intended to be confidential. When examining the nature and circumstances regarding e-mail correspondence in a workplace environment, courts, like the court in Sprenger, typically apply a multi-factor analysis to determine whether an employee's claim that personal e-mails on an employer's computer are confidential is reasonable. The analysis that applies to the spousal privilege applies to other evidentiary privileges and the work-product doctrine, though the twist in Sprenger is that the defendant has the burden to defeat the privilege.

Multi-Factor Analysis of Objectively Reasonable Privacy Expectation: Though the Fourth Amendment's right of reasonable expectation of privacy does not apply directly to non-governmental intrusions, the same standard applies to determining the confidentiality of e-mail communications. Thus, an employee's e-mails sent or stored on an employer's computer system are confidential and protected from discovery only if the employee has a reasonable expectation of privacy. In making this determination, an employer's e-mail policy often plays a crucial role in the analysis.

Typically, an employer has a policy explicitly asserting the employer's right to examine e-mail communications stored on the employer's computer system, and the employee tacitly or overtly agrees to abide by the policy as a condition of employment, which may amount to an intentional waiver of any privilege or protection. Knowing that an employer does not keep e-mails confidential provides strong evidence that the employee's reliance on the employer to keep the e-mails confidential is not reasonable, especially if the employer took additional steps--either opening the e-mails or making them available to others. In individual cases, courts look to the extent that an employer monitors employees' communications, the employees' awareness of such monitoring, and the employees' acknowledgment as a condition of employment that the employer can monitor communications.

In Re Asia Global Crossing, Ltd., 322 B.R. 247 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2005), which is cited in Sprenger, specifies the factors used by courts in this analysis:

- does the corporation maintain a policy banning personal or other objectionable use;
- does the corporation monitor the use of the employee's computer or e-mail;
- do third parties have a right of access to the computer or e-mails; and
- did the corporation notify the employee, or was the employee aware, of the use and monitoring policies.

The court in Sprenger quashed the defendant's subpoena because the defendant failed to show that the employee's expectation of privacy regarding e-mail communications was unreasonable. In this case, the defendant's burden was heavier than in other cases where the person asserting a privilege has the burden to substantiate it, because, unlike other privileges, communications between spouses are presumed confidential, requiring the defendant to demonstrate that it had been waived

What lessons can be drawn from Sprenger about discovery of employee e-mails sent or stored on an employer's work computer and other cases like it? The employer in Sprenger maintained the following e-mail policy governing employee communications using the employer's computer system: "no user should have any expectation of privacy in any message, file, image, or data created, sent, retrieved, or received by use of the Commonwealth's equipment and/or access," and state agencies have the "right at any time, without notice, and without the user's permission to monitor e-mail sent or received by agency users." Though the policy is explicit, clear, and seemingly comprehensive, it was insufficient in itself because the defendant failed to substantiate it. The defendant merely proffered a copy of the policy without evidence or affidavit showing how the policy was implemented or circulated to employees.

The court in Sprenger noted, in particular, that no evidence was provided showing that the plaintiff's spouse actually received notice of the policy. Employers typically use several means to notify their employees of a privacy policy, including posting a notice banner on the employee's computer screen, which appears every time an employee logs on the system, or publishing the policy in an employee handbook. The court found an automated "flash screen," which warns an employee of the privacy policy, an especially effective means of notifying an employee. But none of these means of notification was established in Sprenger. Thus, despite a clear policy rejecting any claim of privacy expectations, the subpoena requested by the defendant in Sprenger was quashed, because the defendant failed to connect the policy with the plaintiff's spouse employee.

The defendant in Sprenger failed to offer any evidence based on the factors listed in In Re Asia Global that would have raised doubts about the plaintiff's privacy expectations. The defendant did not offer any evidence that the employer actually monitored the e-mail communications. Nor did the defendant offer any evidence showing that an authorized third party had the right to access the e-mail communication system. Evidence that an employer or third party routinely or frequently monitored employee communications or accessed e-mails may have been sufficient to undermine the reasonableness of an employee's privacy expectation. But in Sprenger, no evidence substantiating either factor was offered that would have called into question the confidentiality of the e-mail communications.

If an employee does not offer any contrary evidence, establishing the existence of an employer e-mail policy that rejects any employee privacy expectation to e-mails sent on the employer's computer might be enough to defeat a privilege claim--other than a confidential marital communications privilege claim. But because the defendant has the burden to show that the confidential marital communications privilege was waived, the defendant was required to provide evidence demonstrating that the employee's expectation of privacy in the e-mails was unreasonable to meet the defendant's burden.

Best Practices: In most cases, an employee's private confidential e-mail communications stored on an employer's computer system will not be relevant in the underlying litigation. Though subject to discovery, such e-mails are unlikely to be relevant and need not be disclosed. But if an employee who stores e-mail on an employer's computer system is a party to the litigation, privilege issues are more likely to arise. Under such circumstances, an employee who resists a discovery request or subpoena for confidential and privileged e-mails stored on an employer's computer system can defend the privileged status of the e-mails by asserting a reasonable expectation of privacy based on the nonexistence of a privacy e-mail policy or on an asserted ignorance of such an employer policy.

It is important to note that an employee has the burden to show that the privacy expectation was reasonable in privilege and protection cases, except in a case involving the confidential marital communications privilege. The ruling in Sprenger provides a good cautionary tale to parties who seek the production of e-mails that are subject to the marital communications privilege. Unlike other privilege cases, the requesting party has the burden to show that the employee's expectation of privacy in e-mails is not objectively reasonable by providing evidence that the employee was aware of the employer's privacy-e-mail policy and that the employer actually took steps to monitor or make available to others the employee's e-mails.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004. The views expressed in the commentary represent Mr. Rabiej's opinions and do not necessarily reflect the views of the rules committees.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

38 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Using Mandamus to Transfer Venue: Vairo on In re Genentech, Inc.

2009 Emerging Issues 4181

Using Mandamus to Transfer Venue: Vairo on In re Genentech, Inc.

By Georgene Vairo

August 27, 2009

SUMMARY: In re Genentech, Inc., 566 F.3d 1338, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 10882 (Fed. Cir. May 22, 2009), is another recent example of the emerging aggressive use of mandamus as a vehicle for challenging unsuccessful motions to transfer under 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a). In In re Genentech, Inc., the Federal Circuit ruled that mandamus was available to order transfer of venue when the plaintiffs chosen forum had no connection to any of the witnesses or evidence.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Georgene Vairo on In re Genentech, Inc.

Summary. In re Genentech, Inc., 566 F.3d 1338, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 10882 (Fed. Cir. May 22, 2009), is another recent example of the emerging aggressive use of mandamus as a vehicle for challenging unsuccessful motions to transfer under 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a). In In re Genentech, Inc., the Federal Circuit ruled that mandamus was available to order transfer of venue when the plaintiff's chosen forum had no connection to any of the witnesses or evidence.

Facts and Procedural Background. The plaintiff, a German company, brought a patent infringement action against two California companies in the Eastern District of Texas. The California companies then filed a reactive declaratory judgment action seeking a declaration of invalidity and non-infringement of the plaintiff's patents in the Northern District of California. The California companies also sought transfer of venue under 28 U.S.C. § 1404 to the Northern District of California. All parties agreed that the Eastern District of Texas had no connection to any of the witnesses or evidence relevant to the case.

When the district court denied the motion to transfer venue, the defendants sought a writ of mandamus from the court of appeals directing the district to vacate its order and transfer the case. The Federal Circuit ruled that mandamus was appropriate because the district court had committed clear error, and it therefore ordered transfer of the case to the Northern District of California.

Standard for Granting Motions to Transfer. Section 1404(a) provides: "For the convenience of parties and witnesses, in the interest of justice, a district court may transfer any civil action to any other district or division where it might have been brought." The Federal Circuit began by enunciating the standard for granting a motion to transfer under § 1404: the motion should be granted if the movant shows that the transferee venue is "clearly more convenient" than the venue chosen by the plaintiff. In assessing whether a defendant has met its burden of demonstrating the need to transfer, courts apply a number of private interest and public interest factors.

Comment. The Federal Circuit adopted the test and approach for reviewing denials of motions to transfer under § 1404(a) that were announced in a recent, divided en banc Fifth Circuit case, In re Volkswagen of Am., Inc., 545 F.3d 304, 310 (5th Cir. 2008) ("the precedents are clear that mandamus is entirely appropriate to review for an abuse of discretion that clearly exceeds the bounds of judicial discretion"; granting mandamus and ordering the district court judge for the Eastern District of Texas to transfer a product liability case). The Eastern District of Texas has become known as a plaintiff-friendly "rocket docket" and the Fifth Circuit's decision in VW has been viewed as an attempt to rein in blatant forum shopping.

The VW opinion purports to adhere to the relatively stringent test for granting mandamus, but it applied the mandamus test somewhat expansively to enable the defendant to escape the so-called "rocket docket." See Lonny Hoffman, Transfer Venue: Lonny Hoffman on In re Volkswagen of America, Inc., 2009 Emerging Issues 3274 (LexisNexis January 1, 2009). In re Genentech, Inc., and an earlier Federal Circuit case, In re TS Tech United States Corp., 551 F.3d 1315 (Fed. Cir. 2009), followed the Fifth Circuit's lead in allowing mandamus to order the district court to transfer cases.

Although it did not expressly so state, the Federal Circuit was correct to apply the VW test. In reviewing district court judgments in patent cases, the Federal Circuit applies its own law with respect to patent law issues, but with respect to nonpatent issues, it generally applies the law of the circuit in which the district court sits. Midwest Industries, Inc. v. Karavan Trailers, Inc., 175 F.3d 1356 (Fed. Cir. 1999); see Atari, Inc. v. JS & A Group, Inc., 747 F.2d 1422 (Fed. Cir. 1984) (in banc). The Federal Circuit applies its own law to patent issues to serve one of the principal purposes of the court: to promote uniformity in the law with regard to patent and other matters within its exclusive appellate jurisdiction. See S. Rep. No. 97-275, at 5 (1981), reprinted in 1982 U.S.C.C.A.N. 11, 15. The Federal Circuit applies regional circuit law to nonpatent issues "to avoid the risk that district courts and litigants will be forced to select from two competing lines of authority based on which circuit may have jurisdiction over an appeal that may ultimately be taken, and to minimize the incentive for forum-shopping by parties who are in a position to determine, by their selection of claims, the court to which an appeal will go." See Atari, 747 F.2d 1422, at 1439.

Application of § 1404(a) Convenience Factors. The court of appeals then discussed the convenience factors on which the district court had relied. In virtually every instance, it found that the district court had committed "clear error."

Convenience of the Witnesses and Parties. The Federal Circuit correctly found the convenience of the witnesses and parties to be the most significant factor. Because it generally becomes more inconvenient and costly for witnesses to attend trial the further they are away from home, the Fifth Circuit (whose law the Federal Circuit was applying) established a "100-mile" rule, which requires that when the distance between an existing venue for trial of a matter and a proposed venue under § 1404(a) is more than 100 miles, the factor of inconvenience to witnesses increases in direct relationship to the additional distance to be traveled.

The defendants identified at least ten witnesses within the Northern District of California, including at least three nonparty witnesses who had knowledge of material facts. In addition, they identified at least four additional witnesses residing in other parts of California. No witnesses resided in the Eastern District of Texas. Accordingly, the Federal Circuit said that the district court clearly erred by finding that this factor "only slightly" favored transfer. The district court had found that the defendants had failed to identify any "key witnesses." According to the Federal Circuit, this was a higher standard than required: "Requiring a defendant to show that the potential witness has more than relevant and material information at this point in the litigation or risk facing denial of transfer on that basis is unnecessary."

The district court had also emphasized that the Eastern District of Texas would be a more convenient forum for several potential witnesses from Europe. The court of appeals noted that, under the 100-mile rule, inconvenience increases in direct relationship to the additional distance traveled. However, the court said that this rule should not be too rigidly applied. The European witnesses would be required to travel a significant distance in any case, while a significant number of witnesses would not have to travel far from home if the case was transferred to the Northern District of California. Thus, the district court should not have given such significant weight to the inconvenience of the European witnesses.

The district court had also relied on the Eastern District of Texas's central location as convenient for potential witnesses in Iowa and the east coast of the United States. The court of appeals, however, did not view this centrality as a proper consideration when no witnesses actually resided in or near the chosen forum. Because a substantial number of material witnesses resided in or near the transferee venue, and none near the Eastern District of Texas, the district court clearly erred in not determining this factor to weigh substantially in favor of transfer.

Concerning the convenience of the parties, the court of appeals noted that one defendant was headquartered in the Northern District of California and the other was headquartered in San Diego, California. The plaintiff was a German corporation that would have to travel a great distance to either venue, and therefore would be only slightly more inconvenienced by the case being tried in California rather than Texas. Thus, the parties' convenience factor clearly favored transfer.

Comment. The Federal Circuit is correct that the lack of any witnesses in the district clearly militates in favor of transfer. However, its approach will present plaintiffs seeking to stay in a particular court with a problem. Defendants will be able to point to witnesses without any test in terms of their significance or relevance. To the extent that this approach invites gaming, it is problematic. On the other hand, the Federal Circuit did favorably cite a case argued by the plaintiff that would credit the plaintiff's choice of forum so long as any credible witnesses resided in the forum state.

Availability of Compulsory Process. A substantial number of witnesses resided in the Northern District of California, and were therefore subject to the transferee court's subpoena power. No witnesses were within the subpoena power of the Eastern District of Texas. Thus, this factor also strongly favored transfer.

Access to Evidence. Most of the relevant documentary evidence was in the hands of the defendants, either in the Northern District of California or in San Diego. Evidence held by the plaintiff was in Europe and Washington, D.C. These documents would have to be transported in any event, so that it was only slightly more inconvenient or costly to transport them to California than to Texas. Keeping the case in Texas would impose a significant and unnecessary burden on the defendants. The district court therefore clearly erred in finding that this factor was neutral.

The district court had also minimized the importance of this factor by noting that the notion that physical location of some relevant documents should play a substantial role in the venue analysis was somewhat antiquated in the era of electronic storage and transmission. This reasoning, the court of appeals said, would render this factor superfluous.

Comment. The plaintiff certainly had a problem convincing the Federal Court that a German corporate plaintiff would be more inconvenienced in any respect by being required to litigate in California rather than Texas. Indeed, the foreign status of the plaintiff may well have been a factor, just as it is when a defendant moves for dismissal under forum non conveniens. See Piper Aircraft Co. v. Reyno, 454 U.S. 235, 102 S. Ct. 252, 70 L. Ed. 2d 419, 1981 U.S. LEXIS 133; 50 U.S.L.W. 4055 (1982) (the strong presumption in favor of the plaintiff's choice of forum applies with less force when the plaintiff is foreign). This is somewhat ironic, however, because the Fifth Circuit in VW criticized the district court for employing the higher standard for granting a dismissal on forum non conveniens grounds.

Practical Problems. The district court had cited two issues regarding the practicality of the two venues. First, the court had reasoned that, because one of the defendants had filed a different suit in the Eastern District of Texas two years earlier, it could not be heard to complain that it was an inconvenient forum. Consideration of this prior case, according to the Federal Circuit, was clear error: a § 1404 analysis requires individualized consideration of convenience and fairness, and there was no suggestion that the prior case involved the same parties, witnesses, evidence, and facts.

The district court also had stated that the possibility that the Northern District of California lacked jurisdiction over the plaintiff was a critical problem. This was also clear error, as there is no requirement that the transferee court have jurisdiction over the plaintiff or that there be sufficient minimum contacts with the plaintiff.

Comment. The Federal Circuit was clearly correct to ignore the prior litigation. The law is also clear that the court of appeals is correct that whether the transferee court has personal jurisdiction over the plaintiff is irrelevant. As a matter of policy, however, it may be problematic to allow transfer of a case to a district that the plaintiff did not choose that would otherwise lack jurisdiction over that party had it been sued there. Even though black letter law also says that a plaintiff cannot complain that the forum it chose would lack personal jurisdiction over a counterclaim against it, should it be so clear that if the plaintiff has not chosen the forum, as in the Genentech case, that the question of jurisdiction over the plaintiff be disregarded so cavalierly? In Genentech, this was not an issue because the California companies had no affirmative claims to assert against Genentech. But, what if the defendants had claims to assert against the plaintiff?

The Federal Circuit noted that there is no requirement that there be personal jurisdiction over plaintiffs; all that is required is that the party seeking transfer has the burden of proving that the action could have been brought originally in the transferee district. It cited Hoffman v. Blaski, 363 U.S. 335, 343344, 80 S. Ct. 1084, 4 L. Ed. 2d 1254 (1960) (party seeking transfer has burden to establish that transferee court would have had subject-matter jurisdiction, defendants would have been subject to personal jurisdiction, and venue would have been proper at time the action was originally filed), for this point. In Hoffman, however, it was the defendants arguing that they would have waived their objections to the lack of personal jurisdiction in their preferred transferee court. And, the Court was concerned about allowing defendants to unfairly game plaintiffs out of their choice of forum:

The thesis urged by petitioners would not only do violence to the plain words of § 1404, but would also inject gross discrimination. That thesis, if adopted, would empower a District Court, upon a finding of convenience, to transfer an action to any district desired by the defendants and in which they were willing to waive their statutory defenses as to venue and jurisdiction over their persons, regardless of the fact that such transferee district was not one in which the action "might have been brought" by the plaintiff. Conversely, that thesis would not permit the court, upon motion of the plaintiffs and a like showing of convenience, to transfer the action to the same district, without the consent and waiver of venue and personal jurisdiction defenses by the defendants. Nothing in § 1404, or in its legislative history, suggests such a unilateral objective and we should not, under the guise of interpretation, ascribe to Congress any such discriminatory purpose.

Hoffman at 344. It would seem appropriate to allow a plaintiff to flip the Court's argument to prohibit transfer to a district where there would be no personal jurisdiction over a plaintiff if claims could be asserted against it.

Court Congestion. The district court had also found that administrative difficulties caused by court congestion weighed against transfer. The court cited statistics arguably showing that cases that proceeded to trial reached disposition somewhat more quickly in the Eastern District of Texas as opposed to the Northern District of California. The defendants argued that if all cases were considered, not just those that were tried, cases were disposed of more quickly in the Northern District of California. The court of appeals noted that the speed with which a case can be resolved may be a factor in the analysis, but that this factor was speculative, and in any event this single factor should not alone outweigh all the other factors.

Local Interest. Finally, the district court had noted that the Northern District of California had an interest in having the case resolved there, as one of the defendants was headquartered there. This factor therefore also favored transfer even though, as the Federal Circuit conceded, the people in the Eastern District of Texas had an interest in the outcome because allegedly infringing products were sold in the district.

Defendants Were Entitled to Mandamus Relief. The Federal Circuit, like all others, noted that mandamus is available only in extraordinary situations to correct a clear abuse of discretion or usurpation of judicial power. The party seeking mandamus must show that it has no other means of obtaining the relief desired, and that the right to issuance of the writ is clear and indisputable. The Federal Circuit noted that mandamus is available in appropriate cases to correct a patently erroneous denial of transfer.

Here, the convenience to the witnesses and parties, availability of compulsory attendance, and access to evidence factors all weighed significantly in favor of transfer. The local interest factor also weighed in favor of transfer. There was no reasonable argument that other factors outweighed these. The clearly more convenient forum was the Northern District of California. "In denying transfer, the district court clearly abused its discretion and produced a patently erroneous result. The district court (1) improperly applied the 100-mile' rule; (2) improperly substituted its own central proximity for a measure of the convenience of the witnesses and parties, and documents; (3) rigidly applied the law to prevent transfer to the more convenient forum; (4) glossed over the compulsory process factor; and (5) erroneously weighed two essentially irrelevant considerations."

Additionally, the defendants had demonstrated that they had no other means of obtaining relief. A party seeking mandamus for a denial of transfer has no adequate remedy by appeal because the party would not be able to show that it would have won the case had it been litigated in the other venue. Accordingly, the court of appeals granted the petition for writ of mandamus and ordered transfer to the Northern District of California.

Comment. In re Volkswagen made clear that when a trial judge issues a patently erroneous ruling, mandamus is available. And, in VW, the Fifth Circuit suggested that the district judge reached a patently erroneous decision that amounted to a clear abuse of discretion because he set the bar for granting the motion too high. The district judge had required Volkswagen to show that the § 1404(a) factors must "substantially outweigh" the plaintiffs' choice of venue. This was the proper standard because only if the balance of convenience and justice substantially weighs in favor of transfer should the plaintiff's choice of venue be trumped. The Fifth Circuit also noted that a writ should not issue to correct a "mere" abuse of discretion, but that a writ is appropriate to correct a "clear abuse of discretion." This distinction may not be susceptible to sharp definition in all cases, as the Fifth Circuit itself acknowledged.

Was the error in Genentech as clear as in VW? Is there anything else in VW that helps clarify the elusive distinction? As a general rule, the plaintiff's choice of forum is given significant weight and will not be disturbed unless the other factors weigh substantially in favor of transfer. At the same time, it is clear that even though the § 1404 transfer statute is derived from the common-law doctrine of forum non conveniens, the plaintiff's choice of venue is given less weight under § 1404 than was afforded under the common law doctrine because all that at stake is a transfer to another court in the federal system, as opposed to a dismissal that might result in having to bring a new suit in a foreign court.

The VW district court's "substantial weight" standard reflected the stricter forum non conveniens dismissal standard, and is therefore inappropriate in the § 1404 context. Instead, the plaintiff's choice of forum should be treated as a burden of proof matter. In other words, the weight given to the plaintiff's choice corresponds to the burden the moving party must meet to show that a transfer should be granted. The Fifth Circuit, concluded that this burden is merely "good cause." To show "good cause" means that a moving party, in order to support its claim for a transfer, must satisfy the statutory requirements and clearly demonstrate that a transfer is for the convenience of the parties and witnesses, in the interest of justice. Thus, "when the transferee venue is not clearly more convenient than the venue chosen by the plaintiff, the plaintiff's choice should be respected. When the movant demonstrates that the transferee venue is clearly more convenient, however, it has shown good cause and the district court should therefore grant the transfer." In Genentech, it would seem that the Federal Court correctly applied this standard.

Nonetheless, if the Fifth Circuit's approach, as embraced by the Federal Circuit, migrates to other courts of appeals, it is less likely that venue forum selection battles will be decided in the district courts. The party on the losing end of a motion to transfer will want to lobby the court of appeals to grant the writ. If other courts of appeals begin to more freely grant the writ, we are certain to see higher litigation costs and delay. Perhaps Congress ought to consider amending the convenience transfer statute to preclude appellate review, as it did in the case of removal. Under 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d), a decision by a district court to remand to state court may not be reviewed.

RELATED LINKS: For more information, see Moore's Federal Practice

- 17 Moore's Federal Practice (3d ed.) § 111.13[1];
- 17 Moore's Federal Practice (3d ed.) § 111.61

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

39 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Claim Preclusion: Vairo on Travelers Indem. Co. v. Bailey

2009 Emerging Issues 4182

Claim Preclusion: Vairo on Travelers Indem. Co. v. Bailey

By Georgene Vairo

August 27, 2009

SUMMARY: In Travelers Indem. Co. v. Bailey, the Supreme Court applied principles of claim preclusion to bar a collateral attack on the subject-matter jurisdiction of a bankruptcy court that had entered an order two decades earlier enjoining certain lawsuits against a debtors insurer. This Emerging Issues Analysis, written by Georgene Vairo, professor and author, summarizes this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Georgene Vairo on Travelers Indem. Co. v. Bailey

Summary. In Travelers Indem. Co. v. Bailey, -- U.S. --, 129 S. Ct. 2195, 174 L. Ed. 2d 99, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 4537, 77 U.S.L.W. 4523 (June 18, 2009), the Supreme Court applied principles of claim preclusion to bar a collateral attack on the subject-matter jurisdiction of a bankruptcy court that had entered an order two decades earlier enjoining certain lawsuits against a debtor's insurer. The opinion is significant because, on the one hand, it appears to favor the importance of finality, especially given the context of the complex, protracted asbestos litigation. On the other hand, however, it leaves open important questions about the actual power of a bankruptcy court to issue channeling injunctions barring claims against third parties. Thus, the power of a bankruptcy court to approve plans of reorganization that provide global peace, in asbestos cases in particular, and in other mass tort bankruptcies in general, remains very much an issue.

Background and Procedural History. For half a century, Johns-Manville Corporation (Manville) had been the largest U.S. supplier of asbestos and manufacturer of asbestos-containing products. By the early 1980s, as more became known about the link between asbestos exposure and respiratory disease, thousands of lawsuits had been filed against Manville. In 1982, facing the prospect of overwhelming liability, Manville filed for bankruptcy protection.

During the period leading up to a reorganization plan, Manville and its insurers litigated over the scope and limits of Manville's asbestos claim liability coverage; various personal injury claimants filed actions against the insurers; and the insurers themselves filed claims for contribution and indemnification against each other. The key element of Manville's 1986 reorganization plan ("Plan") was the establishment of the Manville Personal Injury Settlement Trust ("Trust"). The Plan channeled all asbestos claims against Manville to the Trust ("Policy Claims"). The "cornerstone" of the settlement leading to the Plan was an agreement among Manville's insurers to pay $770 million, $80 million of it from Travelers Indemnity Company and its affiliates (Travelers), to fund most of the initial corpus of the Trust.

In return, upon payment of the funds, the bankruptcy court order released the insurers from "any and all Policy Claims," and enjoined all actions of any kind for any Policy Claims against Manville's insurers, including Travelers. "Policy Claims" were defined broadly to include any type of claim "arising out of or relating to any or all" of the insurers' Manville asbestos liability policies.

Deal, or No Deal. Despite the 1986 injunction, over a decade later, plaintiffs began filing asbestos claims in state courts seeking to recover against Travelers, not indirectly for Manville's wrongdoing, but for Travelers' own alleged violations of state law. Travelers invoked the 1986 injunction and moved the bankruptcy court for an order enjoining these "Direct Action" state suits. After referring the parties to mediation, Travelers and some of the plaintiffs settled the Direct Actions, with Travelers paying $400 million to compensate the Direct Action claimants, contingent upon the bankruptcy court holding that the state court suits were within the scope of the 1986 injunction, and entering an order clarifying that these suits had been enjoined by the 1986 Orders ("Clarifying Order"). Yet, the settlement required the Direct Action claimants to grant Travelers a separate release apart from the protection accorded by the 1986 Orders. The bankruptcy court also made extensive factual findings, specifically that because all the Direct Action claims were predicated on what Travelers knew by virtue of its relationship with Manville, they arose out of or were related to Travelers' insurance relationship with Manville, and accordingly were barred by the 1986 Orders. In sum, the bankruptcy court said that the Direct Actions were, and always had been, barred by the 1986 Orders.

Some Direct Action claimants and another insurer with contribution claims against Travelers appealed. The district court affirmed, but the Second Circuit reversed. The court of appeals concluded that the bankruptcy court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to enter an order barring state court suit based on Travelers' own conduct and not on that of Manville, the bankruptcy debtor. Although the bankruptcy court had subject matter jurisdiction to enforce its 1986 Orders, it could not enjoin claims over which it had no jurisdiction. In other words, to the extent that the 1986 Orders barred or sought to bar claims such as the Direct Actions, the orders exceeded the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction.

Claim Preclusion Barred Collateral Attack on Jurisdiction to Enter 1986 Injunction. In a 7-2 decision delivered by Justice Souter, the Supreme Court reversed. Interpreting the terms of the 1986 injunction, the Supreme Court agreed with the bankruptcy court that the state-court suits against Travelers were within the scope of the injunction. And, because that order had been tested on direct review at the time, the order was immune to a collateral attack on subject matter grounds.

The Direct Actions Were Within the Scope of the 1986 Orders. The respondents had argued that the Clarifying Order improperly expanded the scope of the 1986 Orders to enjoin the Direct Actions. Their position was that the 1986 Orders only barred actions against insurers seeking to recover derivatively for Manville's wrongdoing, but not actions to recover for Travelers' own misconduct, no matter what its relationship to Travelers' coverage of Manville. However, the Supreme Court noted that the definition of Policy Claims in the 1986 Orders contained nothing limiting it to derivative actions. Rather, there was language in the 1986 Orders directly to the contrary. It not only enjoined expansively defined "Policy Claims" against the settling insurers, but also provided only one specific exception to its reach that did not include claims such as the Direct Actions.

The Supreme Court also rejected the argument that some parties to the Manville bankruptcy (including Travelers) understood the proposed injunction to bar only claims derivative of Manville's liability. The Court conceded that there was some evidence in the record supporting that contention. But, the Court said that because the plain terms of the 1986 Orders were clear and unambiguous, they had to be enforced and applied as stated. Indeed, in a nod to the power of the bankruptcy court, it noted that even if the 1986 Orders had been ambiguous legitimizing a look at the parties' contentions, the Court noted that numerous Courts of Appeals have held that a bankruptcy court's interpretation of its own confirmation order is entitled to substantial deference.

The 1986 Orders Were Final. The Second Circuit's ruling assumed that the Direct Actions were within the scope of the 1986 Orders. However, it held that the 1986 Orders could not be enforced according to their terms because, as the panel, including now-Justice Sonia Sotomayor, saw it, the Bankruptcy Court had exceeded its jurisdiction when it issued the orders in 1986. In overturning the decision below, the Second Circuit concluded that "the bankruptcy court erred insofar as it enjoined suits that, as a matter of state law, are predicated upon an independent duty owed by Travelers to Appellants, that do not claim against the res of the Manville estate, and that seek damages in excess of and unrelated to Manville's insurance policy proceeds." The Supreme Court decided that it was error for the court of appeals to reevaluate the Bankruptcy Court's exercise of jurisdiction in 1986.

The Supreme Court noted that on direct appeal of the 1986 injunction, anyone who objected was free to argue that the bankruptcy court had exceeded its jurisdiction, and the district court or court of appeals could have raised such concerns sua sponte. But, once the 1986 injunctive order became final on direct review (whether or not it was a proper exercise of bankruptcy court jurisdiction and power), it became res judicata to the parties and those in privity with them, not only as to matters that were offered and received to sustain or defeat them, but as to any other admissible matter that might have been offered for those purposes [see Nevada v. United States, 463 U.S. 110, 130, 103 S. Ct. 2906, 77 L. Ed. 2d 509 (1983)].

The Supreme Court explained that the 1986 injunctive order was not any the less preclusive because the attack was on the bankruptcy court's conformity with its subject-matter jurisdiction; subject-matter jurisdiction ordinarily is immune from collateral attack [see Kontrick v. Ryan, 540 U.S. 443, 455 n.9, 124 S. Ct. 906, 157 L. Ed. 2d 867, 2004 U.S. LEXIS 663 (Jan. 14, 2004)]. Thus, so long as the state-court plaintiffs/respondents or those in privity with them were parties to the Manville bankruptcy proceeding, and were given a fair chance to challenge the bankruptcy court's subject-matter jurisdiction then, they could not challenge it in the present case by resisting enforcement of the 1986 injunctive order.

The Supreme Court acknowledged that it had recognized rare exceptions to the general prohibition of collateral attacks on subject-matter jurisdiction [see, e.g., United States v. United States Fid. & Guar. Co., 309 U.S. 506, 514, 60 S. Ct. 653, 84 L. Ed. 894 (1940) (collateral attack on subject-matter jurisdiction is permissible when issue is waiver of sovereign immunity); Kalb v. Feuerstein, 308 U.S. 433, 439-440, 444, 60 S. Ct. 343, 84 L. Ed. 370 (1940) (when debtor's petition for relief was pending in bankruptcy court and federal statute affirmatively divested other courts of jurisdiction to continue foreclosure proceedings, state-court foreclosure judgment was subject to collateral attack)]. Neither of these exceptions applied in this case. In addition, the Restatement (Second) of Judgments describes three circumstances in which a collateral attack on subject-matter jurisdiction might be permissible: (1) when the exercise of subject-matter jurisdiction was a manifest abuse of authority; (2) when allowing the judgment to stand would substantially infringe the authority of another tribunal or agency; and (3) when the judgment was rendered by a court lacking the capability to make an adequately informed determination of a question concerning its own jurisdiction, and as a matter of procedural fairness the party seeking to avoid the judgment should have opportunity belatedly to attack the court's subject-matter jurisdiction [Restatement (Second) of Judgments § 12 (1982)]. But none of the exceptions described in the Restatement was asserted in this case, and it was not apparent how any of them might apply, so the Supreme Court had no occasion to decide whether to adopt the Restatement exceptions.

Comment. It is important to note what the Supreme Court was doing and what it was not doing. It, as discussed below, was not ruling on the merits of the question whether the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to enter an order barring the Direct Actions. Rather, it simply was ruling that neither it, nor the Second Circuit had jurisdiction now to review that issue. Indeed, the Supreme Court noted that if the case before it and the Second Circuit had been a direct review of the 1986 Orders, the Second Circuit (and of course the district court) would have been duty bound to consider whether the Bankruptcy Court had acted beyond its subject-matter jurisdiction [see Arbaugh v. Y & H Corp., 546 U.S. 500, 514, 126 S. Ct. 1235, 163 L. Ed. 2d 1097 (2006); Mansfield, C. & L. M. R. Co. v. Swan, 111 U.S. 379, 382, 4 S. Ct. 510, 28 L. Ed. 462 (1884)]. But, the Court noted, the 1986 Orders had become final on direct review over two decades before. Accordingly, the question whether the Bankruptcy Court had jurisdiction and authority to enter the 1986 Orders, including the injunctions barring suits against the insurers was not properly before the Second Circuit in 2008, and was not properly before the Supreme Court now.

Dissent. Justice Stevens, joined by Justice Ginsburg, dissented, essentially agreeing with the respondents that the terms of the 1986 injunction did not bar state-court suits against Travelers based on its own misconduct. Therefore, because in his view the injunction never meant to bar such suits, Justice Stevens opined that the state-court plaintiffs' current challenge to the injunction was not an impermissible collateral attack on the bankruptcy court's subject-matter jurisdiction.

Narrow Holding. Both the majority opinion and the dissent took a relatively simplistic approach. By reading the 1986 Orders to include direct actions, but finding that the orders were final and not subject to a collateral attack on the subject matter jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court to issue the order in 1986, or to enforce it in 2004, the majority was able to side step the important question of whether the bankruptcy courts have the power to enjoin actions against non-debtors. By reading the 1986 Orders to exclude the Direct Actions, the dissent also was able to avoid the issue.

Thus, it is significant to note that the Supreme Court concluded by emphasizing the narrowness of its holding. Most importantly, the Court's decision in this case did not resolve whether the bankruptcy court, in 1986 or now, could properly enjoin claims against a nondebtor insurer that are not based on the insured debtor's conduct, but rather its own conduct.

Additionally, the Court did not decide whether any particular state court plaintiff is bound by the 1986 injunction. On remand, any such plaintiff could show, for example, that it had not received constitutionally sufficient notice of the 1986 injunctive order and so would not be barred. Given especially Justice Ginsburg's well-known bent towards protecting due process rights, see, for example, Amchem Prods. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 117 S. Ct. 2231, 138 L. Ed. 2d 689 (1997) (writing majority opinion striking down asbestos class action settlement), the majority as well as the dissent are making it plain that that parties to a mass tort settlement will never know for sure exactly who is, and isn't bound by such settlements.

Damned if You Do, Damned if You Don't. It is difficult at times to envision litigation that may or may not be barred by a particular order enjoining future lawsuits. As a practical matter, what was Travelers to do when faced with the Direct Actions? Having thought it was protected by the 1986 Orders, why would it pay $400 million more in 2004 to compensate the Direct Action claimants, $320 million more than it paid into the Trust fund in 1986, and why would it seek a separate release from the Direct Action claimants? Travelers was between the rock and a hard place. Although it thought it had bought global peace for itself in 1986, cases were still coming down the pike. It was obviously good strategy to return to the bankruptcy court to enjoin the Direct Actions. But, to put the matter behind it once and for all, Travelers agreed to put up another $320 million and require separate releases. Such careful lawyering to buy peace ironically provided the argument accepted by the dissent that the 2004 order was broader than the 1986 Orders.

What The Court Is Telling Us. It is fair to read the majority opinion as a strong endorsement of the principle of finality. Once a judgment is in, and an opportunity for direct review has been afforded, the Supreme Court will allow a possible error on the merits and leave it to another day for another litigant to present the issue. On the other hand, the Court -- majority and dissent -- leaves open the question as to who will be bound by the judgment. In 2008, the Supreme Court decided a preclusion case, Taylor v. Sturgell, -- U.S. --, 128 S. Ct. 2161, 171 L. Ed. 2d 155, 2008 U.S. LEXIS 4885, 76 U.S.L.W. 4453 (June 12, 2008)]. It unanimously interred the emerging use of the "virtual representation" theory as a basis for applying claim preclusion or issue preclusion against a litigant who was not a party to the earlier judgment. Justice Ginsburg's opinion explored the general rule against binding nonparties and the evolution of various theories creating exceptions to that rule, drawing a bright line clarifying the limited situations when a nonparty is bound by an earlier judgment.

The Supreme Court has closely guarded the idea that everyone should have his or her own day in court. Indeed, Justices to the left on the Court, such as Justice Ginsburg herself, and to the right, such as Justice Scalia, have been equally firm in protecting the day-in-court principle despite concerns about finality and efficiency. In this sense, the Taylor opinion can be seen as a twin to Justice Ginsburg's opinion in Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 117 S. Ct. 2231, 138 L. Ed. 2d 689, 1997 U.S. LEXIS 4032 (1997), in which she, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist, and Justices Scalia, Thomas, Kennedy and Souter, vacated the class action settlement that could have largely ended the asbestos litigation chiefly because of conflicts among class members that resulted in inadequate representation of the class. Similarly, in Dow Chemical Co. v. Stephenson, 539 U.S. 111; 123 S. Ct. 2161; 156 L. Ed. 2d 106; 2003 U.S. LEXIS 4576 (2003), an equally divided court affirmed a Second Circuit case overturning a district court opinion in the Agent Orange litigation that would have barred non-military class members from collaterally attacking the Agent Orange Settlement, also on the grounds of inadequate representation. From these cases, it is clear that the Court will continue to adhere to a formalistic protection of the right to a day in court.

Conclusion. The Second Circuit's ruling certainly injected additional uncertainty about the scope of a bankruptcy court's jurisdiction to enter third-party channeling injunctions. Unfortunately, the Supreme Court did not resolve the question on the minds of many practitioners who had hoped that the Court would provide an answer to whether a bankruptcy court has broad jurisdiction to enter such channeling injunctions, thereby preserving the expectations of the parties to the settlement and their privies.

RELATED LINKS: For more information, see Moore's Federal Practice

■ 18 Moore's Federal Practice (3d ed.) § 131.30[1][d]

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

40 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Remand on Supplemental Claims: Vairo on Carlsbad Tech. Inc v. HIF Bio Inc.

2008 Emerging Issues 1602

Remand on Supplemental Claims: Vairo on Carlsbad Tech. Inc v. HIF Bio Inc.

By Georgene Vairo

July 29, 2009

SUMMARY: The courts of appeals have been divided on the issue of whether 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d) precludes appellate review of a decision to remand state law claims supported by supplemental jurisdiction. The recent opinion by the U.S. Supreme Court in the Carlsbad Tech. v. HIF Bio decision, resolves this question. This commentary, written by Georgene Vairo, Professor, author and editor, analyzes the U.S. Supreme Court's decision.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Georgene Vairo on Carlsbad Technology, Inc. v. HIF Bio, Inc.

Summary. Carlsbad Technology, Inc. v. HIF Bio, Inc., -- U.S. --, 129 S. Ct. 1862, 173 L. Ed. 2d 843, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 3304 (May 4, 2009), resolves the question as to whether 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d) precludes appellate review of a decision to remand state law claims supported by supplemental jurisdiction. The question had divided the courts of appeals. As a matter of first impression for the circuit, the Federal Circuit in the case below had parted ways with a number of its sister circuits by holding that a remand based on the district court's decision to decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction is not reviewable on appeal. HIF Bio, Inc. v. Yung Shin Pharm. Indus. Co., 508 F.3d 659 (Fed. Cir. 2007).

Procedural Facts. Carlsbad involved a novel anti-angiogenic, anti-cancer application discovered by two Korean scientists. Two companies that obtained the rights to license the application sued a number of individuals, HIF Bio, and other companies in a California state court. They alleged causes of action for violation of the federal Racketeer Influence and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) [18 U.S.C. § 1961], as well as state law violations of rights and ownership of invention, slander of title, conversion, fraud, intentional and negligent interference with contractual relations and prospective economic advantage, breach of implied contract, unfair competition and fraudulent business practices, and unjust enrichment-constructive trust. HIF Bio removed the entire case under 28 U.S.C. § 1441(c), which allows such removal when the case includes at least one federal questions claim under 28 U.S.C. § 1331.

The district court dismissed the RICO claim for failure to adequately allege a pattern of racketeering. The district court found that the rights and ownership of invention claims were state-law claims lacking an independent federal jurisdiction basis. Under the supplemental jurisdiction statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c), the court then declined supplemental jurisdiction over all state-law claims because the preponderance of state law issues means that a state court is the proper venue to try the state law claims" and remanded the case to state court. HIF Bio, Inc. v. Yung Shin Pharm. Indus. Co., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97002, at *10 (C.D. Cal. June 9, 2006). The Federal Circuit dismissed the appeal, holding that it did not have appellate jurisdiction. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that a remand after declining to exercise supplemental jurisdiction is not a remand based on lack of subject matter jurisdiction, and therefore is not subject to the appellate review bar of § 1447(c) and (d).

Review of Remand Decision Basics. Section 1447(d) provides that [a]n order remanding a case to the State court from which it was removed is not reviewable on appeal or otherwise." One might think, as it seems all the opinions in the Supreme Court's Carlsbad opinion believe, that this is a straightforward prohibition on appellate review of any remand decision.

However, the Supreme Court previously had limited the scope of § 1447(d)'s non-reviewability principle. First, and most significantly, in Thermtron Products, Inc. v. Hermansdorfer, 423 U.S. 336, 345346, 96 S. Ct. 584, 46 L. Ed. 2d 542 (1976), the Court reasoned that § 1447(d) must be read in pari materia with, and thus be limited by the grounds enumerated in, § 1447(c). Section 1447(c) requires that a motion to remand based on any defect other than a lack of subject matter jurisdiction be made within 30 days, and also requires the district court to remand if at any time before entry of final judgment it appears that the court lacks subject matter jurisdiction. In Quackenbush v. Allstate Ins. Co., 517 U.S. 706, 116 S. Ct. 1712, 135 L. Ed. 2d 1 (1996), the Supreme Court thus clarified that § 1447(d) bars appellate review only if the remand decision is based on a lack of subject matter jurisdiction or a defect in the removal process. Accordingly, as in Thermtron, a remand decision based on an overly crowded docket was reviewable; and, as in Quackenbush, a remand decision based on abstention was reviewable.

In other words, the Supreme Court tells us that if the remand decision is based on any other ground other than a lack of subject matter jurisdiction or a defect in the removal process, § 1447(d) does not bar appellate review of the remand decision. Only one problem: determining whether a remand decision is based on a lack of jurisdiction. That is the problem raised by Carlsbad: is a remand based on a refusal to exercise supplemental jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c) based on a lack of jurisdiction? If so, it is not subject to appellate review. Two later Supreme Court decisions informed the Federal Circuit's contrarian approach.

Are Remands of Supplemental Claims Based on a Lack of Jurisdiction? When a district court remands claims supported by supplemental jurisdiction because it is declining to exercise such jurisdiction, is the remand based on a lack of subject matter jurisdiction, which would bar appellate review of the decision? Most courts of appeals that had examined this question ruled that § 1447(d) does not act as a bar. [see, e.g., Trans Penn Wax Corp. v. McCandless, 50 F.3d 217, 223224 (3d Cir. 1995). These decisions were primarily based on a footnote in Carnegie-Mellon Univ. v. Cohill stating that [Section] 1447(c) . . . do[es] not apply to cases over which a federal court has pendent jurisdiction," 484 U.S. 343, 355 n. 11, 108 S. Ct. 614, 98 L. Ed. 2d 720 (1988). The circuits reasoned that if § 1447(c) does not apply to cases over which a federal court has pendent jurisdiction, a remand order based on declining supplemental jurisdiction also is not within the class of remands described in § 1447(c) and, therefore, is not subject to the bar on review in § 1447(d).

The law seemed to be clear -- a remand based on a declination of supplemental jurisdiction is not barred by § 1447(d). This approach made sense. Assuming that the state law claims were so related to the federal claims asserted in the case that they would be supported by supplemental jurisdiction under § 1367(a) (as the claims in Carlsbad were), the district court unquestionably had subject matter jurisdiction over those state law claims. The only relevant question then, would be whether the district court would decide whether to exercise such jurisdiction. Section 1367(c) provides that a district court may decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction under certain circumstances. With all the circuits having weighed in on this issue, why did the Federal Circuit rule that § 1447(d) barred review of remands based on § 1367(c)? And, why did the Supreme Court grant cert?

Ambiguous Supreme Court Subject Matter Jurisdiction Jurisprudence. The Federal Circuit questioned the other circuits' reliance on the Cohill footnote because of a more recent statement by the Supreme Court. In particular, the Federal Circuit noted the Court's statement in Powerex Corp. v. Reliant Energy Servs., Inc., 551 U.S. 224, 234-235, 127 S. Ct. 2411, 168 L. Ed. 2d 112 (2007): It is far from clear . . . that when discretionary supplemental jurisdiction is declined the remand is not based on lack of subject-matter jurisdiction for purposes of § 1447(c) and § 1447(d)." What Powerex adds to the supplemental jurisdiction issue is its holding that a remand order is unreviewable if it can be colorably characterized" as a remand based on lack of subject matter jurisdiction.

Therefore, the Federal Circuit distinguished remands based on abstention, which are reviewable under Quackenbush, from remands based on declining supplemental jurisdiction. The court acknowledged that the considerations underlying abstention may in some cases be similar to those enumerated for declining supplemental jurisdiction under § 1367, and both are discretionary doctrines that allow a district court to decline jurisdiction. However, the court reasoned that the two types of remands are fundamentally different in that a court abstains from hearing claims over which it has an independent basis for subject matter jurisdiction, such as federal question or diversity jurisdiction, while a court declines to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a claim for which it has no independent basis for subject matter jurisdiction, i.e., state claims.

Thus, declining supplemental jurisdiction strips the claims of the only basis on which the district court had jurisdiction. Without the cloak of supplemental jurisdiction," state claims must be remanded for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The court concluded that because every § 1367(c) remand necessarily involves a predicate finding that the claims at issue lack an independent basis of subject matter jurisdiction, the remand can be colorably characterized as a remand based on lack of subject matter jurisdiction, and thus is within the class of remands described in § 1447(c) and for which appellate review is barred by § 1447(d).

The Federal Circuit approach of characterizing a § 1367(c) remand as colorably characterized as a remand for lack of subject matter jurisdiction provided the reason for Supreme Court review. The majority opinion written by Justice Thomas seems to restore the status quo ante -- meaning the way things were before the Federal Circuit read Powerex for all it might be worth. But, his opinion, as well as the three concurring opinions by Justices Scalia; Stevens; and Breyer, joined by Justice Souter; illustrate the mess that Thermtron created, as exacerbated by Powerex. In other words, it needed to square the express prohibition of § 1447(d) with its earlier opinions putting certain matters beyond the prohibition.

Obsessing About Subject Matter Jurisdiction. It is true that courts must obsess about whether they have subject matter jurisdiction over a case, be it original jurisdiction or appellate jurisdiction. After setting forth the black letter understanding of the interplay between §§ 1447(d) and (c) discussed above, Justice Thomas notes that [s]ubject matter jurisdiction defines a court's authority to hear a given type of case. Carlsbad, 173 L. Ed. 2d at 848, quoting, United States v. Morton, 467 U.S. 822, 828, 104 S. Ct. 2769, 81 L. Ed. 2d 680 (1984). He then states the issue before the Court to be whether a remand order based on § 1367(c) is a remand based on a lack of subject matter jurisdiction for the purpose of § 1447(c) and (d). He declared that it is not. Indeed, he is correct in noting that a district court has subject matter jurisdiction -- supplemental jurisdiction under § 1367(a) -- over state law claims that lack an independent federal subject matter jurisdiction basis if such claims are part of the same case and controversy as the federal claims. There is jurisdiction over such claims. The question is whether the court will exercise such jurisdiction or decline to do so as provided in § 1367(c). Section 1367(c) provides that a court may decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction in enumerated circumstances. In other words, a court's exercise of its discretion under § 1367(c) is not a jurisdictional matter. Thus, the court's determination may be reviewed for abuse of discretion, but may not be raised at any time as a jurisdictional defect. Id. at 849, quoting, 16 J. Moore et al., Moore's Federal Practice § 106.05[4] (3d ed. 2009).

Because there was no dispute that the federal court had original jurisdiction over the RICO claims, and because the state law claims were proper supplemental claims, Justice Thomas found that the remand could not be colorably characterized as a lack of subject matter jurisdiction, and therefore, was not subject to the § 1447(d) bar against appellate review. He certainly was correct about that. Why, then, were three concurring opinions filed?

Time to Overrule Thermtron? The Federal Circuit decision was significant because it went against the grain of every previous court of appeals decision on the question whether remand decisions based on a declination of supplemental jurisdiction are reviewable. The Federal Circuit read Powerex as reinvigorating the essence of § 1447(d), and specifically Congress' goal of putting the reviewability of remand decision off-limits. This point was embraced by all the concurring opinions. First, Justice Stevens recalled former Chief Justice Rehnquist's dissent in Thermtron: The Court of Appeals not unreasonably believed that 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d) means what it says. Id. at 850. Justice Stevens wrote that if he had been writing on a clean slate, he would honor the text of § 1447(d). However, he then served a lob at some of his colleagues by stating that the Court's adherence to precedent in this case represents a welcome departure from its sometimes single-minded focus on literal text. Id. at 850851.

Next, Justice Scalia called for a reconsideration of Thermtron, finding that it was questionable in its day. Id. at 851. He stated further that the Court has created over the years a hodgepodge of jurisdictional rules that have no evident basis even in common sense. Id. He then shot back at Justice Stevens: If this muddle represents a welcome departure from literal text, . . . , the world is mad. Id.

Finally, somewhat picking up on the madness noted by Justice Scalia, Justice Breyer, joined by Justice Souter, contrasted the decision with Powerex itself. Powerex involved a complicated federal jurisdiction issue: whether a foreign entity that removed a state court case against it was entitled to sovereign immunity. The district court resolved the issue against the entity and remanded the case to state court. In Powerex, the Supreme Court held that the immunity question was colorably characterized as jurisdictional and therefore, appellate review was barred by § 1447(d). In contrast, in Carlsbad, the Court allowed review of a simple issue involving discretion. As Justice Breyer put it, we have held that § 1447 permits review of a district court decision in an instance where that decision is unlikely to be wrong and where a wrong decision is unlikely to work serious harm. And we have held that § 1447 forbids review of a district court decision in an instance where that decision may well be wrong and where a wrong decision could work considerable harm. Unless the circumstances I describe are unusual, something is wrong. Id. at 852. Unfortunately, he notes that such circumstances are not all that unusual, and therefore suggests that experts in this area of the law reexamine the matter with an eye toward determining whether statutory revision is appropriate. Id.

Indeed, Justice Breyer's opinion deftly illustrates the problematic nature of the Court's decisions on appellate review of remand decisions: those regarding subject-matter jurisdiction, which typically are more likely to be difficult and significant, may not be reviewed, while discretionary decisions that are less likely to be wrong or harmful may be appealed.

Justice Thomas also noted that the parties had not raised the issue whether Thermtron ought to be overruled. Thus, it appears that all members of the Court believe that Thermtron should go. It remains to be seen whether the Court will do the job itself, having invited attorneys to raise the issue, or, more likely, leave it to Congress, as Justice Breyer suggests, to fix § 1447(d).

RELATED LINKS: For further information, see Moore's Federal Practice:

- 16 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 106.05[4];
- 16 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 107.44[2][d];
- 19 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 202.11[5];
- 19 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 205.08[1]

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

41 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Jurisdiction -- Motion to Compel Arbitration: Vairo on Vaden v. Discover Bank

2008 Emerging Issues 2371

Jurisdiction -- Motion to Compel Arbitration: Georgene Vairo on Vaden v. Discover Bank

By Georgene Vairo

July 29, 2009

SUMMARY: The U.S. Supreme Court recently resolved a split in the courts of appeals regarding how a federal district court determines whether it has subject matter jurisdiction over a petition to compel arbitration in Vaden v. Discover Bank. All members of the Court agreed with a "look through" the petition approach, but disagreed sharply on how to apply it. This commentary by Georgene Vairo, professor and author, reviews this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Georgene Vairo on Vaden v. Discover Bank

Summary. Vaden v. Discover Bank, -- U.S. --, 129 S. Ct. 1262, 173 L. Ed. 2d 206 (Mar. 9, 2009), resolves a split in the courts of appeals regarding how a federal district court determines whether it has subject matter jurisdiction over a petition to compel arbitration pursuant to Section 4 of the Federal Arbitration Act (FAA) [9 U.S.C. § 4].

All members of the Court agreed with a look through the petition approach, but disagreed sharply on how to apply it. Both the majority opinion, written by Justice Ginsburg, and the dissenting opinion, written by Chief Justice Roberts, make compelling arguments, based on the language of § 4, for their differing takes on applying the look through the petition approach. Indeed, their dueling opinions are a bit like ships passing in the night. Or, perhaps, more appropriately with apologies to Lewis Carroll, they present different ways of going Through the Looking-Glass of the wonderful world of federal jurisdiction: Which controversy of the parties must the court consider? Although the arguable basis for federal jurisdiction in the Vaden case was federal question jurisdiction, the approach taken by the Court would apply in diversity cases as well.

Facts and Procedural Background. A bank sued a credit card holder in state court alleging state claims seeking to recover past-due charges. The card holder counterclaimed, alleging that the bank's finance charges, interest, and late fees violated state law. The bank responded to the counterclaims by filing a federal district court petition to compel arbitration under Section 4 of the FAA [9 U.S.C. § 4]. The district court ordered arbitration, and the Fourth Circuit affirmed [Discover Bank v. Vaden, 489 F.3d 594 (4th Cir. 2007)], both finding that federal jurisdiction existed because, as Vaden conceded, the state law counterclaims she alleged were completely preempted by federal law.

The Supreme Court split along relatively unusual lines. In an opinion by Justice Ginsburg, joined by Justices Scalia, Kennedy, Souter, and Thomas, the Supreme Court reversed the Fourth Circuit's judgment and remanded the case for further proceedings. Chief Justice Roberts, joined by Justices Stevens, Breyer, and Alito, concurred in part and dissented in part.

Determining an Independent Basis for Federal Jurisdiction. Section 4 of the FAA provides that petitions to compel arbitration may be brought before any United States district court which, save for such agreement, would have jurisdiction under title 28 . . . of the subject matter of a suit arising out of the controversy between the parties [9 U.S.C. § 4]. The FAA itself does not confer federal jurisdiction; rather the court must find an independent basis for jurisdiction. The bank argued that the district court had federal question jurisdiction [see 28 U.S.C. § 1331] because the card holder's state law counterclaims were completely preempted by § 27(a) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act (FDIA) [12 U.S.C. § 1831d(a)]. The district court and the Fourth Circuit agreed. The question for the Supreme Court was whether the lower courts correctly found federal question jurisdiction.

There was no disagreement on the Court regarding the basic black-letter jurisdictional rules: Yes, the FAA requires an independent jurisdictional basis. Yes, the district court must comply with all other basic jurisdictional principles, such as the well-pleaded complaint rule [see Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Mottley, 211 U.S. 149 (1908)], including the rule that federal jurisdiction cannot be based on a federal counterclaim. [see Holmes Group, Inc. v. Vornado Air Circulation Systems, Inc., 535 U.S. 826, 830-832, 122 S. Ct. 1889, 153 L. Ed. 2d 13 (2002)]. Yes, under § 4 of the FAA, the district court must determine whether the controversy between the parties arises under federal law or some other basis for federal jurisdiction. And, there was no disagreement on the precise issue facing the Court: Based on the language of § 4 of the FAA, the district court must look through the petition to compel arbitration to determine whether it is predicated on a controversy that arises under federal law, giving rise to federal question jurisdiction.

The Court acknowledged that the look through approach had been rejected by most of the Courts of Appeals that had addressed the question [compare Wisconsin v. Ho-Chunk Nation, 463 F.3d 655, 659 (7th Cir. 2006); Smith Barney, Inc. v. Sarver, 108 F.3d 92, 94 (6th Cir. 1997); and Prudential-Bache Securities, Inc. v. Fitch, 966 F.2d 981, 986-989 (5th Cir. 1992) (all rejecting look through approach) with Community State Bank v. Strong, 485 F.3d 597, 605-606, vacated, reh'g en banc granted, 508 F.3d 576 (11th Cir. 2007) and Discover Bank v. Vaden, 396 F.3d 366, 369-370 (4th Cir. 2005) (both holding that court may look through petition to underlying dispute)].

However, the alternative, considering the relevant controversy between the parties to be the dispute about arbitrability, ignores the phrase save for [the arbitration] agreement in § 4. Moreover, under that approach, federal courts could entertain § 4 petitions only if a federal question suit were already before the court, diversity requirements were satisfied, or the dispute over arbitrability involved a maritime contract. According to the majority, party who could file a federal question suit or remove such a suit to federal court would not have access to federal courts. In contrast, the look through approach allows a § 4 petitioner to ask a federal court to compel arbitration without first seeking federal adjudication of the very questions it wants to arbitrate.

Comment. It makes eminent sense to employ the look through approach. However, the majority ignored an important point made in an opinion that rejected the look through approach that, in turn, led the majority to adopt the overly restrictive approach to the controversy the court needs to look to in determining whether there is federal jurisdiction. In Wisconsin v. Ho-Chunk Nation, 463 F.3d 655, 661 (7th Cir. 2006), the Seventh Circuit had noted that even though it had determined that the plaintiff's complaint failed to provide a basis for subject matter jurisdiction, it did not hold that these facts are impervious to jurisdiction. Rather, it held out the possibility that either party might have been able to craft a complaint that stated a federal question or even that the plaintiff should have been permitted to amend its complaint to allege a federal claim.

This suggests the underlying reason why the majority opinion and dissent diverge: a dispute about what controversy between the parties rules. Is it the controversy set forth in the underlying litigation? Or, is it the controversy that the petitioner seeks to arbitrate? The Court reasoned that the phrase save for [the arbitration] agreement in § 4 means that the court should determine whether it would have jurisdiction over the controversy between the parties if there were no arbitration agreement. However, according to the majority, the most straightforward meaning of the controversy between the parties is the substantive conflict between the parties before the state court. Thus, the federal court should determine whether that substantive conflict between the parties arises under federal law. The concurring and dissenting justices agreed that the district court should look through the petition, though they disagreed with respect to what controversy the court should be looking to.

The reason why the majority could reason as it did is because it postulated that the case involved two questions: Should a district court, if asked to compel arbitration pursuant to § 4, look through' the petition and grant the requested relief if the court would have federal-question jurisdiction over the underlying controversy? And if the answer to that question is yes, may a district court exercise jurisdiction over a § 4 petition when the petitioner's complaint rests on state law but an actual or potential counterclaim rests on federal law? (italics added). In other words, the majority looked to the actual procedural history prior to the bank's filing of the petition to compel arbitration, rather than any hypothetical litigation that could have been filed. According to the majority, if a complaint is filed before a petition to compel arbitration is filed, the federal court is stuck with the procedural posture of the case.

The bottom line under the majority approach, therefore, is that when a district court is asked to compel arbitration, it should look through the petition to determine whether it has jurisdiction to compel arbitration. In other words, the specific dispute the petition raises for arbitration is not the relevant dispute for jurisdictional purposes. Rather, it must look through to the underlying litigation.

Court May Not Look Past Complaint to Counterclaim. Because the FAA does not enlarge federal jurisdiction, the Court interpreted § 4 to permit a federal district court to entertain a petition to compel arbitration if the entire, actual controversy between the parties,' as they have framed it, could be litigated in federal court. In this case, the bank's state-law claim on the credit card debt could not be litigated in federal court. Therefore, the bank's § 4 petition had to be dismissed.

The Fourth Circuit erred, the Supreme Court held, in looking past the bank's complaint to the card holder's counterclaims to find a basis for federal question jurisdiction. The Court explained that under the well-pleaded complaint rule, a suit arises under federal law for purposes of federal question jurisdiction only if the plaintiff's statement of the plaintiff's own cause of action shows that it is based on federal law; a counterclaim based on federal law does not establish federal question jurisdiction [Holmes Group, Inc. v. Vornado Air Circulation Systems, Inc., 535 U.S. 826, 830<n>832, 122 S. Ct. 1889, 153 L. Ed. 2d 13 (2002)]. An exception to the well-pleaded complaint rule, known as the complete preemption doctrine, permits removal to federal court of a cause of action that was pleaded by the plaintiff as a state cause of action if the law governing the cause of action is exclusively federal [see Beneficial Nat. Bank v. Anderson, 539 U.S. 1, 8, 123 S. Ct. 2058, 156 L. Ed. 2d 1 (2003)]. However, because counterclaims cannot establish federal question jurisdiction, this exception does not apply to a state-law based counterclaim, even if it is governed exclusively by federal law. A completely preempted counterclaim remains a counterclaim, and thus does not give rise to federal question jurisdiction.

Applying the well-pleaded complaint rule of Mottley, and the ignore the federal counterclaim rule of Vornado, the district court may not look past a state-law complaint over which a federal court does not have jurisdiction to base jurisdiction on a completely preempted counterclaim even when the petitioner is seeking arbitration of that federal claim. But, this made no sense to Chief Justice Roberts. For good reason.

Dissent's Approach. First of all, as Chief Justice Roberts explains in his dissent, often a § 4 petition is filed before any state or federal lawsuit is filed. Thus, there is no underlying action to look through when determining whether there is federal jurisdiction under § 4. Accordingly, he argued that the controversy to which § 4 refers is the dispute the petitioner seeks to arbitrate. In this case, that is the dispute raised by the counterclaims, i.e., whether the bank charged illegal finance charges, interest, and late fees. The resolution of that controversy is controlled by federal law [see 12 U.S.C. § 1831d(a)]. Therefore, the dissent concluded, a federal court would have jurisdiction . . . of the subject matter of a suit arising out of the controversy the bank seeks to arbitrate.

According to the dissent, the fact that a complaint alleging a state-law claim was filed first and the federal causes of action were filed as counterclaims is a mere fortuity that should not deflect the court's focus from the controversy the petitioner seeks to arbitrate. The dissent reasoned that in other sections of the FAA, controversy means the specific dispute asserted to be subject to arbitration [see, e.g., 9 U.S.C. §§ 2, 10(a)(3), 11(C)]. There is no reason to construe it differently in § 4 to refer to the entire controversy between the parties, including parts of the controversy that the petitioner does not seek to arbitrate.

The dissent also faulted the majority for interpreting § 4 in a way that will lead to inconsistent results depending on whether suit is filed before the petition to arbitrate and, if so, on what claim the suit is based. If, for example, the card holder had filed her completely preempted state-law claims first, and the bank had brought the debt-collection action as a counterclaim, the district court would have had jurisdiction over a petition to arbitrate. Similarly, if no complaint had been filed before the petition to arbitrate was filed, the court would have looked to the controversy sought to be arbitrated, i.e., the completely preempted claims. In contrast, if the controversy were deemed to be the dispute the petitioner sought to arbitrate, the result would be consistent regardless of the sequence or existence of pre-petition complaints.

Comment. The majority criticized the dissent's approach as hypothesizing discrete controversies of its own design rather than focusing on the whole controversy as framed by the parties. Perhaps events could have unfolded differently, the Court allowed, but § 4 does not invite federal courts to dream up counterfactuals when actual litigation has defined the parties' controversy. But, as Chief Justice Roberts pointed out in his dissent, federal courts are required to do just that whenever a party seeks a declaratory judgment. Whether there is federal question jurisdiction over a declaratory judgment action depends on the coercive actions that the parties could have brought [see Franchise Tax Bd. of Cal. v. Construction Laborers Vacation Trust for Southern Cal., 463 U.S. 1, 19, 103 S. Ct. 2841, 77 L. Ed. 2d 420 (1983)] (jurisdiction over a declaratory judgment action exists when, "if the declaratory judgment defendant brought a coercive action to enforce its rights, that suit would necessarily present a federal question" (emphasis added)). The specific controversy outlined in Discover's § 4 petition (whether its fees violate the FDIA), could have been the basis for a lawsuit in which Vaden would claim the FDIA has been violated and Discover would claim it has not.

Perhaps the majority was concerned about opening the floodgates. It made a point of noting that the case between Discover and Vaden involved garden variety state law claims, and suggested that adopting the dissent's approach would enable parties to manufacture federal jurisdiction. Moreover, the majority argued, the petitioner's statement of the issues to be arbitrated might not convey the full flavor of the parties' entire dispute, which would divert the court from recognizing the actual dimensions of the controversy. Finally, according to the majority, the dissent's inquiry could be complicated by the presence of a threshold question as to whether a counterclaim alleged to be based on state law is totally preempted by federal law, a jurisdictional issue that cannot be determined on the basis of a party's concession.

However, the dissent responded to such concerns by noting that a § 4 petitioner could not simply recharacterize or manufacture a controversy to create federal jurisdiction because all of the established rules of federal jurisdiction recited above are fully applicable in scrutinizing whether a federal court would have jurisdiction over a suit arising out of the parties' underlying controversy.

For example, a federal question must be presented by the specific controversy the § 4 petitioner seeks to arbitrate, not by some hypothetical federal issue lurking in the background [see Gully v. First Nat. Bank in Meridian, 299 U.S. 109, 117, 57 S. Ct. 96, 81 L. Ed. 70 (1936)]. A district court could not compel arbitration of a state-law dispute by pointing to a potential federal defense that a § 4 petitioner is not seeking to arbitrate, because the claim itself must present a federal question to arise under federal law [see Skelly Oil Co. v. Phillips Petroleum Co., 339 U.S. 667, 672, 70 S. Ct. 876, 94 L. Ed. 1194 (1950)]. Nor could a district court compel arbitration of a dispute that, though not federal in character, could lead to the filing of a federal counterclaim, for a counterclaim . . . cannot serve as the basis for [federal] jurisdiction of the state-law dispute itself [see Holmes Group, Inc. v. Vornado Air Circulation Systems, Inc., 535 U.S. 826, 831, 122 S. Ct. 1889, 153 L. Ed. 2d 13 (2002)].

The dissent is correct that § 4 petitioners may no more smuggle state-law claims into federal court through § 4 than they can through declaratory judgment actions, or any other federal cause of action. Like the Declaratory Judgment Act, although § 4 might bring some issues into federal court in a particular case that may not be brought in through other procedural mechanisms, it does so by because it enlarges the range of remedies available in the federal courts, rather than extending its jurisdiction [see Skelly Oil, 339 U.S. 667, 671, 70 S. Ct. 876, 94 L. Ed. 1194 (1950)].

While the majority approach appears to present a bright line approach--just look at the underlying litigation and see whether it meets the well-established rules for federal jurisdiction--how would its approach work if no litigation had been filed? Anytime the basis for federal jurisdiction is predicated on federal questions jurisdiction, there are likely to be thorny problems, particularly when one party seeks to recharacterize a state law claim as a federal claim as Discover did in the Vaden case. But, the dissent's approach is also bright line in the sense that it simply incorporates the additional rules pertaining to when a Declaratory Judgment Act claim presents a federal question. If a § 4 petition seeks arbitration of a federal question, the district court must ask whether that issue could have been raised by one of the parties in a coercive action as a federal claim. If so, there should be jurisdiction under the FAA. If not, as the majority reminds us, the petition for arbitration may be filed in state court.

State Court May Order Arbitration. The Court noted that its decision did not deprive the bank of a forum for compelling arbitration. The FAA requires state courts to honor and enforce agreements to arbitrate [see Southland Corp. v. Keating, 465 U.S. 1, 12, 104 S. Ct. 852, 79 L. Ed. 2d 1 (1984)], and the Maryland Arbitration Act embodies the same policy favoring enforcement of arbitration agreements as does the FAA [Walther v. Sovereign Bank, 386 Md. 412, 424, 872 A. 2d 735, 742 (2005)]. Thus, the bank may petition a Maryland court to compel arbitration [see Md. Cts. & Jud. Proc. Code § 3-207 (If a party to an arbitration agreement . . . refuses to arbitrate, the other party may file a petition with a court to order arbitration. . . . If the court determines that the agreement exists, it shall order arbitration.)]. The dissenting justices were not moved by this point, noting that the existence of parallel state law remedies does not warrant a narrow construction of federal remedies.

Comment. An unintended consequence of the majority approach is that it may lead to strategic filings in state courts to prevent a federal court from entertaining a § 4 petition. For example, if Vaden had alleged solely state law claims (as opposed to the completely preempted state law claims) in state court, Discover would be powerless to bring a § 4 petition in federal court even though it may well have been true that the most important issue in the case was the question whether its fees violated federal law. Yes, that is the consequence of the much maligned well pleaded complaint rule. But it would seem that the Chief Justice had it right when he argued that the majority approach had the effect of limiting the meaning of the word controversy in § 4 even though it seemed that Congress had intended a broader construction. The use of the word controversy rather than claim should have allowed the district court to look not just at what was pleaded in the complaint, but the entire controversy involved in the dispute.

RELATED LINKS: For further information, see Moore's Federal Practice:

- 15 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 103.34;
- 19 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 203.12[1]

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

About the Author. Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

42 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Stricter Pleading Standards: Georgene Vairo on Ashcroft v. Iqbal

2009 Emerging Issues 4077

Stricter Pleading Standards: Georgene Vairo on Ashcroft v. Iqbal

By Georgene Vairo

July 28, 2009

SUMMARY: In a recent Supreme Court's case, Ashcroft v. Iqbal, the court continued the trend towards stricter pleading standards in civil cases. The Supreme Court held that in deciding a motion to dismiss a complaint, a district court need not accept as true assertions that are no more than recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements. This Emerging Issues Analysis analyzes the decision.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Summary. Ashcroft v. Iqbal, -- U.S. -, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 3472 (May 18, 2009) continues the Supreme Court's trend towards stricter pleading standards in civil cases. The Supreme Court held that in deciding a motion to dismiss a complaint, a district court need not accept as true assertions that are no more than recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements. Rather, only well-pleaded factual allegations are entitled to an assumption of veracity, and a district court should then determine whether such allegations plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief. The 5-4 opinion significantly raises the Supreme Court's "plausibility" standard that it announced in Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007) to new heights. Unquestionably, the decision portends more cases dismissed at an early stage of litigation, before discovery. Indeed, the erosion of the notice pleading ideal of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8 occasioned by Iqbal and Twombly has caught the attention of Congress. Senator Arlen Specter has introduced a bill, entitled the "Notice Pleading Restoration Act of 2009" (S. 1504), that would prohibit the federal courts from dismissing a civil case unless the complaint fails the "no-set-of-facts" standard established by Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 78 S. Ct. 99, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1957), See David Ingram, Specter Proposes Return to Prior Pleading Standard (7/24/2009), <http://www.law.com/jsp/law/LawArticleFriendly.jsp?id=1202432493166>, last visited, July 27, 2009).

Background and Procedural History. The respondent, Iqbal, was a citizen of Pakistan and a Muslim. After the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks he was arrested in the United States on immigration charges and detained by federal officials. He was deemed to be "of high interest" to the investigation into the terrorist attacks, and was therefore held under restrictive conditions, spending 23 hours a day in lockdown and the remaining hours outside his cell in handcuffs and leg irons. He eventually pleaded guilty to the immigration fraud charges and was removed to Pakistan.

Iqbal then filed a Bivens action in federal court against various federal officials and corrections officers, including the U.S. Attorney General and the Director of the FBI, who were the petitioners here. The complaint alleged that the officials and officers violated the U.S. Constitution by designating him as a person of "high interest," and thereby subjected him to harsh conditions of confinement, on account of his race, religion, or national origin. Iqbal's complaint further alleged that the petitioners approved a policy of arresting and detaining Arab Muslim men as part of the investigation of the September 11 terrorist attacks, and that both petitioners "knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject" the respondent to harsh conditions of confinement as a matter of policy, solely on account of his religion, race, or national origin and for no legitimate penological reason.

The petitioners asserted qualified immunity and moved to dismiss the suit on the ground that the complaint was not sufficient to state a claim against them. The district court denied the motion to dismiss, and the petitioners appealed to the Second Circuit Court of Appeals. While the appeal was pending, the Supreme Court decided Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, which, "retired" the Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 78 S. Ct. 99, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1957), "no set of facts" standard and set out a more stringent standard for evaluating the sufficiency of a complaint [Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929]. The Second Circuit discussed Twombly at length, concluding that it called for a "flexible 'plausibility standard,' which obliges a pleader to amplify a claim with some factual allegations in those contexts where such amplification is needed to render the claim plausible."

The Second Circuit, however, decided that it was not presented with one of those contexts requiring amplification, and that the respondent's complaint was sufficient to allege the petitioners' personal involvement in discriminatory decisions that, if true, violated clearly established constitutional law [Iqbal v. Hasty, 490 F.3d 143 (2d Cir. 2007)]. Judge Cabranes concurred but invited the Supreme Court to address the appropriate pleading standard in cases such as Iqbal's which might lead to high-level government officials who are entitled to invoke official immunity, being subject to the burdens of discovery on the basis of a non-specific complaint. The Supreme Court took Judge Cabranes' cue, and reversed. Justice Souter, the author of the Twombly opinion, dissented.

Appellate Jurisdiction Under Collateral Order Doctrine. Writing for the majority, Justice Kennedy first noted that Iqbal had disputed the Second Circuit's subject matter jurisdiction to hear the appeal, but that the Second Circuit had hardly discussed the issue. He affirmed that subject matter jurisdiction cannot be forfeited or waived and should be fully considered when fairly in doubt.

Although the refusal to dismiss was not a final judgment subject to appellate jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291, the Court concluded that the Second Circuit had jurisdiction to hear the appeal under the collateral order doctrine [see Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 546, 69 S. Ct. 1221, 93 L. Ed. 1528 (1949).] This doctrine makes a limited set of district court orders reviewable even though not final judgments, when they "finally determine claims of right separable from, and collateral to, rights asserted in the action, too important to be denied review and too independent of the cause itself to require that appellate consideration be deferred until the whole case is adjudicated."

A decision denying a claim of qualified immunity falls within the narrow class of orders that are appealable under the doctrine. This is because qualified immunity, which shields government officials from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights, is both a defense to liability and a limited entitlement not to stand trial or face the other burdens of litigation.

The respondent argued that a qualified immunity appeal based solely on the complaint's failure to state a claim, and not on the ultimate issues relevant to the qualified immunity defense itself, is not a proper subject of interlocutory jurisdiction. The Court ruled, however, that appellate jurisdiction is not so strictly confined. Moreover, the Court rejected the respondent's argument that its collateral order cases only permitted review of issues of law, and that the sufficiency of a complaint implicates issues of fact. Rather, the Court ruled that evaluating the sufficiency of a complaint is not a fact-based question of law that ought not be reviewed: "determining whether respondent's complaint has the 'heft' to state a claim is a task well within an appellate court's core competency." 173 L. Ed. 2d at 881.

Comment. The Court's approach to interlocutory review of the denial of the petitioners' motion to dismiss represents an extension of the collateral order doctrine. However, it is not a surprising development in the context of official immunity. Over the decades, from Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 U.S. 511, 105 S. Ct. 2806, 86 L. Ed. 2d 411 (1985), through Wilkie v. Robbins, 551 U.S. 537, 127 S. Ct. 2588, 168 L. Ed. 2d 389 (2007), the Court has consistently opened the door to the use of the collateral order doctrine to allow government officials the opportunity to obtain interlocutory review of district court orders regarding official immunity. Thus, it is not surprising that it found a way around the case relied on by Iqbal, Johnson v. Jones, 515 U.S. 304, 115 S. Ct. 2151, 132 L. Ed. 2d 238 (1995). The Court acknowledged that the line between "fact-based" legal questions and "abstract" legal questions is "not well defined," but said that the sufficiency-of-complaint issue in Iqbal fell "well within the latter class." 173 L. Ed. 2d at 881. Of course, the goal here is to ensure that government officials not be required to engage in costly, time consuming discovery.

Bivens Action. Moving to the merits of the appeal, the Court began by taking note of the elements of a Bivens action—that is, the elements the plaintiff was required to plead to state a claim of unconstitutional discrimination against officials entitled to assert qualified immunity [see Bivens v. Six Unknown FBI Narcotics Agents, 403 U.S. 388, 91 S. Ct. 1999, 29 L. Ed. 2d 619 (1971)]. Bivens recognized an implied private action for damages against federal officers alleged to have violated a citizen's constitutional rights. The Court noted, however, that it has never extended this right of action to First Amendment claims. Nonetheless, because the petitioners did not press this argument, the Court assumed without deciding that the respondent's First Amendment claim was actionable under Bivens.

However, government officials, the Court said, may not be held liable for the unconstitutional conduct of their subordinates under a theory of respondeat superior. Accordingly, a plaintiff must plead that each government official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, violated the Constitution. The factors necessary to establish a Bivens violation will vary with the constitutional provision at issue. When the claim is invidious discrimination in contravention of the First and Fifth Amendments, the plaintiff must plead and prove that the defendants adopted and implemented the detention policies not for a neutral investigative purpose, but rather acted with discriminatory intent.

The respondent argued that the petitioners could be liable under a theory of "supervisory liability" for knowledge and acquiescence in their subordinates' use of discriminatory criteria to make classification decisions among detainees. In other words, a supervisor's mere knowledge of a subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution. The Court rejected this argument—each government official is liable only for his or her own misconduct. Thus, a plaintiff must plead and prove discriminatory intent, not mere knowledge of discrimination by subordinates.

Comment. As discussed below, Iqbal's significance goes beyond its facts as a civil rights case. All of its bottom lines are likely to translate beyond the Bivens and official immunity context. Thus, even though, as Justice Kennedy said in Iqbal that the idea of "supervisory liability" is a "misnomer" in the Bivens context, one wonders whether litigation involving corporations' parents and subsidiaries in the future will be affected by this part of Iqbal. This is particularly so because, as the dissent points out, the petitioners had conceded that there may be Bivens liability as a supervisor on grounds other than respondeat superior. Even if respondeat superior is a viable legal theory in litigation outside the Bivens or civil rights context, Iqbal might be cited for the proposition that more facts need to be pleaded to implicate a parent or subsidiary in the wrongdoing of the other.

Twombly Is Not Limited to Antitrust Disputes. To the extent that there was any debate whatsoever about the reach of Twombly, Iqbal makes plain that stricter pleading standards apply to all civil cases. Justice Kennedy began by running through the pleading standards enunciated in the Court's earlier decision in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly. He squarely rejected the argument that the standards announced in Twombly, a complex antitrust case, should be limited to pleadings made in the context of an antitrust dispute. Rather, the Court made clear that its ruling in Twombly was based on its interpretation and application of Rule 8, which sets out the pleading standard for all civil actions.

Application of Twombly's Pleading Standard. Civil Rule 8(a)(2) requires that a pleading contain a "short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." Twombly amplified Rule 8, according to the Iqbal Court. Under Twombly, to survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to "state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.

Moreover, two working principles underlie the Twombly decision. First, the tenet that a court must accept as true all the allegations contained in a complaint is inapplicable to legal conclusions. Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, also may be disregarded. Second, only a complaint that states a plausible claim for relief survives a motion to dismiss. Determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief is a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense.

The Court then reads Twombly as applying a two-pronged approach to evaluating the sufficiency of a complaint. "In keeping with these principles a court considering a motion to dismiss can choose to begin by identifying pleadings that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth. While legal conclusions can provide the framework of a complaint, they must be supported by factual allegations. When there are well-pleaded factual allegations, a court should assume their veracity and then determine whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief."

Following this two-step methodology, the Court concluded that the complaint did not sufficiently plead claims of invidious discrimination. The complaint contained allegations that the petitioners "knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject [him]" to harsh conditions of confinement "as a matter of policy, solely on account of [his] religion, race, and/or national origin and for no legitimate penological interest." The complaint further alleged that the Attorney General was the "principal architect" of this invidious policy, and that the Director of the FBI was "instrumental" in adopting and executing it. The Court characterized these assertions as nothing more than a "formulaic recitation of the elements" of a constitutional discrimination claim, and therefore conclusory and not entitled to be assumed true. The Court made clear that it was "the conclusory nature of respondent's allegations, rather than their extravagantly fanciful nature, that disentitles them to the presumption of truth." Bottom line, none of these allegations were entitled to the presumption of truth.

The Court then considered whether the remaining allegations, presumed to be true, plausibly suggested an entitlement to relief. The complaint alleged that the FBI, under the direction of one of the petitioners, "arrested and detained thousands of Arab Muslim men . . . as part of its investigation of the events of September 11" and that the policy of holding post-September-11 detainees in highly restrictive conditions of confinement until they were "cleared" by the FBI was approved by both petitioners in the weeks after September 11, 2001.

According to the Court, these allegations, taken as true, did not plausibly establish a discriminatory purpose on the part of the petitioners with respect to the respondent's arrest. Rather, a more likely explanation for their conduct existed: a neutral policy designed to weed out terrorists. According to the Court, even a legitimate policy directing law enforcement to arrest and detain individuals because of their suspected link to the attacks would produce a disparate, but incidental impact on Arab Muslims. In other words, according to the Court, the purpose of the policy was not to target Arabs or Muslims, but it was likely that there would be more Arabs and Muslims detained under the policy. The arrests therefore "were likely lawful and justified by his nondiscriminatory intent to detain aliens who were illegally present in the United States and who had potential connections to those who committed terrorist acts." Because of this obvious alternative explanation, discrimination was not a "plausible" conclusion.

Moreover, these allegations were with reference to the respondent's arrest-but his claims against the petitioners rested on their ostensible policy of holding detainees under severe conditions of confinement once they were categorized as "of high interest." The complaint failed to show plausibly that the petitioners purposefully adopted a policy of classifying detainees as "of high interest" because of their race, religion, or national origin. The complaint alleged that the petitioners approved restrictive conditions of confinement for detainees until they were cleared by the FBI. Even accepting the truth of these allegations, no facts were alleged to show that this action was due to the detainees' race, religion, or national origin.

Comment. A combination of the Court's two-pronged approach requiring 1) an initial scrutiny of all allegations to determine whether they are fact-based sufficiently to be entitled to a presumption of truth, as well as 2) its "bigger than a breadbox" "plausibility" but not a "probability" standard present huge hurdles for plaintiffs. The quaint idea that notice pleading followed by liberal discovery will lead to a fair resolution of a case is dead. For years, since the 1980's, we have witnessed the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure being amended repeatedly to control discovery, to enhance judicial management, and to provide for sanctions to be imposed on attorneys who disregard their Rule 11 obligations. Rule 8 has not been touched. Indeed, until Twombly, in cases like Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence And Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 113 S. Ct. 1160, 122 L. Ed. 2d 517 (1993), and Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 122 S. Ct. 992, 152 L. Ed. 2d 1 (2002), we saw the Court appearing to rein in lower courts who were imposing stricter pleading standards.

The Supreme Court, however, did take some steps to that presaged Twombly and Iqbal. With its 1986 trilogy of summary judgment cases, along with the trilogy's progeny -- Daubert, Joiner, and Kumho -- the Supreme Court announced summary judgment standards that were intended to curb the costs and delay that a notice pleading and liberal discovery regime entail by making it easier for defendants to obtain summary judgment.

Although most commentators believe that summary judgment was granted more frequently than in the past, apparently more needed to be done. In both Twombly and Iqbal, the Court expressed its concerns about forcing defendants into costly discovery. So, it developed a standard for evaluating complaints that would cut off the plaintiff at the pre-discovery stage. A liberal summary judgment regime makes sense because the plaintiff will have had the opportunity to take discovery. A stringent pleading regime deprives plaintiffs of that.

So, what is a plaintiff to do? Even though the Court says that it is not requiring a return to fact pleading, it really is. Plaintiffs alleging conclusions without specific facts face dismissal. Indeed, such allegations will not make it past the first prong of the Court's approach because they will not be entitled to the presumption of proof. It will not work to throw in the kitchen sink because the court will be zeroing in only on the allegations that have some real factual basis so that the court can then apply its "common sense" to determine whether the claims are plausible.

Just as the 1986 trilogy and Daubert turned the district judge into a "gatekeeper" to trial, Iqbal and Twombly turn the district court judge into a gatekeeper to discovery. This will make life very difficult for plaintiffs in cases where the evidence is largely in the hands of the defendants. As the Scotusblog Web site noted, Iqbal is "an unexpected gift for the business community."

Relationship Between Discovery and Rule 12(b)(6). To hammer these points home, the Court also rejected the idea that application of Rule 8 and the Twombly standard might be tempered when the district court cabins discovery in such a way as to preserve the defense of qualified immunity as much as possible. The Court ruled that "the question presented by a motion to dismiss a complaint for insufficient pleadings does not turn on the controls placed upon the discovery process. . . . Because respondent's complaint is deficient under Rule 8, he is not entitled to discovery, cabined or otherwise."

The Court concluded that the respondent's complaint failed to plead sufficient facts to state a claim for purposeful and unlawful discrimination against the petitioners, and reversed and remanded for further proceedings. The Court, however, was also careful to note that its decision applied only to the claims against the highest ranking defendants. It did not analyze the allegations against the lower ranking defendants who were accused of various wrongful acts while Iqbal was incarcerated.

Dissent. Justice Souter, the author of the Twombly opinion, filed a dissent, joined by Justice Stevens, Justice Ginsburg, and Justice Breyer. The dissent concluded that the majority both misapplied the pleading standard under Twombly and incorrectly rejected supervisory liability.

The dissent first observed that the petitioners had explicitly conceded, for purposes of their appeal, that an officer may be subject to Bivens liability as a supervisor on grounds other than respondeat superior. The Court had therefore received no briefing or argument on the proper scope of supervisory liability. Rejecting the principle of supervisory liability in these circumstances was uncalled for, especially as this conclusion had no bearing on the majority's resolution of the present case.

Given the petitioners' concession, the complaint satisfied Rule 8, in the dissent's view. The petitioners admitted they were liable for their subordinates' conduct if they had actual knowledge of the discriminatory nature of the classification of suspects as being "of high interest," and were deliberately indifferent to that discrimination. The complaint alleged, at a bare minimum, that the petitioners knew of and condoned the discriminatory policy their subordinates carried out, and in fact went further and alleged that they acted affirmatively to create the discriminatory detention policy.

The petitioners argued that the complaint failed to satisfy Twombly's plausibility standard because it was implausible that such high-ranking officials would be personally involved in the specific actions of lower-level officers. This response, the dissent said, "bespeaks a fundamental misunderstanding of the enquiry that Twombly demands. Twombly does not require a court at the motion-to-dismiss stage to consider whether the factual allegations are probably true. We made it clear, on the contrary, that a court must take the allegations as true, no matter how skeptical the court may be. . . . The sole exception to this rule lies with allegations that are sufficiently fantastic to defy reality as we know it: claims about little green men, or the plaintiff's recent trip to Pluto, or experiences in time travel. That is not what we have here."

The dissent did not necessarily disagree with the majority over the definition of "plausibility" under Twombly. Rather, the dissent took issue with the first prong of the majority's analysis, under which the majority discarded a number of allegations as "conclusory," leaving only two statements to consider. The dissent agreed that the two allegations selected by the majority did not, by themselves, state a plausible entitlement to relief.

However, the complaint contained many allegations linking the petitioners to the discriminatory practices of their subordinates. These allegations were not merely "bare assertions" or a "formulaic recitation of the elements," as the majority would have it. The complaint contained specific allegations as to a policy that discriminated against Arab Muslim men, and further alleged that the two petitioners knew of, condoned, and agreed to subject the respondent to this particular, discrete, discriminatory policy. Taking the complaint as a whole, it gave the petitioners fair notice of the claim and the grounds on which it rested.

Comment. It is notable that the Iqbal dissent was written by Justice Souter, who wrote for the 7-2 majority in the Twombly opinion. Justice Souter is correct that the Twombly decision did not require the court on a motion to dismiss to decide if the facts are true, as the majority decided in Iqbal. Rather, he said that a court must take the allegations as true, no matter how skeptical the court may be, unless the facts were fanciful -- such as seeing little green men.

Perhaps Twombly and Iqbal can be seen as special cases where public policy considerations give rise to heightened concerns about ensuring the "plausibility" of the cases before letting them go forward. In Twombly, the concern was about the enormous resources involved in defending against an antitrust case. In Iqbal, it was national security concerns, as well, perhaps, a judicial hostility to Bivens actions. Accordingly, while the ruling will lead to more arguments from defense lawyers that plaintiffs must plead with greater specificity in all cases, it is possible that Iqbal will not affect cases where these types of public policy considerations are not at play. On the other hand, district court judges now have an approach that enables them to play the gatekeeper by using their judgment that allegations are not sufficient to be entitled to the presumption of truth, and even if they are, they do not present a plausible claim for relief.

In any event, it is now apparent that the Court has endorsed a variable standard of specificity that depends on complexity, cost of litigation and other policy concerns. Certain business torts and civil rights cases involving a requirement of intent may well fall prey to Iqbal. It remains to be seen whether Senator Specter will be able to convince Congress to revive the no-set-of-facts standard of Conley v. Gibson, and pass the "Notice Pleading Restoration Act of 2009." In the meantime, it is likely that the Federal Judicial Conference will direct its Civil Rules Committees to look into the issue. Given that notice pleading and liberal discovery were the linchpins of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure enacted in 1938, there is a great deal at stake. Will Congress or the Judiciary make it easier for plaintiffs to get to discovery? Or, will defendants be spared the costs of discovery? Defendants can argue that the policy choices made early in the 20th Century are too expensive, given 21st Century costs. Plaintiffs will argue that access to courts is priceless. Indeed, Senator Specter noted in his remarks introducing the bill that: "The effect of the Court's actions will no doubt be to deny many plaintiffs with meritorious claims access to the federal courts and, with it, any legal redress for their injuries." He further noted that given economic realities, government resources will be limited, and "the enforcement of federal antitrust, consumer protection, civil rights and other laws that benefit the public will fall increasingly to private litigants." See David Ingram, Specter Proposes Return to Prior Pleading Standard (7/24/2009), <http://www.law.com/jsp/law/LawArticleFriendly.jsp?id=1202432493166>, last visited, July 27, 2009).

Perhaps we will see a compromise of sorts. The Judicial Conference may recommend a revision of Rule 56 that will restore the pre-Style project language. Prior to the restyling of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in 2007, Rule 56 provided that a court "shall" grant summary judgment if no genuine issues of material fact existed. The Style Project eliminated the use of the word "shall" in all the words, substituting instead the words "must" or "should." For Rule 56, the word "shall" was replaced with the word "should." Defendants are arguing that the word "must" should be used. Plaintiffs tend to prefer "should" which connotes a degree of discretion. The proposed revision of Rule 56 would restore the word "shall." The Style Project was designed to clean up the language and structure of the Civil Rules, not change their meaning. The Advisory Committee Note to the proposed revision acknowledges that the change to "should" might suggest a different standard. Accordingly, it proposes restoring the word "shall" to ensure that the preexisting caselaw on the standard for granting summary judgment remains intact. See <http://www.uscourts.gov/rules/index2.html#standing0609>, last visited July 27, 2009.

A restoration of the word "shall" or, even better from the defense point of view, a change to "must" along with the Supreme Court's liberal interpretation of Rule 56 in its 1986 Trilogy, may appease defendants' interests sufficiently that a restoration of the no-set-of-facts standard for pleading and dismissal of claims will be politically palatable. No matter what positives exist for the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal, it clearly is an end-run around notice pleading. This is a significant departure from the status quo and requires a rethinking. If notice pleading and liberal discovery are to be discarded, they ought to be discarded pursuant to the rule making process of the Rules Enabling Act. 28 U.S.C. § 2072.

RELATED LINKS: For more information on this topic, see Moore's Federal Practice

- 2 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 8.04;
- 2 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 12.34;
- 19 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 202.07[2][b]

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon

Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

43 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Admissibility of Records and Certificates in Criminal Cases After Melendez-Diaz

2009 Emerging Issues 4017

Prof. Daniel Capra on Admissibility of Records and Certificates in Criminal Cases After Melendez-Diaz

By Daniel J. Capra

July 14, 2009

SUMMARY: Professor Capra considers the implications of Melendez-Diaz on the admissibility of records and certificates under the Federal Rules of Evidence. He finds that the Court has left a good deal of uncertainty on the admissibility of autopsy reports, certificates of authenticity, and many other documents that are offered at virtually every federal criminal trial.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Prof. Daniel Capra on Admissibility of Records and Certificates in Criminal Cases After Melendez-Diaz

Setting the Stage

In Crawford v. Washington the Court held that if hearsay is testimonial, its admission violates a criminal defendant's right to counsel unless the declarant is subjected to cross-examination. A quick summary of results on what has been held "testimonial" and what has not, so far, might be useful to frame the importance of the Melendez-Diaz decision.

Hearsay Found Testimonial:

1. Confession of an accomplice made to a police officer.
2. Grand jury testimony.
3. Plea allocutions of accomplices, even if specific references to the defendant are redacted.
4. Statement of an incarcerated person, made to a police officer, identifying the defendant as taking part in a crime.
5. Report by a confidential informant to a police officer, identifying the defendant as involved in criminal activity.
6. Accusations made to officers responding to a 911 call, after the emergency has subsided.

7. Statements made by an accomplice while placed under arrest, but before formal interrogation.

8. False alibi statements made by accomplices to the police (though while testimonial, they do not violate the defendant's right to confrontation because they are not offered for their truth).

9. A police officer's count of the number of marijuana plants found during the search of the defendant's premises.

Hearsay Found Not Testimonial:

1. Statement admissible under the state of mind exception, made to friends.

2. Autopsy reports.

3. Declaration against penal interest implicating both the declarant and the defendant, made in informal circumstances to a friend or loved one (i.e., statements admissible under the Court's interpretation of Rule 804(b)(3) in Williamson v. United States).

4. Letter written to a friend admitting criminal activity by the writer and the defendant.

5. Statements by coconspirators during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy, when not made knowingly to the police or during a litigation.

6. Certificate of nonexistence of a record, prepared by government authorities in anticipation of litigation. (Though these cases were decided before Melendez-Diaz and are no longer good authority).

7. Warrants of deportation.

8. Entries into a regulatory database.

9. Statements made for purpose of medical treatment.

10. 911 calls reporting crimes.

11. Statements to law enforcement officers responding to the declarant's 911 call reporting a crime.

12. Accusatory statements in a private diary.

13. Odometer statements prepared before any crime of odometer-tampering occurred.

14. A present sense impression describing an event that took place months before a crime occurred.

15. Business records -- including certificates of authenticity prepared for trial. (Though the cases finding certificates of authenticity admissible preceded Melendez-Diaz and are now in some doubt).

16. Statements made by an accomplice to his lawyer, implicating the accomplice as well as the defendant.

17. Judicial findings and orders in one case, offered in a different case.

18. Informal statements made with no law enforcement officers present.

Reports on Forensic Testing by Law Enforcement Are Testimonial. Melendez-Diaz v. Massachusetts, 129 S.Ct. __ (2009)

In Melendez-Diaz, a drug case, the trial court admitted three "certificates of analysis" showing the results of the forensic tests performed on the seized substances. The certificates stated that "the substance was found to contain: Cocaine." The certificates were sworn to before a notary public by analysts at the State Laboratory Institute of the Massachusetts Department of Public Health. The Court, in a highly contested 5-4 decision, held that these certificates were "testimonial" under Crawford and therefore admitting them without a live witness violated the defendant's right to confrontation. The majority noted that affidavits prepared for litigation are within the core definition of "testimonial" statements, and the documents at issue, "while denominated by Massachusetts law 'certificates,' are quite plainly affidavits: declarations of facts written down and sworn to by the declarant before an officer authorized to administer oaths." The majority also noted that the only reason the certificates were prepared was for use in litigation. It stated that "[w]e can safely assume that the analysts were aware of the affidavits' evidentiary purpose, since that purpose -- as stated in the relevant state-law provision -- was reprinted on the affidavits themselves."

The implications of Melendez-Diaz -- beyond requiring a live witness to testify to the results of forensic tests conducted primarily for litigation -- are found in the parts of the majority opinion that address the dissent's arguments that the decision will lead to substantial practical difficulties. These implications are discussed in turn:

1. In a footnote, the majority declared in dictum that "documents prepared in the regular course of equipment maintenance may well qualify as nontestimonial records." Apparently these are more like traditional business records than records prepared primarily for litigation, though the question is close -- the reason these records are maintained, with respect to forensic testing equipment, is so that the tests conducted can be admitted as reliable. At any rate, the footnote shows some flexibility, in that not every record involved in the forensic testing process will necessarily be found testimonial. And the footnote indicates an adherence to the test employed in the previous case of Davis v. Washington: hearsay is not testimonial simply because the declarant could anticipate that it would be used in a criminal prosecution. Rather, the primary motivation for making the statement must be to use it in a criminal prosecution.

2. The dissent argued that forensic testers are not "accusatory" witnesses in the sense of preparing factual affidavits about the crime itself. But the majority rejected this distinction, declaring that the text of the Sixth Amendment "contemplates two classes of witnesses -- those against the defendant and those in his favor. The prosecution must produce the former; the defendant may call the latter. Contrary to respondent's assertion, there is not a third category of witnesses, helpful to the prosecution, but somehow immune from confrontation." This statement raises questions about the reasoning of many lower courts that have admitted autopsy reports and other certificates after Crawford -- these cases are discussed below.

3. Relatedly, the defendant argued that the affidavits at issue were nothing like the affidavits found problematic in the case of Sir Walter Raleigh. The Raleigh affidavits were a substitute for a witness testifying to critical historical facts about the crime. But the majority responded that while the ex parte affidavits in the Raleigh case were the paradigmatic confrontation concern, "the paradigmatic case identifies the core of the right to confrontation, not its limits. The right to confrontation was not invented in response to the use of the ex parte examinations in Raleigh's Case." Again, many lower courts after Crawford have distinguished between ministerial affidavits on collateral matters from Raleigh-type ex parte affidavits; this reasoning is in conflict with Melendez-Diaz.

4. The majority noted that cross-examining a forensic analyst may be necessary because "[a]t least some of that methodology requires the exercise of judgment and presents a risk of error that might be explored on cross-examination." This implies that if the evidence is nothing but a machine print-out, it will not run afoul of the Confrontation Clause. Before Melendez-Diaz, a number of courts held that machine printouts are not hearsay at all, because a machine can't make a "statement" -- and in terms of confrontation, a machine does not provide "testimony." This case law appears to survive the Court's analysis in Melendez-Diaz.

5. The majority does approve the basic analysis of Federal courts after Crawford with respect to business and public records, i.e., that if the record is admissible under FRE 803(6) or 803(8) it is, for that reason, non-testimonial under Crawford. For business records, this is because, to be admissible under Rule 803(6), it can't be prepared for litigation. For public records, this is because law enforcement reports prepared for a specific litigation are excluded under Rule 803(8)(B) and (C).

6. In response to an argument of the dissent, the majority seems to state, at least in dictum, that certificates that merely authenticate proffered documents are not testimonial. That passage is better quoted than summarized:

The dissent identifies a single class of evidence which, though prepared for use at trial, was traditionally admissible: a clerk's certificate authenticating an official record -- or a copy thereof -- for use as evidence. But a clerk's authority in that regard was narrowly circumscribed. He was permitted "to certify to the correctness of a copy of a record kept in his office," but had "no authority to furnish, as evidence for the trial of a lawsuit, his interpretation of what the record contains or shows, or to certify to its substance or effect." State v. Wilson, 141 La. 404, 409, 75 So. 95, 97 (1917). The dissent suggests that the fact that this exception was narrowly circumscribed makes no difference. To the contrary, it makes all the difference in the world. It shows that even the line of cases establishing the one narrow exception the dissent has been able to identify simultaneously vindicates the general rule applicable to the present case. A clerk could by affidavit authenticate or provide a copy of an otherwise admissible record, but could not do what the analysts did here: create a record for the sole purpose of providing evidence against a defendant.

This passage could be read to mean that certificates authenticating business records under Rule 902(11) -- and, for foreign business records, under 18 U.S.C. § 3505 -- are not testimonial, because such certificates authenticate pre-existing records rather than create a new one. The viability of a 902(11)-type certificate is muddled, however, because that certificate does more than just certify the authenticity of the record. It also certifies that the record was made at or near the time of the occurrence recorded, and was kept in the regular course of regularly conducted activity. It is notable that Justice Kennedy, in dissent, questioned whether Rule 902(11) could continue to be used in criminal cases -- though he raised the issue as a "sky is falling" rhetorical device, and the majority spent a lot of time emphasizing the narrowness of its opinion. The bottom line is that certification of business records in criminal cases is in some doubt after Melendez-Diaz, but strong arguments can be made that Rule 902(11) and 18 U.S.C. § 3505 remain constitutionally sound. This point will be discussed further below.

7. As counterpoint to the dissent's argument about prior practice having allowed certificates authenticating records, the Melendez-Diaz majority cited a line of cases about affidavits offered to prove the absence of a public record. Again, the passage is better quoted than summarized:

Far more probative here are those cases in which the prosecution sought to admit into evidence a clerk's certificate attesting to the fact that the clerk had searched for a particular relevant record and failed to find it. Like the testimony of the analysts in this case, the clerk's statement would serve as substantive evidence against the defendant whose guilt depended on the nonexistence of the record for which the clerk searched. Although the clerk's certificate would qualify as an official record under respondent's definition -- it was prepared by a public officer in the regular course of his official duties -- and although the clerk was certainly not a "conventional witness" under the dissent's approach, the clerk was nonetheless subject to confrontation. See People v. Bromwich, 200 N. Y. 385, 388-389, 93 N. E. 933, 934 (1911).

This passage should probably be read to mean that any use of Rule 803(10) in a criminal case -- to prove the absence of a public record by way of an affidavit of the official who checked for the record -- is prohibited. As seen below, every federal court to decide the question after Crawford has held that it does not offend the Confrontation Clause to prove the absence of a public record by introducing an affidavit of the official who searched for the record. The rationales behind these decisions are: 1) the underlying records are not testimonial, and so it would stand the Confrontation Clause on its head to hold the affidavit about the records to be testimonial; and 2) the affidavits are essentially ministerial and are not the kind of ex parte testimony used in the Raleigh case. But the first rationale is rejected by the passage quoted above -- it doesn't matter that the underlying records are nontestimonial, because the affidavit is a substitute for in-court testimony and is prepared solely for litigation. And the second argument is rejected by the majority's point that the Confrontation Clause prohibits all testimony, not just the paradigmatic confrontation violation.

Lower Court Cases on Records and Certificates Decided Before Melendez-Diaz

This section discusses the federal circuit court opinions on records and certificates after Crawford, and discusses the possible effect of Melendez-Diaz on this case law.

Certification of business records under Rule 902(11) is not testimonial: United States v. Adefehinti, 519 F.3d 319 (D.C. Cir. 2007): The Court held that a certification of business records under Rule 902(11) was not testimonial even though it was prepared for purposes of litigation. The court relied on United States v. Ellis, 460 F.3d 920 (7th Cir. 2006), which held that a certification of business records was not testimonial, given the fact that the underlying records were not testimonial. It also noted that Rule 902(11) provided a procedural device for challenging the trustworthiness of the underlying records: the proponent must give advance notice that it plans to offer evidence under Rule 902(11), in order to provide the opponent with a fair opportunity to challenge the certification and the underlying records. The court stated that in an appropriate case, "the challenge could presumably take the form of calling a certificate's signatory to the stand. So hedged, the Rule 902(11) process seems a far cry from the threat of ex parte testimony that Crawford saw as underlying, and in part defining, the Confrontation Clause." In this case, the Rule 902(11) certificates were used only to admit documents that were acceptable as business records under Rule 803(6), so there was no error in the certificate process.

Note: While 902(11) may still be viable after Melendez-Diaz, as discussed above, some of the rationales used by the Adefehinti court are suspect. First, the Melendez-Diaz Court seems to reject the argument that the certificate is not testimonial just because the underlying records are nontestimonial. Second, the argument that the defendant can challenge the affidavit by calling the signatory is questionable because the Melendez-Diaz majority rejected the government's argument that any confrontation problem was solved by allowing the defendant to call the analyst. In response to that argument, Justice Scalia stated that "the Confrontation Clause imposes a burden on the prosecution to present its witnesses, not on the defendant to bring those adverse witnesses into court. Its value to the defendant is not replaced by a system in which the prosecution presents its evidence via ex parte affidavits and waits for the defendant to subpoena the affiants if he chooses."

On the other hand, the Melendez-Diaz Court held that the Confrontation Clause would not bar the government from imposing a basic notice-and-demand requirement on the defendant. That is, the state could require the defendant to give a pretrial notice of an intent to challenge the evidence, and only then would the government have to produce the witness. Arguably, Rule 902(11) could be interpreted as embodying a notice-and-demand procedure. And more broadly, it can be argued that 902(11) is simply an authentication provision, and that the Melendez-Diaz majority stated, albeit in dicta, that certificates of authenticity are not testimonial.

The Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules may wish to consider, at some point, whether to amend Rule 902(11) to more specifically provide for a notice-and-demand procedure, at least in criminal cases. Any such amendment should wait for at least the next Supreme Court term, however, because the Court has taken a case presenting the question of what procedures are necessary for an acceptable notice-and-demand procedure after Melendez-Diaz.

Warrant of deportation is not testimonial: United States v. Garcia, 452 F.3d 36 (1st Cir. 2006): In an illegal reentry case, the defendant argued that his confrontation rights were violated by the admission of a warrant of deportation. The court disagreed, finding that the warrant was not testimonial under Crawford. The court noted that every circuit considering the matter has held "that defendants have no right to confront and cross-examine the agents who routinely record warrants of deportation" because such officers have no motivation to do anything other than "mechanically register an unambiguous factual matter."

Other circuits have reached the same result on warrants of deportation. See, e.g., United States v. Valdez-Matos, 443 F.3d 910 (5th Cir. 2006) (warrant of deportation is non-testimonial because "the official preparing the warrant had no motivation other than mechanically register an unambiguous factual matter"); United States v. Torres-Villalobos, 487 F.3d 607 (8th Cir. 2007) (noting that warrants of deportation "are produced under circumstances objectively indicating that their primary purpose is to maintain records concerning the movements of aliens and to ensure compliance with orders of deportation, not to prove facts for use in future criminal prosecutions."); United States v. Bahena-Cardenas, 411 F.3d 1067 (9th Cir. 2005) (a warrant of deportation is non-testimonial "because it was not made in anticipation of litigation, and because it is simply a routine, objective, cataloging of an unambiguous factual matter."); United States v. Cantellano, 430 F.3d 1142 (11th Cir. 2005) (noting that a warrant of deportation is recorded routinely and not in preparation for a criminal trial").

Note: Warrants of deportation probably still satisfy the Confrontation Clause after Melendez-Diaz. Unlike the forensic analysis in that case, a warrant of deportation is for regulatory purposes and is clearly not prepared for the illegal reentry litigation, because by definition the crime has not been committed at the time it's prepared. Warrants of deportation are more akin to certificates of maintenance of forensic equipment, which the Court declared to be nontestimonial in Melendez-Diaz.

Proof of absence of business records is not testimonial: United States v. Munoz-Franco, 487 F.3d 25 (1st Cir. 2007): In a prosecution for bank fraud and conspiracy, the trial court admitted the minutes of the Board and Executive Committee of the Bank. The defendants did not challenge the admissibility of the minutes as business records, but argued that it was constitutional error to allow the government to rely on the absence of certain information in the minutes to prove that the Board was not informed about such matters. The court rejected the defendants' confrontation argument in the following passage:

Although the Court has yet to articulate a precise definition of "testimonial," it is beyond debate that the Board minutes are nontestimonial in character and, consequently, outside the class of statements prohibited by the Confrontation Clause. The Court in Crawford plainly characterizes business records as "statements that by their nature [are] not testimonial." 541 U.S. at 56. If business records are nontestimonial, it follows that the absence of information from those records must also be nontestimonial.

Note: This analysis appears unaffected by Melendez-Diaz, as no certificate or affidavit is involved.

Autopsy reports are not testimonial: United States v. Feliz, 467 F.3d 227 (2d Cir. 2006): Affirming racketeering convictions, the court found no error in the admission of autopsy reports offered to prove the manner and the cause of death of nine victims. The court held that the autopsy reports were properly admitted as both business records under Rule 803(6) and as public records under Rule 803(8)(B). The court concluded that to be admissible under either of these exceptions, the record could not be testimonial within the meaning of Crawford. Put another way, the court declared that if a record were testimonial, it could not by definition meet the admissibility requirements of either exception. With respect to business records, the court noted that Rule 803(6) cannot be used to admit a record that is prepared primarily for purposes of litigation. So by definition to be admissible under Rule 803(6) the record cannot be testimonial within the meaning of Crawford and Davis. The court recognized that a medical examiner may anticipate that an autopsy report might later on be used in a criminal case. But the court stated that mere anticipation of use in litigation was not enough to make the record testimonial. It noted that the Supreme Court had not embraced such a broad definition of "testimonial." With respect to Rule 803(8)(B), the court observed that the rule "excludes documents prepared for the ultimate purpose of litigation, just as does Rule 803(6)." The court also reasoned that an extreme application of the term "testimonial" would impose unnecessary burdens on the government without a corresponding gain in the truth-seeking process. The court noted the "practical difficulties" of proving cause and manner of death if the report is found inadmissible:

Years may pass between the performance of the autopsy and the apprehension of the perpetrator. This passage of time can easily lead to the unavailability of the examiner who prepared the report. Moreover, medical examiners who regularly perform hundreds of autopsies are unlikely to have any independent recollection of the autopsy at issue in a particular case and in testifying invariably rely entirely on the autopsy report. Unlike other forensic tests, an autopsy cannot be replicated by another pathologist. Certainly it would be against society's interest to permit the unavailability of the medical examiner who prepared the report to preclude the prosecution of a homicide case.

Note: The court's emphasis on a practical result is problematic under the majority's analysis in Melendez-Diaz. The dissenters in Melendez-Diaz argued vehemently that requiring live testimony of the analyst would be impractical and would impose substantial and sometimes insurmountable obligations on the government. The majority's response was that it had no authority to consider burdens, because the certificate was testimonial and admission of testimonial hearsay in the absence of cross-examination violates the Confrontation Clause.

This does not mean, however, that autopsy reports are necessarily testimonial after Melendez-Diaz. The forensic report in Melendez-Diaz was prepared solely for litigation and so fit squarely within the Court's definition of "testimonial." Under Davis, it is not enough that a report might foreseeably be used in a litigation -- use in litigation has to be the primary purpose of the report. Under that test, a good argument can still be made that autopsy reports are not testimonial. And notably, the Melendez-Diaz Court agreed with the argument that if a report is admissible under Rule 803(6) or (8), it is by that fact nontestimonial -- because in order to be admissible, it can't be prepared primarily for purposes of litigation.

Certificate of the non-existence of a public record found not testimonial: United States v. Rueda-Rivera, 396 F.3d 678 (5th Cir. 2005): The defendant was charged with being found in the United States after deportation, without having obtained the consent of the Attorney General or the Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security. To prove the lack of approval, the government offered a Certificate of Nonexistence of Record (CNR). The CNR was prepared by a government official specifically for this litigation. The court found that the record was not "testimonial" under Crawford, declaring as follows:

The CNR admitted into evidence in this case, reflecting the absence of a record that Rueda-Rivera had received consent to re-enter the United States, does not fall into the specific categories of testimonial statements referred to in Crawford. We decline to extend Crawford to reach such a document.

Other courts have found that certificates proving the absence of public records are not testimonial. See, e.g.: United States v. Urquhart, 469 F.3d 745 (8th Cir. 2006) (arguing that a CNR "is similar enough to a business record that it is nontestimonial under Crawford."); United States v. Cervantes-Flores, 421 F.3d 825 (9th Cir. 2005) (noting that while the certificate was prepared for litigation, the underlying records were not -- though this misses the point that while the underlying records are not testimonial, the certificate as to their existence or non-existence would still be so because the certificate is prepared solely for purposes of litigation).

Note: For reasons discussed in the analysis of Melendez-Diaz, supra, it is almost certain that CNR's are testimonial, and therefore the above cases are not longer good law. Certificates offered to prove the absence of a public record are prepared solely for purposes of litigation, and the fact that they do not fall within the specific categories referred to in Crawford is certainly not dispositive after Melendez-Diaz. Nor is it dispositive that the records are not about contested historical facts like the ex parte testimony in the Raleigh case.

Certificate of a record of a conviction found not testimonial: United States v. Weiland, 420 F.3d 1062 (9th Cir. 2006): The court held that a certificate of a record of conviction prepared by a public official was not testimonial under Crawford: "Not only are such certifications a 'routine cataloging of an unambiguous factual matter,' but requiring the records custodians and other officials from the various states and municipalities to make themselves available for cross-examination in the countless criminal cases heard each day in our country would present a serious logistical challenge without any apparent gain in the truth-seeking process. We decline to so extend Crawford, or to interpret it to apply so broadly."

Note: The interest in avoiding burdens in countless criminal cases is precisely the argument that was rejected in Melendez-Diaz. Nonetheless, certificates of conviction may still be found non-testimonial, because the Melendez-Diaz majority states, albeit in dicta, that a certificate is not testimonial if it does nothing more than authenticate another document.

Business records are not testimonial: United States v. Jamieson, 427 F.3d 394 (6th Cir. 2005): In a prosecution involving fraudulent sale of insurance policies, the government admitted summary evidence under Rule 1006. The underlying records were essentially business records. The court found that admitting the summaries did not violate the defendant's right to confrontation. The underlying records were not testimonial under Crawford because they did not "resemble the formal statement or solemn declaration identified as testimony by the Supreme Court." See also United States v. Baker*, 458 F.3d 513 (6th Cir. 2006) ("The government correctly points out that business records are not testimonial and therefore do not implicate the Confrontation Clause concerns of Crawford.").

Note: The court's analysis of business records appears unaffected by Melendez-Diaz, because no certificate or affidavit was prepared primarily for use in the litigation.

Post office box records are not testimonial: United States v. Vasilakos, 508 F.3d 401 (6th Cir. 2007): The defendants were convicted of defrauding their employer, an insurance company, by setting up fictitious accounts into which they directed unearned commissions. The checks for the commissions were sent to post office boxes maintained by the defendants. The defendants argued that admitting the post office box records at trial violated their right to confrontation. But the court held that the government established proper foundation for the records through the testimony of a postal inspector, and that the records were therefore admissible as business records; the court noted that "the Supreme Court specifically characterizes business records as non-testimonial."

Note: The court's analysis of business records is unaffected by Melendez-Diaz.

Drug test prepared by a hospital with knowledge of possible use in litigation is not testimonial; certification of that business record under Rule 902(11) is not testimonial: United States v. Ellis, 460 F.3d 920 (7th Cir. 2006): In a trial for felon gun possession, the trial court admitted the results of a drug test conducted on the defendant's blood and urine after he was arrested. The test was conducted by a hospital employee named Kristy, and indicated a positive result for methamphetamine. At trial, the hospital record was admitted without a qualifying witness; instead, a qualified witness prepared a certification of authenticity under Rule 902(11). The court held that neither the hospital record nor the certification were testimonial within the meaning of Crawford and Davis -- despite the fact that both records were prepared with the knowledge that they were going to be used in a prosecution.

As to the medical report, the court reasoned as follows:

Given the focus of the courts of appeals and our own precedent on the declarant's reasonable expectations of whether a statement would be used prosecutorially, Ellis may appear to be on strong ground in arguing that the results of his medical tests were testimonial. It must have been obvious to Kristy (the laboratory technician at the local hospital) that her test results might end up as evidence against Ellis in some kind of trial. . . .

Nevertheless, we do not think these circumstances transform what is otherwise a nontestimonial business record into a testimonial statement implicating the Confrontation Clause. There is no indication that the observations embodied in Ellis's medical records were made in anything but the ordinary course of business. Such observations, the Court in Crawford made clear, are nontestimonial. And we do not think it matters that these observations were made with the knowledge that they might be used for criminal prosecution. Prior to the Court's decision in Davis, two other courts of appeals decided that certificates of nonexistence of record ("CNR"), admitted under Rule 803(10) and used to prove an alien did not receive permission from the Attorney General to reenter the country, were nontestimonial despite the fact they were prepared by the government in anticipation of a criminal prosecution. See, e.g., United States v. Cervantes-Flores, 421 F.3d 825, 833 (9th Cir. 2005); United States v. Rueda-Rivera, 396 F.3d 678, 680 (5th Cir. 2005). The focus of these decisions was that the preparation of these CNRs was routine, and the statements in them were simply too far removed from the examples of testimonial evidence provided by Crawford.

The Ellis court found that the Supreme Court's analysis in Davis supported its view that a statement is not testimonial simply because it is prepared with the knowledge that it is likely to be used in a prosecution:

In Davis, the Court addressed a statement made by a woman to a 911 operator reporting she had been assaulted. That recorded statement was later used at trial to prosecute Davis (the woman's former boyfriend) for a felony violation of a domestic no-contact order. The Court considered the 911 operator's questioning of the woman to be an interrogation, and the operators themselves to be at least "agents of law enforcement." In the face of Davis's objection that introduction of the statement violated the Sixth Amendment, the Court held that when the objective circumstances indicate the "primary purpose" of police interrogation is to meet an ongoing emergency, the statements elicited in response are nontestimonial. We believe this holding necessarily implies that consciousness on the part of the person reporting an emergency (or the police officer eliciting information about the emergency) that his or her statements might be used as evidence in a crime does not lead to the conclusion ipso facto that the statement is testimonial. A reasonable person reporting a domestic disturbance, which is what the declarant in Davis was doing, will be aware that the result is the arrest and possible prosecution of the perpetrator. . . . So it cannot be that a statement is testimonial in every case where a declarant reasonably expects that it might be used prosecutorially.

As to the medical reports, the Ellis court concluded as follows:

While the medical professionals in this case might have thought their observations would end up as evidence in a criminal prosecution, the objective circumstances of this case indicate that their observations and statements introduced at trial were made in nothing else but the ordinary course of business. Therefore, when these professionals made those observations, they--like the declarant reporting an emergency in Davis--were "not acting as . . . witness[es];" and were "not testifying." See Davis, 126 S. Ct. at 2277. They were employees simply recording observations which, because they were made in the ordinary course of business, are "statements that by their nature were not testimonial." Crawford, 541 U.S. at 56.

Note: Ellis is cited by the dissent in Melendez-Diaz (not a good thing for its continued viability), and the circumstances of preparing the toxic screen in Ellis are certainly similar to those in Melendez-Diaz. That said, toxicology tests conducted by private organizations may be found nontestimonial if it can be shown that law enforcement was not involved in the testing. The Melendez-Diaz majority emphasized that the forensic analyst knew that the test was being done for a prosecution, as that information was right on the form. Essentially, after Melendez-Diaz, the less the tester knows about the use of the test, the better.

As to the certification of business record, prepared under Rule 902(11) specifically to qualify the medical records in this prosecution, the Ellis court similarly found that it was not testimonial because the records that were certified were prepared in the ordinary course, and the certifications were essentially ministerial. The court explained as follows:

As should be clear, we do not find as controlling the fact that a certification of authenticity under 902(11) is made in anticipation of litigation. What is compelling is that Crawford expressly identified business records as nontestimonial evidence. Given the records themselves do not fall within the constitutional guarantee provided by the Confrontation Clause, it would be odd to hold that the foundational evidence authenticating the records do. We also find support in the decisions holding that a CNR is nontestimonial. A CNR is quite like a certification under 902(11); it is a signed affidavit attesting that the signatory had performed a diligent records search for any evidence that the defendant had been granted permission to enter the United States after deportation.

The certification at issue in this case is nothing more than the custodian of records at the local hospital attesting that the submitted documents are actually records kept in the ordinary course of business at the hospital. The statements do not purport to convey information about Ellis, but merely establish the existence of the procedures necessary to create a business record. They are made by the custodian of records, an employee of the business, as part of her job. As such, we hold that written certification entered into evidence pursuant to Rule 902(11) is nontestimonial just as the underlying business records are. Both of these pieces of evidence are too far removed from the "principal evil at which the Confrontation Clause was directed" to be considered testimonial.

Note: As discussed in the treatment of Melendez-Diaz earlier in this outline, the fact that the certificate conveys no personal information about Ellis is not dispositive, because the information imparted is being used against Ellis. Moreover, the certificate is prepared exclusively for use in litigation. Nonetheless, a 902(11) certification may still be permissible on one of two grounds, as discussed above: 1) the rule provides for a type of notice-and-demand procedure, and the Court gave its imprimatur to at least some form of such a procedure; or 2) the Court stated that certificates that simply authenticate other records are not testimonial.

Odometer statements, prepared before any crime of odometer-tampering occurred, are not testimonial: United States v. Gilbertson, 435 F.3d 790 (7th Cir. 2006): In a prosecution for odometer-tampering, the government proved its case by introducing the odometer statements prepared when the cars were sold to the defendant, and then calling the buyers to testify that the mileage on the odometers when they bought their cars was substantially less than the mileage set forth on the odometer statements. The defendant argued that introducing the odometer statements violated Crawford. He contended that the odometer statements were essentially formal affidavits, the very kind of evidence that most concerned the Court in Crawford. But the court held that the concern in Crawford was limited to affidavits prepared for trial as a testimonial substitute. This concern did not apply to the odometer statements. The court explained as follows:

The odometer statements in the instant case are not testimonial because they were not made with the respective declarants having an eye towards criminal prosecution. The statements were not initiated by the government in the hope of later using them against Gilbertson (or anyone else), nor could the declarants (or any reasonable person) have had such a belief. The reason is simple: each declaration was made prior to Gilbertson even engaging in the crime. Therefore, there is no way for the sellers to anticipate that their statements regarding the mileage on the individual cars would be used as evidence against Gilbertson for a crime he commits in the future.

Note: this result is unaffected by Melendez-Diaz as the records clearly were not prepared for purposes of litigation.

Tax returns are business records and so not testimonial: United States v. Garth, 540 F.3d 766 (8th Cir. 2008): The defendant was accused of assisting tax filers to file false claims. The defendant argued that the her right to confrontation was violated when the trial court admitted some tax returns of the filers. But the court found no error. The tax returns were business records, and the defendant made no argument that they were prepared for litigation, "as is expected of testimonial evidence."

Note: this result is unaffected by Melendez-Diaz.

Foreign business records are not testimonial: United States v. Hagege, 437 F.3d 943 (9th Cir. 2006): In a prosecution for bankruptcy fraud and related offenses, the trial court admitted foreign business records under 18 U.S.C. § 3505. Similar to Rule 803(6), section 3505 allows the foundation requirements for the business records exception to be established by certification. The defendant argued that admission of the foreign business records violated his right to confrontation after Crawford. The court rejected this argument and affirmed the convictions. It relied on the statement in Crawford that business records are an example of the kind of statements "which by their nature are not testimonial." The court noted that "[t]he foreign certifications attesting to the authenticity of the business records were not admitted into evidence. Thus, we do not consider whether admission of the foreign certifications would have violated the Confrontation Clause under Crawford."

Note: This result is unaffected by Melendez-Diaz, as it involves only the business records, and not the foreign certification. (Certifications that do nothing but authenticate another document may still be nontestimonial, as discussed above.)

Absence of records in database is not testimonial; and drug ledger is not testimonial: United States v. Mendez, 514 F.3d 1035 (10th Cir. 2008): In an illegal entry case, an agent testified that he searched the ICE database for information indicating that the defendant entered the country legally, and found no such information. The ICE database is "a nation-wide database of information which archives records of entry documents, such as permanent resident cards, border crossing cards, or certificates of naturalization." The defendant argued that the entries into the database (or the asserted lack of entries in this case) were testimonial. But the court disagreed, because the records "are not prepared for litigation or prosecution, but rather administrative and regulatory purposes." The court also observed that Rule 803(8) tracked Crawford exactly: a public record is admissible under Rule 803(8) unless it is prepared with an eye toward litigation or prosecution; and under Crawford, "the very same characteristics that preclude a statement from being classified as a public record are likely to render the statement testimonial."

Mendez also involved drug charges, and the defendant argued that admitting a drug ledger with his name on it violated his right to confrontation under Crawford. The court also rejected this argument. It stated first that the entries in the ledger were not hearsay at all, because they were offered to show that the book was a drug ledger and thus a "tool of the trade." As the entries were not offered for truth, their admission could not violate the Confrontation Clause. But the court further held that even if the entries were offered for truth, they were not testimonial, because "[a]t no point did the author keep the drug ledger for the primary purpose of aiding police in a criminal investigation, the focus of the Davis inquiry." (emphasis the court's). The court noted that it was not enough that the statements were relevant to a criminal prosecution, otherwise "any piece of evidence which aids the prosecution would be testimonial."

Note: Both holdings in the above case survive Melendez-Diaz. The first holding is only about the absence of public records -- records that were not prepared in testimonial circumstances. If that absence had been proved by a certificate, then the Confrontation Clause, after Melendez-Diaz, would have been violated. But the absence was proved by a testifying agent. The second holding states the accepted proposition that business records admissible under Rule 803(6) are, for that reason, non-testimonial.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Daniel J. Capra is the Philip Reed Professor of Law at Fordham Law School. He serves as the Reporter to the Judicial Conference Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules. He is a co-author of the five volume "Federal Rules of Evidence Manual" and the casebooks, "Evidence: The Objection Method" and "American Criminal Procedure."

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

44 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Time-Computation Amendments to Federal Rules and Statutes

2009 Emerging Issues 3983

Time-Computation Amendments to Federal Rules and Statutes

By Editorial Staff

July 7, 2009

SUMMARY: This Emerging Issues Analysis introduces the changes being made to 52 Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, and Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure. It focuses on the changes in how time periods in those Rules are calculated and on the changes in specific Rule and statute based deadlines.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Moore's Federal Practice

Time-Computation Amendments to Federal Rules and Statutes

Rules Amendments Effective December 1, 2009, Absent Congressional Action

PREFACE

This pamphlet introduces the changes being made to 52 Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, and Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure. It focuses on the changes in how time periods in those Rules are calculated and on the changes in specific Rule- and statute-based deadlines. This pamphlet does not cover time-computation changes in the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure or in bankruptcy statutes.

All these changes will take effect on December 1, 2009, unless Congress acts to deny or delay the changes. Congress, as a practical matter, has already approved the changes. It has passed companion legislation, the "Statutory Time-Periods Technical Amendments Act of 2009." n1 This legislation adjusts time deadlines that affect court proceedings in 28 statutes, which are governed by the proposed federal-rules time computation amendments. Passage of this legislation indicates that affirmative Congressional action to disapprove the proposed Rule amendments is unlikely.

The pamphlet consists of:

- A brief analysis of the major "themes" of the changes in the time-counting method and deadlines in the Rules; n2
- Reproduction of the proposed amendments to Rule 6 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which served as a "template" for similar changes to the method of computing time being made to the other sets of Rules; n3
- A chart listing all the proposed changed deadlines in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure;
- A chart listing all the proposed changed deadlines in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure;

- A chart listing all the proposed changed deadlines in the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure; and
- A chart listing the most significant changes made by statute in the companion legislation, the "Statutory Time-Periods Technical Amendments Act of 2009."

SYNOPSIS

Preface

Proposed 2009 Changes in Federal Rules and Statutes Affecting Time-Counting Procedures and Deadlines

I. Changes in Methods for Calculating Time Periods

A. Adopting "Days Are Days" Approach

B. Basic "Exclude-the-First-Day and Include-the-Last-Day" Counting Rule Remains Unchanged

C. New Definitions for Expiration of "Last Day"

D. New Rules for Time Periods Stated in Hours

II. Principles Used in Adjusting Individual Time Periods

A. General Scheme Underlying the Time-Period Changes

B. Shorter Deadlines Lengthened to Account for Changes in Counting Rules

C. In Adjusting Deadlines, Week-Long Periods (Multiples of 7 Days) Were Preferred

D. Adjusting Seven-Day Periods Raises Issues

E. Some Deadlines Were Reconsidered on the Merits and Restated Accordingly

1. "Jurisdictional" Time Limits for Civil and Criminal Post-Trial Motions Expanded

2. General Civil Motion Deadlines Reconsidered

3. Time Limits on Amendments of Pleadings Without Leave of Court Completely Revised

4. Default Scheduling Rules for Making and Responding to Summary Judgment Motions Completely Revised

III. Amendment of Time Periods in Selected Statutory Provisions Affecting Court Proceedings

Proposed Amendments to Civil Rule 6 and Advisory Committee Note to Rule 6 Amendment

PROPOSED 2009 CHANGES IN FEDERAL RULES AND STATUTES AFFECTING TIME COUNTING PROCEDURES AND DEADLINES

Effective December 1, 2009, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, and the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure will be amended. A companion statute has been passed by Congress and signed into law by the President, whose changes also become effective on December 1, 2009. n4 The changes affect time deadlines and are important to all lawyers practicing in federal courts.

The changes address two related matters:

- The method for calculating or counting time periods set out in the rules, such as deadlines for actions; and

- The specific time periods set out in the various federal rules.

I. CHANGES IN METHODS FOR CALCULATING TIME PERIODS

A. Adopting "Days Are Days" Approach

The current rules exclude intermediate weekends and holidays for some short time periods, resulting in inconsistency and unnecessary complication. The amended rules are consistent and simple: they count every day, including intermediate weekends and holidays for all time periods.

Under the pre-December 2009 version of the federal rules, the methods used for calculating time periods vary depending on whether the time period in question is 10 days or fewer or 11 days or more. For periods of 10 days or fewer, weekend days and legal holidays that occur during the period are not counted. For periods of 11 days or more, these "intermediate" weekend days and legal holidays are counted. n5 This made calculating time periods unnecessarily complex. As the drafters note: n6

[A] 10-day period and a 14-day period that started on the same day usually ended on the same day (and the 10-day period not infrequently ended later than the 14-day period.

Under the proposed amended rules, this distinction is completely eliminated. As amended, the rules explicitly state: n7

[C]ount every day, including intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays.

The drafters note that the directive to count every day "is relevant only if the time period is stated in days (not weeks, months, or years)." n8 No other exemption or exception is provided in the amended rules.

The drafters recognized that the change requiring all time periods to be counted the same way will effectively shorten periods of 10 days or fewer, which, under the old rules, would have almost always been stretched out to more than the equivalent number of "calendar" days because the "intermediate" weekend days and holidays were excluded. n9 It was this phenomenon that prompted the drafters to adjust the many short time periods and deadlines in the rules and seek comparable changes to the relevant statutes.

See II., below, for a discussion of the changes in individual rule-based or statutory periods.

B. Basic "Exclude-the-First-Day and Include-the-Last-Day" Counting Rule Remains Unchanged

Under all the federal rules, both as currently existing and as proposed to be amended effective December 1, 2009, the most basic counting rule remains the same. n10 In calculating or counting any time period, the "first" day, the day of the act or event that starts the period running, is not counted. n11 The last day of the period is included, unless it is a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday. If the "last" day falls on a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday, the last day of the period extends to the next day that is not a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday. n12

The proposed amendments clarify this basic counting rule in two significant ways. Under the current rules, a time period is extended to the next day when the "last" day falls on a day when the clerk's office is "inaccessible." n13 The provision applies expressly to filing a paper. The proposed amendments expand the provision to explicitly address electronic filings. The provision extending the "last" day of a time period for making a paper filing is preserved in the proposed amended rules. n14 In this era of electronic service and filing, this may seem anachronistic. However, a significant number of filings in the federal courts continues to be made by persons filing pro se, including incarcerated persons, who typically do not have access to a computer. But in most other cases, the crucial test should be whether the electronic filing system is available, rather than whether the "clerk's office" is or is not physically "accessible."

The proposed rule amendments do not define "inaccessible." The drafters recognized that a national rule could not address all conceivable situations, which could be subject to unique local conditions and practice. For this reason, the proposed amendments authorize each court to adopt local rules defining "inaccessible" and providing for shorter or different time-period extensions in such circumstances. n15 By way of an example, the drafters state that the "inaccessibility" provision, as revised, is intended to cover situations in which the "clerk's office" is "inaccessible" because of "an outage of the electronic filing system." The drafters note that a court "might not wish a [temporary or momentary] period of inaccessibility to trigger a full 24-hour extension" of the time to file. In such circumstances, a court is in a better position to determine how long the time period should be extended when an "outage" of the electronic filing system occurs on the last day permitted for filing. Many courts already have elaborate and disparate provisions in their local rules covering this circumstance. n16

The proposed amendments also explain how to determine the "next day" for both forward-looking time periods and backward-looking time periods. A forward-looking time period requires something to be done within a period of time after an event. A backward-looking time period requires something to be done within a period of time before an event. n17 The definition of "next day" comes into play when a deadline falls on a weekend or holiday, because the proposed amendments then directs that the deadline continues to run until the "next day" that is not a weekend or holiday. Under the proposed amendments, if the deadline is measured after an event and the deadline falls on a weekend or holiday, the "next day" is determined by continuing to count forward. But if the deadline is measured before an event and the deadline falls on a weekend or holiday, the "next day" is determined by continuing to count backward, for example, from Saturday the 31st to Friday the 30th. n18

For forward-counted periods, that is, periods that are measured after an event, the rule includes state holidays within the definition of legal holidays. However, state legal holidays are not recognized in counting backward-counted periods. n19 For both forward- and backward-counted periods, the rule thus protects those who may be unaware of the effect of state holidays, some of which may be arcane and little known. n20

C. New Definitions for Expiration of "Last Day"

The proposed amendments provide a definition for when the "last day" of a period expires. For paper filing, the last day of a time period expires "when the clerk's office is scheduled to close." n21 For electronic filing in a district court, the last day of a time period expires "at midnight in the court's time zone." n22 For electronic filing in a court of appeals, the last day of a time period expires at "midnight in the time zone of the circuit clerk's principal office." n23

D. New Rules for Time Periods Stated in Hours

The amended federal rules contain new provisions for calculating time periods or deadlines stated in hours rather than in days, week, months, or years. The time period for a deadline stated in hours starts to run "immediately" on the occurrence of the event that triggers the period. n24 All hours are counted, including those during "intermediate" Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays. n25 If the last hour of the period or deadline falls on a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday, the period extends until the same time on the next day that is not a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday. n26

Although the federal rules as amended will now contain rules for calculating time periods or deadlines stated in hours, there are no such time periods in any of the existing or soon-to-be-amended federal rules. n27 Nonetheless, the possibility of such deadlines is more probable in the era of electronic service and filing than it was previously. Furthermore, as the drafters note, time periods or deadlines stated in hours do exist already in a few statutes and are reasonably common in emergency court orders. n28

II. PRINCIPLES USED IN ADJUSTING INDIVIDUAL TIME PERIODS

A. General Scheme Underlying the Time-Period Changes

One of the primary goals of the drafters was to ensure that the changes to the time computation method did not shorten, as a practical matter, any time period in the rules. n29 Another goal, though less important, was to make the time periods in the rules more convenient by setting them in multiples of seven days whenever possible. n30 The drafters reviewed every time period in the rules with these two purposes in mind. They paid particular attention to every period that was less than 11 days because such periods would be effectively shortened by the change in the time-computation method. n31 After a comprehensive review, they proposed amending time periods in a total of 52 Appellate, Civil, and Criminal Rules.

Though the drafters generally adjusted the time periods to meet the two goals, they did not mechanically extend every short period of time and change every period to a multiple of seven days. Instead they reviewed and evaluated each time period independently. They recognized that some periods were deliberately short and only limited extensions would be appropriate to account for the inclusion of weekends. Practical experience with time periods in other rules, however, called for significant extensions. The drafters took advantage of the top-to-bottom review of the rules to make appropriate adjustments to time periods if there was a good reason to do so.

The bottom line is that practitioners must be aware that virtually all time periods in the federal rules have been adjusted. Most of the adjustments will, as a practical matter, either slightly extend a time deadline or maintain the status quo. A handful of amendments are made for reasons independent of those required to account for the change in the time-computation method. n32 Because the principles were not applied with anything resembling mechanical consistency, a prudent practitioner must check every single deadline, and review all calendaring systems to make sure that every possible deadline change is anticipated.

Practitioners also must be aware that the change in the method of computing time in the federal rules applies to time periods contained in local rules and in statutes affecting court proceedings. Courts were asked to amend their local rules consistent with the changes to the federal rules. Courts also were advised to make these changes effective on the same date as the federal rule changes and the changes to the relevant statutory time periods, December 1, 2009, to prevent confusion.

B. Shorter Deadlines Lengthened to Account for Changes in Counting Rules

Most of the changes in the federal rules that will take effect in December 2009 are intended either to offset the inclusion of weekends and holidays in the computation of short time periods or set the periods in multiples of seven days. A good example of the extension of a short time period given by the drafters of the amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure is Rule 14(a)(1). n33 As currently drafted, a defending party may serve a third-party summons and complaint on a nonparty without leave of court if the defending party acts not more than 10 days after serving its original answer in the action. n34 To keep the deadline essentially the same under the new methods for counting time periods, this time period will be extended to 14 days to account for the four days in the two intermediate weekends. n35

C. In Adjusting Deadlines, Week-Long Periods (Multiples of 7 Days) Were Preferred

In adjusting deadlines, the drafters of the amendments expressed a preference for time periods measured in weeks, that is, in 7-day increments. For example, in Appellate Rule 5(d)(2), a 10-day period was replaced with a 14-day period. n36 In Appellate Rules 28.1(f) and 31(a), 3-day periods were replaced with 7-day periods. n37 The advantage of such time periods is explained in the context of changing 10-day periods to 14-day periods: n38

A 14-day period has an additional advantage. The final day falls on the same day of the week as the event that triggered the period—the 14th day after a Monday, for example, is a Monday. This advantage of using week-long periods led to adopting 7-day periods to replace some of the periods set at less than 10 days, and 21-day periods to replace 20-day periods.

