(3) The definition of "representative of the lawyer" recognizes that the lawyer may, in rendering legal services, utilize the services of assistants in addition to those employed in the process of communicating. Thus the definition includes an expert employed to assist in rendering legal advice. United States v. Kovel, 296 F.2d 918 (2d Cir. 1961) (accountant). Cf. Himmelfarb v. United States, 175 F.2d 924 (9th Cir. 1949) . It also includes an expert employed to assist in the planning and conduct of litigation, though not one employed to testify as a witness. Lalance & Grosjean Mfg. Co. v. Haberman Mfg. Co., 87 F. 563 (S.D.N.Y.1898) , and see revised Civil Rule 26(b)(4). The definition does not, however, limit "representative of the lawyer" to experts. Whether his compensation is derived immediately from the lawyer or the client is not material.

(4) The requisite confidentiality of communication is defined in terms of intent. A communication made in public or meant to be relayed to outsiders or which is divulged by the client to third persons can scarcely be considered confidential. McCormick § 95. The intent is inferable from the circumstances. Unless intent to disclose is apparent, the attorney-client communication is confidential. Taking or failing to take precautions may be considered as bearing on intent.

Practicality requires that some disclosure be allowed beyond the immediate circle of lawyer-client and their representatives without impairing confidentiality. Hence the definition allows disclosure to persons "to whom disclosure is in furtherance of the rendition of professional legal services to the client," contemplating those in such relation to the client as "spouse, parent, business associate, or joint client." Comment, California Evidence Code § 952.

Disclosure may also be made to persons "reasonably necessary for the transmission of the communication," without loss of confidentiality.

Subdivision (b) sets forth the privilege, using the previously defined terms: client, lawyer, representative of the lawyer, and confidential communication.

Substantial authority has in the past allowed the eavesdropper to testify to overheard privileged conversations and has admitted intercepted privileged letters. Today, the evolution of more sophisticated techniques of eavesdropping and interception calls for abandonment of this position. The rule accordingly adopts a policy of protection against these kinds of invasion of the privilege.

The privilege extends to communications (1) between client or his representative and lawyer or his representative, (2) between lawyer and lawyer's representative, (3) by client or his lawyer to a lawyer representing another in a matter of common interest, (4) between representatives of the client or the client and a representative of the client, and (5) between lawyers representing the client. All these communications must be specifically for the purpose of obtaining legal services for the client; otherwise the privilege does not attach.

The third type of communication occurs in the "joint defense" or "pooled information" situation where different lawyers represent clients who have some interests in common. In Chahoon v. Commonwealth, 62 Va. 822 (1871) , the court said that the various clients might have retained one attorney to represent all; hence everything said at a joint conference was privileged, and one of the clients could prevent another from disclosing what the other had himself said. The result seems to be incorrect in overlooking a frequent reason for retaining different attorneys by the various clients, namely actually or potentially conflicting interests in addition to the common interest which brings them together. The needs of these cases seem better to be met by allowing each client a privilege as to his own statements. Thus if all resist disclosure, none will occur. Continental Oil Co. v. United States, 330 F.2d 347 (9th Cir. 1964) . But, if for reasons of his own, a client wishes to disclose his own statements made at the joint conference, he should be permitted to do so, and the rule is to that effect. The rule does not apply to situations where there is no common interest to be promoted by a joint consultation, and the parties meet on a purely adversary basis. Vance v. State, 190 Tenn. 521, 230 S.W.2d 987 (1950) , cert. denied, 339 U.S. 988, 70 S. Ct. 1010, 94 L. Ed. 1389 . Cf. Hunydee v. United States, 355 F.2d 183 (9th Cir. 1965) .

Subdivision (c). The privilege is, of course, that of the client, to be claimed by him or by his personal representative. The successor of a dissolved corporate client may claim the privilege. California Evidence Code § 953; New Jersey Evidence Rule 26(1). Contra, Uniform Rule 26(1).

The lawyer may not claim the privilege on his own behalf. However, he may claim it on behalf of the client. It is assumed that the ethics of the profession will require him to do so except under most unusual circumstances. American Bar Association, Canons of Professional Ethics, Canon 37. His authority to make the claim is presumed unless there is evidence to the contrary, as would be the case if the client were now a party to litigation in which the question arose and were represented by other counsel. Ex parte Lipscomb, 111 Tex. 409, 239 S.W. 1101 (1922) .

Subdivision (d) in general incorporates well established exceptions.

(1) The privilege does not extend to advice in aid of future wrongdoing. 8 Wigmore § 2298 (McNaughton Rev.1961). The wrongdoing need not be that of the client. The provision that the client knew or reasonably should have known of the criminal or fraudulent nature of the act is designed to protect the client who is erroneously advised that a proposed action is within the law. No preliminary finding that sufficient evidence aside from the communication has been introduced to warrant a finding that the services were sought to enable the commission of a wrong is required. Cf. Clark v. United States, 289 U.S. 1, 15-16, 53 S. Ct. 465, 77 L. Ed. 993 (1933) ; Uniform Rule 26(2)(a). While any general exploration of what transpired between attorney and client would, of course, be inappropriate, it is wholly feasible, either at the discovery stage or during trial, so to focus the inquiry by specific questions as to avoid any broad inquiry into attorney-client communications. Numerous cases reflect this approach.

(2) Normally the privilege survives the death of the client and may be asserted by his representative. Subdivision (c) supra. When, however, the identity of the person who steps into the client's shoes is in issue, as in a will contest, the identity of the person entitled to claim the privilege remains undetermined until the conclusion of the litigation. The choice is thus between allowing both sides or neither to assert the privilege, with authority and reason favoring the latter view. McCormick § 98; Uniform Rule 26(2)(b); California Evidence Code § 957; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-426(b)(2); New Jersey Evidence Rule 26(2)(b).

(3) The exception is required by considerations of fairness and policy when questions arise out of dealings between attorney and client, as in cases of controversy over attorney's fees, claims of inadequacy of representation, or charges of professional misconduct. McCormick § 95; Uniform Rule 26(2)(c); California Evidence Code § 958; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-426(b)(3); New Jersey Evidence Rule 26(2)(c).

(4) When the lawyer acts as attesting witness, the approval of the client to his so doing may safely be assumed, and waiver of the privilege as to any relevant lawyer-client communications is a proper result. McCormick § 92, p. 184; Uniform Rule 26(2)(d); California Evidence Code § 959; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-426(b)(d) [sic].

(5) The subdivision states existing law. McCormick § 95, pp. 192-193. For similar provisions, see Uniform Rule 26(2)(e); California Evidence Code § 962; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-426(b)(4); New Jersey Evidence Rule 26(2). The situation with which this provision deals is to be distinguished from the case of clients with a common interest who retain different lawyers. See subdivision (b)(3) of this rule supra.

PART THREE: RULES APPROVED BY SUPREME COURT BUT REJECTED BY CONGRESS
Part Three: Rules Approved by Supreme Court But Rejected by Congress

5-Three Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Rule 504

Rule 504 PSYCHOTHERAPIST-PATIENT PRIVILEGE

[Not enacted.]

(a) Definitions.

(1) A "patient" is a person who consults or is examined or interviewed by a psychotherapist.

(2) A "psychotherapist" is (A) a person authorized to practice medicine in any state or nation, or reasonably believed by the patient so to be, while engaged in the diagnosis or treatment of a mental or emotional condition, including drug addiction, or (B) a person licensed or certified as a psychologist under the laws of any state or nation, while similarly engaged.

(3) A communication is "confidential" if not intended to be disclosed to third persons other than those present to further the interest of the patient in the consultation, examination, or interview, or persons reasonably necessary for the transmission of the communication, or persons who are participating in the diagnosis and treatment under the direction of the psychotherapist, including members of the patient's family.

(b) General rule of privilege. A patient has a privilege to refuse to disclose and to prevent any other person from disclosing confidential communications, made for the purposes of diagnosis or treatment of his mental or emotional condition, including drug addiction, among himself, his psychotherapist, or persons who are participating in the diagnosis or treatment under the direction of the psychotherapist, including members of the patient's family.

(c) Who may claim the privilege. The privilege may be claimed by the patient, by his guardian or conservator, or by the personal representative of a deceased patient. The person who was the psychotherapist may claim the privilege but only on behalf of the patient. His authority so to do is presumed in the absence of evidence to the contrary.

(d) Exceptions.

(1) Proceedings for hospitalization. There is no privilege under this rule for communications relevant to an issue in proceedings to hospitalize the patient for mental illness, if the psychotherapist in the course of diagnosis or treatment has determined that the patient is in need of hospitalization.

(2) Examination by order of judge. If the judge orders an examination of the mental or emotional condition of the patient, communications made in the course thereof are not privileged under this rule with respect to the particular purpose for which the examination is ordered unless the judge orders otherwise.

(3) Condition an element of claim or defense. There is no privilege under this rule as to communications relevant to an issue of the mental or emotional condition of the patient in any proceeding in which he relies upon the condition as an element of his claim or defense, or, after the patient's death, in any proceeding in which any party relies upon the condition as an element of his claim or defense.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE'S NOTE

The rules contain no provision for a general physician-patient privilege. While many states have by statute created the privilege, the exceptions which have been found necessary in order to obtain information required by the public interest or to avoid fraud are so numerous as to leave little if any basis for the privilege. Among the exclusions from the statutory privilege, the following may be enumerated; communications not made for purposes of diagnosis and treatment; commitment and restoration proceedings; issues as to wills or otherwise between parties claiming by succession from the patient; actions on insurance policies; required reports (venereal diseases, gunshot wounds, child abuse); communications in furtherance of crime or fraud; mental or physical condition put in issue by patient (personal injury cases); malpractice actions; and some or all criminal prosecutions. California, for example, excepts cases in which the patient puts his condition in issue, all criminal proceedings, will and similar contests, malpractice cases, and disciplinary proceedings, as well as certain other situations, thus leaving virtually nothing covered by the privilege. California Evidence Code §§ 990-1007. For other illustrative statutes see Ill. Rev. Stat. 1967, c. 51, § 5.1; N.Y.C.P.L.R. § 4504; N.C. Gen. Stat.1953, § 8-53. Moreover, the possibility of compelling gratuitous disclosure by the physician is foreclosed by his standing to raise the question of relevancy. See Note on "Official Information" Privilege following Rule 509 infra .

The doubts attendant upon the general physician-patient privilege are not present when the relationship is that of psychotherapist and patient. While the common law recognized no general physician-patient privilege, it had indicated a disposition to recognize a psychotherapist-patient privilege, Note, Confidential Communications to a Psychotherapist: A New Testimonial Privilege, 47 Nw. U.L. Rev. 384 (1952), when legislatures began moving into the field.

The case for the privilege is convincingly stated in Report No. 45, Group for the Advancement of Psychiatry 92 (1960):

"Among physicians, the psychiatrist has a special need to maintain confidentiality. His capacity to help his patients is completely dependent upon their willingness and ability to talk freely. This makes it difficult if not impossible for him to function without being able to assure his patients of confidentiality and, indeed, privileged communication. Where there may be exceptions to this general rule ..., there is wide agreement that confidentiality is a sine qua non for successful psychiatric treatment. The relationship may well be likened to that of the priest-penitent or the lawyer-client. Psychiatrists not only explore the very depths of their patients' conscious, but their unconscious feelings and attitudes as well. Therapeutic effectiveness necessitates going beyond a patient's awareness and, in order to do this, it must be possible to communicate freely. A threat to secrecy blocks successful treatment." A much more extended exposition of the case for the privilege is made in Slovenko, Psychiatry and a Second Look at the Medical Privilege, 6 Wayne L. Rev. 175, 184 (1960), quoted extensively in the careful Tentative Recommendation and Study Relating to the Uniform Rules of Evidence (Article V. Privileges), Cal. L. Rev. Comm'n, 417 (1964). The conclusion is reached that Wigmore's four conditions needed to justify the existence of a privilege are amply satisfied.

Illustrative statutes are Cal. Evidence Code §§ 1010-1026; Ga. Code § 38-418 (1961 Supp.); Conn. Gen. Stat., § 52-146a (1966 Supp.); Ill. Rev. Stat. 1967, c. 51, § 5.2.

While many of the statutes simply place the communications on the same basis as those between attorney and client, 8 Wigmore § 2286, n. 23 (McNaughton Rev.1961), basic differences between the two relationships forbid resorting to attorney-client save as a helpful point of departure. Goldstein and Katz, Psychiatrist-Patient Privilege: The GAP Proposal and the Connecticut Statute, 36 Conn. B.J. 175, 182 (1962).

Subdivision (a). (1) The definition of patient does not include a person submitting to examination for scientific purposes. Cf. Cal. Evidence Code § 1101. Attention is directed to 42 U.S.C. 242 (a)(2), as amended by the Drug Abuse and Control Act of 1970, P.L. 91-513, authorizing the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to withhold the identity of persons who are the subjects of research on the use and effect of drugs. The rule would leave this provision in full force. See Rule 501.

(2) The definition of psychotherapist embraces a medical doctor while engaged in the diagnosis or treatment of mental or emotional conditions, including drug addiction, in order not to exclude the general practitioner and to avoid the making of needless refined distinctions concerning what is and what is not the practice of psychiatry. The requirement that the psychologist be in fact licensed, and not merely be believed to be so, is believed to be justified by the number of persons, other than psychiatrists, purporting to render psychotherapeutic aid and the variety of their theories. Cal. Law Rev. Comm'n, supra, at pp. 434-37.

The clarification of mental or emotional condition as including drug addition is consistent with current approaches to drug abuse problems. See, e.g., the definition of "drug dependent person" in 42 U.S.C. 201(q), added by the Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, P.L. 91-513.

(3) Confidential communication is defined in terms comformable with those of the lawyer-client privilege, Rule 503(a)(4) supra, with changes appropriate to the difference in circumstance.

Subdivisions (b) and (c). The lawyer-client rule is drawn upon for the phrasing of the general rule of privilege and the determination of those who may claim it. See Rule 503(b) and (c).

The specific inclusion of communications made for the diagnosis and treatment of drug addiction recognizes the continuing contemporary concern with rehabilitation of drug dependent persons and is designed to implement that policy by encouraging persons in need thereof to seek assistance. The provision is in harmony with Congressional actions in this area. See 42 U.S.C. § 260, providing for voluntary hospitalization of addicts or persons with drug dependence problems and prohibiting use of evidence of admission or treatment in any proceeding against him, and 42 U.S.C. § 3419 providing that in voluntary or involuntary commitment of addicts the results of any hearing, examination, test, or procedure used to determine addiction shall not be used against the patient in any criminal proceeding.

Subdivision (d). The exceptions differ substantially from those of the attorney-client privilege, as a result of the basic differences in the relationships. While it has been argued convincingly that the nature of the psychotherapist-patient relationship demands complete security against legally coerced disclosure in all circumstances, Louisell, The Psychologist in Today's Legal World: Part II, 41 Minn. L. Rev. 731, 746 (1957), the committee of psychiatrists and lawyers who drafted the Connecticut statute concluded that in three instances the need for disclosure was sufficiently great to justify the risk of possible impairment of the relationship. Goldstein and Katz, Psychiatrist-Patient Privilege: The GAP Proposal and the Connecticut Statute, 36 Conn. B. J. 175 (1962). These three exceptions are incorporated in the present rule.

(1) The interests of both patient and public call for a departure from confidentiality in commitment proceedings. Since disclosure is authorized only when the psychotherapist determines that hospitalization is needed, control over disclosure is placed largely in the hands of a person in whom the patient has already manifested confidence. Hence damage to the relationship is unlikely.

(2) In a court ordered examination, the relationship is likely to be an arm's length one, though not necessarily so. In any event, an exception is necessary for the effective utilization of this important and growing procedure. The exception, it will be observed, deals with a court ordered examination rather than with a court appointed psychotherapist. Also, the exception is effective only with respect to the particular purpose for which the examination is ordered. The rule thus conforms with the provisions of 18 U.S.C. § 4244 that no statement made by the accused in the course of an examination into competency to stand trial is admissible on the issue of guilt and of 42 U.S.C. § 3420 that a physician conducting an examination in a drug addiction commitment proceeding is a competent and compellable witness.

(3) By injecting his condition into litigation, the patient must be said to waive the privilege, in fairness and to avoid abuses. Similar considerations prevail after the patient's death.

PART THREE: RULES APPROVED BY SUPREME COURT BUT REJECTED BY CONGRESS
Part Three: Rules Approved by Supreme Court But Rejected by Congress

5-Three Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Rule 505

Rule 505 HUSBAND-WIFE PRIVILEGE

[Not enacted.]

(a) General rule of privilege. An accused in a criminal proceeding has a privilege to prevent his spouse from testifying against him.

(b) Who may claim the privilege. The privilege may be claimed by the accused or by the spouse on his behalf. The authority of the spouse to do so is presumed in the absence of evidence to the contrary.

(c) Exceptions. There is no privilege under this rule (1) in proceedings in which one spouse is charged with a crime against the person or property of the other or of a child of either, or with a crime against the person or property of a third person committed in the course of committing a crime against the other, or (2) as to matters occurring prior to the marriage, or (3) in proceedings in which a spouse is charged with importing an alien for prostitution or other immoral purpose in violation of 8 U.S.C. § 1328, with transporting a female in interstate commerce for immoral purposes or other offense in violation of 18 U.S.C. §§ 2421-2424, or with violation of other similar statutes.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE'S NOTE

Subdivision (a). Rules of evidence have evolved around the marriage relationship in four respects: (1) incompetency of one spouse to testify for the other; (2) privilege of one spouse not to testify against the other; (3) privilege of one spouse not to have the other testify against him; and (4) privilege against disclosure of confidential communications between spouses, sometimes extended to information learned by virtue of the existence of the relationship. Today these matters are largely governed by statutes.

With the disappearance of the disqualification of parties and interested persons, the basis for spousal incompetency no longer existed, and it, too, virtually disappeared in both civil and criminal actions. Usually reached by statute, this result was reached for federal courts by the process of decision. Funk v. United States, 290 U.S. 371, 54 S. Ct. 212, 78 L. Ed. 369 (1933) . These rules contain no recognition of incompetency of one spouse to testify for the other.

While some 10 jurisdictions recognize a privilege not to testify against one's spouse in a criminal case, and a much smaller number do so in civil cases, the great majority recognizes no privilege on the part of the testifying spouse, and this is the position taken by the rule. Compare Wyatt v. United States, 362 U.S. 525, 80 S. Ct. 901, 4 L. Ed. 2d 931 (1960), a Mann Act prosecution in which the wife was the victim. The majority opinion held that she could not claim privilege and was compellable to testify. The holding was narrowly based: The Mann Act presupposed that the women with whom it dealt had no independent wills of their own, and this legislative judgment precluded allowing a victim-wife an option whether to testify, lest the policy of the statute be defeated. A vigorous dissent took the view that nothing in the Mann Act required departure from usual doctrine, which was conceived to be one of allowing the injured party to claim or waive privilege.

About 30 jurisdictions recognize a privilege of an accused in a criminal case to prevent his or her spouse from testifying. It is believed to represent the one aspect of marital privilege the continuation of which is warranted. In Hawkins v. United States, 358 U.S. 74, 79 S. Ct. 136, 3 L. Ed. 2d 125 (1958), it was sustained. Cf. McCormick § 66; 8 Wigmore § 2228 (McNaughton Rev. 1961): Comment, Uniform Rule 23(2).

The rule recognizes no privilege for confidential communications. The traditional justifications for privileges not to testify against a spouse and not to be testified against by one's spouse have been the prevention of marital dissension and the repugnancy of requiring a person to condemn or be condemned by his spouse. 8 Wigmore §§ 2228, 2241 (McNaughton Rev. 1961). These considerations bear no relevancy to marital communications. Nor can it be assumed that marital conduct will be affected by a privilege for confidential communications of whose existence the parties in all likelihood are unaware. The other communication privileges, by way of contrast, have as one party a professional person who can be expected to inform the other of the existence of the privilege. Moreover, the relationships from which those privileges arise are essentially and almost exclusively verbal in nature, quite unlike marriage. See Hutchins and Slesinger, Some Observations on the Law of Evidence: Family Relations, 13 Minn. L. Rev. 675 (1929). Cf. McCormick § 90; 8 Wigmore § 2337 (McNaughton Rev. 1961).

The parties are not spouses if the marriage was a sham, Lutwak v. United States, 344 U.S. 604 (1953), or they have been divorced, Barsky v. United States, 339 F.2d 180 (9th Cir. 1964), and therefore the privilege is not applicable.

Subdivision (b). This provision is a counterpart of Rules 503(c), 504(c), and 506(c). Its purpose is to provide a procedure for preventing the taking of the spouse's testimony notably in grand jury proceedings, when the accused is absent and does not know that a situation appropriate for a claim of privilege is presented. If the privilege is not claimed by the spouse, the protection of Rule 512 is available.

Subdivision (c) contains three exceptions to the privilege against spousal testimony in criminal cases.

(1) The need of limitation upon the privilege in order to avoid grave injustice in cases of offenses against the other spouse or a child of either can scarcely be denied. 8 Wigmore § 2239 (McNaughton Rev. 1961). The rule therefore disallows any privilege against spousal testimony in these cases and in this respect is in accord with the result reached in Wyatt v. United States, 362 U.S. 525, 80 S. Ct. 901, 4 L. Ed. 2d 931 (1960), a Mann Act prosecution, denying the accused the privilege of excluding his wife's testimony, since she was the woman who was transported for immoral purposes.

(2) The second exception renders the privilege inapplicable as to matters occurring prior to the marriage. This provision eliminates the possibility of suppressing testimony by marrying the witness.

(3) The third exception continues and expands established Congressional policy. In prosecutions for importing aliens for immoral purposes, Congress has specifically denied the accused any privilege not to have his spouse testify against him. 8 U.S.C. § 1328. No provision of this nature is included in the Mann Act, and in Hawkins v. United States, 358 U.S. 74, 79 S. Ct. 136, 3 L. Ed. 2d 125 (1958), the conclusion was reached that the common law privilege continued. Consistency requires similar results in the two situations. The rule adopts the Congressional approach, as based upon a more realistic appraisal of the marriage relationship in cases of this kind, in preference to the specific result in Hawkins. Note the common law treatment of pimping and sexual offenses with third persons as exceptions to marital privilege. 8 Wigmore § 2239 (McNaughton Rev. 1961).

With respect to bankruptcy proceedings, the smallness of the area of spousal privilege under the rule and the general inapplicability of privileges created by state law render unnecessary any special provision for examination of the spouse of the bankrupt, such as that now contained in section 21(a) of the Bankruptcy Act. 11 U.S.C. § 44(a).

For recent statutes and rules dealing with husband-wife privileges, see California Evidence Code §§ 970-973, 980-987; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure §§ 60-423(b), 60-428; New Jersey Evidence Rules 23(2), 28.

PART THREE: RULES APPROVED BY SUPREME COURT BUT REJECTED BY CONGRESS
Part Three: Rules Approved by Supreme Court But Rejected by Congress

5-Three Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Rule 506

Rule 506 COMMUNICATIONS TO CLERGYMEN

[Not enacted.]

(a) Definitions. As used in this rule:

(1) A "clergyman" is a minister, priest, rabbi, or other similar functionary of a religious organization, or an individual reasonably believed so to be by the person consulting him.

(2) A communication is "confidential" if made privately and not intended for further disclosure except to other persons present in furtherance of the purpose of the communication.

(b) General rule of privilege. A person has a privilege to refuse to disclose and to prevent another from disclosing a confidential communication by the person to a clergyman in his professional character as spiritual adviser.

(c) Who may claim the privilege. The privilege may be claimed by the person, by his guardian or conservator, or by his personal representative if he is deceased. The clergyman may claim the privilege on behalf of the person. His authority so to do is presumed in the absence of evidence to the contrary.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE'S NOTE

The considerations which dictate the recognition of privileges generally seem strongly to favor a privilege for confidential communications to clergymen. During the period when most of the common law privileges were taking shape, no clear-cut privilege for communications between priest and penitent emerged. 8 Wigmore § 2394 (McNaughton Rev. 1961). The English political climate of the time may well furnish the explanation. In this country, however, the privilege has been recognized by statute in about two-thirds of the states and occasionally by the common law process of decision. Id., § 2395; Mullen v. United States, 263 F.2d 275, 105 U.S. App. D.C. 25 (1959) .

Subdivision (a). Paragraph (1) defines a clergyman as a "minister, priest, rabbi, or other similar functionary of a religious organization." The concept is necessarily broader than that inherent in the ministerial exemption for purposes of Selective Service. See United States v. Jackson, 369 F.2d 936 (4th Cir. 1966) . However, it is not so broad as to include all self-denominated "ministers." A fair construction of the language requires that the person to whom the status is sought to be attached be regularly engaged in activities conforming at least in a general way with those of a Catholic priest, Jewish rabbi, or minister of an established Protestant denomination, though not necessarily on a full-time basis. No further specification seems possible in view of the lack of licensing and certification procedures for clergymen. However, this lack seems to have occasioned no particular difficulties in connection with the solemnization of marriages, which suggests that none may be anticipated here. For similar definitions of "clergyman" see California Evidence Code § 1030; New Jersey Evidence Rule 29.

The "reasonable belief" provision finds support in similar provisions for lawyer-client in Rule 503 and for psychotherapist-patient in Rule 504. A parallel is also found in the recognition of the validity of marriages performed by unauthorized persons if the parties reasonably believed them legally qualified. Harper and Skolnick, Problems of the Family 153 (rev. ed. 1962).

(2) The definition of "confidential" communication is consistent with the use of the term in Rule 503(a)(5) for lawyer-client and in Rule 504(a)(3) for psychotherapist-patient, suitably adapted to communications to clergymen.

Subdivision (b). The choice between a privilege narrowly restricted to doctrinally required confessions and a privilege broadly applicable to all confidential communications with a clergyman in his professional character as spiritual adviser has been exercised in favor of the latter. Many clergymen now receive training in marriage counseling and the handling of personality problems. Matters of this kind fall readily into the realm of the spirit. The same considerations which underlie the psychotherapist-patient privilege of Rule 504 suggest a broad application of the privilege for communications to clergymen.

State statutes and rules fall in both the narrow and the broad categories. A typical narrow statute proscribes disclosure of "a confession ... made ... in the course of discipline enjoined by the church to which he belongs." Ariz.Rev.Stats.Ann. 1956, § 12-2233. See also California Evidence Code § 1032; Uniform Rule 29. Illustrative of the broader privilege are statutes applying to "information communicated to him in a confidential manner, properly entrusted to him in his professional capacity, and necessary to enable him to discharge the functions of his office according to the usual course of his practice or discipline, wherein such person so communicating ... is seeking spiritual counsel and advice," Fla. Stats. Ann. 1960, § 90.241, or to any "confidential communication properly entrusted to him in his professional capacity, and necessary and proper to enable him to discharge the functions of his office according to the usual course of practice or discipline," Iowa Code Ann. 1950, § 622.10. See also Ill. Rev. Stats. 1967, c. 51, § 48.1; Minn. Stats. Ann. 1945, § 595.02(3); New Jersey Evidence Rule 29.

Under the privilege as phrased, the communicating person is entitled to prevent disclosure not only by himself but also by the clergyman and by eavesdroppers. For discussion see Advisory Committee's Note under lawyer-client privilege, Rule 503(b).

The nature of what may reasonably be considered spiritual advice makes it unnecessary to include in the rule a specific exception for communications in furtherance of crime or fraud, as in Rule 503(d)(1).

Subdivision (c) makes clear that the privilege belongs to the communicating person. However, a prima facie authority on the part of the clergyman to claim the privilege on behalf of the person is recognized. The discipline of the particular church and the discreteness of the clergyman are believed to constitute sufficient safeguards for the absent communicating person. See Advisory Committee's Note to the similar provision with respect to attorney-client in Rule 503(c).

Rule 507 POLITICAL VOTE

[Not enacted.]

Every person has a privilege to refuse to disclose the tenor of his vote at a political election conducted by secret ballot unless the vote was cast illegally.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE'S NOTE

Secrecy in voting is an essential aspect of effective democratic government, insuring free exercise of the franchise and fairness in elections. Secrecy after the ballot has been cast is as essential as secrecy in the act of voting. Nutting, Freedom of Silence: Constitutional Protection Against Governmental Intrusion in Political Affairs, 47 Mich. L. Rev. 181, 191 (1948). Consequently a privilege has long been recognized on the part of a voter to decline to disclose how he voted. Required disclosure would be the exercise of "a kind of inquisitorial power unknown to the principles of our government and constitution, and might be highly injurious to the suffrages of a free people, as well as tending to create cabals and disturbances between contending parties in popular elections." Johnston v. Charleston, 1 Bay 441, 442 (S.C. 1795) .

The exception for illegally cast votes is a common one under both statutes and case law, Nutting, supra, at p. 192; 8 Wigmore § 2214, p. 163 (McNaughton Rev. 1961). The policy considerations which underlie the privilege are not applicable to the illegal voter. However, nothing in the exception purports to foreclose an illegal voter from invoking the privilege against self-incrimination under appropriate circumstances.

For similar provisions, see Uniform Rule 31; California Evidence Code § 1050; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-431; New Jersey Evidence Rule 31.

Rule 508 TRADE SECRETS

[Not enacted.]

A person has a privilege, which may be claimed by him or his agent or employee, to refuse to disclose and to prevent other persons from disclosing a trade secret owned by him, if the allowance of the privilege will not tend to conceal fraud or otherwise work injustice. When disclosure is directed, the judge shall take such protective measure as the interests of the holder of the privilege and of the parties and the furtherance of justice may require.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE'S NOTE

While sometimes said not to be a true privilege, a qualified right to protection against disclosure of trade secrets has found ample recognition, and, indeed, a denial of it would be difficult to defend. 8 Wigmore § 2212(3) (McNaughton Rev. 1961). And see 4 Moore's Federal Practice PP 30.12 and 34.15 (2d ed. 1963 and Supp.1965) and 2A Barron and Holtzoff, Federal Practice and Procedure § 715.1 (Wright ed. 1961). Congressional policy is reflected in the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, 15 U.S.C. § 78x, and the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1933, id. § 79v, which deny the Securities and Exchange Commission authority to require disclosure of trade secrets or processes in applications and reports. See also Rule 26(c)(7) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, as revised, mentioned further hereinafter.

Illustrative cases raising trade-secret problems are: E. I. Du Pont de Nemours Powder Co. v. Masland, 244 U.S. 100, 37 S. Ct. 575, 61 L. Ed. 1016 (1917) , suit to enjoin former employee from using plaintiff's secret processes, countered by defense that many of the processes were well known to the trade; Segal Lock & Hardware Co. v. FTC, 143 F.2d 935 (2d Cir. 1944) , question whether expert locksmiths employed by FTC should be required to disclose methods used by them in picking petitioner's "pick-proof" locks; Dobson v. Graham, 49 F. 17 (E.D. Pa.1889) , patent infringement suit in which plaintiff sought to elicit from former employees now in the hire of defendant the respects in which defendant's machinery differed from plaintiff's patented machinery; Putney v. Du Bois Co., 240 Mo. App. 1075, 226 S.W.2d 737 (1950) , action for injuries allegedly sustained from using defendant's secret formula dishwashing compound. See 8 Wigmore § 2212(3) (McNaughton Rev. 1961); Annot., 17 A.L.R.2d 383 ; 49 Mich. L. Rev. 133 (1950). The need for accommodation between protecting trade secrets, on the one hand, and eliciting facts required for full and fair presentation of a case, on the other hand, is apparent. Whether disclosure should be required depends upon a weighing of the competing interests involved against the background of the total situation, including consideration of such factors as the dangers of abuse, good faith, adequacy of protective measures, and the availability of other means of proof.

The cases furnish examples of the bringing of judicial ingenuity to bear upon the problem of evolving protective measures which achieve a degree of control over disclosure. Perhaps the most common is simply to take testimony in camera. Annot., 62 A.L.R.2d 509 . Other possibilities include making disclosure to opposing counsel but not to his client, E. I. Du Pont de Nemours Powder Co. v. Masland, 244 U.S. 100, 37 S.Ct. 575, 61 L. Ed. 1016 (1917) ; making disclosure only to the judge (hearing examiner), Segal Lock & Hardware Co. v. FTC, 143 F.2d 935 (2d Cir. 1944) ; and placing those present under oath not to make disclosure, Paul v. Sinnott, 217 F. Supp. 84 (W.D. Pa.1963) .

Rule 26(c) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, as revised, provides that the judge may make "any order which justice requires to protect a party or person from annoyance, embarrassment, oppression, or undue burden or expense, including one or more of the following: ... (7) that a trade secret or other confidential research, development, or commercial information not be disclosed or be disclosed only in a designated way. ..." While the instant evidence rule extends this underlying policy into the trial, the difference in circumstances between discovery stage and trial may well be such as to require a different ruling at the trial.

For other rules recognizing privilege for trade secrets, see Uniform Rule 32; California Evidence Code § 1060; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 50-432; New Jersey Evidence Rule 32.

PART THREE: RULES APPROVED BY SUPREME COURT BUT REJECTED BY CONGRESS
Part Three: Rules Approved by Supreme Court But Rejected by Congress

5-Three Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Rule 509

Rule 509 SECRETS OF STATE AND OTHER OFFICIAL INFORMATION

[Not enacted.]

(a) Definitions.

(1) Secret of state. A "secret of state" is a governmental secret relating to the national defense or the international relations of the United States.

(2) Official information. "Official information" is information within the custody or control of a department or agency of the government the disclosure of which is shown to be contrary to the public interest and which consists of: (A) intragovernmental opinions or recommendations submitted for consideration in the performance of decisional or policymaking functions, or (B) subject to the provisions of 18 U.S.C. § 3500, investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes and not otherwise available, or (C) information within the custody or control of a governmental department or agency whether initiated within the department or agency or acquired by it in its exercise of its official responsibilities and not otherwise available to the public pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552.

(b) General rule of privilege. The government has a privilege to refuse to give evidence and to prevent any person from giving evidence upon a showing of reasonable likelihood of danger that the evidence will disclose a secret of state or official information, as defined in this rule.

(c) Procedures. The privilege for secrets of state may be claimed only by the chief officer of the government agency or department administering the subject matter which the secret information sought concerns, but the privilege for official information may be asserted by any attorney representing the government. The required showing may be made in whole or in part in the form of a written statement. The judge may hear the matter in chambers, but all counsel are entitled to inspect the claim and showing and to be heard thereon, except that, in the case of secrets of state, the judge upon motion of the government, may permit the government to make the required showing in the above form in camera. If the judge sustains the privilege upon a showing in camera, the entire text of the government's statements shall be sealed and preserved in the court's records in the event of appeal. In the case of privilege claimed for official information the court may require examination in camera of the information itself. The judge may take any protective measure which the interests of the government and the furtherance of justice may require.

(d) Notice to government. If the circumstances of the case indicate a substantial possibility that a claim of privilege would be appropriate but has not been made because of oversight or lack of knowledge, the judge shall give or cause notice to be given to the officer entitled to claim the privilege and shall stay further proceedings a reasonable time to afford opportunity to assert a claim of privilege.

(e) Effect of sustaining claim. If a claim of privilege is sustained in a proceeding to which the government is a party and it appears that another party is thereby deprived of material evidence, the judge shall make any further orders which the interests of justice require, including striking the testimony of a witness, declaring a mistrial, finding against the government upon an issue as to which the evidence is relevant, or dismissing the action.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE'S NOTE

Subdivision (a). (1) The rule embodies the privilege protecting military and state secrets described as "well established in the law of evidence," United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1, 6, 73 S. Ct. 528, 97 L. Ed. 727 (1953) , and as one "the existence of which has never been doubted," 8 Wigmore § 2378, p. 794 (McNaughton Rev. 1961).

The use of the term "national defense," without attempt at further elucidation, finds support in the similar usage in statutory provisions relating to the crimes of gathering, transmitting, or losing defense information, and gathering or delivering defense information to aid a foreign government. 18 U.S.C. §§ 793, 794. See also 5 U.S.C. § 1002; 50 U.S.C. App. § 2152(d). In determining whether military or state secrets are involved, due regard will, of course, be given to classification pursuant to executive order.

(2) The rule also recognizes a privilege for specified types of official information and in this respect is designed primarily to resolve questions of the availability to litigants of data in the files of governmental departments and agencies. In view of the lesser danger to the public interest than in cases of military and state secrets, the official information privilege is subject to a generally overriding requirement that disclosure would be contrary to the public interest. It is applicable to three categories of information.

(A) Intergovernmental opinions or recommendations submitted for consideration in the performance of decisional or policy making functions. The policy basis of this aspect of the privilege is found in the desirability of encouraging candor in the exchange of views within the government. Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939, 141 Ct. Cl. 38 (1958) ; Davis v. Braswell Motor Freight Lines, Inc., 363 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1966) ; Ackerly v. Ley, 420 F.2d 1336 (D.C. Cir. 1969) . A privilege of this character is consistent with the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5), and with the standing of the agency to raise questions of relevancy, though not a party, recognized in such decisions as Boeing Airplane Co. v. Coggeshall, 280 F.2d 654, 659, 108 U.S. App. D.C. 106 (1960) (Renegotiation Board) and Freeman v. Seligson, 405 F.2d 1326, 1334, 132 U.S. App. D.C. 56 (1968) (Secretary of Agriculture).

(B) Investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes. This category is expressly made subject to the provisions of the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3500, which insulates prior statements or reports of government witnesses in criminal cases against subpoena, discovery, or inspection until the witness has testified on direct examination at the trial but then entitles the defense to its production. Rarely will documents of this nature be relevant until the author has testified and thus placed his credibility in issue. Further protection against discovery of government files in criminal cases is found in Criminal Procedure Rule 16(a) and (b). The breadth of discovery in civil cases, however, goes beyond ordinary bounds of relevancy and raises problems calling for the exercise of judicial control, and in making provision for it the rule implements the Freedom of Information Act, 18 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7).

(C) Information exempted from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552. In 1958 the old

"housekeeping" statute which had been relied upon as a foundation for departmental regulations curtailing disclosure was amended by adding a provision that it did not authorize withholding information from the public. In 1966 the Congress enacted the Freedom of Information Act for the purpose of making information in the files of departments and agencies, subject to certain specified exceptions, available to the mass media and to the public generally. 5 U.S.C. § 552. These enactments are significant expressions of Congressional policy. The exceptions in the Act are not framed in terms of evidentiary privilege, thus recognizing by clear implication that the needs of litigants may stand on somewhat different footing from those of the public generally. Nevertheless, the exceptions are based on values obviously entitled to weighty consideration in formulating rules of evidentiary privilege. In some instances in these rules, exceptions in the Act have been made the subject of specific privileges, e.g., military and state secrets in the present rule and trade secrets in Rule 508. The purpose of the present provision is to incorporate the remaining exceptions of the Act into the qualified privilege here created, thus subjecting disclosure of the information to judicial determination with respect to the effect of disclosure on the public interest. This approach appears to afford a satisfactory resolution of the problems which may arise.

Subdivision (b). The rule vests the privileges in the government where they properly belong rather than a party or witness. See United States v. Reynolds, supra, p. 7, 73 S. Ct. 528 . The showing required as a condition precedent to claiming the privilege represents a compromise between complete judicial control and accepting as final the decision of a departmental officer. See Machin v. Zuckert, 316 F.2d 336, 114 U.S. App. D.C. 335 (1963) , rejecting in part a claim of privilege by the Secretary of the Air Force and ordering the furnishing of information for use in private litigation. This approach is consistent with Reynolds.

Subdivision (c). In requiring the claim of privilege for state secrets to be made by the chief departmental officer, the rule again follows Reynolds, insuring consideration by a high-level officer. This provision is justified by the lesser participation by the judge in cases of state secrets. The full participation by the judge in official information cases, on the contrary, warrants allowing the claim of privilege to be made by a government attorney.

Subdivision (d) spells out and emphasizes a power and responsibility on the part of the trial judge. An analogous provision is found in the requirement that the court certify to the Attorney General when the constitutionality of an act of Congress is in question in an action to which the government is not a party. 28 U.S.C § 2403.

Subdivision (e). If privilege is successfully claimed by the government in litigation to which it is not a party, the effect is simply to make the evidence unavailable, as though a witness had died or claimed the privilege against self-incrimination, and no specification of the consequences is necessary. The rule therefore deals only with the effect of a successful claim of privilege by the government in proceedings to which it is a party. Reference to other types of cases serves to illustrate the variety of situations which may arise and the impossibility of evolving a single formula to be applied automatically to all of them. The privileged materials may be the statement of government witness, as under the Jencks statute, which provides that, if the government elects not to produce the statement, the judge is to strike the testimony of the witness, or that he may declare a mistrial if the interests of justice so require. 18 U.S.C. § 3500(d). Or the privileged materials may disclose a possible basis for applying pressure upon witnesses. United States v. Beekman, 155 F.2d 580 (2d Cir. 1946) . Or they may bear directly upon a substantive element of a criminal case, requiring dismissal in the event of a successful claim of privilege. United States v. Andolschek, 142 F.2d 503 (2d Cir. 1944) ; and see United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1, 73 S. Ct. 528, 97 L. Ed. 727 (1953) . Or they may relate to an element of a plaintiff's claim against the government, with the decisions indicating unwillingness to allow the government's claim of privilege for secrets of state to be used as an offensive weapon against it. United States v. Reynolds, supra ; Republic of China v. National Union Fire Ins. Co., 142 F. Supp. 551 (D. Md. 1956) .

PART THREE: RULES APPROVED BY SUPREME COURT BUT REJECTED BY CONGRESS
Part Three: Rules Approved by Supreme Court But Rejected by Congress

5-Three Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Rule 510

Rule 510 IDENTITY OF INFORMER

(a) Rule of privilege. The government or a state or subdivision thereof has a privilege to refuse to disclose the identity of a person who has furnished information relating to or assisting in an investigation of a possible violation of law to a law enforcement officer or member of a legislative committee or its staff conducting an investigation.

(b) Who may claim. The privilege may be claimed by an appropriate representative of the government, regardless of whether the information was furnished to an officer of the government or of a state or subdivision thereof. The privilege may be claimed by an appropriate representative of a state or subdivision if the information was furnished to an officer thereof, except that in criminal cases the privilege shall not be allowed if the government objects.

(c) Exceptions.

(1) Voluntary disclosure; informer a witness. No privilege exists under this rule if the identity of the informer or his interest in the subject matter of his communication has been disclosed to those who would have cause to resent the communication by a holder of the privilege or by the informer's own action, or if the informer appears as a witness for the government.

(2) Testimony on merits. If it appears from the evidence in the case or from other showing by a party that an informer may be able to give testimony necessary to a fair determination of the issue of guilt or innocence in a criminal case or of a material issue on the merits in a civil case to which the government is a party, and the government invokes the privilege, the judge shall give the government an opportunity to show in camera facts relevant to determining whether the informer can, in fact, supply that testimony. The showing will ordinarily be in the form of affidavits, but the judge may direct that testimony be taken if he finds that the matter cannot be resolved satisfactorily upon affidavit. If the judge finds that there is a reasonable probability that the informer can give the testimony, and the government elects not to disclose his identity, the judge on motion of the defendant in a criminal case shall dismiss the charges to which the testimony would relate, and the judge may do so on his own motion. In civil cases, he may make any order that justice requires. Evidence submitted to the judge shall be sealed and preserved to be made available to the appellate court in the event of an appeal, and the contents shall not otherwise be revealed without consent of the government. All counsel and parties shall be permitted to be present at every stage of proceedings under this subdivision except a showing in camera, at which no counsel or party shall be permitted to be present.

(3) Legality of obtaining evidence. If information from an informer is relied upon to establish the legality of the means by which evidence was obtained and the judge is not satisfied that the information was received from an informer reasonably believed to be reliable or credible, he may require the identity of the informer to be disclosed. The judge shall, on request of the government, direct that the disclosure be made in camera. All counsel and parties concerned with the issue of legality shall be permitted to be present at every stage of proceedings under this subdivision except a disclosure in camera, at which no counsel or party shall be permitted to be present. If disclosure of the identity of the informer is made in camera, the record thereof shall be sealed and preserved to be made available to the appellate court in the event of an appeal, and the contents shall not otherwise be revealed without consent of the government.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE'S NOTE

The rule recognizes the use of informers as an important aspect of law enforcement, whether the informer is a citizen who steps forward with information or a paid undercover agent. In either event, the basic importance of anonymity in the effective use of informers is apparent, Bocchicchio v. Curtis Publishing Co., 203 F. Supp. 403 (E.D. Pa. 1962) , and the privilege of withholding their identity was well established at common law. Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53, 59, 77 S. Ct. 623, 1 L. Ed. 2d 639 (1957) ; McCormick § 148; 8 Wigmore § 2374 (McNaughton Rev. 1961).

Subdivision (a). The public interest in law enforcement requires that the privilege be that of the government, state, or political subdivision, rather than that of the witness. The rule blankets in as an informer anyone who tells a law enforcement officer about a violation of law without regard to whether the officer is one charged with enforcing the particular law. The rule also applies to disclosures to legislative investigating committees and their staffs, and is sufficiently broad to include continuing investigations.

Although the tradition of protecting the identity of informers has evolved in an essentially criminal setting, noncriminal law enforcement situations involving possibilities of reprisal against informers fall within the purview of the considerations out of which the privilege originated. In Mitchell v. Roma, 265 F.2d 633 (3d Cir. 1959) , the privilege was given effect with respect to persons informing as to violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act, and in Wirtz v. Continental Fin. & Loan Co., 326 F.2d 561 (5th Cir. 1964) , a similar case, the privilege was recognized, although the basis of decision was lack of relevancy to the issues in the case.

Only identity is privileged; communications are not included except to the extent that disclosure would operate also to disclose the informer's identity. The common law was to the same effect. 8 Wigmore § 2374, at p. 765 (McNaughton Rev. 1961). See also Roviaro v. United States, supra, 353 U.S. at p. 60, 77 S. Ct. 623 ; Bowman Dairy Co. v. United States, 341 U.S. 214, 221, 71 S. Ct. 675, 95 L. Ed. 879 (1951) .

The rule does not deal with the question whether presentence reports made under Criminal Procedure Rule 32(c) should be made available to an accused.

Subdivision (b). Normally the "appropriate representative" to make the claim will be counsel. However, it is possible that disclosure of the informer's identity will be sought in proceedings to which the government, state, or subdivision, as the case may be, is not a party. Under these circumstances effective implementation of the privilege requires that other representatives be considered "appropriate." See, for example, Bocchicchio v. Curtis Publishing Co., 203 F. Supp. 403 (E.D. Pa. 1962) , a civil action for libel, in which a local police officer not represented by counsel successfully claimed the informer privilege.

The privilege may be claimed by a state or subdivision of a state if the information was given to its officer, except that in criminal cases it may not be allowed if the government objects.

Subdivision (c) deals with situations in which the informer privilege either does not apply or is curtailed.

(1) If the identity of the informer is disclosed, nothing further is to be gained from efforts to suppress it. Disclosure may be direct, or the same practical effect may result from action revealing the informer's interest in the subject matter. See, for example, Westinghouse Elec. Corp. v. City of Burlington, 351 F.2d 762, 122 U.S. App. D.C. 65 (1965), on remand 246 F. Supp. 839 (D.D.C. 1965), which held that the filing of civil antitrust actions destroyed as to plaintiffs the informer privilege claimed by the Attorney General with respect to complaints of criminal antitrust violations. While allowing the privilege in effect to be waived by one not its holder, i.e. the informer himself, is something of a novelty in the law of privilege, if the informer chooses to reveal his identity, further efforts to suppress it are scarcely feasible.

The exception is limited to disclosure to "those who would have cause to resent the communication," in the language of Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53, 60, 77 S. Ct. 623, 1 L. Ed. 2d 639 (1957), since disclosure otherwise, e.g. to another law enforcing agency, is not calculated to undercut the objects of the privilege.

If the informer becomes a witness for the government, the interests of justice in disclosing his status as a source of bias or possible support are believed to outweigh any remnant of interest in nondisclosure which then remains. See Harris v. United States, 371 F.2d 365 (9th Cir. 1967), in which the trial judge permitted detailed inquiry into the relationship between the witness and the government. Cf. Attorney General v. Briant, 15 M. & W. 169, 153 Eng. Rep. 808 (Exch. 1846). The purpose of the limitation to witnesses for the government is to avoid the possibility of calling persons as witnesses as a means of discovery whether they are informers.

(2) The informer privilege, it was held by the leading case, may not be used in a criminal prosecution to suppress the identity of a witness when the public interest in protecting the flow of information is outweighed by the individual's right to prepare his defense. Roviaro v. United States, supra. The rule extends this balancing to include civil as well as criminal cases and phrases it in terms of "a reasonable probability that the informer may be able to give testimony necessary to a fair determination of the issue of guilt or innocence in a criminal case or of a material issue on the merits in a civil case." Once the privilege is invoked a procedure is provided for determining whether the informer can in fact supply testimony of such nature as to require disclosure of his identity, thus avoiding a "judicial guessing game" on the question. United States v. Day, 384 F.2d 464, 470 (3d Cir. 1967). An investigation in camera is calculated to accommodate the conflicting interests involved. The rule also spells out specifically the consequences of a successful claim of the privilege in a criminal case; the wider range of possibilities in civil cases demands more flexibility in treatment. See Advisory Committee's Note to Rule 509(e) supra.

(3) One of the acute conflicts between the interest of the public in nondisclosure and the avoidance of unfairness to the accused as a result of nondisclosure arises when information from an informer is relied upon to legitimate a search and seizure by furnishing probable cause for an arrest without a warrant or for the issuance of a warrant for arrest or search. McCray v. Illinois, 386 U.S. 300, 87 S. Ct. 1056, 18 L. Ed. 2d 62 (1967), rehearing denied, 386 U.S. 1042. A hearing in camera provides an accommodation of these conflicting interests. United States v. Jackson, 384 F.2d 825 (3d Cir. 1967). The limited disclosure to the judge avoids any significant impairment of secrecy, while affording the accused a substantial measure of protection against arbitrary police action. The procedure is consistent with McCray and the decisions there discussed.

PART THREE: RULES APPROVED BY SUPREME COURT BUT REJECTED BY CONGRESS
Part Three: Rules Approved by Supreme Court But Rejected by Congress

5-Three Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Rule 511

Rule 511 WAIVER OF PRIVILEGE BY VOLUNTARY DISCLOSURE

[Not enacted.]

A person upon whom these rules confer a privilege against disclosure of the confidential matter or communication waives the privilege if he or his predecessor while holder of the privilege voluntarily discloses or consents to disclosure of any significant part of the matter or communication. This rule does not apply if the disclosure is itself a privileged communication.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE'S NOTE

The central purpose of most privileges is the promotion of some interest or relationship by endowing it with a supporting secrecy or confidentiality. It is evident that the privilege should terminate when the holder by his own act destroys this confidentiality. McCormick §§ 87, 97, 106; 8 Wigmore §§ 2242, 2327-2329, 2374, 2389-2390 (McNaughton Rev. 1961).

The rule is designed to be read with a view to what it is that the particular privilege protects. For example, the lawyer-client privilege covers only communications, and the fact that a client has discussed a matter with his lawyer does not insulate the client against disclosure of the subject matter discussed, although he is privileged not to disclose the discussion itself. See McCormick § 93. The waiver here provided for is similarly restricted. Therefore a client, merely by disclosing a subject which he had discussed with his attorney, would not waive the applicable privilege; he would have to make disclosure of the communication itself in order to effect a waiver.

By traditional doctrine, waiver is the intentional relinquishment of a known right. Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 464, 58 S. Ct. 1019, 82 L. Ed. 1461 (1938) . However, in the confidential privilege situations, once confidentiality is destroyed through voluntary disclosure, no subsequent claim of privilege can restore it, and knowledge or lack of knowledge of the existence of the privilege appears to be irrelevant. California Evidence Code § 912; 8 Wigmore § 2327 (McNaughton Rev. 1961).

5-Three Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Rule 512

Rule 512 PRIVILEGED MATTER DISCLOSED UNDER COMPULSION OR WITHOUT OPPORTUNITY TO CLAIM PRIVILEGE

[Not enacted.]

Evidence of a statement or other disclosure of privileged matter is not admissible against the holder of the privilege if the disclosure was (a) compelled erroneously or (b) made without opportunity to claim the privilege.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE'S NOTE

Ordinarily a privilege is invoked in order to forestall disclosure. However, under some circumstances consideration must be given to the status and effect of a disclosure already made. Rule 511, immediately preceding, gives voluntary disclosure the effect of a waiver, while the present rule covers the effect of disclosure made under compulsion or without opportunity to claim the privilege.

Confidentiality, once destroyed, is not susceptible of restoration, yet some measure of repair may be accomplished by preventing use of the evidence against the holder of the privilege. The remedy of exclusion is therefore made available when the earlier disclosure was compelled erroneously or without opportunity to claim the privilege.

With respect to erroneously compelled disclosure, the argument may be made that the holder should be required in the first instance to assert the privilege, stand his ground, refuse to answer, perhaps incur a judgment of contempt, and exhaust all legal recourse, in order to sustain his privilege. See Fraser v. United States, 145 F.2d 139 (6th Cir. 1944) , cert. denied 324 U.S. 849, 65 S.Ct. 684, 89 L.Ed. 1409 ; United States v. Johnson, 76 F.Supp. 538 (M.D.Pa.1947) , aff'd 165 F.2d 42 (3d Cir. 1947) , cert. denied 332 U.S. 852, 68 S.Ct. 355, 92 L.Ed. 422 , reh. denied 333 U.S. 834, 68 S.Ct. 457, 92 L.Ed. 1118 . However, this exacts of the holder greater fortitude in the face of authority than ordinary individuals are likely to possess, and assumes unrealistically that a judicial remedy is always available. In self-incrimination cases, the writers agree that erroneously compelled disclosures are inadmissible in a subsequent criminal prosecution of the holder, Maguire, Evidence of Guilt 66 (1959); McCormick § 127; 8 Wigmore § 2270 (McNaughton Rev. 1961), and the principle is equally sound when applied to other privileges. The modest departure from usual principles of res judicata which occurs when the compulsion is judicial is justified by the advantage of having one simple rule, assuring at least one opportunity for judicial supervision in every case.

The second circumstance stated as a basis for exclusion is disclosure made without opportunity to the holder to assert his privilege. Illustrative possibilities are disclosure by an eavesdropper, by a person used in the transmission of a privileged communication, by a family member participating in psychotherapy, or privileged data improperly made available from a computer bank.

Rule 513 COMMENT UPON OR INFERENCE FROM CLAIM OF PRIVILEGE; INSTRUCTION

[Not enacted.]

(a) Comment or inference not permitted. The claim of a privilege, whether in the present proceeding or upon a prior occasion, is not a proper subject of comment by judge or counsel. No inference may be drawn therefrom.

(b) Claiming privilege without knowledge of jury. In jury cases, proceedings shall be conducted, to the extent practicable, so as to facilitate the making of claims of privilege without the knowledge of the jury.

(c) Jury instruction. Upon request, any party against whom the jury might draw an adverse inference from a claim of privilege is entitled to an instruction that no inference may be drawn therefrom.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE'S NOTE

Subdivision (a). In Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609, 614, 85 S. Ct. 1229, 14 L. Ed. 2d 106 (1965) , the Court pointed out that allowing comment upon the claim of a privilege "cuts down on the privilege by making its assertion costly." Consequently it was held that comment upon the election of the accused not to take the stand infringed upon his privilege against self-incrimination so substantially as to constitute a constitutional violation. While the privileges governed by these rules are not constitutionally based, they are nevertheless founded upon important policies and are entitled to maximum effect. Hence the present subdivision forbids comment upon the exercise of a privilege, in accord with the weight of authority. Courtney v. United States, 390 F.2d 521 (9th Cir. 1968) ; 8 Wigmore §§ 2243, 2322, 2386; Barnhart, Privilege in the Uniform Rules of Evidence, 24 Ohio St. L.J. 131, 137-38 (1963). Cf. McCormick § 80.

Subdivision (b). The value of a privilege may be greatly depreciated by means other than expressly commenting to a jury upon the fact that it was exercised. Thus, the calling of a witness in the presence of the jury and subsequently excusing him after a sidebar conference may effectively convey to the jury the fact that a privilege has been claimed, even though the actual claim has not been made in their hearing. Whether a privilege will be claimed is usually ascertainable in advance and the handling of the entire matter outside the presence of the jury is feasible. Destruction of the privilege by innuendo can and should be avoided. Tallo v. United States, 344 F.2d 467 (1st Cir. 1965) ; United States v. Tomaiolo, 249 F.2d 683 (2d Cir. 1957) ; San Fratello v. United States, 343 F.2d 711 (5th Cir. 1965) ; Courtney v. United States, 390 F.2d 521 (9th Cir. 1968) ; 6 Wigmore § 1808, pp. 275-76; 6 U.C.L.A.L. Rev. 455 (1959). This position is in accord with the general agreement of the authorities that an accused cannot be forced to make his election not to testify in the presence of the jury. 8 Wigmore § 2268, p. 407 (McNaughton Rev. 1961).

Unanticipated situations are, of course, bound to arise, and much must be left to the discretion of the judge and the professional responsibility of counsel.

Subdivision (c). Opinions will differ as to the effectiveness of a jury instruction not to draw an adverse inference from the making of a claim of privilege. See Bruton v. United States, 389 U.S. 818, 88 S. Ct. 126, 19 L. Ed. 2d 70 (1968) . Whether an instruction shall be given is left to the sound judgment of counsel for the party against whom the adverse inference may be drawn. The instruction is a matter of right, if requested. This is the result reached in Bruno v. United States, 308 U.S. 287, 60 S. Ct. 198, 84 L. Ed. 257 (1939) , holding that an accused is entitled to an instruction under the statute (now 18 U.S.C. § 3481) providing that his failure to testify creates no presumption against him.

The right to the instruction is not impaired by the fact that the claim of privilege is by a witness, rather than by a party, provided an adverse inference against the party may result.

Rule 804 HEARSAY EXCEPTIONS: DECLARANT UNAVAILABLE

[Subdivision (b)(2) not enacted.]

* * *

(b) Hearsay exceptions. The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule if the declarant is unavailable as a witness:

* * *

(2) Statement of recent perception. A statement, not in response to the instigation of a person engaged in investigating, litigating, or settling a claim, which narrates, describes, or explains an event or condition recently perceived by the declarant, made in good faith, not in contemplation of pending or anticipated litigation in which he was interested, and while his recollection was clear.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE'S NOTE

Exception (2). The rule finds support in several directions. The well known Massachusetts Act of 1898 allows in evidence the declaration of any deceased person made in good faith before the commencement of the action and upon personal knowledge. Mass. G.L., c. 233, § 65. To the same effect is R.I.G.L. § 9-19-11. Under other statutes, a decedent's statement is admissible on behalf of his estate in actions against it, to offset the presumed inequality resulting from allowing a surviving opponent to testify. California Evidence Code § 1261; Conn. G.S., § 52-172; and statutes collected in 5 Wigmore § 1576. See also Va. Code § 8-286, allowing statements made when capable by a party now incapable of testifying.

In 1938 the Committee on Improvements in the Law of Evidence of the American Bar Association recommended adoption of a statute similar to that of Massachusetts but with the concept of unavailability expanded to include, in addition to death, cases of insanity or inability to produce a witness or take his deposition. 63 A.B.A. Reports 570, 584, 600 (1938). The same year saw enactment of the English Evidence Act of 1938, allowing written statements made on personal knowledge, if declarant is deceased or otherwise unavailable or if the court is satisfied that undue delay or expense would otherwise be caused, unless declarant was an interested person in pending or anticipated relevant proceedings. Evidence Act of 1938, 1 & 2 Geo. 6, c. 28; Cross on Evidence 482 (3d ed. 1967).

Model Code Rule 503(a) provided broadly for admission of any hearsay declaration of an unavailable declarant. No circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness were required. Debate upon the floor of the American Law Institute did not seriously question the propriety of the rule but centered upon what should constitute unavailability. 18 A.L.I. Proceedings 90-134 (1941).

The Uniform Rules draftsman took a less advanced position, more in the pattern of the Massachusetts statute, and invoked several assurances of accuracy: recency of perception, clarity of recollection, good faith, and antecedence to the commencement of the action. Uniform Rule 63(4) (c).

Opposition developed to the Uniform Rule because of its countenancing of the use of statements carefully prepared under the tutelage of lawyers, claim adjusters, or investigators with a view to pending or prospective litigation. Tentative Recommendation and a Study Relating to the Uniform Rules of Evidence (Art. VIII. Hearsay Evidence), Cal. Law Rev. Comm'n, 318 (1962); Quick, Excitement, Necessity and the Uniform Rules: A Reappraisal of Rule 63(4), 6 Wayne L. Rev. 204, 219-24 (1960). To meet this objection, the rule excludes statements made at the instigation of a person engaged in investigating, litigating, or settling a claim. It also incorporates as safeguards the good faith and clarity of recollection required by the Uniform Rule and the exclusion of a statement by a person interested in the litigation provided by the English act.

With respect to the question whether the introduction of a statement under this exception against the accused in a criminal case would violate his right of confrontation, reference is made to the last paragraph of the Advisory Committee's Note under Exception (1) supra.

I Introduction

Assume that a lawyer is reading one of the Federal Rules of Evidence to determine whether a piece of evidence will be admissible at trial -- for example, the lawyer wants to know whether a videotape can be admitted as a learned treatise. Obviously, the best place to start is with the text of the Federal Rules of Evidence. But if the lawyer thinks that the text of a particular rule plainly answers the question of admissibility, or simply leaves the question open for argument, that lawyer will often be wrong. That is because the case law has diverged from the text of the Federal Rules on many important points. Thus, in our example, the Rule admitting learned treatises does not on its face permit introduction of videotapes, and yet such tapes have been admitted under the case law.

The Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules, which this author currently serves as Reporter, has expressed concern that the divergence between case law and the text of the Rule might create a trap for the unwary. See generally Becker and Orenstein, The Federal Rules of Evidence After Sixteen Years -- The Effect of "Plain Meaning" Jurisprudence, the Need for an Advisory Committee on the Rules of Evidence, and Suggestions for Selective Revision of the Rules, 60 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 857, 868 (1992) (noting the need to "resolve discrepancies between the plain text of the Federal Rules and the generally shared interpretation of the Rules deriving from preexisting common law traditions"). One way to correct this divergence might be to propose an amendment to the text of any Rule subject to divergent case law. But the Advisory Committee is acutely aware of the costs of amending an evidence rule. Amendments can lead to the disruption of settled expectations, and may create further problems of interpretation and divergence. The Advisory Committee resolved to take a less drastic course -- a course that would not require an amendment of any rules and yet would highlight for lawyers and judges the existence of divergent case law. The Committee directed the Reporter to prepare this report in an effort to increase the awareness of counsel practicing in federal courts, as well as judges, about the possibility that case law has diverged from the text of some of the Federal Rules of Evidence. This divergence comes in two forms: (1) where the case law (defined as case law in at least one circuit) is inconsistent with either the text of the Rule, the Advisory Committee Note explaining the text, or both; and (2) where the case law has provided significant development on a point that is not addressed by either the text of the Rule or the Committee Note.

This report highlights the major instances in which case law has diverged from an applicable Rule. Before proceeding to these illustrations, it is important to stress several qualifications on the scope of this report.

First, there is no intent to imply that any of the case law discussed herein is incorrect or "wrongly decided." The goal of this report is to point out the case law divergence from the Federal Rules of Evidence, without commenting on the merits of that divergence. Indeed, commentators have opined that much of the divergent case law is sensible and well-decided. See, e.g., Jonakait, Text, Texts, or Ad Hoc Determinations: Interpretation of the Federal Rules of Evidence, 71 Ind. L.J. 551, 571 (1996) ("Sometimes we must look beyond the words of the Rules to understand evidentiary doctrine. We must do so when the Rules are not definitive or ambiguous ... but sometimes even when the text is clear.").

Second, there is no intent to imply that any of the Rules discussed herein are problematic or need to be amended. The fact that the case law diverges from the Rule might be relevant to the need for an amendment, but it is certainly not dispositive. Whether a particular Rule should be amended is a complex question that is well beyond the scope of this report.

Third, there is no attempt to be comprehensive in the treatment of the case law construing the Evidence Rules discussed herein. Divergent case law is defined as case law in at least one circuit that has diverged from the text of the particular rule. This report does not purport to provide a treatise-like discussion of all the pertinent case law, from all the circuits, construing a particular rule. The goal of this report is to raise "red flags" with lawyers and judges, by providing basic information about areas where case law can be found that diverges from the text of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

PART FOUR: CASE LAW DIVERGENCE FROM THE FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE; INTERNET AND EMAIL EVIDENCE
Case Law Divergence from the Federal Rules of Evidence

5-Four Federal Rules of Evidence Manual II

AUTHOR: By Daniel J. Capra Philip Reed Professor of Law, Fordham Law School Reporter to the Judicial Conference Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules

II Examples of Case Law In Conflict With the Text of the Rule and/or Committee Note:

1. Rule 106: Rule 106 sets forth a rule of completeness, providing that when a party introduces a writing or recorded statement, the adversary may "require the introduction at that time of any other part or any other writing or recorded statement which ought in fairness to be considered contemporaneously with it." Rule 106 by its terms permits the adversary to introduce completing statements only where the proponent introduces a written or recorded statement. The language of the Rule does not on its face permit completing evidence when the proponent introduces an oral statement, such as a criminal defendant's oral confession. Some courts have found, however, that Rule 106, or at least the principle of completeness embodied therein, applies to require admission of omitted portions of an oral statement when necessary to correct a misimpression. See United States v. Tarantino, 846 F.2d 1384 (D.C. Cir. 1988) (prior oral statements of a government witness were properly offered on redirect examination since the defendant had used portions of the statements in cross-examination and the omitted portions placed the statements in context). See also the discussion in United States v. Branch, 91 F.3d 699 (5th Cir. 1996) (noting the case law permitting criminal defendants to offer omitted parts of statements they make to law enforcement officers that provide exculpatory information). Compare United States v. Harvey, 914 F.2d 966 (7th Cir. 1990) (Rule 106 does not apply to oral statements).

Moreover, some courts have held that Rule 106 can operate as a de facto hearsay exception when the opponent opens the door by creating a misimpression by offering only part of a statement. In other words, completing evidence is found admissible under Rule 106 even if it would otherwise be hearsay. See United States v. Sutton, 801 F.2d 1346, 1369 (D.C. Cir. 1986) ("Rule 106 can adequately fulfill its function only by permitting the admission of some otherwise inadmissible evidence when the court finds in fairness that that proffered evidence should be considered contemporaneously"). See also C. Wright & K. Graham, Federal Practice and Procedure: Evidence § 5078, at 376 (supporting this approach). Such a reading is not apparent from the text or Committee Note. See United States v. Wilkerson, 84 F.3d 692 (4th Cir. 1996) (interpreting Rule 106 as purely a timing device, not as a rule permitting the admission of otherwise inadmissible evidence).

2. Rule 403: Rule 403 provides that a trial judge may exclude proffered evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed "by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence." Of the negative factors listed that would support exclusion, only one refers to the jury directly -- the danger of "misleading the jury." This would seem to indicate that other negative factors mentioned in the Rule, specifically the danger of unfair prejudice and confusion of the issues, must be taken into account in a bench trial. Yet courts have held to the contrary, reasoning that unfair prejudice and confusing evidence will not have the same negative impact on the judge as it would have on the jury. See, e.g., Schultz v. Butcher, 24 F.3d 626 (4th Cir. 1994) (trial court erred in excluding evidence in a bench trial on the ground of its prejudicial effect); Gulf States Utils. v. Ecodyne Corp., 635 F.2d 517 (5th Cir. 1981) (the portion of Rule 403 referring to prejudicial effect "has no logical application in bench trials").

3. Rule 404(a): The Rule states that no party is permitted in the first instance to introduce character evidence to prove action in accordance with character, except for the "accused" -- i.e., only the "accused" can open the door to circumstantial use of character evidence. Thus, the Rule seems explicit in prohibiting the circumstantial use of character evidence in civil cases. And the Advisory Committee Note confirms this exclusionary principle. Yet some courts have permitted civil defendants to use character evidence circumstantially "when the central issue in a civil case is by its nature criminal." Palmquist v. Selvik, 111 F.3d 1332, 1342 (7th Cir. 1997) (assuming that character evidence could be admissible in certain civil cases); Perrin v. Anderson, 784 F.2d 1040 (10th Cir. 1986) (police officers charged with excessive force are permitted to prove the decedent's character for violence). The Advisory Committee has proposed an amendment to Rule 404(a) that would clarify that character evidence is never admissible in a civil case when it is offered to prove a person's conduct. Barring unforeseen developments, that proposed amendment will become effective on December 1, 2006.

4. Rule 407: Rule 407 prohibits the admission of actions taken after an injury or harm which, if taken previously, would have made the injury or harm less likely to occur, if the remedial measure is offered to prove negligence, culpable conduct, product defect, design defect, or failure to warn. The Rule by its terms would appear to preclude evidence of any action by anyone that would have made the injury or harm less likely to occur. Courts have held, however, that subsequent remedial measures are not excluded by Rule 407 if the measure is taken by someone other than the defendant, i.e., if it is a "third party repair." See, e.g., TLT-Babcock, Inc. v. Emerson Elec. Co., 33 F.3d 397 (4th Cir. 1994) (design change not excluded by Rule 407 where the change was made by an entity that was not a party to the case); Dixon v. International Harvester Co., 754 F.2d 573 (5th Cir. 1985) (repair by tractor owner after an accident not excluded when offered against tractor manufacturer).

Also, the Rule states that "impeachment" is a proper purpose for admitting subsequent remedial measures. Taken literally, this would mean that a plaintiff in a product liability case could offer proof of a subsequent remedial measure to "impeach" a defense witness' assertion that the product used by the plaintiff was safely designed. Yet courts have generally limited the use of subsequent remedial measures when offered for impeachment by way of contradiction. The fear is that this exception would swallow the rule of exclusion. See, e.g., Harrison v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 981 F.2d 25 (1st Cir. 1992) (a desire merely to undercut an expert's credibility cannot be sufficient to trigger the impeachment exception to Rule 407, or else the exception would swallow the rule of exclusion); Kelly v. Crown Equip. Co., 970 F.2d 1273 (3d Cir. 1992) (subsequent remedial measure cannot be offered for simple contradiction of expert's statement that a design was safe). Thus, the "impeachment" permitted by the Rule has been limited to cases where defense witnesses have made extravagant claims of safety. See Wood v. Morbark Indus., 70 F.3d 1201 (11th Cir. 1995) (post-accident design change admissible for impeachment where defense witness testified that the original design was the safest possible design); Muzyka v. Remington Arms Co., 774 F.2d 1309 (5th Cir. 1985) (design change should have been admitted for impeachment where defense witnesses testified that the product was the best and safest product of its kind).

5. Rule 601: Rule 601 essentially states that all questions that had been treated previously as matters of competency are now matters of credibility for the factfinder. The Advisory Committee Note, elaborating on the Rule, indicates an intent to prohibit a trial judge from excluding a witness on grounds of incompetence. Yet courts have excluded witnesses who have been found incapable of testifying in a competent fashion. See, e.g., United States v. Gates, 10 F.3d 765, 766

(11th Cir. 1993) ("Notwithstanding Rule 601, a court has the power to rule that a witness is incapable of testifying, and in an appropriate case it has the duty to hold a hearing to determine that issue."); United States v. Gutman, 725 F.2d 417, 420 (7th Cir. 1984) (trial court retains the power, and sometimes the duty, to hold a hearing "to determine whether a witness should not be allowed to testify because insanity has made him incapable of testifying in a competent fashion.").

6. Rule 607: The Rule states categorically that a party can impeach any witness it calls. On its face, the Rule permits the following scenario: (1) in a criminal case, a witness would testify at trial that the defendant was not at the scene of the crime, though having stated previously to a police officer that the defendant committed the crime; (2) the prior statement to the police officer could not be admitted as substantive evidence because it is hearsay; (3) but the prosecutor calls the witness, knowing he will give testimony favorable to the defendant, and then "impeaches" the witness with his prior statement to the police officer, on the ground that it is inconsistent with the witness' in-court testimony. Thus, Rule 607 by its terms permits the prosecutor to proffer prior inconsistent statements, not made under oath (and therefore not admissible for their truth under Rule 801(d)(1)(A)) in the guise of impeachment. Yet despite the affirmative and permissive language of the Rule, courts have held that a prosecutor cannot call a witness solely to impeach that witness, because to allow this practice would undermine the hearsay rule. See, e.g., United States v. Hogan, 763 F.2d 697, 702 (5th Cir. 1985) ("The prosecution, however, may not call a witness it knows to be hostile for the primary purpose of eliciting otherwise inadmissible impeachment testimony, for such a scheme merely serves as a subterfuge to avoid the hearsay rule. The danger in this procedure is obvious."); United States v. Morlang, 531 F.2d 183 (4th Cir. 1975) (conviction reversed on the ground that the government should not have been permitted to call a witness for no other purpose than to impeach him). See generally Jonakait, The Supreme Court, Plain Meaning, and the Changed Rules of Evidence, 68 Tex. L. Rev. 745 (1990) (noting this and other situations where courts have felt compelled to diverge from the text of an Evidence Rule in order to reach a just result).

7. Rule 613(b): The Rule and the Advisory Committee Note both indicate that it is not necessary to give a witness an opportunity to examine a prior inconsistent statement before that statement is admitted to impeach the witness. All that is necessary is that the witness be given an opportunity at some point in the trial to explain or deny the statement. The Rule thus rejects the common-law rule from Queen Caroline's case, under which the proponent was required to lay a foundation for the prior inconsistent statement at the time the witness testified. Despite the language of the Rule and Note, however, some courts have reverted to the common-law rule. See, e.g., United States v. Sutton, 41 F.3d 1257 (8th Cir. 1994) (trial judge properly excluded testimony as to inconsistent statements by a prosecution witness on the ground that the witness had not been given an opportunity to explain or deny the prior statement while cross-examined by defense counsel); United States v. Marks, 816 F.2d 1207, 1211 (7th Cir. 1987) (trial judge is entitled despite the language of Rule 613(b) "to conclude that in particular circumstances the older approach should be used in order to avoid confusing witnesses and juries").

8. Rule 704(b): Rule 704(b) would seem to prohibit all expert witnesses from testifying that a criminal defendant either did or did not have the requisite mental state to commit the crime charged. It states that "[n]o expert witness ... may state an opinion or inference as to whether the defendant did or did not have the mental state or condition constituting an element of the crime charged or of a defense thereto." But some courts have held (and others have implied) that the rule is applicable only to mental health experts, and therefore does not prohibit intent-based testimony from law enforcement personnel such as narcotics agents. See, e.g., United States v. Gastiaburo, 16 F.3d 582 (4th Cir. 1994) (stating that Rule 704(b) does not apply to the testimony of an expert law enforcement agent); United States v. Lipscomb, 14 F.3d 1236 (7th Cir. 1994) (expressing sympathy with such a position, but finding it unnecessary to decide the matter). Other courts, while technically applying the Rule 704(b) limitation to all expert witnesses, have applied it in such a way as to nullify its impact -- permitting, for example, an expert to opine as to the mental state of a hypothetical person whose fact situation mirrors the fact situation in issue. See, e.g., United States v. Williams, 980 F.2d 1463 (D.C.Cir. 1992) (permitting a law enforcement agent to testify that a hypothetical person carrying ziplock bags each containing small amounts of drugs was intending to distribute them; the hypothetical matched the facts of the case).

9. Rule 801(c) (Implied Assertions): Rule 801(c) defines hearsay as an out-of-court statement "offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted." The Committee Note states that "verbal conduct which is assertive but offered as a basis for inferring something other than the matter asserted" is excluded from the definition of hearsay "by the language of subdivision (c)." This would mean that a statement would be hearsay only if it were offered for the truth of the express assertion in the statement -- offering it for any implied assertion would escape hearsay proscription. So for example, a statement "It is raining cats and dogs" would be admissible to prove it is raining -- the statement would not be offered to prove the express assertion that cats and dogs were falling from the sky.

This highly constricted definition of hearsay generally has been rejected by the courts. The cases generally state that statements are hearsay if (1) they are offered for the truth of a matter implied in the statement and (2) the speaker intended to communicate that implication. See, e.g., United States v. Reynolds, 715 F.2d 99 (3rd Cir. 1983) (rejecting the government's suggestion that only a statement's express assertion should be considered in deciding whether it constitutes hearsay); Lyle v. Koehler, 720 F.2d 426, 433 (6th Cir. 1983) (concluding that letters were hearsay because "the inferences they necessarily invite form an integral part of the letters"; the reference to "matters asserted" in Rule 801(c) covers both express and implied assertions); United States v. Jackson, 88 F.3d 845, 848 (10th Cir. 1996) (stating that the important question under Rule 801(c) is whether the assertion, express or implied, "is intended"). See also Milich, Re-examining Hearsay Under the Federal Rules: Some Method for the Madness, 39 Kan. L. Rev. 893 (1991) (arguing for an intent-based test in determining whether implied assertions are hearsay).

10. Rule 801(d)(2)(D): The rule provides a hearsay exemption for a statement made by a party's agent, when offered against the party, and when the statement concerns a matter within the agent's scope of authority. So for example, a statement by a janitor, "I am sorry the floor was slippery, I should have cleaned up the spill before you slipped in it," can be admitted against the employer in a slip-and-fall case. But what if the party against whom the statement is offered is the government, and the statement is that of a government agent? The Rule provides no relief for statements from government agents, and so it would appear that a statement of a government agent should be admissible against the government in the same way as it would against a private employer. But several courts have held that Rule 801(d)(2)(D) cannot be used against the government. See United States v. Yildiz, 355 F.3d 80 (2d Cir. 2003) . These courts rely on the common-law rule that refused to hold the government to the statements of its agents. But in principle, the common-law did not survive the enactment of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

11. Rule 803(4): The Rule provides a hearsay exception for statements made for purposes of treatment or diagnosis when the statements deal with the "cause or external source" of the medical condition. The exception does not, by its terms, provide a hearsay exception for statements attributing fault. The Committee Note states that statements of fault "would not ordinarily qualify" under the exception, and distinguishes a statement "I was hit by a car" (admissible when made to medical personnel) from "I was hit by a car that ran a red light" (inadmissible). Yet in at least some classes of cases, statements attributing fault, when made to medical personnel, are admitted by the courts under Rule 803(4). The most common example is a statement from a child victim of sexual abuse, specifically identifying her attacker. See, e.g., United States v. Renville, 779 F.2d 430, 438 (8th Cir. 1985) (child's statement attributing fault is admissible under Rule 803(4) "where the physician makes clear to the victim that the inquiry into the identity of the abuser is important to diagnosis and treatment, and the victim manifests such an understanding"); United States v. Joe, 8 F.3d 1488, 1494 (10th Cir. 1993) ("[T]he domestic sexual abuser's identity is admissible under Rule 803(4) where the abuser has such an intimate relationship with the victim that the abuser's identity becomes reasonably pertinent to the victim's proper treatment.").

12. Rule 803(5): The Rule provides a hearsay exception for past recollection recorded: a record "containing a matter about which a witness once had knowledge but now has insufficient recollection to enable the witness to testify fully and accurately" where the record is "shown to have been made or adopted by the witness when the matter was fresh in the witness' memory and to reflect that knowledge correctly." What happens, however, when a person makes a statement to another person, and that other person is the one who writes it down? The exception by its terms does not seem to permit a "two-party voucher" system of proving past recollection recorded, since it states that the record must be shown to have been "made or adopted by the witness." Thus, the Rule does not envision that a person with personal knowledge might make a statement recorded by another, with the record being made admissible by calling both the reporter and the recorder. Despite the language of the Rule, however, cases can be found that permit two-party vouching under Rule 803(5). See, e.g., United States v. Williams, 951 F.2d 853 (7th Cir. 1993) .

13. Rule 803(6): The Rule defines a business record as one "made at or near the time by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge, if kept in the course of a regularly conducted activity." This language could be read as abrogating the common-law requirement that the person transmitting the information to the recorder must have a business duty to do so. It states only that the transmitting person must have "knowledge," not that the person must be reporting within the business structure. Yet despite the text, the courts have held that all those who report information included in a business record must be under a business duty to do so -- or else the hearsay problem created from the report by an outsider must be satisfied in some other way. See United States v. Turner, 189 F.3d 712, 719-20 (8th Cir. 1999) ("[W]hen the source of information and the recorder of that information are not the same person, the business record contains hearsay upon hearsay. If both the source and recorder of the information were acting in the regular course of the organization's business, however, the hearsay upon hearsay problem may be excused by the business records exception to the rule against hearsay."); Bemis v. Edwards, 45 F.3d 1369 (9th Cir. 1995) (911 call was not admissible as a business record because the caller was not under any business duty to report, and the report did not independently satisfy any hearsay exception); Cameron v. Otto Bock Orthopedic Indus. Inc., 43 F.3d 14 (1st Cir. 1994) (product failure reports submitted to the manufacturer after the plaintiff's accident were inadmissible; the reports were submitted by parties who had no business duty to report accurately to the manufacturer).

14. Rule 803(8)(B): Rule 803(8) provides a hearsay exception for public reports. But the Rule specifically excludes from its coverage public reports setting forth "matters observed by police officers and other law enforcement personnel" if such reports are offered "in criminal cases." Read literally, the Rule would not provide a hearsay exception for a forensic report prepared by the police that concluded that the defendant was innocent. Such a report would be offered by the defendant, but the exclusionary language of Rule 803(8)(B) covers all police reports offered in criminal cases. Yet some lower courts have refused to be bound by the plain meaning of the rule, reasoning that Congress intended to regulate only police reports that unfairly inculpate a criminal defendant, and that the exception should therefore apply to public reports offered by the accused. See, e.g., United States v. Smith, 521 F.2d 957 (D.C.Cir. 1975) (despite its exclusionary language, Rule 803(8)(B) should be read in light of Congress' intent to exclude police reports only when offered against a criminal defendant). But see United States v. Sharpe, 193 F.3d 852, 868 (5th Cir. 1999) (the defendant's reliance on Rule 803(8)(B) to admit an exculpatory police report was "misplaced" because the Rule does not grant admissibility for any such reports offered in criminal cases).

15. Rule 803(8)(B) and (C): Rule 803(8)(B) and (C) both contain language appearing to exclude from the hearsay exception all records prepared by law enforcement personnel, when such records are offered against a criminal defendant. Read literally, these provisions would prevent the government from introducing simple tabulations of non-adversarial information. For example, these subdivisions appear not to grant a hearsay exception for a routine printout from the Customs Service recording license plates of cars that crossed the border on a certain day, when offered in a criminal case. Courts have refused to apply the plain exclusionary language of these subdivisions literally, however. They reason that the language could not have been intended to cover reports that are ministerial in nature and prepared under non-adversarial circumstances; it is only adversarial, evaluative reports (such as crime scene reports) that carry the risk of fabrication that the exclusionary language was designed to regulate. See, e.g., United States v. Orozco, 590 F.2d 789 (9th Cir. 1979) (customs records of border crossings are admissible under Rule 803(8) because they are ministerial and not prepared under adversarial circumstances); United States v. Grady, 544 F.2d 598 (2d Cir. 1976) (reports concerning firearms' serial numbers were admissible because they were records of routine factual matters prepared in nonadversarial circumstances).

16. Rule 803(18): Rule 803(18) provides a hearsay exception for "statements contained in published treatises, periodicals, or pamphlets" if they are "established as a reliable authority" by the testimony or admission of an expert witness or by judicial notice. The Rule does not on its face permit evidence in electronic form, such as a film or video. But the Second Circuit has rejected a literal reading of the Rule and upheld the admission of an authoritative videotape under the learned treatise exception. See Costantino v. Herzog, 203 F.3d 164, 171 (2d Cir. 2000) (reasoning that it is "overly artificial to say that information that is sufficiently trustworthy to overcome the hearsay bar when presented in a printed learned treatise loses the badge of trustworthiness when presented in a videotape").

17. Rule 804(b)(1): The Rule provides a hearsay exception for prior testimony when offered against a party who either (1) had a similar motive and opportunity to develop the testimony at the time it was given, or (2) in civil cases, had a predecessor in interest with such a similar motive and opportunity at the time the testimony was given. Some courts have defined the term "predecessor in interest" in civil cases as anyone who had a similar motive and opportunity to develop the testimony, at the time it was given, as the opponent would have at the instant trial; these courts do not require some legal relationship between the prior party and the party against whom the evidence is now offered. This construction collapses the term "predecessor in interest" with the term "similar motive." See, e.g., Lloyd v. American Export Lines, Inc., 580 F.2d 1179 (3rd Cir. 1978) (prior testimony properly admitted against plaintiff, where prior party had a similar motive to develop the testimony as the plaintiff in the instant case would have were the declarant to testify at trial; Judge Stern, concurring, states that such an expansive definition of "predecessor in interest" effectively reads that term out of the Rule); Horne v. Owens-Corning Fiberglass Corp., 4 F.3d 276 (4th Cir. 1993) (prior testimony from a different case properly admitted against the plaintiff, where the previous plaintiff, though not affiliated in any way with the plaintiff, had a similar motive to develop the testimony). Other courts have admitted such evidence not as prior testimony (for want of a predecessor in interest) but as residual hearsay. See Dartez v. Fibreboard Corp., 765 F.2d 456 (5th Cir. 1985) .

18. Rule 804(b)(3): The Rule provides that if a declaration against penal interest is offered to exculpate an accused, it is not admissible under this hearsay exception "unless corroborating circumstances clearly indicate the trustworthiness of the statement." On its face, the rule does not require a showing of corroborating circumstances for statements offered by the government that inculpate the accused. Yet many courts have required the government to establish corroborating circumstances for inculpatory statements offered under Rule 804(b)(3). See, e.g., United States v. Barone, 114 F.3d 1284 (1st Cir. 1997) (imposing a corroborating circumstances requirement for statements offered by the prosecution under Rule 804(b)(3), while acknowledging that the Rule does not explicitly require a showing of corroborating circumstances for such statements); United States v. Garcia, 897 F.2d 1413 (7th Cir. 1990) (requiring a showing of corroborating circumstances for inculpatory declarations against penal interest). Similarly, the corroborating circumstances requirement does not appear to apply when declarations against penal interest are offered in civil cases, because the requirement covers statements offered to exculpate the "accused." At least one court, however, has applied the corroborating circumstances requirement to declarations against penal interest offered in civil cases. See American Automotive Accessories, Inc. v. Fishman, 175 F.3d 534, 541 (7th Cir. 1999) (reasoning that it is important to have a "unitary standard" for declarations against penal interest, no matter in what case and no matter by whom they are offered).

19. Rule 806: The Rule states that a hearsay declarant's credibility may be attacked "by any evidence which would be admissible" if the declarant had testified as a witness. The language raises a problem when the proponent wishes to attack the declarant by proffering specific bad acts to prove the witness' bad character for veracity. Rule 608(b) prohibits extrinsic proof of bad acts when offered to show the witness' character for untruthfulness. Rule 806 could therefore be read literally as prohibiting bad acts impeachment of a hearsay declarant. This is because the only way usually available to introduce bad acts without the witness being there to be asked about them would be to proffer extrinsic evidence in apparent violation of Rule 608(b). But some courts have stated that extrinsic evidence of a bad act can be admitted to prove a hearsay declarant's character for veracity, subject to Rule 403. The reasoning is that because the declarant is not available for cross-examination, extrinsic evidence is "the only means of presenting such evidence to the jury." United States v. Friedman, 854 F.2d 535, n.8 (2d Cir. 1988) . See the extensive discussion of this problem in Cordray, Evidence Rule 806 and the Problem of the Nontestifying Declarant, 56 Ohio State L.J. 495 (1995). But see United States v. Saada, 212 F.3d 210 (3d Cir. 2000) , holding that extrinsic evidence may never be admitted to prove a bad act offered to impeach a hearsay declarant's character for truthfulness. The Saada Court relied on the "plain language" of Rule 806, which it read as creating exactly the same impeachment rules for hearsay declarants as apply for in-court witnesses, with one exception -- impeachment with inconsistent statements (as to which the requirement at trial of confronting the witness with the statement is specifically excused under Rule 806).

20. Rule 807: Rule 807 provides a "residual exception" to the hearsay rule, granting admissibility to trustworthy statements that are "not specifically covered by" other exceptions. There are at least two ways in which the case law diverges from the text and/or Committee Note to Rule 807. First, the Rule permits the admission of residual hearsay only if that hearsay is "not specifically covered" by another exception. This might seem to indicate that hearsay that "nearly misses" one of the established exceptions should not be admissible as residual hearsay -- because it is specifically covered by, and yet not admissible under, another exception. In fact, however, most courts have construed the term "not specifically covered" by another hearsay exception to mean "not admissible under" another hearsay exception. See, e.g., United States v. Fernandez, 892 F.2d 976 (11th Cir. 1989) (grand jury statement is "not specifically covered" by another hearsay exception because it is not admissible under any such exception).

The second divergence between the case law and the text of the residual exception involves the notice requirement. The Rule states that "a statement may not be admitted" under this exception unless the proponent gives notice "sufficiently in advance of trial or hearing to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to prepare to meet it." Most courts have read the notice requirement far more flexibly than its language would seem to indicate. For example, most courts have held that the notice requirement can be satisfied by providing notice at trial, so long as the adversary is given sufficient time to prepare. See, e.g., United States v. Baker, 985 F.2d 1248 (4th Cir. 1993) . Other courts have read a good cause exception into the notice requirement. See, e.g., United States v. Lyon, 567 F.2d 777 (8th Cir. 1977) . But see United States v. Ruffin, 575 F.2d 346 (2d Cir. 1978) (rejecting a good cause exception as not permitted by the text of the Rule).

21. Rule 1006: Rule 1006 allows admission of summaries in lieu of having the voluminous originals presented at trial. Thus the Rule allows a summary to operate as evidence when admitting the underlying components would be too burdensome. The use of summaries as evidence must be distinguished from the use of charts and summaries only for demonstrative purposes to clarify or amplify argument based on evidence that has already been admitted. See, e.g., Air Disaster at Lockerbie Scot. on Dec. 21, 1988, 37 F.3d 804 (2d Cir. 1994) (finding no error where experts gave their opinions on the adequacy of PanAm security measures, relying from time to time on trial transcripts displayed on a projection screen; Rule 1006 objection was misplaced because the trial transcripts were records of testimony at the trial itself). Some courts have considered the "admissibility" of charts and summaries of trial evidence under Rule 1006, but this is a mistake; the Rule is really not applicable because pedagogical summaries are not evidence. See, e.g., United States v. Sawyer, 85 F.3d 713 (1st Cir. 1996) (applying Rule 1006 to approve the use of summaries based on evidence that had already been admitted at trial); United States v. Stephens, 779 F.2d 232 (5th Cir. 1985) (same).

III Examples of Case Law Development Where the Rules and Committee Note Are Silent

1. Rule 103: The Rule provides conditions for a party wishing to preserve a claim of evidentiary error for appeal. It states that a party must make a timely objection or motion to strike, stating the specific ground of objection if that ground is not apparent from the context. An amendment to Rule 103 effective December 1, 2000, further provides that if the trial court makes a definitive ruling on the record admitting or excluding evidence, either at or before trial, a party need not renew an objection or offer of proof to preserve a claim of error for appeal. But the Rule does not address the question whether a party can appeal an advance ruling holding evidence admissible, if the evidence is not actually admitted at trial. For example, assume that a criminal defendant moves in advance of trial to preclude the prosecution from impeaching him with his prior convictions. Assume further that the trial court rules definitively that the convictions are admissible impeachment evidence. Can the defendant decide not to testify at trial, and then argue on appeal that the trial court erred in its advance ruling?

While Rule 103 is silent on whether an appeal can be taken from a ruling holding evidence admissible where the evidence is not eventually admitted at trial, there is significant case law on this question. The Supreme Court, in Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38 (1984) , specifically held that an accused must testify at trial in order to preserve a claim of error predicated upon a trial court's decision to admit the accused's prior convictions for impeachment. The Luce principle has been extended by many lower courts to other comparable situations. See United States v. DiMatteo, 759 F.2d 831 (11th Cir. 1985) (applying Luce where the defendant's witness would be impeached with evidence offered under Rule 608). See also United States v. Goldman, 41 F.3d 785, 788 (1st Cir. 1994) ("Although Luce involved impeachment by conviction under Rule 609, the reasons given by the Supreme Court for requiring the defendant to testify apply with full force to the kind of Rule 403 and 404 objections that are advanced by Goldman in this case."); Palmieri v. DeFaria, 88 F.3d 136 (2d Cir. 1996) (where the plaintiff decided to take an adverse judgment rather than challenge an advance ruling by putting on evidence at trial, the in limine ruling would not be reviewed on appeal); United States v. Ortiz, 857 F.2d 900 (2d Cir. 1988) (where uncharged misconduct is ruled admissible if the defendant pursues a certain defense, the defendant must actually pursue that defense at trial in order to preserve a claim of error on appeal); United States v. Bond, 87 F.3d 695 (5th Cir. 1996) (where the trial court rules in limine that the defendant would waive his fifth amendment privilege were he to testify, the defendant must take the stand and testify in order to challenge that ruling on appeal).

Rule 103 is also silent on whether a party who objects to evidence that the trial court definitively rules admissible, and who then offers the evidence to "remove the sting" of its anticipated prejudicial effect, thereby waives the right to appeal the trial court's ruling. Lower courts had been in conflict on this question. See, e.g., Judd v. Rodman, 105 F.3d 1339 (11th Cir. 1997) (an objection made in limine is sufficient to preserve a claim of error when the movant, as a matter of trial strategy, presents the objectionable evidence herself on direct examination to minimize its prejudicial effect); Gill v. Thomas, 83 F.3d 537, 540 (1st Cir. 1996) ("by offering the misdemeanor evidence himself, Gill waived his opportunity to object and thus did not preserve the issue for appeal"). The Supreme Court, in Ohler v. United States, 529 U.S. 753 (2000) , resolved this question by holding that a party who introduces evidence of a prior conviction on direct examination waives any right to appeal an in limine ruling holding that the evidence would be admissible at trial. The Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Rehnquist, recognized that Rule 103 was silent on this question. It refused to depart from the general common-law rule that "a party introducing evidence cannot complain on appeal that the evidence was erroneously admitted."

2. Rule 104(a): This Rule states that preliminary questions "concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court ... ." But the Rule is silent on who bears the burden of proof on admissibility questions, and it is also silent on what standard of proof is to be employed. A significant body of case law has been developed to answer these questions. Most importantly, in Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) , the Court held that the party seeking to admit the evidence -- the proponent -- generally has the burden of proving that the admissibility requirements set forth in the Federal Rules are met. Furthermore, the Bourjaily Court held that the burden of proving an admissibility requirement under Rule 104(a) is by a preponderance of the evidence. The specific holding in Bourjaily was that for a statement to be admissible under the coconspirator exception to the hearsay rule, the trial court must find that the prosecution has established by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant and the hearsay declarant were members of the same conspiracy. The reasoning in Bourjaily has been extended to most other questions of admissibility under the Federal Rules of Evidence. See, e.g., Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, 509 U.S. 579 (1993) (proponent of expert testimony has the burden of showing it is more likely than not reliable). So, for example, a proponent who proffers a hearsay statement under the excited utterance exception has the burden of showing it more likely than not that the declarant was under the influence of a startling event when he spoke. See Miller v. Keating, 754 F.2d 507 (3d Cir. 1985) (proponent must establish admissibility of an excited utterance by a preponderance of the evidence). One important exception arises with privileges. Because privilege rules operate to exclude relevant and reliable evidence, they are not favored. Therefore, the party seeking to exclude proffered evidence on the ground that it is privileged bears the burden of showing, by a preponderance of the evidence, that a privilege applies. See generally United States v. Zolin, 491 U.S. 554 (1989) .

3. Rule 301: This Rule provides some guidance on the effect of a presumption. The Rule does not define the term "presumption"; it simply states that unless otherwise provided, "a presumption imposes on the party against whom it is directed the burden of going forward with evidence to rebut or meet the presumption, but does not shift to such party the burden of proof in the sense of the risk of nonpersuasion." The Rule specifically leaves it to substantive law to determine when proffered evidence establishes a presumption that a fact exists. Generally speaking, presumptions are based on one or more of the following rationales: (1) one party has superior access to proof; (2) social or economic policies warrant a presumption; (3) experience indicates the high probability of a given conclusion from a given set of facts; (4) a presumption will promote efficiency and convenience. So, for example, it has been held that proof that a letter was mailed establishes a presumption that it was received. Anderson v. United States, 966 F.2d 487 (9th Cir. 1982) (in a taxpayer's suit for a refund, the Government failed to rebut the common-law presumption of receipt that arose from the taxpayer's proof of mailing her return).

Rule 301 is also silent on whether a party favored by a presumption is entitled to a peremptory instruction if the party against whom the presumption operates fails to offer any rebuttal evidence. For example, if a party proves that he mailed a letter, and the opponent provides no conflicting evidence, is the mailing party entitled to an instruction to the jury that the letter is to be deemed mailed? Courts have held that such an instruction must be given upon request. See, e.g., A.C. Aukerman Co., v. R.L. Chaides Constr. Co., 960 F.2d 1020, 1037 (Fed.Cir. 1992) (where presumption applies, the presumed fact "must be inferred, absent rebuttal evidence."). See also C. Mueller & L. Kirkpatrick, Evidence at 137 (1st ed. 1995) ("[I]f the basic facts of a presumption are established, the presumption controls decision on the presumed fact unless there is counterproof that the presumed fact is not so. In jury-tried cases, the judge gives an appropriate instruction. In bench-tried cases, the judge must find the presumed fact.").

4. Rule 404(b): Rule 404(b) provides that a person's uncharged acts of misconduct can be offered to prove something other than a person's character, such as intent or motive. Rule 404(b) imposes a notice requirement on the prosecution in criminal cases, which is intended to protect the accused from unfair surprise; it provides that "upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial."

What happens if the government gives pretrial notice of its intent to proffer a prior bad act, and then subsequently discovers a different bad act that it wants to use as well? Or what if the government responds to a defense request by stating that it does not intend to use Rule 404(b) evidence, and then uncovers a bad act committed by the defendant that it does intend to use? The notice requirement of Rule 404(b) does not state whether the prosecution has a continuing obligation to notify the defendant, should it discover Rule 404(b) evidence after an initial response to the defendant's request. But it has been held that the Rule imposes a continuing obligation of notice. See, e.g., United States v. Barnes, 49 F.3d 1144, 1148 (6th Cir. 1995) (declaring that Rule 404(b) requires "a continuing obligation on the government to comply with the notice requirement ... whenever it discovers information that meets the previous defense request"; noting that a contrary reading "would force the defense to make numerous, periodic requests until the trial has been completed "surely a wasteful procedure.").

The notice requirement of Rule 404(b) is conditioned on a request by the accused. The Rule does not state how specific the request must be to trigger the government's notice obligation. For example, is an omnibus motion for discovery sufficient to trigger the notice requirement? Courts have held that an omnibus motion is not sufficient to trigger the government's obligation to notify under the Rule. Rather, a request for notification, "at a minimum, must be sufficiently clear and particular, in an objective sense, fairly to alert the prosecution that the defense is requesting pretrial notification of the general nature of any Rule 404(b) evidence the prosecution intends to introduce." United States v. Tuesta-Toro, 29 F.3d 771, 774 (1st Cir. 1994) (notice not required where defense demanded outright pretrial disclosure of statements in any form, referring to the defendant in any way, without regard to their admissibility or the government's intention to introduce them). Compare United States v. Williams, 792 F.Supp. 1120, 1133 (S.D. Ind. 1992) (notification required in response to detailed request reciting text of Rule 404(b)); United States v. Alex, 791 F.Supp. 723, 728 (N.D. Ill. 1992) (notification required in response to request specifically referencing Rule 404(b)).

5. Rule 410: Rule 410 provides certain protections to criminal defendants during the process of plea bargaining. Rule 410 is silent, however, on whether its protections can be waived by a criminal defendant. In United States v. Mezzanatto, 513 U.S. 196 (1995) , during guilty plea negotiations the defendant agreed that he could be impeached with statements made during the negotiations if he ultimately went to trial and testified inconsistently with those statements. The Supreme Court upheld the agreement, finding that the defendant had knowingly and voluntarily waived his right to the protection of Rule 410. The Court refused to hold that the Rule's silence on the matter meant that its protections could not be waived. Instead the Court presumed that any statutory right could be waived in the absence of a specific provision to the contrary, so long as the waiver was knowing and voluntary. The facts of Mezzanatto involved a waiver permitting the use for impeachment purposes of statements made during guilty plea negotiations. Neither Mezzanatto nor Rule 410 itself says anything explicitly about whether a defendant can waive the protections of the Rule so as to provide that the prosecution can admit his statements during plea negotiations as substantive evidence at trial, i.e., as party-admissions admissible even if the defendant does not testify. At least one court has relied on the rationale of Mezzanatto to uphold a waiver of Rule 410 protections that permitted the government to use the defendant's statements as substantive evidence in its case-in-chief. See United States v. Burch, 156 F.3d 1315 (D.C. Cir. 1998) .

6. Article VI: Article VI governs treatment of testifying witnesses. The Article is silent about many of the common forms of impeachment, such as bias, contradiction, and mental capacity. There is, of course, a significant amount of case law dealing with impeachment matters on which Article VI is silent. Case law generally regulates the forms of impeachment not specifically covered by Article VI by using principles derived from Evidence Rules 402 and 403 -- such impeachment is permitted unless the probative value of the impeachment evidence is substantially outweighed by the risks of prejudice, confusion and delay. See United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45 (1984) (impeachment for bias governed by Rule 403 principles). See generally Imwinkelreid, The Silence Speaks Volumes: A Brief Reflection on the Question of Whether It Is Necessary To Fill the Seeming Gaps In Article VI of the Federal Rules of Evidence, Governing the Admissibility of Evidence Logically Relevant to the Witness's Credibility, 1998 Univ. Ill. L. Rev. 1013, 1036 (noting that Article VI is silent about most matters of impeachment, but concluding that "as a general proposition, there is little to be gained and much to be lost by initiating the process of revising Article VI.").

7. Rule 615: Rule 615 provides that at the request of a party, and with some exceptions, "the court shall order witnesses excluded so that they cannot hear the testimony of other witnesses, and it may also make the order of its own motion." The Rule specifically provides only for exclusion of witnesses from the courtroom. It is silent about whether a trial judge can order witnesses not to talk to each other outside the courtroom; it says nothing about a judge's power to order a potential witness to refrain from obtaining access to certain information, such as newspaper articles, that might taint the witness' testimony. The courts have held, however, that the trial court retains its common-law power to fashion a more far-reaching sequestration order appropriate to the circumstances of the case. See the extensive discussion in United States v. Sepulveda, 15 F.3d 1161, 1175 (1st Cir. 1993) (Rule 615 "demarcates a compact procedural heartland, but leaves appreciable room for judicial innovation beyond the perimeters of that which the rule explicitly requires"). This common-law power includes the discretion to sequester witnesses before, during, and after their testimony, see Geders v. United States, 425 U.S. 80 (1976) , and to compel the parties to present witnesses in a prescribed sequence. United States v. Machor, 879 F.2d 945, 954 (1st Cir. 1989) . As the court in Sepulveda stated: "Rule 615 neither dictates when and how this case-management power ought to be used nor mandates any specific extra-courtroom prophylaxis, instead leaving the regulation of witness conduct outside the courtroom to the district judge's discretion."

8. Rule 801(d)(1)(B): This Rule provides that a statement is not excluded as hearsay if the witness is subject to cross-examination and the statement is "consistent with the declarant's testimony and is offered to rebut an express or implied charge of recent fabrication." The hearsay exemption for prior consistent statements does not specifically provide that the prior consistent statement must precede the existence of the alleged motive to falsify in order to be admissible. However, the Supreme Court in Tome v. United States, 513 U.S. 150 (1995) , held that a statement is not admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(B) unless it was made before the witness's alleged motive to falsify arose.

Rule 801(d)(1)(B) is also silent on whether prior consistent statements can be admitted independently of the Rule, not for their truth but rather to rehabilitate the credibility of the witness. The courts have held that a consistent statement could be probative and admissible for rehabilitation purposes even if it is not admissible under the hearsay exemption. See, e.g., United States v. Brennan, 798 F.2d 581, 587 (2d Cir. 1986) (prior consistent statement was not admissible to rebut a charge of improper motive, but it was admissible to clarify an apparent inconsistency that had been brought out by defense counsel on cross-examination: "prior consistent statements may be admissible for rehabilitation even if not admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(B)."). Accord United States v. Parodi, 703 F.2d 768 (4th Cir. 1983) .

9. Rule 803(3): The Rule provides a hearsay exception for statements of a declarant's state of mind. The Rule is silent, however, on whether a declarant's statement of intent can be used to prove the subsequent conduct of someone other than the declarant. When the victim says, "I am going to meet Frank tonight", is the statement admissible to prove that Frank and the victim actually met? Or is the statement admissible only to prove the future conduct of the declarant? The Advisory Committee Note refers to the Rule as allowing "evidence of intention as tending to prove the act intended." The case law is conflicted. Some courts have refused to admit a statement that the declarant intended to meet with a third party as proof that they actually did meet. See, e.g., Gual Morales v. Hernandez Vega, 579 F.2d 677 (1st Cir. 1978) ; United States v. Jenkins, 579 F.2d 840 (4th Cir. 1978) (statements of intent can prove only the declarant's subsequent conduct). Other courts hold such statements admissible if the proponent provides corroborating evidence that the meeting took place. See, e.g., United States v. Delvecchio, 816 F.2d 859 (2d Cir. 1987) . See C. Mueller and L. Kirkpatrick, Evidence at 938 (1st ed. 1995) ("Some modern cases take the clearly correct position that the exception in its present form cannot justify use of statements of intent by themselves as proof of what others did. And yet a growing number of cases approve use of a statement to prove what the speaker and another did together if other evidence confirms what the statement suggests the other did.").

10. Rule 1101. Rule 1101 states that the Federal Rules of Evidence are generally applicable to all federal proceedings. Rule 1101(d) lists certain proceedings to which the Rules are inapplicable, including grand jury and bail proceedings. Courts have found that the Federal Rules are inapplicable to a number of proceedings that are not specifically mentioned as exempt in Rule 1101(d). Examples include suppression hearings, proceedings to obtain a temporary restraining order, and proceedings seeking release from psychiatric commitment. See, e.g., United States v. Frazier, 26 F.3d 110 (11th Cir. 1994) (Evidence Rules inapplicable in supervised release revocation proceedings); United States v. Schaefer, 87 F.3d 562 (1st Cir. 1996) (evidence rules inapplicable at suppression hearings); United States v. Palesky, 855 F.2d 34 (1st Cir. 1988) (Evidence Rules are not applicable in hearings held to determine whether a person will be committed to or released from a psychiatric facility). The courts establish these exemptions because they are within the spirit of Rule 1101(d) -- exempting from the Rules those proceedings that are less formal than a trial and in which the judge is the finder of fact. See e.g., Government of Virgin Islands in Interest of A.M., 34 F.3d 153, 161 (3rd Cir. 1994) (Evidence Rules do not apply in juvenile transfer proceedings, even though such proceedings are not specifically exempted in Rule 1101(d)(1); a juvenile transfer proceeding "is of a preliminary nature and is consequently not comparable to a civil or criminal trial.").

I Introduction

The explosive growth of the Internet and burgeoning use of electronic mail are raising a series of novel evidentiary issues. The applicable legal principles are familiar -- this evidence must be authenticated and, to the extent offered for its truth, it must satisfy hearsay concerns. The novelty of the evidentiary issues arises out of the novelty of the media -- thus, it is essentially factual. These issues can be resolved by relatively straightforward application of existing principles in a fashion very similar to the way they are applied to other computer-generated evidence and to more traditional exhibits.

II Internet Evidence

There are primarily three forms of Internet data that are offered into evidence -- (1) data posted on the website by the owner of the site ("website data"); (2) data posted by others with the owner's consent (a chat room is a convenient example); and (3) data posted by others without the owner's consent ("hacker" material). The wrinkle for authenticity purposes is that, because Internet data is electronic, it can be manipulated and offered into evidence in a distorted form. Additionally, various hearsay concerns are implicated, depending on the purpose for which the proffer is made.

[A] Authentication

Website Data. Corporations, government offices, individuals, educational institutions and innumerable other entities post information on their websites that may be relevant to matters in litigation. Alternatively, the fact that the information appears on the website may be the relevant point. Accordingly, courts routinely face proffers of data (text or images) allegedly drawn from websites. The proffered evidence must be authenticated in all cases, and, depending on the use for which the offer is made, hearsay concerns may be implicated.

The authentication standard is no different for website data or chat room evidence than for any other. Under Rule 901(a), "The requirement of authentication ... is satisfied by evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims." United States v. Simpson, 152 F.3d 1241, 1249 (10th Cir. 1998) ; *Johnson-Wooldridge v. Wooldridge, 2001 Ohio App. LEXIS 3319 at 11 (Ohio App. July 26, 2001) .

In applying this rule to website evidence, there are three questions that must be answered, explicitly or implicitly:

1. What was actually on the website?

2. Does the exhibit or testimony accurately reflect it?

3. If so, is it attributable to the owner of the site?

In the first instance, authenticity can be established by the testimony of any witness that the witness typed in the URL associated with the website (usually prefaced with www); that he or she logged on to the site and reviewed what was there; and that a printout or other exhibit fairly and accurately reflects what the witness saw. n1 This last testimony is no different than that required to authenticate a photograph, other replica or demonstrative exhibit. n2 The witness may be lying or mistaken, but that is true of all testimony and a principal reason for cross-examination. Unless the opponent of the evidence raises a genuine issue as to trustworthiness, testimony of this sort is sufficient to satisfy Rule 901(a), presumptively authenticating the website data and shifting the burden of coming forward to the opponent of the evidence. It is reasonable to indulge a presumption that material on a web site (other than chat room conversations) was placed there by the owner of the site.

The opponent of the evidence must, in fairness, be free to challenge that presumption by adducing facts showing that proffered exhibit does not accurately reflect the contents of a website, or that those contents are not attributable to the owner of the site. First, even if the proffer fairly reflects what was on the site, the data proffered may have been the product of manipulation by hackers (uninvited third parties). n3 Second, the proffer may not fairly reflect what was on the site due to modification -- intentional or unintentional, material or immaterial -- in the proffered exhibit or testimony.

Detecting modifications of electronic evidence can be very difficult, if not impossible. That does not mean, however, that nothing is admissible because everything is subject to distortion. The same is true of many kinds of evidence, from testimony to photographs to digital images, but that does not render everything inadmissible. It merely accentuates the need for the judge to focus on all relevant circumstances in assessing admissibility under Fed.R.Evid. 104(a) n4-- and to leave the rest to the jury, under Rule 104(b). n5

In considering whether the opponent has raised a genuine issue as to trustworthiness, and whether the proponent has satisfied it, the court will look at the totality of the circumstances, including, for example:

- The length of time the data was posted on the site.
- Whether others report having seen it.
- Whether it remains on the website for the court to verify.
- Whether the data is of a type ordinarily posted on that website or websites of similar entities (e.g., financial information from corporations).
- Whether the owner of the site has elsewhere published the same data, in whole or in part.
- Whether others have published the same data, in whole or in part.
- Whether the data has been republished by others who identify the source of the data as the website in question.

A genuine question as to trustworthiness may be established circumstantially. For example, more by way of authentication may be reasonably required of a proponent of Internet evidence who is known to be a skilled computer user and who is suspected of possibly having modified the proffered website data for purposes of creating false evidence. n6

In assessing the authenticity of website data, important evidence is normally available from the personnel managing the website ("webmaster" personnel). A webmaster can establish that a particular file, of identifiable content, was placed on the website at a specific time. This may be done through direct testimony or through documentation, which may be generated automatically by the software of the web server. It is possible that the content provider -- the author of the material appearing on the site that is in issue -- will be someone other than the person who installed the file on the web. In that event, this second witness (or set of documentation) may be necessary to reasonably ensure that the content which appeared on the site is the same as that proffered.

Self-Authentication. Government offices publish an abundance of reports, press releases and other information on their official web sites. Internet publication of a governmental document on an official website constitutes an "official publication" within Federal Rule of Evidence 902(5). n7 Under Rule 902(5), official publications of government offices are self-authenticating. n8

Chat Room Evidence. A proffer of chat room postings generally implicates the same authenticity issues discussed above in connection with web site data, but with a twist. While it is reasonable to indulge a presumption that the contents of a website are fairly attributable to the site's owner, that does not apply to chat room evidence. By definition, chat room postings are made by third parties, not the owner of the site. Further, chat room participants usually use screen names (pseudonyms) rather than their real names.

Since chat room evidence is often of interest only to the extent that the third party who left a salient posting can be identified, the unique evidentiary issue concerns the type and quantum of evidence necessary to make that identification -- or to permit the finder of fact to do so. Evidence sufficient to attribute a chat room posting to a particular individual may include, for example:

- Evidence that the individual used the screen name in question when participating in chat room conversations (either generally or at the site in question).

- Evidence that, when a meeting with the person using the screen name was arranged, the individual in question showed up.

- Evidence that the person using the screen name identified him- or herself as the individual (in chat room conversations or otherwise), especially if that identification is coupled with particularized information unique to the individual, such as a street address or email address.

- Evidence that the individual had in his or her possession information given to the person using the screen name (such as contact information provided by the police in a sting operation).

- Evidence from the hard drive of the individual's computer reflecting that a user of the computer used the screen name in question.

See generally United States v. Tank, 200 F.3d 627, 630-31 (9th Cir. 2000) ; United States v. Simpson, 152 F.3d 1241, 1249-50 (10th Cir. 1998) ; Perfect 10, Inc. v. Cybernet Ventures, Inc., 213 F. Supp. 2d 1146, 1154 (C.D. Cal. 2002) .

[B] Hearsay.

Authenticity aside, every extrajudicial statement drawn from a website must satisfy a hearsay exception or exemption if the statement is offered for its truth. See United States v. Jackson, 208 F.3d 633, 637 (7th Cir.) ("The web postings were not statements made by declarants testifying at trial, and they were being offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. That means they were hearsay."), cert. denied, 531 U.S. 973 (2000) ; *Savariego v. Melman, 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8563 at 5 (N.D. Tex. 2002) (excluding on summary judgment "unauthenticated hearsay from an Internet search").

To establish that material appeared on a website, it is sufficient for a witness with knowledge to attest to the fact that the witness logged onto the site and to describe what he or she saw. That obviates any hearsay issue as to the contents of the site. Van Westrienen v. Americontinental Collection Corp., 94 F.Supp.2d 1087, 1109 (D. Or. 2000) ("The only remaining question is whether the content of the website is hearsay under FRE 801... . Here, [plaintiff], by his own account, personally viewed the website and submitted an affidavit detailing specifically what he viewed. Therefore, the contents of the website are not hearsay for purposes of this summary judgment motion"); State v. Rapose, 2004 WL 585856 at *5 (Wash. App. Mar. 25, 2004) (unpublished opinion) (affirming admission of Internet and email documents because "each exhibit was identified and authenticated by the person testifying from personal knowledge of the contents").

Data Entry. Some website data is entered into Internet-readable format in the same way that a bookkeeper may enter numbers into a computer. This act of data entry is an extrajudicial statement -- i.e., assertive nonverbal conduct within Rule 801(a) -- which means that the product is hearsay, within Rule 801(c). Since each level of hearsay must satisfy the hearsay rule, under Rule 805 (Hearsay within Hearsay), the act of data entry must be addressed separately from the content of the posted declaration.

Data entry is usually a regularly-conducted activity within Rule 803(6) (or, in the context of a government office, falls within Rule 803(8) (public records exception)). It also often falls within Rule 803(1) (present sense impression exception).

The real question about the data entry function is its accuracy. This is, in substance, an issue of authenticity and should be addressed as part of the requisite authentication foundation whenever a genuine doubt as to trustworthiness has been raised. If the foundational evidence establishes that the data have been entered accurately, the hearsay objection to the data entry function should ordinarily be overruled. See also Rule 807 (residual exception).

Much Internet evidence does not involve data entry, in the sense described above. If the webmaster is simply transferring an image or digitally converting an electronic file into web format, that is a technical process that does not involve assertive non-verbal conduct within Rule 801(a) and is best judged as purely an authentication issue. The difference, analytically, is between the grocery store clerk who punches the price into the check-out computer (this is assertive non-verbal conduct), and the clerk who simply scans the price into the computer (non-assertive behavior). Only assertive non-verbal conduct raises hearsay issues and requires an applicable hearsay exception or exemption.

Business and Public Records. Businesses and government offices publish countless documents on their websites in ordinary course. Provided that all of the traditional criteria are met, these documents will satisfy the hearsay exception for "records" of the business or public office involved, under Rules 803(6) or (8). Reliability and trustworthiness are said to be presumptively established by the fact of actual reliance in the regular course of an enterprise's activities. *Johnson-Wooldridge v. Wooldridge, 2001 Ohio App. LEXIS 3319 at *12-13 (Ohio App. July 26, 2001) (Internet public record). (Recall that public records which satisfy Rule 803(8) are presumptively authentic under Rule 901(b)(7) (if they derive from a "public office where items of this nature are kept") and even self-authenticating under Rule 902(5) (discussed above in note 6 and the accompanying text).)

As long as the website data constitute business or public records, this quality is not lost simply because the printout or other image that is proffered into evidence was generated for litigation purposes. Each digital data entry contained on the website is itself a Rule 803(6) or (8) "record" because it is a "data compilation, in any form." n9 Consequently, if each entry has been made in conformance with Rule 803(6) or Rule 803(8), the proffered output satisfies the hearsay exception even if it: (a) was not printed out at or near the time of the events recorded (as long as the entries were timely made), (b) was not prepared in ordinary course (but, e.g., for trial), and (c) is not in the usual form (but, e.g., has been converted into graphic form). n10 If the data are simply downloaded into a printout, they do not lose their business-record character. To the extent that significant selection, correction and interpretation are involved, their reliability and authenticity may be questioned. n11

While website data may constitute business records of the owner of the site, they are not business records of the Internet service provider (e.g., America Online, MSN, ATT). "Internet service providers ... are merely conduits ... . The fact that the Internet service provider may be able to retrieve information that its customers posted ... does not turn that material into a business record of the Internet service provider." United States v. Jackson, 208 F.3d 633, 637 (7th Cir. 2000) ("The Internet service providers did not themselves post what was on [the relevant] web sites. [Defendant] presented no evidence that the Internet service providers even monitored the contents of those web sites.").

Rules 803(6) and (8) effectively incorporate an authentication requirement. Rule 803(6) contemplates the admission of hearsay, if its criteria are satisfied, "unless the source of information or the method or circumstances of preparation indicate lack of trustworthiness." Rule 803(8) contains substantially identical language. This trustworthiness criterion parallels the Rule 901(a) requirement of "evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims." As a result, untrustworthy proffers of business or public records may be excluded on hearsay as well as authenticity grounds. n12

Market Reports & Tables. Rule 803(17) excepts from the hearsay rule "Market quotations, tabulations, lists, directories, or other published compilations, generally used and relied upon by the public or by persons in particular occupations." A number of cases have applied this rule to commercial websites furnishing such data as interest rates n13 and blue-book prices of used cars. n14 This rationale plainly extends to the other sorts of traditional information admitted under Rule 803(17), such as tables reflecting the prices of such items as stock, bonds and currency; real estate listings; and telephone books.

Admissions. Website data published by a litigant comprise admissions of that litigant when offered by an opponent. n15 Accordingly, even if the owner of a website may not offer data from the site into evidence, because the proffer is hearsay when the owner attempts to do so, an opposing party is authorized to offer it as an admission of the owner. n16

Non-Hearsay Proffers. Not uncommonly, website data is not offered for the truth of the matters asserted but rather solely to show the fact that they were published on the web, either by one of the litigants or by unaffiliated third parties. For example, in a punitive damages proceeding, the fact of Internet publication may be relevant to show that the defendant published untruths for the public to rely on. n17 Or, in a trademark action, Internet listings or advertisements may be relevant on the issue of consumer confusion or purchaser understanding. n18 In neither of these circumstances is the website data offered for its truth. Accordingly, no hearsay issues arise.

Judicial Skepticism. As they were with computerized evidence prior to the mid-1990s, some judges remain skeptical of the reliability of anything derived from the Internet. See, e.g., St. Clair v. Johnny's Oyster & Shrimp, Inc., 76 F. Supp.2d 773, 774-75 (S.D. Tex. 1999) ("While some look to the Internet as an innovative vehicle for communication, the Court continues to warily and wearily view it largely as one large catalyst for rumor, innuendo, and misinformation ... . Anyone can put anything on the Internet. No web-site is monitored for accuracy and nothing contained therein is under oath or even subject to independent verification absent underlying documentation. Moreover, the Court holds no illusions that hackers can adulterate the content on any web-site from any location at any time. For these reasons, any evidence procured off the Internet is adequate for almost nothing, even under the most liberal interpretations of the hearsay exception rules found in Fed.R.Evid. 807"). While there is no gainsaying a healthy judicial skepticism of any evidence that is subject to ready, and potentially undetectable, manipulation, there is much on the web which is not subject to serious dispute and which may be highly probative. As with so many of the trial judge's duties, this is a matter that can only be resolved on a case-by-case basis.

In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

(n5)Footnote 5. Fed.R.Evid. 104(b) provides that: Relevancy conditioned on fact.--When the relevancy of evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court shall admit it upon, or subject to, the introduction of evidence sufficient to support a finding of the fulfillment of the condition.

III Email Evidence

Like Internet evidence, email evidence raises both authentication and hearsay issues. The general principles of admissibility are essentially the same since email is simply a distinctive type of Internet evidence -- namely, the use of the Internet to send personalized communications.

Authentication. The authenticity of email evidence is governed by Federal Rule of Evidence 901(a), which requires only "evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims." Under Fed.R.Evid. 901(b)(4), email may be authenticated by reference to its "appearance, contents, substance, internal patterns, or other distinctive characteristics, taken in conjunction with circumstances." See generally United States v. Siddiqui, 235 F.3d 1318, 1322 (11th Cir. 2000) ; Bloom v. Comw. of Virginia, 34 Va. App. 364, 370, 542 S.E.2d 18, 20-21 (2001) .

If email is produced by a party from the party's files and on its face purports to have been sent by that party, these circumstances alone may suffice to establish authenticity. n1 Authenticity may also be established by testimony of a witness who sent or received the emails -- in essence, that the emails are the personal correspondence of the witness. n2

It is important, for authentication purposes, that email generated by a business or other entity on its face generally reflects the identity of the organization. The name of the organization, usually in some abbreviated form, ordinarily appears in the email address of the sender (after the @ symbol). This mark of origin has been held to self-authenticate the email as having been sent by the organization, under Fed.R.Evid. 902(7), which provides for self-authentication of: "Trade inscriptions and the like.--Inscriptions, signs, tags, or labels purporting to have been affixed in the course of business and indicating ownership, control, or origin." *See Superhighway Consulting, Inc. v. Techwave, Inc., 1999 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17910 at 6 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 15, 1999) . Where the email reflects the entire email name of a party (and not just the mark of origin), it has been held to comprise a party admission of origin. n3

Independently, circumstantial indicia that may suffice to establish that proffered email were sent, or were sent by a specific person, include evidence that:

- A witness or entity received the email.
- The email bore the email address of a particular individual.
- This email contained the typewritten name or nickname of this individual in the body of the email. n4
- The email recited matters that would normally be known only to the individual who is alleged to have sent it (or to a discrete number of persons including this individual).
- Following receipt of the email, the recipient witness had a discussion with the individual who purportedly sent it, and the conversation reflected this individual's knowledge of the contents of the email.

See generally United States v. Siddiqui, 215 F.3d 1318, 1322-23 (11th Cir. 2000) ; Bloom v. Comw. of Virginia, 34 Va. App. 364, 370, 542 S.E.2d 18, 20-21 (2001) ; Massimo v. State, 144 S.W.3d 210, 215-16 (Tex. App. 2004) (unpublished opinion).

As with all other forms of authentication, the testimony of a witness with knowledge is prerequisite to authenticate email. It is insufficient to proffer email through a witness with no knowledge of the transmissions at issue, unless the witness has sufficient technical knowledge of the process to be in a position to authenticate the email through expert testimony. *See, e.g., Richard Howard, Inc. v. Hogg, 1996 Ohio App. LEXIS 5533 at 8 (Ohio App. Nov. 19, 1996) (affirming exclusion of email where the authenticating witness "was neither the recipient nor the sender of the E-mail transmissions and he offered no other details establishing his personal knowledge that these messages were actually sent or received by the parties involved. Furthermore, the transmissions were not authenticated by any other means").

There are a variety of technical means by which email transmissions may be traced. *See, e.g., Clement v. California Dep't of Corrections, 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17426 at 32 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 9, 2002) ("major e-mail providers include a coded Internet Protocol address (IP address) in the header of every e-mail... . The IP address allows the recipient of an e-mail to identify the sender by contacting the service provider"). Therefore, if serious authentication issues arise, a technical witness may be of assistance. n5 This may become important, for example, in circumstances where a person or entity denies receipt of an email and has not engaged in conduct that furnishes circumstantial evidence of receipt (such as a subsequent communication reflecting knowledge of the contents of the email). See, e.g. Ellison v. Robertson, 189 F. Supp.2d 1051, 1057 n.7 (C.D. Cal. 2002) ("Plaintiff has provided no evidence that AOL actually did receive the email. To the contrary, Plaintiff's former counsel states that while she received an acknowledgment of receipt for her April 17, 2000, email from [a local Internet provider], no such acknowledgment came from AOL"); Carafano v. Metrosplash.com, Inc., 207 F. Supp.2d 1055, 1072 (C.D. Cal. 2002) ("Plaintiff provides no evidence that [defendant Internet service] ever received the reply email in response to its welcome confirmation email").

Hearsay. The hearsay issues associated with email are largely the same as those associated with conventional correspondence. The prevalence and ease of use of email, particularly in the business setting, makes it attractive simply to assume that all email generated at or by a business falls under the business-records exception to the hearsay rule. That assumption would be incorrect.

What Is a Business Record? Or a Present Sense Impression? In United States v. Ferber, 966 F. Supp. 90 (D. Mass. 1997) , the government offered into evidence a multi-paragraph email from a subordinate to his superior describing a telephone conversation with the defendant (not a fellow employee). In that conversation, the defendant inculpated himself, and the email so reflected. Chief Judge Young rejected the proffer under Fed.R.Evid. 803(6) because, "while it may have been [the employee's] routing business practice to make such records, there was not sufficient evidence that [his employer] required such records to be maintained... . [I]n order for a document to be admitted as a business record, there must be some evidence of a business duty to make and regularly maintain records of this type." Id., 996 F. Supp. at 98 . The Ferber Court nonetheless admitted the email, but under 803(1), the hearsay exception for present sense impressions. n6 *See also State of New York v. Microsoft Corp., 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7683 at 9 (D.D.C. April 12, 2002) ("While Mr. Glaser's email [recounting a meeting] may have been 'kept in the course' of RealNetworks regularly conducted business activity, Plaintiffs have not, on the present record, established that it was the 'regular practice' of RealNetworks employees to write and maintain such emails.") (separately holding the present sense impression exception inapplicable); Rambus, Inc. v. Infineon Techs. AG, 348 F. Supp. 2d 698, 707 (E.D. Va. 2004) ("Email is far less of a systematic business activity than a monthly inventory printout"), quoting Monotype Corp. v. Intl. Typeface Corp., 43 F.3d 443, 450 (9th Cir. 1994) .

Hearsay within Hearsay. Because business records are written without regard for the rules of evidence, they commonly contain multiple layers of hearsay. Under Federal Rule of Evidence 805, n7 each layer of hearsay must independently satisfy an exception to the hearsay rule. Absent that, any hearsay portion of an email that is offered for the truth n8 will be excluded. *See, e.g., State of New York v. Microsoft Corp., 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7683 at 14 (D.D.C. April 12, 2002) (" 'If both the source and the recorder of the information, as well as every other participant in the chain producing the record, are acting in the regular course of business, the multiple hearsay is excused by Rule 803(6). If the source of the information is an outsider, Rule 803(6) does not, by itself, permit the admission of the business record. The outsider's statement must fall within another hearsay exception to be admissible because it does not have the presumption of accuracy that statements made during the regular course of business have' ") (citation omitted).

Admission of Party Opponent. Under Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(2), n9 emails sent by party opponents constitute admissions and are not hearsay. *See, e.g., Riisna v. ABC, Inc., 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16969 at *9-10 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 11, 2002) . The email address itself, which reflects that it originates from a party, may be admissible as a party admission. *Middlebrook v. Anderson, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1976, at 14 (N.D. Tex. Feb. 11, 2005) (jurisdictional motion). Further, an email from a party opponent that forwards another email may comprise an adoptive admission of the original message, depending on the text of the forwarding email. Sea-Land Serv., Inc. v. Lozen Int'l, LLC, 285 F.3d 808, 821 (9th Cir. 2002) (one of plaintiff's employees "incorporated and adopted the contents" of an email message from a second of plaintiff's employees when she forwarded it to the defendant with a cover note that "manifested an adoption or belief in [the] truth" of the information contained in the original email, within Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(2)(B)). If there is not an adoptive admission, however, the forwarded email chain may comprise hearsay-within-hearsay. Rambus, Inc. v. Infineon Techs. AG, 348 F. Supp. 2d 698, 707 (E.D. Va. 2004) .

Excited Utterance. In dicta, the Oregon Court of Appeals has indicated that, in appropriate circumstances, an email message might fall within the excited utterance exception to the hearsay rule. State v. Cunningham, 40 P.3d 1065, 1076 n.8 (2002) . (The federal excited utterance exception, contained in Fed.R.Evid. 803(2), n10 is identical to the Oregon exception, Oregon Rule 803(2).)

Non-Hearsay Uses. Not all extrajudicial statements are hearsay or, more precisely, need not be offered for hearsay purposes. The contents of an authenticated email may, for example, constitute a verbal act -- e.g., constitute defamation or the offer or acceptance of a contract. *Middlebrook v. Anderson, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1976, at 14 (N.D. Tex. Feb. 11, 2005) (jurisdictional motion); *Tibbetts v. RadioShack Corp., 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19835, at 45 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 30, 2004) .

FOOTNOTES:

(n5)Footnote 5. Since authentication issues are decided by the court under Federal Rule of Evidence 104(a), live testimony from such a witness is not essential; an affidavit or declaration may be equally effective. Fed.R.Evid. 104(a) is set forth in n.4, supra.

(n6)Footnote 6. Fed.R.Evid. 803(1) sets forth the hearsay exception for present sense impressions, which are defined to include any "statement describing or explaining an event or condition made while the declarant was perceiving the event or condition, or immediately thereafter."

(n7)Footnote 7. Fed.R.Evid. 805 provides: "Hearsay included within hearsay is not excluded under the hearsay rule if each part of the combined statements conforms with an exception to the hearsay rule provided in these rules."

(n8)Footnote 8. Email communications not offered for the truth are not subject to exclusion as hearsay. *See, e.g., Rombom v. Weberman, 2002 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 769 at 20 (Sup. Ct. Kings Cty. June 13, 2002) ("since plaintiff introduced the e-mails to establish their effect upon plaintiff, as opposed to the truth of their content, the e-mails did not constitute inadmissible hearsay").

(n9)Footnote 9. Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(2) provides that a statement is not hearsay if:

> The statement is offered against a party and is (A) the party's own statement, in either an individual or a representative capacity or (B) a statement of which the party has manifested an adoption or belief in its truth, or (C) a statement by a person authorized by the party to make a statement concerning the subject, or (D) a statement by the party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship, or (E) a statement by a coconspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy. The contents of the statement shall be considered but are not alone sufficient to establish the declarant's authority under subdivision (C), the agency or employment relationship and scope thereof under subdivision (D), or the existence of the conspiracy and the participation therein of the declarant and the party against whom the statement is offered under subdivision (E).

(n10)Footnote 10. Fed.R.Evid. 803(2) excepts from the hearsay rule "[a] statement relating to a startling event or condition made while the declarant was under the stress of excitement caused by the event or condition."

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
CHAPTER 1 OBJECTIONS, OFFERS OF PROOF, LIMITING INSTRUCTIONS

1-1 Objections: Basic Requirements.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 103. Rulings on Evidence

(a) Effect of erroneous ruling. -- Error may not be predicated upon a ruling which admits or excludes evidence unless a substantial right of the party is affected, and

(1) Objection. -- In case the ruling is one admitting evidence, a timely objection or motion to strike appears of record, stating the specific ground of objection, if the specific ground was not apparent from the context; * * *.

Once the court makes a definitive ruling on the record admitting or excluding evidence, either at or before trial, a party need not renew an objection or offer of proof to preserve a claim of error for appeal.

(c) Hearing of jury. -- In jury cases, proceedings shall be conducted, to the extent practicable, so as to prevent inadmissible evidence from being suggested to the jury by any means, such as making statements or offers of proof or asking questions in the hearing of the jury.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

(b) Relevancy conditioned on fact. -- When the relevancy of evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court shall admit it upon, or subject to, the introduction of evidence sufficient to support a finding of the fulfillment of the condition.

Rule 105. Limited Admissibility

When evidence which is admissible as to one party or for one purpose but not admissible as to another party or for another purpose is admitted, the court, upon request, shall restrict the evidence to its proper scope and instruct the jury accordingly.

[b] Key Points.

1. A timely objection is required. The objection must be made as soon as the grounds reasonably appear.

2. If the objection is to the form of a question, the objection should be made before the answer is given, if practicable.

3. If the objection is to the answer, a motion to strike the answer should accompany the objection. An instruction to the jury to disregard may be requested under Rule 105.

4. One or more specific grounds for objection generally must be stated. A general objection does not preserve an issue for appeal. The objection "incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial" is a general, not a specific, objection.

5. If the ground for objection is obvious, it need not be stated. Careful counsel, however, will always state the specific ground for objection, because reviewing courts may not agree on what is obvious.

6. If a motion in limine has been made to exclude evidence and has been denied, generally it must be renewed at trial, Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38 (1984) , unless it is a definitive ruling. Rule 103(a). It is difficult to know what a definitive ruling is, and circumstances may change between the time the motion in limine is denied and when the issue arises at trial. Thus, prudent counsel will renew an objection at trial. When a motion in limine is granted or denied, the losing counsel must be careful not to waive any right to appeal by anticipating opposing counsel's actions. For example, when the defendant in a criminal case moves to exclude evidence of a prior conviction under Rule 609 and the trial judge denies the motion, the defendant waives the right to appeal by introducing the prior conviction during direct examination. The Supreme Court so held in Ohler v. United States, 529 U.S. 753 (2000) .

7. If the objecting counsel believes that the jury might be prejudiced as a result of hearing the objection, counsel should seek to be heard outside the presence of the jury as provided in Rule 103(c).

8. In civil cases, as part of the final pretrial order under Fed. R. Civ. P. 16, the trial judge may require all exhibits to be marked and all objections other than relevance to be raised or waived. A party seeking to preserve an objection must be certain to raise it in conformity with any specific procedures imposed by the court.

9. In criminal cases, certain motions to exclude evidence must be raised prior to trial or they will be waived. Fed. R.

Crim. P. 12(b) lists five categories of motions that must be raised before trial: defenses and objections based on defects in the institution of the prosecution or on defects in the charging document, motions to suppress evidence, discovery motions, and severance requests.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to evidence or testimony. Unless a timely objection is made, the witness will be permitted to testify or the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

The judge will often find it useful to make a record outside the hearing of the jury justifying a ruling. A good record will indicate that the judge appropriately used either Rule 104(a) or Rule 104(b) in considering an objection, and grasped the particular evidence rule that supported the objection.

If the judge does not make a statement for the record, the party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude testimony or evidence, the party wishing to offer the testimony or evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on an objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Objections Generally

Counsel have a duty to raise objections to evidence when they believe the evidence is not proper for one reason or another. An objection asks the court to decide whether the rules of evidence, which the court must apply, require that certain evidence be excluded. You must not draw any adverse inference from an objection.

[2] Objection -- First Occasion

The court applies the rules of evidence when an objection is made. The parties do not always agree on what the rules of evidence permit and forbid. The court must resolve their disagreements. You must not draw any negative or positive inference about a party or about counsel simply because the court sustains or overrules an objection. Your job is to consider only the evidence that is actually admitted. You should disregard any question or answer to which an objection is sustained and accept the fact that the parties and the court are bound by the rules of evidence.

[3] Objections -- Reminder

I remind you that you must not draw any negative or positive inference about a party or about counsel simply because the court sustains or overrules an objection.

[4] Motion to Strike

You must ignore that answer [or specify the specific part of the answer]. It is not admissible and may not be considered by you as evidence in this case.

[5] Sidebar Conference

From time to time, the lawyers and I may have a conversation outside of your hearing or we may excuse you from the courtroom. These conversations involve questions of law that the court is required to resolve. You must not draw any negative inference against a party simply because counsel may seek to address a legal question outside of your hearing. Please excuse the delay that sometimes occurs when legal questions arise. I can assure you that the parties and the court will do everything possible to keep the delay as short as possible. The court and the parties thank you for your patience.

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
CHAPTER 1 OBJECTIONS, OFFERS OF PROOF, LIMITING INSTRUCTIONS

1-2 Offers of Proof: Basic Requirements.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 103. Rulings on Evidence

(a) Effect of erroneous ruling. -- Error may not be predicated upon a ruling which admits or excludes evidence unless a substantial right of the party is affected, and

* * *

(2) Offer of proof. -- In case the ruling is one excluding evidence, the substance of the evidence was made known to the court by offer or was apparent from the context within which questions were asked.

Once the court makes a definitive ruling on the record admitting or excluding evidence, either at or before trial, a party need not renew an objection or offer of proof to preserve a claim of error for appeal.

(b) Record of offer and ruling. -- The court may add any other or further statement which shows the character of the evidence, the form in which it was offered, the objection made, and the ruling thereon. It may direct the making of an offer in question and answer form.

(c) Hearing of jury. -- In jury cases, proceedings shall be conducted, to the extent practicable, so as to prevent inadmissible evidence from being suggested to the jury by any means, such as making statements or offers of proof or asking questions in the hearing of the jury.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

(b) Relevancy conditioned on fact. -- When the relevancy of evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court shall admit it upon, or subject to, the introduction of evidence sufficient to support a finding of the fulfillment of the condition.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. If the court sustains an objection and excludes evidence, the proponent of the evidence must "make a record" by establishing the contents of the excluded evidence.

2. The proponent may make an offer of proof as to testimony in several different ways: (a) counsel may orally represent what the testimony of a witness would have been; (b) counsel may make an offer of proof by putting a witness on the stand and asking questions when there is a recess and the jury is not present; (c) counsel may submit a written offer of proof as to testimony; and (d) counsel may refer to a deposition or other statement of a witness and indicate that the witness would testify to the contents of the deposition or statement.

3. The court may direct that an offer of proof must be made in one form or another. The court also may state for the record matters that explain why evidence is excluded.

4. The proponent may mark an exhibit for identification and make it part of the record if it is excluded by the court. The excluded exhibit will not be shown to the jury, of course.

5. An offer of proof need not be made if the answer is apparent from the context, but careful counsel will make the offer anyway if testimony is important.

6. Generally, a cross-examiner will not be required to make the same kind of offer of proof as a direct examiner, since the cross-examiner may not have prepared the witness and may not know what answers the witness would give to certain questions.

7. If the reasons for a cross-examiner's questions are not apparent and the court sustains a relevance objection, the cross-examiner is required to demonstrate relevance by some kind of offer of proof.

8. A cross-examiner who is able to make an offer of proof may enhance the likelihood that erroneous limitations on cross-examination will be perceived to be prejudicial.

9. Since an offer of proof is not part of the evidence before a jury, it should be made outside the hearing of the jury, as provided in Rule 103(c).

10. If a motion in limine to exclude evidence is granted prior to trial, the proponent should seek reconsideration at trial to assure that any error is preserved, Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38 (1984) , unless the ruling is a definitive one. Rule 103(a). It is difficult to know what a definitive ruling is, and circumstances may change between the time the motion in limine is denied and when the issue arises at trial. Thus, prudent counsel will seek review at trial of an in limine ruling excluding evidence. If an offer of proof was made when the motion was granted or denied, it need not be repeated, but careful counsel will incorporate the prior offer of proof in seeking reconsideration. When a motion in limine is granted, the losing counsel must be careful not to waive any right to appeal by anticipating opposing counsel's actions. For example, when the defendant in a criminal case moves to exclude evidence of a prior conviction under Rule 609 and the trial judge denies the motion, the defendant waives the right to appeal by introducing the prior conviction during direct examination. The Supreme Court so held in Ohler v. United States, 529 U.S. 753 (2000) .

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to evidence or testimony. Unless a timely objection is made, the witness will be permitted to testify or the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

The judge will often find it useful to make a record outside the hearing of the jury justifying a ruling. A good record will indicate that the judge appropriately used either Rule 104(a) or Rule 104(b) in considering an objection, and will demonstrate a grasp of the particular evidence rule that supported the objection.

If the judge does not make a statement for the record, the party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude testimony or evidence, the party wishing to offer the testimony or evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on an objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Objection -- First Occasion

The court applies the rules of evidence when an objection is made. The parties do not always agree on what the rules of evidence permit and forbid. The court must resolve their disagreements. You must not draw any negative or positive inference about a party or about counsel simply because the court sustains or overrules an objection. Your job is to consider only the evidence that is actually admitted. You should disregard any question or answer to which an objection is sustained and accept the fact that the parties and the court are bound by the rules of evidence.

[2] Objections -- Reminder

I remind you that you must not draw any negative or positive inference about a party or about counsel simply because the court sustains or overrules an objection.

[3] Sidebar Conference

From time to time, the lawyers and I may have a conversation outside of your hearing or we may excuse you from the courtroom. These conversations involve questions of law that the court is required to resolve. You must not draw any negative inference simply because counsel for one party may seek to address a legal question outside of your hearing.

1-3 Limiting Instructions Generally.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

(b) Relevancy conditioned on fact. -- When the relevancy of evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court shall admit it upon, or subject to, the introduction of evidence sufficient to support a finding of the fulfillment of the condition.

* * *

Rule 105. Limited Admissibility

When evidence which is admissible as to one party or for one purpose but not admissible as to another party or for another purpose is admitted, the court, upon request, shall restrict the evidence to its proper scope and instruct the jury accordingly.

[b] Key Points.

1. The court must give a limiting instruction upon request. Rarely, if ever, is the court required to give an instruction sua sponte.

2. Counsel should request the language they want the court to use in the instruction. If the court chooses its own language, counsel must object under Rule 103(a) if the instruction is inaccurate.

3. The limiting instruction may indicate that evidence is admissible as to one party but not as to others; that evidence is admissible on one issue but not on others; or that evidence is admissible for one purpose and not others.

4. Counsel may request that an instruction be given immediately after evidence is admitted for a limited purpose, and that the instruction be repeated as part of the final instructions to the jury.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to evidence or testimony. Unless a timely objection is made, the witness will be permitted to testify or the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

The judge will often find it useful to make a record outside the hearing of the jury to justify a ruling. A good record will indicate that the judge appropriately used either Rule 104(a) or Rule 104(b) in considering an objection, and will demonstrate a grasp of the particular evidence rule that supported the objection.

If the judge does not make a statement for the record, the party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude testimony or evidence, the party wishing to offer the testimony or evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on an objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Evidence Admissible Against One Party but Not Others

The testimony of this witness [summarize substance] is only admissible against [name of party]. You may not consider this evidence in connection with any other party.

[2] Evidence Admissible on One Claim but Not Others

The testimony of this witness [summarize substance] is only admissible in connection with [count 1 of the indictment or the claim of negligence]. You may not consider this evidence in connection with [any other count of the indictment or any other claim in this case].

[3] Evidence Admissible on One Issue but Not Others

The testimony of this witness is only admissible in connection with one issue in this case [state issue]. You may not use this evidence for any other purpose.

CHAPTER 2 JUDICIAL NOTICE

6-2 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 2-1

2-1 Judicial Notice.

[a] Governing Rule.

Rule 201. Judicial Notice of Adjudicative Facts

(a) Scope of rule. -- This rule governs only judicial notice of adjudicative facts.

(b) Kinds of facts. -- A judicially noticed fact must be one not subject to reasonable dispute in that it is either (1) generally known within the territorial jurisdiction of the trial court or (2) capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned.

(c) When discretionary. -- A court may take judicial notice, whether requested or not.

(d) When mandatory. -- A court shall take judicial notice if requested by a party and supplied with the necessary information.

(e) Opportunity to be heard. -- A party is entitled upon timely request to an opportunity to be heard as to the propriety of taking judicial notice and the tenor of the matter noticed. In the absence of prior notification, the request may be made after judicial notice has been taken.

(f) Time of taking notice. -- Judicial notice may be taken at any stage of the proceeding.

(g) Instructing jury. -- In a civil action or proceeding, the court shall instruct the jury to accept as conclusive any fact judicially noticed. In a criminal case, the court shall instruct the jury that it may, but is not required to, accept as conclusive any fact judicially noticed.

[b] Key Points.

1. A party may ask the court to take judicial notice at any time. If the court takes judicial notice, the party need not offer proof of the fact that is noticed.

2. The court must take judicial notice if a party makes a request and provides the court with sufficient information or material to justify the court's finding that the fact to be noticed is (1) generally known within the territorial jurisdiction of the trial court or (2) capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned.

3. In a civil case, judicial notice is conclusive on the jury.

4. In a criminal case, the jury must be instructed that it may, but is not required to, accept a noticed fact as true.

5. The court may take judicial notice sua sponte, but must give the parties a chance to be heard on the propriety of taking notice.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

Rule 201 is triggered when a party asks the court to take judicial notice or the court decides on its own to do so. Unless a timely objection is made, judicial notice is almost surely proper. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling on the propriety of taking notice.

The judge will often find it useful to make a record outside the hearing of the jury to justify the taking of judicial notice over objection. The judge may state, for example: I find that [insert judicially noticed fact] is not subject to reasonable dispute. This fact is [generally known within the jurisdiction of the court to be true] [capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to -- identify source -- the reliability of which cannot reasonably be questioned].

If the judge does not make a statement for the record, the party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

The effect of judicial notice in a civil case may be the exclusion of evidence that contradicts the judicially noticed fact. Should the judge exclude testimony or evidence, the party wishing to offer the testimony or evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has taken judicial notice, the judge should instruct the jury on the impact of judicial notice. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge may consider sua sponte one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether the parties prefer a particular form of instruction.

In a criminal case, even though the defendant has not objected to evidence, the defendant usually will want to request a limiting instruction from the judge to explain to the jury that judicial notice is not binding upon it.

[1] Civil Case

The court has determined that reasonable people would all agree that [insert fact to be noticed] is true. This fact is so [generally known within this jurisdiction or clearly established as true by sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned] that the court will not require any evidence to prove it. The court instructs you that you must accept this fact as true.

[2] Criminal Case

The court has determined that reasonable people would all agree that [insert fact to be noticed] is true. This fact is so [generally known within this jurisdiction or clearly established as true by sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned] that the court will not require any evidence to prove it. The court instructs you it is taking notice that the fact is true. Although you are not required to do so, you are entitled to accept this fact as true on the basis of the court's notice.

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
CHAPTER 3 PRESUMPTIONS

6-3 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 3-1

3-1 Presumptions in Civil Cases.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 301. Presumptions in General in Civil Actions and Proceedings

In all civil actions and proceedings not otherwise provided for by Act of Congress or by these rules, a presumption imposes on the party against whom it is directed the burden of going forward with evidence to rebut or meet the presumption, but does not shift to such party the burden of proof in the sense of the risk of nonpersuasion, which remains throughout the trial upon the party on whom it was originally cast.

Rule 302. Applicability of State Law in Civil Actions and Proceedings

In civil actions and proceedings, the effect of a presumption respecting a fact which is an element of a claim or defense as to which State law supplies the rule of decision is determined in accordance with State law.

[b] Key Points.

1. The only rules on presumptions govern in civil actions and proceedings. Rule 301 provides the general rule that will be used in actions arising under federal law unless Congress provides otherwise, previous judge-made presumptions in admiralty and certain other actions persist, or the rules are amended to provide additional provisions on presumptions.

2. The party against whom a presumption operates must offer rebuttal evidence to contradict the presumed fact or the presumption will be binding. For example, if one party offers evidence that a letter was mailed to a proper address, a presumption may arise that it was received in a reasonable period of time. If the opposing side challenges the presumed fact (i.e., the fact of receipt) with sufficient evidence to create a disputed issue regarding the presumed fact, the presumption will disappear. If the opposing side does not offer sufficient evidence, the presumption remains and the jury is instructed that if it finds the triggering fact (i.e., the fact of mailing) it must also find the presumed fact.

3. If sufficient rebuttal evidence is offered, the burden of persuasion remains undisturbed. It does not switch as a result of Rule 301.

4. If the opposing party challenges the triggering fact but not the presumed fact, the jury must be instructed that if it finds the triggering fact it must also find the presumed fact.

5. State law on presumptions governs when state law provides the rule of decision in a case. When state and federal claims are merged, the trial judge may have to choose one rule for presumptions if federal and state law are different.

6. If sufficient rebuttal evidence is offered to raise a disputed issue as to the presumed fact, no instruction should be given to the jury. The presumption serves its purpose when it results in the offer of rebuttal evidence and thereafter the presumption plays no part in the decision of the case.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to evidence or testimony or a request is made for an instruction regarding presumptions. Unless a timely request for instruction or objection is made, the judge may or may not instruct the jury on the effect of a presumption. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

The judge will often find it useful to make a record outside the hearing of the jury to justify a ruling. A good record will indicate that the judge appropriately applied Rule 301 and distinguished between the fact that gives rise to a presumption and the presumed fact. For example, the judge may state for the record a finding that the party opposing a presumption has not offered sufficient evidence to warrant a jury in believing that a presumed fact is untrue, which requires the judge to tell the jury that if it finds the fact giving rise to the presumption to be true then it must find that the presumed fact also is true. Or, the judge may state for the record a finding that the party opposing a presumed fact has offered sufficient rebuttal evidence so that the presumption disappears and no mandatory instruction will be given to the jury.

If the judge does not make a statement for the record, the party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge find rebuttal evidence to be insufficient, the party relying on that evidence should be certain to move its admission and to make an offer of proof on the sufficiency question. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. Under Rule 301, the trial judge may choose, even without a request, to instruct the jury when a presumption is binding; the judge is precluded from giving a mandatory instruction when the presumption disappears, but an objection will be required if an instruction is proposed. The rule does not prohibit the judge from considering sua sponte or in response to a party's request whether to give an instruction on a permissible inference.

Three instructions are set forth below. The first two assume that Rule 301 applies. The first instruction should be given whenever the opposing party either offers insufficient rebuttal evidence regarding the presumed fact or limits rebuttal evidence to the triggering fact. The third instruction assumes that a federal statute shifts the burden of persuasion, or that it is a diversity case and state law provides the rule of decision and shifts the burden of persuasion.

[1] Insufficient or No Rebuttal Evidence Regarding Presumed Fact

You have heard evidence that [insert triggering fact -- e.g., the plaintiff mailed a letter to the defendant on a given date]. It is for you to decide whether this is true. I instruct you that if you find that [triggering fact -- e.g., the letter was mailed on or about this date] you must also find that [insert presumed fact -- e.g., the letter was received within a reasonable time thereafter].

[2] Triggering Fact Admitted or Stipulated

The parties have agreed that [insert triggering fact -- e.g., the plaintiff mailed a letter to the defendant on a given date]. You must accept this fact as true. I instruct you also must accept as true [insert presumed fact -- e.g., the letter was received within a reasonable time thereafter].

[3] Statutory or State Law Shifting Burden of Persuasion

You have heard evidence that [insert triggering fact -- e.g., the plaintiff mailed a letter to the defendant on a given date]. It is for you to decide whether this is true. I instruct you that if you find that [triggering fact -- e.g., the letter was mailed on or about this date], the burden is on [name party -- e.g., the defendant] to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that [insert opposite of the presumed fact -- e.g., the letter was not received within a reasonable time thereafter].

CHAPTER 3 PRESUMPTIONS

6-3 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 3-2

3-2 Presumptions in Criminal Cases.

[a] Governing Rule.

NO RULE

[b] Key Points.

1. There is no rule on presumptions in criminal cases.

2. The Supreme Court approved Rule 303 in 1972 and sent it to Congress, but Congress declined to enact it as part of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

3. Proposed, but unenacted Rule 303, read, in part, as follows:

> (b) Submission to jury. The judge is not authorized to direct the jury to find a presumed fact against the accused. When the presumed fact establishes guilt or is an element of the offense or negatives a defense, the judge may submit the question of guilt or of the existence of the presumed fact to the jury, if, but only if, a reasonable juror on the evidence as a whole, including the evidence of the basic facts, could find guilt or the presumed fact beyond a reasonable doubt. When the presumed fact has a lesser effect, its existence may be submitted to the jury if the basic facts are supported by substantial evidence, or are otherwise established, unless the evidence as a whole negatives the existence of the presumed fact.
> (c) Instructing the jury. Whenever the existence of a presumed fact against the accused is submitted to the jury, the judge shall give an instruction that the law declares that the jury may regard the basic facts as sufficient evidence of the presumed fact but does not require it to do so. In addition, if the presumed fact establishes guilt or is an element of the offense or negatives a defense, the judge shall instruct the jury that its existence must, on all the evidence, be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.

4. Congress was concerned with the constitutionality of the proposed rule.

5. In County Court of Ulster v. Allen, 442 U.S. 140 (1979) , the Supreme Court emphasized that, in assessing the validity of presumptions, the key is what the trial judge tells the jury. The Court indicated that if the trial judge does no more than inform the jury of a permissible inference, the instruction will be upheld as long as it is rational.

6. Presumptions in criminal cases, as Allen recognizes, are potentially affected by the constitutional rule that the prosecution must prove beyond a reasonable doubt all elements of crimes charged against a defendant under In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970) . Winship spawned a line of Supreme Court cases -- e.g., Mullaney v. Wilbur, 421 U.S. 684 (1975) , and Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197 (1977) -- that address the question of when a burden of persuasion may be placed on a defendant.

7. In Sandstrom v. Montana, 442 U.S. 510 (1979) , the Supreme Court held that an instruction to the jury in a homicide case that "the law presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts" violated the Constitution because it may have removed from the prosecution some of its burden to prove beyond a reasonable doubt all elements of the crime charged. Prudence would indicate that trial judges should not use the words "presumption" or "presume" other than to refer to the presumption of innocence in their instructions to the jury.

Generally, parties must object to a trial judge's instructions or they will waive complaint. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

The judge will often find it useful to make a record outside the hearing of the jury explaining or justifying an instruction. Given the constitutional implications surrounding presumptions in criminal cases, judges must be extremely careful in the language they choose to use in their instructions. Indeed, the best advice for judges is probably to avoid ever using the word "presumption" in criminal cases except to refer to the presumption of innocence. Since the word "presumption" is confusing even to lawyers, its avoidance and reliance on permissible inference instructions is likely to be a safe course for a judge who is compelled to deal with a criminal presumption.

The following instruction should be safe in most cases:

Permissible Inference Instruction

You have heard evidence that [insert triggering fact -- e.g., the defendant had possession of recently stolen property]. It is for you to decide whether this is true. I instruct you that if you find that [triggering fact -- e.g., the defendant did have possession of recently stolen property] you may, but are not required to, infer that [insert inferred fact -- e.g., the defendant knew that the property was stolen]. The prosecution must prove [insert inferred fact] beyond a reasonable doubt.

CHAPTER 4 RELEVANCE AND RELATED MATTERS

4-1 Relevant Evidence.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

(b) Relevancy conditioned on fact. -- When the relevancy of evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court shall admit it upon, or subject to, the introduction of evidence sufficient to support a finding of the fulfillment of the condition.

* * *

Rule 401. Definition of "Relevant Evidence"

"Relevant evidence" means evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence.

Rule 402. Relevant Evidence Generally Admissible; Irrelevant Evidence Inadmissible

All relevant evidence is admissible, except as otherwise provided by the Constitution of the United States, by Act of Congress, by these rules, or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority. Evidence which is not relevant is not admissible.

[b] Key Points.

1. Relevant evidence is admissible unless the Constitution, a statute, or rules enacted pursuant to the Rules Enabling Act provide otherwise.

2. The burden is on a party who claims an exception to the rule of admissibility to raise a specific objection and point out the exception.

3. Most of the exceptions to admissibility are found in other rules of evidence. Rule 403 is a principal example. Other non-evidence rules may also restrict the use of relevant evidence. For example, Rules 30(b) and 32(a)(3) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, by imposing requirements of notice and unavailability of the deponent, place limits on the use of relevant depositions.

4. Irrelevant evidence is inadmissible. The burden is on a party claiming that evidence is not relevant to make a specific objection.

5. Relevance determinations involve both logic and experience. They also require knowledge of the issues in dispute in a particular case and the law governing those issues.

6. The rule covers both the common-law concepts of materiality and relevance. The words "of consequence to the action" suggest a materiality analysis, while the words "more or less probable" suggest a relevance analysis.

7. An objection "irrelevant" is sufficient to cover any point that at common law would fall under either a materiality or relevance objection.

8. The trial judge, in making a relevance determination, may be using both Rule 104(a) and (b). If the judge is making a basic relevance determination, the issue is a question for the court under Rule 104(a). If, however, one item of evidence is relevant only if another item is proved, the issue for the judge is whether there is sufficient evidence for a trier of fact to find the other item, which is an issue falling within Rule 104(b).

9. Even when the judge is making a basic relevance analysis under Rule 104(a), the judge does not decide whether a witness or an item of evidence is credible, only whether a reasonable jury could find the witness or evidence credible.

10. Rule 104(b) issues are often "connecting up" issues. For example, a party who offers evidence that a witness who testified for the other side recently deposited $10,000 into the bank may promise to connect this evidence with evidence that the opposing party gave the witness the money. If the party does not keep this promise and offers no evidence to warrant a finding that the opposing party had anything to do with the money, the deposit becomes irrelevant and the previously admitted evidence would be stricken.

11. Rule 104(b) thus makes it clear that, if one piece of evidence (piece 1) is relevant only if some piece (piece 2) is established as true, the trial judge must decide whether there is sufficient admissible evidence of piece 2 to warrant a jury finding it to be true. If so, the evidence of both pieces 1 and 2 is admitted. If not, evidence of piece 1 is irrelevant and will be stricken. The jury decides whether to believe both piece 1 and piece 2 if both are admitted into evidence.

12. Relevancy is not an inherent characteristic of any item of evidence but exists only as a relation between an item of evidence and the issues of a particular case.

13. The standard of probability under the rule is "more or less probable than it would be without the evidence." If a trier of fact could find evidence to make even the slightest difference on any disputed matter, the evidence is relevant.

14. Evidence may be relevant because it makes other evidence more understandable, thereby having at least some tendency to make facts more or less probable.

15. Relevance is not the same as sufficiency. The trial judge may find that various items of evidence are relevant and may admit them. The same trial judge may determine as a matter of law that these items could not support a verdict by a rational fact finder, and may grant judgment as a matter of law.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely relevance objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted and relevance issues will be waived. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

The basic ruling that the trial judge makes on relevance is a Rule 104(a) ruling. When a relevance objection is made, the judge does not engage in the kind of fact finding that is often required when other objections to evidence are made. The judge decides whether the evidence has any probative value. If so, it is relevant. In making a relevance ruling, the judge may want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: [Name of party] objects that this evidence is irrelevant. [Name of opposing party] contends that the evidence tends to prove [short description of fact that is made more probable or less probable]. To be relevant an item of evidence standing alone need not be sufficient to prove a fact, nor need it be more than minimally probative. Evidence is relevant if it tends to make any fact that is of consequence to the action even a little more or a little less likely. Applying this test, I find that this evidence [is or is not] relevant. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

As noted in the Key Points, above, an item of evidence may be admissible if connected to one or more additional pieces of evidence. The judge who admits evidence conditionally may want to say outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: [Name of party] objects that this evidence is irrelevant. [Name of opposing party] contends that the evidence tends to prove [short description of fact that is made more probable or less probable]. Evidence is relevant if it tends to make any fact that is of consequence to the action even a little more or a little less likely. Applying this test, I find that this evidence is relevant as long as there is also sufficient evidence for a jury to find [assert additional fact]. [Name of party] has represented that such evidence will be forthcoming, and I therefore admit [evidence to which objection was made] subject to connection. [Name of objecting party] may renew the objection and move to strike evidence if the connection is not made.

Should the judge exclude evidence as irrelevant, the party wishing to offer the evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony. The offer of proof should make clear how the excluded evidence fits the case.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence -- e.g., when a stipulation is offered -- that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence.

[1] Relevance Objection Overruled

It is for you to decide how much weight, if any, to give the evidence that is put before you. The fact that I overrule an objection does not signify in any way that the evidence is important or that you should give it any special weight.

[2] Relevance Objection to Question Sustained

Please keep in mind at all times that questions are not evidence. You must completely disregard any question that I rule to be improper, and you must not speculate about why the question was asked or what answer might have been given.

[3] Relevance Objection to Answer Sustained

You must disregard the answer that you just heard. That answer is not relevant to any of the issues that you are called upon to decide. That answer is not part of the evidence that you are to consider. Remember also that questions are not evidence. Thus, when an answer must be disregarded, so must the question that produced the answer.