The drafters of the amendments explain their methodology as follows: n39

Most of the 10-day periods were adjusted to meet the change in computation method by setting 14 days as the new period. A 14-day period corresponds to the most frequent result of a 10-day period under the former computation method—two Saturdays and Sundays were excluded, giving 14 days in all.

This explanation accounts for the almost universal practice of transforming 20-day periods into 21-day periods. n40 After all, 20-day periods would not be affected by the change in time-period calculation methods, but as the charts in this pamphlet show, most (if not all) 20-day periods were changed to 21-day periods.

The drafters did not apply their preference for deadlines stated in increments of seven days to any period that was already set at 30 days or longer because it is more convenient to compute such longer time periods in months or years. n41

D. Adjusting Seven-Day Periods Raises Issues

There are a few 7-day periods in the rules, for example, Criminal Rules 29(c)(1), 33(b)(2), 34, and 35(a), which raised unique issues. Adding two days to these time periods would offset the inclusion of an intermediate weekend, but a 9-day period would fall short of meeting the drafters' intent to set time periods in multiples of 7 days, whenever possible. Extending 7-day periods to 14-day periods would be consistent with the preference for 7-day multiples, but it might provide too much time in a given situation. For example, the drafters did not extend the 7-day period in Appellate Rule 5(b)(2) from 7 days to 14 days. Instead, they changed it to 10 days. n42 In this case, the drafters concluded that the 7-day period had to be extended to account for the practical loss of two days under the new time computation method, but there was good reason to keep it relatively short. n43

The amendments dealing with time periods for filing interlocutory appeals in class actions offer a good illustration of how complicated adjusting 7-day time periods can be. The Statutory Time-Periods Technical Amendments Act of 2009 n44 did not alter the general statute authorizing discretionary interlocutory appeals, 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b), so the statutory period for taking an interlocutory appeal under this provision remains at 10 days. n45 As noted earlier, the change in counting methodology will effectively shorten this "10-day" period when the federal rule amendments become effective on December 1, 2009. n46 The drafters concluded that maintaining a "shortened" 10-day period was appropriate for these types of proceedings. For class actions covered by the Class Action Fairness Act, the statutory provision governing the time period for seeking appellate review of a district court's order on a remand motion was extended to 10 days. n47 The statutory amendment not only extended the time period but also addressed a troublesome drafting error, which had inadvertently called for a seven-day "waiting period" before an application for an appeal could be filed. n48 The amendment provided a clear deadline for filing an application to appeal. However, the time period selected was not 14 days but 10 days. n49

Despite the use of a 10-day period in the statutory provisions governing interlocutory appeals generally and of class-action orders on remand motions specifically, the time period in Rule 23(f) governing interlocutory appeal of an order granting or denying class-action certification was extended from 10 to 14 days. n50 Prior to the proposed amendments, these appeals had, like the general statute on discretionary interlocutory appeals, a 10-day deadline within which to file a "petition" for permission to appeal. n51 However, this 10-day deadline was changed to a 14-day deadline in the proposed amendments. n52 Thus, one form of discretionary appeals affecting class actions has a 10-day deadline for filing an application to appeal (in conformity with the general statute on interlocutory appeals), but another form of discretionary appeals in class actions has a 14-day deadline to take the same action.

E. Some Deadlines Were Reconsidered on the Merits and Restated Accordingly

1. "Jurisdictional" Time Limits for Civil and Criminal Post-Trial Motions Expanded

The time periods or deadlines for filing post-trial motions in civil cases, such as a motion for new trial, n53 are frequently considered "jurisdictional" in the sense that (1) a court may not grant an untimely motion, n54 and (2)

neither the court nor the parties have the power to extend the deadlines for these motions. n55 The drafters did not merely restate these deadlines as the same or similar periods, adjusted for the new counting rules. Instead, the drafters decided to make a more significant change and expanded the time for filing these types of motions from 10 to 28 days: n56

Former Rules 50, 52, and 59 adopted 10-day periods for their respective post-judgment motions. Rule 6(b) prohibits expansion of those periods. Experience has proved that in many cases it is not possible to prepare a satisfactory post-judgment motion in 10 days, even under the former rule that excluded intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays. These time periods are particularly sensitive because Appellate Rule 4 integrates the time to appeal with a timely motion under these rules. Rather than introduce the prospect of uncertainty in appeal time by amending Rule 6(b) to permit additional time, the former 10-day periods are expanded to 28 days. Rule 6(b) continues to prohibit expansion of the 28-day period.

A similar expansion of the time periods governing post-trial motions in criminal cases was also made. These filing deadlines were expanded from seven to 14 days. This might have been justified under the principles of adjusting for counting-rule changes to a same or similar period (see II.B., above) that is a multiple of seven days (see II.C., above). However, given the "jurisdictional" nature of the deadlines for these post-trial motions, the drafters adjusted the deadlines by selecting what they determined was a more substantively appropriate deadline: n57

Former [Criminal] Rules 29, 33, and 34 adopted 7-day periods for their respective motions. This period has been expanded to 14 days. Experience has proved that in many cases it is not possible to prepare a satisfactory motion in 7 days, even under the former rule that excluded intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays. This led to frequent requests for continuance, and the filing of bare bones motions that required later supplementation. The 14-day period (including intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays as provided by [Criminal] Rule 45(a)) sets a more realistic time for the filing of these motions.

2. General Civil Motion Deadlines Reconsidered

Prior to the 2009 amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Rule 6 permitted written motions to be made on a mere five days' notice, n58 and any opposing affidavit to the motion could be served a mere one day before the "hearing." n59 In most courts, this "default" provision was impractical. Local rules in most courts set much different limits on notice for motions and on the deadlines for responding to motions. n60 This will probably not change, but the "default" provisions of Rule 6 setting deadlines for notice of and opposition to motions have been deliberately altered to a more realistic 14 days of notice for motions and a 7-day deadline for filing opposition. n61

Along the same line, the "unrealistically short" amount of notice on which the court clerk could tax costs other than attorney's fees has been extended from a single day to 14 days under Rule 54. n62

3. Time Limits on Amendments of Pleadings Without Leave of Court Completely Revised

Prior to the 2009 amendments Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Rule 15(a)(1) permitted a pleader to amend a pleading once without leave of court ("as a matter of course") under the following two circumstances: n63

- The amendment was made before a "responsive pleading" was served; or
- If a responsive pleading was not allowed, the amendment was made within 20 days of serving the pleading.

This scheme has generated a large amount of confusion and resulting litigation. n64 Under the pre-amendment scheme, the service of a responsive answer immediately cut off the right to amend as a matter of course, but the service of a responsive Rule 12 motion, or, for that matter, a responsive summary judgment motion, would not cut off the right to amend because these motions do not fall under the definition of a "pleading." Thus, if a defendant challenges the complaint by moving to dismiss without filing an answer, the right to amend as a matter of course continues while the motion remains under consideration. n65

The drafters did not merely correct the time periods to conform to the new time-counting rules; they substituted an entirely new scheme of deadlines for amendments to pleadings without leave of court. Under proposed amended Rule 15(a), a pleader has a right to make one amendment without leave of court within 21 days of serving the pleading. n66 If the pleading is one that does require a response, and if either a responsive pleading or a Rule 12 motion is filed, there is no immediate cutoff of the right to amend without leave. Instead, the right to amend without leave of court survives both a responsive pleading and a responsive Rule 12 motion if the amendment is made within 21 days of the service of the responsive pleading or Rule 12 motion, whichever is earlier. n67 The 21-day periods to amend after service of a response to the pleading are not cumulative. If a responsive pleading is served after a Rule 12 motion, there is no new 21-day period. n68

There are three related, substantial differences in the new scheme:

- The distinction between responsive "pleadings" and responsive Rule 12 "motions" as they affect the time to file is eliminated. A response to the pleading in either form has the same procedural effect; n69
- Service of a response to the pleading, even in the form of a responsive "pleading," does not immediately terminate the right to amend without leave of court. The right to amend without leave of court persists for another 21 days; n70 and
- The right to amend is cut off after 21 days following service of a response to the pleading, regardless of whether response is in "motion" or "pleading" form. The right to amend without leave will not persist through potentially lengthy litigation of Rule 12 motions until some responsive "pleading" is served. n71

4. Default Scheduling Rules for Making and Responding to Summary Judgment Motions Completely Revised

Prior to the 2009 amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Rule 56(b) permitted a "defending" party to make a motion for summary judgment "at any time." n72 In contrast, under the pre-amendment version of Rule 56(a), a "claiming" party could move for summary judgment only after 20 days elapsed from the commencement of the action or after an opposing party served a motion for summary judgment. n73 The pre-amendment version of Rule 56 required only 10 days' notice of the motion, and permitted opposing affidavits to be served at any time "before the day of the hearing." n74

As the drafters note, "[t]he timing provisions for summary judgment are outmoded." n75 The amendments totally revise Rule 56(c), setting out an entirely new timing scheme. n76 Rule 56(a) and (b) are revised to eliminate the timing distinction between motions by "claiming" and "defending" parties. n77

The revised scheme for timing of summary judgment motions provides:

- Any party may move for summary judgment "at any time until 30 days after the close of all discovery." n78 A motion may be filed at the same time the action is commenced. If the motion is premature, the time for response may be extended. n79
- Any response to the motion must be filed within 21 days of service of the motion, or when a responsive pleading is due, whichever is later. n80
- The moving party may reply to the response to the motion within 14 days after the response is served. n81

The drafters are well aware that these Rule 56 provisions are, for all practical purposes, "default" provisions. n82 The proposed rule itself notes that its deadlines will not apply if "a different time is set by local rule or the court otherwise orders." n83 In fact, the timing of summary judgment motions is almost always a matter addressed at a Rule 16(b) scheduling conference and in the Rule 16(b) scheduling order itself. n84

Practitioners should also be aware that the timing provisions in Rule 56 that will go into effect on December 1, 2009, will likely be altered again on December 1, 2010. The 2010 changes are part of a comprehensive revision of Rule 56 that is currently pending approval under the rulemaking process. Under the 2010 changes, the provision governing the time to file a summary judgment motion remains unaltered, but the provisions governing the time to file a response to the motion and reply to the response will be eliminated, leaving such times to local court determinations. The rulemakers recognize that such consecutive amendments may cause confusion, but concluded that the benefits from the 2010 changes would outweigh the temporary confusion.

III. Amendments of Time Periods in Selected Statutory Provisions Affecting Court Proceedings

The Statutory Time-Periods Technical Amendments Act of 2009 amends 28 statutory provisions affecting court proceedings in cases litigated in federal courts, including 9 bankruptcy provisions, to coincide with the changes to the method of computing time in the rules in two important ways. n85 First, the legislation changes certain statutory deadlines to offset any shortening of the time periods resulting from the rules changes that count every day, in effect maintaining the same time period in the statutes. Second, the legislation changes some statutory deadlines that would otherwise be inconsistent with the amended rules deadlines and lead to confusion. The changes, like the proposed rule amendments, take effect on December 1, 2009. n86

Though a large number of statutory time periods could theoretically be affected by the proposed shift in the rules' method of computing time, the number of statutes actually amended is modest. Only statutory time provisions in which the case law applied the rules' method of computing time were amended. Also, only statutes that are frequently used or have time periods that could helpfully be adjusted to offset the effects of the time-computation method were amended. The amendment of 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1) provides a good illustration of such a change. n87 The provision sets the period for objecting to a magistrate judge's report and recommendations at 10 days. n88 The proposed amendments to Civil Rule 72 and Criminal Rule 59 extend the time from 10 days to 14 days, n89 recognizing that under the present computation method 10 days has always meant at least 14 calendar days. Section 636(b) is amended to allow 14 days n90 so that the statute and rules remain consistent.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO CIVIL RULE 6 AND ADVISORY COMMITTEE NOTE TO RULE 6 AMENDMENTS

New material is underlined; matter to be omitted is lined through.

Rule 6. Computing and Extending Time; Time for Motion Papers

(a) Computing Time. The following rules apply in computing any time period specified in these rules or in any local rule, court order, or statute:

(1) Day of the Event Excluded. Exclude the day of the act, event, or default that begins the period.

(2) Exclusions from Brief Periods. Exclude intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays when the period is less than 11 days.

(3) Last Day. Include the last day of the period unless it is a Saturday, Sunday, legal holiday, or-if the act to be done is filing a paper in court-a day on which weather or other conditions make the clerk's office inaccessible. When the last day is excluded, the period runs until the end of the next day that is not a Saturday, Sunday, legal holiday, or day when the clerk's office is inaccessible.

(4) "Legal Holiday" Defined. As used in these rules, "legal holiday" means:

(A) the day set aside by statute for observing New Year's Day, Martin Luther King Jr.'s Birthday, Washington's Birthday, Memorial Day, Independence Day, Labor Day, Columbus Day, Veterans' Day, Thanksgiving Day, or Christmas Day; and

(B) any other day declared a holiday by the President, Congress, or the state where the district court is located.

(a) Computing Time. The following rules apply in computing any time period specified in these rules, in any local rule or court order, or in any statute that does not specify a method of computing time.

(1) Period Stated in Days or a Longer Unit. When the period is stated in days or a longer unit of time:

(A) exclude the day of the event that triggers the period;

(B) count every day, including intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays; and

(C) include the last day of the period, but if the last day is a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday, the period continues to run until the end of the next day that is not a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday.

(2) Period Stated in Hours. When the period is stated in hours:

(A) begin counting immediately on the occurrence of the event that triggers the period;

(B) count every hour, including hours during intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays; and

(C) if the period would end on a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday, the period continues to run until the same time on the next day that is not a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday.

(3) Inaccessibility of the Clerk's Office. Unless the court orders otherwise, if the clerk's office is inaccessible:

(A) on the last day for filing under Rule 6(a)(1), then the time for filing is extended to the first accessible day that is not a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday; or

(B) during the last hour for filing under Rule 6(a)(2), then the time for filing is extended to the same time on the first accessible day that is not a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday.

(4) "Last Day" Defined. Unless a different time is set by a statute, local rule, or court order, the last day ends:

(A) for electronic filing, at midnight in the court's time zone; and

(B) for filing by other means, when the clerk's office is scheduled to close.

(5) "Next Day" Defined. The "next day" is determined by continuing to count forward when the period is measured after an event and backward when measured before an event.

(6) "Legal Holiday" Defined. "Legal holiday" means:

(A) the day set aside by statute for observing New Year's Day, Martin Luther King Jr.'s Birthday, Washington's Birthday, Memorial Day, Independence Day, Labor Day, Columbus Day, Veterans' Day, Thanksgiving Day, or Christmas Day;

(B) any day declared a holiday by the President or Congress; and

(C) for periods that are measured after an event, any other day declared a holiday by the state where the district court is located.

* * * * *

(b) Extending Time.

* * * * *

(2) Exceptions. A court must not extend the time to act under Rules 50(b) and (d), 52(b), 59(b), (d), and (e), and 60(b), except as those rules allow.

(c) Motions, Notices of Hearing, and Affidavits.

(1) In General. A written motion and notice of the hearing must be served at least 5 14 days before the time specified for the hearing, with the following exceptions:

(A) when the motion may be heard ex parte;

(B) when these rules set a different time; or

(C) when a court order-which a party may, for good cause, apply for ex parte-sets a different time.

(2) Supporting Affidavit. Any affidavit supporting a motion must be served with the motion. Except as Rule 59(c) provides otherwise, any opposing affidavit must be served at least 1 7 days before the hearing, unless the court permits service at another time.

* * * * *

Committee Note

Subdivision (a). Subdivision (a) has been amended to simplify and clarify the provisions that describe how deadlines are computed. Subdivision (a) governs the computation of any time period found in these rules, in any local rule or court order, or in any statute that does not specify a method of computing time. In accordance with Rule 83(a)(1), a local rule may not direct that a deadline be computed in a manner inconsistent with subdivision (a).

The time-computation provisions of subdivision (a) apply only when a time period must be computed. They do not apply when a fixed time to act is set. The amendments thus carry forward the approach taken in Violette v. P.A. Days, Inc., 427 F.3d 1015, 1016 (6th Cir. 2005) (holding that Civil Rule 6(a) "does not apply to situations where the court has established a specific calendar day as a deadline"), and reject the contrary holding of In re American Healthcare Management, Inc., 900 F.2d 827, 832 (5th Cir. 1990) (holding that Bankruptcy Rule 9006(a) governs treatment of date-certain deadline set by court order). If, for example, the date for filing is "no later than November 1, 2007," subdivision (a) does not govern. But if a filing is required to be made "within 10 days" or "within 72 hours," subdivision (a) describes how that deadline is computed.

Subdivision (a) does not apply when computing a time period set by a statute if the statute specifies a method of computing time. See, e.g., 2 U.S.C. § 394 (specifying method for computing time periods prescribed by certain statutory provisions relating to contested elections to the House of Representatives).

Subdivision (a)(1). New subdivision (a)(1) addresses the computation of time periods that are stated in days. It also applies to time periods that are stated in weeks, months, or years. See, e.g., Rule 60(c)(1). Subdivision (a)(1)(B)'s directive to "count every day" is relevant only if the period is stated in days (not weeks, months or years).

Under former Rule 6(a), a period of 11 days or more was computed differently than a period of less than 11 days. Intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays were included in computing the longer periods, but excluded in computing the shorter periods. Former Rule 6(a) thus made computing deadlines unnecessarily complicated and led to counterintuitive results. For example, a 10-day period and a 14-day period that started on the same day usually ended on the same day-and the 10-day period not infrequently ended later than the 14-day period. See Miltimore Sales, Inc. v. Int'l Rectifier, Inc., 412 F.3d 685, 686 (6th Cir. 2005).

Under new subdivision (a)(1), all deadlines stated in days (no matter the length) are computed in the same way. The day of the event that triggers the deadline is not counted. All other days—including intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays—are counted, with only one exception: If the period ends on a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday, then the deadline falls on the next day that is not a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday. An illustration is provided below in the discussion of subdivision (a)(5). Subdivision (a)(3) addresses filing deadlines that expire on a day when the clerk's office is inaccessible.

Where subdivision (a) formerly referred to the "act, event, or default" that triggers the deadline, new subdivision (a) refers simply to the "event" that triggers the deadline; this change in terminology is adopted for brevity and simplicity, and is not intended to change meaning.

Periods previously expressed as less than 11 days will be shortened as a practical matter by the decision to count intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays in computing all periods. Many of those periods have been lengthened to compensate for the change. See, e.g., Rule 14(a)(1).

Most of the 10-day periods were adjusted to meet the change in computation method by setting 14 days as the new period. A 14-day period corresponds to the most frequent result of a 10-day period under the former computation method—two Saturdays and two Sundays were excluded, giving 14 days in all. A 14-day period has an additional advantage. The final day falls on the same day of the week as the event that triggered the period—the 14th day after a Monday, for example, is a Monday. This advantage of using week-long periods led to adopting 7-day periods to replace some of the periods set at less than 10 days, and 21-day periods to replace 20-day periods. Thirty-day and longer periods, however, were generally retained without change.

Subdivision (a)(2). New subdivision (a)(2) addresses the computation of time periods that are stated in hours. No such deadline currently appears in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. But some statutes contain deadlines stated in hours, as do some court orders issued in expedited proceedings.

Under subdivision (a)(2), a deadline stated in hours starts to run immediately on the occurrence of the event that triggers the deadline. The deadline generally ends when the time expires. If, however, the time period expires at a specific time (say, 2:17 p.m.) on a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday, then the deadline is extended to the same time (2:17 p.m.) on the next day that is not a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday. Periods stated in hours are not to be "rounded up" to the next whole hour. Subdivision (a)(3) addresses situations when the clerk's office is inaccessible during the last hour before a filing deadline expires.

Subdivision (a)(2)(B) directs that every hour be counted. Thus, for example, a 72-hour period that commences at 10:23 a.m. on Friday, November 2, 2007, will run until 9:23 a.m. on Monday, November 5; the discrepancy in start and end times in this example results from the intervening shift from daylight saving time to standard time.

Subdivision (a)(3). When determining the last day of a filing period stated in days or a longer unit of time, a day on which the clerk's office is not accessible because of the weather or another reason is treated like a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday. When determining the end of a filing period stated in hours, if the clerk's office is inaccessible during the last hour of the filing period computed under subdivision (a)(2) then the period is extended to the same time on the next day that is not a weekend, holiday, or day when the clerk's office is inaccessible.

Subdivision (a)(3)'s extensions apply "[u]nless the court orders otherwise." In some circumstances, the court might not wish a period of inaccessibility to trigger a full 24-hour extension; in those instances, the court can specify a briefer extension.

The text of the rule no longer refers to "weather or other conditions" as the reason for the inaccessibility of the clerk's office. The reference to "weather" was deleted from the text to underscore that inaccessibility can occur for reasons unrelated to weather, such as an outage of the electronic filing system. Weather can still be a reason for inaccessibility of the clerk's office. The rule does not attempt to define inaccessibility. Rather, the concept will continue to develop through caselaw, see, e.g., William G. Phelps, When Is Office of Clerk of Court Inaccessible Due to Weather or Other Conditions for Purpose of Computing Time Period for Filing Papers under Rule 6(a) of Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 135 A.L.R. Fed. 259 (1996) (collecting cases). In addition, many local provisions address inaccessibility for purposes of electronic filing, see, e.g., D. Kan. Rule 5.4.11 ("A Filing User whose filing is made untimely as the result of a technical failure may seek appropriate relief from the court.").

Subdivision (a)(4). New subdivision (a)(4) defines the end of the last day of a period for purposes of subdivision (a)(1). Subdivision (a)(4) does not apply in computing periods stated in hours under subdivision (a)(2), and does not apply if a different time is set by a statute, local rule, or order in the case. A local rule may, for example, address the problems that might arise if a single district has clerk's offices in different time zones, or provide that papers filed in a drop box after the normal hours of the clerk's office are filed as of the day that is date-stamped on the papers by a device in the drop box.

28 U.S.C. § 452 provides that "[a]ll courts of the United States shall be deemed always open for the purpose of filing proper papers, issuing and returning process, and making motions and orders." A corresponding provision exists in Rule 77(a). Some courts have held that these provisions permit an after-hours filing by handing the papers to an appropriate official. See, e.g., Casaldue v. Diaz, 117 F.2d 915, 917 (1st Cir. 1941). Subdivision (a)(4) does not address the effect of the statute on the question of after-hours filing; instead, the rule is designed to deal with filings in the ordinary course without regard to Section 452.

Subdivision (a)(5). New subdivision (a)(5) defines the "next" day for purposes of subdivisions (a)(1)(C) and (a)(2)(C). The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure contain both forward-looking time periods and backward-looking time periods. A forward-looking time period requires something to be done within a period of time after an event. See, e.g., Rule 59(b) (motion for new trial "must be filed no later than 28 days after entry of the judgment"). A backward-looking time period requires something to be done within a period of time before an event. See, e.g., Rule 26(f) (parties must hold Rule 26(f) conference "as soon as practicable and in any event at least 21 days before a scheduling conference is held or a scheduling order is due under Rule 16(b)"). In determining what is the "next" day for purposes of subdivisions (a)(1)(C) and (a)(2)(C), one should continue counting in the same direction—that is, forward when computing a forward-looking period and backward when computing a backward-looking period. If, for example, a filing is due within 30 days after an event, and the thirtieth day falls on Saturday, September 1, 2007, then the filing is due on Tuesday, September 4, 2007 (Monday, September 3, is Labor Day). But if a filing is due 21 days before an event, and the twenty-first day falls on Saturday, September 1, then the filing is due on Friday, August 31. If the clerk's office is inaccessible on August 31, then subdivision (a)(3) extends the filing deadline forward to the next accessible day that is not a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday—no later than Tuesday, September 4.

Subdivision (a)(6). New subdivision (a)(6) defines "legal holiday" for purposes of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, including the time-computation provisions of subdivision (a). Subdivision (a)(6) continues to include within the definition of "legal holiday" days that are declared a holiday by the President or Congress.

For forward-counted periods—i.e., periods that are measured after an event—subdivision (a)(6)(C) includes certain state holidays within the definition of legal holidays. However, state legal holidays are not recognized in computing backward-counted periods. For both forward- and backward-counted periods, the rule thus protects those who may be unsure of the effect of state holidays. For forward-counted deadlines, treating state holidays the same as federal holidays extends the deadline. Thus, someone who thought that the federal courts might be closed on a state holiday would be safeguarded against an inadvertent late filing. In contrast, for backward-counted deadlines, not giving state holidays the treatment of federal holidays allows filing on the state holiday itself rather than the day before. Take, for example, Monday, April 21, 2008 (Patriot's Day, a legal holiday in the relevant state). If a filing is due 14 days after an event, and the fourteenth day is April 21, then the filing is due on Tuesday, April 22 because Monday, April 21 counts as a legal holiday. But if a filing is due 14 days before an event, and the fourteenth day is April 21, the filing is due on Monday, April 21; the fact that April 21 is a state holiday does not make April 21 a legal holiday for purposes of computing this backward-counted deadline. But note that if the clerk's office is inaccessible on Monday, April 21, then subdivision

(a)(3) extends the April 21 filing deadline forward to the next accessible day that is not a Saturday, Sunday or legal holiday-no earlier than Tuesday, April 22.

Subdivisions (b), (c). The times set in the former rule at 1 or 5 days have been revised to 7 or 14 days.

CHARTS:

DEADLINE CHANGES IN CIVIL RULES*

DEADLINE CHANGES IN CRIMINAL RULES*

DEADLINE CHANGES IN APPELLATE RULES*

DEADLINE CHANGES IN FEDERAL STATUTES (Statutory Time-Periods Technical Amendments Act of 2009) Pub. L. No. 111-16; 123 Stat. 1607*

For full chart detailing Deadline changes in Criminal Rules, please select the PDF version of this commentary at no additional charge.

Return to Text

n1 Pub. L. No. 111-16, 123 Stat. 1607.

n2 The publishers gratefully acknowledge the assistance of Mr. John Rabiej, of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, for his assistance in the preparation of this pamphlet.

n3 See Report of the Civil Rules Advisory Committee, May 9, 2008 [Revised June 17, 2008], p. 1 (Civil Rule 6(a) was chosen as the vehicle for the template "provisions that are adopted in as nearly uniform terms as possible by each of the different sets of rules that have time-computation provisions.").

n4 See Statutory Time-Periods Technical Amendments Act of 2009, Pub. L. No. 111-16, 123 Stat. 1607.

n5 Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(2); Fed. R. Crim. P. 45(a)(2); Fed. R. App. P. 26(a)(2).

n6 Fed. R. Civ. P. 6, advisory committee note of 2009.

n7 Proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(1)(B); proposed Fed. R. Crim. P. 45(a)(1)(B); proposed Fed. R. App. P. 26(a)(1)(B).

n8 Fed. R. Civ. P. 6, advisory committee note of 2009.

n9 Fed. R. Civ. P. 6, advisory committee note of 2009 ("Periods previously expressed as less than 11 days will be shortened as a practical matter by the decision to count intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays.").

n10 See 1 Moore's Federal Practice, §§ 6.02, 6.03 (basic counting rule has its origins in common law and applies not only to time periods set out in federal rules, but also to calculation of federal statutory periods except when those statutes explicitly provide for different method of calculating time periods).

n11 Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(1); Fed. R. Crim. P. 45(a)(1); Fed. R. App. P. 26(a)(1); proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(1)(A); proposed Fed. R. Crim. P. 45(a)(1)(A); proposed Fed. R. App. 26(a)(1)(A).

n12 Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(3); Fed. R. Crim. P. 45(a)(3); Fed. R. App. P. 26(a)(3); proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(1)(C); proposed Fed. R. Crim. P. 45(a)(1)(C); proposed Fed. R. App. 26(a)(1)(C).

n13 Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(3); Fed. R. Crim. P. 45(a)(3); Fed. R. App. P. 26(a)(3).

n14 See proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(3); Fed. R. Crim. P. 45(a)(3); Fed. R. App. P. 26(a)(3).

n15 See, e.g., Fed. R. Civ. P. 6, advisory committee note of 2009.

n16 See 1 Moore's Federal Practice, § 5.31[5]; 14 Moore's Federal Practice, § 77.02.

n17 Proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(5); Fed. R. Crim. P. 45(a)(5); Fed. R. App. P. 26(a)(5).

n18 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 6, advisory committee note of 2009 ("In determining what is the 'next' day . . . , one should continue counting in the same direction-that is, forward when computing a forward-looking period and backward when computing a backward-looking period.").

n19 Proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(6)(C), Fed. R. Crim. P. 45(a)(6)(C), Fed. R. App. P. 26(a)(6)(C).

n20 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 6, advisory committee note of 2009 ("For forward-counted deadlines, . . . someone who thought that the federal courts might be closed on a state holiday would be safeguarded against an inadvertent late filing. In contrast, for backward-counted deadlines, not giving state holidays the treatment of federal holidays allows filing on the state holiday itself, rather than the day before.").

n21 Proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(4)(B), Fed. R. Crim. P. 45(a)(4)(B), Fed. R. App. P. 26(a)(4)(D).

n22 Proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(4)(A); Fed. R. Crim. P. 45(a)(4)(A), Fed. R. App. P. 26(a)(4)(A).

n23 Proposed Fed. R. App. 26(a)(4)(B).

n24 Proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(2)(A); Fed. R. Crim. P. 45(a)(2)(A); Fed. R. App. P. 26(a)(2)(A).

n25 Proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(2)(B); Fed. R. Crim. P. 45(a)(2)(B); Fed. R. App. P. 26(a)(2)(B).

n26 Proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(2)(C); Fed. R. Crim. P. 45(a)(2)(C); Fed. R. App. P. 26(a)(2)(C).

n27 Fed. R. Civ. P. 6, advisory committee note of 2009; Fed. R. Crim. P. 45, advisory committee note of 2009; Fed. R. App. P. 26, advisory committee note of 2009.

n28 Fed. R. Civ. P. 6, advisory committee note of 2009; Fed. R. Crim. P. 45, advisory committee note of 2009; Fed. R. App. P. 26, advisory committee note of 2009.

n29 Summary of the Report of the Judicial Conference Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure, Sept. 2008, Rules-p. 2 ("In consultation with the Committee's Time-Computation Subcommittee, the Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, and Criminal Rules Advisory Committees proposed amendments to Appellate Rule 26, Bankruptcy Rule 9006, Civil Rule 6, and Criminal Rule 45 to make the method of computing time consistent, simpler, and clearer. In tandem with this work, each advisory rules committee also reviewed and proposed changes to the time periods in all the rules to ensure that every deadline is reasonable and that changing the time-computation method did not have the effect of shortening existing time periods.").

n30 Summary of the Report of the Judicial Conference Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure, Sept. 2008, Rules-p. 4 ("To further simplify time-counting, the advisory committees proposed changing most periods of less than 30 days to multiples of 7 days. The advisory committees adopted 7, 14, 21, and 28-day periods when possible, so that deadlines will usually fall on weekdays.").

n31 See, e.g., Fed. R. Civ. P. 6, advisory committee note of 2009 ("Periods previously expressed as less than 11 days will be shortened as a practical matter by the decision to count intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays").

n32 See, e.g., proposed Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(A)(vi) (adjusting time to file a Fed. R. Civ. P. 60 motion that tolls appeal time); Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(6)(B) (adjusting time for motion to reopen time to file appeal); Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(c) (adjusting time to serve motion and any affidavit supporting motion in opposition); Fed. R. Civ. P. 50, 52, and 59 (adjusting time to file certain posttrial motions); Fed. R. Civ. P. 54(d)(1) (adjusting time of taxation of costs); Fed. R. Civ. P. 56 (establishing presumptive deadline for motions); Fed. R. Crim. P. 29, 33, and 34 (adjusting time to file certain posttrial motions for judgment of acquittal); and Fed. R. Crim. P. 35 (adjusting deadline to file motion to correct errors in sentencing).

n33 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 6, advisory committee note of 2009.

n34 Fed. R. Civ. P. 14(a)(1).

n35 Proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 14(a)(1).

n36 Compare Fed. R. App. P. 5(d)(2) with proposed Fed. App. P. 5(d)(2).

n37 Compare Fed. R. App. P. 28.1(f), 31(a) with proposed Fed. App. P. 28.1(f), 31(a).

n38 Fed. R. Civ. P. 6, advisory committee note of 2009; Fed. R. Crim. P. 45, advisory committee note of 2009; Fed. R. App. P. 26, advisory committee note of 2009.

n39 Fed. R. Civ. P. 6, advisory committee note of 2009; Fed. R. Crim. P. 45, advisory committee note of 2009; Fed. R. App. P. 26, advisory committee note of 2009.

n40 See, e.g., Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(a) (normal time for responding to complaint changed from 20 to 21 days).

n41 Fed. R. Civ. P. 6, advisory committee note of 2009; Fed. R. Crim. P. 45, advisory committee note of 2009; Fed. R. App. P. 26, advisory committee note of 2009 ("Thirty-day and longer periods, however, were retained without change.").

n42 Compare Fed. R. App. P. 5(b)(2) with proposed Fed. R. App. P. 5(b)(2).

n43 Fed. R. App. P. 5, advisory committee note of 2009 ("Under former [Appellate] Rule 26(a), '7 days' always meant at least 9 days and could mean as many as 11 or even 13 days. Under current [Appellate] Rule 26(a), intermediate weekends and holidays are counted. Changing the period from 7 to 10 days offset the change in computation approach.").

n44 See Pub. L. No. 111-16, 123 Stat. 1607.

n45 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) ("The Court of Appeal . . . may . . . permit an appeal . . . if application is made within ten days after entry of the order.").

n46 Fed. R. App. P. 26, advisory committee note of 2009) ("Periods previously expressed as less than 11 days will be shortened as a practical matter by the decision to count intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays in computing all time periods.").

n47 Statutory Time-Periods Technical Amendments Act of 2009, Pub. L. No. 111-16, § 6(2), 123 Stat. 1607.

n48 See Moore's Federal Practice, §§ 23.63A[5][b], 107.43A[2].

n49 See 28 U.S.C. § 1453(c)(1), as amended in 2009.

n50 Compare Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(f) with proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(f).

n51 Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(f).

n52 Proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(f).

n53 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 59(a).

n54 See Moore's Federal Practice, §§ 50.42[1], 50.51, 52.61, 59.11[1][a], [2][a], 59.31, 60.65[2][a].

n55 Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(b)(2).

n56 Fed. R. Civ. P. 50, 52, 59, advisory committee notes of 2009.

n57 Fed. R. Crim. P. 29, 33, 34, advisory committee note of 2009.

n58 Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(c)(1).

n59 Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(c)(2).

n60 See 1 Moore's Federal Practice, § 6.07 ("As a practical matter, the five-day period for notice of motions is frequently superseded by provisions of local rules."); § 6.08[1] ("Local rules typically require opposition to be filed a considerably longer time before the hearing.").

n61 See proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(c)(1), (2).

n62 Compare Fed. R. Civ. P. 54(d)(1) with proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 54(d)(1); see Fed. R. Civ. P. 54, advisory committee note of 2009 ("Former Rule 54(d)(1) provided that the clerk may tax costs on 1 day's notice. That period was unrealistically short. The new 14-day period provides a better opportunity to prepare and present a response.").

n63 Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)(1).

n64 See 3 Moore's Federal Practice, §§ 15.10-15.13.

n65 Fed. R. Civ. P. 15, advisory committee note of 2009 ("Serving a motion attacking the pleading did not terminate the right to amend, because a motion is not a 'pleading' as defined in Rule 7."); see also 3 Moore's Federal Practice, § 15.11.

n66 Proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)(1)(A).

n67 Proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)(1)(B).

n68 Fed. R. Civ. P. 15, advisory committee note of 2009.

n69 Fed. R. Civ. P. 15, advisory committee note of 2009 ("The distinction drawn in former Rule 15(a) is changed").

n70 Fed. R. Civ. P. 15, advisory committee note of 2009 ("the right to amend is no longer terminated by service of a responsive pleading.").

n71 Fed. R. Civ. P. 15, advisory committee note of 2009 ("the right to amend once as a matter of course terminates 21 days after service of a motion under Rule 12(b), (e), or (f).").

n72 Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(b).

n73 Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(a).

n74 Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c).

n75 Fed. R. Civ. P. 56, advisory committee note of 2009.

n76 See proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c).

n77 See proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(a), (b).

n78 Proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c)(1)(A).

n79 Fed. R. Civ. P. 56, advisory committee note.

n80 Proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c)(1)(B).

n81 Proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c)(1)(C).

n82 Fed. R. Civ. P. 56, advisory committee note of 2009 ("The presumptive timing rules are default provisions that may be altered by an order in the case or by local rule.").

n83 See proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c)(1).

n84 Fed. R. Civ. P. 56, advisory committee note of 2009 ("Scheduling orders are likely to supersede the rule provisions in most cases."); see Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(b)(3)(A); see also 3 Moore's Federal Practice, § 16.13[1][b]; Manual for Complex Litigation (Fourth) § 11.34 (2004).

n85 See Statutory Time-Periods Technical Amendments Act of 2009, Pub. L. No. 111-16, §§ 2-6, 123 Stat. 1607.

n86 Pub. L. No. 111-16, § 7, 123 Stat. 1607.

n87 See Statutory Time-Periods Technical Amendments Act of 2009, Pub. L. No. 111-16, § 6(1), 123 Stat. 1607.

n88 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1).

n89 Proposed Fed. R. Civ. P. 72(b)(2); Fed. R. Crim. P. 59.

n90 Pub. L. No. 111-16, § 6(1), 123 Stat. 1607.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

45 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

California's 2009 E-Discovery Laws: Text and Analysis

2009 Emerging Issues 3958

California's 2009 E-Discovery Laws: Text and Analysis

By Paul R. Kiesel and Steve Williams

July 2, 2009

SUMMARY: E-Discovery: California's new Electronic Discovery Act, effective June 29, 2009, makes comprehensive changes in California law relating to e-discovery. This Emerging Issues Analysis includes analysis by two authors who helped write the Act, the full text of the Code of Civil Procedure provisions affected by the Act, plus the proposed Rules of Court and the corresponding federal e-discovery rules.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: California's 2009 E-Discovery Laws

TEXT AND ANALYSIS

Synopsis

California E-Discovery: Analysis of the 2009 Legislation and Rules

§ 1 Electronic Discovery

[1] Importance of Electronic Evidence in Modern Law Practice

[2] Need for Regulation of Electronic Discovery

[3] The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure

§ 2 California Law Governing Electronic Discovery

- [1] Prior Law
- [2] Development of Judicial Council Proposal
- [3] Passage of the 2009 Electronic Discovery Act
- [4] Basic Features of New Statutes and Rules
- [5] Comparison Between California Law and Federal Rules

§ 3 Scope and Frequency of Allowable Discovery

- [1] Discovery Allowed if Relevant to Subject Matter of Action
- [2] Preservation Request and Litigation Holds
- [3] Conference of Counsel
- [4] Requests for Production
- [5] Testing and Sampling
- [6] Protective Orders
- [7] Production of Documents "Not Reasonably Accessible"
- [8] Frequency of Discovery
- [9] Subpoenas to Nonparties

§ 4 Document Preservation Obligations

- [1] Importance
- [2] Client Notification
- [3] Development of Common Law Preservation Obligations
- [4] Safe Harbor for Inadvertent Destruction of ESI
- [5] Duty to Preserve May Be Broader Than Duty to Produce

§ 5 Meet and Confer Obligations

§ 6 Form in Which Electronic Evidence Must Be Produced

[1] Production Obligations Under California Rules

[2] Native Form Versus "Reasonably Usable" Form

§ 7 Inadvertent Production of Privileged Information

[1] Nature of the Problem

[2] California "Claw Back" Rule

[3] 30-Day Limitation

[4] Obligations of Party Receiving Privileged Information

§ 8 Other LexisNexis References

Appendix A Sample Preservation Letter

Appendix B Comprehensive Instructions for Manner of Production of ESI

Appendix C Sample ESI Production Protocol

Appendix D California Statutes Governing E-Discovery (including 2009 changes)

Appendix E California Rules of Court E-Discovery Rules

Appendix F E-Discovery Provisions of Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and Federal Rules of Evidence

California E-Discovery: Analysis of the 2009 Legislation and Rules

By

Paul R. Kiesel & Steve Williams

§ 1 Electronic Discovery

[1] Importance of Electronic Evidence in Modern Law Practice

The explosion of data in the Information Age has changed the face of litigation. In the past, cases were often built on eyewitness accounts, personal recollection, and credibility. Documents always have been important, but "smoking gun" evidence was difficult to locate manually (among mountains of paper files)-or simply wasn't written down.

Litigation is different today. Juries are now conditioned to expect "smoking gun" evidence. This evidence is often found in the growing mass of e-mail, video, text messages, online commentary, instant messages, and presentations, electronically recorded and stored-somewhere. Electronic information often takes center stage when a dispute arises. "A picture is worth a thousand words." So is an incriminatory e-mail.

Electronically stored information ("ESI") is at issue in almost every case. Information stored on such devices as cell phones, blackberries, computers, computer networks, and voicemail systems is prevalent. It is difficult to imagine a case in which, at a minimum, early discussions to ascertain whether ESI is at issue would not be appropriate-and these discussions must take place at the earliest possible time to insure that ESI is not lost due to the normal functioning of the devices described above. All practitioners should make it a routine practice to identify these issues at the outset of discovery. In the rare case in which ESI is not at issue, nothing will be lost aside from a short letter and a brief amount of time spent confirming that ESI is not at issue. Such cases, however, will be the exception; the rule is that ESI will almost always be at issue, and a practitioner who ignores this reality does so at her own peril, both in terms of seeking information from an adversary and in insuring that she has taken appropriate steps in relation to her own client.

[2] Need for Regulation of Electronic Discovery

In the past few years a pressing need has arisen to manage the discovery demands created by all this electronic data. Counsel need a common set of rules. Judges need uniform guidelines for resolving electronic discovery issues that now appear regularly in their courtrooms.

The general federal and state discovery rules simply were not specific enough to provide detailed guidance on the handling of ESI discovery matters, and did not deal effectively with some of the unique issues that typically arise in e-discovery. Until 2006, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure did not address issues relating to ESI, and the law governing such matters was developed through case law. Similarly, until 2009, California had virtually no statutes or rules addressing ESI.

In 2006, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure were amended to explicitly deal with issues relating to ESI. These changes were made due to a recognition that while existing rules provided a rough framework to deal with the issues presented by ESI, that was all that was provided. There was little uniformity in the application of these rules, and both courts and litigants demanded that the system provide clearer guidance-especially given the draconian consequences which could follow from the failure to preserve data in anticipation of, or during litigation. The amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure were made with these concerns in mind.

Over the last few years, a number of states also amended their rules of procedure to address issues concerning ESI. In addition, the Uniform Law Commission established model e-discovery rules. Many states followed the approach of the Federal Rules, others were more consistent with the Uniform Law Commission's model rules, while others blended the two.

California, however-the home of Silicon Valley and the seventh largest economy in the world, with some of the world's most active courts both in the state and federal system-took no action. For that reason, courts and litigants tried, with results that varied throughout the state, to apply the general principles governing discovery as set forth in the Discovery Act to ESI issues. There was little consistency, as decisions were often made based upon the familiarity (or lack thereof) of a particular judicial officer with ESI issues. The same lack of uniformity which prompted the amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure exists in California, and courts and litigants had no ability to conform their conduct with a clear set of rules because there was none.

[3] The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure

The 2006 amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which became effective December 1, 2006, address ESI in the following ways:

- Issues relating to electronic document maintenance, preservation, and production are to be discussed at the conference of parties [Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 26(f)(3)(C)].
- A party serving a request to produce documents or information "may specify the form or forms in which electronically stored information is to be produced" [Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 34(b)(1)(C)].
- A party responding to such a request may "state an objection to a requested form for producing electronically stored information," and if the responding party objects to the requested form or if no form was specified in the request, "the [responding] party must state the form or forms it intends to use" [Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 34(b)(2)(D)].
- The foregoing provisions must be read in conjunction with Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 34(b)(2)(E)(ii) and (iii), which provide that if the request does not specify the form of production, a party "must produce it in a form or forms in which it is ordinarily maintained or in a reasonably usable form or forms (34(b)(2)(E)(ii)) and that a "party need not produce the same electronically stored information in more than one form" [Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 34(b)(2)(E)(iii)].
- A "safe harbor" is created which provides that absent exceptional circumstances, a court may not impose sanctions on a party for evidence lost due to routine, good-faith operation of an electronic information system [Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 37(f)]. The Advisory Committee Note to this Rule explains that the rule is intended to prevent a party from permitting electronic systems to destroy evidence after a party knows of actual or potential litigation.

The Federal Rules also provide a "claw back" provision that protects a party against claims of waiver when privileged materials are unintentionally produced as part of an electronic production [Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. Rule 26(b)(5)]. This is a reasonable response to the fact that extraordinarily large productions of electronic information make it difficult to perform a traditional privilege review before production without unduly delaying production. This change was incorporated into prior amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and is also reflected in newly amended Fed. R. Evid. 502.

The relevant Federal Rules are reproduced in Appendix F, below.

§ 2 California Law Governing Electronic Discovery

[1] Prior Law

The general law concerning discovery in California primarily resides in the provisions of the Civil Discovery Act of 1986, presently codified in Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2016 et seq. These provisions provide general rules and principles governing discovery in civil cases in California, but for the most part do not explicitly address issues relating to ESI. One of the few exceptions to this is Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2017.710-2017.740 (Chapter 3, relating to "Use of Technology in Conducting Discovery in a Complex Case"), which was added to the Discovery Act in 2004.

Cases which addressed issues of ESI under California law may be viewed as simply applying the general principles of California discovery law rather than creating new rules unique to ESI. For example, in Electronic Funds Solutions v. Murphy (2005) 134 Cal. App. 4th 1161, 36 Cal. Rptr. 3d 663, terminating discovery sanctions were affirmed after a party had "wiped" computer hard drives after production of the computer hard drives had been ordered. The result is not substantively different from what would have resulted had paper documents been destroyed after an order to produce the files had been issued.

[2] Development of Judicial Council Proposal

The California Judicial Council Rules and Projects Committee on Electronic Discovery (the "Committee") first circulated a proposal for electronic discovery in spring, 2006. Those proposed changes would have only amended Rule 212 of the California Rules of Court (on civil case management). However, the Committee withdrew the 2006 proposal out of concern that more comprehensive changes were needed to the framework of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[3] Passage of the 2009 Electronic Discovery Act

The Committee developed a new proposal after working with members of attorney organizations. The new proposal involved various amendments to the Civil Discovery Act [Code Civ. Proc. § 2016.010 et seq.], along with supporting changes in civil case management rules in the California Rules of Court.

In January, 2008 the Judicial Council Rules and Projects Committee on Electronic Discovery circulated the first version of the new proposal for public comment. Thereafter, the Committee evaluated those comments and made final changes. The proposal was unanimously approved by the Judicial Council on April 25, 2008. The legislative changes were introduced in the California Legislature shortly thereafter as AB 926, with the Judicial Council as co-sponsor of the bill along with the Consumer Attorneys of California and the California Defense Counsel. AB 926 was approved unanimously by both houses of the legislature and sent to enrollment. It was expected that the bill would be signed prior to expiration of the legislative session, with the changes going into effect on January 1, 2009. Governor Schwarzenegger, however, vetoed this bill on September 27, 2008, along with many others, as part of the fallout from the protracted budget crisis which took up much of the summer and fall of 2008.

The bill was reintroduced in 2009 as AB 5, in essentially identical form. Due to the importance of the topic and the immediate need for statewide rules in the area [see § 1, above], the 2009 version was designated as an urgency measure. The bill again passed both houses of the legislature unanimously, and this time was signed by Governor Schwarzenegger [Stats. 2009 ch. 5]. The legislation, known as the Electronic Discovery Act [Stats. 2009 ch. 5, § 1], became effective on June 29, 2009, as an urgency measure, "[i]n order to eliminate uncertainty and confusion regarding the discovery of electronically stored information, and thereby minimize unnecessary and costly litigation that adversely impacts access to the courts" [Stats. 2009 ch. 5, § 23].

Conforming amendments to Cal. Rules of Court, Rule 3.724, establishing the duty of the parties to meet and confer regarding issues relating to the discovery of electronically stored information, were adopted by the California Judicial Council, effective August 14, 2009 [see Cal. Rules of Court, Rule 3.724(8), discussed in § 5, below].

[4] Basic Features of New Statutes and Rules

Production of electronic documents involves important considerations of subject matter, accessibility, and cost-benefit analysis. The obligation to identify and produce certain electronic documents is spelled out with particularity in the new electronic discovery rules, as well as in the broader Civil Discovery Act itself.

The new California Electronic Discovery Act and its conforming rules (referred to collectively in this analysis as the "California rules") are largely based on the Uniform Rules Relating to Discovery of Electronically Stored Information ("Uniform Rules") issued by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws ("NCCUSL").

The new California rules were carefully developed by the Judicial Council to operate within the basic framework of existing California civil discovery law. Because California civil discovery law is organically different from federal law, there are differences between the California rules and the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure [see § 2[5], below]. However, there are also many similarities, as will be discussed below.

This commentary primarily addresses core subjects of the proposed California Rules for electronic discovery:

- The scope and frequency of production [see § 3, below].
- Document preservation [see § 4, below].
- The form of production [see § 6, below].
- Maintaining privilege [see § 7, below].

These are perhaps the most important substantive areas of electronic discovery. This commentary also addresses the new "meet and confer" rules that are important to the smooth functioning of electronic discovery rules in practice [see § 5, below].

Businesses and consumer advocates need to know about these changes and be ready to implement them when e-discovery situations arise in their practices.

[5] Comparison Between California Law and Federal Rules

California ESI law is similar to Federal law in many respects. The key differences are:

- California law defines ESI as stored information having "electrical, digital, magnetic, wireless, optical, electromagnetic, or similar capabilities." The Federal rules refer to information "stored in any medium" which can be "retrieved and examined."
- The Federal rules permit discovery of ESI that is "reasonably accessible," which some suggest is intended to preclude discovery of information which is not reasonably accessible due to burden. The California rules, in contrast, do not create a presumption that information which is not "reasonably accessible" is not subject to discovery, but instead provide for case-by-case examination of whether ESI which is not reasonably accessible should be produced in a particular case.

§ 3 Scope and Frequency of Allowable Discovery

[1] Discovery Allowed if Relevant to Subject Matter of Action

The scope of allowable discovery under the Civil Discovery Act is as follows:

§ 2017.010. Unless otherwise limited by order of the court in accordance with this title, any party may obtain discovery regarding any matter, not privileged, that is relevant to the subject matter involved in the pending action or to the determination of any motion made in that action, if the matter either is itself admissible in evidence or appears reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence.

Discovery is allowed if relevant to the subject matter of the pending action and the matter either is itself admissible in evidence or appears reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence. This section is not amended by the Electronic Discovery Act, and remains in effect.

Federal court practitioners will recognize the foregoing rule as the broader standard of discovery used in federal court prior to 2000. However, changes to FRCP Rule 26(b)(1) in the 2000 amendments changed the subject matter of federal discovery from information relevant to the "subject matter involved" to information relevant to the "claims and defenses of the parties." The Federal Advisory Committee Notes state that the 2000 amendment "signals to the parties that they have no entitlement to discovery to develop new claims or defenses that are not already identified in the pleadings" [192 F.R.D. at 389 (2000)].

This is an important difference in discovery practice in California state court, irrespective of electronic discovery. California Superior Court practitioners may seek discovery of matter relevant to the subject matter of the action, so long as it is reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence.

Due consideration should be given to identification, preservation, collection and production of electronic documents in California state courts that are relevant to the subject matter involved, not just to the claims and defenses of the parties.

[2] Preservation Request and Litigation Holds

Conducting discovery of ESI should begin well before a request for production is served. Practitioners should contemplate sending a preservation letter to the opposing party along with the first documents served in a case. At the same, time, a letter setting forth preservation responsibilities should be sent to one's own client.

For plaintiffs, the preservation letter may be served with the summons and complaint or in some instances before an action is commenced. Defendants should send a preservation letter at an early point as well. While there may be some variations among practitioners, a preservation letter should advise an adversary of the general nature of the claims at issue in the case and advise of the duty to maintain and preserve documents and information relating to such claims, whether they be in hard copy or electronic form. Reference may be made to data having "electrical, digital, magnetic, wireless, optical, electromagnetic, or similar capabilities," and reference should also be made to devices including cell phones, blackberries, computers, laptop computers, servers, networks, backup tapes, and digital cameras. The letter should specifically advise an adversary that routine backup procedures should be suspended to the extent necessary to avoid deletion of material which may be subject to discovery.

See Appendix A for an example of a preservation letter.

[3] Conference of Counsel

Prior to the first case management conference, counsel must meet and confer to discuss whether there are particular ESI issues at issue in the case [see Cal. Rules of Court, Rule 3.724; see § 5, below]. If so, the parties should discuss how they propose to handle such issues including such key topics as preservation, form of production, the extent to which discoverable ESI is not "reasonably accessible," and whether there is ESI which a party will not search for potentially discoverable information.

Assertions that ESI is not "reasonably accessible" due to burden or for other reasons should be tested by seeking specifics as to how data is maintained and what steps are necessary to make such data accessible, given that the disputes over such matters are to be resolved by weighing the need for the information against the burdens posed by searching and producing the information.

[4] Requests for Production

Under the Electronic Discovery Act, Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.010(a) has been amended to state:

§ 2031.010(a). Any party may obtain discovery within the scope delimited [by Chapters 2 and 3] by inspecting, copying, testing or sampling. . .electronically stored information in the possession, custody, or control of any other party to the action.

This amendment clarifies that electronically stored information may be sought in discovery.

In serving discovery requests, the practitioner should specify the form of production which is desired. Those who use litigation database programs such as Summation or Concordance typically ask that electronic documents be produced as ".tiff files with load files." See Appendix B for a sample set of comprehensive instructions setting forth the manner in which ESI should be produced.

When the parties recognize that issues concerning ESI are present, it is often helpful to negotiate an ESI protocol. See Appendix C for a sample ESI protocol. If agreement cannot be reached, the parties may present the issue to the court for resolution.

[5] Testing and Sampling

The amendment to Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.010(a) also expands the methods of discovery beyond "inspecting" to also include "copying, testing or sampling." Sampling has become a very useful tool in federal court electronic discovery, and is often used to determine whether broader discovery should be sought or allowed from backup tapes and other legacy information. Through sampling, a requesting party is allowed to review production from a certain number of backup tapes for relevant information and, based on the result, may be allowed broader access to backup tapes and other information otherwise deemed "not reasonably accessible." This option will be available under the new California rules.

The Electronic Discovery Act has not incorporated a limitation that exists under the Federal rules. Specifically, the Advisory Committee Note to FRCP Rule 34(a) contains a limiting clarification on the scope of sampling which states:

The addition of testing and sampling to federal rule 34(a) with regard to documents and electronically stored information is not meant to create a routine right of direct access to a party's electronic information system, although such access might be justified in some circumstances. Courts should guard against undue intrusiveness resulting from inspecting or testing such systems.

A similar provision apparently was considered by the Committee but is not contained in the California statute.

[6] Protective Orders

Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.060(a), relating to protective orders, has been amended to clarify that:

§ 2031.060(a). When an inspection, copying, testing, or sampling of documents. . . or electronically stored information has been demanded, the party to whom the demand has been directed, and any other party of affected person or organization, may promptly move for a protective order.

The amendments to Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.060(a) add the words "inspection, copying, testing or sampling" and add the words "electronically stored information." Otherwise, the code provision relating to protective orders remains as before—a party resisting discovery may move for a protective order in lieu of production.

The Electronic Discovery Act also added a new Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.060(b), which provides as follows:

§ 2031.060(b). The party or affected person or organization seeking a protective order regarding the production, inspection, copying, testing, or sampling of electronically stored information on the basis that such information is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or expense bears the burden of so demonstrating.

This new subsection clarifies that the party seeking a protective order on the grounds that the information sought is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or expense bears the burden of proof.

The burden is similarly placed under the Federal Rules, once the discovery dispute is before the court. However, the way a discovery dispute is brought to attention of the court is different under the Federal Rules. In both systems, the party is required to respond to the discovery request fully and completely unless the responding party believes an objection is appropriate. If the responding party chooses to object rather than respond, the propounding party will have the obligation to bring a motion to compel, however, the burden remains with the responding party to establish the appropriateness of the objection.

Thus, under the Federal Rules a producing party "need not provide" information "it identifies" as being not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or expense. If a requesting party disagrees, it must bring a motion to compel. Alternatively, the responding party may move for a protective order in response to a discovery request [Fed. Rules Civ. Proc., Rule 26(c)]. Similarly, under the California Civil Discovery Act, a responding party may either object to the production, requiring the propounding party to move to compel, or may file a motion for a protective order [Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.060(a)].

The California approach is an extension of the existing framework of the Civil Discovery Act. Moreover, the burden of production is consistent with Rule 6 of the Uniform Rules of the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, which provides:

A party on which a request to produce electronically stored information has been served shall, in a timely manner, serve a response on the requesting party. The response must state, with respect to each item or category in the request that inspection, copying, testing, or sampling of the information will be permitted as requested; or any objection to the request and the reasons for the objection.

With its consensus view that any new e-discovery legislation needs to operate within the basic framework of California civil discovery law, and with the Uniform Rules as an overall guide, the Committee determined that production of electronic information should be based on the same standard as production of other documents and things.

[7] Production of Documents "Not Reasonably Accessible"

The amended protective order statute requires production of electronically stored information found by the court to be "not reasonably accessible" under some circumstances. New Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.060(d), which is similar to the Federal Rules, provides:

§ 2031.060(d). If the party or affected person or organization from whom discovery of electronically stored information is sought establishes that the information is from a source that is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or expense, the court may nonetheless order discovery if the requesting party shows cause.

The Committee note states that this provision is based on the NCCUSL Uniform Rules, Rule 8, subdivision (c); however, the Uniform Rules contain a specific balancing test rather than a good cause standard. The Uniform Rules test provides that the court may order the discovery of electronically stored information from sources deemed "not reasonably accessible" because of undue burden or expense if the party requesting discovery shows that the likely benefit of the proposed discovery outweighs its likely burden or expense, taking into account the following:

- Amount in controversy.
- Resources of the parties.
- Importance of the issues.
- Importance of the requested discovery in resolving the issues.

After seeking comments from the public as to whether a good cause standard or a version of the NCCUSL balancing test should be used in new Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.060(d), the present proposal provides that "the court may . . . order discovery if the demanding party shows good cause[.]"

Under the Electronic Discovery Act,, new subsection Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.060(e) provides that if the court finds good cause for production of electronically stored information that is not reasonably accessible, it may set conditions for the discovery of the information, including allocation of the expense of discovery. A similar provision is found in the Federal Rules.

Another new subsection, Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.210(d), provides that if a party objects to the discovery of electronically stored information on the ground that it is from a source that is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or expense and that the responding party will not search the source in the absence of an agreement with the demanding party or a court order, the responding party must identify in its response the types or categories of sources of electronically stored information that it asserts are not reasonably accessible. By so doing, the responding party preserves any objections it may have relating to that electronically stored information which it asserts is not readily accessible.

The purpose of this latter provision is to provide notice to a propounding party of what types of sources and locations are not being searched for responsive documents. This will permit the parties to meet and confer productively to either resolve the issue or present it to the court for resolution in a more productive manner. In the absence of this provision, it was feared that a party could hide the ball by objecting to discovery on the ground of undue burden; a propounding party would have no way of knowing what the contours of this objection were. For example, a party may object to searching ESI at all on the ground of burden. Such an objection ordinarily would not be reasonable; the burdens of searching various categories of ESI differ and a party should provide some specificity. Taken to its extreme, ESI resident on a computer without a power source might be called "not reasonably accessible." Of course, once power is supplied, the ESI would become reasonably accessible. On the other hand, a party which objects to searching archived backup tapes relating to computer systems which were replaced by the responding party years ago, and for which even putting the backup tapes in a searchable format would be expensive and burdensome, has stated a much more appropriate objection. Providing this type of identification of a category of ESI which will not be searched permits the propounding party to determine quickly which areas are worth pursuing and which are not. Particular objections are preserved for a simple reason: until such time as a responding party actually searches such a source for responsive information, there is typically no feasible way for the responding party to determine whether privileged material is implicated and to determine what, if any, privileges need be asserted.

[8] Frequency of Discovery

Another new subsection, Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.060(f), allows the court to limit the frequency or extent of discovery of electronically stored information, even from a source that is reasonably accessible, if the court determines that one or more of the following conditions exist:

- It is possible to obtain the information from some other source that is more convenient, less burdensome, or less expensive;
- The discovery sought is unreasonably cumulative or duplicative;
- The party seeking discovery has had ample opportunity by discovery in the action to obtain the information sought; or
- The likely burden or expense outweighs the likely benefit, considering the amount in controversy, resources of the parties, importance of the issues and importance of the requested discovery in resolving the issues.

The Federal Rules contain a similar provision. This is a potentially challenging provision for attorneys unfamiliar with electronic discovery. A disciplined approach to discovery is typically required with electronic information. Some attorneys do not seriously focus on documents until later in the case, as trial approaches. Delay in pursuing documents creates the risk that a court may determine that ample opportunity to pursue discovery existed but was not sought, and that belated efforts therefore will not be permitted.

[9] Subpoenas to Nonparties

An area that is always of significant concern to businesses and individuals is subpoenas. People often have information relevant to cases in which they are not directly involved. Searching for, and producing, this information raises concerns of cost and disruption, as well as confidentiality. Courts are much more likely to be solicitous of claims of burden asserted by non-parties than they might be when a party asserts burden.

The Electronic Discovery Act addresses this issue in the context of electronic discovery by adding a new section to the Civil Discovery Act, Code Civ. Proc. § 1985.8, which is similar in many ways to the section governing production of electronic documents by a party to the litigation. The parts of Code Civ. Proc. § 1985.8 governing subpoenas that are the same as production rules for parties are as follows:

- A party serving a subpoena requiring production of electronically stored information must specify the form in which each type of information is to be produced.
- If a party responding to a subpoena objects to a specified form for producing electronic information, or if no form is specified, the responding party shall state in its response the form in which it intends to produce each type of information.

- Unless the parties otherwise agree or the court otherwise orders, if a subpoena does not specify form of electronic production, the subpoenaed party must produce the information in a form in which it is ordinarily maintained or in a form that is reasonably usable.
- The subpoenaed party need not produce the same electronically stored information in more than one form.

The parts of Code Civ. Proc. § 1985.8 governing subpoenas that differ from production rules for parties are as follows:

- If necessary, the responding party at the reasonable expense of the requesting party must translate any data compilations included in the demand into reasonably usable form.
- A party serving a subpoena requiring production of electronically stored information must take reasonable steps to avoid imposing undue burden or expense on a person subject to the subpoena.
- An order of the court requiring compliance with a subpoena must protect a person who is neither a party nor a party's officer from undue burden or expense resulting from compliance.
- If a subpoenaed person notifies the subpoenaing party that electronically stored information produced pursuant to a subpoena is subject to a claim of privilege or of protection as attorney work product, the special "claw back" provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.285, discussed in § 7[2], below, are applicable.

These last three rules implement the common sense notion that parties involved in litigation should bear the expense of translating data compilations and should otherwise take reasonable steps to avoid imposing an undue burden on third parties.

§ 4 Document Preservation Obligations

[1] Importance

Document preservation goes to the heart of electronic discovery. If documents are modified, overwritten, deleted, or destroyed, important evidence may be lost and the goals of discovery undermined. However, businesses need latitude to periodically destroy documents not part of reasonably anticipated or active litigation, and not otherwise subject to retention under Sarbanes-Oxley, HIPPA, etc. For example, most businesses maintain backup tapes of their computer systems for the purpose of disaster recovery. These backup tapes are usually overwritten on a regular basis, e.g., every 30 to 45 days. Voicemail systems, both traditional and cellular, tend to overwrite messages unless special steps to preserve messages are taken. Suspending these processes can cause disruption and expense.

[2] Client Notification

The practice of immediately notifying clients to preserve electronic information is already widespread in federal court as a matter of common law. The initial notification to clients about document preservation is no small matter and should be considered carefully by the practitioner. For example, if a client has a routine document destruction policy in place, how much of that policy must be suspended upon notice of a suit or claim? How early should potential document custodians and document collection categories be identified so that routine destruction of these documents is stopped?

Federal common law requires a party to cease destruction of "relevant" information upon knowledge that a claim or case is likely. In many cases this is prior to litigation actually being filed. Importantly, the party's legal counsel is also required to inform his or her client of this duty. Failure by counsel to do so has resulted in sanctions.

It remains to be seen how notification to clients of the duty to preserve documents will develop under California law. Even if the Civil Discovery Act required counsel to immediately notify clients of the duty to preserve, the question of what should be in the notification letter still remains. The full scope of preservation duties will likely develop under California as a matter of common law, as has occurred under federal law. However, it would be wise for practitioners to take appropriate steps when litigation is anticipated or initiated to insure that information likely to become the subject of discovery is not inadvertently lost or modified through routine business operations. As seen in the sample preservation letter in Appendix A, such obligations may appear onerous. Failure to take reasonable steps to preserve evidence, on the other hand, may lead to severe consequences in proving or defending a case.

[3] Development of Common Law Preservation Obligations

Widely-followed case law defining a range of preservation obligations in federal courts is found in four published opinions from the Southern District of New York in Zubulake v. USB Warburg. The principal opinion on affirmative obligations is Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC (S.D.N.Y. 2003) 220 F.R.D. 212. Zubulake has been followed by the Southern District of California in Qualcomm Inc. v. Broadcom Corp. (S.D. Cal. 2008) 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 911, and by the Central District of California in Hous. Rights Ctr. v. Sterling (C.D. Cal. 2005) 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31872.

Practitioners in California state courts are justifiably hesitant to cite federal sources in support of a California common law argument. California tends to find its own way in legislation and judicial decisions, and cannot be expected to follow federal common law without good reason. Nevertheless, given the widespread acceptance of the Zubulake decisions, it seems likely that California common law regarding the document preservation duty may develop along similar lines.

The starting point in an analysis of California law is probably Cedars-Sinai Med. Ctr. v. Superior Court (1998) 18 Cal. 4th 1, 72 Cal. Rptr. 2d 248, 954 P.2d 511, in which the California Supreme Court declined to adopt a tort remedy for spoliation of evidence, deferring instead to the "potent" sanctions rules governing discovery under former Code Civ. Proc. § 2023 [now see Code Civ. Proc. § 2023.010 et seq.]. The California Supreme Court explained:

[O]ur discovery laws provide a broad range of sanctions for conduct that amounts to a "misuse of the discovery process."

Section 2023 of the Code of Civil Procedure gives examples of misuses of discovery. . . Destroying evidence in response to a discovery request after litigation has commenced would surely be a misuse of discovery within the meaning of section 2023.

See also Electronic Funds Solutions, LLC v. Murphy (2005) 134 Cal. App. 4th 1161, 36 Cal. Rptr. 3d 663, in which a California Court of Appeal affirmed a discovery sanction striking a defendant's answer for destruction of electronic evidence. While neither of these California cases addresses the broader scope of the affirmative duty to preserve, the underlying principles are grounded in similar goals of substantive and procedural fairness. Ambiguity arises, however, from the fact that Cedars-Sinai and Electronic Funds Solutions arise from loss of evidence after litigation has been initiated and discovery served. Less clear is the obligation to preserve discoverable information prior to the commencement of litigation and service of discovery requests.

Given the increasing practice of counsel sending letters to opponents at the outset of litigation demanding document preservation, it seems inevitable that document preservation practices will receive increasing scrutiny in California state courts just as has occurred in federal courts. And given the broad range of sanctionable conduct, as suggested by the California Supreme Court in Cedars-Sinai Med. Ctr. v. Superior Court, above, document preservation duties may generate the kind of scrutiny no lawyer wants to be on the wrong side of.

[4] Safe Harbor for Inadvertent Destruction of ESI

Federal practitioners are familiar with the idea of a "safe harbor" provision, prohibiting sanctions in the event of inadvertent, good faith destruction of documents during the course of litigation. The Electronic Discovery Act contains a similar provision. Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.060(i) provides a safe harbor to parties and counsel for failure to provide electronically stored information that is "lost, damaged, altered, or overwritten as the result of the routine, good-faith operation of an electronic information system."

California state practitioners therefore can assume that good faith mistakes will not be deemed sanctionable conduct. However, the safe harbor defense will likely require a careful explanation of the mistake and why it was in "good faith." Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.060(i) states that "[t]his subdivision shall not be construed to alter any existing obligation to preserve discoverable information."

The "safe harbor" provision is developing in federal common law in a way that does not excuse negligence or material oversight [see, e.g., Hous. Rights Ctr. v. Sterling (C.D. Cal. 2005) 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31872]. Prudence suggests cautious expectations about relying too heavily on safe harbor protections.

[5] Duty to Preserve May Be Broader Than Duty to Produce

Finally, it is noteworthy that under federal common law the duty to preserve electronic information is broader than the duty to produce. Advisory Committee Notes to FRCP Rule 26 provide: "A party's identification of sources of electronically stored information as not reasonably accessible does not relieve the party of its common-law or statutory duties to preserve evidence."

This specific issue is not addressed in the new California rules or Judicial Council commentary. Again, prudence dictates caution about the scope of document preservation under California law. It seems likely that the duty to preserve will be interpreted to be broader than the duty to produce. For that reason, a preservation letter should be sent when litigation is anticipated or has commenced. This letter not only serves to advise the client of what steps are necessary in relation to discovery obligations, but may also become important if claims of loss of evidence or spoliation arise later in the case. In recent years, focus on document preservation issues has become a routine area of discovery, and parties seek to score points by establishing that their adversary took no steps to preserve important evidence—even when the party cannot point to any particular evidence which has been lost. A letter or memo to the client putting them on notice of their obligation to preserve ESI will not only serve to avoid this problem, but may also provide the attorney with protection should the client claim that they were not told of their obligations. No one wants these issues to arise for the first time at their client's deposition.

§ 5 Meet and Confer Obligations

In addition to the Electronic Discovery Act itself, California Rules of Court, Rule 3.724 has been amended to highlight important obligations of counsel to meet and confer regarding electronic discovery. Rule 3.724 generally requires the parties to meet and confer, in person or by telephone, no later than 30 calendar days before the date set for the initial case management conference (unless the court orders another time period), to consider specified issues [Cal. Rules of Court, Rule 3.724]. The amended version of the rule, effective August 14, 2009, specifically requires that the parties consider the following issues relating to e-discovery as part of their obligation to meet and confer [Cal. Rules of Court, Rule 3.724(8)] (note that the proposed version of the amendment would have established a separate 45-day meet-and-confer rule for e-discovery, but that period was changed to 30 days in the final version to conform to the general meet-and-confer rule)]:

- Any issue relating to the preservation of discoverable electronically stored information.
- The form or forms in which information will be produced.
- The time within which the information will be produced.
- The scope of discovery of the information.
- The method for asserting or preserving claims of privilege or attorney work product, including whether such claims may be asserted after production.
- The method for asserting or preserving the confidentiality, privacy, trade secrets, or proprietary status of information relating to a party or persons not a party to the civil proceedings.
- How the cost of production of electronically stored information is to be allocated among the parties.
- Any other issues relating to the discovery of electronically stored information, including developing a proposed plan relating to the discovery of the information.

Meet and confer conferences smooth the issues of electronic discovery immensely. Many questions that counsel ask in the abstract about electronic discovery can, and typically are, dealt with successfully in conference.

While the outer boundaries of discovery need to be explored at times, most discovery of electronic information is focused on active data, readily accessible to most producing parties. Both parties can assist the process immensely by disclosing basic information about computer networks and storage that allow the other party to focus requests more intelligently.

Conversely, counsel who wait until the proverbial "last minute" to seriously address discovery may find themselves short on electronic documents and inadequately prepared for depositions, motions and trial.

Cal Rules of Court, Rule 3.728(13), provides that the court's case management order may contain "any additional orders that may be appropriate, including orders on matters listed in rules 3.724 and 3.727." This section provides authority for the court to include provisions relating to e-discovery in its case management order.

As experience in federal courts has shown, strong case management orders are of great value in facilitating electronic discovery. Proper focus on electronic discovery at the early phases of a case pays dividends as the case proceeds.

§ 6 Form in Which Electronic Evidence Must Be Produced

[1] Production Obligations Under California Rules

The Electronic Discovery Act contains somewhat competing provisions governing the form of production. One sees this by comparing the rules for specifying the form of production in a request against the rules for objecting to the form of production in a response.

Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.030(a) has been amended to allow the requesting party to "specify the form in which each type of electronically stored information is to be produced." This provision suggests that the requesting party controls the form of production.

However, a new subsection, Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.280(b), allows the responding party to object to a specified form for production and "state in its response the form in which it intends to produce each type of the information." This suggests that the responding party ultimately may control the form of production because if it does not agree with the form specified by the requesting party, it can simply object and specify the form in which it agrees to produce.

Another new subsection, Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.280(c), provides that unless the parties agree or the court otherwise orders:

- The responding party must produce the information in a form in which it is ordinarily maintained or in a form that is reasonably usable if no production format is specified in the request, and
- A party need not produce the same electronically stored information in more than one form.

No default form of production is specified in the new rules.

If a dispute develops between the parties as to the form of production—if, for example, the responding party chooses to make a production in a format different from that which was requested and the propounding party is not pleased with the chosen form of production—it is in all parties' interest to promptly present the matter to the court before production is made. Choosing the wrong format could entail great expense if the court orders a subsequent, alternative form of production. It is also possible that a court will refuse to order a new production due to cost concerns even if the court concludes that the responding party was wrong in refusing to produce in the format which was requested by the propounding party. As with many other areas of ESI, it is critical that the parties identify disputes, address them, and present them to the court for resolution where necessary before great expense is incurred.

[2] Native Form Versus "Reasonably Usable" Form

Whether or not a default production form is specified, we expect that debates over the form of production will reduce, in practice, to whether documents are produced in "native format" (including all metadata) or a "reasonably usable form" (not including metadata). Requesting counsel should always consider requesting documents in native format, and should always seek metadata. Because this is likely to be a disputed issue, it is once again imperative for counsel to address it at an early point of the case so that court intervention may be sought if necessary.

Metadata is the hidden information about a document that reveals many things that may be important to litigation, including: file and document history, date of creation, author, editors, dates of access, dates of modification and revision history.

Production in "native" format is almost always cheaper than production in other formats. However, because responding counsel resist producing metadata, the more common current practice is not to produce documents in native format, and instead to incur the additional expense to produce in some other form. In some cases, issues concerning metadata may be minor because of the nature of the case or the value of the case. In other cases, parties will pursue metadata because, for example, it may be critical to determine who accessed and read critical documents. Counsel should note that metadata will not be produced unless affirmative efforts are made to require its production. Attention must be paid to this issue at the earliest point of the discovery process, as metadata may be lost or altered in the absence of preservation, and metadata will not typically be produced unless specifically sought.

A form currently in vogue in federal and state court is to produce electronic documents in "TIFF" format, together with extracted text and a "load file" (computer instructions for loading the data), which can all be matched up and loaded into a litigation software package (such as Concordance or Summation) for review. Parties then agree to retain the original native documents, including metadata, for further possible review.

It is common practice to produce databases in native format. Because databases are constructed in "bits and pieces" of information, it is usually not feasible to print out a database in image format. Most databases can only be meaningfully accessed in native format using search commands such as SQL (search query language). This sometimes requires a reviewing party to obtain a software license from a third party vendor for viewing the database data.

It remains to be seen whether electronic images (TIFF or PDF) will continue to be the accepted standard for production of e-mails and other documents, or whether courts will require production in native format. This is a debate taking place in state and federal courts across the country and will likely continue in California state courts, as well, after adoption of the Electronic Discovery Act.

§ 7 Inadvertent Production of Privileged Information

[1] Nature of the Problem

Inadvertent productions of privileged documents are not uncommon in the era of electronic discovery. When a party and reviewing counsel are producing hundreds of thousands of electronic files in one production, it is possible for privileged documents to slip through from time to time. Because of the volume of material which is produced, it is frequently impossible to perform a complete privilege review while still producing documents in a timely manner. The Federal Rules, and the new California law, both provide for a "claw back" as the only practical means of protecting privilege while permitting production of information in litigation [see Fed. R. Civ. Proc., Rule 26(b)(5); Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.285].

It is not unusual for a document which is either marked "attorney-client privileged" on its face to be produced, or for an e-mail, memo, or letter to or from counsel, to be produced as part of a large production. It is vital that counsel for the requesting party be aware of the rules, and advise all paralegals or other staff of how to recognize such documents. Any such documents should immediately be segregated and notice provided to the responding party, so that the responding party can determine whether the production was intentional or inadvertent. No use of such documents should be made until the responding party has had a chance to express its position on the issue and the issue has been resolved between the parties or by the court.

[2] California "Claw Back" Rule

The Electronic Discovery Act deals with this problem by adding an entirely new section to the Civil Discovery Act, Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.285, which works like this:

- If privileged (or attorney work product protected) electronically stored information is discovered to have been produced, the party making the claim may give notice of the privilege claim and the basis for the claim.
- After being notified, the receiving party must "immediately sequester" the information and either return the information (and any copies) or, within 30 days present the information to the court conditionally under seal for a determination of the claim. Until resolution, the receiving party is required to preserve the information and keep it confidential.
- Any receiving party is precluded from using or disclosing the specified information until the claim of privilege is resolved.

This is known as a "claw back" provision, since a party who inadvertently produces an electronic document can simply "claw" or take it back after production without regard to waiver issues.

[3] 30-Day Limitation

It is important that the receiving party move the court to address the privilege question within 30 days, or it will lose the ability to use that document [Code Civ. Proc. § 2031.285(d)(1)]. This is not a lot of time. And since document "claw backs" often occur during depositions, it is critical that deposing counsel not lose track of the 30-day filing period after the deposition is over.

[4] Obligations of Party Receiving Privileged Information

The new California provision discussed above will control inadvertent production insofar as electronically stored information is concerned. However it does not address inadvertent production of other documents and things and does not address any possible affirmative obligations a receiving party's counsel may have if he or she received inadvertently produced information that is obviously privileged.

In Rico v. Mitsubishi Motors Corp. (2007) 42 Cal. 4th 807, 68 Cal. Rptr. 3d 758, 171 P.3d 1092, the California Supreme Court addressed the affirmative duty of counsel who receive inadvertent productions that are obviously identifiable as confidential or privileged:

When a lawyer who receives materials that obviously appear to be subject to an attorney-client privilege or otherwise clearly appear to be confidential and privileged and where it is reasonably apparent that the materials were provided or made available through inadvertence, the lawyer receiving such materials should refrain from examining the materials any more than is essential to ascertain if the materials are privileged, and shall immediately notify the sender that he or she possesses material that appears to be privileged. The parties may then proceed to resolve the situation by agreement or may resort to the court for guidance with the benefit of protective orders and other judicial intervention as may be justified.

The new California rules for electronic discovery should be read in context of this duty spelled out by the California Supreme Court. It is not always the case that inadvertent productions are obvious. In fact, some companies seem to have an unspoken policy to include an attorney on many e-mails that are sensitive, but not necessarily privileged.

A good way to deal with the potential conflict in this issue will be to agree among counsel as part of the initial meet and confer conference precisely how all forms of privileged and confidential documents will be dealt with in discovery. Proposed new additions to California Rules of Court, Rule 3.724 (discussed in § 5, above) require this.

§ 8 Other LexisNexis References

For coverage of electronic discovery procedures in California, with checklists, see Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Civil Discovery, Ch. 5, Discovery of Electronic Evidence.

For a general guide to electronic discovery in Federal courts in California under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, see Matthew Bender Practice Guide: Federal Pretrial Civil Procedure in California, Ch. 23, Methods of Discovery, Part VII, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 23.158 et seq.

For coverage of the revision of the Federal Rules of Court as they effect electronic discovery, see E-Discovery: Newly Amended Fed Rules of Civil Procedure; see also Moore's Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information.

Appendix A

Sample Preservation Letter

The following form is a sample preservation letter directing an opposing party to preserve electronic evidence. For discussion of preservation letters, see § 3[1], above. A preservation letter should contain the provisions included in this sample.

SAMPLE:

You are hereby given notice to immediately take all steps necessary to prevent the destruction, loss, concealment, or alteration of any paper, document, or electronically stored information ("ESI") and other data or information generated by and/or stored on your computers and storage media (e.g., hard disks, floppy disks, backup tapes, etc.), and e-mail related to (1) [subject matter of lawsuit]; (2) the events and causes of action described in Plaintiffs' Complaint; and (3) ESI and documents you may use to support any defenses you may claim to have in this action.

You should anticipate that much of the information subject to disclosure and responsive to discovery in this action is stored on your current or former computer systems and other media and devices (including personal digital or data assistants, voice-messaging or voice-mail systems, online repositories, and cell phones).

ESI should be afforded the broadest possible definition and includes, but is not limited to, all digital communications (e.g., e-mail, voice mail, instant messaging), word processed documents (e.g. Word and WordPerfect documents and drafts), spreadsheets and tables (e.g. Excel and Lotus 123 worksheets), accounting application data (such as QuickBooks, Money, or Peachtree), image and facsimile files (including PDF, TIFF, JPG, and GIF images), sound recordings (including WAV and MP3 files), video recordings, all databases, all contact and relationship management data, calendar and diary application data, online access data (including temporary, internet files, History, and Cookies), all presentations (including PowerPoint and Corel), all network access and server activity logs, all data created with the use of any Personal Data Assistant (PDA) such as Palm Pilot, HP Jornada, Cassiopeia, or other Windows-based or Pocket PC devices, all CAD files, and all back-up and archival files.

Adequate preservation of ESI requires more than simply refraining from efforts to destroy or dispose of such evidence. You must also intervene to prevent loss due to routine operations and employ proper techniques to safeguard all such evidence.

Because hard copies do not preserve electronic searchability or metadata, they are not an adequate substitute for ESI. If information exists in both electronic and paper form, you should preserve them both.

LITIGATION HOLD

You are requested to immediately initiate a litigation hold for potentially relevant ESI, documents, and tangible things, and to act diligently and in good faith to secure and audit compliance with that litigation hold. You are also requested to preserve and not destroy all passwords, decryption procedures (including, if necessary, the software to decrypt the files), network access codes, ID names, manuals, tutorials, written instructions, decompression or reconstruction software, and any and all other information and things necessary to access, view, and (if necessary) reconstruct any ESI. You should not pack, compress, purge, or dispose of any file or any part thereof.

You are further requested to immediately identify and modify or suspend features of your operations, information systems, and devices that, in routine operations, operate to cause the loss of documents, tangible items, or ESI. Examples of such features and operations include, but are not limited to, purging the contents of e-mail repositories by age, capacity, or other criteria; using data or media wiping, disposal, erasure, or encryption utilities or devices; overwriting, erasing, destroying, or discarding back-up media; re-assigning, re-imaging or disposing of systems, servers, devices, or media; running antivirus or other programs that alter metadata; using metadata stripper utilities; and destroying documents or any ESI by age or other criteria.

SERVERS

With respect to servers like those used to manage electronic mail and network storage, the entire contents of each user's network share and e-mail account should be preserved and not modified.

STORAGE

With respect to on-line storage and/or direct access storage devices attached to your mainframe computers and/or minicomputers, in addition to the above, you are not to modify or delete any ESI, "deleted" files, and/or file fragments existing on the date of this letter's delivery that contain potentially relevant information.

With regard to all electronic media used for off-line storage, including magnetic tapes and cartridges, optical media, electronic media, and other media or combinations of media containing potentially relevant information, you are requested to stop any activity which may result in the loss of any ESI, including rotation, destruction, overwriting and erasure in whole or in part. This request is intended to cover all media used for data or information storage in connection with your computer systems, including magnetic tapes and cartridges, magneto-optical disks, floppy diskettes, and all other media, whether used with personal computers, minicomputers, mainframes or other computers, and whether containing backup and/or archival ESI.

PERSONAL COMPUTERS

You should take immediate steps to preserve all ESI on all personal computers used by your officers, directors and employees, including all secretaries and assistants, that in any way relate to the [subject matter of action], and the events and causes of action described in the Complaint. As to fixed devices, (1) a true and correct copy is to be made of all such ESI, including all active files and completely restored versions of all deleted electronic files and file fragments; (2) full directory listings (including hidden files) for all directories and subdirectories (including hidden directories) on such fixed devices should be written; and (3) all such copies and listings are to be preserved until this litigation is ended. As to floppy diskettes, CDs, tapes, and other non-fixed media relating to this matter, they are to be collected and stored pending resolution of this litigation.

PORTABLE SYSTEMS

In addition to your immediate preservation of ESI, documents and tangible items in your business, on servers and workstations, you should also determine if any home or portable systems may contain potentially relevant data or information. To the extent that officers, board members, or employees have sent or received potentially relevant e-mails or created or reviewed potentially relevant documents away from the office, you must preserve the contents of systems, devices, and media used for these purposes (including not only potentially relevant data from portable and home computers, but also from portable thumb drives, CD-R discs, PDAs, smart phones, voice mailboxes, or other forms of ESI storage). Additionally, if any employees, officers, or directors used online or browser-based e-mail accounts or services to send or receive potentially relevant messages and attachments, the contents of these account mailboxes should be preserved.

EVIDENCE CREATED OR ACQUIRED IN THE FUTURE

With regard to documents, tangible things, and ESI that are created or come into your custody, possession, or control subsequent to the date of delivery of this letter, potentially relevant evidence is to be preserved. You should take all appropriate action to avoid destruction of potentially relevant evidence.

Please forward a copy of this letter to all persons and entities possessing or controlling potentially relevant evidence. Your obligation to preserve potentially relevant evidence is required by law.

Appendix B

Comprehensive Instructions for Manner of Production of ESI

The following form is a sample set of instructions setting forth the manner in which ESI should be preserved in connection with requests for production. For discussion of the use of these instructions, see § 3[4], above.

SAMPLE:

When a request specifically seeks DOCUMENTS in electronic form, such DOCUMENTS shall be produced (i) with a load file suitable for loading the data into a litigation database that defines document breaks, attachments, metadata, and other information (identified below) and (ii) with a cross-reference file that facilitates the linking of the produced TIFF or native file with a litigation database; specifically, production to be as follows:

(a) Spreadsheets -To be produced (i) as a native file, and (ii) with a load file suitable for linking it to a litigation support database that (for authentication) identifies the MD-5 hash value of each file.

(b) Standard Office File Forms (e.g. E-mails, Word Processing Documents, Presentations) -- To be produced (i) in TIFF format, and (ii) with metadata and text searchable information extracted from the native file and produced as fielded metadata. Family relationships among e-mail and attachments are to be maintained.

When any such DOCUMENTS cannot be provided in one of the above manners, as in the case of certain scheduling, accounting, contact management, and database programs (e.g. Primavera, MS Access, Oracle, Microsoft SQL Server), or if Plaintiffs and each Defendant otherwise agree, Plaintiffs and each Defendant will determine another acceptable electronic form for production.

Appendix C

Sample ESI Production Protocol

The following form is a sample ESI protocol. In cases when the parties recognize that issues concerning ESI are present, it is often helpful to negotiate such a protocol. For discussion of the use of such a protocol, see § 3[4], above.

SAMPLE:

ESI PRODUCTION PROTOCOL

■ Obligation to Produce Electronically Stored Information. The parties acknowledge and agree that to the extent they possess electronically stored information ("ESI") responsive to a document request, that ESI is within the scope of matters subject to discovery in this case.

■ Load Files. Except for ESI described in sections 3(b) and (c) below, ESI will be produced in electronic format, with files suitable for loading into a litigation support database. The load files will define document breaks, attachments and other information identified below.

(a) Document Cross-Reference File. The producing party will provide a cross-reference file that identifies the start and end of the document, its attachments and its corresponding metadata.

(b) Cross-Reference or Linking File. The producing party will also provide a cross-reference file that facilitates the linking of the produced image or native file with the litigation database. This cross-reference file will contain fields such as the unique document ID (i.e., BegBates) and the file path of the corresponding image or native file. The producing party may provide this information either in a litigation database format or as a standard delimited ASCII text file.

■ Categories of Production of ESI. ESI will be produced as follows, depending on its classification.

(a) Production of ESI as TIFF Images With Metadata and Extracted Text. Documents created in standard office automation file formats (including but not limited to Microsoft Word or WordPerfect documents) and ESI that can practicably be converted into TIFF format will be produced as single-page TIFF Group IV images, with any available fielded metadata and text searchable information extracted from the native documents.

(i) Bates Numbering. The producing party will brand all TIFF images in the lower right-hand corner with its corresponding bates number, using a consistent font type and size. The Bates number must not obscure any part of the underlying image.

(ii) File Names. Image file names will be identical to the corresponding bates numbered images, with a ".tif" file extension.

(iii) Confidentiality Endorsements. The producing party will brand any confidentiality or similar endorsements in a corner of the TIFF image. Those endorsements must be in a consistent font type and size, and must not obscure any part of the underlying image or Bates number.

(iv) Production of Extracted Full Text. The producing party will provide extracted full text (i.e., text extracted from ESI) for all material originating as ESI in a text file corresponding to a single page of a document. The full text file name will be composed of the Bates number of the associated document, with a ".txt" file extension. When a party is unable to produce extracted full text, it will provide an explanation of that inability with its document production.

(v) Production of Metadata. The producing party will provide the following metadata, as applicable, for all ESI: start bates, end bates, start attachment, end attachment, custodian or source, original file path, original file name, file type/file extension, MD-5 hash value, title, creation date, creation time, page count, last modification date, last modification time, and last saved by name.

(vi) Metadata for E-Mail. In addition to the metadata to be produced for all ESI, for all e-mail, the producing party will also produce the following as fielded metadata: subject, author, recipients, from, to, copyees, blind copyees, date sent, time sent, date received, time received, MD-5 hash value, attachment file name, begin attachment, and end attachment. Family relationships among e-mail and attachments will be maintained by ensuring that attachments immediately follow their parent e-mail, and setting the "begin attachment" and "end attachment" metadata fields appropriately.

(vii) Explanation of Inability to Produce Metadata. When a party is unable to produce metadata for a particular field, it will provide an explanation of that inability with its document production.

(viii) Redaction. If a file that originates in ESI needs to be redacted before production, the file will be rendered in TIFF, and the TIFF will be redacted and produced. However, to the extent that the text is searchable in the native format, the producing party will still provide searchable text for those portions of the document that have not been redacted.

(b) Production of Native Format Documents That Are Impractical to Convert to TIFF. ESI that is not practical to convert to TIFF may be produced using one of the two following methods, which method will be subject to meet and confer between the parties.

(i) Spreadsheets that are Impractical to Convert to TIFF. ESI that is not practical to convert to TIFF (for example, spreadsheets) may be produced in electronic format suitable for loading to a litigation support database with links to the native files.

(A) Identification. ESI produced in native file format will be assigned a unique DocID number within the litigation database.

(B) File Names. File names will be identical to the DocID number, followed by the original file name and file extension.

(C) Authentication. The producing party will provide a litigation database load file with separately fielded data, which will contain, as one of the fields, the MD-5 hash value of each file produced in native format.

(ii) ESI That is Impractical to Produce with Links to a Database. The parties understand and acknowledge that certain categories of ESI are structurally complex and do not lend themselves to production as native format documents with links to a litigation database. For example, in some instances renaming and/or linking a native document comprised of subparts will render the document unusable. After meet and confer, the parties may agree to produce these types of documents in native form, accompanied with a bates number and MD-5 hash value, but separate from a litigation support database. In those instances, if a propounding party or its experts lack access to proprietary software needed to review the producing party's ESI in native format, the parties will meet and confer to obtain a resolution which allows that party to view the affected documents.

(iii) Encrypted or Password-Protected ESI. For any ESI that exists in encrypted format or is password-protected, the producing party will provide the propounding party a means to gain access to those native files (for example, by supplying passwords).

(c) Reports in Lieu of Native Production. If a party believes that it would be impractical to produce ESI in native format because of complexities associated with certain scheduling programs (such as Primavera), accounting systems, mapping systems, and/or other databases (such as MS Access, Oracle, and Microsoft SQL Server), it will so notify the propounding party and will inform the propounding party whether it has generated reports in the normal course of business using those programs or systems. In any such instance, the parties will meet and confer concerning the manner of production of those reports.

(d) Production of Pictures/Images. Any photographic images created and/or maintained in electronic format will be produced in that format.

■ Production Media. The producing party will use the appropriate electronic media (CD, DVD or hard drive) for its ESI production, and will cooperate in good faith to use the highest-capacity available media to minimize associated overhead. The producing party will label the physical media with the producing party, production date, media volume name, and document number range.

■ Avoidance of Duplicate Production. Each producing party will take all reasonable steps to reduce duplication of ESI. De-duplication will be performed within a custodian. The producing party will maintain references to all removed duplicate files.

Appendix D

California Statutes Governing E-Discovery (including 2009 changes)

Appendix D contains the text of the principal California statutes relevant to the discovery of electronically stored information. It incorporates all codified legislative changes enacted in 2009 as part of the California Electronic Discovery Act [Stats. 2009 ch. 5], and includes relevant code sections that are discussed in this pamphlet even though they are unaffected by the 2009 legislation. The headings appearing in boldface type at the beginning of each code section are prepared by the publisher for convenience of the reader and do not form a part of the actual text of the section as enacted or amended by the legislature.

Immediately following each code section, after the designation Leg.H., is a chronological list of all statutes affecting the section since its enactment. Language deleted by the 2009 legislative amendments is indicated by bracketed numbers (e.g., "[1]") in the section at the point where the deletion was made, with the deleted language appearing in small type following the section. Language added by the 2009 legislation is indicated in boldface type.

California Code of Civil Procedure

Synopsis:

Selected Provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure

PART 4. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

Title 3. Of the Production of Evidence

Chapter 2. Means of Production

§ 1985.8. Subpoena-Electronically Stored Information; Access to Information by Party Serving Subpoena.

Title 4. Civil Discovery Act

Chapter 1. General Provisions

§ 2016.020. Definitions.

Chapter 2. Scope of Discovery

Article 1. General Provisions

§ 2017.010. What Matters May Be Subject to Discovery.

§ 2017.020. When Court May Limit Scope of Discovery; Motion for Protective Order; Monetary Sanction.

Chapter 14. Inspection and Production of Documents, Tangible Things, Land, and Other Property

Article 1. Inspection Demand

§ 2031.010. Right to Discovery by Inspecting, Copying, Testing, or Sampling Documents, Tangible Things, Land or Other Property, and Electronically Stored Information.

§ 2031.020. Demand for Inspection, Copying, Testing, or Sampling by Defendant Authorized at Any Time; When Plaintiff May Make Demand for Inspection, Copying, Testing, or Sampling.

§ 2031.030. Format and Requirements for Demands for Inspection, Copying, Testing, or Sampling.

§ 2031.040. Service of Demand for Inspection, Copying, Testing, or Sampling.

§ 2031.050. When Supplemental Demand May Be Propounded.

§ 2031.060. Motion for Protective Order; What Protective Order May Provide; Denial of Protective Order; Monetary Sanction.

Article 2. Response to Inspection Demand

§ 2031.210. Nature and Format of Response to Demand for Inspection, Copying, Testing, or Sampling.

§ 2031.220. Statement Regarding Compliance in Whole or in Part.

§ 2031.230. Representation of Inability to Comply.

§ 2031.240. Statements Regarding Demand That Is Objectionable in Whole or in Part.

§ 2031.250. Signing of Response to Demand.

§ 2031.260. Time for Service of Response; Unlawful Detainer Action.

§ 2031.270. Extension of Date for Inspection or Time for Service of Response; Written Confirmation of Agreement.

§ 2031.280. Production of Documents-Form; Date Specified; Production of Electronically Stored Information; Translation; Expense.

§ 2031.285. Production of Electronically Stored Information-Claim of Privilege or of Protection as Attorney Work Product; Notification to Receiving Party; Receiving Party's Responsibilities; Preclusion From Using or Disclosing Specified Information; Resolution.

§ 2031.290. Retention of Demand for Inspection, Copying, Testing, or Sampling, Proof of Service, and Response by Demanding Party.

§ 2031.300. Effect of Failure to Serve Timely Response to Demand for Inspection, Copying, Testing, or Sampling; Motion for Order; Monetary and Other Sanctions.

§ 2031.310. Motion for Order Compelling Further Response; Grounds; Notice; Waiver; Monetary and Other Sanctions.

§ 2031.320. Motion for Order Compelling Compliance on Failure to Permit Inspection, Copying, Testing, or Sampling in Accordance With Response; Monetary and Other Sanctions.

Text:

PART 4

Miscellaneous Provisions

TITLE 3

OF THE PRODUCTION OF EVIDENCE

CHAPTER 2

MEANS OF PRODUCTION

§ 1985.8. Subpoena-Electronically Stored Information; Access to Information by Party Serving Subpoena.

(a) (1) A subpoena in a civil proceeding may require that electronically stored information, as defined in Section 2016.020, be produced and that the party serving the subpoena, or someone acting on the party's request, be permitted to inspect, copy, test, or sample the information.

(2) Any subpoena seeking electronically stored information shall comply with the requirements of this chapter.

(b) A party serving a subpoena requiring production of electronically stored information may specify the form or forms in which each type of information is to be produced.

(c) Unless the subpoenaing party and the subpoenaed party otherwise agree or the court otherwise orders, the following shall apply:

(1) If a subpoena requiring production of electronically stored information does not specify a form or forms for producing a type of electronically stored information, the person subpoenaed shall produce the information in the form or forms in which it is ordinarily maintained or in a form that is reasonably usable.

(2) A subpoenaed person need not produce the same electronically stored information in more than one form.

(d) The subpoenaed person opposing the production, inspection, copying, testing, or sampling of electronically stored information on the basis that information is from a source that is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or expense shall bear the burden of demonstrating that the information is from a source that is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or expense.

(e) If the person from whom discovery of electronically stored information is subpoenaed establishes that the information is from a source that is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or expense, the court may nonetheless order discovery if the subpoenaing party shows good cause, subject to any limitations imposed under subdivision (h).

(f) If the court finds good cause for the production of electronically stored information from a source that is not reasonably accessible, the court may set conditions for the discovery of the electronically stored information, including allocation of the expense of discovery.

(g) If necessary, the subpoenaed person, at the reasonable expense of the subpoenaing party, shall, through detection devices, translate any data compilations included in the subpoena into a reasonably usable form.

(h) The court shall limit the frequency or extent of discovery of electronically stored information, even from a source that is reasonably accessible, if the court determines that any of the following conditions exists:

(1) It is possible to obtain the information from some other source that is more convenient, less burdensome, or less expensive.

(2) The discovery sought is unreasonably cumulative or duplicative.

(3) The party seeking discovery has had ample opportunity by discovery in the action to obtain the information sought.

(4) The likely burden or expense of the proposed discovery outweighs the likely benefit, taking into account the amount in controversy, the resources of the parties, the importance of the issues in the litigation, and the importance of the requested discovery in resolving the issues.

(i) If a subpoenaed person notifies the subpoenaing party that electronically stored information produced pursuant to a subpoena is subject to a claim of privilege or of protection as attorney work product, as described in Section 2031.285, the provisions of Section 2031.285 shall apply.

(j) A party serving a subpoena requiring the production of electronically stored information shall take reasonable steps to avoid imposing undue burden or expense on a person subject to the subpoena.

(k) An order of the court requiring compliance with a subpoena issued under this section shall protect a person who is neither a party nor a party's officer from undue burden or expense resulting from compliance.

(l) (1) Absent exceptional circumstances, the court shall not impose sanctions on a subpoenaed person or any attorney of a subpoenaed person for failure to provide electronically stored information that has been lost, damaged, altered, or overwritten as the result of the routine, good faith operation of an electronic information system.

(2) This subdivision shall not be construed to alter any obligation to preserve discoverable information.
Leg.H. 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 2, effective June 29, 2009.

TITLE 4

CIVIL DISCOVERY ACT

CHAPTER 1

GENERAL PROVISIONS

§ 2016.020. Definitions.

As used in this title:

(a) "Action" includes a civil action and a special proceeding of a civil nature.

(b) "Court" means the trial court in which the action is pending, unless otherwise specified.

(c) "Document" and "writing" mean a writing, as defined in Section 250 of the Evidence Code.

(d) "Electronic" means relating to technology having electrical, digital, magnetic, wireless, optical, electromagnetic, or similar capabilities.

(e) "Electronically stored information" means information that is stored in an electronic medium. Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 3, effective June 29, 2009.

CHAPTER 2

SCOPE OF DISCOVERY

ARTICLE 1

General Provisions

§ 2017.010. What Matters May Be Subject to Discovery.

Unless otherwise limited by order of the court in accordance with this title, any party may obtain discovery regarding any matter, not privileged, that is relevant to the subject matter involved in the pending action or to the determination of any motion made in that action, if the matter either is itself admissible in evidence or appears reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence. Discovery may relate to the claim or defense of the party seeking discovery or of any other party to the action. Discovery may be obtained of the identity and location of persons having knowledge of any discoverable matter, as well as of the existence, description, nature, custody, condition, and location of any document, tangible thing, or land or other property. Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005.

§ 2017.020. When Court May Limit Scope of Discovery; Motion for Protective Order; Monetary Sanction.

(a) The court shall limit the scope of discovery if it determines that the burden, expense, or intrusiveness of that discovery clearly outweighs the likelihood that the information sought will lead to the discovery of admissible evidence. The court may make this determination pursuant to a motion for protective order by a party or other affected person. This motion shall be accompanied by a meet and confer declaration under Section 2016.040.

(b) The court shall impose a monetary sanction under Chapter 7 (commencing with Section 2023.010) against any party, person, or attorney who unsuccessfully makes or opposes a motion for a protective order, unless it finds that the one subject to the sanction acted with substantial justification or that other circumstances make the imposition of the sanction unjust. Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005.

CHAPTER 14

INSPECTION AND PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS, TANGIBLE THINGS, LAND, AND OTHER PROPERTY

ARTICLE 1

Inspection Demand

§ 2031.010. Right to Discovery by Inspecting, Copying, Testing, or Sampling Documents, Tangible Things, Land or Other Property, and Electronically Stored Information.

(a) Any party may obtain discovery within the scope delimited by Chapters 2 (commencing with Section 2017.010) and 3 (commencing with Section 2017.710), and subject to the restrictions set forth in Chapter 5 (commencing with Section 2019.010), by inspecting, copying, testing, or sampling documents, tangible things, [1] land or other property [2], and electronically stored information in the possession, custody, or control of any other party to the action.

(b) A party may demand that any other party produce and permit the party making the demand, or someone acting on that party's behalf, to inspect and to copy a document that is in the possession, custody, or control of the party on whom the demand is made.

(c) A party may demand that any other party produce and permit the party making the demand, or someone acting on that party's behalf, to inspect and to photograph, test, or sample any tangible things that are in the possession, custody, or control of the party on whom the demand is made.

(d) A party may demand that any other party allow the party making the demand, or someone acting on that party's behalf, to enter on any land or other property that is in the possession, custody, or control of the party on whom the demand is made, and to inspect and to measure, survey, photograph, test, or sample the land or other property, or any designated object or operation on it.

(e) A party may demand that any other party produce and permit the party making the demand, or someone acting on that party's behalf, to inspect, copy, test, or sample electronically stored information in the possession, custody, or control of the party on whom demand is made. Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 4, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.010. 2009 Deletes. [1] and [2] that are

§ 2031.020. Demand for Inspection, Copying, Testing, or Sampling by Defendant Authorized at Any Time; When Plaintiff May Make Demand for Inspection, Copying, Testing, or Sampling.

(a) A defendant may make a demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling without leave of court at any time.

(b) A plaintiff may make a demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling without leave of court at any time that is 10 days after the service of the summons on, or appearance by, the party to whom the demand is directed, whichever occurs first.

(c) Notwithstanding subdivision (b), in an unlawful detainer action or other proceeding under Chapter 4 (commencing with Section 1159) of Title 3 of Part 3, a plaintiff may make a demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling without leave of court at any time that is five days after service of the summons on, or appearance by, the party to whom the demand is directed, whichever occurs first.

(d) Notwithstanding subdivisions (b) and (c), on motion with or without notice, the court, for good cause shown, may grant leave to a plaintiff to make [1] a demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling at an earlier time. Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2007 ch. 113 (AB 1126) § 9, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 5, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.020. 2009 Deletes. [1] an inspection

§ 2031.030. Format and Requirements for Demands for Inspection, Copying, Testing, or Sampling.

(a) (1) A party demanding [1] inspection, copying, testing, or sampling shall number each set of demands consecutively.

(2) A party demanding inspection, copying, testing, or sampling of electronically stored information may specify the form or forms in which each type of electronically stored information is to be produced.

(b) In the first paragraph immediately below the title of the case, there shall appear the identity of the demanding party, the set number, and the identity of the responding party.

(c) Each demand in a set shall be separately set forth, identified by number or letter, and shall do all of the following:

(1) Designate the documents, tangible things, [2] land or other property, or electronically stored information to be inspected, copied, tested, or sampled either by specifically describing each individual item or by reasonably particularizing each category of item.

(2) Specify a reasonable time for the inspection, copying, testing, or sampling that is at least 30 days after service of the demand, unless the court for good cause shown has granted leave to specify an earlier date. In an unlawful detainer action or other proceeding under Chapter 4 (commencing with Section 1159) of Title 3 of Part 3, the demand shall specify a reasonable time for the inspection, copying, testing, or sampling that is at least five days after service of the demand, unless the court, for good cause shown, has granted leave to specify an earlier date.

(3) Specify a reasonable place for making the inspection, copying, testing, or sampling, and performing any related activity.

(4) Specify any inspection, copying, testing, sampling, or related activity that is being demanded [3], as well as the manner in which that [4] activity will be performed, and whether that activity will permanently alter or destroy the item involved. Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2007 ch. 113 (AB 1126) § 10, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 6, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.030. 2009 Deletes. [1] an [2] or [3] in addition to an inspection and copying [4] related

§ 2031.040. Service of Demand for Inspection, Copying, Testing, or Sampling.

The party [1] making a demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling shall serve a copy of the [2] demand on the party to whom it is directed and on all other parties who have appeared in the action. Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 7, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.040. 2009 Deletes. [1] demanding an [2] inspection

§ 2031.050. When Supplemental Demand May Be Propounded.

(a) In addition to the [1] demands for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling permitted by this chapter, a party may propound a supplemental demand to inspect, copy, test, or sample any later acquired or discovered documents, tangible things, [2] land or other property [3], or electronically stored information in the possession, custody, or control of the party on whom the demand is made.

(b) A party may propound a supplemental [4] demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling twice before the initial setting of a trial date, and, subject to the time limits on discovery proceedings and motions provided in Chapter 8 (commencing with Section 2024.010), once after the initial setting of a trial date.

(c) Notwithstanding subdivisions (a) and (b), on motion, for good cause shown, the court may grant leave to a party to propound an additional number of supplemental demands for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling. Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 8, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.050. 2009 Deletes. [1] inspection [2] or [3] that are [4] inspection

§ 2031.060. Motion for Protective Order; What Protective Order May Provide; Denial of Protective Order; Monetary Sanction.

(a) When an inspection, copying, testing, or sampling of documents, tangible things [1], places, or electronically stored information has been demanded, the party to whom the demand has been directed, and any other party or affected person [2], may promptly move for a protective order. This motion shall be accompanied by a meet and confer declaration under Section 2016.040.

(b) The court, for good cause shown, may make any order that justice requires to protect any party or other [3] person from unwarranted annoyance, embarrassment, or oppression, or undue burden and expense. This protective order may include, but is not limited to, one or more of the following directions:

(1) That all or some of the items or categories of items in the [4] demand need not be produced or made available at all.

(2) That the time specified in Section 2030.260 to respond to the set of [5] demands, or to a particular item or category in the set, be extended.

(3) That the place of production be other than that specified in the [6] demand.

(4) That the inspection, copying, testing, or sampling be made only on specified terms and conditions.

(5) That a trade secret or other confidential research, development, or commercial information not be disclosed, or be disclosed only to specified persons or only in a specified way.

(6) That the items produced be sealed and thereafter opened only on order of the court.

(c) The party or affected person who seeks a protective order regarding the production, inspection, copying, testing, or sampling of electronically stored information on the basis that the information is from a source that is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or expense shall bear the burden of demonstrating that the information is from a source that is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or expense.

(d) If the party or affected person from whom discovery of electronically stored information is sought establishes that the information is from a source that is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or expense, the court may nonetheless order discovery if the demanding party shows good cause, subject to any limitations imposed under subdivision (f).

(e) If the court finds good cause for the production of electronically stored information from a source that is not reasonably accessible, the court may set conditions for the discovery of the electronically stored information, including allocation of the expense of discovery.

(f) The court shall limit the frequency or extent of discovery of electronically stored information, even from a source that is reasonably accessible, if the court determines that any of the following conditions exist:

(1) It is possible to obtain the information from some other source that is more convenient, less burdensome, or less expensive.

(2) The discovery sought is unreasonably cumulative or duplicative.

(3) The party seeking discovery has had ample opportunity by discovery in the action to obtain the information sought.

(4) The likely burden or expense of the proposed discovery outweighs the likely benefit, taking into account the amount in controversy, the resources of the parties, the importance of the issues in the litigation, and the importance of the requested discovery in resolving the issues.

(g) If the motion for a protective order is denied in whole or in part, the court may order that the party to whom the demand was directed provide or permit the discovery against which protection was sought on terms and conditions that are just.

[7] (h) Except as provided in subdivision (i), the court shall impose a monetary sanction under Chapter 7 (commencing with Section 2023.010) against any party, person, or attorney who unsuccessfully makes or opposes a motion for a protective order, unless it finds that the one subject to the sanction acted with substantial justification or that other circumstances make the imposition of the sanction unjust.

(i) (1) Notwithstanding subdivision (h), absent exceptional circumstances, the court shall not impose sanctions on a party or any attorney of a party for failure to provide electronically stored information that has been lost, damaged, altered, or overwritten as the result of the routine, good faith operation of an electronic information system.

(2) This subdivision shall not be construed to alter any obligation to preserve discoverable information.
Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 9, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.060. 2009 Deletes. [1] or [2] or organization [3] natural person or organization [4] inspection [5] inspection [6] inspection [7] (d)

ARTICLE 2

Response to Inspection Demand

§ 2031.210. Nature and Format of Response to Demand for Inspection, Copying, Testing, or Sampling.

(a) The party to whom [1] a demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling has been directed shall respond separately to each item or category of item by any of the following:

(1) A statement that the party will comply with the particular demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling by the date set for the inspection, copying, testing, or sampling pursuant to paragraph (2) of subdivision (c) of Section 2031.030 and any related activities.

(2) A representation that the party lacks the ability to comply with the demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling of a particular item or category of item.

(3) An objection to the particular demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling.

(b) In the first paragraph of the response immediately below the title of the case, there shall appear the identity of the responding party, the set number, and the identity of the demanding party.

(c) Each statement of compliance, each representation, and each objection in the response shall bear the same number and be in the same sequence as the corresponding item or category in the demand, but the text of that item or category need not be repeated.

(d) If a party objects to the discovery of electronically stored information on the grounds that it is from a source that is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or expense and that the responding party will not search the source in the absence of an agreement with the demanding party or court order, the responding party shall identify in its response the types or categories of sources of electronically stored information that it asserts are not reasonably accessible. By objecting and identifying information of a type or category of source or sources that are not reasonably accessible, the responding party preserves any objections it may have relating to that electronically stored information. Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2007 ch. 738 (AB 1248) § 7, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 10, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.210. 2009 Deletes. [1] an inspection

§ 2031.220. Statement Regarding Compliance in Whole or in Part.

A statement that the party to whom [1] a demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling has been directed will comply with the particular demand shall state that the production, inspection, copying, testing, or sampling, and related activity demanded, will be allowed either in whole or in part, and that all documents or things in the demanded category that are in the possession, custody, or control of that party and to which no objection is being made will be included in the production. Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 11, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.220. 2009 Deletes. [1] an inspection

§ 2031.230. Representation of Inability to Comply.

A representation of inability to comply with the particular demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling shall affirm that a diligent search and a reasonable inquiry has been made in an effort to comply with that demand. This statement shall also specify whether the inability to comply is because the particular item or category has never existed, has been destroyed, has been lost, misplaced, or stolen, or has never been, or is no longer, in the possession, custody, or control of the responding party. The statement shall set forth the name and address of any natural person or organization known or believed by that party to have possession, custody, or control of that item or category of item. Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 12, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.240. Statements Regarding Demand That Is Objectionable in Whole or in Part.

(a) If only part of an item or category of item in [1] a demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling is objectionable, the response shall contain a statement of compliance, or a representation of inability to comply with respect to the remainder of that item or category.

(b) If the responding party objects to the demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling of an item or category of item, the response shall do both of the following:

(1) Identify with particularity any document, tangible thing, [2] land, or electronically stored information falling within any category of item in the demand to which an objection is being made.

(2) Set forth clearly the extent of, and the specific ground for, the objection. If an objection is based on a claim of privilege, the particular privilege invoked shall be stated. If an objection is based on a claim that the information sought is protected work product under Chapter 4 (commencing with Section 2018.010), that claim shall be expressly asserted.

Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 13, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.240. 2009 Deletes. [1] an inspection [2] or

§ 2031.250. Signing of Response to Demand.

(a) The party to whom the demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling is directed shall sign the response under oath unless the response contains only objections.

(b) If that party is a public or private corporation or a partnership or association or governmental agency, one of its officers or agents shall sign the response under oath on behalf of that party. If the officer or agent signing the response on behalf of that party is an attorney acting in that capacity for a party, that party waives any lawyer-client privilege and any protection for work product under Chapter 4 (commencing with Section 2018.010) during any subsequent discovery from that attorney concerning the identity of the sources of the information contained in the response.

(c) The attorney for the responding party shall sign any responses that contain an objection. Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 14, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.260. Time for Service of Response; Unlawful Detainer Action.

(a) Within 30 days after service of [1] a demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling, the party to whom the demand is directed shall serve the original of the response to it on the party making the demand, and a copy of the response on all other parties who have appeared in the action, unless on motion of the party making the demand, the court has shortened the time for response, or unless on motion of the party to whom the demand has been directed, the court has extended the time for response.

(b) Notwithstanding subdivision (a), in an unlawful detainer action or other proceeding under Chapter 4 (commencing with Section 1159) of Title 3 of Part 3, the party to whom [2] a demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling is directed shall have at least five days from the date of service of the demand to respond, unless on motion of the party making the demand, the court has shortened the time for the response, or unless on motion of the party to whom the demand has been directed, the court has extended the time for response. Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2007 ch. 113 (AB 1126) § 11, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 15, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.260. 2009 Deletes. [1] an inspection [2] an inspection

§ 2031.270. Extension of Date for Inspection or Time for Service of Response; Written Confirmation of Agreement.

(a) The party demanding [1] inspection, copying, testing, or sampling and the responding party may agree to extend the date for the inspection, copying, testing, or sampling or the time for service of a response to a set of [2] demands, or to particular items or categories of items in a set, to a date or dates beyond those provided in Sections

2031.030, 2031.210, 2031.260, and 2031.280.

(b) This agreement may be informal, but it shall be confirmed in a writing that specifies the extended date for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling, or for the service of a response.

(c) Unless this agreement expressly states otherwise, it is effective to preserve to the responding party the right to respond to any item or category of item in the demand to which the agreement applies in any manner specified in Sections 2031.210, 2031.220, 2031.230, 2031.240, and 2031.280. Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2007 ch. 738 (AB 1248) § 8, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 16, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.270. 2009 Deletes. [1] an [2] inspection

§ 2031.280. Production of Documents-Form; Date Specified; Production of Electronically Stored Information; Translation; Expense.

(a) Any documents produced in response to [1] a demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling shall either be produced as they are kept in the usual course of business, or be organized and labeled to correspond with the categories in the demand.

(b) The documents shall be produced on the date specified in the [2] demand pursuant to paragraph (2) of subdivision (c) of Section 2031.030, unless an objection has been made to that date. If the date for inspection has been extended pursuant to Section 2031.270, the documents shall be produced on the date agreed to pursuant to that section.

(c) If a party responding to a demand for production of electronically stored information objects to a specified form for producing the information, or if no form is specified in the demand, the responding party shall state in its response the form in which it intends to produce each type of information.

(d) Unless the parties otherwise agree or the court otherwise orders, the following shall apply:

(1) If a demand for production does not specify a form or forms for producing a type of electronically stored information, the responding party shall produce the information in the form or forms in which it is ordinarily maintained or in a form that is reasonably usable.

(2) A party need not produce the same electronically stored information in more than one form.

(e) If necessary, the responding party at the reasonable expense of the demanding party shall, through detection devices, translate any data compilations included in the demand into reasonably usable form. Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2007 ch. 738 (AB 1248) § 9, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 17, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.280. 2009 Deletes. [1] an inspection [2] inspection

§ 2031.285. Production of Electronically Stored Information-Claim of Privilege or of Protection as Attorney Work Product; Notification to Receiving Party; Receiving Party's Responsibilities; Preclusion From Using or Disclosing Specified Information; Resolution.

(a) If electronically stored information produced in discovery is subject to a claim of privilege or of protection as attorney work product, the party making the claim may notify any party that received the information of the claim and the basis for the claim.

(b) After being notified of a claim of privilege or of protection under subdivision (a), a party that received the information shall immediately sequester the information and either return the specified information and any copies that may exist or present the information to the court conditionally under seal for a determination of the claim.

(c) (1) Prior to the resolution of the motion brought under subdivision (d), a party shall be precluded from using or disclosing the specified information until the claim of privilege is resolved.

(2) A party who received and disclosed the information before being notified of a claim of privilege or of protection under subdivision (a) shall, after that notification, immediately take reasonable steps to retrieve the information.

(d) (1) If the receiving party contests the legitimacy of a claim of privilege or protection, he or she may seek a determination of the claim from the court by making a motion within 30 days of receiving the claim and presenting the information to the court conditionally under seal.

(2) Until the legitimacy of the claim of privilege or protection is resolved, the receiving party shall preserve the information and keep it confidential and shall be precluded from using the information in any manner. Leg.H. 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 18, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.290. Retention of Demand for Inspection, Copying, Testing, or Sampling, Proof of Service, and Response by Demanding Party.

(a) The [1] demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling, and the response to it, shall not be filed with the court.

(b) The party demanding an inspection, copying, testing, or sampling shall retain both the original of the [2] demand, with the original proof of service affixed to it, and the original of the sworn response until six months after final disposition of the action. At that time, both originals may be destroyed, unless the court, on motion of any party and for good cause shown, orders that the originals be preserved for a longer period. Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 19, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.290. 2009 Deletes. [1] inspection [2] inspection

§ 2031.300. Effect of Failure to Serve Timely Response to Demand for Inspection, Copying, Testing, or Sampling; Motion for Order; Monetary and Other Sanctions.

If a party to whom [1] a demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling is directed fails to serve a timely response to it, the following rules shall apply:

(a) The party to whom the [2] demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling is directed waives any objection to the demand, including one based on privilege or on the protection for work product under Chapter 4 (commencing with Section 2018.010). The court, on motion, may relieve that party from this waiver on its determination that both of the following conditions are satisfied:

(1) The party has subsequently served a response that is in substantial compliance with Sections 2031.210, 2031.220, 2031.230, 2031.240, and 2031.280.

(2) The party's failure to serve a timely response was the result of mistake, inadvertence, or excusable neglect.

(b) The party making the demand may move for an order compelling response to the [3] demand.

(c) Except as provided in subdivision (d), the court shall impose a monetary sanction under Chapter 7 (commencing with Section 2023.010) against any party, person, or attorney who unsuccessfully makes or opposes a motion to compel a response to [4] a demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling, unless it finds that the one subject to the sanction acted with substantial justification or that other circumstances make the imposition of the sanction unjust. If a party then fails to obey the order compelling a response, the court may make those orders that are just, including the imposition of an issue sanction, an evidence sanction, or a terminating sanction under Chapter 7 (commencing with Section 2023.010). In lieu of or in addition to this sanction, the court may impose a monetary sanction under Chapter 7 (commencing with Section 2023.010).

(d) (1) Notwithstanding subdivision (c), absent exceptional circumstances, the court shall not impose sanctions on a party or any attorney of a party for failure to provide electronically stored information that has been lost, damaged, altered, or overwritten as a result of the routine, good faith operation of an electronic information system.

(2) This subdivision shall not be construed to alter any obligation to preserve discoverable information.
Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2005 ch. 22 (SB 1108) § 23, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 20, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.300. 2009 Deletes. [1] an inspection [2] inspection [3] inspection [4] an inspection

§ 2031.310. Motion for Order Compelling Further Response; Grounds; Notice; Waiver; Monetary and Other Sanctions.

(a) On receipt of a response to [1] a demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling, the demanding party [2] may move for an order compelling further response to the demand if the demanding party deems that any of the following apply:

(1) A statement of compliance with the demand is incomplete.

(2) A representation of inability to comply is inadequate, incomplete, or evasive.

(3) An objection in the response is without merit or too general.

(b) A motion under subdivision (a) shall comply with both of the following:

(1) The motion shall set forth specific facts showing good cause justifying the discovery sought by the [3] demand.

(2) The motion shall be accompanied by a meet and confer declaration under Section 2016.040.

(c) Unless notice of this motion is given within 45 days of the service of the response, or any supplemental response, or on or before any specific later date to which the demanding party and the responding party have agreed in writing, the demanding party waives any right to compel a further response to the [4] demand.

(d) In a motion under subdivision (a) relating to the production of electronically stored information, the party or affected person objecting to or opposing the production, inspection, copying, testing, or sampling of electronically stored information on the basis that the information is from a source that is not reasonably accessible because of the undue burden or expense shall bear the burden of demonstrating that the information is from a source that is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or expense.

(e) If the party or affected person from whom discovery of electronically stored information is sought establishes that the information is from a source that is not reasonably accessible because of the undue burden or expense, the court may nonetheless order discovery if the demanding party shows good cause, subject to any limitations imposed under subdivision (g).

(f) If the court finds good cause for the production of electronically stored information from a source that is not reasonably accessible, the court may set conditions for the discovery of the electronically stored information, including allocation of the expense of discovery.

(g) The court shall limit the frequency or extent of discovery of electronically stored information, even from a source that is reasonably accessible, if the court determines that any of the following conditions exists:

(1) It is possible to obtain the information from some other source that is more convenient, less burdensome, or less expensive.

(2) The discovery sought is unreasonably cumulative or duplicative.

(3) The party seeking discovery has had ample opportunity by discovery in the action to obtain the information sought.

(4) The likely burden or expense of the proposed discovery outweighs the likely benefit, taking into account the amount in controversy, the resources of the parties, the importance of the issues in the litigation, and the importance of the requested discovery in resolving the issues.

(h) Except as provided in subdivision (j), the court shall impose a monetary sanction under Chapter 7 (commencing with Section 2023.010) against any party, person, or attorney who unsuccessfully makes or opposes a motion to compel further response to [5] a demand, unless it finds that the one subject to the sanction acted with substantial justification or that other circumstances make the imposition of the sanction unjust.

[6] (i) Except as provided in subdivision (j), if a party fails to obey an order compelling further response, the court may make those orders that are just, including the imposition of an issue sanction, an evidence sanction, or a terminating sanction under Chapter 7 (commencing with Section 2023.010). In lieu of or in addition to that sanction, the court may impose a monetary sanction under Chapter 7 (commencing with Section 2023.010).

(j) (1) Notwithstanding subdivisions (h) and (i), absent exceptional circumstances, the court shall not impose sanctions on a party or any attorney of a party for failure to provide electronically stored information that has been lost, damaged, altered, or overwritten as the result of the routine, good faith operation of an electronic information system.

(2) This subdivision shall not be construed to alter any obligation to preserve discoverable information.

Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 21, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.310. 2009 Deletes. [1] an inspection [2] demanding an inspection [3] inspection [4] inspection [5] an inspection [6] (e)

§ 2031.320. Motion for Order Compelling Compliance on Failure to Permit Inspection, Copying, Testing, or Sampling in Accordance With Response; Monetary and Other Sanctions.

(a) If a party filing a response to a demand for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling under [1] Sections 2031.210, 2031.220, 2031.230, 2031.240, and 2031.280 thereafter fails to permit the inspection, copying, testing, or sampling in accordance with that party's statement of compliance, the demanding party [2] may move for an order compelling compliance.

(b) Except as provided in subdivision (d), the court shall impose a monetary sanction under Chapter 7 (commencing with Section 2023.010) against any party, person, or attorney who unsuccessfully makes or opposes a motion to compel compliance with [3] a demand, unless it finds that the one subject to the sanction acted with substantial justification or that other circumstances make the imposition of the sanction unjust.

(c) Except as provided in subdivision (d), if a party then fails to obey an order compelling inspection, copying, testing, or sampling, the court may make those orders that are just, including the imposition of an issue sanction, an evidence sanction, or a terminating sanction under Chapter 7 (commencing with Section 2023.010). In lieu of or in addition to that sanction, the court may impose a monetary sanction under Chapter 7 (commencing with Section 2023.010).

(d) (1) Notwithstanding subdivisions (b) and (c), absent exceptional circumstances, the court shall not impose sanctions on a party or any attorney of a party for failure to provide electronically stored information that has been lost, damaged, altered, or overwritten as the result of the routine, good faith operation of an electronic information system.

(2) This subdivision shall not be construed to alter any obligation to preserve discoverable information.
Leg.H. 2004 ch. 182 (AB 3081), operative July 1, 2005, 2009 ch. 5 (AB 5) § 22, effective June 29, 2009.

§ 2031.320. 2009 Deletes. [1] Section [2] demanding the inspection [3] an inspection

Appendix E

California Rules of Court E-Discovery Rules

Appendix E contains the amended version of California Rules of Court, Rule 3.724, as adopted by the California

Judicial Council effective August 14, 2009. Language deleted by the 2009 changes is indicated by bracketed numbers (e.g., "[1]") in the section at the point where the deletion was made, with the deleted language appearing following the end of the section. Language added by the 2009 amendment is indicated in boldface type. For convenience, the text of Rule 3.728, which was unaffected by the final version of the 2009 amendments, is also included.

Synopsis:

Selected Provisions of the Rules of Court

Title 3. Civil Rules

Division 7. Civil Case Management

Chapter 3. Case Management

Rule 3.724. Duty to meet and confer

Rule 3.728. Case management order

Text:

TITLE 3

Civil Rules

Division 7

Civil Case Management

Chapter 3

Case Management

Rule 3.724. Duty to meet and confer

Unless the court orders another time period, no later than 30 calendar days before the date set for the initial case management conference, the parties must meet and confer, in person or by telephone, to consider each of the issues identified in rule 3.727 and, in addition, to consider the following:

- (1) Resolving any discovery disputes and setting a discovery schedule;
- (2) Identifying and, if possible, informally resolving any anticipated motions;
- (3) Identifying the facts and issues in the case that are uncontested and may be the subject of stipulation;
- (4) Identifying the facts and issues in the case that are in dispute;
- (5) Determining whether the issues in the case can be narrowed by eliminating any claims or defenses by means of a motion or otherwise;
- (6) Determining whether settlement is possible;
- (7) Identifying the dates on which all parties and their attorneys are available or not available for trial, including the reasons for unavailability; [1]
- (8) Any issues relating to the discovery of electronically stored information, including:
 - (A) Issues relating to the preservation of discoverable electronically stored information;
 - (B) The form or forms in which information will be produced;
 - (C) The time within which the information will be produced;
 - (D) The scope of discovery of the information;
 - (E) The method for asserting or preserving claims of privilege or attorney work product, including whether such claims may be asserted after production;
 - (F) The method for asserting or preserving the confidentiality, privacy, trade secrets, or proprietary status of information relating to a party or person not a party to the civil proceedings;
 - (G) How the cost of production of electronically stored information is to be allocated among the parties; and
 - (H) Any other issues relating to the discovery of electronically stored information, including developing a proposed plan relating to the discovery of the information; and

2 Other relevant matters.

Rule 3.724 amended effective August 14, 2009, or earlier; adopted effective January 1, 2007.

Rule 3.724. 2009 Deletes. [1] and [2] (8)

Rule 3.728. Case management order

The case management conference must be conducted in the manner provided by local rule. The court must enter a case management order setting a schedule for subsequent proceedings and otherwise providing for the management of the case. The order may include appropriate provisions, such as:

- (1) Referral of the case to judicial arbitration or other alternative dispute resolution process;
- (2) A date for completion of the judicial arbitration process or other alternative dispute resolution process if the case has been referred to such a process;
- (3) In the event that a trial date has not previously been set, a date certain for trial if the case is ready to be set for trial;
- (4) Whether the trial will be a jury trial or a nonjury trial;
- (5) The identity of each party demanding a jury trial;
- (6) The estimated length of trial;
- (7) Whether all parties necessary to the disposition of the case have been served or have appeared;
- (8) The dismissal or severance of unserved or not-appearing defendants from the action;
- (9) The names and addresses of the attorneys who will try the case;
- (10) The date, time, and place for a mandatory settlement conference as provided in rule 3.1380;
- (11) The date, time, and place for the final case management conference before trial if such a conference is required by the court or the judge assigned to the case;
- (12) The date, time, and place of any further case management conferences or review; and
- (13) Any additional orders that may be appropriate, including orders on matters listed in rules 3.724 and 3.727.

Rule 3.728 adopted effective January 1, 2007.

Appendix F

E-Discovery Provisions of Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and Federal Rules of Evidence

Appendix E contains the full text of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and Federal Rules of Evidence that govern e-discovery in federal courts. They are included in this pamphlet for the convenience of readers and to provide a basis for comparison between the 2009 California changes discussed in this pamphlet and the corresponding provisions of federal law.

Synopsis:

Selected Provisions of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure

Title I. Scope of Rules; Form of Action

Rule 1. Scope and Purpose

Title III. Pleadings and Motions

Rule 16. Pretrial Conferences; Scheduling; Management

Title V. Disclosures and Discovery

Rule 26. Duty to Disclose; General Provisions Governing Discovery

Rule 33. Interrogatories to Parties

Rule 34. Producing Documents, Electronically Stored Information, and Tangible Things, or Entering onto Land, for Inspection and Other Purposes

Rule 37. Failure to Make Disclosures or to Cooperate in Discovery; Sanctions

Title VI. Trials

Rule 45. Subpoena

Text:

TITLE I

Scope of Rules; Form of Action

Rule 1. Scope and Purpose

These rules govern the procedure in all civil actions and proceedings in the United States district courts, except as stated in Rule 81. They should be construed and administered to secure the just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of every action and proceeding. [Adopted Dec. 20, 1937, effective Sept. 16, 1938; amended Dec. 29, 1948, effective Oct. 20, 1949; Feb. 28, 1966, effective July 1, 1966; Apr. 22, 1993, effective Dec. 1, 1993; last amended April 30, 2007, effective December 1, 2007.]

Committee Note of 2007 to Rule 1

The language of Rule 1 has been amended as part of the general restyling of the Civil Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. The merger of law, equity, and admiralty practice is complete. There is no need to carry forward the phrases that initially accomplished the merger. The former reference to "suits of a civil nature" is changed to the more modern "actions and proceedings." This change does not affect such questions as whether the Civil Rules apply to summary proceedings created by statute. See SEC v. McCarthy, 322 F.3d 650 (9th Cir. 2003); see also New Hampshire Fire Ins. Co. v. Scanlon, 362 U.S. 404 (1960).

TITLE III

Pleadings and Motions

Rule 16. Pretrial Conferences; Scheduling; Management

(a) Purposes of a Pretrial Conference. In any action, the court may order the attorneys and any unrepresented parties to appear for one or more pretrial conferences for such purposes as:

- (1) expediting disposition of the action;
- (2) establishing early and continuing control so that the case will not be protracted because of lack of management;
- (3) discouraging wasteful pretrial activities;
- (4) improving the quality of the trial through more thorough preparation; and
- (5) facilitating settlement.

(b) Scheduling.

(1) Scheduling Order. Except in categories of actions exempted by local rule, the district judge-or a magistrate judge when authorized by local rule-must issue a scheduling order:

(A) after receiving the parties' report under Rule 26(f); or

(B) after consulting with the parties' attorneys and any unrepresented parties at a scheduling conference or by telephone, mail, or other means.

(2) Time to Issue. The judge must issue the scheduling order as soon as practicable, but in any event within the earlier of 120 days after any defendant has been served with the complaint or 90 days after any defendant has appeared.

(3) Contents of the Order.

(A) Required Contents. The scheduling order must limit the time to join other parties, amend the pleadings, complete discovery, and file motions.

(B) Permitted Contents. The scheduling order may:

- (i) modify the timing of disclosures under Rules 26(a) and 26(e)(1);
- (ii) modify the extent of discovery;
- (iii) provide for disclosure or discovery of electronically stored information;
- (iv) include any agreements the parties reach for asserting claims of privilege or of protection as trial-preparation material after information is produced;
- (v) set dates for pretrial conferences and for trial; and

(vi) include other appropriate matters.

(4) Modifying a Schedule. A schedule may be modified only for good cause and with the judge's consent.

(c) Attendance and Matters for Consideration at a Pretrial Conference.

(1) Attendance. A represented party must authorize at least one of its attorneys to make stipulations and admissions about all matters that can reasonably be anticipated for discussion at a pretrial conference. If appropriate, the court may require that a party or its representative be present or reasonably available by other means to consider possible settlement.

(2) Matters for Consideration. At any pretrial conference, the court may consider and take appropriate action on the following matters:

(A) formulating and simplifying the issues, and eliminating frivolous claims or defenses;

(B) amending the pleadings if necessary or desirable;

(C) obtaining admissions and stipulations about facts and documents to avoid unnecessary proof, and ruling in advance on the admissibility of evidence;

(D) avoiding unnecessary proof and cumulative evidence, and limiting the use of testimony under Federal Rule of Evidence 702;

(E) determining the appropriateness and timing of summary adjudication under Rule 56;

(F) controlling and scheduling discovery, including orders affecting disclosures and discovery under Rule 26 and Rules 29 through 37;

(G) identifying witnesses and documents, scheduling the filing and exchange of any pretrial briefs, and setting dates for further conferences and for trial;

(H) referring matters to a magistrate judge or a master;

(I) settling the case and using special procedures to assist in resolving the dispute when authorized by statute or local rule;

(J) determining the form and content of the pretrial order;

(K) disposing of pending motions;

(L) adopting special procedures for managing potentially difficult or protracted actions that may involve complex issues, multiple parties, difficult legal questions, or unusual proof problems;

(M) ordering a separate trial under Rule 42(b) of a claim, counterclaim, crossclaim, third-party claim, or particular issue;

(N) ordering the presentation of evidence early in the trial on a manageable issue that might, on the evidence, be the basis for a judgment as a matter of law under Rule 50(a) or a judgment on partial findings under Rule 52(c);

(O) establishing a reasonable limit on the time allowed to present evidence; and (P) facilitating in other ways the just, speedy, and inexpensive disposition of the action.

(d) Pretrial Orders. After any conference under this rule, the court should issue an order reciting the action taken.

This order controls the course of the action unless the court modifies it.

(e) Final Pretrial Conference and Orders. The court may hold a final pretrial conference to formulate a trial plan, including a plan to facilitate the admission of evidence. The conference must be held as close to the start of trial as is reasonable, and must be attended by at least one attorney who will conduct the trial for each party and by any unrepresented party. The court may modify an order issued after a final pretrial conference only to prevent manifest injustice.

(f) Sanctions.

(1) In General. On motion or on its own, the court may issue any just orders, including those authorized by Rule 37(b)(2)(A)(ii)-(vii), if a party or its attorney:

(A) fails to appear at a scheduling or other pretrial conference;

(B) is substantially unprepared to participate-or does not participate in good faith-in the conference; or

(C) fails to obey a scheduling or other pretrial order.

(2) Imposing Fees and Costs. Instead of or in addition to any other sanction, the court must order the party, its attorney, or both to pay the reasonable expenses-including attorney's fees-incurred because of any noncompliance with this rule, unless the noncompliance was substantially justified or other circumstances make an award of expenses unjust. [Adopted Dec. 20, 1937, effective Sept. 16, 1938; amended Apr. 28, 1983, effective Aug. 1, 1983; Mar. 2, 1987, effective Aug. 1, 1987; Apr. 22, 1993, effective Dec. 1, 1993; Apr. 12, 2006, effective Dec. 1, 2006; last amended April 30, 2007, effective December 1, 2007.]

Committee Note of 2007 to Rule 16 (style revision)

The language of Rule 16 has been amended as part of the general restyling of the Civil Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only.

Committee Note of 2007 to Rule 16 (style-substance revision)

When a party or its representative is not present, it is enough to be reasonably available by any suitable means, whether telephone or other communication device.

TITLE V

Disclosures and Discovery

Rule 26. Duty to Disclose; General Provisions Governing Discovery

(a) Required Disclosures.

(1) Initial Disclosure.

(A) In General. Except as exempted by Rule 26(a)(1)(B) or as otherwise stipulated or ordered by the court, a party must, without awaiting a discovery request, provide to the other parties:

(i) the name and, if known, the address and telephone number of each individual likely to have discoverable information-along with the subjects of that information-that the disclosing party may use to support its claims or defenses, unless the use would be solely for impeachment;

(ii) a copy-or a description by category and location-of all documents, electrically stored information, and tangible things that the disclosing party has in its possession, custody, or control and may use to support its claims or defenses, unless the use would be solely for impeachment;

(iii) a computation of each category of damages claimed by the disclosing party-who must also make available for inspection and copying as under Rule 34 the documents or other evidentiary material, unless privileged or protected from disclosure, on which each computation is based, including materials bearing on the nature and extent of injuries suffered; and

(iv) for inspection and copying as under Rule 34, any insurance agreement under which an insurance business may be liable to satisfy all or part of a possible judgment in the action or to indemnify or reimburse for payments made to satisfy the judgment.