[4] Stipulation of Fact

The parties have entered into an agreement, which they call a stipulation, that a certain fact is true. They agree that [insert stipulated fact]. The agreement means that no evidence of this fact will be produced. The court accepts this fact as true and instructs that you also must accept it as true.

[5] Stipulation of Testimony

The parties have entered into an agreement, which they call a stipulation, as to the testimony of a witness who will not be called to testify. The parties agree that [insert name of witness] would testify that [insert stipulation]. The parties have not agreed that this witness's testimony is true or accurate. You must decide whether you believe the stipulated testimony and how much weight to give it. It is for you to decide how important it is that you did not have the opportunity to see and hear this witness.

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
CHAPTER 4 RELEVANCE AND RELATED MATTERS

6-4 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 4-2

4-2 Prejudicial Evidence.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 403. Exclusion of Relevant Evidence on Grounds of Prejudice, Confusion, or Waste of Time

Although relevant, evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence.

[b] Key Points.

1. This is probably the rule invoked most often in support of an objection. A Rule 403 objection amounts to a claim that evidence will detract from rather than enhance the jury's ability to decide a case fairly.

2. Probative evidence that greatly helps one side will almost surely greatly hurt the other side. This is not "unfair prejudice." Unfair prejudice signifies that evidence is likely to confer an advantage or disadvantage on one side that is out of proportion to the probative value of the evidence.

3. The trial judge should consider whether a limiting instruction may ameliorate some or all of the unfair prejudice in deciding whether or not to admit or exclude evidence.

4. The trial judge may also consider the availability of other means of proof in striking a balance between admission and exclusion.

5. The trial judge may also consider admitting some but not all of the evidence offered, when it is possible to eliminate the parts most likely to result in unfair prejudice.

6. Counsel must raise a Rule 403 objection specifically, either by stating the rule by number or by articulating the basis for objection recognized under the rule. An objection that evidence is irrelevant is generally not enough to preserve a Rule 403 objection.

7. Rule 403 is one of the rules that counsel should know by number. Counsel should avoid arguing about unfair prejudice within the hearing of the jury. By mentioning Rule 403 by number and asking for an opportunity to be heard outside the jury's hearing, counsel can avoid highlighting the evidence for the jury.

8. The rule does not enumerate surprise as a ground for exclusion. The drafters assumed that a continuance would generally be an appropriate remedy. If a party does surprise an adversary unfairly, particularly when representations have been made to the court that certain issues will not be raised, the court may decide to exclude evidence on one of the grounds enumerated in Rule 403. E.g., it might be unfairly prejudicial to admit certain evidence on an issue a party indicated would not be raised and as to which the opposing party cannot reasonably respond even with a continuance.

9. Unfair prejudice is the most common complaint when Rule 403 is invoked in jury cases. But the other grounds for objection under the rule should not be overlooked: (a) confusion of the issues, (b) misleading the jury, (c) and considerations of undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence.

10. When a Rule 403 objection is made, the trial judge must weigh the harm to the proponent of excluding relevant evidence against the unfairness the evidence may work against an opposing party. Rule 403 rulings involve the sound exercise of discretion, not actual fact finding.

Rule 403 is triggered when a timely objection is made that evidence should be excluded because its prejudicial effect or other deficiency substantially outweighs its probative value. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted and relevance issues will be waived. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

The basic ruling that the trial judge makes on relevance is a Rule 104(a) ruling, since the judge is ruling on the admissibility of evidence. When a relevance/Rule 403 objection is made, the judge does not engage in the kind of fact finding that is often required when other objections to evidence are made. The judge decides what probative value the evidence has and compares that value to the possible dangers associated with the evidence. In short, the judge engages in balancing. In striking a balance, the judge may find it useful to ask the proponent of the evidence to articulate its probative value and the purposes for which it is offered and the opponent to describe the unfairness that supports the objection. Thereafter, the judge may want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: [Name of objecting party] objects that the prejudicial effect of this evidence substantially outweighs its probative value. [Name of proponent] contends that the evidence tends to prove [state the purpose for which the evidence is offered]. [Name of objecting party] identifies possible unfair prejudice in [describe claim of prejudice]. I have considered the evidence and the arguments of the parties, the extent to which other, less prejudicial evidence is or is not available, and the usefulness of limiting instructions in dealing with any prejudice problem. I also observe that all evidence is prejudicial or it would not be offered, and it is only unfair prejudice that should be of concern. Having weighed the probative value against the possible unfair prejudice, I [overrule or sustain] the objection.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence under Rule 403, the party wishing to offer the evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony. The offer of proof should make clear how the excluded evidence fits the case, and should emphasize the lack of substitute proof when none is available.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

[1] Prejudice Objection Overruled in Jury's Hearing

Counsel are required to object to questions or answers that they believe violate the rules of evidence. Objections are directed to the court, not to you, the jury. Therefore, you should pay no attention to the words used by counsel in an objection or in response to an objection. The fact that an objection was made before evidence was admitted neither increases nor decreases the importance of the evidence. Your job is to decide what weight, if any, to give any evidence that is admitted regardless of whether an objection was made at some point.

[2] Prejudice Objection to Question Sustained in Jury's Hearing

Counsel are required to object to questions or answers that they believe violate the rules of evidence. Objections are directed to the court, not to you, the jury. Therefore, you should pay no attention to the words used by counsel in an objection or in response to an objection. I have sustained an objection to the last question, and you must disregard that question.

[3] Prejudice Objection to Answer Sustained in Jury's Hearing

Counsel are required to object to questions or answers that they believe violate the rules of evidence. Objections are directed to the court, not to you, the jury. Therefore, you should pay no attention to the words used by counsel in an objection or in response to an objection. I have sustained an objection to the witness's answer, and therefore you must disregard the last answer [or the portion of the last answer that mentioned (insert name or fact)]. That answer is not part of the evidence you are permitted to consider.

CHAPTER 4 RELEVANCE AND RELATED MATTERS

6-4 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 4-3

4-3 Other Crimes, Wrongs, Acts, etc.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

(b) Relevancy conditioned on fact. -- When the relevancy of evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court shall admit it upon, or subject to, the introduction of evidence sufficient to support a finding of the fulfillment of the condition.

* * *

Rule 404. Character Evidence Not Admissible to Prove Conduct; Exceptions; Other Crimes

(b) Other crimes, wrongs, or acts. -- Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, provided that upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial.

Rule 413. Evidence of Similar Crimes in Sexual Assault Cases

(a) In a criminal case in which the defendant is accused of an offense of sexual assault, evidence of the defendant's commission of another offense or offenses of sexual assault is admissible, and may be considered for its bearing on any matter to which it is relevant.

(b) In a case in which the Government intends to offer evidence under this rule, the attorney for the Government shall disclose the evidence to the defendant, including statements of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony that is expected to be offered, at least fifteen days before the scheduled date of trial or at such later time as the court may allow for good cause.

(c) This rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.

(d) For purposes of this rule and Rule 415, "offense of sexual assault" means a crime under Federal law or the law of a State (as defined in section 513 of title 18, United States Code) that involved --

(1) any conduct proscribed by chapter 109A of title 18, United States Code;

(2) contact, without consent, between any part of the defendant's body or an object and the genitals or anus of another person;

(3) contact, without consent, between the genitals or anus of the defendant and any part of another person's body;

(4) deriving sexual pleasure or gratification from the infliction of death, bodily injury, or physical pain on another person; or

(5) an attempt or conspiracy to engage in conduct described in paragraph (1)-(4).

Rule 414. Evidence of Similar Crimes in Child Molestation Cases

(a) In a criminal case in which the defendant is accused of an offense of child molestation, evidence of the defendant's commission of another offense or offenses of child molestation is admissible, and may be considered for its bearing on any matter to which it is relevant.

(b) In a case in which the Government intends to offer evidence under this rule, the attorney for the Government shall disclose the evidence to the defendant, including statements of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony that is expected to be offered, at least fifteen days before the scheduled date of trial or at such later time as the court may allow for good cause.

(c) This rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.

(d) For purposes of this rule and Rule 415, "child" means a person below the age of fourteen, and "offense of child molestation" means a crime under Federal law or the law of a State (as defined in section 513 of title 18, United States Code) that involved --

(1) any conduct proscribed by chapter 109A of title 18, United States Code, that was committed in relation to a child;

(2) any conduct proscribed by chapter 110 of title 18, United States Code;

(3) contact between any part of the defendant's body or an object and the genitals or anus of a child;

(4) contact between the genitals or anus of the defendant and any part of the body of a child;

(5) deriving sexual pleasure or gratification from the infliction of death, bodily injury, or physical pain on a child; or

(6) an attempt or conspiracy to engage in conduct described in paragraph (1)-(5).

Rule 415. Evidence of Similar Acts in Civil Cases Concerning Sexual Assault or Child Molestation

(a) In a civil case in which a claim for damages or other relief is predicated on a party's alleged commission of conduct constituting an offense of sexual assault or child molestation, evidence of that party's commission of another offense or offenses of sexual assault or child molestation is admissible and may be considered as provided in Rule 413 and Rule 414 of these rules.

(b) A party who intends to offer evidence under this Rule shall disclose the evidence to the party against whom it will be offered, including statements of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony that is expected to be offered, at least fifteen days before the scheduled date of trial or at such later time as the court may allow for good cause.

(c) This rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 404(b) is one of the most frequently litigated rules. It establishes the basic proposition that crimes, wrongs, or acts that are not the subject of the charges in a criminal case or of the claims or defenses in a civil case often are highly prejudicial. The danger is that a trier of fact will reward or punish parties based on their general character rather than decide who did what to whom with respect to the charges, claims, or defenses.

2. The rule excludes evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts only if it is offered to show character in order to support a claim that a person acted in conformity with that character. Evidence offered for any other purpose is not excluded by Rule 404(b). Evidence offered for other purposes might be excluded as irrelevant under Rule 401 or as unduly prejudicial under Rule 403, however. Rule 404(b) does not exclude evidence that is rendered admissible by Rules 413, 414, and 415.

3. When evidence is offered for a permissible purpose, the party offering it need only satisfy the basic requirements of relevance and authentication, not a higher standard. In Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681 (1988) , the Supreme Court rejected an argument that the prosecution should have to prove other acts by clear and convincing evidence.

4. Rules 404(b), 413, 414, and 415 all contain notice provisions. Rule 404(b), which requires notice only in criminal cases, is more general in its requirements than the other three rules, all of which require a summary of the substance of testimony. Rule 404(b) is the one rule without a specific timing requirement regarding the notice. The fifteen-day requirement does not apply to Rule 404(b), although a trial judge would have the authority to impose a similar timing provision in a criminal case as part of a pretrial scheduling order.

5. A party who objects to Rule 404(b) evidence generally should consider raising relevance and Rule 403 objections in conjunction with a Rule 404(b) objection. The party who offers Rule 404(b) evidence should be prepared to explain to the court the specific purpose(s) for which the evidence is offered and how the evidence proves whatever it is offered to prove.

6. A party offering evidence under Rules 413, 414, and 415 may urge admission for any relevant purpose. This includes offering evidence to prove that a party has a propensity to act in a certain way and that the party therefore is likely to have acted as alleged in accordance with that propensity. A party offering evidence under Rules 413, 414, and 415 may offer the evidence for any purpose for which it could be used under Rule 404(b) but these additional rules do not contain the limitation on use of evidence to prove character or predisposition.

7. A party opposing evidence offered under Rules 413, 414, and 415 should consider relevance and Rule 403 objections. The plain language and legislative history of the rules could support both an argument that Rule 403 does not apply to these rules and a counter argument that it applies to these rules in the same manner it applies to other rules. Thus far, all reported decisions find Rule 403 to be applicable.

8. A party who is concerned about possible prejudice from Rule 404(b) evidence should consider "admitting" for purposes of the case or "stipulating" that an element is true and that the jury should be so instructed. If the admission or stipulation fairly gives an opposing party all that Rule 404(b) evidence would be admitted to prove, the probative value of the evidence may disappear or diminish so significantly that the possible prejudice would substantially outweigh any probative value and result in exclusion. See Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172 (1997) (error to admit proof of prior conviction to prove defendant was a convicted felon in firearms case when defendant stipulated to felony status). Stipulations or admissions are the exception, however, rather than the rule. Old Chief and lower court cases recognize that a party generally should be permitted to prove its case with robust evidence and that stipulations may result in a sterile or artificial presentation that may deprive a party of the legitimate force of its proof.

9. It is unlikely that admissions and stipulations generally will be adequate substitutes for evidence offered pursuant to Rules 413, 414, and 415. Specific acts may provide information concerning the degree or particular characteristics of a person's predisposition and may have particular value.

10. Because evidence offered to prove character under Rules 413, 414, and 415 may have tremendous influence on a jury, the nuances of prior acts and surrounding circumstances may be important. The party against whom such evidence is offered should have a full opportunity to offer evidence of surrounding circumstances. The notice requirement may be especially important with respect to this kind of evidence. The fifteen-day requirement appears to be intended to assure that there is adequate time to prepare and to gather relevant evidence.

11. Rule 404(b) evidence is offered for substantive purposes. Thus, evidence admitted under this rule goes to prove the substance of the charges, claims, or defenses to which it is relevant. Rule 404(b) should be analyzed completely apart from Rule 608(b), which permits questions about prior acts that might shed light on credibility. Rule 608(b) limits questioning to credibility, and it bars extrinsic evidence. The fact that questions might not be permissible to attack a witness under Rule 608(b) is not relevant to an analysis of whether evidence should be admitted under Rule 404(b).

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted and relevance issues will be waived. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

When evidence offered under Rule 404(b) is the subject of an objection, the trial judge will often have to make both a Rule 104(a) and a Rule 104(b) ruling. The 104(a) ruling is that evidence is offered for a proper purpose, not to prove propensity. The 104(b) ruling is whether there is sufficient evidence for a jury to find the other acts by a preponderance of the evidence. In addition to these rulings, the judge often will be faced with a Rule 403 objection.

In ruling on Rule 404(b) evidence, the judge may want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: [Name of party] objects to this evidence of other acts. Other act evidence is not admissible under Rule 404(b) to prove propensity but it is admissible to prove other matters. [Name of proponent] contends that the evidence is admissible to prove [identify purpose]. I find that this [is or is not] a permissible use of other act evidence. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

If the judge finds that it is a permissible use, the judge may want to make an additional statement for the record outside the hearing of the jury: It is not the court's role to decide whether these other acts occurred or the weight to give them. This is for the jury, provided that there is sufficient evidence for the jury to find that the acts occurred. [Name of party] has represented that such evidence will be forthcoming, and I therefore admit [evidence to which objection was made] on the basis of that representation. [Name of objecting party] may renew the objection and move to strike evidence if sufficient proof is not forthcoming.

If a Rule 403 objection is made, the judge may want to make a third statement for the record outside the hearing of the jury: [Name of objecting party] also objects that the prejudicial effect of this evidence substantially outweighs its probative value. [Name of proponent] contends that the evidence tends to prove [state the purpose for which the evidence is offered]. [Name of objecting party] identifies possible unfair prejudice in [describe claim of prejudice]. I have considered the evidence and the arguments of the parties, the extent to which other, less prejudicial evidence is or is not available, and the usefulness of limiting instructions in dealing with any prejudice problem. I also observe that all evidence is prejudicial or it would not be offered, and it is only unfair prejudice that should be of concern. Having weighed the probative value against the possible unfair prejudice, I [overrule or sustain] the objection.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request one or more statements on the record to protect the record on appeal.

When evidence is offered under Rules 413, 414, and 415, an objection often will be made under Rule 403. The statement set forth above should make an adequate record when any such objection is made.

Should the judge exclude evidence under these rules, the party wishing to offer the evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony. The offer of proof should make clear how the excluded evidence fits the case.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence.

[1] Rule 404(b) Evidence in Criminal Case

The defendant in this case is charged with having committed specific acts. The prosecution has presented evidence that the defendant committed acts other than those charged in this case. This evidence of uncharged acts is offered for a specific purpose. It is offered to prove [insert purpose -- e.g., that the defendant intended to do the acts charged, the defendant knew marijuana when he saw it, or that the defendant must have been the person who committed the acts charged because those acts and the other acts were so similar that they must have been committed by the same person]. You must decide whether you believe the prosecution's evidence and whether you find that it helps you decide whether the defendant committed the acts charged in this case. You may not use the evidence of uncharged acts for any other purpose. Your responsibility is to decide whether the prosecution proves beyond a reasonable doubt the acts charged. The defendant is on trial only for those acts and may not be held responsible in this case for any other acts.

[2] Rule 404(b) Evidence in Civil Case

The plaintiff in this case alleges that the defendant committed certain specific acts for which the plaintiff seeks to hold the defendant accountable. The defendant denies the plaintiff's allegations. The plaintiff has presented evidence that the defendant committed additional acts other than those for which the plaintiff seeks to hold the defendant accountable. This evidence of additional acts is offered for a specific purpose: to prove [insert purpose -- e.g., that the defendant intended to deny a promotion to the plaintiff because of race, the defendant intended to agree on the price to be charged for various products, or the defendant knew he was obliged to file certain reports]. You must decide whether you believe the plaintiff's evidence of additional acts and whether you find that it helps you decide whether the defendant committed the acts for which the plaintiff seeks to hold the defendant accountable. You may not use the evidence of additional acts for any other purpose.

[3] Admission or Stipulation by Defendant in Criminal Case

Ordinarily the prosecution must prove each element of every crime charged beyond a reasonable doubt. But, the defendant in this case has agreed that [insert stipulation -- e.g., drugs were sold, and whoever sold them knew that they were narcotic drugs and intended to distribute them]. This element is now conceded, and I instruct you that you must accept this element as having been conclusively established. The prosecution bears no further burden to prove this element.

[4] Rule 413 and Rule 414 Evidence in Criminal Cases

The defendant in this case is charged with having committed specific acts. The prosecution has presented evidence that the defendant committed acts other than those charged in this case. This evidence of uncharged acts is offered to prove that the defendant had a tendency to engage in similar conduct on other occasions. The evidence is also offered to prove [insert other purpose -- e.g., that the defendant intended to do the acts charged]. You must decide whether you believe the prosecution's evidence and whether you find that it helps you decide whether the defendant committed the acts charged in this case. Your responsibility is to decide whether the prosecution proves beyond a reasonable doubt the acts charged. The defendant is on trial only for those acts and may not be held responsible in this case for any other acts.

[5] Rule 415 Evidence in Civil Cases

The plaintiff in this case alleges that the defendant committed certain specific acts for which the plaintiff seeks to hold the defendant accountable. The defendant denies the plaintiff's allegations. The plaintiff has presented evidence that the defendant committed additional acts other than those for which the plaintiff seeks to hold the defendant accountable. This additional evidence is offered to prove that the defendant had a tendency to act as the plaintiff claims he acted and also to prove [insert other purpose -- e.g., that the defendant intended to do the acts alleged]. You must decide whether you believe the plaintiff's evidence of additional acts and whether you find that it helps you decide whether the defendant committed the acts for which the plaintiff seeks to hold the defendant accountable.

CHAPTER 4 RELEVANCE AND RELATED MATTERS

6-4 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 4-4

4-4 Evidence of Criminal Defendant's Character.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(a) Character evidence generally. -- Evidence of a person's character or a trait of character is not admissible for the purpose of proving action in conformity therewith on a particular occasion, except:

(1) Character of accused. -- Evidence of a pertinent trait of character offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or if evidence of a trait of character of the alleged victim of the crime is offered by an accused and admitted under Rule 404(a)(2), evidence of the same trait of character of the accused offered by the prosecution;

Rule 405. Methods of Proving Character

(a) Reputation or opinion. -- In all cases in which evidence of character or a trait of character of a person is admissible, proof may be made by testimony as to reputation or by testimony in the form of an opinion. On cross-examination, inquiry is allowable into relevant specific instances of conduct.

(b) Specific instances of conduct. -- In cases in which character or a trait of character of a person is an essential element of a charge, claim, or defense, proof may also be made of specific instances of that person's conduct.

Rule 413. Evidence of Similar Crimes in Sexual Assault Cases

(a) In a criminal case in which the defendant is accused of an offense of sexual assault, evidence of the defendant's commission of another offense or offenses of sexual assault is admissible, and may be considered for its bearing on any matter to which it is relevant.

(b) In a case in which the Government intends to offer evidence under this rule, the attorney for the Government shall disclose the evidence to the defendant, including statements of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony that is expected to be offered, at least fifteen days before the scheduled date of trial or at such later time as the court may allow for good cause.

(c) This rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.

(d) For purposes of this rule and Rule 415, "offense of sexual assault" means a crime under Federal law or the law of a State (as defined in section 513 of title 18, United States Code) that involved --

(1) any conduct proscribed by chapter 109A of title 18, United States Code;

(2) contact, without consent, between any part of the defendant's body or an object and the genitals or anus of another person;

(3) contact, without consent, between the genitals or anus of the defendant and any part of another person's body;

(4) deriving sexual pleasure or gratification from the infliction of death, bodily injury, or physical pain on another person; or

(5) an attempt or conspiracy to engage in conduct described in paragraph (1)-(4).

Rule 414. Evidence of Similar Crimes in Child Molestation Cases

(a) In a criminal case in which the defendant is accused of an offense of child molestation, evidence of the defendant's commission of another offense or offenses of child molestation is admissible, and may be considered for its bearing on any matter to which it is relevant.

(b) In a case in which the Government intends to offer evidence under this rule, the attorney for the Government shall disclose the evidence to the defendant, including statements of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony that is expected to be offered, at least fifteen days before the scheduled date of trial or at such later time as the court may allow for good cause.

(c) This rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.

(d) For purposes of this rule and Rule 415, "child" means a person below the age of fourteen, and "offense of child molestation" means a crime under Federal law or the law of a State (as defined in section 513 of title 18, United States Code) that involved --

(1) any conduct proscribed by chapter 109A of title 18, United States Code, that was committed in relation to a child;

(2) any conduct proscribed by chapter 110 of title 18, United States Code;

(3) contact between any part of the defendant's body or an object and the genitals or anus of a child;

(4) contact between the genitals or anus of the defendant and any part of the body of a child;

(5) deriving sexual pleasure or gratification from the infliction of death, bodily injury, or physical pain on a child; or

(6) an attempt or conspiracy to engage in conduct described in paragraph (1)-(5).

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 404(a) provides the defendant in a criminal case with the opportunity to offer evidence about his or her own character, or about the character of the victim. These opportunities are exceptions from the general rule that character evidence is not admissible to prove that a person acted on any given occasion in conformity with a particular character trait. Rule 404(a)(1) covers evidence of the character of the accused.

2. Rule 404(a)(1) provides that only the accused may open the door to character evidence, except when another rule provides an exception to the general ban on such evidence -- e.g., Rules 413 and 414.

3. Rule 404(a) does not state which types of evidence may be admitted. Rule 405 governs the types of evidence that may be used.

4. As a general rule, Rule 405(a) indicates that reputation or opinion evidence may be used to prove character, but not specific acts. Rule 405(a) expands the common-law rule, which had limited character evidence to reputation testimony.

5. Specific acts may be inquired into on cross-examination. The direct examiner who calls a character witness generally may not inquire into specific acts.

6. The cross-examiner who asks a character witness about specific acts is engaging in a form of examination approved by the Supreme Court in Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. 469 (1948) . When proof of character was limited to reputation evidence, cross-examiners were permitted to ask a character witness "Have you heard" questions about prior acts. Such questions remain permissible. Cross-examiners may also ask "Do you know" questions of opinion witnesses. The cross-examiner is bound by the witness's answer.

7. The rule does not so state, but courts have always insisted that there be a good-faith basis for any questions asked on cross-examination about specific acts. A good-faith basis does not necessarily mean that the cross-examiner has admissible evidence, however.

8. A character witness is limited to testifying about a pertinent trait of character. For example, in a theft case the pertinent trait would likely be honesty. In a homicide case, the pertinent trait is peaceableness or its equivalent.

9. Rule 404(a)(1) permits a prosecutor to rebut a defendant's character evidence. Such evidence might rebut the defendant's evidence about his or her own character or, if the defendant has introduced negative character evidence about the victim, the prosecution may introduce evidence showing that the defendant has the same undesirable character trait. Rebuttal evidence should be distinguished from cross-examination. A prosecutor may cross-examine a character witness about specific acts, but may not offer evidence to prove that such acts occurred. The prosecutor who wishes to prove affirmatively the defendant's pertinent trait under this Rule may call witnesses to testify only as to reputation or opinion.

10. Although the rule does not so state, because character evidence offered under Rule 404(a)(1) is offered to negate a criminal charge, the relevant time period for the character trait is the time that the crime took place. Often this will be so close in time to a trial that there is no real difference between the date of the crime and the date of the trial, but if there is a gap the reputation or opinion should relate to the date of the alleged offense rather than the date of trial.

11. Rules 413 and 414 give the prosecutor authority to offer evidence irrespective of whether the defendant opens the door to character evidence. Specific act evidence is admissible under these rules.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted and relevance issues will be waived. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

When evidence offered under Rule 404(a) is the subject of an objection, the trial judge will often have to make both a Rule 104(a) ruling as to whether the evidence relates to a relevant character trait, and a ruling under Rule 405 as to whether evidence is offered in a proper form.

In ruling on Rule 404(a) evidence, the judge may want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: [Name of party] objects to this evidence as outside the scope of Rule 404(a). The defendant in a criminal case is permitted to offer evidence of relevant character traits in reputation or opinion form. [Name of opponent] contends that the evidence is not of a relevant character trait. I find that the [insert character trait] [is or is not] a relevant character trait in a prosecution in which the defendant is charged with [describe charges]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

If the cross-examiner seeks to ask a witness questions about what the witness has heard or knows about the defendant, often a Rule 403 objection will be made by the defendant. If a Rule 403 objection is made, the judge may want to make a statement for the record outside the hearing of the jury: The defendant objects that the prejudicial effect of these questions substantially outweighs their probative value. The government contends that the cross-examination fairly tests the witness. I have considered the evidence and the arguments of the parties, the scope of the witness's direct examination, and the usefulness of limiting instructions in dealing with any prejudice problem. Having weighed the probative value of the questions for impeachment purposes against the possible unfair prejudice, I [overrule or sustain] the objection.

When evidence is offered under Rules 413 and 414, an objection often will be made under Rule 403. The trial judge may want to make a record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: The defendant objects that the prejudicial effect of this evidence substantially outweighs its probative value. The government contends that the evidence tends to prove [state the purpose for which the evidence is offered, including propensity]. The defendant identifies possible unfair prejudice in [describe claim of prejudice]. I have considered the evidence and the arguments of the parties, the extent to which other, less prejudicial evidence is or is not available, and the usefulness of limiting instructions in dealing with any prejudice problem. I also observe that all evidence is prejudicial or it would not be offered, and it is only unfair prejudice that should be of concern. Having weighed the probative value against the possible unfair prejudice, I [overrule or sustain] the objection.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer the evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony. If the judge excludes questions of a character witness on cross-examination, the cross-examiner may want to voir dire the witness and elicit answers to the questions so that a reviewing court will know the true impact of the judge's ruling.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence.

[1] Defendant Offers Favorable Character Evidence

The defendant has presented evidence of his good character for [insert trait]. It is for you to decide whether to believe this evidence and how much weight to give it. You may consider whether you believe the defendant's character for [insert trait] creates or helps to create a reasonable doubt as to guilt.

[2] Prosecutor's Rebuttal Evidence

The defendant has presented evidence of his good character for [insert trait]. The prosecutor has presented evidence to rebut the defendant's evidence. It is for you to decide whether to believe some or all of this evidence and how much weight to give it. You may consider whether you believe the defendant's character for [insert trait] creates or helps to create a reasonable doubt as to guilt.

[3] Defendant Attacks Victim

The defendant has presented evidence regarding [name of victim's] character for [insert trait]. It is for you to decide whether to believe this evidence and how much weight to give it. You may consider whether you believe the [name of victim's] character for [insert trait] creates or helps to create a reasonable doubt as to guilt.

[4] Prosecutor's Rebuttal Evidence

The defendant has presented evidence of [name of victim's] character for [insert trait]. The prosecutor has responded with evidence of the defendant's character for [insert trait]. It is for you to decide whether to believe some or all of this evidence and how much weight to give it. You may consider whether you believe any of this evidence creates or helps to create a reasonable doubt as to guilt or whether it tends to prove guilt.

[5] Cross-Examination About Specific Bad Acts -- Witness Denies Acts

Questions are not evidence. The prosecutor asked a character witness whether the witness had heard or was aware of certain things. The witness said "no." There is no evidence in this case that these things actually occurred, and you should not assume that they did. You may consider, however, the demeanor of the witness in answering questions in deciding how much weight to give the witness's testimony.

[6] Cross-Examination About Specific Events -- Witness Admits Knowledge

The defendant called a witness to testify about his good character for [insert trait]. On cross-examination the witness said that she heard or knew about certain things that the prosecution claims cast doubt on the defendant's character for [insert trait]. It is for you to decide how much weight to give the witness's testimony, and you may consider the fact that the witness said that she heard or knew certain things in making your decision.

[7] Rule 413 and Rule 414 Evidence in Criminal Cases

The defendant in this case is charged with having committed specific acts. The prosecution has presented evidence that the defendant committed acts other than those charged in this case. This evidence of uncharged acts is offered to prove that the defendant had a tendency to engage in similar conduct on other occasions. The evidence is also offered to prove [insert other purpose -- e.g., that the defendant intended to do the acts charged]. You must decide whether you believe the prosecution's evidence and whether you find that it helps you decide whether the defendant committed the acts charged in this case. Your responsibility is to decide whether the prosecution proves beyond a reasonable doubt the acts charged. The defendant is on trial only for those acts and may not be held responsible in this case for any other acts.

CHAPTER 4 RELEVANCE AND RELATED MATTERS

6-4 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 4-5

4-5 Evidence of the Victim's Character -- Criminal Case.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 404. Character Evidence Not Admissible to Prove Conduct; Exceptions; Other Crimes

(a) Character evidence generally. -- Evidence of a person's character or a trait of character is not admissible for the purpose of proving action in conformity therewith on a particular occasion, except:

(1) Character of accused. -- Evidence of a pertinent trait of character offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or if evidence of a trait of character of the alleged victim of the crime is offered by an accused and admitted under Rule 404(a)(2), evidence of the same trait of character of the accused offered by the prosecution;

* * *

(2) Character of victim. -- Evidence of a pertinent trait of character of the victim of the crime offered by an accused,

orby the prosecution to rebut the same, or evidence of a character trait of peacefulness of the victim offered by the prosecution in a homicide case to rebut evidence that the victim was the first aggressor;

* * *

Rule 412. Sex Offense Cases; Relevance of Alleged Victim's Past Sexual Behavior or Alleged Sexual Predisposition

(a) Evidence generally inadmissible. -- The following evidence is not admissible in any civil or criminal proceeding involving alleged sexual misconduct except as provided in subdivisions (b) and (c):

(1) evidence offered to prove that any alleged victim engaged in other sexual behavior.

(2) evidence offered to prove any alleged victim's sexual predisposition.

(b) Exceptions. --

(1) In a criminal case, the following evidence is admissible, if otherwise admissible under these rules:

(A) evidence of specific instances of sexual behavior offered to prove that a person other than the accused was the source of semen, injury, or other physical evidence;

(B) evidence of specific instances of sexual behavior by the alleged victim with respect to the person accused of the sexual misconduct offered by the accused to prove consent or by the prosecution; and

(C) evidence the exclusion of which would violate the constitutional rights of the defendant.

* * *

(c) Procedure to determine admissibility. --

(1) A party intending to offer evidence under subdivision (b) must:

(A) file a written motion at least 14 days before trial specifically describing the evidence and stating the purpose for which it is offered unless the court, for good cause requires a different time for filing or permits filing during trial; and

(B) serve the motion on all parties and notify the alleged victim or, when appropriate, the alleged victim's guardian or representative.

(2) Before admitting evidence under this rule the court must conduct a hearing in camera and afford the victim and parties a right to attend and be heard. The motion, related papers, and the record of the hearing must be sealed and remain under seal unless the court orders otherwise.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 404(a)(2) provides the defendant in a criminal case with the right to offer character evidence as to a pertinent character trait of a victim. The rule is overridden, however, in sexual misconduct cases by Rule 412, the federal rape shield rule.

2. Rule 404(a)(2) does not indicate the kinds of evidence that may be used to prove character. Rule 405(a) provides that reputation and opinion evidence may be used to prove a pertinent character trait.

3. A cross-examiner may ask "Have you heard" or "Do you know" questions to test the knowledge of a character witness. The cross-examiner must have a good-faith basis for questions and is bound by the witness's answer.

4. A character witness is limited to testifying about a pertinent trait of character. In most cases, it is unlikely that a victim's character trait will be relevant. The most typical case in which it is relevant is a self-defense case. In such a case, the pertinent trait is peaceableness or its equivalent.

5. Rule 404(a)(2) permits a prosecutor to rebut a defendant's character evidence. Rebuttal evidence may include both favorable evidence regarding the pertinent trait of the victim that was attacked by the defendant's evidence and negative evidence regarding the defendant's character for the same trait. Rebuttal evidence should be distinguished from cross-examination. A prosecutor may cross-examine a character witness about specific acts, but may not offer evidence to prove that such acts occurred. The prosecutor who wishes to prove affirmatively that the victim's pertinent trait is different from the trait claimed by the defendant may call witnesses to testify only as to reputation or opinion.

6. Rule 404(a)(2) gives the prosecution the affirmative right to offer character evidence regarding a victim in a homicide case if the defendant alleges that the victim was the first aggressor. This right of the prosecutor to rebut the defendant's allegation does not depend upon the defendant's actually offering evidence of character. It is the allegation that provides the right of the prosecution to offer evidence. The prosecutor may not respond, however, to a claim that the victim was the first aggressor by attacking the defendant's character; unless the defendant has offered character evidence the prosecution's rebuttal right does not arise.

7. Although the rule does not so state, because character evidence offered under Rule 404(a)(2) is offered to negate a criminal charge, the relevant time period for the character trait is the time that the crime took place. Often this will be so close in time to a trial that there is no real difference between the date of the crime and the date of the trial, but if there is a gap the reputation or opinion should relate to the date the alleged offense occurred rather than the date of trial.

8. In cases in which the defendant is charged with sexual misconduct, reputation and opinion evidence are not admissible to prove the character of the victim, unless the Constitution requires admission of such evidence. Evidence of specific acts is admissible in sexual misconduct cases under the circumstances specified in Rule 412.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted and issues arising under these rules will be waived. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

When evidence offered under Rule 404(a) is the subject of an objection, the trial judge will often have to make both a Rule 104(a) ruling as to whether the evidence relates to a relevant character trait, and a ruling under Rule 405 as to whether evidence is offered in a proper form.

In ruling on Rule 404(a) evidence, the judge may want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: [Name of party] objects to this evidence as outside the scope of Rule 404(a). The defendant in a criminal case is permitted to offer evidence of relevant character traits of a victim in reputation or opinion form. [Name of opponent] contends that the evidence is not of a relevant character trait. I find that the [insert character trait] [is or is not] a relevant character trait in a prosecution in which the defendant is charged with [describe charges]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

In cases in which the defendant is charged with sexual misconduct, the judge must look to Rule 412, which excludes by implication reputation and opinion evidence concerning the sexual behavior or predisposition of the victim, unless such evidence is necessary to protect the constitutional right of a defendant to put on a defense. The judge will want to indicate for the record outside the hearing of the jury the section of Rule 412 that permits a defendant to offer specific act evidence, and to indicate whether the notice requirement of the rule has been satisfied.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request one or more statements on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence.

[1] Defendant Offers Character Evidence

The defendant has presented evidence of [name of victim's] character for [insert trait]. It is for you to decide whether to believe this evidence and how much weight to give it. You may consider whether you believe this evidence creates or helps to create a reasonable doubt as to guilt.

[2] Prosecutor's Rebuttal Evidence Regarding Victim

The defendant has presented evidence of [name of victim's] character for [insert trait]. The prosecutor has presented evidence to rebut the defendant's evidence. It is for you to decide whether to believe some or all of this evidence and how much weight to give it. You may consider whether you believe the evidence creates or helps to create a reasonable doubt as to guilt.

[3] Prosecutor's Rebuttal Evidence Regarding Defendant

The defendant has presented evidence of [name of victim's] character for [insert trait]. The prosecutor has responded with evidence of the defendant's character for [insert trait]. It is for you to decide whether to believe some or all of this evidence and how much weight to give it. You may consider whether you believe any of this evidence creates or helps to create a reasonable doubt as to guilt or whether it tends to prove guilt.

[4] Prosecutor's Rebuttal Evidence Regarding Both Victim and Defendant

The defendant has presented evidence of [name of victim's] character for [insert trait]. The prosecutor has responded with evidence regarding both [name of victim's] and the defendant's character for [insert trait]. It is for you to decide whether to believe some or all of this evidence and how much weight to give it. You may consider whether you believe any of this evidence creates or helps to create a reasonable doubt as to guilt or whether it tends to prove guilt.

[5] Cross-Examination About Specific Bad Acts -- Witness Denies Acts

Questions are not evidence. The prosecutor asked a character witness whether the witness had heard or was aware of certain things. The witness said "no." There is no evidence in this case that these things actually occurred, and you should not assume that they did. You may consider, however, the demeanor of the witness in answering questions in deciding how much weight to give the witness's testimony.

[6] Cross-Examination About Specific Events -- Witness Admits Knowledge

The defendant called a witness to testify about [name of victim's] character for [insert trait]. On cross-examination the witness said that he heard or knew about certain things that the prosecution claims cast doubt on the witness's testimony. It is for you to decide how much weight to give the witness's testimony, and you may consider the fact that the witness said that he heard or knew certain things in making your decision.

[7] Prosecutor's Evidence of Victim's Character in Homicide Case

The prosecutor has presented evidence concerning [name of victim's] character for peaceableness. You must decide whether to believe this evidence and how much weight to give it. You may consider this evidence as you decide whether [name of victim] started the incident that led to the killing, and for no other purpose.

[8] Defense Rebuts Prosecution Evidence

The prosecutor has presented evidence concerning [name of victim's] character for peaceableness. The defendant has presented evidence to rebut the prosecution's evidence. It is for you to decide whether to believe some or all of this evidence and how much weight to give it. You may consider this evidence as you decide whether [name of victim] started the incident that led to the killing, and for no other purpose.

[9] Rule 412 Evidence -- Prior Relationship with Defendant

The defendant has presented evidence concerning his relationship with [name of victim] prior to the sexual misconduct with which the defendant is charged. It is for you to decide whether to believe this evidence and how much weight to give it. You may consider this evidence in deciding only whether [name of victim] consented to the defendant's actions. The fact that two people had a sexual relationship or voluntarily engaged in sexual relations with each other at one time does not excuse or justify conduct that is otherwise criminal.

[10] Rule 412 Evidence -- Source of Semen or Injury

The defendant has presented evidence that [name of victim] engaged in sexual conduct prior to the sexual misconduct with which the defendant is charged. It is for you to decide whether to believe this evidence and how much weight to give it. You may consider this evidence in deciding only whether any prior sexual conduct by [name of victim] explains the injury [or accounts for the semen] that existed after the sexual misconduct with which the defendant is charged. The fact that a person might have voluntarily engaged in sexual relations with one person does not excuse or justify conduct by another that is otherwise criminal.

4-6 Defendant's Character -- Civil Case.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 404. Character Evidence Not Admissible to Prove Conduct; Exceptions; Other Crimes

(a) Character evidence generally. -- Evidence of a person's character or a trait of character is not admissible for the purpose of proving action in conformity therewith on a particular occasion, * * *.

Rule 415. Evidence of Similar Acts in Civil Cases Concerning Sexual Assault or Child Molestation

(a) In a civil case in which a claim for damages or other relief is predicated on a party's alleged commission of conduct constituting an offense of sexual assault or child molestation, evidence of that party's commission of another offense or offenses of sexual assault or child molestation is admissible and may be considered as provided in Rule 413 and Rule 414 of these rules.

(b) A party who intends to offer evidence under this Rule shall disclose the evidence to the party against whom it will be offered, including statements of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony that is expected to be offered, at least fifteen days before the scheduled date of trial or at such later time as the court may allow for good cause.

(c) This rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.

[b] Key Points.

1. The defendant in a civil case, unlike the defendant in a criminal case, generally is not permitted to offer evidence of good character to cast doubt on allegations of misconduct brought by a plaintiff. Some courts may create an exception for "quasi-criminal" cases, but in most civil cases the general exclusionary rule set forth in Rule 404(a) will govern a defendant's evidence.

2. In cases in which the plaintiff claims sexual assault or child molestation as the basis for liability, the plaintiff is entitled under Rule 415 to offer evidence of other instances of sexual molestation or sexual assault.

3. Rule 415 is somewhat unclear as to whether instances of sexual assault can be offered when child molestation forms the basis of the civil suit, or whether instances of child molestation can be shown when sexual assault forms the basis of the civil suit. Since child molestation and sexual assault may involve similar conduct, an argument can be made that they are similar acts and should be treated similarly. Alternatively, a court may examine the similarity of the acts in each case. The court may have to make a case-by-case determination if an objection is made under Rule 403.

4. Counsel objecting to evidence should be permitted to raise relevance objections. Nothing in Rule 415 purports to authorize admission of irrelevant evidence.

5. The fifteen-day notice requirement appears to be a minimum requirement. It does not excuse a party from discovery obligations that may be imposed by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted and issues arising under these Rules will be waived. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

When evidence is offered under Rule 415, an objection often will be made under Rule 403. The trial judge may want to make a statement outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: The defendant objects that the prejudicial effect of this evidence substantially outweighs its probative value. The plaintiff contends that the evidence tends to prove [state the purpose for which the evidence is offered, including propensity]. The defendant identifies possible unfair prejudice in [describe claim of prejudice]. I have considered the evidence and the arguments of the parties, the extent to which other, less prejudicial evidence is or is not available, and the usefulness of limiting instructions in dealing with any prejudice problem. I also observe that all evidence is prejudicial or it would not be offered, and it is only unfair prejudice that should be of concern. Having weighed the probative value against the possible unfair prejudice, I [overrule or sustain] the objection.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer the evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof.

The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence.

[1] Rule 415 Evidence Offered by Plaintiff

The plaintiff in this case alleges that the defendant committed certain specific acts for which the plaintiff seeks to hold the defendant liable. The plaintiff also has presented evidence that the defendant committed acts other than those alleged in the complaint. It is for you to decide whether to believe this evidence and what weight to give it. These other acts are offered to prove that the defendant had a tendency to engage in similar conduct on other occasions. The evidence is also offered to prove [insert other purpose -- e.g., that the defendant intended to do the acts charged]. You must decide whether you believe the plaintiff's evidence and whether you find that it helps you decide whether the defendant committed the acts alleged in this case. Your responsibility is to decide whether the plaintiff proves by a preponderance of the evidence the specific acts alleged in the complaint. The plaintiff seeks to hold the defendant responsible only for these specific acts.

[2] Rebuttal Evidence Offered by Defendant

The defendant has offered evidence to rebut the plaintiff's claim that the defendant committed acts other than those alleged in the complaint. It is for you to decide whether to believe this evidence and what weight to give it.

[a] Governing Rules.

* * *

Rule 404. Character Evidence Not Admissible to Prove Conduct; Exceptions; Other Crimes

(a) Character evidence generally. -- Evidence of a person's character or a trait of character is not admissible for the purpose of proving action in conformity therewith on a particular occasion, * * *.

* * *

Rule 412. Sex Offense Cases; Relevance of Alleged Victim's Past Sexual Behavior or Alleged Sexual Predisposition

(a) Evidence generally inadmissible. -- The following evidence is not admissible in any civil or criminal proceeding involving alleged sexual misconduct except as provided in subdivisions (b) and (c):

(1) evidence offered to prove that any alleged victim engaged in other sexual behavior.

(2) evidence offered to prove any alleged victim's sexual predisposition.

(b) Exceptions. --

* * *

(2) In a civil case, evidence offered to prove the sexual behavior or sexual predisposition of any alleged victim is admissible if it is otherwise admissible under these rules and its probative value substantially outweighs the danger of harm to any victim and of unfair prejudice to any party. Evidence of an alleged victim's reputation is admissible only if it has been placed in controversy by the alleged victim.

(c) Procedure to determine admissibility. --

(1) A party intending to offer evidence under subdivision (b) must:

(A) file a written motion at least 14 days before trial specifically describing the evidence and stating the purpose for which it is offered unless the court, for good cause requires a different time for filing or permits filing during trial; and

(B) serve the motion on all parties and notify the alleged victim or, when appropriate, the alleged victim's guardian or representative.

(2) Before admitting evidence under this rule the court must conduct a hearing in camera and afford the victim and parties a right to attend and be heard. The motion, related papers, and the record of the hearing must be sealed and remain under seal unless the court orders otherwise.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 404(a) generally precludes the use of character evidence to prove a pertinent character trait of an alleged victim in a civil case. Rule 412 effectively bars reputation or opinion evidence from ever being used in a case involving sexual misconduct, even if such evidence might be relevant under another rule.

2. Nothing in Rule 404(a) precludes a defendant from relying on Rule 404(b).

3. Since Rule 412 permits use of a victim's prior sexual conduct with a defendant to prove consent or with others to prove the source of semen or injury in a criminal case, it is likely that the same evidence would be admissible in a civil case.

4. The balancing test under Rule 412(b)(2) requires that the probative value outweigh the danger both of harm to the victim and of prejudice to a party.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted and issues arising under these Rules will be waived. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

When evidence is offered under Rule 412, an objection can be expected that the probative value does not substantially outweigh the danger of harm to the victim and prejudice to the plaintiff. The trial judge may want to make a statement outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: The defendant offers evidence concerning the sexual behavior or propensity of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff objects that the probative value of this evidence does not substantially outweigh the danger of harm to the plaintiff and prejudice to the plaintiff's case. The defendant contends that the evidence tends to prove [state the purpose for which the evidence is offered, including propensity]. The plaintiff identifies [state harm to plaintiff personally] and identifies possible unfair prejudice in [describe claim of prejudice to plaintiff's case]. I have considered the evidence and the arguments of the parties, the extent to which other, less prejudicial evidence is or is not available, the degree to which the plaintiff might be harmed by this testimony, whether it is possible to limit the detail of the testimony, and the usefulness of limiting instructions in dealing with any prejudice problem. Having weighed the probative value against the possible harm to the plaintiff and the danger of unfair prejudice to the plaintiff's case, and recognizing that the probative value must substantially outweigh both the danger of harm to the plaintiff or of prejudice to the plaintiff's case, I [overrule or sustain] the objection.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the defendant should be certain to make an offer of proof. The defendant should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the defendant may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony. If the judge excludes the evidence in whole or in part on the basis of harm to the victim no voir dire of the victim would seem appropriate.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

[1] Rule 412 Evidence -- Prior Relationship with Defendant

The defendant has presented evidence concerning his relationship with [name of victim] prior to the sexual misconduct alleged in the complaint. It is for you to decide whether to believe this evidence and how much weight to give it. You may consider this evidence in deciding only whether [name of victim] consented to the defendant's actions. The fact that two people had a sexual relationship or voluntarily engaged in sexual relations with each other at one time does not excuse or justify conduct that is otherwise criminal.

[2] Rule 412 Evidence -- Source of Semen or Injury

The defendant has presented evidence that [name of victim] engaged in sexual conduct prior to the sexual misconduct alleged in the complaint. It is for you to decide whether to believe this evidence and how much weight to give it. You may consider this evidence in deciding only whether any prior sexual conduct by [name of victim] explains the injury [or accounts for the semen] that existed after the sexual misconduct alleged in the complaint. The fact that a person might have voluntarily engaged in sexual relations with one person does not excuse or justify conduct by another that is illegal.

Rule 406. Habit; Routine Practice

Evidence of the habit of a person or of the routine practice of an organization, whether corroborated or not and regardless of the presence of eyewitnesses, is relevant to prove that the conduct of the person or organization on a particular occasion was in conformity with the habit or routine practice.

[b] Key Points.

1. Habit evidence and evidence of business custom are admissible in both civil and criminal cases. The rules distinguish between character evidence, which usually is not admissible, and habit evidence, which usually is admissible.

2. Generally, habit or custom assumes that an action or practice was done on a number of occasions and that it was typically done in a particular way.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

Rule 406 is triggered when a timely objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted and issues arising under these Rules will be waived. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

When an objection is made that evidence does not qualify as habit or business custom, the trial judge may find it useful to state outside the hearing of the jury the following: [Name of objecting party] objects that the evidence does not qualify as [habit or business custom] evidence. In deciding whether a practice is more than character evidence and can be fairly characterized as habit or business custom, it is important for a court to determine whether there is evidence of a routine which indicates that the same practice occurs on a regular basis. I have examined the evidence of the total number of occasions on which [name of person or organization with habit or custom] was observed and the number of times the practice alleged to be [habit or custom] was observed. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the evidence [is or is not] sufficient to constitute [habit or business custom]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the defendant should be certain to make an offer of proof. The defendant should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the defendant may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

[1] Habit Evidence

Evidence has been offered that [name of person] had a habit of doing [describe action]. You may, but are not required to, infer that a person acted in conformity with a habit. It is for you to decide whether to believe this evidence and what weight to give it.

[2] Business Custom

Evidence has been offered that [name of person or business] had a habit or custom of doing [describe action]. You may, but are not required to, infer that a person or business acted in conformity with a habit or custom. It is for you to decide whether to believe this evidence and what weight to give it.

4-9 Subsequent Remedial Measures.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 407. Subsequent Remedial Measures

When, after an injury or harm allegedly caused by an event, measures are taken that, if taken previously, would have made the injury or harm less likely to occur, evidence of the subsequent measures is not admissible to prove negligence, culpable conduct, a defect in a product, a defect in a product's design, or a need for a warning or instruction. This rule does not require the exclusion of evidence of subsequent measures when offered for another purpose, such as proving ownership, control, or feasibility of precautionary measures, if controverted, or impeachment.

[b] Key Points.

1. This rule bars the admission of subsequent remedial measures or repairs to prove negligence or culpable conduct prior to the taking of the subsequent measures or repairs. The rule does not bar evidence of subsequent remedial measures if offered for another purpose.

2. Rule 407 is an absolute bar on admission of subsequent remedial measures offered to prove negligence, product defect, the need for a product warning or instruction, or culpable conduct. No balancing occurs when evidence is offered for a forbidden purpose and a proper objection is made.

3. Evidence offered for a permissible purpose may not be relevant, or if relevant, may be unduly prejudicial, especially where a jury might use it for a forbidden purpose. Thus, a party objecting to Rule 407 evidence often will raise Rule 401 (relevance) and Rule 403 (unduly prejudicial) objections as well.

4. If ownership, control, feasibility, and similar issues are not disputed, the subsequent remedial evidence is unlikely to be relevant and is likely to be unduly prejudicial.

5. Although almost all cases involving Rule 407 are civil cases, Rule 407 on its face is not limited to civil cases. Evidence offered to prove culpable conduct in a criminal case would appear to be within the literal coverage of the rule.

6. Most courts have held that Rule 407 does not apply to repairs by a non-party. However, such repairs may raise relevance and prejudice concerns.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

Rule 407 is triggered when a timely objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted and issues arising under these Rules will be waived. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

The judge rules on the admissibility of Rule 407 evidence under Rule 104(a). In making a ruling the trial judge may find it useful to state outside the hearing of the jury the following: [Name of objecting party] objects to the admissibility of this evidence claiming that it is evidence of a subsequent remedial measure. The decision whether evidence is a subsequent remedial measure is for the court under Rule 104(a). I find that [describe evidence] [is or is not] evidence of a subsequent remedial measure that falls under Rule 407. But [name of proffering party] argues that the evidence is not offered to prove [state forbidden purpose -- e.g., negligence, culpable conduct, product defect, need for a warning] but is offered to prove [state permissible purpose -- e.g., feasibility]. Thus, it is necessary to determine whether [identify permissible purpose -- e.g., feasibility] is in dispute. I find that it [is or is not] in dispute and that the evidence therefore [may or may not] be admitted on this issue. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

If the judge rules that the evidence is offered for a permissible purpose, the objecting party or the judge sua sponte may raise Rule 403. The judge may want to make an explicit statement for the record in regard to Rule 403 balancing: I have also considered the possibility that evidence admitted for a limited purpose might be misused by the jury as proof of [state forbidden purpose -- e.g., negligence, culpable conduct, product defect, need for a warning]. I have weighed the probative value of the evidence as to [identify permissible purpose -- e.g., feasibility] against the possible prejudicial effect of the evidence. I have also considered the extent to which other, less prejudicial evidence is or is not available, and the usefulness of limiting instructions in dealing with any prejudice problem. I find that the possible prejudicial effect of this evidence [does or does not] substantially outweigh its probative value. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party who offered it should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

[1] Evidence Admitted for Limited Purpose -- Negligence Case

The plaintiff has presented evidence that after the accident the defendant [describe the subsequent measures]. This evidence has been admitted for a limited purpose, to prove [that the defendant had control of the premises, that an action was feasible, etc.]. You may only use this evidence for the limited purpose I have described. The issue in a negligence case such as this is whether the defendant exercised due care prior to the accident. What people do after an accident when they are aware of a problem is not evidence of whether they exercised due care before they were aware of the results of the accident.

[2] Evidence Admitted for Limited Purpose -- Product Liability Case

The plaintiff has presented evidence that after the accident the defendant [describe the subsequent measures]. This evidence has been admitted for a limited purpose, to prove [that the defendant had control of the premises, that an action was feasible, etc.]. You may only use this evidence for the limited purpose I have described. The issue in a product liability case such as this is whether the defendant [manufactured or sold] a product that was defective at the time it was [manufactured or sold], not whether the product was changed at a later time.

[3] Third Party Repair -- Negligence Case

The plaintiff has presented evidence that [name of third party] made a [describe subsequent remedial measure] after the accident. This evidence has been admitted for a limited purpose, to prove [that an action was feasible, etc.]. You may only use this evidence for the limited purpose I have described. The issue in a negligence case such as this is whether the defendant exercised due care prior to the accident. What a third party person does after an accident when he or she is aware of a problem is not evidence of whether the defendant exercised due care before being aware of the results of the accident.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 408. Compromise and Offers to Compromise

Evidence of (1) furnishing or offering or promising to furnish, or (2) accepting or offering or promising to accept, a valuable consideration in compromising or attemptingto compromise a claim which was disputed as to either validity or amount, is not admissible to prove liability for or invalidity of the claim or its amount. Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible. This rule does not require the exclusion of any evidence otherwise discoverable merely because it is presented in the course of compromise negotiations. This rule also does not require exclusion when the evidence is offered for another purpose, such as proving bias or prejudice of a witness, negativing a contention of undue delay, or proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 408 applies to evidence that a person has offered or accepted a valuable consideration as part of an attempt to settle a case. The basic rule is that offers to settle or actual settlements are not admissible to prove liability for or invalidity of a claim, or the amount of a claim.

2. Statements made in settlement negotiations are not admissible for the prohibited purposes, whether or not they are inextricably bound up in a settlement proposal. Similarly, conduct during settlement negotiations also is not admissible for the prohibited purposes.

3. Settlements and offers to settle can be used for purposes other than to prove liability for, invalidity of, or the amount of a claim. The most common example is the use of a settlement by a witness with a party to demonstrate the possible bias of the witness.

4. Rule 408 makes clear that a party cannot immunize otherwise discoverable material by disclosing it in settlement discussions.

5. Several appellate decisions hold that settlements in civil cases are admissible in subsequent criminal prosecutions.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

Rule 408 is triggered when a timely objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted and issues arising under these Rules will be waived. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

The judge rules on the admissibility of Rule 408 evidence under Rule 104(a). In making a ruling the trial judge may find it useful to state outside the hearing of the jury the following: [Name of objecting party] objects to the admissibility of this evidence claiming that it is evidence of an offer to compromise. The decision whether evidence falls under Rule 408, the offer of compromise rule, is for the court under Rule 104(a). I find that [describe evidence] [is or is not] evidence of an offer to compromise or compromise negotiations that falls under Rule 408.

If the judge finds that the evidence is not evidence of an offer to compromise, the objection will be overruled and no further finding will be required. If, however, the judge finds that the evidence falls within Rule 408, the judge may want to make another on the record ruling: [Name of proffering party] argues that the evidence is not offered to prove [state forbidden purpose -- e.g., validity or invalidity of a claim or its amount] but is offered to prove [state permissible purpose -- e.g., bias]. Thus, it is necessary to determine whether [identify permissible purpose -- e.g., bias] is in dispute. I find that it [is or is not] in dispute and that the evidence therefore [may or may not] be admitted on this issue. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

If the judge rules that the evidence is offered for a permissible purpose, the objecting party or the judge sua sponte may raise Rule 403. The judge may want to make an explicit statement for the record in regard to Rule 403 balancing: I have also considered the possibility that evidence admitted for a limited purpose might be misused by the jury as proof of [state forbidden purpose -- e.g., validity or invalidity of a claim or its amount]. I have weighed the probative value of the evidence as to [identify permissible purpose -- e.g., bias] against the possible prejudicial effect of the evidence. I have also considered the extent to which other, less prejudicial evidence is or is not available, and the usefulness of limiting instructions in dealing with any prejudice problem. I find that the possible prejudicial effect [does or does not] substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

If evidence of a civil settlement is offered in a criminal case, the trial judge may want to make an explicit statement for the record in regard to Rule 403 balancing: The government has offered evidence that [name of defendant] entered into a civil settlement to prove [identify purpose of evidence -- e.g., that the defendant was aware of the substance of the regulations alleged to have been violated in this case]. A civil settlement is not excluded in a criminal case by Rule 408. [Name of defendant] objects, however, that the settlement evidence might be given undue weight by the jury. I have considered the possibility that the settlement might be mistaken by the jury as an admission of wrongdoing. I have weighed the probative value of the evidence against the possible prejudicial effect of the evidence. I have also considered the extent to which other, less prejudicial evidence is or is not available, and the usefulness of limiting instructions in dealing with any prejudice problem. I find that the possible prejudicial effect [does or does not] substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party who offered it should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

[1] Limiting Instruction -- Settlement by a Witness with Party to Show Bias

Evidence has been presented that [name of witness] entered into a settlement with [the plaintiff or the defendant]. You may consider this evidence only in deciding whether as a result of the settlement the witness is or might be biased for one side or against the other. The fact that a party settles with someone who is called as a witness is not evidence of the validity or invalidity of the claims made by the plaintiff, the defenses raised by the defendant, or the amount that should be awarded on any claim that succeeds.

[2] Settlement by Party After Trial Begins

Evidence has been presented that [name of witness] entered into a settlement with [the plaintiff or the defendant]. As you know, [name of witness] originally was a [plaintiff or defendant] in this trial. You may consider the evidence that [name of witness] has reached an agreement with the [plaintiff or defendant] only in deciding whether as a result of the settlement the witness is or might be biased for one side or against the other. The fact that a party settles with someone who once was an adverse party in the case is not evidence of the validity or invalidity of the claims made by the plaintiff, the defenses raised by the defendant, or the amount that should be awarded on any claim that succeeds.

[3] Settlement Admitted in Criminal Case

Evidence has been presented that [name of defendant] entered into a settlement with [name of other party in civil case]. You may consider this evidence in deciding whether [name of defendant] committed the [name offense(s) to which the settlement is relevant] in this case. There are many reasons why parties choose to settle cases. Parties may want to avoid the uncertainty of a trial, to avoid the costs of a trial, to resolve a dispute in a cooperative rather than combative way, to foster future relations with the opposing party, or to achieve other goals. You should consider the substance of the settlement as well as any other evidence that may be presented regarding the circumstances of the settlement in deciding what weight, if any, to give the settlement in this case.

* * *

Rule 409. Payment of Medical and Similar Expenses

Evidence of furnishing or offering or promising to pay medical, hospital, or similar expenses occasioned by an injury is not admissible to prove liability for the injury.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 409 renders inadmissible evidence of a party's offering or providing medical, hospital or similar expenses to an injured person when such evidence is offered to prove liability for the injury.

2. Evidence offered for a purpose other than to prove liability for the injury on behalf of which payments were offered or made is not excluded under Rule 409. Such evidence might be excluded as irrelevant under Rule 402 or as unduly prejudicial or confusing under Rule 403.

3. Although Rule 409 is usually applied in civil cases, there is nothing on the face of the rule to limit it to civil cases.

4. In contrast to Rule 408, statements that are made or conduct that occurs in connection with the offer or payment of expenses are not rendered inadmissible by Rule 409. Statements or conduct could be excluded under Rule 403, however.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

Rule 409 is triggered when a timely objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted and relevance issues will be waived. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

The judge rules on the admissibility of Rule 409 evidence under Rule 104(a). In making a ruling the trial judge may find it useful to state outside the hearing of the jury the following: [Name of objecting party] objects to the admissibility of this evidence claiming that it is evidence that is excluded by Rule 409. The decision whether evidence falls under Rule 409, which covers offers to pay medical and other expenses, is for the court under Rule 104(a). I find that [describe evidence] [is or is not] evidence of the type of offer that falls under Rule 409. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party who offered it should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

[1] Evidence of Statement Made at Time a Payment Is Offered

The only evidence you may consider is the statement itself. You may not consider the fact that the defendant offered to pay medical expenses in deciding whether the defendant is responsible for the plaintiff's injury. The law encourages parties who may be entirely without fault to be generous in dealing with persons who suffer injury. Thus, the payment or offer to pay a plaintiff's medical expenses is not an admission of fault. However, the plaintiff has presented evidence that the defendant made a statement at the time he/she offered to pay the medical expenses. It is for you to decide whether to believe that the statement was made and how much weight to give it.

[2] Evidence of Payment Offered for Other Purpose

The plaintiff has presented evidence that the defendant offered to pay the plaintiff's medical expenses after the plaintiff was injured. You may not consider the fact that the defendant offered to pay medical expenses in deciding whether the defendant is responsible for the plaintiff's injury. The law encourages parties who may be entirely without fault to be generous in dealing with persons who suffer injury. Thus, the offer to pay a plaintiff's medical expenses is not an admission of fault by the defendant. The defendant has presented evidence that the plaintiff did not complain about any injury at or near the time the plaintiff claims it occurred. It is for you to decide whether to believe this evidence and how much weight to give it. You may consider any offer that the defendant made to the plaintiff in evaluating what weight to give the fact that the plaintiff did not complain about the injury at or near the time it occurred.

Rule 410. Inadmissibility of Plea Discussions, and Related Statements

Except as otherwise provided in this rule, evidence of the following is not, in any civil or criminal proceeding, admissible against the defendant who made the plea or was a participant in the plea discussions:

(1) a plea of guilty which was later withdrawn;

(2) a plea of nolo contendere;

(3) any statement made in the course of any proceedings under Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure or comparable state procedure regarding either of the foregoing pleas; or

(4) any statement made in the course of plea discussions with an attorney for the prosecuting authority which do not result in a plea of guilty or which result in a plea of guilty later withdrawn.

However, such a statement is admissible (i) in any proceeding wherein another statement made in the course of the same plea or plea discussions has been introduced and the statement ought in fairness to be considered contemporaneously with it, or (ii) in a criminal proceeding for perjury or false statement if the statement was made by the defendant under oath, on the record and in the presence of counsel.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 410 generally excludes all evidence of withdrawn pleas of guilty, pleas of nolo contendere, any statements made in course of a plea colloquy in connection with either a withdrawn plea of guilty or a nolo contendere plea, or any statement made in the course of plea discussions with an attorney for the government. The rule renders evidence inadmissible "against the defendant who made the plea or was a participant in the plea discussions."

2. Rule 410 distinguishes between guilty and nolo pleas. Guilty pleas and statements made in connection therewith are admissible unless the pleas are withdrawn. Nolo pleas and statements made in connection therewith are not. Judgments of conviction entered pursuant to a nolo plea may be admissible under other rules like Rule 609.

3. Statements made in discussions with police, FBI, and law enforcement are generally subjected to constitutional scrutiny but are not governed by Rule 410, which is limited to discussions with an attorney for the prosecuting authority.

4. The Supreme Court in United States v. Mezzanatto, 115 S. Ct. 797 (1995) , held that a defendant may waive the protection of Rule 410 and agree that statements made in plea negotiations shall be admissible for impeachment purposes if no plea agreement is reached and the defendant testifies at trial. Some courts have extended Mezzanatto to agreements that statements may be used for all purposes.

5. The other exceptions to the exclusionary rule arise in proceedings in which a statement made in the course of a plea colloquy or plea bargaining is introduced and another statement should in fairness be considered along with it, and in perjury or false statement prosecutions where the statement made by the defendant was made under oath, on the record, and in the presence of counsel.

6. Rule 410 excludes evidence in both civil and criminal cases if offered against a person who was an accused in a prior criminal proceeding when a plea or statement was made.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

Rule 410 is triggered when a timely objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted and issues arising under these Rules will be waived. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

The judge rules on the admissibility of Rule 410 evidence under Rule 104(a). In making a ruling the trial judge may find it useful to state outside the hearing of the jury the following: The defendant objects to the admissibility of this evidence claiming that it is evidence of plea negotiations. The decision whether evidence falls under Rule 410, the plea negotiation rule, is for the court under Rule 104(a). I find that [describe evidence] [is or is not] evidence of plea negotiations that falls under Rule 410.

If the judge finds that the evidence is not Rule 410 evidence, the objection will be overruled and no further finding will be required. If, however, the judge finds that the evidence falls within Rule 410, the judge may want to make another on the record ruling: The government argues that the evidence is admissible because the defendant agreed to waive the protections of Rule 410 in discussions with the government and agreed that statements could be used at trial for impeachment purposes. The decision whether there was a valid waiver is another decision for the court under Rule 104(a). Having considered the evidence presented and the arguments of the parties, I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant [did or did not] waive the benefit of Rule 410 and agree that statements could be used at trial for impeachment purposes. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

If the judge rules that there was a valid waiver, the defendant or the judge sua sponte may raise Rule 403. The judge may want to make an explicit statement for the record in regard to Rule 403 balancing: I have also considered the possibility that statements admitted for impeachment might be misused by the jury as substantive evidence. I have weighed the probative value of the evidence for impeachment purposes against the possible prejudicial effect of the evidence. I have also considered the extent to which other, less prejudicial evidence is or is not available, and the usefulness of limiting instructions in dealing with any prejudice problem. I find that the possible prejudicial effect [does or does not] substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the government should be certain to make an offer of proof. If the ruling is made prior to trial, it is possible that the government will appeal it before trial starts. It is also possible that, if there is an appeal, the appellate court will address the issue. Thus, the government should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the government may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

[1] Mezzanatto Example -- Statements Introduced for Impeachment

The prosecution has presented evidence that during the course of discussions with the defendant about the possibility of disposing of this case without a trial the defendant made certain statements. The prosecution contends that these statements are inconsistent with the defendant's testimony at trial and that the inconsistency casts doubt on the defendant's testimony. You must decide whether to believe the defendant made these statements and whether they cast doubt on the defendant's testimony. You may not consider any statement made by the defendant in the course of discussions with the prosecutor for any other purpose.

[2] Mezzanatto Extended -- Statements Admitted as Substantive Evidence

The prosecution has presented evidence that during the course of discussions with the defendant about the possibility of disposing of this case without a trial the defendant made certain statements. The prosecution contends that these statements tend to prove the defendant's guilt. You must decide whether to believe that the defendant made these statements and if they were made what weight to give them.

[3] Contemporaneous Statements

The defense in this case has presented evidence that shortly after he was arrested, the defendant met with an attorney for the government and told the attorney for the government that the deceased was trying to kill him before the defendant shot the deceased in self-defense. The defense argues that this evidence demonstrates that the defendant did not have criminal intent in shooting the deceased. It is for you to decide whether to believe this evidence and how much weight to give it. The prosecution has responded to the defendant's evidence with other statements made by the defendant in the same meeting. These statements are admitted to put the statements presented by the defendant in context. You may consider these statements in deciding what weight to give the statements upon which the defendant relies.

Rule 411. Liability Insurance

Evidence that a person was or was not insured against liability is not admissible upon the issue whether the person acted negligently or otherwise wrongfully. This rule does not require the exclusion of evidence of insurance against liability when offered for another purpose, such as proof of agency, ownership, or control, or bias or prejudice of a witness.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 411 excludes evidence that a person was insured or was not insured when offered to prove that the person acted negligently or otherwise wrongfully.

2. The rule does not exclude evidence of liability insurance when offered for other purposes. Evidence offered for other purposes might be excluded as unduly prejudicial under Rule 403.

3. Rule 411 is usually invoked in civil cases, but nothing on the face of the rule indicates that it would not apply in a criminal case. As a practical matter, liability insurance is less likely to be relevant in criminal cases than other forms of insurance such as life or property insurance.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

Rule 411 is triggered when a timely objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted and issues arising under these Rules will be waived. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

The judge rules on the admissibility of Rule 411 evidence under Rule 104(a). In making a ruling the trial judge may find it useful to state outside the hearing of the jury the following: [Name of objecting party] objects to the admissibility of this evidence claiming that it is evidence of liability insurance which cannot be admitted. The decision whether this evidence is liability insurance falling within Rule 411 is for the court under Rule 104(a). I find that [describe evidence] [is or is not] evidence of liability insurance that falls under Rule 411.

If the judge finds that the evidence is not Rule 411 evidence, the objection will be overruled and no further finding will be required. If, however, the judge finds that the evidence falls within Rule 411, the judge may want to make another on the record ruling: [Name of proffering party] argues that the evidence is not offered to prove [state forbidden purpose -- e.g., negligence] but is offered to prove [state permissible purpose -- e.g., bias]. Thus, it is necessary to determine whether [identify permissible purpose -- e.g., bias] is in dispute. I find that it [is or is not] in dispute and that the evidence therefore [may or may not] be admitted on this issue. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

If the judge rules that the evidence is offered for a permissible purpose, the objecting party or the judge sua sponte may raise Rule 403. The judge may want to make an explicit statement for the record in regard to Rule 403 balancing: I have also considered the possibility that evidence admitted for a limited purpose might be misused by the jury as proof of [state forbidden purpose -- e.g., negligence]. I have weighed the probative value of the evidence as to [identify permissible purpose -- e.g., bias] against the possible prejudicial effect of the evidence. I have also considered the extent to which other, less prejudicial evidence is or is not available, and the usefulness of limiting instructions in dealing with any prejudice problem. I find that the possible prejudicial effect of this evidence [does or does not] substantially outweigh its probative value. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party who offered it should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

[1] Impeachment of Defendant's Witness for Bias

You have heard evidence that this witness is employed by an insurance company that insures the defendant. You may consider the fact that the witness's employer has a financial stake in the outcome of the case in deciding what weight to give the witness's testimony. You may not use this evidence for any other purpose. The fact that a defendant had or did not have insurance is not something that you may consider in deciding whether the defendant is liable for any injuries the plaintiff might have suffered or what damages the plaintiff should receive.

[2] Impeachment of Plaintiff's Witness for Bias

You have heard evidence that this witness is employed by an insurance company that insures the plaintiff. You may consider the fact that the witness's employer has a financial stake in the outcome of the case in deciding what weight to give the witness's testimony. You may not use this evidence for any other purpose. [a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 501. General Rule

Except as otherwise required by the Constitution of the United States or provided by Act of Congress or in rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority, the privilege of a witness, person, government, State, or political subdivision thereof shall be governed by the principles of the common law as they may be interpreted by the courts of the United States in the light of reason and experience. However, in civil actions and proceedings with respect to an element of a claim or defense as to which State law supplies the rule of decision, the privilege of a witness, person, government, State, or political subdivision thereof shall be determined in accordance with State law.

Rule 608. Evidence of Character and Conduct of Witness

(b) Specific instances of conduct. -- Specific instances of the conduct of a witness, for the purpose of attacking or supporting the witness' character for truthfulness, other than conviction of crime as provided in rule 609, may not be proved by extrinsic evidence. They may, however, in the discretion of the court, if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness, be inquired into on cross-examination of the witness (1) concerning the witness' character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, or (2) concerning the character for truthfulness or untruthfulness of another witness as to which character the witness being cross-examined has testified.

The giving of testimony, whether by an accused or by any other witness, does not operate as a waiver of the accused's or the witness' privilege against self-incrimination when examined with respect to matters that relate only to character for truthfulness.

Rule 1101. Applicability of Rules

(b) Proceedings generally. -- These rules apply generally to civil actions and proceedings, including admiralty and maritime cases, to criminal cases and proceedings, to contempt proceedings except those in which the court may act summarily, and to proceedings and cases under title 11, United States Code.

(c) Rule of privilege. -- The rule with respect to privileges applies at all stages of all actions, cases, and proceedings.

(d) Rules inapplicable. -- The rules (other than with respect to privileges) do not apply in the following situations:

(1) Preliminary questions of fact. -- The determination of questions of fact preliminary to admissibility of evidence when the issue is to be determined by the court under rule 104.

(2) Grand jury. -- Proceedings before grand juries.

(3) Miscellaneous proceedings. -- Proceedings for extradition or rendition; preliminary examinations in criminal cases; sentencing, or granting or revoking probation; issuance of warrants for arrest, criminal summonses, and search warrants; and proceedings with respect to release on bail or otherwise.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. Privilege claims may be raised at any stage of any proceeding. The trial judge decides pursuant to Rule 104(a) whether or not to sustain a claim of privilege.

2. Generally, a party must raise a timely claim of privilege, and the failure to do so will constitute a waiver. Thus, at the earliest possible stage of a case, a party should claim an applicable privilege to avoid disclosure of protected information and consequent loss of the privilege.

3. Although Rules 104(a) and 1101(d)(1) state that privileges apply even when the trial judge is deciding preliminary questions of fact to rule on the admissibility of evidence, the Supreme Court has held that a trial judge may examine documents that fall within a claim of attorney-client privilege in camera once a prima facie showing of crime or fraud is made. United States v. Zolin, 491 U.S. 554 (1989) .

4. Generally, a witness should be given the opportunity to claim privilege outside the hearing of the jury. The basic rule for most witnesses is that a claim of privilege is not evidence for or against either party.

5. In a criminal case, the defendant has a constitutional right not to testify. Upon request, the judge should instruct the jury that it is to draw no adverse inference from the defendant's exercise of his constitutional right. Carter v. Kentucky, 450 U.S. 288 (1981) . Although it is not a constitutional error to instruct the jury over the defendant's objection, the defendant should be able to choose to forgo an instruction. Lakeside v. Oregon, 435 U.S. 333 (1978) .

6. In a civil case, a party's invocation of the privilege against self-incrimination entitles the opposing party to an instruction that the jury may infer that the information subject to the claim of privilege would be unfavorable to the party claiming it. Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308 (1976) .

7. Except in a civil case when a party invokes the privilege against self-incrimination, the general rule is that a claim of privilege is not evidence. This general rule applies to both long-standing privileges such as attorney-client or spousal privilege and to relatively new privileges such as the psychotherapist-patient privilege.

8. Rule 608(b) establishes that a witness does not forgo the right to claim the privilege against self-incrimination as to "bad acts" that are the subject of impeachment.

9. When state law provides the rule of decision -- e.g., in a diversity case -- state law on privileges will govern.

10. If federal and state issues are joined together for trial and federal and state privilege law is inconsistent, it may be impractical to instruct the jury on both federal and state privileges. Parties are well advised to seek a ruling prior to trial on the privilege law that will apply at trial whenever a conflict is likely.

11. In most cases, claims of privilege can be heard outside the jury's presence. When this occurs, no limiting instructions are needed. There will be times, however, when a privilege claim is not anticipated and is raised while the jury is present. When this occurs, the jury needs some assistance in dealing with the claim.

12. When an ordinary witness claims a privilege, the judge will generally instruct the jury that neither side is to be advantaged or disadvantaged as a result of the privilege claim. It should not matter whether the witness properly or improperly claims the privilege. If a witness refuses to answer questions after the judge rejects a claim of privilege and orders the witness to answer, neither side should suffer from the witness's obstinance.

13. When a party successfully claims a privilege, the judge may find it helpful to tell the jury that the claim was properly made. If a party is unsuccessful in asserting a privilege and thereafter refuses to answer questions, the judge may strike the party's claim or defense or strike the party's testimony.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

A privilege issue will arise when a party, or in some instances a witness, makes a timely claim of privilege. Absent a timely claim, testimony about privileged matters will constitute a waiver of privilege in most instances. A timely privilege claim requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the validity of a claim of privilege under Rule 104(a), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: I have considered all the evidence presented to me with regard to the question of privilege. The party claiming privilege has the burden of demonstrating entitlement to it. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the [describe the evidence in dispute] [is or is not] covered by the [state name of privilege -- e.g., attorney-client privilege]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the privilege issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge rule that the privilege applies and evidence is excluded, the party wishing to offer evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony. Because Rule 1101(c) makes privileges applicable at all stages of a proceeding, the proffering party may not compel disclosure of privileged information in order to make the offer of proof, and may therefore be compelled to describe the nature of the evidence excluded rather than its details.

Once the judge has ruled on the privilege claim, the parties and the trial judge may find its useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

[1] Witness Properly Claims Privilege During Trial

This witness has claimed a privilege not to answer one or more questions. It is my job as judge to decide whether a witness has a valid privilege and may refuse to answer questions. You must disregard the fact that the witness claimed a privilege in deciding this case. You may not speculate as to what the witness's answers would have been. A witness's claim of privilege is not something that may help or hurt either side.

[2] Witness Improperly Claims Privilege During Trial -- Striking Testimony

This witness has claimed a privilege not to answer one or more questions. It is my job as judge to decide whether a witness has a valid privilege and may refuse to answer questions. I have decided that the witness has no valid privilege claim but the witness continues to refuse to answer questions. I therefore will strike the witness's testimony and instruct you to disregard it completely. You may not speculate as to what the witness's answers would have been. A witness's refusal to testify is not something that may help or hurt either side. The parties are not responsible for the witness's conduct.

[3] Party Claims a Privilege

The [plaintiff or defendant] has claimed a privilege not to answer one or more questions. It is my job as judge to decide whether a witness has a valid privilege and may refuse to answer questions. I have found that the [plaintiff or defendant] has a valid privilege claim. Therefore, you must disregard the fact that [plaintiff or defendant] claimed a privilege in deciding this case. You may not speculate as to what the answers would have been. A proper claim of privilege is not something that may help or hurt either side.

[4] Criminal Case -- Defendant Does Not Testify

The defendant in a criminal case has the constitutional right to put the prosecution to its proof. The government must prove its charges beyond a reasonable doubt, and the defendant is not required to lend the government any assistance. The defendant may choose to require the government to put on its evidence and not to testify during the trial. This choice is protected by the Constitution of the United States, and it is your duty to be certain that you do not draw any adverse inference as a result of the defendant's choosing to do what the Constitution permits.

[5] Civil Case -- Party Invokes Privilege Against Self-Incrimination

The [plaintiff or defendant] has declined to answer certain questions and has claimed the privilege against self-incrimination. The [plaintiff or defendant] has the right to claim this privilege and to refuse to answer questions. But, you should assume from the fact that the [plaintiff or defendant] refuses to answer these questions that the answers would be helpful to the opposing party.

[6] Striking a Claim or Defense of Party Who Refuses to Answer

The [plaintiff or defendant] has claimed a privilege not to answer one or more questions. It is my job as judge to decide whether a witness has a valid privilege and may refuse to answer questions. I have found that the [plaintiff or defendant] has no valid privilege claim. I instruct you to disregard all of the evidence that the [plaintiff or defendant] offered to support [describe claim or defense]. I am striking the [describe claim or defense] and granting judgment as a matter of law for the [plaintiff or defendant] as to this [claim or defense].

[7] Striking Testimony of Party Who Refuses to Answer

The [plaintiff or defendant] has claimed a privilege not to answer one or more questions. It is my job as judge to decide whether a witness has a valid privilege and may refuse to answer questions. I have found that the [plaintiff or defendant] has no valid privilege claim. I instruct you to disregard all of the testimony that the [plaintiff or defendant] gave while on the witness stand and to assume that the [plaintiff or defendant] refused to answer questions because the answers would have helped the opposing party.

6-6 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 6-1

6-1 Competency.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 601. General Rule of Competency

Every person is competent to be a witness except as otherwise provided in these rules. However, in civil actions and proceedings with respect to an element of a claim or defense as to which State law supplies the rule of decision, the competency of a witness shall be determined in accordance with State law.

Rule 603. Oath or Affirmation

Before testifying, every witness shall be required to declare that the witness will testify truthfully, by oath or affirmation administered in a form calculated to awaken the witness' conscience and impress the witness' mind with the duty to do so.

Rule 604. Interpreters

An interpreter is subject to the provisions of these rules relating to qualification as an expert and the administration of an oath or affirmation to make a true translation.

Rule 605. Competency of Judge as Witness

The judge presiding at the trial may not testify in that trial as a witness. No objection need be made in order to preserve the point.

Rule 606. Competency of Juror as Witness

(a) At the trial. -- A member of the jury may not testify as a witness before that jury in the trial of the case in which the juror is sitting as a juror. If the juror is called so to testify, the opposing party shall be afforded an opportunity to object out of the presence of the jury.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 601 presumes that witnesses are competent to testify in cases governed by federal law. When state law provides the rule of decision -- in diversity cases, for example -- state law on competency governs.

2. The trial judge rules on the competency of a witness to testify under Rule 104(a). The jury decides on the weight to be given any witness's testimony once the witness is found competent to testify.

3. Rules 603 and 604 set forth oath or affirmation requirements for all witnesses and the requirements for interpreters.

4. Rules 605 and 606(a) disqualify judges and jurors from simultaneously being witnesses.

5. Any ground for disqualifying a witness at common law is likely to be transformed into a credibility issue for the jury under the Federal Rules of Evidence.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to the competency of a witness. Unless a timely objection is made, the witness will be permitted to testify. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on competency under Rule 104(a), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: I have considered all the evidence presented to me with regard to the objection made to the competency of this witness. I begin with the presumption that all witnesses are competent to testify. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the witness [does or does not] understand the duty to tell the truth and [is or is not] capable of understanding the proceedings and communicating information. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the witness [may or may not] testify.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude a witness as incompetent, the party wishing to offer the witness's testimony should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence. For example, a party may not object to a witness as incompetent, but may want the judge to explain to the jury something about the jury's right to assess credibility.

[1] Ordinary Witnesses

It is for you to decide whether or not any witness is credible and reliable and how much weight to give to each witness's testimony. You may consider any factors that you deem appropriate in making your judgment. Among the factors you may choose to consider are the witness's demeanor, candor, intellect, experience, education, judgment, relationship to the parties, mental and emotional condition, and possible interest in the case. These factors are only illustrative and you are free to consider any other evidence you heard about the witness and to weigh it as you find appropriate.

[2] Child Witnesses

It is for you to decide whether or not any witness is credible and reliable and how much weight to give to each witness's testimony. In evaluating the testimony of a child witness, you may want to consider the child's age, intellect, experience, and relationship to the parties. You also may want to consider to what extent the child's testimony appeared to be influenced by the questions being asked or by the preparation of the child to testify.

6-2 Interpreters.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 604. Interpreters

An interpreter is subject to the provisions of these rules relating to qualification as an expert and the administration of an oath or affirmation to make a true translation.

Rule 702. Testimony by Experts

If scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education, may testify thereto in the form of an opinion or otherwise, if (1) the testimony is based upon sufficient facts or data, (2) the testimony is the product of reliable principles and methods, and (3) the witness has applied the principles and methods reliably to the facts of the case.

[b] Key Points.

1. Before allowing an interpreter to participate in a proceeding, the trial judge must find that the interpreter is qualified as an expert. To be qualified, the interpreter must have sufficient specialized knowledge of the language in question and English to assist the court in understanding the testimony of a witness who testifies in whole or in part in a language other than English. The expert's specialized knowledge may come from education, training, or experience.

2. The typical court reporter will not be an expert in all languages and thus can record the interpreter's English translation but not the witness's testimony in another language. The parties may want to request that the witness's testimony be tape recorded and/or that a specialized reporter be retained to record the witness's testimony in the language in which it is provided.

3. The interpreter is a "witness" to what the non-English speaking witness is saying. Thus, the interpreter must be sworn to provide an accurate translation.

4. In some cases, a juror may know the language used by a witness. The juror cannot provide an independent interpretation of the witness's testimony without becoming a witness and running afoul of Rule 605. Judges who are willing to have jurors raise questions in limited circumstances may want to consider an instruction to the jurors that, if they have proficiency in a language used by a witness and disagree with an interpreter's English translation, they should call their disagreement to the court's attention either by writing a note to the court or in whatever other manner the court directs.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

Evidence rules usually are triggered when a timely objection is made to evidence. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence usually will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling. In the case of interpreters, it is possible that an objection will be made to a witness's testifying through an interpreter, but such objections are relatively unusual. Rule 604 does not usually give rise to objections, although in some instances a party will claim that an interpreter is not qualified as an expert. The decision whether the interpreter is qualified is for the court.

Since the trial judge rules on the qualifications of an interpreter under Rule 104(a), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: I have considered all the evidence presented to me with regard to the objection made to the qualifications of the interpreter. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the [name of interpreter] [does or does not] have the specialized experience necessary to assist the jury in understanding the testimony of [name of witness]. I also find by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of interpreter] [does or does not] understand his duty to translate questions and answers correctly. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and [name of interpreter] [may or may not] serve as an interpreter in this case.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge overrule an objection and admit testimony because a witness does not speak English and an interpreter is deemed qualified, the objecting party should be certain to make an offer of proof as to the qualifications of the interpreter or as to the ability of the witness to testify in English.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence. For example, a party may not object to an interpreter's qualifications, but may want the judge to explain to the jury something about the role of an interpreter.

[1] Non-English Speaking Witnesses

I have permitted this witness to testify in [insert language]. This is the language the witness ordinarily uses and will enable the witness to communicate to you as fully as possible with the help of an interpreter. No party should be penalized because it relies upon a witness who is not fluent in English. You should pay the same careful attention to this witness as to witnesses who testify in English. You may consider whether your inability to understand the words used by the interpreter or by the witness affects your ability to assess the credibility of the witness.

[2] Interpreters

[Insert name] has taken an oath similar to the oath given to the witness and has assumed the obligation to translate accurately the questions asked of and the answers given by the witness.

[3] Juror Disagreement

[Insert name] has taken an oath similar to the oath given to the witness and has assumed the obligation to translate accurately the questions asked of and the answers given by the witness. You are required to accept the interpreter's translation as accurate. Some of you may know the language used by the witness. If this is the case and if your understanding of the questions to or answers of the witness differs from the interpreter's translation, I ask that you submit a written note to the court indicating your disagreement with the interpreter's translation.

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
CHAPTER 6 DIRECT AND CROSS-EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES; IMPEACHMENT AND REHABILITATION

6-6 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 6-3

6-3 Impeachment -- by Direct Examiner.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 401. Definition of "Relevant Evidence"

"Relevant evidence" means evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence.

Rule 402. Relevant Evidence Generally Admissible; Irrelevant Evidence Inadmissible

All relevant evidence is admissible, except as otherwise provided by the Constitution of the United States, by Act of Congress, by these rules, or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority. Evidence which is not relevant is not admissible.

Rule 403. Exclusion of Relevant Evidence on Grounds of Prejudice, Confusion, or Waste of Time

Although relevant, evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence.

Rule 607. Who May Impeach

The credibility of a witness may be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness.

Rule 613. Prior Statements of Witnesses

(a) Examining witness concerning prior statement. -- In examining a witness concerning a prior statement made by the witness, whether written or not, the statement need not be shown nor its contents disclosed to the witness at that time, but on request the same shall be shown or disclosed to opposing counsel.

(b) Extrinsic evidence of prior inconsistent statement of witness. -- Extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement by a witness is not admissible unless the witness is afforded an opportunity to explain or deny the same and the opposite party is afforded an opportunity to interrogate the witness thereon, or the interests of justice otherwise require. This provision does not apply to admissions of a party-opponent as defined in rule 801(d)(2).

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

* * *

(d) Statements which are not hearsay. -- A statement is not hearsay if --

(1) Prior statement by witness. -- The declarant testifies at the trial or hearing and is subject to cross-examination concerning the statement, and the statement is (A) inconsistent with the declarant's testimony, and was given under oath subject to the penalty of perjury at a trial, hearing, or other proceeding, or in a deposition, or (B) consistent with the declarant's testimony and is offered to rebut an express or implied charge against the declarant of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive, or (C) one of identification of a person made after perceiving the person; * * *.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. The direct examiner may impeach a witness and thereby "remove the sting" of anticipated impeachment by the cross-examiner. The direct examiner may tactically decide to offer impeachment evidence during direct examination in the hope that, by volunteering facts that might be damaging if withheld on direct and exposed on cross-examination, the credibility of the witness and the direct examiner both will be enhanced. Rule 607 permits the direct examiner to make this choice. When a motion in limine is granted or denied, the losing counsel must be careful not to waive any right to appeal by anticipating opposing counsel's actions. For example, when the defendant in a criminal case moves to exclude evidence of a prior conviction under Rule 609 and the trial judge denies the motion, the defendant waives the right to appeal by introducing the prior conviction during direct examination. The Supreme Court so held in Ohler v. United States, 529 U.S. 753 (2000) .

2. There is a difference between (a) calling a witness who has a positive contribution to make to the direct examiner's case and impeaching the witness, and (b) calling a witness who has no positive contribution to make in order to elicit prior inconsistent statements of the witness that are not admissible for their truth. In (a), the direct examiner is seeking the legitimate help of the witness and seeking also to elicit the impeachment evidence to protect the witness from cross-examination. In (b), the direct examiner is seeking to put prior inconsistent statements into the case that would never be admitted if the other party chose not to call the witness (which is likely if the other party knows the witness has made prior inconsistent statements). A party may not legitimately call a witness knowing that the witness will have nothing positive to say in order to offer prior inconsistent statements not admissible for their truth as impeachment evidence, because the party has no legitimate reason to call the witness. A party who legitimately calls a witness may be able to elicit prior inconsistent statements not admissible for their truth that could be used by a cross-examiner to impeach the witness.

3. In contrast to example (b), a party may call a witness knowing that the witness will be unfavorable with the intent of offering prior inconsistent statements of the witness that are admissible for their truth under Rule 801(d)(1)(A). These prior inconsistent statements are substantive evidence. A party who calls a witness for the purpose of eliciting substantive evidence acts properly.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to prior inconsistent statements of a witness offered by a direct examiner. Unless a timely objection is made, the statements will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of prior inconsistent statements under Rule 104(a), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the grounds for a ruling. If the trial judge has determined, for example, that a prior inconsistent statement may be used by the direct examiner for impeachment or to remove the sting, the judge may make a statement like this: I have considered all the evidence and arguments presented to me with regard to the prior inconsistent statement(s) that is offered on direct examination. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of party] [did or did not] call [name of witness] to elicit relevant evidence in support of [name of party's] case, the statements offered by [name of party] are at least arguably inconsistent with [name of witness's] trial testimony, these statements might be used by opposing counsel as impeachment evidence, and the use of the prior inconsistent statements on direct examination [is or is not] a permissible effort to elicit impeachment evidence on direct examination as permitted by Rule 607. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the statements [may or may not] be used on direct examination.

If the judge is ruling on the admissibility of prior inconsistent statements that are admissible for their truth under Rule 801(d)(1)(A), the judge may make a statement outside the hearing of the jury like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of witness] made statements that [are or are not] inconsistent with [name of witness's] trial testimony, and the prior statements [were or were not] made under oath, subject to penalty of perjury, and in a proceeding. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the statements [may or may not] be used as substantive evidence.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to a prior inconsistent statement, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury the proper use of the statement.

[1] Impeachment by Direct Examiner

The party who calls a witness to testify may bring out any relevant information about the witness to assist you in assessing the witness's credibility. You must decide whether information that you find to be true has a positive or a negative effect on a witness's credibility.

[2] Prior Inconsistent Statements -- Not Admissible for Their Truth

The party who calls a witness to testify may bring out any relevant information about the witness to assist you in assessing the witness's credibility. The [insert party] has asked this witness about prior statements of the witness that might be inconsistent with the witness's testimony in this trial. You must decide whether the witness made prior statements, whether they are inconsistent with the witness's testimony, and whether any prior statements cause you to doubt the trial testimony of the witness. It is important that you consider prior statements of a witness that were not made under oath, subject to penalty of perjury, or in proceeding like this trial only for the purpose of assessing the credibility of the testimony given in this trial by the witness.

[3] Prior Inconsistent Statements -- Admissible as Substantive Evidence

The party who calls a witness to testify may bring out any relevant information about the witness to assist you in assessing the witness's credibility. The [insert party] has asked this witness about prior statements of the witness that might be inconsistent with the witness's testimony in this trial. These prior statements were made under oath, subject to penalty of perjury, and in a formal proceeding like this trial. You may give these statements the same weight that you would give trial testimony by a witness. If you find these prior statements to be inconsistent with the trial testimony, you must decide what parts, if any, you believe of the trial testimony and the prior statements.

CHAPTER 6 DIRECT AND CROSS-EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES; IMPEACHMENT AND REHABILITATION

6-6 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 6-4

6-4 Impeachment -- Prior Bad Acts.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 607. Who May Impeach

The credibility of a witness may be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness.

Rule 608. Evidence of Character and Conduct of Witness

(b) Specific instances of conduct. -- Specific instances of the conduct of a witness, for the purpose of attacking or supporting the witness' character for truthfulness, other than conviction of crime as provided in rule 609, may not be proved by extrinsic evidence. They may, however, in the discretion of the court, if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness, be inquired into on cross-examination of the witness (1) concerning the witness' character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, * * *.

The giving of testimony, whether by an accused or by any other witness, does not operate as a waiver of the accused's or the witness' privilege against self-incrimination when examined with respect to matters that relate only to character for truthfulness.

Rule 611. Mode and Order of Interrogation and Presentation

(a) Control by court. -- The court shall exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of interrogating witnesses and presenting evidence so as to (1) make the interrogation and presentation effective for the ascertainment of the truth, (2) avoid needless consumption of time, and (3) protect witnesses from harassment or undue embarrassment.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 608(b) is not a clear rule. It permits the court to allow a party to ask a witness on cross-examination about prior acts that shed light on the witness's character for truthfulness or untruthfulness. Because the rule permits this impeachment on cross-examination, it seems to anticipate that most questions about prior acts will be intended to attack the witness.

2. Rule 608(b) is one of the few rules of evidence to specifically refer to the court's discretion to admit or exclude evidence. Absent a mandate that evidence be admitted, the court generally has discretion to weigh the probative value of evidence against its dangers under Rule 403. Mention of the court's discretion in this particular rule may reflect both doubts about the probative value of many prior acts, especially those that are stale, and concerns about the possible unnecessary embarrassment of witnesses. The court may guard against witness embarrassment using this discretion or its authority under Rule 611(a).

3. Although Rule 608(b) says that the trial judge may permit questions about bad acts on cross-examination, Rule 607 would seem to permit any party to ask any witness questions relevant to impeachment.

4. Rule 608(b) provides that extrinsic evidence of prior bad acts, other than criminal convictions covered by Rule 609, is not admissible. This limitation on use of extrinsic evidence applies only when a party seeks to contradict a witness's denial of a prior bad act and the only relevance of the act is impeachment under Rule 608(b). Prior bad acts may be proved by extrinsic evidence when such acts are relevant for purposes other than Rule 608(b) impeachment. Prior acts may be admissible under Rule 404(b), for example, to prove intent, knowledge, and many other elements of a claim or defense.

5. Counsel must have a good-faith basis for believing that the prior act occurred to ask a question under Rule 608(b). The good-faith basis need not necessarily be admissible evidence, however.

6. The final paragraph of Rule 608(b) provides that, by testifying, a witness does not lose the Fifth Amendment right to refuse to answer potentially incriminating questions when the questions are asked solely to elicit testimony about prior acts under Rule 608(b).

7. The objecting party under Rule 608(b) often, if not always, will combine a Rule 403 objection with a Rule 608(b) objection.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to questions about prior bad acts. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the permissibility of questions about prior acts under Rule 104(a), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: I have considered the objection made to the questions about prior acts of this witness. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the questions [do or do not] relate to acts which, if true, are probative of the witness's credibility, and that the possible prejudicial effect of evidence concerning these acts [does or does not] substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the questions [may or may not] be asked.

If the issue of good faith arises, the trial judge may request a party to make a proffer as to its good-faith basis for asking questions. If the party lacks a good-faith basis, the judge may want to state for the record the following: The court has asked [name of party] to proffer the basis for questions asked to this witness. Having considered the proffer, the court finds by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of party] [has or lacks] a good-faith basis for the questions, and that they [are proper or should be stricken from the record].

Should the judge exclude questions, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony. Since Rule 608(b) bars extrinsic evidence, it often will be important to a reviewing court to know whether the witness would have admitted or denied the prior acts. Thus, the preferred offer of proof might be a voir dire of the witness when the jury is not present.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to questions, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of a witness's answers.

[1] Witness Admits Prior Bad Act

The witness has testified that he/she [summarize prior act]. You may consider his/her evidence in assessing the witness's credibility and in deciding how much weight you will give his/her testimony.

[2] Witness Denies Prior Bad Act

This witness has denied that he/she engaged in certain conduct about which he/she was questioned. I instruct you that questions are not evidence even when they suggest that something is true. There is no evidence in this case that the witness engaged in the conduct about which he/she was questioned. You must disregard the suggestions contained in the questions in evaluating the credibility of the witness and deciding what weight to give his/her testimony. You may consider, however, the witness's demeanor while testifying in assessing credibility.

[3] Witness Invokes Privilege Against Self-Incrimination

A witness who testifies at a trial retains the right not to answer questions that might be incriminating as to matters that are not in dispute in the trial. This witness was asked a question and properly invoked the privilege against self-incrimination and refused to answer. You must disregard the question and the witness's invocation of the privilege in assessing the credibility of the witness and deciding how much weight to give his/her testimony. You must not penalize or reward any party because the witness chose to exercise a right conferred by the Constitution of the United States.

[4] Absence of Good Faith

[Insert name of counsel] asked this witness a question that suggested the witness had engaged in certain acts. Counsel had no basis in fact or in law for asking such a question. You must disregard the question. The court shall instruct counsel to apologize to the witness for asking it.

CHAPTER 6 DIRECT AND CROSS-EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES; IMPEACHMENT AND REHABILITATION

6-6 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 6-5

6-5 Impeachment -- Character Evidence.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 608. Evidence of Character and Conduct of Witness

(a) Opinion and reputation evidence of character. -- The credibility of a witness may be attacked or supported by evidence in the form of opinion or reputation, but subject to these limitations: (1) the evidence may refer only to character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, and (2) evidence of truthful character is admissible only after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise.

(b) Specific instances of conduct. -- Specific instances of the conduct of a witness, for the purpose of attacking or supporting the witness' character for truthfulness, other than conviction of crime as provided in rule 609, may not be proved by extrinsic evidence. They may, however, in the discretion of the court, if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness, be inquired into on cross-examination of the witness (1) concerning the witness' character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, or (2) concerning the character for truthfulness or untruthfulness of another witness as to which character the witness being cross-examined has testified.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. A party may call a character witness to attack the credibility of a previous witness in a case. When character witnesses are called to attack credibility, their testimony must focus on the previous witness's character for untruthfulness.

2. The character witness is limited on direct examination to testifying about the reputation of the other witness for truthfulness or the character witness's opinion as to another witness's character for untruthfulness. The character witness may not rely upon specific acts in providing reputation or opinion testimony.

3. In theory, a character witness who has testified that a previous witness's character for truthfulness is bad may be asked on cross-examination whether the character witness has heard of or knows of specific acts on the part of the previous witness which, if the answer is yes, would appear inconsistent with an untruthful character. In practice, however, the questioning in the form of "have you heard" or "do you know" about specific acts is usually done in an effort to attack a favorable character witness. It appears that one or more negative acts is more likely to undermine favorable character testimony than one or more positive acts is to undermine negative character evidence.

4. Counsel must have a good-faith basis for the questions on cross-examination of a character witness.

5. Generally an objection under Rule 608 will be accompanied by a Rule 403 objection.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to character evidence or to questions asked of a character witness. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted and the questions allowed. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of character evidence and the validity of cross-examination under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to character evidence the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I have considered the objection to this character evidence. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the evidence that is proffered [does or does not] qualify as reputation or opinion evidence which is admissible under Rule 608(a), and that the possible prejudicial effect of such evidence [does or does not] substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence for impeachment purposes. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

In ruling on the validity of cross-examination questions, the judge may want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like this: I have considered the objection to this form of cross-examination. Having considered the direct testimony of this witness, including the time period addressed by the witness, I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the cross-examination questions [are or are not] valid attempts to test the knowledge of the witness, and that the possible prejudicial effect of these questions and the answers to them [does or does not] substantially outweigh the probative value of this evidence. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the questions [are or are not] permissible.

If the issue of good faith arises, the trial judge may request a party to make a proffer as to its good-faith basis for asking questions. If the party lacks a good-faith basis, the judge may want to state for the record the following: The court has asked [name of party] to proffer the basis for questions asked to this witness. Having considered the proffer, the court finds by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of party] [has or lacks] a good-faith basis for the questions, and that they [are proper or should be stricken from the record].

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony. If the judge has excluded cross-examination questions, the cross-examiner may want to make an offer of proof by voir dire of the witness. This may be especially important because the answer that the witness would give to the question may be significant in a determination of whether exclusion, even if erroneous, is harmless or prejudicial.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to character evidence or to cross-examination questions, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Negative Character Witness Generally

A party may call a witness to testify about the reputation and/or the witness's opinion of another witness's truthful or untruthful character. [Name of character witness] has testified concerning [name of previous witness]. It is for you to assess the credibility of [name of character witness] and to decide how much weight you will give this testimony in connection with your assessment of the credibility of [name of previous witness].

[2] Cross-Examination Concerning Specific Acts Acknowledged by Witness

A party may call a witness to testify about the reputation and/or the witness's opinion of another witness's truthful or untruthful character. [Name of character witness] has testified concerning [name of previous witness]. The [plaintiff or defendant] questioned [name of character witness] concerning whether [name of character witness] had heard or knew about specific acts involving [name of previous witness]. [Name of character witness] testified that he had heard or knew of these acts. You may consider what [name of character witness] heard of or knew as you assess the credibility of [name of character witness] and decide how much weight you will give this testimony in connection with your assessment of the credibility of [name of previous witness]. You are not called upon to decide whether these acts actually occurred. You need only decide whether the fact that [name of character witness] heard or knew certain things casts doubt on the reputation or opinion evidence concerning [name of previous witness].

[3] Cross-Examination Concerning Specific Acts Not Acknowledged by Witness

A party may call a witness to testify about the reputation and/or the witness's opinion of another witness's truthful or untruthful character. [Name of character witness] has testified concerning [name of previous witness]. The [plaintiff or defendant] questioned [name of character witness] concerning whether [name of character witness] had heard or knew about specific acts involving [name of previous witness]. [Name of character witness] denied hearing or knowing of these acts. I remind you that questions are not evidence, and there is no evidence that any of these acts actually occurred. You must not assume that they occurred as you assess the credibility of [name of character witness] and decide how much weight you will give this testimony in connection with your assessment of the credibility of [name of previous witness].

[4] Multiple Character Witnesses

A party may call a witness to testify about the reputation and/or the witness's opinion of another witness's truthful or untruthful character. [Names of character witnesses] have testified concerning [name of previous witness]. The [plaintiff or defendant] questioned [names of character witnesses] concerning whether [names of character witnesses] had heard or knew about specific acts involving [name of previous witness]. Some witnesses testified they had heard of or knew of these acts while other witnesses denied hearing or knowing of these acts. You may consider that some witnesses heard or knew things that others did not in assessing the credibility of [names of character witnesses] and decide how much weight you will give their testimony in connection with your assessment of the credibility of [name of previous witness]. You are not called upon to decide whether these acts actually occurred. You need only decide whether the fact that some witnesses heard or knew certain things casts doubt on their reputation or opinion testimony, and whether the fact that other witnesses did not hear or know these things casts doubt on their reputation or opinion testimony.

6-6 Rehabilitation -- Character Evidence.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 608. Evidence of Character and Conduct of Witness

(a) Opinion and reputation evidence of character. -- The credibility of a witness may be attacked or supported by evidence in the form of opinion or reputation, but subject to these limitations: (1) the evidence may refer only to character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, and (2) evidence of truthful character is admissible only after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise.

(b) Specific instances of conduct. -- Specific instances of the conduct of a witness, for the purpose of attacking or supporting the witness' character for truthfulness, other than conviction of crime as provided in rule 609, may not be proved by extrinsic evidence. They may, however, in the discretion of the court, if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness, be inquired into on cross-examination of the witness (1) concerning the witness' character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, or (2) concerning the character for truthfulness or untruthfulness of another witness as to which character the witness being cross-examined has testified.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. A party may call a character witness to bolster the credibility of a previous witness in a case. When character witnesses are called to bolster credibility, their testimony must focus on the previous witness's character for truthfulness.

2. A witness may not be rehabilitated unless the witness has been previously attacked. The attack may have been through character evidence, but need not be. Any evidence that suggests that a previous witness is an untruthful person is a sufficient attack to warrant rehabilitation.

3. The character witness is limited on direct examination to testifying about the reputation of or the character witness's opinion as to another witness's untruthfulness. The character witness may not rely upon specific acts in providing reputation or opinion testimony.

4. A character witness who has testified that a previous witness's character for truthfulness is good may be asked on cross-examination whether the character witness has heard of or knows of specific acts on the part of the previous witness which, if the answer is yes, would appear inconsistent with a truthful character. The Supreme Court approved such questioning in Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. 469 (1948) .

5. Counsel must have a good-faith basis for the questions on cross-examination of a character witness.

6. Generally an objection under Rule 608 will be accompanied by a Rule 403 objection.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to character evidence or to questions asked of a character witness. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted and the questions allowed. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of character evidence and the validity of cross-examination under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to character evidence the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I have considered the objection to this character evidence. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the credibility of [name of witness] [was or was not] sufficiently attacked to warrant the admission of character evidence for rehabilitation purposes, and that the evidence that is proffered [does or does not] qualify as reputation or opinion evidence which is admissible under Rule 608(a). Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

In ruling on the validity of cross-examination questions, the judge may want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like this: I have considered the objection to this form of cross-examination. Having considered the direct testimony of this witness, including the time period addressed by the witness, I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the cross-examination questions [are or are not] valid attempts to test the knowledge of the witness, and that the possible prejudicial effect of these questions and the answers to them [does or does not] substantially outweigh the probative value of this evidence. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the questions [are or are not] permissible.

If the issue of good faith arises, the trial judge may request a party to make a proffer as to its good-faith basis for asking questions. If the party lacks a good-faith basis, the judge may want to state for the record the following: The court has asked [name of party] to proffer the basis for questions asked to this witness. Having considered the proffer, the court finds by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of party] [has or lacks] a good-faith basis for the questions, and that they [are proper or should be stricken from the record].

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony. If the judge has excluded cross-examination questions, the cross-examiner may want to make an offer of proof by voir dire of the witness. This may be especially important because the answer that the witness would give to the question may be significant in a determination of whether exclusion, even if erroneous, is harmless or prejudicial.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to character evidence or to cross-examination questions, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Positive Character Witness Generally

A party may call a witness to testify about the reputation and/or the witness's opinion of another witness's truthful or untruthful character. [Name of character witness] has testified concerning [name of previous witness]. It is for you to assess the credibility of [name of character witness] and to decide how much weight you will give this testimony in connection with your assessment of the credibility of [name of previous witness].

[2] Cross-Examination Concerning Specific Acts Acknowledged by Witness

A party may call a witness to testify about the reputation and/or the witness's opinion of another witness's truthful or untruthful character. [Name of character witness] has testified concerning [name of previous witness]. The [plaintiff or defendant] questioned [name of character witness] concerning whether [name of character witness] had heard or knew about specific acts involving [name of previous witness]. [Name of character witness] testified that he had heard or knew of these acts. You may consider what [name of character witness] heard of or knew as you assess the credibility of [name of character witness] and decide how much weight you will give this testimony in connection with your assessment of the credibility of [name of previous witness]. You are not called upon to decide whether these acts actually occurred. You need only decide whether the fact that [name of character witness] heard or knew certain things casts doubt on the reputation or opinion evidence concerning [name of previous witness].

[3] Cross-Examination Concerning Specific Acts Not Acknowledged by Witness

A party may call a witness to testify about the reputation and/or the witness's opinion of another witness's truthful or untruthful character. [Name of character witness] has testified concerning [name of previous witness]. The [plaintiff or defendant] questioned [name of character witness] concerning whether [name of character witness] had heard or knew about specific acts involving [name of previous witness]. [Name of character witness] denied hearing or knowing of these acts. I remind you that questions are not evidence, and there is no evidence that any of these acts actually occurred. You must not assume that they occurred as you assess the credibility of [name of character witness] and decide how much weight you will give this testimony in connection with your assessment of the credibility of [name of previous witness].

[4] Multiple Character Witnesses

A party may call a witness to testify about the reputation and/or the witness's opinion of another witness's truthful or untruthful character. [Names of character witnesses] have testified concerning [name of previous witness]. The [plaintiff or defendant] questioned [names of character witnesses] concerning whether [names of character witnesses] had heard or knew about specific acts involving [name of previous witness]. Some witnesses testified they had heard of or knew of these acts while other witnesses denied hearing or knowing of these acts. You may consider that some witnesses heard or knew things that others did not in assessing the credibility of [names of character witnesses] and decide how much weight you will give their testimony in connection with your assessment of the credibility of [name of previous witness]. You are not called upon to decide whether these acts actually occurred. You need only decide whether the fact that some witnesses heard or knew certain things casts doubt on their reputation or opinion testimony, and whether the fact that other witnesses did not hear or know these things casts doubt on their reputation or opinion testimony.

CHAPTER 6 DIRECT AND CROSS-EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES; IMPEACHMENT AND REHABILITATION

6-6 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 6-7

6-7 Impeachment -- Prior Convictions.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 403. Exclusion of Relevant Evidence on Grounds of Prejudice, Confusion, or Waste of Time

Although relevant, evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence.

Rule 607. Who May Impeach

The credibility of a witness may be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness.

Rule 609. Impeachment by Evidence of Conviction of Crime

(a) General rule. -- For the purpose of attacking the credibility of a witness,

(1) evidence that the witness other than an accused has been convicted of a crime shall be admitted, subject to Rule 403, if the crime was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year under the law under which the witness was convicted, and evidence that an accused has been convicted of such a crime shall be admitted if the court determines that the probative value of admitting this evidence outweighs its prejudicial effect to the accused; and

(2) evidence that any witness has been convicted of a crime shall be admitted if it involved dishonesty or false statement, regardless of the punishment.

(b) Time limit. -- Evidence of a conviction under this rule is not admissible if a period of more than ten years has elapsed since the date of the conviction or of the release of the witness from the confinement imposed for that conviction, whichever is the later date, unless the court determines, in the interests of justice, that the probative value of the conviction supported by specific facts and circumstances substantially outweighs its prejudicial effect. However, evidence of a conviction more than ten years old as calculated herein, is not admissible unless the proponent gives to the adverse party sufficient advance written notice of intent to use such evidence to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to contest the use of such evidence.

(c) Effect of pardon, annulment, or certificate of rehabilitation. -- Evidence of a conviction is not admissible under this rule if (1) the conviction has been the subject of a pardon, annulment, certificate of rehabilitation, or other equivalent procedure based on a finding of the rehabilitation of the person convicted, and that person has not been convicted of a subsequent crime which was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year, or (2) the conviction has been the subject of a pardon, annulment, or other equivalent procedure based on a finding of innocence.

(d) Juvenile adjudications. -- Evidence of juvenile adjudications is generally not admissible under this rule. The court may, however, in a criminal case allow evidence of a juvenile adjudication of a witness other than the accused if conviction of the offense would be admissible to attack the credibility of an adult and the court is satisfied that admission in evidence is necessary for a fair determination of the issue of guilt or innocence.

(e) Pendency of appeal. -- The pendency of an appeal therefrom does not render evidence of a conviction inadmissible. Evidence of the pendency of an appeal is admissible.

[b] Key Points.

1. Criminal convictions for offenses involving dishonesty or false statement are always admissible to impeach any witness, including a criminal accused. It makes no difference whether the prior convictions are felonies or misdemeanors. There is no balancing test employed for these convictions. Generally, dishonesty crimes are not crimes of violence, but are crimes that involve falsity, misrepresentation, or deceit.

2. No misdemeanor convictions other than those involving dishonesty or false statement are admissible in any case for impeachment.

3. Felony convictions (crimes punishable by more than one year's incarceration) that do not involve dishonesty or false statement are all subject to a balancing test. The traditional Rule 403 balancing test is used for all witnesses other than the criminal accused. The criminal accused who testifies gets the benefit of a twist on the Rule 403 balancing test. Instead of the accused's having to demonstrate that the prejudicial effect of the prior conviction outweighs its probative value, which would be required under Rule 403, the government must show that the probative value of the conviction outweighs its prejudicial effect. The trial judge need not find that the probative value substantially outweighs the prejudicial effect, just that the probative value is greater.

4. Convictions that are more than ten years old -- measured from the latter of the date of conviction or release from confinement -- cannot be used absent notice of an intent to rely upon the conviction and specific findings by the trial judge that the probative value of the specific facts and circumstances of the conviction substantially outweighs its prejudicial effect. This is the reverse of the ordinary Rule 403 balancing.

5. Generally, the prejudicial effect of the prior conviction will be greatest when the conviction and the crime charged are similar, and will be least when the conviction bears little similarity to the crime charged. The probative value of the prior conviction increases when the conviction has elements of dishonesty as opposed to violence.

6. A direct examiner may offer evidence of a prior conviction to remove the sting of impeachment. However, when a motion in limine is granted or denied, the losing counsel must be careful not to waive any right to appeal by anticipating opposing counsel's actions. For example, when the defendant in a criminal case moves to exclude evidence of a prior conviction under Rule 609 and the trial judge denies the motion, the defendant waives the right to appeal by introducing the prior conviction during direct examination. The Supreme Court so held in Ohler v. United States, 529 U.S. 753 (2000) . The direct examiner who has unsuccessfully sought to exclude a prior conviction through a motion in limine should seek a final court ruling that the conviction can be used by the other side before offering it, and should make clear on the record that any use of the conviction is not intended to be a waiver of the in limine objection but is a response to the trial judge's decision that the opponent may use the evidence for impeachment. It is not clear, however, that this effort will avoid a waiver finding under Ohler.

7. If the trial judge has denied a motion in limine and has ruled that a witness -- e.g., the criminal accused -- can be impeached if he testifies, the witness must testify and be impeached for the motion in limine to be preserved on appeal. The Supreme Court so held in Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38 (1984) .

8. Rule 609 governs the use of prior convictions for impeachment purposes only. It does not preclude convictions from being offered under other rules -- e.g., Rules 404, 413, 414, and 415.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to prior conviction evidence. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of prior convictions under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to such evidence the judge will want to make a statement for the record outside the hearing of the jury that indicates that the proper standard was used in making a ruling.

If the judge is dealing with a conviction that qualifies as a "dishonesty or false statement" conviction, whether misdemeanor or felony and regardless of the nature of the case or the witness who is to be impeached, the judge may choose a statement like the following: I have considered the objection to the prior conviction for [name of crime]. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that it is a conviction involving dishonesty or false statement. Therefore, I must admit it because Rule 609(a)(2) provides that such convictions are always admissible.

In a criminal case when the objection is to the defendant's prior felony conviction for a crime not involving dishonesty or false statement, the judge may choose a statement like the following: I have considered the objection to the defendant's prior conviction for [name of crime]. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the probative value of the conviction for impeachment purposes [does or does not] outweigh the possible prejudicial effect of such evidence, particularly the danger that it will be used as general character evidence. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

In a civil case in which the credibility of a plaintiff or defendant is at issue, the judge may choose a statement like the following: I have considered the objection to [name of party's] prior conviction for [name of crime]. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the possible prejudicial effect of the conviction, particularly the danger that it will be used as general character evidence, [does or does not] substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence for impeachment purposes. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

In a civil or a criminal case, a similar statement can be used when an objection is made to the prior conviction of a non-party witness. But, the judge may substitute "particularly the danger of spill-over to a party" for the words "particularly the danger that it will be used as general character evidence."

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to prior convictions, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Prior Conviction of a Non-Party Witness

You may consider evidence of a witness's criminal convictions in assessing the witness's credibility and deciding how much weight to give the witness's testimony.

[2] Prior Conviction of a Party in a Civil Case Admissible Only for Impeachment

You may consider evidence that [the plaintiff or defendant] has been convicted of certain crimes in assessing [the plaintiff's or the defendant's] credibility as a witness and deciding how much weight to give [the plaintiff's or the defendant's] testimony. You must decide whether a conviction renders a person less worthy of belief than other witnesses. Your job is not to punish [the plaintiff or defendant] for past crimes. Your job is to assess fairly and impartially every witness's credibility in this case. You may consider all that you heard about a prior conviction in assessing its importance, including the nature of the crime for which [the plaintiff or the defendant] was convicted, whether that crime involved untruthfulness or deceit, when the crime occurred, and whether there were extenuating circumstances.

[3] Prior Conviction of a Criminal Accused Admissible Only for Impeachment

You may consider evidence that the defendant has been convicted of certain crimes in assessing the defendant's credibility as a witness and deciding how much weight to give the defendant's testimony. You must decide whether a conviction renders a defendant less worthy of belief than other witnesses. Your job is not to punish the defendant for past crimes. Your job is to assess fairly and impartially every witness's credibility in this case. You may consider that the defendant had the constitutional right not to testify in this case as you evaluate the importance of evidence of a prior conviction. You may consider all that you heard about a prior conviction in assessing its importance, including the nature of the crime for which the defendant was convicted, whether that crime involved untruthfulness or deceit, when the crime occurred, and whether there were extenuating circumstances.

[4] Prior Conviction of a Party in a Civil Case Admissible as Substantive Evidence

You may consider evidence that [the plaintiff or defendant] has been convicted of certain crimes in assessing [the plaintiff's or the defendant's] credibility as a witness and deciding how much weight to give [the plaintiff's or the defendant's] testimony. You must decide whether a conviction renders a person less worthy of belief than other witnesses. You may consider all that you heard about a prior conviction in assessing its importance, including the nature of the crime for which [the plaintiff or the defendant] was convicted, whether that crime involved untruthfulness or deceit, when the crime occurred, and whether there were extenuating circumstances. You may also consider evidence that [the plaintiff or the defendant] has been convicted of certain crimes on the question whether [describe issue -- e.g., whether the defendant intended to touch the plaintiff without consent]. Your job is not to punish [the plaintiff or defendant] for past crimes. Your job is to assess fairly and impartially every witness's credibility in this case and to decide only the issues that are disputed in this case.

[5] Prior Conviction of a Criminal Accused Admissible for Substantive Evidence

You may consider evidence that the defendant has been convicted of certain crimes in assessing the defendant's credibility as a witness and deciding how much weight to give the defendant's testimony. You must decide whether a conviction renders a defendant less worthy of belief than other witnesses. You may consider all that you heard about a prior conviction in assessing its importance, including the nature of the crime for which the defendant was convicted, whether that crime involved untruthfulness or deceit, when the crime occurred, and whether there were extenuating circumstances. You may also consider evidence that the defendant has been convicted of certain crimes in deciding whether [describe issue -- e.g., the defendant knew that he possessed heroin and intended to possess it]. Your job is not to punish the defendant for past crimes. Your job is to assess fairly and impartially every witness's credibility in this case and to decide only the issues that are disputed in this case.

CHAPTER 6 DIRECT AND CROSS-EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES; IMPEACHMENT AND REHABILITATION

6-6 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 6-8

6-8 Impeachment -- Bias.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 401. Definition of "Relevant Evidence"

"Relevant evidence" means evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence.

Rule 402. Relevant Evidence Generally Admissible; Irrelevant Evidence Inadmissible

All relevant evidence is admissible, except as otherwise provided by the Constitution of the United States, by Act of Congress, by these rules, or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority. Evidence which is not relevant is not admissible.

Rule 403. Exclusion of Relevant Evidence on Grounds of Prejudice, Confusion, or Waste of Time

Although relevant, evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence.

Rule 607. Who May Impeach

The credibility of a witness may be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness.

[b] Key Points.

1. No specific rule of evidence addresses bias evidence. However, Rule 401 defines relevant evidence and Rule 402 states that relevant evidence is admissible unless a legal restriction provides otherwise. Not only is bias evidence relevant, but it is regarded as such a powerful form of impeachment that in criminal cases the defendant has a Sixth Amendment Confrontation Clause right to demonstrate the potential bias or interest of government witnesses. Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308 (1974) . The Confrontation right may override provisions of rules of evidence that would exclude defense evidence. See, e.g., Olden v. Kentucky, 488 U.S. 227 (1988) .

2. The Supreme Court recognized the importance of bias evidence and its admissibility under Rule 402 in United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45 (1984) .

3. A direct examiner may elicit evidence of bias or potential bias to remove the sting of expected impeachment by the cross-examiner. At some point, however, a direct examiner may move beyond eliciting evidence of bias to vouching for a witness -- e.g., bringing out extensive details of a plea bargain agreement -- which is improper.

4. The Supreme Court recognized in Abel that a trial judge, in the sound exercise of discretion, may permit a party to elicit testimony that a witness is a member of an organization, but may exclude the name of or details about the organization. For example, the judge may permit testimony that a witness is a member of a "prison gang" while excluding the name of the gang -- e.g., "Aryan Brotherhood" -- if the name might be especially prejudicial in the locale of the trial.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to bias evidence. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to bias evidence the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I have considered the objection to this evidence. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the evidence [is or is not] probative of a possible bias and that the possible prejudicial effect of the evidence [does or does not] substantially outweigh the probative value of this evidence. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to bias evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Plea Bargain Elicited by Government Witness in Criminal Case

The prosecution has presented evidence that this witness has [agreed to plead or pled] guilty to some or all of the crimes charged against the defendant. The witness's plea agreement is not evidence that the defendant is guilty of any crime charged in this case. You may consider the extent to which the witness [agreed to accept or has accepted] responsibility for criminal acts, and the extent to which the witness has avoided responsibility and obtained some benefit from the plea agreement in assessing the credibility of the witness and deciding how much weight to give the witness's testimony.

[2] Plea Bargain Elicited by Defendant on Cross-Examination in Criminal Case

The fact that this witness has [agreed to plead or pled] guilty to some or all of the crimes charged against the defendant is not evidence that the defendant is guilty of any crime charged in this case. You may consider the extent to which the witness [agreed to accept or has accepted] responsibility for criminal acts, and the extent to which the witness has avoided responsibility and obtained some benefit from the plea agreement in assessing the credibility of the witness and deciding how much weight to give the witness's testimony.

[3] Settlement by Co-Defendant in Civil Case

The fact that a witness has [agreed to a settlement or entered into a settlement agreement] with [the plaintiff or the defendant] is something you may consider in assessing the credibility of the witness and deciding how much weight to give the witness's testimony. You may consider the extent to which the witness [or the witness's employer] obtained some advantage from the agreement or suffered some disadvantage in deciding whether the agreement may cause the witness to favor or disfavor one party in this case. The agreement has no bearing on whether the defendant is liable or on the extent of any liability in this case.

[4] Settlement by Co-Plaintiff in Civil Case

The fact that a witness has [agreed to a settlement or entered into a settlement agreement] with [the plaintiff or the defendant] is something you may consider in assessing the credibility of the witness and deciding how much weight to give the witness's testimony. You may consider the extent to which the witness [or the witness's employer] obtained some advantage from the agreement or suffered some disadvantage in deciding whether the agreement may cause the witness to favor or disfavor one party in this case. The agreement has no bearing on whether the plaintiff can establish liability or the extent of any liability in this case.

[5] Group Membership

You may consider the fact that a witness is a member of [insert name or description of group] in deciding whether the witness's membership may cause the witness to favor or disfavor one party in this case. You must not favor or disfavor witnesses or parties who call witnesses because you approve or disapprove of their associates or organizations. But, you may consider whether a witness has reason to favor or disfavor a party in assessing the credibility of a witness and how much weight to give the witness's testimony.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 401. Definition of "Relevant Evidence"

"Relevant evidence" means evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence.

Rule 402. Relevant Evidence Generally Admissible; Irrelevant Evidence Inadmissible

All relevant evidence is admissible, except as otherwise provided by the Constitution of the United States, by Act of Congress, by these rules, or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority. Evidence which is not relevant is not admissible.

Rule 403. Exclusion of Relevant Evidence on Grounds of Prejudice, Confusion, or Waste of Time

Although relevant, evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence.

Rule 607. Who May Impeach

The credibility of a witness may be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness.

Rule 610. Religious Beliefs or Opinions

Evidence of the beliefs or opinions of a witness on matters of religion is not admissible for the purpose of showing that by reason of their nature the witness' credibility is impaired or enhanced.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 610 provides that a witness's beliefs or opinions on matters of religion are not admissible to enhance or impair credibility. The rule does not exclude evidence that a witness is affiliated with a religion when such evidence is relevant to show bias or interest in a case.

2. The Supreme Court recognized the importance of bias evidence and its admissibility under Rule 402 in United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45 (1984) .

3. The Supreme Court recognized in Abel that a trial judge, in the sound exercise of discretion, may permit a party to elicit testimony that a witness is a member of an organization, but may exclude the name of or details about the organization. For example, the judge may permit testimony that a witness is a member of a "prison gang" while excluding the name of the gang -- e.g., "Aryan Brotherhood" -- if the name might be especially prejudicial in the locale of the trial. The same approach could result in a witness testifying to membership in a religious or quasi-religious group without revealing the name of the group.

4. A direct examiner may elicit evidence of bias or potential bias to remove the sting of expected impeachment by the cross-examiner.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to evidence of group membership. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to group membership evidence the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I have considered the objection to this evidence. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the evidence [is or is not] probative of a possible bias or motive and that the possible prejudicial effect of the evidence [does or does not] substantially outweigh the probative value of this evidence. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to group membership evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Group Membership Generally

You may consider the fact that a witness is a member of [insert name or description of group] in deciding whether the witness's membership may cause the witness to favor or disfavor one party in this case. You must not favor or disfavor witnesses or parties who call witnesses because you approve or disapprove of their associates or organizations. But, you may consider whether a witness has reason to favor or disfavor a party in assessing the credibility of a witness and how much weight to give the witness's testimony.

[2] Group Membership Denied

It is for you to decide whether or not the witness is a member of [insert name or description of group]. If you find that the witness is a member, you may consider that fact in deciding whether the witness's membership may cause the witness to favor or disfavor one party in this case. You must not favor or disfavor witnesses or parties who call witnesses because you approve or disapprove of their associates or organizations. But, you may consider whether a witness has reason to favor or disfavor a party and whether the witness tried to conceal membership in a group in assessing the credibility of the witness and how much weight to give the witness's testimony.

CHAPTER 6 DIRECT AND CROSS-EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES; IMPEACHMENT AND REHABILITATION

6-6 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 6-10

6-10 Impeachment -- Leading Questions.

[a] Governing Rule.

Rule 611. Mode and Order of Interrogation and Presentation

(a) Control by court. -- The court shall exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of interrogating witnesses and presenting evidence so as to (1) make the interrogation and presentation effective for the ascertainment of the truth, (2) avoid needless consumption of time, and (3) protect witnesses from harassment or undue embarrassment.

(b) Scope of cross-examination. -- Cross-examination should be limited to the subject matter of the direct examination and matters affecting the credibility of the witness. The court may, in the exercise of discretion, permit inquiry into additional matters as if on direct examination.

(c) Leading questions. -- Leading questions should not be used on the direct examination of a witness except as may be necessary to develop the witness' testimony. Ordinarily leading questions should be permitted on cross-examination. When a party calls a hostile witness, an adverse party, or a witness identified with an adverse party, interrogation may be by leading questions.

[b] Key Points.

1. Generally, the cross-examiner is permitted to ask leading questions. Leading questions may point out inconsistencies in a witness's testimony and thereby impeach the witness.

2. It is common for counsel to state facts as part of a leading question -- e.g., "Isn't it true that ...," or "Isn't it a fact that ...." Such questions require a good-faith basis.

3. The direct examiner usually will have the right to ask leading questions not only of hostile witnesses but of adverse parties and witnesses identified with adverse parties.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to leading questions. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

The trial judge rules on the permissibility of leading questions under Rule 611(c), and has enormous discretion to permit leading questions when they are helpful in eliciting testimony from a witness. Generally, the judge need not give much explanation for allowing or not allowing such questions. However, if the judge denies a cross-examiner the right to ask leading questions, the judge may want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury a reason, such as the judge's view that the witness is actually favorably disposed toward the cross-examiner. Similarly, if the judge grants a direct examiner the right to ask leading questions over objection, the judge may want to explain why outside the hearing of the jury. For example, the judge may conclude that a witness's demeanor is sufficient evidence of hostility toward a direct examiner that leading questions should be permitted.

Once the judge has ruled on an objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to leading questions, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of questions and answers.

[1] Questions Are Not Evidence

The testimony of the witnesses is evidence. Statements made by counsel in their questions are not evidence unless a witness adopts these statements in answering a question.

[2] Evasive Answers

You may consider whether a witness has answered questions candidly and forthrightly or whether the witness has been evasive in assessing the witness's credibility and in deciding how much weight to give to the witness's testimony.

[3] Inconsistent Answers

You must decide whether a witness's answers have been consistent or inconsistent. You may consider whether a witness has answered questions consistently or inconsistently in assessing the witness's credibility and in deciding how much weight to give to the witness's testimony.

6-11 Impeachment -- Materials Used to Refresh Memory.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 612. Writing Used to Refresh Memory

Except as otherwise provided in criminal proceedings by section 3500 of title 18, United States Code, if a witness uses a writing to refresh memory for the purpose of testifying, either --

(1) while testifying, or

(2) before testifying, if the court in its discretion determines it is necessary in the interests of justice,

an adverse party is entitled to have the writing produced at the hearing, to inspect it, to cross-examine the witness thereon, and to introduce in evidence those portions which relate to the testimony of the witness. If it is claimed that the writing contains matters not related to the subject matter of the testimony the court shall examine the writing in camera, excise any portions not so related, and order delivery of the remainder to the party entitled thereto. Any portion withheld over objections shall be preserved and made available to the appellate court in the event of an appeal. If a writing is not produced or delivered pursuant to order under this rule, the court shall make any order justice requires, except that in criminal cases when the prosecution elects not to comply, the order shall be one striking the testimony or, if the court in its discretion determines that the interests of justice so require, declaring a mistrial.

[b] Key Points.

1. A party generally may use anything to refresh the recollection of a witness at trial. At trial, the object used should be marked for identification before being shown to the witness. If the witness's memory is not refreshed, the item is not admissible. If, however, the witness's memory is refreshed, opposing counsel may examine the item, cross-examine the witness about it, and offer into evidence portions relevant to the refreshed recollection.

2. The purpose of admitting the item used to refresh recollection is to demonstrate that the witness may have been influenced by the item rather than by memory.

3. The judge has discretion to order items used before trial by a witness to prepare for testifying turned over to an opposing party. In criminal cases, however, statements covered by the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3500, need not be disclosed until after a government witness testifies on direct examination.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to evidence. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to admission of evidence of materials used to refresh memory during a trial, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I have considered the objection to this evidence and have reviewed the material that [name of party] wants to introduce. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [none, some, or all] of this evidence is related to the testimony of [name of witness]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained in whole or in part], and [describe whether any evidence is] admissible.

If the judge finds that none of the material is related to the testimony, it will be excluded. If the judge finds that all of the material is related, it will be admitted in its entirety. If the judge finds that only some of the material is related, the judge may want to add for the record the following: I shall admit that portion of the material that is related to the testimony and make the remaining portion part of the record of this proceeding.

When the objection is made to materials used to refresh recollection prior to trial, the judge may want to consider making the following statement for the record outside the hearing of the jury: [Name of party] has asked that I order [name of witness] to produce materials used to refresh recollection or prepare for testimony prior to trial. I have considered the testimony that [name of witness] has given and its importance in this case, and I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the interests of justice [do or do not] require that these materials be produced for [name of party] and that [name of party] be permitted to cross-examine the witness on the basis of these materials and to offer them into evidence.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

As long as the judge follows Rule 612, materials used to refresh recollection during trial should be part of the record whenever an opposing party has sought to admit them. Thus, no additional proffer will usually be needed. It will be difficult for a party seeking disclosure of materials used before trial to make a proffer. However, if the party has obtained disclosure and has unsuccessfully sought to admit these materials at trial, the party should submit the materials as an offer of proof.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence used to refresh recollection, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Inadmissible Item Used at Trial to Refresh Recollection

Exhibit [number] was shown to the witness for the purpose of refreshing memory. The witness has indicated that the exhibit did refresh memory. The [plaintiff, prosecutor, or defendant] suggests that the witness's memory was not refreshed and that the witness simply repeated the contents of the exhibit. The contents of the exhibit may not be used to prove any facts in dispute in this case. If the contents did refresh the witness's recollection, you may consider the witness's refreshed testimony and give it the weight you deem proper. If, however, the witness merely repeated the contents of the document and did not testify from a refreshed memory, you must disregard that part of the witness's testimony that merely repeated the contents of the document. You may consider in deciding whether memory actually was refreshed the testimony given by the witness before the exhibit was shown, the words used by the witness after seeing the exhibit, the contents of the exhibit, the witness's level of confidence, the witness's ability to recall events unrelated to the contents of the exhibit, and any other circumstances that you find helpful. You may consider the fact that a witness pretended to remember in assessing the overall credibility of the witness.

[2] Admissible Item Used at Trial to Refresh Recollection

Exhibit [number] [is or will be] in evidence, and you may decide how much weight to give it. This exhibit was shown to the witness for the purpose of refreshing memory. The witness has indicated that the exhibit did refresh memory. The [plaintiff, prosecutor, or defendant] suggests that the witness's memory was not refreshed and that the witness simply repeated the contents of the exhibit. If the contents did refresh the witness's recollection, you may consider the witness's refreshed testimony and give it the weight you deem proper. If, however, the witness merely repeated the contents of the document and did not testify from a refreshed memory, you must disregard that part of the witness's testimony that merely repeated the contents of the document. You may consider in deciding whether memory actually was refreshed the testimony given by the witness before the exhibit was shown, the words used by the witness after seeing the exhibit, the contents of the exhibit, the witness's level of confidence, the witness's ability to recall events unrelated to the contents of the exhibit, and any other circumstances that you find helpful. You may consider the fact that a witness pretended to remember in assessing the overall credibility of the witness.

[3] Inadmissible Item Used Before Trial to Refresh Recollection

The evidence is that exhibit [number] was used by the witness for the purpose of preparing to testify at trial. The witness stated that he based his testimony on his memory of events not on the contents of the exhibit that he used to prepare for testifying. The [plaintiff, prosecutor, or defendant] suggests that the witness's memory was not refreshed and that the witness simply repeated the contents of the exhibit. The contents of the exhibit may not be used to prove any facts in dispute in this case. If you find that the witness testified from actual memory, it does not matter that he reviewed the exhibit and you may consider the witness's refreshed testimony and give it the weight you deem proper. If you find, however, that the witness did not testify from memory and merely repeated the contents of the exhibit, you must disregard that part of the testimony that merely repeated the contents of the exhibit. You may consider in deciding whether the exhibit refreshed the witness's memory the contents of any statements made by the witness before seeing the exhibit, the contents of the exhibit, the words used by the witness while testifying, the witness's level of confidence, the witness's ability to recall events unrelated to the contents of the exhibit, and any other circumstances that you find helpful. You may consider the fact that a witness pretended to remember in assessing the overall credibility of the witness.

[4] Admissible Item Used Before Trial to Refresh Recollection

Exhibit [number] [is or will be] in evidence, and you may decide how much weight to give it. [Name of witness] stated that he used this exhibit for the purpose of preparing to testify at trial. [Name of witness] also testified that he based his testimony on his memory of events not on the contents of the exhibit that he used to prepare for testifying. The [plaintiff, prosecutor, or defendant] suggests that the witness's memory was not refreshed and that the witness simply repeated the contents of the exhibit, If you find that the witness testified from actual memory, it does not matter that he reviewed the exhibit and you may consider the witness's testimony when you find the facts in dispute. If you find, however, that the witness's memory was not refreshed and that the witness merely repeated the contents of the exhibit, you must disregard that part of the testimony that merely repeated the contents of the exhibit. You may consider in deciding whether the exhibit refreshed the witness's memory the contents of any statements made by the witness before seeing the exhibit, the contents of the exhibit, the words used by the witness while testifying, the witness's level of confidence, the witness's ability to recall events unrelated to the contents of the exhibit, and any other circumstances that you find helpful. You may consider the fact that a witness pretended to remember in assessing the overall credibility of the witness.

CHAPTER 6 DIRECT AND CROSS-EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES; IMPEACHMENT AND REHABILITATION

6-6 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 6-12

6-12 Impeachment -- Prior Inconsistent Statements.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 607. Who May Impeach

The credibility of a witness may be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness.

Rule 613. Prior Statements of Witnesses

(a) Examining witness concerning prior statement. -- In examining a witness concerning a prior statement made by the witness, whether written or not, the statement need not be shown nor its contents disclosed to the witness at that time, but on request the same shall be shown or disclosed to opposing counsel.

(b) Extrinsic evidence of prior inconsistent statement of witness. -- Extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement by a witness is not admissible unless the witness is afforded an opportunity to explain or deny the same and the opposite party is afforded an opportunity to interrogate the witness thereon, or the interests of justice otherwise require. This provision does not apply to admissions of a party-opponent as defined in rule 801(d)(2).

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

* * *

(d) Statements which are not hearsay. -- A statement is not hearsay if --

(1) Prior statement by witness. -- The declarant testifies at the trial or hearing and is subject to cross-examination concerning the statement, and the statement is (A) inconsistent with the declarant's testimony, and was given under oath subject to the penalty of perjury at a trial, hearing, or other proceeding, or in a deposition, or (B) consistent with the declarant's testimony and is offered to rebut an express or implied charge against the declarant of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive, or (C) one of identification of a person made after perceiving the person; * * *.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. Although Rule 613 does not explicitly state that prior inconsistent statements are a permissible form of impeachment, the rule assumes that they are and provides the procedures that must be followed when a party seeks to use a prior inconsistent statement for impeachment purposes.

2. Subdivision (a) eliminates the rule laid down in Queen Caroline's case that a party seeking to impeach a witness with a prior written inconsistent statement must show it to the witness before asking questions about it. Now impeaching counsel must, upon request, show it to opposing counsel, but not to the witness. There is no restriction upon impeaching counsel's showing the statement to the witness, but the rule permits impeaching counsel to choose when to do so.

3. Subdivision (b) provides that a party who wants to offer extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement must give the witness who made the statement the opportunity to deny making the statement or to explain it. Whereas the common-law requirement was that the foundation had to be laid before extrinsic evidence could be used, Rule 613(b) eases the foundation requirement and permits impeaching counsel to afford a witness an opportunity to deny or explain after extrinsic evidence is presented. The rule does not indicate whose burden it is to assure that the witness will be present so that the opportunity to deny or explain will be available. The party who holds back using an inconsistent statement during cross-examination may surprise the other side with the statement after the witness has been excused, and argument may occur as to who should be responsible if the witness is not available. To avoid this argument, it would be prudent for the trial judge to consider adopting a standing rule that any party who plans to use an inconsistent statement to impeach a witness and who intends to offer the inconsistent statement before providing the witness with the opportunity to deny or explain it must assure that the witness will be available to be recalled. Counsel may suggest that the trial judge adopt such a rule for any particular case if no standing rule is in effect.

4. Rule 613 governs impeachment with an inconsistent statement, while Rule 801(d)(1)(A) governs the substantive use of inconsistent statements. The same foundation -- i.e., opportunity for witness to explain or deny -- must be laid for a statement that qualifies for admission under Rule 801(d)(1)(A) as for a Rule 613 statement.

5. The direct examiner may impeach a witness and thereby "remove the sting" of anticipated impeachment by the cross-examiner. The direct examiner may tactically decide to offer impeachment evidence during direct examination in the hope that, by volunteering facts that might be damaging if withheld on direct and exposed on cross-examination, the credibility of the witness and the direct examiner both will be enhanced. Rule 607 permits the direct examiner to make this choice. When a motion in limine is granted or denied, the losing counsel must be careful not to waive any right to appeal by anticipating opposing counsel's actions. For example, when the defendant in a criminal case moves to exclude evidence of a prior conviction under Rule 609 and the trial judge denies the motion, the defendant waives the right to appeal by introducing the prior conviction during direct examination. The Supreme Court so held in Ohler v. United States, 529 U.S. 753 (2000) .

6. There is a difference between (a) calling a witness who has a positive contribution to make to the direct examiner's case and impeaching the witness, and (b) calling a witness who has no positive contribution to make in order to elicit prior inconsistent statements of the witness that are not admissible for their truth. In (a), the direct examiner is seeking the legitimate help of the witness and seeking also to elicit the impeachment evidence to protect the witness from cross-examination. In (b), the direct examiner is seeking to put prior inconsistent statements into the case that would never be admitted if the other party chose not to call the witness (which is likely if the other party knows the witness has made prior inconsistent statements). A party may not legitimately call a witness knowing that the witness will have nothing positive to say in order to offer prior inconsistent statements not admissible for their truth as impeachment evidence, because the party has no legitimate reason to call the witness. A party who legitimately calls a witness may be able to elicit prior inconsistent statements not admissible for their truth that could be used by a cross-examiner to impeach the witness.

7. In contrast to example (b), a party may call a witness knowing that the witness will be unfavorable with the intent of offering prior inconsistent statements of the witness that are admissible for their truth under Rule 801(d)(1)(A). These prior inconsistent statements are substantive evidence. A party who calls a witness for the purpose of eliciting substantive evidence acts properly.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to prior inconsistent statements. Unless a timely objection is made, the statements will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to prior inconsistent statements the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I have considered the objection to the use of these prior statements. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the statements [are or are not] sufficiently inconsistent with the witness's trial testimony to be probative, and that the possible prejudicial effect of these statements, particularly the danger they will be used as substantive evidence, [does or does not] substantially outweigh their probative value for impeachment purposes. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to prior inconsistent statements, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Prior Inconsistent Statements -- Not Admissible for Their Truth

Any party may bring out any relevant information about a witness to assist you in assessing the witness's credibility. The [insert party] has asked this witness about prior statements of the witness that might be inconsistent with the witness's testimony in this trial. You must decide whether the witness made prior statements, whether they are inconsistent with the witness's testimony, and whether any prior statements cause you to doubt the trial testimony of the witness. It is important that you consider any of these prior statements of a witness only for the purpose of assessing the credibility of the testimony given in this trial by the witness.

[2] Prior Inconsistent Statements -- Admissible as Substantive Evidence

Any party may bring out any relevant information about a witness to assist you in assessing the witness's credibility. The [insert party] has asked this witness about prior statements of the witness that might be inconsistent with the witness's testimony in this trial. These prior statements were made under oath, subject to penalty of perjury, and in a formal proceeding like this trial. You may give these statements the same weight that you would give trial testimony by a witness. If you find these prior statements to be inconsistent with the trial testimony, you must decide what parts, if any, you believe of the trial testimony and the prior statements.

[3] Prior Inconsistent Statements Not Admissible for Their Truth -- Witness Denies Statements

Any party may bring out any relevant information about a witness to assist you in assessing the witness's credibility. The [insert party] has asked this witness about prior statements of the witness that might be inconsistent with the witness's testimony in this trial. You must decide whether the witness made prior statements, whether they are inconsistent with the witness's testimony, and whether any prior statements cause you to doubt the trial testimony of the witness. It is important that you consider any of these prior statements of a witness only for the purpose of assessing the credibility of the testimony given in this trial by the witness. You may consider the witness's denial of making statements in assessing the witness's overall credibility.

[4] Prior Inconsistent Statements Admissible for Their Truth -- Witness Denies Statements

Any party may bring out any relevant information about a witness to assist you in assessing the witness's credibility. The [insert party] has asked this witness about prior statements of the witness that were made under oath, subject to penalty of perjury, and in a formal proceeding like this trial. You must decide whether the witness made these statements and whether they are inconsistent with the witness's testimony in this trial. You may give any statements that were made and that are inconsistent the same weight that you would give trial testimony. You must decide what parts, if any, you believe of the trial testimony and of any prior inconsistent statements that were made.

6-13 Judge Calls Witness.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 614. Calling and Interrogation of Witnesses by Court

(a) Calling by court. -- The court may, on its own motion or at the suggestion of a party, call witnesses, and all parties are entitled to cross-examine witnesses thus called.

(b) Interrogation by court. -- The court may interrogate witnesses, whether called by itself or by a party.

(c) Objections. -- Objections to the calling of witnesses by the court or to interrogation by it may be made at the time or at the next available opportunity when the jury is not present.

Rule 706. Court Appointed Experts

(a) Appointment. -- The court may on its own motion or on the motion of any party enter an order to show cause why expert witnesses should not be appointed, and may request the parties to submit nominations. The court may appoint any expert witnesses agreed upon by the parties, and may appoint expert witnesses of its own selection. An expert witness shall not be appointed by the court unless the witness consents to act. A witness so appointed shall be informed of the witness' duties by the court in writing, a copy of which shall be filed with the clerk, or at a conference in which the parties shall have opportunity to participate. A witness so appointed shall advise the parties of the witness' findings, if any; the witness' deposition may be taken by any party; and the witness may be called to testify by the court or any party. The witness shall be subject to cross-examination by each party, including a party calling the witness.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 614(a) provides that the court may call a witness to testify, and all parties may cross-examine any witness called by the court. The rule does not set forth guidelines as to when the court should consider calling witnesses. It does not require the court to call any witness.

2. The court is free to indicate to the parties its interest in having a witness testify and to provide the parties with an opportunity to call the witness.

3. Rule 706(a) provides specifically that the court may call a court-appointed expert to testify, and that all parties may cross-examine any court-appointed expert called either by the court or by another party.

4. Like Rule 605, which provides that the judge may not be a witness while judging a trial and that a party may object outside the presence of the jury if the judge proposes to give testimony, Rule 614 permits objections to the judge's calling or questioning witnesses to be made outside the hearing of the jury. A prudent party should make an objection to the judge's calling a witness as soon as possible during the jury's absence to avoid waiving the objection.

5. Nothing in Rule 614 precludes a party from objecting in the jury's presence. In some instances counsel may be prepared to risk confronting the judge before the jury and to object to the court's calling or questioning a witness in the hope that the court may reconsider its proposed course of action before any damage occurs.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to the judge's calling a witness. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

The trial judge has authority under Rule 611(a) and 614 to call witnesses. Because it is unusual for the judge to call a witness, the judge may want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the reasons why the court calls a particular witness. For example, the judge may say: [Name of party] requested that the court call [name of witness]. [Name of party] contends that [name of witness] can provide relevant testimony, but that certain facts surrounding [name of witness] may prejudice any party who calls the witness to the stand. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that by calling the witness as a court's witness and providing both parties a full opportunity to examine the witness, the probative value of the witness's testimony will be enhanced while avoiding unfair prejudice to any party.

Regarding a court-appointed expert, the judge might say: The court determined that it should call [name of witness] as the court's witness. The court is aware of the danger that a jury may give a court-appointed expert's testimony undue weight, and the court has determined that it is preferable that neither party be seen as calling the court's expert as its witness. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that by calling the witness a court's witness, instructing the jury on the witness's role in the case, and providing both parties a full opportunity to examine the witness, the probative value of the witness's testimony will be enhanced while avoiding unfair prejudice to any party.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has a particular interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions when calling a court-appointed expert, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to the court's calling a witness, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper role of the witness.

[1] Court Calls Lay Witness

I am about to call a witness to testify as the court's witness; this means that neither party is calling the witness. The fact that I call the witness does not indicate that the witness's testimony is any more important or any more likely to be true than the testimony of any other witness. Nor does the fact that I ask questions of the witness indicate that these questions are any more important than the questions asked by the lawyers or that the answers given by the witness to my questions are any more likely to be true or entitled to weight than the answers to the questions asked by the lawyers.

[2] Court Calls Expert Witness

I am about to call a witness to testify as the court's witness; this means that neither party is calling the witness. The fact that I call the witness does not indicate that the witness's testimony is any more important or any more likely to be true than the testimony of any other witness. Nor does the fact that I ask questions of the witness indicate that these questions are any more important than the questions asked by the lawyers or that the answers given by the witness to my questions are any more likely to be true or entitled to weight than the answers to the questions asked by the lawyers. This witness was asked by the court to testify and was not retained by either party. The fact that I asked the witness to testify does not indicate that the testimony is more likely to be accurate and complete than the testimony of witnesses retained and called by the parties. However, you may consider the fact that neither party hired this witness to testify in assessing the witness's credibility.

[3] Counsel Objects to Court's Calling Witness or Asking Questions in Jury's Presence

Counsel have the responsibility to object when they believe I am improperly calling a witness or asking questions. You should not draw any adverse inference against counsel or a party from an objection whether the objection is sustained or overruled.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 614. Calling and Interrogation of Witnesses by Court

(a) Calling by court. -- The court may, on its own motion or at the suggestion of a party, call witnesses, and all parties are entitled to cross-examine witnesses thus called.

(b) Interrogation by court. -- The court may interrogate witnesses, whether called by itself or by a party.

(c) Objections. -- Objections to the calling of witnesses by the court or to interrogation by it may be made at the time or at the next available opportunity when the jury is not present.

Rule 706. Court Appointed Experts

(a) Appointment. -- The court may on its own motion or on the motion of any party enter an order to show cause why expert witnesses should not be appointed, and may request the parties to submit nominations. The court may appoint any expert witnesses agreed upon by the parties, and may appoint expert witnesses of its own selection. An expert witness shall not be appointed by the court unless the witness consents to act. A witness so appointed shall be informed of the witness' duties by the court in writing, a copy of which shall be filed with the clerk, or at a conference in which the parties shall have opportunity to participate. A witness so appointed shall advise the parties of the witness' findings, if any; the witness' deposition may be taken by any party; and the witness may be called to testify by the court or any party. The witness shall be subject to cross-examination by each party, including a party calling the witness.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. The court is permitted to ask questions of any witness, whether the witness was called by a party or by the court. Nothing in the rule requires that the court ask questions. The court is free to suggest that counsel may want to pursue an inquiry or clarify matters and to leave the questioning to them.

2. Like Rule 605, which provides that the judge may not be a witness while judging a trial and that a party may object outside the presence of the jury if the judge proposes to give testimony, Rule 614 permits objections to the judge's calling or questioning witnesses to be made outside the hearing of the jury. A prudent party should make an objection to the judge's questioning of a witness as soon as possible during the jury's absence to avoid waiving the objection.

3. Nothing in Rule 614 precludes a party from objecting in the jury's presence. In some instances counsel may be prepared to risk confronting the judge before the jury and to object to the court's questioning a witness in the hope that the court may reconsider its proposed course of action before any damage occurs.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to questions by the court. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

The trial judge rules on the permissibility of the court's questions under Rule 614. In ruling on objections, the judge might find it helpful to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: [Name of party] has objected to questions asked by the court of [name of witness]. The court asked these questions [explain reason: to clarify the witness's testimony, to clear up an ambiguity in the testimony, to repeat testimony that was difficult to hear]. The court invites [name of objecting party] to request an appropriate limiting instruction to assure that it suffers no unfair prejudice from the court's questions.

Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has a particular interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions when an objection is made to the court's questions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to the court's questions, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Court Questions Witness

The fact that I ask questions of a witness does not indicate that these questions are any more important than the questions asked by the lawyers or that the answers given by the witness to my questions are any more likely to be true or entitled to weight than the answers to the questions asked by the lawyers.

[2] Counsel Objects to Court's Questions in Jury's Presence

Counsel have the responsibility to object to any questions that I ask that they believe are improper. You should not draw any adverse inference against counsel or a party from an objection whether or not the objection is sustained or overruled.

6-15 Sequestration Violation.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 615. Exclusion of Witnesses

At the request of a party the court shall order witnesses excluded so that they cannot hear the testimony of other witnesses, and it may make the order of its own motion. This rule does not authorize exclusion of (1) a party who is a natural person, or (2) an officer or employee of a party which is not a natural person designated as its representative by its attorney, (3) a person whose presence is shown by a party to be essential to the presentation of the party's cause, or (4) a person authorized by statute to be present.

[b] Key Points.

1. Any party has a right to invoke the sequestration power of the court. The court "shall" exclude witnesses upon request. The court also may order sequestration on its own.

2. There are four classes of witnesses exempt from a sequestration order: natural persons who are parties; a designated representative who is an officer or employee of an entity; persons whose presence during the testimony of other witnesses is shown to be essential, which often includes expert witnesses; and persons who are authorized by statute to be present, such as the alleged victim in certain criminal prosecutions. The Advisory Committee's Note to Rule 615 indicates that it contemplated that agents who handled transactions and experts who are needed to assist counsel would be candidates for exemption from sequestration. Logic suggests that experts who will be asked to offer an opinion based upon testimony or other evidence also might reasonably be exempted from sequestration.

3. Rule 615 only provides that the court shall order witnesses excluded so that they cannot hear the testimony of other witnesses. Counsel who want a stronger sequestration order should ask for the specific provisions that they want the court to enforce. For example, counsel may ask the court to order that no witnesses may talk with other witnesses about their testimony after they have testified, that no transcripts of other witnesses' testimony may be shown to a witness, and that counsel may not disclose the substance of a witness's testimony to a witness who has not yet testified.

4. The court has broad power to enforce its sequestration orders. It may hold witnesses or counsel in contempt for willful violations, it may permit testimony and instruct the jury about a sequestration violation, and in extreme cases it may exclude the testimony of a witness who has violated an order.

5. Technically, the question whether a sequestration order was violated is for the court under Rule 104(a). If the court finds that there was no violation, the court may bar questioning before the jury about an alleged violation to avoid confusing the jury about sequestration, which is a legal term with which most jurors will have no experience. If the judge decides to exclude a witness as a sanction, there will be no need for a jury instruction. Difficulty may arise if the judge concludes that there is a factual dispute underlying a violation, and the judge decides that the jury should hear the facts in order to fairly assess the credibility of the witness. In such a case the judge may decide as a matter of law that a sequestration violation occurred if certain facts are true and so instruct the jury. The judge might leave to the jury the ultimate task of finding the facts, since they are relevant to assessing credibility and to determining the weight to be given to testimony.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to testimony by a witness who has violated a sequestration order. Unless a timely objection is made, the testimony will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to testimony because of an alleged sequestration violation, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I have considered all evidence concerning the objection that the witness violated the court's sequestration order. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the witness [did or did not] violate the order.

If the court finds that the witness did violate a sequestration order, the question arises as to what the appropriate remedy is. The court may want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury its reasons for choosing a remedy with a statement like the following: I have found that [name of witness] violated the sequestration order. I have considered the nature of the violation, i.e., the degree to which it was intentional; the extent to which the witness was exposed to the testimony of other witnesses; the importance of the witness to the case, and the extent to which differences between this witness's testimony and that of previous witnesses might affect the outcome of the case; any previous statements by this witness; and the ability of [name of opposing party] to demonstrate on cross-examination how exposure to previous testimony may have changed the witness's testimony. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the most appropriate remedy for the sequestration violation is [describe court's choice of remedy].

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

[1] Sequestration Violation -- Conceded or Found by Court

The court entered an order that precluded witnesses who have not yet testified from hearing or learning the testimony of previous witnesses. [Name of witness] violated this order. You may consider the fact that this witness violated the court's order and [heard or learned] of another witness's testimony in evaluating [name of witness's] credibility and deciding how much weight to give to this witness's testimony. You may consider whether the violation was willful on the part of [name of witness] or counsel, the extent to which [name of witness] was exposed to previous testimony, the extent to which the testimony of [name of witness] was the same as or different from previous testimony to which [name of witness] was exposed, the extent to which [name of witness's] testimony was consistent or inconsistent with prior statements, and any other factor that you find helpful.

[2] Facts Surrounding Alleged Violation of Sequestration Order Disputed

The court entered an order that precluded witnesses who have not yet testified from hearing or learning the testimony of previous witnesses. The [plaintiff or defendant] claims that [name of witness] violated this order by [insert summary of the claim -- e.g., reading a transcript of the testimony of another witness]. I instruct you that my order was violated if this is true. The [plaintiff or defendant] denies that any violation occurred. You have heard the evidence regarding the alleged violation. It is for you to decide whether or not the claim made by the [plaintiff or defendant] is true. If you find that it is true, you may consider the fact that this witness violated the court's order and [heard or learned] of another witness's testimony in evaluating [name of witness's] credibility and deciding how much weight to give to this witness's testimony. You may consider whether the violation was willful on the part of [name of witness] or counsel, the extent to which [name of witness] was exposed to previous testimony, the extent to which the testimony of [name of witness] was the same as or different from previous testimony to which [name of witness] was exposed, the extent to which [name of witness's] testimony was consistent or inconsistent with prior statements, and any other factor that you find helpful. You may consider the fact that a witness falsely denied violating an order in assessing the overall credibility of the witness.

CHAPTER 7 OPINION AND EXPERT TESTIMONY

6-7 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 7-1

7-1 Lay Opinion Testimony.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 701. Opinion Testimony by Lay Witnesses

If the witness is not testifying as an expert, the witness' testimony in the form of opinions or inferences is limited to those opinions or inferences which are (a) rationally based on the perception of the witness, and (b) helpful to a clear understanding of the witness' testimony or the determination of a fact in issue, and (c) not based on scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge within the scope of Rule 702.

Rule 704. Opinion on Ultimate Issue

(a) Except as provided in subdivision (b), testimony in the form of an opinion or inference otherwise admissible is not objectionable because it embraces an ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact.

(b) No expert witness testifying with respect to the mental state or condition of a defendant in a criminal case may state an opinion or inference as to whether the defendant did or did not have the mental state or condition constituting an element of the crime charged or of a defense thereto. Such ultimate issues are matters for the trier of fact alone.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 701 recognizes that testimony by a lay witness that includes opinions or inferences may be of assistance to the trier of fact and may be admitted provided that the opinions or inferences are both rationally based on the perceptions of the witness and helpful in understanding the testimony of the witness or resolving a disputed issue.

2. Rule 704(a) provides that testimony is not rendered inadmissible because it addresses an ultimate issue that the trier of fact is called upon to decide. But, the testimony must be otherwise admissible, which means that it must be rationally based on the perceptions of the witness and helpful, as required by Rule 701.

3. It is not always clear when an opinion or inference of a witness will be helpful to the trier of fact. As a general rule, the witness is not permitted to tell the jury how the witness would decide a disputed issue. Rather, the witness is expected to communicate as completely as possible the information that arises from the witness's perceptions of events or conditions. To the extent that the witness adds information that the trier of fact can use to resolve an issue, the witness's testimony is likely to be helpful.

4. Rule 701 was amended effective December 1, 2000, to clearly provide that expert testimony that should be offered under Rule 702 cannot be smuggled in under Rule 701. One principal reason for the amendment was to prevent parties from subverting the discovery requirements concerning expert witnesses found in Fed. R. Civ. P. 26.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to lay opinion testimony. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of lay opinion evidence under Rule 104(a), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: I have considered all the evidence presented to me with regard to the objection made to the lay opinion testimony. The party offering the testimony must show that it is rationally based on the perceptions of the witness and helpful to a clear understanding of the witness's testimony or the determination of a disputed issue. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the [describe the lay opinion evidence in dispute] [is or is not] rationally based on the perceptions of the witness, [is or is not] helpful to a clear understanding of the witness's testimony [and/or] a determination of an issue in dispute, and [is or is not] expert testimony that must be assessed under Rule 702. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude lay opinion evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection to lay opinion testimony, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence. For example, a party may not object to lay opinion testimony, but may want the judge to explain to the jury something about opinion testimony and the respective roles of witness and jury.

[1] Opinions and Inferences Generally

Sometimes a witness testifies in the form of opinions or inferences. The witness does so in order to provide you with all of the information that might help you resolve disputed issues. It is important for you to keep in mind that the witness is not the trier of fact. You are the trier of fact. It is for you to decide whether the testimony of a witness, including any opinions or inferences of the witness, assists you in finding the facts and deciding the issues that are in dispute. And it is for you to decide what weight to give the testimony of a witness, including any opinions or inferences of the witness.

[2] Opinions on Ultimate Issues

Sometimes a witness testifies in the form of opinions or inferences. The witness does so in order to provide you with all of the information that might help you resolve disputed issues. A witness sometimes expresses an opinion in an effort to provide as much information for your use as possible on one of the issues that you must decide. It is important for you to keep in mind that the witness is not the trier of fact. You are the trier of fact. It is your job, not the witness's job, to decide the disputed issues in this case. It is for you to decide whether the testimony of a witness, including any opinions or inferences of the witness, assists you in finding the facts and deciding the issues that are in dispute. And it is for you to decide what weight to give the testimony of a witness, including any opinions or inferences of the witness.