(B) Proceedings Exempt from Initial Disclosure. The following proceedings are exempt from initial disclosure:

(i) an action for review on an administrative record;

(ii) a forfeiture action in rem arising from a federal statute;

(iii) a petition for habeas corpus or any other proceeding to challenge a criminal conviction or sentence;

(iv) an action brought without an attorney by a person in the custody of the United States, a state, or a state subdivision;

(v) an action to enforce or quash an administrative summons or subpoena;

(vi) an action by the United States to recover benefit payments;

(vii) an action by the United States to collect on a student loan guaranteed by the United States;

(viii) a proceeding ancillary to a proceeding in another court; and

(ix) an action to enforce an arbitration award.

(C) Time for Initial Disclosures--In General. A party must make the initial disclosures at or within 14 days after the parties' Rule 26(f) conference unless a different time is set by stipulation or court order, or unless a party objects during the conference that initial disclosures are not appropriate in this action and states the objection in the proposed discovery plan. In ruling on the objection, the court must determine what disclosures, if any, are to be made and must set the time for disclosure.

(D) Time for Initial Disclosures--For Parties Served or Joined Later. A party that is first served or otherwise joined after the Rule 26(f) conference must make the initial disclosures within 30 days after being served or joined, unless a different time is set by stipulation or court order.

(E) Basis for Initial Disclosure; Unacceptable Excuses. A party must make its initial disclosures based on the information then reasonably available to it. A party is not excused from making its disclosures because it has not fully investigated the case or because it challenges the sufficiency of another party's disclosures or because another party has not made its disclosures.

(2) Disclosure of Expert Testimony.

(A) In General. In addition to the disclosures required by Rule 26(a)(1), a party must disclose to the other parties the identity of any witness it may use at trial to present evidence under Federal Rule of Evidence 702, 703, or 705.

(B) Written Report. Unless otherwise stipulated or ordered by the court, this disclosure must be accompanied by a written report—prepared and signed by the witness—if the witness is one retained or specially employed to provide expert testimony in the case or one whose duties as the party's employee regularly involve giving expert testimony. The report must contain:

- (i) a complete statement of all opinions the witness will express and the basis and reasons for them;
- (ii) the data or other information considered by the witness in forming them;
- (iii) any exhibits that will be used to summarize or support them;
- (iv) the witness's qualifications, including a list of all publications authored in the previous ten years;
- (v) a list of all other cases in which, during the previous four years, the witness testified as an expert at trial or by deposition; and
- (vi) a statement of the compensation to be paid for the study and testimony in the case.

(C) Time to Disclose Expert Testimony. A party must make these disclosures at the times and in the sequence that the court orders. Absent a stipulation or a court order, the disclosures must be made:

- (i) at least 90 days before the date set for trial or for the case to be ready for trial; or
- (ii) if the evidence is intended solely to contradict or rebut evidence on the same subject matter identified by another party under Rule 26(a)(2)(B), within 30 days after the other party's disclosure.

(D) Supplementing the Disclosure. The parties must supplement these disclosures when required under Rule 26(e).

(3) Pretrial Disclosures.

(A) In General. In addition to the disclosures required by Rule 26(a)(1) and (2), a party must provide to the other parties and promptly file the following information about the evidence that it may present at trial other than solely for impeachment:

- (i) the name and, if not previously provided, the address and telephone number of each witness—separately identifying those the party expects to present and those it may call if the need arises;
- (ii) the designation of those witnesses whose testimony the party expects to present by deposition and, if not taken stenographically, a transcript of the pertinent parts of the deposition; and
- (iii) an identification of each document or other exhibit, including summaries of other evidence—separately identifying those items the party expects to offer and those it may offer if the need arises.

(B) Time for Pretrial Disclosures; Objections. Unless the court orders otherwise, these disclosures must be made at least 30 days before trial. Within 14 days after they are made, unless the court sets a different time, a party may serve and promptly file a list of the following objections: any objections to the use under Rule 32(a) of a deposition designated by another party under Rule 26(a)(3)(A)(ii); and any objection, together with the grounds for it, that may be made to the admissibility of materials identified under Rule 26(a)(3)(A)(iii). An objection not so made-except for one under Federal Rule of Evidence 402 or 403-is waived unless excused by the court for good cause.

(4) Form of Disclosures. Unless the court orders otherwise, all disclosures under Rule 26(a) must be in writing, signed, and served.

(b) Discovery Scope and Limits.

(1) Scope in General. Unless otherwise limited by court order, the scope of discovery is as follows: Parties may obtain discovery regarding any nonprivileged matter that is relevant to any party's claim or defense-including the existence, description, nature, custody, condition, and location of any documents or other tangible things and the identity and location of persons who know of any discoverable matter. For good cause, the court may order discovery of any matter relevant to the subject matter involved in the action. Relevant information need not be admissible at the trial if the discovery appears reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence. All discovery is subject to the limitations imposed by Rule 26(b)(2)(C).

(2) Limitations on Frequency and Extent.

(A) When Permitted. By order, the court may alter the limits in these rules on the number of depositions and interrogatories or on the length of depositions under Rule 30. By order or local rule, the court may also limit the number of requests under Rule 36.

(B) Specific Limitations on Electronically Stored Information. A party need not provide discovery of electronically stored information from sources that the party identifies as not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or cost. On motion to compel discovery or for a protective order, the party from whom discovery is sought must show that the information is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or cost. If that showing is made, the court may nonetheless order discovery from such sources if the requesting party shows good cause, considering the limitations of Rule 26(b)(2)(C). The court may specify conditions for the discovery.

(C) When Required. On motion or on its own, the court must limit the frequency or extent of discovery otherwise allowed by these rules or by local rule if it determines that:

(i) the discovery sought is unreasonably cumulative or duplicative, or can be obtained from some other source that is more convenient, less burdensome, or less expensive;

(ii) the party seeking discovery has had ample opportunity to obtain the information by discovery in the action; or

(iii) the burden or expense of the proposed discovery outweighs its likely benefit, considering the needs of the case, the amount in controversy, the parties' resources, the importance of the issues at stake in the action, and the importance of the discovery in resolving the issues.

(3) Trial Preparation: Materials.

(A) Documents and Tangible Things. Ordinarily, a party may not discover documents and tangible things that are prepared in anticipation of litigation or for trial by or for another party or its representative (including the other party's attorney, consultant, surety, indemnitor, insurer, or agent). But, subject to Rule 26(b)(4), those materials may be discovered if:

(i) they are otherwise discoverable under Rule 26(b)(1); and

(ii) the party shows that it has substantial need for the materials to prepare its case and cannot, without undue hardship, obtain their substantial equivalent by other means.

(B) Protection Against Disclosure. If the court orders discovery of those materials, it must protect against disclosure of the mental impressions, conclusions, opinions, or legal theories of a party's attorney or other representative concerning the litigation.

(C) Previous Statement. Any party or other person may, on request and without the required showing, obtain the person's own previous statement about the action or its subject matter. If the request is refused, the person may move for a court order, and Rule 37(a)(5) applies to the award of expenses. A previous statement is either:

(i) a written statement that the person has signed or otherwise adopted or approved; or

(ii) a contemporaneous stenographic, mechanical, electrical, or other recording-or a transcription of it-that recites substantially verbatim the person's oral statement.

(4) Trial Preparation: Experts.

(A) Expert Who May Testify. A party may depose any person who has been identified as an expert whose opinions may be presented at trial. If Rule 26(a)(2)(B) requires a report from the expert, the deposition may be conducted only after the report is provided.

(B) Expert Employed Only for Trial Preparation. Ordinarily, a party may not, by interrogatories or deposition, discover facts known or opinions held by an expert who has been retained or specially employed by another party in anticipation of litigation or to prepare for trial and who is not expected to be called as a witness at trial. But a party may do so only:

(i) as provided in Rule 35(b); or

(ii) on showing exceptional circumstances under which it is impracticable for the party to obtain facts or opinions on the same subject by other means.

(C) Payment. Unless manifest injustice would result, the court must require that the party seeking discovery:

(i) pay the expert a reasonable fee for time spent in responding to discovery under Rule 26(b)(4)(A) or (B); and

(ii) for discovery under (B), also pay the other party a fair portion of the fees and expenses it reasonably incurred in obtaining the expert's facts and opinions.

(5) Claiming Privilege or Protecting Trial-Preparation Materials.

(A) Information Withheld. When a party withholds information otherwise discoverable by claiming that the information is privileged or subject to protection as trial-preparation material, the party must:

(i) expressly make the claim; and

(ii) describe the nature of the documents, communications, or tangible things not produced or disclosed-and do so in a manner that, without revealing information itself privileged or protected, will enable other parties to assess the claim.

(B) Information Produced. If information produced in discovery is subject to a claim of privilege or of protection as trial-preparation material, the party making the claim may notify any party that received the information of the claim and the basis for it. After being notified, a party must promptly return, sequester, or destroy the specified information and any copies it has; must not use or disclose the information until the claim is resolved; must take reasonable steps to retrieve the information if the party disclosed it before being notified; and may promptly present the information to the court under seal for a determination of the claim. The producing party must preserve the information until the claim is resolved.

(c) Protective Orders.

(1) In General. A party or any person from whom discovery is sought may move for a protective order in the court where the action is pending or as an alternative on matters relating to a deposition, in the court for the district where the deposition will be taken. The motion must include a certification that the movant has in good faith conferred or attempted to confer with other affected parties in an effort to resolve the dispute without court action. The court may, for good cause, issue an order to protect a party or person from annoyance, embarrassment, oppression, or undue burden or expense, including one or more of the following:

(A) forbidding the disclosure or discovery;

(B) specifying terms, including time and place, for the disclosure or discovery;

(C) prescribing a discovery method other than the one selected by the party seeking discovery;

(D) forbidding inquiry into certain matters, or limiting the scope of disclosure or discovery to certain matters;

(E) designating the persons who may be present while the discovery is conducted; (F) requiring that a deposition be sealed and opened only on court order;

(G) requiring that a trade secret or other confidential research, development, or commercial information not be revealed or be revealed only in a specified way; and

(H) requiring that the parties simultaneously file specified documents or information in sealed envelopes, to be opened as the court directs.

(2) Ordering Discovery. If a motion for a protective order is wholly or partly denied, the court may, on just terms, order that any party or person provide or permit discovery.

(3) Awarding Expenses. Rule 37(a)(5) applies to the award of expenses.

(d) Timing and Sequence of Discovery.

(1) Timing. A party may not seek discovery from any source before the parties have conferred as required by Rule 26(f), except in a proceeding exempted from initial disclosure under Rule 26(a)(1)(B), or when authorized by these rules, by stipulation, or by court order.

(2) Sequence. Unless, on motion, the court orders otherwise for the parties' and witnesses' convenience and in the interests of justice:

(A) methods of discovery may be used in any sequence; and

(B) discovery by one party does not require any other party to delay its discovery.

(e) Supplementing Disclosures and Responses.

(1) In General. A party who has made a disclosure under Rule 26(a)-or who has responded to an interrogatory, request for production, or request for admission-must supplement or correct its disclosure or response:

(A) in a timely manner if the party learns that in some material respect the disclosure or response is incomplete or incorrect, and if the additional or corrective information has not otherwise been made known to the other parties during the discovery process or in writing; or

(B) as ordered by the court.

(2) Expert Witness. For an expert whose report must be disclosed under Rule 26(a)(2)(B), the party's duty to supplement extends both to information included in the report and to information given during the expert's deposition. Any additions or changes to this information must be disclosed by the time the party's pretrial disclosures under Rule 26(a)(3) are due.

(f) Conference of the Parties; Planning for Discovery.

(1) Conference Timing. Except in a proceeding exempted from initial disclosure under Rule 26(a)(1)(B) or when the court orders otherwise, the parties must confer as soon as practicable-and in any event at least 21 days before a scheduling conference is held or a scheduling order is due under Rule 16(b).

(2) Conference Content; Parties' Responsibilities. In conferring, the parties must consider the nature and basis of their claims and defenses and the possibilities for promptly settling or resolving the case; make or arrange for the disclosures required by Rule 26(a)(1); discuss any issues about preserving discoverable information; and develop a proposed discovery plan. The attorneys of record and all unrepresented parties that have appeared in the case are jointly responsible for arranging the conference, for attempting in good faith to agree on the proposed discovery plan, and for submitting to the court within 14 days after the conference a written report outlining the plan. The court may order the parties or attorneys to attend the conference in person.

(3) Discovery Plan. A discovery plan must state the parties' views and proposals on:

(A) what changes should be made in the timing, form, or requirement for disclosures under Rule 26(a), including a statement of when initial disclosures were made or will be made;

(B) the subjects on which discovery may be needed, when discovery should be completed, and whether discovery should be conducted in phases or be limited to or focused on particular issues;

(C) any issues about disclosure or discovery of electronically stored information, including the form or forms in which it should be produced;

(D) any issues about claims of privilege or of protection as trial-preparation materials, including-if the parties agree on a procedure to assert these claims after production-whether to ask the court to include their agreement in an order;

(E) what changes should be made in the limitations on discovery imposed under these rules or by local rule, and what other limitations should be imposed; and

(F) any other orders that the court should issue under Rule 26(c) or under Rule 16(b) and (c).

(4) Expedited Schedule. If necessary to comply with its expedited schedule for Rule 16(b) conferences, a court may by local rule:

(A) require the parties' conference to occur less than 21 days before the scheduling conference is held or a scheduling order is due under Rule 16(b); and

(B) require the written report outlining the discovery plan to be filed less than 14 days after the parties' conference, or excuse the parties from submitting a written report and permit them to report orally on their discovery plan at the Rule 16(b) conference.

(g) Signing Disclosures and Discovery Requests, Responses, and Objections.

(1) Signature Required; Effect of Signature. Every disclosure under Rule 26(a)(1) or (a)(3) and every discovery request, response, or objection must be signed by at least one attorney of record in the attorney's own name-or by the party personally, if unrepresented-and must state the signer's address, e-mail address, and telephone number. By signing, an attorney or party certifies that to the best of the person's knowledge, information, and belief formed after a reasonable inquiry:

(A) with respect to a disclosure, it is complete and correct as of the time it is made; and

(B) with respect to a discovery request, response, or objection, it is:

(i) consistent with these rules and warranted by existing law or by a nonfrivolous argument for extending, modifying, or reversing existing law, or for establishing new law;

(ii) not interposed for any improper purpose, such as to harass, cause unnecessary delay, or needlessly increase the cost of litigation; and

(iii) neither unreasonable nor unduly burdensome or expensive, considering the needs of the case, prior discovery in the case, the amount in controversy, and the importance of the issues at stake in the action.

(2) Failure to Sign. Other parties have no duty to act on an unsigned disclosure, request, response, or objection until it is signed, and the court must strike it unless a signature is promptly supplied after the omission is called to the attorney's or party's attention.

(3) Sanction for Improper Certification. If a certification violates this rule without substantial justification, the court, on motion or on its own, must impose an appropriate sanction on the signer, the party on whose behalf the signer was acting, or both. The sanction may include an order to pay the reasonable expenses, including attorney's fees, caused by the violation. [Adopted Dec. 20, 1937, effective Sept. 16, 1938; amended Dec. 27, 1946, effective Mar. 19, 1948; Jan. 21, 1963, effective July 1, 1963; Feb. 28, 1966, effective July 1, 1966; Mar. 30, 1970, effective July 1, 1970; Apr. 29, 1980, effective Aug. 1, 1980; Apr. 28, 1983, effective Aug. 1, 1983; Mar. 2, 1987, effective Aug. 1, 1987; Apr. 22, 1993, effective Dec. 1, 1993; Apr. 17, 2000, effective Dec. 1, 2000; Apr. 12, 2006, effective Dec. 1, 2006; last amended April 30, 2007, effective December 1, 2007.]

Committee Note of 2007 to Rule 26 (style revision)

The language of Rule 26 has been amended as part of the general restyling of the Civil Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. Former Rule 26(a)(5) served as an index of the discovery methods provided by later rules. It was deleted as redundant. Deletion does not affect the right to pursue discovery in addition to disclosure.

Former Rule 26(b)(1) began with a general statement of the scope of discovery that appeared to function as a preface to each of the five numbered paragraphs that followed. This preface has been shifted to the text of paragraph (1) because it does not accurately reflect the limits embodied in paragraphs (2), (3), or (4), and because paragraph (5) does not address the scope of discovery.

The reference to discovery of "books" in former Rule 26(b)(1) was deleted to achieve consistent expression throughout the discovery rules. Books remain a proper subject of discovery.

Amended Rule 26(b)(3) states that a party may obtain a copy of the party's own previous statement "on request." Former Rule 26(b)(3) expressly made the request procedure available to a nonparty witness, but did not describe the procedure to be used by a party. This apparent gap is closed by adopting the request procedure, which ensures that a party need not invoke Rule 34 to obtain a copy of the party's own statement.

Rule 26(e) stated the duty to supplement or correct a disclosure or discovery response "to include information thereafter acquired." This apparent limit is not reflected in practice; parties recognize the duty to supplement or correct by providing information that was not originally provided although it was available at the time of the initial disclosure or response. These words are deleted to reflect the actual meaning of the present rule.

Former Rule 26(e) used different phrases to describe the time to supplement or correct disclosure or discovery response. Disclosures were to be supplemented "at appropriate intervals." A prior discovery response must be "seasonably * * * amend[ed]." The fine distinction between these phrases has not been observed in practice. Amended Rule 26(e)(1)(A) uses the same phrase for disclosures and discovery responses. The party must supplement or correct "in a timely manner."

Former Rule 26(g)(1) did not call for striking an unsigned disclosure. The omission was an obvious drafting oversight. Amended Rule 26(g)(2) includes disclosures in the list of matters that the court must strike unless a signature is provided "promptly * * * after being called to the attorney's or party's attention."

Former Rule 26(b)(2)(A) referred to a "good faith" argument to extend existing law. Amended Rule 26(b)(1)(B)(i) changes this reference to a "nonfrivolous" argument to achieve consistency with Rule 11(b)(2).

Committee Note of 2007 to Rule 26 (style-substance revision)

As with the Rule 11 signature on a pleading, written motion, or other paper, disclosure and discovery signatures should include not only a postal address but also a telephone number and electronic-mail address. A signer who lacks one or more of those addresses need not supply a nonexistent item.

Rule 11(b)(2) recognizes that it is legitimate to argue for establishing new law. An argument to establish new law is equally legitimate in conducting discovery.

Rule 33. Interrogatories to Parties

(a) In General.

(1) Number. Unless otherwise stipulated or ordered by the court, a party may serve on any other party no more than 25 written interrogatories, including all discrete subparts. Leave to serve additional interrogatories may be granted to the extent consistent with Rule 26(b)(2).

(2) Scope. An interrogatory may relate to any matter that may be inquired into under Rule 26(b). An interrogatory is not objectionable merely because it asks for an opinion or contention that relates to fact or the application of law to fact, but the court may order that the interrogatory need not be answered until designated discovery is complete, or until a pretrial conference or some other time.

(b) Answers and Objections.

(1) Responding Party. The interrogatories must be answered:

(A) by the party to whom they are directed; or

(B) if that party is a public or private corporation, a partnership, an association, or a governmental agency, by any officer or agent, who must furnish the information available to the party.

(2) Time to Respond. The responding party must serve its answers and any objections within 30 days after being served with the interrogatories. A shorter or longer time may be stipulated to under Rule 29 or be ordered by the court.

(3) Answering Each Interrogatory. Each interrogatory must, to the extent it is not objected to, be answered separately and fully in writing under oath.

(4) Objections. The grounds for objecting to an interrogatory must be stated with specificity. Any ground not stated in a timely objection is waived unless the court, for good cause, excuses the failure.

(5) Signature. The person who makes the answers must sign them, and the attorney who objects must sign any objections.

(c) Use. An answer to an interrogatory may be used to the extent allowed by the Federal Rules of Evidence.

(d) Option to Produce Business Records. If the answer to an interrogatory may be determined by examining, auditing, compiling, abstracting, or summarizing a party's business records (including electronically stored information), and if the burden of deriving or ascertaining the answer will be substantially the same for either party, the responding party may answer by:

(1) specifying the records that must be reviewed, in sufficient detail to enable the interrogating party to locate and identify them as readily as the responding party could; and

(2) giving the interrogating party a reasonable opportunity to examine and audit the records and to make copies, compilations, abstracts, or summaries. [Adopted Dec. 20, 1937, effective Sept. 16, 1938; amended Dec. 27, 1946, effective Mar. 19, 1948; Mar. 30, 1970, effective July 1, 1970; Apr. 29, 1980, effective Aug. 1, 1980; Apr. 22, 1993, effective Dec. 1, 1993; Apr. 12, 2006, effective Dec. 1, 2006; last amended April 30, 2007, effective December 1, 2007.]

Committee Note of 2007 to Rule 33

The language of Rule 33 has been amended as part of the general restyling of the Civil Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only.

The final sentence of former Rule 33(a) was a redundant cross-reference to the discovery moratorium provisions of Rule 26(d). Rule 26(d) is now familiar, obviating any need to carry forward the redundant cross-reference.

Former Rule 33(b)(5) was a redundant reminder of Rule 37(a) procedure that is omitted as no longer useful.

Former Rule 33(c) stated that an interrogatory "is not necessarily objectionable merely because an answer * * * involves an opinion or contention * * *." "[I]s not necessarily" seemed to imply that the interrogatory might be objectionable merely for this reason. This implication has been ignored in practice. Opinion and contention interrogatories are used routinely. Amended Rule 33(a)(2) embodies the current meaning of Rule 33 by omitting "necessarily."

Rule 34. Producing Documents, Electronically Stored Information, and Tangible Things, or Entering onto Land, for Inspection and Other Purposes

(a) In General. A party may serve on any other party a request within the scope of Rule 26(b):

(1) to produce and permit the requesting party or its representative to inspect, copy, test, or sample the following items in the responding party's possession, custody, or control:

(A) any designated documents or electronically stored information-including writings, drawings, graphs, charts, photographs, sound recordings, images, and other data or data compilations-stored in any medium from which information can be obtained either directly or, if necessary, after translation by the responding party into a reasonably usable form; or

(B) any designated tangible things; or

(2) to permit entry onto designated land or other property possessed or controlled by the responding party, so that the requesting party may inspect, measure, survey, photograph, test, or sample the property or any designated object or operation on it.

(b) Procedure.

(1) Contents of the Request. The request:

(A) must describe with reasonable particularity each item or category of items to be inspected;

(B) must specify a reasonable time, place, and manner for the inspection and for performing the related acts; and

(C) may specify the form or forms in which electronically stored information is to be produced.

(2) Responses and Objections.

(A) Time to Respond. The party to whom the request is directed must respond in writing within 30 days after being served. A shorter or longer time may be stipulated to under Rule 29 or be ordered by the court.

(B) Responding to Each Item. For each item or category, the response must either state that inspection and related activities will be permitted as requested or state an objection to the request, including the reasons.

(C) Objections. An objection to part of a request must specify the part and permit inspection of the rest.

(D) Responding to a Request for Production of Electronically Stored Information. The response may state an objection to a requested form for producing electronically stored information. If the responding party objects to a requested form-or if no form was specified in the request-the party must state the form or forms it intends to use.

(E) Producing the Documents or Electronically Stored Information. Unless otherwise stipulated or ordered by the court, these procedures apply to producing documents or electronically stored information:

(i) A party must produce documents as they are kept in the usual course of business or must organize and label them to correspond to the categories in the request;

(ii) If a request does not specify a form for producing electronically stored information, a party must produce it in a form or forms in which it is ordinarily maintained or in a reasonably usable form or forms; and

(iii) A party need not produce the same electronically stored information in more than one form.

(c) Nonparties. As provided in Rule 45, a nonparty may be compelled to produce documents and tangible things or to permit an inspection. [Adopted Dec. 20, 1937, effective Sept. 16, 1938; amended Dec. 27, 1946, effective Mar. 19, 1948; Mar. 30, 1970, effective July 1, 1970; Apr. 29, 1980, effective Aug. 1, 1980; Mar. 2, 1987, effective Aug. 1, 1987; Apr. 30, 1991, effective Dec. 1, 1991; Apr. 22, 1993, effective Dec. 1, 1993; Apr. 12, 2006, effective Dec. 1, 2006; last amended April 30, 2007, effective December 1, 2007.]

Committee Note of 2007 to Rule 34

The language of Rule 34 has been amended as part of the general restyling of the Civil Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only.

The final sentence in the first paragraph of former Rule 34(b) was a redundant cross-reference to the discovery moratorium provisions of Rule 26(d). Rule 26(d) is now familiar, obviating any need to carry forward the redundant cross-reference.

The redundant reminder of Rule 37(a) procedure in the second paragraph of former Rule 34(b) is omitted as no longer useful.

Rule 37. Failure to Make Disclosures or to Cooperate in Discovery; Sanctions

(a) Motion for an Order Compelling Disclosure or Discovery.

(1) In General. On notice to other parties and all affected persons, a party may move for an order compelling disclosure or discovery. The motion must include a certification that the movant has in good faith conferred or attempted to confer with the person or party failing to make disclosure or discovery in an effort to obtain it without court action.

(2) Appropriate Court. A motion for an order to a party must be made in the court where the action is pending. A motion for an order to a nonparty must be made in the court where the discovery is or will be taken.

(3) Specific Motions.

(A) To Compel Disclosure. If a party fails to make a disclosure required by Rule 26(a), any other party may move to compel disclosure and for appropriate sanctions.

(B) To Compel a Discovery Response. A party seeking discovery may move for an order compelling an answer, designation, production, or inspection. This motion may be made if:

- (i) a deponent fails to answer a question asked under Rule 30 or 31;
- (ii) a corporation or other entity fails to make a designation under Rule 30(b)(6) or 31(a)(4);
- (iii) a party fails to answer an interrogatory submitted under Rule 33; or
- (iv) a party fails to respond that inspection will be permitted-or fails to permit inspection-as requested under Rule 34.

(C) Related to a Deposition. When taking an oral deposition, the party asking a question may complete or adjourn the examination before moving for an order.

(4) Evasive or Incomplete Disclosure, Answer, or Response. For purposes of this subdivision (a), an evasive or incomplete disclosure, answer, or response must be treated as a failure to disclose, answer, or respond.

(5) Payment of Expenses; Protective Orders.

(A) If the Motion Is Granted (or Disclosure or Discovery Is Provided After Filing). If the motion is granted-or if the disclosure or requested discovery is provided after the motion was filed-the court must, after giving an opportunity to be heard, require the party or deponent whose conduct necessitated the motion, the party or attorney advising that conduct, or both to pay the movant's reasonable expenses incurred in making the motion, including attorney's fees. But the court must not order this payment if:

- (i) the movant filed the motion before attempting in good faith to obtain the disclosure or discovery without court action;
- (ii) the opposing party's nondisclosure, response, or objection was substantially justified; or
- (iii) other circumstances make an award of expenses unjust.

(B) If the Motion Is Denied. If the motion is denied, the court may issue any protective order authorized under Rule 26(c) and must, after giving an opportunity to be heard, require the movant, the attorney filing the motion, or both to pay the party or deponent who opposed the motion its reasonable expenses incurred in opposing the motion, including attorney's fees. But the court must not order this payment if the motion was substantially justified or other circumstances make an award of expenses unjust.

(C) If the Motion Is Granted in Part and Denied in Part. If the motion is granted in part and denied in part, the court may issue any protective order authorized under Rule 26(c) and may, after giving an opportunity to be heard, apportion the reasonable expenses for the motion.

(b) Failure to Comply with a Court Order.

(1) Sanctions in the District Where the Deposition Is Taken. If the court where the discovery is taken orders a deponent to be sworn or to answer a question and the deponent fails to obey, the failure may be treated as contempt of court.

(2) Sanctions in the District Where the Action Is Pending.

(A) For Not Obeying a Discovery Order. If a party or a party's officer, director, or managing agent-or a witness designated under Rule 30(b)(6) or 31(a)(4)-fails to obey an order to provide or permit discovery, including an order under Rule 26(f), 35, or 37(a), the court where the action is pending may issue further just orders. They may include the following:

(i) directing that the matters embraced in the order or other designated facts be taken as established for purposes of the action, as the prevailing party claims;

(ii) prohibiting the disobedient party from supporting or opposing designated claims or defenses, or from introducing designated matters in evidence;

(iii) striking pleadings in whole or in part;

(iv) staying further proceedings until the order is obeyed;

(v) dismissing the action or proceeding in whole or in part;

(vi) rendering a default judgment against the disobedient party; or

(vii) treating as contempt of court the failure to obey any order except an order to submit to a physical or mental examination.

(B) For Not Producing a Person for Examination. If a party fails to comply with an order under Rule 35(a) requiring it to produce another person for examination, the court may issue any of the orders listed in Rule 37(b)(2)(A)(i)-(vi), unless the disobedient party shows that it cannot produce the other person.

(C) Payment of Expenses. Instead of or in addition to the orders above, the court must order the disobedient party, the attorney advising that party, or both to pay the reasonable expenses, including attorney's fees, caused by the failure, unless the failure was substantially justified or other circumstances make an award of expenses unjust.

(c) Failure to Disclose, to Supplement an Earlier Response, or to Admit.

(1) Failure to Disclose or Supplement. If a party fails to provide information or identify a witness as required by Rule 26(a) or (e), the party is not allowed to use that information or witness to supply evidence on a motion, at a hearing, or at a trial, unless the failure was substantially justified or is harmless. In addition to or instead of this sanction, the court, on motion and after giving an opportunity to be heard:

(A) may order payment of the reasonable expenses, including attorney's fees, caused by the failure;

(B) may inform the jury of the party's failure; and

(C) may impose other appropriate sanctions, including any of the orders listed in Rule 37(b)(2)(A)(i)-(vi).

(2) Failure to Admit. If a party fails to admit what is requested under Rule 36 and if the requesting party later proves a document to be genuine or the matter true, the requesting party may move that the party who failed to admit pay the reasonable expenses, including attorney's fees, incurred in making that proof. The court must so order unless:

(A) the request was held objectionable under Rule 36(a);

(B) the admission sought was of no substantial importance;

(C) the party failing to admit had a reasonable ground to believe that it might prevail on the matter; or

(D) there was other good reason for the failure to admit.

(d) Party's Failure to Attend Its Own Deposition, Serve Answers to Interrogatories, or Respond to a Request for Inspection.

(1) In General.

(A) Motion; Grounds for Sanctions. The court where the action is pending may, on motion, order sanctions if:

- (i) a party or a party's officer, director, or managing agent-or a person designated under Rule 30(b)(6) or 31(a)(4)-fails, after being served with proper notice, to appear for that person's deposition; or
- (ii) a party, after being properly served with interrogatories under Rule 33 or a request for inspection under Rule 34, fails to serve its answers, objections, or written response.

(B) Certification. A motion for sanctions for failing to answer or respond must include a certification that the movant has in good faith conferred or attempted to confer with the party failing to act in an effort to obtain the answer or response without court action.

(2) Unacceptable Excuse for Failing to Act. A failure described in Rule 37(d)(1)(A) is not excused on the ground that the discovery sought was objectionable, unless the party failing to act has a pending motion for a protective order under Rule 26(c).

(3) Types of Sanctions. Sanctions may include any of the orders listed in Rule 37(b)(2)(A)(i)-(vi). Instead of or in addition to these sanctions, the court must require the party failing to act, the attorney advising that party, or both to pay the reasonable expenses, including attorney's fees, caused by the failure, unless the failure was substantially justified or other circumstances make an award of expenses unjust.

(e) Failure to Provide Electronically Stored Information. Absent exceptional circumstances, a court may not impose sanctions under these rules on a party for failing to provide electronically stored information lost as a result of the routine, good-faith operation of an electronic information system.

(f) Failure to Participate in Framing a Discovery Plan. If a party or its attorney fails to participate in good faith in developing and submitting a proposed discovery plan as required by Rule 26(f), the court may, after giving an opportunity to be heard, require that party or attorney to pay to any other party the reasonable expenses, including attorney's fees, caused by the failure. [Adopted Dec. 20, 1937, effective Sept. 16, 1938; amended Dec. 29, 1948, effective Oct. 20, 1949; Mar. 30, 1970, effective July 1, 1970; Apr. 29, 1980, effective Aug. 1, 1980; Oct. 21, 1980, effective Oct. 1, 1981; Mar. 2, 1987, effective Aug. 1, 1987; Apr. 22, 1993, effective Dec. 1, 1993; Apr. 17, 2000, effective Dec. 1, 2000; Apr. 12, 2006, effective Dec. 1, 2006; last amended April 30, 2007, effective December 1, 2007.]

Committee Note of 2007 to Rule 37

The language of Rule 37 has been amended as part of the general restyling of the Civil Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only.

TITLE VI

Trials

Rule 45. Subpoena

(a) In General.

(1) Form and Contents.

(A) Requirements-In General. Every subpoena must:

(i) state the court from which it issued;

(ii) state the title of the action, the court in which it is pending, and its civil-action number;

(iii) command each person to whom it is directed to do the following at a specified time and place: attend and testify; produce designated documents, electronically stored information, or tangible things in that person's possession, custody, or control; or permit the inspection of premises; and

(iv) set out the text of Rule 45(c) and (d).

(B) Command to Attend a Deposition-Notice of the Recording Method. A subpoena commanding attendance at a deposition must state the method for recording the testimony.

(C) Combining or Separating a Command to Produce or to Permit Inspection; Specifying the Form for Electronically Stored Information. A command to produce documents, electronically stored information, or tangible things or to permit the inspection of premises may be included in a subpoena commanding attendance at a deposition, hearing, or trial, or may be set out in a separate subpoena. A subpoena may specify the form or forms in which electronically stored information is to be produced.

(D) Command to Produce; Included Obligations. A command in a subpoena to produce documents, electronically stored information, or tangible things requires the responding party to permit inspection, copying, testing, or sampling of the materials.

(2) Issued from Which Court. A subpoena must issue as follows:

(A) for attendance at a hearing or trial, from the court for the district where the hearing or trial is to be held;

(B) for attendance at a deposition, from the court for the district where the deposition is to be taken; and

(C) for production or inspection, if separate from a subpoena commanding a person's attendance, from the court for the district where the production or inspection is to be made.

(3) Issued by Whom. The clerk must issue a subpoena, signed but otherwise in blank, to a party who requests it. That party must complete it before service. An attorney also may issue and sign a subpoena as an officer of:

(A) a court in which the attorney is authorized to practice; or

(B) a court for a district where a deposition is to be taken or production is to be made, if the attorney is authorized to practice in the court where the action is pending.

(b) Service.

(1) By Whom; Tendering Fees; Serving a Copy of Certain Subpoenas. Any person who is at least 18 years old and not a party may serve a subpoena. Serving a subpoena requires delivering a copy to the named person and, if the subpoena requires that person's attendance, tendering the fees for 1 day's attendance and the mileage allowed by law. Fees and mileage need not be tendered when the subpoena issues on behalf of the United States or any of its officers or agencies. If the subpoena commands the production of documents, electronically stored information, or tangible things or the inspection of premises before trial, then before it is served, a notice must be served on each party.

(2) Service in the United States. Subject to Rule 45(c)(3)(A)(ii), a subpoena may be served at any place:

(A) within the district of the issuing court;

(B) outside that district but within 100 miles of the place specified for the deposition, hearing, trial, production, or inspection;

(C) within the state of the issuing court if a state statute or court rule allows service at that place of a subpoena issued by a state court of general jurisdiction sitting in the place specified for the deposition, hearing, trial, production, or inspection; or

(D) that the court authorizes on motion and for good cause, if a federal statute so provides.

(3) Service in a Foreign Country. 28 U.S.C. § 1783 governs issuing and serving a subpoena directed to a United States national or resident who is in a foreign country.

(4) Proof of Service. Proving service, when necessary, requires filing with the issuing court a statement showing the date and manner of service and the names of the persons served. The statement must be certified by the server.

(c) Protecting a Person Subject to a Subpoena.

(1) Avoiding Undue Burden or Expense; Sanctions. A party or attorney responsible for issuing and serving a subpoena must take reasonable steps to avoid imposing undue burden or expense on a person subject to the subpoena. The issuing court must enforce this duty and impose an appropriate sanction—which may include lost earnings and reasonable attorney's fees—on a party or attorney who fails to comply.

(2) Command to Produce Materials or Permit Inspection.

(A) Appearance Not Required. A person commanded to produce documents, electronically stored information, or tangible things, or to permit the inspection of premises, need not appear in person at the place of production or inspection unless also commanded to appear for a deposition, hearing, or trial.

(B) Objections. A person commanded to produce documents or tangible things or to permit inspection may serve on the party or attorney designated in the subpoena a written objection to inspecting, copying, testing or sampling any or all of the materials or to inspecting the premises—or to producing electronically stored information in the form or forms requested. The objection must be served before the earlier of the time specified for compliance or 14 days after the subpoena is served. If an objection is made, the following rules apply:

(i) At any time, on notice to the commanded person, the serving party may move the issuing court for an order compelling production or inspection.

(ii) These acts may be required only as directed in the order, and the order must protect a person who is neither a party nor a party's officer from significant expense resulting from compliance.

(3) Quashing or Modifying a Subpoena.

(A) When Required. On timely motion, the issuing court must quash or modify a subpoena that:

(i) fails to allow a reasonable time to comply;

(ii) requires a person who is neither a party nor a party's officer to travel more than 100 miles from where that person resides, is employed, or regularly transacts business in person—except that, subject to Rule 45(c)(3)(B)(iii), the person may be commanded to attend a trial by traveling from any such place within the state where the trial is held;

(iii) requires disclosure of privileged or other protected matter, if no exception or waiver applies; or

(iv) subjects a person to undue burden.

(B) When Permitted. To protect a person subject to or affected by a subpoena, the issuing court may, on motion, quash or modify the subpoena if it requires:

(i) disclosing a trade secret or other confidential research, development, or commercial information;

(ii) disclosing an unretained expert's opinion or information that does not describe specific occurrences in dispute and results from the expert's study that was not requested by a party; or

(iii) a person who is neither a party nor a party's officer to incur substantial expense to travel more than 100 miles to attend trial.

(C) Specifying Conditions as an Alternative. In the circumstances described in Rule 45(c)(3)(B), the court may, instead of quashing or modifying a subpoena, order appearance or production under specified conditions if the serving party:

(i) shows a substantial need for the testimony or material that cannot be otherwise met without undue hardship; and

(ii) ensures that the subpoenaed person will be reasonably compensated.

(d) Duties in Responding to a Subpoena.

(1) Producing Documents or Electronically Stored Information. These procedures apply to producing documents or electronically stored information:

(A) Documents. A person responding to a subpoena to produce documents must produce them as they are kept in the ordinary course of business or must organize and label them to correspond to the categories in the demand.

(B) Form for Producing Electronically Stored Information Not Specified. If a subpoena does not specify a form for producing electronically stored information, the person responding must produce it in a form or forms in which it is ordinarily maintained or in a reasonably usable form or forms.

(C) Electronically Stored Information Produced in Only One Form. The person responding need not produce the same electronically stored information in more than one form.

(D) Inaccessible Electronically Stored Information. The person responding need not provide discovery of electronically stored information from sources that the person identifies as not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or cost. On motion to compel discovery or for a protective order, the person responding must show that the information is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or cost. If that showing is made, the court may nonetheless order discovery from such sources if the requesting party shows good cause, considering the limitations of Rule 26(b)(2)(C). The court may specify conditions for the discovery.

(2) Claiming Privilege or Protection.

(A) Information Withheld. A person withholding subpoenaed information under a claim that it is privileged or subject to protection as trial-preparation material must:

- (i) expressly make the claim; and
- (ii) describe the nature of the withheld documents, communications, or tangible things in a manner that, without revealing information itself privileged or protected, will enable the parties to assess the claim.

(B) Information Produced. If information produced in response to a subpoena is subject to a claim of privilege or of protection as trial-preparation material, the person making the claim may notify any party that received the information of the claim and the basis for it. After being notified, a party must promptly return, sequester, or destroy the specified information and any copies it has; must not use or disclose the information until the claim is resolved; must take reasonable steps to retrieve the information if the party disclosed it before being notified; and may promptly present the information to the court under seal for a determination of the claim. The person who produced the information must preserve the information until the claim is resolved.

(e) Contempt. The issuing court may hold in contempt a person who, having been served, fails without adequate excuse to obey the subpoena. A nonparty's failure to obey must be excused if the subpoena purports to require the nonparty to attend or produce at a place outside the limits of Rule 45(c)(3)(A)(ii). [Adopted Dec. 20, 1937, effective Sept. 16, 1938; amended Dec. 27, 1946, effective Mar. 19, 1948; Dec. 29, 1948, effective Oct. 20, 1949; Mar. 30, 1970, effective July 1, 1970; Apr. 29, 1980, effective Aug. 1, 1980; Apr. 29, 1985, effective Aug. 1, 1985; Mar. 2, 1987, effective Aug. 1, 1987; Apr. 30, 1991, effective Dec. 1, 1991; Apr. 25, 2005, effective Dec. 1, 2005; Apr. 12, 2006, effective Dec. 1, 2006; last amended April 30, 2007, effective December 1, 2007.]

Committee Note of 2007 to Rule 45

The language of Rule 45 has been amended as part of the general restyling of the Civil Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only.

The reference to discovery of "books" in former Rule 45(a)(1)(C) was deleted to achieve consistent expression throughout the discovery rules. Books remain a proper subject of discovery.

Former Rule 45(b)(1) required "prior notice" to each party of any commanded production of documents and things or inspection of premises. Courts have agreed that notice must be given "prior" to the return date, and have tended to converge on an interpretation that requires notice to the parties before the subpoena is served on the person commanded to produce or permit inspection. That interpretation is adopted in amended Rule 45(b)(1) to give clear notice of general present practice.

The language of former Rule 45(d)(2) addressing the manner of asserting privilege is replaced by adopting the wording of Rule 26(b)(5). The same meaning is better expressed in the same words.

Federal Rules of Evidence

Synopsis:

Selected Provisions of the Federal Rules of Evidence

Article V. Privileges

Rule 502. Attorney-client privilege and work product; limitations on waiver

Article X. Contents of Writings, Recordings, and Photographs

Rule 1001. Definitions

Rule 1002. Requirement of Original

Rule 1003. Admissibility of Duplicates

Rule 1004. Admissibility of Other Evidence of Contents

Text:

ARTICLE V

Privileges

Rule 502. Attorney-client privilege and work product; limitations on waiver

The following provisions apply, in the circumstances set out, to disclosure of a communication or information covered by the attorney-client privilege or work product protection.

(a) Disclosure made in a Federal proceeding or to a Federal office or agency; scope of a waiver. When the disclosure is made in a Federal proceeding or to a Federal office or agency and waives the attorney-client privilege or work-product protection, the waiver extends to an undisclosed communication or information in a Federal or State proceeding only if:

- (1) the waiver is intentional;
- (2) the disclosed and undisclosed communications or information concern the same subject matter; and
- (3) they ought in fairness to be considered together.

(b) Inadvertent disclosure. When made in a Federal proceeding or to a Federal office or agency, the disclosure does not operate as a waiver in a Federal or State proceeding if:

- (1) the disclosure is inadvertent;

(2) the holder of the privilege or protection took reasonable steps to prevent disclosure; and

(3) the holder promptly took reasonable steps to rectify the error, including (if applicable) following Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(b)(5)(B).

(c) Disclosure made in a State proceeding. When the disclosure is made in a State proceeding and is not the subject of a State-court order concerning waiver, the disclosure does not operate as a waiver in a Federal proceeding if the disclosure:

(1) would not be a waiver under this rule if it had been made in a Federal proceeding; or

(2) is not a waiver under the law of the State where the disclosure occurred.

(d) Controlling effect of a court order. A Federal court may order that the privilege or protection is not waived by disclosure connected with the litigation pending before the court-in which event the disclosure is also not a waiver in any other Federal or State proceeding.

(e) Controlling effect of a party agreement. An agreement on the effect of disclosure in a Federal proceeding is binding only on the parties to the agreement, unless it is incorporated into a court order.

(f) Controlling effect of this rule. Notwithstanding Rules 101 and 1101, this rule applies to State proceedings and to Federal court-annexed and Federal court-mandated arbitration proceedings, in the circumstances set out in the rule. And notwithstanding Rule 501, this rule applies even if State law provides the rule of decision.

(g) Definitions. In this rule:

(1) "attorney-client privilege" means the protection that applicable law provides for confidential attorney-client communications; and

(2) "work-product protection" means the protection that applicable law provides for tangible material (or its intangible equivalent) prepared in anticipation of litigation or for trial. [Sept. 19, 2008, P.L. 110-322, § 1(a), 122 Stat. 3537.]

Notes

Application of rule. Act Sept. 19, 2008, P.L. 110-322, § 1(c), 122 Stat. 3538, provides: "The amendments made by this Act [adding this rule] shall apply in all proceedings commenced after the date of enactment of this Act and, insofar as is just and practicable, in all proceedings pending on such date of enactment."

Committee note. This new rule has two major purposes:

(1) It resolves some longstanding disputes in the courts about the effect of certain disclosures of communications or information protected by the attorney-client privilege or as work product-specifically those disputes involving inadvertent disclosure and subject matter waiver.

(2) It responds to the widespread complaint that litigation costs necessary to protect against waiver of attorney-client privilege or work product have become prohibitive due to the concern that any disclosure (however innocent or minimal) will operate as a subject matter waiver of all protected communications or information. This concern is especially troubling in cases involving electronic discovery. See, e.g., Hopson v. City of Baltimore, 232 F.R.D. 228, 244 (D.Md. 2005) (electronic discovery may encompass "millions of documents" and to insist upon "record-by-record pre-production privilege review, on pain of subject matter waiver, would impose upon parties costs of production that bear no proportionality to what is at stake in the litigation").

The rule seeks to provide a predictable, uniform set of standards under which parties can determine the consequences of a disclosure of a communication or information covered by the attorney-client privilege or work product protection. Parties to litigation need to know, for example, that if they exchange privileged information pursuant to a confidentiality order, the court's order will be enforceable. Moreover, if a federal court's confidentiality order is not enforceable in a state court then the burdensome costs of privilege review and retention are unlikely to be reduced.

The rule makes no attempt to alter federal or state law on whether a communication or information is protected under the attorney-client privilege or work product immunity as an initial matter. Moreover, while establishing some exceptions to waiver, the rule does not purport to supplant applicable waiver doctrine generally.

The rule governs only certain waivers by disclosure. Other common-law waiver doctrines may result in a finding of waiver even where there is no disclosure of privileged information or work product. See, e.g., Nguyen v. Excel Corp., 197 F.3d 200 (5th Cir. 1999) (reliance on an advice of counsel defense waives the privilege with respect to attorney-client communications pertinent to that defense); Ryers [Byers] v. Burleson, 100 F.R.D. 436 (D.D.C. 1983) (allegation of lawyer malpractice constituted a waiver of confidential communications under the circumstances). The rule is not intended to displace or modify federal common law concerning waiver of privilege or work product where no disclosure has been made.

Subdivision (a). The rule provides that a voluntary disclosure in a federal proceeding or to a federal office or agency, if a waiver, generally results in a waiver only of the communication or information disclosed; a subject matter waiver (of either privilege or work product) is reserved for those unusual situations in which fairness requires a further disclosure of related, protected information, in order to prevent a selective and misleading presentation of evidence to the disadvantage of the adversary. See, e.g., In re United Mine Workers of America Employee Benefit Plans Litig., 159 F.R.D. 307, 312 (D.D.C. 1994) (waiver of work product limited to materials actually disclosed, because the party did not deliberately disclose documents in an attempt to gain tactical advantage). Thus, subject matter waiver is limited to situations in which a party intentionally puts protected information into the litigation in a selective, misleading and unfair manner. It follows that an inadvertent disclosure of protected information can never result in a subject matter waiver. claw back Rule 502(b). The rule rejects the result in In re Sealed Case, 877 F.2d 976 (D.C. Cir. 1989), which held that inadvertent disclosure of documents during discovery automatically constituted a subject matter waiver.

The language concerning subject matter waiver-"ought in fairness"-is taken from Rule 106, because the animating principle is the same. Under both Rules, a party that makes a selective, misleading presentation that is unfair to the adversary opens itself to a more complete and accurate presentation.

To assure protection and predictability, the rules provides that if a disclosure is made at the federal level, the federal rule on subject matter waiver governs subsequent state court determinations on the scope of the waiver by that disclosure.

Subdivision (b). Courts are in conflict over whether an inadvertent disclosure of a communication or information protected as privileged or work product constitutes a waiver. A few courts find that a disclosure must be intentional to be a waiver. Most courts find a waiver only if the disclosing party acted carelessly in disclosing the communication or information protected under the attorney-client privilege or as work product constitutes a waiver without regard to the protections taken to avoid such a disclosure. See generally Hopson v. City of Baltimore, 232 F.R.D. 228 (D. Md. 2005), for a discussion of this case law.

The rule opts for the middle ground: inadvertent disclosure of protected communications or information in connection with a federal proceeding or to a federal office or agency does not constitute a waiver if the holder took reasonable steps to prevent disclosure and also promptly took reasonable steps to rectify the error. This position is in accord with the majority view on whether inadvertent disclosure is a waiver.

Cases such as Lois Sportswear, U.S.A., Inc. v. Levi Strauss & Co., 104 F.R.D. 103, 105 (S.D.N.Y. 1985) and Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Garvey, 109 F.R.D. 323, 332 (N.D. Cal. 1985), set out a multi-factor test for determining whether inadvertent disclosure is a waiver. The stated factors (none of which are dispositive) are the reasonableness of precautions taken, the time taken to rectify the error, the scope of discovery, the extent of disclosure and the overriding issue of fairness. The rule does not explicitly codify that test, because it is really a set of non-determinative guidelines that vary from case to case. The rule is flexible enough to accommodate any of those listed factors. Other considerations bearing on the reasonableness of a producing party's efforts include the number of documents to be reviewed and the time constraints for production. Depending on the circumstances, a party that uses advanced analytical software applications and linguistic tools in screening for privilege and work product may be found to have taken "reasonable steps" to prevent inadvertent disclosure. The implementation of an efficient system of records management before litigation may also be relevant.

The rule does not require the producing party to engage in a post-production review to determine whether any protected communication or information has been produced by mistake. But the rule does require the producing party to follow up on any obvious indications that a protected communication or information has been produced inadvertently.

The rule applies to inadvertent disclosures made to a federal office or agency, including but not limited to an office or agency that is acting in the course of its regulatory, investigative or enforcement authority. The consequences of waiver, and the concomitant costs of pre-production privilege review, can be as great with respect to disclosures to offices and agencies as they are in litigation.

Subdivision (c). Difficult questions can arise when 1) a disclosure of a communication or information protected by the attorney-client privilege or as work product is made in a state proceeding, 2) the communication or information is offered in a subsequent federal proceeding on the ground that the disclosure waived the privilege or protection, and 3) the state and federal laws are in conflict on the question of waiver. The Committee determined that the proper solution for the federal court is to apply the law that is most protective of privilege and work product. If the state law is more protective (such as where the state law is that an inadvertent disclosure can never be a waiver), the holder of the privilege or protection may well have relied on that law when making the disclosure in the state proceeding. Moreover, applying a more restrictive federal law of waiver could impair the state objective of preserving the privilege or work-product protection for disclosures made in state proceedings. On the other hand, if the federal law is more protective, applying the state law of waiver to determine admissibility in federal court is likely to undermine the federal objective of limiting the costs of production.

The rule does not address the enforceability of a state court confidentiality order in a federal proceeding, as that question is covered both by statutory law and principles of federalism and comity. See 28 U.S.C. § 1738 (providing that state judicial proceedings "shall have the same full faith and credit in every court within the United States . . . as they have by law or usage in the courts of such State . . . from which they are taken."). See also Tucker v. Ohtsu Tire & Rubber Co., 191 F.R.D. 495, 499 (D. Md. 2000) (noting that a federal court considering the enforceability of a state confidentiality order is "constrained by principles of comity, courtesy, and . . . federalism"). Thus, a state court order finding no waiver in connection with a disclosure made in a state court proceeding is enforceable under existing law in subsequent federal proceedings.

Subdivision (d). Confidentiality orders are becoming increasingly important in limiting the costs of privilege review and retention, especially in cases involving electronic discovery. But the utility of a confidentiality order in reducing discovery costs is substantially diminished if it provides no protection outside the particular litigation in which the order is entered. Parties are unlikely to be able to reduce the costs of pre-production review for privilege and work product if the consequence of disclosure is that the communications or information could be used by non-parties to the litigation.

There is some dispute on whether a confidentiality order entered in one case is enforceable in other proceedings. See generally Hopson v. City of Baltimore, 232 F.R.D. 228 (D. Md. 2005), for a discussion of this case law. The rule provides that when a confidentiality order governing the consequences of disclosure in that case is entered in a federal proceeding, its terms are enforceable against non-parties in any federal or state proceeding. For example, the court order may provide for return of documents without waiver irrespective of the care taken by the disclosing party; the rule contemplates enforcement of "claw-back" and "quick peek" arrangements as a way to avoid the excessive costs of pre-production review for privilege and work product. See Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 216 F.R.D. 280, 290 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (noting that parties may enter into "so-called 'claw-back' agreements that allow the parties to forego privilege review altogether in favor of an agreement to return inadvertently produced privilege documents"). The rule provides a party with a predictable protection from a court order-predictability that is needed to allow the party to plan in advance to limit the prohibitive costs of privilege and work product review and retention.

Under the rule, a confidentiality order is enforceable whether or not it memorializes an agreement among the parties to the litigation. party agreement should not be a condition of enforceability of a federal court's order.

Subdivision (e). Subdivision (e) codifies the well-established proposition that parties can enter an agreement to limit the effect of waiver by disclosure between or among them. Of course such an agreement can bind only the parties to the agreement. The rule makes clear that if parties want protection against non-parties from a finding of waiver by disclosure, the agreement must be made part of a court order.

Subdivision (f). The protections against waiver provided by Rule 502 must be applicable when protected communications or information disclosed in federal proceedings are subsequently offered in state proceedings. Otherwise, the holders of protected communications and information, and their lawyers, could not rely on the protections provided by the Rule, and the goal of limiting costs in discovery would be substantially undermined. Rule 502(g) [sic] is intended to resolve any potential tension between the provisions of Rule 502 that apply to state proceedings and the possible limitations on the applicability of the Federal Rules of Evidence otherwise provided by Rules 101 and 1101.

The rule is intended to apply in all federal court proceedings, including court-annexed and court-ordered arbitrations, without regard to any possible limitations of Rules 101 and 1101. This provision is not intended to raise an inference about the applicability of any other rule of evidence in arbitration proceedings more generally. The costs of discovery can be equally high for state and federal causes of action, and the rule seeks to limit those costs in all federal proceedings, regardless of whether the claim arises under state or federal law. Accordingly, the rule applies to state law causes of action brought in federal court.

Subdivision (g). The rule's coverage is limited to attorney-client privilege and work product. The operation of waiver by disclosure, as applied to other evidentiary privileges, remains a question of federal common law. Nor does the rule purport to apply to the Fifth Amendment privilege against compelled self-incrimination.

The definition of work product "materials" is intended to include both tangible and intangible information. See In re Cendant Corp. Sec. Litig., 343 F.3d 658, 662 (3d Cir. 2003) ("work product protection extends to both tangible and intangible work product").

ARTICLE X

Contents of Writings, Recordings, and Photographs

Rule 1001. Definitions

For purposes of this article the following definitions are applicable:

(1) Writings and recordings. "Writings" and "recordings" consist of letters, words, or numbers, or their equivalent, set down by handwriting, typewriting, printing, photostating, photographing, magnetic impulse, mechanical or electronic recording, or other form of data compilation.

(2) Photographs. "Photographs" include still photographs, X-ray films, video tapes, and motion pictures.

(3) Original. An "original" of a writing or recording is the writing or recording itself or any counterpart intended to have the same effect by a person executing or issuing it. An "original" of a photograph includes the negative or any print therefrom. If data are stored in a computer or similar device, any printout or other output readable by sight, shown to reflect the data accurately, is an "original".

(4) Duplicate. A "duplicate" is a counterpart produced by the same impression as the original, or from the same matrix, or by means of photography, including enlargements and miniatures, or by mechanical or electronic re-recording, or by chemical reproduction, or by other equivalent techniques which accurately reproduces the original. (Jan. 2, 1975, P.L. 93-595, § 1, 88 Stat. 1945.)

Rule 1002. Requirement of Original

To prove the content of a writing, recording, or photograph, the original writing, recording, or photograph is required, except as otherwise provided in these rules or by Act of Congress. (Jan. 2, 1975, P.L. 93-595, § 1, 88 Stat. 1946.)

Rule 1003. Admissibility of Duplicates

A duplicate is admissible to the same extent as an original unless (1) a genuine question is raised as to the authenticity of the original or (2) in the circumstances it would be unfair to admit the duplicate in lieu of the original. (Jan. 2, 1975, P.L. 93-595, § 1, 88 Stat. 1946.)

Rule 1004. Admissibility of Other Evidence of Contents

The original is not required, and other evidence of the contents of a writing, recording, or photograph is admissible if-

(1) Originals lost or destroyed. All originals are lost or have been destroyed, unless the proponent lost or destroyed them in bad faith; or

(2) Original not obtainable. No original can be obtained by any available judicial process or procedure; or

(3) Original in possession of opponent. At a time when an original was under the control of the party against whom offered, that party was put on notice, by the pleadings or otherwise, that the contents would be a subject of proof at the hearing, and that party does not produce the original at the hearing; or

(4) Collateral matters. The writing, recording, or photograph is not closely related to a controlling issue. (Jan. 2, 1975, P.L. 93-595, § 1, 88 Stat. 1946; Oct. 1, 1987.)

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Paul R. Kiesel is a partner with Kiesel, Boucher & Larson, LLP, Beverly Hills, California. His practice is devoted to the representation of consumers in personal injury, products liability, class action, construction defect and toxic tort litigation. After serving on the Board of Governors for the California and Los Angeles Trial Lawyers Association (now the Consumer Attorneys Association of California and Los Angeles), he has been elected an Emeritus Board Member of both organizations. Mr. Kiesel has been recognized as one of the top 50 trial lawyers by the Los Angeles Business Journal and by California Law Business as one of the 100 most influential attorneys in the State of California. He writes a monthly technology column for the Los Angeles Daily Journal and is a frequent presenter at continuing legal education programs. Mr. Kiesel is a member of the California Discovery Subcommittee for revision of California discovery rules and statutes relating to electronic discovery and electronically stored information. This committee drafted the Judicial Council's electronic discovery proposal analyzed in this commentary.

Steve Williams is a partner with Cotchett, Pitre & McCarthy, Burlingame, California. He practices exclusively in the fields of litigation, trial, and client counseling. He has represented clients including Chief Justice of California Ronald George, the California Judicial Council, the California State Teachers' Retirement System, the Regents of the University of California, Consumers Union of United States, Inc., United Farm Workers, Dolores Huerta, and E. & J. Gallo Winery. He worked with the Consumer Attorneys of California as member of California Discovery Subcommittee for revision of California discovery rules and statutes relating to electronic discovery and electronically stored information, 2007-2008, and gives yearly lectures to CAOC on the subject of civil discovery in California. He is a board member of Public Justice and of Community Gatepath, an organization dedicated to serving the needs of developmentally disabled children and adults.

Justin T. Berger, a principal at Cotchett, Pitre & McCarthy, and Mark A. Grafilo and Victor Luscap, electronic discovery specialists at the firm, provided key input in the preparation of this article.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

46 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Rabiej on the Options When Little or No ESI is Produced in Discovery

2009 Emerging Issues 3808

John K. Rabiej on the Requesting Party's Options When Little or No ESI is Produced in Discovery

By John K. Rabiej

June 18, 2009

SUMMARY: When faced with a seemingly inadequate response to a discovery request that produces little or no ESI, a party is often hard pressed to substantiate its suspicions that relevant ESI was actually withheld or destroyed. This Emerging Issues Analysis sets out some of the criteria that the courts rely on to handle these vexing disputes.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: John K. Rabiej on the Requesting Party's Options When Little or No ESI is Produced in Discovery

Producing Little or No ESI in Response to Discovery Request

A spate of recent cases address recurring ESI discovery disputes that involve a common fact pattern. In response to a request for all information relevant to a particular issue, a party produces little or no electronically stored information (ESI) even though it maintains a huge volume of electronic records. The responding party defends its production by asserting that its search for relevant ESI was thorough, and that no ESI was found simply because none exists. The requesting party is suspicious that the search was not adequately performed or that ESI was destroyed or withheld. It files a motion asking the court to compel the responding party to conduct another search or impose an appropriate sanction. The developing case law provides guidance to practitioners on the criteria courts rely on to handle such vexing disputes.

When a party produces little or no ESI in response to a discovery request, the opposing party typically files a motion objecting. Often the objection is based solely on a general suspicion that is grounded in common experience that some ESI, especially email messages, had to exist relevant to the pertinent discovery request. In such cases, the party typically offers no direct evidence showing that the opposing party deleted or withheld specific relevant ESI. Instead, the party contends that the failure to produce ESI must have been caused either by the opposing party's deletion of relevant ESI, often as a result of an auto delete program, or the party's failure to search all ESI sources thoroughly.

Objections by the Requesting Party

The requesting party in each of the following cases did not substantiate with any evidence its conclusory allegation that the responding party failed to conduct a thorough search or that specific relevant ESI was destroyed or withheld.

The ruling in each case is the same.

In Superior Prod. P'ship v. Gordon Auto Body Parts Co., Ltd., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 25890, at *5-8 (S.D. Ohio, Mar. 12, 2009), the defendant acknowledged that he did not search several sources of ESI because he believed that no relevant ESI was located there. And at the same time, the defendant did not place a specific litigation hold on the information maintained by its employees. Consequently, ESI was being routinely deleted during the litigation. The plaintiff claimed that the defendant's inadequate searching was the reason why no relevant ESI was produced, but the plaintiff failed to identify the specific missing ESI.

In Bianco v. GMAC Mortgage Corp., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84950, at *3 (E.D. Pa. Oct. 22, 2008), the plaintiff asserted that the defendant failed to produce a specific ESI document, a contingency plan that listed the positions in the company's legal department that would be eliminated in an effort to reduce costs. One of the defendant's employees admitted during a deposition that he had drafted the contingency plan on his company's laptop computer. Yet despite repeated requests for the contingency plan, the defendant failed to produce it, asserting that it had performed an extensive search of the employee's laptop computer and that it had produced all relevant information. The plaintiff did not provide any evidence that the defendant engaged in discovery misconduct.

In Ford Motor Co. v. Edgewood Prop., Inc., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42001, at *22-25 (D.N.J. May 19, 2009), the defendant asserted that there was a noticeable absence of documents in Ford's production related to key decisions critical to the litigation. The defendant requested the court to compel the plaintiff to run a narrowly tailored key word search on the plaintiff's ESI records to confirm the adequacy of the plaintiff's search. The defendant did not provide any evidence that Ford intentionally or negligently withheld ESI.

In Phillips v. Potter, Postmaster Gen., U.S. Postal Serv., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40550, at *15-16 (W.D. Pa. May 14, 2009), the plaintiff asserted that the report of a co-worker to a manager that the plaintiff had been harassed and was requesting the alleged offender to stop was memorialized in an email that the manager had shown to the co-worker and presumably forwarded to the alleged offender. The email, however, was not produced in discovery. The defendant admitted that it failed to place a timely litigation hold on relevant ESI and that ESI was deleted in accordance with an automatic deletion system. Notwithstanding the admission of evidence of a declaration by the co-worker that he had seen the email in question, no email was produced. The plaintiff did not provide any evidence that the email was sent or later destroyed, though the defendant admitted that he failed to place a litigation hold.

Conclusory Allegations Insufficient

The result in each of the above cases was the same. Though sympathetic to the requesting party and its claim that the responding party did not produce all responsive ESI or that it failed to meet its preservation obligations and deleted evidence, the court in each case denied relief. Courts consistently have held that a party's conclusory allegations that the only explanation for the non-production of relevant ESI is that the responding party destroyed or withheld it is insufficient to overcome an opposing party's good faith assertion that, after searching the records, relevant ESI does not exist. Ford Motor Co., at *24-25. A party's good faith assertion that it had searched its records is also sufficient to withstand an opposing party's conclusory allegations that it is unable or unwilling to search for the requested information or that it is withholding the requested ESI. Bianco, at *5. The courts denied relief in these cases despite recognizing that in some situations no litigation hold was in place or an auto-delete program was not suspended, resulting in the deletion of ESI.

Faced with a good faith declaration that a party has conducted a diligent search of ESI on the one hand and a conclusory allegation that the party's efforts were inadequate or that relevant ESI is missing on the other hand, courts have placed the burden on the requesting party to identify the specific missing ESI and submit some evidence showing that relevant ESI had been destroyed or withheld. Phillips, at *16. Of course, a showing that the responding party acted in bad faith in failing to conduct a thorough search or intentionally deleted or intentionally withheld relevant ESI may itself be sufficient to sanction the party.

Not knowing the extent or the thoroughness of the search nor having direct access to the ESI, it is often difficult for a requesting party to substantiate its claims that the responding party destroyed or withheld relevant ESI. This holds true even if the opposing party acknowledges that ESI was being deleted during the litigation. Yet a party who suspects that not all relevant ESI has been produced is not without recourse. In the first instance, a party should depose the opposing party's witnesses who have knowledge in these areas, as noted in Ford Motor Co. at *26. The deposition of the responding party, including any of its employees, may reveal that not all sources of ESI were searched or that specific relevant ESI was deleted. Often such direct evidence is sufficient for relief and in many cases that ends the matter, as discussed below.

Direct Evidence

A party's acknowledgment in a deposition that specific relevant ESI was destroyed or withheld is usually sufficient to refute the responding party's assertion that it had conducted a diligent search. Under these circumstances, the responding party may be sanctioned, or the court may require the party to conduct a more thorough search. In Canon U.S.A., Inc. v. S.A.M., Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47712, at *5 (E.D. La. June 20, 2008), the defendant acknowledged during his deposition that he had not searched all sources of ESI, including a server, because he was unable to access the server. The defendant's admission was sufficient for the court to order the defendant to hire a forensic expert at defendant's expense to search the server. In Surplus Source Group, LLC v. Mid America Engine, Inc., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS, at *5 (E.D. Tex. Apr. 8, 2009), the defendants had assisted the plaintiff in crafting a set of key words to search the defendant's database, but ESI critical to the resolution of material issues to the case remained missing. The court ordered the defendant to search the ESI again based on the defendant's admission that the initial search was inadequate. In an earlier case, the court in Mosaid Tech. Inc. v. Samsung Elec. Co., Ltd., 348 F. Supp. 2d 332, 336 (D.N.J. 2004) ruled that the defendant's failure to implement an effective litigation hold and suspend the automatic deletion system resulted in the non-production of any relevant ESI. An affidavit of the defendant's memory designer substantiated the allegations that email communications were extensively used within Samsung and that the subject matter of the litigation was often discussed in those emails. The party was sanctioned for failure to produce relevant ESI.

Circumstantial Evidence May Be Sufficient

In many cases when little or no ESI has been produced, however, direct evidence is not available to show that the responding party deliberately destroyed or withheld specific relevant ESI. Court rulings recognize that circumstantial evidence often can provide the only means to show that relevant ESI has been deleted or withheld. The standard was stated in Gates Rubber Co. v. Bando Chem. Indus., 167 F.R.D. 90, 115 (D. Colo. 1996) when the court said that sanctions are appropriate when something is not produced or disappears which is known to exist, which ought to exist, or which may reasonably be inferred to exist. In asserting such a claim, a party must be able to identify the purportedly missing ESI with some specificity, though the identification need not be exact. It is not incumbent upon the plaintiff to show that specific documents were lost. It would be enough to demonstrate that certain types of relevant documents existed and that they were necessarily destroyed by the operation of the autodelete function...or by other features of its routine document retention program. Treppel v. Biovail Corp., 233 F.R.D. 363, 372 (S.D.N.Y. 2006).

The court in Superior Prod. P'ship v. Gordon Auto Body Parts Co., Ltd., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 25890, at *8 (S.D. Ohio, Mar. 12, 2009), gives two helpful examples of the types of circumstantial evidence that may be used to overcome a party's assertion that no relevant ESI exists. A showing that selected groups of documents were retained from a certain point in time, and not beyond, can raise the inference that the same documents did exist for earlier time periods but have simply been deleted. The record-keeping practices of other companies engaged in similar business, which show that certain documents that the responding party had not produced are routinely retained by similarly situated companies, provides another example of adequate circumstantial evidence. Such circumstantial evidence was presented in Adams & Assoc., L.L.C. v. Dell, Inc., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26964, at *43 (D. Utah Mar. 30, 2009). In this patent infringement case, the plaintiff listed a number of documents that every company doing business similar to the defendant's would be expected to retain, including test programs' source code, motherboard testing results, and communications with suppliers and design experts. None of these documents was produced in response to the plaintiff's discovery request.

The court sanctioned the defendant for its failure to produce any of these ESI documents.

Another example of circumstantial evidence is provided in Plunk v. Vill. of Elwood, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42952, at *40-41 (N.D. Ill. May 20, 2009). The court ruled that plaintiff's evidence showing that several of the defendant's emails were missing from relevant email chains overcame the defendant's claim that the dearth of ESI is simply because there were few e-mails ... that were responsive to discovery requests. Though the circumstantial evidence was insufficient to show that relevant ESI was deleted intentionally and justify a default judgment, the court ruled that it was sufficient to give an adverse inference jury instruction.

Best Practices

Unless a party can show that a search was performed in bad faith or that specific relevant ESI was deliberately destroyed or withheld improperly, it must provide some evidence that the responding party destroyed or withheld specific relevant ESI. Conclusory allegations are insufficient. Under these circumstances, a party can substantiate its allegation with circumstantial evidence showing that specific relevant ESI was destroyed or withheld. Such circumstantial evidence may be sufficient to overcome a responding party's assertion that it conducted a thorough ESI search. Best practices recommend that a practitioner depose witnesses of the opposing party for information explaining the missing ESI, specify the missing ESI or at least the category of ESI documents missing, review the record for any direct or indirect references to the purportedly missing ESI, indicate how the responding party deleted or failed to produce the specific relevant ESI, and compare the record-keeping practices of other companies doing similar business.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

47 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, J. T. Westermeier. All Rights Reserved.

Westermeier on Recent Ethics Opinion on Metadata Support New Best Practice

2009 Emerging Issues 3791

Westermeier on Recent Ethics Opinion on Metadata Support New Best Practice

By J. T. Westermeier

June 16, 2009

SUMMARY: The American Bar Association, a number of State Bars and the D.C. Bar have issued legal ethics opinions regarding metadata that is embedded in electronic documents that are transmitted and received by attorneys. What affect do these legal ethics opinions have on document retention policies? This important issue is analyzed by J. ("Jay") T. Westermeier, of counsel at Finnegan, Henderson, Farabow, Garrett & Dunner, LLP.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: The American Bar Association n1, a number of State Bars n2 and the D.C. Bar n3 have issued legal ethics opinions regarding metadata that is embedded in electronic documents that are transmitted and received by attorneys. What affect do these legal ethics opinions have on document retention policies?

In this article we argue that in most circumstances draft electronic documents with metadata embedded in them should be purged after the matter for which the documents were created has been completed and recommend that companies adopt a post-transaction due diligence process to purge files of draft documents containing metadata. Below we will discuss our rationale for adopting this policy.

Definition of Metadata

Metadata is defined simply as data about data. DC Bar Ethics Opinion 341 refers to metadata as "electronically stored information, typically not visible from the face of the document as printed out or as initially shown on the computer screen, but which is embedded in the software and retrievable by various means." n4 This DC Bar Ethics Opinion further notes that "metadata provides information regarding the creation or modification of a document and sometimes includes comments by persons participating in the creation or modification of the document." n5 Though metadata is often of little or no interest, as the D.C. Bar Ethics Opinion observes, "in some instances it may reveal significant information." n6

Legal Ethics Opinions

Most (but not all) of the legal ethics opinions issued regarding the obligations of lawyers regarding the treatment of electronic documents with metadata embedded impose upon the sending lawyer an obligation to exercise reasonable care when transmitting electronic documents to ensure that the lawyer does not disclose his or her client's secrets and confidences. n7 These ethics opinions take the position that the lawyers duty respecting confidentiality extends to metadata. As the D.C. Bar Ethics Opinion provides, a lawyers obligation to use reasonable steps to use available technical means to remove such metadata before sending the document. n8 Most of the ethics legal opinions require the sending lawyer to use reasonable care to avoid transmitting metadata to the other party's lawyer inadvertently. n9 We believe removal of metadata documents remaining in a company's files once they are no longer needed is consistent with the legal obligation imposed upon the sending lawyer given the risks relating to discovery of these documents in the event of litigation or compliance with a subpoena.

Distinguishing Between the Kind of Electronic Documents

Several of the Bars in their metadata ethics opinions have recognized a distinction between electronic documents provided in discovery or pursuant to a subpoena from those electronic documents voluntarily provided by opposing counsel in a transaction or other non-contentious matter. n10 The policy recommended in this article seeks to avoid having to deal with electronic documents containing metadata in discovery or subpoena compliance.

With respect to discovery and subpoena compliance additional rules relating to electronic discovery beyond the ethics rules apply to metadata provided in discovery or pursuant to a subpoena. n11 Under these rules parties are required to consult at the outset of a case about the nature of pertinent electronic documents they maintain, including specific discussions concerning the production of documents containing metadata and whether the sending party wishes to assert a claim of privilege as to some or all of the metadata. n12 The review of the metadata in each document to determine whether to assert privilege as to specific metadata information is likely to be time-consuming and costly.

Metadata has been shown in some cases to be probative evidence in litigation. n13 Documents containing metadata are different versions of the document without metadata. Each version is subject to production in discovery or pursuant to a subpoena. Metadata may also result in additional questions during depositions or at trial. If the metadata is "scrubbed" from documents during discovery or in connection with complying with a subpoena the other party may compel production of the metadata and the "scrubbing" party may be found to have destroyed evidence. Since it is impermissible to alter electronic evidence that constitute tangible evidence, the removal of metadata may be prohibited as well. The alteration or destruction of evidence may result in discovery sanctions in some circumstances.

There are very compelling reasons for not maintaining intermediate copies of electronic documents that contain metadata. There is a risk that these documents will be subject to be produced in discovery or pursuant to a subpoena, and may, in such circumstances, require an extensive review of the metadata to determine whether attorney-client privilege, confidentiality or other issues relating to the metadata need to be asserted. Maintaining metadata documents once they are no longer needed is fraught with significant risks and may prove extremely costly. Metadata documents should be purged from company files once they are no longer needed.

Recommended Document Retention Policy

Companies should remove electronic documents containing metadata after the documents containing metadata are no longer needed. Given the potential rises and added costs relating to electronic discovery and subpoena compliance if metadata documents are involved document retention policies should include purging files of any metadata documents as soon as possible once they are no longer needed. The policy should be implemented and applied on a routine and consistent basis before any duty to preserve evidence has been triggered.

Return to Text

n1 American Bar Association Standing Committee on Ethics and Professional Responsibility, Formal

Opinion 06-442; Formal Opinion 05-437.

n2 See, e.g., Alabama State Bar Office of General Counsel, Formal Opinion 2007-02; State Bar of Arizona Ethics Committee, Ethics Opinion 07-03; Colorado Bar Association Ethics Committee, Ethics Opinion 119; The Florida Bar Ethics Department, Ethics Opinion 06-02; Main Board of Overseers of the Bar Professional Ethics Commission, Opinion #196; Maryland State Bar Association Committee on Ethics, Ethics Docket No. 2007-09; New Hampshire Bar Association, Ethics Committee Opinion 2008-2009/4; New York State Bar Association -- Committee on Professional Ethics, Opinion 749, 782; Association of the Bar of the City of New York -- Committee on Professional and Judicial Ethics, Formal Opinion 2003-04.

n3 D.C. Bar Legal Ethics Committee, D.C. Bar Opinion 341 (September 2007).

n4 Id. page 1.

n5 Id.

n6 Id.

n7 Id.

n8 Id.

n9 See, e.g., Alabama State Bar Office of General Counsel, Formal Opinion 2007-02; State Bar of Arizona Ethics Committee, Ethics Opinion 07-03; Colorado Bar Association Ethics Committee, Ethics Opinion 119; The Florida Bar Ethics Department, Ethics Opinion 06-02; Main Board of Overseers of the Bar Professional Ethics Commission, Opinion #196; Maryland State Bar Association Committee on Ethics, Ethics Docket No. 2007-09; New Hampshire Bar Association, Ethics Committee Opinion 2008-2009/4; New York State Bar Association -- Committee on Professional Ethics, Opinion 749, 782; Association of the Bar of the City of New York -- Committee on Professional and Judicial Ethics, Formal Opinion 2003-04.

n10 See, e.g., D.C. Bar Ethics Opinion 341; Florida Bar Opinion 06-2; Alabama State Bar, Office of General Counsel, Opinion No. RO-2007-02

n11 In D.C. Bar Ethics Opinion 341 refers to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure that now provide steps to identify and address issues related to electronic discovery.

n12 See D.C. Bar Ethics Opinion 341 at p. 3.

n13 D.C. Bar Ethics Opinion 341 refers to Williams v. Spring/United Management, 230 F.R.D. 640 (D. Kan. 2005), as an example of how metadata may be considered probative evidence in litigation. The defendant had "scrubbed" the metadata from spreadsheets before producing them. The court ruled that since the metadata could be relevant the defendants had to provide the metadata to the plaintiffs.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

J. ("Jay") T. Westermeier is of counsel at Finnegan, Henderson, Farabow, Garrett & Dunner, LLP resident in the firm's Reston, Virginia office. He is past president of the International Technology Law Association, Life Fellow of the American Bar Foundation, 2001 Burton Award recipient for legal excellence, and only lawyer to receive the Distinguished Information Sciences Award from the Association of Information Technology Professionals. He is listed on Best Lawyers in America (2003-2009), Intellectual Asset Magazine's "IAM 250 -- World's Leading IP Strategists" and Who's Who International of Internet and e-commerce Lawyers.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

48 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Judith A. McMorrow on Attorney Conduct and the SEC

2009 Emerging Issues 3724

Judith A. McMorrow on Attorney Conduct and the Securities and Exchange Commission

By Judith A. McMorrow

June 9, 2009

SUMMARY: This Emerging Issues Analysis explores professional responsibility issues that arise for attorneys practicing before the Securities and Exchange Commission. The Emerging Issues Analysis addresses the SEC Rules of Practice, the changes implemented from the Sarbanes-Oxley legislation, and the actions taken by the Commission in developing norms of professional conduct for attorneys.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Rule 102(e)(1) Allows SEC to Suspend Lawyers Who Lack Requisite Qualifications, Character or Integrity, Engage in Unethical or Improper Professional Conduct, or Willfully Violate Securities Laws. Rule 102(e)(1) of the Security Exchange Commission's Rules of Practice authorizes the Commission to censure or suspend from practicing before it any person who, after notice and a hearing, it has found does not possess the requisite qualifications to represent others,' is lacking in character or integrity' or has engaged in unethical or improper professional conduct,' or who has willfully violated, or willfully aided and abetted the violation of any provision of the Federal securities laws or the rules and regulations thereunder.' n1 The terms "requisite qualifications," "character," and "integrity" are not defined or explained under Rule 102(e). The Commission has not recently relied on these provisions as the basis for a Rule 102(e) proceeding against attorneys. Terms similar to these, such as conduct unbecoming a member of the bar' have been applied in other attorney conduct proceedings. The Commission may avoid using these general terms because of concern about potential constitutional challenges. In addition, the more targeted prohibitions provide ample authority for the Commission to address the conduct of greatest concern.

The Commission regulations provide specific guidance to accountants on what constitutes improper professional conduct,' but prior to the passage of Sarbanes-Oxley had provided little guidance for attorneys on the meaning of this phrase. n2

Suspension of lawyers under Rule 102(e) is often the result of a settlement in which the attorney is accused of violating or aiding and abetting violations of the securities laws and agrees to be suspended from practicing before the Commission. n3 The scope of this provision is enhanced by the Commission's view that willful' means only that the respondent intentionally committed the act that was found to have violated the securities laws. n4

Rule 102(e)(2) Supports Reciprocal Discipline. The Commission may also suspend from practicing before it any attorney who has been suspended or disbarred by a court of the United States or of any State or any person who has been convicted of a felony or a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude. n5 This is often referred to as reciprocal discipline and provides a basis to automatically suspend or disbar an attorney who, after due process, has been found to have engaged in misconduct in another forum. For example, lawyers have been disbarred under: SEC Rule 102(e)(2) for wire fraud convictions, n6 conspiracy to engage in securities fraud, obstruction of justice, and perjury, n7 and suspended after a state bar disciplined the lawyer for misappropriation of client funds. n8

Rule 102(e)(3) Allows SEC to Temporarily Suspend an Attorney. The Commission may also temporarily suspend an attorney from practicing before it, without a preliminary hearing, when the attorney has been permanently enjoined by any court of competent jurisdiction, by reason of his or her misconduct in an action brought by the Commission, from violating or aiding and abetting the violation of any provision of the Federal securities laws or of the rules and regulations thereunder;' or found by any court of competent jurisdiction in an action brought by the Commission to which he or she is a party or found by the Commission in any administrative proceeding to which he or she is a party to have violated (unless the violation was found not to have been willful) or aided and abetted the violation of any provision of the Federal securities laws or of the rules and regulations thereunder.' n9 For example, the Commission has suspended attorneys from practicing before it as a result of an offer of settlement when the attorneys have already been enjoined by a court from violating the securities laws. n10

Courts and SEC Consistently Uphold Commission's Authority to Regulate Attorneys. The Commission's Rules of Practice have asserted authority to regulate attorneys and agents who appear before the SEC since soon after the formation of the agency. n11 The SEC examined the history of Rule 102(e) and the SEC's authority to issue it in its seminal 1981 opinion of Carter and Johnson and concluded that it had full authority to regulate attorney conduct before the SEC. n12 Courts have also confirmed that the SEC has authority to regulate the conduct of professionals who appear before it, and that Rule 102(e) and its predecessor are a valid exercise of that authority. n13

While courts and the SEC have consistently argued that the Commission has power to discipline attorneys, there were some opposing views prior to the passage of Sarbanes-Oxley. One SEC Commissioner dissented from disciplinary proceedings against an attorney arguing that Rule 102(e) exceeded the agency's rulemaking authority, and as a policy matter was a bad idea. n14 Any doubt about the SEC's authority to regulate attorneys was laid to rest with the passage of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which codified Rule 102 and made it part of the Exchange Act, giving it the status of statutory law. n15

Sarbanes-Oxley Act Clarified Scope and Extent of SEC's Power to Regulate Attorneys. Congress became actively involved in regulating corporate counsel with the passage of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act (known as SOX). n16 In addition to establishing specific duties for corporate lawyers, § 307 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act directed the Securities and Exchange Commission to set minimum standards of professional conduct for attorneys who appear before it. n17

SOX required the SEC to include a protocol for reporting material violations of the securities laws. With this legislation Congress has expanded both the congressional and executive role in regulating attorney conduct. Commentators have described this as expanding the gatekeeper role" of attorneys practicing before the SEC. n18

In compliance with the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, the SEC created rules of professional conduct for attorneys who appear and practice before it on behalf of issuers. n19 The SEC initially proposed more expansive regulations, which sparked significant debate within the legal community because of an initial proposal to require attorneys to report client misconduct to the SEC. n20 The SEC eventually backed off the more expansive proposal and imposed the obligations discussed below.

Expansive Definition of Practicing Before SEC. The SEC asserts authority to regulate the conduct of attorneys who appear and practice before the SEC. For purposes of the SEC's authority to regulate attorneys generally, the term practicing before the Commission' is expansively defined in Rule 102(f): n21

(f) Practice defined. For the purposes of these Rules of Practice, practicing before the Commission shall include, but shall not be limited to:

(1) Transacting any business with the Commission; and

(2) The preparation of any statement, opinion or other paper by any attorney, accountant, engineer or other professional or expert, filed with the Commission in any registration statement, notification, application, report or other document with the consent of such attorney, accountant, engineer or other professional or expert.

For purposes of the duty to respond to client misconduct, as set out in 17 C.F.R. § 205, the definition of practicing before the SEC is both more expansive and narrower.

Attorneys Have Obligation Not to Violate Securities Laws or Aid and Abet Violations

Attorneys Have an Obligation Not to Violate the Securities Laws. Attorneys, like all other individuals, must not violate the securities laws, either directly or indirectly. When they function as business actors and make decisions to proceed with conduct that violates the securities laws, they are subject to sanction by the Commission in the same way that a company CEO would be sanctioned. n22 When lawyers knowingly provide legal services to violate the securities laws, they can also be held responsible as a primary wrongdoer. For example, knowingly providing an opinion letter or disclosure document with a misstatement of fact can subject the attorney to liability under the securities laws. n23

In-House Counsel Who Function as Both Legal and Business Advisor Face Particular Challenges. In-house counsel often serve as both business and legal advisor to the corporate client. Consequently, the general counsel may be characterized as a decision-maker and held responsible for any securities violations in the same way that any other corporate decision-maker would be responsible. n24

In re Carter and Johnson* Established Lawyer Responsibility. The SEC's seminal 1981 opinion in In re Carter and Johnson clarified the professional obligations of attorneys to avoid willful aiding and abetting in violations of the securities laws. n25 Carter and Johnson focused on lawyers engaged in an ongoing disclosure program of a corporate client. The Commission held that lawyers, like other actors, can be found liable by the Commission for aiding and abetting a violation of the federal securities law when: n26

1. There exists an independent securities law violation committed by some other party;
2. The aider and abettor knowingly and substantially assisted the conduct that constitutes the violation; and
3. The aider and abettor was aware or knew that his or her role was part of an activity that was improper or illegal.

In Carter and Johnson, the Commission found substantial assistance when a lawyer performs professional duties. n27 The Commission said explicitly that it will not distinguish between professional advice given orally or in writing. Carter and Johnson concluded that a finding of willful aiding and abetting within the meaning of Rule 2(e)(1)(iii) requires a showing that respondents were aware or knew that their role was part of an activity that was improper or illegal.' n28 In Carter and Johnson, the Commission reversed an Administrative Law Judge finding of liability because the evidence did not show that the attorneys fully appreciated the materiality of the information they participated in distributing and did not have the requisite intent to aid the violations by their inaction. The Commission went on to analyze additional professional responsibilities' that the attorneys owed and concluded that when a lawyer learns that a client is about to violate the federal securities laws, the attorney must make all efforts within reason to persuade his client to avoid or terminate proposed illegal action. Such efforts could include, where appropriate, notification of the board of directors of a corporate client.' n29 The Commission was not aggressive in applying the Carter and Johnson standard until it was strengthened and codified through the passage of SOX.

The legal basis for aiding and abetting liability was challenged in Central Bank of Denver v. First Interstate Bank of Denver in 1994 when the Supreme Court held that there was no private civil liability for aiders and abettors of securities law violations and in the process called into question the SEC's right to pursue such actions. n30 Following the Supreme Court's decision, Congress clarified the SEC's ability to pursue aiders and abettors in all enforcement actions. n31 Even with this change, earlier jurisprudence on aiding and abetting developed in private right of action cases may still have force. This is important to note because the circuits do not always agree on the conditions for aiding and abetting liability. n32 As a practical matter, most Commission cases pursuing a lawyer on an aiding and abetting theory do not reach the courts.

Examples of Aiding and Abetting. Lawyers can be responsible for aiding and abetting by failing to provide the client with balanced advice that identifies contrary positions taken by the Commission. n33 Attorneys have also been held liable by the Commission as aiders and abettors where they have clearly provided erroneous advice and should have known better. n34

Lawyers Are Not Liable for Aiding and Abetting Because of Mere Negligence. Lawyers are not liable for aiding and abetting merely because the lawyer's advice, when followed by the client, is ultimately determined to be wrong. n35 The Commission has also stated that it will not pursue attorneys merely for providing negligent legal advice. n36

That being said, lawyers should proceed with caution. Recklessness is a fairly elastic concept. Deliberate ignorance could support a finding of professional misconduct for aiding and abetting a violation of the securities laws. n37 Silence or inaction when the lawyer has a duty to act can also support a finding of aiding and abetting. n38 In addition, lawyers could be liable for malpractice, even if the Commission did not pursue the lawyer.

Sarbanes-Oxley Imposes Additional Obligations to Respond to Material Violations of Securities Laws

Lawyer Owes Primary Obligation to Issuer, Not to Individual Officer or Director. With the passage of Section 307 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, the Commission was given much stronger authority to issue regulations governing attorney conduct. The thrust of the new Commission rules is that an attorney appearing before the Commission in the representation of an issuer owes professional and ethical duties to the issuer as an organization, not to any individual officer, director or employee. n39 This obligation is consistent with the well-established obligations under the rules of professional conduct that govern most lawyers. A continuing challenge for corporate attorneys is keeping the interests of the corporation as an entity dominant when the individual corporate agent is the person with whom the lawyer interacts. n40

Lawyer Must Act When There Is Evidence of Material Violation by Officer, Director, Employee or Agent of Issuer. Section 307 functions as a mandate to the Commission to establish professional norms for attorneys appearing and practicing before the Commission. Section 307, now codified at 15 U.S.C. § 7245, states: n41

§ 7245. Rules of professional responsibility for attorneys

Not later than 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act [enacted July 30, 2002], the Commission shall issue rules, in the public interest and for the protection of investors, setting forth minimum standards of professional conduct for attorneys appearing and practicing before the Commission in any way in the representation of issuers, including a rule--

(1) requiring an attorney to report evidence of a material violation of securities law or breach of fiduciary duty or similar violation by the company or any agent thereof, to the chief legal counsel or the chief executive officer of the company (or the equivalent thereof); and

(2) if the counsel or officer does not appropriately respond to the evidence (adopting, as necessary, appropriate remedial measures or sanctions with respect to the violation), requiring the attorney to report the evidence to the audit committee of the board of directors of the issuer or to another committee of the board of directors comprised solely of directors not employed directly or indirectly by the issuer, or to the board of directors.

The Commission's rules of professional conduct promulgated pursuant to Sarbanes-Oxley, codified at 17 C.F.R. § 205, set out in greater detail the course of action a lawyer who appears or practices before the Commission must take when confronted with evidence of a material violation of the securities laws.

Appearing or Practicing Before the Commission Defined. The duty to respond to a material violation of the securities laws under § 205 applies to anyone who is appearing or practicing' before the Commission. The definition of this phrase is somewhat different than the definition used for general sanctioning power under § 201. Appearing and practicing encompasses transacting business with the Commission, including communications n42 and representing an issuer in connection with a Commission action. n43 Appearing and practicing also includes providing advice with respect to the securities laws or Commission rules and regulations regarding any document the attorney has notice will be submitted to the Commission or incorporated into any document that will be filed, n44 or advising an issuer about whether information is required to be submitted. n45 Appearing or practicing before the Commission only includes the above activities that are part of providing legal services to an issuer with whom the attorney has an attorney-client relationship. n46 The duty to respond to a material violation of the securities laws does not include the attorney who is a non-appearing foreign attorney. n47 To eliminate any doubt about the expansiveness of the definition, the regulations go on to state that a lawyer is deemed to represent an issuer if the lawyer provides legal services, even if not employed or retained by the issuer. n48 In other words, a lawyer who has notice that the lawyer's work product will be incorporated into a document filed or submitted with the Commission will be deemed to be practicing before the Commission and come within the scope of § 205 obligations.

Issuer Defined. The term issuer' under § 205 is defined as having the same meaning as it has in the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. § 78c), and includes publicly traded companies, the people who work for those companies, and anyone who files auditing reports for those companies. n49

Evidence of Material Violation Incorporates Reasonableness Standard. The Commission defines evidence of a material violation as credible evidence, based upon which it would be unreasonable, under the circumstances, for a prudent and competent attorney not to conclude that it is reasonably likely that a material violation has occurred, is ongoing, or is about to occur.' n50 Reasonableness is conduct that would not be unreasonable for a prudent and competent attorney.' n51 Reasonably believes means that an attorney believes the matter in question and that the circumstances are such that the belief is not unreasonable.' n52 The comments accompanying the regulations express the Commission's desire to incorporate an objective standard, with the hopes of crafting a workable rule while recognizing that there is a range of conduct in which an attorney may engage without being unreasonable. n53

Definition of Material Violation. The definition of material violation' is linked to substantive law. Section 205.2(i) states that material violation means a material violation of an applicable United States federal or state securities law, a material breach of fiduciary duty arising under United States federal or state law, or a similar material violation of any United States federal or state law.' n54 A duty to report is not triggered by a material violation of foreign laws. n55 The Commission believed it was unnecessary to define the word "material" since it has a well-established meaning under federal securities laws. n56 In the context of disclosure, the Supreme Court has adopted an objective standard to define materiality as facts that a reasonable person would recognize as important. n57

Reporting to Qualified Legal Compliance Committee When Confronted With Material Violation. An attorney who becomes aware of evidence of a material violation by the issuer or by any officer, director, employee, or agent of the issuer' has an affirmative duty to report evidence of a material violation to either the company's chief legal officer or to both the chief legal officer and the chief executive officer (or their equivalents). n58 Alternatively, the rule allows the lawyer to report the problem directly to the corporation's qualified legal compliance committee (QLCC), if the company has established one prior to the report of a material violation. n59 Under the regulations, at least one member of the QLCC has to be from the company's audit committee and two or more members have to be on the board of directors, but not employed either directly or indirectly by the company, and not an interested person' within the meaning of the Investment Company Act of 1940. n60 The QLCC must also have written procedures and been duly established by the Board of Directors, with the authority and responsibility to respond as designated in the regulations. n61 A lawyer who takes this route of reporting directly to a qualified legal compliance committee, if available, will have satisfied his or her responsibilities under the Act and will not have to follow up on the committee's response. n62

Despite the benefit that a qualified legal compliance committee would have for a reporting attorney, relatively few companies have actually taken advantage of a QLCC. n63 Issuers may shy away from QLCCs because of concern about balkanization of boards, corporate liability or excluding involvement of the chief legal officer. n64

Chief Legal Officer Has Duty to Investigate and Take Reasonable Steps When Confronted With Evidence of Material Violation. If an attorney reports to the chief legal officer, it is the chief legal officer's responsibility to investigate whether a material violation has occurred, is ongoing, or is about to occur. The chief financial officer must then take all reasonable steps to cause the company to adopt an appropriate response, and inform the reporting lawyer of this action. n65 If the chief legal officer determines that the evidence of the material violation is groundless, then he or she shall notify the reporting attorney and advise the reporting attorney of the basis for such determination.' n66 Alternatively, instead of investigating the evidence of a material violation, the chief legal officer is allowed to refer the report to a qualified legal compliance committee if the company has established one prior to the report of the material violation. n67

Obligations of Subordinate and Supervising Attorneys. An attorney who supervises or directs another attorney is a supervisory attorney' within the meaning of § 205. An issuer's chief legal officer is automatically a supervisory attorney within the meaning of the act. n68 An attorney who is under the supervision or direction of another attorney is a subordinate attorney.' n69

A subordinate attorney is responsible for complying with § 205 even if acting under the direction or supervision of another attorney. n70 A subordinate attorney complies with the reporting obligations if the attorney reports evidence of a material violation to his or her supervising attorney. n71 The regulations give some small protection to subordinate attorneys by stating that a subordinate attorney may' take the steps permitted or required by § 205.3(b) on mandatory reporting if the subordinate attorney reasonably believes that a supervisory attorney to whom he or she has reported evidence of a material violation has failed to comply' with the reporting requirements. n72 A supervisory attorney is required to make reasonable efforts' to ensure that a subordinate attorney conforms to § 205. n73 If a subordinate attorney appears and practices before the Commission, the supervisory attorney is also deemed to be appearing and practicing. n74

Reporting Attorney Has Ongoing Obligations. If the attorney who reported the evidence of a material violation believes that the chief legal counsel or the chief executive officer has not provided an appropriate response within a reasonable time, then the attorney shall' report the evidence of a material violation to: n75

- (1) The audit committee of the issuer's board of directors;
- (2) Another committee of the issuer's board of directors consisting solely of directors who are not employed, directly or indirectly, by the issuer and are not, in the case of a registered investment company, "interested persons"; or
- (3) The issuer's board of directors (if the issuer's board of directors has no committee consisting solely of directors who are not employed, directly or indirectly, by the issuer and are not, in the case of a registered investment company, interested persons').

The regulations list four exceptions to the obligation to report up the ladder. First, an attorney has no obligation to report up the ladder if he or she has been retained or directed by the chief legal officer to investigate evidence of a material violation and after reporting the results of this investigation to the chief legal officer either both the attorney and the chief legal officer reasonably believe there is no material violation, or the chief legal officer sends the report up the ladder. n76 A second exception exists when the attorney has been retained by the chief legal counsel to assert a colorable defense on behalf of the company in any investigation or judicial or administrative proceeding relating to such evidence of a material violation,' and the chief legal officer provides reasonable and timely reports of the progress and outcome of those proceedings to the appropriate persons within the company (board of directors, board committee, or a qualified legal compliance committee). n77 Third, an attorney will not have any obligation to report evidence of a material violation if the attorney was retained or directed by a qualified legal compliance committee to investigate evidence of a material violation. n78 Finally, an attorney who has been retained or directed by a qualified legal compliance committee to assert a defense on behalf of the company will also have no obligation to report up the ladder. n79

Sarbanes-Oxley Has Particular Impact on In-House Counsel. The regulations' definition of a supervisory attorney, coupled with its expansive definition of knowledge, has resulted in significant additional obligations imposed on in-house counsel. As one court noted, the § 205 regulations functionally mean that a general counsel has an affirmative duty to inspect the truthfulness of the SEC filings.' n80 Failure to meet that obligation can result in SEC sanctions. n81 It can also potentially subject the general counsel to liability under state corporate law and for malpractice. n82

Commission Allows, but Does Not Require, Attorneys to Report to Commission. The Commission regulations allow, but do not require, a lawyer to disclose confidential information related to the representation of the corporation to the Commission under certain circumstances. n83 Evidence of a material violation reported by an attorney may be used by an attorney in connection with any investigation, proceeding, or litigation in which the attorney's compliance with the Commission rule is at issue.' n84 This provision is generally in alignment with the self-defense exceptions to the duty of confidentiality in the Rules of Professional Conduct as adopted in most jurisdictions. n85 A broader and more controversial provision is contained in 17 C.F.R. § 205.3(d)(2), which states that an attorney may reveal to the Commission confidential information related to the representation [of the issuer] to the extent the attorney reasonably believes necessary' to (1) prevent the company from committing a material violation that is likely to cause substantial injury to the financial interest or property' of the company or its investors; (2) to prevent the company from committing perjury or fraud upon the Commission in a SEC investigation or administrative proceeding; or (3) to rectify the consequences of a material violation by the company that caused, or may cause, substantial injury to the financial interest or property of the company or its investors in the furtherance of which the attorney's services were used.' n86 The initial Commission regulations would have imposed an mandatory obligation to report in the circumstances above, but after a sharp and critical response from the organized bar the Commission made what is called the reporting out' obligation permissive rather than mandatory. n87

Sanctions and Discipline for Violating § 205. Violation of the reporting obligations can subject the attorney to the penalties and remedies available for violation of the securities laws, including disciplinary actions under § 201. n88 The regulations invoke the Supremacy Clause by stating that [a]n attorney who complies in good faith with the provisions of this part shall not be subject to discipline or otherwise liable under inconsistent standards imposed by any state or other United States jurisdiction where the attorney is admitted or practices.' n89 The protections of this provision apply only to actions taken pursuant to the Securities Acts. n90

An attorney practicing in a foreign jurisdiction is not required to comply with the reporting obligations of § 205 to the extent that compliance is prohibited by applicable foreign law. n91 Violation of the requirements of § 205 does not create a private right of action against the offending attorney, law firm or issuer. n92

Interplay Between Rules of Professional Conduct and Commission Requirements

Commission Had Strong Influence on ABA Rules. The legal obligations established by the Commission had a strong influence on the professional obligations required by state bars. Six months after the passage of the Commission's new standards, the American Bar Association amended the Model Rules of Professional Conduct involving representing corporate clients (Rule 1.13) and confidentiality obligations (Rule 1.6). n93 Many states, in turn, have reviewed the changes and embraced them. As discussed in greater detail below, not all states have adopted the recommended changes, so lawyers must carefully review their own Rules of Professional Conduct to determine the scope of their duty under state law to maintain confidences and properly represent organizational clients. If a matter is also pending in federal court, federal court local rules, which may incorporate inconsistent state standards, will not be effective to the extent they are inconsistent with the Sarbanes-Oxley. n94

Model Rule 1.13, Organization as Client. Rule 1.13 clarified the professional obligation of lawyers when confronted with misconduct of a corporate agent. Before the amendment, Rule 1.13 stated that if a lawyer knew of a violation of a legal obligation then the lawyer shall proceed as is reasonably necessary in the best interest of the organization' but only mentioned referring the matter to a higher authority within the organization as one of the possible measures a lawyer could chose to take. n95 The revised Rule 1.13(b) states that unless the lawyer reasonably believes that it is not necessary in the best interest of the organization to do so, the lawyer shall refer the matter to higher authority in the organization, including, if warranted by the circumstances to the highest authority that can act on behalf of the organization as determined by applicable law.' n96

Rule 1.13 was also modified to allow an attorney to disclose confidential information about the corporate client. Under the earlier rule, a lawyer confronted with a violation of the law had to take a far more conservative approach if the company did not agree to conform to the law, with resignation as the only listed option. Under the new Rule 1.13, if the highest authority able to act within the company refuses to address the problem in a timely manner then the lawyer may reveal information relating to the representation whether or not Rule 1.6 permits such disclosure, but only if and to the extent the lawyer reasonably believes necessary to prevent substantial injury to the organization.' n97

Model Rule 1.6, Confidentiality. New exceptions to a lawyer's duty of confidentiality were added to Model Rule 1.6 to address the challenges of corporate representation where financial injury is a common consequence of client misconduct. The Model Rules now allow, but do not require, a lawyer to reveal information relating to the representation of a client to the extent the lawyer reasonably believes necessary: n98

(2) to prevent the client from committing a crime or fraud that is reasonably certain to result in substantial injury to the financial interests or property of another and in furtherance of which the client has used or is using the lawyer's services;

(3) to prevent, mitigate or rectify substantial injury to the financial interests or property of another that is reasonably certain to result or has resulted from the client's commission of a crime or fraud in furtherance of which the client has used the lawyer's services.

Although these amendments have essentially aligned the Model Rules with the Commission's standards, not every state has followed the ABA's example. n99 In addition, Model Rule 1.6 only allows disclosure as to client crime or fraud in furtherance of which the client has used the lawyer's services.' The obligation to act under the SOX regulations is much broader and requires the lawyer to respond to material violations even if the lawyer's services were not used. The SOX regulations also permit, but do not require, the lawyer to disclose outside the corporation if necessary.

Many States Have Followed ABA Recommendations and Amended Their Rules of Conduct. Although a majority of jurisdictions use the ABA's Model Rules as the basis for their standards of professional conduct, many states altered the recommendations of the ABA when adopting the rules. n100 States also periodically review their Rules of Professional Conduct to determine whether to embrace suggested changes. n101 Because not every state has amended their rules relating to client confidentiality, there are still some cases where the Commission's rule would conflict with a lawyer's duty of confidentiality. Several jurisdictions would prohibit the disclosure of that type of information allowed under the Commission's rule. n102 For example, as of 2008 California's state rules would not allow an attorney to report out financial crimes since the exceptions to the duty of confidentiality in California only apply to information where the member reasonably believes the disclosure is necessary to prevent a criminal act that the member reasonably believes is likely to result in death of, or substantial bodily harm to, an individual.' n103

Resolving Conflicts Between Commission Requirements and State Rules of Professional Conduct. The course of action that the Commission standards allow has the potential to conflict with state codes of professional conduct, particularly if the state Rules have not embraced the ABA recommended changes. Under Fidelity Federal v. de la Cuesta, federal regulation preempts conflicting state law if the agency intended to preempt state law and the agency action was within the scope of its delegated authority. n104 The Commission regulations state that [w]here the standards of a state or other United States jurisdiction where an attorney is admitted or practices conflict with this part, this part shall govern,' indicating an intent to preempt conflicting state law. n105

Some commentators question whether there may still be irreconcilable conflicts. n106 There is a plausible question whether the Commission was acting within the scope of its delegated authority. Section 307 of Sarbanes-Oxley Act gave the Commission the authority to issue rules setting forth minimum standards of professional conduct' for attorneys appearing and practicing before it. n107 The remaining two paragraphs of Section 307 describe what later became the Commission's reporting up rule, but there is no further instructions detailing a reporting out rule. Some authors have argued that there is no evidence that Congress wanted the Commission to override state rules on client confidentiality and therefore a court should conclude that neither Section 307 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act nor the Part 205 Rules preempt state regulation of the attorney-client relationship and the prohibition of an attorney disclosing confidential information of a client without its consent.' n108

The question of whether the Commission's standards preempt contrary state codes of conduct has not been settled, but bar associations have offered advisory opinions. For example, the North Carolina State Bar Association agreed with the Commission and issued a formal ethics opinion saying the Rule 205 should be followed unless either the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals or the U.S. Supreme Court determines that the rule was not validly promulgated. n109 Other bars have concluded that the Commission rules do not preempt state ethics rules. n110

Commission Has Multiple Procedures for Disciplining Attorneys

Overview of Commission Actions Directed at Attorneys. The Commission has multiple procedures for disciplining attorneys for misconduct. Commission actions have been prosecuted as civil injunctive actions in federal district courts under section 20(b) of the Securities Act of 1933 and section 21(d) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, as administrative proceedings under Rule 102(e) of the SEC's Rules of Practice, and as administrative cease-and-desist proceedings. n111 In the two years after the passage of Sarbanes-Oxley, the SEC stepped up their scrutiny of lawyers in corporate fraud investigations and brought over 30 enforcement actions against lawyers using these various procedural mechanisms. n112 The choice of procedural devices appears to be based on the nature of the conduct in question and the remedy the Commission seeks.

Civil Injunctions. The SEC has the authority under section 20(b) of the Securities Act of 1933 to institute civil proceedings to enjoin a violation of the securities acts. n113 This provides the Commission authority to use the court system to stop violators. It also provides the threat of future action if the conduct continues. For the injunction to be granted, the SEC must make a proper showing,' which consists of two elements: (1) positive proof of the violation alleged and (2) evidence that there is a reasonable likelihood of future violations of the statutory provisions. n114 While there is no private right of action against aiders and abettors under the Securities laws, Congress gave the Commission authority to pursue aiders and abettors as part of the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995.

The vast majority of proceedings seeking a civil injunction against attorneys are settled in proceedings brought against both the primary violators and the attorneys as aiders and abettors. n115 If the lawyer then engages in what the Commission believes is a subsequent violation, the lawyer's ability to practice before the Commission can be automatically suspended.

Civil Monetary Penalties. The Securities Act of 1933 gives the Commission the authority to use the federal court system to seek civil monetary penalties for securities violations. The statute grants the Commission authority to seek a civil monetary penalty and specifies a three-tiered system for the amount based on the grievousness of the offense.

n116 The first tier, which applies to the least serious violations, provides that the penalty shall not exceed the greater of (i) $5,000 for a natural person or $50,000 for any other person, or (ii) the gross amount of pecuniary gain to such defendant as a result of the violation.' n117 Tier 2 increases the penalties, stating that they shall not exceed the greater of (i) $50,000 for a natural person or $250,000 for any other person, or (ii) the gross amount of pecuniary gain to such defendant as a result of the violation,' but adding a requirement that the violation be one that involved involved fraud, deceit, manipulation, or deliberate or reckless disregard of a regulatory requirement.' n118 Tier 3 further increases the amount, setting a limit per violation of $100,000 for a natural person or $500,000 for any other person, or the gross amount of pecuniary gain to such defendant as a result of the violation,' but also adding a requirement that the violation, in addition to the requirements of tier 2, be one that directly or indirectly resulted in substantial losses or created a significant risk of substantial losses to other persons.' n119

The Commission has pursued lawyers under this power. Substantial civil penalties against lawyers have been based on falsifying records, aiding and abetting the client's reporting violations and lying to auditors. n120 Such penalties have also been on assisting the client in the creation of misleading public statements about efforts to obtain regulatory approval of the company's product. n121 The majority of reported cases against attorneys for civil penalties appear to fall in the $25,000 range. n122

This type of civil action is hardly exclusive and may be combined with any other action that the Commission or the attorney general is entitled to bring against a violator. n123

Disgorgement. In civil actions brought by the SEC against attorneys, the courts also have the authority to order disgorgement of ill-gotten gains in order to prevent the wrongdoer from profiting from the wrongdoing. n124 Disgorgement has been used several times against attorneys for having participated in violations of the securities laws. n125 Disgorgement can range from a small, almost symbolic figure to substantial funds. n126

Administrative Cease-and-Desist Proceedings. The SEC may elect to use internal administrative proceedings, either by seeking a cease-and-desist order or proceeding directly under § 201.102(e). Cease-and-desist orders are sought pursuant to § 8A of the Securities Act of 1933, which authorizes the Commission to issue permanent and temporary cease-and-desist orders. The cease-and-desist orders are administrative remedies that direct a person to refrain from engaging in conduct or practices that violate the registration or anti-fraud provisions of the act. n127 The Commission may seek a cease-and-desist order, rather than an injunction in federal court, in order to avoid excessive collateral consequences, or to facilitate an easier negotiated settlement, or to resolve matters more quickly. n128 It is particularly appropriate for what appears to be an isolated violation. For example, the Commission sought a cease-and-desist order against the general counsel of Google for violations of the registration provisions of Sections 5(a) and (c) of the Securities Act of 1933. n129

Administrative Proceedings Under Rule 102(e) Directly Regulate Lawyer as Lawyer. Both civil proceedings and cease-and-desist orders are based on the lawyer's primary violation of the securities acts or aiding and abetting violation of the securities acts. As set out in detail above, Rule 102(e) of the Commission regulations allows the Commission to essentially disbar an attorney for misconduct. After the high profile case of Carter and Johnson, the Commission has more often pursued actions for aiding and abetting than for a claim of unprofessional conduct under 102(e).

Proceedings Under Rule 102(e) Are Public. Rule 102(e) proceedings to discipline an attorney are public unless otherwise ordered by the Commission on its own motion or after considering the motion of a party.' n130 The Commission made disciplinary actions under Rule 102(e) public in 1988 for the express purpose of promoting awareness of ethical and professional conduct issues. n131 This has increased transparency in the Commission's actions against attorneys.

Statute of Limitations and Laches in Actions Against Attorneys

Statute of Limitations. There is no statute of limitations that expressly applies to SEC actions. The generally applicable statute of limitations, 28 U.S.C. § 2462, states that [e]xcept as otherwise provided by Act of Congress, an action, suit or proceeding for the enforcement of any civil fine, penalty, or forfeiture, pecuniary or otherwise, shall not be entertained unless commenced within five years from the date when the claim first accrued' n132 The SEC has taken the position that there is no statute of limitations that is generally applicable to the Commission's institution of administrative proceedings. n133 However, some courts have disagreed and concluded that § 2462 applies to administrative actions. n134 In particular, the D.C. Circuit has held that § 2462 applies to SEC actions to censure and suspend a securities advisor. n135 This is consistent with a generally accepted principle that suspension or revocation of a professional license is a penalty. n136 The five-year statute of limitations may not apply, however, to actions to restore the status quo, such as a proceeding for restitution or disgorgement. n137

Laches. The defense of laches is an equitable doctrine that focuses on the fairness of permitting a claim to be enforced. n138 For the defense to succeed, the court must find both that the plaintiff delayed unreasonably and inexcusably in commencing the action and that the defendant suffered prejudice as a result. n139 Historically, laches does not run against the United States unless the government specifically consents. n140 If the government is seeking to vindicate purely private rights, however, then laches may be applied. n141 Even so, the defense has been held inapplicable where a government agency is acting in the public interest. n142 This category includes Commission actions to seek equitable relief, such as an injunction, to enforce the securities laws. n143

Return to Text

n1 17 C.F.R. § 201.102(e)(1).

n2 See 17 C.F.R. § 201.102(e)(1)(iv)(A).

n3 See, e.g., In re James A Fitzhenry, Securities Exchange Act Release No. 46870 (Nov. 21, 2002) (5 year suspension by consent); SEC v. Craig Scott, SEC Litigation Release No. 19077, 84 SEC Docket 3048 (Feb. 14, 2005) (3-year suspension by consent).

n4 J. William Hicks, Civil Liabilities: Enforcement and Litigation Under the 1933 Act § 2.115.

n5 17 C.F.R. § 201.102(e)(2); cf. ABA Model Code of Professional Responsibility DR 1-102(A)(3) (A lawyer shall not [e]ngage in illegal conduct involving moral turpitude.).

n6 See, e.g., In re F. Thomas Eck, III, Exchange Act Release No. 52,246 (Aug. 12, 2005).

n7 See, e.g., In re Michael Rosoff, Securities Act Release No. 50,566, 83 SEC Docket 3037 (Oct. 18, 2004).

n8 In re Shawn F. Hackman, Securities Act Release No. 46,478, 78 SEC Docket 1210 (Sept. 10, 2002).

n9 17 C.F.R. § 201.102(e)(3)(i).

n10 See, e.g., In re Robert J. Cassandro, Securities Act Release No. 50,938, 84 S.E.C. Docket 2062 (Dec. 28, 2004); In re Michael W. Smith, Securities Act Release No. 50,566, 83 SEC Docket 3064 (Oct. 20, 2004); In re John B. Zankowski, Securities Act Release No. 52,487 (Sept. 21, 2005) (default judgment).

n11 Note, Disciplinary Proceedings Against Attorneys Under Rule 2(e), 79 Mich. L. Rev. 1270, 1271 (1981).

n12 In re William R. Carter, Charles J. Johnson, Jr., 47 S.E.C. 471 (SEC 1981).

n13 Touche Ross & Co. v. SEC, 609 F.2d 570, 582 (2d Cir. 1979); Davy v. SEC, 792 F.2d 1418, 1421 (9th Cir. 1986); Checkosky v. SEC, 23 F.3d 452, 456 (D.C. Cir. 1994).

n14 In re Keating, Meuthing & Klekamp, 47 S.E.C. 95 (1979).

n15 Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, § 602, 15 U.S.C. § 78d-3.

n16 Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-204, 116 Stat. 745 (codified in scattered sections of 11, 15, 18, 28, and 29 U.S.C.).

n17 15 U.S.C. § 7245; see Standards of Professional Conduct for Attorneys Appearing and Practicing Before the SEC in Representing an Issuer, 68 Fed. Reg. 50,955 (Feb. 6, 2003) (codified at 17 C.F.R. § 205.3(d)(2)), available at <http://www.sec.gov/rules/final/33-8185.htm>.

n18 See, e.g., Fred C. Zacharias, Coercing Clients: Can Lawyer Gatekeeper Rules Work?, 47 B.C.L. Rev. 455 (2005); John C. Coffee, Jr., Regulating the Lawyer: Past Efforts and Future Possibilities: The Lawyer as Gatekeeper: An Agenda for the SEC, 103 Colum. L. Rev. 1293 (2003); Lisa H. Nicholson, A Hobson's Choice For Securities Lawyers in the Post-Enron Environment: Striking a Balance Between the Obligation of Client Loyalty and Market Gatekeeper, 16 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 91 (2002).

n19 Implementation of Standards of Professional Conduct for Attorneys, 68 Fed. Reg. 6320 (Feb. 6, 2003) (codified at 17 C.F.R. § 205); see e.g., Robert J. Jossen, Dealing With the Lawyer's Responsibilities Under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002: Ethical Dilemmas and Practical Considerations, SL027 ALI-ABA 417, 430 (2005).

n20 See, e.g., Thomas Lee Hazen, Treatise on the Law of Securities Regulation § 9.8[7].

n21 17 C.F.R. § 201.102(f).

n22 See Giovanni P. Prezioso, Remarks before the Spring Meeting of the Association of General Counsel, April 28, 2005, Pebble Beach, CA, available online at <http://www.sec.gov/news/speech/spch042805gpp.htm>.

n23 Ackerman v. Schwartz, 947 F.2d 841, 848 (7th Cir. 1991) (for 10(b) and Rule 10b-5 allegations, if the attorney authorized the inclusion of the [opinion] letter with the offering documents, then he appears as a principal . . . and not as an aider or abettor').

n24 See, e.g., SEC v. Jacob Alexander, David Kreinberg, and William F. Sorin, Litigation Release No. 19796, 88 S.E.C. Docket 2122 (Aug. 9, 2006) (charging former general counsel in a scheme to routinely backdate stock option grants); In re Google, Inc. and David C. Drummond, Rel. No. 33-8523, 84 S.E.C. Docket 2293 (Jan. 13, 2005) (finding that general counsel violated Section 5 of the Securities Act where he met with board to discuss need for stock option plans without advising board of relevant law regarding registration requirements relating to option grants); In re George Kern, slip op. at 46-48 (Nov. 14, 1988) (ALJ opinion), proceedings dismissed on procedural grounds, Rel. No. 34-29356 (June 21, 1991) (outside counsel and director to issuer delegated task of making necessary Commission filings in connection with hostile takeover attempt, but did not update original filing even after final agreement was reached with purchaser).

n25 47 S.E.C. 471 (SEC 1981).

n26 In re William R. Carter, Charles J. Johnson, Jr., 47 S.E.C. 471, 503 (SEC 1981).

n27 In re William R. Carter, Charles J. Johnson, Jr., 47 S.E.C. 471, 503 (SEC 1981).

n28 In re William R. Carter, Charles J. Johnson, Jr., 47 S.E.C. 471, 504 (SEC 1981).

n29 In re William R. Carter, Charles J. Johnson, Jr., 47 S.E.C. 471, 504 (SEC 1981).

n30 See Central Bank, N.A. v. First Interstate Bank, N.A., 511 U.S. 164, 191, 114 S. Ct. 1439, 128 L. Ed. 2d 119 (1994).

n31 See 15 U.S.C. § 78t(e).

n32 See Walck v. American Stock Exchange, Inc., 687 F.2d 778, 791 (3d Cir. 1982) (mere inaction cannot amount to aiding and abetting); Metge v. Baehler, 762 F.2d 621, 625 (8th Cir. 1985) (when aider and abettor owes the plaintiff an independent duty to act or to disclose, inaction can be a proper basis for liability under the substantial assistance test); Woods v. Barnett Bank of Ft. Lauderdale, 765 F.2d 1004, 1010 (11th Cir. 1985) (applying a higher standard of scienter--severe recklessness--when liability is based on conduct alone).

n33 See, e.g., In re Jeffrey L. Feldman, Rel. No. 33-7014 (Sept. 20, 1993) (attorney aided and abetted § 5 violations by persisting in advising client of an erroneous legal position even after being put on notice that the Commission staff disagreed with position).

n34 SEC v. Fehn, 97 F.3d 1276, 1294 (9th Cir. 1996); see also Restatement (Third) of Law Governing Lawyers § 94, cmt. c ("A lawyer's intent to facilitate or encourage wrongful action may be inferred if in the circumstances it should have been apparent to the lawyer that the client would employ the assistance to further the client's wrongful conduct and the lawyer nonetheless provided the assistance.") .

n35 In re William R. Carter, Charles J. Johnson, Jr., 47 S.E.C. 471, 503 (SEC 1981); In re Scott G. Monson, SEC Release No. 312429 (Sept. 25, 2006).

n36 In re Scott G. Monson, S.E.C. Release No. 312429 (Sept. 25, 2006)); see also John C. Dickey and Jeffrey A. Minnery, Trends in Claims Against Lawyers, Securities Litigation Report, Volume 4, Number 2 (Feb. 2007).

n37 See SEC v. Fehn, 97 F.3d 1276, 1294 (9th Cir. 1996); In re Stanly P. Silverstein, Exchange Act Release No. 49676, 82 S.E.C. Docket 2943 (May 11, 2004); see generally In re Silicon Graphics Inc. Securities Litigation, Litigation Release No. 15243, 63 S.E.C. Docket 2066 (Feb. 3, 1997).

n38 SEC v. National Student Marketing Corp., 457 F. Supp. 682, 713 (D.D.C. 1978).

n39 17 C.F.R. § 205.3(a); see also SECURITIES LAW TECHNIQUES, Ch. 88A, The SEC Standards of Professional Conduct for Attorneys (Matthew Bender).

n40 William H. Simon, Whom (Or What) Does the Organization's Lawyer Represent?: An Anatomy of Intraclient Conflict, 91 Calif. L. Rev. 57 (2003).

n41 15 U.S.C. § 7245.

n42 17 C.F.R. § 205.2(a)(1)(i).

n43 17 C.F.R. § 205.2(a)(1)(ii).

n44 17 C.F.R. § 205.2(a)(1)(iii).

n45 17 C.F.R. § 205.2(a)(1)(iv).

n46 17 C.F.R. § 205.2(a)(2).

n47 17 C.F.R. § 205.2(a)(2).

n48 17 C.F.R. § 205.2(g).

n49 17 C.F.R. § 205.2(h); see also SECURITIES LAW TECHNIQUES, § 88A.02 (Matthew Bender).

n50 17 C.F.R. § 205.2(e).

n51 17 C.F.R. § 205.2(l).

n52 17 C.F.R. § 205.2(m).

n53 See Implementation of Standards of Professional Conduct for Attorneys, 67 Fed. Reg. 71,670, 71,678 (Dec. 2, 2002) (codified at 17 C.F.R. § 205.2).

n54 17 C.F.R. § 205.2(i).

n55 See Implementation of Standards of Professional Conduct for Attorneys, 67 Fed. Reg. 71,670, 71,679 (Dec. 2, 2002) (codified at 17 C.F.R. § 205.2).

n56 See Implementation of Standards of Professional Conduct for Attorneys, 67 Fed. Reg. 71,670, 71,679 (Dec. 2, 2002) (codified at 17 C.F.R. § 205.2).

n57 Basic Inc. v. Levinson, 485 U.S. 224, 231, 108 S. Ct. 978, 99 L. Ed. 2d 194 (1988); TSC Industries v. Northway, Inc., 426 U.S. 438, 449, 96 S. Ct. 2126, 48 L. Ed. 2d 757 (1976).

n58 17 C.F.R. § 205.3(b); SECURITIES LAW TECHNIQUES, § 88A.04 (Matthew Bender).

n59 17 C.F.R. § 205.3(c).

n60 17 C.F.R. § 205.2(k).

n61 17 C.F.R. § 205.2(k)(2), (3).

n62 17 C.F.R. § 205.3(c).

n63 See Thomas G. Bost, Corporate Lawyers After the Big Quake: The Conceptual Fault Line In the Professional Duty of Confidentiality, 19 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 1089 (2006); Stanley Keller, Implementing the SEC's Standards of Professional Conduct For Attorneys, SM101 ALI-ABA 699 (June 28-29, 2007); Robert Eli Rosen, Resistance to Reforming Corporate Governance: the Diffusion of QLCCS, 74 Fordham L. Rev. 1251, 1252 (2005).

n64 Sanley Keller, Implementing the SEC's Standards of Professional Conduct For Attorneys, SM101 ALI-ABA 699 (June 28-29, 2007).

n65 17 C.F.R. § 205.3(b)(2); SECURITIES LAW TECHNIQUES, § 88A.04 (Matthew Bender).

n66 17 C.F.R. § 205.3(b)(2).

n67 17 C.F.R. § 205.2(k) (providing rules for what constitutes a qualified legal compliance committee as well as its role and responsibility).

n68 17 C.F.R. § 205.4(a).

n69 17 C.F.R. § 205.5(a).

n70 17 C.F.R. § 205.5(b).

n71 17 C.F.R. § 205.5(c).

n72 17 C.F.R. § 205.5(d); see Implementation of Standards of Professional Conduct for Attorneys, 67 Fed. Reg. 71,670, 71,675 (Dec. 2, 2002) (codified at 17 C.F.R. § 205.5).

n73 17 C.F.R. § 205.4(b).

n74 17 C.F.R. § 205.4(b).

n75 17 C.F.R. § 205.3(b)(3).

n76 17 C.F.R. § 205.3(b)(6)(i).

n77 17 C.F.R. § 205.3(b)(6)(ii).

n78 17 C.F.R. § 205.3(b)(7)(i).

n79 17 C.F.R. § 205.3(b)(7)(ii).

n80 Miller v. McDonald (In re World Health Alternatives, Inc.), 385 B.R. 576, 591 (Bankr. D. Del. 2008).

n81 See, e.g., SEC v. Craig Scott, SEC Litigation Release No. 19077, 84 S.E.C. Docket 3048 (Feb. 14, 2005) (general counsel liable for preparing false and misleading notices of late filing, and causing company to file them); In re Stanley P. Silverstein, Securities Exchange Release No. 49676, 82 S.E.C. Docket 2943 (May 11, 2004) (general counsel found liable for approving and allowing to be filed a misleading Form 10-K); see Jonathan C. Dickey and Jeffery A. Minnery, Trends in Claims Against Lawyers, 4 No. 2 Sec. Litig. Rep. 5 (Feb. 2007); 4 Bromberg and Lowenfels on Securities Fraud § 7:395.30 (2d ed.).

n82 Miller v. McDonald (In re World Health Alternatives, Inc.), 385 B.R. 576, 593, 598 (Bankr. D. Del. 2008) (general counsel owes fiduciary duty to corporation under both Florida and Connecticut corporate law).

n83 17 C.F.R. § 205.3(d).

n84 17 C.F.R. § 205.3(d)(1).

n85 See generally Model Rule of Professional Conduct 1.6(b)(5).

n86 17 C.F.R. § 205.3(d)(2).

n87 See, e.g., Thomas Lee Hazen, Treatise on the Law of Securities Regulation § 9.8[7]; C. Evan Stewart, The Pit, the Pendulum, and the Legal Profession: Where Do We Stand After Five Years of Sarbanes-Oxley, Securities Regulation & Law Report, Vol 40, No. 7 (Feb. 18, 2008) at 247 (available at: <http://www.mondaq.com/article.asp?articleid=63936>).

n88 17 C.F.R. § 205.6(a).

n89 17 C.F.R. § 205.6(c).

n90 Bishop v. PCS Admin. (USA), Inc., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 37230, at *30 (N.D. Ill. May 23, 2006) (there is nothing in the Sarbanes-Oxley Act or in the Sentencing Guidelines that mandates ex ante any particular form of corporate compliance program.').

n91 17 C.F.R. § 205.6(d).

n92 17 C.F.R. § 205.7.

n93 See American Bar Association, Center for Professional Responsibility, available at http://www.abanet.org/cpr/mrpc/model_rules.html; Timothy P. Chinaris, More Than the Camel's Nose: The Sarbanes-Oxley Act As Bad News for Lawyers, Their Clients, and The Public, 31 Ohio N.U.L. Rev. 359, 374 (2005).

n94 Fed. R. Civ. P. 83(a)(1).

n95 Pre-2003 version of Rule 1.13(c) available at <http://www.abanet.org/cpr/e2k/e2k-rule113.html>.

n96 ABA Model Rules of Prof'l Conduct R. 1.13(b).

n97 ABA Model Rules of Prof'l Conduct R. 1.13(c).

n98 ABA Model Rules of Prof'l Conduct R. 1.6(b)(2), (b)(3).

n99 See, e.g., California Rules of Professional Conduct 3-100.

n100 See Janelle L. Davis, Sticks and Stones May Break My Bones, But Names Could Get Me A Mistrial: An Examination of Name-Calling in Closing Argument In Civil Cases, 42 Gonz. L. Rev. 133, 147 (2006-2007).

n101 See American Bar Association, Status Of State Review Of Professional Conduct Rules, available at http://www.abanet.org/cpr/jclr/ethics_2000_status_chart.pdf (provides links to each state's rules of ethics as well as tracks which states have adopted the ABA's amendments).

n102 See Christopher M. Fairman, Protecting Consumers: Attorney Ethics and the Law Governing Lawyers, 60 Consumer Fin. L.Q. Rep. 529, 531 (2006) (as of 2006, 8 states plus D.C.).

n103 California Rules of Professional Conduct 3-100.

n104 See Fidelity Federal v. de la Cuesta, 458 U.S. 141, 152154, 102 S. Ct. 3014, 73 L. Ed. 2d 664 (1982); see, e.g., Christopher Fairman, Protecting Consumers: Attorney Ethics And The Law Governing Lawyers, 60 Consumer Fin. L.Q. Rep. 529, 531 (2006).

n105 17 C.F.R. § 205.1.

n106 See, e.g., Thomas G. Bost, Corporate Lawyers After the Big Quake: The Conceptual Fault Line In the Professional Duty of Confidentiality, 19 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 1089, 1108 (2006); Christopher M. Fairman, Protecting Consumers: Attorney Ethics and the Law Governing Lawyers, 60 Consumer Fin. L.Q. Rep. 529, 531 (2006).

n107 15 U.S.C. § 7245.

n108 Corporations Committee of the Business Law Section of the State Bar of California, Conflicting Currents: The Obligation to Maintain Inviolable Client Confidences and the New SEC Attorney Conduct Rules, 32 Pepp. L. Rev. 89, 148 (2004).

n109 See N.C. St. Bar Ass'n, 2005 Formal Ethics Op. 9 (Jan. 20, 2006), available at <http://www.ncbar.com/ethics/ethics.asp>.

n110 Washington State Bar Association, Interim Formal Ethics Opinion Re: The Effect of the SEC's Sarbanes-Oxley Regulations on Washington Attorneys' Obligations Under the RPCs (June 1, 2003); Corporations Committee of the Business Law Section of the State Bar of California, Conflicting Currents: The Obligation to Maintain Inviolable Client Confidences and the New SEC Attorney Conduct Rules, 32 Pepp. L. Rev. 89, 148 (2004).

n111 Bromberg & Lowenfels on Securities Fraud § 7:395.10 (2d. ed.).

n112 Stephen M. Cutler, Director of the SEC Division of Enforcement, The Themes of Sarbanes-Oxley as Reflected in the Commission's Enforcement Program, Address at the UCLA School of Law, Los Angeles, Cal. (Sept. 20, 2004), available at <http://www.sec.gov/news/speech/spch092004smc.htm>; see also John C. Dickey and Jeffrey A. Minnery, Trends in Claims Against Lawyers, 4 No. 2 Sec. Litig. Rep. 5 (Feb. 2007).

n113 15 U.S.C. § 77t (b); see Thomas Lee Hazen, Treatise on the Law of Securities Regulation § 16.2[2][A].

n114 J. William Hicks, Civil Liabilities: Enforcement and Litigation Under the 1933 Act § 2.41.

n115 See, e.g., In re Leonard Goldner, Securities Exchange Act Release No. 53375 (Feb. 27, 2006); In re L. Van. Stillman, Securities Act Release No. 51218, 84 S.E.C. Docket 3013 (Feb. 17, 2005); In re David S. Pearl, Securities Act Release No. 1827, 80 SEC Docket 2216 (July 30, 2003).

n116 15 U.S.C. § 77t(d)(2).

n117 15 U.S.C. § 77t(d)(2)(A).

n118 15 U.S.C. § 77t(d)(2)(B).

n119 15 U.S.C. § 77t(d)(2)(C).

n120 SEC v. Henry C. Yuen, SEC Litigation Release No. 19047, 84 SEC Docket 2599 (Jan. 21, 2005) ($150,000 civil penalty ordered against attorney). See Thomas Lee Hazen, Treatise on the Law of Securities Regulation § 16.2[5].

n121 SEC v. Biopure Corporation, SEC Litigation Release No. 19825 (Sept. 12, 2006) ($40,000 penalty ordered).

n122 See, e.g., SEC v. Integrated Services Group, Inc., et al., SEC Litigation Release No. 19476, 86 SEC Docket 2002 (Nov. 29, 2005) ($25,000 penalty for violating sections 5(a) and 5(c) of the Securities Act of 1933); In re Robert J. Cassandro, Securities Act Release No. 50938, 84 SEC Docket 2062 (Dec. 28, 2004); SEC v. Rocky Mountain Energy Corp, Inc., et al., SEC Litigation Release No. 18522, 81 SEC Docket 3043 (Dec. 23, 2003) ($25,000 penalty after being accused of participating in an illegal distribution of approximately 47 millions shares of Rocky Mountain stock in four unregistered share-exchange transactions); SEC v. Jack D. Weiss, SEC Litigation Release No. 19002, 84 S.E.C. Docket 2026 (Dec. 17, 2004) ($25,000 penalty by consent against outside securities counsel for aiding and abetting a fraudulent scheme to inflate assets of an Israeli company).

n123 J. William Hicks, Civil Liabilities: Enforcement and Litigation Under the 1933 Act § 2.52.

n124 See SEC v. Huffman, 996 F.2d 800, 802 (5th Cir. 1993); Thomas Lee Hazen, Treatise on the Law of Securities Regulation § 16.2[4][B].

n125 SEC v. Integrated Services Group, Inc., SEC Litigation Release No. 19476, 86 SEC Docket 2002 (Nov. 29, 2005); SEC v. Henry C. Yuen, SEC Litigation Release No. 19047, 84 SEC Docket 2599 (Jan. 21, 2005); In re Robert J. Cassandro, Securities Act Release No. 50938, 84 SEC Docket 2062 (Dec. 28, 2004).

n126 SEC v. Henry C. Yuen, SEC Litigation Release No. 19047, 84 SEC Docket 2599 (Jan. 21, 2005) ($150,000 in disgorgement ordered for attorney as a result of his participating in overstating revenues during his time as general counsel); In re Robert J. Cassandro, Securities Act Release No. 50938, 84 SEC Docket 2062 (Dec. 28, 2004) ($950 in disgorgement related to attorney's role as outside counsel in drafting a false and misleading form 8-K to conceal the true ownership company).

n127 15 U.S.C. § 77h-1(a); J. William Hicks, Civil Liabilities: Enforcement and Litigation Under the 1933 Act § 2.89.

n128 Hicks, at § 2.89.

n129 In re Google, Inc. and David C. Drummond, Securities Act Release No. 8523, 84 S.E.C. Docket 2293 (Jan. 13, 2005).

n130 17 C.F.R. § 201.102(e)(7).

n131 Disciplinary Proceedings Involving Professionals Practicing Before the Commission, 39 Fed. Reg. 13,288 (Apr. 12, 1974) (to be codified at 17 C.F.R. pt. 201). T

n132 28 U.S.C. § 2462.

n133 Johnson v. SEC, 87 F.3d 484, 486487 (D.C. Cir. 1996); Thomas Lee Hazen, Treatise on the Law of Securities Regulation § 16.2.

n134 3M Co. v. Browner, 17 F.3d 1453, 1454 (D.C. Cir. 1994) (§ 2462 applies to EPA administrative proceedings).

n135 Johnson v. SEC, 87 F.3d 484, 492 (D.C. Cir. 1996).

n136 In re Ruffalo, 390 U.S. 544, 550, 88 S. Ct. 1222, 20 L. Ed. 2d 117 (1968) (disbarment of attorney is a penalty).

n137 Johnson v. SEC, 87 F.3d 484, 492 (D.C. Cir. 1996); SEC v. Lorin, 869 F. Supp. 1117, 11221123 (S.D.N.Y. 1994) (disgorgement is not a fine, penalty, or forfeiture' within the meaning of § 2462 since it is strictly remedial').

n138 Holmberg v. Armbrrecht, 327 U.S. 392, 396, 66 S. Ct. 582, 90 L. Ed. 743 (1946); SEC v. Willis, 777 F. Supp. 1165, 1174 (S.D.N.Y. 1991).

n139 Lottie Joplin Thomas Trust v. Crown Publishers, Inc., 592 F.2d 651, 655 (2d Cir. 1978); SEC v.

Willis, 777 F. Supp. 1165, 1174 (S.D.N.Y. 1991).

n140 United States v. Summerlin, 310 U.S. 414, 416, 60 S. Ct. 1019, 84 L. Ed. 1283 (1940) ("It is well settled that the United States is not subject to the defense of laches in enforcing its rights"); SEC v. Penn Cent. Co., 425 F. Supp. 593, 599 (E.D. Pa. 1976).

n141 SEC v. Willis, 777 F. Supp. 1165, 1175 (S.D.N.Y. 1991); see Penn Cent. Co., 425 F. Supp. 593, 599 (E.D. Pa. 1976).

n142 SEC v. Willis, 777 F. Supp. 1165, 1175 (S.D.N.Y. 1991); SEC v. Gulf and Western Indus., Inc., 503 F. Supp. 343, 348 (D.D.C. 1980).

n143 S.E.C. v. McCaskey, 56 F. Supp. 2d 323, 327 (S.D.N.Y. 1999).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Judith A. McMorrow is a Professor at Boston College Law School, where she teaches torts, professional responsibility and related topics. She has written many articles on topics of professional responsibility and age discrimination (with a focus on retirement policy.) Professor McMorrow is active in pro bono activities, including representing women in Massachusetts seeking commutation based on Battered Woman Syndrome. She has also been active in promoting the interdisciplinary practice of law. After graduating from University of Notre Dame Law School in 1980, Prof. McMorrow clerked for the Hon. Gilbert S. Merritt (United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit) and Chief Justice Warren E. Burger (United States Supreme Court.) She practiced with the Washington D.C. law firm of Steptoe and Johnson before entering teaching in 1985.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

49 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

John K. Rabiej on the Risks Associated with Keyword Searches

2009 Emerging Issues 3635

John K. Rabiej on the Risks Associated with Keyword Searches

By John K. Rabiej

May 19, 2009

SUMMARY: Parties routinely use selected keywords to search massive amounts of ESI electronically. The search technique is quick and inexpensive. But an inadequately planned keyword search can produce disappointing results, and it can risk severe consequences. Recent case law highlights the pitfalls of inadequate keyword searches undertaken by individuals who have little or no relevant expertise.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Lawyers often rely on automated keyword searches to facilitate the examination of electronically stored information (ESI). See, e.g., Victor Stanley, Inc. v. Creative Pipe, Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42025, at *15 (D. Md. May 29, 2008) (it is universally acknowledged that keyword searches are useful tools for search and retrieval of ESI). Keyword searching offers a useful tool to minimize the volume of ESI that lawyers must review. As the term implies, keyword searching locates documents containing a specific word or words regardless of context. Lawyers are familiar with the general technique, using it in automated legal research. In general, lawyers rely on keyword searches in discovery to: (1) identify ESI that must be preserved; (2) locate relevant ESI responsive to discovery requests; and (3) identify privileged and work product ESI. Though quick and efficient, keyword searches are inherently limited and can produce incomplete results that can have serious consequences. Their use must therefore be tempered with caution, especially because courts are open to challenges about their reasonableness and completeness. See Autotech Tech. v. Automationdirect.com, Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23498, at *11B12 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 25, 2008) (party did not fashion adequate search protocol and was responsible for additional costs incurred to retrieve information).

Keyword Searching Limitations

Studies have shown that untutored keyword searches miss many relevant documents. The most famous study concluded that keyword searches identify only 20% of the relevant ESI, though the participating attorneys believed that they were collecting 75% or more. See Blair & Moron, An Evaluation of Retrieval Effectiveness for a Fulltext Document Retrieval System, Communication of the ACM, Vol. 28 No. 3, March 1985; see also Tomlinson, Oard, Baron, and Thompson, Overview of the TREC 2007 Legal Track, 1 (2007) (On average (over 43 topics), the reference Boolean query found just 22% of the relevant documents that are estimated to exist. Its precision averaged 29%.'). The low success rate is caused by the richness and ambiguity of the English language and the overly simplistic techniques used in the searches. At the other extreme, keyword searches can capture too many non-relevant documents. See, e.g., Ross v.

Abercrombie & Fitch Co., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87039 (S.D. Ohio Oct. 27, 2008) (parties collaboratively selected 120 keywords, which produced large number of hits; parties later refined search, using 123 keywords, producing one million pages of documents; court declined to require party to review documents identified after yet another refined search identified 1.3 million pages and suggested that subsequent searches be performed on smaller data sets). The frequency of false positives can be high because such searches locate designated words regardless of context. For example, a search for the word "strike" in the context of a labor union protest will capture the word when it means to hit someone or something or missing a pitch in a baseball game.

Selecting proper keywords can be complicated and a thorough search procedure can involve the sciences of computer technology, statistics, and linguistics. See, e.g., Victor Stanley, Inc. v. Creative Pipe, Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42025, at *15B16, *26B33 (D. Md. May 29, 2008) (extensive discussion of literature explaining keyword search techniques, their deficiencies and limitations). Unless well designed, keyword searches will omit relevant information, including misspelled words, singular or plural forms of words, words containing an extra space, or acronyms. See, United States v. O'Keefe, Sr., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12220, at *23B24 (D.D.C. Feb. 18, 2008) (lawyers and judges typically are not competent to develop and apply appropriate keyword searches and should rely on experts because developing proper keywords for ESI searching is "clearly beyond the ken of a layman"). Inadequate keyword searches restricted to certain electronic files will also fail to retrieve data located in mislabeled file types. For example, a text document can be stored inadvertently or deliberately in a file typically used to store an image, i.e., .jpg file. Failure to test the results of a keyword search for quality assurance is a factor in determining the reasonableness and completeness of a discovery search. See, e.g., In re Seroquel Prods. Liab. Litig., 244 F.R.D. 650, 662 (M.D. Fla. 2007) (Common sense dictates that sampling and other quality assurance techniques must be employed to meet requirements of completeness.').

The consequences of an inadequate keyword search were highlighted in Victor Stanley, Inc. v. Creative Pipe, Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42025 (D. Md. May 29, 2008). In this case, the defendant purportedly used five pages of keywords to identify privileged and protected documents. The search failed to identify 165 privileged or protected documents, which were produced in discovery. The court commented on the benefits of keyword searches in general, but it could not determine whether the keyword search in the instant case was sufficiently reasonable to prevent waiving the privilege or protection. Though the defendant had the burden to show it had taken reasonable steps to prevent the disclosure of privileged or protected documents, it did not give the court information regarding the adequacy of the search. The defendant failed to inform the court about the keywords used, the rationale for their selection, the qualifications of the individuals to design a reliable search, the use of any sampling to test the results for quality assurance, and the specific search technique used. Absent an explanation of the keyword search, the court could not rule on its reasonableness. It granted the plaintiff's motion, finding the defendant's production of the documents waived any privileged or protected status. The holding in Victor Stanley underscores not only the need to fully document search protocols but also the major advantages offered by a court order entered under newly enacted Federal Rule of Evidence 502, which would have averted this problem by protecting the privileged or protected status of documents disclosed in discovery.

Effective Keyword-Search Strategies

Though keyword searching offers a good tool, expectations should be tempered with an understanding of its limits. Keyword searching is best used as a filtering tool, reducing the volume of ESI as a "first cut" that must be reviewed. It should not be relied on as the exclusive tool to locate specific ESI. Courts are beginning to scrutinize the efficacy of keyword lists, finding some search techniques inadequate. A party can take several steps to enhance keyword searching. In general, adopting a list of about 30 to 50 terms will retrieve the relevant evidence without being too inclusive or restrictive. Whole words should be selected and "noise" words, e.g., it, a, and the should be avoided to limit the number of irrelevant hits. It is important to constantly sample the results of the keyword searching to determine whether it is too narrow or inclusive. The great advantage of keyword searching is that it can be easily adjusted to minimize or expand the number of hits retrieved. Employing an electronic evidence expert should be considered if the volume of ESI is large.

Collaboration

Typically, the producing party creates a list of key words to search its records in response to a discovery request. The opposing party may be permitted to scrutinize the list and raise objections to the court about its effectiveness in identifying relevant evidence. See William A. Gross Constructon Assoc., Inc. v. American Manufacturers Mutual Ins. Co., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22903, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 19, 2009) (opposing party objected to search terms, proposing many others). Best practices recommend that parties make a good faith effort to collaborate on the use of searching methods, including agreement on the keywords. See, e.g., The Sedona Conference Best Practices Commentary on the Use of Search and Information Retrieval Methods in E-Discovery 189, 211 (2007) (Parties should make a good faith attempt to collaborate on the use of particular search and information retrieval methods, tools and protocols (including as to keywords, concepts, and other types of search parameters).'). The Rule 26(f) conference presents a good opportunity to discuss the selection of keywords. But lawyers must exercise due care in drafting and agreeing to any search protocols.

In Re: Fannie Mae Secs. Litig., 552 F.3d 814 (D.C. Cir. 2009), offers a lesson on the consequences of imprecise search protocols. In this case, the ESI records of the Office of the Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight (OFHEO) were subpoenaed under Rule 34. Defendants in the case contended that OFHEO, a third party, failed to produce the requested ESI in a timely manner. In accordance with a search protocol stipulated between OFHEO and the defendants, OFHEO reviewed 660,000 documents based on 400 selected keywords after hiring 50 contract attorneys solely for that purpose and expending more than $6 million, approximately 9 percent of the agency's entire annual budget. When it sought an extension of time to file the required privilege logs after failing to meet two earlier extensions of time, the district court granted the defendant's motion holding OFHEO in contempt. Though sympathetic to OFHEO's seemingly herculean efforts, the district court ruled that OFHEO was bound to comply with the conditions contained in its stipulated order, which specified the following: "OFHEO will work with the Individual Defendants to provide the necessary information (without individual review) to develop appropriate search terms. By October 19, 2007, the Individual Defendants will specify the search terms to be used." As construed by the court, the stipulated order imposed no limits on the number or types of search terms nor did it give OFHEO any role in developing or rejecting the search terms, other than a consultative one. And even though the search terms retrieved approximately 80% of the office's entire email messages, OFHEO could not rely on the Rule 45 safeguards against unreasonable discovery demands because it was bound by its stipulated order. The appellate court upheld the lower court's finding.

Collaboration with an opposing party does not mean that a party is obligated to accept key words proposed by the other party. See, e.g., Treppel v. Biovail Corp., 233 F.R.D. 363 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) (party can reject list of key words proposed by opposing party, but must proceed with its own key word list rather than produce nothing). Nor should a party rely solely on inadequate keywords supplied by the opposing party to meet its discovery burden. See, e.g., Spieker v. Quest Cherokee, LLC, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88103, at *8-9 (D. Kan. Oct. 30, 2008) (Defendant cannot escape its burden of production by now arguing that plaintiffs' suggested search terms are 'specific enough.' If the search terms need to be more specific to answer plaintiffs' production requests, defendant should modify the terms accordingly.)

Alternative Searching Techniques

Keyword searching is rigidly precise and locates only the exact version of a word, which means that misspelled words, synonyms, acronyms, and other abbreviations are omitted. Most search engines now employ Boolean search criteria, which permit more sophisticated word searches narrowing the scope of a search by using word connectors, e.g., and' (requires two or more keywords together), or' (requires either keyword), and w/5' (requires presence of keyword within designated number of words), and a wildcard' denoted as an asterisk (*), which retrieves words based on the search term's root or suffix. Boolean searching is the most common way of electronically searching data. Several alternative searching techniques have been developed to address the major drawbacks with keyword searching. See e.g., Victor Stanley, Inc. v. Creative Pipe, Inc., 250 F.R.D. 251, 261 (D. Md. 2008) (advanced search techniques include probabilistic search models, fuzzy search models, clustering searches, and concept and categorization searches).

Keyword searching based on stemming techniques focus on parts of a word. Though similar to a Boolean-wildcard search, stemming is based on linguistics analysis. Fuzzy queries are based on relevance analysis and designed to retrieve information with content similar to a specific term or phrase. See, e.g., The Sedona Conference Best Practices Commentary on the Use of Search and Information Retrieval Methods in E-Discovery 189, 219 (2007) (Fuzzy search is an attempt to improve search recall by matching more than the exact word: fuzzy matching techniques try to reduce words to their core and then match all forms of the word.'). It is used often to search information that has undergone an Optical Character Recognition conversion from paper documents.

More sophisticated searches employ cutting-edge technology based on concept searches and artificial intelligence that identify words in similar categories, much like a "Google" search. Searches are conducted to ascertain the number of times a particular search term is used in a given document or a set of documents, which result in relevancy rankings that can provide useful guidance in refining a search. The greater the number of hits in an individual document, the higher its "term frequency," while the greater the number of documents containing the search term, the higher its "inverse document frequency."

Concept and context searching are new technologies that rely on linguistic analysis of sentence structures, parts of speech, and noun phrases. The technologies base their search on the associations among the designated words within the collected documents. See, e.g., The Sedona Conference Best Practices Commentary on the Use of Search and Information Retrieval Methods in E-Discovery 189, 202 (2007) (The classic example is the concept search that will recognize that documents about Eskimos and igloos are related to Alaska, even if they do not specifically mention the word 'Alaska. '). Some of these methodologies rely on thesauri, which identify and group synonyms and similar words. Searches using a "clustering" technique batch similar documents together based on the concepts contained in each document. The results of these searches can be most useful in identifying "code" or "alias" words used as substitutes to prevent detection. The track record of these technologies is not proven. Moreover, they can be expensive. These emerging technologies, nevertheless, can be used effectively to supplement or refine the other culling techniques as part of an overall filtering strategy, especially by companies faced with constant litigation, who have dedicated qualified IT personnel.

Conclusions

Keyword searches are often the only practical means of reviewing ESI. Though accurate in operation, the results can be disappointing. A practitioner who fails to recognize the inherent limitations of keyword searches risks incomplete results that can compromise the production and preservation of relevant ESI and the identification of privileged and protected ESI. Best practices recommend that a practitioner: (1) develop a search protocol with care, relying on experienced experts when appropriate, (2) collaborate with the opposing party's counsel to develop a search protocol, including agreed-upon keywords, (3) take advantage of emerging search techniques to supplement Boolean keyword searches, and (4) document thoroughly the details of the search protocol.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

50 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Why Lawyers Should Request Court to Enter Rule 502(d) Confidentiality Order

2009 Emerging Issues 3603

John K. Rabiej on Why Lawyers Should Routinely Request Court to Enter Rule 502(d) Confidentiality Order

By John K. Rabiej

May 7, 2009

SUMMARY: A court order under FRE 502(d) protects a party from the threat of waiving the attorney-client privilege or work-product protection when privileged or protected information is disclosed. Few requests for the court order have been reported, because the bench and bar are unfamiliar with the new rule (enacted in Sept. 2008). Best practices call for lawyers to request the court to enter the order routinely in every discovery-intensive case.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: A rule of evidence enacted in 2008 holds great promise for substantial discovery savings and expediting discovery, but it has been little used to date. Under Federal Rule of Evidence 502(d), a federal court can order that the attorney-client privilege or work-product protection is not waived when privileged or protected information has been disclosed. The rule "responds to the widespread complaint that litigation costs necessary to protect against the waiver of attorney-client privilege or work product have become prohibitive due to the concern that any disclosure (however innocent or minimal) will operate as a subject matter waiver of all protected communications or information." See Fed. R. Evid. 502, Committee Note (2008). The new rule's protection is so effective and its benefits so substantial that a lawyer should have a very good reason not to request the court to enter a Rule 502(d) confidentiality order in every discovery-intensive case.

The advantages of a Rule 502(d) court order present a "win-win" option for all parties. The Committee Note to Rule 502 recognizes the principal utility of the court order: "The rule provides a party with a predictable protection from a court order -- predictability that is needed to allow the party to plan in advance to limit the prohibitive costs of privilege and work product review and retention." If extensive discovery is pursued in a case, especially discovery of electronically stored information, a Rule 502(d) order can significantly reduce costs for the responding party by eliminating the threat of a waiver that would otherwise compel it to screen exhaustively all information subject to discovery for privilege or work product. See Spieker v. Quest Cherokee, LLC, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88103, at *13 (D. Kan. Oct. 30, 2008) (court ordered parties to address cost savings features under Rule 502 in any future discussions regarding projected $250,000 privilege and relevance review of electronically stored information). The elimination of the threat of a waiver also removes the primary cause for contesting a request to produce discovery, which in turn benefits the requesting party by expediting the production of discovery. The rule does not require any showing of special need or justification for the Rule 502(d) order, and courts have been encouraged to grant them routinely. Yet the reported number of Rule 502(d) orders remains modest. The bench's and bar's unfamiliarity with the rule seems to be the only obstacle preventing more frequent reliance.

Under Rule 502(d), a federal court may order that information protected under the attorney-client privilege or work-product doctrine disclosed in connection with a federal proceeding does not waive the privilege or protection in any ongoing or subsequent litigation. A court order under the rule eliminates not only the risk that the privilege or protection is waived regarding the specific disclosed information, but it also eliminates the risk that the privilege or protection is waived regarding the "subject matter" of the disclosed information.

Most importantly, Rule 502(d) extends its protection against privilege and protection waiver regarding information disclosed in the case to all ongoing or subsequent litigation, including state court litigation. That means that a party no longer must exhaustively review documents before disclosing them in discovery for fear that an inadvertent disclosure of privileged or protected information will waive the privilege or protection in a later lawsuit. Though a party should remain vigilant in ensuring that it does not inadvertently disclose documents containing important confidential matter, an order entered by the court under Rule 502(d) eliminates the privilege-waiver and protection-waiver threats. See, e.g., Alcon Manufacturing, Ltd. v. Apotex Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96630, at *18 (S.D. Ind. Nov. 26, 2008) (expensive, painstaking review is precisely what new Evidence Rule 502 and the protective order in this case were designed to avoid').

Parties should discuss early in the litigation whether they can agree to request a Rule 502(d) order jointly. If no agreement can be reached, a single party may make the request or the court itself may enter the order to facilitate the discovery process. At the Rule 26(f) discovery-planning conference, parties are directed to address any issue relating to the assertion of an attorney-client privilege or work-product protection claim. The conference offers a discrete opportunity to discuss requesting the court to enter the Rule 502(d) confidentiality order. An excellent example of a draft Rule 502(d) order has been prepared by Gregory P. Joseph, of Gregory P. Joseph Law Offices LLP in New York, former Litigation Section Chair of the American Bar Association: The Impact of Rule 502 on Protective Orders.pdf (Document attached to end of this document).

Though a Rule 502(d) court order is clearly preferable in many cases, other provisions of Rule 502 were enacted to clarify the law governing the consequences of disclosing privileged or protected information when no Rule 502(d) order has been entered. But the protection against waiving the privilege or protection is neither as extensive nor as clear-cut as that provided under Rule 502(d). In general, the waiver of the privilege or protection is determined on a case-by-case basis, subject to all the vicissitudes inherent in the judicial decisionmaking process. See Rhoads Indus., Inc. v. Building Materials Corp. of America, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93504, at *6-7 (E.D. Pa. Nov. 14, 2008) (applies multi-factor test to determine reasonableness of party's inadvertent disclosure).

Thus, absent a Rule 502(d) order, a lawyer must demonstrate that the disclosure of privileged or protected information was inadvertent, that the lawyer took reasonable steps to prevent disclosure, and that the lawyer attempted promptly to rectify the error. The inquiry is fact intensive and decided on a case-by-case basis. A large body of court rulings in individual cases constitute the case law. See Moore's Federal Practice 3rd Edition, § 37A.32[5]. The court rulings can be surprising at times.

For instance, the Committee Note to Rule 502 points out that "depending on the circumstances, a party that uses advanced analytical software applications and linguistic tools in screening for privilege and work product may be found to have taken 'reasonable steps' to prevent inadvertent disclosure." See Fed. R. Evid. 502(b), Committee Note (2008); see also Rhoads Indus., Inc. v. Building Materials Corp. of America, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93504, at *29-32 (E.D. Pa. Nov. 14, 2008) (court approvingly cites Committee Note to Rule 502). Despite a general presumption of "reasonableness," courts have scrutinized the steps taken to prevent disclosure and carefully examined the effectiveness of the automated privilege review software. In one important case decided a few months before enactment of Rule 502, the court evaluated the search of keywords used in identifying privileged electronically stored information and faulted the parties for failing to develop a more effective search. See, e.g., Victor Stanley Inc. v. Creative Pipe Inc., (D. Md. May 29, 2008) (court faulted search of electronically stored information because party failed to describe how key words were selected, qualifications of individuals selecting key words, how search was conducted, implementation of quality controls, and any sampling or test runs employed to assure accuracy). Though rulings like Victor Stanley undercut a party's confidence in using software to screen for privilege and work product, they underscore the advantages of a Rule 502(d) court order, where the cost-savings benefit of a software application to screen documents for privilege or work product can be realized without jeopardizing privilege or work product.

Other provisions of Rule 502 deal with other aspects of the attorney-client privilege and work-product protection. For example, waiver of the privilege or protection regarding the subject-matter' of the disclosed privileged or protected information is limited only to situations in which a party intentionally discloses the information in a selective, misleading, or unfair manner. See Fed. R. Evid. 502, Committee Note (2008). Rule 26(b)(5)(B) sets up procedures to assert privilege and work-product protection claims after production, freezing the status quo and deferring the decision to determine whether a privilege or protection has been waived until a court rules on the privilege or protection claim. Under the rule, the receiving party must return, sequester, or destroy the claimed privileged or protected information if the responding party produced the information and then notified the party of the claim.

Rule 502 also recognizes the well-established practice of parties entering into agreements limiting the effect of privilege or protection waiver when the information is disclosed during discovery. But the agreement can only bind the consenting parties. Nonparties may be bound only if the agreement is incorporated into a court order under Rule 502(d). Such agreements can include 'clawback' provisions designed to permit a producing party to retrieve inadvertently disclosed confidential information, or 'quick peek' provisions designed to permit the requesting party an opportunity to examine all information on condition that neither agreement prevents the producing party from asserting a privilege or protection claim. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(f) Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(f), Committee Note (2006); see, e.g., American Econ. Ins. Co. v. Schoolcraft, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42519, at *8 (D. Colo. June 23, 2006) (example of stipulated confidentiality order allowing party to demand return of inadvertently disclosed privileged matter without waiving privilege). The parties may request the court to incorporate the agreement into the court's case-management order, which may protect the privilege or protection claim in subsequent litigation. Illustrative Civil Form 35 includes a provision for the parties to describe their agreement or an order regarding claims of privilege or protection as trial preparation materials asserted after production.

Rule 502 clarifies the consequences of disclosing privileged or protected information and applies more consistent standards to ascertain the reasonableness of a party's actions in safeguarding privileged and protected information from disclosure. But it does not eliminate the second-guessing of a party's steps to prevent the disclosure or the steps taken to rectify the error, which can have disastrous results in a given case. A court order under Rule 502(d) renders these risks moot. Rule 502(d) sets up a simple procedure to request the court for the order, which parties can pursue jointly or individually. Sample confidentiality orders are readily available. The cost savings, expedited discovery production, and elimination of wasteful satellite litigation under Rule 502(d) can benefit all parties in litigation. All that is required for full realization of the rule's benefits is greater bench and bar familiarity with it.

Gregory P. Joseph n1

On September 19, 2008, the President signed into law Federal Rule of Evidence 502 (Attorney-Client Privilege and Work Product; Limitations on Waiver). It applies to previously filed cases in the discretion of the trial judge and to all cases filed on and after September 19, 2008, without exception.

Rule 502(d) is the most innovative aspect of the new Rule, and it dictates that protective orders be drafted differently than they have in the past. Subdivision (d) provides that a federal court order governing waiver through disclosure of privileged or protected information is binding on all other courts and third parties:

(d) Controlling effect of a court order. -- A federal court may order that the privilege or protection is not waived by disclosure connected with the litigation pending before the court -- in which event the disclosure is also not a waiver in any other federal or state proceeding.

For years, it has been common practice to include in protective orders claw-back provisions to address the inadvertent production of material protected by the attorney-client privilege or work product protection. Rule 502(d) resolves a vexing, pre-existing problem -- that the court-ordered return and protection of inadvertently produced material in Case 1 did not afford any protection from the discovery demands of litigants in Case 2. But it does more, too.

Current Short-Form Order

Prior to Rule 502(d), a typical short-form version of such a provision provided:

If a party inadvertently produces information that it later discovers to be privileged, the production of that information shall not be deemed to constitute the waiver of any applicable privileges, provided that the producing party promptly informs the receiving party of the inadvertent production and requests the return or confirmed destruction of the privileged information, including any copies or derivative works that have been made of that inadvertent production. Within three (3) business days of receiving such notification, the receiving party shall return or confirm destruction of all such privileged Information, including any copies or summaries thereof.

Four observations in light of Rule 502(d). First, this order is limited by its term to privilege. While conventional practice in the past has been to read "privilege" expansively to include work product protection, Rule 502 clearly distinguishes between the two, and so should court orders now. Otherwise, a reference only to privilege is subject to the argument that it reflects a negotiated narrowing of the Rule's protection.

Second, this order focuses on inadvertent production of information, rather than disclosure of information. Inadvertent disclosure can occur many ways -- e.g., at deposition, by email, in extrajudicial conversations relating to the case. The language of Rule 502(d) is broad enough to cover all of these, and the order should do so as well (absent specific reasons not to).

Third, Rule 502(d) does not impose a promptness requirement on any request to return the information. A promptness requirement may be desirable, depending on many factors, including the magnitude of the anticipated discovery. Further, lawyers may choose to distinguish party disclosures from third-party responses to subpoenas, as to which it may be desirable to maintain a promptness requirement.

Fourth, and perhaps most important, this form of order is limited to inadvertent disclosure. It may be in any given case that limiting the scope of the order to inadvertent production is prudent. But that is a choice for counsel to make (more about the consequences of this choice below).

Form of Order -- Inadvertent Production

Taking Rule 502(d) into account, this is a provision that is limited to protecting inadvertent disclosure:

(a) If, in connection with the pending litigation, a party (the "Disclosing Party") inadvertently discloses information subject to a claim of attorney-client privilege or attorney work product protection ("Inadvertently Disclosed Information"), the disclosure of the Inadvertently Disclosed Information shall not constitute or be deemed a waiver or forfeiture of any claim of privilege or work product protection that the Disclosing Party would otherwise be entitled to assert with respect to the Inadvertently Disclosed Information and its subject matter.

(b) If a claim of inadvertent disclosure is made by a Disclosing Party with respect to Inadvertently Disclosed Information, the Receiving Party shall, within five business days, return or destroy all copies of the Inadvertently Disclosed Information and provide a certification of counsel that all such Inadvertently Disclosed Information has been returned or destroyed.

(c) Within five business days of the notification that such Inadvertently Disclosed Information has been returned or destroyed, the Disclosing Party shall produce a privilege log with respect to the Inadvertently Disclosed Information.

(d) The receiving party may move the Court for an Order compelling production of the Inadvertently Disclosed Information (a "Privilege Motion"). The Privilege Motion shall be filed under seal and shall not assert as a ground for entering such an Order the fact or circumstances of the inadvertent production.

(e) The Disclosing Party retains the burden of establishing privileged or protected nature of any Inadvertently Disclosed Information. Nothing in this paragraph shall limit the right of any party to petition the Court for an in camera review of the Inadvertently Disclosed Information.

This model has the following salient characteristics:

First, it is not limited to privilege but explicitly applies to work product protection as well.

Second, it extends beyond production to disclosure of information. True, it is clumsy in its operation as to the proverbial blurt-out of privileged information at a deposition or an extrajudicial statement (how do you return or destroy that?). But the operational issue is not the real problem. Subject matter waiver is the problem, and this order prevents it. It is also consistent with the holdings of various courts a blurt-out of protected information at a deposition does not affect a subject matter waiver. See e.g., In re County of Erie, 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 21496 (2d Cir. Oct. 14, 2008); Pinnacle Pizza Co. v. Little Caesar Enters., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 488845 (D. S.D. July 3, 2007).

Third, this provision eliminates any promptness requirement for requests for the return of protected information. If a promptness requirement is deemed appropriate, it can be added as a proviso at the end of paragraph (a), using the language of the dependent clause at the end of first sentence of the Current Short-Form Order, above.

Fourth, this model is limited to disclosures "in connection with the pending litigation." The rulemakers placed that limitation in Rule 502(d) to prevent parties from using the courts to protect non-litigation-related disclosures, as to regulatory agencies. Query how effective that limitation is. If a regulatory agency serves a subpoena and the receiving party seeks to quash it in court, that court action is presumably a "litigation" to which Rule 502(d) applies. The limitation in the Rule does, however, eliminate its application to voluntary disclosures to regulators, and that could require parties to decide whether they want to force the issuance of subpoenas (which, in some circumstances, may require the commencement of formal regulatory proceedings that become disclosable events).

Form of Order -- Not Limited to Inadvertent Production

Rule 502(d) is not limited to inadvertent disclosure. It protects against waiver by disclosure of any type, whether inadvertent or intentional. It therefore permits a party to open its files to an adversary; allows the adversary decide what information it considers relevant and wants to use; and permits the disclosing party to assert privilege thereafter (or not to do so) -- as in the quick-peek approach to electronic discovery. The Rule also permits a disclosing party to selectively waive privilege or work product protection, which raises a specter addressed below.

A provision that is not limited to inadvertent disclosure could take this form:

(a) If, in connection with the pending litigation, a party (the "Disclosing Party") discloses information subject to a claim of attorney-client privilege or attorney work product protection ("Disclosed Protected Information"), the disclosure of the Disclosed Protected Information shall not constitute or be deemed a waiver or forfeiture of any claim of privilege or work product protection that the Disclosing Party would otherwise be entitled to assert with respect to the Disclosed Protected Information and its subject matter.

(b) A Disclosing Party may assert in writing attorney-client privilege or work product protection with respect to Disclosed Protected Information. The Receiving Party shall, within five business days of receipt of that writing, return or destroy all copies of the Disclosed Protected Information and provide a certification of counsel that all such Disclosed Protected Information has been returned or destroyed.

(c) Within five business days of the notification that such Disclosed Protected Information has been returned or destroyed, the Disclosing Party shall produce a privilege log with respect to the Disclosed Protected Information.

(d) The receiving party may move the Court for an Order compelling production of the Disclosed Protected Information (a "Privilege Motion"). The Privilege Motion shall be filed under seal and shall not assert as a ground for entering such an Order the fact or circumstances of the inadvertent production.

(e) The Disclosing Party retains the burden of establishing privileged or protected nature of any Disclosed Protected Information. Nothing in this paragraph shall limit the right of any party to petition the Court for an in camera review of the Disclosed Protected Information.

(f) If, at trial, at a hearing, at a deposition, or on a motion, a Disclosing Party marks for identification or offers into evidence Disclosed Protected Information -- or proffers or elicits testimonial or other evidence that incorporates or relies on Disclosed Protected Information, including evidence within Federal Rule of Evidence 703 -- that act shall be deemed to effect a waiver and forfeiture by the Disclosing Party of attorney-client privilege and work product protection that would otherwise apply to undisclosed information concerning the same subject matter, within Federal Rule of Evidence 502(a). The preceding sentence shall not apply to (i) proceedings to determine whether the Disclosed Protected Information is privileged or protected or subject to discovery or disclosure, or (ii) Disclosed Protected Information that is marked for identification, offered into evidence, or incorporated in evidence proffered or elicited by an adverse party, or relied on by a witness proffered by an adverse party.

The key to this form of order is subdivision (f), which takes into account the most dangerous threat posed by Rule 502(d) in the context of intentional disclosure of protected information -- namely, that a party could use the privilege as both a sword and a shield. The Rule is intended to facilitate discovery. It is not intended to permit a party affirmatively to introduce a favorable piece of privileged or protected information while simultaneously protecting unfavorable information. Subdivision (f) is intended to preclude this result. Note that (1) it prevents back-dooring privileged information through experts, and (2) it permits a party to use its own Disclosed Protected Information where an adversary first proffers it and thereby opens the door.

Return to Text

n1 Mr. Joseph, of Gregory P. Joseph Law Offices LLC in New York, is a Fellow of the American College of Trial Lawyers and former Chair of the Section of Litigation of the American Bar Association. He can be reached at gjoseph@josephnyc.com. 2008 Gregory P. Joseph

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

51 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Dorsaneo on 2008 Amendments to Texas Rules of Appellate Procedure

2009 Emerging Issues 3326

Dorsaneo on 2008 Amendments to Texas Rules of Appellate Procedure

By William Dorsaneo III

February 6, 2009

SUMMARY: The Texas Supreme Court and Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas promulgated significant amendments to the Texas Rules of Appellate Procedure which took effect on September 1, 2008. This commentary, written by William V. Dorsaneo, III, author of the renowned treatise Texas Litigation Guide, discusses these amendments and their implications.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Introduction.

The Texas Supreme Court and Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas have promulgated significant amendments to the Texas Rules of Appellate Procedure which took effect on September 1, 2008. (Tex. Sup. Ct. Amendments to the Texas Rules of Appellate Procedure, Misc. Docket No. 08-9115 published in 71 Tex. B.J. 676-687 (2008); Technical Corrections to the Amendments to the Texas Rules of Appellate Procedure, Misc. Docket No. 08-9115a, published in 71 Tex. B.J. 762 (2008); Tex. Sup. Ct. Order Amending Texas Rules of Appellate Procedure, Misc. Docket No. 08-9017 published in 71 Tex. B.J. 286-297 (2008); Court Crim. App. Order Amending Texas Rules of Appellate Procedure, Misc. Docket No. 08-102, published in 71 Tex. B.J. 676-687 (2008); Court of Crim. App. Order for Amendments to the Texas Rules of Appellate Procedure, Misc. Docket No. 08-103, published in 71 Tex. B.J. 837 (2008)).

Accelerated Appeals in Civil Cases.

Appeals as of Right. Former Appellate Rule 28 provided very incomplete guidance concerning the situations in which an appeal is accelerated in the courts of appeals. To remedy this problem, Appellate Rule 28.1 comprehensively defines the types of accelerated appeals as appeals permitted by statute from interlocutory orders, appeals in quo warranto proceedings, appeals required by statute to be accelerated or expedited as well as all appeals required by statute to be filed or perfected within less than 30 days after the date of the order or judgment being appealed. Tex. R. App. P. 28.1(a).

Proposed Appellate Rule 28.1 was drafted to provide a more uniform appellate timetable and to supersede statutes containing shorter deadlines for perfecting an appeal. For example, under Family Code Sections 109.002(a) and 263.405(a) in an appeal from a final order in a suit in which termination of the parent-child relationship, the procedures for an accelerated appeal under the Texas Rules of Appellate Procedure apply. Similarly, under Health and Safety Code Section 81.191(b) [n]otice of appeal must be filed no later than the 10th day after the date on which the order is signed; see also Health & Safety C. 574.070(b) (notice must be filed not later than the 10th day after the date on which the order is signed); Elec. C. § 232.014 (establishing fast appellate track for election contests).

As originally proposed and published in the April 2008 Bar Journal, proposed Appellate Rule 28.1 made all accelerated appeals subject to a uniform appellate timetable prescribed by Rule 26.1(b) regardless of any statutory deadlines. (see 71 Tex. B. J. at 291, Misc. Docket No. 08-9017).

As finally promulgated, however, in response to public comment regarding certain statutes, such as Election Code Section 232.014, Appellate Rule 28.1(b) takes the opposite approach and makes it clear that statutory timetables for perfecting accelerated appeals as defined in Rule 28.1(a) govern over the deadlines prescribed in Rule 26.1(b). Although the text of Appellate Rule 28.1 warns that the time for perfecting an accelerated appeal may be provided by statute and the comment to the rule makes it clear that there are many statutes that contain statutory deadlines, as finally promulgated, neither one provides more specific guidance. In fact, the second sentence in the revised comment is arguably misleading because it states that Rule 28 provides a uniform appellate timetable, before the third sentence in the comment makes it clear that there are many statutory deadlines, which govern over deadlines provided in the rule.

For additional discussion of these issues see Ch. 153, Accelerated Appeals § 153.03.

Procedure for Permissive Interlocutory Appeals. Amended Appellate Rule 28.2 is designed to establish the procedure for taking a permissive interlocutory appeal under Texas Civil Practice and Remedies Code Sections 51.014 (d)-(e) enacted by the 77th Legislature in 2001 and amended by the 79th Legislature in 2005. To perfect such an appeal, unless the court of appeals extends the time to perfect the appeal, a party to the trial court proceeding must file a notice of accelerated appeal as provided in Rule 25.1 with the trial court clerk not later than the 20th day after the date the trial court signs a written order granting permission to appeal. Tex. R. App. P. 28.2. In other words, Appellate Rule 28.2 resolves important questions, which are not answered by the current statute, about what must be filed to perfect the appeal and whether the time to perfect appeal runs from the date of the underlying order that is the subject of the permissive accelerated appeal or from the date of the trial courts order permitting the appeal.

As originally published and as finally promulgated, Appellate Rule 28.2 provides the appeal is perfected by filing a notice of appeal and clearly chooses the written order granting permission to appeal as the order that triggers the commencement of the time for perfecting the appeal. Recent case law demonstrates that the courts of appeals needed guidance on these issues. See e.g., Inliner Americas, Inc. v. Macomb Funding Group, L.L. C., 244 S.W.3d 427, 430 (Tex. App.--Houston [14th Dist.] 2007, pet. dismd, as moot) (time to perfect appeal runs from date of order being appealed not order permitting interlocutory appeal).

For a step-by-step explanation of the procedure, the current statute, and proposed Appellate Rule 28.2, see Ch. 153 Accelerated Appeals § 153.04.

Use of Precedent in Cases Transferred to Other Courts of Appeals. The precedential value of prior decisions of the courts of appeals in transferred cases has vexed appellate courts and practitioners for a number of years. This problem has been addressed and probably resolved by Appellate Rule 41.3. See Am. Natl Ins. Co. v. Intl Bus., Machines Corp., 933 S.W.2d 685, 689 (Tex. App.--San Antonio 1996, writ denied) (Duncan J., concurring and dissenting opinion); see also Wade Glover, Comment, Docket Equalization: Turning the Texas Court System Into a Crapshoot and How Your Case May Be Affected, 40 Tex. Tech L. Rev. 295 (2008).

If a case is transferred for docket equalization or other purposes by the Texas Supreme Court under Government Code § 73.001 from Dallas to El Paso or to Eastland, but the Dallas Courts view of Texas law as reflected in its decisions differs from the precedent of the transferee courts, what precedent should the transferee courts apply in deciding the appeal? Appellate Rule 41.3 answers this question. The transferee courts (El Paso or Eastland) must decide the case in accordance with the precedent of the transferor court under principles of stare decisis if the transferee courts decision otherwise would have been inconsistent with the precedent of the transferor court. Tex. R. App. P. 41.3.

Counsel should note that the Appellate Rules pragmatic recognition that different opinions about Texas law exist among the courts of appeals is not meant to suggest that Texas law is different in different courts of appeals districts as many have assumed or suggested. See e.g. Andrew T. Solomon, A Simple Prescription for Texass Ailing Court System: Stronger Stare Decisis, 37 St. Marys L.J. 417, 439 (2006).

Finally, the Texas Supreme Courts adoption of the doctrine of stare decisis as the standard for applying the transferor courts precedent normally should provide the transferee court with sufficient latitude in the decision-making process to avoid adherence to decisions that are plainly wrong. See Gutierrez v. Collins, 583 S.W.3d 312, 317 (Tex. 1979).

Suspending Enforcement of Trial Court Judgments. Appellate Rule 24.2 modifies the still cumbersome procedure for determining the amount a judgment debtor must post as security to suspend enforcement of a trial courts judgment. As a result of amendments made to the Civil Practice and Remedies Code in 2003, the amount of security needed to supersede a money judgment must equal the sum of compensatory damages awarded in the judgment, interest for the estimated duration of the appeal, and costs awarded in the judgment. See Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code § 52.006 (a)-(c); Tex. R. App. P. 24.2 (a)(1). In addition, the amount of security could not exceed the lesser of 50 percent of the judgment debtors net worth or $25 million. Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code § 52.006(b); Tex. R. App. P. 24.2(a).

As reflected in In re Smith, 192 S.W.3d 564, 568 (Tex. 2006) (per curiam), these amendments spawned the development of postjudgment disputes concerning the judgment debtors net worth. In such cases, trial courts may have difficulty in complying with the requirement contained in Appellate Rule 24.2 of not only determining the judgment debtors net worth, but also stating with particularity the factual basis for that determination. For example, if the judgment debtor claims to have a very low or even a negative net worth but does not provide detailed information about assets and liabilities in the debtors affidavit of net worth, the judgment creditor will need to provide the court with the information, which normally will be ascertainable only after the judgment creditor conducts postjudgment discovery concerning the debtors assets and liabilities.

The Appellate Rule amendments provide a clearer procedural picture of how a postjudgment net worth controversy must be litigated to facilitate the presentation of evidence sufficient to enable the trial judge to perform the courts obligation. However, attempts to simplify the process and the trial judges responsibility to state the basis for the determination of the judgment debtors net worth were not successful.

For a complete discussion of the procedure, see Ch. 148 Suspending Enforcement of the Judgment § 148.04.

Revised Rules Concerning Availability of Oral Argument. After Justice Jane Bland (First Court) apprised the Advisory Committee of statistics showing a marked decline in the number of oral arguments in the courts of appeals for the last decade, Justice Bland, Justice Terry Jennings (First Court) and Justice David Gaultney (Beaumont) together with other members of the Appellate Rules Subcommittee took the lead in recommending amendments to Appellate Rules 38 and 39. As originally proposed, these revisions would have required oral submission unless the justices on the panel to which the case was assigned unanimously voted to deny argument as unnecessary for any of the reasons specified in Appellate Rule 39.1 ((a) the appeal is frivolous; (b) the dispositive issue or issues have been authoritatively decided; (c) the facts and legal arguments are adequately presented in the briefs and record; or (d) the decisional process would not be significantly aided by oral argument.).

To facilitate the determination, amended Appellate Rule 38.1 states that an appellate brief may include a statement explaining why oral argument, should or should not be permitted. Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(e) Any such statement must not exceed one page and should address how the courts decisional process would, or would not; be aided by oral argument

Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(e). Regardless of whether a brief includes a statement regarding oral argument, a request for oral argument must be noted on the front cover of the brief of a party requesting oral argument. See Tex. R. App. P. 39.7.

Ultimately, however, as a result of opposition to the unanimity requirement for denying argument from the Council of Chief Justices, Appellate Rule 39.1 was changed by providing for a decision to deny argument by the court instead of the panel and by omission of the proposed unanimity requirement, see Tex. R. App. P. 39.1; see also Joseph D. Hughes, Brief Histories of Select Proposed Appellate Rule Changes, 20 APP. ADVOC. 258 (Summer 2008).

Although the Court added a precatory comment to the final version of amended Rule 39, which provides that an appellate court must evaluate these reasons in view of the traditional importance of oral argument, it remains to be seen what impact these rule changes will have on the courts of appeals and on appellate practice.

For further discussion, see Ch., 150, Appellate Proceedings in Court of Appeals § 150.03.

Postjudgment Motion for Rehearing Practice in the Court of Appeals; Relationship to Petition for Review Practice.

Overview. Amendments to a number of appellate rules change the relationship between and the timetables for filing motions for rehearing and motions for en banc reconsideration in the courts of appeals and, as explained below, petitions for review in the Texas Supreme Court. See Tex. R. App. P. 49, 53. Companion changes were also made in order to clarify the duration of the court of appeals plenary power. Tex. R. App. P. 19. In addition, Appellate Rule 49.5 was amended to permit a party to file a further motion for rehearing when a court of appeals issues a different opinion in granting a motion for rehearing, regardless of whether the opinion is issued in connection with the overruling of a prior motion for rehearing. see Tex. R. App. P. 49.5(c); cmt. Finally, the requirement for a certificate of conference for motions for rehearing and for motions for en banc reconsideration was eliminated because it is presumed that non-movants will routinely oppose relief sought by such motions. See Tex. R. App. P. 10.1, 49.12, cmt.

Amendments to Appellate Rule 49. As originally published in the April 2008 Bar Journal, proposed Appellate Rule 49 in order to clarify that a motion for en banc reconsideration did not need to be filed simultaneously with a motion for panel rehearing made a clear distinction between motions for rehearing and motions for en banc reconsideration. (71 Tex. B.J. at 295). Unfortunately, this distinction was not carried forward in the final version of the Appellate Rule 49.

As under previous practice, motions for rehearing may be filed within 15 days after the court of appeals renders its judgment or order. After a motion for rehearing is decided, another motion for rehearing may be filed within 15 days after the court's action if the court: (1) modifies its judgment; (2) vacates its judgment and renders a new judgment; or (3) issues a different opinion. Tex. R. App. P. 49.5.

The final version of Appellate Rule 49.7 also provides that a motion for en banc reconsideration may be filed, as a separate motion, with or without filing a motion for rehearing, within 15 days after the court of appeals judgment or order is rendered. Tex. R. App. P. 49.7. Unfortunately, as finally promulgated, Appellate Rule 49.7 also states that when permitted a motion for en banc reconsideration must be filed within 15 days after the court of appeals denial of the party's last timely filed motion for rehearing or en banc reconsideration. Tex. R. App. P. 49.7.

In contrast, the original version of the proposed rule published in the April 2008 Bar Journal clearly authorized the filing of a motion for en banc reconsideration, without permission, within 15 days after the overruling of the same party's last timely filed motion for rehearing or en banc consideration. Proposed Tex. R. App. P. 49.6. (71 Tex. B.J. at 295).

Apparently influenced by the Courts most recent decision concerning en banc reconsideration (City of San Antonio v. Hartman, 201 S.W.3d 687, 670-671 (Tex. 2006), holding that a motion for en banc reconsideration is a type of motion for rehearing that is timely filed, as long as the court of appeals retains plenary power over its judgment)), the second half of the second sentence of the final version of the en banc reconsideration provision is much less clear than the original version.

Based on the wording of the final version of the en banc reconsideration rule and the first sentence of the revised comment, a motion for en banc reconsideration may be filed as a separate motion or in combination with an ordinary motion or rehearing within 15 days of the court of appeals judgment or order. Tex. R. App. P. 49.7; cmt (Rule 49 is revised to treat a motion for en banc reconsideration as a motion for rehearing and to include procedures governing the filing of a motion for en banc reconsideration.)

But what happens if an ordinary motion for rehearing is filed without being coupled with a motion for en banc reconsideration? Under these circumstances, when is a motion for en banc reconsideration permitted? Under prior law one possibility was that no motion for en banc reconsideration could be filed after the court's decision of an ordinary motion for rehearing because of the prerequisites for filing a further motion for rehearing provided in Appellate Rule 49.5. While this analysis probably did not preclude en banc reconsideration if a majority of the en banc court ordered it with or without motion, the right to en banc reconsideration following a tardy motion was at least somewhat more problematic. But in Yzaquirre v. Gonzalez, 989 S.W.2d 111, 113 (Tex. App.--San Antonio 1999, pet denied) the San Antonio Court interpreted what has now become the next to the last sentence of Appellate Rule 49.7 to authorize a motion for en banc reconsideration at any time within the period of plenary power so that [l]itigants may therefore wait until the panel declines to revise its opinion and judgment before moving for en banc review. Unfortunately, the en banc court's opinion in Yzaquirre does not attempt to reconcile Rule 49.5 with Rule 49.7.

As finally promulgated, Appellate Rule 49.7's when permitted restriction is not very clear, but it most likely refers to the prerequisites set forth in Appellate Rule 49.5. Under this analysis, unless the next to the last sentence of Rule 49.7 trumps the additional when permitted language, counsel must/should combine a motion for en banc reconsideration with an ordinary motion for rehearing or file a motion for en banc reconsideration without filing an ordinary motion for rehearing, within the initial 15 day period. Otherwise, the motion for en banc consideration will be untimely and will not extend the time for filing a petition for review.

Of course, it is possible that the when permitted restriction has nothing to do with the requirements of Appellate Rule 49.5. For example, the language could simply be regarded as an oblique reference to the requirements for en banc consideration prescribed in Appellate Rule 41.2(c).

Companion amendments are proposed for Appellate Rule 19.1(b) which had implied that a motion for en banc reconsideration is a type of motion for rehearing. See Tex. R. App. P. 19.1 (b) (court of appeals plenary power over its judgment expires 30 days after the court overrules all timely filed motions for rehearing or en banc reconsideration, and all timely filed motions to extend time to file such motion).

For a detailed discussion of these amendments see Ch. 150, Appellate Proceedings in Court of Appeals §§ 150.106, 150.108.

Timetable for Filing Petitions for Review in Texas Supreme Court. Under the 2008 amendments to Appellate Rule 53.7, the Texas Supreme Court may shorten the normal deadline for filing a petition for review with the Texas Supreme Court. Tex. R. App. P. 53.7(a). In addition under new Appellate Rule 53.7, the normal deadlines for filing a petition for review is 45 days following: (1) the date the court of appeals rendered judgment, if no motion for rehearing or en banc reconsideration is timely filed; or (2) the date of the court of appeals last ruling on all timely filed motions for rehearing or timely filed motions or en banc reconsideration. Tex. R. App. P. 53.7(a).

Although justices of the courts of appeals have the right to grant en banc reconsideration, with or without a motion while the court of appeals has plenary power as provided in Appellate Rule 19 [Tex. R. App. P. 49.7; see Tex. R. App. P. 19 amended effective 9/1/08], as a result of the 2008 amendments to Appellate Rule 53.7, the date for filing a petition for review runs from the date of the court of appeals last ruling on all timely filed motions for rehearing and all timely filed motions for en banc reconsideration Tex. R. App. P. 53.7(a). This means that if a further motion for rehearing or en banc reconsideration is not permitted by Appellate Rule 49.7, the date for filing a petition for review should not be calculated from the date of the court of appeals ruling on the tardy motion.

For additional discussion of petition for review practice in the Texas Supreme Court, see Ch. 151, Appellate Proceedings in Supreme Court § 151.04.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

William V. Dorsaneo, III is the Chief Justice John and Lena Hickman Distinguished Faculty Fellow and Professor of Law at Southern Methodist University's Dedman School of Law in Dallas, Texas, where he teaches a variety of litigation courses. He is also the principal author of the widely used and often cited twenty-six volume Texas Litigation Guide published by Matthew Bender & Company, the co-author of the five-volume Texas Civil Trial Guide, the co-author of three casebooks entitled Cases and Materials on Civil Procedure, Texas Civil Procedure: Pre-Trial Litigation, and Texas Civil Procedure: Trial and Appellate Practice, and several other volumes on Texas litigation subjects.

Professor Dorsaneo served as the Reporter to the Combined Committee appointed by the Texas Supreme Court, the Court of Criminal Appeals and the Texas Legislature to draft the Texas Rules of Appellate Procedure and for the last 20 years he has served as the Chairman of the Appellate Rules Subcommittee of the Advisory Committee to the Texas Supreme Court. He is Board certified by the Texas Board of Legal Specialization in Civil Appellate Law and maintains an active appellate practice. He is also a board member of the Appellate Judges' Education Institute, a member of the Institute's Education Committee and a member of the American Law Institute.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

52 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Susan M. Brazas on Novell v. Migliaccio

2008 Emerging Issues 3082

Susan M. Brazas on Novell v. Migliaccio, 2008 WI 44, 749 N.W.2d 544 (2008).

By Susan Brazas

November 13, 2008

SUMMARY: In Novell v. Migliaccio, 2008 WI 44, 749 N.W.2d 544 (2008), the Wisconsin Supreme Court considered the question of whether reasonable reliance is an element of a cause of action for statutory misrepresentation in the sale of real estate under Wis. Stat. sec. 100.18. This Emerging Issues Analysis explores the Courts review of the statute as applied to a home sale where the buyer claimed misrepresentation as to water leaking in a basement.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Seller Beware: Reasonable Reliance Not Required

In the May 2008 court opinion of Novell v. Migliaccio, 2008 WI 44, 749 N.W.2d 544 (2008), the Wisconsin Supreme Court addressed the statutory cause of action for fraudulent misrepresentation under Wis. Stat. sec. 100.18. The Supreme Court affirmed the Appellate Courts reversal of summary judgment as to the one statutory count based on sec. 100.18, and affirmed the trial courts granting of summary judgment as to all remaining counts.

The key holding of the Novell Courts opinion is that reasonable reliance is not a required element for a cause of action for fraudulent misrepresentation under Wis. Stat. sec. 100.18. What made this result surprising in this case is that the buyer was informed by a home inspector, in advance of closing, that a check of the foundation of the home was advisable in order to determine whether water seepage was a problem. In fact, the home inspector voiced many concerns to the buyers about the marginal condition of the basement walls, including bowing and cracking. However, on the disclosure form, the sellers had answered no to all questions inquiring about knowledge of water leakage. They also told the home inspector that they had not painted cracks in the walls. Foundation experts later testified that it appeared that the home had been experiencing water leaking for at least three years prior to the sale, and that the cracks in the basement walls had been painted. It was also noted that the buyer and the sellers were friends, and that the buyer asserted that this fact, along with the sellers assurance that they had never had water in the basement and had not painted cracks in the walls, were factors that led the buyer not to seek further inspection by a foundation specialist.

Analysis of the Statutory Cause of Action. The Court's analysis focused on three factors: (1) the plain language of the statute, sec. 100.18; (2) the purpose of sec. 100.18; and (3) case law precedent. First, the Novell court found that neither reasonable nor reliance (nor a similar term) is found anywhere within the language of the statute and concluded that the statute itself did not include reasonable reliance as an element. Second, the Court noted that the purpose of the statute was to prohibit and deter sellers from making false representations, and concluded that requiring a plaintiff/buyer to prove that he or she reasonably relied on the representation would not serve the purpose of the statute. Third, the Court cited to other cases interpreting sec. 100.18 that held that reasonable reliance was not a required element of a claim under that statute.

The most recent prior case addressing a section 100.18 action for a leaky basement was discussed at length in the Novell opinion. In Malzewski v. Rapkin, 2006 WI App 183, 296, Wis. 2d 98, 723 N.W.2d 156, a similar fact scenario existed, and the court held, as in Novell, that reasonable reliance is a required element for numerous other theories of recovery, but not for a false advertising claim under sect. 100.18. The later decision in K&S Tool & Die Corp. v. Perfection Machinery Sales, Inc., 2007 WI 70, 301 Wis. 2d 109, 732 N.W.2d 792 confirmed this holding.

Practical Implications. Despite Novell, attorneys must be prepared to argue the reasonableness or unreasonableness of a buyers reliance on the sellers representations. Even though the Novell Courts key--and repeated--holding was that reasonable reliance is not a required element of a section 100.18 claim, still the Court found that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to the unreasonableness of the buyers reliance, so as to preclude summary judgment. As the Court framed it, the issue was whether the sellers representation that the basement did not leak was a material inducement causing the purchaser's loss. Thus, either party must be prepared to marshal and present evidence as to the reasonableness of the buyers reliance. Related facts, such as warnings or definitive findings of a home inspection, should be explored and pleaded.

Impact on Pleadings. This opinion illustrates the importance, in pleadings and in motion practice, of establishing the element of causation for a claim of fraudulent representation. Note that although some courts refer to section 100.18 claims as false advertising or fraudulent advertising claims, it is, in fact, untrue, deceptive, or misleading representations that are actionable; advertising need not be involved. Bonn v. Haubrich, 123 Wis. 2d 168, 366 N.W.2d 503 (Ct. App. 1985). Reasonable attorneys fees are awarded to the prevailing party. Wis. Stat. sec. 100.18(11)(b).

The Novell Court confirmed that unreasonable reliance could be a defense to a sec. 100.18 claim, and that unreasonable reliance could be considered as a factor weighing against causation. Nonetheless, the Novell Court stood firmly by the established case precedent that it is causation, and not reasonable reliance, that is the third requisite element of this statutory cause of action. In other words, all that need be established is reliance, rather than reasonable reliance, to satisfy this third element.

Impact on Briefing and Argument. It is critical to consider the ultimate holding of a case opinion, and not just selected footnotes or dicta, in citing to case law as support for ones position. This was the lesson to the defense counsel in Novell, whose reading of certain case precedent (from Malzewski) was described as actually supporting the position of the opposing party rather than the defense. Thus, careful consideration should be given to citing to case law that has, as its ultimate holding, a position contrary to the desired language contained elsewhere in the opinion. The attorney who draws the courts attention to such cases should present argument as to how and why the two views within the opinion can and should be reconciled. For additional discussion of misrepresentation see: Powell on Real Property Ch. 81, Contracts of Sale The Law of Vendor and Purchaser; Purchase and Sale of Real Property ch. 40 Caveat Emptor, Implied Warranties and Warranties for New Construction.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in Beloit, Wisconsin, and South Beloit, Illinois. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin, at the trial and appellate levels.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

53 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Susan M. Brazas on Busch v. Mison

2008 Emerging Issues 3083

Susan M. Brazas on Busch v. Mison, 2008 Ill. App. LEXIS 909 (Sept. 15, 2008)

By Susan M. Brazas

November 13, 2008

SUMMARY: The 1st Dist. App. Ct. considered a challenge to the sufficiency of a single rejection of an arbitration award for two cases commenced in separate court divisions and under separate case numbers but consolidated for the purposes of discovery and trial. In Busch v. Mison, the First District explores the potential trap for the unwary, even where pains have been taken to timely file the rejection within the 30-day limit of Supreme Court Rule 93.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: ILLINOIS FIRST DISTRICT HOLDS THAT A SINGLE REJECTION OF ARBITRATION AWARD IS SUFFICIENT TO REJECT THE AWARD AS TO BOTH CASES CONSOLIDATED FOR DISCOVERY AND FOR TRIAL.

In Busch v. Mison, 2008 Ill. App. LEXIS 909 (Sept. 15, 2008), the First District Appellate Court of Illinois addressed the applicability of Supreme Court Rule 93(a) to an arbitration award of two separate cases consolidated by the circuit court prior to the arbitration hearing for purposes of discovery and trial. In affirming the trial court in this interlocutory appeal under Illinois Supreme Court Rule 308, the First District answered affirmatively the certified question of whether the single rejection of the arbitration award served as a rejection of the award as to both cases which had been consolidated and presented at a single arbitration hearing.

This case arose from a two-car accident in which Busch was the driver, and Kushma his passenger, in one vehicle, and Mison was the driver of the other vehicle. Busch and Kuschma brought a personal injury action against Mison, alleging injuries due to his negligence in the automobile accident. Mison filed a separate personal injury lawsuit against Busch for his injuries sustained in the same accident. The circuit court consolidated the two suits, stating that consolidation was for purposes of discovery and trial. One arbitration hearing ensued, and one arbitration award was entered.

Within the 30-day time limit of Illinois Supreme Court Rule 93(a), Mison filed a rejection of the award. Several motions and response briefs were then filed, requesting the circuit court to rule on whether the rejection applied to both cases, or only to the one municipal-court-division case filed by Busch. The Cook County Circuit Court held that Rule 93(a) did not require separate notices of rejection of award, but certified a question of law on the issue pursuant to Illinois Supreme Court Rule 308.

The First District Court of Appeals held that a single notice of rejection that covers any part of the arbitration award is sufficient under Rule 93(a) when cases have been consolidated for purposes of discovery and trial. As part of its reasoning, the First District concluded that such a consolidation was intended to bring the entire case to a resolution, and was distinguishable from a consolidation merely for convenience. The Court also interpreted Supreme Court Rule 92(c) to mean that any rejection of any part of an arbitration award applies to the entire award.

Practical Implications. Counsel cannot assume that consolidation will be viewed by as having been done in order to bring the entire case to a single resolution unless the court order of consolidation specifically indicates that the cases are consolidated for the purposes of discovery and trial. Therefore, counsel will be well advised to take steps to have such language included in an order entered prior to the arbitration hearing. Caution is also required because it is uncertain whether the Busch ruling will be considered by the Supreme Court, or whether other courts will limit it to its facts.

Strategic Considerations. Among the factors to be considered in moving for, or objecting to, consolidation of cases is whether it will be strategically advantageous to one's client to have the separate cases heard together. If, for example, having both cases heard at once would likely result in one's own claim being defeated, separate proceedings should be undertaken. Likewise, consolidation should be avoided if the nature of the relief requested is so different in the two cases that inequities or inconsistent outcomes would likely result.

Counsel should consider carefully the strategic decision of whether to reject an arbitration award. Rule 93 contains no provision for the withdrawal of a notice of rejection and, therefore, it will not be allowed. Stemple v. Pickerill, 377 Ill. App. 3d 788 (2d Dist. 2007). This is because if one party files a notice of rejection, any other party wishing to reject the award may rely on that notice, and need not file its own notice of rejection. Id. Only upon a party's petition (and not on the court's own motion) to bar a party from rejecting the arbitration award under Supreme Court Rule 91(b) may the court exercise its discretion to so bar a party. Walker v. Lewis, 352 Ill. App. 3d 952, 961 (1st Dist. 2004).

Take Caution When Filing Notice of Rejection of Arbitration Award. The Busch opinion -- especially the special concurrence -- suggests that the language chosen by the attorney drafting the rejection of the arbitration award is critical. This language should be clear and should specify exactly the parts of the arbitration award that are being rejected. Quoting from the award of the arbitrators will be the safest course. If a party wishes to reject the entire award, the rejection should state that explicitly.

Among the arguments on appeal advanced by Busch was that Mison's rejection should be limited to only the municipal court division case, because Mison listed only that case number in the caption of his notice of rejection. To avoid this possible basis for limitation on the notice of rejection of award, and to err on the side of caution, counsel should include any and all case numbers -- and the language consolidated with -- in the caption of the notice of rejection of award.

Above all, counsel should exercise great care to calendar the due date for filing a rejection of the arbitration award. By the express terms of Rule 93(a), the a rejection of the award may be filed only within 30 days after the filing of an award with the clerk of the court, and upon payment to the clerk of the court the sum of $200 for awards of $30,000 or less or $500 for awards greater than $30,000. The Rule contains no provision for discretion or for extensions of time beyond the 30 days.

Counsel should also err on the side of caution as to the fee paid, if the awards taken together may be viewed as exceeding $30,000. Payment of the lesser fee could be construed as meeting the requirements for rejecting only one aspect of the award or, worse yet, could be construed as a failure timely to file. Counsel cannot rely upon the assurance of a deputy court clerk as to the correct amount of the fee, as the mandatory fee provisions within Rule 93(a) will be strictly construed. Liebovich Steel & Aluminum Co. v. Advance Iron Works, Inc., 353 Ill. App. 3d 311, 314 (2d Dist. 2004). Further, the requisite fee must be paid within the 30-day period, or the notice of rejection will be stricken. Killoren v. Racich, 260 Ill. App. 3d 197, 198, 632 N.E.2d 621 (1994). Thus, counsel should allow plenty of time and give ample consideration to all details of the notice of rejection.

For a discussion of arbitration see: Illinois Civil Procedure Ch. 11 MANDATORY ARBITRATIONS, SETTLEMENTS, DISMISSALS, AND DEFAULTS. See generally Illinois Civil Procedure LexisNexis Forms.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin. Ms. Brazas is an author of the LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas has written and lectured on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and developments in case law.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

54 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Susan M. Brazas on Rogers v. Tyson Foods, Inc.

2008 Emerging Issues 3084

Susan M. Brazas on Rogers v. Tyson Foods, Inc., 2008 Ill. App. LEXIS 915 (Aug. 11, 2008).

By Susan Brazas

November 13, 2008

SUMMARY: Knowing when and how to position a case for possible interlocutory appeal is an important strategic consideration. The Fifth District addressed the issue of the appellate courts jurisdiction to review the denial of a motion for summary judgment based on the federal preemption doctrine in Rogers v. Tyson Foods. Susan Brazas explores this decision and suggests some alternative strategies for obtaining prompt interlocutory appellate review.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Fifth District Finds It Lacks Jurisdiction to Review Denial of Motion for Summary Judgment Asserting Federal Preemption

In Rogers v. Tyson Foods, 2008 Ill. App. LEXIS 915 (Aug. 11, 2008),

the Fifth District Appellate Court addressed its jurisdiction to consider the trial courts denial of a motion for summary judgment which asserted the federal preemption doctrine. The short opinion in Rogers concludes with the abrupt holding that the Appellate Court is without jurisdiction to consider the federal preemption argument which the defendant had raised in its motion for summary judgment in the trial court because that motion had been denied and the denial was not a final judgment subject to interlocutory appeal as of right. A final judgment or decision is generally a prerequisite to appellate jurisdiction. Arangold Corp. v. Zehnder, 187 Ill. 2d 341, 359 (1999).

Practical Implications. Although the Rogers court did not mention it, there is an exception to the general rule against granting interlocutory appeals of right for the denial of summary judgment motions: where the parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment, and one motion was granted and the other denied. Arangold Corp. v. Zehnder, 187 Ill. 2d 341, 359 (1999). However, the opposing motions for summary judgment must be as to the same claim or issue for this principle of review to apply. Id. In such a situation, the resulting order is final and appealable because it entirely disposes of the litigation. However, the test for a judgment being appealable is that the particular judgment appealed from, if affirmed, would leave only the execution of the judgment. Flores v. Dugan, 91 Ill. 2d 108, 112 435 N.E.2d 480 (1982). In contrast, in the Rogers case, if the denial of the defendants motion for summary judgment were affirmed, the litigation would proceed.

The other factor that identifies an appealable order is the magic language, under Supreme Court Rule 304, that it as a final and appealable order. See Berry v. Chade Fashions, Inc., 890 N.E.2d 1239, 1243 (1st Dist. 2008). In the event that counsel is not clear on whether an order will be viewed as appealable, this or similar language should be included in the order at the circuit court. This explicit language can be helpful because it is established law that a judgment that fails to dispose of all claims is not final and is subject to revision before entry of a final judgment that does adjudicate all the claims and liabilities of the parties. Towns v. Yellow Cab Co., 73 Ill. 2d 113, 120, 382 N.E.2d 1217, 1220 (1978).

Standards for Pleading. The attorney considering strategy for dispositive motions should consider the limitations of a motion for summary judgment in the event that it is denied. Once the case is properly postured, a motion to dismiss or motion for judgment on the pleadings may offer a more advantageous resolution of key issues such as preemption. The dilemma of the defendant in Rogers is understandable; its position was that the case should not be before the state court at all, but the appellate court found itself without jurisdiction to hear that argument. A large number of federal cases address preemption and summary judgment and counsel would be advised to glean persuasive authority from those sources.

Implications for Argument and Briefing. Counsel can also stress the overarching principles of equity and fairness in arguing for the appellate court to exercise jurisdiction over an interlocutory appeal. For example, a basic tenet of preemption is that federal law does not preempt state law unless Congress intended that it should. Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 505 U.S. 504, 516, 112 S. Ct. 2608 (1992). Counsel should peruse not only the explicit language of the federal statute, but also the statute's structure and purpose, and examine whether the state law is in actual conflict with federal law. Garcia v. Volvo Europa Truck, N.V., 1996 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9587, 6-7 (N.D. Ill. June 20, 1996).

Strategic Considerations. The Rogers court identified the following distinguishing aspects of cases in which preemption arguments were found to be within the appellate courts' jurisdiction: (1) where a motion to stay proceedings was granted or denied and (2) where a motion for preliminary injunction was granted or denied. The Rogers court thus hinted at the existence of two windows of opportunity for litigants to bring themselves within the appellate courts' jurisdiction: via a motion to stay or a motion for preliminary injunction. Thus, attorneys can consider availing themselves of either of these mechanisms as a way to have an important issue such as preemption -- which provides a complete affirmative defense -- considered early in the case. The advantage of these two approaches over a motion for summary judgment is that whether the motion is granted or denied is irrelevant: in either event, the appellate court has jurisdiction because motions of these two types fit squarely within the bases for jurisdiction set forth within Rule 307(a).

For further discussion of appeals from grants or denials of motions, see:

Illinois Civil Procedure Ch. 15, Appellate Review; Illinois Litigation Forms and Checklists C109.02, Appealing Non-Final Order.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin. Ms. Brazas is an author of the LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas has lectured at ISBA seminars on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and case law developments.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

55 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Dual Partnership Citizenship: Vairo on Swiger v. Allegheny Energy, Inc.

2008 Emerging Issues 3052

Dual Partnership Citizenship: Vairo on Swiger v. Allegheny Energy, Inc.

By Georgene Vairo

October 21, 2008

SUMMARY: When one party to a suit is a partnership with a partner who has dual U.S./foreign citizenship and is permanently living abroad, can there ever be diversity jurisdiction? In Swiger v. Allegheny Energy, Inc., the Third Circuit Court of Appeals addresses this question. This Emerging Issues Analysis, by Moores Federal Practice Editorial Board member Georgene Vairo, explores the difficult jurisdictional issues raised in the case.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Georgene Vairo on Swiger v. Allegheny Energy, Inc.

Swiger v. Allegheny Energy, Inc., 540 F.3d 179, 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 18139 (3d Cir. Aug. 25, 2008), involves an issue that is becoming increasingly important in our globalized world: how dual citizenship affects diversity jurisdiction. Although at first glance Swiger seems simply to affirm the general rule that the presence of a stateless citizen destroys complete diversity, it is an important case because it deals with the citizenship of a dual U.S./foreign citizen as well. The Third Circuit held that there is no diversity jurisdiction if one of the parties is a partnership with a partner who is a dual United States and United Kingdom citizen permanently living abroad.

Facts and Procedural Background. A citizen of West Virginia sued several entities in federal court on several state-law claims, including abuse of process, wrongful use of civil proceedings, invasion of privacy, and wrongful discharge. One of the defendants, a law firm, was a partnership, and one of the members of that partnership was a dual U.S. and United Kingdom citizen domiciled in the United Kingdom.

The law firm, joined by the other defendants, moved to dismiss the complaint on the ground that complete diversity between the parties was lacking. At the time of the filing of the lawsuit, one of the law firms partners was a dual United States and United Kingdom citizen domiciled in the United Kingdom. The district court dismissed the case for lack of jurisdiction, concluding that the citizenship of all of the members of an unincorporated entity such as a general or limited partnership count when determining whether diversity jurisdiction exists, and that a United States citizen who is not domiciled in one of the United States cannot invoke diversity jurisdiction. The district court dismissed the case for lack of jurisdiction [Swiger v. Allegheny Energy, Inc., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8610, at *2S*3 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 7, 2007)], and the Third Circuit affirmed.

Legal Basics. The diversity statute provides for jurisdiction over actions between: (1) citizens of different States; (2) citizens of a State and citizens or subjects of a foreign state; (3) citizens of different States and in which citizens or subjects of a foreign state are additional parties; and (4) a foreign state . . . as plaintiff and citizens of a State or of different States." [28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)]. A natural person is deemed to be a citizen of the state where she is domiciled. [See Gilbert v. David, 235 U.S. 561, 569, 35 S. Ct. 164, 59 L. Ed. 360 (1915).] Congress has expressly provided that the citizenship of a corporation is both (1) of the state or states in which it is incorporated and (2) of the state in which it has its principal place of business. [See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(1).]

Quoting Moore's Federal Practice [15 Moore's Federal Practice § 102.57[1] (3d ed. 2006) (a partnership is not a 'citizen' of any state within the meaning of the statutes regulating jurisdiction)], and Carden v. Arkoma Assoc., 494 U.S. 185, 187 S.Ct. 1192, 110 S. Ct. 1015, 108 L. Ed. 2d 157 (1990) (holding that a limited partnership is not a citizen under the jurisdictional statute), the Third Circuit stated that a partnership and other unincorporated associations, unlike individuals or corporations, would not be considered a citizen" as that term is used in the diversity statute.

Because a partnership is not a citizen for diversity purposes, the citizenship of all of the partners determines the citizenship of a partnership. [See Carden v. Arkoma Assoc., 494 U.S. 185, 187 S.Ct. 1192, 110 S. Ct. 1015, 108 L. Ed. 2d 157 (1990)]. Thus, to satisfy the complete diversity requirement, all of the partners must be diverse from all of the parties on the opposing side [Lincoln Prop. Co. v. Roche, 546 U.S. 81, 84 n.1, 126 S. Ct. 606, 163 L. Ed. 2d 415 (2006)].

Partner Domiciled Abroad Is Not Citizen of State. The Third Circuit noted the special problem presented by partnerships that have American partners living abroad. It stated the axiom that in order to be a citizen of a State within the meaning of the diversity statute, a natural person must be both a citizen of the United States and be a domiciliary of a state. [See Newman-Green, Inc. v. Alfonzo-Larrain, 490 U.S. 826, 828, 109 S. Ct. 2218, 104 L. Ed. 2d 893 (1988).] An American citizen domiciled abroad, although a citizen of the United States, cannot simultaneously be domiciled in a state. Such a person is considered stateless" for purposes of diversity jurisdiction, and therefore, American citizens living abroad cannot be sued (or sue) in federal court based on diversity jurisdiction.

Stateless" Partner Destroys Diversity Jurisdiction. Citing Moore's again, the Third Circuit agreed with its sister circuits that the principles outlined above preclude diversity jurisdiction over a suit in which a partner of a partnership that is a party is a U.S. citizen domiciled abroad [see 15 Moore's Federal Practice § 102.37[16] (If a member of a partnership is a United States citizen permanently living abroad, there can be no diversity of jurisdiction because the member is neither a citizen of a state nor a citizen of a foreign country)]; Herrick Co. v. SCS Communs., Inc., 251 F.3d 315, 322 (2d Cir. 2001); accord ISI Int'l, Inc. v. Borden Ladner Gervais LLP, 316 F.3d 731, 733 (7th Cir. 2003); Cresswell v. Sullivan & Cromwell, 922 F.2d 60, 69 (2d Cir. 1990)].

Citizenship of Other Partners Does Not Preserve Diversity. The Third Circuit rejected the plaintiffs argument that the court should focus on the citizenship of the partners who are citizens of states, ignoring the statelessness" of the partner living abroad. The plaintiff reasoned that the partnership should be considered a citizen of all the states of which one of its partners is a citizen, rendering the partnership not stateless." However, the Third Circuit found this argument to be in conflict with the Supreme Courts explicit holding that for purposes of diversity jurisdiction, a partnerships citizenship is determined by reference to all partners, and all partners must be diverse from all parties on the opposing side" [see Lincoln Prop. Co. v. Roche, 546 U.S. 81, 84 n. 1, 126 S. Ct. 606, 163 L. Ed. 2d 415 (2006)]. Because the law firm had a stateless partner, not all partners of the partnership were diverse from all parties on the opposing side. According to the Third Circuit, the district court had correctly held that it lacked diversity jurisdiction over the action.

Comment. It is true that an individual can be domiciled in only one state or country at a time, as opposed to having one or more residences. However, the Third Circuit pushed the envelope a bit. Relying on Newman-Green, the Third Circuit stated that United States citizens domiciled abroad are neither citizens of a State,' see 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(1), nor citizens or subjects of a foreign state, see 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(2). Unlike this case, Newman-Green did not involve a dual United States/Foreign state party. Curiously, the plaintiff seemed to accept the district courts characterization of the partner as a stateless" citizen. The plaintiff argued that the district court erred in holding that it lacked diversity jurisdiction on the theory that a single partner who is not a citizen of a state would not render the entire partnership stateless for diversity purposes. However, the plaintiff assume[d]" that the partner was in fact stateless.

Whether a federal district court has diversity jurisdiction over a lawsuit involving a partnership that has among its partners an American citizen domiciled in a foreign state was an issue of first impression for the Third Circuit. The plaintiffs assumption, however, made the Third Circuits job easy. All courts that have addressed the issue of whether a federal district court has diversity jurisdiction over a lawsuit involving a partnership that has among its partners an American citizen domiciled in a foreign state have held that such an entity does not qualify for diversity jurisdiction. However, the plaintiff did make the argument that the partners dual citizenship in the United Kingdom created alienage jurisdiction. The Third Circuit next turned to that argument.

No Alienage Jurisdiction for Dual Citizens. The Third Circuit also rejected the plaintiffs argument that the foreign citizenship of the stateless" partner should be considered for purposes of establishing diversity. If the foreign citizenship were considered, there would be diversity, because the plaintiff was a citizen of West Virginia and the partner was a citizen of the United Kingdom [see 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(2)]. However, while this case was pending on appeal, the Third Circuit held in another case that for purposes of diversity jurisdiction, only the American nationality of a dual national is recognized for diversity purposes. [Frett-Smith v. Vanterpool, 511 F.3d 396, 400 (3d Cir. 2008)]. Thus, the plaintiff could not rely on alienage jurisdiction either.

Comment. The issue of dual citizenship was also a case of first impression for the Third Circuit. As in the stateless citizen issue, the Third Circuit agreed with the growing trend in its sister circuits that have been holding that for a dual national citizen, only the American nationality is relevant for purposes of diversity jurisdiction. These courts argue that diversity jurisdiction may be properly invoked only when a dual citizen's domicile, and thus his citizenship, is in a state diverse from that of adverse parties. [See Coury v. Prot, 85 F.3d 244, 250 (5th Cir. 1996) (citing Action S.A. v. Marc Rich & Co., 951 F.2d 504 (2d Cir. 1991); Sadat v. Mertes, 615 F.2d 1176 (7th Cir. 1980); Mutuelles Unies v. Kroll & Linstrom, 957 F.2d 707 (9th Cir. 1992); Las Vistas Villas, S.A. v. Petersen, 778 F. Supp. 1202 (D.C. Fla. 1991), aff'd, 13 F.3d 409 (11th Cir. 1994).] The only way that an American citizen, domiciled abroad, can sue under § 1332 is under § 1332(a)(1), and only if that national is a citizen, i.e., domiciled, in one of the 50 U.S. states. This emerging view is based on the rationale that a dual citizen should not be allowed to invoke alienage jurisdiction under § 1332(a)(2) because that would give him an advantage not enjoyed by native-born American citizens. [T]he major purpose of alienage jurisdiction is to promote international relations by assuring other countries that litigation involving their nationals will be treated at the national level, and alienage jurisdiction is intended to allow foreign subjects to avoid real or perceived bias in the state courts--a justification that should not be available to the dual citizen who is an American." [Coury v. Prot, 85 F.3d 244, 250 (5th Cir. 1996) (quoting from 1 Moore's Federal Practice (2d ed.) § 0.75[4]).]

Concurrence: Stateless" Partners Should Be Treated as Jurisdictional Zeroes." Circuit Judge McKee concurred. He agreed that the authority on which the majority relied strongly suggests the majority's analysis, but he argued that the case law does not necessarily compel the result reached by the court. Applying the Carden rule concerning the citizenship of partnerships and the stateless" citizen doctrine together resulted in a ruling that was inconsistent with both reality and common sense. It would be more logical, he pointed out, to treat a stateless" partner in this situation as a jurisdictional zero" rather than, in essence, as a citizen of the plaintiffs state. The purposes of diversity jurisdiction would be fully served as long as none of the partners was a citizen of the plaintiffs home state.

Judge McKee pointed out that as business ventures and legal relationships become more global, courts will be faced with stateless" partners more often. He expressed hope that Congress will clarify the meaning of Section 1332(a), making it clear whether diversity jurisdiction extends to these circumstances. Otherwise, he warned, persons suing large partnerships will increasingly be barred from bringing their claims in federal court.

Comment. Both the majority and the concurring judge are correct to look at the purpose of the diversity statute. It is likely that the well-known bias against the assertion of diversity jurisdiction supports the majority view. However, just as Congress decided to expand diversity jurisdiction in the Class Action Fairness Act [see 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)], Congress ought to take up Judge McKee's suggestion to consider amending § 1332 to clarify how dual citizens and partnerships with stateless citizens ought to be treated. Indeed it is time for Congress to take up the Supreme Court's hint in Carden to amend the statute (as it did in the Class Action Fairness Act which treats unincorporated associations as corporations) to conform with modern business realities.

Moreover, Judge McKee is likely correct that the majority stretched two somewhat dissimilar lines of Supreme Court precedent, i.e., the stateless citizen line and the unincorporated association line, to reach an illogical conclusion. Despite its apparent relevance to this jurisdictional dispute, for example, Judge McKee noted that Carden does not definitively answer the specific question here. In Carden, an Arizona limited partnership brought a diversity action against two Louisiana citizens. The partnership asserted that complete diversity was satisfied because none of its general partners shared the same citizenship as any adverse party. The citizenship of its limited partners, it argued, was irrelevant to the presence of diversity jurisdiction. The Court rejected that position and held that complete diversity was lacking because one of the limited partners was, like the defendants, a citizen of Louisiana, thus precluding complete diversity. Similarly, in Grupo Dataflux v. Atlas Global Group, L.P., 541 U.S. 567, 124 S. Ct. 1920, 158 L. Ed. 2d 866 (2004), because aliens were on both sides of the case, the requisite diversity was therefore lacking. Neither case directly addressed the specific jurisdictional question before the Third Circuit: whether diversity jurisdiction exists when no party on either side share a common citizenship. In other words, why is complete diversity lacking when the plaintiff is a citizen of one state and no defendant is a citizen of that state.

References. 15 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) §§ 102.37[16], 102.57[1], 102.70.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

56 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Can a State Remove Under CAFA?: Vairo on LA ex rel. Caldwell v. Allstate Ins. Co

2008 Emerging Issues 3053

Can a State Remove Under CAFA?: Vairo on Louisiana ex rel. Caldwell v. Allstate Ins. Co

By Georgene Vairo

October 21, 2008

SUMMARY: If a state sues as parens patriae on behalf of its citizens, rather than as the representative of a class, may the defendant remove under the Class Action Fairness Act? In Louisiana ex rel. Caldwell v. Allstate Ins. Co., the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals addresses this question. This Emerging Issues Analysis evaluates the disparate approaches taken in the majority and dissenting opinions.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Louisiana ex rel. Caldwell v. Allstate Ins. Co., 536 F.3d 418, 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 15275 (5th Cir. July 18, 2008), picks up where another recent Fifth Circuit case left off. In Louisiana v. AAA Ins. (In re Katrina Canal Litig. Breaches), 524 F.3d 700, 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 7933 (5th Cir. Apr. 11, 2008), the Fifth Circuit dealt with an issue of first impression under the Class Action Fairness Act (CAFA): may a defendant remove under CAFA if the state is the named plaintiff in a class action case? The court held that the State of Louisiana was not entitled to remand of a class action suit, because the state had joined a class of citizen plaintiffs not entitled to any immunity that might otherwise protect the state from removal. In Allstate, the second case, the Fifth Circuit decided another issue of first impression: if a state sues as parens patriae on behalf of its citizens, rather than as the representative of a class, may the defendant remove under CAFA? The Fifth Circuit held that the case was properly removed under CAFA.

Facts and Procedural Background of Katrina Litigation: In the wake of Hurricane Katrina, Louisiana enacted the Road Home Program. In exchange for a partial assignment of the homeowners' claims against their insurers, the State of Louisiana advanced money to Louisiana homeowners to reconstruct. As the partial assignee of these claims, Louisiana sued over 200 insurance companies for breach of contract in Louisiana state court, adding a class of Louisiana citizens who had applied for funds from the program as plaintiffs. The defendants removed the case to federal court on the ground of diversity under the Class Action Fairness Act (CAFA) [see 28 U.S.C. §§ 1332(d)(2) (CAFA diversity requirements), 1453(b) (removal under CAFA)].

Louisiana argued that CAFA did not apply, and that even if it did apply by its terms, it could not abrogate sovereign immunity from federal process. Alternatively, it argued that Congress did not clearly abrogate sovereign immunity from federal process in CAFA. The district court denied Louisiana's motion to remand, and the Fifth Circuit affirmed. Although the Fifth Circuit agreed with Louisiana that a state was not a citizen for diversity purposes, even under CAFA, Louisiana sought relief not only for itself, but also for the class of citizens joined as plaintiffs. This class of citizens satisfied the minimal diversity rules of CAFA, which require only that any member of a class of plaintiffs is a citizen of a State different from any defendant [see 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(2)].

The Fifth Circuit was sympathetic to Louisiana's argument that a state should not be subject to CAFA jurisdiction. However, it noted that Congress had considered and rejected an amendment that would have exempted class actions filed by an attorney general from removal under CAFA. Moreover, even CAFA's use of the term "citizen" did not bar its application because CAFA refers to the citizenship of any class member and any defendant. Accordingly, in expanding federal jurisdiction over certain class actions filed in state court, the Fifth Circuit eliminated the rule that citizenship of the named representative is controlling.

Finally, the court agreed that a state is not a citizen under the diversity statutes, including CAFA, but that because Louisiana sought relief for both the State and the citizens, both the State and the citizens were likely real parties in interest. Because CAFA only requires minimal diversity, CAFA supplies federal jurisdiction and a path to removal unless state sovereignty turns away its exercise.

In our Expert Commentary on the Katrina case, we noted as a practice pointer that state attorneys general wanting to stay out of federal court ought not join a class of state citizens. See Vairo, Georgene, In re Katrina Canal Litigation Breaches, LexisNexis Expert Commentary, 2008 Emerging Issues 2362. The line of Supreme Court precedent suggesting that a state is not a person or a citizen would likely be controlling. Before CAFA was enacted, the question whether a state plaintiff suing defendants over whom it has regulatory authority in state court under its own state laws may be removed to federal court on diversity grounds would not arise. The rule that a state is not a person for diversity purposes and the requirement of complete diversity always precluded the removal of a state's action on the ground of diversity. CAFA, with its minimal diversity requirements, however, pushes the question forward," because diversity jurisdiction may be based on minimal diversity, i.e., the citizenship of plaintiffs other than the state. So, what happens if the state sues without joining a class? That is the issue in the Allstate case.

Allstate Facts and Procedural Background. The State of Louisiana, through its attorney general, filed a parens patriae action against the Allstate Insurance Company, and a number of other insurers and their agents in state court alleging violations of Louisiana's antitrust laws. Specifically, Louisiana alleged a scheme to thwart policyholder indemnity. Allegedly, in violation of their fiduciary duties, the insurer defendants and others continuously manipulated Louisiana commerce by rigging the value of policyholder claims and raising the premiums held in trust by their companies for the benefit of policy holders to cover their losses. Louisiana alleged that the defendant insurance companies (and possibly others) worked together to undervalue and underpay policyholders' claims, particularly in the wake of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Defendants removed the action to federal court arguing that the parens patriae action was a class action or mass action under CAFA. Louisiana moved to remand the action, but the district judge denied the motion. The district court was primarily concerned about who the real parties in interest were in this case. In noting that it was his responsibility to look to the substance of the complaint--to pierce the pleadings--and to determine the real nature of the claim asserted, he explained: [I]t's the Court's responsibility to not just merely rely on who a plaintiff chose to sue, or, in this case, how the plaintiff chose to plead, but I have to look at the specific substance of . . . the complaint . . ." Judge Zainey concluded that, while the State was a nominal party, the real parties in interest were the citizen policyholders. Ultimately, he denied Louisiana's motion to remand the case back to state court, concluding that the lawsuit was properly removed under CAFA.

Louisiana petitioned the Fifth Circuit for permission to appeal the interlocutory order under CAFA. The petition was granted and a divided Fifth Circuit panel affirmed.

Relevant CAFA Provisions: Definition of Class Actions and Mass Actions. CAFA permits removal of class actions and mass actions involving parties with minimal diversity [see 28 U.S.C. §§ 1332(d)(2), (11), 1453]. For CAFA purposes, "class action" is defined as any civil action filed under rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure or similar State statute or rule of judicial procedure authorizing an action to be brought by 1 or more representative persons as a class action [28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(1)(B)]. A mass action is any civil action . . . in which monetary relief claims of 100 or more persons are proposed to be tried jointly on the ground that the plaintiffs claims involve common questions of law or fact, except that jurisdiction shall exist only over those plaintiffs whose claims in a mass action satisfy the jurisdiction amount requirement under [28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)]" [see 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(11)(B)(i)].

The Fifth Circuit majority then foreshadowed its decision. It looked to the legislative history of CAFA and stated that Congress intended that the term class action" should be construed broadly to prevent jurisdictional gamesmanship." It quoted from a Senate Report that stated that CAFAs application should not be confined solely to lawsuits that are labeled class actions' by the named plaintiff or the state rulemaking authority. Generally speaking, lawsuits that resemble a purported class action should be considered class actions for the purpose of applying these provisions." [See S. Rep. No. 109-14, at 35 (2005).]

Like the Katrina court, the majority also noted that Congress had considered but rejected an amendment that would have exempted class actions filed by state attorneys general from removal under CAFA. Here, the majority quoted Senator Hatch's statement: At worst, [the amendment] will create a loophole that some enterprising plaintiffs' lawyers will surely manipulate in order to keep their lucrative class action lawsuits in State court. . . . If this legislation enables State attorneys general to keep all class actions in State court, it will not take long for plaintiffs' lawyers to figure out that all they need to do to avoid the impact of [CAFA] is to persuade a State attorney general to simply lend the name of his or her office to a private class action." [See 151 Cong. Rec. S1157, 1163S1164 (daily ed. Feb. 9, 2005) (statement of Sen. Hatch).]

Louisiana Authorized to Bring Parens Patriae Antitrust Actions But Are They Class or Mass Actions?

Louisiana argued that because it had filed the action as a parens patriae action instead of a class action (as it had in the Katrina case) that CAFA did not supply federal jurisdiction. The Fifth Circuit agreed that a state has standing to bring a parens patriae action to assert an interest relating to sovereignty or a quasi-sovereign interest, such as the States interest in the physical and economic health and well-being of its citizens. Specifically, under Louisiana law, the Louisiana Attorney General has statutory and constitutional authority to bring parens patriae antitrust actions [see La. Rev. Stat. §§ 51.128, 51.138; see also La. Rev. Stat. § 13.5036]. However, the court did not decide whether this parens patriae authority allows the State to sue for treble damages in a representative capacity under state law. Rather, like the district court, it focused on a narrow issue: whether the real parties in interest were the individual policyholders or the State as the guide to whether the states parens patriae action should be considered a class action or mass action for CAFA purposes.

Comment. In taking this tack, the Fifth Circuit majority ignores the general rule that jurisdiction depends on a review of the well-pleaded complaint. The states complaint did not contain the words class action" or mass action." Nonetheless, the majority turned to the well-established" rule that in determining whether there is jurisdiction, federal courts look to the substance of the action and not only at the labels used by the parties. The first case on which the majority relied was Grassi v. Ciba-Geigy, Ltd., 894 F.2d 181, 185 (5th Cir. 1990), in which the Fifth Circuit had stated: [J]urisdictional rules may not be used to perpetrate a fraud or ill-practice upon the court by either improperly creating or destroying diversity jurisdiction. Were that to occur, we would not elevate form over substance but would accomplish whatever piercing and adjustments considered necessary to protect the court's jurisdiction." However, that case involved an assignment of interest to create federal jurisdiction, and Congress has specifically banned the use of collusive assignments to create jurisdiction [see 28 U.S.C. § 1359].

The second case the majority relied on was Wecker v. Nat'l Enameling & Stamping Co., 204 U.S. 176, 185S186, 27 S. Ct. 184, 51 L. Ed. 430 (1907), in which the Supreme Court stated: Federal courts should not sanction devices intended to prevent a removal to Federal court where one has that right, and should be equally vigilant to protect the right to proceed in the Federal court as to permit the state courts, in proper cases, to retain their own jurisdiction."). Of course, this standard invites a begging of the question. A defendant does not have the right to remove unless there is federal jurisdiction. And, the Wecker court dealt with the well-established fraudulent joinder" doctrine pursuant to which claims made against a local defendant to prevent removal will be disregarded if the plaintiff has no colorable claim against that defendant. Indeed, defendants may pierce the pleadings to show that the . . . claim has been fraudulently pleaded to prevent removal." [See Burchett v. Cargill, Inc., 48 F.3d 173, 175 (5th Cir. 1995) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).] Here, in essence, the defendants argued that the state fraudulently joined itself because it was not the real party in interest. Curiously, before the district court, at least according to the Fifth Circuit, Louisiana failed to object to the district court engaging in that sort of a piercing analysis.

Policyholders Are Real Parties in Interest With Respect to Treble Damages. The Fifth Circuit framed the real party in interest question as whether Louisiana's action is a parens patriae action or whether, as the district court found, the citizen policyholders are the real parties in interest." Nonetheless, the court began by examining the parens patriae case law. The purpose of this discussion was to make the point that in the context of such actions, the state is a real party in interest when an action concerns a type of injury that the state has addressed or would be likely to address to further the well-being of its citizens.

The Fifth Circuit determined that the policyholders were the real parties in interest, at least with respect to the claim for treble damages. The court explained that a party is a real party in interest when it is directly and personally concerned in the outcome of the litigation to the extent that his or her participation in the litigation will ensure a genuine adversary issue between the parties. The state does not have such an interest when it sues for the particular benefit of a limited number of citizens and does not assert a direct interest of its own. The court concluded that the only parties with the direct interest in the treble damages sought by the Attorney General were the individual policyholders, who were the ones who suffered damages.

Type of Relief Matters. The court acknowledged that if Louisiana were seeking only injunctive relief, it would have a more compelling argument that it is the real party in interest. In In re Katrina Canal Litigation Breaches (referred to by the court as Road Home), in which another panel of the Fifth Circuit refused to remand another case brought by the Louisiana Attorney General against insurance companies in connection with damage caused by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, the panel left open the possibility that various claims could be severed so that the claims that were removable under CAFA (the claims of the class of Louisiana citizens) would remain in federal court, while Louisianas claims could be remanded to state court [see In re Katrina Canal Litigation Breaches, 524 F.3d 700, 711S712 (2008), discussed at 2008 Emerging Issues 2362.]. The Fifth Circuit again raised that possibility with respect to the claims for injunctive relief in this case, although during oral argument the State had insisted it was not interested in having the injunctive relief claims severed from the damage claims.

Suit Is Mass Action" Subject to CAFA Removal. Having determined that the policyholders were the real parties in interest, the Fifth Circuit agreed with the defendants that the action was properly removed under CAFA because the requirements of a mass action were met: the suit was a civil action in which monetary claims of 100 or more persons were proposed to be tried jointly on the ground that they involved common questions of law or fact, the aggregate amount in controversy was at least $5 million, the parties were minimally diverse, and the suit was brought in a representative capacity on behalf of those who allegedly suffered harm [see 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(11)(B)(i)].

Comment. Of course, given how the state structured the case as a parens patriae action none of the policy holders were parties to the suit. Should not the court have simply dismissed the case? If the state, the only plaintiff named on the complaint, was not a real party in interest, then there were no proper plaintiffs before the court, and there was no attempt to join any new plaintiffs. Yet, the Fifth Circuit found that the claims of 100 or more persons were proposed to be tried jointly. The court did not address whether the suit could properly proceed as a class action following further proceedings on remand. Nor did it determine the manner by which the individual policyholders were to be added to the case, leaving this matter to the district judges capable hands."

There is no question that the Fifth Circuits approach vindicates Congressional intent to interpret CAFAs expanded jurisdictional provisions broadly. But, it seems inappropriate to hijack a case with no plaintiffs. If the case had been dismissed, the state had the option of refilling series of cases, each with fewer than 100 plaintiffs, to get the ball rolling towards a resolution of its claims against the defendants.

Louisiana Waived Eleventh Amendment Immunity. Finally, the Fifth Circuit held that Louisiana had waived any Eleventh Amendment immunity by bringing a suit in which individual policyholders were the real parties in interest. In so holding, the court again relied on Katrina, in which the other panel held that the State had waived immunity by joining a class of private citizens [see In re Katrina Canal Litigation Breaches, 524 F.3d 700, 711 (2008)]. The court concluded that it was bound by this circuit precedent. However, it should be noted that in Katrina, the Louisiana Attorney General had explicitly added a class of Louisiana citizens to his suit against the insurance companies [see In re Katrina Canal Litigation Breaches, 524 F.3d 700, 703 (2008)]. The Attorney General had not added such citizen plaintiffs in this case, though the Fifth Circuit proclaimed them the real parties in interest.

Dissent: Suit Not Removable Under CAFA. In a dissenting opinion, Judge Southwick disagreed with the majority's approach. He argued that in determining whether the case was removable under CAFA, the court should have limited its consideration to what the case is, not what it must be if all the relief requested is to be part of the litigation. In other words, because the case as then structured did not satisfy the definition of a class action or a mass action, it was not subject to removal under CAFA. Although he noted that perhaps the case ought to be structured as a class action or mass action, it was not. Accordingly, the parens patriae case should have been remanded to state court, where answers to the following questions could be obtained: (1) does the Louisiana Attorney General have authority to bring the treble damage claims under the Louisiana Monopolies Act? This is important, because if it did, it would be more likely that the court would have to consider the state a real party in interest. (2) If so, must the attorney general use a class or mass action to do so? And (3) if so, does the Attorney General wish to amend the suit or to dismiss the treble damage claims, which then under Katrina would be removable under CAFA?

Judge Southwick also argued that even if the state were merely a nominal party, such a conclusion could not make this suit a mass action. Instead, Judge Southwick would find that the Attorney General had filed a defective pleading under Louisiana law. In his view, the majority was the wrong court making a premature finding.

Comment. Judge Southwick's approach is preferable. It may well be true that the case was of a kind Congress intended to be removable under CAFA, especially because as the majority pointed out the state was represented by several plaintiffs law firms. And, it may well have turned out to be true had the case been remanded that the state attorney general would have been required under Louisiana state law to name a class of policy holders of over 100 plaintiffs in order to obtain treble damages. But, to do less violence to principles of federalism, it would have been preferable to have those issues decided by the state court, rather than not resolved at all.

Judge Southwick also reminds us that doubts about removal ought to be resolved in favor of remand. Moreover, he correctly observes that Louisiana cannot be forced to litigate in the posture of a plaintiff in a mass action or, as a class representative, so that the court can find that there is federal jurisdiction: Deciding that a removed case should be a class or mass action does not create or confirm anything. It only states our opinion that the parties after procedural work in state court should make this a removable action."

Additionally, as the majority seems to understand, the fact that Congress did not provide a state attorney general suits exemption under CAFA may have been because some members believed that such immunity existed automatically.

It may well be worthwhile for the state to consider petitioning for en banc review or for certiorari.

References. 5 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) §§ 23.63[2][e], 23.63A[6]; 15 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) §§ 102.107[3], 107.14[2][g][v]; 17A Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 123.41[2].

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

57 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Higginbotham on Revisions to Rule 26: Expert Trial Witness Discovery

2008 Emerging Issues 2771

The Honorable Patrick E. Higginbotham on Revisions to Rule 26: Expert Trial Witness Discovery

By Hon. Patrick E. Higginbotham

September 28, 2008

SUMMARY: On August 8, 2008, revisions to Rule 26 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure were published for public comment. The revisions would make significant changes in the rules governing disclosure and discovery of expert witness information. The Hon. Patrick E. Higginbotham, U.S. Circuit Judge, Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, and author of the Rule 26 coverage in Moores Federal Practice, offers an introduction to these important proposals.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Hon. Patrick E. Higginbotham on Revisions to Rule 26: Expert Trial Witness Discovery

Cite as: Hon. Patrick E. Higginbotham, Revisions to Rule 26: Expert Witness Discovery, LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online)

I. Introduction

The large experiment with pretrial discovery and notice pleading launched in 1938 with adoption of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure has continued over the past 70 years. It is a history of rulemaking responsive to the experience of judges and lawyers working with sea changes in federal litigation.

These years have seen the growth of the public law model with citizens seeking judicial policing of federal and state executive and legislative functions, the enlisting by Congress of private suits to enforce its legislative norms such as regulation of securities markets, the environment, antitrust, patents, ERISA, and anti-discrimination laws -- to start a long list. The substantive questions asked of judges and juries reach deep into complex issues of science, mathematics, economics, medicine, engineering, and electronics -- to start another long list.

Lawyers have turned to experts in these fields to teach them and then to teach judges and juries -- consulting experts and testifying experts. The costly mining of these technologies with the attending necessary schooling of lawyers has spawned persistent disputes over proprietary rights -- of attorney-client privilege and attorney work product. And the paper trails these efforts leave, in turn with the large changes in their retention brought by computer technology, have created an industry of document retention and production. Envisioned at the outset as an enterprise of counsel, discovery has become a free-standing business selling support services to case managers. And discovery's place in the time line and its role in the development of a case have changed as the Rule 56 summary judgment has increasingly become the main event. Over this course have come responsive changes in the rules of Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and the Federal Rules of Evidence.

The rule changes now published for comment and the rules with which they are entwined are best understood against the backdrop of these tidal changes. This history makes plain that new rules for discovery and amendments to old rules are based on experience in practice and their effectiveness upon the Committees understanding of that experience. In short the comment period is vital. My task is to introduce the changes in Rule 26 now published for comment.

One introductory matter remains: a setting that needs a brief reminder of relevant rule changes over the past 30 years, a gentle introduction to the reality that the dynamic character of civil litigation in the United States and the resistance of discovery to discipline, particularly by rules of civil procedure, teach that rule making for the arena of discovery is best undertaken with low expectations. That we try and try again is testament to the importance of the enterprise, not new found formulations

II. Historical Overview

A. The 1970 Amendments

Before the 1970 amendments, the rules of discovery were relatively dispersed. With the growing concerns over the increasing cost of litigation and a sense that discovery was a major contributor to that cost, if not the culprit, the Rules Committee moved much of discovery regulation to Rule 26. The idea was to establish Rule 26 as a rule governing discovery in general." n1 Rule 26(b)(3) addressed production of trial preparation materials n2 and good cause" was deleted as a requirement for production of documents under Rule 34. n3 Rule 26(b)(4) was added creating different tracks for those who will testify at trial and those experts who will not. n4 Discovery from the non-testifying expert implicated attorney work product and the rule allowed discovery only on a showing of exceptional circumstances under which it would be impractical for the party seeking discovery to obtain facts or opinions on the subject by other means. The provisions of Rule 30(b) governing protective orders n5 were transferred to Rule 26(a) to give it application to discovery generally." n6 Finally, Rule 26(e) turned to duty of supplementation, providing that a party is under a duty seasonably to supplement his response with respect to any question directly addressed to (A) the identity and location of persons having knowledge of discoverable matters, and (B) the identity of each person expected to be called as an expert witness at trial, the subject matter on which he is expected to testify, and the substance of his testimony." n7

B. The 1980, 1983 And 1987 Amendments

In 1980, new subdivision 26(f) added the requirement of a discovery conference. n8

Three years later, the Committee made changes in 26(a) and 26(b), adding new language in 26(b)(1) addressing frequency or extent of use of the discovery methods. In addition, the Committee added a new subdivision 26(g), requiring the signing and certification of discovery requests, responses, and objections, with sanctions if the certification is violated. n9 An amendment to Rule 26 in 1987 made technical non-substantive changes. n10

C. The 1993 Amendments

Six years later, the Rules Committee chose rule-directed over party-initiated discovery for matters attending expert witnesses. Rule 26(a)(1) required initial disclosure by a party without waiting for a discovery request. Rule 26(a)(2)(A) required disclosure of the identity of any person who may be used at trial to present evidence under Rules 702, 703, or 705 of the Federal Rules of Evidence.¹¹ For any witness retained or specially employed to provide expert testimony in the case or whose duties as an employee of the party regularly involve giving expert testimony," Rule 26(a)(2)(B) required the Rule 26(a)(2)(A) disclosure to be accompanied by a written report prepared and signed by the witness, including a complete statement of all opinions to be expressed and the basis and reasons therefor" and the data, or other information considered by the witness in forming the opinions. n11 As we will see, the changes now published for comment target this language in Rule 26(a)(2)(B).

Since 1970, parties could use interrogatories to discover the substance of facts and opinions to be expressed by expert witnesses and at least a summary of the grounds for each opinion. Lawyers found the device far less useful than simply taking the deposition of witnesses who would offer expert testimony at trial, skipping the use of interrogatories. This practice was usually pursued by agreement and often by court order. The Committee listened, and by rule, validated practice making clear that A party may depose any person who has been identified as an expert whose opinions may be presented at trial." n12 The 1993 amendments in turn substituted a report for experts covered by (a)(2)(B) but was silent regarding other experts. Further accenting the utility of reporting requirements and the inefficiency of written interrogatories, the Committee made the report of the anticipated testimony of the expert a condition to the taking of the deposition. It provided that If a report is required under subdivision (a)(2)(b) the deposition shall not be conducted until after the report is provided. n13

A grasp of the full narrative of the Committees struggle with discovery and Rule 26 is worth the effort. This limited and incomplete recounting is limited to the setting of a backdrop to the proposed treatment of Expert Trial Witness Discovery and Disclosure" to which I now turn.

The Rules Committee considered for the fourth time at its April 7-8, 2008 meeting recommendations of a sub-committee for changes in Rule 26 governing discovery and disclosure of expert witnesses. The Advisory Committee in turn made three related proposals to the Standing Committee which has now published them for comment. The first relates to party disclosure.

III. Party Disclosure: A New Obligation to File a Report

Under the present rules, a party must disclose the identity of any witness it may use at trial to present evidence under Federal Rule of Evidence 702, 703, or 705. n14 A witness retained or specially employed to provide expert testimony in the case or one whose duties as the partys employee regularly involve giving expert testimony" must provide an expert witness report under

Rule 26(a)(2)(B). n15

The Committee learned that many courts were requiring reports of witnesses offering expert testimony but who were outside the reach of Rule 26(a)(2)(B). While these reports were often helpful, their burden fell heavily upon treating physicians over whom a party had little control and employees who did not regularly offer expert testimony. Balancing the benefits and burdens of this practice, the Advisory Committee proposes a new but lighter disclosure obligation than is placed on witnesses covered by the present rule.

Under the new 26(a)(2)(C), a party must disclose the subject matter of the expected testimony and a summary of the facts and opinions of the expected testimony. The proposal responds to the problem of surprise by validating the trend to require reports contrary to the rule, persuaded that trial judges and counsel by their practices recognized the usefulness of this disclosure, albeit a studiously brief one. It also expects that this report, short-form, will facilitate the taking of the witness deposition. And a focus on the latter purpose may be essential to its success, requiring enough information for opposing counsel to make a fair judgment of the necessity of a deposition, but no more. This report for experts must not be confused with the reports now required under Rule 26(a)(2)(B). This new summary report is just that. Saying more than is required is likely only to promote more discovery.

IV. New Proposals Regulate Draft Reports and Attorney-Client Communications

It is helpful to view this set of proposals mindful of the overarching concerns and objectives of the Advisory Committee. The Advisory Committee's report to the Standing Committee makes plain that the proposals accept the utility of pretrial exposure of expert witnesses who will testify at trial. While the traditional view, even consensus, is that doing so promotes settlements and efficiency at trial, core objectives of the 1938 Rules, these proposals arrive in a legal culture the Committee could not have foreseen in 1938.

As experts have become centerpieces of litigation, the pressures for learning all that is possible about them have increased. There is more here than simply an increase in the use of experts in civil cases. n16 This central role of experts is attended by a change in their relationship to the lawyers retaining them. As the Advisory Committee explains, the expert is now seen as a part of the party's camp and seldom as an independent professional offering detached objective opinions of science. In short, experts are today often advocates of a cause of the retaining party. This relationship shapes the exchanges between the lawyer and the lawyer's expert as the expert studies" the case. The expert becomes, in varying degrees, a consultant to the case, pushing aside lawyer theories that cannot be sustained. As the case is shaped in preparation, the produced drafts and detritus of the efforts offer rich material for an opposing party. These pressures challenge rulemaking. And the proposed rules are pristine examples of this phenomenon. The present rules allow discovery of facts, data, or other information considered by the expert. n17 The other information" language has in practice invited efforts to compel production of the exchanges between lawyer and expert. The substitution of reports for interrogatories led to efforts to compel disclosure of drafts of reports.

Lawyers and judges have advised the Committee that in practice lawyers have responded to the risk of being ordered to disclose communications with the testifying expert by hiring parallel experts who will not testify but will consult. It is suggested that the rule in practice has foundered with changing roles of experts and perversely produced inefficiency and unnecessary costs. The American Bar Association, acting on recommendations of the Litigation Sections Federal Practice Task Force, has urged changes in state and federal rules of discovery in response to inefficiencies and costs attending discovery relating to expert witnesses. It points to New Jersey, which by rule limits discovery of draft reports and attorney-client communications. Its rule limits discovery of communication between attorney and witness to facts and data. n18 The Advisory Committee reports that a wide range of lawyers in New Jersey were unanimous in their praise for the rule as reducing discovery problems.

The proposal is to delete the words or other information" from facts or data or other information." The reach of discovery is further narrowed by protecting as work product drafts of any report or disclosure required by 26(a)(2). By the addition of (C) to Rule 26(b)(4), work product protection is extended to communications in any form between an expert and retaining counsel, with three exceptions. Discovery is allowed in the ordinary course for:

- . Communications relating to compensation for the expert's study or testimony;
- . Communications identifying facts or data that the party's attorney provided and that the expert considered in forming the opinions to be expressed; or

. Communications identifying assumptions that the party's attorney provided and that the expert relied upon in forming the opinions to be expressed.

In addition to these three categories, allowing discovery of draft reports or attorney-expert witness communications may be had on a showing of substantial need for the discovery to prepare the case and an inability, without undue hardship, to obtain the substantial equivalent by other means. n19

The comment period will likely produce differing views regarding both the justifications for any narrowing of discovery of reports by expert witnesses and communications with the retaining lawyer as well as whether the proposals will work as intended. On the latter score data" seems clear enough. Facts" and assumptions" furnished by the attorney to the expert witness and relied upon by the expert are a bit more elusive but should prove workable as has been the case in New Jersey. Compensation" is clear enough but note that discovery is allowed for communications relating to compensation for the experts study or testimony. Study" may create difficulty as a statement for services rendered may, by detailing the course of study, disclose more than you wish of your work product.

A careful lawyer will pause at the practical question of just what can be provided to an expert witness that would not be data, facts considered by him, or assumptions that the expert relied upon. First, any facts or data provided are virtually by definition, considered. As for assumptions, reliance upon an assertion that they were not relied upon is not without risk of disclosure, either in a deposition or in cross-examination at trial. If the question is, did your counsel provide any assumptions, likely a proper question, you are left with a response, that undermines and lingers, such as none that I relied upon," followed by the question of why did you decline to rely upon them?"

Communication with an expert by counsel that is not within one of the exceptions (call it x") is yet not free of difficulty for counsel, apart from the uncertainty at the margins of the exceptions. For example, a cross examining lawyer may inquire at trial of x" when x" is relied upon because it is a basis of his opinion. Will the lawyer be prohibited from inquiry about its source? The argument will be that the judge or jury is entitled to know the source of this basis for the expert's opinion, that he should be allowed to ask where the x" came from. Because an objection to this question at trial comes at a cost, it may be wise to file an in limine motion to define the limits of cross examination and the absence of the good cause exception to work product protection. The larger point here is that the operation of the discovery rules and admissibility at trial may not be of a piece.

Counsel must also craft communications discoverable under any of the three exceptions with an eye upon the precise language defining their scope -- such as relates to" or considered by" to identify" facts or data." Produced material should be carefully reviewed for commentary and stray marginal notes that may be interleaved in the material. If produced information is being generated for the expert, counsel should take care that it, as well as any transmittal letters conform to the exceptions. Redaction is a poor substitute for careful attention in preparation.

V. Conclusions and General Observations

While discovery is the handmaiden of notice pleading and was seen as facilitating settlements by allowing the parties to evaluate the strength of their case, that calculation looked to the likely outcome of a trial. The trial is no longer seen as the main event. Rather, that is now the summary judgment. Witness the extensive proposals for Rule 56, companions to these efforts.

Many point to the cost of litigation as the killing force of trials and see uncontrollable discovery as the culprit -- achieving settlements not as struck for by the 1938 Rules but by pricing out trials and many litigants, their evaluation of the likelihood of ultimate success aside. With this decline of trials, the trial courts increasingly function in a manner more akin to an administrative than a judicial body. n20 These larger changes are the elephant in the living room as the Advisory Committee continues its long struggle with the discovery process. Practicing lawyers are wise to remain tuned to these large debates over the very role of courts and juries as they present their disputes including discovery issues to federal judges judges who are concerned about dark courtrooms and loss of a craft in which they were trained.

Relatedly, there is a large question precedent to the entire approach of the Rules Committee that will be asked again in the comment period. The changing role of expert witnesses in litigation has been briefly described above. I will not repeat it here to make the point that there is a well considered argument that limiting discovery from experts, with its trailing and somewhat uncertain limiting of trial evidence of the preparation of the expert for trial, moves in the wrong direction; that the proposed rule amendments accept that the expert witness today is an advocate for the party who hires him; that he is part of the lawyer team. The comment period affords an opportunity for further exploration of whether such a state of affairs is a public good to be salvaged.

There is a tension between the shielding of the expert witness from discovery and presenting the witness to judge or jury at trial as a disinterested student of science. The Daubert decision n21 and its progeny have insisted that expert opinion be grounded in science in the sense that the witnesss opinion is validated by his adherence to scientific method, a response to the perception that expert testimony is a carrier of junk science; that experts are increasingly less disinterested in their methods and increasingly just advocates for a party, spinning under oath. As the argument goes, this is either a good state of affairs or an undesirable one that we lack the will or ability to alter and hence accept -- the employ of testifying advocates. The proposed changes in disclosure respond in part to the circumstance that well-financed parties can avoid disclosure by hiring consulting experts to teach them and shape their litigation theories and hiring a second set to testify at trial. This is seen as undesirable because it increases the cost of litigation and disadvantages poorer litigants; as well as fostering discovery disputes generated by the techniques now being deployed for avoiding discovery. It is fair to ask whether complete disclosure is preferable to enabling an expert to consult and testify free from disclosure of the consulting path.

Supported by talented staff, some of our very best lawyers, law professors and judges work hard on the Rules Committees, drawing on rich experience and continuous study. But as good as they are, and to these eyes they are splendid, to succeed they must have the benefit of the experience of a broad range of practicing lawyers and members of the academy. With this brief introduction and commentary, I urge you accept the invitation of the Rules Committee and share your views with it.

Return to Text

n1 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 26, Committee Note of 1970; 6 Moore's Federal Practice, § 26App.05[2] (Matthew Bender 3d ed.) (1970 Amendment to Rule 26).

n2 See 6 Moore's Federal Practice, § 26App.05 (Matthew Bender 3d ed.) (1970 Amendment to Rule 26).

n3 See 7 Moore's Federal Practice, § 34App.03 (Matthew Bender 3d ed.) (1970 Amendment to Rule 34).

n4 See 6 Moore's Federal Practice, § 26App.05 (Matthew Bender 3d ed.) (1970 Amendment to Rule 26).

n5 See 7 Moore's Federal Practice, § 30App.03 (Matthew Bender 3d ed.) (1970 Amendment to Rule 30).

n6 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 26, Committee Note of 1970; 6 Moore's Federal Practice, § 26App.05[2] (Matthew Bender 3d ed.) (1970 Amendment to Rule 26).

n7 See 6 Moore's Federal Practice, § 26App.05 (Matthew Bender 3d ed.) (1970 Amendment to Rule 26).

n8 See 6 Moore's Federal Practice, § 26App.06 (Matthew Bender 3d ed.) (1980 Amendment to Rule 26).

n9 See 6 Moore's Federal Practice, § 26App.07 (Matthew Bender 3d ed.) (1983 Amendment to Rule 26).

n10 See 6 Moore's Federal Practice, § 26App.08 (Matthew Bender 3d ed.) (1987 Amendment to Rule 26).

n11 See 6 Moore's Federal Practice, § 26App.09 (Matthew Bender 3d ed.) (1993 Amendment to Rule 26).

n12 See 6 Moore's Federal Practice, § 26App.09 (Matthew Bender 3d ed.) (1993 Amendment to Rule 26).

n13 See 6 Moore's Federal Practice, § 26App.09 (Matthew Bender 3d ed.) (1993 Amendment to Rule 26).

[14]Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(a)(2)(A).

[15]Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(a)(2)(B).

n16 And criminal cases as well, although the concerns there, while informing the dimension of the tasks on the civil side, are distinct difficulties.

[17]Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(a)(2)(B)(ii).

n18 N.J. Court Rules, R. 4:10-2(d) (trial preparation; experts).

n19 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(3)(A) (protection for trial preparation materials).

n20 Patrick E. Higginbotham, So Why do We Call Them Trial Courts? 55 S.M.U. L. Rev. 1405 (2002); Judith Resnik, Trial as Error, Jurisdiction as Injury: Transforming The Meaning of Article III, 113 Harv. L. Rev. 924 (2000); William G. Young, An Open Letter to U.S. District Court Judges, The Federal Lawyer, 30, 31 (July 2003).

n21 Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharms., 509 U.S. 579, 113 S. Ct. 2786, 125 L. Ed. 2d 469 (1993).

RELATED LINKS: For more information, see Moore's Federal Practice:

- 6-26 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 26.23;
- 6-26 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 26.70;
- 6-26 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 26.80

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Patrick E. Higginbotham, the author of Chapters 26, 27, and 28 in Moore's Federal Practice, has served as a United States Circuit Judge for the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals since 1982. He assumed senior status in 2006, but maintains a full workload on the court.

58 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Hon. Michael M. Baylson on Revisions to Rule 56

2008 Emerging Issues 2772

Hon. Michael M. Baylson on Revisions to Rule 56: Improving Procedures for Counsel and Facilitating Decisions by Judges

By Hon. Michael M. Baylson

September 28, 2008

SUMMARY: On August 8, 2008, revisions to Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure were published for public comment. The proposed revisions would make significant procedural changes in summary judgment practice. The Honorable Michael M. Baylson, U.S. District Judge, Eastern District of Pennsylvania, and member of the Civil Rules Advisory Committee, offers an introduction to these important proposals.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Hon. Michael M. Baylson on Revisions to Rule 56: Improving Procedures for Counsel and Facilitating Decisions by Judges

Cite as: Hon. Michael M. Baylson, Revisions to Rule 56: Improving Procedures for Counsel and Facilitating Decisions by Judges, LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online)

I. Background -- What Is Wrong With the Present Rule 56?

On August 8, 2008, revisions to Rule 56, Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, were published for public comment. The Advisory Committee on Civil Rules, part of the U.S. Judicial Conferences Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure, has been working on this project for approximately three years. The revisions being published follow many drafts, and have been vetted before numerous judges, practitioners and law professors.

Both the full Advisory Committee and its Rule 56 Subcommittee have unanimously recommended that the revisions be published for comment because they represent a decided improvement in clarifying procedures for counsel and facilitating the work of judges in deciding motions for summary judgment under Rule 56.

In many districts summary judgment motions are filed in virtually every civil case, yet several provisions in the current rule are outmoded in the context of current litigation practice:

. Timing of plaintiff's motion. There is no good reason to preclude a plaintiff from filing a motion for summary judgment at any time after filing the complaint; n1

. Distinguishing between filing by claiming party or defending party. There is no good reason to distinguish between the filing of a motion by a claiming party or by a defending party; n2

. Hearing on motion. The rule assumes that the court will have a hearing, and allows the opposing party to serve affidavits at any time before the hearing day. n3 However, many judges do not have hearings on summary judgment motions, but instead set dates by which such dispositive motions must be filed; supporting affidavits almost always must be filed along with the motion and supporting briefs, or with a response. n4

. Varying local practice from district to district. Most district courts have their own local rules on summary judgment procedures and there is a profusion of individual district judge practice rules. Mastering these varying rules is a heavy burden on counsel in a specific case, and an expense for clients. Many lawyers have presented anecdotal evidence to the Advisory Committee that the varying rules of different districts, and judges within the same district, increase the cost of litigation. A profusion of local rules reflects widespread dissatisfaction with the national rule.

. No explicit provision for partial summary judgment. The rule does not explicitly provide for what is commonly referred to as partial summary judgment, even though that is the outcome in many cases.

. Lack of clarity. Because of the lack of clear direction to counsel about procedures for responding to a motion for summary judgment, some lawyers find themselves in procedural limbo, and may err in what is required, to the prejudice of their clients. Clerks offices and judges chambers receive many telephone requests to ascertain how a particular filing issue should be handled. Some courts encourage motions to strike pleadings that were improperly filed on a pending summary judgment motion.

II. Proposed Revisions Are Procedural, Not Substantive

The revisions to Rule 56 are not intended to change the substantive law of summary judgment:

. The changes are exclusively procedural.

. There is no intent to favor movants or nonmovants, plaintiffs or defendants.

. No changes are being made in the substantive standard for summary judgment. The courts will continue to be guided by the Supreme Court 1986 trilogy, n5 and each circuits existing and developing law on summary judgment.

. There is no change in the summary judgment burden.

III. Objectives of the Proposed Revisions

The Committee believes that the rule improves and clarifies procedures, particularly the adoption of the point/counterpoint procedure discussed below. Many lawyers and judges have endorsed the revisions, believing that the increased specificity and clarity will facilitate judicial decision-making, which will be valuable to counsel and the parties by enabling courts to decide summary judgment motions more efficiently and, presumably, more promptly.

IV. Summary of the Provisions of the Proposed Rule

Subdivision (a) -- Motion for Summary Judgment or Partial Summary Judgment

The party moving for summary judgment may do so on all or part of a claim or defense, and the court should grant summary judgment if there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and a party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.

The use of the verb should has been the subject of great discussion within and outside the Advisory Committee. It is important to note that in the 2007 revision, as part of the style revision to all of the Federal Rules, the word shall was changed to should.

As the Comment notes: n6

It is established that although there is no discretion to enter summary judgment when there is a genuine issue as to any material fact, there is discretion to deny summary judgment when it appears that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact. Should in amended Rule 56(c) recognizes that courts will seldom exercise the discretion to deny summary judgment when there is no genuine issue as to any material fact. [Citations omitted].

Some lawyers have asserted that shall had a mandatory connotation, which is lost by using a more discretionary verb, such as should. The Advisory Committee's decision to propose the word should followed extensive legal research that many courts have approved the denial of a motion for summary judgment for various reasons even though there are no genuine disputes as to any material fact.

Several specific reasons support should:

- . Use of the verb must would introduce a mandatory concept to the rule which is not supported by the case law, and would result in the revision impeding on substantive summary judgment standards, which the Committee has consistently and consciously avoided.

- . Some judges decline to grant summary judgment where there are no disputed facts, but a close legal issue, and the judge believes that the court can make a more definitive ruling on the legal issue by requiring that the parties adhere to the burdens of proof appropriate in a trial context.

- . Some motions for summary judgment contain such voluminous exhibits, declarations and supporting briefs that a judge may find a trial is a more prompt and efficient context to bring the litigation to a close.

- . A judge may believe that a prompt trial is in the public interest, and deciding a motion for summary judgment would require substantial delays in the trial, even though there may not be any disputed facts.

- . Some cases which involve a high degree of public interest may warrant a trial, even though the facts are not in dispute.

56(a) adds another sentence which reflects the views of virtually all circuits, that [t]he court should state on the record the reasons for granting or denying the motion. The Committee heard from many counsel that although a statement of reasons usually accompanies the grant of a motion for summary judgment, denials are too often simply one line orders -- leaving counsel and the parties in the dark as to, e.g., whether the motion was legally unfounded or the court concluded that there were disputes on material facts. Once again, the verb should expresses an expected and a preferred mode of judicial action. The context of the ruling is left to the courts discretion, whether as a written order or as part of the transcript of a hearing or argument. The extent of the reasons is also left to the courts discretion. Obviously, in a complex case there may be a great many disputed material facts, but only one of them would warrant the court to deny summary judgment. In such a case, there is no need for the court to detail every dispute. In other cases, however, the court may find great utility in a detailed finding of all material facts that are not in dispute.

Subdivision (b) -- Time for a Motion, Response, and Reply

56(b) sets the timing requirements. n7

It is important to note the time provisions of (b) may be modified by a local rule, as well as a court order in an individual case. After considering many alternatives, the Advisory Committee selected 30 days after the close of all discovery as the deadline for the filing of a summary judgment motion, in the absence of a local rule or a specific court order. A response may be filed 21 days after the motion is served, or the nonmovants responsive pleading is due, whichever is later. A reply by the movant must be filed within 14 days after the response is served, but only if the responding party has submitted additional facts, as provided in paragraph (c).

The rule separately provides for a reply brief to be filed in every case.

Subdivision (c) -- Procedures

Subparagraph (c) is the beating heart of Rule 56. Many local rules and individual judges practice orders have similar requirements. The requirements of (c) can be modified by the judge, but only on a case-by-case basis. The rule requires for the movant to file three separate documents:

. Motion. The movant files the motion itself, which identifies the claim or defense, or part thereof, on which summary judgment is sought.

. Separate statement. The movant files a separate statement, which concisely identifies in separately numbered paragraphs only those material facts that cannot be genuinely disputed and entitle the movant to summary judgment. These specific words were adopted to require counsel to list only those facts which are both undisputed and crucial for summary judgment. Although some lawyers had proposed specific numerical limits on the number of separately numbered paragraphs, the Committee believed that any maximum limitation should only be adopted by an individual judge presiding over a specific case. Many judges react unfavorably to endless statements of minor or non-material facts that many attorneys include for fear of leaving something out -- when the actual material facts which are not disputed, and most importantly, entitle the movant to summary judgment are usually few in number. Undoubtedly, the application of this paragraph in practice will require some discipline by counsel, and patience by judges, particularly for those who have not dealt with local rules or practice orders that have similar requirements.

. Brief. The movant files a brief stating the movants contentions under law or facts.

The responding party must file:

. Response. The responding party files a response, in correspondingly numbered paragraphs, which accepts or disputes, in whole or part, each fact in the movants statement.

. Identification of any additional material facts. The responding party may, in its response, concisely identify . . . additional material facts that preclude summary judgment.

. Brief. The responding party also files a brief stating its contentions on the law or facts.

If, and only if, the respondent has filed additional facts, then the movant must [note the mandatory imperative] file a reply to any additional facts stated by the nonmovant.

The response and the movants reply must be in the same form as the prior factual statements.

As noted above, the movant may file a reply brief in every case. Many judges look forward to a reply brief, particularly in cases with shifting burdens of proof, to determine what factor of law the movant can cite to support its position, after the responding party has filed its papers.

The rule also makes clear in (c)(3) that a movant may accept or dispute a fact, either entirely or for purposes of the motion only. The latter position may be taken by a party to present what it believes is the proper legal argument, but to reserve a different position for trial if the court rejects its argument as to the law or the facts.

Proposed Rule 56(c)(4)(A)(ii) allows the movant to simply state in its motion for summary judgment that after discovery, the opposing party has no admissible evidence to meet its burden. Under Celotex Corp. v. Catrett,ⁿ⁸ such a showing shifts the burden to require the opposing party (usually the plaintiff) to show it can meet its burden at trial. Celotex clearly allows dismissal of a case at the summary judgment phase where the plaintiff is unable to show admissible facts that satisfy its burden of proof:

In our view, the plain language of Rule 56(c) mandates the entry of summary judgment, after adequate time for discovery and upon motion, against a party who fails to make a showing sufficient to establish the existence of an element essential to that party's case, and on which that party will bear the burden of proof at trial. In such a situation, there can be no genuine issue as to any material fact," since a complete failure of proof concerning an essential element of the nonmoving party's case necessarily renders all other facts immaterial.ⁿ⁹

Under Celotex, the moving party may meet its burden by showing the court that there is an absence of evidence to support the nonmoving party's case. Once the moving party has shown an absence of evidence, the burden shifts to the nonmoving party to designate specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial.ⁿ¹⁰ The Court found no express or implied requirement in Rule 56 that the moving party support its motion with affidavits or other similar materials negating the opponent's claim.ⁿ¹¹

In practice, there are few such bare bone motions for summary judgment because counsel for the defendant will usually present to the court at least a short narrative about the case, noting the plaintiff's burden of proof, what facts the plaintiff must show it can prove, and then making a statement that the plaintiff has no evidence, or insufficient evidence, to meet that burden.

Thus, although the proposed rule provides for numbered paragraphs of undisputed facts, there is no intent to change the rule in Celotex and preclude a movant from simply making a statement that the opposing party has no facts to prove its case.

Once again, the rule only provides for procedural steps and does not intrude on the substantive standard or make any attempt to change existing burdens under Supreme Court or circuit law.

Paragraph (c)(4)(A) continues the requirement that a statement that a fact can or cannot be genuinely disputed must be supported by specific citations to the record.

The proposal specifies the following:

- . Depositions.
- . Documents.
- . Electronically stored information.
- . Affidavits or declarations.ⁿ¹²
- . Stipulations.

. Admissions.

. Interrogatory answers or other materials.

However, as noted above, one party can make a showing that the materials cited (by the other party) do not establish the absence or presence of a genuine dispute and may also state that the party cannot produce admissible evidence to support the fact. A number of circuits have held that in advancing or disputing a factual position in a motion for summary judgment, a party must cite admissible evidence. n13

The proposed rule also makes clear that although the court need not consider materials other than those presented by counsel, it may find other materials in the record which establish a genuine dispute of fact or, if the court gives notice to the parties, it may grant summary judgment for reasons other than those presented by the movant.

The rule also makes clear, in its requirement that evidence relied upon be admissible, that a response or reply to a statement of fact may note that the other party has presented a fact that is not admissible in evidence.

The proposed rule also repeats the current language that an affidavit or declaration must be made on personal knowledge, set out facts that will be admissible in evidence, and show that the affiant is competent to testify on the matters stated, once again emphasizing that a party relying on a fact must, as part of its papers before the court, show that the party has the ability to have the fact admitted into evidence at trial.

The remaining five subdivisions of the rule are generally procedural clarifications of existing practices that are followed by most judges, and derive from provisions in the current rule, but have been made more specific to benefit both counsel who make summary judgment motions and judges who decide them.

Subdivision (d) -- When Facts Are Unavailable

56(d) deals with the situation that arises when facts are unavailable to the nonmovant, who shows by affidavit or declaration why it cannot present facts essential to justify its opposition. In such a case, the court may defer considering the motion, allow time to obtain affidavits or take discovery, or issue any other appropriate order. Although most judges follow these procedures, the rule now provides in black and white the need of the movant to bring this situation to the courts attention and gives the court discretion to deal with the situation in a fair manner.

Subdivision (e) -- Failure to Respond or Properly Respond

56(e) addresses the situation where a party either fails to respond or does not properly respond. As the Committees review has shown, virtually all judges who do not receive a timely response, or any response, to a summary judgment motion will usually give the nonmovant notice and a further chance to respond, particularly in pro se civil rights cases, where mail can be delayed, or the plaintiff (often a prisoner) does not understand the ramifications of not responding to a motion. In those cases, the court will send an appropriate directive to the plaintiff giving additional time within which to submit a response to the pending motion for summary judgment, and will advise the plaintiff that a failure to respond will likely result in the court granting the motion as unopposed.

Numerous decisions have held that if there is no response, or an inadequate response, the court may consider a fact statement by the movant as undisputed for purposes of the motion. n14 However, most circuits do not approve the granting of summary judgment only on the basis of a nonmovants failure to respond, but require the court to examine the moving papers to satisfy itself that the movant is entitled to summary judgment under the law. n15 The proposed rule does authorize the court to grant summary judgment if the motion and supporting materials, including the facts considered undisputed, show that the movant is entitled to it. This language, allowing the court to consider undisputed facts along with the other materials in granting summary judgment, follows settled law.

Subdivision (f) -- Judgment Independent of the Motion

Subparagraph (f) makes clear, after giving notice and a reasonable time to respond, that a court may grant summary judgment for a nonmovant or may grant or deny the motion on grounds not raised by the parties, or may consider summary judgment on its own after identifying for the parties material facts that may not be genuinely in dispute.

Subdivision (g) -- Partial Grant of the Motion

Subparagraph (g) makes clear the courts power to grant partial summary judgment by either establishing a material fact or making a legal ruling justified by the motion and responses.

Subdivision (h) -- Affidavit or Declaration Submitted in Bad Faith

As to subparagraph (h), authorizing imposition of monetary sanctions against a party who submits an affidavit or declaration in bad faith or solely for delay, the proposed rule makes the sanctions discretionary rather than continuing the mandatory language in the current rule. Empirical research has shown that few motions have been filed nationwide, let alone granted, under the current summary judgment sanctions rule.

V. Providing Comments on Proposals for Rule 56

Individuals who have reviewed these materials and wish to make comments on the rule as it is published should feel free to do so. The Advisory Committee will also hold hearings on three separate occasions as follows:

November 17, 2008 in Washington, DC

January 14, 2009 in San Antonio, TX

February 2, 2009 in San Francisco, CA

The Committee welcomes comments on perceived inadequacies and any suggestions that would improve the intent of clarifying procedures but not changing substance.

Return to Text

ⁿ¹ See Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(a)(1) (motion may be filed at any time after (1) 20 days have passed from the commencement of the action; or (2) the opposing party serves a motion for summary judgment).

n2 See, e.g., Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(a) (governing motion by claiming party"); Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(b) (governing motion by defending party").

n3 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c) (The motion must be served at least 10 days before the day set for the hearing. An opposing party may serve opposing affidavits before the hearing day. . . .").

n4 Affidavits. Although an affidavit filed the day before a court hearing may be successful in causing the court to deny summary judgment, failure to adhere to an earlier deadline and relying instead on the current provisions of Rule 56(c) is not usually successful.

3d Circuit See, e.g., Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 644 F.2d 969, 980982 (3d Cir. 1981) (finding, in a Freedom of Information Act case, that the district court erred when it rejected the governments affidavit and index which had been filed the day before the hearing, and explaining Rule 56(c)).

5th Circuit See, e.g., Farina v. Mission Inv. Trust, 615 F.2d 1068, 1076 (5th Cir. 1980) ([A]bsent an affirmative showing by the non-moving party of excusable neglect according to Rule 6(b) a court does not abuse its discretion when it refuses to accept out-of-time affidavits.).

7th Circuit See, e.g., Pfeil v. Rogers, 757 F.2d 850, 857 (7th Cir. 1985) (holding that district courts refusal, on a summary judgment motion, to consider opposing affidavits filed after the court-imposed deadline was not an abuse of discretion).

9th Circuit See, e.g., Marshall v. Gates, 44 F.3d 722, 725 (9th Cir. 1995) ([Rule 56(c)] does not unconditionally require a district court to accept affidavits up to the date set for hearing on the motion for summary judgment. Rather, the rule allows district courts to adopt procedures pursuant to which the non-moving party may oppose a motion prior to a hearing date.); Fowler v. Honeywell Intern. Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29726, at *7 (D. Ariz. Apr. 10, 2008) (striking an affidavit that was filed in compliance with Rule 56(c) but in violation of local rules).

n5 Trilogy. Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986); Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986); Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986).

n6 See Report of the Civil Rules Advisory Committee (May 9, 2008), p. 79, available at (last checked October 2, 2008).

n7 Part of this revision is likely to become effective as of December 1, 2009 as a result of previously published time computation revisions. The Judicial Conference approved these revisions in September 2008, and forwarded them to the Supreme Court.

[8]Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 322323, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986).

[9]Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 322323, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986).

[10]Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 324325, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986) (emphasis omitted).

[11]Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986) (emphasis omitted).

n12 The proposed rule adds that declarations pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1746 may be filed in lieu of an affidavit.

n13 Party must cite admissible evidence.

3d Circuit Pamintuan v. Nanticoke Memorial Hosp., 192 F.3d 378, 387 n.13 (3d Cir. 1999) (affirming district court's grant of summary judgment, the Third Circuit noted that district court properly found plaintiff's evidence to be inadmissible); Petruzzis IGA Supermarkets, Inc. v. Darling-Delaware Co., Inc., 998 F.2d 1224, 1235 n.9 (3d Cir. 1993) (allowing hearsay statement to be considered on summary judgment because it was capable of being admissible at trial).

9th Circuit Beyene v. Coleman Sec. Services, Inc., 854 F.2d 1179, 1181 (9th Cir. 1988) (It is well settled that only admissible evidence may be considered by the trial court in ruling on a motion for summary judgment.").

n14 See, e.g., Runnels v. Armstrong World Indus., 105 F. Supp. 2d 914, 918 (C.D. Ill. 2000) (because Plaintiff has submitted no facts or evidence to counter [defendant] Armstrong's version of events, Armstrong's facts are undisputed for purposes of this motion").

n15 See, e.g., Vt. Teddy Bear Co. v. 1-800 BEARGRAM Co., 373 F.3d 241, 244 (2d Cir. 2004) ([T]he failure to oppose a motion for summary judgment alone does not justify the granting of summary judgment. Instead, the district court must still assess whether the moving party has fulfilled its burden . . .).

RELATED LINKS: For more information, see Moore's Federal Practice

■ 11-56 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 56.01;

■ 11-56 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 56.50

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Michael M. Baylson has served as a United States District Judge for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania since 2002. He is a member of the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules and serves as Chair of the Rule 56 Subcommittee. Acknowledgment is recognized to Judge Baylson's law clerks, Dana Bazelon, Clare Putnam and Katherine Stroker for their assistance in research.

59 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Jason M. Frank on Soukup v. Law Offices of Herbert Hafif

2008 Emerging Issues 2922

Jason M. Frank on Soukup v. Law Offices of Herbert Hafif (2006) 39 Cal. 4th 260

By Jason M. Frank and Nicholas J. Begakis

September 25, 2008

SUMMARY: A defendant in a SLAPPback lawsuit cannot invoke the anti-SLAPP statute if the defendant's underlying action is illegal as a matter of law.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Frank, Jason M. Jason M. Frank on Soukup v. Law Offices of Herbert Hafif (2006) 39 Cal. 4th 260. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Date content was last viewed online).

Background. The California Legislature enacted the anti-SLAPP statute to prevent and deter meritless strategic lawsuits against public participation (aka SLAPP) that are brought primarily to chill the valid exercise of the constitutional rights of freedom of speech and petition for redress of grievances [Code Civ. Proc. § 425.16(a)]. The anti-SLAPP statute allows a defendant to file a special motion to strike the lawsuit as a SLAPP which, in turn, enables the trial court using a summary judgment like procedure to evaluate the merits of the lawsuit at an early stage of the litigation [Code Civ. Proc. § 425.16(b)(1)].

To prevail, the defendant must first make a threshold showing that the plaintiffs cause of action is one arising from the defendants exercise of constitutionally protected activity. If the defendant succeeds, the burden then shifts to the plaintiff to demonstrate a probability of prevailing on the claim. In making this determination, the trial court considers the pleadings and any evidence submitted by the parties through affidavits [Code Civ. Proc. § 425.16(b)(2)]. If the trial court determines that the claim lacks merit, the prevailing defendant is entitled to recover his or her attorneys fees and costs [Code Civ. Proc. § 425.16(c)].

The prevailing defendant can also bring a separate SLAPPback lawsuit for malicious prosecution or abuse of process to seek compensation for any resulting financial and emotional damages incurred beyond attorneys fees and costs. However, in a twist illustrating the old adage Whats good for the goose is good for the gander, the SLAPPback defendant i.e., the party that had his or her underlying lawsuit dismissed as a SLAPP can bring his or her own special motion to strike the SLAPPback lawsuit as a SLAPP suit under the anti-SLAPP statute.

In 2005, the California Legislature enacted Code Civ. Proc. § 425.18 which stack[s] the procedural deck in favor of the SLAPPback plaintiff confronted with a special motion to strike [39 Cal. 4th 260, 282]. First, Section 425.18 provides the SLAPPback plaintiff with a longer timeframe in which to conduct discovery that might yield evidence to resist the motion to strike, as well as the right to file an ex parte application for a continuance to seek further discovery [Code Civ. Proc. § 425.18(d), (e)]. Second, Section 425.18 exempts the plaintiff from fees and costs even if his or her SLAPPback lawsuit is stricken [Code Civ. Proc. § 425.18(c)]. Third, Section 425.18 limits an unsuccessful SLAPPback defendant to writ review (whereas ordinarily an order granting or denying a special motion to strike is subject to immediate appeal) [Code Civ. Proc. § 425.18(c)]. Fourth, and most critical to this analysis, a defendant in a SLAPPback lawsuit cannot file a special motion to strike if the defendants underlying claim which was dismissed as a SLAPP was illegal as a matter of law [Code Civ. Proc. § 425.18(h)].