Rule 615. Exclusion of Witnesses

At the request of a party the court shall order witnesses excluded so that they cannot hear the testimony of other witnesses, and it may make the order of its own motion. This rule does not authorize exclusion of (1) a party who is a natural person, or (2) an officer or employee of a party which is not a natural person designated as its representative by its attorney, (3) a person whose presence is shown by a party to be essential to the presentation of the party's cause, or (4) a person authorized by statute to be present.

Rule 702. Testimony by Experts

If scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education, may testify thereto in the form of an opinion or otherwise, if (1) the testimony is based upon sufficient facts or data, (2) the testimony is the product of reliable principles and methods, and (3) the witness has applied the principles and methods reliably to the facts of the case.

Rule 703. Bases of Opinion Testimony by Experts

The facts or data in the particular case upon which an expert bases an opinion or inference may be those perceived by or made known to the expert at or before the hearing. If of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the particular field in forming opinions or inferences upon the subject, the facts or data need not be admissible in evidence in order for the opinion or inference to be admitted. Facts or data that are otherwise inadmissible shall not be disclosed to the jury by the proponent of the opinion or inference unless the court determines that their probative value in assisting the jury to evaluate the expert's opinion substantially outweighs their prejudicial effect.

Rule 704. Opinion on Ultimate Issue

(a) Except as provided in subdivision (b), testimony in the form of an opinion or inference otherwise admissible is not objectionable because it embraces an ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact.

(b) No expert witness testifying with respect to the mental state or condition of a defendant in a criminal case may state an opinion or inference as to whether the defendant did or did not have the mental state or condition constituting an element of the crime charged or of a defense thereto. Such ultimate issues are matters for the trier of fact alone.

Rule 705. Disclosure of Facts or Data Underlying Expert Opinion

The expert may testify in terms of opinion or inference and give reasons therefor without first testifying to the underlying facts or data, unless the court requires otherwise. The expert may in any event be required to disclose the underlying facts or data on cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. The trial judge is the gatekeeper when expert witnesses are called to testify and an objection is made to their testimony. Under the Supreme Court's decision in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993) , the trial judge generally decides whether the expert's testimony is relevant to the issues in dispute and sufficiently reliable to be admitted. Daubert was a scientific evidence case, but the Supreme Court extended its requirements in Kumho Tire Co., Ltd. v. Carmichael, 526 U.S. 137 (1999) , which held that the gatekeeping function is one that the trial judge performs as to all experts, although the factors the judge will consider will differ along with the nature of the expertise claimed by the expert. When the trial judge performs the gatekeeping function, appellate courts will defer and apply an "abuse of discretion" standard on appeal from rulings admitting or excluding expert testimony. General Electric Co. v. Joiner, 522 U.S. 136 (1997) .

2. The trial judge performs the gatekeeping role under Rule 104(a) and thus may consider any evidence (except privileged information) in determining the admissibility of expert testimony. Any factual disputes are resolved under a preponderance of the evidence standard. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) .

3. Although some judges state before the jury that an expert is "qualified," the better practice is for the trial judge not to indicate to the jury findings regarding a rule of evidence. The judge can overrule any objection to expert testimony and permit an expert to testify without placing before the jury the court's imprimatur as to a witness's expertise.

4. An expert witness may testify in the form of an opinion or "otherwise." The "otherwise" is a reminder that an expert may be asked to give background information instead of an opinion.

5. An expert may testify on the basis of information provided at the trial or before. Some experts will be exempt from sequestration under Rule 615 and will testify on the basis of hearing the trial evidence. Other experts will testify on the basis of hypothetical questions. Some experts will testify on the basis of reviewing before trial facts or data that either are admitted at trial or are inadmissible but are the type of information upon which similar experts rely in forming opinions or drawing inferences with respect to that subject matter.

6. Just as the trial judge must determine whether an expert qualifies under Rule 702 and whether the basis of the expert's opinion is sufficient under Daubert, the trial judge also must decide whether an expert may rely upon inadmissible data in rendering an opinion. This is also a Rule 104(a) ruling. The last sentence of Rule 703 was added on December 1, 2000, to make very clear that the fact that a witness may rely upon inadmissible facts or data does not mean that the jury must hear the inadmissible matter. Under the amended Rule, the judge may not permit the jury to hear inadmissible facts or data unless the probative value of the evidence in evaluating the expert testimony substantially outweighs the prejudicial effect of the evidence (i.e., the likelihood it may be used as substantive evidence by the trier of fact). This is a reverse-Rule 403 balancing test. Under Rule 703, in close cases the jury does not hear the inadmissible facts or data. Even when the judge decides that it might be important for the jury to know something about the basis for the witness's opinion, the trial judge may put limits on the details that the jury is permitted to hear when an expert relies on otherwise inadmissible evidence.

7. Rule 705 permits counsel to offer expert testimony in the way that it is most likely to be understood, with the facts either preceding or following opinions. The court may, however, require that the facts be presented first.

8. Although Rule 705 states that an inquiry into the facts upon which an expert relies "may" be permitted on cross-examination, the court is almost certain to permit a cross-examiner latitude to ask the expert about facts or data upon which an opinion is based. The word "may" suggests, however, that reasonable time limits and limitations on cumulative testimony are permissible.

9. Rule 704(b) places a limit on expert testimony regarding the mental state of a criminal accused at the time an alleged crime was committed.

10. Rule 615(3) provides authority for a trial judge to permit an expert to remain in the courtroom during trial, but the party who wants to exempt the expert from a sequestration order must demonstrate, if there is an objection, that the presence of the expert is essential. Prudent counsel will not permit an expert in the courtroom until the trial judge has ruled that the expert is essential and thus may be present while other witnesses testify.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to expert testimony. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. However, a timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of expert testimony under Rule 104(a), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: I have considered all the evidence presented to me with regard to the objection to this expert testimony. The party offering the testimony must show that it constitutes scientific, technical, or specialized knowledge that will assist the jury in understanding the evidence or resolving disputed issues and that the witness is qualified to provide such testimony. I have considered both the relevance of the evidence, including its fit in this case, and the reliability of such evidence in making my ruling. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the [describe the expert opinion evidence in dispute] [does or does not] constitute scientific, technical, or specialized knowledge, it [will or will not] assist the jury in this case, the witness [is or is not] qualified to provide such testimony, the testimony [is or is not] based upon sufficient facts or data, the testimony [is or is not] the product of reliable principles and methods, and the witness [has or has not] applied the principles and methods reliably to the facts of the case. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

If the expert relies upon evidence not otherwise admissible, the trial judge may also consider stating for the record the following: The witness has relied upon facts or data that are not otherwise admissible in evidence. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that these facts or data [are or are not] of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the field. I have carefully considered the extent to which such facts or data should be admitted and the danger that they might be used for their truth rather than to explain the witness's opinion. I find that the probative value of the inadmissible facts or data in assisting the jury to evaluate the expert's opinion [does or does not] substantially outweigh the prejudicial effect of permitting the jury to hear the facts or data. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude expert evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection to the expert testimony, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence. For example, a party may not object to expert testimony, but may want the judge to explain to the jury something about expert or opinion testimony and the respective roles of witness and jury.

The following instructions can easily be requested by parties and readily be adopted by trial judges to explain trial developments to the jury.

[1] Qualifications of Witness

Some witnesses who testify claim to have special knowledge, skill, training, experience, or education that enable them to offer opinions or inferences concerning issues in dispute. The fact that a witness has knowledge, skill, training, experience, or education does not require you to believe the witness, to give such a witness's testimony any more weight than that of any other witness, or to give it any weight at all. It is important for you to keep in mind that the witness is not the trier of fact. You are the trier of fact. It is for you to decide whether the testimony of a witness, including any opinions or inferences of the witness, assists you in finding the facts and deciding the issues that are in dispute. And, it is for you to decide what weight to give the testimony of a witness, including any opinions or inferences of the witness.

[2] Reliance on Inadmissible Facts or Data

This witness's opinion is based on certain facts or data that the court has determined are admissible only to explain the basis of the expert's opinion. These facts or data are [describe in summary the inadmissible facts or data]. You may consider these facts or data when you assess the witness's credibility and you decide what weight to give the opinion that the witness offered. You must not use this information for any other purpose.

[3] Exemption from Sequestration

You might have noticed that most witnesses were excluded from the courtroom while other witnesses testified, but that [name of witness] was present during the testimony of some or all witnesses. The court permitted [name of witness] to be present because it was expected that this witness's testimony would refer to that of other witnesses. You should ignore the fact that this witness was present in comparing her credibility with that of other witnesses. She is neither more nor less credible simply because she was allowed to be present when other witnesses testified.

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
CHAPTER 7 OPINION AND EXPERT TESTIMONY

6-7 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 7-3

7-3 Court-Appointed Experts.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 614. Calling and Interrogation of Witnesses by Court

(a) Calling by court. -- The court may, on its own motion or at the suggestion of a party, call witnesses, and all parties are entitled to cross-examine witnesses thus called.

(b) Interrogation by court. -- The court may interrogate witnesses, whether called by itself or by a party.

(c) Objections. -- Objections to the calling of witnesses by the court or to interrogation by it may be made at the time or at the next available opportunity when the jury is not present.

Rule 702. Testimony by Experts

If scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education, may testify thereto in the form of an opinion or otherwise, if (1) the testimony is based upon sufficient facts or data, (2) the testimony is the product of reliable principles and methods, and (3) the witness has applied the principles and methods reliably to the facts of the case.

Rule 703. Bases of Opinion Testimony by Experts

The facts or data in the particular case upon which an expert bases an opinion or inference may be those perceived by or made known to the expert at or before the hearing. If of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the particular field in forming opinions or inferences upon the subject, the facts or data need not be admissible in evidence in order for the opinion or inference to be admitted. Facts or data that are otherwise inadmissible shall not be disclosed to the jury by the proponent of the opinion or inference unless the court determines that their probative value in assisting the jury to evaluate the expert's opinion substantially outweighs their prejudicial effect.

Rule 706. Court Appointed Experts

(a) Appointment. -- The court may on its own motion or on the motion of any party enter an order to show cause why expert witnesses should not be appointed, and may request the parties to submit nominations. The court may appoint any expert witnesses agreed upon by the parties, and may appoint expert witnesses of its own selection. An expert witness shall not be appointed by the court unless the witness consents to act. A witness so appointed shall be informed of the witness' duties by the court in writing, a copy of which shall be filed with the clerk, or at a conference in which the parties shall have opportunity to participate. A witness so appointed shall advise the parties of the witness' findings, if any; the witness' deposition may be taken by any party; and the witness may be called to testify by the court or any party. The witness shall be subject to cross-examination by each party, including a party calling the witness.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 614(a) and Rule 706(a) provide that the court may call a court-appointed witness to testify, and all parties may cross-examine any witness called by the court. The rules do not set forth guidelines as to when the court should consider calling witnesses and when it should leave the decision whether to call an expert to the parties. Neither rule requires the court to call any witness.

2. The court is free to indicate to the parties its interest in having a witness testify and to provide the parties with an opportunity to call the witness.

3. Rule 706(a) provides specifically that all parties may cross-examine any court-appointed expert called either by the court or by another party. Rule 706 does not explicitly state that the court may question a court-appointed expert, but the assumption appears to be that the court may. Rule 614(b) provides specific authority for the court to examine any witness, including a court-appointed expert.

4. Like Rule 605, which provides that the judge may not be a witness while judging a trial and that a party may object outside the presence of the jury if the judge proposes to give testimony, Rule 614 permits objections to the judge's calling or questioning witnesses to be made outside the hearing of the jury. A prudent party should make an objection to the judge's calling a witness as soon as possible during the jury's absence to avoid waiving the objection.

5. Nothing in Rule 614 precludes a party from objecting in the jury's presence. In some instances counsel may be prepared to risk confronting the judge before the jury and to object to the court's calling or questioning a witness in the hope that the court may reconsider its proposed course of action before any damage occurs.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to testimony by a court-appointed expert. Unless a timely objection is made, the expert's evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of expert testimony under Rule 104(a), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: I have considered all the evidence presented to me with regard to the objection to this expert testimony. To be admissible, expert testimony must constitute scientific, technical, or specialized knowledge that will assist the jury in understanding the evidence or resolving disputed issues and the witness must be qualified to provide such testimony. I have considered both the relevance of the evidence, including its fit in this case, and the reliability of such evidence in making my ruling. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the [describe the expert opinion evidence in dispute] [does or does not] constitute scientific, technical, or specialized knowledge, it [will or will not] assist the jury, the witness [is or is not] qualified to provide such testimony, the testimony [is or is not] based upon sufficient facts or data, the testimony [is or is not] the product of reliable principles and methods, and the witness [has or has not] applied the principles and methods reliably to the facts of the case. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

If the judge excludes the testimony, no further ruling is required. If the judge admits the testimony, two additional rulings might be required for a complete record. The first deals with disclosure of the court appointment. The second deals with disclosure of inadmissible facts and data. With respect to the first ruling, the judge might consider the following statement for the record: I have also considered whether the fact that the court appointed the witness should be revealed to the jury and have carefully weighed the probative value of this fact against its possible prejudicial effect. I find that the possible prejudicial effect [does or does not] substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence. I shall therefore [disclose or not disclose] to the jury the fact that the court appointed the expert.

If the expert relies upon evidence not otherwise admissible, the trial judge may also consider stating for the record the following: The witness has relied upon facts or data that are not otherwise admissible in evidence. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that these facts or data [are or are not] of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the field. I have carefully considered the extent to which such facts or data should be admitted and the danger that they might be used for their truth rather than to explain the witness's opinion. I find that the probative value of the inadmissible facts or data in assisting the jury to evaluate the expert's opinion [does or does not] substantially outweigh the prejudicial effect of permitting the jury to hear the facts or data. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

Should the judge exclude the expert evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document, including any report the expert may have made to the court, setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection to court-appointed expert testimony, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence. For example, a party may not object to the testimony of a court-appointed expert, but may want the judge to explain to the jury something about opinion testimony and the respective roles of witness and jury.

[1] Court Calls Expert Witness

I am about to call a witness to testify as the court's witness; this means that neither party is calling the witness. The fact that I call the witness does not indicate that the witness's testimony is any more important or any more likely to be true than the testimony of any other witness. Nor does the fact that I ask questions of the witness indicate that these questions are any more important than the questions asked by the lawyers or that the answers given by the witness to my questions are any more likely to be true or entitled to weight than the answers to the questions asked by the lawyers. This witness was asked by the court to testify and was not retained by either party. The fact that the court asked the witness to testify does not indicate that the testimony is more likely to be accurate and complete than the testimony of witnesses who are retained and called by the parties. However, you may consider the fact that neither party hired this witness to testify in assessing the witness's credibility.

[2] Party Calls Witness -- Court-Appointed Status Revealed

This witness was asked by the court to testify and was not retained by either party. The fact that the court asked the witness to testify does not indicate that the testimony is more likely to be accurate and complete than the testimony of witnesses who are retained and called by the parties. However, you may consider the fact that neither party hired this witness to testify in assessing the witness's credibility.

[3] Court Questions Witness

The fact that I ask questions of a witness does not indicate that these questions are any more important than the questions asked by the lawyers or that the answers given by the witness to my questions are any more likely to be true or entitled to weight than the answers to the questions asked by the lawyers.

[4] Counsel Objects to Court's Calling Witness or Questions in Jury's Presence

Counsel have the responsibility to object when they believe I am improperly calling a witness or asking questions. You should not draw any adverse inference against counsel or a party from an objection whether or not I sustain the objection.

[5] Qualifications of Witness

This witness claims to have special knowledge, skill, training, experience, or education that enable him/her to offer opinions or inferences concerning issues in dispute. The fact that a witness has knowledge, skill, training, experience, or education does not require you to believe the witness, to give such a witness's testimony any more weight than that of any other witness, or to give it any weight at all. It is important for you to keep in mind that the witness is not the trier of fact. You are the trier of fact. It is for you to decide whether the testimony of a witness, including any opinions or inferences of the witness, assists you in finding the facts and deciding the issues that are in dispute. And it is for you to decide what weight to give the testimony of a witness, including any opinions or inferences of the witness.

[6] Reliance on Inadmissible Facts or Data

This witness's opinion is based on certain facts or data that the court has determined are only admissible to explain the basis of the expert's opinion. These facts or data are [describe in summary the inadmissible facts or data]. You may consider these facts or data when you assess the witness's credibility and you decide what weight to give the opinion that the witness offered. You must not use this information for any other purpose.

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

6-8 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 8-1

8-1 Statement Not Admitted for Its Truth.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 105. Limited Admissibility

When evidence which is admissible as to one party or for one purpose but not admissible as to another party or for another purpose is admitted, the court, upon request, shall restrict the evidence to its proper scope and instruct the jury accordingly.

Rule 403. Exclusion of Relevant Evidence on Grounds of Prejudice, Confusion, or Waste of Time

Although relevant, evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. Hearsay statements are those made by a declarant outside of the trial, when the statements are offered for their truth. A statement is not hearsay if offered for a purpose that does not require that the statements be believed by the trier of fact. For example, an out-of-court statement by a declarant to the driver of a car that "your tires are bad" is not hearsay if offered to prove that the statement put the driver on notice of a possible problem. The statement is hearsay if offered to prove that the tires were, in fact, bad.

2. Generally, if an objection is made that a proffered statement is hearsay, the proffering party must articulate a relevant, nonhearsay use for the statement to circumvent the objection.

3. When a statement is admissible for a nonhearsay purpose but contains an assertion of fact that might easily be considered for its truth, the objecting party may rely upon Rule 403 and urge exclusion of the statement on the ground that its prejudicial effect (i.e., the consideration by the trier of fact of the statement for its truth) substantially outweighs its probative value. If the trial judge overrules a Rule 403 objection, the objecting party should consider asking for a limiting instruction regarding the permissible and impermissible uses of the statement.

4. Difficult cases arise when a declarant makes a statement that is offered not for its truth but as circumstantial evidence of something else. Suppose, for example, that a declarant makes a statement that the "defendant is a donkey." If this statement is offered to prove that it is unlikely that the declarant would have voluntarily entrusted his funds to the defendant, a trial judge could conclude that the statement is relevant, circumstantial evidence and is not offered to prove the truth of what the declarant asserted. In some circumstances the content of a statement not offered for its truth may present dangers associated with character evidence. Rule 403 objections are likely to be made under these circumstances. If the evidence is admitted, a limiting instruction might well be important.

5. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling. Generally, there are no Confrontation Clause issues when statements are not offered for their truth.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I have considered [name of party's] hearsay objection. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the statement [is or is not] offered for its truth and thus [is or is not] hearsay as defined by Rule 801(c).

If the judge has found the statement to be hearsay, the judge will exclude it unless it qualifies under Rule 801(d) or one of the exceptions in Rule 803, 804, or 807. If the judge finds that the statement is offered for a nonhearsay purpose and is therefore admissible under Rule 802, the judge may want to add the following statement for the record outside the hearing of the jury: I have considered the probative value of the statement for [identify nonhearsay purpose] and have weighed this against the possible prejudicial effect of the statement were the jury to use it for its truth. I have considered the utility of limiting instructions as part of the weighing process, and I find that the possible prejudicial effect of the statement [does or does not] substantially outweigh its probative value. Therefore, the objection is [sustained or overruled], and the evidence is [excluded or admitted].

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Cases in Which No Hearsay Is Admitted for Its Truth

[Name of witness] has testified that [name of or description of declarant] made a statement concerning [brief description of subject matter -- e.g., the condition of the tires]. It is for you to decide whether such a statement was made. I instruct you, however, that you may consider any such statement only for the limited purpose of [briefly state the limited purpose -- e.g., deciding whether the defendant had notice of a bad tire]. You may not consider such a statement in deciding [describe truth of matter stated -- e.g., whether the tire was in fact bad]. In other words, you are not to decide whether any such statement was true. Instead, you are to decide, whether or not it was true, if it helps you determine [reiterate the limited purpose -- e.g., whether the defendant had notice of a bad tire].

[2] Cases in Which Some Hearsay Is Admitted for Its Truth

[Name of witness] has testified that [name of or description of declarant] made a statement concerning [brief description of subject matter -- e.g., the condition of the tires]. It is for you to decide whether such a statement was made. I instruct you, however, that you may consider any such statement only for the limited purpose of [briefly state the limited purpose -- e.g., deciding whether the defendant had notice of a bad tire]. You may not consider such a statement in deciding [describe truth of matter stated -- e.g., whether the tire was in fact bad]. In other words, you are not to decide whether any such statement was true. Instead, you are to decide, whether or not it was true, if it helps you determine [reiterate the limited purpose -- e.g., whether the defendant had notice of a bad tire].

When I instruct you that a statement is admitted for a limited purpose, you must use the statement for only that purpose. You have heard or might hear testimony about other statements that you are permitted to accept as true. The only limitations on your use of any statements admitted as evidence are those stated in my instructions.

8-2 Statement Not Intended as an Assertion.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(a) limits the definition of hearsay to oral or written assertions or conduct that is nonverbal when the assertions or conduct are intended by the declarant as an assertion. Thus, evidence that a person laughed or cried or jumped up and down with joy usually will not constitute hearsay under Rule 801.

2. Rule 104(a) governs any dispute as to whether a declarant intended to make an assertion. Thus, under the Supreme Court's decision in Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) , the trial judge may consider inadmissible as well as admissible evidence in deciding whether or not an assertion was intended.

3. Evidence that is not hearsay must be relevant to be admitted. The proponent of the evidence generally bears the burden of demonstrating relevance. For example, evidence that a plaintiff screamed might be offered in a personal injury case to show suffering. The plaintiff will have to show, however, that the scream was temporally related to the injury at issue in litigation.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [the oral or written words (were or were not) assertions, the conduct (was or was not) intended as an assertion by the actor] and thus [are or are not, is or is not] a statement under Rule 801(a). Therefore, the objection is [sustained or overruled], and the evidence is [excluded or admitted].

If the judge finds that the words or conduct are not statements, they will not be hearsay. But, if the judge finds that they qualify as statements, the proponent may next argue that they are not offered for their truth. In ruling on whether this is so, the judge may want to add for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I have considered [name of party's] hearsay objection. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the statement [is or is not] offered for its truth and thus [is or is not] hearsay as defined by Rule 801(c).

If the judge has found the statement to be hearsay, the judge will exclude it unless it qualifies under Rule 801(d) or one of the exceptions in Rule 803, 804, or 807. If the judge finds that the statement is offered for a nonhearsay purpose and is therefore admissible under Rule 802, the judge may want to add the following statement for the record outside the hearing of the jury: I have considered the probative value of the statement for [identify nonhearsay purpose] and have weighed this against the possible prejudicial effect of the statement were the jury to use it for its truth. I have considered the utility of limiting instructions as part of the weighing process, and I find that the possible prejudicial effect of the statement [does or does not] substantially outweigh its probative value. Therefore, the objection is [sustained or overruled], and the evidence is [excluded or admitted].

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Unavailable Actor

You have heard evidence that [describe evidence -- e.g., the automobile passed inspection the day before the accident]. The [insert party relying on evidence] contends that [describe contention -- e.g., this proves that the brakes were in good condition at the time of the accident]. The person whose conduct is relied upon [identify actor -- e.g., the inspector] is unavailable as a witness. You must decide how much weight to give this evidence and the significance of the fact that the [identify actor] is not available to testify.

[2] Available Actor

You have heard evidence that [describe evidence -- e.g., the automobile passed inspection the day before the accident]. The [insert party relying on evidence] contends that [describe contention -- e.g., this proves that the brakes were in good condition at the time of the accident]. The person whose conduct is relied upon [identify actor -- e.g., the inspector] has now testified as a witness. You must decide how much weight to give both [describe conduct -- e.g., the inspection] and the testimony of the [identify actor].

8-3 Prior Inconsistent Statements -- Substantive Evidence.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

Rule 607. Who May Impeach

The credibility of a witness may be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness.

Rule 613. Prior Statements of Witnesses

(a) Examining witness concerning prior statement. -- In examining a witness concerning a prior statement made by the witness, whether written or not, the statement need not be shown nor its contents disclosed to the witness at that time, but on request the same shall be shown or disclosed to opposing counsel.

(b) Extrinsic evidence of prior inconsistent statement of witness. -- Extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement by a witness is not admissible unless the witness is afforded an opportunity to explain or deny the same and the opposite party is afforded an opportunity to interrogate the witness thereon, or the interests of justice otherwise require. This provision does not apply to admissions of a party-opponent as defined in rule 801(d)(2).

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

* * *

(d) Statements which are not hearsay. -- A statement is not hearsay if --

(1) Prior statement by witness. -- The declarant testifies at the trial or hearing and is subject to cross-examination concerning the statement, and the statement is (A) inconsistent with the declarant's testimony, and was given under oath subject to the penalty of perjury at a trial, hearing, or other proceeding, or in a deposition, or (B) consistent with the declarant's testimony and is offered to rebut an express or implied charge against the declarant of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive, or (C) one of identification of a person made after perceiving the person; * * *.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(d)(1)(A) provides that certain prior inconsistent statements of a witness may be used as substantive evidence. These statements must have been made (a) under oath, (b) subject to penalty of perjury, and (c) in a proceeding. Unlike the hearsay exception for former testimony (Rule 804(b)(1)), Rule 801(d)(1)(A) imposes no requirement that the party against whom a prior statement is offered have been present at or had an opportunity to participate in the proceeding in which a prior statement was made. Thus, grand jury testimony may be used by the prosecution in a criminal case as substantive evidence if it is inconsistent with a trial witness's testimony, even though the defendant was not present when the grand jury testimony was given.

2. Rule 801 does not specifically refer to Rule 613, but Rule 613 specifically refers to Rule 801(d)(2). It appears that the basic requirements for all prior inconsistent statements, whether admitted as substantive evidence (except for admissions) or simply as impeachment, are set forth in Rule 613. Subdivision (a) of Rule 613 eliminates the rule laid down in Queen Caroline's case that a party seeking to impeach a witness with a prior written inconsistent statement must show it to the witness before asking questions about it. Now impeaching counsel must, upon request, show it to opposing counsel, but not to the witness. There is no restriction upon impeaching counsel's showing the statement to the witness, but the rule permits impeaching counsel to choose when to do so.

3. Rule 613(b) eliminates the foundation requirement for prior inconsistent statements that qualify as admissions under Rule 801(d)(2). It does not eliminate the foundation requirement for prior inconsistent statements that are admissible under Rule 801(d)(1). When a party seeks to offer extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement as substantive evidence, the witness who made the prior inconsistent statement must be provided an opportunity to explain or deny the prior inconsistent statement. Whereas the common-law requirement was that the foundation had to be laid before extrinsic evidence could be used, Rule 613(b) eases the foundation requirement and permits impeaching counsel to afford a witness an opportunity to deny or explain after extrinsic evidence is presented. Rule 801(d)(1)(A) requires that the witness whose prior inconsistent statement is offered as substantive evidence be present and available for cross-examination. This requirement is consistent with the basic foundation required by Rule 613 and generally is satisfied even if the witness claims loss of memory about the prior statement.

4. It is permissible for counsel to call a witness knowing that the witness will depart from a prior statement that is admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(A) and intending to use the prior inconsistent statement as substantive evidence.

5. It is not permissible for a direct examiner to call a witness who will be unfavorable for the purpose of eliciting a prior inconsistent statement that is not admissible for its truth. In this circumstance, the direct examiner is seeking to put prior inconsistent statements into the case that would never be admitted if the other party chose not to call the witness (which is likely if the other party knows the witness has made prior inconsistent statements). A party may not legitimately call a witness knowing that the witness will have nothing positive to say in order to offer prior inconsistent statements not admissible for their truth as impeachment evidence, because the party has no legitimate reason to call the witness.

6. A party who legitimately calls a witness may be able to elicit prior inconsistent statements not admissible for their truth that could be used by a cross-examiner to impeach the witness. There is a difference between (a) calling a witness who has a positive contribution to make to the direct examiner's case and impeaching the witness, and (b) calling a witness who has no positive contribution to make in order to elicit prior inconsistent statements of the witness that are not admissible for their truth. In (a), the direct examiner is seeking the legitimate help of the witness and seeking also to elicit the impeachment evidence to protect the witness from cross-examination. It is (b) that is impermissible.

7. The fact that a prior inconsistent statement is admissible as substantive evidence does not mean that the party who offers it is barred from arguing that the prior statement also is relevant to assessing the credibility of the witness-declarant. A prior inconsistent statement that is admitted under Rule 801(d)(1)(A) may be used as both impeachment and substantive evidence.

8. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to prior inconsistent statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the prior statement [is or is not] a statement of a trial witness, it [is or is not] sufficiently inconsistent with the witness's trial testimony to qualify as a prior inconsistent statement, it [was or was not] made under oath, subject to penalty of perjury in a [trial hearing, proceeding or deposition], and the witness [is or is not] available for cross-examination on the statement. Therefore, the objection is [sustained or overruled], and the evidence is [excluded or admitted].

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Prior Inconsistent Statements Admissible for Their Truth

Any party may bring out any relevant information about a witness to assist you in assessing the witness's credibility. The [insert party] has asked this witness about prior statements of the witness that might be inconsistent with the witness's testimony in this trial. These prior statements were made under oath, subject to penalty of perjury, and in a formal proceeding like this trial. You may give these statements the same weight that you would give trial testimony by a witness. If you find these prior statements to be inconsistent with the trial testimony, you must decide what parts, if any, you believe of the trial testimony and the prior statements.

[2] Prior Inconsistent Statements Admissible for Their Truth -- Witness Denies Statements

Any party may bring out any relevant information about a witness to assist you in assessing the witness's credibility. The [insert party] has asked this witness about prior statements of the witness that were made under oath, subject to penalty of perjury, and in a formal proceeding like this trial. You must decide whether the witness made these statements and whether they are inconsistent with the witness's testimony in this trial. You may give any statements that were made and that are inconsistent the same weight that you would give trial testimony by a witness. You must decide what parts, if any, you believe of the trial testimony and of any prior inconsistent statements that were made.

[3] Prior Inconsistent Statements Not Admissible for Their Truth

Any party may bring out any relevant information about a witness to assist you in assessing the witness's credibility. The [insert party] has asked this witness about prior statements of the witness that might be inconsistent with the witness's testimony in this trial. You must decide whether the witness made prior statements, whether they are inconsistent with the witness's testimony, and whether any prior statements cause you to doubt the trial testimony of the witness. It is important that you consider any of these prior statements only for the purpose of assessing the credibility of the testimony given in this trial by the witness.

[4] Prior Inconsistent Statements Not Admissible for Their Truth -- Witness Denies Statements

Any party may bring out any relevant information about a witness to assist you in assessing the witness's credibility. The [insert party] has asked this witness about prior statements of the witness that might be inconsistent with the witness's testimony in this trial. You must decide whether the witness made prior statements, whether they are inconsistent with the witness's testimony, and whether any prior statements cause you to doubt the trial testimony of the witness. It is important that you consider any of these prior statements only for the purpose of assessing the credibility of the testimony given in this trial by the witness. You may consider the witness's denial of making statements in assessing the witness's overall credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

* * *

(d) Statements which are not hearsay. -- A statement is not hearsay if --

(1) Prior statement by witness. -- The declarant testifies at the trial or hearing and is subject to cross-examination concerning the statement, and the statement is (A) inconsistent with the declarant's testimony, and was given under oath subject to the penalty of perjury at a trial, hearing, or other proceeding, or in a deposition, or (B) consistent with the declarant's testimony and is offered to rebut an express or implied charge against the declarant of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive, or (C) one of identification of a person made after perceiving the person; * * *.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. At common law, prior consistent statements generally were admissible only for rehabilitation, not for their truth. However, Rule 801(d)(1)(B) makes certain prior inconsistent statements admissible as substantive evidence when the declarant whose statement is offered testifies during the trial and is available for cross-examination. As long as the cross-examiner has the opportunity to question the witness concerning the prior statements, the foundation is likely to be deemed adequate even if the witness has memory problems.

2. Aside from the requirement that the witness be available and subject to cross-examination, Rule 801(d)(1)(B) requires that a prior statement be consistent with the trial testimony and be offered to rebut one or more of three express or implied charges: (a) recent fabrication, (b) improper influence, and (c) improper motive.

3. The Supreme Court held in Tome v. United States, 513 U.S. 150 (1995) that a prior consistent statement is admissible as substantive evidence to rebut a charge of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive only if the statement was made prior to the time of the charged fabrication or the time that that the alleged influence or motive arose.

4. A number of reported decisions uphold the admission of prior consistent statements simply to rehabilitate a witness, not for the truth of the prior statements. Prior consistent statements made after a motive to falsify arose raise relevance problems. Common-law courts traditionally observed that mere repetition of a statement does not increase the likelihood that it is true.

5. The fact that a prior consistent statement is admissible as substantive evidence does not mean that the party relying upon it cannot also argue that the consistency of the statement and the trial testimony also bolsters the credibility of the witness-declarant.

6. There is no requirement in Rule 801(d)(1)(B) that prior consistent statements must have been made under oath, subject to penalty of perjury, and in a proceeding in order to qualify as substantive evidence. This requirement is confined to prior inconsistent statements under (d)(1)(A).

9. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to prior consistent statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the prior statement [is or is not] a statement of a trial witness, it [is or is not] sufficiently consistent with the witness's trial testimony to qualify as a prior consistent statement, it [is or is not] offered to rebut a charge of [recent fabrication or improper influence or motive], the prior statement [was or was not] made prior to the time that the [motive to falsify or the improper influence or motive arose], and the witness [is or is not] available for cross-examination on the statement. Therefore, the objection is [sustained or overruled], and the evidence is [excluded or admitted].

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Prior Consistent Statements -- Admissible as Substantive Evidence

[Name of party] has presented prior statements of [name of witness] to rebut any suggestion that [name of witness] decided to give false testimony or that the testimony was the product of some improper influence or motive. You must decide whether [name of witness] made these prior statements, and you may give any of these prior statements the same weight as trial testimony. You must decide what portion of the witness's testimony and the prior statements is true.

[2] Prior Consistent Statements -- Inadmissible as Substantive Evidence

[Name of party] has presented prior statements of [name of witness] to rebut any suggestion that [name of witness] decided to give false testimony or that the testimony was the product of some improper influence or motive. You must decide whether [name of witness] made these prior statements. You may consider how consistent any such statements were with the witness's trial testimony in assessing the credibility of this witness at trial.

[3] Combination of Statements Admissible and Inadmissible as Substantive Evidence

[Name of party] has presented prior statements of [name of witness]. Some of these statements are presented to rebut any suggestion that [name of witness] decided to give false testimony or that the testimony was the product of some improper influence or motive. These statements include [summarize statements]. You must decide whether [name of witness] made these prior statements, and you may give any of these prior statements the same weight as trial testimony. You must decide what portion of the witness's testimony and these prior statements is true. Other statements are presented simply because [name of party] contends that their consistency with the witness's trial testimony bolsters the credibility of the witness. These statements include [summarize statements]. You may consider how consistent any such statements were with the witness's trial testimony in assessing the credibility of this witness at trial.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. Pretrial identifications made by a trial witness qualify as non-hearsay under Rule 801 provided that the witness who made the identification testifies and is subject to cross-examination. There is no requirement that the pretrial identification be made in any particular format or that there have been any oath or other formality associated with the identification.

2. Generally, the provision that a witness be subject to cross-examination is satisfied if the cross-examiner has the opportunity to put questions to the witness. A witness's lack of memory does not render the witness unavailable.

3. There may be constitutional limitations on the use of pretrial identifications in criminal cases. Some procedures may be so unreliable as to violate due process. Manson v. Brathwaite, 432 U.S. 98 (1977) . Some identifications occurring after an accused has been formally charged require the presence of counsel. Kirby v. Illinois, 406 U.S. 682 (1972) .

4. An identification may also be a prior consistent statement, but Rule 801(d)(1)(C) establishes that all prior identifications are admissible as substantive evidence. There is no limitation on the use of these identifications that is analogous to the "rebuttal" limitation on the use of prior consistent statements.

5. Although pretrial identifications are admissible as substantive evidence, there is nothing in the rules that precludes the offering party from arguing that the pretrial identifications also corroborate and bolster the credibility of a trial witness.

6. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to prior statements of identification that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the prior statement [is or is not] a statement of a trial witness, it [is or is not] a statement by the witness identifying [name person identified] made by the witness after perceiving [name person identified], and the witness [is or is not] available for cross-examination on the statement. Therefore, the objection is [sustained or overruled], and the evidence is [excluded or admitted].

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Prior Identification Undisputed

The government has presented evidence that this witness identified the defendant prior to trial. You may give a pretrial identification the same weight as trial testimony, and you may consider the pretrial identification in assessing the credibility of the witness. You should consider all of the circumstances surrounding an identification in deciding what weight to give it. These may include the timing of the identification, the consistency of the identification with any description given by the witness, whether the witness chose the defendant from a group or viewed him alone, whether any suggestiveness might have influenced the witness, and the certainty or lack thereof expressed by the witness.

[2] Identification Disputed

The government has presented evidence that this witness identified the defendant prior to trial. You must decide whether this identification actually occurred. You may give a pretrial identification the same weight as trial testimony, and you may consider the pretrial identification in assessing the credibility of the witness. You should consider all of the circumstances surrounding any identification that was made in deciding what weight to give it. These may include the timing of the identification, the consistency of the identification with any description given by the witness, whether the witness chose the defendant from a group or viewed him alone, whether any suggestiveness might have influenced the witness, and the certainty or lack thereof expressed by the witness.

(D) a statement by the party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship, or (E) a statement by a co-conspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy. * * *

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(d)(2)(A) establishes that one party may admit into evidence the statements of an adverse party as admissions. At common law, admissions were hearsay but admissible as an exception. Under Rule 801, admissions are nonhearsay. The difference between treating admissions as exceptions and treating them as nonhearsay is semantic. The result is the same: The only evidentiary limitations are that the adverse party's statement must be relevant and must not violate another rule of evidence. For example, an adverse party's offer of settlement, while arguably relevant, is inadmissible under Rule 408. Similarly, statements made during settlement negotiations, otherwise admissible as admissions, may be excluded by Rule 408.

2. A statement need not admit anything to qualify as an admission. Any statement by a party offered against that party is admissible if relevant and not barred by another rule.

3. In a multi-party case, it is important for parties against whom a statement is not admissible to seek an instruction that lets the jury know that an admission is evidence only against the party who made the statement.

4. In criminal cases, the trial judge may have to make a voluntariness determination with respect to confessions when a defendant moves to suppress pretrial statements. The trial judge's determination, like most evidence determinations, uses a preponderance of the evidence standard. Lego v. Twomey, 404 U.S. 477 (1972) ; Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) .

5. In criminal cases, limiting instructions are not sufficient to protect codefendants from the prejudicial effect of admissions made by nontestifying codefendants. Bruton v. United States, 389 U.S. 818 (1968) . If two or more defendants are charged with a crime and one has confessed, the government may seek a severance so that it can use the confession against the defendant who made it without violating the rights of other defendants. Alternatively, the government may seek to have all defendants tried together by choosing not to use the confession against anyone or by seeking to redact the confession so that it does not refer to anyone other than the confessing defendant.

6. The proponent of an admission is not required to show that the party who made the admission had personal knowledge. Also, a party generally cannot object that an admission was stated in the form of an opinion. The theory of party admissions is that a party is responsible for statements it makes and that it has the opportunity to point out any deficiencies in its statements and to explain them.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the evidence [is or is not] a statement of [identify declarant-party] and is offered by [name of proponent] against [identify declarant-party]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the statement [is or is not] admissible as a party admission under Rule 801(d)(2)(A).

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

The following instructions can easily be requested and readily be adopted by trial judges to explain trial developments to the jury.

[1] Single Party Case

One party is permitted to present as evidence statements made by another party. You may give these statements the same weight as trial testimony.

[2] Multiple Party Civil Case -- Basic Rule

One party is permitted to present as evidence statements made by another party. Each party is responsible, however, only for its own statements. You must be sure to use statements that one party offers against another only against the party who actually made the statement. No other party is responsible for these statements, and these statements may not be used as evidence against any other party.

[3] Multiple Party Criminal Case -- Basic Rule

The government is permitted to offer statements made by a defendant as evidence against that defendant, but not against other defendants. It is for you to decide whether a defendant made the statement offered by the government. You must be certain to use any statement of a defendant only against that defendant.

[4] Multiple Party Civil Case -- Additional Statements Admitted Under Exceptions

One party is permitted to present as evidence statements made by another party. Each party is responsible, however, only for its own statements, and the usual rule is that you must be sure to use evidence of a party's statements only against the party who actually made the statement. There are some statements that fall outside the usual rule and that may be used against all parties. You must be certain to use any statement of a party only against that party unless I specifically instruct you that the statement may also be used against other parties. I now instruct you that evidence of a statement [describe statement -- e.g., that the defendant truck driver shouted immediately after an accident that "I ran the light"] may be used against all of the [describe parties -- e.g., defendants] in this case.

[5] Multiple Party Criminal Case -- Additional Statements Admitted Under Exceptions

The government is permitted to offer statements made by a defendant as evidence against that defendant, but the usual rule is that such statements may not be used against other defendants. It is for you to decide whether a defendant made the statement offered by the government. You must be certain to use any statement of a defendant only against that defendant unless I specifically instruct you that a statement may be used against a defendant who did not make that statement. I now instruct you that [summarize statement] may be used against all defendants in this case.

(D) a statement by the party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship, or (E) a statement by a co-conspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy. * * *

[b] Key Points.

1. An adoptive admission is one in which a party adopted or ratified the statement of another. At common law, adoptive admissions were exceptions to the hearsay rule; under Rule 801, they and other admissions are deemed nonhearsay. The result under Rule 801 is the same as under the common law. Adoptive admissions are admissible as long as they are relevant and not barred by some other rule. In short, they are treated virtually the same as admissions actually made by a party. Although there are cases that seem to hold that a trial judge should determine whether there is sufficient evidence for a jury to find adoption, Rule 104(a) would seem to be as applicable to adoptive admissions as to any other hearsay exemption or exception. Thus, the trial judge must decide whether adoption has been proved to the judge's satisfaction by a preponderance of the evidence. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) .

2. In making the Rule 104(a) determination, the trial judge will usually consider all of the circumstances surrounding the making of a statement by someone other than a party and the party's purported adoption. These circumstances include whether the statement was the sort that would normally have elicited a response, whether the party heard and understood the statement, whether the party was in a position to respond, and what the party did in response to the statement.

3. Even though the trial judge must engage in fact finding to decide admissibility of contested statements, Rule 104(e) makes clear that a party against whom an adoptive admission is offered may develop all of the circumstances and ask the jury to give little or no weight to a so-called adoption.

4. The proponent of an adoptive admission is not required to show that the party who adopted a statement had personal knowledge. Also, a party generally cannot object that an admission was stated in the form of an opinion. The theory of party admissions is that a party is responsible for statements it makes or adopts and that it has the opportunity to point out any deficiencies in its statements or in adopted statements and to explain them.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the evidence [is or is not] a statement of [identify declarant], that [name of party against whom offered] [did or did not] adopt the statement, and the statement [is or is not] offered by [name of proponent] against [identify declarant-party]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the statement [is or is not] admissible as an adoptive admission under Rule 801(d)(2)(B).

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Adoption Uncontested

One party to a case may present statements made by opposing parties as evidence. You may consider any statement made by a party and decide how much weight to give to such a statement. In this case, [name of proffering party] has presented evidence that [name of adopting party] adopted a statement made by someone else. You may treat an adopted statement as though it had been made by the party who adopted it.

[2] Adoption Contested

One party to a case may present statements made by opposing parties as evidence. You may consider any statement made by a party and decide how much weight to give to such a statement. In this case, [name of proffering party] has presented evidence that [name of adopting party] adopted a statement made by someone else. [Name of adopting party] disputes adopting the statement. It is for you to decide what weight, if any, to give this evidence. In deciding whether [name of adopting party] adopted a statement, you may consider whether someone else did make a statement, whether and how well [name of adopting party] heard and understood the statement, whether [name of adopting party] made any response, how easy or difficult it would have been to respond, and the extent to which a reasonable person in the position of [name of adopting party] would have thought that a response or failure to respond would be considered to be an adoption.

or (D) a statement by the party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship, or (E) a statement by a co-conspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy. The contents of the statement shall be considered but are not alone sufficient to establish the declarant's authority under subdivision (C), * * *.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Any statement by a person authorized by a party to speak concerning a subject is admissible as readily as if the party actually made the statement. At common law, authorized statements were exceptions to the hearsay rule, while Rule 801 makes them nonhearsay. Rule 801 expands the scope of authorized admissions from the common law by making even internal statements by a party admissible.

2. In many cases, there will be no question that a party authorized someone to make a statement on behalf of the party. In some cases, however, authorization will be a disputed question. The trial judge resolves disputes under Rule 104(a) and determines admissibility using a preponderance of the evidence standard. See Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 801 as amended in 1997 makes clear that, in determining whether the declarant was authorized to speak for a party, the trial judge may consider the contents of the statements themselves but must also find some independent evidence of authorization. A party may offer evidence under Rule 104(e) designed to affect the weight any authorized admission is given.

3. The proponent of an admission is not required to show that the authorized speaker who made the admission had personal knowledge. Also, a party generally cannot object that an admission was stated in the form of an opinion. The theory of party admissions is that a party is responsible for statements it makes or authorizes and that it has the opportunity to point out any deficiencies in its statements and to explain them.

4. Rule 806 provides that, when an authorized admission is introduced, the party against whom it is admitted may impeach the declarant in the various ways a party may impeach a trial witness. Moreover, the rule provides that a party need not lay the foundation required for prior inconsistent statements by Rule 613 when impeaching an authorized agent. The last sentence of Rule 806 is ambiguous, referring to hearsay and declarants, not to admissions. The thrust of Rule 806 seems consistent with permitting any party against whom a statement, other than the party's own statement, is introduced to attack the declarant who made the statement. Thus, it is reasonable to expect that a party seeking to attack a declarant could call the declarant and ask leading questions directed at the credibility of the declarant and the statement that was introduced against the party.

5. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling. Generally, there are no Confrontation Clause issues when statements are not offered for their truth.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the evidence [is or is not] a statement of [identify declarant], [name of declarant] [was or was not] authorized by [name of party against whom offered] to make a statement on this subject, and the statement is offered by [name of proponent] against [name of party against whom offered]. In making this finding, I have considered the contents of the statement and also the additional evidence relied upon by the parties. The objection is [overruled or sustained], and the statement [is or is not] admissible as an authorized admission under Rule 801(d)(2)(C).

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

The following instructions can easily be requested and readily be adopted by trial judges to explain trial developments to the jury.

(D) a statement by the party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship, or (E) a statement by a co-conspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy. The contents of the statement shall be considered but are not alone sufficient to establish * * * the agency or employment relationship and scope thereof under subdivision (D), * * *.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(d)(2)(D) makes admissible against a party any statement made by the party's agent or employee concerning a matter within the scope of the agent's or employee's agency or employment as long as the statement was made while the agency or employment relationship continued.

2. Unlike the common-law rule which restricted agent's statements to agents who had "speaking authority," Rule 801(d)(2)(D) contains no such restriction.

3. The trial judge makes the decision under Rule 104(a) whether the agency requirement is satisfied, generally using the preponderance of the evidence standard. See Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 801 as amended in 1997 makes clear that, in determining whether the declarant was an agent or employee of a party, the trial judge may consider the contents of the statements themselves but must also find some independent evidence of agency or employment. Even though the trial judge may find agency, the party against whom an agent's statement is offered should be able to offer evidence to suggest that the employment or agency relationship was not one that should inspire confidence in the reliability of the statements.

4. In some cases, the agency issue for evidence purposes may overlap with an issue in the case. For example, the agent of a company might have admitted tortious conduct prior to a trial in which the company defends on the ground that the agent acted outside the scope of his/her agency. The trial judge may have to decide under Rules 104(a) and 801(d)(2)(D) whether the agent's statement concerned a matter within the scope of the agency. The proponent of the evidence must show that this was so under the preponderance standard. If the trial judge is persuaded, the statement will be admitted, but the jury may well choose to give the statement no weight. If the trial judge is not persuaded, the statement will be excluded, and the jury will not hear it; but, the jury may still find for the plaintiff on the basis of other evidence.

5. The proponent of an admission is not required to show that the agent or employee who made the admission had personal knowledge. Also, a party generally cannot object that an admission was stated in the form of an opinion. The theory of party admissions is that a party is responsible for statements made by agents or employees relating to their employment or agency while the relationship continues, and that the party has the opportunity to point out any deficiencies in agent statements and to explain them.

6. Rule 806 provides that a party may impeach an agent-declarant whose statement was admitted pursuant to Rule 801(d), that the impeachment devices available for trial witnesses are also available for agent-declarants, and that the usual foundation requirement for prior inconsistent statements under Rule 613 is suspended. The last sentence of Rule

806 is ambiguous, referring to hearsay and declarants, not to admissions. The thrust of Rule 806 seems consistent with permitting any party against whom a statement, other than the party's own statement, is introduced to attack the declarant who made the statement. Thus, it is reasonable to expect that a party seeking to attack a declarant could call the declarant and ask leading questions directed at the credibility of the declarant and the statement that was introduced against the party.

7. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the evidence [is or is not] a statement of [identify declarant], [name of declarant] [was or was not] an [agent or employee] of [name of party against whom statement is offered] when the statement was made, the statement [does or does not] concern a matter that was within the scope of agency or employment, and the statement is offered by [name of proponent] against [identify declarant-party]. In making this finding, I have considered the contents of the statement and also the additional evidence relied upon by the parties. The objection is [overruled or sustained], and the statement [is or is not] admissible as an agent's admission under Rule 801(d)(2)(D).

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Single Party Civil Case

The [plaintiff or defendant] presented evidence that [name or identify declarant] made certain statements. It is for you to decide whether these statements were made. You may give these statements the same weight as trial testimony and use these statements as evidence against the [plaintiff or defendant]. You may consider the relationship of [name of declarant] to [name of party against whom statement is offered] in deciding the weight to give [name of declarant's] statements.

[2] Multiple Party Civil Case

The [plaintiff or defendant] presented evidence that [name or identify declarant] made certain statements. It is for you to decide whether these statements were made. You may give these statements the same weight as trial testimony, but you may only use these statements as evidence against [name of plaintiff or defendant]. You may consider the relationship of [name of declarant] to [name of party against whom statement is offered] in deciding the weight to give [name of declarant's] statements.

[3] Single Defendant Criminal Case

The government has presented evidence of certain statements made by [name or description of declarant]. It is for you to decide whether these statements were made. You may give these statements the same weight as trial testimony and use them against the defendant. You may consider evidence concerning the relationship of [name of declarant] to the defendant in deciding the weight to give [name of declarant's] statements.

[4] Multiple Defendant Criminal Case

The government has presented evidence that [name or identify declarant] made certain statements. It is for you to decide whether these statements were made. You may give these statements the same weight as trial testimony, but you may only use these statements as evidence against [name of defendant]. You may consider the relationship of [name of declarant] to [name of defendant against whom statement is offered] in deciding the weight to give [name of declarant's] statements.

8-10 Coconspirator's Statement.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

(d) Statements which are not hearsay. -- A statement is not hearsay if --

* * *

(2) Admission by party-opponent. -- The statement is offered against a party and is (A) the party's own statement, in either an individual or a representative capacity or (B) a statement of which the party has manifested an adoption or belief in its truth, or (C) a statement by a person authorized by the party to make a statement concerning the subject, or

(D) a statement by the party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship, or (E) a statement by a co-conspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy. The contents of the statement shall be considered but are not alone sufficient to establish * * * the existence of the conspiracy and the participation therein of the declarant and the party against whom the statement is offered under subdivision (E).

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(d)(2)(E) codifies the common-law coconspirator exception to the hearsay rule, although the rule defines coconspirator statements as nonhearsay. The difference is largely semantic, and Rule 801(d)(2)(E) is recognized as the equivalent of the traditional exception.

2. In ruling on the admissibility of coconspirator statements, the trial judge decides whether statements were made (a) by a member of the conspiracy, (b) in furtherance of the conspiracy, and (c) during the conspiracy, and (d) whether they are offered against a defendant who also was a member of the conspiracy. The trial judge makes this finding by a preponderance of the evidence. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 801 as amended in 1997 makes clear that, in determining whether the declarant and the defendant were members of a conspiracy, the trial judge may consider the contents of the statements themselves but must also find some independent evidence of conspiracy.

3. The proponent of a coconspirator's statement is not required to show that the declarant had personal knowledge. Also, a party generally cannot object that an admission was stated in the form of an opinion. The theory of party admissions is that a party is responsible for statements of its criminal agents and that it has the opportunity to point out any deficiencies in its statements and to explain them.

4. Rule 806 provides that a party may attack a coconspirator-declarant using the same means that could be used to attack a trial witness, and that the normal foundation requirement for prior inconsistent statements found in Rule 613 is suspended. The last sentence of Rule 806 is ambiguous, referring to hearsay and declarants, not to admissions. The thrust of Rule 806 seems consistent with permitting any party against whom a statement, other than the party's own statement, is introduced to attack the declarant who made the statement. Thus, it is reasonable to expect that a party seeking to attack a declarant could call the declarant and ask leading questions directed at the credibility of the declarant and the statement that was introduced against the party.

5. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the evidence [is or is not] a statement of [identify declarant], [name of declarant] [was or was not] a member of a conspiracy, [name of party against whom statement is offered] [was or was not] also a member of that conspiracy, the statement [was or was not] made during the conspiracy, the statement [was or was not] made in furtherance of the conspiracy, and the statement is offered by [name of proponent] against [identify party]. In making this finding, I have considered the contents of the statement and also the additional evidence relied upon by the parties. The objection is [overruled or sustained], and the statement [is or is not] admissible as a coconspirator's statement under Rule 801(d)(2)(E).

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Single Defendant Civil Case

The plaintiff has presented evidence that [name or identify declarant] made certain statements. It is for you to decide whether these statements were made. You may give these statements the same weight as trial testimony and use them as evidence against the defendant.

[2] Multiple Defendant Civil Case -- Admissible Against All Defendants

The plaintiff has presented evidence that [name or identify declarant] made certain statements. It is for you to decide whether these statements were made. You may give these statements the same weight as trial testimony and use these statements against all defendants.

[3] Multiple Defendant Civil Case -- Admissible Against Some Defendants

The plaintiff has presented evidence that [name or identify declarant] made certain statements. It is for you to decide whether these statements were made. You may give these statements the same weight as trial testimony, but you may use these statements only against [names of defendants]. You may not use these statements against any other defendant.

[4] Single Defendant Criminal Case

The prosecution has presented evidence that [name or identify declarant] made certain statements. It is for you to decide whether these statements were made. You may give these statements the same weight as trial testimony and use them as evidence against the defendant.

[5] Multiple Defendant Criminal Case -- Admissible Against All Defendants

The prosecution has presented evidence that [name or identify declarant] made certain statements. It is for you to decide whether these statements were made. You may give these statements the same weight as trial testimony and use these statements against all defendants.

[6] Multiple Defendant Criminal Case -- Admissible Against Some Defendants

The prosecution has presented evidence that [name or identify declarant] made certain statements. It is for you to decide whether these statements were made. You may give these statements the same weight as trial testimony, but you may use these statements only against [names of defendants]. You may not use these statements against any other defendant.

8-11 Present Sense Impression.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

(1) Present sense impression. -- A statement describing or explaining an event or condition made while the declarant was perceiving the event or condition or immediately thereafter.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Hearsay exceptions that are included in Rule 803 do not require a showing of unavailability. Thus, the hearsay declarant may or may not be present at trial as the hearsay statement is introduced pursuant to an exception.

6. For a statement to qualify as a present sense impression, the proponent must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the declarant made a statement that described or explained an event or condition either while it occurred or immediately thereafter. Some courts require corroboration of the event or condition.

7. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom a present sense impression is admitted to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, and (c) permits the party against whom the evidence is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions. Thus, a party who seeks to impeach a trial witness with an inconsistent statement must comply with the foundation requirement found in Rule 613, but the same party need not lay a foundation before offering extrinsic evidence to impeach a hearsay declarant whose present sense impression is admitted.

8. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [identify declarant] [did or did not] make a statement describing an event or condition, and [identify declarant] [did or did not make] this statement while perceiving the event or condition or immediately thereafter. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the statement [is or is not] admissible as a present sense impression under Rule 803(1).

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Declarant Testifies at Trial

[Name of party] has presented evidence that [name or identify declarant] made a statement concerning [subject matter] before this trial started. It is for you to decide whether this statement was made. [Name or identify declarant] has testified or will testify. You may give the statement the same weight as you give trial testimony. You may consider [name of declarant's] trial testimony when you decide the weight to give to the earlier statement.

[2] Declarant Does Not Testify at Trial

[Name of party] has presented evidence that [name or identify declarant] made a statement concerning [subject matter] before this trial started. It is for you to decide whether this statement was made. You may give the statement the same weight as you give trial testimony. You should consider all of the circumstances surrounding the statement in deciding its weight. [Name or identify declarant] will not testify in this trial. You may consider this in deciding what weight to give the statement.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

* * *

(2) Excited utterance. -- A statement relating to a startling event or condition made while the declarant was under the stress of excitement caused by the event or condition.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Hearsay exceptions that are included in Rule 803 do not require a showing of unavailability. Thus, the hearsay declarant may or may not be present at trial as the hearsay statement is introduced pursuant to an exception.

6. For a statement to qualify as an excited utterance, the proponent must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the declarant made a statement that related to a startling event or condition while the declarant remained under the stress of the condition. The terms "related" and "under the stress" provide some flexibility for a trial judge to find that a statement is an excited utterance even though it does not directly describe or explain an event, and even though some time passes between the event or condition and the statement.

7. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom an excited utterance is admitted to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, and (c) permits the party against whom the evidence is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions. Thus, a party who seeks to impeach a trial witness with an inconsistent statement must comply with the foundation requirement found in Rule 613, but the same party need not lay a foundation before offering extrinsic evidence to impeach a hearsay declarant whose excited utterance is admitted.

8. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [identify declarant] [did or did not] make a statement relating to a startling event or condition, and [identify declarant] [did or did not make] this statement while under the stress of this startling event or condition. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the statement [is or is not] admissible as an excited utterance under Rule 803(2).

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Declarant Testifies at Trial

[Name of party] has presented evidence that [name or identify declarant] made a statement concerning [subject matter] before this trial started. It is for you to decide whether this statement was made. [Name or identify declarant] has testified or will testify. You may give the statement the same weight as you give trial testimony. You may consider [name of declarant's] trial testimony when you decide the weight to give to the earlier statement.

[2] Declarant Does Not Testify at Trial

[Name of party] has presented evidence that [name or identify declarant] made a statement concerning [subject matter] before this trial started. It is for you to decide whether this statement was made. You may give the statement the same weight as you give trial testimony. You should consider all of the circumstances surrounding the statement in deciding its weight. [Name or identify declarant] will not testify in this trial. You may consider this in deciding what weight to give the statement.

CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

6-8 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 8-13

8-13 Existing Mental or Physical Condition, State of Mind.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

* * *

(3) Then existing mental, emotional, or physical condition. -- A statement of the declarant's then existing state of mind, emotion, sensation, or physical condition (such as intent, plan, motive, design, mental feeling, pain, and bodily health), but not including a statement of memory or belief to prove the fact remembered or believed unless it relates to the execution, revocation, identification, or terms of declarant's will.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Hearsay exceptions that are included in Rule 803 do not require a showing of unavailability. Thus, the hearsay declarant may or may not be present at trial as the hearsay statement is introduced pursuant to an exception.

6. Rule 803(3) preserves the distinction the Supreme Court recognized in its pre-Rules decisions -- Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Hillmon, 145 U.S. 285 (1892) , and Shepard v. United States, 290 U.S. 96 (1933) -- between statements of a current state of mind or physical or mental condition (which include a present intention to do something in the future) and statements looking backward. Only statements of a present state of mind or physical or mental condition qualify for admission under the exception. Statements looking backward do not qualify except in disputes about a will.

7. In Hillmon, the Supreme Court observed in dictum that a statement by a declarant as to his intent to do something with a third party could be used to prove not only what the declarant did but also what the third party did. Rule 803(3) does not indicate whether this approach is retained under the rule, and the legislative history indicates disagreement on the point between the House of Representatives and the Senate.

8. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom a state of mind statement is admitted to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, and (c) permits the party against whom the evidence is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions. Thus, a party who seeks to impeach a trial witness with an inconsistent statement must comply with the foundation requirement found in Rule 613, but the same party need not lay a foundation before offering extrinsic evidence to impeach a hearsay declarant whose state of mind statement is admitted.

9. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [identify declarant] [did or did not] make a statement and that this statement described his/her then existing [emotion, sensation, pain, physical condition, intention, etc.]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the statement [is or is not] admissible as a statement of a then existing mental, emotional, or physical condition under Rule 803(3).

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

8-14 Statements for Medical Diagnosis or Treatment.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

* * *

(4) Statements for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment. -- Statements made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment and describing medical history, or past or present symptoms, pain, or sensations, or the inception or general character of the cause or external source thereof insofar as reasonably pertinent to diagnosis or treatment.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Hearsay exceptions that are included in Rule 803 do not require a showing of unavailability. Thus, the hearsay declarant may or may not be present at trial as the hearsay statement is introduced pursuant to an exception.

6. Rule 803(4) expands the common-law exception for statements of medical history. The rule provides that statements made for medical diagnosis or treatment that report present or past pain and symptoms and even statements concerning the external source of pain or symptoms are admissible. Thus, unlike Rule 803(3), Rule 803(4) covers statements relying on the memory of a declarant as well as statements of present mental or physical condition.

7. Nothing in Rule 803(4) limits the exception to a patient's own statements. Statements of family members, rescue squad members, or other persons who are providing information about the patient that is reasonably pertinent to medical diagnosis or treatment come within the exception. The rule permits statements to be admitted that describe the general character of the cause or source of an injury and thus is a broad hearsay exception.

8. Rule 803(4) is not a hearsay exception for the medical diagnosis itself. Statements by a doctor concerning a diagnosis or proposed treatment are not statements made for medical diagnosis. Such statements, if incorporated in records, may qualify as legitimate parts of business records under Rule 803(6), but they do not fit within Rule 803(4).

9. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom a statement of medical condition is admitted to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, and (c) permits the party against whom the evidence is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions. Thus, a party who seeks to impeach a trial witness with an inconsistent statement must comply with the foundation requirement found in Rule 613, but the same party need not lay a foundation before offering extrinsic evidence to impeach a hearsay declarant whose statement of medical condition is admitted.

10. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [identify declarant] [did or did not] make a statement, this statement was made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment of [identify declarant or other person], and this statement [did or did not] describe [medical history, past or present symptoms, pain, or sensations]. I also find by a preponderance of the evidence that the portions of the statement that describe the cause or external source of pain or symptoms [were or were not] reasonably pertinent to diagnosis or treatment. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the statement [is or is not] admissible as a statement made for medical diagnosis or treatment under Rule 803(4).

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Declarant Testifies at Trial

[Name of party] has presented evidence that [name or identify declarant] made a statement concerning [subject matter] before this trial started. It is for you to decide whether this statement was made. [Name or identify declarant] has testified or will testify. You may give the statement the same weight as you give trial testimony. You may consider [name of declarant's] trial testimony when you decide the weight to give to the earlier statement.

[2] Declarant Does Not Testify at Trial

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

6-8 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 8-15

8-15 Prior Recollection Recorded.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

* * *

(5) Recorded recollection. -- A memorandum or record concerning a matter about which a witness once had knowledge but now has insufficient recollection to enable the witness to testify fully and accurately, shown to have been made or adopted by the witness when the matter was fresh in the witness' memory and to reflect that knowledge correctly. If admitted, the memorandum or record may be read into evidence but may not itself be received as an exhibit unless offered by an adverse party.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Hearsay exceptions that are included in Rule 803 do not require a showing of unavailability. Although Rule 803(5) on its face is one of the many rules that make the availability of the declarant immaterial, the effect of the rule is to require availability since the foundation requires that the witness whose recorded recollection is offered be unable to testify fully and accurately. This requirement means that the witness must be present to lay this foundation. Moreover, the witness's presence is also required to demonstrate that when the witness wrote or adopted the statement the matters were fresh in the witness's memory and were recorded accurately.

6. Rule 803(5) does not require a total memory loss. Any loss of memory that results in the witness being unable to testify fully and accurately warrants recourse to recorded recollection.

7. Rule 803(5) only permits the proffering party to read recorded recollection to the jury. Recorded recollection is not admissible in written form.

8. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom prior recollection recorded is admitted to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, and (c) permits the party against whom the evidence is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions. Thus, a party who seeks to impeach a witness testifying from memory with an inconsistent statement must comply with the foundation requirement found in Rule 613, but the same party need not lay a foundation before offering extrinsic evidence to impeach prior recollection recorded that is read to the jury. If the prior inconsistent statement is in writing, it may be introduced and the jury will have the opportunity to view the written inconsistent statement but will not have a written copy of the recorded recollection.

9. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of witness] [is able or is unable] to testify fully and accurately concerning a matter about which [name of witness] once had knowledge, [name of witness] [did or did not] [make or adopt] the contents of a memorandum or record, [name of witness] [did or did not] do so while the matter set forth therein was fresh in [name of witness's] mind, and the memorandum or record [does or does not] correctly reflect the witness's knowledge at the time it was made. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible as recorded recollection under Rule 803(5) and [may or may not] be read to the jury.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Declarant's Own Recordation

[Name of party] has presented evidence that [name of witness] made a record of what he/she remembered before this trial started. [Name of witness] testified that his/her memory was fresh when he/she made the record and that this memory is accurately set forth in the record that was read to you. It is for you to decide how fresh the witness's memory was when the record was made, how accurate the witness's memory was when the record was made, and how accurate the record of that memory is. You may give the record that was read to you the same weight as you give trial testimony. You may consider [name of declarant's] trial testimony when you decide the weight to give this record.

[2] Declarant Adopted Record

[Name of party] has presented evidence that [name of declarant] had a memory of certain matters prior to trial that was more complete and accurate than the witness's current memory, [name of declarant] described this memory to [name or describe third party], and [name of declarant] confirmed that [name or describe third party] accurately recorded this memory in the record that was read to you. It is for you to decide how fresh the witness's memory was when the record was made, how accurate the witness's memory was when the record was made, how carefully the memory was recorded, how carefully [name of declarant] examined the record in confirming that it was accurate, and how reliable the witness's memory and the record are. You may give the record that was read to you the same weight as you give trial testimony. You may consider [name of declarant's] trial testimony when you decide the weight to give this record.

CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

6-8 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 8-16

8-16 Business Records.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

* * *

(6) Records of regularly conducted activity. -- A memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, in any form, of acts, events, conditions, opinions, or diagnoses, made at or near the time by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge, if kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity, and if it was the regular practice of that business activity to make the memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, all as shown by the testimony of the custodian or other qualified witness, or by certification that complies with Rule 902(11), Rule 902(12), or a statute permitting certification, unless the source of information or the method or circumstances of preparation indicate lack of trustworthiness. The term "business" as used in this paragraph includes business, institution, association, profession, occupation, and calling of every kind, whether or not conducted for profit.

(7) Absence of entry in records kept in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (6). -- Evidence that a matter is not included in the memoranda, reports, records, or data compilations, in any form, kept in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (6), to prove the nonoccurrence or nonexistence of the matter, if the matter was of a kind of which a memorandum, report, record, or data compilation was regularly made and preserved, unless the sources of information or other circumstances indicate lack of trustworthiness.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

Rule 902. Self-Authentication

Extrinsic evidence of authenticity as a condition precedent to admissibility is not required with respect to the following:

* * *

(11) Certified domestic records of regularly conducted activity. -- The original or a duplicate of a domestic record of regularly conducted activity that would be admissible under Rule 803(6) if accompanied by a written declaration of its custodian or other qualified person, in a manner complying with any Act of Congress or rule prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority, certifying that the record --

(A) was made at or near the time of the occurrence of the matters set forth by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge of those matters;

(B) was kept in the course of the regularly conducted activity; and

(C) was made by the regularly conducted activity as a regular practice. A party intending to offer a record into evidence under this paragraph must provide written notice of that intention to all adverse parties, and must make the record and declaration available for inspection sufficiently in advance of their offer into evidence to provide an adverse party with a fair opportunity to challenge them.

(12) Certified foreign records of regularly conducted activity. -- In a civil case, the original or a duplicate of a foreign record of regularly conducted activity that would be admissible under Rule 803(6) if accompanied by a written declaration by its custodian or other qualified person certifying that the record --

(A) was made at or near the time of the occurrence of the matters set forth by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge of those matters;

(B) was kept in the course of the regularly conducted activity; and

(C) was made by the regularly conducted activity as a regular practice.

The declaration must be signed in a manner that, if falsely made, would subject the maker to criminal penalty under the laws of the country where the declaration is signed. A party intending to offer a record into evidence under this paragraph must provide written notice of that intention to all adverse parties, and must make the record and declaration available for inspection sufficiently in advance of their offer into evidence to provide an adverse party with a fair opportunity to challenge them.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Hearsay exceptions that are included in Rule 803 do not require a showing of unavailability. Although Rule 803(6) on its face is one of the many rules that make the availability of the declarant immaterial, the effect of the rule is to require availability of some witness to lay the foundation for the business record or to have a witness provide a certificate in conformity with Rule 902(11), Rule 902(12), or a corresponding federal statute. The foundation may be laid by a custodian of records or by any other qualified witness. The custodian or other foundation witness need not be able to say exactly who in the business made a certain record. The rule requires that the record be made in the ordinary course of business, at or near the time of the events recorded, by a person with knowledge or as a result of information provided by a person with knowledge, and kept in the ordinary course of business.

6. The rule was amended on December 1, 2000, to permit certificates to be used rather than live witnesses. This raises a question as to whether a certificate that is self-authenticating should be admitted along with the business record. The answer should be "yes," so that a trier of fact can consider the certificate in deciding the weight to give to the business record.

7. The title of this subdivision refers to regularly conducted activities; the first sentence of Rule 803(6) limits the exception to records of a business; and the final sentence defines business to refer to virtually any regularly conducted activity, whether for profit or not. The result is a very broad rule.

8. Rule 803(6) explicitly covers opinions and diagnoses, thereby clearly signaling that subjective assessments in business records are not excluded from the hearsay exception.

9. Business records may be excluded as lacking trustworthiness, but the burden is on the party objecting to the records to make a showing of untrustworthiness.

10. Rule 803(7) permits business records to be used to prove that the absence of a recording means that an event or condition did not take place. The reasoning is that, if an event or condition would have been recorded in the ordinary course of the business, the absence of a record is proof that it did not occur.

11. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom a business record is offered to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, and (c) permits the party against whom the evidence is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions. It can be tricky to decide who the declarant is when a business record is offered. It seems clear that the business is a declarant and can be impeached. If individual contributions to business records can be identified, these individuals may also be declarants and be subject to impeachment.

12. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [identify document] [is or is not] a [memorandum, report, record, or data compilation] of [acts, events, conditions, opinions, or diagnoses], the document [was or was not] made at or near the time of the matters recorded therein, the matters recorded [were or were not] based upon information transmitted by a person with knowledge, the document [was or was not] kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity of [identify business activity], and it [was or was not] the regular practice of [identify business activity] to make such a document. I also find by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of witness or certifier] [was or was not] qualified to lay the foundation for this document. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible as a record of a regularly conducted activity under Rule 803(6).

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Business Record to Prove Contents -- Custodian Testifies

[Name of party] has presented records of [name of business]. [Name of custodian] testified that these records were made by [name of business] in the ordinary course of its business, were based upon the knowledge of the person who transmitted or recorded the information, were made at or near the time of the matters recorded, and were kept in the ordinary course of its business. You may consider the completeness or incompleteness of the records; their appearance, and the care or lack of care with which they have been preserved; the testimony about who provided the information that was recorded and who actually recorded it; whether the business actually relied upon these records and would likely have been aware of any mistakes; and any other evidence admitted in this case in deciding what weight to give these records. You may give these records the same weight as trial testimony.

[2] Business Record to Prove Contents -- Foundation by Certificate

[Name of party] has presented records of [name of business] along with a certificate of [identify person certifying the records] certifying that these records were made by [name of business] in the ordinary course of its business, were based upon the knowledge of the person who transmitted or recorded the information, were made at or near the time of the matters recorded, and were kept in the ordinary course of its business. You may consider the completeness or incompleteness of the records; their appearance, and the care or lack of care with which they have been preserved; the appearance and contents of the certificate offered along with the records, whether the business actually relied upon these records and would likely have been aware of any mistakes; and any other evidence admitted in this case in deciding what weight to give these records. You may give these records the same weight as trial testimony.

[3] Business Record -- Admitted by Stipulation

[Name of party] has presented records of [name of business]. The parties agree that these records were made by [name of business] in the ordinary course of its business, were based upon the knowledge of the person who transmitted or recorded the information, were made at or near the time of the matters recorded, and were kept in the ordinary course of its business. You may consider the completeness or incompleteness of the records; their appearance, and the care or lack of care with which they have been preserved; any evidence about who provided the information that was recorded and who actually recorded it; and any other evidence admitted in this case in deciding what weight to give these records. You may give these records the same weight as trial testimony.

[4] Absence of Entry in Business Record

[Name of party] has presented records of [name of business]. [Name of custodian] testified that these records were made by [name of business] in the ordinary course of its business, were based upon the knowledge of the person who transmitted or recorded the information, were made at or near the time of the matters recorded, and were kept in the ordinary course of its business. [Name of party] contends that the absence of any entry in these records for [describe event or condition] is evidence that it did not occur. You may consider the completeness or incompleteness of the records; their appearance, and the care or lack of care with which they have been preserved; the testimony about who provided the information that was recorded and who actually recorded it; whether the business actually relied upon these records and would likely have been aware of any mistakes; and any other evidence admitted in this case in deciding what weight to give these records. You may give these records the same weight as trial testimony.

CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

6-8 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 8-17

8-17 Public Records.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

* * *

(8) Public records and reports. -- Records, reports, statements, or data compilations, in any form, of public offices or agencies, setting forth (A) the activities of the office or agency, or (B) matters observed pursuant to duty imposed by law as to which matters there was a duty to report, excluding, however, in criminal cases matters observed by police officers and other law enforcement personnel, or (C) in civil actions and proceedings and against the Government in criminal cases, factual findings resulting from an investigation made pursuant to authority granted by law, unless the sources of information or other circumstances indicate lack of trustworthiness.

(9) Records of vital statistics. -- Records or data compilations, in any form, of births, fetal deaths, deaths, or marriages, if the report thereof was made to a public office pursuant to requirements of law.

(10) Absence of public record or entry. -- To prove the absence of a record, report, statement, or data compilation, in any form, or the nonoccurrence or nonexistence of a matter of which a record, report, statement, or data compilation, in any form, was regularly made and preserved by a public office or agency, evidence in the form of a certification in accordance with rule 902, or testimony, that diligent search failed to disclose the record, report, statement, or data compilation, or entry.

(12) Marriage, baptismal, and similar certificates. -- Statements of fact contained in a certificate that the maker performed a marriage or other ceremony or administered a sacrament, made by a clergyman, public official, or other person authorized by the rules or practices of a religious organization or by law to perform the act certified, and purporting to have been issued at the time of the act or within a reasonable time thereafter.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

Rule 902. Self-Authentication

Extrinsic evidence of authenticity as a condition precedent to admissibility is not required with respect to the following:

* * *

(1) Domestic public documents under seal. -- A document bearing a seal purporting to be that of the United States, or of any State, district, Commonwealth, territory, or insular possession thereof, or the Panama Canal Zone, or the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, or of a political subdivision, department, officer, or agency thereof, and a signature purporting to be an attestation or execution.

(2) Domestic public documents not under seal. -- A document purporting to bear the signature in the official capacity of an officer or employee of any entity included in paragraph (1) hereof, having no seal, if a public officer having a seal and having official duties in the district or political subdivision of the officer or employee certifies under seal that the signer has the official capacity and that the signature is genuine.

(3) Foreign public documents. -- A document purporting to be executed or attested in an official capacity by a person authorized by the laws of a foreign country to make the execution or attestation, and accompanied by a final certification as to the genuineness of the signature and official position (A) of the executing or attesting person, or (B) of any foreign official whose certificate of genuineness of signature and official position relates to the execution or attestation or is in a chain of certificates of genuineness of signature and official position relating to the execution or attestation. A final certification may be made by a secretary of embassy or legation, consul general, consul, vice consul, or consular agent of the United States, or a diplomatic or consular official of the foreign country assigned or accredited to the United States. If reasonable opportunity has been given to all parties to investigate the authenticity and accuracy of official documents, the court may, for good cause shown, order that they be treated as presumptively authentic without final certification or permit them to be evidenced by an attested summary with or without final certification.

(4) Certified copies of public records. -- A copy of an official record or report or entry therein, or of a document authorized by law to be recorded or filed and actually recorded or filed in a public office, including data compilations in any form, certified as correct by the custodian or other person authorized to make the certification, by certificate complying with paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of this rule or complying with any Act of Congress or rule prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority.

(5) Official publications. -- Books, pamphlets, or other publications purporting to be issued by public authority.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Hearsay exceptions that are included in Rule 803 do not require a showing of unavailability. Rule 803(8) and (9) are often used in connection with Rule 902, which means that documents are both self-authenticating and admissible as public records. Thus, it is unnecessary even to have a foundational witness such as a custodian testify. The fact that no foundation witness is required as a matter of law does not mean that such witnesses are forbidden or that they might not be required as a tactical necessity to demonstrate the import and the reliability of records. A party relying on public records may find it extremely helpful to offer foundation testimony.

6. Rule 803(8) contains three separate and distinct variations on the public records exception. (A) provides an exception for records setting forth the activities of a public office or agency. This exception applies in all cases. (B) provides an exception for records that include matters observed pursuant to a duty imposed by law, but on its face seems to create an exception in criminal cases for matters observed by law enforcement officers. (C) provides an exception for factual findings made pursuant to an official inquiry, but is limited to civil cases and to evidence offered against the government in criminal cases. Despite the fact that (B) and (C) are worded differently, the case law tends to treat them similarly and to interpret (B) as forbidding records of matters observed by law enforcement officers from being used against the defendant in a criminal case, but not forbidding use against the government itself. A number of courts have interpreted (B) as not excluding reports of ministerial or mechanical observations by government officers that are made routinely and involve little subjectivity.

7. The Supreme Court has taken a very broad view of "factual findings." In Beech Aircraft Corp. v. Rainey, 488 U.S. 153 (1988) , the Court held that the term includes evaluative reports. The result is that factual findings include subjective as well as objective judgments that are made pursuant to an investigation. The Supreme Court's interpretation of "factual findings" means that Rule 803(8)(C) is similar in its scope, at least in civil cases and when used against the government in criminal cases, to Rule 803(6). Rule 803(6) explicitly covers opinions and diagnoses, thereby clearly signaling that subjective assessments in business records are not excluded from the hearsay exception.

8. Public records may be excluded as lacking trustworthiness, but the burden is on the party objecting to the records to make a showing of untrustworthiness. Rule 803(9) creates a special exception for records of vital statistics that are kept by public agencies. This rule does not include an exception for records shown to be untrustworthy.

9. Rule 803(10) permits a party to show the absence of a particular event or filing from the appropriate public records as evidence that the event or filing did not take place. The reasoning is that, if the event, filing, or occurrence did take place, it would have been recorded in public records.

10. It is somewhat ironic that Rule 803(10) provides that, to prove the absence of a record, testimony must reveal that a diligent search of the records was conducted, but the rule permits introduction of a certified copy of records without any certification that a diligent search was conducted to assure that the records produced are complete.

11. The scope of Rule 803(9) is not clear on its face. It provides a hearsay exception for records of such matters as births and deaths, but does not indicate whether a record purporting to set forth facts surrounding a birth or a death is admissible. The thrust of the rule appears to be to permit events to be proved by these records, not surrounding circumstances.

12. Rule 803(12) provides a hearsay exception for certificates of ceremonial acts that are prepared either by religious officials or public officials. There is no requirement that these certificates be kept by any public office. Rule 803(12) requires only that the religious official or public official be authorized by the religion or law to perform the act and that the certificate be issued at the time of the act or reasonably soon thereafter.

13. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom a public record is admitted to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, and (c) permits the party against whom the evidence is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions. It can be tricky to decide who the declarant is when a public record is offered. It seems clear that the agency that created the record is a declarant and can be impeached. If individual contributions to public records can be identified -- e.g., the investigator who made factual findings -- these individuals may also be declarants and be subject to impeachment.

14. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [identify document] [is or is not] a [record, report, statement, or data compilation] of a public office or agency, the document [does or does not] set forth [the activities of the office or agency, matters observed pursuant to duty imposed by law as to which there was a duty to report, or factual findings resulting from an investigation made pursuant to legal authority], and the sources of the information or circumstances [do or do not] indicate that the matters recorded are untrustworthy. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible as a public record or report under Rule 803(8).