The Burden Is On The SLAPPback Plaintiff To Specifically Establish That The Underlying Claim Was Illegal As A Matter Of Law. In Soukup v. Law Offices of Herbert Hafif (2006) 39 Cal. 4th 260, 46 Cal. Rptr. 3d 638, 139 P.3d 30, the California Supreme Court interpreted the illegal as a matter of law exemption in Section 425.18(h). In a unanimous decision, the Court concluded that the fact that the SLAPPback defendants underlying claim was dismissed as a SLAPP does not mean that the claim was illegal as a matter of law [39 Cal. 4th 260, 283-284]. The Court reasoned that to hold otherwise would mean that a SLAPPback defendant could never file a special motion to strike because, by definition, the underlying claim in a SLAPPback lawsuit would always have been dismissed as a SLAPP suit [39 Cal. 4th 260, 283-284].

The Soukup Court also concluded that the burden of establishing that the underlying claim was illegal as a matter of law should be shouldered by the SLAPPback plaintiff [39 Cal. 4th 260, 286]. The Court reasoned that ordinarily a defendant filing a special motion to strike satisfies his or her initial burden simply by demonstrating that the challenged cause of action is one arising from protected activity [39 Cal. 4th 260, 286]. The Court, concluded that it thus, could not impose an additional requirement that the defendant also prove that the protected activity did not violate any laws [39 Cal. 4th 260, 286]. The Court found that placing this burden on the defendant also would be impractical and inefficient because it would require the defendant to identify and address every conceivable statute that might have had some bearing on the underlying action and then prove a negative that the underlying action did not violate any of these laws [39 Cal. 4th 260, 286].

Accordingly, once the SLAPPback defendant demonstrates that the SLAPPback lawsuit arises from protected activity, the SLAPPback plaintiff may counter by demonstrating that the underlying action was illegal as a matter of law because either: [1] the defendant concedes the illegality of the assertedly protected activity; or [2] the illegality is conclusively established by the evidence presented in connection with the motion to strike [39 Cal. 4th 260, 286-87]. The SLAPPback plaintiff must specifically identify the statute or statutes that the SLAPPback defendant is alleged to have violated [39 Cal. 4th 260, 287]. [T]he [SLAPPback] plaintiff must also show the specific manner in which the statute or statutes were violated with reference to their elements [39 Cal. 4th 260, 287]. The Soukup Court explicitly held that [a] generalized assertion that a particular statute was violated by the filing or maintenance of the underlying action without a particularized showing of the violation will be insufficient to demonstrate illegality as a matter of law [39 Cal. 4th 260, 287]. If the SLAPPback plaintiff cannot conclusively establish that the underlying action was illegal as a matter of law, then the SLAPPback plaintiff will need to demonstrate that there is a probability that the SLAPPback plaintiff will prevail on his or her claim for malicious prosecution or abuse of process (i.e., the same requirement any plaintiff would face opposing a special motion to strike once the defendant established that the plaintiffs claim concerns protected activity) [39 Cal. 4th 260, 291].

Litigation Significance

1. The SLAPPback Plaintiff Faces A Very High Burden To Establish The Illegal As A Matter of Law Exemption.

The Soukup decision places a very high burden on the SLAPPback plaintiff to establish the illegal as a matter of law exemption. In order to apply, either the SLAPPback defendant has to admit that the underlying action concerned illegal activity or the evidence will need to conclusively demonstrate illegality [39 Cal. 4th 260, 286-287]. Based on the authority cited in Soukup, if there is a genuine issue of material fact, the illegal as a matter of law exemption will not apply [39 Cal. 4th 260, 285-286].

For example, in Soukup, the California Supreme Court approvingly cited the legislative analysis of an earlier version of Section 425.18(h) which used the phrase indisputably illegal conduct instead of illegal as a matter of law [39 Cal. 4th 260, 285-286]. The Soukup Court quoted a passage from the legislative analysis stating that if there is a genuine issue of material fact that turns on the credibility of [a] witness or on proper inferences to be drawn from indisputable facts, then the matter is not indisputable [39 Cal. 4th 260, 285-286 (quoting Sen. Comm. on Judiciary, Analysis of Assem. Bill No. 1158 (2005-2006 Reg. Sess.))]. While the Soukup Court noted that the final version of Section 425.18 did not contain the indisputably illegal conduct language, the Court found that there is no indication in the legislative history that a different meaning was intended [39 Cal. 4th 260, 285-286].

The Soukup Court also relied heavily on the decision in Paul for Council v. Hanyecz (2001) 85 Cal. App. 4th 1356 (2001). In Paul, the plaintiff was a city council member seeking reelection. Following his defeat, he sued the defendants alleging that they interfered with his candidacy through illegal campaign contributions. The defendants filed a special motion to strike under the anti-SLAPP statute based on the fact that campaign contributions constitute political speech protected by the First Amendment. However, the defendants moving papers showed that they did, in fact, violate the Political Reform Act by laundering campaign contributions [85 Cal. App. 4th 1356, 1367]. The Paul court found that the defendants could not invoke the anti-SLAPP statute, because their underlying conduct was not a valid exercise of their constitutional rights [85 Cal. App. 4th 1356, 1367]. The Paul court, nevertheless, noted that had there been a factual dispute as to the legality of defendants actions, then we could not so easily have disposed of defendants motion [85 Cal. App. 4th 1356, 1367].

As the above authorities demonstrate, unless the SLAPPback plaintiff can conclusively prove that there are no disputed issues of material fact, the illegal as a matter of law exemption will not apply. In order to establish the illegal as a matter of law exemption, a SLAPPback plaintiff should specifically present evidence establishing each element of the alleged statutes or laws that were violated. If it appears that facts essential to establish the exemption may exist, but cannot then be presented, the SLAPPback plaintiff should take advantage of the greater discovery rights afforded under Section 425.18(e) which allows the SLAPPback plaintiff to file an ex parte application for a continuance to obtain necessary discovery. For an example of a plaintiff proving that the asserted protected conduct was illegal as a matter of law even though the defendant would not concede illegality, see the California Supreme Courts companion decision to Soukup in Flatley v. Mauro (2006) 39 Cal. 4th 299, 330-31 (holding that evidence submitted on special motion to strike conclusively established that attorneys communications constituted extortion, not protected settlement demands, and thus were illegal as a matter of law).

2. A SLAPPback Defendant Should Strongly Consider Filing A Special Motion To Strike.

If a SLAPPback defendant believes that the plaintiff will have a difficult time proving his or her case, then the SLAPPback defendant should strongly consider filing a special motion to strike under the anti-SLAPP statute. A SLAPPback defendant should be able to easily satisfy the threshold burden of establishing that a SLAPPback lawsuit arises from protected activity. The Soukup Court recognized that a SLAPPback lawsuit for malicious prosecution or abuse of process i.e., that the SLAPPback defendant committed a tort by filing the underlying lawsuit implicates the defendants First Amendment right of petition [39 Cal. 4th 260, 291]. As such, upon the filing of a special motion to strike, the burden will immediately shift to the SLAPPback plaintiff to establish: (1) that the SLAPPback defendants underlying claim was illegal as a matter of law or (2) that the SLAPPback plaintiffs lawsuit for malicious prosecution or abuse of process has merit. If the SLAPPback plaintiff cannot make this showing, the SLAPPback lawsuit will be dismissed. By filing a special motion to strike, the SLAPPback defendant can obtain a relatively quick determination of the merits of plaintiffs case.

RELATED LINKS: For further discussion of anti-SLAPP motions generally, see

- Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Pretrial Civil Procedure, Ch. 13, Anti-SLAPP Motions;
- Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 376, Motions to Strike: Anti-SLAPP

For further discussion of SLAPPback suits in particular, see

- Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Pretrial Civil Procedure, Ch. 13, Anti-SLAPP Motions, § 13.22A et seq.;
- California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 376, Motions to Strike: Anti-SLAPP, § 376.17.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Jason M. Frank is a litigation partner at Paul Hastings Janofsky & Walker LLP, a law firm with more than 1,200 lawyers and 18 offices in major business centers across Asia, Europe, and the U.S. Mr. Frank's practice in the firm's Los Angeles office focuses primarily on consumer class actions and commercial disputes, including claims for false advertising, unfair competition, breach of contract, fraud and other business torts. Mr. Frank received a J.D. degree from the University of Michigan in 1997 and his B.A. degree from the University of Michigan in 1994. He serves as a member of the Board of Governors for the Association of Business Trial Lawyers (ABTL), Los Angeles chapter. He is a board member and former president of Urban Compass, a California Public Benefit Corporation, dedicated to mentoring at-risk youths in Southern California. He also serves on the LexisNexis California Editorial Board.

Mr. Frank was assisted in the production of this Expert Commentary by Nicholas J. Begakis, an associate in the Los Angeles litigation department of Paul Hastings Janofsky & Walker LLP. Mr. Begakis earned his J.D. degree, magna cum laude, from the University of California, Hastings College of the Law in 2007 and was admitted to the Order of the Coif and the Thurston Society.

60 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Jason M. Frank on Flatley v. Mauro

2008 Emerging Issues 2923

Jason M. Frank on Flatley v. Mauro (2006) 39 Cal. 4th 299

By Jason M. Frank and Nicholas J. Begakis

September 25, 2008

SUMMARY: California Supreme Court decision adds an exception to the first step of the anti-SLAPP test by holding that if "either the defendant concedes, or the evidence conclusively establishes" that the alleged protected activity is illegal as a matter of law, the defendant is precluded from using the anti-SLAPP statute.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Frank, Jason M. Jason M. Frank on Flatley v. Mauro (2006) 39 Cal. 4th 299. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Date content was last viewed online).

Background: The California Legislature enacted the anti-SLAPP statute to prevent and deter meritless strategic lawsuits against public participation (aka SLAPP) that are brought primarily to chill the valid exercise of the constitutional rights of freedom of speech and petition for the redress of grievances [Code Civ. Proc. § 425.16(a)]. The anti-SLAPP statute allows a defendant to file a special motion to strike the lawsuit as a SLAPP. [Code Civ. Proc. § 425.16(b)]. If the defendant can demonstrate that the plaintiffs lawsuit concerns protected activity such as the defendants exercise of his or her constitutional rights then the burden shifts to the plaintiff to demonstrate (through pleadings and affidavits) a probability of prevailing in the lawsuit. In short, the anti-SLAPP statute provides a relatively quick and efficient means for defendants to resolve meritless lawsuits early in the litigation.

In Flatley v. Mauro (2006) 39 Cal. 4th 299, 46 Cal. Rptr. 3d 606; 139 P.3d 2 the California Supreme Court held that a defendant will not be permitted to employ the anti-SLAPP statute if the asserted protected activity is illegal as a matter of law [39 Cal. 4th 299, 305] In Flatley, the plaintiff -- renowned dance star Michael Flatley -- sued attorney D. Dean Mauro for civil extortion, intentional infliction of emotional distress and wrongful interference with economic advantage. Flatleys claims arose from a letter and subsequent phone calls from Mauro demanding payment to Mauros client who claimed she was raped by Flatley. Mauro unsuccessfully moved to strike Flatleys complaint under the anti-SLAPP statute arguing that the demand letter was a prelitigation settlement offer and therefore Flatleys lawsuit was challenging the attorneys exercise of his constitutionally protected rights of petition and free speech. The California Supreme Court upheld the trial courts denial of the motion to strike, finding that Mauros letter constituted criminal extortion and was therefore unprotected by constitutional guarantees of petition and free speech.

Test: Traditionally, an anti-SLAPP motion proceeds in two parts. First, the defendant must make a prima facie showing that the plaintiff's causes of action arise from acts the defendant took in furtherance of his or her constitutional rights [39 Cal. 4th 299, 314]. Second, if the defendant shows that the lawsuit arises from constitutionally protected activity, the burden shifts to the plaintiff to make a prima facie showing of facts which, if proven, would support a judgment in the plaintiff's favor [39 Cal. 4th 299, 314].

The Flatley Court added an exception to the first step of this test holding that if either the defendant concedes, or the evidence conclusively establishes that the alleged protected activity is illegal as a matter of law, the defendant is precluded from using the anti-SLAPP statute [39 Cal. 4th 299, 320]. The Court emphasized that in reaching this conclusion, the question of whether the defendant's underlying conduct was illegal as a matter of law is preliminary, and unrelated to the second prong question of whether the plaintiff has demonstrated a probability of prevailing [39 Cal. 4th 299, 320]. The Court further emphasized that the showing required to establish conduct illegal as a matter of law either through defendant's concession or by uncontroverted and conclusive evidence is not the same showing as the plaintiff's second prong showing of probability of prevailing [39 Cal. 4th 299, 320].

Litigation Significance: As noted in a concurring opinion, the illegal as a matter of law exception created by the Flatley Court may prove difficult to implement in practice without blurring the distinction between the first and second prong tests for anti-SLAPP motions [39 Cal. 4th 299, 335]. The standard for determining whether the exception applies is virtually indistinguishable from the standard plaintiffs must satisfy under the second prong when proving the merits of their case [39 Cal. 4th 299, 335].

For example, the Flatley decision does not clearly address which party has the burden of raising and proving that the illegal as a matter of law exception applies [39 Cal. 4th 299, 320]. However, from a practical standpoint, it is clear that the plaintiff will need to do both. The Court in fact recognizes the holding in Navellier v. Sletten (2002) 29 Cal. 4th 82, where the California Supreme Court held that the anti-SLAPP statute does not require defendants to prove that their asserted protected activity was valid as a matter of law [39 Cal. 4th 299, 319-320]. Consequently, in order for a plaintiff to conclusively establish that the illegal as a matter of law exception applies, the plaintiff likely will need to establish the merits of his or her case because the illegality will be inextricably linked with the basis for the claim.

The facts in Flatley provide a perfect illustration. The defendant was being sued for engaging in extortion. The defendant claimed that it was protected activity. The plaintiff ultimately had to conclusively establish that the defendant's so-called prelitigation settlement efforts were extortion through supporting declarations [39 Cal. 4th 299, 332-333]. It is hard to see how this is any different than the traditional two-step test for anti-SLAPP motions. While there may be unique situations where the illegality of the conduct is not inextricably linked with the merits of the case, in most situations the plaintiff will ultimately have the burden of proving that the alleged protected conduct is illegal and that the evidence establishes a probability that the plaintiff will prevail on the merits. As such, the Flatley decision still makes it relatively easy for a defendant to shift the burden of proof to the plaintiff, even if the asserted protected activity is illegal as a matter of law.

RELATED LINKS: For further discussion of anti-SLAPP motions generally, see

- Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Pretrial Civil Procedure, Ch. 13, Anti-SLAPP Motions;
- California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 376, Motions to Strike: Anti-SLAPP

For further discussion of the Litigation Privilege as it pertains to anti-SLAPP motions, see

- Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Pretrial Civil Procedure, Ch. 13, Anti-SLAPP Motions § 13.18;
- California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 376, Motions to Strike: Anti-SLAPP, § 376.15

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Jason M. Frank is a litigation partner at Paul Hastings Janofsky & Walker LLP, a law firm with more than 1,200 lawyers and 18 offices in major business centers across Asia, Europe, and the U.S. Mr. Frank's practice in the firm's Los Angeles office focuses primarily on consumer class actions and commercial disputes, including claims for false advertising, unfair competition, breach of contract, fraud and other business torts. Mr. Frank received a J.D. degree from the University of Michigan in 1997 and his B.A. degree from the University of Michigan in 1994. He serves as a member of the Board of Governors for the Association of Business Trial Lawyers (ABTL), Los Angeles chapter. He is a board member and former president of Urban Compass, a California Public Benefit Corporation, dedicated to mentoring at-risk youths in Southern California. He also serves on the LexisNexis California Editorial Board.

Mr. Frank was assisted in the production of this Expert Commentary by Nicholas J. Begakis, an associate in the Los Angeles litigation department of Paul Hastings Janofsky & Walker LLP. Mr. Begakis earned his J.D. degree, magna cum laude, from the University of California, Hastings College of the Law in 2007 and was admitted to the Order of the Coif and the Thurston Society.

61 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Katherine C. Huibonhoa on Alan v. American Honda Motor Co., Inc.

2008 Emerging Issues 2921

Katherine C. Huibonhoa on Alan v. American Honda Motor Co., Inc., (2007) 40 Cal. 4th 894

By Katherine C. Huibonhoa

September 24, 2008

SUMMARY: California Supreme Court literally construes trigger for 60-day appeal clock under California Rule of Court 8.104(a)(1), reversing appellate court decision dismissing appeal as untimely

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Huibonhoa, Katherine C. Katherine Huibonhoa on Alan v. American Honda Motor Co., Inc., (2007) 40 Cal. 4th 894. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Date content was last viewed online).

Introduction: California Rule of Court 8.104(a) sets forth the time in which a party must appeal from a judgment or appealable order. Rule 8.104(a) states that unless otherwise provided by statute or by Rule 8.108 (governing extensions of time for appeal), a party must file a notice of appeal on or before the earliest of [Cal. Rule of Ct., Rule 8.104(a) (emphasis added)]:

(1) 60 days after the superior court clerk mails the party filing the notice of appeal a document entitled Notice of Entry of judgment or a file-stamped copy of the judgment, showing the date either was mailed;

(2) 60 days after the party filing the notice of appeal serves or is served by a party with a document entitled Notice of Entry of judgment or a file-stamped copy of the judgment, accompanied by proof of service; or

(3) 180 days after entry of judgment.

In Alan v. American Honda Motor Co., Inc. (2007) 40 Cal. 4th 894, 55 Cal. Rptr. 3d 534, 152 P.3d 1109, the Court focused on subsection (a) regarding what type of documentation from the superior court clerk constitutes proper notice of a judgment or appealable order. The Court read Rule 8.104(a)(1) literally to require either a document entitled Notice of Entry of judgment or a court file-stamped copy of the judgment, and also held that Rule 8.104(a)(1) requires a single, self-sufficient document that satisfies all of the stated conditions.

Background: In Alan, the plaintiff Keith Alan alleged that defendant American Honda Motor Co., Inc. failed to inform customers fully about costly replacements associated with timing belts in its vehicles and sued for unfair competition and false advertising. Following some discovery, Alan moved to certify a nationwide class, and the superior court denied the motion.

On January 2, 2003, the superior court clerk mailed to the parties a single envelope with two documents: (i) a document entitled STATEMENT OF DECISION RE: ALANS MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION (Statement of Decision), a file-stamped document that set forth the courts reasons for denying the motion and stated that Plaintiffs motion was denied; and (ii) a minute order entitled RULING ON SUBMITTED MATTER/MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION (Minute Order) that referenced the Statement of Decision and stated that both the Statement of Decision and the Minute Order were mailed on January 2, 2003. Subsequently, on January 21, 2003, Defendant filed and served on Plaintiff a document entitled NOTICE OF ENTRY OF ORDER AND STATEMENT OF DECISION DENYING CLASS CERTIFICATION (Notice of Entry) that attached copies of the Statement of Decision and Minute Order sent by the superior court clerk on January 2.

Plaintiff Alan thereafter filed his appeal on March 6, 2003 -- 63 days after the superior court clerk mailed the Statement of Decision and Minute Order, and 44 days after Honda served the Notice of Entry. While both parties agreed that the January 21 Notice of Entry satisfied Rule 8.104(a)(2), Defendant Honda contended that the earlier January 2 Statement of Decision and Minute Order together satisfied Rule 8.104(a)(1) and commenced the 60-day appeal clock. Defendant Honda thus moved to dismiss the March 6, 2003 appeal as untimely under Rule 8.104(a)(1).

Plaintiff Alan opposed. He argued, among other things, that the service of the Minute Order triggered the 60-day clock and that the appeal was filed timely. Alans position was that neither the Statement of Decision nor the Minute Order satisfied Rule 8.104(a)(1), that Rule 8.104(a)(2) governed the timeliness of the appeal, and that he timely filed the notice of appeal under Rule 8.104(a)(2) (i.e., within 60 days of service of the January 21 Notice of Entry).

The appellate court granted Defendants motion to dismiss, holding that the Statement of Decision and Minute Order could be read together to satisfy the rule. The appellate court also rejected Plaintiff Alans argument that Rule 8.104(a)(1) required a single document that satisfied its conditions.

Result: The California Supreme Court reversed on two alternate grounds. First, the Court found that there was no document entitled Notice of Entry among the documents the superior court clerk mailed on January 2, as required by the literal language of Rule 8.104(a)(1). The Court then moved to the second half of subsection (a) and questioned whether there was a file-stamped copy of the judgment mailed by the clerk. The Court answered in the negative, holding that the Minute Order (rather than the file-stamped Statement of Decision) was the appealable order in the case. Since the superior court clerks January 2 mailing did not satisfy either condition set forth in Rule 8.104(a)(1), the Court concluded that the notice of appeal was filed timely under Rule 8.104(a)(2).

Second, the Alan Court went a step further and offered an alternate basis for its conclusion. The Court utilized principles of statutory construction, including the well-established policy of resolving ambiguities in rules limiting the right to appeal -- such as Rule 8.104(a)(1) -- in favor of the right to appeal, as long as that can be accomplished without violence to the applicable rules. The Court concluded that interpreting Rule 8.104(a)(1) as requiring a single, self-sufficient document did not do violence to the rule and was consistent with the plain language of the rule. For this reason as well, the Court concluded, the Statement of Decision and Minute Order could not be taken together to satisfy Rule 8.104(a)(1).

The Significance of the Case:

- The Rule means what it says. Alan makes clear that language in Rule 8.104(a)(1) -- and presumably the same language in Rule 8.104(a)(2) -- requires: (1) a single, self-sufficient document, (2) that is precisely entitled Notice of Entry of judgment or that is a court file-stamped copy of the judgment, and (3) that shows the date of mailing by the clerk (or, for Rule 8.104(a)(2), that attaches a proof of service).

- Limitations on the right to appeal. The Alan Court utilized principles of statutory construction to construe Rule

8.104(a)(1) literally and in favor of the appeal. It relied on the rule that jurisdictional limits, such as time limits for filing an appeal, are to be construed strictly and literally. The Court also underscored that where there is doubt, statutory ambiguities in rules that limit the right to appeal should be resolved in favor of the right to appeal, as long as that can be done without doing violence to the applicable rules.

Practice Tips:

■ Follow the Rules literal requirements. Parties seeking to appeal (or to commence the appeal clock) should follow Rule 8.104(a) precisely. Where the superior court clerk is to notify the parties of the entry of judgment, parties should review carefully what is received from the clerk and determine whether it consists of: (1) a single, self-sufficient document, (2) that is precisely entitled Notice of Entry of judgment or that is a court file-stamped copy of the judgment, and (3) that shows the date of mailing by the clerk. If it does not strictly meet these requirements, Rule 8.104(a)(1) has not been triggered and the 60-day appeal clock has not yet started. To trigger the 60-day clock, either party (whichever party would like to get the clock started) should call upon Rule 8.104(a)(2) by serving on the other party: (1) a single, self-sufficient document, (2) that is precisely entitled Notice of Entry of judgment or that is a court file-stamped copy of the judgment, and (3) that includes a proof of service.

■ Parties can use Rule 8.104 strategically. The Alan decision clarifies what precise documentation is required to trigger the appeal clock under Rule 8.104(a). In the case at bar, the Courts decision favored the appellant. But Alan would not seem to favor appellant or appellee. While Alan prevents appellees from relying on a questionable document (or documents) to commence the appeal clock and then argue that the 60 days have run, it makes clear what documentation will (and will not) trigger the clock. A party who would like to commence the appeal clock soon can and should act under Rule 8.104(a)(2), assuming the appropriate documentation is available from the court. Similarly, where a clerk has not mailed the correct documentation, parties should act accordingly, moving quickly (or slowly) under Rule 8.104(a)(2) to begin the 60-day appeal clock. In any event, Alan did not address and does not modify Rule 8.104(a)(3), which states that the appeal clock expires 180 days after entry of judgment.

RELATED LINKS: For further discussion of time requirements for filing a notice of appeal, see

- California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 42, Notice of Appeal, § 42.13;
- California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 42, Notice of Appeal, § 42.50

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Katherine C. Huibonhoa is a partner in the San Francisco office of Paul Hastings Janofsky & Walker, LLP. Ms. Huibonhoa represents and counsels employers in all aspects of employment law, with a particular emphasis on appeals, wrongful termination and equal employment opportunity litigation, and the accommodation of physical and mental disabilities. Ms. Huibonhoa has extensive experience representing a wide variety of clients in state and federal court litigation involving single and multiple plaintiff cases, as well as discrimination and wage and hour class actions. Her appellate experience includes defending domestic and international clients in both employment and general litigation matters in California appellate courts and in federal appellate courts across the country. Ms. Huibonhoa received her B.A., cum laude, from Columbia College, and her J.D. from Columbia Law School. She is admitted to the Bars of California and New York.

62 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Electronic Discovery, Evidence and Claims in New York

2008 Emerging Issues 2938

Bisceglie on Electronic Discovery, Evidence and Claims in New York

By Kyle C. Bisceglie

September 24, 2008

SUMMARY: This emerging issue commentary summarizes the legal developments in New York related to electronically stored information ("ESI") or "electronic discovery", as it is called in New York state courts. This commentary emphasizes New York state law in this emerging area, referencing federal precedent only as necessary to guide state practice, and treats ESI evidentiary issues and new substantive claims that merit the practitioners attention.

PDF LINK: Enhanced Emerging Issues Commentary ($)

ARTICLE: New York generally has been a forward-looking jurisdiction in dealing with electronic discovery. New York courts held ESI discoverable as early as 1979. See Ball v. State, 101 Misc. 2d 554, 421 N.Y.S.2d 328 (Ct. Cl. 1979) (finding that computer information, including printouts and tapes containing raw data, is discoverable). New Yorks early adoption of a meet and confer requirement for electronic evidence in its Commercial Division rules, development of evidentiary standards for authentication, and amendment to the CPLR to preserve privileged communications over email provide additional evidence that electronic discovery has been part of practice in New York since long before the December 2006 amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure governing discoverability of ESI. See 2006 Amendments and Advisory Committee Notes to Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(b), 26(a)(b) and (f), 33(d), 34(a), 37(e) and 45(a)(b)(d) and (e).

However, like most states, New Yorks rules of civil procedure do not expressly address electronic discovery: the CPLR contains no specific provisions governing the discovery of electronic documents. Lipco Elec. Corp. v. ASG Consulting Corp., 4 Misc. 3d 1019A (N.Y. Supr. Ct. 2004). Instead, courts and practitioners rely on the general pre-trial disclosure provisions of Article 31 of the CPLR, specifically CPLR 3120, for disclosure of electronic records, and often look to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and federal case law for guidance. Delta Financial Corp. v. Morrison, 13 Misc.3d 604, 819 N.Y.S.2d 908, 911 (N.Y. Supr. Ct. 2006).

This commentary addresses the following areas that are important for the New York practitioner to evaluate when considering electronic discovery: (I) preservation and litigation holds; (II) court ordered preservation; (III) the meet and confer; (IV) the allocation of costs between the parties and cost shifting; (V) spoliation of electronic discovery; (VI) use of E.S.I. as evidence; (VII) the impact of electronic data on substantive claims available under New York law; (VIII) preservation of the attorney-client privilege; and (IX) third party discovery. The meet and confer requirement has been addressed briefly, and this commentary does not address at length technical issues of ESI including format of exchanges

(e.g., TIFF, PDF, native, PST, etc.), document management systems (Concordance, Summation, Ringtail, etc.) and presentation of evidence at trial.

I. Preservation

New York state courts impose a duty on the part of the party in possession and control of evidence to see that it is preserved. Amaris v. Sharp Electronics Corp., 304 A.D.2d 457, 758 N.Y.S.2d 637 (1st Dept. 2003). The obligation to preserve evidence arises only when a party should have known that the evidence may be relevant in future litigation. Kronisch v. United States, 150 F.3d 112, 126 (2d Cir. 1998). This duty often predates the filing of the suit. In Zubulake IV, the court found the duty arose before any written complaint was made because the evidence indicated that the employees of defendant who worked with the plaintiff recognized the possibility she might sue. Zubulake v. UBS Warburg et al., 220 F.R.D. 212, 217 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (Zubulake IV).

Zubulake IV articulated a Summary of Preservation Obligations that is observed in all New York courts:

A party or anticipated party must retain all relevant documents (but not multiple identical copies) in existence at the time the duty to preserve attaches, and any relevant documents created thereafter

The scope of a party's preservation obligation can be described as follows: Once a party reasonably anticipates litigation, it must suspend its routine document retention/destruction policy and put in place a litigation hold to ensure the preservation of relevant documents. As a general rule, that litigation hold does not apply to inaccessible backup tapes (e.g., those typically maintained solely for the purpose of disaster recovery), which may continue to be recycled on the schedules set forth in the company's policy. On the other hand, if backup tapes are accessible (i.e., actively used for information retrieval), then such tapes would likely be subject to the litigation hold.

However, it does make sense to create one exception to this general rule. If a company can identify where particular employee documents are stored on backup tapes, then the tapes storing the documents of key players to existing or threatened litigation should be preserved if the information contained on those tapes is not otherwise available. This exception applies to all backup tapes.

Zubulake IV, 220 F.R.D. at 218 (emphasis original).

The duty to preserve applies not only to the party but also to the party's outside and inside counsel. Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, et al., 229 F.R.D. 422, 435 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (Zubulake V). The requirements of this duty are fairly commonly understood and much has been written about them; only a brief summary is due here. Counsel must become familiar with a client's document retention policy and data retention architecture by speaking with key players in the litigation, and information technology personnel who can explain system-wide backup procedures. Id. at 432. Counsel also can preserve data based on broadly drawn system-wide keyword searches and preserve those documents for anticipated discovery demands. It is not sufficient to simply issue the legal hold; counsel must take some reasonable steps to ensure compliance. Id. And there are certain steps counsel should take to continue the litigation hold and preservation during the pendency of the action, id. at 433, which steps include periodically reissuing the litigation hold, speaking to key players (again) about the hold and obtaining custody of backup tapes, if necessary. Id. at 433-34.

As a practical matter, counsel applying these rules learns quickly that while these rules are not intended to be difficult or onerous, it is the role of outside counsel to make sure in-house counsel and business persons appreciate the danger in failure to comply. Unless the client has had the misfortune of a prior bad experience, some persistence may be required. Additionally, plaintiff's counsel may include in a demand letter notice to preserve certain types of evidence, and the more specific the instruction as to the individuals involved and the type of evidence they have, the harder it will be to argue later that the duty to preserve did not arise. It is more common to see such a preservation request in suits brought by individual plaintiffs than in suits brought by an institution, perhaps because in the former there is a lower likelihood that onerous demands will be turned around on counsel.

II. Court Ordered Preservation

New York State approaches preservation requirements differently than federal courts. Rule 26(f), the only preservation rule in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, requires counsel to discuss any issues relating to preserving discoverable information. Substantive law, the best known of which may be the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995, 15 U.S.C. 78u-4 (the PSLRA), also may impact preservation of evidence under federal law. Under PSLRA, a defendant shall treat all documents, data compilations (including electronically recorded or stored data), and tangible objects that are in the custody or control of such person and that are relevant to the allegations, as if they were the subject of a continuing request for production of documents from an opposing party under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. 15 U.S.C. 78u-4(b)(3)(C)(i). All of these requirements matter little in New York state court, the federal protections are not directly binding [on New York courts]. It is true that the federal court could, and probably would, enforce the PSLRA, but New York courts cannot independently enforce a breach of PSLRA. Weiller v. New York Life Ins. Co., 6 Misc. 3d 1038A, 800 N.Y.S.2d 359, (N.Y. Supr. Ct. 2005). The Advisory Committee points out two important assumptions about federal preservation: (1) The operation of computers involves both the automatic creation and automatic deletion or overwriting of certain information. Failure to address preservation issues early in the litigation increases uncertainty and raises a risk of disputes, and (2) [t]he requirement that the parties discuss preservation does not imply that courts should routinely enter preservation orders.

A. Preservation and Disclosure Prior to Commencing Litigation

Under New York law, preservation orders are divided into those orders issued before and those issued after commencing litigation. Unlike federal law, New York expressly provides for pre-litigation preservation and discovery. CPLR 3102(c) governs and provides a mechanism to compel disclosure of electronic records: [b]efore an action is commenced, disclosure to aid in bringing an action, to preserve information or to aid in arbitration, may be obtained, but only by court order. The court may appoint a referee to take testimony. However, simply because relief is available does not mean that it is freely granted: the prospective plaintiff must demonstrate, by affidavits and evidentiary facts, the existence of a prima facie cause of action. Barash v. Waldorf Astoria, 2003 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 245 (N.Y. Supr. Ct. 2003). See, e.g., Quad/Graphics, Inc. v. Southern Adirondack Library System, 174 Misc. 2d 291, 29294, 664 N.Y.S.2d 225, 22628 (N.Y. Supr. Ct. 1997) (denying pre-litigation disclosure of library computer records to petitioner corporation that sought the data to determine which of its employees were utilizing company computers to access the Internet via the library).

It is important to note that practitioners seeking discovery before commencement of litigation must purchase and use a separate index number for each and every amendment made. This includes seeking pre-action discovery from additional parties or to establish additional substantive claims. Failure to do so can have significant consequences. In Harris v. Niagara Falls Board of Education, 6 N.Y.3d 155, 157, 811 N.Y.S.2d 299, 300 (2006), plaintiff commenced a special proceeding to obtain permission to serve a late notice of claim, pay a filing fee and obtain an index number. The application was successful, but plaintiff was compelled to bring a second proceeding seeking permission to serve a late notice of claim on additional entities. After receiving permission and serving the notices of claim, plaintiff commenced the action by filing a summons and complaint with the county clerk that used the same index number for the papers in the two special proceedings and the initial action. The defendants waited until after the statute of limitations had expired before seeking dismissal without an adjudication of the merits. Id. at 158. The Appellate Division then dismissed the complaint and the Court of Appeals affirmed. Id. at 150.

B. Preservation and Disclosure After Commencing Litigation

The Commercial Division rules require parties to discuss implementation of a data preservation plan, and practitioners may seek preservation orders for electronic information after commencing litigation under the CPLR. Specifically, CPLR 3103(a) governs post commencement orders and states: The court may ... make a protective order ... regulating the use of any discovery device. Such order shall be designed to prevent unreasonable annoyance, expense, ... or other prejudice to any person.

Weiller v. New York Life Ins. Co., 6 Misc. 3d 1038A, 800 N.Y.S.2d 359 (N.Y. Supr. Ct. 2005), provides a telling example of how the rules work in New York state practice. In Weiller, the defendant insurance corporations allegedly engaged in an elaborate scheme to drastically limit its liability to policyholders by denying meritorious claims based on economic factors having nothing to do with insureds actual qualifications under the policies. Id. at *1. The plaintiffs sought what was in substance, a motion for a preliminary injunction, in that it sought to restrain the defendants from discarding [a]ll databases, electronic material, tape media, electronic media, hard drives, computer disks and documents, asserted to be of possible probative value. Id. at *6. Even though a federal court had previously issued an almost identical order, the court issued such a preservation order with respect to all material requested by the plaintiffs and without any cost shifting (although it noted that it might address it later). See also School of Visual Arts v. Kuprewicz, 3 Misc. 3d 278, 771 N.Y.S.2d 804, 813 n.8 (N.Y. Supr. Ct. 2003) (In a previous oral ruling, the Court enjoined [defendant] from destroying or erasing any files from her home computer and directed [her] to give the computer to her lawyer so as to preserve potential evidence).

III. Meet and Confer

The meet and confer requirement is perhaps the one significant area of ESI where New York state court and other federal jurisdictions offer clearer guidance than New York federal court. While Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(f) was amended to require counsel to discuss preservation as part of his or her discovery plan, none of the Southern, Eastern or Northern Districts prescribes any rules governing the meet and confer. This is in contrast to federal courts in Kansas, Maryland and Delaware, each of which provide local rules governing ESI generally and the meet and confer specifically. See Guidelines for Discovery of Electronically Stored Information for the U.S. District Court for the District of Kansas, Default Standards for Discovery of Electronic Documents (E-Discovery) for the District of Delaware and District of Maryland's Suggested Protocol for Discovery of Electronically Stored Information. It is not uncommon for litigants in the Southern District to look to these guidelines as a starting point in preparation for the meet and confer.

Effective January 17, 2006, the Commercial Division of the Supreme Court amended Part 202 of the Uniform Civil Rules of the Supreme and County Courts by adding Section 202.70 to include a meet and confer requirement. This Section contains Rule 8(b), which governs practice in the Commercial Division statewide. Rule 8(b) provides:

Prior to the preliminary conference, counsel shall confer with regard to anticipated electronic discovery issues. Such issues shall be addressed with the court at the preliminary conference and shall include but not be limited to (i) implementation of a data preservation plan; (ii) identification of relevant data; (iii) the scope, extent and form of production; (iv) anticipated cost of data recovery and proposed initial allocation of such cost; (v) disclosure of the programs and manner in which the data is maintained; (vi) identification of computer system(s) utilized; (vii) identification of the individual(s) responsible for data preservation; (viii) confidentiality and privilege issues; and (ix) designation of experts.

To date, no published opinion of the Commercial Division interprets this rule. Additionally, practice experience suggests that this rule although adopted well before the better-known ESI amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure has not been as actively managed as the federal meet and confer requirement. This may be due in part to the heavy volume of cases and lack of magistrates in the Commercial Division. Nevertheless, pro-active counsel have had a new weapon to wield in the appropriate cases. See Berman, Outside Counsel E-Discovery in New York, N.Y.L.J., June 25, 2005, at 4, col. 4 (noting that the rule will make cost allocation a primary strategic consideration).

IV. Cost Shifting and Allocation for Both Parties

Once discovery is pending, practitioners must next consider who bears the cost. There are significant differences between New York and federal courts as relates to the cost of discovery of ESI. While the Supreme Court has instructed that in federal courts the presumption is that the responding party must bear the expense of complying with discovery requests, Oppenheimer Fund, Inc. v. Sanders, 437 U.S. 340, 358, 98 S. Ct. 2380, 2393 (1978), Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(2)(B) modifies this presumption as to electronically stored information by requiring: [a] party need not provide discovery of electronically stored information from sources that the party identifies as not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or cost. Examples of accessible data include data on PCs, servers and local drives, and inaccessible data may include backup tapes, erased, fragmented or damaged tapes. Thus, in federal court the practitioner must employ the seven-factor test articulated in Zubulake v. UBS Warburg, LLC, 217 F.R.D. 309 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (Zubulake III) as to inaccessible data, to determine if the cost of discovery should be shifted to the requesting party: (1) The extent to which the discovery request is specifically tailored to discover relevant information; (2) the availability of such information from other sources; (3) the total cost of production, compared to the amount in controversy; (4) the total cost of production, compared to the resources available to each party; (5) the relative ability of each party to control costs and its incentive to do so; (6) the importance of the issues at stake in the litigation; and (7) the relative benefits to the parties of obtaining the information. Id. at 322. New York federal courts still maintain the presumption that the responding party pays, the cost shifting analysis must be neutral and close calls should be resolved in favor of the presumption. Id. at 320.

It is unclear whether the New York state courts will employ this cost shifting analysis. In New York, although courts have often looked to federal cases for guidance on the issues of electronic discovery, In re Maura, 17 Misc.3d 237, 842 N.Y.S.2d 851 (N.Y. Supr. Ct. 2007), the presumption is that each party should shoulder the initial burden of financing his own suit, and based upon such a principle, it is the party seeking discovery of documents who should pay the cost of their [reproduction]. Rosado v Mercedes-Benz of N. Am., 103 A.D.2d 395, 398, 480 N.Y.S.2d 124 (2d Dept 1984). This is nearly a diametrically opposite starting point from federal rules and derives from CPLR 3120, which provides for Notice of Discovery and Inspection. CPLR 3120 requires a party to produce and permit the party seeking discovery, or someone acting on his or her behalf, to inspect, copy, test or photograph any designated documents or any things which are in the possession, custody or control of the party or person served. In other words, the producing party has no obligation to produce any documents but simply must make them available for inspection. This approach to discovery has its obvious limitations in the electronic era, but certainly explains why New York's starting point is fundamentally different from the federal standard.

Courts have interpreted this and similar CPLR provisions (e.g., CPLR 3114 imposing translation cost on examining party) as making cost shifting not an issue in New York, as the party seeking discovery should incur the costs incurred in the production of discovery material. Lipco Elec. Corp. v. ASG Consulting Corp., 4 Misc.3d 1019(A), 798 N.Y.S.2d 345, *9 (N.Y. Supr. Ct. 2004); In re Maura, 17 Misc.3d 237, 842 N.Y.S.2d 851, 859 (2007); Etzion v. Etzion, 7 Misc.3d 940, 796 N.Y.S.2d 844 (N.Y. Supr. Ct. 2005). There has been some recognition that electronic discovery presents additional issues not present in traditional discovery. The Lipco court observed that [r]etrieving computer based records or data is not the equivalent of getting the file from a file cabinet or archives. But see Etzion, 7 Misc.3d 940, 796 N.Y.S.2d at 846 (Courts have held that the contents of a computer are analogous to the contents of a filing cabinet.). Nevertheless, New York state case law is evolving to meet the new demands of electronic discovery. In a later decision in Delta Financial Corp. v. Morrison, 13 Misc.3d 604, 819 N.Y.S.2d 908 (N.Y. Supr. Ct. 2006), the court found that it was not bound by the Zubulake decision but still expressly followed its cost shifting analysis. After the Delta Financial decision, the Commercial Division amended its Rules of Practice in 2006 to require counsel to confer with each other regarding anticipated electronic discovery issues, including (i) the scope, extent and form of production and (ii) the anticipated cost of data recovery and proposed initial allocation of such cost, thus opening the door for a cost shifting analysis.

Reflecting the New York presumption that the party seeking electronic discovery should incur the cost, several cases have allocated some of the costs associated with electronic discovery to the responding party or reserved the right to reallocate costs at a later date. One such case is Etzion, 7 Misc.3d 940, 796 N.Y.S.2d 844. In Etzion, a matrimonial action, plaintiff sought production of computerized business records and hard drives belonging to defendant. Finding the information relevant, the court allowed the hard drive of the defendant to be cloned because the husband had deleted and altered information on the computer. The court also found that the party seeking production shall bear the cost of the production of the business records she seeks, subject to any possible reallocation of costs at trial. Id. at 847.

New York courts have not required the party seeking discovery to bear the cost of discovery if the cost is inordinately low. In Waltzer v. Tradescape & Co., L.L.C., 31 A.D.3d 302, 819 N.Y.S.2d 38 (1st Dept 2006), the court first noted that as a general rule, under the CPLR, the party seeking discovery should bear the cost incurred in the production of discovery material, but then did not require the seeking party to pay because the information sought was already on CD and the cost of copying and giving them to plaintiff would have been inconsequential. Id. at 40. Of note to the practitioner, the court also required the defendant to bear the cost of examining them to see if they should not be produced due to privilege or on relevancy grounds. Id.

New York state courts, also, may defer the decision on costs as secondary to moving forward with production. In Weiller, defendants claimed they had incurred more than $1 million in preserving computer hard drives under a federal order. Weiller, 6 Misc. 3d 1038(A) at *6. The court stated that it is not insensitive to the cost entailed in electronic discovery, and would, at the appropriate juncture, entertain an application by defendants to obligate plaintiff, the requesting party, to absorb all or a part of the cost of the e-discovery it seeks, or will seek, herein. Id. Note the state courts de-emphasis on the allocation of costs: the court will not constrain the production of possibly relevant evidence on account of the later need to allocate the cost. Id.

Of course, parties are free to reach an agreement as to allocation. See Samid v. Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn, 5 A.D.3d 463, 773 N.Y.S.2d 116 (2d Dept 2004) (plaintiff agreed that all costs related to the recovery of defendants' hard drive data would be borne solely by plaintiff to ascertain whether relevant, deleted emails could be recovered).

An additional issue addressed by the courts related to cost shifting is who must pay if a client seeks work product that is stored electronically. In Matter of Sage Realty Corp. v. Proskauer Rose Goetz & Mendelsohn, 294 A.D.2d 190, 743 N.Y.S.2d 72 (1st Dept 2002), plaintiff asked defendant firm to produce work product it had created as plaintiffs lawyers. The defendant law firm initially refused to produce the documents claiming it would be too costly because the documents were on data tapes, but the court found that barring a substantial showing by the Proskauer firm of good cause to refuse client access, petitioners should be entitled to inspect and copy work product materials, for the creation of which they paid during the course of the firms representation. Id. at 191. However, the court found that because it was work product, the assemblage and delivery of documents to a client is properly chargeable to the client. Id. at 191-92.

V. Spoliation of Electronic Information

Under New York law, spoliation is the destruction or significant alteration of evidence, or the failure to preserve property for another's use as evidence in pending or reasonably foreseeable litigation. West v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 167 F.3d 776 (2d Cir.1990).

The determination of an appropriate sanction, if any, for spoliation is confined to the sound discretion of the court and is assessed on a case-by-case basis. Zubulake IV, 220 F.R.D. at 217. In one of the best known federal cases, the court ordered re-depositions, attorneys fees and an adverse jury instruction. Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, et al., 229 F.R.D. 422, 435 (S.D.N.Y. 2004)(Zubulake V). Perhaps tellingly, before ordering the adverse instruction, the Zubulake court issued four time-consuming decisions involving tedious and difficult fact finding that great[ly] burden[ed] the courts resources. The court noted in postscript that since the case began much has changed pointing to a flood of recent opinions, guidance from professional groups, the American Bar Association and the Sedona Conference and proposed revisions to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Now the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure have been amended, and it is doubtful that federal courts in New York (and elsewhere) are going to be as patient as the Zubulake court was.

Federal courts in New York have not hesitated to impose sanctions in appropriate circumstances both before and after Zubulake IV. See De Espana v. American Bureau of Shipping, No. 03 Civ. 3573 (S.D.N.Y. June 6, 2007) (court imposed costs for spoliation but did not allow an adverse inference because plaintiff could show only that defendant was negligent and could not establish the relevance of the spoliated evidence); In re NTL, Inc. Sec. Litig., No. 02 Civ. 3013, 7377 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 30, 2007) (court imposed adverse jury inference and costs for defendants gross negligence in allowing ESI to be destroyed); Metropolitan Opera Assn, Inc. v. Local 100 Hotel Employees and Restaurant Employees

Inter. Union, 212 F.R.D. 178 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (court entered judgment as to liability finding defendants utter failure to preserve ESI and related behavior aggressively willful.)

New York state courts have addressed allegations of spoliation and ordered severe sanctions in a number of cases. The movant must demonstrate that the party alleged to have spoliated the evidence was on notice of a potential lawsuit. Travelers Indemnity Co. v. C.C. Controlled Combustion Co., Inc., 2003 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 1477 (N.Y. City Civ. Ct. 2003). CPLR 3126 provides that the court may make such orders with regard to the failure or refusal as are just for willful failure to disclose relevant information. Sage Realty Corps., et al. v. Proskauer Rose LLP, et al., 713 N.Y.S.2d 155, 159 (1st Dept 2000) (citations omitted) (involving destroying tapes of critical business conversations). Spoliation sanctions are appropriate under New York law for both intentional and negligent spoliation. Travelers Indemnity Co., 2003 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 1477, at *3. Penalties for a refusal to comply with disclosure requests are explicitly provided for in CPLR 3126. That section allows for such sanctions as the following: (a) having the matter resolved against the party who destroyed or failed to preserve the significant evidence [CPLR 3126(1)]; (b) prohibiting the disobedient party from supporting or opposing claims based on such spoliated evidence [CPLR 3126(2)]; or (c) striking the pleadings of the disobedient party [CPLR 3126(3)]. New York state courts have broad discretion to impose sanctions under CPLR 3126 when a party intentionally, contumaciously or in bad faith fails to comply with a discovery order or destroys evidence prior to an adversary's inspection. Sage Realty Corps., 713 N.Y.S.2d at 160. The party seeking disclosure bears the burden of showing willfulness; the non-disclosing party must demonstrate an excuse. Id. at 160-61 (citations omitted). In upholding dismissal of the complaint, the Sage Realty Corporation court recognized the very destruction of the evidence diminishes the ability of the deprived party to prove relevance directly. Id. at 160.

Based on the CPLR and these standards, state courts have ordered the most severe remedy available for spoliation of electronic data dismissal of the complaint. See, e.g., Long Island Diagnostic Imaging, P.C. v. Stony Brook Diagnostic Associates, 286 A.D.2d 320, 728 N.Y.S.2d 781 (2d Dept 2001) ([s]triking of a party's pleading is a proper sanction for a party who spoliates evidence by purging a computer database despite several court orders directing the defendant to produce the evidence.); Ingoglia v. Barnes & Noble College Booksellers, Inc., 48 A.D.3d 636, 852 N.Y.S.2d 337 (2d Dept 2008) (reversing the trial court on abuse of discretion and dismissing complaint when plaintiff installed a software program designed to permanently remove data from the computer's hard drive and numerous files, images, and folders, as well as some history of the plaintiff's internet usage, had been deleted between the date the defendant demanded inspection of the plaintiff's computer and the date of the inspection); see also Sage Realty Corps., 713 N.Y.S.2d 155 (involving tape recordings). Alternatively, at least one state court has awarded attorneys fees where there was insufficient evidence that the lost emails were relevant. Hunts Point Realty Corp. v. Pacifico, 16 Misc.3d 1122(A), 847 N.Y.S.2d 902 (Table) (Sup. Ct., Nassau County July 24, 2007).

VI. Use of ESI as Evidence

Litigators have and, apparently, will continue to expend a tremendous amount of time, effort and clients money in obtaining ESI through discovery. Likewise, jurists, commentators and third-party legal support service providers have written extensively on electronic discovery. There is limited guidance on how to use ESI as evidence in motion practice or at trial once it has been obtained.

The evidentiary issues presented by ESI are essentially the same evidentiary issues presented by traditional documentary evidence. With respect to ESI, trial lawyers most commonly encounter four evidentiary hurdles: (1) is the ESI relevant; (2) is it authentic; (3) if the ESI is offered for the truth of the matter asserted, is it hearsay, and if so, is it covered by an applicable exception; and (4) is the form of the ESI that is being offered as evidence an original or a duplicate of the original writing?

New York does not have written evidence rules but depends on a hodgepodge of court rules, CPLR, statutes and case law. This has significant implications for the practitioner including greater importance of case law interpretation, less uniformity and substantially more trial court discretion. In federal court, the jury determines questions of relevance and authentication under Fed. R. Evid. 104(b), and the court determines questions of hearsay under Fed. R. Evid. 104(a)

. In New York state courts, the court determines relevance, authentication, hearsay and best evidence.

While many New York federal and state cases address discoverability of ESI, only a handful of cases involve ESI evidence. Most of the New York cases address the use of computer records in cases involving credit card disputes or accounts stated although there are a few cases involving admissibility of instant messages, emails, websites and chat room content. These cases provide limited instruction and vary in the amount of required foundation.

As a result, to date, the best guidance for practitioners seeking to admit ESI into evidence in a motion, hearing or trial in New York is their own fingerspitzengefühl to establish a foundation, as well as reliable evidence treatises including Edward J. Imwinkelried, Evidentiary Foundations (LexisNexis 6th Ed. 2005) and Jack B. Weinstein & Margaret A. Berger, Weinsteins Federal Evidence (Joseph M. Laughlin ed., Matthew Bender 2d ed. 1997). In terms of case law guidance, Lorraine v. Markel American Ins. Co., 241 F.R.D. 534 (D. Md. 2007) provides a summary of best evidentiary practices and a survey of state and federal decisions nationwide on all significant and recurring issues associated with foundation for ESI in each of its different flavors: email; internet website postings; text messages and chat room content; computer stored records and data; computer animation and computer simulations; and digital photographs. Significantly, Lorraine does not cite to any authority in New York nor has the decision been cited in New York. However, it is a good starting place for practitioners preparing to submit ESI evidence to a court because it provides guidance as to best practices. As the Lorraine court wisely observed in the context of authentication, but applicable to all evidentiary foundations:

[T]here is wide disparity between the most lenient [and demanding] position[s] courts have taken in accepting records Lawyers can expect to encounter judges in both camps, and in the absence of controlling precedent in the court where an action is pending setting forth the foundational requirements for computer records, there is uncertainty about which approach will be required. Further, although it may be better to be lucky than good, as the saying goes, counsel would be wise not to test their luck unnecessarily. If it is critical to the success of your case to admit into evidence computer stored records, it would be prudent to plan to authenticate the record by the most rigorous standard that may be applied. If less is required, then luck was with you.

Lorraine, 241 F.R.D. at 558-59.

New York case law suggests that this observation about lenient and demanding camps is no less true here. Certainly, New York courts are far more amenable to admitting electronic evidence than the Southern District of Texas which, in ruling on the authenticity of a print-out of a posting on the U.S. Coast Guards website, noted the following:

While some look to the Internet as an innovative vehicle for communication, the Court continues to warily and wearily view it largely as one large catalyst for rumor, innuendo, and misinformation There is no way Plaintiff can overcome the presumption that the information he discovered on the Internet is inherently untrustworthy. Anyone can put anything on the Internet. No web-site is monitored for accuracy and nothing contained therein is under oath or even subject to independent verification absent underlying documentation. Moreover, the Court holds no illusions that hackers can adulterate the content on any web-site from any location at any time. For these reasons, any evidence procured off the Internet is adequate for almost nothing, even under the most liberal interpretation of the hearsay exception rules found in Fed. R. Evid. 807. Instead of relying on the voodoo information taken from the Internet, Plaintiff must hunt for hard copy back-up documentation in admissible form from the United States Coast Guard or discover alternative information verifying what Plaintiff alleges.

St. Clair v. Johnnys Oyster and Shrimp, Inc., 76 F. Supp. 2d 773 (S.D. Tex. 1999).

In that spirit, this commentary outlines the issue as it pertains to ESI, and notes any New York or other helpful precedent. It is beyond the scope of this commentary to provide a treatise-like dissertation on New York evidence.

A. Relevance

There have been few, if any, cases in New York dealing with the relevance of ESI possibly because the threshold is fairly easy to establish. Under New York law all relevant evidence is admissible unless its admission violates some exclusionary rule and has any tendency in reason to prove the existence of a material fact, i.e., it makes determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence. People v. Scarola, 71 N.Y.2d 769 (1988); see Hoya Saxa, Inc. v. Gowan, 149 Misc. 2d 191, 192, 571 N.Y.S.2d 179, 180 (1st Dept 1991) (Multiple Dwelling Law § 328(3) provides that printed computerized violation files of a department shall be relevant evidence for the enforcement of State housing standard laws.) This is largely consistent with Fed. R. Evid. 401 which provides: Relevant evidence means evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence. While it is not difficult to establish that ESI is relevant, the practitioner should attempt to articulate multiple grounds of relevance carefully identifying each potential basis for admissibility rather than putting all his or her eggs in a single evidentiary basket. Lorraine v. Markel American Ins. Co., 241 F.R.D. 534, 541 (D. Md. 2007). The more relevant purposes the practitioner can establish, the greater latitude he or she will have in laying other foundations (like hearsay, authentication, etc.) or establishing a permissible use.

B. Authentication of E.S.I. in New York

Authentication issues in New York are complicated by the fact that every type of record seems to have its own authenticating provision or statute. For example, here are some of the various authenticating provisions found in the CPLR: CPLR 2105 (Certification by attorney); CPLR 4518 (business records exception); CPLR 4520 (Certificate or Affidavit of public officer); CPLR 4532 (self-authentication of newspapers and periodicals of general circulation); CPLR 4536 (proof of writing by comparison of handwriting); CPLR 4538 (Acknowledged, proved or certified writing; conveyance of real property without the state); CPLR 4540 (Authentication of official record of court or government office of the US); CPLR 4541: (proof of proceedings before a justice of the peace); CPLR 4542 (Proof of Foreign Records and Documents); CPLR 4543 (Proof of facts or writing by methods other than those authorized in this article). Statutes providing for authentication include: Business Corporation Law § 107 (corporate seal is prima facie evidence of authentication); Domestic Relations Law § 14-a (town and city clerks can authenticate marriage certificates) and the Uniform Commercial Code.

In New York, the court determines if there is clear and convincing evidence that the document is authentic. The jury's role is to determine if the evidence is genuine. As a result, New York state courts are invested with greater decision-making power than federal courts which, under Fed. R. Evid. 104(b), are permitted to enter the evidence only if a reasonable jury could rationally conclude based on a preponderance of evidence that it is authentic.

One New York court permitted authentication of instant messages through circumstantial evidence, which included a close friend and cousin testifying to the defendant's screen name and sending a message to that screen name. People v. Pierre, 838 N.Y.S.2d 546, 548-49 (1st Dept 2007). The court also noted there was no evidence that anyone had a motive, or opportunity, to impersonate defendant by using his screen name.

As to emails, two New York cases demonstrate that emails can be admitted circumstantially and by sworn statements. In one case, the court admitted a series of email exchanges based on the content of the exchanges, in particular the detail about meetings and about progress on construction sites and the fact that they were produced by a third party in response to a subpoena. U.S. Information Systems, Inc. et al., v. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local Union Number 3, AFL-CIO, et al., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52870 (S.D.N.Y. August 1, 2006); see also Monte v. Ernst & Young LLP, 330 F. Supp.2d 350, 359 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (admitting email messages based on sworn statements attesting to their authenticity and overruling an objection that the emails are suspect on the basis of having been preserved for so long). The Lorraine decision, supra, states that the most common ways to authenticate include person with personal knowledge, expert testimony or comparison with authenticated exemplar, distinctive characteristics, including circumstantial evidence, self-authenticated trade inscriptions (viz., the auto signature) and certified copies of business records. All of these should be viable means of authentication in New York.

One New York court ruled inadmissible print-outs of websites obtained from the Wayback Machine service maintained by the Internet Archive Company, which service allows a user to obtain an archived website as it appeared at a particular period in time. Robert Novak d/b/a Petswarehouse.com, v. Tucows, Inc., Opensrs and Nitin Networks, Inc., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21269 (E.D.N.Y. 2007). The Eastern District found insufficient plaintiffs declaration lacked sufficient personal knowledge to set forth with any certainty that the documents obtained via third-party websites are, in fact, what he proclaims them to be. Id. At *5. The court suggested that plaintiff should have provided testimony or sworn statements from an employee of the companies hosting the sites from which plaintiff printed the pages. The court excluded the documents for absence of authentication and as hearsay. The court suggested that testimony from employees of Internet Archive might be insufficient. Rather, because the webpages came from third-parties who donate the data to the Internet Archive, only testimony from employees of the companies that originally hosted the sites would be sufficient. But see Telewizja Polska USA, v. Echostar Satellite Corp., 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20845 (N.D.Ill. October 15, 2004)(affidavit from representatives of Internet Archive Company sufficient where opposing party did not present any evidence that Internet Archive is unreliable or biased).

Lorraine, supra, identifies the following ways to authenticate internet websites: witness with personal knowledge, expert testimony, distinctive characteristics, public records, system or process capable of producing reliable result and official publication. Nearly all of these should be viable methods in New York.

C. Hearsay

Another common issue raised by ESI is hearsay. When ESI is offered into evidence, it is often a statement, made by a declarant out of court offered for the truth of the matter asserted. In 2000, New York enacted New York State Technology Law § 306, which states: In any legal proceeding where the provisions of the civil practice law and rules are applicable, an electronic record or electronic signature may be admitted into evidence pursuant to the provisions of article forty-five of the civil practice law and rules including, but not limited to section four thousand five hundred thirty-nine of such law and rules. This still requires that the proponent articulate why the evidence is not hearsay or find an applicable exception. The most commonly used exceptions are the business and public records exceptions and, particularly for emails, excited utterances, state of mind and present state of mind.

1. Business Records (CPLR 4518)

There has been a long-line of cases providing guidance on the admission of print-outs of computer data usually in the area of account stated or claims involving credit card statements. Beginning in 1974 with Ed Guth Realty, Inc. v. Gingold, 34 N.Y.2d 440, 451, 358 N.Y.S.2d 367, 374 (1974), the business records exception has been used to admit computer documents. In Gingold, the City of Syracuse attempted to avoid changes to real estate tax assessments by arguing that the computer printouts of the supporting statistical evidence could not come in under the business entry rule (CPLR 4518). Id. at 451. The court rejected this argument, holding that: [e]ssentially, the business entry exception to the hearsay rule is based on the concept of routineness. The routineness of the entry in the usual course of business tends to guarantee truthfulness because of the absence of motivation to falsify. Certainly, compiling and feeding data into a computer in the context we have before us would seem to be as routine a function as could be imagined and should be included under CPLR 4518. Id. See also Federal Exp. Corp. v. Federal Jeans, Inc., 14 A.D.3d 424, 788 N.Y.S.2d 113 (1st Dept 2005) (holding that computer-generated invoices and billing records of amounts due were admissible as business records in an account stated action, since plaintiff established that information contained therein was entered into computer in regular course of business); Education Resources Institute, Inc., v. John S. Piazza, 794 N.Y.S.2d 65 (2d Dept 2005) (opining that computer printouts are admissible as business records if data stored in normal course of business as shown by affidavit from an individual with personal knowledge as to the care and maintenance of the computer system); Citibank (S.D.) N.A. v. Jones, 272 A.D.2d 815, 708 N.Y.S.2d 517 (3d Dep't 2000) (summary judgment appropriate where plaintiff submitted an affidavit from manager familiar with creation and maintenance of computer records); Wayne County Dept. of Social Services ex rel. Van Dusen v. Petty, 273 A.D.2d 943, 709 N.Y.S.2d 791 (4th Dep't 2000) (certified computerized records kept in the ordinary course of business are admissible as evidence); Schneider Fuel Oil, Inc. v. DeGennaro, 238 A.D.2d 495, 656 N.Y.S.2d 668 (2d Dep't 1997) (In an action for goods sold and delivered and account stated, the court held that computer records of the plaintiff-creditor demonstrating that the defendant received and retained accounts without objection and made partial payments sufficient evidence to support summary judgment in favor of the plaintiff.); Matter of Thomma, 232 AD2d 422, 648 NYS2d 453 (2d Dept 1996) (Computer printouts are admissible as business records if the data was stored in the normal course of business.).

In 2002, CPLR 4518(a), which governs admission of any writing or recording kept in the regular course of business, was amended to specify that electronic records are to be treated the same as any other business record. The 2002 Amendment added:

An electronic record, as defined in section three hundred two of the state technology law, used or stored as such a memorandum or record, shall be admissible in a tangible exhibit that is a true and accurate representation of such electronic record. The court may consider the method or manner by which the electronic record was stored, maintained or retrieved in determining whether the exhibit is a true and accurate representation of such electronic record.

2. Public Records (CPLR 4520)

Another common way of admitting E.S.I. over a hearsay objection is CPLR 4520, which states: Where a public officer is required or authorized, by special provision of law, to make a certificate or an affidavit to a fact ascertained, or an act performed, by him in the course of his official duty, and to file or deposit it in a public office of the state, the certificate or affidavit so filed or deposited is prima facie evidence of the facts stated. One example of using this public records exception to admit ESI is People v. Baker, 183 Misc.2d 650, 705 N.Y.S.2d 846 (Oneida Co. Ct. 2000). In Baker, the defendant objected to the admission of a computer printout of a Department of Motor Vehicles abstract of his driving record. The court disagreed, finding that a computer generated abstract is properly authenticated by simultaneous affixation of seal and certifying signature of Department of Motor Vehicle Records and the insertion of the individual's driving information on the abstract. Id. at 654. The court reasoned that [t]echnological advances have permitted simultaneous reprinting of information and transmitting of same that overcome the objections occasioned by improper authentication. In many ways, the present procedure serves to overcome the possibility of human error that might result from improper comparison prior to separate affixation of the seal and signature. Id. at 655. Further, the court noted that it has been advised that access to the computer generation of the information is strictly limited. Accuracy, which is the intent of the authentication rules, is satisfied by the simultaneous printing process. Id.

D. Original Documents and Reproductions

With the widespread use of E.S.I. by almost every business and governmental agency, New York courts relaxed the Best Evidence Rule considerably, and allow computer printouts of electronic business records to be admitted if the underlying business records were kept in the regular course of business. In re Thomma, 232 A.D.2d 422, 648 N.Y.S.2d 453 (2d Dept 1996). The traditional rationale held that printouts of the data are summaries of the records. See Ed Guth Realty v. Gingold, supra, 34 N.Y.2d at 451.

To determine how to admit E.S.I., the practitioner must first determine if the information was originally in electronic form (such as documents stored in a database or word processing system) or if it was derived from an optically scanned image that was originally in document form. If the information was originally in electronic form, the document may be admissible as a business record under CPLR 4518 and the practitioner need not be concerned about the Best Evidence Rule. If it was not originally in electronic form and is an optically scanned image, the practitioner should proceed under CPLR 4539(b).

CPLR 4539(b) was added in 1996 to extend the statutes coverage to electronic data imaging, that is scanning original documents into electronic copies. CPLR 4539(b) allows [a] reproduction created by any process which stores an image of any writing, entry, print or representation and which does not permit additions, deletions, or changes without leaving a record of such additions, deletions, or changes . . . [to be] admissible in evidence as the original. This broadly worded statute seemingly allows practitioners to admit electronic copies of documents that are not business records, such as deposition testimony or other exhibits.

Of note to the practitioner, N.Y. State Technology Law § 306 references CPLR 4539. Section 306 authorizes the admission of electronic records pursuant to CPLR Article 45, including, but not limited to CPLR 4539. The implication of this cross-reference is that tangible forms of information stored in computer databases, such as documentary printouts, qualify as copies or reproductions within the meaning of CPLR 4539(a). Though section 306 speaks only of the admissibility of the electronic record itself, the definition of electronic record requires that such record be capable of being accurately reproduced in forms perceptible by human sensory capabilities. State Technology Law § 302(2). Thus, there should be no need for the proponent to produce, as an exhibit, the hard drive or other electronic medium in which the electronic record is stored. Also, CPLR 4539(a) seems to preclude printouts of non-business records. As noted above, courts have treated printouts as summaries of voluminous records. See Ed Guth Realty, Inc. v. Gingold, supra.

VII. Substantive Claims

New York has revisited and given new meaning to centuries-old substantive claims because of the widespread use and importance of electronically stored information. In particular, the torts of conversion of property and trespass to chattel have been applied in ways that the original prosecutors of such claims would never have imagined. Both are examples of the growing trend of adapting existing law to meet the needs of the electronic age.

A. Conversion of Intangible Property or Electronic Data

The tort of conversion in New York requires the unauthorized assumption and exercise of the right of ownership over goods belonging to another to the exclusion of the owners rights. Vigilant Ins. Co. of America v. Housing Authority of City of El Paso, Tex., 87 N.Y.2d 36, 44, 637 N.Y.S.2d 342 (1995). New York law permits conversion of intangible property, which creates a property right that may or may not be represented by something tangible, but that itself has no intrinsic value apart from the right it represents. United States v. Bellomo, 263 F. Supp. 2d 561, 573 (E.D.N.Y. 2003). Traditionally, electronic data was not considered intangible property. That changed with Thyroff v. Nationwide Mutual Insurance Company, 8 N.Y.3d 283 (2007).

In Thyroff, the plaintiff was an insurance agent who leased his computer equipment as an independent contractor. Upon termination of the agreement, defendant confiscated its equipment, along with all of the information the plaintiff had stored on his computer, including personal correspondence and email, customer information, and personal documents and data. Thyroff v. Nationwide Mutual Insurance Company, 460 F.3d at 403 (2d Cir. 2006). The plaintiff sued, claiming the taking of his electronic data constituted conversion. The Court of Appeals permitted plaintiffs claim to proceed, and, thereby, expanded the scope of conversion, finding it cannot be seriously disputed that societys reliance on computers and electronic data is substantial, if not essential. Thyroff, 8 N.Y.3d at 291. On this basis, Thyroff accorded the supposedly intangible electronic information the same treatment as a paper document kept in a file cabinet. Id. at 292. See also Astroworks, Inc. v. Astroexhibit, Inc., 257 F. Supp. 2d 609 (S.D.N.Y. 2003), Shmueli v. Corcoran Group, 9 Misc. 3d 589 (N.Y. Supr. Ct. 2005), and a Ninth Circuit decision, Kremen v. Cohen, 337 F.3d 1024 (9th Cir. 2003). Subsequent decisions suggest that the ability to copy electronic data will limit the use of this tort because it requires actual exclusion of the owner. See A & G Research, Inc. v. GC Metrics, Inc., 2008 NY Slip Op 51016U (N.Y. Sup. Ct. May 21, 2008) (stating copied computer data does not exclude the proper owner); Leser v. Karenkooper.com, 2008 NY Slip Op 50135U (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 2008) (stating the use of an image from a webpage does not exclude the proper owner). See generally Bisceglie, Kyle C., Kyle C. Bisceglie on Thyroff v. Nationwide Insurance Company. LexisNexis Expert Commentary (July 2008), 2008 Emerging Issues 2495.

B. Trespass to Chattel

Trespass to chattel, an old and rarely-used common law tort action, requires interference with a person's property. Sporn v. MCA Records, Inc., 58 N.Y.2d 482, 487, 448 N.E.2d 1324 (1983). While the trespasser, to be liable, need not intend or expect the damaging consequences of his intrusion, he must intend the act which amounts to or produces the unlawful invasion, and the intrusion must at least be the immediate or inevitable consequence of what he willfully does, or which he does so negligently as to amount to willfulness. Phillips v. Sun Oil Co., 307 N.Y. 328, 121 N.E.2d 249, 250-51 (1954). Though this violation was originally intended to protect physical property, beginning with School of Visual Arts v. Kuprewicz, 3 Misc. 3d 278, N.Y.S.2d 804 (N.Y. Supr. Ct. 2003), the tort was extended to electronic information.

In School of Visual Arts, a former employee posted false job postings on the internet, causing unsolicited job applications and pornographic emails to be sent to the director of human resources of her former employer. Id. at 807. These actions caused large volumes of unsolicited job applications and pornographic emails to be sent to plaintiff by way of their computer system without their consent. Id. at 808. The plaintiff argued that the unsolicited material depleted hard disk space, drained processing power, and adversely affected other system resources. The court agreed, ruling that the complaint stated a valid cause of action for trespass to chattels. Id. See also Davidoff v. Davidoff, 12 Misc.3d 1162A, *10, 819 N.Y.S.2d 209 (N.Y. Supr. Ct. 2006) (Defendants alleged tortious conduct, that is, sending to plaintiffs Website unsolicited content, and causing a depletion or deletion of information therein, thereby adversely affecting the effectiveness of his website, constitutes a claim for trespass to chattel.) (complaint dismissed on other grounds). And, as a result, a tort originally designed to address a partys misappropriation of the use of anothers horse or cow is now a means to combat spam.

VIII. Attorney-Client Privilege

Another important electronic discovery issue faced by practitioners involves preserving the attorney-client and work-product privileges. This issue typically arises in two contexts: document production and email communications.

There has been significant discussion of the document production at the federal level. Litigants may inadvertently produce documents or, in the interest of efficiency, the parties may agree to produce documents in advance of a privilege review with the understanding that the producing party can either claw back the documents or the examining party sneaked-a-peak subject to subsequent privilege review. The concern is that production or such agreements could lead to waiver. The 2006 amendments to Fed. R. Civ. P. 16 attempt to give some protection against inadvertent disclosure by stating that a scheduling order can include any agreements the parties reach for asserting claims of privilege or of protection as trial-preparation material after production. However, there is still concern whether such agreements would be binding outside of that particular litigation and, as a result, would result in subject matter wavier. A proposed amendment to Fed. R. Evid. 502 would make the court-ordered agreement enforceable in all courts, state and federal, in order to avoid subject matter waiver. See S. 2450 passed by the U.S. Senate on February 27, 2008.

In New York state, CPLR 4503(a) states that a privilege exists for confidential communications made between attorney and client in the course of professional employment, and CPLR 3101(b) vests privileged matter with absolute immunity. Spectrum Sys. Intl Corp. v. Chemical Bank, 575 N.Y.S.2d 809, 814, N.E.2d 1055, 1060 (1991). The party asserting the privilege must demonstrate that there was: (1) a communication between client and counsel, which (2) was intended to be and was in fact kept confidential, and (3) made for the purpose of obtaining or providing legal advice. United States v. Constr. Prods. Research, Inc., 73 F.3d 464, 473 (2d Cir. 1996). With electronic communications, the main issue is whether the communication was intended to and is in fact confidential.

New York ensures that emails do not lose their privileged character simply because the email travels through multiple servers and ISPs. CPLR 4548 provides: no communication under this article shall lose its privileged character for the sole reason that it is communicated by electronic means or because persons necessary for the delivery or facilitation of such electronic communication may have access to the content of the communication.

The leading New York case on attorney-client privilege and electronic documents is Scott v. Beth Israel Medical Center Inc., 847 N.Y.S.2d 436 (Sup. Ct. 2007). In Scott, the court denied the motion of a hospital administrator for a protective order that would have required his employer, Beth Israel Medical Center, to return email correspondence between Dr. Scott and his attorneys that were sent through Beth Israels email system and presumably found on Beth Israel's server during discovery. The Beth Israel Court reasoned that sending the emails through the hospital's system with knowledge of the hospital's restrictive email policy destroyed any reasonable expectation of confidentiality and, thereby, waived the attorney-client privilege. See generally Bisceglie, Kyle C., Kyle C. Bisceglie on Privilege Issues in E-discovery under New York Law in Scott v. Beth Israel Medical Center Inc. LexisNexis Expert Commentary (August 2008), 2008 Emerging Issues 2112.

One argument made by the administrator was that CPLR 4548 protected the confidentiality of his communications. The court rejected this argument, noting that CPLR 4548 simply acknowledges the widespread use of email and that use of email by itself will not abrogate the privileged nature of a communication. However, CPLR 4548 does not absolve an attorney of his or her responsibilities to assess the risk of communicating by email with a client. The holder of the privilege and his or her attorney must protect the confidential communication if they expect it to remain privileged.

IX. Non-party Disclosure

Discovery rules apply equally to subpoenas. As the Advisory Committee Notes for the 2006 Amendments explain: Rule 45 is amended to conform the provisions for subpoenas to changes in other discovery rules, largely related to discovery of electronically stored information. However, Fed. R. Civ. P. 45 requires issuing counsel to take reasonable steps to avoid imposing undue burden or expense on a person subject to the subpoena. Fed. R. Civ. P. 45(c)(1). Any compliance order must protect the responding party from significant expense resulting from compliance. Fed. R. Civ. P. 45(c)(2)(B). Under the burden-shifting framework of Fed. R. Civ. P. 45(d)(1)(D), the initial burden is on the responding party to show the ESI is not reasonably accessible. Auto Club Family Insur. Co. v. Ahner, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 63809, *8-9 (E.D.La. Aug. 29, 2007). The burden then shifts to issuing counsel to show good cause.

While the subpoena provision of the CPLR has not been amended to explicitly address electronic discovery, there is no reason to believe electronic evidence cannot be subpoenaed.

While New York does not recognize a tort for negligent third-party spoliation, see Ortega v. City of New York, 9 N.Y.3d 69, 2007 N.Y. LEXIS 2715 (2007), contempt is available under NY CLS Jud § 773 and Fed. R. Civ. Proc. R. 45, respectively. See generally Bisceglie, Kyle C., Kyle C. Bisceglie on Ortega v. City of New York. LexisNexis Expert Commentary (March 2008), 2008 Emerging Issues 2858.

CROSS-REFERENCES: Federal Judicial Center, Managing Discovery of Electronic Information: A Pocket Guide for Judges, Federal Judicial Center, 2007; The Sedona Guidelines: Best Practice Guidelines & Commentary for Managing Information & Records in the Electronic Age; Paul R. Rice, Electronic Evidence: Law and Practice (ABA Publishing 2005); Shira A. Scheindlin & Jeffrey Rabkin, Electronic Discovery in Federal Civil Litigation: Is Rule 34 Up to the Task?, 41 B.C. L. Rev. 327, 335-41 (2000)

Additional Federal Cases Interpreting December 2006 Amendments to Fed. R. Civ. P. on ESI: Rule 26(b)(2)(B) and (C): W.E. Aubuchon Co., Inc. v. BeneFirst, LLC, 245 F.R.D. 38 (D. Mass. 2007) (construing Rule 26(b)(2)(B) in light of Zubulakes distinction between accessible and inaccessible formats); Veeco Instruments, Inc. Securities Litigation, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23926 (S.D.N.Y. April 2, 2007) (finding good cause under Rule 26(b)(2)(C) to restore backup tapes); Best Buy Stores, LP v. Developers Diversified Realty Corp., 247 F.R.D. 567 (D. Minn. 2007) (finding no duty to preserve and no requirement to produce a now inaccessible searchable database under Rule 26(b)(2)(C) and (D)); National Union Fire Insurance Co. v. Clearwater Insurance Co., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52770 (S.D.N.Y. July 21, 2007) (denying order to restore backup tapes given inadequate showing); Columbia Pictures Industries v. Bunnell, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 46364 (C.D. Cal. May 29, 2007) (ordering production of data from the RAM memory on party's website); Peskoff v. Farber, 240 F.R.D. 26 (D.D.C. 2007) (imaged hard drives accessible and produced at the expense of producing party); Disability Rights Council of Greater Washington v. Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority, 242 F.R.D. 139 (D.D.C. 2007) (ordering production of inaccessible backup tapes under Rule 26(b)(2)(B) because responding party failure to issue a litigation hold); Woodburn Construction Co. v. Enron Pacific, LLC, Civ. No. C07-1620 (W.D. Wash. April 30, 2007) (denying motion to compel where parties had agreed to discovery protocol for ESI and requesting party sought formats at variance with protocol); Hubbard v. Potter, 247 F.R.D. 27 (D.D.C. 2008) (ordering further discovery but largely rejecting argument based on a party's unsupported assumptions about the volume of responsive documents that should have been produced); Peskoff v. Faber, 244 F.R.D. 54 (D.D.C. 2007) (ordering further discovery where witness testified to frequent use of email); KnifeSource, LLC v. Wachovia Bank, N.A., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58829 (D.S.C. August 10, 2007) (motion to compel under Rule 26(b)(2)(B) granted because data sought was non-physical but accessible); Seattle v. Professional Basketball Club, LLC, Civ. No. C07-1620MJP (W.D.Wash. February 25, 2008) (a bald assertion that discovery will be burdensome is insufficient in light of Rule 26(b)(2)(B)); Petcou v. C.H. Robinson Worldwide, Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13723 (N.D.Ga. February 25, 2008) (motion to compel denied given ESI was inaccessible); U&I Corp. v. Advanced Medical Design, Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27931 (M.D.Fla. March 26, 2008) (involving parties' discovery obligations, meet and confer, IT conference, burden shifting, and potential sanctions); Asset Funding Group, LLC v. Adams & Reese, LLP, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 30348 (E.D.La. April 4, 2008) (ordering a responding party to hire IT consultant and certify methods used to perform satisfactory search of various ESI data sources); Mikron Industries, Inc. v. Hurd Windows & Doors, Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27455 (W.D.Wash. April 21, 2007) (protective order denied because responding party did not meet and confer properly, and did not support its allegation of burdensomeness).

Rule 26(b)(5)(B): Muro v. Target Corp., 243 F.R.D. 301 (N.D.Ill. 2007) (finding that, to preserve privilege, a party must describe each privileged string entry of emails on the privilege log rather than describing the entire string email as only one entry); Garcia v. Berkshire Life Ins. Co. of America, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 86639 (D.Colo. November 13, 2007) (technical incompetence is no defense for failure to produce ESI where the producing party had been put on notice of its obligations).

Rule 26(f)(4): eBay Seller Antitrust Litigation, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 75498 (N.D. Cal. October 2, 2007) (Court ordered responding party to produce IT witness to testify about responding party's ESI preservation and collection based on Advisory Committee Note to Rule 26(f).); RLI Insurance Co. v. Indian River School District, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 78419 (D. Del. October 23, 2007) (motion to compel denied as discovery was not made in initial meet and confer).

Rule 34(a) and (b): Calyon v. Mizuho Secur. USA Inc. 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 36961 (S.D.N.Y. May 18, 2007) (rejecting party's request to inspect and image hard drives under Rule 34 for inadequate showing); Scotts Company LLC v. Liberty Mutual Insur. Co., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43005 (S.D. Ohio June 12, 2007) (same); Ferron v. Search, LLC, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34599 (S.D. Ohio April 28, 2008) (permitting imaging of party's hard drive given qualifying reason(s) including failure to preserve and produce); PSEG Power New York, Inc. v. Alberici Constructors, Inc., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66767 (N.D.N.Y. September 7, 2007) (responding party ordered to pay for reproduction of thousands of emails originally produced without attachments); DOnofrio v. SFX Sports Group, Inc., 247 F.R.D. 43 (D.D.C. 2008) (interpreting if necessary language of Rule 34(a) to shield responding party from converting inaccessible data); Autotech Technologies Ltd. Partnership v. Automationdirect.com, Inc., 248 F.R.D. 556 (N.D. Ill. 2008) (motion to compel reproduction of metadata denied because it was not in original request); Michigan First Credit Union v. Cumis Insur. Society, Inc., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84842 (E.D. Mich. Nov. 16, 2007) (citing Williams v. Sprint, 230 F.R.D. 640 (D. Kan. 2005) for the proposition that there is a general presumption against production of metadata); 3M Co. v. Kanbar, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 45232 (N.D. Cal. June 14, 2007) (applying the requirement of Rule 34 to producing ESI in ordinary course of business or labeled to correspond to each request and finding that the responding party produce in a searchable format); Palgut v. City of Colorado Springs, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 91719 (D. Colo. December 3, 2007) (denying motion to compel restoration where responding party lacked hardware to access inaccessible data).

Rule 37(f): Cache la Poudre Feeds, LLC v. Land O'Lakes, Inc., 244 F.R.D. 614, 623 (D. Colo. 2007) (addressing when duty to preserve arises in context of letter containing equivocal statement of discontent); Doe v. Norwalk Community College, 248 F.R.D. 372 (D. Conn. 2007) (rejecting good faith protection of Rule 37(f) because party did not have a routine system in place and ordering sanctions including adverse inference and costs for spoliation); Seroquel Products Liability Litig., 244 F.R.D. 650 (M.D. Fla. 2007) (imposing sanctions for multiple discovery shortcomings in response); Qualcomm Inc. v. Broadcom Corp., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 911 (S.D.Cal. 2008) (sanction of attorneys fees and costs in the amount of $8,568,633.24 for withholding tens of thousands of emails); The Southern New England Tel.

Co., v. Global Naps, Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47986 (D. Conn. June 23, 2008) (deliberate destruction of computer files using Window Washer and other discovery violations results in $5.2 million default judgment against defendant); Keithley v. The Home Store.com, Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 61741 (D. N. Cal. August 12, 2008) (Court ordered adverse inference and $320,000 in costs because responding party did not satisfy their duty to preserve ESI including source code.)

Rule 45: United States v. Three Bank Accounts, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29992 (D. S. Dak. April 2, 2008) (denying motion to quash given bare-bones allegation of burden; the Court enforced a subpoena that resulted in the identification of 250,000 electronic documents and would require three employees working full-time for four weeks with the proviso that the parties work in good faith to reduce its scope); Guy Chemical Co., Inc. v. Romaco AG, 243 F.R.D. 310 (N.D. Ind. 2007) (issuing counsel ordered to pay costs for production as non-party status is significant factor in finding undue burden).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Kyle C. Bisceglie, a Partner at Olshan Grundman Frome Rosenzweig & Wolosky LLP in New York City, counsels corporations, partnerships, and individuals with respect to complex commercial litigation, Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR), contracts, business advice and litigation avoidance. He has tried numerous cases without loss and has been involved in litigations, arbitrations, mediations and settlement negotiations. He also serves as general counsel to various entrepreneurial ventures and businesses in technology infrastructure, advertising, event production, dental and medical instruments, insurance, chemical distribution, fashion and consulting fields. Mr. Bisceglie has complex litigation experience in a variety areas including commercial, financial, insurance, employment, race and sex discrimination, harassment and retaliation, copyright and trademark, defamation, and business tort. He has participated in the investigation of the worldwide derivatives trading practices of a New York based merchant bank, representation of US policyholders in the largest insurance insolvency in North American history, and coordination of negotiation over and litigation for the transfer of a major beverage and spirit company's most valuable brand. Mr. Bisceglie also spent five years in the litigation department of Cadwalader, Wickersham and Taft; two years trying cases as an assistant prosecutor; and one year as a law clerk to Judge Alfred M. Wolin, United States District Court for the District of New Jersey. He can be reached by phone at 212-451-2207 or by email at Kbisceglie@olshanlaw.com.

63 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Hedges on an Innovative Response to Burdensome Pretrial Preservation Obligations

2008 Emerging Issues 2901

Hedges on an Innovative Response to Burdensome Pretrial Preservation Obligations

By Ronald J. Hedges

September 11, 2008

SUMMARY: In a recent case, one party faced with the burden of determining and clarifying its pretrial preservation obligations sought judicial intervention, requesting a declaratory judgment to help define its obligations. Ronald J. Hedges, counsel at the New York office of Nixon Peabody LLP and former U.S. Magistrate Judge, analyzes this innovative approach and discusses how a party can deal with burdensome pretrial preservation requirements.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Hedges on an Innovative Response to Burdensome Pretrial Preservation Obligations

INTRODUCTION

The burdens imposed by pretrial preservation obligations can be very costly, and often leave litigants in the awkward position of either preserving a substantial amount of electronically stored information and/or paper documents at their own expense, or determining for themselves which of their documents may be relevant to potential litigation. Little guidance exists for making that determination outside of the general requirement that parties exercise good faith and reasonableness to identify and preserve relevant information. n1 While this requirement may seem simple to satisfy, the risk that a court will disagree with a party's unilateral exercise of good faith and reasonableness, and the resulting threat of sanctions, encourages litigants to consider any means possible to clarify the scope of their preservation obligation. As Texas v. City of Frisco n2 demonstrates, pre-litigation means available to litigants to clarify their preservation obligation is limited.

CASE SUMMARY

On April 13, 2007, the Texas Department of Transportation (TxDOT) received a Notice Regarding Preservation of Electronic Data from counsel for the City of Frisco regarding potential litigation stemming from the conversion of SH 121 from a freeway to a tollway (the Project). n3 By that letter, the City of Frisco requested that TxDOT preserve documents and communications relating to the Project, as well all backup tapes or other storage media that may have contained that data. n4

Though TxDot attempted to comply with this broad preservation request, the burden and expense associated with that preservation led TxDOT to request a meet and confer with City of Frisco, pursuant to Rule 26(f) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The meet and confer process is essential in establishing the scope of discovery, and provides an excellent opportunity for parties to resolve discovery disputes. However, TxDOT's request went unanswered.

Without any direction from the opposing party, and confronted with a broad request for preservation, TxDOT sought judicial intervention. TxDOT filed a Complaint and Request for Declaratory Relief and Protective Order on August 14, 2007. By that Complaint, TxDOT requested a declaratory judgment and the courts protection from a general litigation hold request. n5 As stated more specifically in the Complaint:

TxDOT seeks protection from the broad scope and undue burden of the litigation hold and requests a declaratory judgment releasing TxDOT from the City's requested litigation hold as it violates the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure discovery provisions and as the City would not be entitled to such overbroad and general discovery were a case filed under NEPA and the APA. n6

The City of Frisco responded to the declaratory judgment action with a motion to dismiss, arguing that TxDOT had failed to plead the required elements of a justiciable claim and, essentially, was requesting an advisory opinion regarding preservation.

HOLDING

The Court dismissed TxDOT's Complaint on the grounds that TxDOT's claim was not ripe. In the context of declaratory judgment actions, the ripeness doctrine applies as follows:

A suit for declaratory relief, while allowing a party to anticipate a suit and seek a judicial resolution, must nevertheless meet this keystone limitation. In hornbook form, a declaratory action must be ripe in order to be justiciable, and is ripe only where an actual controversy exists. An actual controversy exists where a substantial controversy of sufficient immediacy and reality exists between parties having adverse legal interests. Ordinarily whether particular facts are sufficiently immediate to establish an actual controversy yields answers on a case-by-case basis. Whether a declaratory action is ripe, by its very structure, pushes against our insistence upon mature disputes. That is, it contemplates an ex ante determination of rights that exists in some tension with traditional notions of ripeness. n7

The obvious issue with requesting a declaratory judgment to resolve an issue with pretrial preservation is that the reasonably foreseeable litigation that gives rise to the duty to preserve may not be a substantial controversy of sufficient immediacy and reality. In the litigation hold letter, the City of Frisco clearly stated that only a potential exists for litigation in connection with [the Project]. n8 As the Court held:

While a "threat of litigation, if specific and concrete, can indeed establish a controversy upon which declaratory judgment can be based," the facts here are not "sufficiently immediate to establish an actual controversy" between the City and the State. Neither the letter nor any of the facts alleged by Plaintiff rise to the level of controversy sufficient to confer jurisdiction. n9

The Court went on to hold that no concrete or developed disagreement actually existed with regards to the preservation of documents, and stated: A pre-enforcement action like Plaintiff's is only ripe "if any remaining questions are purely legal ... [and] further factual development" is not required for effective judicial review. The facts here are not fully developed. The dispute is abstract, hypothetical and not suited for judicial determination. n10

IMPACT

The decision in Texas v. City of Frisco emphasizes the awkwardness of being subject to a burdensome pretrial preservation obligation: Though no justiciable controversy may exist at the time the duty to preserve attaches, a party's actions during the pretrial preservation period may have serious consequences in the subsequent litigation. Even if litigation is so probable that it rises to the level of controversy sufficient to confer jurisdiction, as the Court in City of Frisco suggests is possible, a party seeking relief from its preservation duty must then overcome the discretionary hurdle associated with declaratory judgment actions.

As the Supreme Court stated in MedImmune, Inc. v. Genentech, Inc.: n11

The Declaratory Judgment Act provides that a court may declare the rights and other legal relations of any interested party, 28 U.S.C. § 2201(a) (emphasis added), not that it must do so. This text has long been understood to confer on federal courts unique and substantial discretion in deciding whether to declare the rights of litigants.

The Court emphasized the authority vested in District Courts by stating:

We have found it more consistent with the statute, however, to vest district courts with discretion in the first instance, because facts bearing on the usefulness of the declaratory judgment remedy, and the fitness of the case for resolution, are peculiarly within their grasp. n12

The likelihood of a judge voluntarily inserting himself into a discovery dispute prior to the filing of a Complaint in the underlying substantive action seems small. The likelihood of a judges decision to abstain from entertaining a declaratory judgment action being overturned on appeal seems smaller.

PRACTICE TIPS

A party subject to a pretrial preservation obligation must, unfortunately, fend for itself absent party agreement. TxDOT acted appropriately in requesting a meet and confer with City of Frisco, as an agreement with the opposing party remains the most effective means of establishing explicit guidelines for the preservation of documents and insulating oneself from potential discovery sanctions for spoliation.

Even if the opposing party does not comply, requesting a meet and confer is an important step for a party trying to establish good faith preservation. The City of Frisco court noted that, while they do not specifically address pre-suit litigation hold requests, the Rules of Civil Procedure n13 contemplate that the parties will act in good faith in the preservation and production of documents, and encouraged the parties to handle the preservation of documents in response to their respective litigation holds in such good faith. n14 The party requesting the meet and confer is in a better position to decide for themselves what documents they consider relevant, and can later point to their opponents failure to take advantage of the opportunity to participate in the preservation process should any documents be lost.

Though there is always some uncertainty when determining what documents will be relevant to a claim that is not yet filed, one thing is clear in the aftermath of City of Frisco: Until the substantive claim is filed, judges are not likely to waste judicial resources and specify what constitutes good faith in the pretrial preservation context. Parties subject to a preservation obligation, therefore, should not waste their own resources seeking judicial intervention. Parties should, instead, rely on negotiation with their opponent to establish the boundaries of their preservation obligation and leverage the fact that, outside of any guidance from the opponent, they will determine for themselves what documents will be necessary in proving the opponents claim.

A party who still feels uncomfortable going forward without judicial intervention and who prefers, instead, to rely on the possibility that a court will entertain a declaratory judgment action must first develop a specific set of facts to present to the judge in the hopes of clearing the specific and concrete hurdle set forth in City of Frisco. While this is sure to be a difficult task because formal discovery has not yet taken place, a possibly substantial paper trail may already exist depending on the nature of the dispute. The party seeking a declaratory judgment must gather those documents and present them in a manner that shows a significant threat of litigation.

Finally, the party seeking a declaratory judgment must persuade the judge to do the unlikely and exercise their discretion to hear the case. Rather than argue in terms of the burdens imposed on the preserving party, an argument focused on the notion of judicial economy may be more persuasive. A judge may be more likely to entertain a declaratory judgment action knowing that an early decision on the preservation issue will avoid future motion practice regarding the scope of the preservation obligation and, possibly, even hearings on motions for sanctions. An argument focusing on the waste of judicial resources later in litigation also seems to emphasize the likelihood of that litigation occurring, thereby strengthening the specific and concrete controversy argument.

Return to Text

n1 The Sedona Conference Commentary on Legal Holds: The Trigger & the Process, Guideline 6, at 12 (Aug. 2007 Public Comment Version), available at http://www.thesedonaconference.org/content/miscFiles/Legal_holds.pdf.

n2 No. 4:07cv383, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24353 (E.D. Tex. Mar. 27, 2008)

n3 Complaint, Exh. A (available at <http://ralphlosey.files.wordpress.com/2008/04/exb-a.pdf>).

n4 Id. at 2.

n5 Complaint, 3 (available at <http://ralphlosey.files.wordpress.com/2008/04/tx-v-city-of-frisco-complaint-la021316.pdf>).

n6 Id. TxDOT argued that any claim brought by the City of Frisco regarding the environmental impact of the Plan would be brought pursuant to the National Environmental Policy Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 4321-4347 (NEPA), and, therefore, under the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552 et seq. (APA). The NEPA and APA would only allow a plaintiff to request the agency record and, even then, only after a final decision had been rendered. Complaint at 9.

n7 City of Frisco, U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24353, at *5 (citing Shields v. Norton, 289 F.3d 832, 835 (5th Cir. 2002)).

n8 Complaint, Exh. A.

n9 City of Frisco, U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24353, at *8-9.

n10 Id. at 9 (internal citations omitted).

n11 MedImmune, Inc. v. Genentech, Inc., __ U.S. __, 127 S. Ct. 764, 776 (2007) (internal citations omitted).

n12 Id. (internal citations omitted).

n13 The court in City of Frisco cited generally to Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 37.

n14 City of Frisco, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24353 at *10.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Ronald J. Hedges is counsel to Nixon Peabody LLP in its New York City office. He served as a United States Magistrate Judge in the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey from 1986 to 2007. Among other things, Mr. Hedges was a member of the Editorial Team for The Sedona Guidelines: Best Practices Addressing Protective Orders, Confidentiality & Public Access in Civil Cases (Mar. 2007). He was also the drafter of Local Civil Rule 5.3 of the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey, which established procedures for protective and sealing orders. For more information, or to contact Mr. Hedges, go to http://www.nixonpeabody.com/attorneys_detail1.asp?ID=1324. Mr. Hedges would like to thank Nixon Peabody associate Luis A. Casillas for his dedicated assistance on this project. Mr. Casillas is an associate in the firm's Business Litigation Group, and is a recent graduate of the Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law.

64 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

John K. Rabiej: How Shallow Is the Rule 37(e) Safe Harbor?

2008 Emerging Issues 2902

John K. Rabiej: How Shallow Is the Rule 37(e) Safe Harbor?

By John K. Rabiej

September 11, 2008

SUMMARY: In Nucor Corp. v. Bell, the court sanctioned a party for continuing to operate its laptop computer after litigation commenced, which may have destroyed relevant, residual/deleted ESI on the computer's hard drive. John K. Rabiej, Chief of the Rules Committee Support Office, which staffs the Judicial Conference's Standing and Advisory Rules Committees, discusses the implications of the court's ruling and suggests strategies to deal with it.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: JOHN K. RABIEJ: HOW SHALLOW IS THE RULE 37(e) SAFE HARBOR?

In Nucor Corp. v. Bell, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52808 (D.S.C. Feb. 1, 2008), the court sanctioned the defendant for continuing to operate his laptop computer, potentially destroying relevant electronically stored information (ESI), which had been earlier deleted but remained on the computer's available disk space. See 7 Moore's Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.03[3] (discussion of residual/deleted ESI). The court declined to apply Rule 37(e), which was intended to provide limited protection to a party from sanctions under certain conditions for the loss of relevant ESI resulting from the routine, good-faith operation of a computer. The court ruled that the safe harbor only protected a party from sanctions imposed under the civil rules and did not apply when a court sanctions a party under its inherent powers outside the Rule 37(e) framework.

Rule 37(e) was intended to provide real, though limited, protection to parties to continue the routine, good-faith operation of electronic information systems, even if ESI might be lost in the process. The court's sanction in Nucor Corp. underscored a latent gaping hole in the safe-harbor protection that the rulemakers had recognized but which they had hoped would not be resorted to by the courts. The court's ruling is especially significant because it deals with ESI that is not reasonably accessible under Rule 26(b)(2) and a party's duty to preserve it.

Purpose of Rule 37(e) Safe-Harbor Protection

Rule 37(e) balances the rights of litigants to have relevant evidence preserved and the needs of businesses to continue normal operations. Requiring a party at the start of all litigation to suspend, for example, the auto-delete function that eliminates email stored after a certain number of days or the recycling of backup tapes would cripple most businesses. In addition, preventing a business from turning on its computers in an effort to preserve all relevant ESI would provide a too-lopsided advantage to one side. On balance, the costs of significant business interruptions caused by the suspension of routine computer operations would be heavy and widespread, while the potential benefits of preserving critical ESI that was not available from other sources would be relatively marginal and infrequent.

Because relevant ESI might be lost, however, Rule 37(e)'s safe-harbor protection is circumscribed and applies only under specified conditions. First, the continued operation of an electronic information system must be done in good faith to secure the rule's protection. Determining the meaning of good faith and whether a party must take steps to prevent the loss of information on sources that it believes are not reasonably accessible depends on the circumstances of each case. One factor is whether the party reasonably believes that the information on such sources is likely to be discoverable and not available from reasonably accessible sources. See Committee Note to Fed. R. Civ. P. 37(e) (2006). Accordingly, a party may not deliberately continue computer operations knowing that relevant ESI, which is not available from another source, is being destroyed in the process.

The background rulemaking materials provide additional guidance. Good faith is described as a culpability standard intermediate between a negligence and a reckless or intentional culpability standard. Under this definition, a party would be protected from sanctions under Rule 37(e) for negligently failing to suspend computer operations even though the party should have known that the continued operation of a computer would destroy relevant ESI not available from another source. Even if the party's actions exceeded negligence, Rule 37(e) might protect the party as long as the party's actions did not rise to a reckless or intentional level of culpability.

Second, Rule 37(e)'s safe-harbor protection may not be available under exceptional circumstances. Again, the rule's background materials offer guidance as to the meaning. In the discussion of changes made to the rule after public comment, the limited role of this provision is clarified. The provision is intended to protect an entirely innocent party requesting discovery against serious prejudice arising from the loss of potentially important information. (Emphasis added.)

Third, Rule 37(e)'s safe harbor protects a party only from sanctions imposed under the civil rules. The obligation to preserve relevant, non-privileged evidence arises from common law, not from the civil rules. Because the substantive common law establishes both the preservation duty and spoliation sanctions enforcing the duty, Rule 37(e) expressly applies only to sanctions imposed under the civil rules. Extending the reach of the rule to apply to sanctions under the court's inherent powers would have tested the limits of the rulemaking authority.

Though acknowledging the limited reach of the rule, it was expected that courts would rely on the rule's good faith and exceptional circumstances conditions as grounds for imposing spoliation sanctions, even if imposed under the court's inherent powers. In analogous contexts, courts have applied for a long time the same standards and analysis that apply to sanctions under Rule 37 in general as they do to discovery sanctions under their inherent powers. See 7 Moore's Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.50 (noting that the standards governing the sanctions of a party under the court's inherent authority or under Rule 37 are the same). The expectation that the Rule 37(e) conditions would be relied on by courts when sanctioning parties under their inherent power was based on these past analogous experiences. This expectation apparently was not met in Nucor Corp.

Court's Ruling

In Nucor Corp., the defendant admitted intentionally destroying a thumb-drive device, which contained relevant ESI, precisely because he anticipated litigation. It was later determined that the defendant viewed documents downloaded from the thumb-drive device to the laptop computer. Despite a preservation order prohibiting the defendant from destroying or altering any electronic documents, the defendant continued to operate the laptop computer. The defendant also installed, reinstalled, and then uninstalled a new software program on the laptop computer, which consumed substantial disk space (73.3 megabytes of data). The installation and un-installation had overwritten and destroyed potentially relevant ESI, which would have identified the specific trade-secret documents the defendant had viewed on the laptop computer that had been transmitted from the thumb-drive device. In addition, the defendant continued to operate the laptop computer, which also served to overwrite available disk space and destroy residual/deleted ESI, though consuming much less disk space. The court concluded that the defendant acted intentionally and that it would strain credulity to believe that defendants did not know the laptop would contain relevant evidence in this litigation (Nucor Corp. at *23). It also ruled that the employee was solely responsible for the destruction of the thumb-drive device, but that both the employee and employer-corporation were responsible for the destruction of ESI caused by the continued computer operations.

The plaintiff moved for sanctions under Rule 37 for spoliation for installing software programs and operating the laptop computer, which permanently destroyed ESI that had been earlier transmitted from the thumb-drive device and later deleted from the laptop computer. The defendant contended that operation of its computer was protected under Rule 37(e). The court found that the defendant committed spoliation by installing the software programs and operating the laptop computer, which destroyed residual/deleted ESI that was not available from other sources. The court's ruling would have been unexceptionable, but for the basis for the sanction. The court did not ground its sanctions in Rule 37(e), but instead, relied exclusively on its inherent authority. Id. at *15-16 n. 3.

Though the court did not expressly rely on the conditions specified in Rule 37(e), the facts of the case provide ample support for such a ruling. The evidence manifests a pattern demonstrating that the defendant did not act in good faith in continuing computer operations. Clearly, the defendant's actions in destroying the only other source of relevant ESI and then installing and uninstalling software programs, overwriting deleted data on the laptop computer, did not represent routine good faith operations. Because the defendant had intentionally destroyed the alternative thumb-drive source of the ESI, the defendant was obligated to take the necessary measures to protect and preserve the ESI on the laptop computer, though it was not reasonably accessible. Under these circumstances, the defendant should have imposed a litigation hold suspending further operation of the laptop computer or making a forensic mirror image of its hard drive (see Committee Note to Fed. R. Civ. P. 37(e) (2006)). Alternatively, the defendant's destruction of the thumb drive met the rule's exceptional circumstances condition and would support the court's sanctions for failing to suspend computer operations. The ESI that was potentially lost by the defendant's actions was important and seriously prejudiced the plaintiff.

The court in Nucor Corp. held that Rule 37(e) by its plain language did not apply to sanctions under the court's inherent powers. Of course, the court may have implicitly relied on the good faith and exceptional circumstances conditions when it sanctioned the defendant. But the court's opinion leaves open the question whether Rule 37(e)'s conditions apply in all cases. The court's reluctance to apply Rule 37(e), which provides protection if the party acts in good faith, may be explained by its finding that the defendant's actions did not manifest bad faith because the defendant did not deliberately intend to bring about loss of evidence. Nucor Corp. at *23. Though the defendant's continued operation of the computer was intentional, the court did not find that the defendant deliberately intended to destroy evidence. The rule, of course, does not require a showing of bad faith or that the party acted intentionally or recklessly to forfeit the safe-harbor protection. Indeed, the rule recognizes a culpability standard lower than bad faith, which the defendant in Nucor Corp. exceeded, forfeiting his eligibility for the safe-harbor protection.

Conclusions

Though limited, Rule 37(e)'s safe-harbor protection represents a key component of the 2006 e-discovery rule amendments. The court in Nucor Corp. opted to sanction the defendant under its inherent power apparently outside the framework of Rule 37(e) and refrained from expressly relying on the limiting conditions specified in Rule 37(e) when it sanctioned the defendant for continuing routine computer operations. But the court could have relied on the Rule 37(e) conditions, which also supported a finding that the safe-harbor protection was inapplicable.

It remains to be seen what lesson courts will take from the Nucor Corp. ruling. If courts were to regularly sanction parties for spoliation of ESI resulting from routine, good-faith computer operations under their inherent powers without reference to the limiting conditions in Rule 37(e), the rule's safe-harbor protection would be rendered virtually meaningless. Parties would be subject to sanctions for merely acting negligently in continuing routine computer operations. To protect themselves against harsh spoliation sanctions, parties would be required to take the safest course and suspend all routine computer operations at the commencement of litigation, including recycling of backup tapes, auto-deletion of old e-mails, and even turning on a computer. On the other hand, if courts find that the conditions specified in Rule 37(e) were implicitly followed in Nucor Corp. and they rely on the same conditions when sanctioning parties under their inherent power, parties could still continue their computer operations in good faith with some degree of confidence without fear of sanctions.

Nucor Corp. underscores the importance of parties discussing preservation obligations as early as possible in the litigation. Both parties should know what is being preserved at an early stage in the litigation and any concerns or objections should be immediately raised and addressed before the consequences become severe. If the preservation issues are not addressed and a discovery dispute later develops, a party requesting relevant ESI, which was destroyed as part of routine computer operations, can look to the court's ruling in Nucor Corp. for authority to sanction a party outside the civil rules under the court's inherent powers. And the party could argue that mere negligence is sufficient to sanction the responding party. Conversely, the responding party can argue that the court's ruling is consistent with Rule 37(e) and that the "good faith" and "exceptional circumstances" conditions remain applicable in all cases. Accordingly, the party could argue that a showing of culpability beyond negligence would be required to sanction the party.

The better practice would be to recognize that the routine, good-faith operation of a computer system establishes a defense under the conditions specified in Rule 37(e) against spoliation sanctions imposed under either the civil rules or the court's inherent power.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004.

65 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Richard D. Rosen on Rights of Returning Servicemembers in Texas

2008 Emerging Issues 2872

Richard D. Rosen on Rights of Returning Servicemembers in Texas

By Richard D. Rosen

September 10, 2008

SUMMARY: Thousands of men and women serving in the armed forces in such places as Iraq, Afghanistan and the Balkans, will return to Texas to resume their civilian lives, joining more than 1.7 million veterans already residing in Texas. Attorneys should be aware of both federal and state statutes that protect veterans from some adverse effects their service may have had on their civilian lives and livelihoods as well as offer additional unique benefits.

PDF LINK: Core Emerging Issues Commentary ($)

ARTICLE: For the foreseeable future, thousands of men and women serving in the armed forces in such places as Iraq, Afghanistan, and the Balkans, will return to Texas to resume their civilian lives, joining the more than 1.7 million veterans already residing in the state. Both federal and state statute afford to these veterans protections from some of the adverse effects their service may have had on their civilian lives and livelihoods as well as benefits unique to those who shoulder the defense of their nation in the military. Attorneys representing returning servicemembers and those representing parties who deal with them, such as employers, creditors, landlords, and adverse litigants, should be familiar with the basic structure of these laws.

Federal law. Two federal statutes provide special protections to men and women returning from military service: the Servicemembers Civil Relief Act of 2003, 50 U.S.C. app. §§ 501-596, and the Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act of 1994, 38 U.S.C. §§ 4301-4334. The former furnishes a variety of protections from the deleterious impact of military service, while the latter confers employment-related security. Other veteran benefits are provided by the GI Bill, including the newly enacted Post-9/11 Veterans Educational Assistance Act of 2008, Pub. L. No. 110-252, Title 5, 122 Stat. 2357. Information about these programs can be found at <http://www.vba.va.gov/VBA/>.

Servicemembers Civil Relief Act (SCRA) of 2003.

Origins and Purpose. The SCRA has its genesis in the Soldiers and Sailors Civil Relief Acts of 1918 and 1940, enacted during the First and Second World Wars, respectively. Constitutionally predicated on Congress war powers, Dameron v. Brodhead, 345 U.S. 322 (1953), the Acts purpose is to provide for, strengthen, and expedite the national defense by protecting servicemembers to enable [them] to devote their entire energy to the defense needs of the Nation, and to provide for the temporary suspension of judicial and administrative proceedings that may adversely affect the civil rights of servicemembers during their military service. 50 U.S.C. app. § 502. Interpreting an earlier version of the Act, the Supreme Court held that the Act is to be liberally construed to protect those who have been obliged to drop their own affairs to take up the burdens of the nation. Boone v. Lightner, 319 U.S. 561, 575 (1943).

Persons Protected. The SCRA protects active and Reserve members of the uniformed services (including the Public Health Service and National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration) as well as members of the National Guard called to federal service or activated for more than 30 days to respond to a federally declared national emergency. 50 U.S.C. app. § 511.

Implications for Returning Servicemembers. Although primarily concerned with protecting the rights of currently serving members of the military, the SCRA has important implications for those who leave the armed forces. The Act includes protections from judicial and administrative processes and shelter from some of the adverse economic impact of military service that extend beyond active military service.

Judicial and Administrative Procedural Protections. Three principal SCRA provisions shield servicemembers from the effects of administrative and judicial proceedings during their absence from the civilian community: protections from default judgments, stays of ongoing proceedings, and tolling of statutes of limitations. The Act does not apply to criminal proceedings. 50 U.S.C. app. § 512(b).

Default Judgment Protection.

Prerequisite to Entry of Default Judgments. Before any court may enter a default judgment against a defendant, the plaintiff must file an affidavit stating whether or not the defendant is a member of the military or that the plaintiff is unable to discern whether the defendant is in the armed forces. 50 U.S.C. app. § 521(b)(1). If the defendant is a member of the armed forces, the court must appoint an attorney to represent the defendant servicemember; however, if the attorney cannot locate the defendant servicemember, the attorney may not waive any defense or otherwise bind the defendant servicemember in the case. 50 U.S.C. app. § 521(b)(2).

Right to Reopen Default Judgment. If the court enters a default judgment against a defendant servicemember during his or her period of military service or within 60 days after leaving military service, the servicemember may petition the court to reopen the judgment. 50 U.S.C. app. § 512(g). Provided the defendant servicemember has not entered an appearance in the proceeding, id. § 512(a), the court must grant the petition if it appears (1) that the servicemember was materially affected by reason of his or her military service from defending the action, and (2) that the servicemember has a meritorious or legal defense to the action. 50 U.S.C. app. § 521(g)(1); see, e.g., Flynn v. Great American Mgt. Co., 246 Va. 93, 431 S.E.2d 327 (1993) (prejudice requirement); Murdock v. Murdock, 338 S.C. 322, 526 S.E.2d 241 (1999) (prejudice requirement); Urbana College v. Conway, 29 Ohio App.3d 13, 502 N.E.2d 675 (1985) (meritorious defense requirement); La Mar v. La Mar, 19 Ariz. App. 128, 505 P.2d 566 (1973) (meritorious defense requirement). The purpose of the provision is to prevent default judgments from being entered against members of the armed services in circumstances where they might be unable to appear and defend themselves. United States v. Kaufman, 453 F.2d 306, 308-309 (2nd Cir. 1971).

Effect of Default Judgment. A default judgment subject to SCRA is not void, but merely voidable. Hawkins v. Hawkins, 999 S.W.2d 171, 174 (Tex. App. 1999). A servicemember must file a petition to open a default judgment with the court that entered it not later than 90 days after termination or release from military service. 50 U.S.C. app. § 521(g)(2). Even if a court vacates, sets aside, or reverses a default judgment against a servicemember, the court's action may not impair a right or title acquired by a bona fide purchaser for value under the judgment. 50 U.S.C. app. § 512(h).

Stay of Judicial & Administrative Proceedings.

Application for Stay. Servicemembers, as well as former servicemembers who are within 90 days of their release from the armed forces, may apply for a stay of any civil or administrative proceeding in which they are party at any stage before final judgment. 50 U.S.C. app. §§ 522(a), (b).

Prerequisites for Stay. An application for a stay of proceedings must include (1) a letter or other communication describing how the servicemembers current military duties materially affect his or her ability to appear and stating a date when the servicemember will be available, and (2) a letter or other communication from the servicemembers commanding officer stating that the servicemembers current military duties prevents appearance and that military leave is not authorized at that time. 50 U.S.C. app. § 522(b)(2). The fact that a party to an action is serving in the armed forces is not--in and of itself--a basis for a stay. Boone, 319 U.S. at 568; In re Burrell, 230 B.R. 309, 313-314 (E.D. Tex. 1999).

Courts Discretion. A motion for stay is addressed to the discretion of the trial court, Boone, 319 U.S. at 575; Strong v. Potomac Leasing Co., 722 S.W.2d 429, 481 (Tex. App. 1986); however, where the evidence supports a servicemembers claim that military service materially affects his or her ability to prosecute or defend an action, the trial court abuses its discretion if it does not grant the stay. See, e.g., Bond v. Bond, 547 S.W.2d 43, 45 (Tex. App. 1976) (trial court abused its discretion in refusing to grant two-week continuance to servicemember who was restricted to base until his retirement); Ulmer v. Mackey, 242 S.W.2d 679, 681 (Tex. App. 1951) (trial court abused its discretion in refusing to grant stay to defendant-servicemember in Korea performing combat duties at time of trial). Moreover, simply because a stay may cause inconvenience to other parties to the action or proceeding is not a basis for denying it. Semler v. Oertwig, 234 Iowa 233, 241, 12 N.W.2d 265, 270 (1943).

Effect of Application for Stay. An application for a stay neither constitutes an appearance for jurisdictional purposes nor a waiver of any procedural or substantive defense (e.g., lack of personal jurisdiction). 50 U.S.C. app. § 522(c). Servicemembers granted a stay of proceedings may apply for additional stays if their military service continues to affect materially their ability to defend or prosecute the action. 50 U.S.C. app. § 522(d)(1). If the court denies an additional stay, it must appoint counsel to represent the servicemember in the proceeding. 50 U.S.C. app. § 522(d)(2).

Tolling of the Statute of Limitations.

Nature of Provision. The period of a servicemembers military service may not be included in computing any civil or administrative limitation period. In short, statutes of limitation are tolled during a servicemembers military service. 50 U.S.C. app. § 526(a); Lester v. United States, 487 F. Supp. 1033, 1038 (N.D. Tex. 1980); First Natl Bank of Hico v. English, 240 S.W.2d 503, 506 (Tex. App. 1951). Thus, when servicemembers return to civilian life, their time spent in the military is deducted from virtually all temporal limits on causes of action either in favor or against them.

Periods Tolled by Military Service. Tolled are periods limited by law, regulation, or order for bringing any action or proceeding in a court, or before any board, bureau, commission, department, or other agency of a state (including its political subdivisions) or federal government by or against the servicemember or his or her estate. 50 U.S.C. app. § 526(a). Similarly, a period of military service is not included in computing any period for the redemption of real property sold or forfeited to enforce an obligation, tax, or assessment. 50 U.S.C. app. § 526(b). The Act does not apply, however, to limitation periods prescribed by U.S. internal revenue laws. 50 U.S.C. app. § 526(c). The provision extends to members of the Reserve components while in an active military status, but not to Reservists performing weekend drills or individual unit training. Min v. Avila, 991 S.W.2d 495, 506-507 (Tex. App. 1999). It is also inapplicable to members of the National Guard unless they are called to federal service. Bowen v. United States, 49 Fed. Cl. 673, 676 (2001), affd, 292 F.3d 1383 (Fed. Cir. 2002). Finally, the SCRA does not toll statutes of limitations for persons related to members of the military but who are not themselves in the armed forces. See, e.g., Lester, 487 F. Supp. at 1039 (claim of servicemembers wife not tolled).

Automatic Application. Unlike the SCRA sections dealing with default judgments and stays of proceedings, the tolling provision does not depend upon a servicemembers ability to demonstrate that military service materially affected his or her ability to participate in the proceeding. Conroy v. Aniskoff, 507 U.S. 511, 514 (1993); In re A.H. Robins Co., 996 F.2d 716, 718 (4th Cir. 1993) (the tolling provision is unconditional). Tolling is automatic under the statute; it is not restricted to those servicemembers engaged in battle or who are otherwise handicapped from asserting their legal claims. Bickford v. United States, 228 Ct. Cl. 321, 656 F.2d 636, 640 (1981). Moreover, the Act tolls limitations periods regardless of whether the cause of action arose before or during military service. Thompson v. Reedman, 201 F. Supp. 837, 838 (E.D. Pa. 1961). The statute does not preclude, however, such defenses as laches--an inexcusable delay in bringing an action causing prejudice to the defendant. Foster v. United States, 733 F.2d 88, 90 (Fed. Cir. 1984).

Effect of Tolling. The tolling provision cuts both ways: it applies whether the servicemember is a plaintiff or a defendant and may inure to the benefit of the non-servicemember party. Thus, in Scruggs v. Troncalli, 307 S.W.2d 300, 304 (Tex. App. 1957), the court applied the tolling provision to a defendant servicemember, holding that the period of military service could not be included in computing the time during which the defendant was allegedly in adverse possession of land.

Economic protections. Most SCRA protections from the economic dislocations of military service apply only to currently serving members of the armed forces. For example, the Act provides temporary shelter to both servicemembers and their dependents from eviction, 50 U.S.C. app. § 531; permits servicemembers to terminate pre-existing leases and installment contracts, 50 U.S.C. app. § 535; and caps interest on pre-existing liabilities to six percent. 50 U.S.C. app. § 527.

Foreclosure of mortgages and other security interests.

Nature of Protection. The SCRA affords protection--extending beyond a period of military service--from foreclosure of mortgages and other security interests on real or personal property provided (1) the obligation secured by the mortgages or security interests originated before military service and (2) the servicemembers ability to meet the obligation is materially affected by military service. 50 U.S.C. app. § 533(a). The SCRA gives servicemembers time to bring their mortgage obligations current before foreclosure proceedings may be brought against them. In an action filed during, or within 90 days after, a period of military service to enforce such an obligation, the court may sua sponte--or shall upon application of the servicemember--stay the proceedings for a period of time or adjust the obligation to preserve the interests of the parties. 50 U.S.C. app. § 533(b). Sales, foreclosures, or seizures of property for breaches of such obligations during, or within 90 days after, a period of military service, are invalid except by court order or agreement of the servicemember waiving his or her rights under the Act. 50 U.S.C. app. § 533(c); see 50 U.S.C. app. § 517 (waiver of SCRA rights by written agreement). Violation of the section constitutes a misdemeanor, 50 U.S.C. app. § 533(d)(1), and the SCRA's rights and remedies are in addition to any remedy for wrongful conversion otherwise available under law to the person claiming relief under [the] section, including consequential and punitive damages. 50 U.S.C. app. § 533(d)(2).

Practice Note: Under the recently enacted Housing and Economic Recovery Act of 2008, Pub. L. No. 110-289, §2203, 122 Stat. 2654, 2849, Congress expanded the SCRA protection against mortgage foreclosures from 90 days to nine months following release or discharge from military service. In addition, Congress limited the rate of interest on mortgage obligations to six percent during the period of military service and for one year after release or discharge from such service. 50 U.S.C. app. § 2203(b). The Act became effective on July 30, 2008, and its provisions expire on December 31, 2010. 50 U.S.C. app. § 2203(c). The Act also requires the Secretary of Defense to develop and implement a program to advise servicemembers returning from active duty abroad about how to prevent or forestall mortgage foreclosures, including credit and home-mortgage counseling. 50 U.S.C. app. § 2202.

Protection Prerequisites. Servicemembers usually establish that their military service materially affected their ability to meet mortgage or similar obligations by providing evidence comparing their pre-service and military-service incomes. See Federal Natl Mtg. Assn v. Deziel, 136 F. Supp. 859, 860-861 (E.D. Mich. 1956); Queens County Savings Bank v. Thaler, 181 Misc. 229, 230, 44 N.Y.S.2d 4, 5-6 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1943); see generally Kathleen H. Switzer, Mortgage Defaults and the Soldiers and Sailors Civil Relief Act: Assigning the Burden of Proof When Applying the Material Effect Test, 18 Real Estate L.J. 171, 178-179 (1993). If servicemembers can demonstrate that their military service materially affected their ability to meet their obligations, courts generally afford three types of relief:

(1) A stay of the proceedings, or an extension of the maturity dates of [the servicemembers] obligations by way of diminished payments.

(2) Where foreclosure judgment has already been ordered, a reopening or setting aside of the judgment in order that the [servicemember] may assert a defense; and

(3) Where a sale has been had under a judgment of foreclosure, invocation of the statutory redemption period, extended by a period equal to [the servicemembers] military service.

The Judge Advocate General's School Guide to the Servicemembers Civil Relief Act 82 (ABA 2007) (footnotes omitted) [hereafter Guide to SCRA]; James P. Pottorff, Contemporary Applications of the Soldiers and Sailors Civil Relief Act, 132 Mil. L. Rev. 115, 128 (1991).

Anticipatory relief.

Nature of Protection. The SCRA allows servicemembers to seek declaratory relief suspending certain contractual obligations and tax assessments where the servicemembers ability to comply with the obligations or pay the assessment has been materially affected by their military service. 50 U.S.C. app. § 591. A servicemember may, during military service or within 180 days of discharge from military service, apply to a court for relief from contractual obligations incurred before military service or from a tax or assessment falling due before or during military service. 50 U.S.C. app. § 591(a). The obligation or tax need not be in arrears for a servicemember to apply for relief. Application of Marks, 181 Misc. 497, 501, 46 N.Y.S.2d 755, 758 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1944). The court may grant a stay of the enforcement of an obligation either during a period of military service or at or after the termination of such service. 50 U.S.C. app. §§ 591(b)(1)(A), 591(b)(2)(A).

Temporal Limits of Stay. The length of the stay depends upon the nature of the obligation. For purchases of real estate or obligations secured by real estate, the court may stay enforcement of the obligation during military service, and permit servicemembers to satisfy back payments by spreading them over the remaining life of the of the contract plus a period equal to the period of military service. 50 U.S.C. app. § 591(b)(1); see also Guide to SCRA at 88. For non-real estate-related obligations and taxes or assessments, the servicemember must satisfy his or her obligations within a period of time equal to the servicemembers period of military service. 50 U.S.C. app. § 591(b)(2)(B); see also Guide to SCRA at 88. When a court grants a stay, the servicemember is not subject to fines or penalties for the period of compliance with the terms and conditions of the stay. 50 U.S.C. app. § 591(c).

Effect of Stay. The fact a servicemember applies for or receives a stay in connection with the payment of any tax, penalty, insurance premium, or other civil obligation or liability may not provide the basis for adverse credit or lending determinations, including adverse reports on the servicemembers creditworthiness, refusals to insure the servicemember, or changes in the conditions required for insurance. 50 U.S.C. app. § 518.

Tax relief. Where a servicemembers ability to pay federal or state income tax falling due before or during military service has been materially affected by his or her military service, the IRS or state taxing authority must defer collection of income tax upon notice from the taxpayer for a period not more than 180 days after termination or release from the armed forces. 50 U.S.C. app. § 570(a). No interest or penalty may accrue for the period of deferment by reason of nonpayment of the deferred tax. 50 U.S.C. app. § 570(b). The SCRA suspends statutes of limitation for the collection of deferred taxes for the period of military service and for an additional 270 days thereafter. 50 U.S.C. app. § 570(c). Finally, the section only defers tax collection, not the filing of returns. Military personnel must look elsewhere for filing extensions or postponements. Guide to SCRA at 100 (citing I.R.C. § 7508(a)(1), 26 U.S.C. § 7508(a) (permitting personnel in combat zone or participating in contingency operation to postpone filing federal income tax returns for the duration of combat service plus 180 days)).

State of residence.

Nature of the Protection. The SCRA preserves servicemembers state of residence, which is important for purposes of state taxes. A servicemember neither loses nor acquires residence for purposes of state income or personal property taxes by reason of being sent to a particular state in compliance with military orders. 50 U.S.C. app. § 571(a). Take, for example, a servicemember who is a domiciliary of Texas who receives military orders to report for duty in California. The servicemember does not lose his or her Texas residence by virtue of performing military service in California, and the servicemember is not liable to the State of California for taxes on his or her military compensation or personal property that accompanies him or her to California. 50 U.S.C. app. §§ 571(b-c); see Snapp v. Neal, 382 U.S. 397 (1966) (ad valorem tax on house trailer barred by prior version of SCRA); California v. Buzard, 382 U.S. 386, 395 (1966) (tax on automobile). And once the servicemember returns to Texas after fulfilling his or her military commitment, the State of California may not attempt to impose an income or personal property tax on the servicemember for the period of time spent in California.

Limitations. The residency provision is inapplicable to a spouses income and personal property, although the tax jurisdiction may not use military compensation of a nonresident servicemember to increase the tax liability imposed on income earned by the spouse. 50 U.S.C. app. § 571(d). Nor does the provision apply to non-military income received by the servicemember (e.g., through a part-time job); however, like spousal income, the tax jurisdiction may not use the servicemembers military compensation to increase the tax rate. 50 U.S.C. app. § 571(d). Finally, the section does not apply to other forms of taxation, such as real property taxes, United States v. Onslow Co. Bd. of Education, 728 F.2d 628, 636 (4th Cir. 1984); taxes on property used in a trade or business, 50 U.S.C. app. § 571(c)(3); or sales and use taxes. Sullivan v. United States, 395 U.S. 169, 175 (1969).

Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act (USERRA) of 1994.

General. The Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act of 1994 is the latest in a series of laws protecting veterans employment and reemployment rights going back to the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, and preceded most recently by the Veterans Reemployment Rights Act (VRRA) of 1974. 20 C.F.R. § 1002.2. In enacting USERRA, Congress emphasized its continuity with earlier statutes, and it intended that the large body of case law developed under earlier statutes remain in full force and effect to extent consistent with USERRA. 20 C.F.R. § 1002.2; Rogers v. City of San Antonio, 392 F.3d 758, 762 (5th Cir. 2004).

USERRAs Objectives. USERRAs principal purposes are (1) to encourage military service by eliminating or minimizing disadvantages to civilian careers resulting from such service; (2) to minimize the disruption of the lives of servicemembers as well as their employers, fellow employees, and communities, by providing for prompt reemployment of servicemembers upon their completion of service; and (3) to prohibit discrimination against persons because of their military service. 38 U.S.C. § 4301. The Act accomplishes these objectives by requiring--with limited exceptions--the immediate reemployment of persons called away for military service and by prohibiting discrimination against employees because of their military service.

Employers Included under USERRA. The Act applies to virtually every employer in the United States, regardless of number of employees they hire--an employer of one falls under the Act. 20 C.F.R. § 1002.34(a); Cole v. Swint, 961 F.2d 58, 60 (5th Cir. 1992). The term employer means any person, institution, organization, or other entity that pays salary or wages for work performed or that has control over employment opportunities, and includes federal, state, and local governments. 38 U.S.C. § 4303(4).

Meaning of Uniformed Service. The uniformed services under the Act are the Armed Forces, the Army National Guard and the Air National Guard when engaged in active duty for training, inactive duty training, or full-time National Guard duty, the commissioned corps of the Public Health Service, and any other category of persons designated by the President in time of war or national emergency. 38 U.S.C. § 4303(16). USERRA's protections cover all categories of military training and service, including duty performed on a voluntary or involuntary basis, in time of peace or war, in the active or Reserve Components of the armed forces. 38 U.S.C. § 4303(13); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.6. While National Guard service under authority of state law is not covered by USERRA, 20 C.F.R. § 1002.57(a), National Guard service under federal authority is protected. Included is duty performed by the National Guard when called to federal service and active duty for training, inactive duty training, or full-time National Guard duty under title 32, United States Code. 20 C.F.R. § 1002.6.

Notice of Rights and Duties. USERRA requires employers to post notices of employee rights and benefits as well as the obligations of employers and employees under the Act. 38 U.S.C. § 4334(a). A copy of the required notice appears at http://www.dol.gov/vets/programs/userra/USERRA_PRIVATE.pdf.

Reemployment Rights.

Prerequisites for Reemployment. If an employee is absent from a position of civilian employment by reason of military service, he or she is entitled to prompt reemployment by the same employer if--

(1) The employee left his or her job to perform voluntary or involuntary military service. 38 U.S.C. § 4312(a); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.32(a).

(2) The employee provided advanced written or verbal notice of military service to the employer. 38 U.S.C. § 4312(a)(1); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.32(a)(1). The Act does not require notice if prevented by military necessity (e.g., classified missions, short-notice deployments) or, under all of the relevant circumstances, giving notice is otherwise impossible or unreasonable (e.g., employers absence at the time service commences). 38 U.S.C. § 4312(b); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.86; see also H.R. Rep. No. 103-65, at 25-26, reprinted in 1994 U.S.C.C.A.N. 2449, 2458-2459.

(3) The cumulative length of the employees current absence for military service plus all previous absences for military service with the same employer does not exceed five years. 38 U.S.C. § 4312(a)(2); 20 C.F.R. §§ 1002.32(a)(2), 1002.101. The Act excludes significant periods of service from the five year cumulative total, including weekend and annual training for Guard and Reserve members and service during wars, national emergencies, and operational missions. 38 U.S.C. § 4312(c); see also 20 C.F.R. § 1002.103 (listing all periods excluded from the five-year limit).

(4) The employee was released or discharged from military service under honorable conditions. 38 U.S.C. §§ 4304, 4313(a); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.32(a)(4). Employees separated from the armed forces with a dishonorable or bad conduct discharge as a result of a court-martial conviction or who receive a discharge under other than honorable conditions by reason of an adverse administrative proceeding are not eligible for reemployment under the Act. 20 C.F.R. § 1002.32(a)(4).

(5) The employee reports to, or submits an application for reemployment to, the employer in a timely manner following his or her military service. 38 U.S.C. § 4312(a)(3), 20 C.F.R. § 1002.115. Whether an employee has reported to work or filed an application for reemployment in a timely manner depends upon the length of the employees period of military service. The Act establishes the time periods for compliance with the timeliness requirement; however, an employee who fails to report or apply for reemployment within the appropriate period does not automatically forfeit the entitlement to reemployment. Instead, the employee is subject to the employers established policies pertaining to discipline for absence from scheduled work. 38 U.S.C. § 4312(e)(3); 20 C.F.R. 1002.117(a). USERRAs timeliness requirements are--

a. For periods of military service less than 31 days: The employee must report to work or apply for reemployment not later than the beginning of the first full regularly scheduled work period (e.g. shift) on the first full calendar day following the completion of service and the expiration of eight hours after a period allowing for the safe transportation of the person from the place of service to the persons residence. 38 U.S.C. § 4312(e)(1)(A)(i). For example, if the employee completes a period of service and travel home, arriving at ten oclock in the evening, he or she cannot be required to report to the employer until the beginning of the next full regularly scheduled work period that begins at least eight hours after arriving home, i.e., no earlier than six oclock the next morning. 20 C.F.R. § 1002.115(a). If it is impossible or unreasonable for the employee to report within such time period through no fault of the employee, he or she must report to the employer as soon as possible after the expiration of the eight-hour period. 20 C.F.R. § 1002.115(a); 38 U.S.C. § 4312(e)(1)(A)(ii).

b. For periods of military service more than 30 days but less than 181 days: The employee must report to work or apply for reemployment not later than 14 days after the completion of service or if submitting such application within such period is impossible or unreasonable through no fault of the employee, the next first full calendar day when submission of such application becomes possible. 38 U.S.C. § 4312(e)(1)(C); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.115(b).

c. For periods of military service more than 180 days: The employee must report to work or apply for reemployment not later than 90 days after the completion of the period of service. 38 U.S.C. § 4312(e)(1)(D); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.115(c).

d. For employees hospitalized or convalescing from a service-connected illness or injury: The employee must report to work or apply for reemployment at the end of the period necessary for the employee to recover from the illness or injury. 38 U.S.C. § 4312(e)(2)(A). Generally, the period of recovery may not exceed two years except that it must be extended by the minimum time necessary to accommodate circumstances beyond the employees control that make reporting within the period impossible or unreasonable. 38 U.S.C. § 4312(e)(2)(B); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.116.

Nature of Right to Reemployment. If employees meet the conditions described above, USERRA requires employers to hire them promptly in the positions of employment they would have been employed had their employment not been interrupted by military service, provided they are qualified to perform the positions duties. 38 U.S.C. § 4313(a)(1)(A). If employees are not qualified to perform the duties, employers must make reasonable efforts to qualify them. 38 U.S.C. § 4313(a)(1)(B). The term promptly means as soon as practicable and generally may not exceed two weeks absent unusual circumstances. 20 C.F.R. § 1002.181. For employees who performed military service for more than 90 days, the employee must be restored to a position of like seniority, status and pay, the duties of which the person is qualified to perform. 38 U.S.C. § 4313(a)(2)(A).

Escalator Principle. Returning employees must not only be promptly reemployed, they must also receive the seniority and perquisites of seniority they earned before they departed for military services plus any additional seniority, rights, and benefits they would have attained had they remained continuously employed. 38 U.S.C. § 4316(a). [T]he returning veteran does not step back on the seniority escalator at the point he stepped off. He steps back on the point he would have occupied had he kept his position continuously during the period of military service. Fishgold v. Sullivan Drydock & Repair Corp., 328 U.S. 275, 284-285 (1946); H.R. Rep. No. 103-65, at 30, reprinted in 1994 U.S.C.C.A.N. 2449, 2463. Thus, employees are entitled to all of the perquisites of seniority (e.g., promotions, pay raises) based on their pre-service length of employment plus the period spent in military service. In other words, [t]he employer must determine the seniority rights, status, and rate of pay as though the employee had been continuously employed during the period of service. 20 C.F.R. § 1002.193. A seniority-based right or benefit is one that accrues with, or is determined by, longevity in employment, 38 U.S.C. § 4303(12) (defining seniority as longevity in employment); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.212; see, e.g., Alabama Power Co. v. Davis, 431 U.S. 581 (1977) (company pension benefits); it does not include benefits, rights, or status not based on longevity. 38 U.S.C. § 4316(b)(3); McKinney v. Missouri-Texas RR. Co., 357 U.S. 265 (1958); Rogers v. City of San Antonio, 392 F.3d 758, 764 (5th Cir. 2004). Returning employees receive promotions and pay increases if there is a reasonable certainty they would have received the pay increases and promotions absent military service. 20 C.F.R. §§ 1002.191, 1002.193, 1002.236. A reasonable certainty means a high probability. 20 C.F.R. § 1002.213; see also H.R. Rep. No. 103-65, at 31, reprinted in 1994 U.S.C.C.A.N. 2449, 2464.

Employer-Provided Health Insurance. Returning employees are entitled to immediate reinstatement of their employer-provided health insurance (if any) without a waiting period or exclusion for preexisting conditions other than those conditions determined to be service-connected by the Veterans Administration. 38 U.S.C. § 4317(b); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.168(a). In addition, employees may elect continuing coverage under their employers health-insurance plan for up to 24 months while on qualifying military leave. 38 U.S.C. § 4317(a)(1); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.164. If called to active duty for less than 31 days, the employee may not be required to pay more than the regular employee share for health insurance; if he or she is away for more than 31 days, the employee may pay 102% of the full premium, representing the employees and employers full share plus 2% for administrative costs. 38 U.S.C. § 4317(a)(2); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.166. The Act neither requires employers to establish a health plan if they do already have one, nor permits employees to initiate new health plan coverage at the beginning of a period of service if they did not previously have such coverage. 20 C.F.R. §§ 1002.164(b-c).

Employer-Funded Pension Plans. An employer may not treat a returning employee as having incurred a break in service for purposes of participation, vesting, and accrual of benefits in an employer-maintained pension plan. 38 U.S.C. § 4318(a)(2); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.259. The amount (if any) of an employers obligation to the plan during the period of qualifying military service depends upon the type of pension plan, whether employer contributions are contingent upon employee contributions to the plan, and whether the employee elects to make up his or her contributions to the plan upon reemployment. 38 U.S.C. § 4318(b); 20 C.F.R. §§ 1002.261--1002.267.

Accrued Leave. Upon an employees request, employers must permit employees whose employment is interrupted because of military service to use, during their service, any vacation, annual, or similar leave with pay accrued before the commencement of service. 38 U.S.C. § 4316(d). Employers may not, however, require employees to use vacation, annual, or similar leave during their military service. 38 U.S.C. § 4316(d).

Disabled Veterans. Employers must make reasonable efforts to accommodate returning employees suffering from service-connected disabilities by placing them in positions of employment they would have attained but for their military service. 20 C.F.R. § 1002.225. If the disability is not an impediment for the position, the disabling condition is irrelevant for USERRA purposes. Uniformed Services Employment & Reemployment Rights Act of 1994, Final Regulations, 70 Fed. Reg. 75,277 (Dec. 19, 2005). If the disability limits the employees ability to perform the job, the Act requires the employer to make reasonable efforts to accommodate the disability. 38 U.S.C. § 4313(a)(3); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.226. If despite the employers reasonable efforts to accommodate the disability, the returning disabled employee cannot become qualified for the position, the employee must receive any other position which is equivalent in seniority, status, and pay, the duties of which the person is qualified to perform or would become qualified to perform with reasonable efforts by the employer. 38 U.S.C. § 4313(a)(3)(A); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.225(a). If no such position exists, the employer must place the employee in a position which is the nearest approximation . . . in terms of seniority, status, and pay consistent with circumstances of such persons case. 38 U.S.C. § 4313(a)(3)(B); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.225(b).

Discharge of Returning Employees. The Act protects servicemembers from being fired following their reemployment. Except for cause, a returning employee may not be fired within one year after being reemployed if the employees period of military service was more than 180 days, or within 180 days if the employees service was more than 30 days but less than 181 days. 38 U.S.C. § 4316(c); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.247. If the employer fires a returning employee within these USERRA-protected periods, it bears the burden of proving that the employee was discharged for cause (e.g., employee misconduct, reductions-in-force). 20 C.F.R. § 1002.248; Ferguson v. Walker, 397 F. Supp. 2d

964, 972 (N.D. Ill. 2005).

Exceptions to Reemployment. Employers have three possible defenses for denying reemployment to returning servicemembers, 38 U.S.C. § 4312(d), and they have the burden of establishing the defenses. 38 U.S.C. § 4312(d)(2). Specifically, even if an employee is otherwise eligible for reemployment, the employer is not required to reemploy him or her--

(1) If the employers circumstances have so changed as to make such reemployment impossible or unreasonable. 38 U.S.C. § 4312(d)(1)(A). For example, an employer may be excused from reemploying the employee where there has been an intervening reduction in force that would have included that employee. 20 C.F.R. § 1002.139(a). The impossible or unreasonable circumstances exception is, however, narrowly construed. Uniformed Services Employment & Reemployment Rights Act of 1994, Final Regulations, 70 Fed. Reg. 75,261 (Dec. 19, 2005). The employer may not refuse to reemploy a returning servicemember simply because it hired another employee to fill the position during the servicemembers absence. 20 C.F.R. § 1002.139(a). If mere replacement of the employee would exempt an employer from the Act, its protections would be meaningless. Cole v. Swint, 961 F.2d 58, 60 (5th Cir. 1992). In such circumstances, the employer has the burden of displac[ing] the replacement worker or ensur[ing] the returning employee is placed in a position of like seniority, status, and benefits. Major Michele A. Forte, Reemployment Rights for the Guard and Reserve: Will Civilian Employers Pay the Price for National Defense, 59 A.F.L. Rev. 287, 313 (2007) (footnote omitted); see, e.g., Nichols v. Department of Veterans Affairs, 11 F.3d 160, 163 (Fed. Cir. 1993); Fitz v. Board of Educ., 662 F. Supp. 1011, 1014 (E.D. Mich. 1985), affd, 802 F.2d 457 (6th Cir. 1986).

(2) If assisting the returning employee in becoming qualified for reemployment would impose an undue hardship on the employer. 38 U.S.C. § 4312(d)(1)(B). The term undue hardship means actions requiring significant difficulty or expense, when considered in light of (a) the nature and cost of the needed action; (b) the employers overall financial resources, including such factors as the number of its employees and the impact of the accommodation on its operations; and (c) the type of operations the employer conducts, including such factors as the composition, structure, and functions of its work force and the geographic separateness of the employers facilities. 38 U.S.C. § 4303(15).

(3) If the employment from which the servicemember left was only for a brief, nonrecurrent period and there was no reasonable expectation that the employment would continue indefinitely or for a significant period. 38 U.S.C. § 4312(d)(1)(C).

Enforcement.

Remedial Mechanisms: State & Private Employers. A servicemember denied reemployment under the Act has the option of seeking assistance from the Department of Labors Veterans Employment and Training Service (VETS) or initiating a private cause of action directly against the employer. 38 U.S.C. §§ 4322(a), 4323(a); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.303. If the servicemember seeks assistance from VETS, the Service will investigate the claim and attempt to resolve it with the employer. 38 U.S.C. §§ 4321--4322, 4326; 20 C.F.R. §§ 1002.288--1002.291. If VETS is unsuccessful, the servicemember may seek referral of the case to the U.S. Attorney General, who may commence an action on his or her behalf. 38 U.S.C. § 4322(a)(1); 20 C.F.R. §§ 1002.292. Alternatively, if the servicemember is unsuccessful in securing relief through VETS and the Attorney General, he or she may sue private employers in United States district court or state employers in state court. 38 U.S.C. §§ 4323(b)(2-3); 20 C.F.R. §§ 1002.303--1002.305. For lawsuits against private employers in U.S. district court, venue is proper in any district where the employer maintains a place of business. 38 U.S.C. § 4323(c)(2); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.307. In spite of the statutory right to file suit, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has held that USERRA does not preclude enforcement of individual contracts to arbitrate employment-related disputes. Garrett v. Circuit City Stores, Inc., 449 F.3d 672, 681 (5th Cir. 2004). Returning servicemembers or their attorneys having questions or needing assistance may contact the National Committee for Employer Support to the Guard and Reserve (ESGR) at 1-800-336-4590 or may visit the ESGR website at <http://esgr.org/userra.asp>.

Remedial Mechanisms: Federal Agency Employers. Where a federal agency has failed to comply with USERRA, the employee may generally seek relief before the Merit Systems Protection Board (MSPB). 38 U.S.C. § 4324. The Office of Special Counsel (OSC) will represent a federal-sector claimant if requested and if the OSC is reasonably satisfied that the claimant is entitled to the relief sought. 38 U.S.C. § 4324. Where a federal-sector claimant does not want OSC representation, or if the OSC is not reasonably satisfied the claimant is entitled relief, the claimant may appeal to the MSPB on his or her own behalf using privately retained counsel. 38 U.S.C. § 4324; see also H.R. Rep. No. 103-65, at 40, reprinted in 1994 U.S.C.C.A.N. 2449, 2473.

Statute of Limitations & Laches. USERRA does not have a statute of limitation and specifically proscribes the application of state statutes of limitations to proceedings under the Act. 38 U.S.C. § 4323(i). Some federal courts have applied the federal general four-year statute of limitations (28 U.S.C. § 1658) to USERRA claims. See, e.g., Wagner v. Novartis Pharm. Corp., --- F. Supp. 2d ---, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52974 (E.D. Tenn. Jul. 10, 2008); ONeil v. Putnam Retail Mgt., LLP, 407 F. Supp. 310, 316 (D. Mass. 2005); see generally Jones v. R.R. Donnelley & Sons Co., 541 U.S. 369, 382 (2004) (application of general statute of limitations to federal statutes acts enacted after 1990). Servicemembers who unreasonably delay in seeking relief to the prejudice of the employer may be barred by laches. Miller v. City of Indianapolis, 281 F.3d 648, 653 (7th Cir. 2002).

Remedies. Once a violation of USERRA is established, a court may order an employer to comply with the Acts reemployment provisions, and it may direct the employer to compensate the returning employee for lost wages and benefits suffered as a result of the employers noncompliance. 38 U.S.C. §§ 4323(d)(1)(A-B); 20 C.F.R. §§ 1002.312(a-b). If the court finds the employers noncompliance with the Act was willful, it may award to the returning employee an amount equal to his or her lost wages and benefits as liquidated damages. 38 U.S.C. § 4323(d)(1)(C); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.312(c). If successful, the returning employee may also recover attorneys fees, expert witness fees, and litigation costs. 38 U.S.C. § 4323(h)(2); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.310. On the other hand, no court costs or fees may be assessed against the returning employee. 38 U.S.C. § 4323(h)(1); 20 C.F.R. § 1002.310.

Nondiscrimination.

Prohibited Actions. Although not directly related to the rights of returning servicemembers, practitioners should recognize that USERRA prohibits discrimination against employees who serve, have served, or will serve in the armed forces. 38 U.S.C. § 4311(a). Congress intended that USERRA's anti-discrimination provision be broadly construed and strictly enforced. H.R. Rep. No. 103-65, at 23, reprinted in 1994 U.S.C.C.A.N. 2449, 2456. Thus, employers may not fire or take other adverse employment actions against employees before they serve or after they return because of their membership or anticipated membership in the military. 38 U.S.C. § 4311(a). USERRA also prohibits employers from taking adverse employment actions as reprisals against employees who seek the protections of USERRA or who cooperate with investigations under the Act. 38 U.S.C. § 4311(b). An adverse employment action is a tangible change in working conditions that produces a material employment disadvantage. Clegg v. Arkansas Dept of Correction, 496 F.3d 922, 927 (8th Cir. 2007) (internal quotations omitted). Examples of adverse employment actions include transfer to positions that are less stable or deny an employees ability to earn bonuses, Maxfield v. Clintas Corp., 427 F.2d 544, 552 (8th Cir. 2005); transfer to jobs having less regular schedules and longer work days, Hill v. Michelin North America, Inc., 252 F.3d 307, 313 (4th Cir. 2001); denial of a promotion, Brandsasse v. City of Suffolk, 72 F. Supp. 2d 608, 614 (E.D. Va. 1999); opening an investigation of an employee following the employees request for accommodation of his military service, Brandsasse v. City of Suffolk, 72 F. Supp. 2d 608, 615; failure to offer make-up promotional exams upon return from military service, Fink v. City of New York, 129 F. Supp. 2d 511, 520 (E.D.N.Y.2001), and terminating an employee during a reduction-in-force because of the employees National Guard membership. Brinkley v. Dialysis Clinic, Inc., 403 F. Supp. 2d 1090, 1100 (M.D. Ala. 2005).

Burden of Proof.

Employees Burden. An employer violates USERRA if the employee can establish that his or her military service, claim for USERRA relief, or cooperation with an investigation under the Act was a motivating factor (not the sole factor) in the denial of employment, promotion, or any benefit of employment. 38 U.S.C. § 4311(c)(2); Coffman v. Chugach Support Serv., Inc., 411 F.3d 1231, 1238-1239 (11th Cir. 2005); Leisek v. Brightwood Corp., 278 F.3d 895, 898-899 (9th Cir. 2002). An employee may prove discriminatory motive or intent either by direct or circumstantial evidence, and [d]iscriminatory motivation under the USERRA may be reasonably inferred from a variety of factors, including proximity in time between the employees military activity and the adverse employment action, inconsistencies between the proffered reason and other actions of the employer, an employers expressed hostility towards members protected by the statute together with knowledge of the employees military activity, and disparate treatment of certain employees compared to other employees with similar work records or offenses. Sheehan v. Department of the Navy, 240 F.3d 1009, 1014 (Fed. Cir. 2001); see also Sutherland v. SOS Internatl, Ltd., 541 F. Supp. 2d 787, 793 (E.D. Va. 2008).

Employers Burden. If the employee successfully establishes that the employer was at least partially motivated by his or her military service, the burden shifts to the employer to prove that it would have taken the action in the absence of the employees military service, claim, or cooperation. Maxfield, 427 F.3d at 551. [T]he employee does not have the burden of showing that the employers stated reason is a pretext. Instead, the employer must show, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the stated reason was not a pretext; that is, that the action would have been taken in the absence of [the employees military] service. Velazquez-Garcia v. Horizon Lines of Puerto Rico, Inc. 473 F.3d 11, 17 (1st Cir. 2007) (quoting 38 U.S.C. § 4311(c)) (emphasis in the original); see also Grosjean v. FirstEnergy, 481 F. Supp. 878, 883 (N.D. Ohio 2002); Snowman v. Imco Recycling, Inc., 347 F. Supp. 2d 338 (N.D. Tex. 2004) (employer met burden where it proved decision to terminate employee was made before employee informed employer about military service).

Enforcement. The provisions relating to the enforcement of a returning employees reemployment rights are applicable to discrimination claims under the Act.

Texas Law. In addition to the federal government, the State of Texas furnishes various protections to returning servicemembers.

Reemployment Rights of Public Employees.

Reemployment Rights. A public employee who leaves a state or local governmental entity to enter active military service is entitled to be reemployed by the governmental entity upon the completion of service. Tex Govt Code § 613.002(a). The employee must be rehired in the same department in which he or she was employed at the time of entry onto active duty and in the same position or a position of similar seniority, status, and pay. Tex Govt Code §§ 613.002(a)(2), (a)(3). The returning employee is considered to have been on furlough or leave of absence during his or her period of military service and may participate in retirement or other benefits to which public employees are entitled. Tex Govt Code § 613.006. The Texas Attorney General has opined that a returning public employee is entitled to credit for pay purposes for the time spent on military leave, Op. Texas Atty. Gen. No. MW-109, June 18, 1971; Op. Texas Atty. Gen. No. MW-100, Dec. 13, 1979, as well as sick leave accumulated before the employee entered active duty. Op. Texas Atty. Gen. No. M-886, Dec. 20, 1979. An employee is not entitled to accumulate sick and annual leave while performing military service. Op. Texas Atty. Gen. No. M-886, Dec. 20, 1979; however, his or her service counts for longevity purposes in determining the amount of sick and annual leave the employee earns upon his or her return. Op. Texas Atty. Gen. No. H-941, Feb. 9, 1977; see e.g., Tex Govt Code § 661.152 (accrual of vacation leave based on longevity).

Prerequisites. To be entitled to reemployment, the returning public employee must be discharged, separated, or released from active military under honorable conditions not later than the fifth anniversary of entry onto active duty and must be physically and mentally qualified to perform the duties of the position. Tex Govt Code § 613.002(b). If the public employee cannot perform the duties of the position because of a disability sustained during military service, the governmental entity must rehire the returning employee in a position the employee can perform and that has like seniority, status, and pay as the former position or has the nearest possible seniority, status, and pay. Tex Govt Code § 613.003. The returning employee must apply for reemployment not later than the 90th day after the employee is discharged or released from active military service. Tex Govt Code § 613.004(a). The application for employment must (1) be made to the same governmental entity that employed the veteran before he or she entered military service, (2) be in writing, and (3) include evidence of a discharge under honorable conditions (usually a DD Form 214). Tex Govt Code § 613.004(b).

Protection from Discharge. Veterans reemployed by governmental entities may not be discharged from the position within one year of the date of reemployment. Tex Govt Code § 613.005.

Enforcement. Returning veterans may sue public officials failing to comply with the Texas reemployment statute in the district court in the district in which the individual is a public official. Tex Govt Code § 613.021(a). Alternatively, the district attorney of the appropriate district may seek relief on behalf of the veteran. Tex Govt Code § 613.022. Veterans seeking judicial relief are not subject to payment of court costs or fees. Tex Govt Code § 613.023.

Public Employee Military Leave.

National Guard & Reserve Activations For Emergencies. A state employee called by the governor to state active duty as a member of the National Guard because of an emergency is entitled to be paid emergency leave without a loss of military leave and without a deduction in salary. Tex Govt Code §§ 431.0825, 661.903. A state employee called to federal active duty as a member of the National Guard may not generally receive the employees state salary; Tex Govt Code § 661.903; however, state employees who are members of the Reserve or National Guard and who are activated for a federal national emergency are entitled to an unpaid leave of absence and continue to accrue state service credit for purposes of longevity pay while on military duty although they do not accrue vacation or sick leave during an their absence. Tex Govt Code §§ 661.904(a-b). Such employees also accrue retirement service credit by receiving at least one hour of state pay during each month of active military service. Tex Govt Code § 661.904(f). The head of the state agency must grant sufficient emergency leave as differential pay to a state employee on unpaid military leave if the employees military pay is less than the employees state gross pay, but the combination of emergency leave and military pay may not exceed the employees actual state gross pay. Tex Govt Code § 661.9041(a). In addition, Texas law provides that persons called to active military duty as a member of the Texas National Guard who suffer economic hardship as a result of serving on active duty are eligible to receive supplemental pay. Tex Govt Code § 431.0821(a).

Military Leave. State and local employees, who are members of the Reserve or National Guard, receive a paid leave of absence on days in which the employees are engaged in authorized military training or duty for a period not exceeding 15 workdays per federal fiscal year. Tex Govt Code § 431.005. During these leaves of absence, employees are not subject to loss of time, efficiency rating, personal time, sick leave, or vacation time. Tex Govt Code § 431.005.

State Employment Preference.

Qualifying Veterans. To qualify for a veterans employment preference, a person must (1) have served in the military for not less than 90 consecutive days during a federal national emergency or was discharged from military service for an established service-connected disability; (2) have received an honorable discharge; and (3) be competent. Tex. Govt Code § 657.002(a). In addition, a veterans surviving spouse who has not remarried or an orphan of a veteran qualifies for a veterans employment preference if (1) the veteran was killed while on active duty; (2) the veteran served in the military for not less than 90 consecutive days during a federal national emergency; and (3) the spouse or orphan is competent. Tex Govt Code § 657.002(b).

Nature of Preference. Qualified veterans receive an employment preference with a state public entity or public work over other applicants for the same position who do not have a greater qualification. Tex Govt Code § 657.003(a). A public entity is a public department, commission, board, or agency. Tex Govt Code § 657.001(2). Qualified veterans with service-connected disabilities are entitled to a preference for positions for which there is no competitive examination over all other applicants for the same position without a service-connected disability and who do not have greater qualifications. Tex Govt Code § 657.003(b). Where a state agency requires an examination for employment and if a qualifying veteran achieves the minimum test score, the veteran must receive an additional 10-points added to the score; a disabled veteran gets--in addition to the 10 points--an additional 5-points (i.e., 15 points). Tex Govt Code § 657.003(c). Qualified veterans also receive a retention preference during reductions-in-force, so long as the reduction involves employees of a similar type or classification. Tex Govt Code § 675.007.

Minimum Level of Preferences. Texas law requires a public entity or public work to give preferences in hiring to qualified veterans so that at least 40% of the employees of the public entity or public work are selected from qualified veterans. Tex Govt Code § 657.004(a). Public entities or public works that have not achieved the 40% minimum must, in filling vacancies, give preferences to individuals entitled to a veterans employment preference until they have reached at least the 40% goal. Tex Govt Code § 657.004(a). Moreover, public entities or public works must, when possible, give 10% of preferences to qualified veterans discharged from the armed services within the preceding 18 months. Tex Govt Code § 657.004(b).

Enforcement. Qualified veterans who claim that a public entity or work has violated the preference statute may appeal the action of the public entity or public work by filing a written complaint with its governing body. Tex Govt Code § 657.010(a). The governing body must respond to the complaint within 15 business days. Tex Govt Code § 657.010(b). The governing body may render a different hiring decision than the decision that is the subject of the complaint if the governing body determines that the veterans preference was not applied. Tex Govt Code § 657.010(b). Texas courts also may overturn the hiring process where a public official has failed to award the required veterans preference; however, sovereign immunity bars the award of money damages or an injunction requiring appointment of the veteran into the position. King v. Texas Dept of Human Serv., 28 S.W.3d 27, 33-34 (Tex. App. 2000).

Education Benefits.

Tuition & Fee Waiver (Hazelwood Act). Veterans who are Texas citizens, who entered military service in Texas, and who resided in the state at least twelve months before their military service are exempt from the payment of tuition and fees in Texas institutions of higher education (excluding general deposit fees, student services fees, and any fees or charges for lodging, board, or clothing). Tex. Educ. Code §§ 54.203(a), 54.203(b-1). Veterans must have served a minimum (excluding training) of 180 days and must have served during a time of war or federal national emergency. Tex. Educ. Code § 54.203(a)(4). If veterans are entitled to federal education assistance (e.g., GI Bill), they must use those benefits before relying upon the state grant. Tex. Educ. Code § 54.203(e). Veterans may not receive the benefits of the statute for more than a cumulative total of 150 semester credit hours. Tex. Educ. Code § 54.203(c). In determining whether to admit a person to any higher educational program, including those awarding a baccalaureate, graduate, postgraduate, or professional degree, an institution of higher education may not consider the fact that the person is eligible for an exemption from tuition and fees. Tex. Educ. Code § 54.203(j). Finally, the tuition and fee exemption provisions also apply to the children of members of the armed forces (1) who were killed in action; (2) who die while in service; (3) who are missing in action; (4) whose death is directly caused by a service-connected illness or injury; or (5) who are totally disabled as a result of a service-related injury. Similarly, children of Texas National Guard members killed on active duty or who are totally disabled as the result of a service-related injury are also exempt from tuition and fees. Tex. Educ. Code § 54.203(b).

Former Prisoners of War (POW). Veterans who were Texas residents at the time of their entry on active duty and who were classified as POWs on or after January 1, 1999, are exempt from paying tuition and fees at institutions of higher education for up to 120 semester credit hours. Tex. Educ. Code § 54.219(b). To be eligible, veterans must be enrolled for at least 12 semester credit hours. Tex. Educ. Code § 54.219(a)(b)(3). Eligible veterans are also exempt for paying fees and charges for room and board if they live on campus, and institutions must provide them a stipend for room and board if they live off campus. Tex. Educ. Code § 54.219(c). The institution must also award a scholarship to cover the costs of books and similar materials required for courses. Tex. Educ. Code § 54.219(d). Children of servicemembers who are either classified as POWs or missing-in-action are entitled to exemption from tuition and fees, except room, board, and clothing fees. Tex. Educ. Code § 54.209.

Readmission After Military Service. Institutions of higher education must readmit students who withdraw to perform active military service without requiring reapplication or fees, provided the student is otherwise eligible to return. Tex. Educ. Code § 51.9242(a). The statute does not apply, however, to students who withdraw solely to perform one or more training exercises as a member of the Texas National Guard. Tex. Educ. Code § 51.9242(a). Eligible veterans have one year to return to the institution after their release from active military service. Tex. Educ. Code § 51.9242(b). The institution must provide financial assistance previously given to the veteran before his or her withdrawal if the veteran meets current eligibility requirements for the assistance, other than requirement directly affected by the his or her service (such as continuous enrollment), and it must allow the veteran the same academic status he or she had before withdrawing, including any course credit awarded by the institution. Tex. Educ. Code § 51.9242(b).

Other Benefits. The State of Texas offers a variety of other benefits to veterans, notably to veterans who have service-connected disabilities, such as the award of credit at institutions of higher education for certain military training, Tex. Educ. Code § 51.3041; waiver or reduction of fees for concealed handgun permits, Tex Govt Code § 411.1951; waiver of fees for hunting and fishing licenses for disabled veterans and Texas residents on active duty, Tex. Parks & Wild. Code §§ 41.012; 46.004; exemption from payment of drivers license fees for certain disabled veterans, Tex. Transp. Code § 521.426; the use of specialty military license plates, Tex. Transp. Code §§ 504.301--541.315; partial exemption from real property taxes for disabled veterans, Tex. Tax Code § 11.22; state preferences for goods produced or offered by Texas bidders owned by disabled veterans, Tex. Govt Code § 2155.444(a); and loans, housing, and financial assistance from the state. Tex. Nat. Res. Code chs. 161, 162, & 164. More information about these and other benefits are available from the Texas Veterans Commission (<http://www.tvc.state.tx.us/>) and the Texas Veterans Land Board (<http://www.glo.state.tx.us/vlb/>).

Return to Text

n1 By its terms, USERRA applies to state governments as employers; however, the Supreme Court has held that Congress may neither abrogate a states Eleventh Amendment immunity in the federal courts through legislation enacted under its Article I powers. Seminole Tribe of Florida v. Florida, 517 U.S. 44 (1996), nor require state courts to enforce such federal laws. Alden v. Maine, 527 U.S. 706 (1999). USERRA is an exercise of Congress article I war powers and cannot abrogate a states sovereign immunity. Velasquez v. Frapwell, 160 F.3d 389 (7th Cir. 1998), vacated on other grounds, 165 F.3d 329 (7th Cir. 1999); but see Major Timothy M. Harner, The Soldier and the State: Whether the Abrogation of State Sovereign Immunity in USERRA Enforcement Actions Is a Valid Exercise of the Congressional War Powers, 195 Mil. L. Rev. 91 (2008) (arguing USERRA is a valid exercise of Congress war powers). State employees may, however, seek injunctive relief in federal court against state officials, id. at 394, or seek to have the United States bring suit on their behalf. 38 U.S.C. § 4323(a). Moreover, as will be discussed below, Texas law affords USERRA-like protections to employees of state and local governments. Tex. Govt Code §§ 613.001--613.006.

n2 The Texas Attorney General has opined that the residency requirement is unconstitutional. Op. Texas Atty. Gen. No. DM-468, March 12, 1998. The Attorney General also opined that a court would likely strike offending fixed-point requirement but leave remainder intact, thus extending exemption to all honorably discharged resident veterans. Op. Texas Atty. Gen. No. DM-468, March 12, 1998.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Richard D. Rosen is the Director of the Center for Military Law and Policy and Associate Professor of Law at Texas Tech University School of Law in Lubbock, Texas, where he teaches Torts, Constitutional Law, Litigation with the Federal Government, and National Security Law. Prior to teaching at Texas Tech University School of Law, Professor Rosen completed a distinguished career as an officer in the Judge Advocate Generals Corps of the United States Army. He was a litigator for a Miami law firm for several years before joining the U.S. Army as a judge advocate. Before retiring from the military, Dean Rosen was Commandant of the Judge Advocate Generals School, U.S. Army in Charlottesville, VA, where he commanded the Army's ABA-recognized law school. Other military positions held by Professor Rosen include Staff Judge Advocate of the III Armored Corps and Fort Hood, Fort Hood, TX; Chief of Personnel, Plans and Training, The Pentagon, Washington, DC; Special Counsel to the Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Division, Department of Justice, Washington, DC; Deputy Legal Counsel to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, The Pentagon, Washington, DC; and Staff Judge Advocate of the 1st Cavalry Division, Fort Hood, TX. Professor Rosen has authored many published articles on the subject of military law.

66 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Arthur Best on State v. Sweet

2008 Emerging Issues 2803

Arthur Best on State v. Sweet, 949 A.2d 809 (N.J. 2008)

By Arthur Best

September 9, 2008

SUMMARY: New Jersey interprets Crawford narrowly, to exempt test certificates used in connection with breath testing instruments from Confrontation Clause requirements in prosecutions for driving while intoxicated.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview

Current Confrontation Clause jurisprudence requires the exclusion of testimonial hearsay unless the declarant testifies or is unavailable and the defendant had an opportunity to develop the declarant's statement prior to trial. Many statements made by or to police as part of the investigation of past crimes or past alleged crimes would seem to fit the Supreme Court's definition of testimonial, but narrow understandings of that term have been adopted by many appellate courts. In State v. Sweet, 949 A.2d 809 (N.J. 2008), the New Jersey Supreme Court considered the proper Confrontation Clause treatment of foundational documents concerning the status of Breathalyzer brand blood alcohol measuring devices. The documents at stake in two companion cases were device inspection certificates and certificates describing reagent ampoules used in the device.

Pertinent Legal Principles

Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) and Davis v. Washington, 547 U.S. 813 (2006) held that the Confrontation Clause applies only to testimonial hearsay. Understood most broadly, those decisions hold that a statement is testimonial if its primary purpose is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to a criminal prosecution or if an objective witness would reasonably believe that the statement would be available for use at a trial.

State v. Chun, 943 A.2d 114 (N.J. 2008) applied the Confrontation Clause to documentary evidence related to a breath testing device different from the one involved in the current case. The court determined that admissibility of results from this device required introduction of numerous foundation documents, such as documents describing calibration of the device. It held that such documents were not subject to Confrontation Clause requirements. The court stated,

[t]o be sure, some of these documents and certificates are prepared by the police, but none of them relates to or reports a past fact and none of them is generated or prepared in order to establish any fact that is an element of the offense. . . The fact that they may be used to demonstrate that a device, which was used to conduct the breath tests for a particular defendant, was in good working order does not transform them into evidence of an element of the offense nor make them testimonial in the constitutional sense.

State v. Chun, 943 A.2d 114, 167 (N.J. 2008).

For an overview of Confrontation Clause issues, see 1-3 United States Supreme Court Cases and Comments P 3.05.

Application of Doctrine to Breathalyzer Devices

The New Jersey Supreme Court followed the analysis it had recently developed in State v. Chun, and determined that the foundational documents associated with Breathalyzer brand testing devices could be introduced without regard to the Confrontation Clause requirements of Crawford and Davis. This required two stages of analysis, considering basic hearsay issues as well as Confrontation Clause issues.

Basic Hearsay Analysis. With regard to hearsay, the Court concluded that the documents are hearsay but that they are within the coverage of the business records exception. The documents are hearsay because they describe facts about whether or not the devices were in good working order, and they were introduced to establish that those facts were true (and that the devices were working properly when they were used to test the breath of particular defendants). The documents fit the business records exception because they were made in the regular course of business, were prepared reasonably contemporaneously with the events they described, and there was no credible challenge to their trustworthiness.

Confrontation Clause Analysis. The Court characterized the documents as non-testimonial hearsay and therefore exempt from Confrontation Clause requirements. This accords with decisions in many other jurisdictions, such as Bohsancurt v. Eisenberg, 212 Ariz. 182, 129 P.3d 471, 476-77 (Ariz. Ct. App. 2006) (maintenance and calibration records for breath testing machine are not testimonial); Rackoff v. State, 281 Ga. 306, 637 S.E.2d 706, 707, 709 (Ga. 2006) (inspection certifications are not testimonial); and People v. Kim, 368 Ill. App. 3d 717, 859 N.E.2d 92, 93-94, 307 Ill. Dec. 92 (Ill. App. Ct. 2006), appeal denied, 224 Ill. 2d 589, 871 N.E.2d 60, 312 Ill. Dec. 660 (Ill. 2007) (device test affidavit is non-testimonial). The Court based its conclusion on the idea the ampoule and device certificates did not relate to any past facts that must be proved to establish an element of a charged offense. The Court contrasted these documents with reports of the analysis of a suspected controlled substance sought to be introduced in a drug crime prosecution. Those laboratory reports would relate to the crux of the criminal prosecution and ought therefore to be characterized as testimonial, in the Courts analysis.

Significantly, the Court noted that the State had raised what the Court termed strong policy considerations to support characterizing the documents as non-testimonial. As described by the Court, the State suggested that given the sheer volume of driving while intoxicated prosecutions conducted, numbering more than 25,000 each year, requiring the testimony of the authors of foundational certificates -- in contrast with the Breathalyzer blood alcohol content reports that establish the offense -- is impractical. State v. Sweet, 949 A.2d 809, 815 (2008). Undoubtedly the factual assertions in this argument are valid. However, in another context, the United States Supreme Court has rejected the idea that simplifying the work of law enforcement and facilitating criminal prosecution can properly affect the application of the Confrontation Clause. In Giles v. California, 128 S.Ct. 2678 (2008), the majority opinion stated:

[W]e are puzzled by the dissent's decision to devote its peroration to domestic abuse cases. Is the suggestion that we should have one Confrontation Clause (the one the Framers adopted and Crawford described) for all other crimes, but a special, improvised, Confrontation Clause for those crimes that are frequently directed against women? Domestic violence is an intolerable offense that legislatures may choose to combat through many means -- from increasing criminal penalties to adding resources for investigation and prosecution to funding awareness and prevention campaigns. But for that serious crime, as for others, abridging the constitutional rights of criminal defendants is not in the State's arsenal.

Giles v. California, 128 S.Ct. 2678, 2693 (2008).

For an analysis of the developing understanding of when hearsay is testimonial, see 1-14 Weinstein's Evidence Manual § 14.03.

Social Factors Influencing Narrow Application of Confrontation Clause. The Courts statement that the documents such as the ones in the current case do not relate to any past facts necessary to support the appellants convictions suggests that the Court was inclined to find a way to avoid application of the Confrontation Clause. Undoubtedly the facts described in those documents were essential to the prosecutions, given the choices the prosecution had made in how to establish the elements of its case, even though the underlying crimes might have been established with other types of proof. Nonetheless, practical concerns about tens of thousands of cases may have led the Court to reach the conclusion it did. Further, the Court may have assumed that cross-examination of the authors of the documents would likely have been entirely unavailing for the defendants.

These considerations were apparent in Sweets companion case, State v. Buda, 949 A.2d 761 (N.J. 2008). Buda considered the admissibility of statements by a three-year-old child to a Youth and Family Services worker who interviewed the child in a hospital. The child made a statement about the source of injuries he had sustained, and that statement was admitted against a defendant accused of assaulting him. The Supreme Court characterized the statement as non-testimonial because it was obtained while a dangerous situation was present and was made to protect the declarant from the risk of future harm. This interpretation fits the framework of Davis v. Washington which characterized a 911 call seeking help as non-testimonial and characterized statements to a police officer made while the declarant was in a position of safety as testimonial. The New Jersey Supreme Court chose to characterize the child who was in a hospital and whose injuries were being investigated by the police as more like a declarant seeking help in a 911 emergency call than like a declarant being interviewed after a crime has been committed. That characterization may well have been influenced by a strong desire to facilitate the protection of child victims of abuse, rather than by a neutral application of the United States Supreme Courts evolving Confrontation Clause analysis.

Counsel in future New Jersey cases and cases in other states where the frontiers of the new Confrontation Clause jurisprudence are being determined should be alert to courts willingness to consider extrinsic policy factors such as inconvenience to the government and the need to protect victims from future abuse. Where those inclinations are contrary to a clients position, counsel should rely on the unambiguous statements of the majority in Giles and seek to influence courts to follow that decisions dictates, despite the risk of hampering some criminal prosecutions.

RELATED LINKS: For an overview of Confrontation Clause issues, see

- 1-3 United States Supreme Court Cases and Comments P 3.05

For an analysis of the developing understanding of when hearsay is testimonial, see

- 1-14 Weinstein's Evidence Manual § 14.03

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Arthur Best is a Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law. Prior to entering teaching, he served in the general counsels office of the Federal Communications Commission, was a litigator for the Federal Trade Commission, was a project director for Ralph Naders Center for Study of Responsive Law, and was a Deputy Commissioner of the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs. His books include the widely-used evidence text Evidence: Examples and Explanations, the semi-annual Supplement volumes to Wigmore on Evidence, and Basic Tort Law (co-authored), a popular law school casebook.

67 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Arthur Best on Monti v. Wenkert

2008 Emerging Issues 2810

Arthur Best on Monti v. Wenkert, 947 A.2d 261 (Conn. 2008)

By Arthur Best

September 9, 2008

SUMMARY: As a matter of first impression, high-low settlement agreement between estate and a defendant was required to be disclosed both to the court and to non-settling defendant doctor promptly upon its execution.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview

In Monti v. Wenkert, 947 A.2d 261 (Conn. 2008), the Connecticut Supreme Court analyzed how high-low settlements should be treated in multiple-defendant cases, in terms of their disclosure to non-settling defendants and possible disclosure to the jury as a means of showing bias or prejudice on the part of the settling defendant. The Courts analysis shows that even very slight possibilities of prejudice are adequate to support a requirement of disclosure. The Courts holding also opens the door to the use of such settlements for impeachment.

Factual Context

The factual context of this wrongful death medical malpractice case is important for understanding the Courts treatment of possible bias issues. The decedent, who was seventeen years old, went to the office of Dr. Mark J. Decker in early November, 1996, complaining of an earache. She received a prescription for an antibiotic. About a week later, she returned to the office complaining of headache, loss of appetite, and other symptoms. She was told to continue on the medication. The next day she went to a hospital emergency room, was diagnosed as suffering from an allergic reaction to the antibiotic, was given a different antibiotic, and was sent home. A day later, she returned to the hospital and was admitted to its intensive care unit, suffering from throat tightness, difficulty swallowing, and an increased respiratory rate. Dr. Decker was her attending physician at the hospital. He discharged her after three days. When Dr. Decker discharged the decedent, he told her parents that there was nothing medically wrong with her.

The day after her discharge from the hospital, the decedents mother took her to see her regular psychiatrist, Dr. Naomi E. Wenkert. The decedent collapsed outside the psychiatrists office door, but recovered and began to breathe more normally. Her lips were bluish and purple, which can indicate that a persons blood is deficient in oxygen. Dr.

Wenkert diagnosed the decedent as having a panic attack. She conducted the scheduled counseling session and prescribed a sedative. The decedent died that evening, from a cause determined to have been acute respiratory distress syndrome caused by a viral infection that neither Dr. Decker nor Dr. Wenkert diagnosed.

Course of Trial

The decedents parents sued a number of defendants for their daughters wrongful death, but the court treated them as equivalent to two defendants: Dr. Decker and Dr. Wenkert. The plaintiffs introduced testimony attempting to show that each doctors conduct was below the relevant standard of care. Dr. Wenkert testified that she had been told that the decedent was discharged from the hospital because she was fine. The plaintiffs questioned her about her evaluation of the decedents symptoms, and about whether she would have made the same decision to see the decedent if she had been informed that she had a serious medical condition such as viral pneumonia. After the plaintiffs had rested their case, and after Dr. Wenkert testified, the plaintiffs and Dr. Wenkert executed a settlement agreement. The agreement was a high-low agreement specifying that the plaintiffs would recover from $300,000 to $1,000,000, depending on the verdict, from Dr. Wenkerts insurers.

The jury found that Dr. Wenkert was free from liability, and that Dr. Decker was liable for substantial damages. Following the trial, the Dr. Decker became aware of the high-low agreement. On appeal, he argued that the agreement should have been disclosed to him, and that the failure to disclose it impaired his ability to challenge certain evidence and to impeach Dr. Wenkerts expert witness.

Supreme Courts Analysis

The Connecticut Supreme Court grounded its discussion of this high-low agreement by analyzing Mary Carter agreements and their treatment in many other states. It relied on Vermont Union School District No. 21 v. H.P. Cummings Construction Co., 143 Vt. 416, 426-27, 469 A.2d 742 (1983) for a definition of a Mary Carter agreement as "a contract by which one or more defendants in a multi-party case secretly align themselves with the plaintiff and agree to continue as active defendants in the suit while working to aid in the plaintiff's case; in exchange, their own maximum liability will be diminished proportionately by increasing the liability of the nonagreeing defendant or defendants," noting that such agreements have four distinct features: "[(1) the] agreeing defendants must remain in the action in the posture of defendants . . . [(2) the] agreement must be kept secret . . . [(3) the] agreeing defendants guarantee to the plaintiff a certain monetary recovery regardless of the outcome of the lawsuit . . . [and (4) the] agreeing defendants' liability is decreased in direct proportion to the increase in the nonagreeing defendants' liability." Id., 427.

The obvious risk in Mary Carter agreements is that the settling defendant has an incentive to become highly adversarial to other defendants who have not settled, and can offer testimony that puts both the settling defendant and other defendants in a bad light, since the settling defendants ultimate financial liability has been limited and will even be reduced depending on the allocation of responsibility to other parties. Not surprisingly, many states regulate such agreements, either by barring them, or by requiring their disclosure either to other parties or to other parties and the jury.

For a general description and analysis of Mary Carter agreements, see 15A Am Jur 2d Compromise and Settlement § 21. See also 57B Am Jur 2d Negligence § 1057, for a comparison of disclosed and non-disclosed contingent settlement agreements. A survey of jurisdictions positions on propriety and required disclosure of such agreements is provided at 57B Am Jur 2d Negligence § 1058.

Does agreeing to a high-low settlement agreement bias a party against others in the case who have not settled? That possibility would be a rationale for requiring disclosure of such agreements, and the Connecticut court accepts that idea that one who participates in such an agreement might expend less resources to defend against liability, knowing that he will have to pay some minimum amount regardless of the verdict. Monti v. Wenkert, 947 A.2d 261, 275 (Conn.

2008). This is a kind of bias in favor of the plaintiff.

Showing a strong interest in identifying reasons why high-low agreements might impair the fairness of the judicial process, the Court also stated that once a high-low settlement has been accepted, the plaintiff might more vigorously pursue liability against the nonsettling defendant because there is no cap on a verdict against him. Id. The power of this argument would necessarily depend on the facts of a case, but ordinarily plaintiff always have strong incentives to vigorously pursue liability against all defendants; the fact that the Court chose to highlight the theoretical chance that a plaintiff's resources might be reallocated suggests that the Court is highly likely to require disclosures of all sorts of agreements among parties, even where the concrete likelihood that the agreements will affect the fairness of a trial is small.

Indeed, on the facts of this case, the Court held that no harm occurred because of the non-disclosure of the agreement. The Court did not analyze whether that factual finding might have been understood to undermine the Court's conclusion that disclosure of such agreements should be the rule going forward.

Counsel can take two important points from the Court's decision. One is the explicit result of the case that requires disclosure of high-low and Mary Carter agreements to non-settling parties. The second point is that where virtually any claim of possible bias can be made, this opinion should offer strong support for permitting an inquiry into the bias as part of cross-examination. The opinion adopts a very low threshold for concluding that factors extrinsic to the merits of a case could affect a person's presentation of evidence, and for that reason represents a position highly accepting of various kinds of bias evidence.

Impeachment Use of High-Low Agreements. The Court approved decisions holding that agreements of the type involved in this case may be used for impeachment purposes, but noted that they may not be used for the purpose of proving liability or damages. When they are used for impeachment, the trial court must give the jury a cautionary instruction to the effect that the evidence is relevant for impeachment only, and not as proof of a party's underlying claim or defense.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Arthur Best is a Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law. Prior to entering teaching, he served in the general counsel's office of the Federal Communications Commission, was a litigator for the Federal Trade Commission, was a project director for Ralph Naders Center for Study of Responsive Law, and was a Deputy Commissioner of the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs. His books include the widely-used evidence text Evidence: Examples and Explanations, the semi-annual Supplement volumes to Wigmore on Evidence, and Basic Tort Law (co-authored), a popular law school casebook.

68 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Arthur Best on State v. Sanchez

2008 Emerging Issues 2812

Arthur Best on State v. Sanchez, 177 P.3d 444 (Mont. 2008)

By Arthur Best

September 9, 2008

SUMMARY: Considering whether an accusatory note by someone who was subsequently murdered: 1) is hearsay, 2) is "testimonial" hearsay for purposes of the Confrontation Clause, and 3) is admissible under the forfeiture by wrongdoing doctrine.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview.

In State v. Sanchez, 177 P.3d 444 (Mont. 2008), the victim, Aleasha Chenowith (AC) was shot and killed outside her home. Raul Sanchez (RS) was charged with deliberate homicide for this killing, and was convicted after a trial in which the court admitted testimonial and documentary evidence of out-of-court statements by the victim. The Montana Supreme Courts opinion provided a detailed analysis of how hearsay, the Confrontation Clause and the concept of forfeiture by wrongdoing should apply to statements by a declarant who was murdered.

Hearsay analysis of out-of-court statements.

1. ACs sisters testimony. The trial court admitted testimony by ACs sister in which the sister testified that AC once told her that RS has said that if AC ever got RS angry, RS would obtain something from Mexico that would eat her stomach in a matter of days. This testimony included two out of court statements. For the first statement, the declarant was RS, and the out-of-court words were something like If you get me angry, I will obtain something from Mexico that will harm you. For the second statement, the declarant was AC, and the out-of-court words were something like Recently, RS said he might harm me.

The trial court overruled a hearsay objection to these statements on the ground that there was no effort to prove the truth of the matter asserted. The Montana Supreme Court agreed, noting that there was no effort to show that RS really could obtain poison from Mexico and stating that the relevance of the statement was to show a pattern of threats or that RS contemplated killing AC.

Counsel should be aware that the trial court and Supreme Court failed to analyze this testimony as double hearsay, even though there were two declarants and two statements. Clearer argument might have protected the defendant from admission of the testimony. With regard to the out-of-court words by RS, there is no hearsay problem, since RS was a defendant and his words are all admissions when sought to be introduced against him. The missing part of the courts analysis, however, involves whether there was any admissible evidence to show that RS actually did say those words. The only evidence offered for that proposition was testimony by the sister of AC in which the sister quoted ACs out-of-court statement to the effect that RS had once said certain words.

See 1-14 Weinstein's Evidence Manual § 14.05 for treatment of multiple hearsay situations.

ACs out-of-court statement was offered for its truth: the proposition that RS had said certain words. The courts conclusion that the words of RS were not offered for their truth avoided considering that ACs words had to be true in order for them to be relevant. A mistaken or untruthful statement by AC that RS had made certain statements would have had no relevance at the trial. The out-of-court statement by AC that RS had spoken certain words was introduced to show that RS had in fact spoken those words. For that reason it had to be covered by a hearsay exception in order for it to be admissible, and both courts ignored that aspect of the analysis.

2. ACs neighbors testimony. A neighbor of AC testified that AC told her that RS had said during an argument You cross me, I kill you. With regard to this testimony, the Supreme Court did focus on the reliability of ACs out-of-court statement. The Supreme Court examined whether an exception existed that could permit its admission to show that the event it described (RSs having said certain words) really did occur. It noted that the dying declarations exception fails to legitimize its admission since she did not believe death was imminent when she made the statement. The present sense impression could not cover the statement since the statement was made the day after having observed the event it described. The excited utterance exception failed to apply because testimony showed that AC was unconcerned about the threat when she recounted it. For these reasons, the Court held that the statement was wrongly admitted, although the error was harmless.

The Supreme Court did not explicitly compare its treatment of ACs statement to her neighbor with its treatment of ACs statement to her sister. Apparently the difference that mattered to the court was that the statement to the sister involved poison -- and there was no effort to show that the defendant used poison to kill AC -- but that the statement to the neighbor involved a threat to kill -- and the states case did involve an effort to show that RS actually did deliberately kill AC.

3. ACs note. The prosecution offered into evidence a note that had been written by AC that was found in her residence after she was killed. It was headed To whom it concerns and stated that RS had threatened to kill her and that if she became sick and perhaps died you will have some answers. The Supreme Court held that admission of this note was improper, since there was no hearsay exception to cover the statement by RS incorporated in the note that RS would kill AC. The hearsay error was harmless, the Court found, because the impact on the jury of properly-admitted other evidence related to deliberate homicide qualitatively would have outweighed any impact from the wrongly-admitted hearsay.

Was the accusatory note testimonial hearsay?

On appeal, the defendant argued that admission of the accusatory note violated his Confrontation Clause rights, since it was testimonial hearsay and therefore inadmissible unless he had had a prior opportunity to cross-examine the declarant. (Admissibility of testimonial hearsay also requires a showing that the declarant was unavailable at trial, which was true of this declarant.) The majority of the Montana Supreme Court ruled that the note was testimonial, because the declarant might reasonably have expected that the its contents would be used at a trial. The court reviewed the formality of the note (its use of the formal to whom it concerns language, and its explicit purpose of explaining an untimely death or poisoning if such were to occur. It was accusatory, it provided date and time documentation of a threat, and it gave a name and motive for a likely killer. The court stated that the notes substance and its comprehensive salutation indicate that it reasonably included law enforcement. State v. Sanchez, 17 P.3d 444, 453 (Mont. 2008). Also, the court gave weight to additional circumstances, including the fact that the declarant signed her name to the note and also printed her name, and that she left the note in a location where it would easily be found if her death was being investigated.

For an analysis of the developing understanding of when hearsay is testimonial, see 1-14 Weinstein's Evidence Manual § 14.03.

Does the forfeiture by wrongdoing doctrine allow admission of the note?

The Montana court considered whether forfeiture of Confrontation Clause rights occurs whenever a defendant's conduct causes the unavailability of a declarant or only when a defendant commits wrongdoing with the intent to prevent a witness from testifying. It decided this issue prior to the United States Supreme Court's decision in Giles v. California, 128 S. Ct 2678 (2008). The Montana court reached a conclusion contrary to the Giles holding, so its analysis is of historical interest only, although it happens to be a clear example of a category of cases that received special attention by the Giles court. The Giles court held that forfeiture by wrongdoing occurs only when a defendant engages in conduct designed to prevent a witness from testifying, such as offering a bribe. The forfeiture by wrongdoing doctrine does not apply where evidence suggests that a defendant had caused a person to be absent but had not done so to prevent the person from testifying. The Court referred to cases in this second category as including the typical murder case involving accusatorial statements by the victim.

1-17 Weinstein's Evidence Manual § 17.06 offers an analysis of the specific provision in the Federal Rules of Evidence governing forfeiture of hearsay objections by wrongdoing. The Supreme Court relied in part on the Federal Rule of Evidence 804(b)(6) to support its conclusion that forfeiture should be understood as limited to instances where wrongdoing is specifically intended to prevent testimony.

With specific reference to domestic violence cases, the Supreme Court in Giles offered dictum describing a possibly expansive definition of conduct meant to procure the unavailability of a witness. It stated that domestic violence is often intended to dissuade a victim from resorting to outside help, and is often meant to prevent testimony to police officers or cooperation in criminal prosecutions. If such an abusive relationship culminates in a murder, the evidence may support a finding that the crime expressed the intent to isolate the victim and to stop her from reporting abuse to the authorities or cooperating with a criminal prosecution -- rendering her prior statements admissible under the forfeiture doctrine. An additional understanding of this dictum may come from a concurring opinion. In that concurrence by two Justices, it was stated that the element of intention would normally be satisfied by the intent inferred on the part of the domestic abuser in the classic abusive relationship, which is meant to isolate the victim from outside help, including the aid of law enforcement and the judicial process.

In future cases of this type, prosecutors will seek to operationalize the Courts dictum. Appellate decisions will likely determine what kinds of abuse scenarios will be treated as adequately supporting the conclusion that a defendant's murder of a victim was suffused with an overall intent to isolate her and to stop her from communicating with police or prosecutors.

RELATED LINKS: For treatment of multiple hearsay situations, see

- 1-14 Weinstein's Evidence Manual § 14.05

For an analysis of the developing understanding of when hearsay is testimonial, see

- 1-14 Weinstein's Evidence Manual § 14.03

For an analysis of the specific provision in the Federal Rules of Evidence governing forfeiture of hearsay objections by wrongdoing

- 1-17 Weinstein's Evidence Manual § 17.06

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Arthur Best is a Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law. Prior to entering teaching, he served in the general counsels office of the Federal Communications Commission, was a litigator for the Federal Trade Commission, was a project director for Ralph Naders Center for Study of Responsive Law, and was a Deputy Commissioner of the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs. His books include the widely-used evidence text Evidence: Examples and Explanations, the semi-annual Supplement volumes to Wigmore on Evidence, and Basic Tort Law (co-authored), a popular law school casebook.

69 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

William C. Bochet on Wein v. Morris, 194 N.J. 364, 944 A.2d 642 (2008)

2008 Emerging Issues 2868

New Jersey Supreme Court Sustains Arbitration Award in Ten-Year-Old Case by William C. Bochet

By William C. Bochet

September 9, 2008

SUMMARY: William C. Bochet explores the long history of Wein v. Morris, 194 N.J. 364, 944 A.2d 642 (2008) and its implications on arbitration in New Jersey.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: The Supreme Court finally put an end to Wein v. Morris, 194 N.J. 364, 944 A.2d 64 (2008), a drawn-out matter that was the subject of an earlier published decision by the Appellate Division. The Court held that an order to stay litigation for arbitration is a final order for purposes of appeal as of right. It also found that a party's participation in arbitration could constitute waiver of any objection to that means of dispute resolution.

Off to Arbitration. Plaintiffs were a realty company and its brokers who entered into lease commission agreements with the defendant property owners. These agreements provided for the plaintiffs to find national drug store tenants for defendants' commercial properties. Prospective tenants were shown the real estate, but negotiations for leases bogged down. The frustrated owners eventually bypassed the realtors and entered into leases with tenants on their own. A failure to pay commissions to the plaintiffs brought this tortuous action into being.

The lease commission agreements between the parties contained an arbitration clause that mandated that any disputes between the parties be submitted to arbitration under the rules of the American Arbitration Association. Notwithstanding this clear-cut requirement, the plaintiffs commenced suit in the Superior Court. Defendants joined issue and the parties undertook almost five years of discovery. There was no mention of arbitration, save a half-hearted motion by defendants to compel arbitration after discovery had concluded. That motion was withdrawn.

After discovery concluded, defendants filed a motion for summary judgment. Plaintiffs responded with a similar cross-motion. The filings were massive. On the return date of the motions, the trial judge, sua sponte -- words normally meaning by itself but more likely for itself in this instance -- ordered the parties to arbitrate and dismissed the case. This action consequently facilitated the exit from chambers of moving papers which included over 300 pages of factual contentions and two bankers boxes of exhibits.

Despite the parties agreement that arbitration had been waived, no one appealed the dismissal of the lawsuit. Arbitration proceeded and an award in favor of plaintiffs was issued, after 16 days of hearings before a retired judge. A subsequent award of future commissions to plaintiffs was made by the arbitrator, as a re-calculation, since no reconsideration of a final award was permissible under AAA rules.

Plaintiffs returned to court to enter judgment on the award. The trial court, surprising no one -- this time -- entered judgment.

The Appellate Division reversed. In a reported decision [Wein v. Morris, 388 N.J. Super. 640, 909 A.2d 1186 (App. Div. 2006)], the panel found that the trial judge erred in ordering arbitration after five years of litigation. This set the stage for the parties and counsel, to shuffle, briefs in hand, to the Supreme Court of New Jersey.

Finally, an Order. Our appellate courts zealously guard their prerogative to be selective when considering cases for review which have not reached a final judgment. The scheme is designed to avoid piecemeal appeals in the course of litigation. Thus, only appeals from final judgments may be made as of right [N.J. Ct. R. 2:2-3(a)]. All other intrusions into the appellate stratus must be by its leave, a sanctification which is rarely bestowed [N.J. Ct. R. 2:2-3(b)]. An interlocutory appeal for which leave was not granted is likely to be dismissed, Vitanza v. James, 397 N.J. Super. 516, 938 A.2d 166 (App. Div. 2008). Improper certification of interlocutory orders as final, (N.J. Ct. R. 4:42-2), is a stratagem that is particularly detested, Janicky v. Point Bay Fuel, Inc., 396 N.J. Super. 545, 935 A.2d 803 (App. Div. 2007).

The Appellate Division and the Supreme Court had to grapple over this issue, as the Wein matter was a case where there were arguably two final orders. The first was the order of dismissal which was foisted upon the nonplussed parties at the apex of five years of discovery, capped by their overabundant summary judgment filings. The second happened almost two years later, when the court entered judgment on the arbitration award. The Appellate Division went with the second order, holding that the order of dismissal was not final since arbitration of the issues remained on the horizon. It reversed the final order of judgment, jettisoned the arbitration award and remanded the case for trial.

The Supreme Court was inclined toward the earlier order as being final. Its opinion pointed out that the order of dismissal was inappropriate. The proper method -- if impromptu conduct of that sort is ever apropos -- was for the trial judge to order a stay of the lawsuit during the pendency of the arbitration proceedings. The Court held that an order to stay a case during arbitration is a final order for purposes of an appeal as of right and recommended amendment of N.J. Ct. R. 2:2-3(a) in that regard. Out of fairness to the parties in the case, however, the ruling was made prospective, thus allowing the appeal to remain viable.

No Second Chance. The Appellate Divisions reversal of the order to compel arbitration and dismiss the litigation brought about a situation where the parties participation in lengthy arbitration would come to no avail. This disturbed the Supreme Court, which also must have had a distaste for seeing the effect upon its vaunted case disposition averages by the addition of a ten-year-old case to the trial calendar. An alternate solution loomed to assuage this perturbation.

Highgate Development Corp. v. Kirsh, 224 N.J. Super. 328, 540 A.2d 861 (App. Div. 1988) was a case which followed a lengthy arbitration process over a dispute between the plaintiff contractor and the defendant homeowners. The contract between the parties called for arbitration by the American Arbitration Association in one paragraph and by private arbitrators in a rider. The parties submitted to the AAA. Its arbitrator ultimately ruled in favor of the plaintiff. The plaintiff then filed an action to confirm the arbitrators award. This was denied by the trial court which ruled that the AAA had no jurisdiction over the matter as a result of the riders provision for private arbitration. The Appellate Division reversed that order. It held that the defendants participation in the AAA proceedings waived any right they may have had to demand private arbitration. The court noted that, although the defendants asserted objection at the outset, their overall course of conduct bespoke acquiescence in the process. The defendants should not be permitted to submit the dispute to the AAA arbitrator with the ...expectation that they could have a second bite at the apple if they were dissatisfied with the first. Id. at 336.

In Wein, the Appellate Divisions shelving of the award to plaintiffs, after sixteen days of arbitration hearings, served to give that same second bite of the apple to the defendant property owners. Citing Highgate, above, and its consideration of the totality of the circumstances, the Supreme Court held that the defendants had waived their objection to arbitration by fervently participating in it. While they objected to the order of the trial court, they neither objected to the arbitrator nor did they seek to appeal the courts order. These circumstances called for reinstatement of the arbitration award. The Supreme Court reversed that portion of the Appellate Divisions judgment that remanded the case for trial.

Lesson Learned. The lesson from this is that a partys conduct could trump the formalities of objection in the eyes of the court. The defendants simply did not demonstrate their disapprobation of arbitration. Their actions spoke louder than their words.

Reconsidering Reconsideration. After the arbitrators award was rendered, the plaintiffs requested that the arbitrator amend the award to include future commissions and attorneys fees. This was despite the AAA rules that prohibited reconsideration on the merits, but allowed correction of technical errors. The arbitrator amended the award on the question of future commissions and recalculated one commission.

The Supreme Court ended its decision with one small tidbit of benefit for the defendants. It agreed with the Appellate Division that the arbitrator had no power to modify a final award. The amendment violated the functus officio doctrine by doing so. This doctrine ...provides that arbitrators exhaust their power when they make a final determination on the matters submitted by them. Kimm v. Blisset, LLC, 388 N.J. Super. 14, 27, 905 A.2d 887 (App. Div. 2006), certif denied, 189 N.J. 428, 915 A.2d 1051 (2007). The three exceptions to this doctrine are clerical mistakes, undecided issues and clarification of an award. None applied to the amendment here, and so went the future commissions.

For additional information about arbitration in New Jersey see: LexisNexis Practice Guide NJ Pretrial Practice Chapter 6 Arbitration.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

William Bochet is a graduate of Dickinson College and the University of Pennsylvania School of Law. He has practiced in the Borough of Fair Lawn, New Jersey for over 35 years. He received his certification as a Certified Civil Trial Attorney by the Supreme Court of New Jersey in 1982 and his certification in Civil Trial Advocacy by the National Board of Trial Advocacy in 1989. Mr. Bochet is a Master of the Justice Morris Pashman American Inn of Court and is Secretary of the Bergen County Bar Association. He has written and lectured on civil trial practice throughout his career.

70 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Arthur Best on Manna v. State

2008 Emerging Issues 2799

Arthur Best on Manna v. State, 945 A.2d 1149 (Del. 2008) The Delaware Supreme Court reviews and applies the pro-defendant "mercy" rule.

By Arthur Best

September 8, 2008

SUMMARY: Reviewing separate uses of evidence of honest character as general character evidence on behalf of a criminal defendant and as refutation of an effort to show that a testifying defendant has testified untruthfully, and holding that general honesty is a trait relevant to an alleged crime of robbery.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview. In this criminal case, Manna v. State, 945 A.2d 1149 (Del. 2008), the defendant was charged with participating in the robbery of a convenience store. At trial, he testified and denied participating in the robbery. He sought to introduce testimony from four witnesses who would testify that he had a reputation for being honest and truthful. The trial court excluded this testimony for a number of reasons, all of which were rejected by the Delaware Supreme Court. The trial court confused general character evidence with credibility character evidence and also ignored the historical basis for permitting criminal defendants the option of introducing evidence of their good character. The Supreme Court reviewed the history and modern application of the overlapping rules concerning general and credibility character evidence.

Crucial Evidence. The defendant sought to have a friend of this family, an aunt, his youth minister and his lacrosse coach all testify that he had a reputation for being honest and truthful. The trial court denied admissibility of this evidence because it believed that the defendant's credibility as a witness had not been impeached. The trial court also stated that the only point to be served by introduction of the evidence in question was to evoke sympathy for the Defendant. Manna v. State, 945 A.2d 1149, 1151 (Del. 2008).

Relationship between General Character Evidence and Credibility Character Evidence. Delaware Evidence Rule 404(a), similar to Federal Rule of Evidence 404(a), provides:

Evidence of a person's character or a trait of his character is not admissible for the purpose of proving action in conformity therewith on a particular occasion, except: (1) Character of accused. Evidence of a pertinent trait of character offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same; or if evidence of a trait of character of the alleged victim of the crime is offered by an accused and admitted under Rule 404(a)(2), evidence of the same trait of character of the accused offered by the prosecution; (2) Character of alleged victim. Except as otherwise provided by statute, evidence of a pertinent trait of character of the alleged victim of the crime offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or evidence of a character trait of peacefulness of the alleged victim offered by the prosecution in a homicide case to rebut evidence that the alleged victim was the first aggressor; (3) Character of witness. Evidence of the character of a witness, as provided in Rules 607, 608, and 609.

This is a codification of what has sometimes been called the mercy rule, a common law principle that allows a criminal defendant who has acquired a good reputation to let the jury know about that reputation, in the hope that it will lead the jury to entertain a reasonable doubt about the defendant's intent to commit a crime. In its modern codifications, the rule does not permit introduction of all character evidence about a defendant, but requires that the character evidence relate to a pertinent trait of character.

For a description of the mercy rule in the context of federal evidence law, see 1-404 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 404.02

Delaware Evidence Rule 608(a) provides:

Except as provided in 11 Del. C. §§ 3508 and 3509, the credibility of a witness may be attacked or supported by evidence in the form of opinion or reputation, but subject to these limitations: (1) The evidence may refer only to character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, and (2) evidence of truthful character is admissible only after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked.

This provision is similar to Federal Rule of Evidence 608(a). It elaborates the exception set out in Rule 404(a)(3) that authorizes the use of character evidence about witnesses.

Key Elements in the Character Evidence Rules.

1. There is a difference between using character evidence to refute a contention that a defendant committed a crime, covered by Rule 404(a)(1), and using character evidence to attack or bolster the credibility of a witness (who may or may not be a defendant), covered by Rule 608(a).
2. When a defendant seeks to use character evidence to refute a charge, the defendant must show that the particular character trait a character witness will testify about is relevant (or pertinent) to the charged crime.
3. When a party seeks to use character evidence to bolster the credibility of a witness, the evidence is admissible only if there has previously been an attack on the credibility of that witness.

Rationale and Application of Rule 404(a). The United States Supreme Court has explained the significance of a criminal defendant's right to introduce character evidence. In Michelson v. United States, 355 U.S. 469, 476 (1948), the Court wrote:

[A defendant] may introduce affirmative testimony that the general estimate of his character is so favorable that the jury may infer that he would not be likely to commit the offense charged. This privilege is sometimes valuable to a defendant for this Court has held that such testimony alone, in some circumstances, may be enough to raise a reasonable doubt of guilt and that in the federal courts a jury in a proper case should be so instructed.

Under Delaware law, this historic rationale for defendant's character evidence has been recognized, and a jury instruction similar to the one described in Michelson is available.

Delaware's Application of the Defendant's Right to Introduce Character Evidence. Critical to applying Rule 404(a) rule is an understanding of what character traits are pertinent to a particular charged crime. The Delaware Supreme Court has adopted a pro-defendant generous view of this issue. In this case, for example, it held that the offense of robbery involves dishonesty, and that therefore character evidence about honesty and truthfulness should be treated as pertinent. Because the defendants character witnesses were prepared to testify about those traits, their testimony was precisely the type of testimony Rule 404(a) is designed to permit. For that reason, the Court held that the trial court had erred in excluding the character evidence.

In another context, the Delaware Supreme Court has held that drug offenses do not involve the kind of dishonesty that makes them relevant for impeachment. See Gregory v. State, 616 A.2d 1198, 1204 (Del.1992). This had the effect of decreasing the availability of character evidence against a defendant, while the ruling in the current case has the effect of increasing the availability of character evidence in favor of a defendant. This combination of holdings is consistent with the original pro-defendant origin of the so-called mercy rule."

Distinguishing Character Evidence Used for Impeachment. The trial court in this case mistakenly excluded the character evidence in part because it was confused about the distinction between character evidence used for impeachment and character evidence used to attack the prosecutions substantive case. Because the trial court believed that the defendants character for truthfulness had not been attacked in cross-examination, the court prohibited the use of character evidence under Rule 608.

See 1-12 Weinstein's Evidence Manual § 12.03 for analysis of character evidence to rehabilitate the credibility of a witness who has been impeached by a showing of characteristic untruthfulness.

If Rule 608 had been the defendants only avenue for admission of the character evidence, the Courts ultimate decision to exclude the evidence would likely have been affirmed. The Delaware Supreme Court stressed that trial courts are in the best position to determine whether cross-examination has attacked the credibility of a witness in a way that should permit bolstering of that witness with character evidence. It is not true, the court stated, that every time a defendant takes the stand, the defendant will be entitled to introduce character evidence if his or her testimony is challenged.

The trial courts error was to believe that rejecting the bolstering rationale for character evidence under Rule 608 was totally dispositive on the issue of character evidence. Since Rule 404(a) offers a basis different from the Rule 608 basis for admitting character evidence, the ruling on Rule 608 did not require exclusion of the evidence.

Prejudice and Confusion of Issues. The trial court also held that Delaware Rule of Evidence 403 permitted exclusion of the evidence on grounds of prejudice, confusion, or waste of time. The Supreme Court rejected that basis for the trial court ruling. Ordinarily, a trial courts analysis of admissibility of character evidence is highly fact-dependent and would be reversed only by a showing of abuse of discretion. In this case, the trial court excluded all four character witnesses, and did so in the mistaken impression that garnering sympathy is a forbidden rationale for use of character evidence. For these reasons, the defendant was held to have established abuse of discretion. A ruling to admit testimony by any number of character witnesses greater than zero would likely have been sustained, but the total bar of that category of evidence was an abuse of discretion.

RELATED LINKS: For a description of the mercy rule in the context of federal evidence law, see

- 1-404 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 404.02

For analysis of character evidence to rehabilitate the credibility of a witness who has been impeached by a showing of characteristic untruthfulness, see

- 1-12 Weinstein's Evidence Manual § 12.03

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Arthur Best is a Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law. Prior to entering teaching, he served in the general counsels office of the Federal Communications Commission, was a litigator for the Federal Trade Commission, was a project director for Ralph Naders Center for Study of Responsive Law, and was a Deputy Commissioner of the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs. His books include the widely-used evidence text Evidence: Examples and Explanations, the semi-annual Supplement volumes to Wigmore on Evidence, and Basic Tort Law (co-authored), a popular law school casebook.

71 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Discretionary Appellate Review Under CAFA: Vairo on Spivey v. Vertrue, Inc

2008 Emerging Issues 2804

Discretionary Appellate Review Under CAFA: Vairo on Spivey v. Vertrue, Inc

By Georgene Vairo

September 4, 2008

SUMMARY: In Spivey v. Vertrue, Inc., the Seventh Circuit held that the Class Action Fairness Acts provision on discretionary appellate of remand orders must be interpreted literally, so that an application to appeal is timely if filed not less than 7 days after entry of the order." This commentary, by Moores Federal Practice Editorial Board member Georgene Vairo, analyzes the Seventh Circuits approach to interpreting this statutory language.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE:

Cite as: Vairo, Georgene. "Spivey v. Vertrue, Inc." LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

The Class Action Fairness Act (CAFA") has spawned more than its share of interpretive disputes. At the time of its passage, we predicted the issue involved in Spivey v. Vertrue, Inc., 528 F.3d 982, 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 12419 (7th Cir. June 11, 2008); the probable drafting flaw in the language of 28 U.S.C. § 1453(c)(1), which provides for discretionary appellate review of district court orders granting or denying a motion to remand an action removed to federal court under CAFA back to state court [see Class Action Fairness Act of 2005 With Commentary and Analysis by Georgene M. Vairo of Moores Federal Practice Board of Editors (LexisNexis 2005)]. Spivey is important because the Seventh Circuit has created a circuit split by holding that the time limit for this CAFA provision should be read literally, so that an application to appeal is timely if filed not less than 7 days after entry of the order." Judge Frank Easterbrooks amusing opinion not only reminds one of the old Miller Lite beer commercials -- Great Taste . . . Less Filling -- but makes a lot of sense. (The Great Taste...Less Filling!" advertising campaign was ranked by Advertising Age magazine as the 8th best advertising campaign in history. See http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Miller_Lite.)

Background. The plaintiff filed suit in state court as a class action, alleging that the defendant, a marketer, systematically submitted unauthorized charges to its customers' credit cards. The defendant removed the case to federal court under CAFA. The plaintiff moved to remand, arguing that CAFA's amount in controversy requirement was not met because the amount in controversy did not exceed $5 million. The district court agreed and remanded the case.

The defendant then filed for leave to appeal the remand as authorized by CAFA, 28 U.S.C. § 1453(c)(1), which provides that a court of appeals may accept an appeal from an order granting or denying remand if application is made to the court of appeals not less than 7 days after entry of the order." The defendant's lawyer mailed the petition on the seventh day after the district court's remand order, and the petition reached the court of appeals and was filed" on the tenth day after the remand order was filed. The plaintiff argued that the petition was too late and the court of appeals lacked jurisdiction.

Petition Was Timely. Because the defendant's petition for leave to appeal was filed ten days after the remand order it met the not less than 7 days after entry of the order" under the language of the statute. Excluding weekends when counting the 7-day period, as required by Appellate Rule 26(a)(2), arguably the period would be extended to not less than 9 days" after the entry of the remand order. Because the defendant filed the petition on the tenth day, it was timely, i.e., it was filed not less than 7 or 9 days" after the filing of the order.

The plaintiff's argument was that the statute should not be interpreted literally because Congress did not mean what it said. And, Judge Easterbrook agreed that CAFAs drafters intended to write not more than 7 days" or not later than 7 days," or within 7 days" because time limits for appeals are always set the last date allowed for action, rather than the earliest time to file something. Additionally, taking an even closer look at the ugly wording of the provision, he noted: No one noticed the gaffe (or the misuse of the word less' when correct diction requires fewer') before the statute was enacted." Nonetheless, even though it was doubtless" that Congress intended a short deadline, legislative history can not justify reading a statute to mean the opposite of what it says." Nor is the fact that Congress wrote an imprecise or even perverse deadline reason to disregard the enacted language. Moreover, [t]he garble has attracted considerable attention by both judges and law reviews, but Congress has not enacted a technical-corrections bill."

The Seventh Circuit is the first to hold that less" means less." Every other circuit has ruled that less" means more" [see Estate of Pew v. Cardarelli, 527 F.3d 25, 28 (2d Cir. 2008); Morgan v. Gay, 466 F.3d 276, 277 (3d Cir. 2006); Amalgamated Transit Union v. Laidlaw Transit Services, Inc., 435 F.3d 1140, 1146 (9th Cir. 2006), rehearing en banc denied, 448 F.3d 1092 (9th Cir. 2006) (Bybee, J., and five other judges dissenting); Pritchett v. Office Depot, Inc., 420 F.3d 1090, 1093 n.2 (10th Cir. 2005); Miedema v. Maytag Corp., 450 F.3d 1322, 1326 (11th Cir. 2006)].

Those courts cited three reasons why less" should mean more", i.e., that Congress wanted any petition to appeal to be filed in no more than 7 days." First, the intent of Congress was to compel prompt action so that the removal question could be quickly decided. Second, these courts were concerned about the abuses that may result if there were an open-ended period for appealing the order. Third, they invoked the rule that when the uncontested legislative history is at odds with the language of the statute, that legislative intent controls. It also bears mentioning that, except for the Ninth Circuit case, the party petitioning filed on the 6th or 7th day after the order was filed. Accordingly, these courts were reviving an otherwise untimely petition. And, the Ninth Circuit, after holding that less" means more," revived the plaintiffs otherwise untimely petition (filed 43 days after the district court order), invoking its authority to suspend the rules for good cause [see Fed. R. App. P. 2].

However, the Seventh Circuit refused to adopt a statutory interpretation that did such violence to the text: Legislative history may help disambiguate a cloudy text by showing how words work in context; it does not permit a judge to turn a clear text on its head." It, however, agreed with the result that most of the courts had reached, but on a different ground. According to the Seventh Circuit, a petition filed before the period has elapsed should also be accepted. Under Appellate Rule 4(a)(2), a premature notice of appeal remains on file and springs into effect when the decision becomes appealable. The same approach makes sense for a premature request for leave to appeal.

But to the extent that language in other circuits' opinions implies that they would deem a petition filed on the eighth day or later day jurisdictionally late, the Seventh Circuit took issue. A statute should not be construed to sand-bag litigants by misleading language or pull the rug out from under a litigant who relied on statutory text. Accordingly, in the Seventh Circuit, a petition for appeal under CAFA that is filed after the 7-day period is timely. Litigants should be able to rely on the enacted language of a statute (which also would have justified the result in the Ninth Circuit case).

Finally, the Seventh Circuit noted that its holding does not give litigants forever to appeal. Appellate Rule 5(a)(2) says that, when there is no other limit, a petition for permission to appeal must be filed within the time provided by Rule 4(a) for filing a notice of appeal," or in other words within 30 days. Reading § 1453(c)(1) to mean what it says thus does not authorize indefinite delay. Although it may allow a party 23 days more than the authors anticipated, our reading avoids nasty surprises for litigants who believe--and are entitled to believe--that courts will honor the language in the enrolled bill that the President signs."

Amount in Controversy Was Adequately Pleaded. Under CAFA, the district courts have original and removal jurisdiction of cases if, among other requirements, the amount in controversy exceeds $5 million. The defendant submitted an affidavit to the effect that its billings, for a portion of the programs described in the complaint, amounted to almost $7 million. The Seventh Circuit interpreted the complaint, which alleged that the defendant made unauthorized charges as a standard practice, as putting into controversy the propriety of all the defendant's charges.

The removing party, as the proponent of federal jurisdiction, bears the burden of describing how the controversy exceeds $5 million. This is a pleading requirement, not a matter of proof. The demonstration concerns what the plaintiff is claiming, not whether the plaintiff is likely to win or be awarded everything that is claimed. Once the proponent of federal jurisdiction has explained plausibly how the stakes exceed $5 million, cf. Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007) [discussed in July 2007 MOORES FEDERAL PRACTICE UPDATE, p. 149], then the case belongs in federal court unless it is legally impossible for the plaintiff to recover that much." The district court had found that recovery of more than $5 million was uncertain, but uncertainty is not impossibility.

Accordingly, the Seventh Circuit granted the petition and accepted the appeal, and decided the appeal by reversing the remand to state court. The case was then remanded to the federal district court for adjudication on the merits.

RELATED LINKS: See Moore's Federal Practice for additional information:

- 5 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 23.63[2][c];
- 5 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 23.63A[5][b];
- 16 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 107.43A;
- 19 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 202.11[5]

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

72 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Vairo on FC Inv. Group LC v. IFX Mkts., Ltd.

2008 Emerging Issues 2805

Whether a Website Constitutes Personal Jurisdiction: Vairo on FC Inv. Group LC v. IFX Mkts., Ltd.

By Georgene Vairo

September 4, 2008

SUMMARY: In FC Inv. Group v. IFX Mkts., Ltd., the D.C. Court of Appeals held that general personal jurisdiction could not be predicated on a website without a showing that forum residents actually conducted continuous and systematic" business with the defendant through the website. This commentary, by Moores Federal Practice Editorial Board member Georgene Vairo, analyzes this important case, including RICO's service of process provision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Vairo, Georgene. "FC Inv. Group LC v. IFX Mkts., Ltd." LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

FC Inv. Group LC v. IFX Mkts., Ltd., 529 F.3d 1087, 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 13312 (D.C. Cir. June 20, 2008) is significant because it addresses a number of personal jurisdiction issues. Most importantly, the D.C. Circuit held that general personal jurisdiction could not be predicated on a website without a showing that forum residents actually conducted continuous and systematic" business with the defendant through the website, thereby clarifying the extent to which a website can be used to establish general jurisdiction. Second, the court ruled that personal jurisdiction may not be based on RICO's nationwide service provision unless at least one defendant has minimum contacts with the forum jurisdiction.

Background. Two plaintiffs sued a London-based currency broker, IFX, alleging that the broker conspired to defraud them of millions of dollars through a currency investment scheme. The district court denied their motion for jurisdictional discovery and ultimately dismissed their complaint for lack of personal jurisdiction. On appeal, the D.C. Circuit addressed several issues with respect to personal jurisdiction, including a question as to the interpretation of the RICO jurisdictional provision.

Internet Website May Not Be Sufficient Basis for General Personal Jurisdiction. The defendant maintained a website that, the plaintiffs alleged, allowed forum residents to make large value transactions over the Internet. The court of appeals noted that the mere accessibility of a defendant's website does not establish the necessary minimum contacts required for general jurisdiction. The website must also be 1) an interactive, rather than a passive website through which users merely access information, and 2) residents of the forum must actually use the website to conduct transactions with the defendant in a continuous and systematic" way.

The record showed evidence of only one resident of the District of Columbia that had an online account with the defendant, and this was for only six months. This limited contact, unrelated to the plaintiffs or their claims, was not sufficient to support personal jurisdiction.

Regarding the first requirement C an interactive website C the district court held that IFX's website was not sufficiently active" to support its general jurisdiction over IFX. It properly contrasted IFX's website with the website in another D.C. Circuit case in which the court held that a website maintained by Ameritrade, a Nebraska-based securities broker, was sufficiently interactive" to support general jurisdiction in the District because the website allowed District residents to [1] open Ameritrade brokerage accounts online; [2] transmit funds to their accounts electronically; . . . [3] use those accounts to buy and sell securities, borrow from Ameritrade on margin, and [] pay Ameritrade brokerage commissions and interest" [see Gorman v. Ameritrade Holding Corp., 293 F.3d 506, 512 (D.C. Cir. 2002)]. Although both IFX's and Ameritrade's websites allowed users to conduct financial transactions online, there was one critical difference between the two: unlike Ameritrade's website, the IFX website did not allow for online account registration. To become an IFX customer, one was required to download an application form, sign it and return it along with required identification documents . . . certified by an attorney, . . . an embassy authority, consulate or high commission of the country of issue." This deficiency rendered the IFX website as not sufficiently active for general jurisdiction, according to the district court.

But, the D.C. Circuit noted that a foreign defendant that is doing business" with continuous and systematic contacts" in the District, via Internet, mail or some combination of the two, suffices for general jurisdiction. It quoted Burger King Corp. v. Rudzewicz, 471 U.S. 462, 467, 105 S. Ct. 2174, 85 L. Ed. 2d 528 (1985): [I]t is an inescapable fact of modern commercial life that a substantial amount of business is transacted solely by mail and wire communications across state lines, thus obviating the need for physical presence within a State in which the business is conducted." (emphasis added). Thus, because IFX made its mail-in registration form readily available for download on its website, the district court's focus on IFX's lack of an online registration feature may have been misplaced.

However, the D.C. Circuit did not reach the merits of the district court's holding on this issue because of its holding as to the second requirement C use by residents. The D.C. Circuit squarely held that limited contact with a single District customer C unrelated to the plaintiffs or their claims C does not support the district court's exercise of general jurisdiction.

Comment. The question whether a website suffices for general jurisdiction is very important. By holding squarely that use by only one resident is not enough, the D.C. Circuit begs the question of how many residents C unrelated to the plaintiff or its claims C need to have used the website. This is a difficult problem. By quoting Burger King, the D.C. Circuit opens the door to expanded use of a website to support general jurisdiction. The old Bricks Test" for general jurisdiction may be eroding.

Court Did Not Err in Denying Jurisdictional Discovery. The plaintiffs next argued that the district court should have allowed discovery to determine the volume of transactions by the single District of Columbia resident who used the website, and also to determine whether residents of Maryland and Virginia might have used the defendant's website while at work in the District.

The district court did not abuse its discretion, the D.C. Circuit held. Business contacts with a single customer, no matter how extensive, would be insufficient to support general jurisdiction over a foreign corporation. Discovery as to Maryland and Virginia residents would have been merely a fishing expedition." A district court has broad discretion with respect to discovery, and need not grant a request based on conjecture or speculation.

Comment. Of course it makes eminent sense to say that the district court has broad jurisdiction over discovery. On the other hand, at the motion-to-dismiss phase of a litigation, the plaintiff may not have access to the evidence it needs to meet its burden. Accordingly, even though the D.C. Circuit is correct to leave the question to the district court, one hopes that district courts will be sensitive to this need.

Plaintiffs Failed to Establish Specific Personal Jurisdiction. The plaintiffs also argued that specific jurisdiction could be exercised based on the defendant's regular phone calls to the plaintiffs in the forum in furtherance of the alleged fraudulent scheme. The district court had analyzed this question under a subsection of the District of Columbia long-arm statute that allowed jurisdiction over defendants transacting business" in the District and concluded that phone calls alone could not constitute transacting business." The plaintiffs argued that the district court should have analyzed the question under another subsection. However, the plaintiffs did not raise this subsection in the district court and in fact failed to invoke the applicable long-arm statute at all. It is the plaintiffs' burden, the court of appeals said, to establish the court's personal jurisdiction over the defendant. Accordingly, it was their responsibility to raise the question in a manner that gave the district court fair notice of their arguments so the court could rule and so the issue could be preserved for appeal. The plaintiffs were not entitled to raise this theory on appeal.

Comment. Bad lawyering? This is another reminder that plaintiffs lawyers need to be ready to meet forum selection arguments that defendants are likely to raise. By not being ready to deal specifically with the defendants specific personal jurisdiction arguments from the outset, the plaintiffs attorneys hurt themselves.

Jurisdiction Could Not Be Based on Agency or Conspiracy Theory. The plaintiffs also argued that specific jurisdiction existed because the defendant conspired with another entity (against whom the plaintiffs had obtained a judgment in separate litigation). To prevail on this theory of jurisdiction under the applicable long-arm statute, the plaintiffs had to plead with particularity facts sufficient to demonstrate the existence of a conspiracy, which they had not done. Nor did the complaint plead with particularity overt acts within the forum taken in furtherance of the conspiracy. There were allegations as to a business relationship between the defendant and the other entity, but not as to any specific agreement or understanding to commit fraud. A bare allegation of a conspiracy or agency was insufficient to establish personal jurisdiction.

Jurisdiction Could Not Be Based on RICO's Nationwide Service Provision. The plaintiffs had alleged a conspiracy under RICO, and argued that personal jurisdiction could be exercised even in the absence of minimum contacts with the forum because of RICO's nationwide service of process provision (see 18 U.S.C. ' 1965). The D.C. Circuit noted that there are differing views on the interpretation of this provision. It adopted the reasoning of the Second Circuit, which has held that a civil RICO action may be brought only in a district court where personal jurisdiction based on minimum contacts is established as to at least one defendant [see PT United Can Co. Ltd. v. Crown Cork & Seal Co., 138 F.3d 65, 70 (2d Cir. 1998)].

Section 1965 contains four parts, which must be read together. Subsection (a) grants jurisdiction over an original defendant C it allows the action to be brought in any district in which the defendant resides, is found, has an agent, or transacts his affairs." Thus, minimum contacts with the forum must be established as to at least this first defendant. Subsection (b) allows nationwide service and jurisdiction over other parties" not residing in the forum, who may be additional defendants of any kind. Next, subsection (c) simply allows service of subpoenas on witnesses. Subsection (d) then provides that [a]ll other process" may be served where the person resides, is found, has an agent, or transacts his affairs." Reading this subsection in context, it means process other than a summons of a defendant or subpoena of a witness. Thus, it is subsection (b), not (d), that grants nationwide service, and only if jurisdiction exists over at least one defendant under subsection (a).

Here there was only one defendant. The court could not exercise personal jurisdiction over that defendant because it lacked minimum contacts with the forum. And because there was no defendant over which the court could otherwise exercise jurisdiction, the nationwide service provision was inapplicable. Accordingly, the court of appeals affirmed the district court's judgment dismissing the action.

Comment. Overall, the D.C. Circuit's opinion is a primer on current personal jurisdiction trends. The use of a federal nationwide service statute sounds inviting. But, it is clearly plaintiffs responsibility to ensure that statutory standards are understood and met.

RELATED LINKS: See Moore's Federal Practice for additional information:

- 16 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) §§ 108.44[3];
- 16 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 108.123

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporations Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

73 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Professor Kent Sinclair on Hicks v. Mellis, 275 Va. 213, 657 S.E.2d 142 (2008).

2008 Emerging Issues 2708

Nonsuits -- Notice -- Non-Prosecution? A Legislative Gap Leads to Strange Procedural Wrangle about Striking Inactive Cases from the Docket, and Reinstating Them at Plaintiff's Behest Without Notice (in Order to Obtain a Nonsuit?)

By Prof. Kent Sinclair

August 15, 2008

SUMMARY: In its recent decision in Hicks v. Mellis, 275 Va. 213 (2008) the Supreme Court of Virginia dealt with the same statute that led to the striking down of local docket management procedures in a case last year, Code §8.01-335. In this Commentary, Professor Kent Sinclair reviews the implications of this decision for circuit court docket management practices, nonsuits, and dismissals of actions for failure to actively advance their preparation.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Great strides have been made in Virginia practice in the last three years, with the unification of pleading legal and equitable claims in a single complaint, the adoption of a modern form of res judicata doctrine focusing on the same conduct, transaction or occurrence, and clarification and improvement of nonsuit doctrine and the nonsuit statute. Docket management remains a contentious arena, however, and a recent decision highlights a matter on which the General Assembly might offer some assistance at the intersection of docket management and nonsuit practice in Virginia.

On striking facts where the reinstatement was followed by a nonsuit, and where neither the reinstatement nor the nonsuit were on notice to a named defendant in a medical malpractice action, the Court in Hicks v. Mellis, 275 Va. 213 (2008) has given express consideration to the failure of current law to require notice to a defendant whose rights are arguably affected significantly by the trial court's actions in implementing these procedures.

Recent Case Law. Just a few months ago, the Supreme Court of Virginia reviewed an appeal involving the dismissal of "Unserved Cases," answering the question whether aggressive docket management in Circuit and District Courts to toss out claims based on violation of the "One Year Rule" regarding service of process will be valid. In Collins v. Shepherd, 274 Va. 390, 649 S.E.2d 672, 2007 Virginia LEXIS 116 (Sept. 14, 2007), the Court held invalid a local rule of the trial court which was used in a civil case for personal injury damages as the basis for a sua sponte order of dismissal entered with prejudice pursuant. The Court found that the a local rule providing for the dismissal of cases not served upon the defendant within one year of filing was invalid because it conflicts with Code §§ 8.01-335. Without a rule or statutory basis for its actions in dismissing a case where service of process was not completed, the circuit court was without authority to dismiss the case pursuant to the local rule.

Virginia Code § 8.01-4 has been amended multiple times in the past decade to protect against what has been perceived by some as balkanized or simply overreaching local Rules. That statute which governs both district court and circuit court local rule enactments provides the authority for limited local rules, focusing on rules "necessary to promote proper order and decorum and the efficient and safe use of courthouse facilities and clerks' offices." Even this grudging charter for the creation of local rules is expressly limited by the provision that no "substantive rights" may be affected by those rules. The statute, as amended in 1999 and again in 2000, reads today as follows:

The district courts and circuit courts may, from time to time, prescribe rules for their respective districts and circuits. Such rules shall be limited to those rules necessary to promote proper order and decorum and the efficient and safe use of courthouse facilities and clerks' offices. No rule of any such court shall be prescribed or enforced which is inconsistent with this statute or any other statutory provision, or the Rules of Supreme Court or contrary to the decided cases, or which has the effect of abridging substantive rights of persons before such court. Any rule of court which violates the provisions of this section shall be invalid.

The courts may prescribe certain docket control procedures which shall not abridge the substantive rights of the parties nor deprive any party the opportunity to present its position as to the merits of a case solely due to the unfamiliarity of counsel of record with any such docket control procedures.

Obviously, "docket control procedures" come in for special scrutiny under the second paragraph of Code §8.01-4, quoted above. The evident legislative concern was for trial and motion scheduling procedures that could catch counsel from distant locales unaware, with prerequisites or limitations that do not generally apply in Virginia practice being enforced to prevent, truncate or peremptorily schedule pretrial or trial proceedings to the detriment of anyone not fully conversant with local practice.

In Collins, the Supreme Court, which acknowledged "the laudable goal" of concluding all civil cases, except by leave of court and in suits for divorce, within twelve months of filing, concluded that the circuit court did not have the authority to adopt a local rule that essentially translated Rule 3:5(e) into a mode of procedure for the court dismissing unserved cases sua sponte. Based in part on the language in Code § 8.01-4 expressly stating that local rules must not abridge the substantive rights of the parties or deprive any party from having a case heard on the merits, the Supreme Court found that the General Assembly's intention was that local rules govern the administration, but not become the determining factor in the ultimate outcome, of cases.

An important part of the analysis of local procedures given in the Collins decision last fall was the tension between such efforts and the express provisions of Code §8.01-335, which governs circuit courts' authority to discontinue inactive cases, and provides, in relevant part, that:

[A]ny court in which is pending an action, wherein for more than two years there has been no order or proceeding, except to continue it, may, in its discretion, order it to be struck from its docket and the action shall thereby be discontinued.

Any court in which is pending a case wherein for more than three years there has been no order or proceeding, except to continue it, may, in its discretion, order it to be struck from its docket and the action shall thereby be discontinued. The court may dismiss cases under this subsection without any notice to the parties. The clerk shall provide the parties with a copy of the final order discontinuing or dismissing the case. Any case discontinued or dismissed under the provisions of this subsection may be reinstated, on motion, after notice to the parties in interest, if known, or their counsel of record within one year from the date of such order but not after.

Under Code § 8.01-335(A), the earliest point at which the circuit court may discontinue a pending case is after two years of inactivity, and even then discontinuance may be ordered only if neither party requests a continuance or the parties fail to abide by a schedule set by the court following a continuance. In the Collins decision, the Supreme Court noted that a case must be inactive for three years before a circuit court may dismiss it sua sponte under Code §

8.01-335(B). In Collins, the procedure utilized by the circuit court to enter the dismissal order was done pursuant to a local rule that, under Code § 8.01-4, the circuit court was not authorized to adopt. Thus the Court concluded that the mode of procedure utilized by the circuit court was one that it could not lawfully adopt. Accordingly, the dismissal order was void ab initio and subject to challenge at any time, the "21-day rule" notwithstanding.

Additionally, the Court remarked in Collins that Code § 8.01-335 provides the parties to a discontinued case the opportunity to reinstate the case within one year of the discontinuance, and that the right to nonsuit an unserved action is an important option for plaintiffs. Both of these matters are now addressed in the new decision in Hicks v. Mellis.

Background Facts in Hicks v. Mellis. A child born in October of 1989 was allegedly injured by medical malpractice in 1990. Suit was filed in 1993 against the Commonwealth, the hospital, and unnamed health care providers; this suit was nonsuited in 1995. In October of 1999 a second action on the claim was filed naming the defendant doctor and another physician, among various defendants, but none of the several defendants was served.

After more than three years with no further filings or proceedings in the case, early in 2003 the circuit court entered an order under Code § 8.01-335(B) discontinuing and striking the case from the docket. Eleven months later the plaintiff filed a timely motion to reinstate the case pursuant to Code § 8.01-335(B). The circuit court, after observing that none of the defendants had been served with process, entered an order of reinstatement returning the case to the courts docket. In early 2004, plaintiff filed a motion for nonsuit, which the circuit court granted by order in May of 2004. On the same day, plaintiff filed a third motion for judgment naming only the treating physician as a defendant.

The defendant first received notice of the plaintiff's claim when he was served in May of 2005, just under one year after the case was filed. Upon consideration of defendant's special plea of the statute of limitations the circuit court concluded that reinstatement of the case had been improvidently allowed because Code § 8.01-335(B) required that the parties in interest be notified prior to reinstating a case that had been stricken from the docket, and the defendant doctor had not received such notice. Thus, the circuit court concluded that the case remained stricken from the docket, that the second nonsuit was of no effect, and that the third motion for judgment was barred by the statute of limitations under Code § 8.01-243.1. From a judgment implementing that analysis, the plaintiff appealed.

Legal Analysis in the Recent Case. The Supreme Court in Hicks v. Mellis reviewed the language of Code § 8.01-335(B), which governs reinstatement of inactive cases discontinued from the docket. This portion of the statute provides:

B. Any court in which is pending a case wherein for more than three years there has been no order or proceeding, except to continue it, may, in its discretion, order it to be struck from its docket and the action shall thereby be discontinued. The court may dismiss cases under this subsection without any notice to the parties. The clerk shall provide the parties with a copy of the final order discontinuing or dismissing the case. Any case discontinued or dismissed under the provisions of this subsection may be reinstated, on motion, after notice to the parties in interest, if known, or their counsel of record within one year from the date of such order but not after. (Emphasis added).

The Supreme Court held that this language is plain: it provides that any court in which an action is pending for more than three years with no order or proceeding, except to continue it, may, in its discretion, order the case to be stricken from the docket and discontinued. The Court noted that under the provisions of subsection (B) the trial judge may dismiss cases under this subsection without any prior notice to the parties. The section further provides that any case that is discontinued or dismissed under this provision may be reinstated, on motion, after notice to the parties in interest, if known, or their counsel of record, within one year from the date of such order but not after.

Notice Required Notice Omitted. Under this statutory language, a circuit court may enter an order reinstating a discontinued case only after notice is given to known parties in interest. The Supreme Court in Hicks v. Mellis observed that the parties to that appeal did not dispute that the defendant doctor was a known party in interest to the discontinued action. Therefore, the circuit court entered the reinstatement order contrary to the notice provision set forth in Code §

8.01-335(B), and the effect of that order on the present litigation must be considered.

Traversing doctrine that has been recited a half-dozen times by the Court in the last five years, in Hicks v Mellis the Supreme Court noted that an order is void ab initio if the court did not have the jurisdiction to render the order, or if the court employed an unlawful mode of procedure in entering the order. Because an order that is void ab initio is a complete nullity, the order may be challenged directly or collaterally by all persons, anywhere, at any time, or in any manner. These principles are reviewed in several leading cases, such as Singh v. Mooney, 261 Va. 48, 51-52, 541 S.E.2d 549, 551 (2001); Evans v. Smyth-Wythe Airport Commn, 255 Va. 69, 73, 495 S.E.2d 825, 828 (1998); Lapidus v. Lapidus, 226 Va. 575, 579, 311 S.E.2d 786, 788 (1984). In contrast, an order is voidable if its issuance was reversible error but was within the courts jurisdiction to enter. A court has jurisdiction to err, as well as to correctly decide the issues presented in a case, and the remedy to correct an error by a trial court is to appeal the courts decision upon entry of a final order, not to collaterally attack the erroneous decision in a separate action. Traditional case law on these points includes: Collins v. Shepherd, 274 Va. 390, 649 S.E.2d 672 (2007), Evans v. Smyth-Wythe Airport Commn, Lapidus v. Lapidus, and Anthony v. Kasey, 83 Va. 338, 340, 5 S.E. 176, 177 (1887).

The Court has repeatedly observed that a challenge to an order based on a trial courts misapplication of a statute generally raises a question of court error, not a question of the courts jurisdiction. Review of Code § 8.01-335(B) in the present case demonstrates that the circuit court had jurisdiction to enter the reinstatement order but misapplied the statute.

Code § 8.01-335(B). Code § 8.01-335(B) permits a circuit court to enter a reinstatement order without prior notice to anyone when the circuit court has determined that there are no known interested parties or counsel of record. Thus, in Hicks v. Mellis the Court concluded that while prior notice is prescribed prior notice is not "a jurisdictional requirement" for entry of a reinstatement order under the statute.

The Court found some discretion latent within Code § 8.01-335(B), since the statute provides that a circuit court may reinstate a discontinued action after notice to the parties in interest, if known, or their counsel of record. The Court found it significant that the statute does not direct that notice be given only to named defendants or their counsel of record, but leaves for the circuit courts determination the issue whether there are known parties who have an interest in the litigation, a matter that will rest on the facts and circumstances of a particular case. The Court concluded:

The potentially broad scope of the inquiry may require that the circuit court decide both issues of fact and of law in reaching a conclusion. Such determinations are core functions of our courts in the exercise of their jurisdiction.

Of course, the defendant doctor easily could be identified as a person of interest in the medical malpractice case pending in Hicks v. Mellis he was a named defendant! However the Court found that this fact did not change the nature of the legal determination that the circuit court was required to make under the statute. Thus, the circuit courts failure to apply the statute properly while error -- did not affect the courts jurisdiction to enter the reinstatement order.

On similar reasoning the Court concluded that the trial courts reinstatement order was not void ab initio on the ground that the court employed an "unlawful mode of procedure." Code § 8.01-335(B) required that the circuit court decide whether there were known interested parties entitled to notice before reinstating the case and, thus, the circuit court lawfully could have made this determination and still have reached the wrong result. The Supreme Court concludes that because the misapplication of the statute in the present case occurred in the circuit courts lawful exercise of its jurisdiction, the reinstatement order was merely voidable, rather than void ab initio and, thus, was not subject to collateral attack in the present action.

Notice Redux. The fact that the defendant health care provider was not served in the nonsuited action, and had no other notice of those proceedings, and thus that he did not know that the May 25, 2004 order of nonsuit had been entered and could have been appealed, was both facially unfair and troubling. However, the Supreme Court concluded, this defect in the implementation of the procedural requirements cannot be considered in this collateral action. Rather, the Court noted the issue as a question for the General Assembly's consideration, and invited in future revisions to the Code. As a result, the Supreme Court found that the circuit court erred in sustaining the defendant's plea of the statute of limitations and in dismissing the suit on that basis. The circuit court's judgment was reversed and the case was remanded for further proceedings.

Nonsuit. In the Collins opinion last fall the Court noted that by operation of a procedure effectuated solely by local rule the circuit court dismissed Collins case with prejudice without the case being heard on the merits. The Court observed that in the absence of this local rule, "Collins would have retained the right to take a nonsuit and refile his civil action beyond the one-year limitation period established by the local rule," in accord with Code § 8.01-380 and case authority such as Berry v. F&S Fin. Mktg., 271 Va. 329, 332-33, 626 S.E.2d 821, 823 (2006), Waterman v. Halverson, 261 Va. 203, 208, 540 S.E.2d 867, 869 (2001), and McManama v. Plunk, 250 Va. 27, 32, 458 S.E.2d 759, 762 (1995)). The Supreme Court therefore held in Collins that:

"The dismissal under a local rule of a case that the plaintiff would otherwise be able to pursue under the Code, case law, and Rules of Court exceeds the authority delegated to circuit courts under Code § 8.01-4."

The nonsuit mechanism is viewed in that analysis as a means for plaintiff to avoid the general effect of failure to serve process in one year, which is a dismissal on the merits. If nonsuit can be attained, the service failure and bar to entry of judgment evaporates. The recent decision in Hicks v. Mellis shows that unless the statutes are changed, a stricken action can be reinstated then nonsuited to achieve this goal without giving notice to the defendant whose exposure to suit is thereby extended. This procedure is error, as Hicks v. Mellis clearly explains and thus trial courts are exhorted to follow the statutory notice requirements but under the holding of this case, applying current statutory provisions, failure to do so does not render the proceedings void.

Virginia Cross-References Research Leads. For further analysis of the topics of Virginia law addressed herein, please consult the following sources:

For an overview on local rules of court and the movement to require uniform statewide pretrial orders, see Kent Sinclair & Leigh Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed.) §1.11.

An overview of nonsuit practice in Virginia, including the relationship of the "21-day rule" to the availability of nonsuits can be found in

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is Professor of Law and served for many years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). Both are treatises on Virginia law published by Lexis Law Publishing. Professor Sinclair is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Court Advance Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges. For the past 15 years he has been Reporter and Editor of the Guide to Evidence in Virginia, and starting in 2008 he is co-author of Friend & Sinclair, The Law of Evidence in Virginia.

74 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Professor Kent Sinclair on Univ. of VA Health Svcs. Found. v. Morris

2008 Emerging Issues 2710

Charitable Immunity in Virginia -- Salvation by Good Works (if accompanied by a good ratio of paying and donated services and nine other factors!). Minor factors and controlling considerations in obtaining common-law charitable immunity in Virginia courts.

By Kent Sinclair

August 15, 2008

SUMMARY: Professor Kent Sinclair discusses the importance of a wide-ranging recent decision in University of Virginia Health Services Foundation v. Morris, 275 Va. 319, 657 S.E.2d 512 (2008) and provides an understanding of the true operation of charitable immunity in Virginia.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview & Importance of the Decision: Considering four "key" relevant factors out of a much larger list of considerations articulated in prior case law, the court found that the University of Virginia's health services foundation as it actually conducts its affairs is not dominantly in accord with the charitable purpose stated in its own articles of incorporation. The Court found that, instead, it operates like a profitable commercial business with extensive revenue and assets. Thus the Court found that this foundation is not immune from tort liability under the doctrine of charitable immunity.

This decision has significant implications for litigation involving medical negligence claims involving hospitals, health services foundations, and other bodies. It addresses both our "presumptions" about charitable status and the nitty-gritty of detailed considerations a court must consider when ruling on a claim of such immunity. At bottom the pending cases focused on the ratio of revenues and the cost of the institution's charitable work, the profit based incentive payment system it had in place, and the absence of charitable gift giving. Code sections 8.01-38 and § 32.1-123 were both construed.

Background Facts

A health services foundation associated with a large public university's medical center is incorporated as a non-profit group practice health care provider organization that employs the physicians who work at the university's medical school. The physicians it employs are also employed by the medical school; they teach and perform research at the medical school and render patient care services at the medical center and regional primary care offices.

One of the purposes stated in the foundation's articles of incorporation is to assist and conduct programs providing charity medical care to patients who might not otherwise be able to afford it. The foundation bills various charges, receives insurance payments, and engages in patient billing and collections. It receives no funds as contributions or donations. Funds generated by the foundation are used to pay part of the physicians guaranteed salaries and benefits, and certain incentive compensation.

The foundation involved in these collected cases was determined by the Internal Revenue Service to be exempt from federal income tax under § 501(c)(3), and it was further determined to be a public charity rather than a private foundation, as § 509(a)(3) organization. In several medical malpractice cases the foundation raised the defense of charitable immunity, and inconsistent trial court rulings resulted. The recent decision disposed of collected appeals in several of these cases.

General Principles Reprised (and Applied)

In the Health Services Foundation case, the Court adhered to the recitation made several times in the last two decades, that the doctrine of charitable immunity is firmly embedded in the law of this Commonwealth and has become a part of the general public policy of the State.

The Court explained that this doctrine is grounded in part in the public policy that the resources of charitable institutions are better used to further the institutions charitable purposes, than to pay tort claims lodged by the charity's beneficiaries. Additionally, it preserves the spirit and intent of philanthropic gifts made by the public to charitable institutions and so that that much of the burden borne by those gifts will not be again cast upon the public.

Limitations on Immunity. Despite these important policy roots, case law has also clearly stated the canon that the doctrine of charitable immunity in Virginia is limited.

First: A charitable institution is immune from liability to beneficiaries for acts of ordinary negligence by its servants or agents, but may be liable for ordinary negligence in the selection and retention of its servants or agents.

Second: Charitable immunity applies only to claims of negligence asserted by those who accept the charitable institutions benefits. A charitable institution is not immune from liability to invitees or strangers with no beneficial relationship to the institution.

Third: A charitable institution is not immune for acts of gross negligence or willful or wanton negligence, as such conduct can never be characterized as an attempt to carry out the mission of the charity to serve its beneficiaries.

Moreover, in addition to these fundamental judicial limitations on charitable immunity, the General Assembly has limited charitable immunity in certain instances. One such limitation is Code § 8.01-38, which denies charitable immunity to most hospitals.

Code § 8.01-38 and Hospital Immunity. Code § 32.1-123 defines hospital to mean any licensed facility in which the primary function is the provision of diagnosis, of treatment, and of medical and nursing services, surgical or nonsurgical, for two or more nonrelated individuals, including hospitals known by varying nomenclature or designation such as sanatoriums, sanitariums and general, acute, rehabilitation, chronic disease, short-term, long-term, outpatient surgical, and inpatient or outpatient maternity hospitals.

Code § 8.01-38 denies immunity to hospitals:

No hospital, as defined in this section, shall be immune from liability for negligence or any other tort on the ground that it is a charitable institution unless (i) such hospital renders exclusively charitable medical services for which service no bill for service is rendered to, nor any charge is ever made to the patient or (ii) the party alleging such negligence or other tort was accepted as a patient by such institution under an express written agreement executed by the hospital and delivered at the time of admission to the patient or the person admitting such patient providing that all medical services furnished such patient are to be supplied on a charitable basis without financial liability to the patient. . . .

Because Code § 8.01-38 is in derogation of the common law of charitable immunity, the Court holds that it must be strictly construed and not enlarged in its operation by construction beyond its express terms.

The health services organization reviewed in the Court's recent decision did not fall under Code §§ 8.01-38 and 32.1-123 as a matter of plain language and statutory construction.

Code § 32.1-123 includes in the definition of hospital only facilit[ies] licensed pursuant to this article. The foundation in the pending cases was not so licensed to operate as a hospital and had never applied for or held a license to operate as a hospital or been subject to any type of hospital accreditation. Because it did not come within the definition of hospital in Code § 32.1-123, the foundation did not fall within the scope of Code § 8.01-38's denial of charitable immunity to hospitals.

Common Law Charitable Immunity Background Standards and Factors. Whether an entity such as the health services foundation before the Court in the recent litigation is eligible for common law charitable immunity from tort liability is a mixed question of law and fact that is subject to de novo review on appeal. Thus a trial court's finding on such a topic may be replaced by that of the appellate court if it disagrees with the conclusions or inferences to be drawn from the facts presented.

The Court's plenary explication of the common-law test was most recently given in Ola v. YMCA of South Hampton Roads, Inc., 270 Va. 550, 621 S.E.2d 70 (2005). That 2005 decision stressed that -- to establish charitable immunity as a bar to tort liability -- an entity must prove at least two distinct elements. The absence of either element makes the bar of charitable immunity inapplicable:

- (1) the entity seeking immunity must show it is organized with a recognized charitable purpose, and
- (2) that it operates in fact in accord with that purpose.

Where these two elements are shown, the burden is then on the purportedly immune entity to further establish a third requirement with respect to the particular tort plaintiff: that the tort claimant was a beneficiary of the charitable institution at the time of the alleged injury.

Charitable Organization and Operation. In examining whether the organizations articles of incorporation have a charitable or eleemosynary purpose the Supreme Court of Virginia held in Ola (and reaffirmed in the Health Services Foundation decision) that "if an organizations charter sets forth a charitable or eleemosynary purpose, there is a rebuttable presumption [that] it operates as a charitable institution in accordance with that purpose." However, the Court warned in Ola that:

if the manner in which the organization actually conducts its affairs is not in accord with the charitable purpose, then the presumption may be rebutted and the bar of charitable immunity does not apply.

In its recent Health Services Foundation decision the Supreme Court of Virginia tabulated no fewer than 10 factors that "are indicative of whether a charitable organization operates in fact with a charitable purpose." These factors are:

- (1) Does the entity's charter limit the entity to a charitable or eleemosynary purpose?
- (2) Does the entity's charter contain a not for profit limitation?
- (3) Is the entity's financial purpose to break even or earn a profit?
- (4) Does the entity in fact earn a profit, and if so, how often does that occur?

- (5) If the entity earns a profit (a surplus beyond expenses) must that be used for a charitable purpose?
- (6) Does the entity depend on contributions and donations for a substantial portion of its existence?
- (7) Is the entity exempt from federal income tax and/or local real estate tax?
- (8) Does the entity's provision of services take into consideration a person's ability to pay for such services?
- (9) Does the entity have stockholders or others with an equity stake in its capital?
- (10) Are the directors and officers of the entity compensated and if so, on what basis?

Even this list of 10 broad factors is said by the Court to be "not exclusive," and hence other considerations may be raised in any given case to support a fact-specific analysis of each instance. Further, "no one factor is determinative" and hence the absence of any particular element will not doom or assure a claim of charitable immunity in Virginia.

Articles of Incorporation. The Supreme Court noted in the Health Services Foundation litigations that an entity is entitled to a presumption that it operates as a charitable institution in accordance with the purposes set out in its Articles of Incorporation. In that case the Articles recited that the foundation was formed exclusively for charitable, scientific and educational purposes, as contemplated by Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code. Thus the Court found that these Articles of Incorporation established the rebuttable presumption that the foundation was a charitable organization. As a result, the Court noted, "[t]he plaintiffs in the respective cases then had the burden of rebutting the presumption" -- which they did!

Conducting the Business. Rebutting the presumption that a facially nonprofit charitable institution is immune is not difficult. The Court states that while such an entity benefits initially from the presumption, "if the manner in which [it] actually conducts its affairs is not in accord with the charitable purpose, then the presumption may be rebutted and the bar of charitable immunity does not apply." In practice the word "may" could be misleading; it appears that if the conduct of an entity's affairs is not in accord with the charitable nature of its status, the immunity is rebutted.

Four Key Factors. In the Health Services Foundation case the Court found four of the ten articulated factors to be "determinative" in coming to the conclusion that the foundation did not operate in fact with a charitable purpose.

- (1) it was created to correct billing and collection problems;
- (2) the ratio of its revenue compared to the cost of its charitable work is substantially disproportionate;
- (3) its incentive payment structure is functionally a profit-based bonus system, much like a for-profit enterprise; and
- (4) it does not accept charitable gifts.

In discussing these factors as applied to the cases before it, the Court noted that the particular health services entity involved had been largely created to increase the amount of revenue received by the medical center it served. Further, this foundation "aggressively pursues legal collections." After a detailed review of the thousands of claims and millions of dollars involved, the Court concluded that the "magnitude of these practices suggests that the foundation operates more like a for-profit business with a financial purpose of earning a profit than a charitable organization."

Important Ratio. Looking at the various contributed, pro bono and free services of the entity, and comparing that to the income generated, the Court found that the ratio of the foundation's unreimbursed shortfall in a recent year to total revenue and other income was only about 0.66%. It concluded: "The minimal cost" of its charity work "as compared to its income illustrates how small a portion of [its] work is charitable."

Incentive Payments and Profit-Like Approach. Overall, the Supreme Court of Virginia found that the UVA Health Services Foundation's incentive payment structure included a distribution of surplus revenue in a manner more consistent with a successful commercial business than a charitable organization. It noted that the revenue is distributed by the foundation to the medical center departments in accordance with how much revenue those departments generated, rather than how much indigent care is provided, how much research is performed, or how many hours their physicians spent teaching. The Court said that this mode of operation "is functionally a profit-based bonus system." The Court noted that the departments that generate the most revenue received the most money from the foundation, and those physicians who are the most financially productive in their departments generally received the biggest incentive payments. Thus, in the Court's view, the foundation followed the model of a profitable commercial business and not a charitable institution.

Receiving Charitable Contributions as an Important Factor. In addition to the Court's focus on the amount of charitable care provided, the Court made a point about the absence of charitable contributions or donations received by the entity. Receipt of contributions or donations is held in the Health Services Foundation case to be an important factor because charitable immunity in Virginia is based on public policy. The reasoning is interesting: If the foundation were required to pay tort awards to the various plaintiffs in the present cases, no philanthropic-minded intentions would be nullified, because no gifts are received. Thus the fact that no charitable donors' intentions would be frustrated by diversion of their gifts to pay tort judgments was an important consideration in determining that the entity is not entitled to protected charitable status.

The Court was quick to point out that receipt of charitable gifts is not a sine qua non for entitlement to charitable immunity. It acknowledged that there are some charitable organizations that do not receive or accept donations, particularly if they are previously endowed from a philanthropic gift. These organizations may still be entitled to charitable immunity for other reasons.

Summary and Conclusion. The Supreme Court's analysis of the long list of pertinent factors in Health Services Foundation is illustrative of the necessary analysis under the Ola decision and other governing case law. It shows starkly that the manner in which an entity actually conducts its affairs is critical. If the "operation" of the entity is not dominantly in accord with the charitable purpose stated in its Articles of Incorporation, it will be denied the protections of the charitable immunity doctrine.

Virginia Cross-References Research Leads. For further analysis of the topics of Virginia law addressed herein, please consult the following sources:

For an overview on charitable immunity in Virginia, see Kent Sinclair & Leigh Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed.) § 2.32 Charitable and Related Immunities.

For a general discussion of the charitable immunity defense, see Charles E. Friend, Personal Injury Law in Virginia Chapter 11 (Immunities) and § 11.5 (Charitable Immunity).

A dated but insightful article is: "Charitable Immunity: What Price Hath Charity?," 28 U. Rich. L. Rev. 953 (1994).

On the operation of charitable immunity in diverse aspects of Virginia law, see also Michie's Jurisprudence, NEGLIGENCE, § 12, and COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES, § 10.

On charitable hospitals generally, see Michie's Jurisprudence, HOSPITALS AND SANITARIUMS, § 7.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is Professor of Law and served for many years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). Both are treatises on Virginia law published by Lexis Law Publishing. Professor Sinclair is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Court Advance Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges. For the past 15 years he has been Reporter and Editor of the Guide to Evidence in Virginia, and starting in 2008 he is co-author of Friend & Sinclair, The Law of Evidence in Virginia.

75 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

James Hauser on Frosti v. Creel, 979 So. 2d 912 (Fla. 2008).

2008 Emerging Issues 2698

Calculating Damages to Determine Net Judgment in light of Frosti v. Creel, 979 So. 2d 912 (Fla. 2008).

By James Hauser

August 14, 2008

SUMMARY: When and how to make an offer of judgment can be a puzzling decision. This commentary, written by James C. Hauser, an expert on Florida attorneys fees, analyzes the Florida Supreme Courts interpretation of the statute and court rule governing the decision in Frosti v. Creel.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In Frosti v. Creel, 979 So. 2d 912 (Fla. 2008), the Florida Supreme Court answered two questions interpreting the Offer of Judgment Statute, § 768.79 and Fla. R.Civ.P. 1.442. This commentary discusses the consequences of those answers for practitioners.

Answer Number I: Multiple Damage Awards Will be Combined to Calculate Whether a Party Is Entitled to Attorneys Fees Based on an Offer of Judgment. In order for a plaintiff to recover attorneys fees based on an offer of judgment, the amount recovered by the plaintiff must be greater than 125% of the amount being offered. §768.79(6) (b). However, the statute is silent as to whether an award of compensatory damages must be combined with an award of punitive damages to calculate whether the 125% threshold level has been reached.

In Frosti, Ms. Frosti was injured in an automobile accident caused by Mr. Houck. She served an offer of judgment on Mr. Houck, for $1 in punitive damages, contingent upon Mr. Houck settling for $24,999 in compensatory damages. The jury returned a verdict of $20,670 in compensatory damages (which was less the $24,999 offered), but $73,800 in punitive damages. The total amount of damages of $94,470 was more than 125% of the offer of judgment. If the amount of damages was combined, then Ms. Frosti would be entitled to attorneys fees under §768.79. If the amount of damages was not combined, because the compensatory damage award by the jury of $20,670 was less than the offer of judgment of $24,999, she would not be entitled to attorneys fees.

To determine the judgment obtained for purposes of calculating whether the amount recovered is greater than the 125% offer of judgment, the Florida Supreme Court held that the key is the net judgment, not the jury verdict. See Anderson v. King, 817 So. 2d 1102 (Fla. 2d DCA 2002). To calculate the net judgment the Florida Supreme Court held that the compensatory and punitive damages must be added together. Since the combined total of $94,470 was more than 125% of the combined offer of $25,000, Ms. Frosti was entitled to attorneys fees. Frosti v. Creel, 979 So. 2d 912 (Fla. 2008).

Answer Number 2: Filing an Offer of Judgment Prior to the Final Judgment Does Not Invalidate the Offer of Judgment. In Mills v. Martinez, 909 So. 2d 340 (Fla. 5th DCA 2005), the offer of judgment was filed with the court two years prior to the jury verdict. The 5th DCA held that the premature filing of the offer of judgment did not invalidate it. The 2nd DCA came to the opposite conclusion in Frosti v. Creel, 943 So. 2d 1023 (Fla. 2d DCA 2006), holding that the premature filing of the offer of judgment made it void. In Frosti, the offer was filed after the jury verdict, but before the final judgment.

Fla.R.Civ.P. 1.442(d) states in part that the proposal for settlement:

... shall not be filed unless necessary to enforce the provisions of this rule. (emphasis added.)

§768.79(3) has a similar provision which states:

the offer shall not be filed ... unless filing is necessary to enforce the provisions of this section. (emphasis added.)

The key phrase is necessary to enforce.

The Florida Supreme Court could have ruled that because the offer of judgment in Frosti was filed after the jury verdict, but prior to the final judgment, the offer was timely filed. The amount of damages ($20,670 compensatory and $73,800 punitive) was known at the time that the offer of judgment was filed with the court. Thus, to determine whether the damages recovered was more than 125% of the $25,000 offer, so as to Ms. Frosti to attorneys fees under § 768.79 it was necessary to file the offer. However, the Florida Supreme Court went further and held that even if the offer of judgment is filed prior to a determination of damages, the offer will not be invalid. The Florida Supreme Court specifically approved the 5th DCA decision in Mills and stated at page 914:

We hold that a motion for attorneys fees and costs made pursuant to Floridas offer of judgment need not be denied because the underlying proposal for settlement was filed in the trial court before the judgment was entered.

The Florida Supreme Courts rationale was that neither the statute nor the rule prohibit the filing of the offer of judgment prior to the final judgment. If the offer of judgment is filed prematurely, the opposing party can always file a motion to strike, with leave to refile the offer of judgment after the verdict or final judgment. While that may make practical sense, the Florida Supreme Courts decision seemingly conflicts with the literal wording of both § 768.79(3) and Fla.R.Civ.P. 1.442(d). Simply put an offer of judgment filed prior to the decision on the merits is not necessary to enforce the offer of judgment. Without knowing the amount of the damages there is no way to know whether the amount of the offer exceeds 125% of the net judgment which would entitle the plaintiff to attorneys fees.

Caution Is required: Even though the Florida Supreme Court ruled that compensatory and punitive damages must be combined to calculate the judgment obtained, the party making the offer still must separate the amount of compensatory damages from the amount of punitive damages in the offer itself. Both Fla.R.Civ.P. 1.442(c) (2) (E) and § 768.79(2) (c) mandate that the offer state with particularity the amount of punitive damages being offered. If the amount of punitive damages is not separately disclosed, then the offer may be defective. Thus, in Frosti, if the offer had stated that it was for $25,000 for both compensatory and punitive damages, the plaintiff may not have been entitled to attorneys fees.

For additional information about the offer of judgment see: Attorneys Fees in Florida, Second Edition, Chapter 4, Offer of Judgment. LexisNexis Practice Guide: Florida Civil Motion Practice, 13.10 Making a Settlement Offer.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Hon. James C. Hauser is a recently retired Circuit Court Judge for the Ninth Judicial Circuit of the State of Florida where he had served since 1990. Previously, he was County Judge in Orange County, in which capacity he was named Jurist of the Year by the Young Lawyers Division of the Florida Bar in 1989. He is a graduate of Boston University School of Law and the Wharton School of Finance at the University of Pennsylvania. Judge Hauser lectures frequently before the bench, bar, and public on the subject of attorney's fees. He is the author for Floridas foremost authority on attorneys fees, Attorneys Fees in Florida, Second edition. He is also the author of Florida Residential Landlord-Tenant Manual. Judge Hauser is available for personal consultations or to lecture on obtaining and maximizing attorney fees and can be reached at 407-951-6685, 9012 Summit Centre Way 102, Orlando, Fla. 32810 or by email at hauserjim@gmail.com.

76 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Ogden on International Federation v Superior Court

2008 Emerging Issues 2681

Professor Gregory Ogden on International Federation of Professional and Technical Engineers, Local 21, AFL-CIO v. Superior Court (2007) 42 Cal. 4th 319

By Mr. Gregory L. Ogden

August 13, 2008

SUMMARY: Professor Gregory Ogden on International Federation of Professional and Technical Engineers, Local 21, AFL-CIO v. Superior Court (2007) 42 Cal. 4th 319 Get expert commentary on the California Supreme Court decision upholding disclosure of city employees name, job title, and gross salary for employees earning more than $100,000 per year under the California Public Records Act.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: California Supreme Court upholds disclosure of city employees name, job title, and gross salary for employees earning more than $100,000 per year under California Public Records Act

Background: In International Federation of Professional and Technical Engineers, Local 21, AFL-CIO v. Superior Court (2007) 42 Cal. 4th 319, 327-329, 64 Cal. Rptr. 3d 693, 165 P. 3d 488, the California Supreme Court holds that salary information for specific public employees of the City of Oakland earning $100,000 or more per year is a disclosable public record within the meaning of the California Public Records Act [Gov. Code §§ 6252(d), 6253(a)]. Reporters for the Contra Costa Times requested disclosure of this information for the 2003-2004 fiscal year from the City of Oakland. The City refused to provide salary information for specific individuals claiming that this information was exempt from disclosure. After allowing intervention by two public employee unions that opposed disclosure, the superior court ordered disclosure of the salary information and rejected claims for exemption based on the privacy interests of the individuals; and for police officers, the peace officer personnel records exemption was asserted. The Court of Appeal denied the petition of the two unions challenging disclosure.

Holdings: The California Supreme Court held that the salary information was not exempt from disclosure under the personnel and medical records exemption [Gov. Code § 6254(c)] because disclosure of this information did not constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. The California Supreme Court relied upon the public policy supporting the adoption of the public records act, that public access to information about government is essential to government accountability, and that the right of public access to governmental information is protected not only by the California Public Records Act [Gov. Code §§ 6250 to 6277], but also by provisions of the California Constitution [Cal.

Const., art. 1, § 3, subd. (b)(1)]. The California Supreme court noted that claims for exemption of salary information for particular public employees based on concerns specific to that employee, such as undercover police officers, could be made under either the personnel and medical records [Gov. Code § 6254(c)], or the public interest exemption [Gov. Code § 6255], but that neither the city nor the unions provided such information to the superior court. The California Supreme court also rejected a claim that disclosure of salary information would violate the public employees right to privacy under the California Constitution [Cal. Const., art. 1, § 1] because the public interest in disclosure of this information outweighed the privacy interest of the employees. Finally, the California Supreme court held that the peace officers personal records exemption [Gov. Code § 6254(k), Penal Code §§ 832.7, 832.8] did not include salary information of peace officers as one of the categories of information exempt from disclosure [Penal code § 832.8], and thus this exemption did not apply to police officer salary information.

California Public Records Act Provisions. The California Public Records Act provides that access to information concerning the conduct of the peoples business is a fundamental and necessary right of every person in this state [Gov. Code § 6250]. The California Constitution also protects public access to information and provides that the people have the right of access to information concerning the conduct of the peoples business, and, therefore, the writings of public officials and agencies shall be open to public scrutiny. [Cal. Const., art. I, § 3, subd. (b)(1)]. However, peace officer privacy rights are protected in the California Constitution as well [Cal. Const., art. I, § 3, subd. (b)(3)]. Public records include any writing containing information relating to the conduct of the publics business prepared, owned, used or retained by any state or local agency [Gov. Code § 6252(e); see also Gov. Code § 6252 (g)]. There are many statutory exemptions under which public records are exempt from disclosure including records, the disclosure of which is exempted or prohibited pursuant to federal or state law, including but not limited to the provisions of the evidence code relating to privilege [Gov. Code § 6254(k)] under which peace officer personnel records are exempt from disclosure under the provisions of Penal Code §§ 832.7, and 832.8. Other exemptions include the privacy exemption, which provides: Personnel, medical, or similar files, the disclosure of which would constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [are exempt from disclosure] [Gov. Code § 6254(c)], and the public interest exemption which states that the public interest served by not disclosing the record clearly outweighs the public interest served by disclosure of the record [Gov. Code § 6255(a)].

California Public Records Act Policies: The California Public Records Act [Gov. Code §§ 6250-6277] provides for disclosure of public records so that the people of the State of California can be well informed about the records and writings of public officials and agencies. This helps to maintain accountability of those public officials. The media frequently request disclosure of public records (as in this case, reporters for The Contra Costa requested the salary information from the City of Oakland) so that the media can report to the public on the actions of public officials, insofar as those are reflected in the writings records, and other documents of public officials and agencies. However, much of the information that is in the possession of public officials and agencies may be exempt from disclosure under one of the numerous exemptions to the disclosure requirements of the public records act. Typically, a member of the public or a media representative will request disclosure of a public record, and the public agency will either disclose the record, or they will not disclose the record and rely upon one of the listed exemptions in the public records act or other statutes to justify non disclosure. The validity of the exemption claim will be litigated in the court system, and the appellate courts will determine in a case-by-case basis whether or not a particular exemption claim is justified in the circumstances. In many cases, the courts will have to engage in a balancing of competing interests, some of which may support disclosure, and some of which may not support disclosure.

Litigation Significance of International Federation: The International Federation decision is very specific in that it upheld disclosure of salary information for highly paid public employees working for the City of Oakland. The decision is significant in that it rejected the stated grounds for non disclosure based on the personnel and medical records exemption [Gov. Code § 6254(c)], the peace officers personal records exemption [Gov. Code § 6254(k), Penal Code §§ 832.7, 832.8] because salary information was not within the types of the information listed and protected by that exemption, the public interest exemption [Gov. Code § 6255], and the right of privacy recognized in the California

Constitution. This court decision is part of a larger trend in recent decisions of the California Supreme Court including the decision in Commission on Peace Officer Standards and Training v. Superior Court (2007) 42 Cal. 4th 278, 64 Cal. Rptr. 3d 661, 165 P. 3d 462 (upholding disclosure of the peace officers name, employing agency, date of new appointment, and termination date) ordering disclosure of public records under the California Public Records Act, and narrowly interpreting exemption to disclosure. The impact of the decision will be felt most directly by public agencies that have highly paid employees officers and therefore maintain personnel data on those employees. News articles that provide lists of highly paid employees of public agencies can provide the public with information about the public agencies use of tax dollars. That can ensure that the public agencies are held accountable to the citizens who pay taxes. In an era in which the public wants transparency from public officials, requiring disclosure of information under the act facilitates both transparency and accountability. The most immediate beneficiary of the decision will be media representatives who are researching information to develop media stories on compensation of public employees. The impact of this decision on public agencies could be substantial to the extent that specific public employers are overly generous with salary and other compensation provided to their employees. Within the world of public records act litigation, this decision is significant, but the information disclosed relates to a small percentage of the overall public employment workforce in the State of California.

Cross References

For further discussion of public records act issues, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Public Administrative Law, Volume 41, Ch. 470C, Public Records Act, generally, and specifically, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Public Administrative Law, Volume 41, Ch. 470C, Public Records Act, § 470C.13 (Exemptions from Disclosure).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Gregory L. Ogden is a professor of law at Pepperdine University where he has taught since 1978. He teaches administrative law, civil procedure, professional responsibility, and remedies. He is a graduate of UCLA, (BA, cum laude) UC Davis school of Law (JD, Law Review Editor), and he has two LLM=s, one from Temple University in legal education, and one from Columbia University in administrative law. He has been an administrative law consultant to the Administrative Conference of the United States, and to the California Law Revision Commission. He has taught administrative law for over 25 years, and was the principal author of California Public Agency Practice, (three volumes, Matthew, Bender & Co., Inc...1989), and California Public Administrative Law (two volumes in California Forms of Pleading and Practice, (LexisNexis Matthew Bender), the leading treatise on California administrative law. In fall 2005, He completed a major revision of a State Administrative Law in California chapter (200 pages) for a multi volume treatise on California Environmental Law and Land Use Practice (LexisNexis Matthew Bender). He has authored several articles in the administrative law field, including most recently the following article in the Journal of the NAALJ: Ogden, Gregory L., AThe Role of Demeanor Evidence in Determining Credibility of Witnesses in Fact Finding: The Views of ALJ=s, @ 20 Journal of NAALJ 1 (2000). Professor Ogden was the 1999 NAALJ Fellowship recipient, and he presented his fellowship paper on demeanor evidence at the 1999 NAALJ Conference in Asheville, North Carolina.

77 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Ogden on Peace Officer Standards v Superior Court

2008 Emerging Issues 2682

Professor Gregory Ogden on Commission on Peace Officer Standards and Training v. Superior Court (2007) 42 Cal. 4th 278

By Gregory L. Ogden

August 13, 2008

SUMMARY: Professor Gregory Ogden on Commission on Peace Officer Standards and Training v. Superior Court (2007) 42 Cal. 4th 278 Get expert commentary on the California Supreme Court decision upholding disclosure of police officer names, employing agencies, and employment dates under California Public Records Act.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: California Supreme Court upholds disclosure of police officer names, employing agencies, and employment dates under California Public Records Act

Background. In Commission on Peace Officer Standards and Training v. Superior Court (2007) 42 Cal. 4th 278, 64 Cal. Rptr. 3d 661, 165 P. 3d 462, the California Supreme Court holds that information relating to California peace officers that is maintained in an electronic database by the California Commission on Peace Officer Standards and Training was a public record that was disclosable under The California Public Records Act [Gov. Code § 6252(e), (g)]. Disclosure of this information was requested by the Los Angeles Times for the purpose of documenting trends in the movement of police officers from one department to another department. The information requested included the peace officers name and birth date, employing department, appointment dates, termination dates, and reason for termination. The Commission denied the request. The Newspaper filed a petition for a writ of mandate under the California Public Records Act with the superior court. The superior court ordered disclosure of the peace officers name, employing agency, date of new appointment, and termination date. The California Court of Appeal issued a writ of mandate under Gov. Code § 6259(c) vacating the superior court judgment and ordering that the records not be disclosed.

Holdings: The California Supreme Court reversed the court of appeal and held that these records were public records that were not exempt from disclosure under Gov. Code § 6354(k) (statutory exemptions including privilege) and were not exempt from disclosure under the peace officer personnel records statutory provisions [Penal Code §§ 832.7, 832.8] because the content of the information sought was not within the enumerated listings in Penal Code Section § 832.8, and therefore Section 832.7 did not apply to preclude disclosure. The Supreme Court also held that no other statutory exemption in the California Public Records Act applied to exempt disclosure of these records. The California Supreme Court rejected the argument that the records kept by the Commission were categorically exempt under Gov. Code § 6254(c) because the privacy and safety interest of the peace officers as a group did not outweigh the public interest in disclosure of the information. Thus, disclosure of these records would not constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. However, The California Supreme Court also held that the Commission could seek to justify exclusion from the disclosed records of information about specific officers because disclosure of that information would jeopardize the safety or efficacy of the peace officers. The exclusion would be based on a showing under the personnel and medical records exemption [Gov. Code § 6254(c)], and under the public interest exemption [Gov. Code § 6255]. The California Supreme Court remanded the case back to the Superior Court to allow the Commission to make such a showing.

California Public Records Act Provisions. The California Public Records Act provides that access to information concerning the conduct of the peoples business is a fundamental and necessary right of every person in this state [Gov. Code § 6250]. The California Constitution also protects public access to information and provides that the people have the right of access to information concerning the conduct of the peoples business, and, therefore, the writings of public officials and agencies shall be open to public scrutiny [Cal. Const., art. I, § 3, subd. (b)(1)]. However, peace officer privacy rights are protected in the California Constitution as well [Cal. Const., art. I, § 3, subd. (b)(3)]. Public records include any writing containing information relating to the conduct of the publics business prepared, owned, used or retained by any state or local agency [Gov. Code § 6252(e); see also Gov. Code § 6252(g)]. There are many statutory exemptions under which public records are exempt from disclosure including records, the disclosure of which is exempted or prohibited pursuant to federal or state law, including but not limited to the provisions of the evidence code relating to privilege [Gov. Code § 6254(k)] under which peace officer personnel records are exempt from disclosure under the provisions of Penal Code §§ 832.7, and 832.8. Other exemptions include the privacy exemption, which provides: Personnel, medical, or similar files, the disclosure of which would constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [are exempt from disclosure] [Gov. Code § 6254(c)], and the public interest exemption which states that the public interest served by not disclosing the record clearly outweighs the public interest served by disclosure of the record [Gov. Code § 6255(a)].

California Public Records Act Policies: The California Public Records Act [Gov. Code §§ 6250 to 6277] provides for disclosure of public records so that the people of the State of California can be well informed about the records and writings of public officials and agencies. This helps to maintain accountability of those public officials. The mass media frequently request disclosure of public records (as in this case, the Los Angeles Times requested the Commission records) so that the media can report to the public on the actions of public officials, insofar as those are reflected in the writings records, and other documents of public officials and agencies. However, much of the information that is in the possession of public officials and agencies may be exempt from disclosure under one of the numerous exemptions to the disclosure requirements of the public records act. Typically, a member of the public or a media representative will request disclosure of a public record, and the public agency will either disclose the record, or they will not disclose the record and rely upon one of the listed exemptions in the public records act or other statutes to justify nondisclosure. The validity of the exemption claim will be litigated in the court system, and the appellate courts will determine in a case-by-case basis whether or not a particular exemption claim is justified in the circumstances. In many cases, the courts will have to engage in a balancing of competing interests, some of which may support disclosure, and some of which may not support disclosure.

Litigation significance of the Commission decision: the Commission decision is fairly narrow in that it upheld disclosure of only the name of the police officer, the officer employing agency, the date of appointment and date of termination, but no other personal information such as a particular officers birth date and reasons for termination. The decision is significant in that it narrowly interpreted the scope of the peace officer personnel records exemption by focusing on the content of the information sought, not the format in which the information was kept. It also applied statutory interpretation principles to reach the most sensible result. The impact of the decision will be felt most directly by public agencies that employ police officers and therefore maintain personnel data on those officers. The most likely beneficiary of the decision will be media representatives who are researching police officer information to develop a media story on an investigation. However, the impact on public agencies will not be that great since the scope of disclosable data is fairly narrow. Within the world of public records act litigation, this decision is significant, but it affects a narrow class of litigants and the scope of the information requested relates to a small percentage of the overall public employment workforce in the state of California.

Cross References

For further discussion of public records act issues, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Public Administrative Law, Volume 41, Ch. 470C, Public Records Act, generally, and specifically, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Public Administrative Law, Volume 41, Ch. 470C, Public Records Act, § 470C.13 (Exemptions from Disclosure).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Gregory L. Ogden is a professor of law at Pepperdine University where he has taught since 1978. He teaches administrative law, civil procedure, professional responsibility, and remedies. He is a graduate of UCLA, (BA, cum laude) UC Davis school of Law (JD, Law Review Editor), and he has two LLM=s, one from Temple University in legal education, and one from Columbia University in administrative law. He has been an administrative law consultant to the Administrative Conference of the United States, and to the California Law Revision Commission. He has taught administrative law for over 25 years, and was the principal author of California Public Agency Practice, (three volumes, Matthew, Bender & Co., Inc...1989), and California Public Administrative Law (two volumes in California Forms of Pleading and Practice, (LexisNexis Matthew Bender), the leading treatise on California administrative

78 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Bisceglie on Privilege Issues in E-discovery under New York Law

2008 Emerging Issues 2112

Bisceglie on Privilege Issues in E-discovery under New York Law in Scott v. Beth Israel Medical Center Inc., 2007 NY Slip Op 27429

By Kyle C. Bisceglie

August 7, 2008

SUMMARY: On October 17, 2007, the NY Supreme Court (Comm. Part) held that a hospital administrator suing his employer had waived the attorney-client and work-product privileges because he and his lawyers regularly corresponded via email using the employers e-mail system. Kyle C. Bisceglie, a Partner at Olshan Grundman LLP in New York City, discusses Scott v. Beth Israel and its implications for privilege issues, employer-employee disputes & ediscovery.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In Scott v. Beth Israel Medical Center Inc., 2007 NY Slip Op 27429, 847 N.Y.S.2d 436, 2007 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 7114, Justice Charles E. Ramos of the New York County Supreme Court, Commercial Division, denied the motion of a hospital administrator, Dr. W. Norman Scott (Dr. Scott), for a protective order that would have required Beth Israel Medical Center (Beth Israel) to return the e-mail correspondence between Dr. Scott and his attorneys that were sent through Beth Israel's e-mail system and presumably found on Beth Israel's server during discovery. The Beth Israel Court reasoned that sending the e-mails through the hospital's system with knowledge of its restrictive e-mail policy destroyed any reasonable expectation of confidentiality and, thereby, waived the attorney-client privilege.

Attorney-client privilege

The attorney-client privilege is the oldest recognized evidentiary privilege in Anglo-American jurisprudence, dating back to the 1600s, and fosters the open dialog between lawyer and client that is essential for effective representation. See Delta Financial Corporation v. Morrison, 13 Misc.3d 441, 444, 820 N.Y.S.2d 745, 748 (N.Y. Sup.Ct. 2006); Swidler & Berlin v. United States, 524 U.S. 399, 403 (1998); United States v. Bilzerian, 926 F.2d 1285, 1292 (2d Cir. 1991), cert denied, 502 U.S. 813, (1991). Its purpose is to encourage full and frank communication between an attorney and his client and thereby promote broader public interests in the observance of law and the administration of justice. Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383, 389 (1981). Thus, the burden of breaching the privilege is particularly onerous. United States v. David, 131 F.R.D. 391, 398 (S.D.N.Y. 1990). Nonetheless, privileges are not to be expansively construed, as they are in derogation of the search for truth," United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 710, 94 S. Ct. 3090, 41 L. Ed. 2d 1039 (1974), and the attorney-client privilege in particular, "applies only where necessary to achieve its purpose." Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391, 403, 96 S. Ct. 1569, 48 L. Ed. 2d 39 (1976); see In re Grand Jury Investigation, United States v. Doe, 399 F.3d 527, 531 (2d Cir. 2005).

In New York, CPLR 4503(a) states that a privilege exists for confidential communications made between attorney and client in the course of professional employment, and CPLR 3101(b) vests privileged matter with absolute immunity. Spectrum Sys. Intl Corp. v. Chemical Bank, 575 N.Y.S.2d 809, 814, N.E.2d 1055, 1060 (1991). For a definition of what is encompassed by the privilege, courts still must look to the common law. Id. The burden of establishing the attorney-client privilege, in all its elements, always rests upon the party asserting the privilege. Untied States v. Schwimmer, 892 F.2d 237, 244 (2d Cir. 1989). To this end, the party asserting the privilege must demonstrate that there was: (1) a communication between client and counsel, which (2) was intended to be and was in fact kept confidential, and (3) made for the purpose of obtaining or providing legal advice. United States v. Constr. Prods. Research, Inc., 73 F.3d 464, 473 (2d Cir. 1996); See also Rossi v. Blue Shield, 73 N.Y.2d 588, 593, 540 N.E.2d 703, 542 N.Y.S.2d 508 (1989).

Facts of Scott v. Beth Israel

Returning to Beth Israel, the extraordinary facts are a lesson for the wary practitioner to avoid. Dr. Scott and, seemingly, his attorneys sent emails over a seven-month period beginning in February of 2004 of such a sensitive legal nature that Dr. Scott and his attorneys later claimed they were all privileged and work-product. All were sent from or to Dr. Scott's employer-issued e-mail, and accordingly, over Beth Israel's e-mail server.

The e-mails were sent during a time when Beth Israel's e-mail policy was in effect. The policy was comprehensive and unambiguous, stating in relevant part:

. This policy applies to everyone who works for the Medical Center including employees

. All Medical Center computer systems Internet Access Systems, related technology systems, and the wired or wireless networks that connect them are the property of the Medical Center and should be used for business purpose only.

. Employees have no personal privacy right in any material created, received, saved or sent using Medical Center communication or computer systems. The Medical Center reserves the right to access and disclose such material at any time without prior notice.

At Beth Israel, Dr. Scott was the Chairman of the Orthopedics Department, worked closely with the Human Resources administrator responsible for disseminating the electronic communication and privacy policy, and, beginning in 2002, required newly hired doctors under his supervision to sign a written form acknowledging their review and familiarity with the policy. While Dr. Scott never signed such an acknowledgment, he received an employee handbook that contained a brief summary of the policy before enacting the written acknowledgment requirement for his subordinates.