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Public Records to Prove Contents -- Custodian or Other Witness Testifies

[Name of party] has presented records of [name of agency]. [Name of custodian] testified that these records were made and kept by [name of agency] in its official capacity. You may consider the completeness or incompleteness of the records; their appearance, and the care or lack of care with which they have been preserved; any evidence about who provided the information that was recorded and who actually recorded it; whether the agency actually relied upon these records and would likely have been aware of any mistakes; and any other evidence admitted in this case in deciding what weight to give these records. You may give these records the same weight as trial testimony.

[2] Public Record -- Self-authenticating

[Name of party] has presented records of [name of agency]. You may consider the completeness or incompleteness of the records; their appearance, and the care or lack of care with which they have been preserved; any evidence about who provided the information that was recorded and who actually recorded it; whether the agency actually relied upon these records and would likely have been aware of any mistakes; and any other evidence admitted in this case in deciding what weight to give these records. You may give these records the same weight as trial testimony.

[3] Absence of Entry in Public Record -- Custodian Testifies

[Name of party] has presented records of [name of agency]. [Name of party] contends that the absence of any record of [describe event, occurrence, or filing] proves that it did not occur. [Name of custodian] testified that these records were made and kept by [name of agency] in its official capacity. You may consider the completeness or incompleteness of the records; their appearance, and the care or lack of care with which they have been preserved; any evidence about who provided the information that was recorded and who actually recorded it; whether the agency actually relied upon these records and would likely have been aware of any mistakes; and any other evidence admitted in this case in deciding what weight to give these records. You may give these records the same weight as trial testimony.

[4] Absence of Entry in Public Records -- Self-authenticating

[Name of party] has presented records of [name of agency]. [Name of party] contends that the absence of any record of [describe event, occurrence, or filing] proves that it did not occur. You may consider the completeness or incompleteness of the records; their appearance, and the care or lack of care with which they have been preserved; any evidence about who provided the information that was recorded and who actually recorded it; whether the agency actually relied upon these records and would likely have been aware of any mistakes; and any other evidence admitted in this case in deciding what weight to give these records. You may give these records the same weight as trial testimony.

CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

6-8 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 8-18

8-18 Religious Organization Records.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

* * *

(11) Records of religious organizations. -- Statements of births, marriages, divorces, deaths, legitimacy, ancestry, relationship by blood or marriage, or other similar facts of personal or family history, contained in a regularly kept record of a religious organization.

(12) Marriage, baptismal, and similar certificates. -- Statements of fact contained in a certificate that the maker performed a marriage or other ceremony or administered a sacrament, made by a clergyman, public official, or other person authorized by the rules or practices of a religious organization or by law to perform the act certified, and purporting to have been issued at the time of the act or within a reasonable time thereafter.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Hearsay exceptions that are included in Rule 803 do not require a showing of unavailability. Rule 803(11) is similar to the business records rule. On its face Rule 803(11) makes the availability of the declarant immaterial. However, the effect of the rule is to require some witness to lay the foundation for the record. A witness generally will be required to demonstrate that the record is regularly kept by the religious organization. Unlike Rule 803(6), Rule 803(11) does not require that the record be made at or near the time of the events recorded, by a person with knowledge, or as a result of information provided by a person with knowledge. The last clause of Rule 803(11) is ambiguous. Is a regularly kept record one that is regularly made and kept or merely one that, if made, is regularly kept? The ambiguity may be intentional. Records of religious organizations may not include all marriages, divorces, etc., since some events may go unreported to the organization, and it should be sufficient that the organization regularly keeps a record of events that are reported. Hence, the rule does not require any showing that the religious organization purports to record all relevant events. Indeed, there is no provision in the rules to use the absence of an entry in records of religious organizations to prove anything, which signals that Rule 803(11) is intended to be different from Rules 803(6) and 803(8).

6. Rule 803(11) is limited in its scope. Unlike Rule 803(6), Rule 803(11) does not cover opinions and diagnoses of why events happened. Rule 803(11) is directed at events in a family or personal history rather than to explanations of events.

7. Although business records and public records may be excluded as lacking trustworthiness, no such provision is included in Rule 803(11). This might well be a recognition of the point made above that the drafters understood that these records would be less complete than many business and public records.

8. Rule 803(12) provides a hearsay exception for certificates of ceremonial acts that are prepared either by religious officials or public officials. There is no requirement that these certificates be kept by any public office. Rule 803(12) requires only that the religious official or public official be authorized by the religion or law to perform the act and that the certificate be issued at the time of the act or reasonably soon thereafter.

9. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom an organizational record is offered to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, and (c) permits the party against whom the evidence is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions. It can be tricky to decide who the declarant is when an organizational record is offered. It seems clear that the organization is a declarant and can be impeached. If individual contributions to organizational records can be identified, these individuals may also be declarants and be subject to impeachment.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following if the document purports to be a record of a religious organization: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [identify document] [is or is not] a document that was regularly kept by [name of organization], that [name of organization] [is or is not] a religious organization, and the document [does or does not] contain a statement of [births, marriages, divorces, deaths, or family history]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible as a record of a religious organization under Rule 803(11).

If the document purports to be a particular certificate, the judge will want to consider the following instruction for the record outside the hearing of the jury: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [identify document] [is or is not] a certificate stating that the maker of the document [performed a marriage, administered a sacrament], the maker [was or was not] [a public official, member of the clergy] who [was or was not] authorized by law or the rules or practices of a religious organization to perform the act certified, and the certificate [does or does not] purport to have been issued at the time of the act or within a reasonable time thereafter. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible under Rule 803(12).

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Organizational Record to Prove Contents -- Custodian Testifies

[Name of party] has presented records of [name of organization]. [Name of custodian] testified that these records were regularly kept by [name of organization]. You may consider the completeness or incompleteness of the records; their appearance, and the care or lack of care with which they have been preserved; the testimony about who provided the information that was recorded and who actually recorded it; whether the organization actually relied upon these records and would likely have been aware of any mistakes; and any other evidence admitted in this case in deciding what weight to give these records. You may give these records the same weight as trial testimony.

[2] Organizational Record -- Admitted by Stipulation

[Name of party] has presented records of [name of organization]. The parties have agreed that these records were made by [name of organization] in the ordinary course of its business, were based upon the knowledge of the person who transmitted or recorded the information, were made at or near the time of the matters recorded, and were kept in the ordinary course of its business. You may consider the completeness or incompleteness of the records; their appearance, and the care or lack of care with which they have been preserved; any evidence about who provided the information that was recorded and who actually recorded it; and any other evidence admitted in this case in deciding what weight to give these records. You may give these records the same weight as trial testimony.

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

* * *

(13) Family records. -- Statements of fact concerning personal or family history contained in family Bibles, genealogies, charts, engravings on rings, inscriptions on family portraits, engravings on urns, crypts, or tombstones, or the like.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

Rule 901. Requirement of Authentication or Identification

(a) General provision. -- The requirement of authentication or identification as a condition precedent to admissibility is satisfied by evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims.

(b) Illustrations. -- By way of illustration only, and not by way of limitation, the following are examples of authentication or identification conforming with the requirements of this rule:

(1) Testimony of witness with knowledge. -- Testimony that a matter is what it is claimed to be.

* * *

(4) Distinctive characteristics and the like. -- Appearance, contents, substance, internal patterns, or other distinctive characteristics, taken in conjunction with circumstances.

* * *

(8) Ancient documents or data compilation. -- Evidence that a document or data compilation, in any form, (A) is in such condition as to create no suspicion concerning its authenticity, (B) was in a place where it, if authentic, would likely be, and (C) has been in existence 20 years or more at the time it is offered.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Hearsay exceptions that are included in Rule 803 do not require a showing of unavailability. Rule 803(13) might appear to be a rule that will require a foundation witness to identify a bible, crypt, or urn. In some cases, however, a crypt or urn can be authenticated by circumstantial evidence or by age under Rule 901(b)(4) and (8).

6. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom a family record is offered to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, and (c) permits the party against whom the evidence is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions. It can be tricky to decide who the declarant is when a family record is offered. If individual contributions to family records can be identified, these individuals may be declarants and be subject to impeachment. It is doubtful that an entire family is subject to impeachment because someone in the family created a record that falls within Rule 803(13).

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [identify object] [does or does not] contain a statement of fact concerning personal or family history, and [identify object] [is or is not] a family record. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible under Rule 803(13).

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Family Record to Prove Contents -- Witness Testifies

[Name of party] has presented [describe object]. [Name of witness] testified that this [describe object] belonged to [identify individual or family]. You may consider the appearance of [describe object], whether the matters recorded within it are consistent with the nature and purpose of [describe object], whether there is evidence that [identify individual or family] relied upon or acted consistently with the information contained in [describe object], and any other evidence admitted in this case in deciding what weight to give the information contained in [describe object]. You may give this information the same weight as trial testimony.

[2] Family Record to Prove Contents -- Circumstantial Authentication

[Name of party] has presented [describe object] and contends that it belonged to [identify individual or family]. You may consider the appearance of [describe object], whether the matters recorded within it are consistent with the nature and purpose of [describe object], whether there is evidence that [identify individual or family] relied upon or acted consistently with the information contained in [describe object], and any other evidence admitted in this case in deciding what weight to give the information contained in [describe object]. You may give this information the same weight as trial testimony.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

* * *

(14) Records of documents affecting an interest in property. -- The record of a document purporting to establish or affect an interest in property, as proof of the content of the original recorded document and its execution and delivery by each person by whom it purports to have been executed, if the record is a record of a public office and an applicable statute authorizes the recording of documents of that kind in that office.

(15) Statements in documents affecting an interest in property. -- A statement contained in a document purporting to establish or affect an interest in property if the matter stated was relevant to the purpose of the document, unless dealings with the property since the document was made have been inconsistent with the truth of the statement or the purport of the document.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

Rule 901. Requirement of Authentication or Identification

(a) General provision. -- The requirement of authentication or identification as a condition precedent to admissibility is satisfied by evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims.

(b) Illustrations. -- By way of illustration only, and not by way of limitation, the following are examples of authentication or identification conforming with the requirements of this rule:

(1) Testimony of witness with knowledge. -- Testimony that a matter is what it is claimed to be.

(7) Public records or reports. -- Evidence that a writing authorized by law to be recorded or filed and in fact recorded or filed in a public office, or a purported public record, report, statement, or data compilation, in any form, is from the public office where items of this nature are kept.

(8) Ancient documents or data compilation. -- Evidence that a document or data compilation, in any form, (A) is in such condition as to create no suspicion concerning its authenticity, (B) was in a place where it, if authentic, would likely be, and (C) has been in existence 20 years or more at the time it is offered.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Hearsay exceptions that are included in Rule 803 do not require a showing of unavailability. Thus, Rule 803(14) and (15) may be used whether or not the people who dealt with property are available to testify. Rule 901(b)(7) provides for ready authentication of recorded documents affecting interests in property.

6. Rule 803(14) makes the record of a document that purports to demarcate a property interest admissible to prove the content of the original recorded document and its execution and delivery by all who have purported to execute and deliver it, provided that the record is kept in a public office and a statute authorizes the recording of such a document.

7. Rule 803(15) governs documents that are not recorded but purport to demarcate a property interest. It makes statements in such documents admissible unless dealings with the property after the document was made have been inconsistent with the statements contained therein. The rule does not clearly indicate whether the proponent of the evidence must prove that the dealings with the property have been consistent or whether the opponent must prove that the dealings have not been consistent. It would make sense to impose at a minimum upon the opponent the burden of making a good-faith allegation that the dealings have been inconsistent. If such an allegation is made, to require the proponent to demonstrate that the dealings have been consistent would require the proponent to establish some element of trustworthiness which is typically required when a hearsay exception is invoked. The trial judge decides by a preponderance of the evidence whether the exception is satisfied, but if the document is admitted all evidence concerning the consistency or inconsistency of the dealings and the contents of the document should be admissible as going to the weight a jury might choose to give the document.

8. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom a record is offered to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, and (c) permits the party against whom the evidence is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions. Thus, Rule 806 permits a party to impeach the declarant whose statements are contained in documents purporting to create or affect a property interest.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [identify document] [does or does not] purport to affect an interest in property, the document [is or is not] a record of a public office, and an applicable statute [does or does not] authorize the recording of such documents in that office. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible under Rule 803(14) to prove the content of the originally recorded document and its execution and delivery by each person by whom it purports to have been executed.

If the document is not recorded, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [identify document] [does or does not] purport to affect an interest in property, the matter stated in the document [was or was not] relevant to the purpose of the document, and dealings with the property since the document was made [have or have not] been consistent with the contents of the document. This document therefore [is or is not] admissible under Rule 803(15).

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Recorded Document

[Name of party] has presented a record obtained from [identify public office]. [Name of party] relies upon this record to prove [identify the relevant portion of the document]. You may give this information the same weight as trial testimony.

[2] Unrecorded Document

[Name of party] has presented [identify document] and relies upon it to prove [identify the relevant portion of the document]. You may consider whether the dealings with the property after this document was made were consistent or inconsistent with the document in deciding how much weight to give this document. You may give it the same weight as trial testimony.

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

[8-21 Ancient Documents.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence exept those with respect to privileges.

(b) Relevancy conditioned on fact. -- When the relevancy of evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court shall admit it upon, or subject to, the introduction of evidence sufficient to support a finding of the fulfillment of the condition.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended

by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

* * *

(16) Statements in ancient documents. -- Statements in a document in existence twenty years or more the authenticity of which is established.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

Rule 901. Requirement of Authentication or Identification

(a) General provision. -- The requirement of authentication or identification as a condition precedent to admissibility is satisfied by evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims.

(b) Illustrations. -- By way of illustration only, and not by way of limitation, the following are examples of authentication or identification conforming with the requirements of this rule:

* * *

(8) Ancient documents or data compilation. -- Evidence that a document or data compilation, in any form, (A) is in such condition as to create no suspicion concerning its authenticity, (B) was in a place where it, if authentic, would likely be, and (C) has been in existence 20 years or more at the time it is offered.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. The ancient document exception is one of the broadest exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence. It provides a hearsay exception for any statement in any document more than twenty years old as long as the authenticity of the document is established. The authenticity of many documents is easily established. Rule 901(b)(8) provides, for example, for authentication of ancient documents, and any other showing under Rule 901 that would permit a fact finder to find that the document is what the proponent claims is sufficient authentication. The only guarantee of trustworthiness associated with Rule 803(16) is the age of the document, and age is not always a guarantee of reliability. Although properly authenticated ancient documents will not be excluded on hearsay grounds, there may be other reasons a trial judge would exclude ancient documents. For example, since the opponent of hearsay is entitled to impeach the declarant, as explained below, the opponent may convince the trial judge that some documents are so inherently untrustworthy that the probative value of their contents is substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effects of admission. The trial judge may then exclude the ancient document under Rule 403.

6. The relationship between Rule 803(16) and Rule 901(b)(8) is interesting. The latter is an illustration of how a document may be authenticated. Generally, authentication questions are resolved by the trial judge under Rule 104(b) while hearsay issues like those arising under Rule 803(16) are resolved by the judge under Rule 104(a). If the trial judge finds that a document has not been in existence for twenty years, the document will fail under the hearsay rule if offered for its truth. The same document might, however, be sufficiently authenticated under Rules 104(b) and 901 and thus be admissible if offered for some other purpose.

7. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom a document is offered to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, and (c) permits the party against whom the evidence is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions. Thus, Rule 806 permits a party to impeach the declarant who prepared Rule 803(16) documents. In some instances, Rule 806 will permit an entity to be impeached. In other instances where individual contributors to Rule 803(16) documents can be identified, Rule 806 will permit them to be impeached.

8. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [identify document] [has or has not] been in existence for at least twenty years and that there [is or is not] sufficient evidence for the jury to find that the document is what [name of party] claims. I have considered whether the document is in such condition as to create no suspicion concerning its authenticity and was in a place where an authentic document would likely be. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible under Rule 803(16) as an ancient document.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Ancient Documents Generally

[Name of party] has presented [describe ancient document] and relies upon it to prove [identify the relevant portion of the document]. This document was prepared in [state year]. You may consider in deciding what weight to give the information in this document any evidence that is presented concerning the nature of the document, the audience for whom it was intended, the circumstances in which it was made, how important or unimportant it was that the information was accurate when the document was made, the condition of the document, where it was found, the length of time it has been in existence, and whether the passage of time increases or decreases the reliability of the information. You may give the information in this document the same weight as trial testimony.

[2] Witness Reliance on Ancient Documents

[Name of party] has presented [describe ancient document] and relies upon it to prove [identify the relevant portion of the document]. This document was prepared in [state year]. You may consider in deciding what weight to give the information in this document any evidence that is presented concerning the nature of the document, the audience for whom it was intended, the circumstances in which it was made, how important or unimportant it was that the information was accurate when the document was made, the condition of the document, where it was found, the length of time it has been in existence, and whether the passage of time increases or decreases the reliability of the information. You may give the information in this document the same weight as trial testimony. The weight that you give the document may affect the weight you give to the testimony of a witness who relies upon the document at trial.

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

* * *

(17) Market reports, commercial publications. -- Market quotations, tabulations, lists, directories, or other published compilations, generally used and relied upon by the public or by persons in particular occupations.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

Rule 902. Self-Authentication

Extrinsic evidence of authenticity as a condition precedent to admissibility is not required with respect to the following:

* * *

(5) Official publications. -- Books, pamphlets, or other publications purporting to be issued by public authority.

(6) Newspapers and periodicals. -- Printed materials purporting to be newspapers or periodicals.

(7) Trade inscriptions and the like. -- Inscriptions, signs, tags, or labels purporting to have been affixed in the course of business and indicating ownership, control, or origin.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Hearsay exceptions that are included in Rule 803 do not require a showing of unavailability. Thus, a party may rely upon tables, lists, and the like even though the authors of the documents are available to testify. One aspect of Rule 803(17) may require a foundation witness. If a list or document is used in particular occupations, a witness may have to so testify. The trial judge may in some cases take judicial notice that some lists or quotations are widely used by the general public. The self-authentication provisions of Rule 902 limit the need for a witness to identify the preparer of most documents that fall within Rule 803(17).

6. Although foundation testimony may not be required to admit lists and tabulations, parties may choose to offer foundation testimony to explain Rule 803(17) documents and to convince a jury that they are reliable. In many cases, the testimony will come from an expert who relies upon these documents and who is able to explain their significance.

7. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom a record is offered to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, and (c) permits the party against whom the evidence is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions. Thus, Rule 806 permits a party to impeach the declarant who prepares Rule 803(17) documents. In some instances, Rule 806 will permit an entity to be impeached. In other instances where individual contributors to Rule 803(17) documents can be identified, Rule 806 will permit them to be impeached.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [identify document] [is or is not] a published compilation of [describe compilation] and that this document [is or is not] generally used and relied upon by [the public or persons in a particular occupation]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible under Rule 803(17).

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

The following instructions can easily be requested and readily be adopted by trial judges to explain trial developments to the jury.

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 201. Judicial Notice of Adjudicative Facts

(a) Scope of rule. -- This rule governs only judicial notice of adjudicative facts.

(b) Kinds of facts. -- A judicially noticed fact must be one not subject to reasonable dispute in that it is either (1) generally known within the territorial jurisdiction of the trial court or (2) capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned.

* * *

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

* * *

(18) Learned treatises. -- To the extent called to the attention of an expert witness upon cross-examination or relied upon by the expert witness in direct examination, statements contained in published treatises, periodicals, or pamphlets on a subject of history, medicine, or other science or art, established as a reliable authority by the testimony or admission of the witness or by other expert testimony or by judicial notice. If admitted, the statements may be read into evidence but may not be received as exhibits.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Rule 803(18) is limited to using learned treatises in connection with expert testimony. The exception does not permit a party to introduce a treatise for the truth of its contents except in connection with expert testimony. To qualify a treatise for the exception, the proponent must establish that it is a reliable authority. This can be done through expert testimony or by an admission from an adversary. The rule also indicates that reliability can be established by judicial notice, although Rule 201 does not make it easy for a trial judge to find that many treatises are reliable enough to satisfy Rule 803(18).

6. Rule 803(18) permits the proponent to call an expert and to have the expert not only rely upon reliable treatises, but also to read from those treatises to the jury. The rule does not permit the treatise itself to be introduced, however, presumably to prevent a jury from examining technical material without the help of an expert. Under the rule, admission of the evidence is limited to having the witness read it to the jury. In the case of a chart found in a treatise, it might be necessary to show the jury the chart rather than to read it. This is technically not permissible, but it appears to be necessary to reach the result intended by the drafters. After the chart has been shown to the jury, however, it should not be provided to the jury during deliberations, since that would appear to circumvent the rule and go beyond what is necessary to acquaint the jury with the contents of the treatise.

7. Rule 803(18) also permits a cross-examiner to utilize a reliable treatise whether or not the expert being cross-examined has relied upon or even is familiar with the treatise. The cross-examiner can read from it and question why the expert is not aware of it, why the expert did not utilize it, or whether and why the expert disagrees with it.

8. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom a learned treatise is offered to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, and (c) permits the party against whom the evidence is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions. Thus, Rule 806 permits a party to impeach the declarant who authored a learned treatise and to cross-examine the declarant. The rule does not address whether a declarant-author who is within the subpoena power of the court may be compelled to testify without being compensated as an expert witness.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [identify document] [is or is not] established as a reliable authority on the basis of [insert basis -- admission by a party opponent, testimony, judicial notice], this document was [relied upon by an expert witness on direct examination, called to the attention of an expert witness on cross-examination], and this document [does or does not] contain statements that are relevant to the issues in dispute. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible as a learned treatise, and the contents [may or may not] be read into evidence.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Use of Treatise on Direct Examination

[Name of party] has presented [identify publication] and relies upon it to prove [identify the relevant portion of the document]. You may give this information that was read to you the same weight as trial testimony by a witness. You may also consider the witness's reliance on this information in deciding the weight to give the witness's testimony.

[2] Use of Treatise on Cross-Examination

[Name of party] has read portions of [identify publication] during cross-examination of this witness. You may give the information that was read to you the same weight as trial testimony by a witness. You may also consider the witness's answers to questions about this information in deciding the weight to give the witness's testimony.

CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

6-8 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 8-24

8-24 Reputation Evidence.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 404. Character Evidence Not Admissible to Prove Conduct; Exceptions; Other Crimes

(a) Character evidence generally. -- Evidence of a person's character or a trait of character is not admissible for the purpose of proving action in conformity therewith on a particular occasion, except:

(1) Character of accused. -- Evidence of a pertinent trait of character offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or if evidence of a trait of character of the alleged victim of the crime is offered by an accused and admitted under Rule 404(a)(2), evidence of the same trait of character of the accused offered by the prosecution;

(2) Character of victim. -- Evidence of a pertinent trait of character of the victim of the crime offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or evidence of a character trait of peacefulness of the victim offered by the prosecution in a homicide case to rebut evidence that the victim was the first aggressor;

(3) Character of witness. -- Evidence of the character of a witness, as provided in rules 607, 608, and 609.

Rule 405. Methods of Proving Character

(a) Reputation or opinion. -- In all cases in which evidence of character or a trait of character of a person is admissible, proof may be made by testimony as to reputation or by testimony in the form of an opinion. On cross-examination, inquiry is allowable into relevant specific instances of conduct.

(b) Specific instances of conduct. -- In cases in which character or a trait of character of a person is an essential element of a charge, claim, or defense, proof may also be made of specific instances of that person's conduct.

Rule 608. Evidence of Character and Conduct of Witness

(a) Opinion and reputation evidence of character. -- The credibility of a witness may be attacked or supported by evidence in the form of opinion or reputation, but subject to these limitations: (1) the evidence may refer only to character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, and (2) evidence of truthful character is admissible only after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise.

* * *

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

* * *

(19) Reputation concerning personal or family history. -- Reputation among members of a person's family by blood, adoption, or marriage, or among a person's associates, or in the community, concerning a person's birth, adoption, marriage, divorce, death, legitimacy, relationship by blood, adoption, or marriage, ancestry, or other similar fact of his personal or family history.

(20) Reputation concerning boundaries or general history. -- Reputation in a community, arising before the controversy, as to boundaries of or customs affecting lands in the community, and reputation as to events of general history important to the community or State or nation in which located.

(21) Reputation as to character. -- Reputation of a person's character among associates or in the community.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Rule 803(19), (20), and (21) provide hearsay exceptions for reputation evidence. Rule 803(19) covers family-type information. Rule 803(20) covers property and historical issues. Rule 803(21) covers individuals, and must be examined in connection with limitations on the use of personal character evidence that are set forth in Rules 404(a), 405, and 608(a).

6. The witness who testifies at trial about reputation must lay a foundation and demonstrate knowledge of conversations in the relevant community sufficient to give rise to a reputation.

7. Although Rule 806 permits any party against whom hearsay is offered to impeach the declarant, impeachment of reputation evidence is difficult since reputation generally reflects the conversations of many unidentified persons.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of witness] [does or does not] have a sufficient basis to testify as to the reputation of [describe reputation], and that this reputation testimony [does or does not] relate to [personal or family history, boundaries or events of general history that are important to the community, or a person's character among associates in the community]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible under [Rule 803(19), (20), or (21)].

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Reputation Regarding Family or Personal History

[Name of witness] has testified that the reputation of [identify person or family] is that [describe relevant fact -- e.g., was married and divorced before marrying X]. You may give the reputation evidence the same weight as the trial testimony of witnesses. In deciding how much weight to give the reputation evidence, you may consider the length of time the reputation endured, the likelihood or unlikelihood this reputation would endure if it was false, and the opportunities or lack thereof for correcting a false reputation.

[2] Reputation Regarding Boundary

[Name of witness] has testified that the reputation or common understanding in the community is that [describe relevant fact -- e.g., the lake formed the boundary between the property of X and Y]. You may give the reputation evidence the same weight as the trial testimony of witnesses. In deciding how much weight to give the reputation evidence, you may consider the length of time the reputation endured, the likelihood or unlikelihood this reputation would endure if it was false, and the opportunities or lack thereof for correcting a false reputation.

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

6-8 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 8-25

8-25 Judgments Admitted to Prove Underlying Facts.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

* * *

(22) Judgment of previous conviction. -- Evidence of a final judgment, entered after a trial or upon a plea of guilty (but not upon a plea of nolo contendere), adjudging a person guilty of a crime punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year, to prove any fact essential to sustain the judgment, but not including, when offered by the Government in a criminal prosecution for purposes other than impeachment, judgments against persons other than the accused. The pendency of an appeal may be shown but does not affect admissibility.

(23) Judgment as to personal, family, or general history, or boundaries. -- Judgments as proof of matters of personal, family, or general history, or boundaries, essential to the judgment, if the same would be provable by evidence of reputation.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

Rule 902. Self-Authentication

Extrinsic evidence of authenticity as a condition precedent to admissibility is not required with respect to the following:

(1) Domestic public documents under seal. -- A document bearing a seal purporting to be that of the United States, or of any State, district, Commonwealth, territory, or insular possession thereof, or the Panama Canal Zone, or the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, or of a political subdivision, department, officer, or agency thereof, and a signature purporting to be an attestation or execution.

(2) Domestic public documents not under seal. -- A document purporting to bear the signature in the official capacity of an officer or employee of any entity included in paragraph (1) hereof, having no seal, if a public officer having a seal and having official duties in the district or political subdivision of the officer or employee certifies under seal that the signer has the official capacity and that the signature is genuine.

(3) Foreign public documents. -- A document purporting to be executed or attested in an official capacity by a person authorized by the laws of a foreign country to make the execution or attestation, and accompanied by a final certification as to the genuineness of the signature and official position (A) of the executing or attesting person, or (B) of any foreign official whose certificate of genuineness of signature and official position relates to the execution or attestation or is in a chain of certificates of genuineness of signature and official position relating to the execution or attestation. A final certification may be made by a secretary of embassy or legation, consul general, consul, vice consul, or consular agent of the United States, or a diplomatic or consular official of the foreign country assigned or accredited to the United States. If reasonable opportunity has been given to all parties to investigate the authenticity and accuracy of official documents, the court may, for good cause shown, order that they be treated as presumptively authentic without final certification or permit them to be evidenced by an attested summary with or without final certification.

(4) Certified copies of public records. -- A copy of an official record or report or entry therein, or of a document authorized by law to be recorded or filed and actually recorded or filed in a public office, including data compilations in any form, certified as correct by the custodian or other person authorized to make the certification, by certificate complying with paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of this rule or complying with any Act of Congress or rule prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Rule 803(22) and (23) provide hearsay exceptions for judgments in certain criminal cases and to prove the same sort of family history, personal history, property history, and other general history that may be proved by reputation evidence pursuant to Rule 803(19) and (20).

6. Rule 803(22) is limited to convictions for crimes punishable by death or imprisonment for more than one year (i.e., felonies in federal court and most states). Although the exception is drafted in a somewhat confusing fashion, it seems to permit admission of any final judgment of conviction based upon a plea of not guilty or guilty. Judgments entered pursuant to pleas of nolo contendere are excluded by the rule. The judgment may be offered to prove any fact essential to the judgment, which means any fact that must be true for the judgment of conviction to be valid. Convictions are admissible in both civil and criminal cases. The confusing language in the rule relates to whose convictions may be admitted. The rule appears to permit any conviction of any person to be used in a civil proceeding provided that the fact that is essential to the judgment of conviction is relevant. However, in criminal cases the rule appears to be limited to convictions of the defendant who is on trial (except that convictions of other persons may be used for impeachment under Rule 609).

7. Rule 803(23) permits any of the historical information that can be proved by reputation evidence to be proved by a judgment. The historical information must be essential to the judgment for the judgment to be used as evidence, which means that the historical information must be true for the judgment to be valid.

8. Certified copies of judgments will be self-authenticating, and no witness will be required to lay a foundation for a judgment.

9. Although Rule 806 permits any party against whom hearsay is offered to impeach the declarant, impeachment of judgments is difficult because the declarant is the tribunal that entered the judgment. It is permissible, however, for a party against whom a judgment is offered to elicit evidence that the judgment is on appeal.

10. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [identify document] [is or is not] evidence of a final judgment that was rendered after a trial or upon a plea of guilty, this document [does or does not] adjudge a person guilty of a crime punishable by death or imprisonment for more than one year, and the following fact [insert fact] [was or was not] essential to sustain the judgment. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the document [is or is not] admissible under Rule 803(22) to prove the fact that was essential to the judgment.

In a case in which a judgment as to personal, family, or general history is offered, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [identify document] [is or is not] evidence of a judgment in a judicial proceeding and [insert fact] [was or was not] essential to the judgment, and [insert fact] concerns [personal or family history, boundaries, or events of general history important to the community]. This document therefore [is or is not] admissible under Rule 803(23) to prove the fact that was essential to the judgment.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Judgment in Criminal Case -- Use in Civil Case

[Name of party] has presented a judgment in a previous criminal case. In that case [name of convicted party] was convicted of [state crime or crimes]. One fact that was essential to the conviction was [state fact]. You may give the judgment the same weight as to this fact as you would give the trial testimony of a witness. You may consider in deciding what weight to give the evidence that a judgment in a criminal case requires either proof beyond a reasonable doubt or a plea of guilty by the defendant.

[2] Judgment in Criminal Case -- Use in Criminal Case -- Single Defendant

The prosecution has presented evidence of a judgment in a previous criminal case. In that case the defendant was convicted of [state crime or crimes]. One fact that was essential to the conviction was [state fact]. You may give the judgment the same weight as to this fact as you would give the trial testimony of a witness. You may consider in deciding what weight to give the evidence that a judgment in a criminal case requires either proof beyond a reasonable doubt or a plea of guilty by the defendant. The previous conviction is offered to prove [state fact]. Your job is to decide what weight to give the conviction as to this fact. Your job is not to punish the defendant for a previous conviction or to use the conviction as evidence of any other fact in this case.

[3] Judgment in Criminal Case -- Use in Criminal Case -- Multiple Defendants

The prosecution has presented evidence of a judgment in a previous criminal case. In that case [name of defendant] was convicted of [state crime or crimes]. One fact that was essential to the conviction was [state fact]. You may give the judgment the same weight as to this fact as you would give the trial testimony of a witness as you consider the evidence against [name of defendant]. This judgment is not admissible against any other defendant, and you must not use the judgment as to any other defendant. You may consider in deciding what weight to give the evidence against [name of defendant] that a judgment in a criminal case requires either proof beyond a reasonable doubt or a plea of guilty by the defendant. The previous conviction is offered to prove [state fact]. Your job is to decide what weight to give the conviction as to this fact. Your job is not to punish the defendant for a previous conviction or to use the conviction as evidence of any other fact in this case.

[4] Civil Judgment on Personal History or Boundaries

[Name of party] has presented a judgment in a prior civil case. One fact essential to that judgment was [state fact]. You may give the judgment the same weight as to this fact as you would give the testimony of a trial witness. You may consider in deciding the weight to give the judgment that a judgment requires a finding that essential facts are true by a preponderance of the evidence. A preponderance of the evidence means that something is more likely than not true.

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

6-8 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 8-26

8-26 Former Testimony.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 804. Hearsay Exceptions; Declarant Unavailable

(a) Definition of unavailability. -- "Unavailability as a witness" includes situations in which the declarant --

(1) is exempted by ruling of the court on the ground of privilege from testifying concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement; or

(2) persists in refusing to testify concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement despite an order of the court to do so; or

(3) testifies to a lack of memory of the subject matter of the declarant's statement; or

(4) is unable to be present or to testify at the hearing because of death or then existing physical or mental illness or infirmity; or

(5) is absent from the hearing and the proponent of the declarant's statement has been unable to procure the declarant's attendance (or in the case of a hearsay exception under subdivision (b)(2), (3), or (4), the declarant's attendance or testimony) by process or other reasonable means.

A declarant is not unavailable as a witness if exemption, refusal, claim of lack of memory, inability, or absence is due to the procurement or wrongdoing of the proponent of a statement for the purpose of preventing the witness from attending or testifying.

(b) Hearsay exceptions. -- The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule if the declarant is unavailable as a witness:

(1) Former testimony. -- Testimony given as a witness at another hearing of the same or a different proceeding, or in a deposition taken in compliance with law in the course of the same or another proceeding, if the party against whom the testimony is now offered, or, in a civil action or proceeding, a predecessor in interest, had an opportunity and similar motive to develop the testimony by direct, cross, or redirect examination.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Rule 804 requires a showing of unavailability of the declarant. The proponent of any Rule 804(b) exception must demonstrate by a preponderance of the evidence that the declarant is unavailable under the definition provided in Rule 804(a).

6. The focus of the exception for former testimony is on the party against whom the evidence is offered. It is this party or a predecessor in interest who must have had a prior opportunity and similar motive to examine the declarant whose testimony is offered. It is irrelevant in most instances whether the proponent of the evidence was present or represented when the former testimony was taken. The only relevance of the proponent's status may be on the issue of whether the motive of the party against whom the testimony was offered was similar when the former testimony was generated to the motive that party would have at trial.

7. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom former testimony is admitted to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, and (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, even though the party against whom the former testimony is offered might have had many opportunities to lay the foundation while the former testimony was taken. Although Rule 806 permits the party against whom hearsay is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions, that right is effectively negated by the proponent's demonstration that the declarant is unavailable as a condition of introducing the testimony.

8. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of declarant] [is or is not] available to testify, that [name of declarant] previously testified in a proceeding in which [name of party against whom evidence is offered] [did or did not] have an opportunity to examine [name of declarant] and that [name of party against whom evidence is offered] [did or did not] have an interest in developing the testimony of [name of declarant] similar to the interest [name of party against whom evidence is offered] has during this trial. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and [name of declarant's] former testimony [is or is not] admissible under Rule 804(b)(1).

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Former Testimony Generally

[Name of party] has presented the testimony given under oath and subject to penalty of perjury by [name of declarant] in [describe proceedings]. [Name of opposing party] had the opportunity to examine [name of declarant] when this testimony was given. You may give this testimony the same weight as the trial testimony of a witness. [Name of declarant] is unavailable and will not appear as a witness. It is for you to decide whether this affects the weight you give the testimony.

[2] Former Testimony and Predecessors in Interest

[Name of party] has presented the testimony given under oath and subject to penalty of perjury by [name of declarant] in [describe proceedings]. [Name of predecessor in interest] had the opportunity to examine [name of declarant] when this testimony was given. [Name of predecessor in interest] was the [explain relationship to party -- e.g., was a former owner of the company that is currently before you as the defendant in this case]. You may give this testimony the same weight as the trial testimony of a witness. [Name of declarant] is unavailable and will not appear as a witness. It is for you to decide whether this affects the weight you give the testimony.

CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

6-8 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 8-27

8-27 Dying Declaration.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 804. Hearsay Exceptions; Declarant Unavailable

(a) Definition of unavailability. -- "Unavailability as a witness" includes situations in which the declarant --

(1) is exempted by ruling of the court on the ground of privilege from testifying concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement; or

(2) persists in refusing to testify concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement despite an order of the court to do so; or

(3) testifies to a lack of memory of the subject matter of the declarant's statement; or

(4) is unable to be present or to testify at the hearing because of death or then existing physical or mental illness or infirmity; or

(5) is absent from the hearing and the proponent of the declarant's statement has been unable to procure the declarant's attendance (or in the case of a hearsay exception under subdivision (b)(2), (3), or (4), the declarant's attendance or testimony) by process or other reasonable means.

A declarant is not unavailable as a witness if exemption, refusal, claim of lack of memory, inability, or absence is due to the procurement or wrongdoing of the proponent of a statement for the purpose of preventing the witness from attending or testifying.

(b) Hearsay exceptions. -- The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule if the declarant is unavailable as a witness:

* * *

(2) Statement under belief of impending death. -- In a prosecution for homicide or in a civil action or proceeding, a statement made by a declarant while believing that the declarant's death was imminent, concerning the cause or circumstances of what the declarant believed to be impending death.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Rule 804 requires a showing of unavailability of the declarant. The proponent of any Rule 804(b) exception must demonstrate by a preponderance of the evidence that the declarant is unavailable under the definition provided in Rule 804(a). Although the common law frequently provided that the declarant must die as a result of the circumstances giving rise to the dying declaration, Rule 804(b)(2) provides that any showing of unavailability is sufficient provided that the statement was made while the declarant believed death was imminent. The trial judge must find by a preponderance of the evidence that the declarant believed death to be imminent before admitting a statement as a dying declaration.

6. The rule provides that dying declarations may be admitted not only in homicide cases as at common law, but also in civil cases.

7. A dying declaration is one that addresses the cause and/or circumstances of what the declarant believes to be impending death.

8. Rule 806 permits any party against whom a dying declaration is admitted to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached. Although Rule 806 permits the party against whom hearsay is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions, that right is effectively negated by the proponent's demonstration that the declarant is unavailable as a condition of introducing the testimony.

9. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of declarant] [is or is not] available to testify, that [name of declarant] [did or did not] make a statement at a time when he/she believed death was imminent, and this statement [did or did not] relate the cause and circumstances of the death believed to be imminent. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the statement [is or is not] admissible under Rule 804(b)(2) as a dying declaration.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Dying Declaration -- Civil Case

[Name of party] has presented evidence of a statement by [name of declarant]. It is for you to decide whether [name of declarant] made this statement. You may give this statement the same weight as trial testimony. In deciding how much weight to give the statement, you may consider whether the circumstances in which the statement was made make it more or less likely that [name of declarant] would speak the truth and whether the circumstances increased or decreased the ability of [name of declarant] to observe and communicate accurately and completely. [Name of declarant] is unavailable and will not appear as a witness. It is for you to decide whether this affects the weight you give the statement.

[2] Dying Declaration -- Criminal Homicide Case

The prosecution has presented evidence of a statement by [name of declarant]. It is for you to decide whether [name of declarant] made this statement. You may give this statement the same weight as trial testimony. In deciding how much weight to give the statement, you may consider whether the circumstances in which the statement was made make it more or less likely that [name of declarant] would speak the truth and whether the circumstances increased or decreased the ability of [name of declarant] to observe and communicate accurately and completely. [Name of declarant] is unavailable and will not appear as a witness. It is for you to decide whether this affects the weight you give the statement.

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 804. Hearsay Exceptions; Declarant Unavailable

(a) Definition of unavailability. -- "Unavailability as a witness" includes situations in which the declarant --

(1) is exempted by ruling of the court on the ground of privilege from testifying concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement; or

(2) persists in refusing to testify concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement despite an order of the court to do so; or

(3) testifies to a lack of memory of the subject matter of the declarant's statement; or

(4) is unable to be present or to testify at the hearing because of death or then existing physical or mental illness or infirmity; or

(5) is absent from the hearing and the proponent of the declarant's statement has been unable to procure the declarant's attendance (or in the case of a hearsay exception under subdivision (b)(2), (3), or (4), the declarant's attendance or testimony) by process or other reasonable means.

A declarant is not unavailable as a witness if exemption, refusal, claim of lack of memory, inability, or absence is due to the procurement or wrongdoing of the proponent of a statement for the purpose of preventing the witness from attending or testifying.

(b) Hearsay exceptions. -- The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule if the declarant is unavailable as a witness:

* * *

(3) Statement against interest. -- A statement which was at the time of its making so far contrary to the declarant's pecuniary or proprietary interest, or so far tended to subject the declarant to civil or criminal liability, or to render invalid a claim by the declarant against another, that a reasonable person in the declarant's position would not have made the statement unless believing it to be true. A statement tending to expose the declarant to criminal liability and offered to exculpate the accused is not admissible unless corroborating circumstances clearly indicate the trustworthiness of the statement.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Rule 804 requires a showing of unavailability of the declarant. The proponent of any Rule 804(b) exception must demonstrate by a preponderance of the evidence that the declarant is unavailable under the definition provided in Rule 804(a).

6. The rule provides that declarations against interest include not only statements against a declarant's pecuniary or proprietary interest but also declarations against penal interest. The key provision in the rule is that the trial judge must find that the statements were sufficiently against interest that a reasonable person would not have made such a statement without believing that it was true. The Supreme Court has made clear in Williamson v. United States, 512 U.S. 594

(1994) , that, when a person makes a series of statements, the trial judge must examine each statement that is offered as a declaration against interest to determine whether it satisfies the requirements of the rule.

7. There are, unfortunately, reported cases in which courts confuse the terms "admission against interest" and declarations against interest. Admissions are covered by Rule 801(d)(2). An admission is any statement of a party or its agent offered against that party, whether or not the statement purported to "admit" anything at the time it was made. A declaration against interest may be a statement by any declarant; it must have been against that declarant's interest when made. Whereas an admission is only admissible against the party responsible for the statement, a declaration against interest is admissible against any party.

8. The final sentence of Rule 804(b)(3) limits declarations against interest offered by a defendant in a criminal case. It provides that statements offered to exculpate the defendant must not only be corroborated, but must be corroborated by evidence that clearly demonstrates the trustworthiness of the statements.

9. Rule 806 permits any party against whom a declaration against interest is admitted to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached. Although Rule 806 permits the party against whom hearsay is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions, that right is effectively negated by the proponent's demonstration that the declarant is unavailable as a condition of introducing the testimony.

10. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of declarant] [is or is not] available to testify, that [name of declarant] [did or did not] make a statement, and the statement [was or was not] so much against [name of declarant's] [pecuniary, proprietary, or penal interest] that a reasonable person would not have made the statement unless it were true. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the statement [is or is not] admissible under Rule 804(b)(3) as a statement against interest.

If the statement is one against a declarant's penal interest and is offered by the defendant in a criminal case because it tends to exculpate the defendant, the trial judge should add -- before stating the conclusion "Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the statement [is or is not] admissible under Rule 804(b)(3) as a statement against interest" -- the following statement for the record outside the hearing of the jury: I find also that there [are or are not] sufficient corroborating circumstances as to clearly indicate that [name of declarant's] statement is trustworthy.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Declaration Against Pecuniary Interest

[Name of party] has presented evidence that [name of declarant] made a statement that [describe statement]. It is for you to decide whether this statement was made. You may give this statement the same weight as trial testimony. You may consider in deciding the weight to give this statement whether [name of declarant] reasonably would have thought that such a statement might be financially damaging and whether a reasonable person would have made such a statement without believing it to be true. [Name of declarant] is unavailable and will not appear as a witness. It is for you to decide whether this affects the weight you give the statement.

[2] Declaration Against Property Interest

[Name of party] has presented evidence that [name of declarant] made a statement that [describe statement]. It is for you to decide whether this statement was made. You may give this statement the same weight as trial testimony. You may consider in deciding the weight to give this statement whether [name of declarant] reasonably would have thought that such a statement might damage his/her interest in property and whether a reasonable person would have made such a statement without believing it to be true. [Name of declarant] is unavailable and will not appear as a witness. It is for you to decide whether this affects the weight you give the statement.

[3] Declaration Concerning Civil Liability

[Name of party] has presented evidence that [name of declarant] made a statement that [describe statement]. It is for you to decide whether this statement was made. You may give this statement the same weight as trial testimony. You may consider in deciding the weight to give this statement whether [name of declarant] reasonably would have thought that such a statement might expose him/her to civil liability and whether a reasonable person would have made such a statement without believing it to be true. [Name of declarant] is unavailable and will not appear as a witness. It is for you to decide whether this affects the weight you give the statement.

[4] Declaration Against Penal Interest

[Name of party] has presented evidence that [name of declarant] made a statement that [describe statement]. It is for you to decide whether this statement was made. You may give this statement the same weight as trial testimony. You may consider in deciding the weight to give this statement whether [name of declarant] reasonably would have thought that such a statement would expose him/her to criminal liability and whether a reasonable person would have made such a statement without believing it to be true. [Name of declarant] is unavailable and will not appear as a witness. It is for you to decide whether this affects the weight you give the statement.

CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

6-8 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 8-29

8-29 Family History.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 804. Hearsay Exceptions; Declarant Unavailable

(a) Definition of unavailability. -- "Unavailability as a witness" includes situations in which the declarant --

(1) is exempted by ruling of the court on the ground of privilege from testifying concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement; or

(2) persists in refusing to testify concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement despite an order of the court to do so; or

(3) testifies to a lack of memory of the subject matter of the declarant's statement; or

(4) is unable to be present or to testify at the hearing because of death or then existing physical or mental illness or infirmity; or

(5) is absent from the hearing and the proponent of the declarant's statement has been unable to procure the declarant's attendance (or in the case of a hearsay exception under subdivision (b)(2), (3), or (4), the declarant's attendance or testimony) by process or other reasonable means.

A declarant is not unavailable as a witness if exemption, refusal, claim of lack of memory, inability, or absence is due to the procurement or wrongdoing of the proponent of a statement for the purpose of preventing the witness from attending or testifying.

(b) Hearsay exceptions. -- The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule if the declarant is unavailable as a witness:

* * *

(4) Statement of personal or family history. -- (A) A statement concerning the declarant's own birth, adoption, marriage, divorce, legitimacy, relationship by blood, adoption, or marriage, ancestry, or other similar fact of personal or family history, even though declarant had no means of acquiring personal knowledge of the matter stated; or (B) a statement concerning the foregoing matters, and death also, of another person, if the declarant was related to the other by blood, adoption, or marriage or was so intimately associated with the other's family as to be likely to have accurate information concerning the matter declared.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Rule 804 requires a showing of unavailability of the declarant. The proponent of any Rule 804(b) exception must demonstrate by a preponderance of the evidence that the declarant is unavailable under the definition provided in Rule 804(a).

6. Rule 804(b)(4) is an extremely broad rule. It permits a party to introduce any statement that a person has made about his own personal history whether or not the person could have had personal knowledge of the facts asserted. Thus, a declarant's statement that "I was born in Country X, and the King was my real father" qualifies for this exception. Moreover, the exception extends to statements made by a person related to another by blood, marriage, or adoption concerning the history of that other person, including statements about that person's death. It also applies to statements about another's personal history that are made by someone who is not a family member but who is so intimately associated with the other's family as to be likely to have accurate information. Otherwise, the rule does not require any showing of trustworthiness.

7. Rule 806 permits any party against whom personal or family history is admitted to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached. Although Rule 806 permits the party against whom hearsay is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions, that right is effectively negated by the proponent's demonstration that the declarant is unavailable as a condition of introducing the testimony.

8. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of declarant] [is or is not] available to testify, that [name of declarant] made a statement concerning his/her own personal or family history. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and [name of declarant's] statement [is or is not] admissible under Rule 804(b)(4).

If the statement was made concerning the personal or family history of another, the judge will want to make a different statement for the record outside the hearing of the jury: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of declarant] [is or is not] available to testify, that [name of declarant] made a statement concerning the personal or family history of [name of other person], and that [name of declarant] was related to this other person by [blood, marriage, or intimate association] such that [name of declarant] would be likely to have accurate information about [name of other person's] personal or family history. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and [name of declarant's] statement [is or is not] admissible under Rule 804(b)(4).

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Declarant's Own History

[Name of party] has presented evidence of a statement by [name of declarant] concerning [describe statement]. It is for you to decide whether [name of declarant] made this statement. You may give this statement the same weight as trial testimony. You may consider in deciding the weight whether [name of declarant] would have made such a statement without believing it to be true, whether [name of declarant] spoke from personal knowledge, whether [name of declarant] made the statement to someone in a position to know whether or not it was true, and other circumstances surrounding the making of the statement. [Name of declarant] is unavailable and will not appear as a witness. It is for you to decide whether this affects the weight you give the statement.

[2] Statement About Another's History

[Name of party] has presented evidence of a statement by [name of declarant] concerning [describe statement]. It is for you to decide whether [name of declarant] made this statement. You may give this statement the same weight as trial testimony. You may consider in deciding the weight whether [name of declarant] would have made such a statement about [describe relationship between declarant and other person -- e.g., his father, his mother, his son] without believing it to be true, whether [name of declarant] spoke from personal knowledge, whether [name of declarant] made the statement to someone in a position to know whether or not it was true, and other circumstances surrounding the making of the statement. [Name of declarant] is unavailable and will not appear as a witness. It is for you to decide whether this affects the weight you give the statement.

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 804. Hearsay Exceptions; Declarant Unavailable

(a) Definition of unavailability. -- "Unavailability as a witness" includes situations in which the declarant --

(1) is exempted by ruling of the court on the ground of privilege from testifying concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement; or

(2) persists in refusing to testify concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement despite an order of the court to do so; or

(3) testifies to a lack of memory of the subject matter of the declarant's statement; or

(4) is unable to be present or to testify at the hearing because of death or then existing physical or mental illness or infirmity; or

(5) is absent from the hearing and the proponent of the declarant's statement has been unable to procure the declarant's attendance (or in the case of a hearsay exception under subdivision (b)(2), (3), or (4), the declarant's attendance or testimony) by process or other reasonable means.

A declarant is not unavailable as a witness if exemption, refusal, claim of lack of memory, inability, or absence is due to the procurement or wrongdoing of the proponent of a statement for the purpose of preventing the witness from attending or testifying.

(b) Hearsay exceptions. -- The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule if the declarant is unavailable as a witness:

* * *

(6) Forfeiture by wrongdoing. A statement offered against a party that has engaged or acquiesced in wrongdoing that was intended to, and did, procure the unavailability of the declarant as a witness.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Rule 804 requires a showing of unavailability of the declarant. The proponent of any Rule 804(b) exception must demonstrate by a preponderance of the evidence that the declarant is unavailable under the definition provided in Rule 804(a). In addition, the proponent of hearsay who claims forfeiture by wrongdoing must show that the party against whom the statement is offered either engaged or acquiesced in wrongdoing with the intention of making the declarant unavailable and that this party succeeded in doing so.

6. In many instances the party proffering Rule 804(b)(6) evidence will offer additional evidence concerning the wrongdoing of the party against whom the evidence is offered to show consciousness of guilt or implicit adoption of the hearsay statement. The trial judge will have to balance the prejudicial effect of having the jury hear about the wrongdoing against its probative value.

7. Rule 806 permits any party against whom a hearsay declaration is admitted to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached. Although Rule 806 permits the party against whom hearsay is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions, that right is effectively negated by the proponent's demonstration that the declarant is unavailable as a condition of introducing the testimony. Under Rule 804(b)(6), the wrongdoer forfeits only the hearsay objection. Wrongdoing by the opponent of the statement does not forfeit the right to assert other objections to the evidence, or to impeach the declarant under Rule 806.

8. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of declarant] [is or is not] available to testify, that [name of declarant] [did or did not] make a statement that is relevant to these proceedings, that [name of party against whom evidence is offered] [did or did not] engage or acquiesce in wrongdoing that was intended to, and did, have the effect of making [name of declarant] unavailable to testify as a witness. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and [name of declarant's] statement [is or is not] admissible under Rule 804(b)(6).

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Evidence of Wrongdoing Admitted

[Name of proffering party] has presented evidence of a statement by [name of declarant] concerning [describe statement]. It is for you to decide whether [name of declarant] made this statement. You may give this statement the same weight as trial testimony. [Name of declarant] is unavailable and will not appear as a witness. It is for you to decide whether this affects the weight you give the statement. [Name of proffering party] has also presented evidence that [name of party against whom statement is offered] engaged or acquiesced in conduct with the intent to make [name of declarant unavailable]. It is for you to decide whether [name of party against whom statement is offered] engaged in such conduct, and whether this conduct affects the weight you give to a statement made by [name of declarant] and whether this conduct affects how you weigh other evidence in the case.

[2] Evidence of Wrongdoing Excluded

[Name of proffering party] has presented evidence of a statement by [name of declarant] concerning [describe statement]. It is for you to decide whether [name of declarant] made this statement. You may give this statement the same weight as trial testimony. [Name of declarant] is unavailable and will not appear as a witness. It is for you to decide whether this affects the weight you give the statement.

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

6-8 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 8-31

8-31 Residual Hearsay.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

Rule 807. Residual Exception

A statement not specifically covered by Rule 803 or 804 but having equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness, is not excluded by the hearsay rule, if the court determines that (A) the statement is offered as evidence of a material fact; (B) the statement is more probative on the point for which it is offered than any other evidence which the proponent can procure through reasonable efforts; and (C) the general purposes of these rules and the interests of justice will best be served by admission of the statement into evidence. However, a statement may not be admitted under this exception unless the proponent of it makes known to the adverse party sufficiently in advance of the trial or hearing to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to prepare to meet it, the proponent's intention to offer the statement and the particulars of it, including the name and address of the declarant.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 801(c) defines hearsay. Rule 802 creates an exclusionary rule for hearsay statements but provides that they may be admitted pursuant to exceptions found in the Federal Rules of Evidence or in other provisions of law.

2. The party making a hearsay objection need only say, "I object, hearsay" in a timely fashion to invoke the protection of Rule 802. The proffering party has the opportunity to respond that a statement is not being offered for its truth. The trial judge rules on whether the proffering party's use of the statement amounts to a hearsay use.

3. When a declaration has a permissible nonhearsay use but also might be used for its truth, a prudent objecting party will raise a Rule 403 objection and claim that the prejudicial effect (i.e., the likelihood the statement will erroneously be used for its truth) substantially outweighs the probative value of the declaration for the nonhearsay purpose for which it is offered. The trial judge strikes the balance.

4. Assuming that the declaration is offered for its truth and is therefore hearsay, the proponent of the evidence may seek to demonstrate entitlement to an exception. The proponent must prove to the trial judge's satisfaction under Rule 104(a) that a statement qualifies as an exception for it to be admissible over a hearsay exception. Cf. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . Rule 104(a) permits the trial judge to consider any evidence, whether admissible or not, that sheds light on the admissibility of the hearsay statement.

5. Rule 807 requires the proponent of the evidence to show that the hearsay statement is evidence of a material fact, which presumably means it is important, it is better than other evidence that is available through reasonable efforts, and its admission would be consistent with the rules and the interests of justice.

6. Rule 807 imposes a pretrial or prehearing notice requirement that is intended to avoid surprise and to permit the trial judge to consider any advance objections that parties may choose to make to residual hearsay.

7. Although the hearsay declarant will often have to be unavailable for the proponent of residual hearsay to satisfy the requirement that no better evidence is reasonably available, the fact is that in some cases the declarant's memory may have failed or some intervening event may make a hearsay statement better evidence than trial testimony.

8. Rule 806 permits any party against whom residual hearsay is admitted to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached.

9. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of declarant] [is or is not] available to testify, [name of declarant] [did or did not] make a statement that is relevant to these proceedings, [name of proponent of statement] [did or did not] provide notice of an intention to rely upon this statement sufficiently in advance of the trial to provide [name of party against whom statement is offered] with a fair opportunity to prepare to meet it, the statement [is or is not] offered as evidence of an important fact, the statement [is or is not] more probative as to this fact than any other evidence that [name of proponent] can procure through reasonable efforts, and the general purposes of the Rules of Evidence and the interests of justice [will or will not] best be served by [admission or exclusion] of the statement. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and [name of declarant's] statement [is or is not] admissible under Rule 807.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Hearsay Declarant Unavailable

[Name of proffering party] has presented evidence of a statement by [name of declarant] concerning [describe statement]. It is for you to decide whether [name of declarant] made this statement. You may give this statement the same weight as trial testimony. [Name of declarant] is unavailable and will not appear as a witness. It is for you to decide whether this affects the weight you give the statement.

[2] Hearsay Declarant Testifies

[Name of proffering party] has presented evidence of a statement by [name of declarant] concerning [describe statement]. It is for you to decide whether [name of declarant] made this statement. [Name of declarant] is a witness in this case. You may give this statement the same weight as trial testimony and you may consider [name of declarant's] trial testimony in deciding the weight to give this statement.

CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

6-8 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 8-32

8-32 Hearsay Within Hearsay.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

(d) Statements which are not hearsay. -- A statement is not hearsay if --

* * *

(2) Admission by party-opponent. -- The statement is offered against a party and is (A) the party's own statement, in either an individual or a representative capacity or (B) a statement of which the party has manifested an adoption or belief in its truth, or (C) a statement by a person authorized by the party to make a statement concerning the subject, or (D) a statement by the party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship, or (E) a statement by a co-conspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

* * *

(5) Recorded recollection. -- A memorandum or record concerning a matter about which a witness once had knowledge but now has insufficient recollection to enable the witness to testify fully and accurately, shown to have been made or adopted by the witness when the matter was fresh in the witness' memory and to reflect that knowledge correctly. If admitted, the memorandum or record may be read into evidence but may not itself be received as an exhibit unless offered by an adverse party.

(6) Records of regularly conducted activity. -- A memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, in any form, of acts, events, conditions, opinions, or diagnoses, made at or near the time by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge, if kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity, and if it was the regular practice of that business activity to make the memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, all as shown by the testimony of the custodian or other qualified witness, or by certification that complies with Rule 902(11), Rule 902(12), or a statute permitting certification, unless the source of information or the method or circumstances of preparation indicate lack of trustworthiness. The term "business" as used in this paragraph includes business, institution, association, profession, occupation, and calling of every kind, whether or not conducted for profit.

(8) Public records and reports. -- Records, reports, statements, or data compilations, in any form, of public offices or agencies, setting forth (A) the activities of the office or agency, or (B) matters observed pursuant to duty imposed by law as to which matters there was a duty to report, excluding, however, in criminal cases matters observed by police officers and other law enforcement personnel, or (C) in civil actions and proceedings and against the Government in criminal cases, factual findings resulting from an investigation made pursuant to authority granted by law, unless the sources of information or other circumstances indicate lack of trustworthiness.

Rule 805. Hearsay Within Hearsay

Hearsay included within hearsay is not excluded under the hearsay rule if each part of the combined statements conforms with an exception to the hearsay rule provided in these rules.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 805 provides that, when one hearsay statement is contained within another, they both can be admitted if each statement comes within a hearsay exception. In this context, statements defined as nonhearsay in Rule 801 also qualify as coming within a hearsay exception. For example, Rule 805 applies when one level of hearsay qualifies as a party admission. The most common examples of multiple levels of hearsay are admissions contained in other records -- e.g., prior recollection recorded, business records, or public records. Rule 805 is important whenever an out-of-court statement offered for its truth [Rule 801(c)] is found within any other out-of-court statement also offered for its truth. The proponent must justify admission of both statements, using either Rule 801's definitions of some statements as nonhearsay or the hearsay exceptions that are found in Rules 803, 804, or 807.

2. The defense in a criminal case must make clear if it intends to make a Confrontation Clause objection in addition to or instead of a hearsay objection. This is especially important when the defense claims that a statement is testimonial and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . A hearsay objection alone generally is insufficient to preserve a confrontation claim on appeal. A Confrontation Clause objection requires the trial judge to make a constitutional rather than an evidence ruling.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely hearsay objection is made. Unless a timely objection is made, evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of alleged hearsay evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to statements that are offered for their truth, the judge will want to make for the record a statement supporting a ruling admitting or excluding evidence outside the hearing of the jury. If a business record containing an admission is offered, the judge might consider the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that [identify document] [is or is not] a [memorandum, report, record, or data compilation] of [acts, events, conditions, opinions, or diagnoses], the document [was or was not] made at or near the time of the matters recorded therein, the matters recorded [were or were not] based upon information transmitted by a person with knowledge, the document [was or was not] kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity of [identify business activity] and it [was or was not] the regular practice of [identify business activity] to make such a document. I also find by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of witness or certifier] [was or was not] qualified to lay the foundation for this document. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the record [is or is not] admissible as a business record.

If, however, the judge finds that the rule is satisfied as to a document but that statements contained in the document do not themselves qualify as business records, the judge will want to make an additional finding: As a result of these findings, the document is admissible as a record of a regularly conducted activity under Rule 803(6) to prove that certain statements contained therein were made but standing alone the business records rule does not establish that those statements may be considered for their truth. I find also by a preponderance of the evidence that the [identify statement within document] [is or is not] a statement of [identify declarant-party] and [is or is not] offered by [name of proponent] against [identify declarant-party]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the statement [is or is not] admissible as an admission.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to hearsay, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Admissions in Business or Public Records -- Single Party Case

[Name of proffering party] has presented certain records that state that [name of opposing party] made a statement about [describe statement]. It is for you to decide whether [name of opposing party] made this statement. In doing so, you may give these records the same weight as trial testimony. One party is permitted to use as evidence against another party statements made by that other party.

[2] Admissions in Business or Public Records -- Multiple Party Case

[Name of proffering party] has presented certain records that state that [name of opposing party] made a statement about [describe statement]. It is for you to decide whether [name of opposing party] made this statement. In doing so, you may give these records the same weight as trial testimony. One party is permitted to use as evidence against another party statements made by that other party. Each party is responsible, however, only for its statements. You must be sure to use statements that one party offers against another only against the party who actually made the statement. No other party is responsible for these statements, and these statements may not be used as evidence against any other party.

[3] Hearsay Exceptions in Business or Public Records

[Name of proffering party] has presented certain records that state that [name or identify declarant] made a statement about [describe statement]. It is for you to decide whether this statement was made. In doing so, you may give these records the same weight as trial testimony.

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

6-8 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 8-33

8-33 Impeaching Declarants -- Prior Bad Acts.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 607. Who May Impeach

The credibility of a witness may be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness.

Rule 608. Evidence of Character and Conduct of Witness

(b) Specific instances of conduct. -- Specific instances of the conduct of a witness, for the purpose of attacking or supporting the witness' character for truthfulness, other than conviction of crime as provided in rule 609, may not be proved by extrinsic evidence. They may, however, in the discretion of the court, if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness, be inquired into on cross-examination of the witness (1) concerning the witness' character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, * * *.

The giving of testimony, whether by an accused or by any other witness, does not operate as a waiver of the accused's or the witness' privilege against self-incrimination when examined with respect to matters that relate only to character for truthfulness.

Rule 611. Mode and Order of Interrogation and Presentation

(a) Control by court. -- The court shall exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of interrogating witnesses and presenting evidence so as to (1) make the interrogation and presentation effective for the ascertainment of the truth, (2) avoid needless consumption of time, and (3) protect witnesses from harassment or undue embarrassment.

* * *

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

(d) Statements which are not hearsay. -- A statement is not hearsay if --

* * *

(2) Admission by party-opponent. -- The statement is offered against a party and is (A) the party's own statement, in either an individual or a representative capacity or (B) a statement of which the party has manifested an adoption or belief in its truth, or (C) a statement by a person authorized by the party to make a statement concerning the subject, or (D) a statement by the party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship, or (E) a statement by a co-conspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom a certain admission or hearsay is admitted to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, and (c) permits the party against whom the evidence is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions.

2. The party wishing to impeach the declarant may use the same impeachment tools that are available to attack trial witnesses. Thus, the impeaching party may ask the declarant about prior bad acts.

3. Rule 608(b) is not a clear rule. It permits the court to allow a party to ask a witness on cross-examination about prior acts that shed light on the witness's character for truthfulness or untruthfulness. Because the rule permits this impeachment on cross-examination, most questions about prior bad acts are intended to attack the witness.

4. Rule 608(b) is one of the few rules of evidence to specifically refer to the court's discretion to admit or exclude evidence. Absent a mandate that evidence be admitted, the court generally has discretion to weigh the probative value of evidence against its dangers under Rule 403. Mention of the court's discretion in this particular rule may reflect doubts about the probative value of many prior acts on the truthfulness of a witness, especially those that are stale, as well as concerns about the possible unnecessary embarrassment of witnesses. The court may guard against witness embarrassment using this discretion or its authority under Rule 611(a).

5. Although Rule 608(b) says that the trial judge may permit questions about bad acts on cross-examination, Rule 806 provides that a party may attack a hearsay declarant by calling the declarant as a witness and proceeding as if on cross-examination. Thus, Rule 806 authorizes the party calling a declarant for impeachment to question the declarant about prior bad acts.

6. Rule 608(b) provides that extrinsic evidence of prior bad acts, other than criminal convictions covered by Rule 609, is not admissible. This limitation on use of extrinsic evidence applies only when a party seeks to contradict a witness's denial of a prior bad act and the only relevance of the act is impeachment under Rule 608(b). Prior bad acts may be proved by extrinsic evidence when such acts are relevant for purposes other than Rule 608(b) impeachment. Prior acts may be admissible under Rule 404(b), for example, to prove intent, knowledge, and many other elements of a claim or defense.

7. Counsel must have a good-faith basis for believing that the prior act occurred to ask a question under Rule 608(b). The good-faith basis need not necessarily be admissible evidence, however.

8. The final paragraph of Rule 608(b) provides that, by testifying, a witness does not lose the Fifth Amendment right to refuse to answer potentially incriminating questions when the questions are asked solely to elicit testimony about prior acts under Rule 608(b).

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to questions about prior bad acts. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling. Thus, a party must object to evidence offered to impeach a hearsay declarant to call the issue to the judge's attention.

If the hearsay declarant is called as witness, the normal evidence rules apply. Since the trial judge rules on the permissibility of questions about prior acts under Rule 104(a), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: I have considered the objection made to the questions about prior acts of this witness. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the questions [do or do not] relate to acts that, if true, are probative of the witness's credibility, and that the possible prejudicial effect of evidence concerning these acts [does or does not] substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the questions will be [permitted or disallowed].

If the issue of good faith arises, the trial judge may request a party to make a proffer as to its good-faith basis for asking questions. If the party lacks a good-faith basis, the judge may want to state for the record the following: The court has asked [name of party] to proffer the basis for questions asked to this witness. Having considered the proffer, the court finds by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of party] [has or lacks] a good-faith basis for the questions, and that they [are proper or should be stricken from the record].

If the hearsay declarant does not testify, the question arises whether the party seeking to impeach the declarant should be able to offer extrinsic evidence if that is the only way to impeach the declarant. Since the rules provide no clear answer, the judge surely will want to make a record outside the hearing of the jury whenever admitting or excluding extrinsic evidence: I find that [name of declarant] [is or is not] unavailable and thus [name of impeaching party] [does or does not] have an opportunity to ask [name of declarant] questions that relate to acts that, if true, are probative of [name of declarant's] credibility, and that the probative value of these acts [is or is not] sufficiently great that I shall [admit or exclude] extrinsic evidence relating to these acts.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude questions, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony. Since Rule 608(b) bars extrinsic evidence, it often will be important to a reviewing court to know whether the witness would have admitted or denied the prior acts. Thus, the preferred offer of proof might be a voir dire of the witness when the jury is not present.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to questions, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of a witness's answers.

[1] Witness Admits Prior Bad Act

The witness has testified that he [summarize prior act]. You may consider this evidence in assessing the witness's credibility and in deciding how much weight you will give his testimony and any statements made by this witness.

[2] Witness Denies Prior Bad Act

This witness has denied that he engaged in certain conduct about which he was questioned. I instruct you that questions are not evidence even when they suggest that something is true. There is no evidence in this case that the witness engaged in the conduct about which he was questioned. You must disregard the suggestions contained in the questions in evaluating the credibility of the witness and deciding what weight to give this testimony and any statements by this witness. You may consider, however, the witness's demeanor while testifying in assessing credibility.

[3] Witness Invokes Privilege Against Self-Incrimination

A witness whose statements are admitted into evidence and who is called to testify at a trial retains the right not to answer questions that might be incriminating as to matters that are not in dispute in the trial. This witness was asked a question and properly invoked the privilege against self-incrimination and refused to answer. You must disregard the question and the witness's invocation of the privilege in assessing the credibility of the witness and deciding how much weight to give his testimony and any statements by the witness. You must not penalize or reward any party because the witness chose to exercise a right conferred by the Constitution of the United States.

[4] Absence of Good Faith

[Insert name of counsel] asked this witness a question that suggested the witness had engaged in certain acts. Counsel had no basis in fact or in law for asking such a question. You must disregard the question. The court shall instruct counsel to apologize to the witness for asking it.

[5] Extrinsic Evidence

You will recall that [name of party] presented evidence of a statement by [name of declarant], and I told you that you could give this statement the same weight as trial testimony. [Name of opposing party] has presented evidence that [name of declarant] [describe bad act]. You may consider this evidence in assessing the credibility of [name of declarant] and in deciding the weight to give to his/her statement. You may also consider that [name of declarant] did not testify and had no opportunity to deny that he/she did this act.

CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

6-8 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 8-34

8-34 Impeaching Declarants -- Character Evidence.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 607. Who May Impeach

The credibility of a witness may be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness.

Rule 608. Evidence of Character and Conduct of Witness

(a) Opinion and reputation evidence of character. -- The credibility of a witness may be attacked or supported by evidence in the form of opinion or reputation, but subject to these limitations: (1) the evidence may refer only to character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, and (2) evidence of truthful character is admissible only after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise.

(b) Specific instances of conduct. -- Specific instances of the conduct of a witness, for the purpose of attacking or supporting the witness' character for truthfulness, other than conviction of crime as provided in rule 609, may not be proved by extrinsic evidence. They may, however, in the discretion of the court, if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness, be inquired into on cross-examination of the witness (1) concerning the witness' character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, or (2) concerning the character for truthfulness or untruthfulness of another witness as to which character the witness being cross-examined has testified.

* * *

Rule 611. Mode and Order of Interrogation and Presentation

(a) Control by court. -- The court shall exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of interrogating witnesses and presenting evidence so as to (1) make the interrogation and presentation effective for the ascertainment of the truth, (2) avoid needless consumption of time, and (3) protect witnesses from harassment or undue embarrassment.

* * *

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

(d) Statements which are not hearsay. -- A statement is not hearsay if --

* * *

(2) Admission by party-opponent. -- The statement is offered against a party and is (A) the party's own statement, in either an individual or a representative capacity or (B) a statement of which the party has manifested an adoption or belief in its truth, or (C) a statement by a person authorized by the party to make a statement concerning the subject, or (D) a statement by the party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship, or (E) a statement by a co-conspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom a certain admission or hearsay is admitted to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, and (c) permits the party against whom the evidence is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions.

2. A party may call a character witness to attack the credibility of a hearsay declarant. When character witnesses are called to attack credibility, their testimony must focus on the hearsay declarant's character for untruthfulness.

3. The character witness is limited on direct examination to testifying about the declarant's reputation for untruthfulness or the witness's opinion of the declarant's character for untruthfulness. The character witness may not rely upon specific acts in providing reputation or opinion testimony.

4. In theory, a character witness who has testified that a previous witness's character for truthfulness is bad may be asked on cross-examination whether the character witness has heard of or knows of specific acts on the part of the previous witness that, if the answer is yes, would appear inconsistent with an untruthful character. In practice, however, the questioning in the form of "have you heard" or "do you know" of specific acts is usually done in an effort to attack a favorable character witness. It appears that negative acts are more likely to undermine favorable character testimony than positive acts are to undermine negative character evidence.

5. Counsel must have a good-faith basis for the questions on cross-examination of a character witness.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to character evidence or to questions asked of a character witness. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted and the questions allowed. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of character evidence and the validity of cross-examination under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to character evidence the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I have considered the objection to this character evidence. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the evidence that is proffered [does or does not] qualify as reputation or opinion evidence which is admissible under Rule 608(a), and that the possible prejudicial effect of such evidence [does or does not] substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence for impeachment purposes. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

In ruling on the validity of cross-examination questions, the judge may want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like this: I have considered the objection to this form of cross-examination. Having considered the direct testimony of this witness, including the time period addressed by the witness, I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the cross-examination questions [are or are not] valid attempts to test the knowledge of the witness, and that the possible prejudicial effect of these questions and the answers to them [does or does not] substantially outweigh the probative value of this evidence. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the questions [will or will not] be permitted.

If the issue of good faith arises, the trial judge may request a party to make a proffer as to its good-faith basis for asking questions. If the party lacks a good-faith basis, the judge may want to state for the record the following: The court has asked [name of party] to proffer the basis for questions asked to this witness. Having considered the proffer, the court finds by a preponderance of the evidence that [name of party] [has or lacks] a good-faith basis for the questions, and that they [are proper or should be stricken from the record].

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony. If the judge has excluded cross-examination questions, the cross-examiner may want to make an offer of proof by voir dire of the witness. This may be especially important because the answer that the witness would give to the question may be significant in a determination of whether exclusion, even if erroneous, is harmless or prejudicial.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to character evidence or to cross-examination questions, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Negative Character Witness Generally

A party may call a witness to give reputation or opinion testimony about the truthful or untruthful character of any person whose out-of-court statements have been presented as having the same weight as trial testimony. [Name of character witness] has testified concerning [name of hearsay declarant]. It is for you to assess the credibility of [name of character witness] and to decide how much weight you will give this testimony in connection with your assessment of the credibility of [name of hearsay declarant].

[2] Cross-Examination Concerning Specific Acts Acknowledged by Witness

A party may call a witness to give reputation or opinion testimony about the truthful or untruthful character of any person whose out-of-court statements have been presented as having the same weight as trial testimony. [Name of character witness] has testified concerning [name of hearsay declarant]. The [plaintiff or defendant] questioned [name of character witness] concerning whether [name of character witness] had heard or knew about specific acts involving [name of hearsay declarant]. [Name of character witness] testified that he had heard or knew of these acts. You may consider what [name of character witness] heard of or knew as you assess the credibility of [name of character witness] and decide how much weight you will give this testimony in connection with your assessment of the credibility of [name of hearsay declarant]. You are not called upon to decide whether these acts actually occurred. You need only decide whether the fact that [name of character witness] heard or knew certain things casts doubt on the reputation or opinion evidence concerning [name of hearsay declarant].

[3] Cross-Examination Concerning Specific Acts Not Acknowledged by Witness

A party may call a witness to give reputation or opinion testimony about the truthful or untruthful character of any person whose out-of-court statements have been presented as having the same weight as trial testimony. [Name of character witness] has testified concerning [name of hearsay declarant]. The [plaintiff or defendant] questioned [name of character witness] concerning whether [name of character witness] had heard or knew about specific acts involving [name of hearsay declarant]. [Name of character witness] denied hearing or knowing of these acts. I remind you that questions are not evidence, and there is no evidence that any of these acts actually occurred. You must not assume that they occurred as you assess the credibility of [name of character witness] and decide how much weight you will give this testimony in connection with your assessment of the credibility of [name of hearsay declarant].

[4] Multiple Character Witnesses

A party may call a witness to give reputation or opinion testimony about the truthful or untruthful character of any person whose out-of-court statements have been presented as having the same weight as trial testimony. [Names of character witnesses] have testified concerning [name of hearsay declarant]. The [plaintiff or defendant] questioned [names of character witnesses] concerning whether [names of character witnesses] had heard or knew about specific acts involving [name of hearsay declarant]. Some witnesses testified they had heard of or knew of acts while other witnesses denied hearing or knowing of these acts. You may consider that some witnesses heard or knew things that others did not in assessing the credibility of [names of character witnesses] and decide how much weight you will give their testimony in connection with your assessment of the credibility of [name of hearsay declarant]. You are not called upon to decide whether these acts actually occurred. You need only decide whether the fact that some witnesses heard or knew certain things casts doubt on their reputation or opinion testimony, and whether the fact that other witnesses did not hear or know these things casts doubt on their reputation or opinion testimony.

CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

6-8 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 8-35

8-35 Impeaching Declarants -- Prior Convictions.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 607. Who May Impeach

The credibility of a witness may be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness.

Rule 609. Impeachment by Evidence of Conviction of Crime

(a) General rule. -- For the purpose of attacking the credibility of a witness,

(1) evidence that the witness other than an accused has been convicted of a crime shall be admitted, subject to

Rule 403, if the crime was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year under the law under which the witness was convicted, and evidence that an accused has been convicted of such a crime shall be admitted if the court determines that the probative value of admitting this evidence outweighs its prejudicial effect to the accused; and

(2) evidence that any witness has been convicted of a crime shall be admitted if it involved dishonesty or false statement, regardless of the punishment.

(b) Time limit. -- Evidence of a conviction under this rule is not admissible if a period of more than ten years has elapsed since the date of the conviction or of the release of the witness from the confinement imposed for that conviction, whichever is the later date, unless the court determines, in the interests of justice, that the probative value of the conviction supported by specific facts and circumstances substantially outweighs its prejudicial effect. However, evidence of a conviction more than ten years old as calculated herein, is not admissible unless the proponent gives to the adverse party sufficient advance written notice of intent to use such evidence to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to contest the use of such evidence.

(c) Effect of pardon, annulment, or certificate of rehabilitation. -- Evidence of a conviction is not admissible under this rule if (1) the conviction has been the subject of a pardon, annulment, certificate of rehabilitation, or other equivalent procedure based on a finding of the rehabilitation of the person convicted, and that person has not been convicted of a subsequent crime which was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year, or (2) the conviction has been the subject of a pardon, annulment, or other equivalent procedure based on a finding of innocence.

(d) Juvenile adjudications. -- Evidence of juvenile adjudications is generally not admissible under this rule. The court may, however, in a criminal case allow evidence of a juvenile adjudication of a witness other than the accused if conviction of the offense would be admissible to attack the credibility of an adult and the court is satisfied that admission in evidence is necessary for a fair determination of the issue of guilt or innocence.

(e) Pendency of appeal. -- The pendency of an appeal therefrom does not render evidence of a conviction inadmissible. Evidence of the pendency of an appeal is admissible.

Rule 611. Mode and Order of Interrogation and Presentation

(a) Control by court. -- The court shall exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of interrogating witnesses and presenting evidence so as to (1) make the interrogation and presentation effective for the ascertainment of the truth, (2) avoid needless consumption of time, and (3) protect witnesses from harassment or undue embarrassment.

* * *

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

(d) Statements which are not hearsay. -- A statement is not hearsay if --

* * *

(2) Admission by party-opponent. -- The statement is offered against a party and is (A) the party's own statement, in either an individual or a representative capacity or (B) a statement of which the party has manifested an adoption or belief in its truth, or (C) a statement by a person authorized by the party to make a statement concerning the subject, or (D) a statement by the party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship, or (E) a statement by a co-conspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom a certain admission or hearsay is admitted to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, and (c) permits the party against whom the evidence is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions.

2. Criminal convictions for offenses involving dishonesty or false statement are always admissible to impeach any witness or hearsay declarant, including a criminal accused. It makes no difference whether the prior convictions are felonies or misdemeanors. There is no balancing test employed for these convictions. Generally, dishonesty crimes are not crimes of violence, but are crimes that involve falsity, misrepresentation, or deceit.

3. No misdemeanor convictions other than those involving dishonesty or false statement are admissible in any case for impeachment.

4. Felony convictions (crimes punishable by more than one year's incarceration) that do not involve dishonesty or false statement are all subject to a balancing test. The traditional Rule 403 balancing test is used for all witnesses or hearsay declarants other than the criminal accused. The criminal accused whose hearsay statement is admitted gets the benefit of a twist on the Rule 403 balancing test. Instead of the accused's having to demonstrate that the prejudicial effect of the prior conviction outweighs its probative value, which would be required under Rule 403, the government must show that the probative value of the conviction outweighs its prejudicial effect. The trial judge need not find that the probative value substantially outweighs the prejudicial effect, just that the probative value is greater.

5. Convictions that are more than ten years old -- measured from the latter of the date of conviction or release from confinement -- cannot be used absent notice of an intent to rely upon the conviction and specific findings by the trial judge that the probative value of the specific facts and circumstances of the conviction substantially outweighs its prejudicial effect. This is the reverse of the ordinary Rule 403 balancing.

6. Generally, the prejudicial effect of the prior conviction will be greatest when the conviction and the crime charged are similar, and will be least when the conviction bears little similarity to the crime charged. The probative value of the prior conviction increases when the conviction has elements of dishonesty as opposed to violence.

7. Rule 609 governs the use of prior convictions for impeachment purposes only. It does not preclude convictions from being offered under other rules -- e.g., Rules 404, 413, 414, 415, and 803(22).

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to prior conviction evidence. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of prior convictions under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to such evidence the judge will want to make a statement for the record outside the hearing of the jury that indicates that the proper standard was used in making a ruling.

If the judge is dealing with a conviction that qualifies as a "dishonesty or false statement" conviction, whether misdemeanor or felony and regardless of the nature of the case or the witness who is to be impeached, the judge may choose a statement like the following: I have considered the objection to the prior conviction for [name of crime]. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that it is a conviction involving dishonesty or false statement. Therefore, I must admit it because Rule 609(a)(2) provides that such convictions are always admissible.

In a civil or criminal case in which the credibility of any hearsay declarant is at issue, the judge may choose a statement like the following: I have considered the objection to [name of declarant's] prior conviction for [name of crime]. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the possible prejudicial effect of the conviction, particularly the danger of spill-over to a party, [does or does not] substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence for impeachment purposes. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to prior convictions, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

The following instruction can easily be requested and readily be adopted by trial judges to explain trial developments to the jury.

[1] Prior Conviction of a Hearsay Declarant Generally

You may consider evidence of the criminal convictions of any person whose statements were presented and whose statements may be given the same weight as trial testimony in assessing this person's credibility and deciding how much weight to give this person's statement.

[2] Prior Conviction of Particular Declarant

You will recall that [name of party] presented evidence of a statement of [name of declarant], and that I told you that you could give this statement the same weight as trial testimony. [Name of party] has presented evidence that [name of declarant] was convicted of [insert crime]. You may consider this conviction is assessing [name of declarant's] testimony and in deciding how much weight to give his/her statement.

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

6-8 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 8-36

8-36 Impeaching Declarants -- Bias.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 401. Definition of "Relevant Evidence"

"Relevant evidence" means evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence.

Rule 402. Relevant Evidence Generally Admissible; Irrelevant Evidence Inadmissible

All relevant evidence is admissible, except as otherwise provided by the Constitution of the United States, by Act of Congress, by these rules, or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority. Evidence which is not relevant is not admissible.

Rule 403. Exclusion of Relevant Evidence on Grounds of Prejudice, Confusion, or Waste of Time

Although relevant, evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence.

Rule 607. Who May Impeach

The credibility of a witness may be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness.

Rule 611. Mode and Order of Interrogation and Presentation

(a) Control by court. -- The court shall exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of interrogating witnesses and presenting evidence so as to (1) make the interrogation and presentation effective for the ascertainment of the truth, (2) avoid needless consumption of time, and (3) protect witnesses from harassment or undue embarrassment.

* * *

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

(d) Statements which are not hearsay. -- A statement is not hearsay if --

* * *

(2) Admission by party-opponent. -- The statement is offered against a party and is (A) the party's own statement, in either an individual or a representative capacity or (B) a statement of which the party has manifested an adoption or belief in its truth, or (C) a statement by a person authorized by the party to make a statement concerning the subject, or (D) a statement by the party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship, or (E) a statement by a co-conspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom a certain admission or hearsay is admitted to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, and (c) permits the party against whom the evidence is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions.

2. Because Rule 806 permits a party to impeach a hearsay declarant in the same ways the party could impeach a trial witness, the rule permits a party to call a hearsay declarant to the stand to elicit testimony about bias. The rule also permits a party to offer extrinsic evidence of bias.

3. No specific rule of evidence addresses bias evidence. However, Rule 401 defines relevant evidence and Rule 402 states that relevant evidence is admissible unless a legal restriction provides otherwise. Not only is bias evidence relevant, but it is regarded as such a powerful form of impeachment that in criminal cases the defendant has a Sixth Amendment Confrontation Clause right to demonstrate the potential bias or interest of government witnesses. Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308 (1974) . The Confrontation right may override provisions of rules of evidence that would exclude defense evidence. See, e.g., Olden v. Kentucky, 488 U.S. 227 (1988) .

4. The Supreme Court recognized the importance of bias evidence and its admissibility under Rule 402 in United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45 (1984) .

5. The Supreme Court recognized in Abel that a trial judge, in the sound exercise of discretion, may permit a party to elicit testimony that a witness is a member of an organization, but may exclude the name of or details about the organization. For example, the judge may permit testimony that a witness is a member of a "prison gang" while excluding the name of the gang -- e.g., "Aryan Brotherhood" -- if the name might be especially prejudicial in the locale of the trial.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to bias evidence. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to bias evidence the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I have considered the objection to this evidence. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the evidence [is or is not] probative of a possible bias on the part of [name of declarant] and that the possible prejudicial effect of the evidence [does or does not] substantially outweigh the probative value of this evidence. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to bias evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

The following instructions can easily be requested and readily be adopted by trial judges to explain trial developments to the jury.

[1] Bias Generally

You may consider the bias or interest of any person whose statement has been presented and whose statement may be given the same weight as trial testimony in deciding what weight to give the statement.

[2] Plea Bargain by Hearsay Declarant

The fact that [name of hearsay declarant] has [agreed to plead or pled] guilty to some or all of the crimes charged against the defendant is not evidence that the defendant is guilty of any crime charged in this case. You may consider the extent to which [name of hearsay declarant] [agreed to accept or has accepted] responsibility for criminal acts, and the extent to which [name of hearsay declarant] has avoided responsibility and obtained some benefit from the plea agreement in assessing the credibility of [name of hearsay declarant] and deciding how much weight to give statements made by [name of hearsay declarant].

[3] Group Membership

You may consider the fact that a person whose statement was presented to you and whose statement may be given the same weight as trial testimony is a member of [insert name or description of group] in deciding whether this person might favor or disfavor one party in this case. You must not favor or disfavor parties who call witnesses or offer statements because you approve or disapprove of their associates or organizations. But, you may consider whether a person has reason to favor or disfavor a party in assessing the credibility of this person and how much weight to give his/her statements.

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
CHAPTER 8 HEARSAY

6-8 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 8-37

8-37 Impeaching Declarants -- Prior Inconsistent Statements.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 607. Who May Impeach

The credibility of a witness may be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness.

Rule 611. Mode and Order of Interrogation and Presentation

(a) Control by court. -- The court shall exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of interrogating witnesses and presenting evidence so as to (1) make the interrogation and presentation effective for the ascertainment of the truth, (2) avoid needless consumption of time, and (3) protect witnesses from harassment or undue embarrassment.

* * *

Rule 613. Prior Statements of Witnesses

(a) Examining witness concerning prior statement. -- In examining a witness concerning a prior statement made by the witness, whether written or not, the statement need not be shown nor its contents disclosed to the witness at that time, but on request the same shall be shown or disclosed to opposing counsel.

(b) Extrinsic evidence of prior inconsistent statement of witness. -- Extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement by a witness is not admissible unless the witness is afforded an opportunity to explain or deny the same and the opposite party is afforded an opportunity to interrogate the witness thereon, or the interests of justice otherwise require. This provision does not apply to admissions of a party-opponent as defined in rule 801(d)(2).

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

(d) Statements which are not hearsay. -- A statement is not hearsay if --

* * *

(2) Admission by party-opponent. -- The statement is offered against a party and is (A) the party's own statement, in either an individual or a representative capacity or (B) a statement of which the party has manifested an adoption or belief in its truth, or (C) a statement by a person authorized by the party to make a statement concerning the subject, or (D) a statement by the party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship, or (E) a statement by a co-conspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

* * *

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 806 does the following: it (a) permits any party against whom a certain admission or hearsay is admitted to impeach the declarant in the same ways that a trial witness could be impeached, (b) provides that the usual foundation for prior inconsistent statements is not required, and (c) permits the party against whom the evidence is offered to call the declarant and ask leading questions.

2. Rule 806 trumps the procedural requirement of a foundation for inconsistent statements that is found in Rule 613(b). Hence, even though Rule 613(b) provides that a party who wants to offer extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement must give the witness who made the statement the opportunity to deny making the statement or to explain it, Rule 806 lifts this burden from the proponent of an inconsistent statement offered to impeach a hearsay declarant.

3. Rule 613(a) eliminates the rule laid down in Queen Caroline's case that a party seeking to impeach a witness with a prior written inconsistent statement must show it to the witness before asking questions about it. Now impeaching counsel must, upon request, show it to opposing counsel, but not to the witness. This requirement is not trumped by Rule 806, and counsel must comply with it if counsel has called the declarant for purposes of cross-examination. There is no restriction upon impeaching counsel's showing the statement to the witness, but the rule permits impeaching counsel to choose when to do so.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to prior inconsistent statements. Unless a timely objection is made, the statements will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of evidence under Rule 104(a), in ruling on objections to prior inconsistent statements the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury something like the following: I have considered the objection to the use of these prior statements. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the statements [are or are not] sufficiently inconsistent with the statement of [name of hearsay declarant] that has been admitted for its truth to be probative, and that the possible prejudicial effect of these statements, particularly the danger they will be used as substantive evidence, [does or does not] substantially outweigh their probative value for impeachment purposes. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the statements [are or are not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to prior inconsistent statements, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about the proper use of evidence.

[1] Prior Inconsistent Statements -- Declarant Not Called as Witness

[Name of party relying on hearsay] has presented evidence of a statement by [name of declarant]. I have already instructed you that you must decide whether this statement was made and that you may give this statement the same weight as trial testimony. [Name of opposing party] has presented evidence about prior statements of [name of declarant] that might be inconsistent with the statement presented by [name of party relying on hearsay]. You must decide whether [name of declarant] made a prior statement, whether the prior statement was inconsistent with the statement upon which [name of party relying on hearsay] relies, and whether any prior statement causes you to doubt the statement upon which [name of party relying on hearsay] relies.

[2] Prior Inconsistent Statements -- Declarant Called as Witness

[Name of party relying on hearsay] has presented evidence of a statement by [name of declarant]. I have already instructed you that you must decide whether this statement was made and that you may give this statement the same weight as trial testimony. [Name of party] has now called [name of declarant] as a witness, asked [name of declarant] about the statement, and presented evidence of other statements by [name of declarant] that [name of party] contends are inconsistent with the statement relied upon by [name of party relying on hearsay]. You must decide whether [name of declarant] made these other statements, whether they are inconsistent with the statement upon which [name of party relying on hearsay] relies, and whether any of these other statements cause you to doubt the statement upon which [name of party relying on hearsay] relies. You may consider the contents of the several statements as well as the testimony of [name of declarant] in deciding the weight to give the statement upon which [name of party relying on hearsay] relies.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

(b) Relevancy conditioned on fact. -- When the relevancy of evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court shall admit it upon, or subject to, the introduction of evidence sufficient to support a finding of the fulfillment of the condition.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 901. Requirement of Authentication or Identification

(a) General provision. -- The requirement of authentication or identification as a condition precedent to admissibility is satisfied by evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims.

* * *

[b] Key Points.

1. Authentication or identification of evidence requires only that the proponent provide a basis for a reasonable fact finder to determine that the offered evidence is what the proponent claims it to be. The role of the trial judge when an objection is made on authentication or identification grounds is to decide whether there is sufficient evidence for a jury to find that the matter in question is what the proponent claims.

2. Thus, the trial judge makes the determination pursuant to Rule 104(b). The trial judge must make this determination by assessing only admissible evidence.

3. The fact that the trial judge admits evidence does not bar the opposing party from offering evidence to suggest that the matter is a fraud or improperly identified.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made on authentication or identification grounds. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the adequacy of authentication or identification under Rule 104(b), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: [Name of party] has objected to [describe evidence] as lacking a sufficient foundation. I have considered all the evidence and argument presented to me with regard to this objection. The task of the court is to determine whether there is sufficient evidence from which the jury could find by a preponderance of the evidence that the proffered evidence is what its proponent claims. The court does not decide on the credibility of witnesses or whether it believes witnesses in making its ruling. It decides only whether a reasonable jury could find witnesses credible and could accept their testimony as true. I find that a reasonable jury [could or could not] find that the offered evidence [describe evidence and conclusion -- e.g., is the defendant's hotel bill]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence as lacking a sufficient foundation, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence. For example, a party may not object to evidence on foundational grounds, but may want the judge to explain to the jury its role in assessing the credibility of witnesses and the reliability of evidence.

[1] Authentication Generally

[Name of proponent] has presented [cite exhibit number] and contends [summarize contention -- e.g., that it is an authentic hotel bill]. It is for you to decide whether [cite exhibit number] is authentic and how much weight to give it.

[2] Identification Generally

[Name of proponent] has presented [cite exhibit number or describe testimony] and contends that it [summarize contention -- e.g., is a watch the defendant was wearing at the time of the accident, or establishes that the defendant participated in the telephone conversation]. It is for you to decide whether or not the evidence supports this contention and how much weight to give it.

(b) Illustrations. -- By way of illustration only, and not by way of limitation, the following are examples of authentication or identification conforming with the requirements of this rule:

[b] Key Points.

1. Authentication or identification of evidence requires only that the proponent provide a basis for a reasonable fact finder to determine that the offered evidence is what the proponent claims it to be. The role of the trial judge when an objection is made on authentication or identification grounds is to decide whether there is sufficient evidence for a jury to find that the matter in question is what the proponent claims.

2. Thus, the trial judge makes the determination pursuant to Rule 104(b). The trial judge must make this determination by assessing only admissible evidence.

3. The fact that the trial judge admits evidence does not bar the opposing party from offering evidence to suggest that the matter is a fraud or improperly identified.

4. Rule 901(b) offers examples of ways to authenticate evidence. It is unclear whether the limitations in these examples -- e.g., the limitation that nonexpert opinion about handwriting cannot be based on knowledge acquired for litigation -- are binding or advisory.

5. Rule 901(b)(2) and (b)(3) provide two specific ways to authenticate handwriting, and Rule 901(b)(4) provides a third way. It is never necessary to authenticate evidence by all available means. However, a party may choose as a matter of strategy to use more than one method of authentication.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made on authentication or identification grounds. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the adequacy of handwriting authentication or identification under Rule 104(b), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: [Name of party] has objected to [describe evidence] as lacking a sufficient foundation. I have considered all the evidence and argument presented to me with regard to this objection. The task of the court is to determine whether there is sufficient evidence from which the jury could find by a preponderance of the evidence that the proffered evidence is what its proponent claims. The court does not decide on the credibility of witnesses or whether it believes witnesses in making its ruling. It decides only whether a reasonable jury could find witnesses credible and could accept their testimony as true. I find that a reasonable jury [could or could not] find that the [describe evidence and the conclusion -- e.g., note contains the handwriting of the defendant]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence as lacking a sufficient foundation, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence. For example, a party may not object to evidence on foundational grounds, but may want the judge to explain to the jury its role in assessing the credibility of witnesses and the reliability of evidence.

[1] Nonexpert Opinion

[Name of proponent] has presented the testimony of [name of witness] to establish that [cite exhibit number] contains the handwriting of [name of writer]. It is for you to decide whether [name of witness] is able to identify this handwriting and the accuracy of the identification, and also to decide how much weight to give this testimony.

[2] Expert Opinion

[Name of proponent] has presented the testimony of [name of witness] to establish that [cite exhibit number] contains the handwriting of [name of writer]. [Name of witness] testified that he compared [cite challenged exhibit number] with [cite exemplar exhibit number] which [name of proponent] contends contains the handwriting of [name of writer]. It is for you to decide whether [cite exemplar exhibit number] contains the handwriting of [name of writer], whether [name of witness] is able to compare this handwriting with the writing on [cite challenged exhibit number] and the accuracy of the comparison, and how much weight to give this testimony.

[3] Circumstantial Evidence

[Name of proponent] contends that [cite exhibit number] contains the handwriting of [name of writer]. It is for you to decide whether the distinctive characteristics of this exhibit, the circumstances surrounding its creation, or other evidence establishes that it contains the handwriting of [name of writer] and how much weight to give this evidence.

4. Rule 901(b)(5) provides that any witness who claims to have experience with a voice may make a voice identification.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made on authentication or identification grounds. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the adequacy of voice authentication or identification under Rule 104(b), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: [Name of party] has objected to [describe evidence] as lacking a sufficient foundation. I find that a reasonable jury [could or could not] find that the [describe evidence and conclusion -- e.g., voice on the telephone was that of the defendant]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence as lacking a sufficient foundation, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. [b] Key Points.

1. Authentication or identification of evidence requires only that the proponent provide a basis for a reasonable fact finder to determine that the offered evidence is what the proponent claims it to be. The role of the trial judge when an objection is made on authentication or identification grounds is to decide whether there is sufficient evidence for a jury to find that the matter in question is what the proponent claims.

3. The fact that the trial judge admits evidence does not bar the opposing party from offering evidence to suggest that the matter is a fraud or improperly identified.

4. Rule 901(b) offers examples of ways to authenticate evidence. It is unclear whether the limitations in these examples -- e.g., the limitation that telephone calls to listed numbers of individuals are properly authenticated if the individual identifies himself or herself -- are binding or advisory.

5. Rule 901(b)(6) provides for ways of authenticating telephone calls to individuals or to businesses.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made on authentication or identification grounds. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the adequacy of authentication or identification as to telephone conversations under Rule 104(b), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: [Name of party] has objected to [describe evidence] as lacking a sufficient foundation. I have considered all the evidence and argument presented to me with regard to this objection. The task of the court is to determine whether there is sufficient evidence from which the jury could find by a preponderance of the evidence that the proffered evidence is what its proponent claims. The court does not decide on the credibility of witnesses or whether it believes witnesses in making its ruling. It decides only whether a reasonable jury could find witnesses credible and could accept their testimony as true. I find that a reasonable jury [could or could not] find that the [describe evidence and the conclusion -- e.g., telephone call was made by the plaintiff]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence as lacking a sufficient foundation, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence. For example, a party may not object to evidence on foundational grounds, but may want the judge to explain to the jury its role in assessing the credibility of witnesses and the reliability of evidence.

[1] Calls to Individuals -- Specific Number

[Name of witness] testified that he/she telephoned [number] and that the person who answered the phone identified himself/herself as [identity of person]. [Name of offering party] has also presented evidence that this telephone number was in fact assigned to [identity of person]. It is for you to decide whether [identity of person] received the call and participated in the telephone conversation and the weight to give this evidence.

[2] Calls to Individuals -- Telephone Directory

[Name of witness] testified that he/she telephoned the number in the telephone directory listed for [identity of person] and that the person who answered the phone identified himself/herself as [identity of person]. It is for you to decide whether [identity of person] received the call and participated in the telephone conversation and the weight to give this evidence.

[3] Calls to Business -- Specific Number

[Name of witness] testified that he/she telephoned [number], a person answered the phone, and a conversation took place which [name of witness] described. [Name of offering party] has also presented evidence that this telephone number was in fact assigned to [identity of business]. It is for you to decide whether [identity of business] received the call, whether someone at [identity of business] participated in the conversation, and the weight to give this evidence.

[4] Calls to Business -- Telephone Directory

[Name of witness] testified that he/she telephoned the number in the telephone directory listed for [identity of business], a person answered the phone, and a conversation took place which [name of witness] described. It is for you to decide whether [identity of business] received the call, whether someone at [identity of business] participated in the conversation, and the weight to give this evidence.

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

(b) Relevancy conditioned on fact. -- When the relevancy of evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court shall admit it upon, or subject to, the introduction of evidence sufficient to support a finding of the fulfillment of the condition.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 901. Requirement of Authentication or Identification

(a) General provision. -- The requirement of authentication or identification as a condition precedent to admissibility is satisfied by evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims.

(b) Illustrations. -- By way of illustration only, and not by way of limitation, the following are examples of authentication or identification conforming with the requirements of this rule:

(7) Public records or reports. -- Evidence that a writing authorized by law to be recorded or filed and in fact recorded or filed in a public office, or a purported public record, report, statement, or data compilation, in any form, is from the public office where items of this nature are kept.

[b] Key Points.

1. Authentication or identification of evidence requires only that the proponent provide a basis for a reasonable fact finder to determine that the offered evidence is what the proponent claims it to be. The role of the trial judge when an objection is made on authentication or identification grounds is to decide whether there is sufficient evidence for a jury to find that the matter in question is what the proponent claims.

2. Thus, the trial judge makes the determination pursuant to Rule 104(b). The trial judge must make this determination by assessing only admissible evidence.

3. The fact that the trial judge admits evidence does not bar the opposing party from offering evidence to suggest that the matter is a fraud or improperly identified.

4. Rule 901(b)(7) provides for authentication of public records.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made on authentication or identification grounds. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the adequacy of authentication or identification under Rule 104(b), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: [Name of party] has objected to [describe evidence] as lacking a sufficient foundation. I have considered all the evidence and argument presented to me with regard to this objection. The task of the court is to determine whether there is sufficient evidence from which the jury could find by a preponderance of the evidence that the proffered evidence is what its proponent claims. The court does not decide on the credibility of witnesses or whether it believes witnesses in making its ruling. It decides only whether a reasonable jury could find witnesses credible and could accept their testimony as true. I find that a reasonable jury [could or could not] find that the [describe evidence and the conclusion -- e.g., document is a record kept in the office of the Secretary of State]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence as lacking a sufficient foundation, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence. For example, a party may not object to evidence on foundational grounds, but may want the judge to explain to the jury its role in assessing the credibility of witnesses and the reliability of evidence.

The following instructions can easily be requested and readily be adopted by trial judges to explain trial developments to the jury.

[1] Public Records Authorized to Be Filed -- Judicial Notice Taken

[Name of party] has presented evidence that [cite exhibit number] is a record that is filed with [name of public office]. I instruct you that the law of [e.g., United States, State, or local government] authorizes such records to be filed. It is for you to decide whether this record was filed, whether the filing of this record proves that it is authentic, and the weight to be given this record.

[2] Public Records Generally

[Name of party] has presented evidence that [cite exhibit number] was prepared by [name of public office]. It is for you to decide whether [name of public office] prepared this record and the weight to be given it.

[b] Key Points.

1. Authentication or identification of evidence requires only that the proponent provide a basis for a reasonable fact finder to determine that the offered evidence is what the proponent claims it to be. The role of the trial judge when an objection is made on authentication or identification grounds is to decide whether there is sufficient evidence for a jury to find that the matter in question is what the proponent claims.

2. Thus, the trial judge makes the determination pursuant to Rule 104(b). The trial judge must make this determination by assessing only admissible evidence.

3. The fact that the trial judge admits evidence does not bar the opposing party from offering evidence to suggest that the matter is a fraud or improperly identified.

4. Rule 901(b) provides various ways to authenticate or identify evidence. It is unclear whether the limitations in the examples -- e.g., an ancient document must be twenty years old -- are binding on a trial judge. It is clear that if the limitations are satisfied, the proponent of evidence has done enough to authenticate it.

5. Rule 901(b)(8) provides a mechanism for authenticating ancient documents. Assuming that the limitations are binding or that the trial judge will choose to apply them even if they are not binding, the trial judge must find that there is sufficient evidence for a jury to find that the requirements are true. However, the judge must leave the final decision as to whether the document is authentic for the jury.

6. An ancient document may be hearsay. Rule 803(16) contains a hearsay exception for ancient documents. An authentication objection does not raise a hearsay issue. A hearsay objection must be specifically raised and dealt with under Article VIII of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made on authentication or identification grounds. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the adequacy of authentication or identification under Rule 104(b), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: [Name of party] has objected to [describe evidence] as lacking a sufficient foundation. It decides only whether a reasonable jury could find witnesses credible and could accept their testimony as true. I find that a reasonable jury [could or could not] find that the [describe evidence and the conclusion -- e.g., this document is the map created by the defendant's father]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence as lacking a sufficient foundation, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made on authentication or identification grounds. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the adequacy of authentication or identification of processes and systems under Rule 104(b), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: [Name of party] has objected to [describe evidence] as lacking a sufficient foundation. I have considered all the evidence and argument presented to me with regard to this objection. The task of the court is to determine whether there is sufficient evidence from which the jury could find by a preponderance of the evidence that the proffered evidence is what its proponent claims. It decides only whether a reasonable jury could find witnesses credible and could accept their testimony as true. I find that a reasonable jury [could or could not] find that the [describe evidence and the conclusion -- e.g., the computer program produced accurate results]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence as lacking a sufficient foundation, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 902. Self-Authentication

Extrinsic evidence of authenticity as a condition precedent to admissibility is not required with respect to the following:

(1) Domestic public documents under seal. -- A document bearing a seal purporting to be that of the United States, or of any State, district, Commonwealth, territory, or insular possession thereof, or the Panama Canal Zone, or the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, or of a political subdivision, department, officer, or agency thereof, and a signature purporting to be an attestation or execution.

(2) Domestic public documents not under seal. -- A document purporting to bear the signature in the official capacity of an officer or employee of any entity included in paragraph (1) hereof, having no seal, if a public officer having a seal and having official duties in the district or political subdivision of the officer or employee certifies under seal that the signer has the official capacity and that the signature is genuine.

(3) Foreign public documents. -- A document purporting to be executed or attested in an official capacity by a person authorized by the laws of a foreign country to make the execution or attestation, and accompanied by a final certification as to the genuineness of the signature and official position (A) of the executing or attesting person, or (B) of any foreign official whose certificate of genuineness of signature and official position relates to the execution or attestation or is in a chain of certificates of genuineness of signature and official position relating to the execution or attestation. A final certification may be made by a secretary of embassy or legation, consul general, consul, vice consul, or consular agent of the United States, or a diplomatic or consular official of the foreign country assigned or accredited to the United States. If reasonable opportunity has been given to all parties to investigate the authenticity and accuracy of official documents, the court may, for good cause shown, order that they be treated as presumptively authentic without final certification or permit them to be evidenced by an attested summary with or without final certification.

(4) Certified copies of public records. -- A copy of an official record or report or entry therein, or of a document authorized by law to be recorded or filed and actually recorded or filed in a public office, including data compilations in any form, certified as correct by the custodian or other person authorized to make the certification, by certificate complying with paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of this rule or complying with any Act of Congress or rule prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority.

(5) Official publications. -- Books, pamphlets, or other publications purporting to be issued by public authority.

(6) Newspapers and periodicals. -- Printed materials purporting to be newspapers or periodicals.

(7) Trade inscriptions and the like. -- Inscriptions, signs, tags, or labels purporting to have been affixed in the course of business and indicating ownership, control, or origin.

(8) Acknowledged documents. -- Documents accompanied by a certificate of acknowledgment executed in the manner provided by law by a notary public or other officer authorized by law to take acknowledgments.

(9) Commercial paper and related documents. -- Commercial paper, signatures thereon, and documents relating thereto to the extent provided by general commercial law.

(10) Presumptions under Acts of Congress. -- Any signature, document, or other matter declared by Act of Congress to be presumptively or prima facie genuine or authentic.

(11) Certified domestic records of regularly conducted activity. -- The original or a duplicate of a domestic record of regularly conducted activity that would be admissible under Rule 803(6) if accompanied by a written declaration of its custodian or other qualified person, in a manner complying with any Act of Congress or rule prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority, certifying that the record--

(A) was made at or near the time of the occurrence of the matters set forth by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge of those matters;

(B) was kept in the course of the regularly conducted activity; and

(C) was made by the regularly conducted activity as a regular practice.

A party intending to offer a record into evidence under this paragraph must provide written notice of that intention to all adverse parties, and must make the record and declaration available for inspection sufficiently in advance of their offer into evidence to provide an adverse party with a fair opportunity to challenge them.

(12) Certified foreign records of regularly conducted activity. -- In a civil case, the original or a duplicate of a foreign record of regularly conducted activity that would be admissible under Rule 803(6) if accompanied by a written declaration by its custodian or other qualified person certifying that the record--

(A) was made at or near the time of the occurrence of the matters set forth by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge of those matters;

(B) was kept in the course of the regularly conducted activity; and

(C) was made by the regularly conducted activity as a regular practice.

The declaration must be signed in a manner that, if falsely made, would subject the maker to criminal penalty under the laws of the country where the declaration is signed. A party intending to offer a record into evidence under this paragraph must provide written notice of that intention to all adverse parties, and must make the record and declaration available for inspection sufficiently in advance of their offer into evidence to provide an adverse party with a fair opportunity to challenge them.

[b] Key Points.

1. Authentication or identification of evidence requires only that the proponent provide a basis for a reasonable fact finder to determine that the offered evidence is what the proponent claims it to be. The role of the trial judge when an objection is made on authentication or identification grounds is to decide whether there is sufficient evidence for a jury to find that the matter in question is what the proponent claims.

2. Thus, the trial judge generally makes the determination as to authenticity and identification pursuant to Rule 104(b). The trial judge must make this determination by assessing only admissible evidence. Rule 902 makes certain kinds of evidence self-authenticating and removes the need to call witnesses to lay a foundation for various public documents and other evidence.

3. The fact that the trial judge admits evidence does not bar the opposing party from offering evidence to suggest that the matter is a fraud or improperly identified.

4. Rule 902 provides various mechanisms for authenticating evidence without calling witnesses. It is not a prohibition on the calling of witnesses. A party who faces an adversary's attack on the genuineness of evidence may choose to call witnesses even though they are not required to testify as a condition of admitting the challenged evidence.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made on authentication or identification grounds. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the adequacy of authentication or identification under Rule 104(b), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: [Name of party] has objected to [describe evidence] as lacking a sufficient foundation. I have considered all the evidence and argument presented to me with regard to this objection. The task of the court is to determine whether there is sufficient evidence from which the jury could find by a preponderance of the evidence that the proffered evidence is what its proponent claims. The court does not decide on the credibility of witnesses or whether it believes witnesses or other evidence in making its ruling. Relying on Rule 902, I find that a reasonable jury [could or could not] find that the [describe evidence and the conclusion -- e.g., exhibit is a genuine copy of a public document prepared by the Department of Commerce]. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude evidence as lacking a sufficient foundation, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence. For example, a party may not object to evidence on foundational grounds, but may want the judge to explain to the jury its role in assessing the credibility of witnesses and the reliability of evidence.

The following instructions can easily be requested and readily be adopted by trial judges to explain trial developments to the jury.

Rule 1001. Definitions

For purposes of this article the following definitions are applicable:

(1) Writings and recordings. -- "Writings" and "recordings" consist of letters, words, or numbers, or their equivalent, set down by handwriting, typewriting, printing, photostating, photographing, magnetic impulse, mechanical or electronic recording, or other form of data compilation.

(2) Photographs. -- "Photographs" include still photographs, X-ray films, video tapes, and motion pictures.

(3) Original. -- An "original" of a writing or recording is the writing or recording itself or any counterpart intended to have the same effect by a person executing or issuing it. An "original" of a photograph includes the negative or any print therefrom. If data are stored in a computer or similar device, any printout or other output readable by sight, shown to reflect the data accurately, is an "original."

(4) Duplicate. -- A "duplicate" is a counterpart produced by the same impression as the original, or from the same matrix, or by means of photography, including enlargements and miniatures, or by mechanical or electronic re-recording, or by chemical reproduction, or by other equivalent techniques which accurately reproduce the original.

Rule 1002. Requirement of Original

To prove the content of a writing, recording, or photograph, the original writing, recording, or photograph is required, except as otherwise provided in these rules or by Act of Congress.

Rule 1007. Testimony or Written Admission of Party

Contents of writings, recordings, or photographs may be proved by the testimony or deposition of the party against whom offered or by that party's written admission, without accounting for the nonproduction of the original.

[b] Key Points.

1. Article X sets forth the Federal Rules of Evidence version of the best evidence rule. Article X greatly relaxes the common-law rule, especially with its ready acceptance of duplicates. Like the common-law rule, however, Rule 1002 imposes the best evidence requirement only when a writing, recording, or photograph is used to prove its contents rather than being used for another purpose.

2. It is the trial judge's decision under Rule 104(a) whether a writing or recording is being offered to prove its contents. This decision usually is made without resort to fact finding, since the determination when an item is being offered to prove its content or for some other purpose is largely based on a logical analysis of the relationship between the contents and the issues in the case.

3. It is also the judge's decision whether a writing or recording that is offered for its contents qualifies as an original under Rule 1001(3). Even though the judge makes a determination that a writing or recording is an original, the jury may decide that is not authentic. When adversaries each claim that a different writing or recording is an original, or where one party claims that a writing or recording is an original and another denies that any such document ever existed, or where adversaries offer competing evidence regarding the contents of a document, Rule 1008 indicates that the jury, not the judge, is to decide which party is correct. The subject of competing evidence is covered in § 10-4.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to a writing or recording on best evidence grounds. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on whether a writing or recording is offered to prove its contents under Rule 104(a), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: I have considered the [writing or recording] and the objection that it is not the best evidence. An objection on best evidence grounds can only be made when a writing or recording is used to prove its contents. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the [describe writing or recording] [is or is not] offered to prove its contents. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

If the judge finds that the best evidence rule applies, the judge will have to decide whether the writing or recording that is offered is an original, an admissible duplicate, or admissible secondary evidence, or whether the objecting party has acknowledged the genuineness of the writing or recording in a way that moots a best evidence objection under Rule 1007.

If the judge finds that the writing or recording is an original, Rule 1002 is satisified. Generally, the judge will want to make a finding outside the hearing of the jury on the record as to whether the writing or recording is an original in a form such as the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the [writing or recording] [is or is not] an original under Rule 1001(3).

If the judge finds that the writing or recording is not an original, the judge may have to decide whether the objecting party has admitted authenticity as provided in Rule 1007. The judge will generally make a a finding outside the hearing of the jury on the record as to whether Rule 1007 is satisfied in a form such as the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that, even though the [writing or recording] is not an original, [name of party] [has or has not] [testified at trial, testified in a deposition, or stated in writing] that the [writing or recording] is genuine. Therefore, the requirement of an original [is or is not] excused.

Once the judge has ruled on the best evidence objection, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence. For example, a party may not object to a writing or recording, but may want the judge to explain to the jury the reason why a writing or recording is admitted into evidence.

[1] Writing or Recording Not Admitted to Prove Contents

[Name of party] has presented [describe writing or recording -- e.g., a photograph] that [name of witness] has testified is a fair and accurate depiction of what he/she observed. You may use the photograph to help you understand the testimony of [name of witness] and to decide what weight to give that testimony.

[2] Writing or Recording Used to Prove Contents -- Impermissible Evidence

[Name of witness] has referred to [describe writing or recording]. The contents of this [describe writing or recording] are in dispute in this case. You may not consider the testimony of [name of witness] in deciding on the contents of [describe writing or recording].

[3] Party's Admission

[Name of offering party] has presented [cite exhibit number] and contends it accurately reflects the contents of the original. [Name of offering party] has produced evidence that [name of opposing party] admitted in [testimony, a deposition, or a writing] that the contents of [cite exhibit number] accurately reflect the contents of the original document. [Name of opposing party] contends that he/she erred in making this admission. It is for you to decide what the contents of the original were. You may consider the fact that [name of opposing party] made an admission, the explanation offered by [name of opposing party] for the admission and all other evidence that is before you in deciding what the contents of the original were.

* * *

Rule 1001. Definitions

For purposes of this article the following definitions are applicable:

(1) Writings and recordings. -- "Writings" and "recordings" consist of letters, words, or numbers, or their equivalent, set down by handwriting, typewriting, printing, photostating, photographing, magnetic impulse, mechanical or electronic recording, or other form of data compilation.

(2) Photographs. -- "Photographs" include still photographs, X-ray films, video tapes, and motion pictures.

(3) Original. -- An "original" of a writing or recording is the writing or recording itself or any counterpart intended to have the same effect by a person executing or issuing it. An "original" of a photograph includes the negative or any print therefrom. If data are stored in a computer or similar device, any printout or other output readable by sight, shown to reflect the data accurately, is an "original."

(4) Duplicate. -- A "duplicate" is a counterpart produced by the same impression as the original, or from the same matrix, or by means of photography, including enlargements and miniatures, or by mechanical or electronic re-recording, or by chemical reproduction, or by other equivalent techniques which accurately reproduce the original.

Rule 1002. Requirement of Original

To prove the content of a writing, recording, or photograph, the original writing, recording, or photograph is required, except as otherwise provided in these rules or by Act of Congress.

Rule 1003. Admissibility of Duplicates

A duplicate is admissible to the same extent as an original unless (1) a genuine question is raised as to the authenticity of the original or (2) in the circumstances it would be unfair to admit the duplicate in lieu of the original.

Rule 1007. Testimony or Written Admission of Party

Contents of writings, recordings, or photographs may be proved by the testimony or deposition of the party against whom offered or by that party's written admission, without accounting for the nonproduction of the original.

[b] Key Points.

1. Article X sets forth the Federal Rules of Evidence version of the best evidence rule. Article X greatly relaxes the common-law rule, especially with its ready acceptance of duplicates. Like the common-law rule, however, Rule 1002 imposes the best evidence requirement only when a writing, recording, or photograph is used to prove its contents rather than being used for another purpose.

2. Most documents and recordings copied on a machine will be presumptively admissible under Rule 1003.

3. It is the trial judge's decision under Rule 104(a) whether a genuine question is raised as to the authenticity of the original. Even though the judge admits a duplicate, a party may seek to persuade a jury that the document is not authentic.

4. Rule 1007 provides that a party can offer an opposing party's testimony, deposition, or written admission to prove the contents of a document without accounting for nonproduction of the original. In many cases where a party has admitted the contents of a document, there will be no dispute about the contents at trial. In some cases the admission may be binding -- e.g., under Fed. R. Civ. P. 36 -- unless the trial judge grants relief. However, there will be cases in which a party will admit genuineness of a document at some stage of a proceeding and later change its mind. Rule 1007 provides for admissibility of evidence; it does not preclude a party from challenging the contents of a document it once admitted.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to writings or recordings. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of writings and recordings under Rule 104(a), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: I have considered all the evidence presented to me with regard to the objection made to the use of a duplicate. The party opposing such use must demonstrate that it has raised a genuine question as to authenticity of the document or that it would be unfair to permit the use of the duplicate. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that a genuine question as to authenticity [has or has not] been raised and that it [would or would not] be unfair to permit the use of the duplicate. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

Should the judge exclude the duplicate, the party relying on it may well decide to use the duplicate as its offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make such an offer and assure that the duplicate is made part of the record. The judge may prescribe the form in which any offer must be made, but the proffer of the duplicate is likely to be the most efficient and most accurate form of offer in these circumstances.

Even if a judge determines that a writing or recording does not qualify as a duplicate or should not be admitted as a duplicate, the proponent may still rely upon Rule 1007. If so, the judge will generally make a a finding outside the hearing of the jury on the record as to whether Rule 1007 is satisfied in a form such as the following: I find by a preponderance of the evidence that, even though the [writing or recording] is not an original, [name of party] [has or has not] [testified at trial, testified in a deposition, or stated in writing] that the [writing or recording] is genuine. Therefore, the requirement of an original [is or is not] excused.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection to the duplicate, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

As the first limiting instruction set forth below demonstrates, even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence. For example, a party may not object to a writing or recording, but may want the judge to explain to the jury something about its role regarding documents.

[1] Duplicate Admitted by Stipulation

The parties have agreed that [cite exhibit number] is an accurate copy of the original of this document. You must give this copy the same weight you would give the original.

[2] Duplicate Admitted Over Objection

[Name of party] has presented [cite exhibit number] and contends it is an accurate copy of the original. It is for you to decide whether [cite exhibit number] is an accurate copy and the weight to give it. You may consider the appearance of the document as well as any testimony or other evidence concerning it in making your decision.

[3] Party's Admission

[Name of offering party] has presented [cite exhibit number] and contends it is an accurate copy of the original. [Name of offering party] has produced evidence that [name of opposing party] admitted in [testimony, a deposition, or a writing] that the contents of [cite exhibit number] accurately reflect the contents of the original document. [Name of opposing party] contends that he/she erred in making this admission. It is for you to decide what the contents of the original were. You may consider the fact that [name of opposing party] made an admission, the explanation offered by [name of opposing party] for the admission and all other evidence that is before you in deciding what the contents of the original were.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 1001. Definitions

For purposes of this article the following definitions are applicable:

(1) Writings and recordings. -- "Writings" and "recordings" consist of letters, words, or numbers, or their equivalent, set down by handwriting, typewriting, printing, photostating, photographing, magnetic impulse, mechanical or electronic recording, or other form of data compilation.

(2) Photographs. -- "Photographs" include still photographs, X-ray films, video tapes, and motion pictures.

(3) Original. -- An "original" of a writing or recording is the writing or recording itself or any counterpart intended to have the same effect by a person executing or issuing it. An "original" of a photograph includes the negative or any print therefrom. If data are stored in a computer or similar device, any printout or other output readable by sight, shown to reflect the data accurately, is an "original."

(4) Duplicate. -- A "duplicate" is a counterpart produced by the same impression as the original, or from the same matrix, or by means of photography, including enlargements and miniatures, or by mechanical or electronic re-recording, or by chemical reproduction, or by other equivalent techniques which accurately reproduce the original.

Rule 1002. Requirement of Original

To prove the content of a writing, recording, or photograph, the original writing, recording, or photograph is required, except as otherwise provided in these rules or by Act of Congress.

Rule 1003. Admissibility of Duplicates

A duplicate is admissible to the same extent as an original unless (1) a genuine question is raised as to the authenticity of the original or (2) in the circumstances it would be unfair to admit the duplicate in lieu of the original.

Rule 1004. Admissibility of Other Evidence of Contents

The original is not required, and other evidence of the contents of a writing, recording, or photograph is admissible if --

(1) Originals lost or destroyed. -- All originals are lost or have been destroyed, unless the proponent lost or destroyed them in bad faith; or

(2) Original not obtainable. -- No original can be obtained by any available judicial process or procedure; or

(3) Original in possession of opponent. -- At a time when an original was under the control of the party against whom offered, that party was put on notice, by the pleadings or otherwise, that the contents would be a subject of proof at the hearing, and that party does not produce the original at the hearing; or

(4) Collateral matters. -- The writing, recording, or photograph is not closely related to a controlling issue.

Rule 1005. Public Records

The contents of an official record, or of a document authorized to be recorded or filed and actually recorded or filed, including data compilations in any form, if otherwise admissible, may be proved by copy, certified as correct in accordance with Rule 902 or testified to be correct by a witness who has compared it with the original. If a copy which complies with the foregoing cannot be obtained by the exercise of reasonable diligence, then other evidence of the contents may be given.

Rule 1008. Functions of Court and Jury

When the admissibility of other evidence of contents of writings, recordings, or photographs under these rules depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the question whether the condition has been fulfilled is ordinarily for the court to determine in accordance with the provisions of rule 104. However, when an issue is raised (a) whether the asserted writing ever existed, or (b) whether another writing, recording, or photograph produced at the trial is the original, or (c) whether other evidence of contents correctly reflects the contents, the issue is for the trier of fact to determine as in the case of other issues of fact.

[b] Key Points.

1. Article X sets forth the Federal Rules of Evidence version of the best evidence rule. Article X greatly relaxes the common-law rule, especially with its ready acceptance of duplicates. Like the common-law rule, however, Rule 1002 imposes the best evidence requirement only when a writing, recording, or photograph is used to prove its contents rather being used than for another purpose.

2. The trial judge generally decides the legal questions that arise in connection with the best evidence rule. For example, it is the trial judge's decision under Rule 104(a) whether a genuine question is raised as to the authenticity of the original or whether an original was lost in good faith.

3. Rule 1004 comes into play when the original of a document is lost or unavailable. With respect to all writings and recordings except those covered by Rule 1005, a party who has shown a recognized excuse for not producing the original may offer any other admissible evidence to prove the contents. The trial judge determines under Rule 104(a) whether the excuse has been demonstrated.

4. Article X makes duplicates presumptively admissible, but it does not require a party to produce a duplicate rather than other evidence of the contents of documents not covered by Rule 1005. In short, a party who shows that an original was lost in good faith may either submit a duplicate or provide other evidence of the contents of the original.

5. Rule 1005 makes a special provision for public records. It does not require the original, but it limits proof of the contents of public records to two forms of evidence unless these forms are unavailable.

6. The fact that the trial judge may have determined that an original was destroyed in good faith may not be a bar to a party's offering evidence from which a jury might find bad faith and draw the inference that the writing or recording was destroyed to hide its contents.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to writings or recordings. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

The trial judge generally rules on the admissibility of writings and recordings under Rule 104(a), and Rule 104(a) governs when the trial judge decides whether an adequate excuse has been shown under Rule 1004 for nonproduction of the original of a writing or recording. When making a ruling under Rule 1004, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: [Name of offering party] contends that the original of the [describe writing or recording] is unavailable [explain why -- e.g., was lost or destroyed in good faith]. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the original [was or was not] lost or destroyed in good faith. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and other evidence of the contents of the original [will or will not] be admitted.

Similarly, when a public record is to be proved and an objection is raised, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: [Name of offering party] contends that the original of [describe writing or recording] is [found in an official record or a document that is recorded or filed in an official office] and that [(exhibit number) is a copy certified to be correct in accordance with Rule 902 or a witness will testify that he/she has compared the original to (exhibit number) and has found it to be correct]. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that the original of [describe writing or recording] [is or is not] [found in an official record or a document that is recorded or filed in an official office].

If the judge finds that the writing or recording is a public record, the judge will want to continue and state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: I further find by a preponderance of the evidence that [exhibit number] [is or is not] [a duly certified copy of the original under Rule 902 or demonstrated by testimony to be a correct copy of the original]. Accordingly, I will [admit or exclude] [exhibit number].

[1] Claim of Bad Faith

[Name of offering party] has introduced [describe evidence -- e.g., a copy or testimony] and claims that this evidence accurately states the contents of the original [describe writing or recording]. [Name of opposing party] contends that this evidence does not accurately state the contents of the original and that [name of offering party] deliberately destroyed the original to prevent its use as evidence. It is for you to decide whether the evidence presented by [name of offering party] accurately states the contents of the original. You may consider whether [name of offering party] deliberately destroyed the original to prevent its use in making your decision.

[2] Certified Copy -- Public Record

[Name of offering party] has presented a certified copy of a [writing or recording] that is [describe circumstances -- e.g., filed in a public office]. It is for you to decide whether you are satisfied that the copy accurately reflects the contents of the original. You make consider the nature of the certification, the appearance of the [writing or recording] and all testimony and other evidence in the case in making your decision.

[3] Testifying Witness--Public Record

[Name of offering party] has presented testimony by [name of witness] that [name of witness] compared [exhibit number] to an original document that [describe circumstances -- e.g., is filed in a public office]. It is for you to decide whether you are satisfied from the testimony that [exhibit number] accurately reflects the contents of the original. You make consider the testimony of [name of witness], the appearance of [exhibit number] and all testimony and other evidence in the case in making your decision.

CHAPTER 10 CONTENTS OF WRITINGS, RECORDINGS, AND PHOTOGRAPHS

6-10 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 10-4

10-4 Competing Originals, Duplicates, or Testimony.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 1001. Definitions

For purposes of this article the following definitions are applicable:

(1) Writings and recordings. -- "Writings" and "recordings" consist of letters, words, or numbers, or their equivalent, set down by handwriting, typewriting, printing, photostating, photographing, magnetic impulse, mechanical or electronic recording, or other form of data compilation.

(2) Photographs. -- "Photographs" include still photographs, X-ray films, video tapes, and motion pictures.

(3) Original. -- An "original" of a writing or recording is the writing or recording itself or any counterpart intended to have the same effect by a person executing or issuing it. An "original" of a photograph includes the negative or any print therefrom. If data are stored in a computer or similar device, any printout or other output readable by sight, shown to reflect the data accurately, is an "original."

(4) Duplicate. -- A "duplicate" is a counterpart produced by the same impression as the original, or from the same matrix, or by means of photography, including enlargements and miniatures, or by mechanical or electronic re-recording, or by chemical reproduction, or by other equivalent techniques which accurately reproduce the original.

Rule 1002. Requirement of Original

To prove the content of a writing, recording, or photograph, the original writing, recording, or photograph is required, except as otherwise provided in these rules or by Act of Congress.

Rule 1003. Admissibility of Duplicates

A duplicate is admissible to the same extent as an original unless (1) a genuine question is raised as to the authenticity of the original or (2) in the circumstances it would be unfair to admit the duplicate in lieu of the original.

Rule 1007. Testimony or Written Admission of Party

Contents of writings, recordings, or photographs may be proved by the testimony or deposition of the party against whom offered or by that party's written admission, without accounting for the nonproduction of the original.

Rule 1008. Functions of Court and Jury

When the admissibility of other evidence of contents of writings, recordings, or photographs under these rules depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the question whether the condition has been fulfilled is ordinarily for the court to determine in accordance with the provisions of rule 104. However, when an issue is raised (a) whether the asserted writing ever existed, or (b) whether another writing, recording, or photograph produced at the trial is the original, or (c) whether other evidence of contents correctly reflects the contents, the issue is for the trier of fact to determine as in the case of other issues of fact.

[b] Key Points.

1. Article X sets forth the Federal Rules of Evidence version of the best evidence rule. Article X greatly relaxes the common-law rule, especially with its ready acceptance of duplicates. Like the common-law rule, however, Rule 1002 imposes the best evidence requirement only when a writing, recording, or photograph is used to prove its contents rather than being used for another purpose.

2. The trial judge generally decides the legal questions that arise in connection with the best evidence rule. For example, it is the trial judge's decision under Rule 104(a) whether a writing or recording is offered to prove the contents thereof, whether a writing or recording qualifies as an original, and whether a writing or recording qualifies as a duplicate.

3. Nevertheless, Rule 1008 provides that three issues, which will usually be at the heart of a dispute, are for the jury to decide. These are (A) whether a writing ever existed (for example, where one party claims breach of contract and the other denies there was a contract), (B) which of two documents actually is the original, and (C) whether other evidence correctly reflects the contents of a document (for example, where one party claims that the other substituted a contract with forged signatures for the actual contract signed by the parties).

4. Under Rule 1008, if both parties claim to have originals, the trial judge should permit both documents to be admitted and let the jury decide which, if either, is genuine. If one party has what it claims to be an original and the other party has a duplicate of what it claims was the original, both documents should be admitted. Finally, if one party has a document and the other wants to offer testimony that the document is a fraud, the testimony should be admitted.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to writings or recordings. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Although the trial judge generally rules on the admissibility of writings and recordings under Rule 104(a), Rule 1008 provides that certain disputed issues are for the jury to decide. When Rule 1008 issues are before the court, the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: There is a dispute in this case as to [whether a writing or recording ever existed, which of two writings or recordings is the original, or which evidence is the actual evidence of the contents of the writing or recording]. Although most best evidence objections are for the court to resolve under Rule 104(a), this question is specifically reserved for the jury by Rule 1008. Accordingly, I make no finding on this issue and shall instruct the jury on its responsibilities as fact finder.

The judge will almost always want to instruct the jury as to its responsibilities on Rule 1008 matters. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction.

[1] Competing Originals

Each party has presented an exhibit that it claims is the original [describe document]. It is for you to decide whether either of these documents is the original. You make consider the appearance of the documents as well as testimony and other evidence regarding them in making your decision.

[2] Competing Documents -- Original and Duplicate

[Name of party] has presented [cite exhibit number] and contends that it is the original [describe document]. [Name of opposing party] has presented [cite exhibit number] and contends that it is a copy of the actual original. It is for you to decide whether either document is authentic. You may consider the appearance of the documents as well as testimony and other evidence regarding them in making your decision.

[3] Oral Testimony -- Existence of Contract

[Name of party] has presented testimony by [name of witness] that there was a [describe writing or recording -- e.g., written contract between the plaintiff and the defendant]. [Name of opposing party] has offered contrary testimony and has denied the existence of such a [describe writing or recording]. It is for you to decide whether such a [describe document] existed and if so what it provided.

[4] Oral Testimony -- Disputing Existence of Document

[Name of party] has presented [cite exhibit number] and contends that it is [the original or a copy of] [describe document]. [Name of opposing party] has presented testimony of [name of witness] and contends that [cite exhibit number] is not genuine and that no such document ever existed. It is for you to decide whether [cite exhibit number] is genuine.

[5] Oral Testimony -- Disputing Contents of Document

Both parties agree that there was a [describe writing or recording] and that neither party can produce it at this time. Each party has offered testimony as to the contents of the [describe writing or recording]. It is for you to decide, based on all the evidence that is before you, what the contents of the [describe writing or recording] actually were.

CHAPTER 10 CONTENTS OF WRITINGS, RECORDINGS, AND PHOTOGRAPHS

6-10 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 10-5

10-5 Summaries.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

(b) Relevancy conditioned on fact. -- When the relevancy of evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court shall admit it upon, or subject to, the introduction of evidence sufficient to support a finding of the fulfillment of the condition.

* * *

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

Rule 403. Exclusion of Relevant Evidence on Grounds of Prejudice, Confusion, or Waste of Time

Although relevant, evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence.

Rule 611. Mode and Order of Interrogation and Presentation

(a) Control by court. -- The court shall exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of interrogating witnesses and presenting evidence so as to (1) make the interrogation and presentation effective for the ascertainment of the truth, (2) avoid needless consumption of time, and (3) protect witnesses from harassment or undue embarrassment.

* * *

Rule 1001. Definitions

For purposes of this article the following definitions are applicable:

(1) Writings and recordings. -- "Writings" and "recordings" consist of letters, words, or numbers, or their equivalent, set down by handwriting, typewriting, printing, photostating, photographing, magnetic impulse, mechanical or electronic recording, or other form of data compilation.

(2) Photographs. -- "Photographs" include still photographs, X-ray films, video tapes, and motion pictures.

(3) Original. -- An "original" of a writing or recording is the writing or recording itself or any counterpart intended to have the same effect by a person executing or issuing it. An "original" of a photograph includes the negative or any print therefrom. If data are stored in a computer or similar device, any printout or other output readable by sight, shown to reflect the data accurately, is an "original."

(4) Duplicate. -- A "duplicate" is a counterpart produced by the same impression as the original, or from the same matrix, or by means of photography, including enlargements and miniatures, or by mechanical or electronic re-recording, or by chemical reproduction, or by other equivalent techniques which accurately reproduce the original.

Rule 1002. Requirement of Original

To prove the content of a writing, recording, or photograph, the original writing, recording, or photograph is required, except as otherwise provided in these rules or by Act of Congress.

Rule 1006. Summaries

The contents of voluminous writings, recordings, or photographs which cannot conveniently be examined in court may be presented in the form of a chart, summary, or calculation. The originals, or duplicates, shall be made available for examination or copying, or both, by other parties at reasonable time and place. The court may order that they be produced in court.

[b] Key Points.

1. Article X sets forth the Federal Rules of Evidence version of the best evidence rule. Article X greatly relaxes the common-law rule, especially with its ready acceptance of duplicates. Like the common-law rule, however, Rule 1002 imposes the best evidence requirement only when a writing, recording, or photograph is used to prove its contents rather than being used for another purpose.

2. It is the trial judge's decision whether a chart, summary, or calculation should be admitted. The purpose of Rule 1006 is to avoid burdening the court with voluminous documents that are more helpful when presented in summary form. Presumably, the trial judge's control over the mode of proof under Rule 611(a) applies to summaries as well as to other exhibits.

3. The single most important prerequisite to admissibility of a summary exhibit is that the proponent must show that the underlying documents are themselves admissible. A party cannot take voluminous inadmissible documents and generate from them an admissible summary.

4. The procedural requirements of the rule are intended to assure that the party against whom a summary is offered has an opportunity to check the summary for accuracy and to raise any objections before the summary is admitted. The trial judge has authority to reject any misleading or inaccurate summary under Rule 403, since it is likely to be more prejudicial than helpful. The fact, however, that a summary may not be 100% perfect does not mean that it cannot be admitted. A summary that contains small mistakes might still be probative and might not raise much of a concern about prejudice.

5. The trial judge's decision to admit a summary does not preclude an opposing party from presenting some of the underlying documents to challenge the summary.

6. Rule 1006 addresses only summaries of evidence too voluminous to be readily produced at trial. It does not address summaries of evidence that has been admitted. Many judges permit these summaries to be used as illustrative evidence. Some judges admit summaries of trial evidence as exhibits.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The rules set forth are triggered when a timely objection is made to a summary exhibit. Unless a timely objection is made, the evidence will be admitted. A timely objection requires the trial judge to make a ruling.

Since the trial judge rules on the admissibility of a summary under Rule 104(a), generally the judge will want to state for the record outside the hearing of the jury the following: I have considered all the evidence presented to me with regard to the objection made to the summary exhibit. A summary may be offered when it is not practicable to introduce the original documents. The opposing party is guaranteed an opportunity to examine and copy the underlying documents in order to assure that it may object to inaccuracies or irregularities in the summary. I find by a preponderance of the evidence that this summary [is or is not] a compilation of documents or records that are too voluminous to be produced, that this summary [is or is not] a summary of documents or records that would themselves be admissible, and that the objecting party [has or has not] had a full and fair opportunity to examine the underlying documents or records. Therefore, the objection is [overruled or sustained], and the evidence [is or is not] admissible.

A judge who rules on a summary of trial testimony may want to make the following statement for the record outside the hearing of the jury: I have considered all evidence and argument presented to me concerning the use of this summary of trial testimony. Using the authority vested in me by Rule 611(a) with respect to the mode and order of proof, and considering the probative value and possible prejudicial effect of this summary under Rule 403, I find that it is more likely than not that this summary [will or will not] assist the jury in resolving the disputed issues in this case and in understanding the evidence, and that the possible prejudicial effect of this evidence [does or does not] substantially outweigh its probative value. I have also considered whether the exhibit should be admitted into evidence or simply used for illustrative purposes, and I have decided [to admit it or to rule that it shall not be admitted but shall be used only for illustrative purposes].

The party who prevails on the evidence issue may find it useful to request such a statement on the record to protect the record on appeal.

Should the judge exclude a summary, the party wishing to offer such evidence should be certain to make an offer of proof. The party should request an opportunity to make the offer. The judge may prescribe the form in which the offer must be made, but if the judge permits the party some freedom to choose how to make the offer, the party may choose among the following alternatives: (a) a proffer by counsel as to the substance of the excluded evidence; (b) putting a witness on the stand to testify in question and answer form; (c) a written summary of the excluded evidence; and (d) a deposition or other document setting forth the substance of the excluded testimony. The party making the offer will certainly want to make the excluded summary part of the record, but may also find it useful to make an additional proffer in view of the fact that the underlying records are probably not before the court.

Once the judge has ruled on the objection to the summary, the judge may find it useful in some circumstances to give a limiting instruction to the jury. Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence -- e.g., where evidence is admitted by stipulation -- that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence. For example, a party may not object to a summary, but may want the judge to explain to the jury something about a summary exhibit.

The following instructions can easily be requested and readily be adopted by trial judges to explain trial developments to the jury.

[1] Summaries of Voluminous Material -- Stipulation

[Name of party] has presented [cite exhibit number] which is [describe exhibit]. A party may use a summary exhibit to present voluminous information that could not easily be produced in court. The parties have agreed that this exhibit is an accurate summary.

[2] Summaries of Voluminous Material -- Accuracy Disputed

[Name of party] has presented [cite exhibit number] and contends that it is [describe summary -- e.g., an accurate summary of the company's sales for a three-year period]. A party may use a summary exhibit to present voluminous information that could not easily be produced in court. [Name of opposing party] has challenged the accuracy of the summary. It is for you to decide the weight to give this summary. You may consider the testimony about how the summary was prepared, the appearance of the summary, whether [name of opposing party] had an opportunity to examine both the summary and underlying information, and other testimony and exhibits that relate to the summarized information in making your decision.

[3] Competing Summaries of Voluminous Material

[Name of party] has presented [cite exhibit number] and contends that it is [describe summary -- e.g., an accurate summary of the company's sales for a three-year period]. [Name of opposing party] has presented [cite exhibit number] and contends that it is [describe summary -- e.g., an accurate summary of the company's sales for a three-year period]. Both parties may use summary exhibits to present voluminous information that could not easily be produced in court. Each side challenges the accuracy of the other's summary. It is for you to decide the weight to give each summary. You may consider the testimony about how each summary was prepared, the appearance of each summary, whether the party against whom a summary is offered had an opportunity to examine both the summary and underlying information, and other testimony and exhibits that relate to the summarized information in making your decision as to the weight to give to either or both summaries.

[4] Summaries of Trial Testimony -- Exhibit Shown but Not Admitted

[Name of party] has used [cite exhibit number or describe exhibit] to illustrate or summarize evidence presented to you. This exhibit is not evidence. It is put before you to assist you in recalling or understanding the evidence that was presented to you. You must disregard all or part of this exhibit if you find that it inaccurately describes the evidence, and you must be aware that no summary is likely to include all of the evidence that has been presented and that the party who prepared it may have emphasized evidence favorable to it.

[5] Summaries of Trial Testimony -- Exhibit Admitted

[Name of party] has used [cite exhibit number] to illustrate or summarize evidence presented to you. I admitted this exhibit solely to assist you to recall or understand the evidence that was presented to you. You must disregard all or part of this exhibit if you find that it inaccurately describes the evidence, and you must be aware that no summary is likely to include all of the evidence that has been presented and that the party who prepared it may have emphasized evidence favorable to it.

CHAPTER 11 MISCELLANEOUS RULES

6-11 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 11-1

11-1 Miscellaneous Rules.

[a] Governing Rules.

Rule 1101. Applicability of Rules

(a) Courts and judges. -- These rules apply to the United States district courts, the District Court of Guam, the District Court of the Virgin Islands, the District Court for the Northern Mariana Islands, the United States courts of appeals, the United States Claims Court, and to United States bankruptcy judges and United States magistrate judges, in the actions, cases, and proceedings and to the extent hereinafter set forth. The terms "judge" and "court" in these rules include United States bankruptcy judges and United States magistrate judges.

(b) Proceedings generally. -- These rules apply generally to civil actions and proceedings, including admiralty and maritime cases, to criminal cases and proceedings, to contempt proceedings except those in which the court may act summarily, and to proceedings and cases under title 11, United States Code.

(c) Rule of privilege. -- The rule with respect to privileges applies at all stages of all actions, cases, and proceedings.

(d) Rules inapplicable. -- The rules (other than with respect to privileges) do not apply in the following situations:

(1) Preliminary questions of fact. -- The determination of questions of fact preliminary to admissibility of evidence when the issue is to be determined by the court under rule 104.

(2) Grand jury. -- Proceedings before grand juries.

(3) Miscellaneous proceedings. -- Proceedings for extradition or rendition; preliminary examinations in criminal cases; sentencing, or granting or revoking probation; issuance of warrants for arrest, criminal summonses, and search warrants; and proceedings with respect to release on bail or otherwise.

(e) Rules applicable in part. -- In the following proceedings these rules apply to the extent that matters of evidence are not provided for in the statutes which govern procedure therein or in other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority: the trial of misdemeanors and other petty offenses before United States magistrate judges; review of agency actions when the facts are subject to trial de novo under section 706(2)(F) of title 5, United States Code; review of orders of the Secretary of Agriculture under section 2 of the Act entitled "An Act to authorize association of producers of agricultural products" approved February 18, 1922 (7 U.S.C. 292), and under sections 6 and 7(c) of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930 (7 U.S.C. 499f, 499g(c)); naturalization and revocation of naturalization under sections 310-318 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1421-1429); prize proceedings in admiralty under sections 7651-7681 of title 10, United States Code; review of orders of the Secretary of the Interior under section 2 of the Act entitled "An Act authorizing associations of producers of aquatic products" approved June 25, 1934 (15 U.S.C. 522); review of orders of petroleum control boards under section 5 of the Act entitled "An Act to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in petroleum and its products by prohibiting the shipment in such commerce of petroleum and its products produced in violation of State law, and for other purposes," approved February 22, 1935 (15 U.S.C. 715d); actions for fines, penalties, or forfeitures under part V of title IV of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1581-1624), or under the Anti-Smuggling Act (19 U.S.C. 1701-1711); criminal libel for condemnation, exclusion of imports, or other proceedings under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (21 U.S.C. 301-392); disputes between seamen under sections 4079, 4080, and 4081 of the Revised Statutes (22 U.S.C. 256-258); habeas corpus under sections 2241-2254 of title 28, United States Code; motions to vacate, set aside or correct sentence under section 2255 of title 28, United States Code; actions for penalties for refusal to transport destitute seamen under section 4578 of the Revised Statutes (46 U.S.C. 679); actions against the United States under the Act entitled "An Act authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty for damage caused by and salvage service rendered to public vessels belonging to the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1925 (46 U.S.C. 781-790), as implemented by section 7730 of title 10, United States Code.

Rule 1102. Amendments

Amendments to the Federal Rules of Evidence may be made as provided in section 2076 of title 28 of the United States Code.

Rule 1103. Title

These rules may be known and cited as the Federal Rules of Evidence.

[b] Key Points.

1. Rule 1101 clearly establishes that Rule 501 and privileges apply at all stages of all proceedings. The rule also provides that the trial judge is not bound by rules of evidence in making determinations of fact regarding preliminary questions of admissibility. See Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) .

2. Rule 1101 also indicates the proceedings in which the rules of evidence do not apply.

[c] Rulings on the Record, Proffers, and Limiting Instructions.

The trial judge is unlikely to have to make rulings under Rule 1101 in most circumstances, since the rule provides good guidance as to when the Federal Rules of Evidence apply and when they do not. It might be wise in some cases in which grand jury or other testimony is admitted from proceedings that do not follow the Federal Rules for the trial judge to instruct the jury to that effect.

Parties generally must request limiting instructions under Rule 105, and should consider the advisability of requesting a specific instruction. The trial judge has an interest in considering sua sponte whether to give one or more instructions, but often will find it helpful to inquire whether one or both parties wants a limiting instruction before making a final decision on whether to give a particular limiting instruction.

Even if a party has not objected to evidence, that party may nonetheless request a limiting instruction from the judge to the jury to explain to the jury or caution it about certain evidence. For example, a party may not object to evidence from other proceedings, but may want the judge to tell the jury that the evidence rules did not apply in those proceedings.

[1] Evidence from Other Proceedings -- Rules Inapplicable -- Party Was Participant

[Name of party] has presented evidence that was developed in [describe proceeding]. The same rules of evidence that we use in jury trials do not apply in these proceedings. Thus, the questions and answers may be less formal than many you have heard in this trial. It is for you to decide whether the nature of the questions and answers affects the weight you give this evidence. You may consider in deciding the weight to give this evidence that [name of party against whom evidence is offered] was a participant in the [describe proceeding] when the evidence you have heard was presented.

[2] Evidence from Other Proceedings -- Rules Inapplicable -- Party Was Not Participant

[Name of party] has presented evidence that was developed in [describe proceeding]. The same rules of evidence that we use in jury trials do not apply in these proceedings. Thus, the questions and answers may be less formal than many you have heard in this trial. It is for you to decide whether the nature of the questions and answers affects the weight you give this evidence. You may consider in deciding the weight to give this evidence that [name of party against whom evidence is offered] was not a participant in the [describe proceeding] when the evidence you have heard was presented.

APPENDIX B: THE FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE

6-B Federal Rules of Evidence Manual ARTICLE I

ARTICLE I GENERAL PROVISIONS

Rule 101. Scope.

These rules govern proceedings in the courts of the United States and before the United States bankruptcy judges and United States magistrate judges, to the extent and with the exceptions stated in rule 1101. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987; Apr. 25, 1988, effective Nov. 1, 1988; Apr. 22, 1993, effective Dec. 1, 1993.]

Rule 102. Purpose and Construction.

These rules shall be construed to secure fairness in administration, elimination of unjustifiable expense and delay, and promotion of growth and development of the law of evidence to the end that the truth may be ascertained and proceedings justly determined. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 103. Rulings on Evidence.

(a) Effect of erroneous ruling.--Error may not be predicated upon a ruling which admits or excludes evidence unless a substantial right of the party is affected, and

(1) Objection.--In case the ruling is one admitting evidence, a timely objection or motion to strike appears of record, stating the specific ground of objection, if the specific ground was not apparent from the context; or

(2) Offer of proof.--In case the ruling is one excluding evidence, the substance of the evidence was made known to the court by offer or was apparent from the context within which questions were asked.

Once the court makes a definitive ruling on the record admitting or excluding evidence, either at or before trial, a party need not renew an objection or offer of proof to preserve a claim of error for appeal.

(b) Record of offer and ruling.--The court may add any other or further statement which shows the character of the evidence, the form in which it was offered, the objection made, and the ruling thereon. It may direct the making of an offer in question and answer form.

(c) Hearing of jury.--In jury cases, proceedings shall be conducted, to the extent practicable, so as to prevent inadmissible evidence from being suggested to the jury by any means, such as making statements or offers of proof or asking questions in the hearing of the jury.

(d) Plain error.--Nothing in this rule precludes taking notice of plain errors affecting substantial rights although they were not brought to the attention of the court. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Apr. 17, 2000, effective Dec. 1, 2000.]

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions.

(a) Questions of admissibility generally.--Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

(b) Relevancy conditioned on fact.--When the relevancy of evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court shall admit it upon, or subject to, the introduction of evidence sufficient to support a finding of the fulfillment of the condition.

(c) Hearing of jury.--Hearings on the admissibility of confessions shall in all cases be conducted out of the hearing of the jury. Hearings on other preliminary matters shall be so conducted when the interests of justice require, or when an accused is a witness and so requests.

(d) Testimony by accused.--The accused does not, by testifying upon a preliminary matter, become subject to cross-examination as to other issues in the case.

(e) Weight and credibility.--This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987.]

Rule 105. Limited Admissibility.

When evidence which is admissible as to one party or for one purpose but not admissible as to another party or for another purpose is admitted, the court, upon request, shall restrict the evidence to its proper scope and instruct the jury accordingly. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 106. Remainder of or Related Writings or Recorded Statements.

When a writing or recorded statement or part thereof is introduced by a party, an adverse party may require the introduction at that time of any other part or any other writing or recorded statement which ought in fairness to be considered contemporaneously with it. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987.]

ARTICLE II JUDICIAL NOTICE

Rule 201. Judicial Notice of Adjudicative Facts.

(a) Scope of rule.--This rule governs only judicial notice of adjudicative facts.

(b) Kinds of facts.--A judicially noticed fact must be one not subject to reasonable dispute in that it is either (1) generally known within the territorial jurisdiction of the trial court or (2) capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned.

(c) When discretionary.--A court may take judicial notice, whether requested or not.

(d) When mandatory.--A court shall take judicial notice if requested by a party and supplied with the necessary information.

(e) Opportunity to be heard.--A party is entitled upon timely request to an opportunity to be heard as to the propriety of taking judicial notice and the tenor of the matter noticed. In the absence of prior notification, the request may be made after judicial notice has been taken.

(f) Time of taking notice.--Judicial notice may be taken at any stage of the proceeding.

(g) Instructing jury.--In a civil action or proceeding, the court shall instruct the jury to accept as conclusive any fact judicially noticed. In a criminal case, the court shall instruct the jury that it may, but is not required to, accept as conclusive any fact judicially noticed. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
APPENDIX B: THE FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE

6-B Federal Rules of Evidence Manual ARTICLE III

ARTICLE III PRESUMPTIONS IN CIVIL ACTIONS AND PROCEEDINGS

Rule 301. Presumptions in General in Civil Actions and Proceedings.

In all civil actions and proceedings not otherwise provided for by Act of Congress or by these rules, a presumption imposes on the party against whom it is directed the burden of going forward with evidence to rebut or meet the presumption, but does not shift to such party the burden of proof in the sense of the risk of nonpersuasion, which remains throughout the trial upon the party on whom it was originally cast. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 302. Applicability of State Law in Civil Actions and Proceedings.

In civil actions and proceedings, the effect of a presumption respecting a fact which is an element of a claim or defense as to which State law supplies the rule of decision is determined in accordance with State law. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
APPENDIX B: THE FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE

6-B Federal Rules of Evidence Manual ARTICLE IV

ARTICLE IV RELEVANCY AND ITS LIMITS

Rule 401. Definition of "Relevant Evidence."

"Relevant evidence" means evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 402. Relevant Evidence Generally Admissible; Irrelevant Evidence Inadmissible.

All relevant evidence is admissible, except as otherwise provided by the Constitution of the United States, by Act of Congress, by these rules, or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority. Evidence which is not relevant is not admissible. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 403. Exclusion of Relevant Evidence on Grounds of Prejudice, Confusion, or Waste of Time.

Although relevant, evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 404. Character Evidence Not Admissible To Prove Conduct; Exceptions; Other Crimes.

(a) Character evidence generally.--Evidence of a person's character or a trait of character is not admissible for the purpose of proving action in conformity therewith on a particular occasion, except:

(1) Character of accused.--Evidence of a pertinent trait of character offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or if evidence of a trait of character of the alleged victim of the crime is offered by an accused and admitted under Rule 404(a)(2), evidence of the same trait of character of the accused offered by the prosecution;

(2) Character of alleged victim.--Evidence of a pertinent trait of character of the alleged victim of the crime offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or evidence of a character trait of peacefulness of the alleged victim offered by the prosecution in a homicide case to rebut evidence that the alleged victim was the first aggressor;

(3) Character of witness.--Evidence of the character of a witness, as provided in rules 607, 608, and 609.

(b) Other crimes, wrongs, or acts.--Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, provided that upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987; Apr. 30, 1991, effective Dec. 1, 1991; Apr. 17, 2000, effective Dec. 1, 2000.]

Rule 405. Methods of Proving Character.

(a) Reputation or opinion.--In all cases in which evidence of character or a trait of character of a person is admissible, proof may be made by testimony as to reputation or by testimony in the form of an opinion. On cross-examination, inquiry is allowable into relevant specific instances of conduct.

(b) Specific instances of conduct.--In cases in which character or a trait of character of a person is an essential element of a charge, claim, or defense, proof may also be made of specific instances of that person's conduct. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987.]

Rule 406. Habit; Routine Practice.

Evidence of the habit of a person or of the routine practice of an organization, whether corroborated or not and regardless of the presence of eyewitnesses, is relevant to prove that the conduct of the person or organization on a particular occasion was in conformity with the habit or routine practice. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 407. Subsequent Remedial Measures.

When, after an injury or harm allegedly caused by an event, measures are taken that, if taken previously, would have made the injury or harm less likely to occur, evidence of the subsequent measures is not admissible to prove negligence, culpable conduct, a defect in a product, a defect in a product's design, or a need for a warning or instruction. This rule does not require the exclusion of evidence of subsequent measures when offered for another purpose, such as proving ownership, control, or feasibility of precautionary measures, if controverted, or impeachment. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Apr. 11, 1997, effective Dec. 1, 1997.]

Rule 408. Compromise and Offers To Compromise.

Evidence of (1) furnishing or offering or promising to furnish, or (2) accepting or offering or promising to accept, a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise a claim which was disputed as to either validity or amount, is not admissible to prove liability for or invalidity of the claim or its amount. Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible. This rule does not require the exclusion of any evidence otherwise discoverable merely because it is presented in the course of compromise negotiations. This rule also does not require exclusion when the evidence is offered for another purpose, such as proving bias or prejudice of a witness, negativing a contention of undue delay, or proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 409. Payment of Medical and Similar Expenses.

Evidence of furnishing or offering or promising to pay medical, hospital, or similar expenses occasioned by an injury is not admissible to prove liability for the injury. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 410. Inadmissibility of Pleas, Plea Discussions, and Related Statements.

Except as otherwise provided in this rule, evidence of the following is not, in any civil or criminal proceeding, admissible against the defendant who made the plea or was a participant in the plea discussions:

(1) a plea of guilty which was later withdrawn;

(2) a plea of nolo contendere;

(3) any statement made in the course of any proceedings under Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure or comparable state procedure regarding either of the foregoing pleas; or

(4) any statement made in the course of plea discussions with an attorney for the prosecuting authority which do not result in a plea of guilty or which result in a plea of guilty later withdrawn.

However, such a statement is admissible (i) in any proceeding wherein another statement made in the course of the same plea or plea discussions has been introduced and the statement ought in fairness be considered contemporaneously with it, or (ii) in a criminal proceeding for perjury or false statement if the statement was made by the defendant under oath, on the record and in the presence of counsel. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Dec. 12, 1975; Apr. 30, 1979, effective Dec. 1, 1980.]

Rule 411. Liability Insurance.

Evidence that a person was or was not insured against liability is not admissible upon the issue whether the person acted negligently or otherwise wrongfully. This rule does not require the exclusion of evidence of insurance against liability when offered for another purpose, such as proof of agency, ownership, or control, or bias or prejudice of a witness. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987.]

Rule 412. Sex Offense Cases; Relevance of Alleged Victim's Past Sexual Behavior or Alleged Sexual Predisposition.

(a) Evidence Generally Inadmissible.--The following evidence is not admissible in any civil or criminal proceeding involving alleged sexual misconduct except as provided in subdivisions (b) and (c):

(1) Evidence offered to prove that any alleged victim engaged in other sexual behavior.

(2) Evidence offered to prove any alleged victim's sexual predisposition.

(b) Exceptions.

(1) In a criminal case, the following evidence is admissible, if otherwise admissible under these rules:

(A) evidence of specific instances of sexual behavior by the alleged victim offered to prove that a person other than the accused was the source of semen, injury or other physical evidence;

(B) evidence of specific instances of sexual behavior by the alleged victim with respect to the person accused of the sexual misconduct offered by the accused to prove consent or by the prosecution; and

(C) evidence the exclusion of which would violate the constitutional rights of the defendant.

(2) In a civil case, evidence offered to prove the sexual behavior or sexual predisposition of any alleged victim is admissible if it is otherwise admissible under these rules and its probative value substantially outweighs the danger of harm to any victim and of unfair prejudice to any party. Evidence of an alleged victim's reputation is admissible only if it has been placed in controversy by the alleged victim.

(c) Procedure to Determine Admissibility.

(1) A party intending to offer evidence under subdivision (b) must--

(A) file a written motion at least 14 days before trial specifically describing the evidence and stating the purpose for which it is offered unless the court, for good cause requires a different time for filing or permits filing during trial; and

(B) serve the motion on all parties and notify the alleged victim or, when appropriate, the alleged victim's guardian or representative.

(2) Before admitting evidence under this rule the court must conduct a hearing in camera and afford the victim and parties a right to attend and be heard. The motion, related papers, and the record of the hearing must be sealed and remain under seal unless the court orders otherwise. [Adopted Oct. 28, 1978, effective Nov. 28, 1978; amended Nov. 18, 1988; Apr. 29, 1994, effective Dec. 1, 1994; Sept. 13, 1994, effective Dec. 1, 1994.]

Rule 413. Evidence of Similar Crimes in Sexual Assault Cases.

(a) In a criminal case in which the defendant is accused of an offense of sexual assault, evidence of the defendant's commission of another offense or offenses of sexual assault is admissible, and may be considered for its bearing on any matter to which it is relevant.

(b) In a case in which the Government intends to offer evidence under this rule, the attorney for the Government shall disclose the evidence to the defendant, including statements of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony that is expected to be offered, at least fifteen days before the scheduled date of trial or at such later time as the court may allow for good cause.

(c) This rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.

(d) For purposes of this rule and Rule 415, "offense of sexual assault" means a crime under Federal law or the law of a State (as defined in section 513 of title 18, United States Code) that involved--

(1) any conduct proscribed by chapter 109A of title 18, United States Code;

(2) contact, without consent, between any part of the defendant's body or an object and the genitals or anus of another person;

(3) contact, without consent, between the genitals or anus of the defendant and any part of another person's body;

(4) deriving sexual pleasure or gratification from the infliction of death, bodily injury, or physical pain on another person; or

(5) an attempt or conspiracy to engage in conduct described in paragraphs (1)-(4). [Adopted Sept. 13, 1994, effective July 9, 1995.]

Rule 414. Evidence of Similar Crimes in Child Molestation Cases.

(a) In a criminal case in which the defendant is accused of an offense of child molestation, evidence of the defendant's commission of another offense or offenses of child molestation is admissible, and may be considered for its bearing on any matter to which it is relevant.

(b) In a case in which the Government intends to offer evidence under this rule, the attorney for the Government shall disclose the evidence to the defendant, including statements of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony that is expected to be offered, at least fifteen days before the scheduled date of trial or at such later time as the court may allow for good cause.

(c) This rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.