Dr. Scott and his attorneys argued the e-mails in question remained confidential for at least two reasons. First, he claimed to be unaware of Beth Israel's email policy. Second, relying on N.Y. C.P.L.R. 4548 (McKinney 1999), he claimed that the emails were made in confidence.

Not surprisingly, the Court rejected both contentions. As an administrator and one who required written acknowledgment of the policy from his subordinates, he had constructive knowledge of the policy.

As to his confidentiality claim under CPLR 4548, that section provides: no communication under this article shall lose its privileged character for the sole reason that it is communicated by electronic means or because persons necessary for the delivery or facilitation of such electronic communication may have access to the content of the communication. The Court reminded us that the modest purpose and effect of CPLR 4548; it simply acknowledges the widespread use of e-mail and that use of e-mail by itself will not abrogate the privileged nature of a communication.

However, it also doesn't absolve an attorney of his or her responsibilities to assess the risk of communicating by e-mail with a client. The holder of the privilege and his or her attorney must protect the confidential communication if they expect it to remain privileged. Dr. Scott's attorneys simply failed to assess the risk of the employer's e-mail policy and, therefore, failed to adequately protect the privilege. In this case, the Court analogized the effect of the employer e-mail policy to having someone watching over its employees' shoulders as he typed.

Confidentiality

The most-critical question for applying the attorney-client privilege is whether a communication remains confidential. Because no New York state case had addressed e-mail confidentiality in the attorney-client context, the Beth Israel Court looked for guidance to a federal bankruptcy case, In re Asia Global Crossing, Ltd. 322 B.R. 247 (S.D.N.Y. 2005). The Asia Global court iterated four factors to determine whether an employee's e-mail communications with his or her attorney remain confidential: (1) does the corporation maintain a policy banning personal or other objectionable use, (2) does the company monitor the use of the employee's computer or email, (3) do third parties have a right of access to the computer or e-mails, and (4) did the corporation notify the employee, or was the employee aware, of the use and monitoring policies? Id., at 257. If these four factors are met, the attorney-client privilege certainly does not apply. Asia Global, 322 B.R., at 258; Beth Israel, 847 N.Y.S.2d at 442. Both the Asia Global and Beth Israel courts characterized these factors as requirements but ultimately applied them like guidelines intended to determine whether the holder of the privilege intended to keep her communication private. As noted by the New York Court of Appeals, the determination of confidentiality requires an inquiry that is necessarily fact-specific. Rossi, 73 N.Y.2d at 593.

Beth Israel suggests that waiver may be found where only some of the Asia Global factors are present. Indeed, the Beth Israel court focused primarily on the client's intent, finding that C.P.L.R. 4548 makes the third party right of access inapplicable in New York. Additionally, the Beth Israel Court devitalized the second Asia Global factor, a company's monitoring of its employee's computer use, by equating a policy allowing for monitoring with actual monitoring. 847 N.Y.S.2d at 442.

Analysis of Dr. Scott's and his attorneys' intent clearly shows failure to adequately safeguard their e-mails. Dr. Scott's awareness and administration of Beth Israel's e-mail policy and use of the company's e-mail server signify carelessness by the doctor and his attorney sufficiently extreme to vitiate any claim to privilege. Of note to the practitioner, the boilerplate notice included in each e-mail sent from the law firm -- that the message may contain information that is privileged and confidential will not save privilege. Id., at 443. This language may preserve a privilege if one exists, but it will not regain privilege once it has been lost.

Analysis of Commonly Encountered Fact Patterns

Since C.P.L.R. 4548 makes third party access to e-mails or employee computers irrelevant in New York, only the remaining three Asia Global factors affect the attorney-client privilege. The presence of all three remaining factors to some degree evidences an intent to waive any privilege. 847 N.Y.S.2d at 447. This may not be true outside New York. See, e.g., Sims v. Lakeside School, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 69568 (W.D.Wash. 2007) (holding that e-mails sent from an employer-provided computer and an employer-provided e-mail account were privileged on public policy grounds). In order to provide guidance to practitioners applying New York, consider the following common scenarios.

Company e-mail policy forbids personal use of company e-mail and computers, but the company does not actively monitor its employees.

Beth Israel overlooked any distinction between policy and action, perhaps because the policy was so clear and unambiguous. A court may be more vigilant in this distinction with an ambiguous or halfhearted policy. Under such circumstance, employees may rightly claim a legitimate expectation of maintaining the confidentiality of e-mails. In Curto v. Medical World Communications, Inc., 388 F. Supp. 2d 101, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27088 (E.D.N.Y. 2006), the court upheld the privilege because the company failed to actively monitor. Curto involved a tepid employee e-mail policy where employees understand that [the employer] may use human or automated means to monitor use of computer resources, and an employer that only enforced the policy four times in very limited circumstances. The court noted that the lack of monitoring created a false sense of security which lulled employees into believing that the policy would not be enforced. Id., at 3 (internal quotations omitted). This lull created a reasonable expectation of privacy that allowed for the maintenance of the attorney-client privilege.

E-mails are sent using a personal e-mail account while using a company computer.

In Curto, the employee also took reasonable steps to safe guard the communications, including sending the e-mails through her personal AOL account. Id. Although the court considered other factors, sending e-mails through a web-based e-mail may protect attorney-client communications in New York, as web-based emails are not typically routed through an employer owned e-mail system. Sending e-mails through a personal e-mail account that is not web-based, such as using Microsoft Exchange to access a personal account, diminishes arguments for privilege.

This result is consistent with other jurisdictions. See, e.g., National Economic Research Associates, Inc. v. Evans, 2006 Mass. Super. LEXIS 371 (Mass. Supr. 2006), the employee communicated with his attorney while using a company computer and his personal, web-based and password-protected Yahoo account. The companys internet and e-mail policy that noted that a log may be kept of users network activities to monitor network usage did not put the employee on notice that screen shots of his e-mails would be logged and accessible by the company.

The policy exists but an employee claims that they were unaware of the email policy.

As shown in Beth Israel, this is in most circumstances a desperation argument at best. If the employee claims ignorance, the court will perform a fact-based analysis and impute actual or constructive knowledge as appropriate. In Long v. Marubeni America Corp., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 76594 (S.D.N.Y. 2006), the employee claimed that he did not violate the companys Electronic Communications Policy (ECP) when he sent e-mails to his attorney from a password-protected and employer-provided e-mail account. The court rejected the employees claim of ignorance, when he helped prepare the Employee Handbook that contained it. The Court found the e-mails were not privileged. Id., at 3.

Another claim of ignorance made by employees that has been rejected by courts is that the employee ignored flash-screen notices that required them to click yes on a screen displaying the ECP and a warning that the computer was subject to monitoring. See United States v. Etkin, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12834 (S.D.N.Y. 2008) (rejecting assertion of marital privilege for e-mails).

Attorney communicates with their client using encrypted e-mails and a companys e-mail system.

Encrypting e-mails enhances the arguments for the attorney-client privilege. Simply put, it is strong evidence of an employees desire to maintain confidentiality even if he is at the same time demonstrating his intent to contravene company policy. The confidentiality test focuses on the clients intent to impede their employers access. See Baptiste v. Cushman Wakefield, Inc. 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2579 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (finding that e-mail was maintained where the party came into possession of the communication as the result of improper conduct of another). Taking this additional affirmative step shows the intent of both attorney and client to maintain the confidentiality of the communication. Encrypting communications will not stop an employer from hacking the encrypted file, but this additional step would put the employer on par with a thief or eavesdropper, which does not destroy the privilege. Prink v. Rockefeller Center, Inc., 48 N.Y.2d 309, 315 n. 2, 398 N.E.2d 517, 520, 422 N.Y.S.2d 911, 915 (1979). Additionally, adding encryption protects the practitioner by conforming to the opinion of the New York Bar Committee on Professional and Judicial Ethics, which noted that:

it would be advisable for [practitioners] to advice its clients and prospective clients that the security of communications over the Internet is not equal to that of other forms of communication that are generally accepted as secure, such as the U.S. Mail, express delivery, or the telephone. This technologically developing area has attracted the attention of professional snoopers who can exploit sniffer software and powerful search engines to find messages of interest.

N.Y. Comm. Prof. & Judicial Eth., Formal Op. 1998-2 (1998); see also ABA Comm. On Ethics & Prof'l Responsibility, Formal Op. 99-413 (1999).

No ruling in New York has directly addressed the issue of an employee who encrypts communications and sends them using his employers e-mail system in derogation of an express and unambiguous policy preventing such encryption, but People v. Jiang, 131 Cal.App.4th 1027, 33 Cal.Rptr.3d 184 (Cal. Ct. App. 2005) provides the most germane law to analyze this issue. In Jiang, the prosecution attempted to discover files prepared by the defendant for his lawyer that pertained to a criminal trial and were protected by individual passwords created by the defendant. The companys computer policy stated: I have no expectation of privacy in any property owned by the company. . . . I further understand that such property, including voicemail and electronic mail, is subject to inspection by Company personnel at any time. Id., at 197-98. This policy is not iron-clad and the court noted that the policy did not bar employees from using company computers for personal matters. Accordingly, the courts analysis turned on whether the employee took best efforts to preserve the privilege and not on the specific wording of the policy. The court found that creating password-protection and placing the data in a folder called Attorney for the explicit purpose of protecting it from disclosure satisfied the burden imposed on the privilege claimant. Id., at 203. Adding this additional level of security does not guarantee the privilege, but it is recommended if e-mails are to be sent using a companys e-mail system.

A client communicates with his attorney via a password-protected, employer-provided e-mail account.

Using a password-protected, employer-provided e-mail will not protect privileged information from disclosure. In Long v. Marubeni America Corporation, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 76594 (S.D.N.Y. 2006), the Court found that that employees did not maintain confidentiality when they elected to use work computers to communicate with their attorney. The employees were aware of their employers electronic communications policy that allowed monitoring of all e-mails and prohibited the use of the system for personal purposes. The court rejected the employees claim that using private password-protected e-mail accounts to communicate with their attorney was sufficient to maintain confidentiality. Id., at 3.

If none of the Asia Global Factors are satisfied:

If none of the factors can be satisfied, the communications are privileged. See In re Asia Global, 322 B.R. at 259-61. In Global, the record before the court was insufficient to conclude that Asia Global employees use of the e-mail system waived the attorney-client privilege. Id., at 261. The Court was unable to determine if the company had an electronic communications policy or if the company monitored its employees computer use. Since the court was only able to determine that the employees sent e-mails and they were stored on the company server, the court could not find waiver of the attorney-client privilege. Id., at 253.

Recommendations

The consequences of waiver can be far-reaching extending not only to disputes between employer and employee but to all litigants who use their employers e-mail system improperly to communicate with their attorney for non-work related matters.

Practitioners should counsel employers to:

- (1) establish or review their electronic communications and computer usage policies to ensure they clearly notify employees that their private use of the employer provided system is monitored;
- (2) introduce click-through screens that display their electronic communications policy whenever an employee logs in;

(3) include an electronic communication policy in all employee handbooks distributed to employees and require all employees to give written notification that they are aware of, and will comply with, the policy;

(4) enforce electronic communications policies by actually monitoring employee Internet usage and e-mails on a regular basis.

Practitioners should counsel their clients to:

(1) never communicate with personal attorneys over an employer provided e-mail address;

(2) use a web-based, password-protected e-mail, such as g-mail or yahoo, if they must communicate with personal attorneys while using a company issued computer;

(3) employ encryption software if forced to communicate with their clients to their work e-mails. (Preferably, an employee should never communicate with their attorney while at work.)

Practitioners should consider the following for themselves:

(1) train junior attorneys at your firm about the perils of communicating with a client by e-mail;

(2) avoid use of e-mail all-together for certain peculiarly sensitive communications;

(3) insert in the subject line Privileged attorney client privilege and confidential work product or facsimile. This wont save a privilege but might ensure the document is not inadvertently turned over during document production;

(4) demand disclosure of the domain name addresses for e-mails identified on a privilege log. Where the litigant uses a work e-mail address to litigate a non-work matter including personal and unrelated business claims, seek discovery (including subpoena to the employer if applicable) of the litigants employers e-mail policy and practices to undertake the Beth Israel analysis.

For additional discussion of Privilege Issues in E-discovery under New York Law, see Marjorie A. Shields, Application of Attorney-Client Privilege to Electronic Documents, 26 A.L.R. 287 (2007); John Gergacz, Employees Use of Employer Computers to Communicate with Their Own Attorneys and the Attorney-Client Privilege, 10 Comp. L. Rev. & Tech. J. 269, 276 (2007) (most thorough analysis of e-mail and attorney-client privilege); Elise M. Bloom, Ownership of E-mail is Not Clear Employees Retain Some Rights Over Confidential Writing Sent From Work, 30 Nat'l L.J. 18, S1 (2008) (Analysis of In re Asia Global factors); Paul H. Aloe, Scott Is Dire Warning About E-mail Communications, 238 N.Y. L.J. 4 (2007) (criticism of and arguments against Beth Israel); John K. Villa, Emails Between Employees and Their Attorneys Using Company Computers: Are They Still Privileged?, 26 NO. 3 ACC Docket 102 (2008) (additional counter arguments against Beth Israel and practice suggestions); Audrey Jordan, Note, Does Unencrypted E-mail Protect Client Confidentiality?, 27 Am. J. Trial Advoc. 623 (Spring 2004) (discussion of encryption).

For application of Privilege Issues in E-discovery outside of New York, see City of Reno v. Reno Police Protective Assn, 118 Nev. 889, 59 P.3d 1212 (Nev., 2002) (government documents sent over e-mail are still privileged because the disclosure policy was not meant to effect them); Geer v. Gilman Corp, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38852 (D.Conn. 2007) (attorney-client communications remained privileged when reviewed by boyfriend because plaintiff requested they remain confidential and took active steps to ensure confidentiality); Ball v. Versar, Inc., 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24351 (S.D.Ind. 2005) (finding waiver of privilege extended to all work and home computer systems known to have been used by plaintiff).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Kyle C. Bisceglie, a Partner at Olshan Grundman Frome Rosenzweig & Wolosky LLP in New York City, counsels corporations, partnerships, and individuals with respect to complex commercial litigation, Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR), contracts, business advice and litigation avoidance. He has tried numerous cases without loss and has been involved in litigations, arbitrations, mediations and settlement negotiations. He also serves as general counsel to various entrepreneurial ventures and businesses in technology infrastructure, advertising, event production, dental and medical instruments, insurance, chemical distribution, fashion and consulting fields. Mr. Bisceglie has complex litigation experience in a variety areas including commercial, financial, insurance, employment, race and sex discrimination, harassment and retaliation, copyright and trademark, defamation, and business tort. He has participated in the investigation of the worldwide derivatives trading practices of a New York based merchant bank, representation of US policyholders in the largest insurance insolvency in North American history, and coordination of negotiation over and litigation for the transfer of a major beverage and spirit company's most valuable brand. Mr. Bisceglie also spent five years in the litigation department of Cadwalader, Wickersham and Taft; two years trying cases as an assistant prosecutor; and one year as a law clerk to Judge Alfred M. Wolin, United States District Court for the District of New Jersey. He can be reached by phone at 212-451-2207 or by email at Kbisceglie@olshanlaw.com.

79 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Dismissal Under Rule 19(b): Vairo on Republic of the Philippines v. Pimentel

2008 Emerging Issues 2121

Dismissal Under Rule 19(b): Vairo on Republic of the Philippines v. Pimentel

By Georgene Vairo

August 7, 2008

SUMMARY: In Republic of Philippines v. Pimentel, the United States Supreme Court faced the question of whether under Civil Rule 19 (Required Joinder of Parties), a court must dismiss an interpleader action involving a foreign country that has successfully claimed sovereign immunity. This commentary, by Moores Federal Practice Editorial Board member Georgene Vairo, analyzes the Supreme Courts decision to direct a dismissal under Rule 19.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Vairo, Georgene. "Republic of the Philippines v. Pimentel" LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 19 (Required Joinder of Parties") is dense and difficult to apply. I see a sense of dread in my students faces when I begin to cover it in my Civil Procedure class. I tell them to relax because Rule 19, though not infrequently invoked in motions to dismiss, rarely results in dismissal. After Republic of the Philippines v. Pimentel, -- U.S. --, 128 S. Ct. 2180, 171 L. Ed. 2d 131, 2008 U.S. LEXIS 4889, 76 U.S.L.W. 4445 (June 12, 2008), that may no longer be true. Pimentel is the United States Supreme Courts first major explication of the workings of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 19 since its 40 year old seminal decision on that rule in Provident Tradesmens Bank & Trust Co. v. Patterson, 390 U.S. 102, 111, 88 S. Ct. 733, 19 L. Ed. 2d 936 (1968), and its almost 20 year old decision in Temple v. Synthes Corp., 498 U.S. 5, 111 S. Ct. 315, 112 L. Ed. 2d 263 (1990).

Pimentel is important for several reasons. First, unlike Provident Tradesmens and Temple, where the Supreme Court vacated a dismissal under Rule 19, the Court in Pimentel directed a dismissal based on Rule 19. Second, because the action involved the question whether a lawsuit could proceed with absent required foreign sovereign parties, and the operation of the Alien Tort Claims Statute, the decision is significant apart from the Rule 19 analysis. Third, Pimentel is significant because the Rule 19 issue arose in the context of an interpleader action under 28 U.S.C. § 1335.

In Pimentel, the Supreme Court held that the Ninth Circuit gave insufficient weight to the foreign sovereign status of two claimants in an interpleader action who had been joined but then asserted their sovereign immunity and were dismissed from the action. The Court reversed the Ninth Circuits holding that the interpleader action could proceed without the sovereign claimants.

Background. The case before the Court was an interpleader action that arose out of the Ferdinand E. Marcos Human Rights Litigation. It concerned an attempt by the class of human rights victims in the litigation (the Pimentel class) to collect a portion of an almost $2 billion judgment awarded in 1995 to the class and affirmed as a final judgment on appeal in 1996. The class victims were tortured, disappeared, or summarily executed during the 1972-86 martial law regime of former President Marcos in the Philippines. The case was brought pursuant to the Alien Tort Statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1350, and the Torture Victim Protection Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1350 (note). The judgment collection process proved to be difficult. In the interpleader action, the class was awarded the assets from a Merrill Lynch Account (Arelma assets) established by Marcos in 1972.

Merrill Lynch commenced the interpleader action to determine the ownership of the Arelma assets that were allegedly stolen by Marcos when he was the President of the Republic of the Philippines. Facing claims from various Marcos creditors, including the Pimentel class, Merrill Lynch filed the interpleader action, under 28 U.S.C. § 1335, naming, among the defendants, the Republic, the Philippine Presidential Commission on Good Governance, Arelma, the Philippine National Bank (PNB), and the Pimentel class. The Philippine Presidential Commission was created to recover any property wrongfully taken by Marcos. The Philippine National Bank (PNB) held some of the disputed assets in escrow, awaiting the outcome of pending litigation in the Sandiganbayan, a Philippine court determining whether Marcos' property should be forfeited to the Republic.

Two entities interpleaded by Merrill Lynch invoked sovereign immunity: the Republic and the Commission. They were dismissed, and the interpleader action proceeded to judgment over their objection that they were Rule 19(b) indispensable parties" in whose absence the litigation could not proceed. The district court held that the action could proceed in the absence of the two entities, and the Ninth Circuit agreed, stating, among other reasons, that the two entities could not prevail on the merits of their claims. The Supreme Court granted certiorari.

Appealability and Standing Issues. The Court began by dealing with the questions it asked the parties to address when it granted certiorari: whether the Republic and the Commission, having been dismissed from the interpleader action, had the right to appeal the District Court's determination under Rule 19 that the action could proceed in their absence, and whether they had the right to seek the Court's review of the Court of Appeals' judgment affirming the District Court.

The Pimentel class -- beneficiaries of the interpleader judgment that they owned the assets in issue -- had contended that the Republic and the Commission, having been dismissed from the action on sovereign immunity grounds, were not proper parties in the Court of Appeals or in the Supreme Court. However, the Court ended up not ruling on that issue because it found that other parties before it, Arelma and PNB, also had sought review of the Ninth Circuit's decision. They, too, moved to dismiss the action under Rule 19(b), had appealed from the denial of their motion, and were petitioners before the Court. The Court reiterated the general rule that any party may move to dismiss an action under Rule 19(b). Additionally, any court with proper jurisdiction may consider sua sponte the absence of a required person and dismiss for failure to join.

The Court rejected the Pimentel class's argument that Arelma and PNB lacked standing to raise the issue whether the action could proceed in the absence of the Republic and the Commission. The Pimentel class argued that because Arelma and PNB lost on the merits of their underlying claims to the interpleaded assets, and failed to petition for certiorari on that merits ruling, they abandoned any entitlement to the interpleaded assets and therefore lacked a concrete stake in the outcome of further proceedings. The Court rejected the argument because dismissal of the action under Rule 19(b) would have benefited Arelma and PNB by vacating the judgment denying them the interpleaded assets. The Court stated that a party that seeks to have a judgment vacated in its entirety on procedural grounds does not lose standing simply because the party does not petition for certiorari on the substance of the order."

Comment. It is interesting that the Court did not resolve the question it presented to the parties. It would seem that the very parties who would be prejudiced if they were not able to appeal the Rule 19 determination should have the right to appeal. However, because they could not be bound by the interpleader action, arguably they ought not have the right to appeal. This is an important issue because it is not always true that the existing parties will have an incentive to pursue a Rule 19 issue. See Moores Federal Practice § 19.02[4][d].

Persons Required To Be Joined Under Rule 19. The Court then turned to the question whether Merrill Lynchs interpleader action could proceed in the district court without the Republic and the Commission. The Court articulated the three-step process called for under Rule 19. First, under Rule 19(a), a court must determine whether certain persons are required to be joined if feasible." None of the parties disputed that the Republic and the Commission were required to be joined -- so-called necessary parties." They were required to be joined if feasible because without them as parties, their interests in the interpleader action were not protected [see Fed. R. Civ. P. 19(a)(1)(B)(i)].

Second, and the problem in Merrill Lynchs action, was that such parties could be joined only if feasible. Here, Merrill Lynch did join them, but they were dismissed on sovereign immunity grounds. In other words, had they not been joined initially as parties, it would not have been feasible to join them if they raised the sovereign immunity defense. Third, however, nonjoinder even of a required person does not necessarily result in dismissal under Rule 19. When joinder is not feasible, under Rule 19(b), the court must determine whether, in equity and good conscience, the action should proceed among the existing parties or should be dismissed because such parties are so-called indispensable" parties. Rule 19(b) sets out four non-exclusive factors that govern this determination. The design of the rule, the Court said, indicates that the determination whether to proceed will turn on factors that are case-specific, which is consistent with a rule based on equitable considerations.

Comment. Before Rule 19 was amended in 1966, the rule used the terms necessary" and indispensable." The Court therefore was correct to point out that earlier versions of the rule, particularly the use of the word indispensable," could imply a rigidity that would be in tension with this case-specific approach." Also, as the Court put it, the use of the word indispensable" in the rule created a verbal anomaly of an indispensable person who turns out to be dispensable after all. (See Provident Tradesmens, 390 U.S. at 117.) However, the three-step process envisioned even after the 1966 amendments leaves a similar anomaly -- Required persons may turn out not to be required for the action to proceed after all." To put it another way, required" or indispensable" is a conclusion reached only after the three-step process is completed.

Ninth Circuit Improperly Decided the Merits And Did Not Give Proper Weight to The Assertion of Sovereign Immunity. Before working its way through the Rule 19 analysis, the Supreme Court emphasized the importance of sovereign immunity in the context of the interpleader action. In affirming the district courts refusal to dismiss the case under Rule 19, the Ninth Circuit had in effect decided the merits of the two sovereign entities' claims to the disputed assets. According to the Supreme Court, however, once it was recognized that those claims were not frivolous, it was error for the Ninth Circuit to address the claims on their merits when the entities had been granted sovereign immunity. The consideration of the merits was itself an infringement on foreign sovereign immunity. The bottom line of the Supreme Courts decision is that the Ninth Circuit thus erred in not giving the necessary weight to the absent entities' assertion of sovereign immunity in its Rule 19 analysis.

The doctrine of foreign sovereign immunity, the Court stated, has been recognized since early in the history of our nation, and is designed to give foreign states and their instrumentalities some protection from the inconvenience of suit. The privilege is codified in the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (28 U.S.C. §§ 1330, 16021611). Immunity in the present case was uncontested, and the district court had correctly dismissed the two entities on this ground.

The Court continued that giving full effect to sovereign immunity promotes comity interests. Comity and dignity interests take concrete form in this case. The claims of the Republic and the Commission arise from events of historical and political significance for the Republic and its people. The Republic and the Commission have a unique interest in resolving the ownership of or claims to the Arelma assets and in determining if, and how, the assets should be used to compensate those persons who suffered grievous injury under Marcos. There is a comity interest in allowing a foreign state to use its own courts for a dispute if it has a right to do so. The dignity of a foreign state is not enhanced if other nations bypass its courts without right or good cause. Then, too, there is the more specific affront that could result to the Republic and the Commission if property they claim is seized by the decree of a foreign court."

Accordingly, when sovereign immunity is asserted, and the claims of the sovereign are not frivolous, dismissal of the action must be ordered when there is a potential for injury to the interests of the absent sovereign. In a case in which a person asserts frivolous claims, a court may have leeway under both Rule 19(a)(1), defining required parties, and Rule 19(b), addressing when a suit may go forward nonetheless, to disregard the frivolous claim. Here, however, the claims of the absent entities were not frivolous, and the Ninth Circuit should not have proceeded on the premise that those claims would be determined against the sovereign entities that asserted immunity.

Comment. The Court is undoubtedly correct about the importance of protecting the interests underlying the doctrine of sovereign immunity. What is curious, however, and as the partial dissent of Justice Stevens points out, the Court has elevated its importance to the detriment of a proper Rule 19 analysis. When Rule 19 was amended in 1966, the point was to allow for a more flexible and case-specific analysis rather than pigeon-hole certain types of cases as more or less requiring the joinder of absent parties, the 1966 amendments were designed to allow the district court to balance all relevant factors in its determination. The elevation of sovereign immunity as above all other factors is not consistent with that approach.

Justice Stevens, concurring in part and dissenting in part, agreed with Justice Kennedy who wrote the majority opinion, that the Court had jurisdiction and agreed that the Court should not affirm the Ninth Circuit's judgment on the merits of its Rule 19 analysis. He agreed that the courts below erred by concluding that the New York statute of limitations provided a virtually insuperable obstacle to petitioners' recovery of the Arelma, S. A., assets. He therefore agreed that the Court should reverse. But, he wrote that the appropriate disposition of this case would have been to reverse and remand for further proceedings. He was troubled by the majority opinion which in effect gave near-dispositive effect" to the Republics and the Commissions status as sovereign entities, as the Court did by ordering outright dismissal of the case.

He then explained how the Court could engage in flexible, case-specific Rule 19 analysis. For example, he stated that the Ninth Circuit could either order the district court to stay further proceedings pending a reasonably prompt decision of the a related Philippine proceeding, or order the case reassigned to a different district judge to conduct further proceedings. He noted the risk of unfairness in conducting any proceedings without the participation of the Republic and the Commission, but that they could avoid any risk by waiving their sovereign immunity. Indeed, the record provided a basis for believing that they would do so if the case proceeded before a different judge.

First, the Republic did not invoke its sovereign immunity until after the District Court denied its motion seeking dismissal or transfer for improper venue, dismissal on act of state grounds, or recusal of the district judge. The Republic advanced a factual basis for suspecting that the district judge would likely have substantial difficulty in putting out of his or her mind previously-expressed views." For example, the district judge summoned an attorney representing Merrill Lynch to a meeting in chambers after learning that the Republic and the Commission sought to obtain the Arelma funds from Merrill Lynch. At this meeting, the district judge directed Merrill Lynch to file an interpleader action before him in the District of Hawaii and to deposit the Arelma funds with the court, despite the attorney's argument that New York would likely be the more appropriate forum. After Merrill Lynch filed the interpleader action, the district judge sealed the file, making it difficult for other parties to determine the status of the proceedings. According to Justice Stevens, these actions bespeak a level of personal involvement and desire to control the Marcos proceedings" that supported the Republic and the Commission's concern about the district judge's impartiality.

Further, Justice Stevens noted several case-specific facts suggesting that the Republic and the Commission's sovereign interests should be given less weight than in the ordinary case. First, the Republic and the Commission at some point would have to take steps in United States courts (or possibly invoke the assistance of the Attorney General) to recover the assets held in the United States. In other words, the sovereign interest implicated in the Marcos litigation is not of the same magnitude as when a sovereign faces liability: the Republic's interest is in choosing the most convenient venue and time for the suit to proceed."

Second, for decades, the Republic had participated in other proceedings involving Marcos' assets in United States courts without invoking sovereign immunity. Indeed, in 1987 the Republic had filed an amicus brief with the Ninth Circuit in the underlying consolidated class action that led to the entry of respondents' judgment against Marcos urging the Ninth Circuit to reverse the district judge's dismissal of two of the cases and to allow the Plaintiffs in those two cases to present their evidence of gross human rights violations against Ferdinand Marcos and to pursue justice in U.S. District Court." Thus, either the Republic was encouraging futile and purely symbolic litigation, or the Republic believed that other creditors would have access to at least a portion of Marcos' vast assets."

How Merits Might Matter. Rule 19 cannot be applied in a vacuum, the Court also stated, and it may require some preliminary assessment of the merits of certain claims. For example, Rule 19 directs a court, in determining who is a required person, to consider whether complete relief can be afforded in that person's absence (see Fed. R. Civ. P. 19(a)(1)(A)). Similarly, in the Rule 19(b) inquiry, a court must examine, to some extent, the claims presented and the interests likely to be asserted both by the joined parties and the absent entities or persons. Here, however, it was improper to issue a definitive holding regarding a nonfrivolous, substantive claim made by an absent, required entity that was entitled by its sovereign status to immunity from suit. That privilege, the Court said, is much diminished if an important and consequential ruling affecting the sovereign's substantial interest is determined, or at least assumed, by a federal court in the sovereign's absence and over its objection.

Comment. There seems to be a trend toward conflating the merits of a litigation with procedure. In the class action context, for example, over the last several years, courts have begun to incorporate a merits analysis into their decision whether a class may be certified. (See 5 Moores Federal Practice § 23.84.) Here, however, we see the opposite result the merits are not to matter so long as they are non-frivolous.

Application of Rule 19(b) Factors. Once a court has determined that a party is required to be joined, but it is not feasible to join the party, the court must look to the factors in Rule 19(b) to determine whether the action may proceed in the absence of the party or be dismissed. According to the Court, the Ninth Circuit's failure to give proper weight to the two entities' sovereign immunity most directly implicated Rule 19(b)'s first factor, which directs a court to consider the extent to which a judgment rendered in the person's absence might prejudice that person or the existing parties. As to the second Rule 19(b) factor -- the extent to which any prejudice could be lessened or avoided by relief or measures other than dismissal -- there was no substantial argument to allow the action to proceed. No alternative remedies or forms of relief had been proposed.

As to the third Rule 19(b) factor -- whether a judgment rendered without the absent party would be adequate -- the Ninth Circuit had understood adequacy "to refer to satisfaction of the remaining parties' claims. However, according to the Court, adequacy refers to the social interest in the efficient administration of justice and the avoidance of multiple litigation. This interest has traditionally been thought to support compulsory joinder of absent and potentially adverse claimants. Going forward with the action without the Republic and the Commission would not further the public interest in settling the dispute as a whole because the Republic and the Commission would not be bound by the judgment.

Finally, with respect to the fourth Rule 19(b) factor -- whether the plaintiff would have an adequate remedy if the action were dismissed -- the Ninth Circuit considered the lack of an alternative forum for some of the other claimants should the action be dismissed. However, in an interpleader action the plaintiff is the stakeholder. As a practical matter, dismissal could protect the stakeholder in some respects. While it would not receive a judgment determining the party entitled to the assets, it was likely that in any later suit it could seek to join the Republic and the Commission and have the action dismissed (again) under Rule 19(b) should they again assert sovereign immunity. Dismissal for nonjoinder to some extent would serve the purpose of interpleader, which is to prevent a stakeholder from having to pay two or more parties for one claim.

The Court concluded by noting that any prejudice to the stakeholder was outweighed by prejudice to the absent entities invoking sovereign immunity. Dismissal under Rule 19(b) may mean, in some instances, that plaintiffs will be left without a forum, but that result is contemplated under the doctrine of foreign sovereign immunity.

Comment. This analysis, of course, puts Merrill Lynch between the proverbial rock and the hard place. The purpose of interpleader is to put to rest any claim to the property in question. If the interpleader action cannot go forward because some parties cannot be joined, then Merrill Lynch could be open to multiple litigation over the same property and the possibility of inconsistent judgments C giving the property to the Pimentel class or to the Republic and Commission. There is no certainty that there ever would be one forum for resolution of the property dispute. Merrill Lynch would be subject to the possibility of perpetual litigation. The Courts ruling under Rule 19 is therefore at odds with the purpose of interpleader under 28 U.S.C. § 1335. Congress enacted § 1335 to solve the jurisdictional problems -- subject matter and personal -- that often made it difficult for a stakeholder to resolve all claims to particular property. The interpleader statute allows for nationwide service of process and minimal diversity and a small amount in controversy ($500) to provide a federal forum for resolving property disputes such as the one confronting Merrill Lynch.

Finally, the Courts opinion shows its ambivalence to human rights litigation. The Alien Tort Claims statute continues to be used against governments, corporations and individuals. Many such cases are dismissed on forum non conveniens grounds; others because the plaintiffs fail to state a cognizable claim against one or more defendants. Yet, sometimes, as in this case, a plaintiff or plaintiff class is successful in obtaining a judgment. Pimentel shows that obtaining a judgment is not the same as collecting on it. Maybe there is something to Justice Stevens comment that human rights litigation is simply symbolic.

RELATED LINKS: See Moore's Federal Practice for additional discussion:

- 4 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 19.05;
- 4 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 22.04

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporations Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

80 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Virtual Representation Theory: Georgene Vairo on Taylor v. Sturgell

2008 Emerging Issues 2106

Virtual Representation Theory: Georgene Vairo on Taylor v. Sturgell

By Georgene Vairo

August 6, 2008

SUMMARY: In Taylor v. Sturgell, the United States Supreme Court rejected the emerging use of the virtual representation theory as a basis for applying claim preclusion or issue preclusion against a litigant who was not a party to the earlier judgment. This commentary, by Moores Federal Practice Editorial Board member Georgene Vairo, analyzes the Taylor opinion in the context of the Courts historic protection of the day-in-court principle.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Vairo, Georgene. "Taylor v. Sturgell" LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

In Taylor v. Sturgell, -- U.S. --, 128 S. Ct. 2161, 76 L. Ed. 2d 155, 2008 U.S. LEXIS 4885, 76 U.S.L.W. 4453 (June 12, 2008), the Supreme Court unanimously interred the emerging use of the virtual representation" theory as a basis for applying claim preclusion or issue preclusion against a litigant who was not a party to the earlier judgment. The Court reversed the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals decision articulating the theory and setting out the factors and analysis to be used when relying on the virtual representation exception. Justice Ginsburgs opinion is a mini-treatise on preclusion that thoroughly explores the general rule against binding nonparties and the evolution of various theories creating exceptions to that rule. The opinion seeks to draw a bright line that clarifies the limited situations when a nonparty is bound by an earlier judgment.

Facts. Greg Herrick, an antique aircraft enthusiast seeking to restore a vintage airplane manufactured by the Fairchild Engine and Airplane Corporation (FEAC), filed a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request seeking copies of technical documents related to the airplane from the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA). The FAA denied his request based on FOIA's exemption for trade secrets, see 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4). Herrick took an administrative appeal, but when respondent Fairchild, FEAC's successor, objected to the documents' release, the FAA again denied the request. Herrick then filed an unsuccessful FOIA lawsuit to secure the documents.

Less than a month later, Taylor, Herrick's friend and also an antique aircraft enthusiast, made a FOIA request for the same documents Herrick had unsuccessfully sued to obtain. When the FAA failed to respond, Taylor filed suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. Holding the suit barred by claim preclusion, the district court granted summary judgment to the FAA and to Fairchild, as intervenor in Taylor's action. The court acknowledged that although Taylor was not a party to Herrick's suit, a nonparty may be bound by a judgment if she was virtually represented" by a party. The D.C. Circuit affirmed, announcing a five-factor test for virtual representation." The first two factors of the D.C. Circuit's test "identity of interests" and "adequate representation" -- are necessary but not sufficient for virtual representation. In addition, at least one of three other factors must be established: a close relationship between the present party and his putative representative," substantial participation by the present party in the first case," or tactical maneuvering on the part of the present party to avoid preclusion by the prior judgment."

The D.C. Circuit acknowledged the absence of any indication that Taylor participated in, or even had notice of, Herrick's suit. It nonetheless found the "identity of interests," "adequate representation," and "close relationship" factors satisfied because the two men sought release of the same documents, were close associates," had discussed working together to restore Herrick's plane, and had used the same lawyer to pursue their suits. Because these conditions sufficed to establish virtual representation, the court left open the question whether Taylor had engaged in tactical maneuvering to avoid preclusion.

General Rule Against Nonparty Preclusion. Justice Ginsburg began by reiterating that the application of claim and issue preclusion to nonparties runs up against the deep-rooted historic tradition that everyone should have his own day in court." Thus, she began her opinion by quoting the general rule: It is a principle of general application in Anglo-American jurisprudence that one is not bound by a judgment in personam in a litigation in which he is not designated as a party or to which he has not been made a party by service of process." [Quoting Hansberry v. Lee, 311 U.S. 32, 40, 61 S. Ct. 115, 85 L. Ed. 22 (1940)].

Comment. The manner in which Justice Ginsburg began the opinion was a wonderful predictor of what the Court would do with the virtual representation doctrine. The Supreme Court has closely guarded the idea that everyone should have his or her own day in court. Indeed, Justices to the left on the Court, such as Justice Ginsburg herself, and to the right, such as Justice Scalia, have been equally firm in protecting the day-in-court principle despite concerns about finality and efficiency. In this sense, the Taylor opinion can be seen as a twin to Justice Ginsburg's opinion in Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 117 S. Ct. 2231, 138 L. Ed. 2d 689 (1997), in which she, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist, and Justices Scalia, Thomas, Kennedy and Souter, vacated the class action settlement that could have largely ended the asbestos litigation chiefly because of conflicts among class members that resulted in inadequate representation of the class. Similarly, in Dow Chemical Co. v. Stephenson, 539 U.S. 111, 123 S. Ct. 2161, 156 L. Ed. 2d 106 (2003), an equally divided court affirmed a Second Circuit case overturning a district court opinion in the Agent Orange litigation that would have barred non-military class members from collaterally attacking the Agent Orange Settlement, also on the grounds of inadequate representation. From these cases, it is clear that the Court will continue to adhere to a formalistic protection of the right to a day in court.

Preclusion Doctrines. The Court began its analysis by noting that the preclusive effect of a federal court judgment is determined by federal common law [Semtek Intl Inc. v. Lockheed Martin Corp., 531 U.S. 497, 507508, 121 S. Ct. 1021, 149 L. Ed. 2d 32 (2001)], discussed in Apr. 2001 MOORES FEDERAL PRACTICE UPDATE, p. 43]. A judgment may result in claim preclusion or issue preclusion, alternatively referred to as res judicata and collateral estoppel." Under the doctrine of claim preclusion, a final judgment forecloses successive litigation of the same claim, whether or not relitigation of the claim raises the same issues as the earlier suit. Issue preclusion, in contrast, bars successive litigation of an issue actually litigated and resolved in a valid court determination essential to the prior judgment, even if the issue recurs in the context of a different claim. Together, these doctrines preclude parties from contesting matters that they have had a full and fair opportunity to litigate. But, as stated above, the general rule is that parties, not nonparties, are precluded. However, the Court noted that there are limited exceptions to the general rule.

Exceptions to General Rule. The Court grouped the exceptions into six categories:

. First, a person who agrees to be bound by the determination of issues in an action between others is bound in accordance with the terms of his or her agreement [see Restatement (Second) of Judgments § 40].

. Second, nonparty preclusion may be justified based on a pre-existing substantive legal relationship between the person to be bound and a party to the judgment. Qualifying relationships include: preceding and succeeding owners of property, bailee and bailor, and assignee and assignor [see Restatement (Second) of Judgments §§ 43-44, 52, 55].

. Third, in certain limited circumstances, a nonparty may be bound by a judgment because he or she was adequately represented by someone with the same interests who was a party to the suit. Representative suits with preclusive effect on nonparties include properly conducted class actions, and suits brought by trustees, guardians, and other fiduciaries.

. Fourth, a nonparty is bound by a judgment if he or she assumed control over the litigation in which that judgment was rendered; because such a person has had the opportunity to present proofs and argument, he or she has already had his or her day in court, despite not being a formal party to the litigation.

. Fifth, preclusion is applicable when a person who did not participate in a litigation later brings suit as the designated representative of a person who was a party to the prior adjudication. A party bound by a judgment may not avoid its preclusive force by relitigating through a proxy. Similarly, the Supreme Court in this case noted that preclusion is appropriate when a nonparty later brings suit as an agent for a party who is bound by a judgment.

. Sixth, in certain circumstances a special statutory scheme may expressly foreclose successive litigation by nonlitigants if the scheme is otherwise consistent with due process. Examples of such schemes include bankruptcy and probate proceedings, and quo warranto actions or other suits that may be brought only on behalf of the public at large.

Supreme Court Rejects Virtual Representation. In addition to the six foregoing exceptions to the general rule against nonparty preclusion, some lower courts, including the District of Columbia Circuit in this case, have recognized a virtual representation" exception [see Taylor v. Blakey, 490 F.3d 965 (D.C. Cir. 2007); see also Tyus v. Schoemehl, 93 F.3d 449 (8th Cir. 1996); Kourtis v. Cameron, 419 F.3d 989 (9th Cir. 2005)]. The Supreme Court in Taylor unanimously rejected the use of the virtual representation doctrine to bind a nonparty to a judgment in circumstances that do not fit within one of the six established categories of exceptions to the general rule against nonparty preclusion.

The Court expressly rejected an argument that preclusion is appropriate as a result of virtual representation" whenever an equitable and fact-intensive balancing test establishes that the relationship between a party and a nonparty is close enough to bring the nonparty within the judgment. The Court explained that, because of the fundamental nature of the general rule against nonparty preclusion, it has delineated only a few discrete exceptions that apply in limited circumstances.

The Court also explained that a broad doctrine of virtual representation should be rejected because of the limitations on nonparty preclusion based on adequate representation (the third established exception to the general rule against nonparty preclusion). A party's representation of a nonparty is adequate for preclusion purposes only if, at a minimum: (1) the interests of the nonparty and his or her representative are aligned; and (2) either the party understood himself or herself to be acting in a representative capacity, or the original court took care to protect the interests of the nonparty. In addition, adequate representation sometimes requires (3) notice of the original suit to the persons alleged to have been represented. In the class-action context, these limitations are implemented by the procedural safeguards contained in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23.

The Court was concerned that an expansive doctrine of virtual representation would effectively recognize a common-law class action, with preclusion based on identity of interests and some kind of relationship between parties and nonparties, but without the procedural protections provided by Rule 23. These protections, grounded in due process, could be circumvented if the Court were to approve a virtual representation doctrine that allowed courts to create such de facto class actions.

The Court also noted that a broad balancing test under a doctrine of virtual representation would significantly complicate the task of district courts faced with preclusion issues. Given that preclusion doctrine is intended to reduce the burden on courts and litigants, the Court's clear, specific criteria for preclusion are preferable to the all-things-considered balancing approach that would be required under the virtual representation doctrine.

Finally, the Court rejected a contention that nonparty preclusion should apply more broadly in public-law" litigation than in private-law" litigation. The Supreme Court acknowledged that Congress could adopt procedures limiting repetitive litigation of claims that can be brought on behalf of the public at large. However, Congress had not done so in the statutory scheme involved in this case, the Freedom of Information Act [see 5 U.S.C. § 552], and the Court found that the absence of statutory constraints on successive actions weighed against the imposition of such constraints through extraordinary application of the common law of preclusion. The Court also noted that, to the extent that there is a risk of repetitive lawsuits under legislation like the Freedom of Information Act, stare decisis will allow courts swiftly to dispose of such suits brought in the same circuit. The Court also stated that the human tendency not to waste money will deter the bringing of suits based on claims or issues that have already been adversely determined against others [quoting D. Shapiro, Civil Procedure: Preclusion in Civil Actions 97 (2001)].

Comment. The amorphous balancing test required by the D.C. Circuits virtual representation doctrine clearly is at odds with the Courts protection of due process and day-in-court values in general, and with its constrained approach to nonparty preclusion, in particular. Darwinian evolution of preclusion doctrine is dead. The Court adhered to a formalistic approach despite knowing that it was sacrificing the competing finality principle. A purist will agree that protecting constitutional rights is more important than achieving peace. However, the Court did leave a crack in the door that is likely to result in contentious litigation in the future.

Although the Court disapproved the theory of virtual representation, and held that the preclusive effects of a judgment in a federal question case decided by a federal court should instead be determined according to the six established grounds for nonparty preclusion, the Court opined that its decision is unlikely to cause a great shift in actual practice. It noted that many lower-court opinions that appeared to be decided on virtual representation grounds are at least arguably defensible on one of the six established grounds. Indeed, the Court found that preclusion might have been appropriate under the fifth established ground --that a nonparty to the prior litigation brought the present suit as a representative or agent of a party who is bound by the prior adjudication. Because this question had not been adjudicated below, the Court remanded for the lower courts to consider whether the present plaintiff was acting as the agent of the plaintiff in the previous suit. The Court instructed that on remand, the defendant would bear the burden of proving the agency relationship, because preclusion is an affirmative defense.

The problem here is that an inquiry into whether there has been tactical maneuvering is at odds with the Courts overall approach of looking at the exceptions to the general rule rigidly and formalistically. Fortunately the Court has set the bar for such a finding rather high, stating that the lower courts should be cautious about finding preclusion on the basis of agency. The Court states that a mere whiff of tactical maneuvering" will not suffice; instead, principles of agency law indicate that preclusion is appropriate only if the putative agent's conduct of the suit is subject to the control of the party who is bound by the prior adjudication. Despite this admonition, it will be interesting to see how the caselaw on this point evolves.

References. 18 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) §§ 131.40[3][e][i][B], 132.04[1][b][vi].

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporations Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

81 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Joe McDonnell on Petraski v. Thedos

2008 Emerging Issues 2859

Joe McDonnell on Petraski v. Thedos, 2008 Ill. App. LEXIS 169 (Ill. App. Ct. 2008)

By Joseph B. McDonnell

August 4, 2008

SUMMARY: The admissibility of evidence of intoxication has troubled Illinois trial lawyers and judges for years. If a pharmacist testifies as an expert witness that plaintiffs blood-alcohol level was over the presumptive limit of intoxication at the time of the accident, but cant state that she was intoxicated -- is the evidence admissible? This commentary, written by Joe McDonnell, explores Petraski v. Thedos, and the answer to that question.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Background. The admissibility of evidence of intoxication has troubled Illinois trial lawyers and judges for years. The general rule is that a partys consumption of alcohol prior to the occurrence in question is inadmissible in the absence of evidence, lay or expert, that the person was intoxicated. Thus, innuendos of intoxication, or evidence of drinking unsupported by evidence of actual intoxication, are impermissible. Benuska v. Dahl, 87 Ill.App.3d 911 (1980). There must be a showing that the alcohol impaired the partys mental and physical faculties. Clay v. McCarthy, 73 Ill.App.3d 462, 466 (1979). It must be shown that the intoxication resulted in an impairment of mental or physical abilities and a corresponding diminution in the ability to act with ordinary care. Marshall v. Osborn, 213 Ill.App.3d 134 (1991). Unless such intoxication evidence is presented, the prejudice that might result to a party based solely on evidence of drinking was deemed too strong to warrant any reference to it. Sandberg-Schiller v. Rosello, 119 Il.App.3d 318, 331 (1983). (Evidence of drinking in a criminal case appears to have been treated somewhat differently by the courts. For an analysis, see People v. Gosse, 119 Ill.App.3d 733 (2nd Dist. 1983)).

Governing Principles. It has long been established that a lay person (assuming a proper foundation) may express an opinion as to a persons intoxication or sobriety where relevant to the issues in the case. Vandever v. Preston, 13 Ill.App.2d 29 (1957)(lay witness competent to testify as to whether an individual is intoxicated). An emergency medical technician was properly allowed to testify that the defendant was intoxicated at the time of the accident, based on a strong odor of alcohol on his breath and his belligerency while being treated. Lindsay v. Appleby, 91 Ill.App.3d 705 (1980). Similar testimony by three paramedics who attended the defendant driver at the accident scene was held properly admitted. Buczynia v. Cuomo & Son Cartage, 146 Ill.App.3d 404 (1st Dist. 1986).

Bearing on Duty of Care. Intoxication neither bars recovery nor relieves the intoxicated party from the duty of exercising the same degree of care as a sober person. Countryman v. Winnebago County, 135 Ill.App.3d 384, 393 (2d Dist.1985).

Expert Testimony. Where lay opinion evidence is unavailable, a party may attempt to prove intoxication through an expert witness. The evidence will be admissible, so long as there is an appropriate foundation upon which the experts opinion may be based and the evidence meets the relevancy test. This was the problem which confronted the court in Petraski v. Thedos, 2008 Ill. App. LEXIS 169 (Ill. App. Ct. 2008), recently decided by the First District Appellate Court.

The trial judge had granted plaintiffs motion in limine to bar the testimony of defendants expert, who had opined in discovery that the plaintiff, who had made a left-turn (with the arrow in her favor) in front of a deputy sheriffs vehicle on an emergency run, had had a blood-alcohol level greater than .08 (the level of presumptive intoxication under the statute) at the time of the accident. The testimony was based on an examination of medical records, including a blood test result which revealed a blood serum reading of .116 grams per deciliter approximately an hour and a half after the accident. The witness was unable to state what the plaintiff had drunk, when she had stopped, or what she had eaten. He did testify at his deposition, however, that with a blood alcohol level of .116, the overwhelming majority of the population would be impaired in their ability to operate a motor vehicle safely.

The appellate court held that the testimony should have been admitted. Any questions as to the appropriate application of the recognized method of calculating the BAC at the time of the accident were appropriate to test the witness opinion, but were not of such a nature as to bar the testimony. The Court seemed particularly persuaded by the fact that, even without hearing any evidence of drinking (let alone intoxication), the jury found the plaintiff to have been 25% contributorily negligent, even though she admittedly had the left-turn arrow in her favor at the time of the accident. By reason of the trial courts ruling barring the expert testimony, defense counsel was unable to respond to plaintiffs challenge in closing argument that the defense could not demonstrate any reason why the plaintiff would have turned in front of the police vehicle unless she had the green arrow. Hearing the defense witness testimony might have provided an explanation.

The Significance of Petraski. This is a case in which a very substantial verdict for the plaintiff (over $35,000,000) was overturned because of what the appellate court perceived to be an unduly rigid adherence to the no intoxication ergo no evidence of drinking rule. Without emasculating the rule, the decision makes it clear compliance is possible where there is a sufficient evidentiary foundation and a qualified expert to interpret the evidence.

Tips for Practitioners. Evidence of intoxication entitles a party to an instruction on intoxication as an element to be considered by the jury in determining whether a partys conduct conformed to the standard of ordinary care. Brown v. Decatur Memorial Hosp., 74 Ill.App.3d 436, (4th Dist. 1979), aff'd, 83 Ill.2d 344, 415 N.E.2d 337, 47 Ill.Dec. 332 (1980). The instruction is found at IPI 12.01 (Intoxication as Negligence); see also 2-39 Illinois Forms of Jury Instruction § 39.40.

The first priority, however, in establishing intoxication of a party, is to develop as much evidence as possible concerning the partys behavior (odor of alcohol, slurred speech, glassy eyes, disheveled appearance, confused, unruly or obnoxious conduct, inappropriate responses, refusal to follow directions, etc.) Where a blood alcohol test is performed and the result is above the presumptive level of intoxication (625 ILCS 5/11-501.2(b)(3)), expert testimony must tie up the test with the time of the accident by extrapolation of the results to the critical time. This may be established through accepted standards of admissibility applied to evidence of blood alcohol tests. See Cuellar v. Hout, 168 Ill.App.3d 416, 420-21 (1988). Keep in mind that, where a blood test is in evidence, you start with a statutory presumption of intoxication, and the task, then, of proving intoxication is made easier with evidence that nails down that presumption and makes it, for purposes of argument, conclusive.

When opposing admission of evidence of intoxication based on lay opinion testimony, foundational evidence should be challenged if it is even questionably relevant, i.e., where the proposed conclusion is as easily explained by circumstances having nothing to do with intoxication, such as excitement, feelings of intimidation, accusatory conduct by others, illness or disease, the effects of prescription medication, etc. Where expert testimony is offered, again the adequacy of the foundation must be challenged if at all possible, e.g., whether procedural requirements were complied with, propriety of the conversion factor (the higher the better for the challenger), challenging the chain of evidence, and other appropriate factors.

For Further Discussion on Evidence of Intoxication and Negligence, see 1-701 Illinois Evidence Courtroom Manual 1 (discussing opinion testimony on intoxication); 2-39 Illinois Forms of Jury Instruction § 39.40 (discussing the proper use and authority for the Intoxication As Negligence jury instruction); and 1-14 Illinois Tort Law § 14.03 (discussing the evidence of intoxication and the determination contributory negligence).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students. Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

82 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Aloe on Charles v. Long Is. Coll. Hosp., 2008 N.Y. App. Div. LEXIS 176 (2008)

2008 Emerging Issues 2860

Paul H. Aloe on Charles v. Long Is. Coll. Hosp., 2008 N.Y. App. Div. LEXIS 176 (N.Y. App. Div. 2d Dep't Jan. 15, 2008)

By Paul H. Aloe

August 4, 2008

SUMMARY: Charles v. Long Is. Coll. Hosp., a Second Department opinion, raises a concern for third party practice. This decision has the potential for mischief and underscores some analytical flaws in recent case law treatment of CPLR 1008. This commentary, written by Paul Aloe, discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Charles v. Long Is. Coll. Hosp., a recent memorandum opinion in the Second Department, raises a concern for third party practice. Charles holds that because the plaintiffs service on the defendant/third party plaintiff was defective, the third party complaint served by the defendant/third party plaintiff against the third party defendant had to be dismissed, even though the defendant did not raise the issue of defective service, and even though the service made by the defendant/third party plaintiff on the third party defendant appears to have been good. This decision has the potential for mischief and underscores some analytical flaws in recent case law treatment of CPLR 1008.

CPLR Provisions Discouraging Technical Objections. A variety of provisions in the CPLR are designed to discourage defendants from raising a technical service objection where the defendant nevertheless received process and was otherwise subject to New York jurisdiction. These provisions include the following:

CPLR 304, after the commencement by filing amendments enacted in 1992, makes commencement of the action the filing, rather than the service, of the summons and complaint.

CPLR 306-b permits the court to extend the time for service if service is not properly made within the requisite time frame.

CPLR 3211(e) requires that a defendant who wishes to avail himself or herself of a technical service defect do so by motion, either brought before answering the complaint, or, if the defendant answers the complaint, within sixty days of the answer.

CPLR 320(b) provides that if the service defect is not raised as provided in CPLR 3211, then the appearance by the defendant is the equivalent of service of process.

These provisions combine to discourage the defendant from raising technical service issues by forcing the defendant to raise the issue early by motion and giving the defendant little reward for the effort since, even if the defendant succeeds on the motion, the plaintiff can simply seek to extend the time for service, obviate the objection, and make new service on the defendant. Unlike the old commencement-by-service system, where an invalidation of service led to the dismissal of the action without the opportunity to re-commence it if the statute of limitations had run, under the commencement-by-filing system, the plaintiff can simply cause the service to be made anew in the same action.

The dilemma for the improperly served defendant. Charles presents a dilemma for the improperly served defendant who wishes to serve a third party defendant. If the defendant fails to move to dismiss the main complaint for improper service, the third party defendant can move to dismiss the third party complaint because of the improper service of the main summons and complaint. By the time this motion has been interposed, the time for the main defendant to interpose his or her own motion against the plaintiff under CPLR 3211 will likely have run out.

Background for Charles decision. Charles appears to be predicated on an earlier First Department decision, Prigent v. Friedman.ⁿ¹ Prigent involved a slightly different situation. CPLR 306-b, in effect at the time of Prigent, required that the plaintiff file an affidavit of service with the County Clerk within 120 days of the filing of the summons and complaint.ⁿ² The plaintiff in Prigent failed to timely file the affidavit of service. One of the defendants successfully moved to dismiss on that basis and the other answered the complaint and thereafter served a third party complaint on the defendant who had been dismissed, seeking to interpose a claim for indemnification and recovery of costs and attorneys' fees in defending the main action. The First Department held that the third party defendant was entitled to be dismissed pursuant to CPLR 1008, which permits the third party defendant to interpose against the main plaintiff any defense that the defendant would have, even one that was waived. According to the First Department, it was of no moment that the third party complaint sought relief different from the main complaint, or that the objection had been waived by the main defendant. Had the defendant properly moved to dismiss, the indemnification claim would be academic, and attorneys' fees would not have been incurred.ⁿ³

To make sense of this it is necessary to review CPLR 1008. CPLR 1008 allows the third party defendant to assert against the plaintiff in his answer any defenses which the third-party plaintiff has to the plaintiff's claim. This has been interpreted to mean that the third party defendant can defeat the third party complaint by any defense that the third party plaintiff has against the main plaintiff but has waived.ⁿ⁴ The third party defendant is not bound by a determination made in the case before the third party defendant was joined in the action.ⁿ⁵ Where the defense is one that would absolve the main defendant of any liability, this principle makes sense. But it makes less sense where the objection is a service objection since, in that situation, the defendant would not necessarily be absolved of liability even if the motion were successful. A defense should not be confused with a procedural objection, even one that might lead to a dismissal. If the defendant remains liable on a properly commenced action, then the objection is not truly a defense.

Confusion between objections and defenses. A careful reading of the CPLR reveals a distinction between an objection and a defense. CPLR 3211(e), which governs the time period for interposing a motion based on a technical defect as to service, refers to the issue as an objection rather than a defense. CPLR 3018, which contains a list of affirmative defenses that must be pled in an answer, does not include a service defect among them. Apart from the linguistic distinction, there is a substantive difference between objections and the kinds of defenses set forth in CPLR 3018(b). Those defenses all relate to items which, if sustained, completely defeat plaintiffs claim against the defendant. See CPLR 3018(b) (listing arbitration and award, collateral estoppel, culpable conduct claimed in diminution of damages as set forth in article fourteen-A, discharge in bankruptcy, facts showing illegality either by statute or common law, fraud, infancy or other disability of the party defending, payment, release, res judicata, statute of frauds, or statute of limitation). On the other hand, a technical defect in the service of process, or in the commencement process, does not defeat the plaintiffs claim, it defeats the action, leaving the plaintiff to start over, or, in the situation of service, to obtain leave from the court to extend the time for service under CPLR 306-b.

CPLR 1008 is founded on sound principal where it allows the third party defendant to defend on a defense that would defeat the plaintiffs claim in its entirety. But where the issue is a procedural objection, one that the plaintiff can cure by re-service or commencing an entirely new action, it makes less sense. The defendant in that situation remains liable to the plaintiff, and the third party defendant, even if dismissed, is subject to an entirely new action for contribution or indemnity after the judgment is paid in the main action, the only difference being that the policy behind joining the main action with the third party action is undermined.

Another problem: Defendants appearance. Charles is problematic for yet another reason. The Court in Charles failed to consider CPLR 320(b). Under that provision, the failure of the main defendant to interpose a motion for a service defect makes the defendants appearance equivalent of the personal service of the summons. n6 At that point, there is service, and there is no personal jurisdiction issue, whether it is an objection or a defense.

The Trap. Charles, however, represents a trap for the defendant who wishes to employ third party practice. If the defendant suspects any procedural defect that can lead to dismissal and fails to raise it by motion, the defendant can then find that defect used against it. It does not matter how trivial or technical if dismissal is possible, the defendant can lose its third party rights if the defendant fails to pursue the issue. Of course, if the defendant raises the issue before the third party defendant is joined and loses, the third party defendant still has a second chance to raise the issue against the main defendant if the ruling was made before the third party defendant was joined. Presumably, it would be difficult to make the same argument to the same judge who decided the issue, but it is possible under the rule that a third party defendant is not bound by the determination if the third party defendant was not joined at the time the determination was made.

The Committee on Civil Practice Law and Rules of the New York State Bar Association has proposed a statutory amendment that would overrule Charles. But until that happens, defense counsel needs to take some care when contemplating third party practice.

For additional discussion of the issues raised in this commentary, see New York Civil Practice: CPLR (Weinstein, Korn & Miller) P 304.01 (Action or Proceeding Commenced by Filing), P 306-b.03 (Court May Dismiss for Failure to Timely Serve or it May Extend Time for Service), P 1008.02 (Third-Party Defendant May Raise Defenses Against Plaintiff or Third-Party Plaintiff), P 3211.49 (CPLR 3211(e) Generally Requires Single Motion to Dismiss, Although Certain Objections Are Not Waived), P 320.10 (Objection May Be Raised by Motion or Pleading), P 3018.13 (Affirmative Defenses Must Be Plead).

Return to Text

n1 . 264 A.D.2d 568, 695 N.Y.S.2d 79 (1st Dept 1999)

n2

[2]. See L 1992, ch 216, § 7. This version of CPLR 306-b was replaced by L 1997, ch 476, § 1, eff Jan 1, 1998

n3

[3]. 264 A.D.2d at 569, 695 N.Y.S.2d at 80

n4

[4]. See Cogan v. Madeira Associates, 1 A.D.3d 1066, 766 N.Y.S.2d 475 (4 Dept. 2003). Weitzner v. New York City Dep't of Social Services, 212 A.D.2d 414, 622 N.Y.S.2d 688 (1st Dep't 1995); New York Civil Practice: CPLR (Weinstein, Korn & Miller) 1008.02.

n5

[5]. See Nickerson v. City of New York, 309 A.D.2d 588, 765 N.Y.S.2d 510 (1st Dep't 2003)

n6

[6]. CPLR 320(b) (subject to the provisions of subdivision (c), an appearance of the defendant is equivalent to personal service of the summons upon him, unless an objection to jurisdiction under paragraph eight of subdivision (a) of rule 3211 is asserted by motion or in the answer as provided in rule 3211.)

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Paul H. Aloe is a partner in the firm of Kudman Trachten Aloe LLP. His practice focuses on complex commercial litigation, constitutional law and civil rights, employment law, corporate restructuring, bankruptcy law, land use planning. Mr. Aloe was previously a partner in the firm of RubinBaum LLP and a confidential law clerk for the Appellate Division, Third Department.

Mr. Aloe served as chair of the New York State Bar Association Committee on Civil Practice Law and Rules from 1992 to 1998. He continues to be actively involved in the crafting of legislation affecting the Civil Practice Law and Rules, and has authored the annual civil practice review for the Syracuse Law Review from 1999 through 2004. He has also authored numerous other articles on civil practice.

83 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Joe McDonnell on the Illinois Insurance Placement Liability Act

2008 Emerging Issues 2861

Joe McDonnell on the Illinois Insurance Placement Liability Act (IPLA); 735 ILCS 5/2-2201: Fiduciary duty of insurance producers

By Joseph B. McDonnell

August 4, 2008

SUMMARY: Illinois Insurance Placement Liability Act (IPLA) 735 ILCS 5/2-2201 concerns the liabilities of insurance brokers and agents: How much protection does it give to these insurance producers for breach of their fiduciary duty to the insured? Is this fair? Is it constitutional? This commentary, written by Joe McDonnell explores the intricacies of this statute.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Consequences of a fiduciary relationship. The existence of a fiduciary relationship imposes upon the fiduciary a duty not present in the usual contractual arms-length undertaking. While in every contract in Illinois there is an implicit obligation of each party to act in good faith in carrying out the terms of the agreement, the existence of a fiduciary relationship adds an important element: the element of trust placed in the fiduciary by the other party.

There are many examples of a fiduciary relationship: guardian and ward, administrator and heirs, trustee and beneficiary, principal and agent, lawyer and client. In general, the term describes any relationship wherein trust and confidence are reposed in the fiduciary by the other party.

In a lawyer-client relationship, for example, the lawyer is under a duty to the client to exercise that degree of professional care and skill which reasonably qualified lawyers would exercise under the same or similar circumstances. But there is also inherent in the lawyer-client relationship a fiduciary duty on the part of the lawyer. Depending upon the facts of the case, the fiduciary duty may constitute an additional basis for relief in a legal malpractice case, for example, if the lawyer fails to account for the clients funds which come into the lawyers possession.

Historically, Illinois has recognized a fiduciary relationship between an insured and the insureds broker, acting as the insureds agent. Perelman v. Fisher, 298 Ill.App.3d 1007, 1011 (1st Dist. 1998)(The relationship between and insured and his broker, acting as the insureds agent, is a fiduciary one); Cincinnati Insurance Co. v. Guccione, 308 Ill.App.3d 220 (2nd Dist. 1999)(the relationship between and insured and his broker is fiduciary); Economy Fire & Casualty Co. v. Bassett, 170 Ill.App.3d 765, 771 (5th Dist. 1988)(Illinois law places a particular burden on insurance producer to exercise competence and skill when procuring coverage).

The existence of a fiduciary duty is particularly important in cases where the insured may not have read the policy procured at his or her request, or has read it incompletely. Under Illinois law, the insured's failure to read the contract and point out errors is not considered contributory negligence as a matter of law and, therefore, is not an absolute bar to recovery based on breach of fiduciary duty. Black v. Illinois Fair Plan Assn., 87 Ill.App.3d 1106, 111 (5th Dist. 1980); Economy Fire & Casualty Co. v. Bassett, 170 Ill.App.3d 765, 771 (5th Dist. 1988).

Immunity from breach of fiduciary duty under the statute. The advantage of asserting breach of fiduciary duty in an action against an insurance producer has been compromised to some extent, at least, by statute. In 1996, the Illinois legislature enacted Public Act 89-638, which added Section 2-2201 to the Code of Civil Procedure (735 ILCS 5/2-2201), effective Jan. 1, 1997. Section (a) of the statute provides that an insurance producer shall exercise ordinary care and skill in renewing or placing coverage for an insured or prospective insured, but Section (b) of the statute states that no cause of action concerning the sale, placement, procurement, renewal, binding, cancellation of, or failure to procure a policy shall subject the insurance producer to civil liability under standards governing the conduct of a fiduciary or a fiduciary relationship except when the conduct upon which the cause of action is based involves the wrongful retention or misappropriation by the insurance producer of any money that was received as premiums, as a premium deposit, or as payment of a claim.

735 ILCS 5/2-2201(b).

Section (d) reiterates that claims based on negligence concerning the sale, placement, procurement, renewal, binding, cancellation of or failure to procure any policy of insurance, are not affected. 735 ILCS 5/2-2201(d).

Section (b) of the statute, therefore, grants an exemption from liability for breaches of fiduciary duty by insurance producers and brokers. See Mizuho Corp. Bank (USA) vs. Cory & Associates, Inc., 341 F.3d 644 (7th Cir. 2003).

How the courts are applying the immunity. There is considerable doubt, however, that the Illinois courts are applying the exemption in quite the fashion that the legislature intended. In a recent case, the exception for claims based on retention or misappropriation of money received as a premium deposit was broadly construed to recognize a claim for breach of fiduciary duty by an insurance broker.

In Dodd Technologies vs. Mesirow Insurance Services, Inc., Illinois Appellate Court, First District, No. 1-06-3300 (filed Feb. 14, 2008), 2008 Ill. App. LEXIS 100, a class action suit, the plaintiff's broker had received contingent commissions from certain insurance companies, conditioned upon his placing insurance with the company for the plaintiff and other putative class members. The commissions were not disclosed to the plaintiff or any other member of the class. In its complaint, the plaintiff alleged in Count I a breach of fiduciary duty on the part of the broker. On defendant's motion, and in reliance on Section (b) of the statute, the claim for breach of fiduciary duty was dismissed. On plaintiff's appeal, the trial court's decision was reversed. Notwithstanding the fact that the contingent commissions (characterized by the court as kickbacks) were not premiums in the strict sense of the word, the court found that the facts fit within the exception to the immunity conferred by Section (b) of the statute and that the breach of fiduciary duty allegations stated a cause of action. The court based its decision in part on the maxim that a court interpreting a statute will assume that the legislature did not intend an unjust result (citing In re Marriage of Beyer, 324 Ill.App.3d 305, 309) and that the placement of policies that are not the most advantageous for the consumer is most certainly unjust. Dodd Technologies, supra, slip op. at 9. The court accordingly held that the placement of policies with companies that were not the most advantageous for the consumers constitutes the wrongful misappropriation of money received as premiums within the meaning of that language in the exception clause of Section (b) of the statute. Slip op. at 9.

What is the practical effect of the statute? In its effort to reach a just result, the appellate court in Dodd Technologies may have engaged in an unduly strained interpretation of the statutory language. However, in view of the long-established judicial treatment of the broker-insured relationship as creating a fiduciary duty on the part of the broker, it is understandable that the courts may construe the statute in such a manner as to recognize claims based on breach of that duty wherever possible. (One caveat: At this writing, the Dodd Technologies case is not final).

Another problem which has apparently not been raised to this point is whether the statute constitutes special legislation, or whether it represents a denial of equal protection in violation of federal and state constitutional guarantees. There is no comparable protection afforded other fiduciaries, including lawyers, trustees of an express trust, or persons acting as agents in other recognized fiduciary relationships. Why are insurance producers protected from claims based on their breach of fiduciary duty, particularly where the same statute that immunizes them from liability for such claims recognizes their traditional duty to use ordinary care and skill in serving their customers?

Implications for Practitioners. It is essential to recognize the difference between an insurance agent and an insurance broker. The term insurance producer is defined in the Illinois Insurance Code as a person required to be licensed under the law of [Illinois] to sell, solicit or negotiate insurance. 215 ILCS 5/500-10. This definition would cover either an agent, traditionally considered in the industry as an independent contractor who represents the insurance company, and a broker, who is identified as one who represents insureds and prospective insureds in dealing with insurance companies. Generally, the Illinois courts have accepted this distinction, holding that an agent is one who represents the insurer, while a broker represents the insured. It will be difficult if not impossible to successfully assert a breach of fiduciary duty claim if the producer is in fact an agent (or an independent contractor) who holds himself out and acts only on behalf of the insurance company. A breach of fiduciary duty claim is accordingly restricted to the broker-insured relationship.

Defense counsel should certainly assert the statutory defense available under 735 ILCS 5/2-2201(b) where the claim is based on breach of fiduciary duty and should resist any attempt to bring the claim within the exception in the last clause of Section (b). The plain language of the exception, the argument should be, limits its reach to the wrongful retention or misappropriation by the insurance producer of any money that was received as premiums, as a premium deposit, or as payment of a claim. 735 ILCS 5/2-2201(b).

Plaintiffs counsel may consider challenging the constitutionality of the statute as suggested above.

For additional discussion of duties of insurance contracts, premiums, agents and brokers, see Illinois Jurisprudence, Personal Injury and Torts § 29:110 (Insurance brokers); Illinois Jurisprudence, Insurance § 1:10 et seq. (Illinois Insurance Code); Illinois Jurisprudence, Insurance § 4:1 et seq. (insurance contract and policy generally); Illinois Jurisprudence, Insurance § 6:1 et seq. (insurance premiums).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

84 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Joe McDonnell on Williams v. City of Evanston

2008 Emerging Issues 2862

Joe McDonnell on Williams v. City of Evanston

By Joseph B. McDonnell

August 4, 2008

SUMMARY: Competing public policy concerns embodied in legislation such as the Tort Immunity Act make doing battle against governmental entities a challenging enterprise, as the plaintiffs in Williams v. City of Evanston learned. This commentary, written by Joe McDonnell, explores the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In Williams v. City of Evanston, 2007 Ill. App. LEXIS 1369 (Ill. App. 1st Dist 2007) the plaintiff faced the daunting challenge of establishing that the conduct of the municipality through its employee was sufficiently blameworthy to satisfy the statutory willful and wanton requirement so as to hold the municipality liable.

Background for the challenge. The doctrine of sovereign immunity, based on the theory that the King can do no wrong, was abolished in Illinois by judicial decision in 1959. Molitor v. Kaneland Community Unit School Dis. No. 302, 18 Ill.2d 11 (Ill. 1959). Quoting from a Florida case, the Illinois Supreme Court said that in preserving the sovereign immunity theory, the courts have overlooked the fact that the Revolutionary War was fought to abolish that divine right of kings on which the theory is based. Molitor, 18 Ill.2d at 21-22.

It didn't take long, however, for the Illinois legislature to resuscitate the doctrine, at least in part. In 1965, the Tort Immunity Act was passed to protect local public entities and their employees from liability resulting from the operation of government. DeSmet v. County of Rock Island, 219 Ill.2d 497 (Ill. 2006). Its purpose was to ensure that public funds were not dissipated by private damage awards. Thereafter, the Illinois Constitution of 1970 reserved to the legislature the ultimate responsibility of determining whether local units of government were immune from liability in tort. Ware v. City of Chicago, 375 Ill.App.3d 574 (1st Dist. 2007).

Immunity May Be Partial or Total. Two important principles have emerged from the courts construction of the Act. The first concerns the reach of an immunity provided in the Act, either with respect to the entity involved or the type of conduct immunized by the statute. Where the statute, for example, states that neither a local public entity nor its employee shall be liable for failure to provide police protection, the immunity is total, and without exception for willful or wanton conduct. Village of Bloomington v. CDG Enterprises, Inc., 196 Ill.2d 484 (Ill. 2001). The second arises where the legislature chooses to limit immunity to cover only negligence. It has unambiguously done so (DeSmet v. County of Rock Island, 219 Ill.2d 497, 514 (Ill. 2006)), generally by specifying that certain conduct on the part of public entities is not actionable, or that certain municipal entities and/or their employees shall not be liable except for willful and wanton conduct. It is this second principle that was involved in Williams v. City of Evanston.

The First Hurdle: Satisfying the Statutory Definition. In Williams, the plaintiffs, driver and passenger, sustained injuries when struck at an intersection by an Evanston city ambulance. The ambulance driver admitted that he had not stopped for the red light, but had slowed his vehicle to 15-20 mph upon entering the intersection and was going 5 mph when the collision occurred. The speed of plaintiffs vehicle was estimated at 20-25 mph by both of its occupants. And, although neither of them saw the ambulance before the collision, they estimated its speed at the time of the collision as between 40 and 50 mph, based upon the impact. The speed limit for traffic in the ambulances lane was 25 mph. Plaintiffs also produced photographs which they contended demonstrated a high-speed collision, but they did not produce expert testimony interpreting the photographs.

The statute governing the case stated that, [e]xcept for willful and wanton conduct, neither a local public entity, nor a public employee acting within the scope of his employment, is liable for an injury caused by the negligent operation of a motor vehicle when responding to an emergency call 745 ILCS 10/5-106. It was undisputed that the ambulance was responding to an emergency call, so plaintiffs were required to make a submissible case of willful and wanton conduct in compliance with the statute.

The defense moved for summary judgment, contending that the evidence taken as a whole was insufficient to warrant a finding of willful and wanton conduct. The trial court agreed, and entered judgment in defendants favor. On plaintiffs appeal, the First District affirmed.

The Decision. The court noted initially that the Tort Immunity Act defines willful and wanton conduct as a course of action which shows an actual or deliberate intention to cause harm or which, if not intentional, shows an utter indifference to or conscious disregard for the safety of others or their property. 745 ILCS 10/1-210. This is essentially the definition which has been approved by the Illinois Supreme Court. See Pfister v. Shusta, 167 Ill.2d 417 (1995).

Acknowledging a split of authority on comparable factual situations considered by Illinois courts of review, the first district determined that, giving plaintiffs the benefit of every doubt, the testimony was insufficient to create a factual issue for a jury's determination. A driver of an emergency vehicle is not required to stop for a traffic signal (Illinois Vehicle Code, 625 ILCS 5/11-205), so the admitted fact that the ambulance driver had not stopped for the red light was insufficient to raise a question of willful and wanton conduct. Neither was the driver's alleged failure to activate his emergency signals sufficient to raise the issue (citing Shuttlesworth v. City of Chicago, slip op. at 11, decided Nov. 5, 2007). Finally, the requirement of the City of Evanston that drivers of emergency vehicles slow down or stop at traffic signs during an emergency run was unavailing to the plaintiffs. Previous authority has held that violation of a self-imposed rule does not normally impose a legal duty, let alone constitute evidence of either negligence or willful and wanton conduct. Wade v. City of Chicago, 364 Ill.App.3d 773 (2006). Moreover, the evidence did not support the assertion that the driver was operating the ambulance at a high rate of speed. Since the plaintiffs' testimony was clear that they did not see the ambulance prior to impact, their respective estimates of speed based on impact were of little or no worth.

The court also noted that the photographs in the record were insufficient, in the absence of expert testimony, to raise an issue of excessive speed, citing DiCosola v. Bowman, 342 Ill.App.3d 530 (2003). The summary judgment in favor of the city and its employee was affirmed.

Tips for Practitioners. The restrictions set forth in the Tort Immunity Act with respect to limiting the liability of a public entity and its employee to actions demonstrating willful and wanton conduct present a serious hurdle to plaintiffs in accidents resulting from collisions with an authorized emergency vehicle. The bar is high, and, while one need not show an intentional harm, many times the circumstances are such that the necessary proof may be only degrees less than intentional wrongdoing. Pfister v. Shusta, 167 Ill.2d 417, 422 (1995). Counsel must emphasize that driving an emergency vehicle is not a license to ignore other vehicles, cross-traffic, obstructions to view, and speed limits.

From the defense standpoint, in most cases presenting a serious question as to the nature of the alleged wrongdoing, a motion for summary judgment should be filed. It then becomes a matter of persuasion and good-lawyering on the part of plaintiffs counsel to overcome the motion.

Once the summary judgment motion is defeated, the real battle begins: convincing a jury that the circumstances (particularly if the emergency was questionable) did not justify the hazard to life and limb evidenced by the drivers conduct. It may be well to remind the jurors that conscious disregard for others is exhibited by conduct which puts others, as well as the actor himself, at peril; and that the prospect of giving aid to others, while commendable, does not justify putting oneself and innocent third parties at risk.

For additional discussion of the Tort Immunity Act, see See generally Illinois Municipal Tort Liability; Illinois Jurisprudence, Personal Injury and Torts § 3:32 (Tort Immunity Act); see also Illinois Municipal Tort Liability § 5.09 (Municipal Liability for Emergency Medical Services); § 1.11 (willful and wanton misconduct).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnells trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

85 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

William C. Bochet on Sensient Colors v. Allstate

2008 Emerging Issues 2863

William C. Bochet on Sensient Colors v. Allstate, 193 N.J. 373, 939 A.2d 767 (2008)

By William C. Bochet

August 4, 2008

SUMMARY: In Sensient Colors v. Allstate, 193 N.J. 373, 939 A.2d 767 (2008), the New Jersey Supreme Court cast aside established principles of comity in favor of public policy concerns. This commentary, written by William Bochet, examines this decision and its potentially destabilizing effects.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In a case that seems to favor public policy over precedent, the Supreme Court of New Jersey upset the vintage doctrine of comity known as the "first-filed rule." In Sensient Colors v. Allstate, 193 N.J. 373, 939 A.2d 767 (2008), the court, in a unanimous opinion, held that "special equities" may trump the precept that if cases filed in different states have the same parties, issues and claims, the case that was the first to be filed will proceed before any others; the actions in the other state or states would be dismissed or stayed until the earlier case is concluded. The court's decision follows the earlier inroad on the rule by the Appellate Division in American Home Products Corp. v. Adriatic Ins. Co., 286 N.J. Super. 24, 668 A.2d 67 (App. Div. 1995). Both cases involved the issue of insurance coverage for environmental tortfeasors.

Putrid Playground. A predecessor corporation of the plaintiff, Sensient Colors, Inc., had a factory in Camden, New Jersey at which the company manufactured chemical products. Their operations apparently contaminated the property where the factory was located. After the factory was abandoned, it became a place where children played and was also frequented by drug users and vandals. The pollution at the property allegedly leached into an adjacent residential project.

The housing project filed suit against Sensient for damages caused by the contamination of its property. Also named was the New Jersey Department of Environmental Protection, which, in turn, cross-claimed for its costs in remediating conditions on Sensient's property.

Sensient sought to have its insurance carriers defend the action and claims against it. One, Zurich, agreed to participate in the defense under a reservation of rights. Competing declaratory judgment filings followed.

No Comity Tonight. The United States Constitution, at Article IV §1, contains a mandate that each state must "give full faith and credit" to the legal judgments of other states. This mutual respect between states is called comity. A part of comity is the recognition that one state must defer to the courts of another when the same parties are already engaged in the same controversy in another state. Thus, the state where the dispute is filed first has precedence over a state where an action is filed afterwards. As pointed out in Sensient, the doctrine "has its roots in our federal system," citing Riggs v. Johnson County, 73 U.S. 166, 196, 18 L.Ed. 768, 776 (1868). In 1898, the Court in Riggs referred to the rule as having been established long ago. Riggs v. Johnson County, 73 U.S. 166, 177 (1898).

After agreeing to defend Sensient in the action against it, albeit under a reservation of rights, Zurich filed a declaratory judgment action in New York. The action sought adjudication that its policy did not cover Sensient for claims deriving from environmental pollution. Sensient then filed its own case in New Jersey, seeking an opposite conclusion. Zurich successfully moved for dismissal of the New Jersey action, because Zurich's lawsuit in New York was the first filed.

Sensient appealed the dismissal. The Appellate Division reversed and reinstated the action. In a published opinion, the appellate panel found that there was no identity of claims in the two suits. The court also found that, even if there were a substantial identity of parties and claims, equitable principles mitigated against application of the first-filed rule. See Sensient Colors, Inc., v. Allstate Ins. Co., 388 N.J. Super. 374, 908 A.2d 826 (App. Div. 2006).

Special Equities. Zurich petitioned the New Jersey Supreme Court for certification. Not surprisingly, certification was granted, and, one year later, a unanimous Supreme Court squelched any notion that it would endorse Zurich's effort to make an end run away from its responsibility to pay for remediation of the toxicity produced by its insured.

The Supreme Court paid scant heed to the appellate panel's view that the first-filed rule might not be applicable. It then went right on to "special equities." In an opinion notable for a dearth of cited precedent--it cites Margarum v. Moon, 63 N.J. Eq. 586, 53 A. 179 (Ch. 1902), an opinion only once before cited by an appellate court in this state through to its centennial--the Court relies primarily upon American Home Products Corp. v. Adriatic Ins. Co., 286 N.J. Super. 24, 668 A.2d 67 (App. Div. 1996). That case similarly dealt with insurers seeking to avoid paying for environmental clean-up costs by filing a declaratory judgment action in New York. The Appellate Division there affirmed denial of dismissal for a later-filed action in New Jersey. The opinion asserted "special equities" which countermanded the long-standing first-filed rule of interstate comity.

The special equities applied to the benefit of alleged toxic polluter Sensient by the state's highest court are as follows:

1. Zurich's filing an action in another state after agreeing to a conditional defense of the underlying lawsuit;
2. The concern of the state for the toxic cesspools it had ignored for a century;
3. Anxiety that remediation may possibly be needed in the future; and
4. The location of the polluted soil being principally in New Jersey.

None of these reasons appear so extraordinary as to justify a vague exception to the first-filed rule. Rather, it seems that the real rationale behind the use of special equities analysis is this: The Supreme Court wants the insurance industry to fund environmental clean-ups. It fears other states, including New York in this case and in the American Home Products Corp., will not follow this view, particularly when insurance policies have pollution exclusion clauses.

Guidance for the Future. The first-filed rule provided a compass for litigants and their counsel as to where a case would be decided when two or more actions with substantially identical parties and issues are filed in different jurisdictions. It is premised upon the constitutional mandate of comity.

In Sensient, this ancient concept is suspended for vague, result-oriented heterodoxy. This leaves counsel with no secure confidence in any result, regardless of precedent. So, while the short-term benefit of this decision may be palpable, the long-term effect is that legal precedent is malleable in New Jersey if its courts imagine a temporary economic or social issue which should supersede it.

For additional discussion of comity and the first filed rule, see Moore's Federal Practice § 57.42[2][b][i] (discussing first filed rule and the courts discretion); Moore's Federal Practice § 111.13 (discussing first filed rule and interests of justice).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

William C. Bochet is a member of the firm of Muscarella, Bochet, Edwards & D'Alessandro, with offices in Fair Lawn, New Jersey. He is a graduate of Dickinson College and the University of Pennsylvania School of Law. He was admitted to practice in the State of New Jersey in 1970 and to the United States Supreme Court in 1975. In 1982, he was certified as a Civil Trial Attorney by the New Jersey Supreme Court and was certified as a Certified Civil Trial Specialist by the National Board of Trial Advocacy in 1989. Mr. Bochet has been a Master of the Justice Morris Pashman American Inn of Court since its inception in 1990. He is presently Secretary of the Bergen County Bar Association, as well as a member of Trial Attorneys of New Jersey, New Jersey State Bar Association and the American Bar Association. Mr. Bochet has written and lectured on trial practice throughout his career and has provided commentary and annotations for LexisNexis New Jersey Court Rules Annotated, Parts One, Two and Four since 2007.

86 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Langsdorf on Treadwell v. J. D. Construction Co.

2008 Emerging Issues 2864

Stephen E. F. Langsdorf on Leah Treadwell et al. v. J. D. Construction Co., et al.

By Stephen E. F. Langsdorf

August 4, 2008

SUMMARY: When it comes to protecting a clients personal assets, it isnt enough to form a corporation. The client must be counseled to ensure that the corporation not only acts like a corporation, but also calls itself by its proper name. The consequences of failing to adhere to these requirements are explored by Stephen E. F. Langsdorf in his commentary on Leah Treadwell et al. v. J. D. Construction Co., et al.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cautionary Notes for Doing Business in the Corporate Form

Not a rose by any other name. One of the first things we lawyers learned in law school was that it is wise to do business as a corporation to avoid personal liability. That way if you make a mistake, or things just go wrong, the potential exposure is the corporate assets and not your personal resources. Historically, the Maine Supreme Judicial Court has made it very difficult to pierce the corporate veil and hold an individual shareholder liable when doing business as a corporation. Leah Treadwell et al vs. J. D. Construction Co., et al., however, signals that personal liability may be found much more readily: this business owner used his corporations trade name on a contract and had not filed an assumed name form with the Secretary of State.

Actual knowledge is not enough. The Treadwells knew that they were contracting with a corporation to build their home. The contract stated that they were contracting with J. D. Construction Co., Inc., and it was signed by the corporations owner, Jesse Derr. Mr. Derr did not work on the job himself and was usually nowhere to be found. Eventually, he abandoned the job completely because it was not profitable. The Treadwells sued J. D. Construction Co., Inc. and Derr in Superior Court, and won a damages award of $66,783.89 to repair defective work, and complete unfinished work under the contract. The Superior Court did not hold Mr. Derr personally liable because the evidence was clear that the Plaintiffs knew they were contracting with a corporation.

That should have been enough, but it wasnt. The problem was that the corporations actual name, as filed with the Secretary of State, was JCDER, Inc., not J. D. Construction Co., Inc. as set forth in the contract. Derr never filed a statement intending to transact business under an assumed name as allowed pursuant to 13-C M.R.S.A. §404 (2006).

Accordingly, on appeal, the Law Court analyzed the case under the Law of Agency. The Court cited the Restatement (Third) of Agency §1.04 cmt. b (2006) for the contention that an agent may avoid personal liability on a contract negotiated on a principals behalf only if he discloses not only that he is an agent, but also the identity of the principal. In other words, the Court saw JCDER, Inc. as the principal on whose behalf Jesse Derr negotiated a contract. By misnaming the corporation on the document, the Court concluded that he had not revealed the principals identity. Since the Treadwells knew nothing about JCDER, Inc., the agent was personally liable. Saco Dairy Co. v. Norton 140 Me. 204, 207, 35 A.2d 857, 858 (1944).

The more traditional approach. Misnaming corporations has not historically been treated as a cardinal sin under Maine law. There have been numerous cases where the Court has treated the misnaming of a corporation as nothing more than a clerical error. See Christian Fellowship and Renewal Center v. Town of Limington, et al., 769 A.2d 834 (Me. 2001); Brogan v. McEachern 103 Me. 198, 68 A.2d 822 (Me. 1907).

One also would have thought that this case would have been analyzed under the well established line of case law that allows the corporate veil to be pierced only under unusual circumstances where the defendant abused the privilege of separate corporate identity leading to an unjust and inequitable result. Johnson v. Exclusive Properties Unlimited, 1998 Me. 244 6, 720 A.2d 568, 571; State v. Weinschank, 2005 Me. 28 19, 868 A.2d 200, 207. Typically, the court looks at such issues as whether the corporation is under capitalized, insolvent, bankrupt or whether the shareholder has maintained the proper separate corporate existence. It appears that the facts in Treadwell might have lead to liability if this standard where applied.

Lessons learned. Treadwell suggests that lawyers must give scrupulous advice to clients as to how to protect their personal assets and avoid personal liability. Not only is it necessary to advise clients to properly maintain corporate records, all necessary annual filings, separate bank accounts and to provide and maintain sufficient capitalization within the corporation, but it is also critical to identify the corporation exactly as set forth either in the Articles of Incorporation or as provided to the Secretary of State under an assumed name form. While this case could be an aberration and is consistent with the Law Courts long history of reaching the practical result, it does require lawyers to be very exact in their advice to clients.

For additional discussion of the requirements for doing business in the corporate form, see Liability of Corporate Officers and Directors § 6.01 (liability for corporate debts); Construction Law P 1.01[2] (Types of Business Associations and the Attendant Exposure to Liability).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Stephen E. F. Langsdorf concentrates in the representation of businesses and municipalities. He specializes in civil litigation and employment law before administrative agencies, in arbitrations and in court. He appears often before the Maine Human Rights Commission and Federal and State courts on employment matters and civil rights laws. He graduated from Texas A&M University with a degree in philosophy and history and earned his law degree from the University of Texas. He joined Preti Flaherty in 1986, became a Member in 1996, and an Equity Member in 1997. He is a member of the Kennebec County, Maine State and American Bar Associations and the Maine Trial Lawyers Association. He serves on the Board of Directors of the University of Maine at Augusta Foundation and is a former board member of FORUM-A, an Augusta based arts organization. He is a former chairman of the Town of Sidney Board of Tax Appeals.

87 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Russ Bensing on Hayes v. Oakridge Home

2008 Emerging Issues 2865

Russ Bensing on Hayes v. Oakridge Home, 2008 Ohio 787 (Ohio Ct. App. 2008) and Enforcement of Contractual Arbitration Provisions

By Russell Bensing

August 4, 2008

SUMMARY: As Hayes v. Oakridge Home makes clear, arbitration is no longer the sole province of attorneys dealing with commercial leases or franchise agreements. An understanding of how to invoke that, or avoid it, is becoming increasingly essential for attorneys practicing in those areas. This commentary, written by Russ Bensing, discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: The lawyer who took in Florence Hayes medical malpractice claim against her nursing home probably never thought he'd need a crash course in arbitration law. As Hayes v. Oakridge Home makes clear, that area of law is no longer the sole province of attorneys dealing with commercial leases or franchise agreements. Lawyers handling not only consumer cases, but also personal injury or employment discrimination suits, may find that ordinary purchase agreements, contracts for nursing home care, or employment agreements require any disputes to be submitted to arbitration, rather than to the normal court process. An understanding of how to invoke that, or avoid it, is becoming increasingly essential for attorneys practicing in those areas.

The Basics. Lawyers new to this area should be aware that the strong public policy in favor of arbitration, reiterated by the Ohio Supreme Court just five years ago in Ignazio v. Clear Channel Broad., Inc., 113 Ohio St.3d 276 (2007) is of limited value here. That public policy was developed in contemplation of agreements between parties of relatively equal bargaining power and skill. Trial and appellate courts have expressed much more unease about applying them when the parties are a corporation and an ordinary consumer.

That unease has led to a broad application of the concept of unconscionability to arbitration provisions in such contracts: a party may avoid arbitration if he presents a quantum of evidence that the arbitration provision is both substantively and procedurally unconscionable. Substantive unconscionability concerns the fairness of the terms, while procedural unconscionability relates to the fairness of the bargaining process.

Felix v. Ganley Chevrolet, Inc., 2006 Ohio App. LEXIS 4410 (8th Dist. 2006).

Counsel should be aware that the rationale for this analysis is not well developed: no explanation is offered as to why both substantive and procedural unconscionability need be shown, nor is the quantum of evidence which must be produced ever defined. Thus, counsel entering this arena will encounter a bewildering array of conflicting decisions. While the Hayes court invalidated the arbitration provision of a nursing home contract, just three months before in Fortune v. Castle Nursing Homes, Inc., 2007 Ohio App. LEXIS 5652 (5th Dist. 2007) (Fortune II), the court affirmed a decision enforcing an arbitration provision in a similar contract, finding it procedurally conscionable despite having determined that it was substantively unconscionable in a prior appeal. Fortune v. Castle Nursing Homes, Inc., 164 Ohio App. 3d 689 (5th Dist. 2005) (Fortune I). Indeed, the reasoning process in these cases often works in reverse: a court reacts instinctively to the fairness of the situation and then applies the rationale necessary to produce the desired result, rather than the other way around. With that in mind, some guidance for lawyers is:

Invoking the clause. As one court put it in another context, Actions speak louder than words, and motions speak loudest of all. Failure to raise the clause as a defense in an answer, or to file a motion seeking to invoke it at the earliest opportunity, may be deemed a waiver. Land v. J.D. Byrider, Inc., 2007 Ohio App. LEXIS 1148 (12th Dist. 2007).

Counsel representing a party asserting an arbitration provision can either file a motion to stay proceedings under R.C. 2711.02, or a motion to compel arbitration under R.C. 2711.03, or both.

Responding. Note that a motion under R.C. 2711.03 requires a hearing, while a motion under R.C. 2711.02 does not. Maestle v. Best Buy Co., 100 Ohio St. 3d 330 (2003). Regardless of what type of motion is filed, the better practice for counsel representing the party seeking to avoid arbitration is to file a brief in opposition arguing that the clause is unconscionable. Such a claim places the validity of the arbitration provision in dispute, and a trial court errs by granting arbitration without conducting a hearing. Bencivenni v. Dietz, 2007 Ohio App. LEXIS 571 (8th Dist. 2007).

Framing the issues. Counsel for both sides should be aggressive here, and resist the urge to file simple pro forma motions and briefs. Remember that the result will often depend more upon the trial courts initial impression of the fairness of the arbitration provision than upon the case law. Both sides should accompany their pleadings with arguments and affidavits supporting their contentions as to why the provision is fair, or why it is not. Counsel should also note that the facts of the underlying case may alter a judges perception of the fairness of arbitration; even though that wont be a factor in the hearing, if the facts are particularly outrageous, spend some time in the pleadings talking about them.

Substantive Unconscionability. Although by no means an exhaustive list, the following factors have been important in determining that a particular arbitration provision is substantively unconscionable:

- . It does not provide remedies that normal legal avenues do. For example, in a consumer suit, arbitration doesnt provide for class actions, attorney fees, or treble damages, as does the Consumer Sales Practice Act. Schwartz v. Alltel Corp., 2006 Ohio App. LEXIS 3280 (8th Dist. 2006).

- . The arbitration is more costly, with fees for the arbitrators and charges for pleadings, hearings, etc. Eagle v. Fred Martin Motor Co., 157 Ohio App. 3d 150 (9th Dist. 2004).

. The arbitration process does not provide the ample discovery that is often essential in fact-dependent cases such as negligence suits. Manley v. Personacare of Ohio, 2007 Ohio App. LEXIS 303 (11th Dist. 2007).

. The agreement is basically unfair. In Fortune I, for example, the court found that a provision requiring the loser in arbitration to pay the winners attorney fees could have a chilling effect on the willingness of people to make claims.

Procedural Unconscionability. The factors here are equally broad, but two are key:

. There is a gross disparity in bargaining power, for example, large corporation v. consumer, and the contract is for a consumer necessity. Olah v. Ganley Chevrolet, Inc., 2006 Ohio App. LEXIS 618 (8th Dist. 2006).

. The contract is adhesionary, that is, the consumer has no opportunity to modify or reject the arbitration provision. Maestle v. Best Buy Co., 2005 Ohio App. LEXIS 3759 (8th Dist. 2005).

Hayes and Fortune II highlight the conflicting results in determining procedural unconscionability. In Fortune II, the court found the agreement procedurally conscionable because the plaintiff had demonstrated business acumen by performing such mundane activities as buying a home and two cars; in Hayes, the court found the agreement procedurally unconscionable despite the fact that the arbitration provision was separately marked, was modifiable, was not required to be signed as a condition of admission to the home, and could be revoked within 90 days of the resident leaving the home. One gets the impression that the overriding factor in Hayes was the plaintiffs age of 94.

The hearing. Counsel must remember that the hearing will not be merely for argument, but for evidence. This is especially crucial on the issue of procedural unconscionability. Counsel should have witnesses present to testify as to details of the bargaining process involved in producing the agreement, focusing on discussions about the arbitration provision. Plaintiffs should also be prepared to answer questions about their business acumen and prior business dealings.

Some final thoughts. The lack of a rigorous analytical framework for the law in this area offers opportunities for a creative attorney. Plaintiffs counsel, for example, might argue that the quantum of evidence necessary to establish both substantive and procedural unconscionability imposes a burden of presenting a prima facie case, at which point the evidentiary burden shifts to the defendant to prove that the agreement is conscionable in both respects.

Keep in mind, too, that arbitration isnt necessarily the sanctuary from the excesses of the civil process that some defendants think it to be. A few years ago, a local auto dealer forced arbitration on a claim involving a $6,260 truck purchase. Last year in Samber v. Mullinax Ford East, 173 Ohio App. 3d 585 (11th Dist. 2007), the court affirmed an arbitration award of $105,000, including punitive damages, treble damages, and attorney fees, against the dealer on that claim.

Cross-references. See generally Leonard J. Nelson III, 1-9 Medical Malpractice § 9.08 (LexisNexis 2007); A.J. Stephani and Glen Weissenberger, 1-16 OH Civil Procedure Litigation Manual (LexisNexis 2007).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Russ Bensing is a solo practitioner in Cleveland, Ohio, specializing in criminal, appellate, and general civil litigation. He graduated from Case Western Reserve University Law School in 1975, and was admitted to the Ohio Bar that year, to practice in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio in 1976, and to the United States Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in 1982. He is a member of the Ohio State Bar Association, the Cleveland Metropolitan Bar Association, the Ohio Association of Criminal Defense Attorneys, and the Cuyahoga Criminal Defense Lawyers Association. He is the author of The Briefcase, a blog devoted to Ohio law.

88 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

William C. Bochet on Dolan v. Sea Transfer Corp.

2008 Emerging Issues 2866

William C. Bochet on Dolan v. Sea Transfer Corp., 2008 N.J. Super. LEXIS 37 (App. Div. 2008)

By William C. Bochet

August 4, 2008

SUMMARY: In Dolan v. Sea Transfer Corp., 2008 N.J. Super. LEXIS 37 (App. Div. 2008), the Appellate Division has issued another choice of law decision concerning motor vehicle accidents between residents of different states. This commentary, written by William C. Bochet, discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: The Appellate Division has issued another choice of law decision concerning motor vehicle accidents between residents of different states. In Dolan v. Sea Transfer Corp., 2008 N.J. Super. LEXIS 37 (App. Div. 2008), the Court adds more sediment to the already murky stream of opinions which followed the introduction of "governmental interest analysis" in place of the historical doctrine that the location of the accident determined the applicable law.

The case involved a New Jersey resident who suffered personal injuries in an accident that occurred on Route 46 in New Jersey. The collision occurred when a shipping container broke free from a tractor-trailer and was struck head-on by the injured plaintiff's vehicle. The tractor was owned by the employer of the New York resident who was driving it. The trailer, or chassis, was owned by Hapag-Lloyd, a shipping company that had its principal office in New Jersey. The container dislodged because it was not properly fastened by the driver at a terminal in New York. The accident happened after the tractor-trailer briefly entered New Jersey en route to a destination in New York.

The issue was whether or not New York law should be used to attach liability to Hapag-Lloyd, the owner of the container and the trailer to which the load was not properly secured. Under New Jersey law, Hapag-Lloyd would not be responsible. Under New York law, there is a statute imposed vicarious liability. The Appellate Division favored New York.

Stare, Stare, Naught. Stare decisis is a judicial doctrine that exists to keep "the stability of the law." Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 577, 123 S. Ct. 2472, 2483, 156 L. Ed. 508, 525 (2003). It calls for adherence to precedent, so as to show respect for the conclusions of judges in the past. It "has at its core the predictability in cases." J & M Land Co. v. First Union Nat'l Bank ex rel. Meyer, 166 N.J. 493, 521, 766 A.2d, 110 (2001). Courts follow the principles applied by the courts of the past, as they are set forth in case law. The concept is not inviolable. Obsolete or badly reasoned decisions need not be followed. Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808, 827, 111 S. Ct. 2597, 2609, 115 L. Ed. 720 (1991). A court on the same level always has the power to modify or overrule itself.

In tort litigation, the historical norm as to choice of law was lex loci delicti. It was a relatively hard-and-fast rule that applied the law of the place where the accident happened to the litigation that ensued. Thus, if the accident happened in New York, a New Jersey court would apply New York law. The concept met its demise in Mellk v. Sarahson, 49 N.J. 226, 229 A.2d 625 (1967). The case involved a suit in New Jersey by an automobile passenger against the driver of the car in which he was a passenger during an accident in Ohio. The defendant asserted the defense of a host-guest statute that barred recovery from the host-driver for acts of ordinary negligence. The Supreme Court of New Jersey refused to apply the Ohio statute, despite lex loci delicti and principles of comity. Instead, the court adopted New Jersey law, which had no such statute. The rationale was that Ohio could hardly care if New Jersey residents collect damages from each other, while New Jersey had "a strong public interest" in seeing that happen. So began the application of "governmental interest analysis" as the yardstick for deciding choice of law issues in interstate automobile accident cases.

And A Weighing We Go. The Dolan courts, both at the trial and appellate levels, applied the now forty-year-old Mellk analysis. The appellate opinion cites other progeny of the concept, accepting some, distinguishing others. The common thread for most is the N.Y. Vehicle and Traffic Law § 388(1), the statute that imposes liability upon motor vehicle owners for the negligent operation of their vehicles by others. A scoreboard would be helpful:

Case Name

Plaintiffs Residence

Defendant Drivers Residence

Defendant Owners Residence

Place of Accident

Law Applied

Dolan v. Sea Transfer

N.J.

N.Y.

N.J./N.Y.

N.J.

N.Y.

Fu v. Fu, 160 N.J. 108 (1999)

N.J.

N.J.

PA

N.Y.

N.Y.

Haggerty v. Cedeno, 279 N.J. 607 (App. Div. 1995)

N.J.

FL

DE/N.Y.

N.J.

N.Y.

Erny v. Estate of Merola, 171 N.J. 86 (2002)

N.J.

N.Y. and N.Y.

N.Y. and N.Y.

N.J.

N.Y.

Kim v. Paccar Financial Corp., 385 N.J. Super 142 (App. Div. 2006)

N.J.

N.J.

N.J. and N.Y. (leased to N.Y.)

N.J. and WA

N.J.

Arias v. Figueroa, 395 N.J. Super. 623 (App. Div. 2007)

N.J.

N.Y.

CA/N.J. (leased to N.Y.)

N.J.

N.J.

A search for a pattern here will not necessarily be fruitful for counsel seeking to advise clients of their probable fate in litigation. Rather, "governmental interest analysis" is by definition a "case-by-case" determination of which state's "strong public policy" -- a ubiquitous phrase in appellate opinions of this genre -- should dominate the other.

In Dolan, the court praises New York's redoubtable interest in public safety as a factor in its decision to apply that state's statute, implying that New Jersey has no such interest. Left unsaid is the fact that New Jersey's legislative scheme contemplates first party insurance, uninsured/underinsured motorist coverage (NJS 39:6A-14, 17:28-1.1), to protect its citizens from being under compensated for injuries arising from motor vehicle accidents. New York's legislature seeks to advance that goal by imposing vicarious liability upon vehicle owners regardless of there being no agency or other culpability. New Jersey's legislature has not made that its public policy.

A part of the reasoning the Dolan court uses to apply the New York statute was that the happening of the accident in New Jersey was "fortuitous". The negligent party dropped into New Jersey for no reason other than to avoid Manhattan traffic. Given the result, though, it would seem the fortuity was that the tortfeasor and vehicle owner came from New York, and had plenty of insurance.

Missed Mistrial. The defendants appealed the result on a second ground. The plaintiffs' attorney apparently made obstreperous comments to the jury in opening and closing statements which could have influenced the very successful result for plaintiffs. The Appellate Division declined to overrule the trial court's denial of a new trial motion, citing the, for now, precedent of Baxter v. Fairmount Foods, 74 N.J. 588 (1977). At the conclusion of the opinion, the court pointed out that defense counsel failed to request a mistrial. The message is that it is not enough to object to egregious conduct. A motion for a mistrial should also be made. Otherwise, there is a risk that the appellate court may refuse to address the issue.

Cross References. For more information, see Restat 2d of Conflict of Laws, Chapter 7: Wrongs.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

William C. Bochet is a member of the firm of Muscarella, Bochet, Edwards & D'Alessandro, with offices in Fair Lawn, New Jersey. He is a graduate of Dickinson College and the University of Pennsylvania School of Law. He was admitted to practice in the State of New Jersey in 1970 and to the United States Supreme Court in 1975. In 1982, he was certified as a Civil Trial Attorney by the New Jersey Supreme Court and was certified as a Certified Civil Trial Specialist by the National Board of Trial Advocacy in 1989. Mr. Bochet has been a Master of the Justice Morris Pashman American Inn of Court since its inception in 1990. He is presently Secretary of the Bergen County Bar Association, as well as a member of Trial Attorneys of New Jersey, New Jersey State Bar Association and the American Bar Association. Mr. Bochet has written and lectured on trial practice throughout his career and has provided commentary and annotations for LexisNexis New Jersey Court Rules Annotated, Parts One, Two and Four since 2007.

89 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Rabiej on Native File Format and Metadata

2008 Emerging Issues 2857

Rabiej on Native File Format and Metadata

By John K. Rabiej

August 4, 2008

SUMMARY: This commentary, written by John Rabiej, Chief of the Rules Committee Support Office that staffs the Judicial Conference's Standing and Advisory Rules Committees, analyzes cases and legal periodicals explaining native file format and metadata, the risks of disclosing privileged and confidential information when producing ESI in native file format, and precautions that can be taken to mitigate inadvertent disclosures.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: The 2006 amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure answer many questions about the discovery of electronically stored information (ESI). But the amendments provide less guidance on issues arising from the discovery and production of ESI in native file format with original metadata intact. The rulemakers deliberately left definitive answers to these issues to case-law development. What lessons has the caselaw taught us about native file formats and metadata?

Definitions. Metadata is commonly defined as data about data (see Williams v. Sprint/United Management Co., 230 F.R.D. 640, 646 (D. Kan. 2005)(description of metadata); see also The Sedona Conference, The Sedona Guidelines: Best Practice Guidelines & Commentary for Managing Information & Records in the Electronic Age, at 94 (Sept. 2005); see also 7 Moore's Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.43[2]). Metadata is generated by the computer software program operating a particular application. Most metadata is not visible on the computer screen, does not appear on the electronic file when a copy is printed, and is often completely unknown to the person who generates the file (see Autotech Tech. Lmt. v. Automationdirect.com, Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist LEXIS 27962, at *n.1 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 2, 2008)(detailed description of metadata); Committee Note to Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(f) (2006)). Basic types of similar metadata are generated by most software programs. But there can be significant differences in the metadata, depending on the program application (see Williams v. Sprint/United Management Co., 230 F.R.D. 640, 647 (D. Kan. 2005)(metadata varies with different applications).

There are two general types of metadata: (1) file-system metadata, which is automatically generated by the computer to identify, track, and manage an electronic file; and (2) substantive metadata, which is added by the user or vendor to an electronic file.

File-system metadata is information about a particular data set or document which describes how, when, and by whom it was collected, created, accessed, modified, and how it is formatted (see Williams v. Sprint/United Management, 230 F.R.D. 640, 646 (D. Kan. 2005) (quoting App. F to The Sedona Guidelines: Best Practice Guidelines and Commentary for Managing Information & Records in Electronic Age). It can contain a list of authors, modification dates, the time spent on edits, name of the network server or hard disk where the file is saved, other file properties and summary information, and hyper links to other documents (see How to Minimize Metadata in Word 2002, <<http://support.microsoft.com/kb/290945>> (Mar. 3, 2005)). Software applications that are very interactive, like those creating spreadsheets, generate more extensive file-system metadata that may be essential to understand the application's output (see Williams v. Sprint/United Management Co., 230 F.R.D. 640, 647 (D. Kan. 2005) (metadata concerning relationships between data essential to understand undifferentiated mass of tables of data)).

Substantive metadata can include previous document revisions, document versions, hidden text, and comments. Microsoft Word, for example, generates two popular substantive types of metadata, including features that save all versions of a document and track all edits to a document (see Donna Payne, Metadata: the Good, the Bad, and the Ugly, <http://www.payneconsulting.com/pub_books/articles/>; Corel WordPerfect metadata records the last 300 actions made to a document).

Native file format is the file structure of ESI created by the original software application. It is the way ESI is stored and used in the normal course of business (see Autotech Tech. Lmt. v. Automationdirect.com, Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27962, at *3 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 2, 2008)). Viewing or searching electronic files in the native file format usually requires the original software application, e.g., Word documents require Microsoft software to use it. Native file format includes metadata.

Producing ESI in its native file format in response to a discovery request is often a matter of convenience. Many lawyers are familiar with word-processing documents generated by Microsoft Word (and Excel and PowerPoint) and Corel WordPerfect. Exchanging electronic files containing Word or WordPerfect documents in their native file formats is a common practice. But lawyers may be unaware that they may be disclosing privileged, confidential, or embarrassing information when they exchange ESI in native file format with metadata intact.

Relevance of Metadata. The relevance of file-system metadata is usually limited, pertinent only when the authenticity or reliability of a particular electronic file is at issue (see § 37A.43[2]). For example, metadata showing the date a file has been generated and the date of edits made to it can be critical in establishing a fraudulent document (see Hagenbuch v. 3B6 Sistemi Elettronici Indus. S.R.L., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10838, at *9-10 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 8, 2006) (metadata relevant to prove identity of persons receiving disputed information). But if the authenticity or reliability of a certain document is not at issue, file-system metadata that describes the history, tracking, or management of an electronic file is usually not relevant. There is a major exception to this general rule of thumb. File-system metadata that explains how information in an electronic file was compiled, like a spreadsheet containing a table showing the results of a specific formula, can be significant (see 7 Moore's Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.43[2]).

A good example of how file-system metadata can be important in a case is shown in Williams v. Sprint/United Management Co.. In this case, the file-system metadata for an Excel spreadsheet contained critical data, i.e., the formula that was used to compute results in a table, which was omitted from the printed TIFF image produced in response to a discovery request. The printed TIFF image obscured spreadsheet columns, hid the applicable formulas, and prevented the party from performing any calculations. The court held that the metadata was essential and relevant to the requesting party's claim (Williams v. Sprint/United Management Co., 230 F.R.D. 640, 647 (D. Kan. 2005) (to understand the spreadsheet, the user must be able to ascertain the formula within the cell)).

The potential relevance of substantive metadata can be very significant. It can show edits to a document that reveal the deletion of key information relevant to a case, e.g., results of a study showing higher risk of severe reactions associated with a new drug.

Concerns About Producing ESI with Metadata Intact. A practitioner should be wary of producing ESI in its native file format without knowing exactly what metadata is being disclosed when responding to a discovery request. Metadata, especially substantive metadata, may contain privileged or protected information.

Some jurisdictions impose an ethical duty on lawyers to review documents for metadata to prevent the disclosure of privileged information, and others prohibit an attorney from searching or mining metadata in ESI inadvertently disclosed in discovery (see Opinion 2007-02, Alabama State Bar Association (March 14, 2007) and Formal Opinion 782, New York State Bar (2001), requiring lawyers to exercise reasonable care to prevent disclosure of privileged metadata, and New York State Bar Opinion 749, concluding that it is unethical for an attorney to mine metadata; but see Formal Opinion 06-442 (Aug. 5, 2006), in which the American Bar Association states that the Model Rules of Professional Conduct do not contain any specific prohibition against a lawyers reviewing and using embedded information in electronic documents, whether received from opposing counsel, an adverse party, or an agent of an adverse party.; see also Marcia Coyle, Where Do the Footprints of Metadata Lead?, The National Law Journal (Feb. 20, 2007), and Donna Payne, Metadata Are You Protected? <http://www.payneconsulting.com/pub_books/articles/> (2004), for a list of other jurisdictions imposing ethical duties, including Texas, New Jersey, Arkansas, California, District of Columbia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Florida, and Arizona). Reviewing metadata for privilege purposes can be burdensome. The 2006 Committee Note to Rule 26(f) recognizes the burden, reminding lawyers to review metadata to ensure that no privileged information is included, further complicating the task of privilege review.

Unlike file-system metadata, which usually gives a historical account of a document, substantive metadata may reveal a much wider range of privileged, confidential, or embarrassing information. Unless certain computer functions are turned off, substantive metadata revealing edits and changes to a file and other information can be retrieved from the file. Producing documents in native file format has resulted in some well-publicized unintended disclosures of confidential or embarrassing information. Metadata has revealed that the text of a supposed government report was actually based on a document drafted by a student (metadata in British dossier on Iraqs security infrastructure revealed that document was prepared by post-graduate student attending Monterey Institute of International Studies, see <<http://tinyurl.com/frqt>>). Other examples of embarrassing inadvertent disclosures of confidential information include revelations of internal trade secrets (see Verne Kopytoff, Googles Gaffe Reveals Internal Secrets: Notes Inadvertently Offer a Look at Financial Plans, Future Product, S.F. Chron., Mar. 8, 2006, available at <<http://www.sfgate.com/cgi-bin/article.cgi?f/c/a/2006/03/08/GOOGLE.TMP>>), deletion of relevant data linking drug to heart failure (see David M. Ewalt, When Words Come Back From the Dead, Forbes.com, Dec. 13, 2005, <http://forbes.com/2005/12/13/microsoft-word-merck_cx_de_1214word.html>), and information implicating high-ranking Syrian officials in the murder of a former Lebanese prime minister (see James Bone & Nicholas Blanford, UN Office Doctored Report on Murder of Hariri, Times (London), Oct. 22, 2005, available at <http://www.timesonline.co.uk/tol/news/world/middle_east/article581486.ece>). In addition to concerns about inadvertently disclosing confidential information, producing ESI in its native file format raises practical and evidentiary problems. Opening or searching an electronic file in its native file format requires access to the software program that created the file. Popular software programs that generate word-processed documents are readily available, e.g., WordPerfect and Microsoft Word. In large-scale discovery, however, ESI may be generated using many different software applications. Opening the various files produced in discovery may require access to many different software programs (see 7 Moore's Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.43[2]). For example, a search of e-mails produced by one software program will not reveal information contained in the attachments created by another software program. A separate software application must be used to search and open the attachment. If an electronic file was created by a customized software application, moreover, opening or searching it may be subject to a separate licensing agreement that charges expensive license user fees (see Northern Natural Gas Co. v. Teksystems Global Applications, Outsourcing, L.L.C., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64149, at *5 (D. Neb. Sept. 6, 2006)(license for software cost $50,000); see also 7 Moore's Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.43[2]).

On the other hand, ESI in its native file format can be convenient to run calculations, test different formulae, or evaluate the reliability of statistical or other data, especially spreadsheets and other data involving tables. But this same feature raises authentication issues. Unless proper precautions are promptly taken to assure authenticity, detecting subsequent changes made to ESI produced in native file format can be difficult. Unlike static image documents, like TIFF or PDF images that cannot be altered and that can be stamped with the common Bates numbering system to assure reliability (see Hagenbuch v. 3B6 Sistemi Elettronici Indus. S.R.L., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10838, at *9-10 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 8, 2006)), ESI created in native file formats requires some other method of identification to ensure authenticity and reliability.

Parties Obligation to Preserve and Produce ESI in Native File Format with Metadata. Metadata is ESI (Bar v. Lowe's Ctrs., Inc., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 32497, at *22 (May 2, 2007)). Though metadata is not mentioned explicitly in the Civil Rules (see Michigan First Credit Union v. Cumis Ins. Soc., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84842, at *4-5 (E.D. Mich. Nov. 16, 2007)), the definition of ESI in Rule 34 is expansive and clearly applies to metadata. The rulemakers considered metadata to be ESI (Minutes of April 15-16, 2004, Civil Rules Committee meeting, at 13, available at <<http://www.uscourts.gov/rules/Minutes/CRAC0404.pdf>>). The 2006 Committee Note to Rule 26(f) implicitly recognizes metadata as ESI, recommending that parties discuss in the Rule 26(f) conference whether metadata should be produced in discovery.

Because metadata is part of the file structure of ESI, it may be subject to preservation obligations if it is relevant (see Williams v. Sprint/United Management, 230 F.R.D. 640, 651 (D. Kan. 2005) (if a party knows or should know that metadata is relevant and not available from other sources, it must be preserved)). But metadata usually is not relevant, and a party is not subject to sanctions for failing to preserve irrelevant metadata (see Inventory Locator Serv., LLC v. Partsbase, Inc., 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 46252, at *39 (W.D. Tenn. Oct. 19, 2005) (metadata including The Last Creation Date and Last Access Date was destroyed, but destruction was not sanctionable because metadata was not relevant)).

The Civil Rules do not specify whether a party is obligated to produce ESI with metadata intact (Williams v. Sprint/United Management, 230 F.R.D. 640, 649 (D. Kan. 2005)). The rules establish procedures, however, designed to identify and resolve any disagreement among the parties as to the form of production, including whether metadata should be produced. To this end, the rules require parties to discuss the form of ESI production early in the case at the Rule 26(f) conference. The discovery plan required under Rule 26(f) must state the parties views and proposals on: ... any issues about disclosure or discovery of electronically stored information, including the form or forms in which it should be produced (see Kentucky Speedway, LLC v. Nat. Assoc. Stock Car Auto Racing, Inc., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92028, at *23 (E.D. Ken. Dec. 18, 2006)). Practitioners should address the issues arising from producing ESI in native file format with metadata intact promptly at the conference to prevent problems from later developing.

If a party fails to specify the form of production or if the parties disagree about the manner of ESI production, the Civil Rules provide a procedural framework to resolve form-of-production issues. Under Rule 34(b)(1)(C), the requesting party may specify the form or forms in which ESI, including metadata, is to be produced. The request for metadata must be specific (see Pace v. Int'l Mill Service, Inc., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34104, at *6-7 (N.D. Ind. May 7, 2007); see also D'Onofrio v. SFX Sports Group, Inc., 247 F.R.D. 43, 48 (D.D.C. 2008)). Courts ordinarily will not compel a party to produce metadata unless the request is specific (see The Ponca Tribe of Indians of Oklahoma v. Continental Carbon Co., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 74225, at *6-7 (W.D. Okla. Oct. 11, 2006) (metadata not required to be produced in response to original discovery request, which failed to specify manner of ESI production)). Making the party responsible for clearly and specifically requesting metadata is consistent with the weight of the caselaw, which maintains a modest presumption that the producing party need not take special efforts to preserve or produce metadata (see Autotech Tech. Lmt. v. Automationdirect.com, Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist LEXIS 27962, at *12-14 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 2, 2008) (quoting The Sedona Principles); Kentucky Speedway, LLC v. Nat. Assoc. Stock Car Auto Racing, Inc., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92028, at *23 (E.D. Ken. Dec. 18, 2006)).

A direct request for metadata is clear. But must metadata be produced if a party requests ESI in its native file format? The inference in cases and in the minutes of the Civil Rules Committee meetings indicate that such a request also calls for the production of the original metadata intact. As noted, metadata is physically part of the native file format structure of an electronic file and can be eliminated only if steps are taken deliberately to remove it (Minutes of April 14-15, 2005, Civil Rules Committee meeting, at 17, available at <<http://www.uscourts.gov/rules/Minutes/CRAC0405.pdf>>). Accordingly, a request for ESI in native file format should be interpreted to include metadata. (As a practical matter, most requests for ESI in native file format also include specific requests for the metadata in the reported caselaw.) At least one prominent commentator disagrees and believes that metadata is not part of an electronic file produced in its native file format (see Thomas Y. Allman, The Impact of the Proposed Federal E-Discovery Rules, 12 Rich. J.L. & Tech. 13, 15 (2006) (Neither default form is intended to mandate production of metadata or embedded data. The Advisory Committee discussed the competing concerns at some length but ultimately decided that the best course of action was to remain silent and leave the issue to individual case law development.)).

If the requesting party fails to specify the format of production, the producing party has the option to produce it: (1) as it is ordinarily maintained, or (2) in a reasonably usable form or forms.

If the responding party selects to produce ESI in a form or forms in which it is ordinarily maintained, as that term is used in Rule 34(b)(1)(C), must ESI be produced in its native file format with metadata intact? The Civil Rules Committee recognized that technically adept lawyers and experts assume that production in the form ordinarily maintained includes embedded data and metadata (see In Re Verisign, Inc. Sec. Litig., 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22467, at 8-12 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 10, 2004) (request for ESI in original format, as it was kept in the usual course of business meant production in native file format); see also 7 Moore's Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.43[2]). But the Committee ultimately decided not to take a position on whether metadata must be included when ESI is produced in the form that it is ordinarily maintained (Minutes, October 2-3, 2003, Civil Rules Committee meeting, at 28, available at <<http://www.uscourts.gov/rules/Minutes/CRAC1003.pdf>>). The Committee concluded that it was not necessary to decide the issue, as a practical matter, because issues as to embedded data and metadata arise only if the responding party opts to produce [ESI] in the form ordinarily maintained (Minutes, April 14-15, 2005, Civil Rules Committee meeting, at 19, available at <<http://www.uscourts.gov/rules/Minutes/CRAC0405.pdf>>; see also Minutes, April 15-16, 2004, Civil Rules Committee meeting, at 15, available at <<http://www.uscourts.gov/rules/Minutes/CRAC0404.pdf>>). The Committee recognized that parties would simply remove the metadata and produce the ESI under the reasonably usable option.

But what if the party directly requests production of ESI in the form that it is ordinarily maintained without also specifically requesting metadata? Whether metadata must be produced in response to such a direct request is not clear (see Williams v. Sprint/United Management Co., 230 F.R.D. 640, 652, n.69 (D. Kan. 2005) (Court holds that when a party is ordered to produce electronic documents as they are maintained in the ordinary course of business, the producing party should produce the electronic documents with their metadata intact, unless the party timely objects); see In Re Payment Interchange Fee and Merchant Discount Antitrust Litig., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2650, at *14-17 (E.D.N.Y. Jan.12, 2007) (metadata must be produced in response to request for ESI in form ordinarily maintained). Under a conservative reading of the present caselaw, a practitioner should interpret a request for ESI as it is ordinarily maintained to include metadata.

Alternatively, the responding party may produce ESI in a reasonably usable form, as that term is used in Rule 34(b)(1)(C). If the responding party selects this option, must ESI be produced in its native file format with metadata intact? In determining whether a specific form of production is a reasonably usable form, the rulemakers excluded any production form of ESI that removes or significantly degrades the ability to electronically search the file (Committee Note to Rule 34(b) (2006)).

Can a party extract metadata from the ESI without violating the prohibition against degrading the file? The rulemakers thought so, frequently acknowledging the use of TIFF and PDF images, which do not include metadata, as alternative, reasonably usable forms of production. Under most circumstances, extracting metadata will not degrade the capability to search ESI. In fact, the Civil Rules Committee expressly noted that an electronic file with its metadata stripped out would remain reasonably usable for purposes of Rule 34(b)(2)(E)(ii) (see Minutes of April 14-15, 2005, Civil Rules Committee meeting, at 17, available at <<http://www.uscourts.gov/rules/Minutes/CRAC0405.pdf>>). Caselaw is also replete with examples of ESI produced without metadata in TIFF and PDF images. In most cases, metadata is not essential to make the file searchable by electronic means and extracting metadata would not degrade its searchability (see Wyeth v. Impax Labor., Inc., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 79761, at *4 (D. Del. Oct. 26, 2006) (metadata is often of limited evidentiary value and reviewing it can be wasteful); but see In Re Payment Interchange Fee and Merchant Discount Antitrust Litig., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2650, at *14 (E.D.N.Y. Jan.12, 2007) (court concludes that deleting metadata from ESI significantly degrades searchability of documents).

If there is no agreement on the form of production, a producing party may object in writing to a request to produce ESI in its native file format or in the form that it is ordinarily maintained and offer an alternative, reasonably usable form of production. If the parties are unable to agree on the alternative form of production after meeting and conferring, they may raise the matter with the court, either filing a motion to compel production or a motion for a protective order. In evaluating such motions, courts have properly recognized that the evidentiary value of most metadata is marginal, while the cost and burden in reviewing and extracting metadata can be substantial (see Michigan First Credit Union v. Cumis Ins. Soc., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84842, at *5-6 (E.D. Mich. Nov. 16, 2007)(production of metadata would be extremely burdensome, with no countervailing discovery or evidentiary benefit). The prevailing view among courts is that the requesting party must show a particularized need for the metadata sufficient to offset the cost and burden in reviewing and producing the metadata (see CP Solution PTE, Ltd. v. Gen. Elec. Co., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27053, at *14 (D. Conn. Feb. 6, 2006)(party must show need for metadata); see Kentucky Speedway, LLC v. Nat. Assoc. Stock Car Auto Racing, Inc., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92028, at *23 (E.D. Ken. Dec.18, 2006)(party failed to make showing of particularized need for metadata); O'Bar v. Lowe's Home Ctr., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 32497, at *13-14 (W.D.N.C. May 2, 2007) (pretrial order requiring showing of particularized need); see Wyeth v. Impax Labor., Inc., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 79761, at *4-5 (D. Del. Oct. 26, 2006) (metadata not required when party failed to show particularized need for native file format). Courts have consistently required a party who objects to producing metadata to produce metadata only when it is relevant, has evidentiary value, is not available from other sources, and is not unreasonably burdensome to produce.

Best Practices. Parties should discuss the form of production of ESI early in the litigation at the Rule 26(f) conference. Parties should make clear their preferences on the specific form of ESI production at the conference. A request for metadata should be specific and preferably limited to certain documents or data (see Kentucky Speedway, LLC v. Nat. Assoc. Stock Car Auto Racing, Inc., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92028, at *24-24 (E.D. Ken. Dec.18, 2006) (court encourages party to limit the number of documents for which it requests metadata).

The requesting party should be prepared to make a showing of particularized need for ESI in its native file format with metadata intact. A request for metadata may be justified if reasonable suspicion is shown that a particular document or data has been altered or if the requested metadata provides information essential to understanding the electronic file, e.g., spreadsheet. A request for ESI in its native file format may be justified if the party needs to run computations using the software application to verify its contents. The requesting party should ensure that it has access to the software programs that generated the ESI in native file format, taking into account any applicable licensing agreements or customized software. Moreover, the party should take prompt steps to ensure that ESI in its native file format is authenticated for future evidentiary purposes.

The producing party should be wary of producing ESI in native file format because it may inadvertently disclose privileged or confidential information. When faced with a request to produce ESI in its native file format, the producing party should be prepared to make a showing of the cost and burden in reviewing metadata for privilege purposes and extracting privileged or protected metadata that would offset the benefit of producing metadata.

If the requesting party fails to specify the form of ESI production, the producing party can select a reasonably usable form, but it must first state the form or forms it intends to use, subject to objection from the requesting party. Copies of ESI produced in hard-copy (paper) or as electronic TIFF images may be reasonably usable and will ensure that no metadata will be revealed. A photocopy or a TIFF image is an exact copy of the electronic file, but the requesting party may object to these forms because it may be difficult to conduct electronic word searches or to link attachments to its original document. Producing ESI in PDF appears to be the prevalent practice. PDF is also an exact copy of ESI and can be searched electronically. But PDF copies can contain substantial metadata, including a list of authors, creation date, modification dates, title, subject, and many others. As numerous people have learned to their chagrin, merely converting a Microsoft Word document to PDF does not remove all metadata automatically (Redacting with Confidence: How to Safely Publish Sanitized Reports Converted from Word to PDF, National Security Agency, at 2 (December 13, 2005)). Despite the risk that some metadata may be revealed, the convenience in producing ESI in PDF may offset the risk in many situations. In other instances, however, greater scrutiny may be required. In these cases, the practitioner should consider producing the least revealing electronic file, which can be produced by printing the file to paper and then scanning it into PDF (see In Re Payment Interchange Fee and Merchant Discount Antitrust Litig., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2650, at *7 (E.D.N.Y. Jan.12, 2007); see also Donna Payne, Metadata Are You Protected? <http://www.payneconsulting.com/pub_books/articles/>(2004)).

There may be situations in which ESI must be produced in its native file format in order to run calculations, e.g., spreadsheets. In these cases, there are ways to extract metadata, and some government entities have provided practical guidance on how to scrub documents to remove metadata (see Redacting with Confidence: How to Safely Publish Sanitized Reports Converted from Word to PDF, National Security Agency, at 4-5 (December 13, 2005)). Special software programs are also designed to extract metadata (see Williams v. Sprint/United Management Co., 230 F.R.D. 640, 644 (D. Kan. 2005)(defendant used software to scrub spreadsheets to remove metadata). In fact, both Microsoft (Word documents) and Corel (WordPerfect documents) offer guidance and on-line utilities to minimize and extract metadata (see How to Minimize Metadata in Word 2002, <<http://support.microsoft.com/kb/290945>> (Mar. 3, 2005); see also Donna Payne, Metadata: the Good, the Bad, and the Ugly, <http://www.payneconsulting.com/pub_books/articles/>). But the burden and cost in extracting metadata of individual documents or data can be significant. The responding party should be prepared to make a showing to the court of the burdens in extracting metadata, requesting the court to limit the extraction of metadata to a specified number of documents or data (see Redacting with Confidence: How to Safely Publish Sanitized Reports Converted from Word to PDF, National Security Agency, at 4-5 (December 13, 2005); see also Kentucky Speedway, LLC v. Nat. Assoc. Stock Car Auto Racing, Inc., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92028, at *24-24 (E.D. Ken. Dec. 18, 2006) (request for metadata should be limited to specified documents)).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004.

90 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Kyle C. Bisceglie on Ortega v. City of New York

2008 Emerging Issues 2858

Kyle C. Bisceglie on Ortega v. City of New York, 9 N.Y.3d 69, 2007 N.Y. LEXIS 2715 (2007)

By Kyle C. Bisceglie

August 4, 2008

SUMMARY: In Ortega v. City of New York, 9 N.Y.3d 69, 2007 N.Y. LEXIS 2715 (2007), a unanimous New York Court of Appeals rejected a claim against a non-party for negligent spoliation of evidence under New York law. This commentary, written by Kyle C. Bisceglie, examines the Ortega decision in the context of other primary authority and outlines the remaining remedies available to a party in New York aggrieved by spoliated evidence.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: In Ortega v. City of New York, 9 N.Y.3d 69, 2007 N.Y. LEXIS 2715 (2007), the Court of Appeals, by unanimous decision, held that New York does not recognize a tort claim of third-party negligent spoliation of evidence. A claim for third-party spoliation would arise when a party with custody of evidence crucial to a claim between two other parties destroys or loses it, thereby compromising one of the two parties' ability to prosecute its claim or defend itself against the other party's claim. This is in contrast to the more common circumstance in which a defendant fails to preserve evidence which the plaintiff needs to prosecute a claim against it.

Spoliation has been defined as "[t]he intentional destruction of evidence" and "[t]he destruction, or the significant and meaningful alteration of a document or instrument." Black's Law Dictionary 1401 (6th ed. 1990). Under the common-law doctrine of spoliation, "when a party negligently loses or intentionally destroys key evidence, thereby depriving the non-responsible party from being able to prove its claim or defense, the responsible party may be sanctioned by the striking of its pleading." Ingoglia v. Barnes & Noble College Booksellers, Inc., __ A.D.3d __, 2008 N.Y. App. Div. LEXIS 1479 (2d Dep't 2008). Equivalent sanctions for intentional spoliation by a party are available to courts under CPLR 3126.

Given the availability of other remedies, most New York courts have declined to recognize an independent tort for spoliation against a party. See Black Radio Network, Inc. v. NYNEX Corp., 44 F. Supp. 2d 565, 586, 1999 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7072 (S.D.N.Y. 1999) (New York follows "the majority view and [does] not recognize spoliation of evidence as a cognizable tort action", quoting Weigl v. Quincy Specialties Co., 158 Misc. 2d 753 (Sup. Ct. N.Y. Co. 1993) (discussed infra)). See, e.g., Pharr v. Cortese, 146 Misc. 2d 1078, 1990 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 389 (Sup. Ct. N.Y. Co. 1990) (declining to recognize independent claim for intentional spoliation against physician who allegedly falsified medical records to avoid malpractice liability). The availability of an appropriate remedy may not be so clear, however, when the spoliator is not a party to the case in which the evidence is relevant.

The plaintiffs in Ortega claimed that the City's negligent destruction of a defective vehicle in which the plaintiffs were injured prevented them from even identifying the responsible parties to sue, and they instead sought to recover the entire amounts of their personal injury damages from the City. See Ortega, 9 N.Y.3d at 74. The Ortega Court refused to recognize such a claim, finding the essential elements of causation and damages claims inherently too hypothetical and speculative without the key evidence necessary to prove them. See id. at 81-82. Despite the Court's categorical rejection of a cause of action for third-party negligent spoliation, however, it did not explicitly rule out an equivalent cause of action in circumstances where the injury caused by the third party's spoliation is easier to determine.

The So-Called "Common-Law Claim for Intentional or Negligent Impairment of a Claim or Defense. New York courts have recognized an independent tort claim against an actor who is deemed to have some duty to another party to preserve evidence, usually characterizing it as a tort for impairment of another's right to sue a third party, or impairment of a defense against a third party's claim, rather than for spoliation. This claim has been recognized most commonly in the employer-employee context.

For example, in Wiegl v. Quincy Specialties Co., 158 Misc. 2d 753, 1993 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 339 (Sup. Ct. N.Y. Co. 1993), the plaintiff was a laboratory technician who was injured on the job when her lab coat caught fire. Her employer generally cooperated with pre-litigation discovery, but lost the lab coat. The plaintiff sued the party believed responsible for her injuries, and also asserted claims against her employer for negligent and intentional spoliation. On the employer's motion to dismiss, the Supreme Court concluded that New York courts do not recognize spoliation as a tort action, but nevertheless sustained the spoliation claims by construing them as claims for negligent and intentional impairment by an employer of its employee's right to sue a third-party. See id. at 757.

In DiDomenico v. C&S Aeromatik Supplies, Inc., 252 A.D.2d 41, 1998 N.Y. App. Div. LEXIS 14050 (2d Dep't 1998), the plaintiff, an employee of United Parcel Service ("UPS"), was injured on the job by an allegedly defective package containing a caustic substance. UPS initially refused to cooperate with the plaintiff's attorney, violated a pre-litigation discovery order pursuant to CPLR 3102(c), and destroyed the defective package. The plaintiff sued various parties believed responsible for his injuries, and also sued UPS for deliberate impairment of his right to sue a third party. See id. at 46. UPS continued to violate discovery orders even after it was made a party to the lawsuit, and the Second Department sanctioned it by striking its answer and granting summary judgment to the plaintiff on its claims against UPS.

The Second Department found striking of the employer's answer warranted under CPLR 3126, but also noted "the evolving rule" that a spoliator of key evidence may be sanctioned by striking of pleadings even where the spoliation is not willful, and even if the spoliation occurred before the spoliator became a party, provided the spoliator was on notice that the evidence might be needed in future litigation. Id. at 53.

In Fada Industries, Inc. v. Falchi Building Co., LP, 189 Misc. 2d 1, 2001 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 225 (Sup. Ct. Queens Co. 2001), the Supreme Court extended the cause of action for impairment of a claim or defense beyond the employee-employer relationship, to encompass a spoliation claim by an insured against its insurer. In that case, a defendant's leaking water heater damaged its own premises and the premises of a neighbor. During the inspection of the defendant's premises by its insurer, the insurer removed the water heater, and subsequently lost or destroyed it. The neighbor sued the defendant, and the defendant brought a third-party action for indemnification against its insurer, on the grounds that the insurer's negligent loss of the water heater impaired the insured's defense in the underlying action, and prevented it from identifying other potential third-party defendants. See id. at 3.

The Fada Industries court, relying on DiDomenico and Wiegl, sustained the insured's third-party complaint against its insurer, ruling that it stated valid causes of action "for negligent spoliation of evidence" and "for negligent impairment of the ability to sue a third party". Id. at 12-13. The Court expressly limited its decision to the facts of the case before it, noting that because the insured sought only indemnification for its liability in the underlying action, the damages were not speculative, and that the sanctions normally available to a party under the spoliation doctrine, such as striking of pleadings or preclusion of evidence, would be of little use. See id. at 9, 11. The Court acknowledged that it was recognizing a previously unrecognized cause of action for negligent spoliation, but found it "fitting that a party should have a remedy against a nonparty, particularly when that nonparty is the party's insurer, for the nonparty's loss or destruction of key evidence." Id. at 12.

The Court of Appeals' Rejection of Negligent Third-Party Spoliation Claims. In MetLife Auto & Home v. Joe Basil Chevrolet, Inc., 1 N.Y.3d 478, 2004 N.Y. LEXIS 228 (2004), the Court of Appeals declined to "recognize a cause of action for third-party negligent spoliation of evidence and impairment of a claim or defense as an independent tort" on the facts of that case, but stopped short of ruling out such a cause of action altogether. Id. at 480. That case involved an apparently spontaneous automobile fire, which damaged the home where the car was parked. The vehicle owner's insurance carrier, Royal, took possession of the vehicle and then mistakenly destroyed it. MetLife, as subrogee of the damaged homeowner, sued the vehicle's owner and other responsible parties for damages from the fire, and included a claim against Royal for reckless spoliation of evidence.

The Court of Appeals dismissed MetLife's spoliation claim against Royal, distinguishing the facts of that case from those of DiDomenico in that "there was no duty, court order, contract or special relationship" between Royal and MetLife that would have required Royal to preserve the vehicle. Id. at 484. In particular, the Court noted that although MetLife had received verbal assurance from Royal that it would preserve the vehicle, it had "made no effort to preserve the evidence by court order or written agreement." Id.

The take-away from MetLife Auto -- a cause of action for third-party spoliation of evidence would require, at least, a duty or other obligation on the part of the third party to the injured party to preserve the evidence. See, e.g., Hennessy v. Restaurant Assoc., Inc., 25 A.D.2d 340, 341, 2006 N.Y. App. Div. LEXIS 71 (1st Dep't 2006) ("Absent some duty to preserve evidence, there is no cause of action for negligent spoliation", citing MetLife Auto). Three and one half years later, however, in Ortega v. City of New York, 9 N.Y.3d 69, 2007 N.Y. LEXIS 2715 (2007), the Court of Appeals ostensibly ruled out any cognizable tort claim for negligent spoliation by a third party.

Ortega v. City of New York involved yet another apparently spontaneous automobile fire, this time while the owner and a passenger were inside the vehicle, causing them both serious injury. The vehicle was subsequently towed and impounded by the City, and the passenger obtained a Court order directing the City to preserve the vehicle for inspection by her attorney. Instead, the City Pound inadvertently destroyed the vehicle in violation of the preservation order.

It would appear that the passenger, having attempted to preserve the vehicle by obtaining a court order just as the MetLife Auto Court seemed to prescribe, might have had a viable spoliation claim against the City. Both the owner and the passenger sued the City for negligent spoliation of evidence, claiming that the destruction of the vehicle prevented them from determining the cause of the fire or identifying responsible parties, and seeking damages comparable to what they believed they would have won had they sued the responsible parties. Neither plaintiff pursued a direct personal injury claim against any anyone that might have been identified responsible party.

On the City's summary judgment motion, the Supreme Court dismissed the owner's spoliation claim but sustained the passenger's, noting the City's obligation to the passenger to preserve the vehicle pursuant to the Court order, and relying on MetLife Auto and DiDomenico. See Ortega v. City of New York, 11 Misc. 3d 848, 853-55, 2006 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 267 (Sup. Ct. Kings Co. 2006). On appeal, however, the Second Department dismissed the passenger's spoliation claim as well as the owner's, see Ortega v. City of New York, 35 A.D.3d 422, 2006 N.Y. App. Div. LEXIS 14547 (2d Dep't 2006), and the Court of Appeals affirmed.

The Court of Appeals expressly rejected what it viewed as the Ortega plaintiffs' attempt for "recognition of a new cause of action because they cannot meet the traditional proximate cause and actual damages standards at the foundation of our common-law tort jurisprudence." 9 N.Y.3d at 80. Citing its general reluctance "to embrace claims that reply on hypothetical theories or speculative assumptions about the nature of the harm incurred or the extent of plaintiff's damages", the Court refused to hold a negligent third party liable for all of the damages the plaintiff might have recovered from a potential tortfeasor, "because the content of the lost evidence is unknown, there is no way of ascertaining to what extent the proof would have benefited either the plaintiff or defendant in the underlying lawsuit and it is therefore impossible to identify which party, if any, was actually harmed." Id. at 81. The Court also expressed concern about leaving municipalities vulnerable as attractive alternative defendants to actual tortfeasors. See id. at 82-83.

Instead, the party claiming injury as a result of the spoliation may be able to seek more limited recovery by other means. Had the Ortega plaintiffs pursued a claim against the City for contempt of the preservation order pursuant to Judiciary Law § 773, for example, they might have been able to recover the additional expenses incurred in attempting to prove their personal injury claims without the ability to inspect the vehicle which the City negligently destroyed. See id. at 80.

How Far Does Ortega Go? In Ortega the Court of Appeals did not reference the Second Department's decision in DiDomenico, even though the Supreme Court had expressly relied on that case in the decision appealed from, and the Court of Appeals itself in its MetLife Auto decision had been careful to distinguish DiDomenico. Nor did the Court of Appeals mention "impairment of a claim or defense" as it did in MetLife Auto, leaving open the question of whether a claim for negligent third-party spoliation might survive under a different guise within a limited scope.

The Court of Appeals' reasons for refusing to recognize the spoliation claims in Ortega do not apply to the same degree in all circumstances. For example, when the party claiming its interests were impaired by the spoliation is a defendant and seeks indemnification for its own potential liability as in Fada Indus., uncertainty in the calculation of damages is not an issue. In fact, whenever the third-party spoliation claim is ancillary to a lawsuit against the parties deemed directly responsible for the underlying damages, as in Fada Indus., DiDomenico, and Weigl, as well as in MetLife Auto, the hypothetical and speculative aspects of the spoliation claim should not be nearly as great as in Ortega, where the effects of the spoliation was the only matter being litigated.

Thus, the Court of Appeals may have left the door open, albeit only slightly, to a spoliation claim against a third party in the context of a special relationship giving rise to obligations beyond the mere duty to preserve evidence, such as the employer-employee relationship, or the relationship between an insurer and its insured. In addition, the Court of Appeals in Ortega addressed only negligent third-party spoliation, and has not yet ruled out an independent claim against a third party who intentionally destroys evidence despite a legally cognizable duty or obligation to preserve it. Likewise, if the party has agreed to produce certain evidence either because of a pre-existing relationship between the parties or a promise and allows it to be destroyed, the requesting party may have viable beach of contract or promissory estoppels claims. Finally, Ortega certainly does not preclude an aggrieved party from pursuing relief under NY CLS Jud §773, FRCP45(e)(USCS Fed Rules Civ Proc R 45), etc. if the evidence is destroyed after a subpoena has been issued or a preservation order entered.

For additional discussion of potential claims and remedies for third-party spoliation see Brian Warwick, Smith v. Atkinson: The Supreme Court of Alabama Holds that Liability Can Be Imposed on a Third Party for Negligent Spoliation of Evidence, 62 Ala. Law. 201 (May 2001); Benjamin Clark, The License to Spoliate Must Be Revoked: Why Missouri Should Recognize a Tort for Third-Party Spoliation, 59 J. Mo. B 308 (Nov./Dec. 2003); James Killelea, Spoliation of Evidence: Proposals for New York State, Note, 70 Brooklyn L. Rev. 1045 (2005).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Kyle C. Bisceglie, a Partner at Olshan Grundman Frome Rosenzweig & Wolosky LLP in New York City, counsels corporations, partnerships, and individuals with respect to complex commercial litigation, Alternative Dispute Resolution ("ADR"), contracts, business advice and litigation avoidance. He has tried numerous cases without loss and has been involved in litigations, arbitrations, mediations and settlement negotiations. He also serves as general counsel to various entrepreneurial ventures and businesses in technology infrastructure, advertising, event production, dental and medical instruments, insurance, chemical distribution, fashion and consulting fields. Mr. Bisceglie has complex litigation experience in a variety areas including commercial, financial, insurance, employment, race and sex discrimination, harassment and retaliation, copyright and trademark, defamation, and business tort. He has participated in the investigation of the worldwide derivatives trading practices of a New York based merchant bank, representation of US policyholders in the largest insurance insolvency in North American history, and coordination of negotiation over and litigation for the transfer of a major beverage and spirit company's most valuable brand. Mr. Bisceglie also spent five years in the litigation department of Cadwalader, Wickersham and Taft; two years trying cases as an assistant prosecutor; and one year as a law clerk to Judge Alfred M. Wolin, United States District Court for the District of New Jersey. He can be reached by phone at 212-885-8818 or by email at kbisceglie@bartonesq.com.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

91 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Bensing on B & T Distribs. v. CSK Constr., Inc., 2008 Ohio App. LEXIS 1583

2008 Emerging Issues 2629

Russ Bensing on Requests for Admissions and B & T Distribs. v. CSK Constr., Inc., 2008 Ohio App. LEXIS 1583 (6th Dist. 2008)

By Russ Bensing

July 30, 2008

SUMMARY: Requests for admission can be a powerful tool for litigators. Failure to respond to such requests may have dire consequences. This commentary, written by Russ Bensing examines this tool in light of B & T Distributors v. CSK Construction, Inc., from the perspectives of both the propounder and the responding counsel.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Responding to discovery requests is on every attorneys list of least favorite things to do. As the 6th Districts recent decision in B & T Distribs. v. CSK Constr., Inc., 2008 Ohio App. LEXIS 1583 points out, however, a dilatory response to requests for admissions can engender more than a motion to compel it can result in losing the case entirely.

The consequences of not making a timely response can be dire. The time for responding to requests for admissions under Civ.R. 36 28 days is the same as that for responding to interrogatories and requests for production. The difference is what happens on the 29th day. Failure to timely produce documents or to timely answer interrogatories may lead to a prodding call from opposing counsel. Failure to respond to requests for admissions, though, has far more drastic repercussions: the rule provides that failure to answer within the time allotted means that [t]he matter is admitted. Given that a request can be used to establish a fact, even if it goes to the heart of the case, Cleveland Trust Co. v. Willis, 20 Ohio St. 3d 66, 67 (1985), and even if the fact must be proven by the requesting party at trial, Youssef v. Jones, 77 Ohio App. 3d 500, 509 (6th Dist. 1991), the unwary practitioner can find himself having admitted everything necessary for an opponent to obtain a judgment. Because of these drastic consequences, the Rule has been enforced unevenly by Ohio courts.

Tactics for capitalizing on failure to timely respond. To maximize the chance of having the matters not timely admitted deemed admitted, counsel intending to propound requests for admissions should keep the following in mind:

. In order to demand strict compliance with the rules, one must first comply with them. It is not unusual to combine requests for admission with interrogatories and requests for production. Because of the difference in effect of the failure to respond to request for admission, subparagraph (C) was added to Civ. R. 36 in 2005. That subparagraph mandates that the caption of a document containing requests for admission plainly state that it includes such requests. A general

Request for Discovery will not be sufficient.

. Although the Rule provides a 28-day period for response, it also provides that the requests must state the period designated for response. If the request does not specify a period for response, the response may be made anytime prior to trial. McGreevy v. Bassler, 2008 Ohio App. LEXIS 265 (10th Dist. 2008).

. The 2004 amendments to the Civil Rules required that discovery requests be served electronically as well as by mail, but did not specify the consequences of failure to make electronic service. Effective July 1, 2008, service of the discovery request, including requests for admissions, will not be deemed complete until the responding party receives both an electronic and a paper copy.

Once the opposing party has failed to timely respond, counsel for the propounding party can file a motion to have the requests be deemed admitted. The tactical wisdom of that option is questionable, however. Such a motion is not necessary, Farah v. Chatman, 2007 Ohio App. LEXIS 629 (10th Dist. 2007). The same effect can be achieved by filing a motion for summary judgment based on the admitted requests, or even by waiting until trial. As will be seen, one of the key factors in determining whether to permit a late filing is the prejudice to be suffered by the propounding party. Showing the prejudice suffered as a result of permitting a late filing on the eve of trial is obviously a much easier task than demonstrating the prejudice of permitting the responding party to file responses a week after they were due.

At some point, of course, the responding party will attempt a late filing. At that point, counsel for the propounding party should cite the case law indicating that late filing should be permitted only in compelling circumstances, Sandler v. Gossick, 87 Ohio App. 3d 372, 377 (8th Dist. 1993), and that mere inadvertence of counsel is not excusable neglect under Civ. R. 6(B). Whitehouse v. Customer Is Everything!, Ltd., 2007 Ohio App. LEXIS 6086 (11th Dist. 2007).

Tactics for tardy counsel. Counsel for the party that has failed to respond is not bereft of options, either. Central to counsel's argument here is the Rule itself, specifically subparagraph (B), which provides that the court may permit withdrawal or amendment when the presentation of the merits of the action will be subserved thereby and the party who obtained the admission fails to satisfy the court that withdrawal or amendment will prejudice the party in maintaining his action or defense on the merits. (Amendment, of course, includes a late filing.) The Supreme Court cited this language in Balson v. Dodds, 62 Ohio St. 2d 287, 290 (1980), upholding the trial court's decision to permit a tardy response to admissions because the opposing party could not demonstrate she would suffer any prejudice as a result.

With that in mind, some suggestions:

. Counsel should make sure that the opponent has strictly complied with the requirements for requests for admissions. As noted above, failure to specify in the caption that the discovery requests include admissions, failure to designate a period for response, or failure to make electronic service will relieve counsel of the obligation of making a timely, or in fact any, response.

. Counsel should act quickly: the faster the responses are filed, the more likely that the opposing party will be unable to demonstrate prejudice, especially if the case is still in the early stages. See, for example, Kutscherousky v. Integrated Communs. Solutions, LLC, 2005 Ohio App. LEXIS 3893 (5th Dist. 2005) (trial court abused discretion in denying leave to amend where responses filed only nine days after they were due), and Vertex Constr., Inc. v. Setterlin Constr. Co., 1988 Ohio App. LEXIS 1499 (10th Dist. 1988) (leave should be granted where no pretrial conference or trial date had been set, and the parties had not yet completed discovery).

. Unless counsel has an especially valid excuse for a tardy response, little time should be spent in providing one. In Kutscherousky, supra, the court held that the two-prong test of Rule 36(B) directs the court to consider the effect upon the litigation and prejudice to the resisting party, rather than focusing on the moving party's excuses for an erroneous admission.

. A motion for leave to amend the responses is not absolutely necessary; simply contesting summary judgment can suffice. Jade Sterling Steel Co. v. Stacey, 2007 Ohio App. LEXIS 480 (8th Dist. 2007). Needless to say, the preferred option is to file the motion for leave; use of Jade is a last resort, where counsels first realizes the failure to respond to requests upon the arrival of the opponents motion for summary judgment.

. Do not forget the first prong of the Rule 36(B) test for permitting amendment: that doing so would subserve presentation on the merits. There are innumerable decisions espousing the preference for resolving cases on their merits, rather than on technicalities. Resort to this line of argument is especially appropriate where the requests, if deemed admitted, would essentially determine the action. See Albrecht, Inc. v. Hambones Corp., 2002 Ohio App. LEXIS 5745 (9th Dist. 2002).

Do not be afraid to cite federal cases. The federal counterpart to Rule 36 is virtually identical to it, and federal case law is far more forgiving. There are federal cases in which leave to amend was granted a year after the requests were due, and even on the day of trial. Kutscherousky, supra, contains an excellent summary of those cases.

For additional information about requests for admissions, see Ohio Civil Rules Practice 10.56 Requests for Admissions; Ohio Civil Rules Practice 10.57 Procedure for Request for Admissions.

RELATED LINKS: Bensing is a solo practitioner in Cleveland, Ohio, specializing in criminal, appellate, and general civil litigation. He graduated from Case Western Reserve University Law School in 1975, and was admitted to the Ohio Bar that year, to practice in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio in 1976, and to the United States Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in 1982. He is a member of the Ohio State Bar Association, the Cleveland Metropolitan Bar Association, the Ohio Association of Criminal Defense Attorneys, and the Cuyahoga Criminal Defense Lawyers Association. He is the author of The Briefcase, a blog devoted to Ohio law.

92 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Mack on License Drafting Practice: City of Hope Medical Center v. Genentech

2008 Emerging Issues 2622

Mack on Practical Implications on License Drafting Practice and Commercial Litigation of City of Hope Medical Center v. Genentech, Inc.

By Olga V. Mack

July 29, 2008

SUMMARY: In City of Hope Medical Center v. Genentech, Inc., the Supreme Court of California reversed the punitive damage award for breach of fiduciary duty and upheld the actual damage award for breach of contract. This long-awaited decision, analyzed by Olga Mack, compels practitioners who draft license agreements to be more proactive to minimize their clients exposure to punitive damages.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In City of Hope Medical Center v. Genentech, Inc., 43 Cal. 4th 375, 75 Cal. Rptr. 3d 333, 181 P.3d 142, City of Hope Medical Center (Hospital or plaintiff) asserted breach of fiduciary duty and breach of contract, including breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing against Genentech, Inc. (Genentech or defendant) related to a licensing agreement. In particular, the plaintiff asserted that the defendant failed to pay royalties on its third-party licenses.

The Court Set Aside The Punitive Damage Award. The Supreme Court of California reversed the punitive damage award of $200,000,000 for breach of fiduciary duty. Punitive damages are not available in California for a breach contract. However, punitive damages are available in tort-related claims such as breach of fiduciary duty. Thus, the Court set aside the award for punitive damages because it found that no fiduciary relationship formed between the Hospital and Genentech for the following four reasons:

- First, referring to specific Genentech/Hospital contract provisions, the Court found that the parties entered into a contract to achieve mutually beneficial agreement. That is, the plaintiff did not enter into the contract with the view of acting primarily for the benefit of the defendant.
- Second, no facts indicate that Genentech, through its conduct, knowingly undertook the obligations of a fiduciary.
- Third, special circumstances such as a joint venture, partnership, or agency did not exist to impose fiduciary obligations as a matter of law. In fact, one of the Genentech/Hospital contract provisions expressly stated that the parties relationship is not a joint venture, partnership, or agency.
- Fourth, rejecting reliance on Stevens v. Marco, 147 Cal. App. 2d 357 (1956), the Court held that the fiduciary relationship does not necessarily form merely when the following four characteristics are present: (a) one party entrusts its affairs, interests, or property to another; (b) one party grants another a broad discretion because of knowledge disparity; (c) asymmetrical access to information exists; and (d) one party is vulnerable and dependent upon another. In fact, the Court observed that these characteristics are common in many contractual agreements. That is, fiduciary obligations are not necessarily created when one party entrusts valuable intellectual property to another for commercial development in exchange for payment of compensation contingent on commercial success; the secrecy of information is a factor that may be considered at trial, but does not require the imposition of fiduciary duties. See Wolf v. Superior Court, 107 Cal. App. 4th 25 (2003). The Court observed that one party's vulnerability must be so substantial to impose a fiduciary duty. In this case, however, the Court did not impose a fiduciary duty because the contract was between two sophisticated parties, each party had a substantial bargaining power, and both parties were represented by counsel throughout the negotiations of the contract.

The Court Affirmed The Actual Damage Award. However, the California Supreme Court affirmed the actual damage award of $300,164,030 to the Hospital for a breach of contract because Genentech failed to pay certain royalties. In its breach of contract discussion, the Court observed:

- First, the conduct (e.g., concealing certain information) between execution of the contract and a dispute about the meaning of the contract's terms is admissible to resolve the ambiguities in the contract's language.
- Second, the jury may interpret the agreement when the contract construction depends on the credibility of extrinsic evidence.
- Third, if uncertain language remains after considering the evidence, it must be interpreted against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist.
- Fourth, stipulations regarding the admission of evidence, absent express limitation, apply to a later trial of the same action, unless the court allows the stipulation to be withdrawn.

Implications of Hope Medical Center v. Genentech, Inc. on License Drafting Practices. In light of the Courts holding in City of Hope Medical Center v. Genentech, Inc., the practitioners who draft license agreements are well advised to minimize their clients exposure to litigation in general, and punitive damages in particular. Thus, a practitioner may consider:

- Explicitly stating that the purpose of the contract is to achieve mutually beneficial agreement.
- Explicitly listing what each party gains from entering the license agreement, e.g., royalty payments, ability to manufacture certain products, ability to sell certain products, research funding, exclusive or joint ownership of a property (such as patent, trade secret, trademark, copyright, real property, etc.), right to assign, right to transfer, right to file patent applications, exclusive or non-exclusive ability to license, etc.
- Avoiding language in the contract that states or suggests that the client acts for the benefit of the other party.
- Scrutinizing the facts and circumstances of the prior relationship between the parties and the dynamics of the license negotiations suggesting that the client knowingly undertook the obligations of a fiduciary.
- Explicitly including a clause in the contract that the parties' relationship is not a joint venture, partnership, or agency.
- Explicitly and clearly stating that parties do not intend to enter a fiduciary relationship.
- Explicitly including mandatory alternative dispute resolution (e.g., arbitration).
- Explicitly and clearly limiting remedies in case license disputes arise (e.g., capping damages to a certain amount, prohibiting punitive damages, etc.).
- Advising clients that while, in general, licensing relationships do not establish a fiduciary relationship and, thus, do not expose clients to punitive damages, the Courts may consider various extrinsic facts in determining whether a fiduciary relationship was formed. Thus, the clients are well-advised to deal with the other party as fairly as possible, to communicate regularly, and to document their compliance with contractual obligations during the license negotiations and throughout the life of the license.
- Counseling clients that exposure to punitive damages increases (although is uncertain) when the other party is not sophisticated, a substantial bargaining power imbalance exists, and/or the other party is not represented by counsel.
- Counseling clients that exposure to punitive damages increases (although is uncertain) when the other party provides secret information as part of the bargain.
- Documenting all communications oral and written that suggest the parties did not intend to enter a fiduciary relationship and to create a record of fair dealing.

- Including the other party in as many aspects of license drafting as practical to avoid uncertain language being interpreted against the client.
- Explicitly stating that the license should not be construed against either party.
- Defining key terms (e.g., royalty, license, profit, etc.) and the key license conditions (e.g., what constitutes use of the patent, what constitutes application of a certain method, etc.) as clearly and as precisely as practical to minimize exposure to expensive and time-consuming future litigation.

Implications of Hope Medical Center v. Genentech, Inc. on Extrinsic Evidence-Intensive Contract Litigation.

While the holding in City of Hope Medical Center v. Genentech, Inc., primarily affects license drafting practices to minimize clients exposure to punitive damages, the case also provides some insight for attorneys who litigate disputes especially those that are extrinsic evidence-intensive. Thus, a litigator may consider:

- Counseling client that punitive damages exposure is minimal, absent an explicit contractual agreement or substantial facts that suggest a fiduciary relationship exists.
- Foreseeing the implications of entering into a stipulation regarding evidence admission, especially early in the case, because such stipulations generally apply to a later trial of the same action.
- Relying on the contract language as much as possible during the contract interpretation stage of trial.
- Assessing the risks and benefits of having a judge or jury interpret potentially ambiguous license language.
- Relying on written communications and well-documented evidence as much as practical to interpret ambiguous contract language, especially when witnesses are not available to testify and/or appear incredible.

Conclusion. In City of Hope Medical Center v. Genentech, Inc., the Supreme Court of California reversed the punitive damage award for breach of fiduciary duty and upheld the actual damage award for breach of contract. This long-awaited decision compels practitioners, who draft license agreements, to be more proactive to minimize their clients exposure to punitive damages. The decision also encourages commercial litigators to be more careful in handling extrinsic evidence-intensive cases.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Olga V. Mack is a patent litigator at the Palo Alto office of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

93 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Brazas on Hatchett v. Swanson, 2008 Ill. App. LEXIS 472

2008 Emerging Issues 2626

Susan M. Brazas on Hatchett v. Swanson, 2008 Ill. App. LEXIS 472, No. 2-07-0690 (May 20, 2008).

By Susan M. Brazas

July 29, 2008

SUMMARY: The Second District Appellate Court recently entered the fray of a topic popular among Illinois courts for the past several months: what are the risks of a voluntary dismissal when it comes time to re-file and then serve the summons and re-filed complaint? In Hatchett v. Swanson, the Second District points out that deadlines are a moving target that can easily prove a trap for the unwary.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Brazas, Susan M. Hatchett v. Swanson. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

Second District Addresses Timely Service of Summons for a Re-Filed Complaint After Voluntary Dismissal

In the May 2008 court opinion of Hatchett v. Swanson, 2008 Ill. App. LEXIS 472, No. 2-07-0690 (May 20, 2008), the Second District Appellate Court tackled the topic of diligent service of a re-filed complaint following a voluntary dismissal. Recently, this has been the subject of much attention in Illinois courts. The ink was barely dry on the Illinois Supreme Court's decision in Case v. Galesburg Cottage Hospital, 2007 Ill. LEXIS 1707 (Dec. 13, 2007), heralding the sanctity of a plaintiff's absolute right to re-file after a voluntary dismissal when the Court issued another decision addressing the subject, Hudson v. City of Chicago, No. 100466 (Jan. 25, 2008). In Hudson, the Supreme Court addressed the interplay of the voluntary dismissal statute, found at 735 ILCS 5/2-1009, and the doctrine of res judicata and identified a policy against claim-splitting.

What Happened in Hatchett. In Hatchett, a spectator injured during a race sued the race sponsor. The spectator voluntarily dismissed the first complaint and then refiled. The trial court granted the sponsors motion to dismiss with prejudice. The appellate court vacated and remanded, holding that although the trial court could determine if service was diligently made after the refiling in light of the entire history of the case, it should not have considered the length of time the spectator waited before refiling.

Recent Supreme Court Decisions on Similar Issues. In its Case v. Galesburg decision, 2007 Ill. LEXIS 1707 (Dec. 13, 2007), the Supreme Court held that the right to re-file a voluntarily dismissed complaint within the one-year window of time set forth in Section 13-217 of the Code of Civil Procedure is an absolute right that must be protected.

The Case court held, as did the Hatchett court, that the window of time between a voluntary dismissal and a re-filing must not be considered in assessing whether there was diligence in service under Supreme Court Rule 103(b).

In Hudson v. City of Chicago, No. 100466 (Jan. 25, 2008), the Illinois Supreme Court addressed the interplay of the voluntary dismissal statute and the doctrine of res judicata. In affirming the trial court and the appellate court, the Supreme Court applied its decision of twelve years earlier to find that the plaintiff's re-filed action was barred by res judicata, because plaintiff could have, but did not, pursue his case to conclusion in the trial court after one count of his original action was involuntarily dismissed with prejudice.

In Hatchett, the Second District applied the analysis and holding of Case to identify factors infringing upon the right to re-file within one year identified in the Case decision. Interestingly, the Hatchett court made an extensive analysis of the sequence of amendments to the Rule on diligence of service, Rule 103(b) of the Illinois Supreme Court Rules.

This focus on the chronology of amendments to the Supreme Court Rule highlights the importance of tracing the history of a rule, rather than assuming that it has always been in the familiar form. The opinion raises, but does not answer, the interesting question of whether the amendments to Supreme Court Rule should apply retroactively. This leaves open the possibility of creative argument by counsel as to whether diligence should be evaluated in historical context or according to current standards.

The Hatchett court also noted that a dismissal under Rule 103(b) for failure to timely serve a re-filed complaint would not serve the purposes of Rule 103. This is an example of the importance of arguing that the court should be guided by furtherance of policy considerations. Further, counsel should also make liberal use of the Committee Comments to the Rules in their arguments, as the Hatchett court cited the Comments in its analysis. Sources of this type may tip the scales on a close question.

Case Law Trends Persuasive. The Hatchett court also considered the Supreme Court's view of diligence over the course of eleven years, in five cases. In analysis the Hatchett court noted that cases decided during that period, although not directly on point, were instructive for an overarching policy that justice should be administered without delay. The Hatchett court determined that the often-repeated totality of the circumstances approach should be considered, as is specified in the most recent amendment to Rule 103(b). However, the interesting distinction made by the Hatchett court is that while the circumstances of the initial filing of the complaint may be scrutinized, the timing of the re-filing may not. Just as did the Case court, the Hatchett court found that the plaintiff has an absolute right to re-file within the one-year window and that a plaintiff who takes full advantage of that time must not be punished when an analysis of diligence of service is made.

Impact on Pleadings. The Hatchett opinion illustrates the importance of examining policy implications of the case law on a particular subject. Although counsel is often tempted to find the newest and best case on a topic, a consistent, well-established line of cases can be even more persuasive. Likewise, a historical review of the evolution of procedural rules or statutes can be offered as supporting evidence for a particular interpretation.

The Hatchett opinion also sheds light on the importance of not dismissing unconventional arguments out of hand. For example, if one were to presume that only a totality of the circumstances approach would be followed, then one might likely miss the opportunity to argue that one particular aspect of the factual background is so critical that it should be given far greater weight. Counsel should also seek out those phrases that define the message of case law on the subject, as did the Hatchett court when it identified the policy goal of Rule 103(b) as justice without delay.

For additional information, see Illinois Civil Procedure § 11.04, Voluntary Dismissals.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin, at the trial and appellate level. Ms. Brazas is an author of the LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas is a frequent lecturer at ISBA seminars on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and case law developments.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

94 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Rabiej on Accessibility of ESI

2008 Emerging Issues 2627

Rabiej on Accessibility of ESI

By John K. Rabiej

July 29, 2008

SUMMARY: In dueling footnotes, Judge Francis and Judge Pitman reach opposite conclusions on whether converting relevant accessible ESI into inaccessible ESI pending litigation violates preservation obligations. John K. Rabiej, Chief of the Rules Committee Support Office, discusses the facts of each case and explains their rationales.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Rabiej, John K. Whether Converting Accessible ESI into Inaccessible ESI Violates Preservation Obligations. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

In dueling footnotes, two noted jurists reach opposite conclusions on whether converting relevant accessible electronically stored information (ESI) into inaccessible ESI pending litigation violates preservation obligations (see 7 Moores Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.35[1], discussing what constitutes inaccessible ESI). In Quinby v. WestLB, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35583, at *27 n.10 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 15, 2005) (Quinby I), Judge Pitman concludes that a party is not obligated to preserve evidence in a particular form and may convert accessible ESI into inaccessible ESI pending litigation, though the party may be responsible to pay the added costs in reconverting and producing relevant ESI in discovery. In Treppel v. Biovail Corp., 233 F.R.D. at 372 n. 4 (S.D.N.Y. 2006), Judge Francis expresses a contrary view. He concludes that converting ESI into an inaccessible form when litigation is anticipated violates the preservation obligation based on Residential Funding Corp. v. DeGeorge Fin. Corp., 306 F.3d at 110 (2d Cir. 2002). Judge Pitman disagrees with Judge Francis's analysis in Quinby II (Quinby v. WestLB, 245 F.R.D. 94, 103 n.12 (S.D.N.Y. 2006)). The outcome of this debate can have far-reaching implications.

Facts. In Quinby I, e-mails of employees were regularly deleted from a defendant's active database when the employee left the company. A record of the e-mails was retained solely on backup tapes, which compressed the data to save storage expense. In prior litigation, the defendant had hired a consultant to decompress and restore certain backup tapes containing former employee e-mails, which would later be relevant in Quinby I. The restored e-mails were easily accessible. After the action was filed in Quinby I, the defendant's consultant had recompressed the previously restored backup tapes in apparent ignorance of the new lawsuit, making the former employees' e-mail inaccessible again.

In Treppel, the plaintiff initiated the action on April 29, 2003. On December 13, 2003, the defendant created backup tapes of relevant ESI located on its computer servers. In March 2005, the defendant again made backup tapes but at the same time it also created a mirror image of the ESI on the hard drives of certain employees. The ESI on the mirror image was easily accessible.

The plaintiff in Treppel filed a motion in late 2005 requesting the court to enter a order compelling the defendant to preserve all relevant ESI. Though preservation orders can be helpful to instruct parties on the parameters of discovery, courts should not routinely enter these orders (see Committee Note to Rule 26(f) (2006) (requirement that the parties discuss preservation does not imply that courts should routinely enter preservation orders; *but see Treppel supra at 16, noting that such preservation orders are increasingly routine in cases involving electronic evidence). Judge Francis applied a three-factor balancing test regularly used by courts to determine whether a preservation order was appropriate (see Treppel, supra at 370; see also 7 Moores Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.10[3][b]). Under the first factor in the test, Judge Francis considered the potential destruction of the evidence absent a preservation order. Because the plaintiff failed to demonstrate that any evidence had been lost or that the defendant's actions in creating backup tapes and a mirror image of hard drives were inadequate to preserve the evidence, Judge Francis denied the preservation order request as premature.

In reaching his decision, Judge Francis noted that ESI would be effectively destroyed if it is converted from an accessible form into an inaccessible form. Judge Francis relied on Residential Funding, supra, concluding that permitting the downgrading of data to a less accessible form which systematically hinders future discovery by making the recovery of the information more costly and burdensome is a violation of the preservation obligation (Treppel, supra at 372 n.4). Judge Francis did not sanction the defendant because the converted ESI had not been downgraded and remained accessible. Judge Francis opined, however, that if the defendant had converted the ESI into an inaccessible backup tape, like the defendant had done in Quinby I, he would have found such action sanctionable. Presumably, the defendant in Treppel was not sanctioned because the ESI was retained on an accessible mirror image of the data. Why Judge Francis did not sanction the defendant for converting accessible ESI into inaccessible backup tapes in 2003 and 2004, and waiting until 2005, nearly two years after the litigation had commenced, before creating a mirror image of the ESI, is puzzling.

Judge Pitman was not persuaded by the Treppel analysis. He concluded that the preservation obligation does not require a party to retain ESI in a particular form, whether in an accessible or inaccessible form. He found no case holding that a party must retain ESI in a particular form as part of the preservation obligations. The lack of precedent was not surprising because a party is entitled to preserve ESI in whatever form it chooses (see Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 220 F.R.D. at 218 (S.D.N.Y. 2003)). If a party has the right to choose its ESI storage form, it has the right to alter it, so long as a complete and accurate duplicate of the ESI can be later produced and the requesting party's interests are not prejudiced. Treppel was not to the contrary because it dealt with the issuance of a preservation order, while Residential Funding concerned what evidence could be considered in determining whether to impose an adverse inference instruction sanction (Quinby II, supra at 103 n.12).

Judge Pitman ruled that the conversion of the ESI did not violate any preservation obligation but added that if a party creates its own burden or expense by converting into an inaccessible format data that it should have reasonably foreseen would be discoverable material at a time when it should have anticipated litigation, then it should not be entitled to shift costs of restoring and searching the data (Quinby II, supra at 104; see also Best Buy Stores, L.P. v. Dev. Div. Realty Corp., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88771, at *11 (D. Minn. Nov. 29, 2007) (downgrading database by converting ESI on active database into inaccessible ESI did not destroy the information it contained but rather removed it from a searchable format ... therefore, Best Buy did not have a duty to preserve the Odom database...)).

The issues arising from the conversion of ESI into an inaccessible form should not be confused with issues about whether a party may rely solely on backup tapes to fulfill preservation obligations. A backup tape is a snapshot of ESI created ordinarily at the end of a business day (see 7 Moores Federal Practice, Ch. 37A., Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.05[2][b]). Absent a litigation hold, ESI that is created and deleted during the day before the snapshot is taken is lost (see Wood Group Pressure Control, L.P. v. B & B Oilfield Serv., Inc., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 83708, at *32-34 (E.D. Lo. Apr. 27, 2007)). Accordingly, a party cannot rely exclusively on backup tapes to serve as a substitute for a litigation hold or a preservation instruction. Treppel and Quinby only address the consequences of a conversion of the form of ESI.

Analysis. Preservation requirements are not directly addressed in the federal rules. But the concern that parties would convert accessible ESI into inaccessible ESI solely for tactical litigation purposes arose in three different rulemaking contexts. In each, the Civil Rules Committee decided that the better approach was to require the party to pay the costs of reconverting inaccessible ESI, rather than prohibiting a party from initially converting the form of ESI.

Under Rule 26(b)(2)(B), a party need not provide discovery of electronically stored information from sources that the party identifies as not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or cost. The Civil Rules Committee was concerned that the rule would encourage parties to convert accessible ESI into inaccessible ESI solely to make discovery more difficult. After careful consideration, however, the Committee declined to revise the language because it was persuaded that as a practical matter businesses would not change their record-keeping systems cavalierly and incur potentially significant costs solely for litigation purposes. Moreover, converting ESI into an inaccessible form would disrupt day-to-day business, which typically is dependent on quick and easy access to business records.

The Committee recognized that in a given case, however, a party might nonetheless consider altering its ESI storage practices solely for tactical litigation purposes. Instead of prohibiting a party from converting the form of ESI by establishing a new preservation obligation standard, the Committee addressed this potential problem by requiring a court to consider specifically the party's conversion of the form of ESI when deciding whether to compel the party to produce the inaccessible ESI (see Committee Note to Rule 26(b)(2) (2006) (failure to produce relevant information that seems likely to have existed but is no longer available on more easily accessed sources is a factor to be considered in deciding whether the party must produce inaccessible ESI)). If accessible relevant ESI is converted into an inaccessible form, the court would set the conditions for the discovery, including requiring the producing party to pay the costs to reconvert the ESI into an accessible form (Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(2)(B)). Judge Pitman's analysis is consistent with the Committee's approach.

The preservation standard articulated by Judge Francis sounds similar to the Committee's admonition in Rule 34 cautioning parties not to convert the form of ESI to make it more difficult or burdensome for the requesting party to use the information efficiently in the litigation (see Committee Note to Rule 34 (2006)). Though the context is slightly different, the analysis is the same. Under Rule 34, a party is not required to produce ESI in the form in which it is ordinarily maintained, as long as it is produced in a reasonably usable form. The Committee was concerned that a party with the option to produce ESI in a reasonably usable form would convert accessible ESI and produce it in an inaccessible form. The Committee Note makes clear that the party may not convert the form of ESI and produce it in a form that significantly degrades its searchability, language that echoes Judge Francis's standard. If the party produces ESI in an inaccessible form, the questions whether a producing party should be required to convert such information to a more usable form, or should be required to produce it at all, should be addressed under Rule 26(b)(2)(B)" (see Committee Note to Rule 34 (2006)). Again, Judge Pitman's analysis is consistent with the Committee's approach.

The Civil Rules Committee had considered proposing a new Rule 34.1 that would explicitly set out a party's ESI preservation obligations. Ultimately it declined to propose the rule, concluding it might entrench on substantive law and would skirt too close to the limits of its rulemaking authority. However, the draft rule, which never went into effect, is instructive because it reflects the Committees preliminary views on the scope of the preservation obligation. Under the draft rule, a party converting accessible ESI into an inaccessible form would not be subject to sanctions for spoliation; however, the party would be required to arrange for the preservation of complete and accurate duplicates of ... data, if its routine practices involved the mutation of such data. On all three occasions, the Committee viewed finding a party responsible for paying costs to reconvert ESI a better solution than sanctioning the party.

Implications. The preservation standard articulated by Judge Francis in Treppel would impose significant restrictions. It is correct that sanctions for spoliation would be limited to situations in which the conversion of the form of ESI hindered discovery by making the recovery of the information more costly and burdensome. Thus, converting data from an active database to a mirror image would not degrade its searchability. But other conversions routinely undertaken for business purposes, like storing ESI off-site or microfilming the data, would risk sanctions because it might increase retrieval burdens and costs. The Treppel standard, even as limited by Judge Francis, would inevitably lead to unnecessary satellite litigation about whether a particular form change actually increases retrieval burdens. Any change in the form of ESI would invite scrutiny and challenge. Even apparently innocuous conversions, including converting ESI from WordPerfect to Word, might be sanctionable because the search capabilities may be negatively affected; for example, differences in metadata might increase search costs. Because parties risk severe penalties if they violate their preservation obligations, such a preservation standard, though limited, would have the unfortunate effect of constraining a party in making business decisions that are entirely proper.

Conclusions. In promulgating the 2006 ESI discovery amendments, the Civil Rules Committee was sensitive to the possibility that a party might convert the form of ESI from an accessible form into an inaccessible one. In the first instance, the Committee observed that the problem should be infrequent. Parties typically will refrain from converting accessible ESI into an inaccessible form because the same data must be used for daily business purposes. Though infrequent, the Committee decided nonetheless to address this possibility by making the party responsible to reconvert the form of ESI and produce it in an accessible form incur the expense to do so. The Committee adopted this approach not only because it concluded that a change in the standards governing preservation obligations might be outside its authority, but also because it did not prejudice the interests of the requesting party and it was more consistent with the approach followed generally in the 2006 ESI discovery rule amendments.

The Committee's approach is consistent with the principle that a party may maintain ESI in any form it chooses and with Rule 34, which permits a party to produce relevant ESI in any reasonably usable form, unless the party requests a specific form of production. Both Judge Pitman and Judge Francis emphasize a party's responsibility to produce converted ESI in a form that does not degrade its integrity and searchability. Their different approaches are designed to achieve the same result, ensuring that ESI produced in discovery is not altered from its original state and its searchability is not impaired. But Judge Pitman's approach, which is consistent with the electronic discovery rules, reaches the result while allowing parties to retain their current flexibility in maintaining the form of ESI. The lesson for the practitioner is to discuss the form of ESI to be produced in discovery early in the litigation. If any relevant accessible ESI is converted into an inaccessible form during the litigation, the party will likely be responsible to reconvert it at its own expense. But the act of converting the ESI in the first place is not sanctionable as spoliation so long as the reconverted ESI is a complete and accurate duplicate of the original ESI.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors' qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

95 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Rabiej on Production of ESI

2008 Emerging Issues 2628

Rabiej on Production of ESI

By John K. Rabiej

July 29, 2008

SUMMARY: In MGP Ingredients, Inc. v. Mars, Inc. both parties assume that ESI must be produced as it is kept in the usual course of business or organized and labeled to correspond to the categories specified in the discovery request. John K. Rabiej, Chief of the Rules Committee Support Office, discusses the facts of the case and explains why the procedures governing production of hard-copy documents do not apply to the production of ESI.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Rabiej, John K. Whether ESI Must Be Produced Either as Kept in Usual Course of Business or Organized to Correspond to Categories in the Discovery Request. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

Rule 34(b)(2)(E) sets out the procedures that apply to the production of documents and electronically stored information (ESI), unless the parties stipulate or the court orders otherwise. Under subparagraph (E)(i), a party must produce documents as they are kept in the usual course of business or must organize and label them to correspond to the categories in the request. Under subparagraph (E)(ii), a party must produce ESI in a form or forms in which it is ordinarily maintained or in a reasonably usable form or forms if the discovery request does not specify a form for producing it.

In MGP Ingredients, Inc. v. Mars, Inc., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 76853 (D. Kan. Oct. 15, 2007), the parties assumed that the production of ESI was governed by the separate procedures in both subparagraphs (E)(i) and (E)(ii). The plaintiff further contended, over the defendant's objections, that ESI must be organized and labeled in accordance with one of the options in subparagraph (E)(i). In fact, subparagraph (E)(i) applies only to the production of hard-copy documents, while subparagraph (E)(ii) exclusively governs the production of ESI (see 7 Moores Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.41[1]). The parties in MGP Ingredients, Inc., incorrectly framed the issue, mistakenly applying subparagraph (E)(i) to the production of ESI. The procedures in subparagraph (E)(ii) should have been followed in the case. Though a correct analysis would not have changed the ultimate result in this case, adopting this flawed analysis could have a substantial and untoward impact in other cases.

Facts. In MGP Ingredients, Inc., the defendant collected and scanned 38,000 pages of hard-copy documents. The defendant also collected 18.5 gigabytes of data, consisting of e-mail files and other electronic data. After reviewing the documents for privilege, the defendant provided the plaintiff in single-page .tiff format 27,717 Bates-numbered pages as part of its initial disclosure obligations. An additional 10,000 pages in .tiff format were later produced. The production was sorted according to custodian, the source of the .tiff images was distinguished either as hard-copy documents or electronic documents, and the .tiff images were produced in the order kept by the respective document custodians.

The plaintiff filed 54 separate discovery requests. The defendant relied on its initial disclosures as a full response to the discovery requests. The plaintiff filed a motion to compel, contending that the defendant violated Rule 34(b)(2)(E)(i) by failing to produce the documents in an order that categorized them by topic or related to a specific request. The plaintiff asserted that the defendant's production unjustifiably created a burden on the party seeking the discovery to determine which documents are responsive to which request. Id. at *7. The defendant responded that because the plaintiff had failed to request a specific form of production, the defendant's production of the material as it was kept in the usual course of business under the optional alternative in subparagraph (E)(i) was proper. The court ruled that the defendant's production complied with Rule 34(b)(2)(E)(i) and denied the plaintiff's motion to compel.

Flawed Analysis. The two options set out in Rule 34(b)(2)(E)(i) for producing documents are intended to prevent a party from unnecessarily creating obstacles for the other party by dumping mountains of documents. The over-production of ESI could raise similar problems. The drafters of the e-discovery amendments to Rule 34 recognized that the procedures in subparagraph (E)(i), which were written to apply to hard-copy documents, did not neatly fit ESI and had to be modified to apply to ESI. In particular, though the procedures in subparagraph (E)(i) work well with paper documents, which generally can be produced in only one form, they are not as effective with ESI, which can exist in different forms. Accordingly, the rulemakers crafted alternative, mutually exclusive, procedures in subparagraph (E)(ii) that are designed to apply specifically to ESI, not to supplement the procedures in subparagraph (E)(i).

Subparagraph (E)(ii) was drafted to provide an ESI functional analogue to the procedures governing hard-copy documents (see 7 Moores Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.42). It was intended to provide requirements comparable, but not in addition, to those in subparagraph (E)(i) to protect against deliberate or inadvertent production in ways that raise unnecessary obstacles for the requesting party. See Committee Note to Rule 34(b) (2006); see also Report of Advisory Committee on Civil Rules to Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure, July 25, 2005, found in House Document 109-105, at 159 (2006) (These alternatives [form ordinarily maintained or reasonably usable form] were intended to provide functional analogues to the existing rule language that provides choices for producing hard-copy documents....). The structure of subparagraph (E)(ii) was designed to track the structure in subparagraph (E)(i). Thus, the option in subparagraph (E)(ii) to produce ESI in a form or forms in which it is ordinarily maintained parallels the option to produce documents as they are kept in the usual course of business, while the second option to produce ESI in a reasonably usable form or forms parallels the option to produce documents in an order that categorizes the information by topic or related to a specific request.

Although the option to produce ESI in a reasonably usable form is not precisely the same as the option to produce hard-copy documents organized and labeled to correspond to the request, it is functionally analogous because it enables a party seeking production to locate the pertinent information on their own, regardless of any index or labeling provided by the responding party. See Zakre v. Norddeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6026, at *3 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 9, 2004) (citing The Sedona Principles: Best Practices, Recommendations & Principles for Addressing Document Discovery, Sedona Conference Working Group Series 2004 Principle 11)).

The distinction between the procedures in subparagraph (E)(i) and (E)(ii) is made plain in the language of the two pertinent provisions. By its terms, subparagraph (E)(i) applies only to documents, while subparagraph (E)(ii) applies to ESI. Though lawyers and judges have long interpreted documents to include ESI, Rule 34(a)(1)(A) and the accompanying Committee Note make clear that ESI is separate from and distinguishable from documents. The rule deliberately refers separately to designated documents and electronically stored information to highlight the differences between them (Rule 34(a)(1)(A)). Therefore, ESI is not a subset of documents; it is a new category in addition to documents. See Report of Advisory Committee on Civil Rules to Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure, July 25, 2005, found in House Document 109-105, at 157-158 (2006) (The Committee decided to recommend making electronically stored information separate from documents.) The distinction was drawn primarily to recognize the difficulty in fitting different forms of ESI, like dynamic databases that constantly change, within the traditional concept of document. See Committee Note to Rule 34(a) (2006).

Though conceptually distinct, documents often will include ESI. The Committee Note to Rule 34 tries to clarify the relationship of these two provisions by explaining that the term documents usually includes ESI but only in discovery rules that [were] not amended [in 2006], including Rules 30(f), 36(a), and 37(c)(2) and only in such rules as circumstances warrant. The limitation excludes Rule 34, which was amended. Thus, the parties in MGP Ingredients, Inc., should have applied the procedures in subparagraph (E)(ii) to ESI in lieu of the procedures governing hard-copy documents in subparagraph (E)(i). The arguably too-subtle distinction drawn in Rule 34 between ESI and documents may explain the parties confusion with the interplay of subparagraph (E)(i) and subparagraph (E)(ii).

Substantial Practical Differences Between the Two Production Procedures. There can be significant practical differences between producing ESI in a reasonably usable form under subparagraph (E)(ii) or producing ESI in an organized fashion that corresponds to specific categories in the request under subparagraph (E)(i). Under the plaintiffs view in MGP Ingredients, Inc., a party producing ESI in .tiff format would also be obligated to organize the electronic images to correspond to the categories in its request. Requesting that the images be segregated in this fashion may impose substantial burdens on the responding party. In its motion in opposition to the plaintiffs motion to compel, the defendants in MGP Ingredients, Inc., characterized the burden as follows: As is increasingly common, the bulk of Defendants production in this case consists of ESI. If, when faced with a large production of electronic information, litigants [are compelled to comply with subparagraph (E)(i)], the time and expense associated with document discovery will dramatically increase. Indeed, it would be nothing short of a monumental task for Defendants to identify which of Plaintiffs fifty-four (54) separate requests for production each of the thousands of produced documents in this case [are] responsive to (if any).

Subparagraph (E)(ii) eliminates the unnecessary burdens that would have been imposed on a party producing ESI if subparagraph (E)(i) were to apply. Under subparagraph (E)(ii), absent a request for a specific form of production, a party may produce ESI in a form in which it is ordinarily maintained, which typically means production in its native file format (see 7 Moores Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.43[2]). Alternatively, the party may produce ESI in a reasonably usable form. Determining whether production of ESI in a form other than in its native file format represents a reasonably usable form will depend on the circumstances of each case. Parties often produce ESI in .pdf or .tiff format in response to discovery requests. Each format has its advantages (see 7 Moores Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.43[3]). Though electronic .tiff images are not word text-searchable, their metadata can be searched and sorted. Moreover, .tiff images can be converted to word text-searchable images using an Optical Character Recognition software program. Producing ESI in paper may also be reasonably usable, but in such a case the hard-copy documents might have to be indexed or organized to correspond to the categories in the discovery request; otherwise they may not be reasonably usable.

Advice to Practitioners. The judge in MGP Ingredients, Inc., correctly noted that the plaintiff could have avoided the discovery production issue by simply requesting the defendant to produce the ESI in a specific form at an early stage in the litigation. The judges advice highlights the importance of the Rule 26(f) discovery-planning conference at which the parties must develop a discovery plan that addresses the form or forms in which [ESI] is to be produced. If the party fails to take advantage of this opportunity and request that ESI be produced in a specific form, the responding party has the option to produce it in its native file format or in a reasonably usable form. The responding party presumptively meets its production discovery obligations if it produces ESI in a word-searchable form, either text or metadata searchable, unless special circumstances demonstrate otherwise. There is no additional burden to produce ESI as it is kept in the usual course of business or organized and labeled to correspond to the categories in the discovery request.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

96 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Eli Wald on Fee Arrangements Between Co-Counsel

2008 Emerging Issues 2587

Eli Wald on Fee Arrangements Between Co-Counsel: Brown & Bain, P.A. v. OQuinn, 518 F.3d 1037 (9th Cir. 2008)

By Eli Wald

July 24, 2008

SUMMARY: In Brown & Bain, P.A. v. OQuinn the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals held that a law firm must pay a former co-counsel pursuant to the fee agreement between them, even if the law firm suffered a loss on the case. This Commentary, written by Professor Eli Wald, a legal ethics expert, summarizes the pertinent legal issues decided by the Court.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview

In Brown & Bain, P.A. v. OQuinn the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals held that a law firm must pay a former co-counsel pursuant to the fee agreement between them, even if the law firm suffered a loss on the case. This Commentary, written by Professor Eli Wald, a legal ethics expert and member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and the Colorado Bar Association Ethics Committee, summarizes the pertinent legal issues decided by the Court.

Factual Background

Attorney OQuinn engaged Brown & Bain to assist him in pursuing a class action suit. In relevant part, the engagement letter included two fee provisions. First, OQuinn was to pay Brown & Bain a discounted hourly rate (discounted relative to Brown & Bain standard hourly rate). Second, at the termination of the action by trial or settlement, OQuinn was to pay Brown & Bain additional payments. Brown & Bain, P.A. v. OQuinn, 518 F.3d at 1038 (2008).

The engagement letter specified that these additional payments were not to be paid to Brown & Bain until OQuinn and other plaintiffs counsel working on the matter, in the aggregate, recovered from the proceeds of the litigation an amount equal to the discount rate previously paid to Brown & Bain. Further, the engagement letter, drafted by Brown & Bain, stated that After [OQuinn] and the other plaintiffs counsel working on the case (in the aggregate) have recovered an amount equal to the discount rate payments the remainder of our respective recoveries will be divided one-half to [OQuinn] and the other plaintiffs counsel and one-half to Brown & Bain until our additional payments have been fully paid. Any recovery remaining after payment of Brown & Bains discount rate and additional payments in this action belongs to [OQuinn] and the other plaintiffs counsel Id.

In accordance with the first fee provision of the engagement letter, Brown & Bain billed OQuinn on a monthly basis and was paid the discount rate monthly to a total of $2,920,975.17 for 26,000 hours of work. Id. After the case settled, pursuant to the contingent fee agreement with the plaintiffs, OQuinn retained roughly 40% of the settlement, $10,106,988.61 (plus costs chargeable to its clients). Brown & Bain demanded payment of the additional payments pursuant to the second fee provision of the engagement letter. OQuinn refused. Id. at 10381039.

Procedural Background

Brown & Bain filed a breach of contract suit in Arizona state court. OQuinn removed the action to federal court and filed a counterclaim for repudiation of the contract based on Brown & Bains withdrawal from the class action. Both sides filed for summary judgment and the trial court gave summary judgment for Brown & Bain. OQuinn appealed. Id. at 1039.

Pertinent Legal Questions

(a) Must a law firm pay a former co-counsel pursuant to the fee agreement between them, even if the law firm suffered a loss on the case?

(b) Does Arizona Rule of Professional Conduct 1.5 govern the relationship between lawyer and lawyer and apply to a fee arrangement between co-counsel?

The Decision

(a) Must a law firm pay a former co-counsel pursuant to the fee agreement between them, even if the law firm suffered a loss on the case? The Court framed the two issues presented by OQuinn as follows:

(1) Whether the term recovery in the engagement letter is so clear that its meaning could be determined as a matter of law, and (2) whether Brown & Bain had abandoned the contract and so was not entitled to further compensation.

Id. at 1039.

OQuinn essentially argued that the term recovery in the engagement letter meant net recovery as opposed to gross recovery. Thus, his liability for the additional payments began only when OQuinn had recovered all the expenses it had absorbed. On the basis of its own accounting to itself, OQuinn absorbed expenses in excess of the $10,106,988.61 it grossly recovered and consequently was not liable to Brown & Bain for additional payments per the engagement letter.

The Court rejected OQuinns interpretation of recovery. It held that [a]ccording to the plain language of this provision, costs reimbursements are not to be deducted in determining the amount equal to the discount rate payments.

OQuinns obligation is triggered when it has recovered an amount -- not a net amount -- equivalent to the payments already made. Unquestionably, when OQuinn received an amount of over $10 million from the settlement, it had recovered several times the $2.9 million it had disbursed in discount rate payments (emphasis added). Id. at 1040.

Reasoning that when interpreting a contract, Arizona courts attempt to ascertain and give effect to the intention of the parties at the time the contract was made, Id. (citation omitted), the Court concluded [i]t is the total gross amount received by the lawyers that acts as the trigger for the additional payments to Brown & Bain, not a net amount. Id.

The Court then turned to OQuinns second line of defense, Brown & Bains withdrawal from the class action. It reasoned that it was part of OQuinns defense to show that the withdrawal of Brown & Bain had burdened the clients [and constituted a breach of contract, but] OQuinn did not do so. Id. at 1042.

Having rejected both of OQuinns arguments, the Court affirmed the trial courts grant of summary judgment to Brown & Bain and held that OQuinn must pay Brown & Bain pursuant to the fee agreement between them. The Court noted that while OQuinns alleged loss was actually unproved, even if OQuinn had been able to establish a loss in the class action, such a loss would not determine the reasonableness of the allocation of charges among the lawyers themselves. Id. at 1041.

(b) Does Arizona Rule of Professional Conduct 1.5 govern the relationship between lawyer and lawyer and apply to a fee arrangement between co-counsel? In the alternative, OQuinn argued that disbursement of the additional payments would violate Arizona Rule of Professional Conduct 1.5. Arizonas Rule 1.5(a), following ABA Model Rule 1.5(a), states in relevant part: a lawyer shall not make an agreement for, charge, or collect an unreasonable fee or an unreasonable amount for expenses. OQuinn maintained that as a result of absorbing charges related to the case he suffered a loss of $3.2 million and that payment of the additional payments would bring Brown & Bains total fee to $6.2 million. OQuinn argued that such allocation of fees between Brown & Bain and himself was unreasonable in violation of Rule 1.5(a).

The Court rejected OQuinn argument on two different grounds. First, it held that even assuming that OQuinn did in fact suffer a loss as the result of absorbing charges related to the case, however ethically appropriate, the absorption of the charges did not diminish what OQuinn had received from the proceeds, and therefore OQuinn remained liable to Brown & Bain for the amount it had agreed to pay. Id. at 141.

Second, the Court clarified that the Arizona Rules of Professional Conduct Rule 1.5 govern the relation between lawyer and client, not between lawyer and lawyer. Id. Thus, even if the allocation of fees between co-counsel is unreasonable, it does not violate Rule 1.5., because additional payments to Brown & Bain would have no effect on the fees already charged the client. Id.

Analysis

The Courts straight-forward reading of the engagement letter and its decision to hold OQuinn to its commitment to pay co-counsel Brown & Bain additional payments, notwithstanding the fact that OQuinn allegedly suffered a loss in the case as a whole, reflects the Courts commitment to the principle of the Freedom of Contracts and its application to dealings among members of the legal profession. The Courts decision amounts to advising OQuinn that you have made your bed, now lie in it. Having executed a contractual agreement with Brown & Bain, OQuinn must accept its consequences, even if, in hindsight, it appears that OQuinn made a bad business decision.

Brown & Bain, P.A. v. OQuinn thus stands for the proposition that courts will strictly enforce fee agreements between law firms. The holding rejects a somewhat nostalgic view of the practice of law as an honorable profession encompassing implicit duties of conduct among practitioners, including, for example, a duty to reasonably share fees among co-counsel. Instead, it affirms a more business oriented image of the practice of law, in which contractual obligations govern the relationships among lawyers. See generally, Russell G. Pearce, The Professionalism Paradigm Shift: Why Discarding Professional Ideology Will Improve the Conduct and Reputation of the Bar, 70 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1229 (1996).

The Courts perspective also explains its interpretation of Arizonas Rule of Professional Conduct 1.5. The Court was correct in pointing out that Rule 1.5 has traditionally been interpreted to govern the relationship between attorney and client, not between lawyer and lawyer. But the language of the Rule does not preclude a broad reading that would cover the latter relationship. Rule 1.5(a) reads: A lawyer shall not make an agreement for, charge, or collect an unreasonable fee or an unreasonable amount for expenses. Notably, however, it does not read: A lawyer shall not make an agreement for, charge, or collect from a client an unreasonable fee or an unreasonable amount for expenses. (emphasis added). Thus, the Court could have, in theory, read the Rule to cover the relationship between lawyer and lawyer.

Arguably, the Court read Rule 1.5 narrowly consistent with its business oriented approach to the practice of law, pursuant to which relationships between lawyers are to be governed by contracts, not by court-imposed professional duties grounded in the rules of professional conduct.

Practice Tip #1. Co-counsel should negotiate and spell out important contingencies in their fee agreements because courts will strictly enforce fee agreements between law firms and will not read professional duties of reasonable dealings into such contracts.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Eli Wald is a professor at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law, where he teaches in the areas of legal ethics and legal profession. He is the author of numerous law review articles examining topics such as the regulation of the corporate bar in the post-corporate scandals era, increased lawyer mobility, attorney-client communications and the rise and fall of Jewish law firms.

Prof. Wald, a Continuing Legal Education instructor and expert witness, is a member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and a member of the Colorado Bar Associations Ethics Committee.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

97 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Eli Wald on Unauthorized Practice of Law in Delaware

2008 Emerging Issues 2588

Eli Wald on Unauthorized Practice of Law in Delaware: Revised Delaware Lawyers Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 5.5(d)

By Eli Wald

July 24, 2008

SUMMARY: The Delaware Supreme Court recently amended its Unauthorized Practice of Law (UPL) provision, Delaware Lawyers Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 5.5(d). This Commentary, written by Professor Eli Wald, summarizes the pertinent legal issues arising under the revised Rule.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Revised Delaware Lawyers Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 5.5(d)

Overview

The Delaware Supreme Court recently amended its Unauthorized Practice of Law (UPL) provision, Delaware Lawyers Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 5.5(d). The revised Rule allows lawyers admitted in a foreign jurisdiction to practice law as in-house counsel in Delaware on a permanent basis and streamlines Delawares UPL procedures by ordering that lawyers admitted in a foreign jurisdiction must comply with Delaware Supreme Court Rule 55.1(a)(1), Limited Permission to Practice to In-house Counsel. This Commentary, written by Professor Eli Wald, a legal ethics expert and member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and the Colorado Bar Association Ethics Committee, summarizes the pertinent legal issues arising under the revised Rule.

Revised Delaware UPL Rule

In January 2008 the Delaware Supreme Court amended Rule 5.5(d) of the Delaware Lawyers Rules of Professional

Conduct effective immediately. Rule 5.5(d) and Rule 5.5(d)(1) were amended by adding the words or in a foreign jurisdiction, and the words after compliance with Supreme Court Rule 55.1(a)(1) were added in subsection (d)(1). As amended, Rule 5.5(d) and Rule 5.5(d)(1) read as follows:

(d) A lawyer admitted in another United States jurisdiction, or in a foreign jurisdiction, and not disbarred or suspended from practice in any jurisdiction, may provide legal services in this jurisdiction that:

(1) are provided to the lawyer's employer or its organizational affiliates after compliance with Supreme Court Rule 55.1(a)(1) and are not services for which the forum requires pro hac vice admission; or

Background

In August 2002 the American Bar Association revised Model Rule 5.5 to explicitly permit out-of-state lawyers admitted in another United States jurisdiction to work as in-house counsel and provide legal services to the lawyer's employer or its organizational affiliates without requiring pro hac vice admission. Model Rules of Professional Conduct R. 5.5(d)(1) (2007) (Rule 5.5 as amended in August 2002). Similarly, the Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers approves of allowing out-of-state attorneys working in-house to provide legal services to their employer. The Restatement states: [s]tates have permitted practice within the jurisdiction by inside legal counsel for a corporation or similar organization, even if the lawyer is not locally admitted and even if the lawyer's work consists entirely of in-state activities, when all of the lawyer's work is for the employer-client . . . and does not involve appearance in court. Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers §3 cmt. F (2000). The Restatement reasons that [l]eniency is appropriate because the only concern is with the client-employer, who is presumably in a good position to assess the quality and fitness of the lawyer's work. Id.

Many states exempt in-house counsel from their UPL regulations. Professor Needham explains that such exemptions take the form of regulations granting admission status to in-house counsel (usually rules of professional conduct or court rules) or opinions by states' committees charged with enforcing UPL provisions. *See, Carol A. Needham, Multijurisdictional Practice Regulations Governing Attorneys Conducting A Transactional Practice, 2003 U. Ill. L. Rev. 1331, 1344*1345 (listing states allowing practice by out-of-state in-house counsel).

Analysis

Following the ABA, in September 2003 the Delaware Supreme Court adopted a limited practice rule for in-house counsel. Delaware Supreme Court Rule 55.1, Limited Permission to Practice to In-house Counsel (2005).

While subsection 55.1(a)(1) stated: Lawyers admitted to practice in a jurisdiction outside of the United States may apply individually to the Supreme Court for a Delaware Certificate of Limited Practice, pursuant to the provisions of this Rule, Id., Delaware Rule of Professional Conduct 5.5(d) provided only that A lawyer admitted in another United States jurisdiction, and not disbarred or suspended from practice in any jurisdiction, may provide legal services in this jurisdiction: (1) that are provided to the lawyers employer or its organizational affiliates and are not services for which the forum requires pro hac vice admission[.] Delaware Lawyers Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 5.5(d) (2005). Rule 5.5(d) did not explicitly authorize provision of legal services by in-house counsel admitted in a foreign jurisdiction. Thus, what subsection 55.1(a)(1) permitted, Rule 5.5(d) did not authorize.

The recent amendment to Rule 5.5(d) corrects this ambiguity. Rule 5.5(d), as revised, now clearly states that A lawyer admitted. . . in a foreign jurisdiction. . . may provide legal services in this jurisdiction that: (1) are provided to the lawyers employer or its organizational affiliates after compliance with Supreme Court Rule 55.1(a)(1). . .

However, while clearing one ambiguity, the revised Rule creates a new one: subsection 55.1(a)(1) only applies to lawyers admitted in a foreign jurisdiction. Thus, while presumably the Court intended to generally subject lawyers admitted in another United States jurisdiction to Rule 55.1(a) and lawyers admitted in a foreign jurisdiction to subsection 55.1(a)(1), the revised Rule only accomplishes the latter.

Comment 15 to Rule 5.5 clarifies that in-house counsel authorized to offer legal services in Delaware pursuant to Rule 5.5(d), including attorneys admitted in a foreign jurisdiction, may establish a permanent office in Delaware. While the comment only refers to lawyers who are admitted to practice in another United States jurisdiction, see, Delaware Lawyers Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 5.5(d) cmt. 15 (2008), it is clear that given the amendment to Rule 5.5(d) itself, the comment should be read to apply equally to lawyers admitted in another United States jurisdiction and attorneys admitted in a foreign jurisdiction.

Similarly, the rationale for allowing out-of-state in-house counsel to offer legal services to their employers in Delaware, stated in comment 16, see, Delaware Lawyers Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 5.5(d) cmt. 16 (2008) (The lawyer's ability to represent the employer outside the jurisdiction in which the lawyer is licensed generally serves the interests of the employer and does not create an unreasonable risk to the client and others because the employer is well situated to assess the lawyer's qualifications and the quality of the lawyer's work.), applies with equal force to lawyers admitted in a foreign jurisdiction. The amendment to Rule 5.5(d) simply acknowledges current global practice realities in which Delaware entities employ attorneys admitted in foreign jurisdictions.

Practice Tip #1. An attorney admitted in a foreign jurisdiction may practice law as in-house counsel in Delaware on a permanent basis, subject to the procedures specified in Delaware Supreme Court Rule 55.1(a)(1), Limited Permission to Practice to In-house Counsel. However, foreign attorneys (as well as lawyers admitted in another United States jurisdiction) intending to practice as in-house counsel in Delaware should note:

- . Practice in Delaware pursuant to subsection 5.5(d) subjects attorneys to the disciplinary authority of Delaware, see, Delaware Lawyers Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 5.5(d) cmt. 19 (2008); and

- . Practice in Delaware pursuant to subsection 5.5(d) subjects attorneys to communication duties pursuant to Delaware Lawyers Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 1.4. Specifically, a lawyer may have to inform the client that the lawyer is not licensed to practice law in Delaware, for example, when the representation occurs primarily in Delaware and requires knowledge of Delaware law. See, Delaware Lawyers Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 5.5(d) cmt. 20 (2008).

Practice Tip #2. Foreign attorneys (as well as lawyers admitted in another United States jurisdiction) intending to practice as in-house counsel in Delaware should note that establishing an office or other systematic presence in Delaware for the purpose of rendering legal services to the employer, may subject the lawyers to registration or other requirements, compare, e.g., Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court Rule 4:02(9), S.J.C. Rule 4:02(9) (2008) (imposing an annual registration requirement for in-house lawyers), including assessments for client protection funds and mandatory continuing legal education. See, Delaware Lawyers Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 5.5(d) cmt. 17 (2008).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Eli Wald is a professor at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law, where he teaches in the areas of legal ethics and legal profession. He is the author of numerous law review articles examining topics such as the regulation of the corporate bar in the post-corporate scandals era, increased lawyer mobility, attorney-client communications and the rise and fall of Jewish law firms.

Prof. Wald, a Continuing Legal Education instructor and expert witness, is a member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and a member of the Colorado Bar Associations Ethics Committee.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

98 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

McDonnell on O'Casek v. Children's Home & Aid Society , 2008 Ill. LEXIS 628.

2008 Emerging Issues 2568

Joe McDonnell on O'Casek v. Children's Home & Aid Society of IL, 2008 Ill. LEXIS 628. What is the Effect of a Later Amendment to a Statute after It Has Been Declared Unconstitutional?

By Joseph B. McDonnell

July 24, 2008

SUMMARY: Where the legislature acts to amend a statute shortly after a court decision finding the statute unconstitutional, does the amendment amount to a reenactment of the challenged statute? The answer and how O'Casek v. Children's Home and Aid Society, 2008 Ill. LEXIS 628, was decided is explained in detail by experienced Illinois attorney and litigator Joe McDonnell.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: A Statute is Declared Unconstitutional. Now What? Where a statute is declared unconstitutional, it is simply null and void and has no binding effect. The legislature may or may not take action to cure whatever defect caused the court to find the law invalid. Where the statute in question contained an amendment to a prior law on the same subject, the prior law will ordinarily be considered to have been resuscitated following the declaration of unconstitutionality. This may lead to serious complications if, following the ruling finding the law invalid, the legislature undertakes to amend the statute once more. Without explicit language in the amendment indicating the legislative intent, does the new amendment constitute a reenactment of the statute previously found unconstitutional? Or is the amendment one which is to be applied to the statute as it existed prior to the amendment considered by the court in its finding overturning the statute? To muddy the waters even more, suppose the legislature passes yet another bill years later, more comprehensive in its language, and which purports to reenact the earlier statute without the offensive portion which had fallen with the decision of unconstitutionality? Does that action serve to explain the intent of the previous legislature with respect to the earlier amendment?

These questions were presented in O'Casek v. Children's Home and Aid Society of Illinois, Docket No. 105050, 2008 Ill. LEXIS 628, decided by the Illinois Supreme Court on June 19, 2008. The core issue considered by the Court was whether an amendment to Sec. 2-622 of the Code of Civil Procedure (735 ILCS 5/2-622) was in fact a reenactment of the statute previously held unconstitutional by the Court in Best v. Taylor Machine Works, 179 Ill.2d 367 (Ill. 1997). If that were the case, it would mean that a plaintiff in a medical malpractice case, who had filed a complaint without the certificate of merit required by Sec. 2-622(a), could not obtain an extension of ninety days to file the required affidavit if she had earlier dismissed a suit based on the same or similar facts. Thus, a complaint filed under such circumstances would suffer dismissal with prejudice.

On the other hand, if the amendment were deemed applicable to the prior version of the statute (i.e., that which preceded the statute held invalid), under which an extension of time was allowable without regard to whether or not an earlier case had been voluntarily dismissed, the plaintiff's complaint would not be subject to dismissal.

In earlier opinions, the same district from which the case under review originated had held that the post-Best amendment constituted a reenactment of the 1995 version of Sec. 2-622 found unconstitutional in Best. Cargill v. Czelatdko, 353 Ill. App. 3d at 655 (4th Dist. 2004); followed in Crull v. Sriratana, 376 Ill. App. 3d 803 (4th Dist. 2007). In O'Casek, the appeal under review by the Supreme Court, a different panel of the fourth district had held that, by virtue of a statutory enactment (Public Act 94-677), several months after its decision in Cargill, it was clear that the 1995 version of section 2-622 "disappeared with Best and was never reenacted." O'Casek, 374 Ill. App. 3d at 513.

History of the Statute. In its original form, Sec. 2-622 required a "certificate of merit" to be filed with every complaint based on healing art malpractice. Sec. 2-622(a) (1). If, however, plaintiff had been unable to obtain a professional consultation prior to the expiration of the applicable statute of limitations, and was thus unable to supply the required certificate, he could obtain an additional ninety days after filing the complaint to do so. Sec. 2-622(a) (2).

The Civil Justice Reform Amendments of 1995, which effected major changes in medical malpractice litigation, included a change in Sec. 2-622 which eliminated the ninety-day extension in any case where the plaintiff had previously dismissed a suit based on the same or a similar cause of action. Therefore, one who had earlier taken a voluntary dismissal of her case was precluded from obtaining an extension of time to file the certificate of merit, thus suffering dismissal of her suit with prejudice.

On Dec. 18, 1997, the Illinois Supreme Court held the Civil Justice Reform Amendments of 1995 unconstitutional in their entirety. Best v. Taylor Machine Works, 179 Ill. 2d 367 (1997). The content of Sec. 2-622 (including the bar on the 90-day extension of time where the plaintiff had earlier voluntarily dismissed her suit) was not directly involved in the Court's determination. However, because the court found the provisions of the Act not severable, it held that the entire statute must fall. Best, 179 Ill.2d at 467.

The Naprapath Amendment: Legislative Action -- or Reaction? The Illinois legislature amended Sec. 2-622 to add naprapaths to the list of health care professionals to be included in those covered by the statute only two months after the Court's decision in Best. This was Public Act 90-579. The structure and placement of the bill in the pre-Best version of the statute led some to the belief that the bill was intended to and did reenact the statute as it existed when Best was decided. If true, that would reinstate the provision barring an extension of time to file the affidavit of merit if plaintiff had previously dismissed her case. This argument appeared to be supported by the Court's invitation to the legislature in Best "to reenact whatever provisions it deems desirable or appropriate." Best, 179 Ill. 2d at 471. Finally, there was nothing in the Best decision which had called into question any aspect of Sec. 2-622; it was included in the finding of unconstitutionality only because of principles of severability.

Those opposing this view argued that Public Act 90-579 was intended only to extend the requirements of Sec. 2-622 to those who practice the healing art of 'naprapathy,' rather than to reenact the pre-Best [i.e., 1995] version of Sec. 2-622. Supporting this view was the fact that nothing in the legislative debates concerning P.A. 90-579 showed any reference to the Best decision, or suggested that the legislature intended to do anything than to add naprapaths to the list of health care professionals.

The Supreme Court's holding that P.A. 90-579 did not reenact the statute stricken in Best is based on several principles of statutory construction, the most important of which is to ascertain and give effect to the intent of the legislature. The Court emphasized the role of legislative history in determining that intent, and discussed the sometimes convoluted mechanics of law-making and the guidelines offered by the Statute on Statutes and that governing Operations of the General Assembly.

Legislative Intent: What is-and what is not-included? The Supreme Court's opinion is significant in that, although it affirms the judgment of the appellate court, it disagrees with a major premise of that court's decision—that a still later amendment to Sec. 2-622 demonstrates the legislative intent behind the post-Best amendment.

In its opinion in O'Casek, the appellate court stressed the fact that P.A. 94-677 effective August 25, 2005, had amended the Code of Civil Procedure by "reenacting and changing" section 2-622." Unlike P.A. 90-579, which used the 1995 version of section 2-622, P.A. 94-677 used the pre-1995 version of Sec. 2-622, with the exception that it also incorporated the naprapath amendment contained in P.A. 90-579. To the appellate court, this clarified the earlier legislature's intent that P.A. 90-579 was not intended to re-enact the statute stricken by the court in Best.

The Supreme Court found this analysis dubious at best, pointing out that the actions of the 94th General Assembly can hardly be relevant in determining the intent of the 90th General Assembly in passing legislation seven years earlier. The Court twice pointed out, at the beginning and at the end of its discussion regarding statutory construction, that "[s]tatutes are to be construed as they were intended to be construed when they were passed." O'Casek, slip op. pp. 18, 20.

In addition, the Court criticized the appellate court's construction of P.A. 94-677, enacted in 2005, as being a "continuation" of the pre-1995 version of the statute. The Court stated that the language used in the 2005 amendment -- "reenacting and changing Section 2-622"—indicated more than a mere continuance of existing legislation.

Ultimately, the Supreme Court's opinion was based on an analysis of the language used in P.A. 90-579, aided by a reading of the legislative debates, the Statute on Statutes (5 ILCS 70/5) and the General Assembly Operations Act (25 ILCS 10/10(f)). The debates contained no discussion of the Best decision or any suggestion that the bill was intended to re-enact any part of the statute held invalid in Best. For all that appeared, the only reason the bill was introduced was to add the practice of naproprathy to the list of healing art practitioners covered by the statute. This conclusion was fortified by the constitutional and statutory directives concerning new legislation, as well as applicable House and Senate Rules, requiring that new matter be either italicized or underscored. The bill in question contained no italics or underscoring except those adding napropaths to the list of health care providers, thus indicating this was the only change the legislature intended, and that the bill was not intended as a re-enactment of Sec. 2-622.

Tips for Practitioners. A case involving the application of a statute may bring into play several principles of statutory construction. The cardinal rule, of course, is to give effect to the intent of the legislature. Unlike other cases where the meaning of statute is unclear, mandating the use of recognized aids in construction, the problem here was not the meaning of the language used, but whether the legislature intended to reenact in its entirety the statute which included the amendment. In such cases, although the dissenters in O'Casek correctly point out that it is not always a reliable guide, a study of the legislative debates is imperative for such light as they may impart to the particular issue.

The Legislative Reference Bureau in Springfield is the place to start the search. The Bureau maintains a website at www.ilga.gov which contains a link to researching legislative history, including instructions for obtaining legislative documents. Another excellent source is Northwestern University's website <http://www.law.northwestern.edu/library/services>.

A second aspect of the Supreme Court's opinion deserves mention -- that is the rule of appellate review and that it is the judgment of the Appellate Court, rather than the reasons assigned for its decision, which is the subject of review in the Supreme Court. What the Appellate Court may assign as reasons for its judgment is not a matter of concern in the Supreme Court. See Ramirez v. Midway Moving and Storage, Inc. 880 N.E.2d 653 (1st Dist. 2007). The rule should be kept firmly in mind when representing any party on appeal. Is the decision appealed from correct or incorrect, regardless of the reasons given by the lower court?

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant State's Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students. Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

99 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Manning on Vitanza v. James & Janicky v. Point Bay Fuel, Inc.

2008 Emerging Issues 2512

The Appellate Division Warns That Its Jurisdictional Rules Are Not To Be Broken: Manning on Vitanza v. James, 397 N.J. Super. 516 (App. Div. 2008) and Janicky v. Point Bay Fuel, Inc., 396 N.J. Super. 545 (App. Div. 2007).

By Diana Manning

July 14, 2008

SUMMARY: In this expert commentary, Diana C. Manning, an experienced appellate practitioner and shareholder in the Florham Park, New Jersey law firm of Bressler, Amery & Ross, P.C. discusses the recent Appellate Division opinions in Vitanza v. James, 397 N.J. Super. 516 (App. Div. 2008) and Janicky v. Point Bay Fuel, Inc., 396 N.J. Super. 545 (App. Div. 2007).

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Practitioners are cautioned that the Appellate Division has sent the message that it will be strictly enforcing the rules. Dismissing several interlocutory appeals, the Appellate Division warned practitioners to ignore jurisdictional requirements at their own peril.

Interlocutory Appeals without Proper Leave Will Be Rejected. Vitanza v. James, 397 N.J. Super. 516 (App. Div. 2008), a libel and slander case, involved defendants appeal from the entry of summary judgment on liability, and the denial of defendants motion to dismiss plaintiffs claims. Despite the fact that the orders appealed from were not final and did not dispose of all issues, the defendants filed an interlocutory appeal without seeking leave to do so.

Ordinarily, appeals may only be taken from final judgments of the trial courts, and from those interlocutory orders expressly referenced in N.J. Ct. R. 2:2-3. Final judgments are those that dispose of all issues as to all parties. See Kattoura v. Patel, 262 N.J. Super. At 40 (App. Div. 1993). Review of an interlocutory order must be sought through a motion for leave to appeal as set forth in N.J. Ct. R. 2:5-6. Leave to file an interlocutory appeal is granted sparingly. Moon v. Warren Haven Nursing Home, 182 N.J. at 513 (2005).

Referencing the strong policy against piecemeal review and interruption of the orderly processing of cases to disposition in the trial courts, the Vitanza Court noted that its earlier warnings to the bar and trial courts regarding compliance with the rules applicable to interlocutory appeals have gone unheeded. Id. at 518. While recognizing that past deviations have been excused if the respondent did not move to dismiss, the Court warned that practitioners should not expect such indulgences in the future:

The Rules are written to require uniformity as a means of providing equal justice. The time has come to enforce the Rules and not to decide an appeal merely because the respondent did not move to dismiss it and it was fully briefed.

Id. at 519.

Rejection of Improper Finality Certifications. Similarly, in Janicky v. Point Bay Fuel, Inc., 396 N.J. Super. 545 (App. Div. 2007), the Appellate Division chastised both the trial court and the attorneys involved for their improper use of a finality certification to circumvent [the Appellate Divisions] exclusive authority to determine whether leave should be granted to appeal an interlocutory order. Id. At 547. The Appellate Division rejected the parties attempt to certify as final, and appeal from, a declaratory order which simply disposed of a single legal issue in the case. Id. At 552.

The issue considered in Janicky related to a home fuel oil suppliers issuance of a ProGuard Accidental Release Protection Certificate designed to reimburse the owners cleanup costs associated with an accidental release of oil from a fuel oil system, and whether that Certificate constituted a policy of insurance. After a claim for reimbursement was denied, plaintiffs filed a Complaint seeking the benefit of the Certificate, and asserting consumer fraud claims based on the alleged misrepresentation that the issuer of the Certificate was not authorized to sell insurance.

Defendant filed a motion seeking dismissal of the Consumer Fraud Act claims arguing that the Department of Banking and Insurance had exclusive jurisdiction to determine whether the Certificate constituted insurance. Plaintiffs filed a cross-motion seeking a declaration that the Certificate was an insurance policy. The trial court issued a declaratory order stating that the Certificate constituted a policy of insurance. Thereafter, the Court entered a Consent Order submitted by the parties declaring the order to be final for purposes of N.J. Ct. R. 4:42-2. Despite the fact that there remained open issues for determination in the trial court, defendant then appealed to the Appellate Division seeking review of the predominant legal issue in the case, and which was decided by the trial court.

Under New Jersey Court Rule 2:2-3, parties may seek interlocutory review in a limited number of circumstances. One of those circumstances is an order certified as final pursuant to New Jersey Court Rule 4:42-2 in order to permit execution on a partial summary judgment fully adjudicating a separable claim for affirmative relief or all claims by and against a single party in multi-party litigation. Id. At 550 (citing DOLiviera v. Micol, 321 N.J. Super. 637 (App. Div. 1999)).

The Order in Janicky did not meet those criteria and the Court signaled that procedurally improper attempts to circumvent the Rule will no longer be tolerated:

Unfortunately, however, our numerous pronouncements regarding the inappropriateness of using a finality certification to obtain review of an interlocutory order have gone unheeded.

Id. At 552. Practitioners should now expect the Appellate Division to vacate such a certification if an order does not fall within the terms of Rule 4:42-2. Id. At 551 (quoting S.N. Golden Estates, Inc. v. Contl Cas. Co., 317 N.J. Super. At 88 (App. Div. 1998)).

Expect Strict Enforcement. The Vitanza and Janicky Courts issued a strong warning to practitioners they should strictly adhere to the jurisdictional rules when practicing in the Appellate Division. While their criticism was directed at improper appeal from interlocutory orders, practitioners should prepare for strict enforcement across the full range of procedural issues that may arise. Indeed, the number of appeals properly before the Court is a central focus of the Appellate Divisions determination to strictly enforce its jurisdictional requirements:

If we treat every interlocutory appeal on the merits just because it is fully briefed, there will be no adherence to the Rules, and parties will not feel there is a need to seek leave to appeal from interlocutory orders. At a time when this court struggles to decide over 7,000 appeals a year in a timely manner, it should not be presented with piecemeal litigation and should be reviewing interlocutory decisions only when they genuinely warrant pre-trial review.

Vitanza, 397 N.J. Super. at 519 (quoting Parker v. City of Trenton, 382 N.J. Super. at 458 (App. Div. 2006)).

While the Vitanza and Janicky decisions were decided in the context of improper interlocutory appeals, the logic is equally applicable to other procedural aspects of the Court Rules all of which are designed to efficiently and fairly handle the numerous matters considered by the appellate courts. The Appellate Rules place great emphasis on the timing of appeals, and the manner in which information is presented to the Court. Given the Appellate Divisions harsh reaction to the improper appeals in Vitanza and Janicky, practitioners should be very mindful of the Appellate Divisions jurisdictional requirements and its many procedural requirements.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Diana Manning is a member of the law firm of Bressler, Amery & Ross, P.C., and practices in its Florham Park, New Jersey office. Ms. Manning concentrates her practice in trial and appellate litigation, including commercial litigation, professional negligence, and product liability claims. She is admitted to practice in New Jersey and New York, as well as, the U.S. District Court for the District of New Jersey, the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York, and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. Ms. Manning has been involved in a number of reported decisions, appears frequently before the New Jersey Superior Court, Appellate Division, and has been appointed to the Malpractice Insurance Committee and the Appellate Practice Committee of the New Jersey State Bar Association. She has authored the Professional Liability and Product Liability chapters of the LexisNexis Practice Guide, New Jersey Personal Injury Litigation, 2007. She also authored the article, The Expansion of Recoverable Damages in Legal Malpractice Actions Impacts Us All, for the New Jersey Lawyer Magazine.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

100 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

David Fish on Pancoe v. Singh, 376 Ill. App. 3d 900 (1st Dist. 2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 2515

David Fish on Pancoe v. Singh, 376 Ill. App. 3d 900 (1st Dist. 2007): Party May Call Opponents Expert without Disclosing Intent to Do So in Rule 213(f) Disclosures.

By David Fish

July 14, 2008

SUMMARY: A trial court judge may allow a party to call the opposing partys expert witness even if the party did not disclose that witness in its Rule 213(f) disclosures. However, before trying this, a practitioner must carefully assess the likelihood that an appellate court will agree with the trial judge. Pancoe v. Singh, 376 Ill. App. 3d 900 (1st Dist. 2007), discusses this situation and provides some guidance on analyzing the risk.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In Illinois, a party may be allowed to call an expert witness it did not include in its Rule 213(f) disclosures if the testimony of the witness is not prejudicial or of great surprise to the opposing party. Pancoe v. Singh, 376 Ill. App. 2d at 913-14 (1st Dist. 2007). Allowing a party to call a witness it did not disclose in its Rule 213(f) disclosure is not automatically an abuse of discretion by the trial court, and the trial courts decision will be overturned only if no reasonable person would adopt the same view. Id. at 913.

In reviewing the decision of a trial judge to allow testimony of a witness not disclosed under Rule 213(f), the appellate court will apply a six-factor test to determine whether the trial court abused its discretion. Id. at 913. The six-factor analysis considers the following: (1) the surprise to the adverse party; (2) the prejudicial effect of the testimony; (3) the nature of the testimony; (4) the diligence of the adverse party; (5) the timely objection by the adverse party; and (6) the good faith of the party calling the witness. Id. at 913.

In Pancoe, during the Plaintiffs case-in-chief on the second day of trial, the Plaintiff called the Defendants expert witness to testify. Id. at 904. The Defendant objected because the Plaintiff did not disclose this witness in its Rule 213(f) disclosure. Rule 213(f) requires that parties provide the identities and addresses of witnesses who will testify and, if the witness is an expert, the subjects to which the witness will testify and the opinions the party expects to elicit. Id. at 912. In spite of the fact that Plaintiff had not disclosed the Defendants expert witness in his Rule 213(f) disclosures, the trial court let the expert testify, but limited the experts testimony to information discussed in his deposition. Id. at 904-05.

The Appellate Court found that even though Plaintiff had violated Rule 213(f), the decision by the trial court judge to allow the Defendants expert to testify during Plaintiffs case-in-chief was not an abuse of discretion because there was no surprise to the Defendant, the witness called was the Defendants own expert, the testimony had no prejudicial effect because the trial court gave the Plaintiffs argument based upon the experts testimony little weight, there was no lack of good faith because Plaintiff had subpoenaed the witness, which put Defendant on notice, and again, it was Defendants own witness. Pancoe, 376 Ill. App. 3d at 912-13.

Strategic Considerations. Calling another partys expert witness can be a very compelling trial strategy. A trier of fact expects the expert witness to support the case of the party who retained the expert. After all, a party typically pays quite handsomely for its own experts time in coming to court to testify. Many jurors view experts as hired guns, and if a partys own hired gun does not support the partys case, winning the case will be an uphill battle.

But before calling an opposing partys expert witness, especially one not included in Rule 213(f) disclosures, the practitioner must be sure to evaluate the six-factor analysis that will be applied in any appeal. Having the witness testify only to invite an expensive and likely successful appeal will be a small victory, indeed.

The attorney calling the opposing partys expert witness should confine the testimony to information that was discussed during the deposition. Likewise, an attorney should keep Pancoe in mind while determining what to discuss during a deposition because it seems that anything discussed during the deposition will be fair play at trial, even though the witness is the opposing partys expert. A practitioner should avoid calling the opposing partys expert if the purpose is to intentionally cause surprise or the action is in bad faith.

Conclusion. As Pancoe highlights, failure to comply with Rule 213(f) does not automatically prevent a party from calling an undisclosed witness or make testimony inadmissible. The trial court is given great discretion to determine whether information not disclosed under Rule 213 should be allowed. The review by an appellate court as to whether the trial court abused its discretion with regard to Rule 213 will look at multiple factors to see whether the decision of the trial court was an abuse of discretion causing the opposing party any unfair surprise or prejudice.

For additional discussion, see Illinois Civil Procedure § 8.02, Methods of Formal Discovery; LexisNexis(R) Forms: FORM 1468-41.07 Interrogatories Concerning Expert Witnesses.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Mr. Fish has litigated numerous multi-million dollar disputes throughout the United States. Mr. Fish has represented a broad array of clients including large publicly traded companies, governmental bodies, privately held companies, small corporations, and individuals. Mr. Fish graduated second in his law school class from Northern Illinois University College of Law in DeKalb, Illinois. He received his undergraduate degree from Illinois State University (Major: Political Science, Minor: Philosophy). Prior to starting his own firm, Mr. Fish was employed as an associate or summer associate by larger law firms. (Including, Jenner & Block in Chicago, Klein, Thorpe & Jenkins in Chicago and The Collins Law Firm, P.C. in Naperville). The Fish Law Firm is located in Naperville, Illinois, DuPage County.

Current and Past Bar and Professional Associations: Illinois State Bar Association's Federal Civil Practice Section (Chairman), ATLA Business Torts Section (Subcommittee on Antitrust & Unfair Competition), Northern District of Illinois Federal Trial Bar, Illinois State Bar Association, DuPage County Bar Association (past vice-chair of the Business Law Practice Committee), Chicago Bar Association, and Naperville-Area Chamber of Commerce.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

101 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Innovative Changes in Florida Jury Trials

2008 Emerging Issues 430

Circuit Judge (Retired) Ralph Artigliere on Innovative Changes in Jury Trials Sanctioned by the Florida Supreme Court

By Ralph Artigliere

July 14, 2008

SUMMARY: Eight years after the Florida Courts Jury Innovations Committee was challenged by the Supreme Court to advocate reform and innovations to the jury system, the Supreme Court issued a far-reaching opinion adopting many changes recommended in the Innovations Committee Report. This Emerging Issues Analysis provides a practical analysis of the opinion and adopted changes.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Changes in the Jury System Are Upon Us. Eight years after the Florida Courts Jury Innovations Committee was challenged by the Supreme Court to advocate reform and innovations to the jury system, the Supreme Court issued a far-reaching opinion adopting many changes recommended in the Innovations Committee Report. See 967 So.2d at 179. The Court described the innovations process as the most comprehensive review and thorough evaluation of Floridas jury system in the history of this state 967 So.2d at 179. The opinion includes new rules of civil and criminal procedure, new rules of judicial administration, and new civil and criminal jury instructions.

In 1999, the Florida Supreme Court embarked on its quest for acceptable and effective innovations. In 2001, the Innovations Committee issued its initial report containing forty-eight recommendations covering jury management and administration, in-court procedures for criminal and civil cases, and juror treatment and compensation, which were published to the Bar for comment. In 2002, the Supreme Court held oral argument and by administrative order approved eighteen of the forty-eight recommendations, most significantly consisting of recommendations relating to juror time management, summons enforcement and postponement, juror orientation, and standardized juror questionnaires. See, In Re Final Report of the Jury Innovations Committee, Fla. Admin. Order No. AOSC03-041 (Oct.17, 2003). Other debatable or controversial recommendations were deferred and referred to court committees for study and recommendation, including procedural changes in jury instructions by the court, juror questions, and juror note taking. See AOSC03-41 2. Following another five years of study, reports by various court committees, publication to members of The Florida Bar, comments from lawyers, judges and academics, and another oral argument, the Supreme Court issued its opinion implementing changes in procedures and jury instruction for jury trials effective January 1, 2008. 967 So.2d at 184.

Jury innovations are part of a national trend to improve the comfort of jurors and effectiveness of the jury trial. However, tinkering with the traditional jury trial can be controversial, and change can be unwelcome to judges and trial lawyers. The strategy, process, and deliberate pace of the Florida innovations effort were remarkably effective. The Supreme Court got it right by identifying the need for change; spurring the Innovations Committee to advocate reform and innovation followed by referral of the most controversial measures to appropriate standing committees for review, analysis, debate, and recommendation; allowing an opportunity for comment from judges and lawyers; and considering further input through oral argument with presentation by interested groups and committees. The written reports, briefs, comments and other input are listed in the docket posted at http://jweb.flcourts.org/pls/docket/ds_docket.

While many judges received court-provided judicial education on the innovations, change like this is not easy, and there is a continuing need to emphasize the changes to ensure that judges effectively apply the new law. Counsel should expect some resistance and lack of uniformity in conduct of the jury trial during the transition to new practices and procedures. Practitioners must be aware of the new rules to avoid pitfalls and to turn change to tactical advantage whenever possible. Specific changes in law and procedure and practice considerations for counsel that affect the conduct of the trial are set out below.

Standardized Juror Questionnaires. Juror Questionnaires, properly used, can streamline voir dire, enable clear and confidential disclosure of juror answers to sensitive or universal questions, and create a written record of each jurors answers. The innovations Committee recommended standard voir dire questionnaires for jurors in criminal and civil cases so that the voir dire questions by attorneys and judge may be limited to case-specific inquiry. The Court found that the current civil form questionnaire in Florida Rules of Civil Procedure, Form 1.984--Standard Voir Dire Questionnaire was adequate but adopted a new criminal form Florida Rules of Criminal Procedure 3.9855--Juror Voir Dire Questionnaire. However, the use of the approved forms is left to the discretion of the chief judge in each circuit court. 967 So.2d at 181.

Practice Tips

- . Since juror questionnaires can vary from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, find out in advance the questions that will appear on the questionnaire before preparing voir dire questions.

- . Address the judges voir dire procedures at pretrial conference to uncover any limitations regarding asking or clarifying answers to questions that appear on the questionnaire.

- . Remember that the venire will be sitting and waiting while the questionnaires and information they contain is processed. Nonetheless, in the right case, a questionnaire can be a time saver.

- . Perhaps the most useful aspect of a questionnaire is that it obtains information about jurors and their attitudes outside the hearing of the remaining jurors. Thus, questionnaires can identify disqualifying information or issues to be discussed privately with potential jurors without the danger of tainting the panel. Consider requesting a case-specific questionnaire designed to elicit answers to sensitive or important questions that may need to be discussed further in camera with jurors.

Juror Questions of Witnesses. The Innovations Committee recommended that jurors be allowed to ask questions of witnesses in civil and criminal cases. In 1999 juror questioning of witnesses became mandatory in civil cases pursuant to statute. See Sec. 40.50(3), Florida Statutes. Then the Supreme Court approved a standard jury instruction for juror questions. See Standard Jury Instruction (Civil) 1.13. Yet availability of and procedure for juror questions varied from courtroom to courtroom. Many judges permitted questioning in all civil cases, but some left it up to the lawyers as to whether questions would be permitted, notwithstanding the statutory mandate. In criminal cases, questioning by jurors was not required, and most judges did not permit it. The issue of juror questions is more controversial in criminal cases because a juror may ask a previously unasked question, the answer to which furnishes evidence of an element of the crime. During the innovations process, there was substantial resistance to juror questioning of witnesses in criminal cases by individuals, committees, and lawyer groups. Ultimately the Supreme Court mandated questioning by jurors in civil cases and authorized the judge to allow questions in criminal cases within the discretion of the Court. 967 So. 2d at 181. The opinion contains rules and jury instructions for civil and criminal cases. See Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.452, Fla. R. Crim. P. 3.371 and Standard Jury Instructions (Civil) 1.13 and (Criminal) 2.13. The practitioner must be cautioned that, notwithstanding rules and jury instructions on the subject, leeway still exists in the procedure for juror questions, allowing judges different ways to conduct the questioning. Judges around the state employ widely varying methods for taking and processing juror questions for witnesses if they allow questions at all. Two trials conducted in the same courthouse the same week may have vastly different juror question procedure. However, a framework and required elements are set forth in the rules and jury instructions cited above. The essential elements are: (1) Questions shall be permitted in a civil case and may be permitted in a criminal case; (2) any juror who has a question shall prepare an unsigned, written question which is given to the bailiff and taken to the judge; (3) the question is read to counsel outside the hearing of the jury where objections of counsel are considered. What remains unspecified is the emphasis the judge gives to the process. Some judges ask after every witness whether jurors have any questions. Others announce the process at the beginning of trial and leave it to jurors to raise their hand if they have a question at the end of lawyer questions, thus de-emphasizing juror questioning. A key potential for harm occurs if the judge lets the questioning juror know which party or parties objected to the question. It is one thing to object to a question asked by the opponent. A juror may be more upset with an attorney or party if it becomes known that the attorney objected to the jurors own question. Counsel should object if the objections are not taken out of the jurors hearing and in a manner that does not disclose who objected. Likewise, jurors should not be aware of any other jurors questions that are objectionable and not asked for any reason.

Illustrative Example: Failure to Allow Juror Questions in Civil Cases. If the court decides not to ask questions in a civil case at all, the practitioner may object to the omission and the failure to give Standard Jury Instruction (Civil) 1.13. Under Florida Rules of Civil Procedure Form 1.985, the court does not have the discretion to vary from the standard instruction unless the court enters an order or makes a record explaining the legal basis for not giving the standard instruction and following the statutory mandate. Best practice dictates that the practitioner should request the standard instruction by submission to the court as part of its formal written jury instruction submission to the court. It is incumbent to make the request for the instruction on juror questioning in writing at, or by best practice before, the start of trial. If the court does not give standard instruction 1.13, the practitioner must submit the standard instruction in writing if it was not previously submitted, and lodge a contemporaneous objection. See Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.470(b).

Practice Tips

- . Anticipate differences in procedure for juror questions from judge to judge, and find out at pretrial or at least before the trial starts what procedure the judge will use.
- . Object if the judge varies from the rules and the instruction if the variance is harmful.
- . Object if the judge allows jurors to observe which party is objecting to a juror question.
- . If a juror question involves a subject that is irrelevant or improper, consider requesting that the judge take the opportunity to educate the juror that the subject of the question is not a matter for consideration in the case.

Illustrative Example. In an automobile, premises liability, or malpractice case in which insurance is available, lawyers and judges may be concerned that a juror will ask about insurance. Discuss the possibility with the judge in advance and formulate a proposed judicial response to advocate before the Court from counsels perspective. Otherwise, some judges may be unprepared to deal with the issue, which could arise as part of a written proposed question to a witness or even out loud in voir dire. Being prepared in advance with a proposed solution will allow the matter to be handled as seamlessly as possible in the course of the proceedings.

Juror Note Taking. Note-taking is a comfort measure and aid to memory for jurors, just like it is for students, judges, and lawyers. The Innovations Committee recommended and the Supreme Court sanctioned note-taking in civil and criminal cases. The jury instructions adequately set out the procedure for note-taking, use of notes during deliberations, and the destruction of juror notes after the trial. See Florida Standard Jury Instruction (Civil) 1.8 and (Criminal) 1.6 and Fla. R. Jud. Admin. 2.430. There is still some resistance for juror note-taking on the theory that note takers will not pay attention and that a jurors notes may receive undue weight over the recollection of the group during deliberations. Both of these concerns are addressed in the jury instructions, and it seems incongruous to allow lawyers and the judge to take notes and make jurors rely on memory alone. Further, jurors may be nonplussed if one judge allows note-taking while another judge in the next trial does not. In any event, the Supreme Courts decision is clear: note-taking shall be permitted. One prior inconsistency in the law regarding juror notes was apparently put to rest by the innovations opinion. Florida Statutes, Sec. 40.50 provides that the court shall instruct that the jurors may take notes regarding the evidence and keep the notes to refresh their memories and to use during recesses and deliberations. (e.s.) The statute predated the innovations opinion and presumably allows jurors take their notes out of the court room and even possibly home with them in cases exceeding five days. Some judges actually allowed that to happen. The better procedure is set out in the jury instructions approved by the Supreme Court, which state that the bailiff will take possession of the notes during recesses. This is a better practice because jurors who take notes from the courtroom could supplement them with information gleaned or generated outside of court. Since this is a procedural and not a substantive issue, the instructions approved for publication in the opinion would presumably control over the statute. See Art. V, § 2(a), Fla. Const. If the court allows jurors to take their notes from the courtroom, counsel should object to preserve the error.

Juror Notebooks. Upon recommendation that the court rules provide for jury notebooks, the Supreme Court promulgated identical civil and criminal rules authorizing juror notebooks and amended the civil rule on pretrial conference to include juror notebooks as a point of discussion at pretrial. See Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.455 and 1.200(b) and Fla. R. Crim. P. 3.372. The court has the discretion to authorize documents and exhibits to be included in notebooks for juror use during trial. When faced with a complicated civil case, the practitioner may consider requesting the use of juror notebooks. In addition to exhibits, jurors may benefit from a list of witnesses, timeline for the circumstances giving rise to the case, and a list of definitions of technical terms. Judges usually prefer that counsel work out the contents of the notebook by agreement in advance. One copy each of the notebook should be provided for the Court and for the record. The juror notebook may or may not include blank pages for juror note taking. In any event, notebooks furnished to jurors (except for the copy filed with the clerk) may contain juror notes and markings and best practice dictates that they be destroyed along with any juror notes. See Fla. R. Jud. Admin. 2.430(l).

Written Jury Instructions. The Supreme Court implemented the innovations recommendation that jurors be provided a written set of jury instructions by amending the civil and criminal rules of procedure to require the court to provide the jury with a written set of instructions for use in deliberations. 967 So. 2d at 182. See Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.470(b) and Fla. R. Crim. P. 3.390(b) and 3.400. In order to implement this requirement effectively, judges will need the assistance of counsel in furnishing an accurate and clean set of jury instructions. For some judges, this will mean having instructions on a computer disk or forwarded electronically to the Court in advance so they may be edited as necessary. For others, the practitioner may need to provide a copy or copies of the final edited version for the jury in a timely manner during trial. Either way, the time crunch is especially difficult in one-day criminal and short civil trials. Some judges will want to give instructions prior to closing argument (see below) and still others provide each juror with his or her own set of instructions during oral delivery of instructions and deliberations. This is an excellent practice, as it precludes a juror from hogging the instructions during deliberations and facilitates accurate review by all jurors. Failure to anticipate the courts preferences and needs with regard to jury instructions may result in uncomfortable delay and distraction when counsel would prefer to be focused on preparing final argument. For a comprehensive treatment on effectively creating and presenting jury instructions to the court, see FASTRAIN: HOW TO WRITE AND USE JURY INSTRUCTIONS IN CIVIL AND CRIMINAL CASES, 4th ed. 2007 (The Florida Bar distributed by LexisNexis).

Practice tips.

- . Cover the courts requirements regarding jury instructions at pretrial conference.

. Request a charge conference to discuss jury instructions well enough in advance of the time the Court will deliver them so that logistics in getting a final set of instructions will be manageable.

. Prepare clean sets of instructions with one instruction per page in advance so a final edited set can be prepared rapidly.

Final Instructions Before Closing Arguments. The Innovations Committee recommended that judges be encouraged to give final instructions before closing argument. The Supreme Court accepted the recommendation for civil and criminal cases. 967 So. 2d 182. See Fla.R.Civ.P. 1.470(b) and Fla. R. Crim.P. 3.390(a). Most judges and lawyers see the benefit of having the instructions presented prior to closing, but this procedure is still within the discretion of the judge. If the court turns down a practitioners request to have instructions prior to closing, the only additional measure open to counsel is to object and request that the Court state for the record the reason for varying from the course now encouraged by Rule. Counsel should consider, however, whether the objection and request is worth potentially angering the judge, as there is likely to be little or no tactical advantage gained by the objection.

Judicial Answers to Deliberating Jurors Questions. The Innovations Committee recommended that judges be as responsive as possible to deliberating jurors questions. The Standard Jury Instructions Committee Civil studied this issue and recommended a standard jury instruction outlining a procedure for juror questions during deliberations. The Supreme Court responded by authorizing the instruction for civil and criminal cases. See Florida Standard Jury Instruction (Civil) 7.3(a) and (Criminal) 4.3. The Court further authorized the modification to Standard Jury Instruction (Civil) 7.2 informing the jurors prior to deliberations to send any questions in writing via the bailiff that does not disclose any vote or split of the jury. The new instructions provide helpful formats for answering or not answering a question and notes on how to receive and address juror questions.

Illustrative Example. A deliberating juror or jury submits a question that indicates confusion about the law. Does counsel encourage the judge to clarify the law or advocate for the judge to tell jurors to just rely on the instructions that have been given? When faced with this problem, the practitioner should encourage the judge to clarify the law with input from the parties on the instruction to be given. Under the new procedure, rereading the same instructions that were given earlier is not helpful. The jurors already have a written set of instructions with them. Instead, ask the judge to prepare an instruction with the input of counsel, to write out the instruction, and to read it and provide the response in writing to the jury. When a juror or jury indicates confusion on the law during deliberations, a trial court must attempt to ameliorate confusion about the law. Morgan Intl Realty, Inc. v. Dade Underwriters Ins. Agency, Inc., 571 So. 2d 52 (Fla. 3d DCA 1990). Urging the Court to have the jury simply rely on its recollection of the instructions and evidence could result in reversal of a favorable verdict. The Morgan holding is consistent with the Innovations Committee recommendation that judges be as responsive as possible to deliberating jurors questions, which was confirmed in the innovations case. See 967 So.2d at 183.

Read Back of Testimony. Under existing case law, judges were traditionally given broad discretion on whether or not to read back testimony requested by the jury. Civil and criminal cases supporting this view are cited in the opinion and need not be repeated here. 967 So. 2d 183. The Jury Innovations Committee recommended that the rules provide specific criteria for judges when confronted with a request to read back testimony, but the civil rules committee declined to recommend rules, citing the discretion afforded by the case law. The Supreme Court agreed that rules with criteria should not be adopted, but instead authorized new civil and criminal jury instructions to be given when read back is granted and when it is not. See Florida Standard Jury Instructions (Civil) 7.3(b) and (Criminal) 4.4. The practitioner should be aware that judicial education supports read back of testimony as opposed to simply stating that a transcript is not available. The new instructions contain some guidance on how to get the jury to narrow the request to manageable levels or to inform them of the time needed for preparing the transcript in case they could get along without a read back.

Juror Impasse. The Innovations Committee recommended a more active judicial role in resolving jury impasse. This recommendation was opposed by the civil and criminal jury instruction committees, and the Supreme Court agreed and declined to adopt any amendment to current jury instructions. In light of the Courts decision, the practitioner should be wary of any judicial effort to coerce a jury verdict by enhancing or repeating the standard jury instructions (commonly referred to as the Allen charge). See Standard Jury Instruction (Civil) 7.3 And (Criminal) 4.1. If the Court varies from the standard instructions or attempts to become more active in resolving impasse than allowed under current law, counsel opposing such variance should object to preserve error.

Other Action. The opinion also addressed instructions to jurors about post verdict discussions, and there are standard instructions for civil and criminal cases in that regard. See Florida Standard Jury Instruction (Civil) 7.4 and (Criminal) 4.2. The Court also adopted a new rule on juror time management to provide meaningful guidance to judges on how to achieve the most efficient use of juror time. See Fla. R. Jud. Admin. 2.256.

Practice tips.

- . Juror satisfaction and effectiveness is directly linked to how efficiently juror time is managed.
- . Judges and jurors appreciate trial lawyer efforts to minimize delay, waiting, and wasted time.

Conclusion. Change is upon us. The Innovations opinion provides a somewhat flexible framework in which new ground will be broken in jury trials. During the transition period of adjustment to the changes and beyond, the practitioner who learns and masters the new process stands the best chance to turn the change to advantage. In any event, if the innovations are properly applied in practice, our citizens will find jury service to be better managed and a more comprehensible experience.

Cross References: Florida Forms of Jury Instruction (LexisNexis); FASTRAIN: HOW TO WRITE AND USE JURY INSTRUCTIONS IN CIVIL AND CRIMINAL CASES, 4th ed. 2007 (The Florida Bar distributed by LexisNexis).

RELATED LINKS: See Implementation Of Jury Innovations Committee Recommendations, 967 So. 2d 178, 2007 Fla. LEXIS 1841 (Fla. 2007).

■ 967 So. 2d 178

See FLORIDA FORMS OF JURY INSTRUCTION (LexisNexis)

■ www

See FASTRAIN: HOW TO WRITE AND USE JURY INSTRUCTIONS IN CIVIL AND CRIMINAL CASES, 4th ed. 2007 (The Florida Bar distributed by LexisNexis).

■ www

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Judge (ret.) Ralph Artigliere graduated with honors from the United States Military Academy at West Point in 1969 and high honors from the University of Florida School of Law in 1977. After a twenty-four year career as a civil trial lawyer with Holland & Knight (1977-81), Lane, Trohn, Clarke, Bertrand & Williams, P.A. (1981-91-Managing Partner), and Anderson & Artigliere, P.A.(1991-2001), Judge Artigliere was appointed to the Circuit Bench for the Tenth Judicial Circuit by Governor Jeb Bush in 2001. Judge Artigliere teaches civil trial, jury communication, jury trial innovations, and eDiscovery to judges as a member of the faculties of the Florida Judicial Colleges and has been an instructor at the Florida Bars Advanced Trial Advocacy Course since 2001. Judge Artigliere sits on two Committees that responded to the Jury Innovations Report (Civil Rules and Supreme Court Standard Civil Jury Instruction Committees) and appeared at oral argument on behalf of the jury instruction committee in the Jury Innovations case. He co-authored with William Artigliere the Florida Bars FasTrain Manual: How to Write and Use Jury Instructions in Civil and Criminal Cases distributed by LexisNexis. Judge Artigliere is Board Certified in Civil Trial by the Florida

Bar and received the 2007 Harry Lee Anstead Award as Board Certified Lawyer of the Year. In 2006, Judge Artigliere was the recipient of the Florida Bars William M. Hoeveler Judicial Award for outstanding professionalism and contributions to the court system, and in 2005 he received the Willson American Inns of Court Professionalism Award for adherence to the highest standards of professional conduct as well as significant contributions to the cause of professionalism. Before retiring from the bench in 2008, Judge Artigliere served as judge of the felony criminal, circuit civil, and family divisions and as administrative judge of the civil and family divisions.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

102 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Attorney's Fees Recoverable on Remand: Hoffman on Martin v Franklin

2008 Emerging Issues 2508

Attorney's Fees Recoverable on Remand: Hoffman on Martin v Franklin

By Lonny Hoffman

July 8, 2008

SUMMARY: In 2005, the U. S. Supreme Courts decision in Martin v. Franklin, 546 U.S. 132 (2005) effectively resolved the uncertainty surrounding the question of when attorney's fees are recoverable after a case has been remanded. In this commentary, Professor Lonny Hoffman summarizes the Martin case and uses the Seventh Circuit's decision in Lott v. Pfizer, 492 F.3d 789 (7th Cir. 2007), to illustrate how the lower courts have applied Martin..

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Hoffman, Lonny. Lonny Hoffman on the Effect of Martin v. Franklin on Recovery of Attorneys Fees after Remand as Illustrated by Lott v. Pfizer. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

Introduction. When are attorneys fees recoverable from a defendant after a case has been remanded back to state court? Although Congress has empowered federal judges to award attorneys fees (and other costs) when a case is remanded, over the years the courts have given uncertain answers to when that discretion is properly exercised. In 2005, the United States Supreme Court decided Martin v. Franklin, 546 U.S. 132 (2005), and squarely resolved this uncertainty. Thats the good news. The bad news for plaintiffs is that Martin effectively puts the kibosh on getting attorneys fees, at least most of the time. This Expert Commentary summarizes the high points of Martin and then turn to a recent example from the Seventh Circuit, Lott v. Pfizer, 492 F.3d 789 (7th Cir. 2007), to illustrate how the lower courts, post-Martin, have applied the case in handling requests for attorneys fees after remand.

Martin v. Franklin: Background and Procedural History. Martin v. Franklin began when Gerald and Juana Martin filed a class action lawsuit in New Mexico state court. The defendant removed the case to federal court, arguing that the amount-in-controversy (AIC) requirement for diversity jurisdiction was satisfied because the punitive damages plaintiffs sought should be included in the calculation. The district judge agreed and refused to remand the case but the Tenth Circuit held that because a recent development in the law clarified that punitive damages are not supposed to be included in figuring out if the minimum AIC had been met, remand should be granted.

Back in district court, the Martins moved for attorneys fees under 28 U.S.C. §1447(c), the statutory section that gives discretion to federal courts to do just that. Again, the district judge ruled for the defendants (as did the Tenth Circuit thereafter) on the ground that although the case law defendant relied upon for its theory of aggregation had since been overturned, it had not been mistaken in relying on it since it had been sound at the time the notice of removal was filed. The Supreme Court then granted certiorari in the case.

Supreme Court Adopts Stingy Objectively Reasonable Basis Standard. In what was to be the newly appointed Chief Justice Roberts first opinion for the Court, the U.S. Supreme Court affirmed. A natural reading of §1447(c), Roberts wrote, specifically provides that a remand order may require payment of attorneys fees not shall or should and so does not support the Martins argument for even a presumption in favor of awarding fees. In this case, the ultimately improper removal nevertheless had an objectively reasonable basis. What follows is the most important passage in the opinion:

[T]he standard for awarding fees should turn on the reasonableness of the removal. Absent unusual circumstances, courts may award attorneys fees under §1447(c) only where the removing party lacked an objectively reasonable basis for seeking removal. Conversely, when an objectively reasonable basis exists, fees should be denied.

Martin, thus, makes it pretty darned clear that you only get attorneys fees when a defendant has acted well outside the normal boundaries of good legal judgment. To illustrate how stingy this objectively reasonable standard is and why, after Martin, you rarely see a court award attorneys fees after remand, consider the Seventh Circuits recent decision in Lott v. Pfizer, 492 F.3d 789 (7th Cir. 2007).

Seventh Circuit, Applying Martin, Denies Attorneys Fee Award in Lott v. Pfizer. The pertinent parts of *Lott v. Pfizer*s long procedural history are as follows. Almost three years ago, Congress passed the Class Action Fairness Act, making it effective as of February 18, 2005. CAFA allows all kinds of class action suits that previously had to be litigated in state court to be filed in or removed to federal court. For all kinds of reasons, many class action plaintiffs dont want to be in federal court. Ms. Lott certainly felt that way, and so she moved with all deliberate speed to file her suit before CAFA went into effect. Indeed, she filed it on February 17, just one day before the statutes commencement date. Pretty clever, eh?

Not to be out-lawyered, Pfizer found a way to remove the case. It argued that the case nevertheless was commenced in federal court after February 18 because in this context commenced should be the date it actually arrived in federal court: that is, the date it was removed by Pfizer itself to federal court.

Now if this argument sounds like it cant possibly be right, thats because, well, it isnt. Indeed, before Pfizer made this dubious argument several district courts had already rejected it outright (its also notable that literally within days of Pfizers removal both the Tenth Circuit and Seventh Circuit also rejected the identical assertion made by other defendants). Yes, Pfizer tried to distinguish those cases, but neither the district judge nor the Seventh Circuit saw any differences. Judge Posner noted that CAFA could have but said no such thing about commenced being measured as of the date of removal and characterized Pfizers argument as requiring radical judicial surgery on the statute. He also wryly commented that lobbying groups for corporations just like Pfizer surely had sought for the bill to deal with this anticipated problem of suits filed on the eve of CAFAs passage but had not been successful.

Sounds like a case where 1447(c) attorneys fees might be warranted, right? Wrong. Thereafter, another panel of the Seventh Circuit held that even though the removal-as-commencement argument was soundly rejected, the law was still unsettled when Pfizer removed the case (no circuit courts had actually ruled on the issue when Pfizer removed the case) and so it acted objectively reasonably, within the meaning of Martin.

And so it goes. Lott is typical of the post-Martin §1447(c) cases. That is, thanks to the Supreme Courts decision, it is now very difficult to find an occasion where a defendant is considered to have acted objectively unreasonably in removing a case. Whether this really is the balance Congress was trying to strike between discouraging improvident removals while not dampening legitimate bids to gain the federal forum, its a good bet that the Court isnt going to revisit its decision in Martin any time soon.

References

For a discussion of costs and attorneys fees on a motion for remand, see Moore's Federal Practice (3d ed.) § 107.41[3][a].

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Lonny Hoffman is the George Butler Research Professor of Law at the University of Houston Law Center. He is a specialist on civil procedure in the federal and state courts, including class actions and other complex litigation. His full bio and CV may be found at <http://www.law.uh.edu/faculty/main.asp?PID=179>.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

103 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Bisceglie on Thyroff v. Nationwide Mutual Insurance Company, 8 N.Y.3d 283 (2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 2495

Kyle C. Bisceglie on Thyroff v. Nationwide Mutual Insurance Company, 8 N.Y.3d 283 (2007)

By Kyle C. Bisceglie

July 7, 2008

SUMMARY: In a decision that constitutes an important part of the burgeoning body of law covering electronic data, the Court of Appeals ruled that New York permits claims for conversion of electronic property. This commentary, written by Kyle C. Bisceglie, a Partner at Olshan Grundman Frome Rosenzweig & Wolosky LLP in New York City, discusses its importance and implications under New York law.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Bisceglie, Kyle C. Thyroff v. Nationwide Mutual Insurance Company. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

New York Court of Appeals Okays Claim for Conversion of Electronic Data. In Thyroff v. Nationwide Mutual Insurance Company, 8 N.Y.3d 283 (2007), the Court of Appeals unanimously agreed that New York permits a claim for conversion of computerized electronic records. In so doing, the Court answered the previously open question that had been certified by the Second Circuit: whether New York law recognizes a claim for conversion of certain electronic computer records and data. Id. at 284.

Louis Thyroff was an insurance agent for Nationwide, who leased his computer equipment as an independent contractor under an agents agreement from the company. Upon termination of the agreement, Nationwide confiscated its equipment, along with all of the information Thyroff had stored on his computer, including personal correspondence and email, customer information, personal documents and data, Microsoft Office, and other hardware and software programs. Thyroff v. Nationwide Mutual Ins. Co., 460 F.3d at 403 (2d Cir. 2006).

Thyroff sued in the U.S. District Court for the Western District of New York, claiming, among other claims, that the taking of his electronic data constituted conversion. The Western District dismissed the action, holding that Thyroff was not excluded from his property by Nationwide, and, in any event, Nationwide owned the computer system. Thyroff appealed.

The Thyroff Court determined to expand the scope of conversion, finding [i]t cannot be seriously disputed that societys reliance on computers and electronic data is substantial, if not essential. Thyroff, 8 N.Y.3d at 291. The Court noted the ubiquitous and pervasive use of computers and electronic data, including drafting and dissemination of the Thyoff opinion itself! Id. at 292. On this basis, Thyoff accorded the supposedly intangible property at issue the same treatment as a paper document kept in a file cabinet. Id. at 292.

Preliminaries: Elements of the Tort; Intangible v. Tangible Property and the Merger Doctrine. Conversion in New York requires the "unauthorized assumption and exercise of the right of ownership over goods belonging to another to the exclusion of the owner's rights." Vigilant Ins. Co. of Am. v. Hous. Auth., 87 N.Y.2d at 44 (N.Y. 1995). Each of these elements must be met for a court to find conversion.

Traditionally, the term goods required tangible or physical property. Sporn v. MCA Records, 58 N.Y.2d at 489 (1983). Later, New York would permit conversion of certain types of intangible property. This distinction between tangible and intangible property is simple in theory only. The theory holds that tangible property is capable of actual possession, Miller v. United States, 78 U.S. at 329 (U.S. 1871), while intangible property is not physical matter which can be located on a map. Texas v. New Jersey, 379 U.S. at 677 (1965). Intangible property represents value, and creates a property right that may or may not be represented by something tangible, but that itself has no intrinsic value apart from the rights it represents. United States v. Bellomo, 263 F. Supp. 2d at 573 (E.D.N.Y. 2003).

According to Restatement (Second) of Torts § 242 cmt. b. (1965), intangible property may include promissory notes, bonds, bills of exchange, share certificates, warehouse receipts, insurance policies and savings bank books. It does not include electronic data. So it was that before the Internet; intangible assets were typically intellectual property or payment rights, including stock certificates. See Juliet M. Moringiello, False Categories in Commercial Law: The (Ir)Relevance of (In)Tangibility, 35 Fla. St. U. L. Rev. 119 (2007) (discussing the history of intangible property). Modernity has further blurred the lines between tangible and intangible. Recent law from other jurisdictions finds intangible property encompasses a variety of interests not previously addressed, and suggests that the list will expand hand-in-hand with technological innovation. See, e.g., Kremen v. Cohen, 337 F.3d 1024 (9th Cir. 2003) (Internet domain name); Ali v. Fasteners for Retail, Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31436 (D. Cal. 2008) (emails and software source codes); Mundy v. Decker, 1999 Neb. App. LEXIS 3 (Neb. Ct. App. Jan. 5, 1999) (WordPerfect directory).

Moving beyond theory to application in Thyoff, the Court clearly viewed the electronic data as intangible, despite likening it to paper kept in a file cabinet. Thyoff, 8 N.Y.3d at 292. The electronic records in Thyoff meet definitions of tangible, since the records can transform to literal form by the mere expedient of a printing key function (Shmueli v. Corcoran Group, 9 Misc. 3d at 592 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 2005)), or intangible (as the Court implies), since the data was only stored in virtual form. Perhaps realizing the futility and increasing irrelevance of this distinction, Thyoff appeared to just move on to whether the elements of conversion are met or not: In the absence of a significant difference in the value of the information, the protections of the law should apply equally to both forms physical and virtual. Thyoff, 8 N.Y.3d at 292.

Thyoff also casts aside another namesake relic of the common law, the so called merger doctrine. Per the Restatement (Second) of Torts § 242 (1965), the merger doctrine applies when intangible property rights are merged with a document, so that transfer of the document will transfer the property right. An early and best example of the merger rule is that a share of stock was so merged in the stock certificate that conversion of the certificate resulted in damages for conversion of the shares as well. Agar v. Orda, 264 N.Y. 248 (1934).

Jurisdictions vary in their application of the merger rule, with some courts following a literal interpretation of the Restatement, others disregarding the document requirement, and still others finding that there can never be conversion of intangible property. Thyoff mentions the history of the merger rule in New York case law, but ultimately suggests we may have outgrown it: [I]t generally is not the physical nature of a document that determines its worth, it is the information memorialized in the document that has intrinsic value. Thyoff, 8 N.Y.3d at 292.

Due to Thyoff, New York courts are now largely free of these doctrines when addressing conversion of electronic media. Practitioners should start with the following four cases in developing new conversion theories: Thyoff, Astroworks, Inc. v. Astroexhibit, Inc., 257 F. Supp. 2d 609 (S.D.N.Y. 2003), Shmueli v. Corcoran Group, 9 Misc. 3d 589

(N.Y. Supr. Ct. 2005), and a 9th Circuit decision, Kremen v Cohen, 337 F.3d 1024 (9th Cir. 2003).

Astroworks and Shmueli. In Astroworks, plaintiff and defendant intended to form a web-based space-related business together, but plaintiff eventually formed the website on his own, allegedly using defendants ideas. Astroworks, 257 F. Supp. 2d at 612. The Southern District of New York found that while defendants idea alone could not be converted, the tangible expression or implementation of that idea can be, and therefore plaintiff could be liable for conversion of the website. Id. at 617 (quoting Matzan v Eastman Kodak Co., 134 A.D.2d at 864, 521 N.Y.S.2d 917 (4th Dept. 1987))

In Shmueli, plaintiff worked as an independent contractor, real estate broker. Similar to Thyroff, plaintiff was unable to access her computer files, particularly her electronic client list (composed of contacts made both within and outside of her scope of employment with Defendant) immediately subsequent to her termination. The Supreme Court of New York, Commercial Division found that a computerized client list constitutes convertible property. Shmueli, 9 Misc. 3d at 594. Shmueli was a widely-publicized and remarkable decision but, as the court itself noted, limited to a narrow type of property electronic client lists.

Thyroff, Astroworks and Shmueli are all consistent decisions albeit with slightly different methodology and scope. Thyroff acknowledges that it was the first time this Court had addressed the issue of conversion of intangible property that does not strictly satisfy the merger test. Thyroff, 8 N.Y.3d at 290. The Courts holding in Thyroff goes beyond the allowance of computerized client lists in Shmueli. While the holding in Thyroff is specifically limited by the Court to electronic records that were stored on a computer and were indistinguishable from printed documents (Id. at 292), the Court does not rule out the possibility, or even likelihood, that the category of intangible property covered by the tort of conversion will continue to develop and expand to eventually include the myriad other forms of virtual information available. Id. at 293. As a federal case, Astroworks is not controlling law for New York and predates Thyroff, but, in countenancing a claim for conversion of a website, provides an example of the type of other forms of virtual information that are likely now convertible in New York as a result to Thyroff.

Possible Impact of Kremen v Cohen. In Kremen v Cohen, 337 F.3d 1024 (9th Cir. 2003), plaintiff registered the domain name sex.com to a company he owned called Online Classifieds. Defendant Cohen, described as a con artist, sent a letter to the Internet registrar, Defendant Network Solutions, stating Online Classifieds was transferring ownership of sex.com to him. Network Solutions, without further investigation (for example, inquiring as to why a company called Online Classifieds would mail a letter), transferred the domain name to Defendant Cohen. Plaintiff, unable to reach Defendant Cohen to secure damages, claimed that Network Solutions had converted his property, that is, the domain name. The Ninth Circuit agreed with plaintiff that a conversion action could stand.

This decision is significant because it explicitly eliminates the strict merger doctrine, and says the Restatement is not followed in California. Id. at 1033. At most, California may retain a minimal merger requirement that calls for some connection to a document or tangible object not representation of the owners intangible interest in the strict Restatement sense. Id. at 1033. Additionally, the Ninth Circuit suggests that conversion could be applied to ALL personal property, should the claim arise in future cases. Id. at 1031.

As discussed above, the New York Court of Appeals, similar to the Ninth Circuit in Kremen, indicates in Thyroff that the merger doctrine and tangible/intangible distinction is no longer strictly required in New York, so long as the other elements of conversion are met. One wonders whether or not New York will follow Californias lead and expand the tort of conversion to cover all personal property. *Thyroff*s logic certainly suggests a domain name similar to the one in Kremen is subject to the tort in New York: [S]ocietys reliance on computers and electronic data is substantial, if not essential, Thyroff, 8 N.Y.3d at 291, and The lack of a compelling reason to prohibit conversion for a redress of a misappropriation of intangible property underscores the need for reevaluating the appropriate application of conversion. Id. Shmueli and Astroworks opened the doors to conversion of intangible property apart from the strict merger requirement, Thyroff broadened the application of that right, and it appears that New York law might go so far as Kremen and beyond in future cases.

Application in Employment Law: Thyroff likely not available to employees. Thyroff provides little for employees seeking to reclaim electronic data left behind with an employer. It is commonplace for employees to use company technology, computers in particular, for their own personal uses. When they leave, they may try to take electronic data in one way or another forwarding documents by email, or converting data to PST files and exporting to a thumb drive. Employees will not find much success in seeking to recoup the electronic data through a claim for conversion, because there are very little to no property rights for employees in New York. By definition, An employer-employee relationship exists when the evidence demonstrates that the employer exercises control over the results produced by a claimant or the means used to achieve the results. Hertz Corp. v. Comm'r of Labor, 2 N.Y.3d 733 (N.Y. 2004). Shmueli emphasizes plaintiffs status as an independent contractor, and in fact, the Shmueli court explicitly denies extension of the rights to an employee because their work product is considered proprietary to the employer. Shmueli, 9 Misc. 3d at 595 (quoting Pullman Group v Prudential Ins. Co. of Am., 733 N.Y.S. 2d 1 (1st Dept. 2001)). In other words, all work product is assumed to be within the scope of employment for salaried employees, and employees therefore do not retain a property interest in such work product.

While there is an academic argument for non-work product created in ones place of employment, (See Lee Nolan Jacobs, Is Whats Yours Really Mine?: Shmueli v Corcoran Group and Penumbra Property Rights, 14 J.L. & Poly 837 (2006) (discussing the uncertainty surrounding individual property rights in the workplace), the tort of conversion requires exclusivity of ownership. Once information is placed on a company server, or on a computer other employees can access, an employee is no longer able to exercise exclusive control over the document, and there is no longer a cause of action for conversion. In addition, many employers require employees to sign a specific waiver of privacy expectations with regard to their computer usage as a condition of employment.

In narrow circumstances, conversion may still exist including where the employer explicitly allows for personal computer use, the employee guards it with security and/or an employee saves a personal document on the local drive only.

In sum, Thyroff should benefit employers who now have another claim against an employee who steals and destroys electronic data and computer records with them on the way out.

Application of Thyroff to Licensing, Independent Contractor or Third-Party Relations. The Shmueli court emphasizes that plaintiff was an independent contractor working with the defendant, and not just an employee. Shmueli, 9 Misc. 3d at 594. Alternatively, Thyroff was both a licensee and independent contractor, and Astroworks involved arms-length parties in an enterprise. Conversion claims will be much easier to sustain in third-party relations because it is easier to claim exclusivity or control over ones property. Of course, whether or not someone is an employee, an independent contractor or other is a sometimes difficult question that is beyond the scope of this commentary. The take away Thyroff, Astroworks, Shmueli, and Kremen make conversion claims more viable in the context of licensing, independent contractors and third-parties.

Conclusion. Thyroff is another of the increasing number of cases of importance in how our legal system is responding to the explosion of electronic data. Conversion has its limits in the cyber-world simply because so often data is not stolen but copied, and copying will not engender conversion without exclusion. Subsequent opinions citing Thyroff suggest this result. See A & G Research, Inc. v. GC Metrics, Inc., 2008 NY Slip Op 51016U (N.Y. Sup. Ct. May 21, 2008) (stating copied computer data does not exclude the proper owner); Leser v. Karenkooper.com, 2008 NY Slip Op 50135U (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 2008) (stating the use of an image from a webpage does not exclude the proper owner).

Because so many data files are copied, this claim may be unavailable in certain circumstances. Practitioners especially those representing employers should look to the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act, 18 USC 1030, in cases involving copying of data without exclusion. Despite this limitation, as New York applies Thyroff to the myriad and exponentially growing other forms of virtual information, Thyroff, 8 N.Y.3d at 293, practitioners should expect to see an increase in conversion claims following termination of licensing agreements, independent contractors and co-venturers.

Cross-References

For more information on the tort of conversion, intangible property and employee property rights, see 1-2A Computer Law § 2A.11 (explaining Thyroff's role in the expansion of conversion); 1-4 New York Employment Law § 4.02 (discussing misappropriated employee work product); 1-7 Taxation of Intellectual Property § 7.02 (noting conversion of domain name in Kremen); Computer Fraud and Abuse Act, 18 USC 1030 (stating act of copying is not a deletion of original files); 2-249 Warren's Negligence in the New York Courts § 249.02 (noting apparent application of CPLR 5001 to intangible property as well); Juliet M. Moringiello, False Categories in Commercial Law: The (Ir)Relevance of (In)Tangibility, 35 Fla. St. U. L. Rev. 119 (2007) (discussing the history of intangible property); and Lee Nolan Jacobs, Is Whats Yours Really Mine?: Shmueli v Corcoran Group and Penumbra Property Rights, 14 J.L. & Poly 837 (2006) (examining the uncertainty surrounding individual property rights in the workplace).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Kyle C. Bisceglie, a Partner at Olshan Grundman Frome Rosenzweig & Wolosky LLP in New York City, counsels corporations, partnerships, and individuals with respect to complex commercial litigation, Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR), contracts, business advice and litigation avoidance. He has tried numerous cases without loss and has been involved in litigations, arbitrations, mediations and settlement negotiations. He also serves as general counsel to various entrepreneurial ventures and businesses in technology infrastructure, advertising, event production, dental and medical instruments, insurance, chemical distribution, fashion and consulting fields. Mr. Bisceglie has complex litigation experience in a variety areas including commercial, financial, insurance, employment, race and sex discrimination, harassment and retaliation, copyright and trademark, defamation, and business tort. He has participated in the investigation of the worldwide derivatives trading practices of a New York based merchant bank, representation of US policyholders in the largest insurance insolvency in North American history, and coordination of negotiation over and litigation for the transfer of a major beverage and spirit company's most valuable brand. Mr. Bisceglie also spent five years in the litigation department of Cadwalader, Wickersham and Taft; two years trying cases as an assistant prosecutor; and one year as a law clerk to Judge Alfred M. Wolin, United States District Court for the District of New Jersey. He can be reached by phone at 212-451-2207 or by email at Kbisceglie@olshanlaw.com.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

104 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Barrett on Old Forge School District v. Highmark Inc., 924 A.2d 1205.

2008 Emerging Issues 2497

Matthew Barrett on Old Forge School District v. Highmark Inc. d/b/a Highmark Blue Shield and Pennsylvania Blue Shield, 924 A.2d 1205, 2007 Pa. LEXIS 1366 (Pa. 2007).

By Matthew P. Barrett

July 7, 2008

SUMMARY: The Pennsylvania Supreme Court discussed in Old Forge School District v. Highmark Inc. d/b/a Highmark Blue Shield and Pennsylvania Blue Shield, 924 A.2d 1205, the basis for finding vexatious conduct on the part of a litigant and the award of attorneys fees. Matthew P. Barrett, a partner at O'Malley, Harris, Durkin & Perry in Scranton, elaborates on the impact of Old Forge on seeking attorneys fees and the determination of vexatious conduct.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Barrett, Matthew. Old Forge School District v. Highmark Inc. d/b/a Highmark Blue Shield and Pennsylvania Blue Shield. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

In June 2007, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court reviewed a case where there had been an award of attorney fees. Issue on appeal was whether or not plaintiffs had engaged in vexatious conduct when they filed an action which, in part, challenged Highmarks rates and reserves. Highmark is a health insurance plan which does business as Highmark Blue Cross Blue Shield and Pennsylvania Blue Shield. In 2002, the Pennsylvania Insurance Department set out to determine whether or not surplus and reserve levels maintained by various health insurers, including Highmark, were appropriate. The Pennsylvania Department of Insurance had concluded that certain health insurers had substantial reserves in surplus amounts and felt that accumulating additional surpluses would be inefficient. The health insurers were then requested to submit plans for approval of their reserves and surplus levels.

Insurance Commissioners Decision Issued. In February 2005, a review had been completed of the applications as submitted by the health insurers, and Insurance Commissioner Koken issued an order addressing the reserves maintained by various health insurers. A surplus was considered to be that amount the plan has in capital after all liabilities had been deducted from the assets. In re Applications of Capital Blue Cross et. al., No. MS05-02-006, slip op., p. 10 (Pa. Ins. Dept February 9, 2005). If the plan was operating with a sufficient level of surplus, then that plan would not include a premium for risk and contingency factor in field rates for the next calendar year. Highmark at 1206. In making her ruling, the Insurance Commissioner noted that the Department of Insurance had received much input and requests from the public which took the position that plan participants should receive rebates or premium reductions. However, the Commissioner on this issue stated the following: [A]ttempting to target accumulated surplus to one group of rate bearers is inherently problematic and a potentially inequitable notion. In fact, a rate rollback or a rate freeze could prove detrimental to the marketplace. Highmark at 1207, quoting In re Applications of Capital Blue Cross et. al., No. MS05-02-006 at p. 17.

She further noted the following:

[W]here a blue plan has sufficient surplus, forward looking rate relief would assure that additional surplus is not cumulatively derived from premium income. Thus, for example, it would be appropriate to charge rates that do not include a risk and contingency factor where a plan has sufficient levels of surplus.

Id.

Insurance Commissioners Decision Challenged. Following the order issued by the Insurance Commissioner, petitions for review were filed with the Commonwealth Court challenging the Commissioners order and determination. See City of Philadelphia v. Pennsylvania Ins. Dept., 889 A.2d 664, 668 (Pa. Cmwlth. 2005) One group of petitioners were 3 policyholders, 4 Blue Cross subscribers and 14 public interest groups. The second petition was filed by the City of Philadelphia who was an employer and who paid premiums to one of the plans. On dismissing those petitions, the Commonwealth Court held that under Pennsylvania law, the petitioners had no protected property interest in their rates; therefore, they had no right to due process hearing or standing to appeal the findings made by the Commissioner regarding the surplus held by each of the plans. Id. at 672.

Insurance Commissioners Decision Challenged Again and Counsel Fees Sought and Granted. Two weeks after that decision by the Commonwealth Court, a separate action was filed with the Commonwealth Court by the Old Forge School District, Lawrence S. Herman, D.C., NACHAS, Inc., Jason H. Herman, Robert Petty, R.G. Petty Masonry, on their own behalf and on behalf of all others similarly situated. This action asserted causes of action under breach of contract and unjust enrichment. In this action, the Plaintiffs sought a refund alleging the Insurance Commissioners pervious order supported a conclusion that the 2004 premium rates were not properly calculated.