(d) For purposes of this rule and Rule 415, "child" means a person below the age of fourteen, and "offense of child molestation" means a crime under Federal law or the law of a State (as defined in section 513 of title 18, United States Code) that involved--

(1) any conduct proscribed by chapter 109A of title 18, United States Code, that was committed in relation to a child;

(2) any conduct proscribed by chapter 110 of title 18, United States Code:

(3) contact between any part of the defendant's body or an object and the genitals of the body of a child;

(4) contact between the genitals or anus of the defendant and any part of the body of a child;

(5) deriving sexual pleasure or gratification from the infliction of death, bodily injury, or physical pain on a child; or

(6) an attempt or conspiracy to engage in conduct described in paragraphs (1)-(5). [Adopted Sept. 13, 1994, effective July 9, 1995.]

Rule 415. Evidence of Similar Acts in Civil Cases Concerning Sexual Assault or Child Molestation.

(a) In a civil case in which a claim for damages or other relief is predicated on a party's alleged commission of conduct constituting an offense of sexual assault or child molestation, evidence of that party's commission of another offense or offenses of sexual assault or child molestation is admissible and may be considered as provided in Rule 413 and Rule 414 of these rules.

(b) A party who intends to offer evidence under this Rule shall disclose the evidence to the party against whom it will be offered, including statements of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony that is expected to be offered, at least fifteen days before the scheduled date of trial or at such later time as the court may allow for good cause.

(c) This rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule. [Adopted Sept. 13, 1994, effective July 9, 1995.]

ARTICLE V PRIVILEGES

Rule 501. General Rule.

Except as otherwise required by the Constitution of the United States or provided by Act of Congress or in rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority, the privilege of a witness, person, government, State, or political subdivision thereof shall be governed by the principles of the common law as they may be interpreted by the courts of the United States in the light of reason and experience. However, in civil actions and proceedings, with respect to an element of a claim or defense as to which State law supplies the rule of decision, the privilege of a witness, person, government, State, or political subdivision thereof shall be determined in accordance with State law. PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
APPENDIX B: THE FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE

6-B Federal Rules of Evidence Manual ARTICLE VI

ARTICLE VI WITNESSES

Rule 601. General Rule of Competency.

Every person is competent to be a witness except as otherwise provided in these rules. However, in civil actions and proceedings, with respect to an element of a claim or defense as to which State law supplies the rule of decision, the competency of a witness shall be determined in accordance with State law. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 602. Lack of Personal Knowledge.

A witness may not testify to a matter unless evidence is introduced sufficient to support a finding that the witness has personal knowledge of the matter. Evidence to prove personal knowledge may, but need not, consist of the witness' own testimony. This rule is subject to the provisions of rule 703, relating to opinion testimony by expert witnesses. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987; Apr. 25, 1988, effective Nov. 1, 1988.]

Rule 603. Oath or Affirmation.

Before testifying, every witness shall be required to declare that the witness will testify truthfully, by oath or affirmation administered in a form calculated to awaken the witness' conscience and impress the witness' mind with the duty to do so. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987.]

Rule 604. Interpreters.

An interpreter is subject to the provisions of these rules relating to qualification as an expert and the administration of an oath or affirmation to make a true translation. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1. 1987.]

Rule 605. Competency of Judge as Witness.

The judge presiding at the trial may not testify in that trial as a witness. No objection need be made in order to preserve the point. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 606. Competency of Juror as Witness.

(a) At the trial.--A member of the jury may not testify as a witness before that jury in the trial of the case in which the juror is sitting. If the juror is called so to testify, the opposing party shall be afforded an opportunity to object out of the presence of the jury.

(b) Inquiry into validity of verdict or indictment.--Upon an inquiry into the validity of a verdict or indictment, a juror may not testify as to any matter or statement occurring during the course of the jury's deliberations or to the effect of anything upon that or any other juror's mind or emotions as influencing the juror to assent to or dissent from the verdict or indictment or concerning the juror's mental processes in connection therewith, except that a juror may testify on the question whether extraneous prejudicial information was improperly brought to the jury's attention or whether any outside influence was improperly brought to bear upon any juror. Nor may a juror's affidavit or evidence of any statement by the juror concerning a matter about which the juror would be precluded from testifying be received for these purposes. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Dec. 12, 1975; Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987.]

Rule 607. Who May Impeach.

The credibility of a witness may be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987.]

Rule 608. Evidence of Character and Conduct of Witness.

(a) Opinion and reputation evidence of character.--The credibility of a witness may be attacked or supported by evidence in the form of opinion or reputation, but subject to these limitations: (1) the evidence may refer only to character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, and (2) evidence of truthful character is admissible only after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise.

(b) Specific instances of conduct.--Specific instances of the conduct of a witness, for the purpose of attacking or supporting the witness' credibility, other than conviction of crime as provided in rule 609, may not be proved by extrinsic evidence. They may, however, in the discretion of the court, if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness, be inquired into on cross- examination of the witness (1) concerning the witness' character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, or (2) concerning the character for truthfulness or untruthfulness of another witness as to which character the witness being cross-examined has testified.

The giving of testimony, whether by an accused or by any other witness, does not operate as a waiver of the accused's or the witness' privilege against self-incrimination when examined with respect to matters which relate only to credibility. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987; Apr. 25, 1988, effective Nov. 1, 1988.]

Rule 609. Impeachment by Evidence of Conviction of Crime.

(a) General rule.--For the purpose of attacking the credibility of a witness,

(1) evidence that a witness other than an accused has been convicted of a crime shall be admitted, subject to Rule 403, if the crime was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year under the law under which the witness was convicted, and evidence that an accused has been convicted of such a crime shall be admitted if the court determines that the probative value of admitting this evidence outweighs its prejudicial effect to the accused; and

(2) evidence that any witness has been convicted of a crime shall be admitted if it involved dishonesty or false statement, regardless of the punishment.

(b) Time limit.--Evidence of a conviction under this rule is not admissible if a period of more than ten years has elapsed since the date of the conviction or of the release of the witness from the confinement imposed for that conviction, whichever is the later date, unless the court determines, in the interests of justice, that the probative value of the conviction supported by specific facts and circumstances substantially outweighs its prejudicial effect. However, evidence of a conviction more than ten years old as calculated herein, is not admissible unless the proponent gives to the adverse party sufficient advance written notice of intent to use such evidence to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to contest the use of such evidence.

(c) Effect of pardon, annulment, or certificate of rehabilitation.--Evidence of a conviction is not admissible under this rule if (1) the conviction has been the subject of a pardon, annulment, certificate of rehabilitation, or other equivalent procedure based on a finding of the rehabilitation of the person convicted, and that person has not been convicted of a subsequent crime which was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year, or (2) the conviction has been the subject of a pardon, annulment, or other equivalent procedure based on a finding of innocence.

(d) Juvenile adjudications.--Evidence of juvenile adjudications is generally not admissible under this rule. The court may, however, in a criminal case allow evidence of a juvenile adjudication of a witness other than the accused if conviction of the offense would be admissible to attack the credibility of an adult and the court is satisfied that admission in evidence is necessary for a fair determination of the issue of guilt or innocence.

(e) Pendency of appeal.--The pendency of an appeal therefrom does not render evidence of a conviction inadmissible. Evidence of the pendency of an appeal is admissible. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987; Jan. 26, 1990, effective Dec. 1, 1990.]

Rule 610. Religious Beliefs or Opinions.

Evidence of the beliefs or opinions of a witness on matters of religion is not admissible for the purpose of showing that by reason of their nature the witness' credibility is impaired or enhanced. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987.]

Rule 611. Mode and Order of Interrogation and Presentation.

(a) Control by court.--The court shall exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of interrogating witnesses and presenting evidence so as to (1) make the interrogation and presentation effective for the ascertainment of the truth, (2) avoid needless consumption of time, and (3) protect witnesses from harassment or undue embarrassment.

(b) Scope of cross-examination.--Cross-examination should be limited to the subject matter of the direct examination and matters affecting the credibility of the witness. The court may, in the exercise of discretion, permit inquiry into additional matters as if on direct examination.

(c) Leading questions.--Leading questions should not be used on the direct examination of a witness except as may be necessary to develop the witness' testimony. Ordinarily leading questions should be permitted on cross-examination. When a party calls a hostile witness, an adverse party, or a witness identified with an adverse party, interrogation may be by leading questions. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987.]

Rule 612. Writing Used To Refresh Memory.

Except as otherwise provided in criminal proceedings by section 3500 of title 18, United States Code, if a witness uses a writing to refresh memory for the purpose of testifying, either--

(1) while testifying, or

(2) before testifying, if the court in its discretion determines it is necessary in the interests of justice,

an adverse party is entitled to have the writing produced at the hearing, to inspect it, to cross-examine the witness thereon, and to introduce in evidence those portions which relate to the testimony of the witness. If it is claimed that the writing contains matters not related to the subject matter of the testimony the court shall examine the writing in camera, excise any portions not so related, and order delivery of the remainder to the party entitled thereto. Any portion withheld over objections shall be preserved and made available to the appellate court in the event of an appeal. If a writing is not produced or delivered pursuant to order under this rule, the court shall make any order justice requires, except that in criminal cases when the prosecution elects not to comply, the order shall be one striking the testimony or, if the court in its discretion determines that the interests of justice so require, declaring a mistrial. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987.]

Rule 613. Prior Statements of Witnesses.

(a) Examining witness concerning prior statement.--In examining a witness concerning a prior statement made by the witness, whether written or not, the statement need not be shown nor its contents disclosed to the witness at that time, but on request the same shall be shown or disclosed to opposing counsel.

(b) Extrinsic evidence of prior inconsistent statement of witness.--Extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement by a witness is not admissible unless the witness is afforded an opportunity to explain or deny the same and the opposite party is afforded an opportunity to interrogate the witness thereon, or the interests of justice otherwise require. This provision does not apply to admissions of a party-opponent as defined in rule 801(d)(2). [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987; Apr. 25, 1988, effective Nov. 1, 1988.]

Rule 614. Calling and Interrogation of Witnesses by Court.

(a) Calling by court.--The court may, on its own motion or at the suggestion of a party, call witnesses, and all parties are entitled to cross-examine witnesses thus called.

(b) Interrogation by court.--The court may interrogate witnesses, whether called by itself or by a party.

(c) Objections.--Objections to the calling of witnesses by the court or to interrogation by it may be made at the time or at the next available opportunity when the jury is not present. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 615. Exclusion of Witnesses.

At the request of a party the court shall order witnesses excluded so that they cannot hear the testimony of other witnesses, and it may make the order of its own motion. This rule does not authorize exclusion of (1) a party who is a natural person, or (2) an officer or employee of a party which is not a natural person designated as its representative by its attorney, or (3) a person whose presence is shown by a party to be essential to the presentation of the party's cause, or (4) a person authorized by statute to be present. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987; Apr. 25, 1988, effective Nov. 1, 1988; Nov. 18, 1988; Apr. 24, 1998, effective Dec. 1, 1998.]

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
APPENDIX B: THE FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE

6-B Federal Rules of Evidence Manual ARTICLE VII

ARTICLE VII OPINIONS AND EXPERT TESTIMONY

Rule 701. Opinion Testimony by Lay Witnesses.

If the witness is not testifying as an expert, the witness' testimony in the form of opinions or inferences is limited to those opinions or inferences which are (a) rationally based on the perception of the witness, (b) helpful to a clear understanding of the witness' testimony or the determination of a fact in issue, and (c) not based on scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge within the scope of Rule 702. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987; Apr. 17, 2000, effective Dec. 1, 2000.]

Rule 702. Testimony by Experts.

If scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education, may testify thereto in the form of an opinion or otherwise, if (1) the testimony is based upon sufficient facts or data, (2) the testimony is the product of reliable principles and methods, and (3) the witness has applied the principles and methods reliably to the facts of the case. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Apr. 17, 2000, effective Dec. 1, 2000.]

Rule 703. Bases of Opinion Testimony by Experts.

The facts or data in the particular case upon which an expert bases an opinion or inference may be those perceived by or made known to the expert at or before the hearing. If of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the particular field in forming opinions or inferences upon the subject, the facts or data need not be admissible in evidence in order for the opinion or inference to be admitted. Facts or data that are otherwise inadmissible shall not be disclosed to the jury by the proponent of the opinion or inference unless the court determines that their probative value in assisting the jury to evaluate the expert's opinion substantially outweighs their prejudicial effect. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987; Apr. 17, 2000, effective Dec. 1, 2000.]

Rule 704. Opinion on Ultimate Issue.

(a) Except as provided in subdivision (b), testimony in the form of an opinion or inference otherwise admissible is not objectionable because it embraces an ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact.

(b) No expert witness testifying with respect to the mental state or condition of a defendant in a criminal case may state an opinion or inference as to whether the defendant did or did not have the mental state or condition constituting an element of the crime charged or of a defense thereto. Such ultimate issues are matters for the trier of fact alone. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Oct. 12, 1984.]

Rule 705. Disclosure of Facts or Data Underlying Expert Opinion.

The expert may testify in terms of opinion or inference and give reasons therefor without first testifying to the underlying facts or data, unless the court requires otherwise. The expert may in any event be required to disclose the underlying facts or data on cross-examination. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987; Apr. 22, 1993, effective Dec. 1, 1993.]

Rule 706. Court Appointed Experts.

(a) Appointment.--The court may on its own motion or on the motion of any party enter an order to show cause why expert witnesses should not be appointed, and may request the parties to submit nominations. The court may appoint any expert witnesses agreed upon by the parties, and may appoint expert witnesses of its own selection. An expert witness shall not be appointed by the court unless the witness consents to act. A witness so appointed shall be informed of the witness' duties by the court in writing, a copy of which shall be filed with the clerk, or at a conference in which the parties shall have opportunity to participate. A witness so appointed shall advise the parties of the witness' findings, if any; the witness' deposition may be taken by any party; and the witness may be called to testify by the court or any party. The witness shall be subject to cross-examination by each party, including a party calling the witness.

(b) Compensation.--Expert witnesses so appointed are entitled to reasonable compensation in whatever sum the court may allow. The compensation thus fixed is payable from funds which may be provided by law in criminal cases and civil actions and proceedings involving just compensation under the fifth amendment. In other civil actions and proceedings the compensation shall be paid by the parties in such proportion and at such time as the court directs, and thereafter charged in like manner as other costs.

(c) Disclosure of appointment.--In the exercise of its discretion, the court may authorize disclosure to the jury of the fact that the court appointed the expert witness.

(d) Parties' experts of own selection.--Nothing in this rule limits the parties in calling expert witnesses of their own selection. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987.]

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
APPENDIX B: THE FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE

6-B Federal Rules of Evidence Manual ARTICLE VIII

ARTICLE VIII HEARSAY

Rule 801. Definitions.

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement.--A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant.--A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay.--"Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

(d) Statements which are not hearsay.--A statement is not hearsay if--

(1) Prior statement by witness.--The declarant testifies at the trial or hearing and is subject to cross- examination concerning the statement, and the statement is (A) inconsistent with the declarant's testimony, and was given under oath subject to the penalty of perjury at a trial, hearing, or other proceeding, or in a deposition, or (B) consistent with the declarant's testimony and is offered to rebut an express or implied charge against the declarant of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive, or (C) one of identification of a person made after perceiving the person; or

(2) Admission by party-opponent.--The statement is offered against a party and is (A) the party's own statement, in either an individual or a representative capacity or (B) a statement of which the party has manifested an adoption or belief in its truth, or (C) a statement by a person authorized by the party to make a statement concerning the subject, or (D) a statement by the party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship, or (E) a statement by a coconspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy. The contents of the statement shall be considered but are not alone sufficient to establish the declarant's authority under subdivision (C), the agency or employment relationship and scope thereof under subdivision (D), or the existence of the conspiracy and the participation therein of the declarant and the party against whom the statement is offered under subdivision (E). [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Oct. 16, 1975, effective Oct. 31, 1975; Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987; Apr. 11, 1997, effective Dec. 1, 1997.]

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule.

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial.

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

(1) Present sense impression.--A statement describing or explaining an event or condition made while the declarant was perceiving the event or condition, or immediately thereafter.

(2) Excited utterance.--A statement relating to a startling event or condition made while the declarant was under the stress of excitement caused by the event or condition.

(3) Then existing mental, emotional, or physical condition.--A statement of the declarant's then existing state of mind, emotion, sensation, or physical condition (such as intent, plan, motive, design, mental feeling, pain, and bodily health), but not including a statement of memory or belief to prove the fact remembered or believed unless it relates to the execution, revocation, identification, or terms of declarant's will.

(4) Statements for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment.--Statements made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment and describing medical history, or past or present symptoms, pain, or sensations, or the inception or general character of the cause or external source thereof insofar as reasonably pertinent to diagnosis or treatment.

(5) Recorded recollection.--A memorandum or record concerning a matter about which a witness once had knowledge but now has insufficient recollection to enable the witness to testify fully and accurately, shown to have been made or adopted by the witness when the matter was fresh in the witness' memory and to reflect that knowledge correctly. If admitted, the memorandum or record may be read into evidence but may not itself be received as an exhibit unless offered by an adverse party.

(6) Records of regularly conducted activity.--A memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, in any form, of acts, events, conditions, opinions, or diagnoses, made at or near the time by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge, if kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity, and if it was the regular practice of that business activity to make the memorandum, report, record or data compilation, all as shown by the testimony of the custodian or other qualified witness, or by certification that complies with Rule 902(11), Rule 902(12), or a statute permitting certification, unless the source of information or the method or circumstances of preparation indicate lack of trustworthiness. The term "business" as used in the paragraph includes business, institution, association, profession, occupation, and calling of every kind, whether or not conducted for profit.

(7) Absence of entry in records kept in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (6).--Evidence that a matter is not included in the memoranda reports, records, or data compilations, in any form, kept in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (6), to prove the nonoccurrence or nonexistence of the matter, if the matter was of a kind of which a memorandum, report, record, or data compilation was regularly made and preserved, unless the sources of information or other circumstances indicate lack of trustworthiness.

(8) Public records and reports.--Records, reports, statements, or data compilations, in any form, of public offices or agencies, setting forth (A) the activities of the office or agency, or (B) matters observed pursuant to duty imposed by law as to which matters there was a duty to report, excluding, however, in criminal cases matters observed by police officers and other law enforcement personnel, or (C) in civil actions and proceedings and against the Government in criminal cases, factual findings resulting from an investigation made pursuant to authority granted by law, unless the sources of information or other circumstances indicate lack of trustworthiness.

(9) Records of vital statistics.--Records or data compilations, in any form, of births, fetal deaths, deaths, or marriages, if the report thereof was made to a public office pursuant to requirements of law.

(10) Absence of public record or entry.--To prove the absence of a record, report, statement, or data compilation, in any form, or the nonoccurrence or nonexistence of a matter of which a record, report, statement, or data compilation, in any form, was regularly made and preserved by a public office or agency, evidence in the form of a certification in accordance with rule 902, or testimony, that diligent search failed to disclose the record, report, statement, or data compilation, or entry.

(11) Records of religious organizations.--Statements of births, marriages, divorces, deaths, legitimacy, ancestry, relationship by blood or marriage, or other similar facts of personal or family history, contained in a regularly kept record of a religious organization.

(12) Marriage, baptismal, and similar certificates.--Statements of fact contained in a certificate that the maker performed a marriage or other ceremony or administered a sacrament, made by a clergyman, public official, or other person authorized by the rules or practices of a religious organization or by law to perform the act certified, and purporting to have been issued at the time of the act or within a reasonable time thereafter.

(13) Family records.--Statements of fact concerning personal or family history contained in family Bibles, genealogies, charts, engravings on rings, inscriptions on family portraits, engravings on urns, crypts, or tombstones, or the like.

(14) Records of documents affecting an interest in property.--The record of a document purporting to establish or affect an interest in property, as proof of the content of the original recorded document and its execution and delivery by each person by whom it purports to have been executed, if the record is a record of a public office and an applicable statute authorizes the recording of documents of that kind in that office.

(15) Statements in documents affecting an interest in property.--A statement contained in a document purporting to establish or affect an interest in property if the matter stated was relevant to the purpose of the document, unless dealings with the property since the document was made have been inconsistent with the truth of the statement or the purport of the document.

(16) Statements in ancient documents.--Statements in a document in existence twenty years or more the authenticity of which is established.

(17) Market reports, commercial publications.--Market quotations, tabulations, lists, directories, or other published compilations, generally used and relied upon by the public or by persons in particular occupations.

(18) Learned treatises.--To the extent called to the attention of an expert witness upon cross-examination or relied upon by the expert witness in direct examination, statements contained in published treatises, periodicals, or pamphlets on a subject of history, medicine, or other science or art, established as a reliable authority by the testimony or admission of the witness or by other expert testimony or by judicial notice. If admitted, the statements may be read into evidence but may not be received as exhibits.

(19) Reputation concerning personal or family history.--Reputation among members of a person's family by blood, adoption, or marriage, or among a person's associates, or in the community, concerning a person's birth, adoption, marriage, divorce, death, legitimacy, relationship by blood, adoption, or marriage, ancestry, or other similar fact of personal or family history.

(20) Reputation concerning boundaries or general history.--Reputation in a community, arising before the controversy, as to boundaries of or customs affecting lands in the community, and reputation as to events of general history important to the community or State or nation in which located.

(21) Reputation as to character.--Reputation of a person's character among associates or in the community.

(22) Judgment of previous conviction.--Evidence of a final judgment, entered after a trial or upon a plea of guilty (but not upon a plea of nolo contendere), adjudging a person guilty of a crime punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year, to prove any fact essential to sustain the judgment, but not including, when offered by the Government in a criminal prosecution for purposes other than impeachment, judgments against persons other than the accused. The pendency of an appeal may be shown but does not affect admissibility.

(23) Judgment as to personal, family, or general history or boundaries.--Judgments as proof of matters of personal, family or general history, or boundaries, essential to the judgment, if the same would be provable by evidence of reputation.

(24) [Transferred to Rule 807.]
[Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Dec. 12, 1975; Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987; Apr. 11, 1997, effective Dec. 1, 1997; Apr. 17, 2000, effective Dec. 1, 2000.]

Rule 804. Hearsay Exceptions; Declarant Unavailable.

(a) Definition of unavailability.--"Unavailability as a witness" includes situations in which the declarant--

(1) is exempted by ruling of the court on the ground of privilege from testifying concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement; or

(2) persists in refusing to testify concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement despite an order of the court to do so; or

(3) testifies to a lack of memory of the subject matter of the declarant's statement; or

(4) is unable to be present or to testify at the hearing because of death or then existing physical or mental illness or infirmity; or

(5) is absent from the hearing and the proponent of a statement has been unable to procure the declarant's attendance (or in the case of a hearsay exception under subdivision (b)(2), (3), or (4), the declarant's attendance or testimony) by process or other reasonable means.

A declarant is not unavailable as a witness if exemption, refusal, claim of lack of memory, inability, or absence is due to the procurement or wrongdoing of the proponent of a statement for the purpose of preventing the witness from attending or testifying.

(b) Hearsay exceptions.--The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule if the declarant is unavailable as a witness:

(1) Former testimony.--Testimony given as a witness at another hearing of the same or a different proceeding, or in a deposition taken in compliance with law in the course of the same or another proceeding, if the party against whom the testimony is now offered, or, in a civil action or proceeding, a predecessor in interest, had an opportunity and similar motive to develop the testimony by direct, cross, or redirect examination.

(2) Statement under belief of impending death.--In a prosecution for homicide or in a civil action or proceeding, a statement made by a declarant while believing that the declarant's death was imminent, concerning the cause or circumstances of what the declarant believed to be impending death.

(3) Statement against interest.--A statement which was at the time of its making so far contrary to the declarant's pecuniary or proprietary interest, or so far tended to subject the declarant to civil or criminal liability, or to render invalid a claim by the declarant against another, that a reasonable person in the declarant's position would not have made the statement unless believing it to be true. A statement tending to expose the declarant to criminal liability and offered to exculpate the accused is not admissible unless corroborating circumstances clearly indicate the trustworthiness of the statement.

(4) Statement of personal or family history.--(A) A statement concerning the declarant's own birth, adoption, marriage, divorce, legitimacy, relationship by blood, adoption, or marriage, ancestry, or other similar fact of personal or family history, even though declarant had no means of acquiring personal knowledge of the matter stated; or (B) a statement concerning the foregoing matters, and death also, of another person, if the declarant was related to the other by blood, adoption, or marriage or was so intimately associated with the other's family as to be likely to have accurate information concerning the matter declared.

(5) [Transferred to Rule 807.]

(6) Forfeiture by wrongdoing.--A statement offered against a party that has engaged or acquiesced in wrongdoing that was intended to, and did, procure the unavailability of the declarant as a witness. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Dec. 12, 1975; Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987; Nov. 18, 1988; Apr. 11, 1997, effective Dec. 1, 1997.]

Rule 805. Hearsay Within Hearsay.

Hearsay included within hearsay is not excluded under the hearsay rule if each part of the combined statements conforms with an exception to the hearsay rule provided in these rules. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant.

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in Rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987; Apr. 11, 1997, effective Dec. 1, 1997.]

Rule 807. Residual Exception.

A statement not specifically covered by Rule 803 or 804 but having equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness, is not excluded by the hearsay rule, if the court determines that (A) the statement is offered as evidence of a material fact; (B) the statement is more probative on the point for which it is offered than any other evidence which the proponent can procure through reasonable efforts; and (C) the general purposes of these rules and the interests of justice will best be served by admission of the statement into evidence. However, a statement may not be admitted under this exception unless the proponent of it makes known to the adverse party sufficiently in advance of the trial or hearing to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to prepare to meet it, the proponent's intention to offer the statement and the particulars of it, including the name and address of the declarant. [Adopted Apr. 11, 1997, effective Dec. 1, 1997.]

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
APPENDIX B: THE FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE

6-B Federal Rules of Evidence Manual ARTICLE IX

ARTICLE IX AUTHENTICATION AND IDENTIFICATION

Rule 901. Requirement of Authentication or Identification.

(a) General provision.--The requirement of authentication or identification as a condition precedent to admissibility is satisfied by evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims.

(b) Illustrations.--By way of illustration only, and not by way of limitation, the following are examples of authentication or identification conforming with the requirements of this rule:

(1) Testimony of witness with knowledge.--Testimony that a matter is what it is claimed to be.

(2) Nonexpert opinion on handwriting.--Nonexpert opinion as to the genuineness of handwriting, based upon familiarity not acquired for purposes of the litigation.

(3) Comparison by trier or expert witness.--Comparison by the trier of fact or by expert witnesses with specimens which have been authenticated.

(4) Distinctive characteristics and the like.--Appearance, contents, substance, internal patterns, or other distinctive characteristics, taken in conjunction with circumstances.

(5) Voice identification.--Identification of a voice, whether heard firsthand or through mechanical or electronic transmission or recording, by opinion based upon hearing the voice at any time under circumstances connecting it with the alleged speaker.

(6) Telephone conversations.--Telephone conversations, by evidence that a call was made to the number assigned at the time by the telephone company to a particular person or business, if (A) in the case of a person, circumstances, including self-identification, show the person answering to be the one called, or (B) in the case of a business, the call was made to a place of business and the conversation related to business reasonably transacted over the telephone.

(7) Public records or reports.--Evidence that a writing authorized by law to be recorded or filed and in fact recorded or filed in a public office, or a purported public record, report, statement, or data compilation, in any form, is from the public office where items of this nature are kept.

(8) Ancient documents or data compilation.--Evidence that a document or data compilation, in any form, (A) is in such condition as to create no suspicion concerning its authenticity, (B) was in a place where it, if authentic, would likely be, and (C) has been in existence 20 years or more at the time it is offered.

(9) Process or system.--Evidence describing a process or system used to produce a result and showing that the process or system produces an accurate result.

(10) Methods provided by statute or rule.--Any method of authentication or identification provided by Act of Congress or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 902. Self-Authentication.

Extrinsic evidence of authenticity as a condition precedent to admissibility is not required with respect to the following:

(1) Domestic public documents under seal.--A document bearing a seal purporting to be that of the United States, or of any State, district, Commonwealth, territory, or insular possession thereof, or the Panama Canal Zone, or the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, or of a political subdivision, department, officer, or agency thereof, and a signature purporting to be an attestation or execution.

(2) Domestic public documents not under seal.--A document purporting to bear the signature in the official capacity of an officer or employee of any entity included in paragraph (1) hereof, having no seal, if a public officer having a seal and having official duties in the district or political subdivision of the officer or employee certifies under seal that the signer has the official capacity and that the signature is genuine.

(3) Foreign public documents.--A document purporting to be executed or attested in an official capacity by a person authorized by the laws of a foreign country to make the execution or attestation, and accompanied by a final certification as to the genuineness of the signature and official position (A) of the executing or attesting person, or (B) of any foreign official whose certificate of genuineness of signature and official position relates to the execution or attestation or is in a chain of certificates of genuineness of signature and official position relating to the execution or attestation. A final certification may be made by a secretary of an embassy or legation, consul general, consul, vice consul, or consular agent of the United States, or a diplomatic or consular official of the foreign country assigned or accredited to the United States. If reasonable opportunity has been given to all parties to investigate the authenticity and accuracy of official documents, the court may, for good cause shown, order that they be treated as presumptively authentic without final certification or permit them to be evidenced by an attested summary with or without final certification.

(4) Certified copies of public records.--A copy of an official record or report or entry therein, or of a document authorized by law to be recorded or filed and actually recorded or filed in a public office, including data compilations in any form, certified as correct by the custodian or other person authorized to make the certification, by certificate complying with paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of this rule or complying with any Act of Congress or rule prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority.

(5) Official publications.--Books, pamphlets, or other publications purporting to be issued by public authority.

(6) Newspapers and periodicals.--Printed materials purporting to be newspapers or periodicals.

(7) Trade inscriptions and the like.--Inscriptions, signs, tags, or labels purporting to have been affixed in the course of business and indicating ownership, control, or origin.

(8) Acknowledged documents.--Documents accompanied by a certificate of acknowledgment executed in the manner provided by law by a notary public or other officer authorized by law to take acknowledgments.

(9) Commercial paper and related documents.--Commercial paper, signatures thereon, and documents relating thereto to the extent provided by general commercial law.

(10) Presumptions under Acts of Congress.--Any signature, document, or other matter declared by Act of Congress to be presumptively or prima facie genuine or authentic.

(11) Certified domestic records of regularly conducted activity.--The original or a duplicate of a domestic record of regularly conducted activity that would be admissible under Rule 803(6) if accompanied by a written declaration of its custodian or other qualified person, in a manner complying with any Act of Congress or rule prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority, certifying that the record--

(A) was made at or near the time of the occurrence of the matters set forth by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge of those matters;

(B) was kept in the course of the regularly conducted activity; and

(C) was made by the regularly conducted activity as a regular practice.

A party intending to offer a record into evidence under this paragraph must provide written notice of that intention to all adverse parties, and must make the record and declaration available for inspection sufficiently in advance of their offer into evidence to provide an adverse party with a fair opportunity to challenge them.

(12) Certified foreign records of regularly conducted activity.--In a civil case, the original or a duplicate of a foreign record of regularly conducted activity that would be admissible under Rule 803(6) if accompanied by a written declaration by its custodian or other qualified person certifying that the record--

(A) was made at or near the time of the occurrence of the matters set forth by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge of those matters;

(B) was kept in the course of the regularly conducted activity; and

(C) was made by the regularly conducted activity as a regular practice.

The declaration must be signed in a manner that, if falsely made, would subject the maker to criminal penalty under the laws of the country where the declaration is signed. A party intending to offer a record into evidence under this paragraph must provide written notice of that intention to all adverse parties, and must make the record and declaration available for inspection sufficiently in advance of their offer into evidence to provide an adverse party with a fair opportunity to challenge them. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987; Apr. 25, 1988, effective Nov. 1, 1988; Apr. 17, 2000, effective Dec. 1, 2000.]

Rule 903. Subscribing Witness' Testimony Unnecessary.

The testimony of a subscribing witness is not necessary to authenticate a writing unless required by the laws of the jurisdiction whose laws govern the validity of the writing. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

ARTICLE X CONTENTS OF WRITINGS, RECORDINGS, AND PHOTOGRAPHS

Rule 1001. Definitions.

For purposes of this article the following definitions are applicable:

(1) Writings and recordings.--"Writings" and "recordings" consist of letters, words, or numbers, or their equivalent, set down by handwriting, typewriting, printing, photostating, photographing, magnetic impulse, mechanical or electronic recording, or other form of data compilation.

(2) Photographs.--"Photographs" include still photographs, X-ray films, video tapes, and motion pictures.

(3) Original.--An "original" of a writing or recording is the writing or recording itself or any counterpart intended to have the same effect by a person executing or issuing it. An "original" of a photograph includes the negative or any print therefrom. If data are stored in a computer or similar device, any printout or other output readable by sight, shown to reflect the data accurately, is an "original."

(4) Duplicate.--A "duplicate" is a counterpart produced by the same impression as the original, or from the same matrix, or by means of photography, including enlargements and miniatures, or by mechanical or electronic re-recording, or by chemical reproduction, or by other equivalent techniques which accurately reproduces the original. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 1002. Requirement of Original.

To prove the content of a writing, recording, or photograph, the original writing, recording, or photograph is required, except as otherwise provided in these rules or by Act of Congress. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 1003. Admissibility of Duplicates.

A duplicate is admissible to the same extent as an original unless (1) a genuine question is raised as to the authenticity of the original or (2) in the circumstances it would be unfair to admit the duplicate in lieu of the original. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 1004. Admissibility of Other Evidence of Contents.

The original is not required, and other evidence of the contents of a writing, recording, or photograph is admissible if--

(1) Originals lost or destroyed.--All originals are lost or have been destroyed, unless the proponent lost or destroyed them in bad faith; or

(2) Original not obtainable.--No original can be obtained by any available judicial process or procedure; or

(3) Original in possession of opponent.--At a time when an original was under the control of the party against whom offered, that party was put on notice, by the pleadings or otherwise, that the contents would be a subject of proof at the hearing, and that party does not produce the original at the hearing; or

(4) Collateral matters.--The writing, recording, or photograph is not closely related to a controlling issue. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987.]

Rule 1005. Public Records.

The contents of an official record, or of a document authorized to be recorded or filed and actually recorded or filed, including data compilations in any form, if otherwise admissible, may be proved by copy, certified as correct in accordance with rule 902 or testified to be correct by a witness who has compared it with the original. If a copy which complies with the foregoing cannot be obtained by the exercise of reasonable diligence, then other evidence of the contents may be given. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 1006. Summaries.

The contents of voluminous writings, recordings, or photographs which cannot conveniently be examined in court may be presented in the form of a chart, summary, or calculation. The originals, or duplicates, shall be made available for examination or copying, or both, by other parties at [a] reasonable time and place. The court may order that they be produced in court. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

Rule 1007. Testimony or Written Admission of Party.

Contents of writings, recordings, or photographs may be proved by the testimony or deposition of the party against whom offered or by that party's written admission, without accounting for the nonproduction of the original. [Adopted

Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987.]

Rule 1008. Functions of Court and Jury.

When the admissibility of other evidence of contents of writings, recordings, or photographs under these rules depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the question whether the condition has been fulfilled is ordinarily for the court to determine in accordance with the provisions of rule 104. However, when an issue is raised (a) whether the asserted writing ever existed, or (b) whether another writing, recording, or photograph produced at the trial is the original, or (c) whether other evidence of contents correctly reflects the contents, the issue is for the trier of fact to determine as in the case of other issues of fact. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

6-B Federal Rules of Evidence Manual ARTICLE XI

ARTICLE XI MISCELLANEOUS RULES

Rule 1101. Applicability of Rules.

(a) Courts and judges.--These rules apply to the United States district courts, the District Court of Guam, the District Court of the Virgin Islands, the District Court for the Northern Mariana Islands, the United States courts of appeals, the United States Claims Court, and to United States bankruptcy judges and United States magistrate judges, in the actions, cases, and proceedings and to the extent hereinafter set forth. The terms "judge" and "court" in these rules include United States bankruptcy judges and United States magistrate judges.

(b) Proceedings generally.--These rules apply generally to civil actions and proceedings, including admiralty and maritime cases, to criminal cases and proceedings, to contempt proceedings except those in which the court may act summarily, and to proceedings and cases under title 11, United States Code.

(c) Rule of privilege.--The rule with respect to privileges applies at all stages of all actions, cases, and proceedings.

(d) Rules inapplicable.--The rules (other than with respect to privileges) do not apply in the following situations:

(1) Preliminary questions of fact.--The determination of questions of fact preliminary to admissibility of evidence when the issue is to be determined by the court under rule 104.

(2) Grand jury.--Proceedings before grand juries.

(3) Miscellaneous proceedings.--Proceedings for extradition or rendition; preliminary examinations in criminal cases; sentencing, or granting or revoking probation; issuance of warrants for arrest, criminal summonses, and search warrants; and proceedings with respect to release on bail or otherwise.

(e) Rules applicable in part. In the following proceedings these rules apply to the extent that matters of evidence are not provided for in the statutes which govern procedure therein or in other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority: the trial of misdemeanors and other petty offenses before United States magistrate judges; review of agency actions when the facts are subject to trial de novo under section 706(2)(F) of title 5, United States Code; review of orders of the Secretary of Agriculture under section 2 of the Act entitled "An Act to authorize association of producers of agricultural products" approved February 18, 1922 (7 U.S.C. 292), and under sections 6 and 7(c) of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930 (7 U.S.C. 499f, 499g(c)); naturalization and revocation of naturalization under sections 310-318 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1421-1429); prize proceedings in admiralty under sections 7651-7681 of title 10, United States Code; review of orders of the Secretary of the Interior under section 2 of the Act entitled "An Act authorizing associations of producers of aquatic products" approved June 25, 1934 (15 U.S.C. 522); review of orders of petroleum control boards under section 5 of the Act entitled "An Act to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in petroleum and its products by prohibiting the shipment in such commerce of petroleum and its products produced in violation of State law, and for other purposes," approved February 22, 1935 (15 U.S.C. 715d); actions for fines, penalties, or forfeitures under part V of title IV of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1581-1624), or under the Anti-Smuggling Act (19 U.S.C. 1701-1711); criminal libel for condemnation, exclusinof imports, or other proceedings under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (21 U.S.C. 301-392); disputes between seamen under sections 4079, 4080, and 4081 of the Revised Statutes (22 U.S.C. 256-258); habeas corpus under sections 2241-2254 of title 28, United States Code; motions to vacate, set aside or correct sentence under section 2255 of title 28, United States Code; actions for penalties for refusal to transport destitute seamen under section 4578 of the Revised Statutes (46 U.S.C. 679); actions against the United States under the Act entitled "An Act authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty for damage caused by and salvage service rendered to public vessels belonging to the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1925 (46 U.S.C. 781-790), as implemented by section 7730 of title 10, United States Code. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Dec. 12, 1975; Nov. 6, 1978, effective Oct. 1, 1979; Apr. 2, 1982, effective Oct. 1, 1982; Mar. 2, 1987, effective Oct. 1, 1987; Apr. 25, 1988, effective Nov. 1, 1988; Apr. 22, 1993, effective Dec. 1, 1993.]

Rule 1102. Amendments.

Amendments to the Federal Rules of Evidence may be made as provided in Section 2072 of title 28 of the United States Code. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975; amended Apr. 30, 1991, effective Dec. 1, 1991.]

Rule 1103. Title.

These rules may be known and cited as the Federal Rules of Evidence. [Adopted Jan. 2, 1975, effective July 1, 1975.]

PREFACE

These Civil Trial Practice Standards have been developed as guidelines to assist judges and lawyers who try civil cases in state and federal court. The Standards address practical aspects of trial that are not fully addressed by rules of evidence or procedure. They are not intended to be a substitute for existing evidentiary or procedural rules but rather to supplement and operate consistently with those rules. The Standards are predicated on the recognition that, in an era of increasingly complicated evidence and litigation, there are methods for enhancing jury comprehension and minimizing jury confusion that merit wider consideration and use. These Standards are designed to furnish practical guidance for the implementation and use of many of these methods.

The Standards suggest a variety of approaches but recognize that ultimately the trial court must exercise its discretion in light of the circumstances before it, and nothing in these Standards limits that discretion. The Standards are drafted on the assumption that each litigant before the court is represented by counsel. The court's exercise of discretion will necessarily be affected if parties are appearing pro se.

These Standards do not reflect any substantive legal doctrines. They are not comprehensive in the sense that many other issues arise at trial that are not addressed in the rules of evidence or procedure and yet have an impact on a jury's ability to perform its function. They are advisory only and, while they have been drafted to operate consistently with existing law, in the event of any conflict, the law governing in the jurisdiction prevails. It is hoped that, notwithstanding these limitations, these Standards will prove useful to both bench and bar.

PART FIVE: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE MANUAL: THE TRIAL BOOK
APPENDIX C: CIVIL TRIAL PRACTICE STANDARDS

6-C Federal Rules of Evidence Manual PART ONE

PART ONE THE JURY

1. Juror Questionnaires & Voir Dire.

a. Juror Questionnaires.

i. Party-Proposed Questionnaire. To expedite and enhance voir dire, the court should in appropriate cases permit the parties to submit a proposed juror questionnaire to be completed privately by each member of the venire panel.

A. Conferral Requirement. The parties should be required to confer on the form and content of the questionnaire prior to its submission to the court.

B. Parties Not in Agreement. If the parties cannot agree on the form and content of the questionnaire, each party should be afforded the opportunity to submit a proposed questionnaire and to comment upon any proposal submitted by another party.

ii. Court Questionnaire. If the court routinely uses a form of juror questionnaire, a copy of that form should be made available to the parties before any party's proposal is due or, if no proposals are permitted, in advance of jury selection.

b. Voir Dire.

i. Court & Counsel Roles. The trial judge should conduct an initial voir dire examination. Counsel should then be permitted to question panel members for a reasonable period of time.

ii. Multiple Parties. In a case involving multiple parties, the court should permit each separately-represented party to participate meaningfully in voir dire, subject to reasonable time limitations and avoidance of repetition.

Comment

Subdivision (a)(i). The increasing use of jury consultants, coupled with the limitations on, or elimination of, lawyer-conducted voir dire in some courts, has led to increased reliance on questionnaires to permit expeditious, informed jury selection. It is well recognized that the use of juror questionnaires may expedite juror selection and can be helpful in rooting out bias. See, e.g., United States v. Thai, 29 F.3d 785, 801 (2d Cir. 1994). Questionnaires have proved particularlyuseful in lengthy, complicated or highly-publicized cases. See, e.g., United States v. Faulkner, 17 F.3d 745, 758 n.14 (5th Cir. 1994); Federal Judicial Center, Manual for Complex Litigation 3d § 22.41 (1995). The Manual for Complex Litigation 3d provides a generic form of questionnaire that is to "be adapted for use in particular litigation by taking into account the facts of that litigation" (at § 41.7).

Whether to permit the use of a questionnaire -- and, if so, the extent of questioning permitted -- is discretionary with the court. See, e.g., United States v. Padilla-Valenzuela, 896 F. Supp. 968 (D. Ariz. 1995). The fact that the parties may agree on a form of questionnaire, or that one party may propose a questionnaire to which no objections are interposed, does not necessarily mean that the court will use it as submitted, or at all. The constitutional limits that circumscribe the use of peremptory challenges (see, e.g., Purkett v. Elem, 115 S. Ct. 1769 (1995); J.E.B. v. Alabama ex rel. T.B., 114 S. Ct. 1419 (1994); Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986)) stress the importance both of judicial supervision of the selection process and of ensuring that voir dire be as effective as possible in supporting challenges for cause. See Manual for Complex Litigation 3d at § 22.41.

Subdivision (a)(ii). To the extent that courts use form juror questionnaires that are not published or otherwise publicly available, they should be furnished to the parties to afford them the opportunity to suggest emendations tailored to the case. This is routinely done at present. See, e.g., United States v. Preston, No. 95-40083-01-SAC, 1996 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6712, at *72 (D. Kan. Apr. 5, 1996).

Subdivision (b)(i). Subdivision (b)(i) of this Standard is Standard 7(b) of the Standards Relating to Juror Use & Management (1993 rev. ed.) of the American Bar Association Judicial Administration Division and the National Center for State Courts.

Subdivision (b)(ii). Subdivision (b)(ii) recognizes that multiple plaintiffs, defendants or other parties on the same side of a caption -- while ostensibly aligned in interest -- often have differing interests, whether or not those differences are in the nature of, or have matured to, cross-claims, third-party claims or any other sort of formal adversity. This subdivision also recognizes that differences in the nature of the co-parties (e.g., natural person vs. corporation; ethnicity; unique aspects of background) will often require different voir dire questions. The court should therefore permit counsel for co-parties to question independently, subject to reasonable limitations.

2. Juror Notebooks.

a. Use & Contents. In cases of appropriate complexity, the court should distribute, or permit the parties to distribute, to each juror identical notebooks, which may include copies of:

i. The court's preliminary instructions;

ii. Selected exhibits that have been ruled admissible (or excerpts thereof);

iii. Stipulations of the parties;

iv. Other material not subject to genuine dispute, which may include:

A. Photographs of parties, witnesses, or exhibits;

B. Curricula vitae of experts;

C. Lists or seating charts identifying attorneys and their respective clients;

D. A short statement of the parties' claims and defenses;

E. Lists or indices of admitted exhibits;

F. Glossaries;

G. Chronologies or timelines; and

v. The court's final instructions.

The notebooks should include paper for the jurors' use in taking notes, if permitted under Standard 3.

b. Procedure.

i. Conferral Requirement. The court should require counsel to confer on the contents of the notebooks before trial begins.

ii. Parties Not in Agreement. If counsel cannot agree, each party should be afforded the opportunity to submit its proposal and to comment upon any proposal submitted by another party.

iii. Use at Trial.

A. At the time of distribution, the court should instruct the jurors concerning the purpose and use of the notebooks.

B. During the course of trial, the court may permit the parties to supplement the materials containedin the notebooks with additional documents as they become relevant and after they have been ruled admissible or otherwise approved by the judge for inclusion.

C. The court should require the jurors to sign their notebooks and should collect them at the end of each trial day until the jury retires to deliberate. The notebooks should be available to the jurors during deliberations.

Comment

This Standard encourages the increasingly common practice of using juror notebooks to maximize comprehension of the evidence in appropriately complex cases. In addition to copies of the court's instructions, important exhibits (or salient excerpts from exhibits) and stipulations, contents may consist of any other aids to the understanding of the jury that the court finds appropriate in the circumstances. See, e.g., Consorti v. Armstrong World Indus., 72 F.3d 1003, 1008 (2d Cir. 1995); United States v. Rana, 944 F.2d 123, 126 (3d Cir. 1991), cert. Denied, 112 S. Ct. 981 (1992); ACandS, Inc. v. Godwin, 340 Md. 334, 400 n.22, 667 A.2d 116, 148 n.22 (1995); Gray v. Phillips Petrol. Co., No. 84-2107-S, 1990 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5677 at *2-*3 (D. Kan. 1990); United States v. Plitt Southern Theaters, Inc., 671 F. Supp. 1095, 1096 (W.D.N.C. 1987); Federal Judicial Center, Manual for Complex Litigation 3d §§ 22.32, 22.42 (1995); American Bar Association Section of Litigation, National Center for State Courts & State Justice Institute, Jury Trial Innovations § IV-7 (Munsterman et al. eds. 1997); Hon. Robert M. Parker, Streamlining Complex Cases, 10 Rev. Litig. 547, 550 (1991); Robert E. Litan (ed.), Verdict: Assessing the Civil Jury System 388 (Brookings 1993).

It lies within the court's discretion to decide not only whether but also when notebooks should be distributed. Ordinarily, if notebooks are to be provided, they should be distributed at or near the outset of trial for convenience of reference throughout the proceedings. Alternatively, the court may determine that distribution should follow the introduction of some or all of the exhibits or salient testimony. In either event, the court may permit the parties to supplement the notebooks with additional materials that the court rules admissible or includible (e.g., instructions) later in the trial. Materials that have not specifically been approved by the judge may not be included in jury notebooks.

The court may suggest or, in appropriate cases, direct the parties to prepare notebooks for jurors. This should ordinarily be resolved prior to trial.

3. Juror Note-Taking.

a. Notes Permitted. The court should ordinarily permit jurors to take notes during the proceedings and use them during deliberations.

b. Cautionary Instructions. Prior to permitting jurors to take notes, the court should give an appropriate cautionary instruction to the jury, including that:

i. Jurors are not required to take notes, and those who take notes are not required to take notes extensively;

ii. Note-taking should not divert jurors from paying full attention to the evidence and evaluating witness credibility;

iii. Notes are merely memory aids and are not evidence or the official record;

iv. Jurors who take few or no notes should not permit their independent recollection of the evidence to be influenced solely by the fact that other jurors have taken notes;

v. Notes are confidential and will not be reviewed by the court or anyone else. They may not be disclosed to other jurors until deliberations begin; and

vi. After the trial is over, all juror notes will be collected and destroyed.

c. Procedure.

i. The court should ensure that jurors have writing instruments and notepaper.

ii. The court should collect all juror notes at the end of each trial day until the jury retires to deliberate. The notes should be available to the jurors during deliberations.

iii. All juror notes will be collected and destroyed.

Comment

The Federal Judicial Center has observed that "[p]ermitting jurors to take notes, once discouraged, has now become widely accepted." Federal Judicial Center, Manual for Complex Litigation 3d § 22.42 (1995). The vast majority of courts recognize that it is within the sound discretion of the trial judge to permit jurors to take notes. See, e.g., Esaw v. Friedman, 217 Conn. 553, 559-61, 586 A. 2d 1164, 1167-68 (1991) (collecting cases); State v. Mejia, 233 Conn. 215, 238-40, 658 A.2d 571, 582-83 (1995); Murphy v. United States, 670 A.2d 1361 (D.C. App. 1996); State v. Trujillo, 869

S.W.2d 844, 849-50 (Mo. App. 1994); People v. DiLuca, 85 A.D.2d 439, 448 N.Y.S.2d 730, 734-35 (App. Div. 1982);State v. Waddell, No. 94-2462, 1996 Ohio LEXIS 166 at *14 (Ohio Sup. Ct. March 4, 1996); Sugar v. Bartlett, 916 P.2d 1383, 1385-87 (Okla. 1996); State v. Triplett, 187 W.Va. 760, 421 S.E.2d 511, 519-20 (1992).

This Standard is consistent with the position taken in the American Bar Association Standards for Criminal Justice. See 3 ABA Standards for Criminal Justice § 15-3.2 at 15-84 (2d ed. 1986). It is also the position taken in Standard 16(c)(i) of the Standards Relating to Juror Use & Management (1993 rev. ed.) of the American Bar Association Judicial Administration Division and the National Center for State Courts, n1 and in American Bar Association Section of Litigation/Brookings Institution, Charting a Future for the Civil Jury System 18-19 (1992).

This Standard encourages note-taking because "[t]here is abundant evidence that individuals tend to be better able to recall events and testimony if they have taken notes at the time; the very process of writing things down helps to encode the events in one's memory." ABA Section of Litigation/Brookings Institution, Charting a Future for The Civil Jury System 18 (1992). See also Heuer & Penrod, Increasing Juror Participation in Trials Through Note Taking and Question Asking, 79 Judicature 256 (1996); Robert E. Litan (ed.), Verdict: assessing the Civil Jury System 358-60, 386-88, 444 (Brookings 1993); Developments in the Law -- The Civil Jury, 110 Harv. L. Rev. 1408, 1509-11 (1997); Statement of Robert MacCoun, University of California at Berkeley Graduate School of Public Policy, before the Judiciary Committee of the California State Senate concerning Improving Jury Comprehension in Criminal and Civil Trials at 1 (July 27, 1995). At the same time, the Standard recognizes the need for court discretion to address unusual circumstances in which note-taking may be contraindicated.

The cautionary instructions recommended in this Standard are derived from the cases and from suggestions made by the American Judicature Society and the Federal Judicial Center. See, e.g., State v. Mejia, 233 Conn. at 238-40, 658 A.2d at 577-78, 581; State v. Waddell, 1996 Ohio LEXIS 166, at *18-*19; Price v. State, 887 S.W.2d 949, 954-55 (Tex. Crim. App. 1994); American Judicature Society, Toward More Active Juries: taking Notes and Asking Questions 13-14 (1991); Federal Judicial Center, Litigation Management Manual Exhibit B (1992).

4. Juror Questions for Witnesses.

a. Discretion. If it will assist the jury to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, the court may permit jurors to submit written questions for witnesses.

b. Cautionary Instructions. Prior to permitting the submission of questions, the court should instruct the jury that:

i. Questions should be reserved for important points only;

ii. The sole purpose of juror questions is to clarify the testimony, not to comment on it or express any opinion about it;

iii. Jurors are not to argue with the witness;

iv. Jurors are to remember that they are not advocates and must remain neutral fact finders;

v. Jurors are not to reach any definite conclusions until the end of the case, after they have heard all of the evidence and arguments of counsel;

vi. There are some questions that the court will not ask, or will not ask in the form that a juror has written, because of the rules of evidence or other legal reasons, or because the question is expected to be answered later in the case;

vii. Jurors are to draw no inference if a question is not asked -- it is no reflection on either the juror or the question;

viii. Jurors are not to weigh the answers to their questions more heavily than other evidence in the case;

ix. Questions will be accepted only in writing, at the court's invitation, and are not to be disclosed to other jurors; and

x. Any question must be submitted in writing to the court, with the juror's signature or designated number affixed.

Instructions (vi), (vii) and (viii) should ordinarily be reiterated in the final jury charge.

c. Procedure. If the court permits juror questioning:

i. Upon receipt of a written question, the court should make it part of the court record and disclose it to counsel outside the presence of the jury;

ii. Counsel must be given the opportunity, outside the hearing of the jury, to interpose objections, including objections predicated on litigation strategy or stipulation of the parties;

iii. Counsel should have the opportunity to suggest modifications to the question;

iv. The court should modify the question to eliminate any objectionable matter;

v. The court may pose the question to the witness, or permit counsel to do so, at that time or later; in so deciding, the court should consider whether counsel prefer to ask, or to have the court ask, the question; and

vi. After the question is answered, counsel should be given an opportunity to ask appropriate follow-up questions.

Comment

This Standard reflects the position taken in Standard 16(c)(i) of the Standards Relating to Juror Use & Management (1993 rev. ed.) ("Juror Use Standards") of the American Bar Association Judicial Administration Division and the National Center for State Courts, n2 and in the American Bar Association Section of Litigation/Brookings Institution symposium report, Charting a Future for the Civil Jury System 20 (1992). See also American Bar Association Section of Litigation, National Center for State Courts & State Justice Institute, Jury Trial Innovations § V-7 (Munsterman et al. eds. 1997); Developments in the Law -- The Civil Jury, 110 Harv. L. Rev. 1408, 1508-09 (1997); Kelso, Final Report of the Blue Ribbon Commission on Jury System Improvement, 47 HASTINGS L.J. 1433, 1507 (1996); Amar, Reinventing Juries: Ten Suggested Reforms, 28 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 1169, 1185 (1995); Minnesota State Bar Association Civil Litigation Section, Committee on Civil Juries: Report at 6-7 (June 1995).

Questioning is primarily the province of counsel, not jurors. This Standard is not intended to suggest that juror questioning would be appropriate, or is necessary, in every case. Rather, it is intended to focus the court on this option and to acknowledge that, in appropriate contexts, it is an option that may profitably be exercised. It is predicated on the notion that, with appropriate safeguards, juror questioning can materially advance the pursuit of truth, particularly when a jury is confronted with a complex case, complicated evidence or unclear testimony. See, e.g., American Judicature Society, Toward More Active Juries: Taking Notes & Asking Questions 11-14 (1991); Heuer & Penrod, Increasing Juror Participation in Trials Through Note Taking and Question Asking, 79 Judicature 256 (1996); Robert E. Litan (ed.), Verdict: Assessing the Civil Jury System 358-60, 390-91 (Brookings 1993); Statement of Robert MacCoun, University of California at Berkeley Graduate School of Public Policy, before the Judiciary Committee of the California State Senate concerning Improving Jury Comprehension in Criminal and Civil Trials at 1 (July 27, 1995).

State and federal courts have overwhelmingly recognized that whether to allow juror questioning of witnesses is a matter vested in the sound discretion of the trial judge. See, e.g., United States v. Bush, 47 F.3d 511, 514-15 (2d Cir. 1995); United States v. Cassiere, 4 F.3d 1006, 1017-18 (1st Cir. 1993); United States v. George, 986 F.2d 1176, 1178 (8th Cir. 1993); DeBenedetto v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 754 F.2d 512, 516 (4th Cir. 1985); United States v. Callahan, 588 F.2d 1078, 1086 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 26 (1979); Spitzer v. Haims & Co., 217 Conn. 532, 546-47, 587 A.2d 105, 112-13 (1991); Rudolph v. Iowa Methodist Med. Ctr., 293 N.W.2d 550, 555-56 (Iowa 1980); State v. Hays, 883 P.2d 1093, 1101-02 (Kan. 1994); State v. Graves, 907 P.2d 963, 966-67 (Mont. 1995); People v. Bacic, 202 A.D.2d 234, 608 N.Y.S.2d 452, 452 (1st Dept.), appeal denied, 616 N.Y.S.2d 483 (1994); 3 Wigmore, Evidence § 784(a) (Chadbourn rev.).

As the courts have observed, in the context of complex cases or complicated testimony, "[j]uror-inspired questions may serve to advance the search for truth by alleviating uncertainties in the jurors' minds, clearing up confusion, or alerting the attorneys to points that bear further elaboration. Furthermore, it is at least arguable that a question-asking juror will be a more attentive juror." United States v. Sutton, 970 F.2d 1001, 1005 n.3 (1st Cir. 1992).

The practice of jury questioning -- especially oral questioning -- has often been frowned upon, particularly in criminal cases, due to concern that it risks compromising jury neutrality, encouraging premature deliberations, and unduly delaying the proceedings. These concerns can be addressed with proper precautions, as adumbrated in subdivisions (b) and (c) of this Standard, and a vigilant trial judge. Moreover, civil actions rarely present the same constitutional issues or liberty interests that foster judicial sensitivity in criminal cases. In deciding whether, or when, to permit counsel to ask a juror's question, the court should consider, and take care to avoid, any risk that the inquiring lawyer will thereby gain some form of advantage by becoming in some sense aligned with the juror.

Ordinarily, the court should not invite or entertain questions from jurors until after the parties' examination and cross-examination of a witness has concluded. Counsel should generally be afforded wide latitude to try their cases as they see fit, and juror questions should be permitted on purely a supplemental basis.

Affording counsel the "opportunity, outside the hearing of the jury, to interpose objections" does not necessarily entail a formal break in the proceedings. In the court's discretion, depending on the nature of the question, the opportunity may appropriately consist of a sidebar.

Effective December 1, 1995, the State of Arizona by court rule authorized jurors to submit written questions to the court, provided that counsel are afforded an opportunity to object outside the presence of the jury. Ariz. R. Civ. P. 39(b)(1), (10). The Federal Judicial Center's Manual for Complex Litigation 3d§ 22.42 (1995) expressly notes that the trial court may, in its discretion, permit juror questioning.

The substance of this Standard is drawn in part from the cases and from the Arizona Rule. See, e.g., United States v. Sutton, 970 F.2d at 1005-06; United States v. Thompson, 76 F.3d 442 (2d Cir. 1996); United States v. Bascope-Zurita, 68 F.3d 1057, 1064 (8th Cir. 1995); Ariz. R. Civ. P. 39(b)(1), (10); Sommers v. Friedman, 493 N.W.2d 393, 399-400 (Wis. App. 1992); Spitzer v. Haims & Co., 217 Conn. at 546-47, 587 A.2d at 112-13; Rudolph v. Iowa Methodist Med. Ctr., 293 N.W.2d at 555-56; State v. Graves, 907 P.2d at 966-67; Dann & Logan, Jury Reform: The Arizona Experience

, 79 Judicature 280 (1996); Hon. William W. Schwarzer, Reforming Jury Trials, 132 F.R.D. 575, 592 (1990).

The Standard provides that jurors should identify themselves when submitting questions. This is designed to enable the parties and the judge to address any potential or apparent violations of the judge's instructions or the juror's duties.

5. Instructing the Jury.

a. Notice to Parties. Before delivering any instructions to the jury, the court should:
i. Inform counsel on the record of the content of the instructions it intends to deliver;

ii. Allow argument by counsel concerning the proposed instructions;

iii. Allow counsel to make a record of any objections; and

iv. Provide counsel with copies of the instructions.

b. Preliminary Instructions. Before opening statements begin, the court should give preliminary instructions that explain:

i. The jury's role;

ii. Trial procedures, including:
A. Juror note-taking;

B. Juror questioning; and

C. The nature of evidence and its evaluation;

iii. The issues in dispute; and

iv. The basic relevant legal principles.

c. Interim Instructions. During the trial, the court may sua sponte, and should upon request of a party, consider giving instructions at any point at which they might be helpful to the jury.

d. Final Instructions. The court should consider delivering final instructions on the law and other important matters prior to final argument. In all events, instructions concerning the appropriate procedures to be followed during deliberations -- and for reporting the results of deliberations -- should be given following closing argument.

e. Substance of Instructions.

i. Understandable Instructions. The instructions should be readily understood by lay persons of average education and sophistication.

ii. Conferral Requirement. The court should require counsel to confer on the substance of instructions before trial begins.

iii. Parties Not in Agreement. If counsel cannot agree, each party should be afforded the opportunity to submit proposed instructions and to comment upon any instructions proposed by another party. If, based upon the evidence presented at trial, the court determines that different or additional instructions are appropriate, it should permit counsel to confer, propose and comment on the substance of any such instructions before they are delivered by the court.

f. Availability During Deliberations. Final instructions should be provided for the jurors' use during deliberations.

Comment

This Standard is modeled on Standard 16(c) of the Standards Relating To Juror Use & Management (1993 rev. ed.) of the American Bar Association Judicial Administration Division and the National Center for State Courts, n3 with minor emendations. Subdivision (c) is drawn from Federal Judicial Center, Manual for Complex Litigation 3d § 22.433 (1995). The Standard is also consistent with the recommendations of: American Bar Association Section of Litigation/Brookings Institution, Charting a Future for the Civil Jury System 22-23 (1992); American Bar Association Section of Litigation, National Center for State Courts & State Justice Institute, Jury Trial Innovations §§ VI-1 to VI-5 (Munsterman et al. eds. 1997); Manual for Complex Litigation 3d §§ 22.432 and 22.434; Developments in the Law -- The Civil Jury, 110 Harv. L. Rev. 1408, 1503-07 (1997); Minnesota State Bar Association Civil Litigation Section, Committee on Civil Juries: Report at 7-8 (June 1995); and Robert E. Litan (ed.), Verdict: Assessing the Civil Jury System 444-46 (Brookings 1993).

Preliminary Instructions. The use of preliminary instructions has widespread support among members of the bench and bar, and former jurors, as a valuable aid to juror comprehension. See, e.g., New York State Bar Association Federal Courts Committee, Improving Jury Comprehension in Complex Civil Litigation 8-11 (July 1988); Hon. William W. Schwarzer, Reforming Jury Trials, 132 F.R.D. 575, 583-84 (1990); Ninth Circuit Council, Survey of Juror Attitudes: Final Report 7 (1986); Wisconsin Judicial Council Committee on Improving Jury Communications, Draft Final Report 17-18 (May 1985); Report of the Committee on Juries of the Judicial Council of the Second Circuit 42-43 (Aug. 1984); Manual for Complex Litigation 3d § 22.21.

Judges should develop standard preliminary jury instructions concerning the matters set forth in subdivision (b)(i) and (ii). These instructions should be made available for review in all cases by all counsel, who should be encouraged to suggest any additional instructions they believe would be helpful in their particular cases.

Procedures relating to juror questions and note-taking referred to in subdivision (b)(ii)(A)-(B) are set forth in Standards 3 and 4. Preliminary instructions should be included in juror notebooks distributed pursuant to Standard 2.

Substantive Instructions. Judges should require counsel to confer and to seek agreement on substantive instructions before trial begins. Where counsel cannot agree, each party should be required to submit proposed instructions and objections to the opponent's instructions before trial. The judge should consider having a pretrial conference to rule on instructions prior to trial. At a minimum, where there is dispute over basic, relevant legal principles, the court should advise counsel as to its determination of the law, which will be reflected in its preliminary instructions, so that counsel can prepare their openings, and otherwise finalize preparation of their cases, based on the court's resolution of the governing law.

Interim Instructions. The judge should consider summarizing the key points of law that govern the most important disputed issues not only at the outset of the case but also at those points in the trial when, in the court's judgment, it might assist the jurors. This practice offers several potential advantages:

> First, interim instructions ... may enhance the jury's ability to remember the evidence presented at trial. ... Second, by serving as a sort of continually updated roadmap of the issues in the case, interim instructions may increase the jury's ability to organize and assimilate evidence and ultimately to connect that evidence to the legal issues on which it bears. Third, ... interim instructions on matters of procedure (e.g., presumptions, the nature of reasonable inferences or the evaluation of credibility) ... allow jurors to > appreciate their significance ... [Fourth,] interim instructions ... may be better understood and more effectively applied by the jury than when they are buried in an omnibus charge at the close of trial.

New York State Bar Association Federal Courts Committee, Improving Jury Comprehension in Complex Civil Litigation 13-14 (July 1988).

Understandable Instructions. Instructions should be written in plain English, tailored to the facts of the case, and logically organized to assist the jurors in their deliberations. See generally Standard 16(c)(iii) of the ABA Standards Relating to Juror Use & Management and accompanying Commentary ("The instructions should be formulated and presented with primary concern for facilitating the jurors' understanding of the questions they must decide"). See also Jury Trial Innovations at § VI-2 ("The frustrations expressed by jurors during deliberations indicate a need to improve the clarity (and, thereby, the efficacy) of jury instructions").

Availability During Deliberations. Subdivision (f) reflects the view that the "[a]vailability of the ... charge in the jury room is almost certain to assist the jury in arriving at an informed verdict while reducing the need to send questions to the judge and to have parts of the charge re-read." Schwarzer, Reforming Jury Trials, 132 F.R.D. at 585. In accordance with subdivision (f), the final instructions may be included within juror notebooks, if those are provided pursuant to Standard 2. Instructions may also be provided to the jury on tape, if that is more useful or appropriate in certain cases.

6. Verdict: Form and Availability During Deliberations.

a. Form of Verdict. In cases of appropriate complexity, the court should consider the desirability of a special verdict form tailored to the issues in the case.

b. Submissions from Parties. The court should afford the parties the opportunity to propose for the court's consideration an agreed form of verdict to be submitted to the jury.

i. Parties Not in Agreement. If counsel cannot agree on a form of verdict, each party should be afforded the opportunity to propose a form of verdict and to comment upon any proposal submitted by another party.

ii. Judicially Fashioned Verdict Form. The court should afford counsel the opportunity to comment upon any form of verdict that it fashions independently of the parties.

c. Availability. A copy of the verdict form should be provided to each juror for use during deliberations. Where the court determines that it will assist the jurors, a copy of the verdict form should be available to each juror during closing arguments and final instructions.

Comment

Subdivisions (a)-(b). Subject to governing law, the court has the discretion to submit any of a broad array of potential verdict forms to the jury. This Standard recognizes that "[c]hoosing among these alternatives is not subject to scientific precision; each has desirable and undesirable features." New York State Bar Association Federal Courts Committee, Improving Jury Comprehension in Complex Civil Litigation 31 (July 1988). Accordingly, counsel should be permitted to be heard on this subject.

To assist the court and expedite the trial, the parties should be encouraged to agree on a verdict form. The court may provide sample verdict forms to counsel to expedite the process. If the parties come to agreement, and the agreed form is neither defective under applicable law nor otherwise inappropriate, the court should ordinarily furnish that form to the jury. If the parties disagree, the court should receive submissions from the parties and fashion an appropriate form of verdict, permitting the parties to be heard on the judicially-crafted form.

Subdivision (c). The purpose of providing each juror with a copy of the verdict form is to assist them with their deliberations. It will also make it easier for each juror -- especially if a special verdict is involved -- to answer questions if the jury is polled at the end of the case. The verdict form may be included within juror notebooks, if those are provided pursuant to Standard 2.

7. Exhibit Availability During Jury Deliberations.

a. Generally. Exhibits admitted into evidence should ordinarily be provided to the jury for use during deliberations.

b. Aids. The court may provide the jurors with aids to facilitate their review of the evidence.

c. Exhibits Offered for Limited Purposes. If an exhibit that has been admitted for any limited purpose is provided for juror use during deliberations, the court should consider re-instructing the jury as to the limited purpose for which the exhibit was admitted.

Comment

Subdivision (a) is animated by the widespread conviction that jurors should ordinarily be permitted to review the tangible evidence during their deliberations. If the evidence is voluminous, the court may invite counsel to identify those exhibits that they wish initially be delivered to the jury room. If certain evidence is potentially dangerous to the jurors, the court may prefer to substitute, at least initially, a photograph for the jurors' use.

Subdivision (b) recognizes that certain types of aids may be necessary for the jury to review evidence efficiently -- or, in some cases, at all -- during deliberations. One category of aid is mechanical, such as a videocassette recorder to view a videotape. A second type may be textual, such as an index to facilitate retrieval and review of documents. The Standard is drafted broadly in view of the large number of items that fall within this category, including those to be developed in the future. In exercising its discretion in this regard, the court should take into account any risk that the aid sent to the jury room, coupled with whatever else is available to the jury, might be used for improper experimentation purposes.

Subdivision (c) is drawn from the cases, which find that certain admonitory instructions may be appropriate when evidence admitted for a limited purpose is sent to the jury room. See, e.g., United States v. Cox, 633 F.2d 871, 874 (9th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 844 (1981); State v. Lord, 117 Wash. 2d 829, 856-57, 822 P.2d 177, 193-94 (1991).

8. Post-Trial Contact of Jurors by Counsel.

a. Notification of Jury. At the time that the jury is dismissed -- or earlier if counsel is not expected to be present when the jury is dismissed -- the court should inform the jurors in the presence of counsel:

i. Approach. Whether counsel may approach them after the trial has concluded and, if so, ii. Discretion. That the jurors are free to discuss the trial with counsel, or to refuse to do so, in their discretion.

b. Authorization. Unless prohibited by law, the court should ordinarily permit counsel to contact jurors after their terms of jury service have expired, subject, in the court's discretion, to reasonable restrictions.

Comment

Because different jurisdictions, and different judges within the same jurisdiction, sometimes have conflicting views on this matter, the judge should inform the jury, in the presence of counsel, whether counsel may discuss the case with individual jurors after the trial has concluded. If post-trial discussions are permitted, the jurors should be apprised of their right to decline to participate, if they so choose.

Except in unusual circumstances, the court should exercise its discretion in favor of permitting counsel to contact jurors after their terms of jury service have expired. See, e.g., Delvaux v. Ford Motor Co., 764 F.2d 469, 471 (7th Cir. 1985) ("Considerations of some weight favor allowing such questioning"). The exchange may enhance the understanding of both participants. Lawyers areindependently prohibited from asking questions of, or making comments to, a discharged juror for the purpose of harassing or embarrassing the juror, or influencing the juror's actions in future jury service. See, e.g., ABA Model Rule of Professional Conduct 4.4; ABA Model Code of Professional Responsibility DR 7-108(D).

9. Inquiry into Jury Misconduct.

a. Allegation of Juror Misconduct.

i. Court. Upon receipt of an allegation of juror misconduct, the court should promptly apprise the parties and afford them the opportunity to be heard as to whether the allegation warrants further inquiry or other judicial action.

ii. Counsel. Counsel should promptly refer an allegation of juror misconduct to the court and to counsel for all parties in the proceeding.

b. Nature and Scope of Inquiry. If the court determines that the allegation of juror misconduct warrants further inquiry, it should consult with counsel concerning the nature and scope of the inquiry, including:

i. Which jurors should be questioned;

ii. Whether the court or counsel should ask the questions; and

iii. The substance of the questions.

c. Relief. If the court ascertains that juror misconduct has occurred, it should afford counsel the opportunity to be heard as to an appropriate remedy.

d. Pendency of Deliberations. If the allegation of juror misconduct is received while the jury is deliberating, the recipient must ensure as quickly as possible that the court and counsel are informed of it, and the court should proceed as promptly as practicable to ascertain the facts and to fashion an appropriate remedy.

Comment

Not all allegations of juror misconduct are substantial or require examination. A juror's statement that he or she acquiesced in a verdict but did so harboring doubts is facially insufficient to impeach the verdict. In contrast, a juror's statement that jurors consulted an encyclopedia or text book during deliberations will ordinarily necessitate further inquiry. Whenever an allegation of misconduct is received, it must promptly be brought to the attention of all concerned, regardless of whether the recipient deems the allegation likely to lead to juror disqualification or verdict impeachment. If the jury is still deliberating at the time the allegation is received, time is of the essence to permit the court to decide, on an adequate record, whether a remedy short of a mistrial (or disqualification of too many jurors) is available and appropriate.

6-C Federal Rules of Evidence Manual PART TWO

PART TWO JUDICIAL PARTICIPATION IN DEVELOPING EVIDENCE

10. Questioning by the Court in Jury Trials. A trial court may question a witness if necessary to assist the jury but should exercise self-restraint and preserve an atmosphere of impartiality and detachment.

a. Subject Matter. Generally, the court should not question a witness about subject matter not raised by any party with that witness, unless the court has provided the parties an opportunity, outside the hearing of the jury, to explain the omission. If the court believes that questioning on the subject is necessary, the court should afford the parties an opportunity to develop the subject on further examination prior to questioning the witness itself.

b. Illustrations. The court may exercise its discretion to:
i. Ask questions that clarify answers given by a witness;

ii. Ask a witness to repeat an answer that the court had difficulty hearing or believes the jury might have had difficulty hearing;

iii. Assist counsel who is having difficulty properly formulating a question;

iv. Direct an evasive or unresponsive witness to answer a question; or

v. Instruct a witness as to the court's expectations of all witnesses.

c. Impeachment; Rehabilitation; Emphasis. Except in unusual circumstances, the court should not seek to impeach or to rehabilitate a witness, nor seek to emphasize or de-emphasize the importance of any witness or testimony.

d. Instruction. The court should instruct the jury that questions from the court, like questions from the lawyers, are not evidence; that only the answers are evidence; that questions by the court should not be given special weight or emphasis; and that the fact that the court asks a question does not reflect a view on the merits of the case or of the credibility of any witness.

Comment

This Standard starts from the premise that witness questioning is ordinarily for counsel, not the court. The basic principle that the trial judge "should exercise self-restraint and preserve an atmosphere of impartiality and detachment" is drawn from Judge Augustus Hand's opinion in Pariser v. City of New York, 146 F.2d 431, 433 (2d Cir. 1945). Accord People v. Hawkins, 10 Cal. 4th 920, 42 Cal. Rptr. 2d 636, 897 P.2d 574, 589 (1995); People v. Melendez, 634 N.Y.S.2d 607, 608-09 (App. Div. 1996); Auger v. Auger, 149 Vt. 559, 563, 546 A.2d 1373, 1375 (1988) (" 'Active judicial interrogation runs afoul of basic principles underlying the adversary system' ") (citation omitted); Federal Judicial Center, Manual for Complex Litigation 3d § 22.24 (1995). This Standard nonetheless recognizes that for certain limited purposes the trial court may "question witnesses, as an aid to the jury, so long as it does not step across the line and become an advocate for one side." United States v. Filani, 74 F.3d 378, 385 (2d Cir. 1996).

The corollaries articulated in subdivisions (a) through (c) are drawn from practice and reflect numerous decisions. See, e.g., United States v. Dreamer, 88 F.3d 655, 659 (8th Cir. 1996); United States v. Castner, 50 F.3d 1267 (4th Cir. 1995); United States v. Evans, 994 F.2d 317 (7th Cir.), cert. Denied, 114 S. Ct. 335 (1993); United States v. Gonzalez-Torres, 980 F.2d 788 (1st Cir. 1992); Johnson v. Celotex Corp., 899 F.2d 1281 (2d Cir.), cert. Denied, 111 S. Ct. 297 (1990); Van Leirsburg v. Sioux Valley Hosp., 831 F.2d 169 (8th Cir. 1987); United States v. Block, 755 F.2d 770 (11th Cir. 1985); Lane v. Wallace, 579 F.2d 1200 (10th Cir. 1978). See generally 2 Saltzburg, Martin & Capra, Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1005-06 (6th ed. 1994); Federal Judicial Center, Manual for Complex Litigation 3d § 22.24 (1995).

In dealing with inexperienced counsel, particularly those with little or no trial experience, the court from time to time may interject questions without consulting counsel in order to save time. This may be especially appropriate when opposing counsel makes numerous objections to the form of questions and those objections have merit. The court may suggest to counsel questions that would avoid objections as to form.

In any case in which the court asks more than a few questions, at a recess when the jury is absent, the court should inquire whether counsel believe the court's questions were either objectionable or otherwise counterproductive. Although objections may be made outside the presence of the jury under Federal Rule of Evidence 614(c) and analogous rules in effect in most states (see 2 Joseph & Saltzburg, Evidence in America: The Federal Rules in the States §§ 48.2, 48.3 (Supp. 1994)), counsel often will be reluctant to volunteer objections to the court's questions. The court can ameliorate counsel's concern about questioning the court's decision to intervene with a witness by inviting counsel's views. n4

11. Court-Appointed Experts. The court may appoint an expert to serve as a judicial tutor as to esoteric subject matter or, in exceptional cases, as a witness to testify at a trial. The same expert may serve in both capacities.

a. Selection.

i. The court should invite the parties to recommend jointly an expert to be appointed by the court.

ii. If the parties cannot agree, the court should invite them to submit names of a specified number of experts with a summary of their qualifications and an explanation of the manner in which those qualifications "fit" the issues in the case.

iii. The court may choose one or more experts recommended by each party; it may choose one or more experts from those recommended by any of the parties; or it may reject the experts recommended by the parties and select an expert unilaterally.

iv. Before selecting an expert, the court should:

A. Consider seeking recommendations from a relevant professional organization or entity that is responsible for setting standards or evaluating qualifications of persons who have expertise in the relevant area, or from the academic community, and

B. Afford the parties an opportunity to object to the appointee on the basis of bias, qualifications or experience.

b. Scope of Expert's Duties. The court should afford the parties the opportunity to participate in defining the scope of the expert's duties.

c. Communications between Court and Expert. The court should ensure that the parties are aware of all communications pertaining to the merits between the court and a court-appointed expert by:

i. Permitting the parties to be present when the court meets or speaks with the expert;

ii. Providing that all communications between court and expert will be in writing with copies to the parties; or

iii. Recording oral communications between court and expert and making a transcript or copy of the recording available to the parties.

d. Communications between Parties and Expert. The court should ensure that every party is:

i. Informed of, and afforded the opportunity to explore, in advance of trial, the findings and opinions of any court-appointed expert; and

ii. Aware of all communications between any party and a court-appointed expert by:

A. Permitting all parties to be present when any party meets or speaks with the expert, or

B. Providing that all communications between any party and the expert will be in writing with copies to all parties.

e. Testimony at Trial. If an expert witness appointed by the court testifies at trial:

i. Questioning. The court ordinarily should not call and question the witness. The witness should be examined by counsel, in an order determined by the court.

ii. No Identification as Court Appointee. The witness should not ordinarily be identified as one appointed by the court.

iii. If Identified as Court Appointee. If the court determines that, in the circumstances, it is appropriate to identify the witness as a court appointee, the court should instruct the jury that:

A. It is not to give greater weight to the testimony of a court-appointed expert than any other witness simply because the court chose the expert;

B. The jury may consider the fact that the witness is not retained by either party in evaluating the witness's opinion; and

C. The jury should carefully assess the nature of, and basis for, each witness's opinion.

Comment

Trial judges have inherent authority to appoint experts as technical advisors to assist the court. See, e.g., Reilly v. United States, 863 F.2d 149, 156-57 (1st Cir. 1988); Note, Improving Judicial Gatekeeping: Technical Advisors and Scientific Evidence, 110 Harv. L. Rev. 941, 949-51 (1997). They may also appoint expert witnesses for testimonial purposes under Federal Rule of Evidence 706(c) and similar provisions in force in most states. 2 Joseph & Saltzburg, Evidence in America: The Federal Rules in the States §§ 55.2, 55.3 (Supp. 1994). This Standard applies to experts appointed in either capacity.

Courts should be reluctant to have court-appointed experts testify in jury trials. Identification of an expert with the court may artificially enhance that expert's status and confer a false aura of authority and credibility. n5 It may be difficult for a jury to understand why a court-appointed expert was retained and how the expert is being compensated. The process through which a court-appointed expert arrives at an opinion is often one from which counsel have been excluded. The result may be that neither counsel is comfortable with the approach the expert has taken.

A court-appointed expert may aid both in decision-making and in settlement. Among the myriad services such an expert may provide are: to advise the court on technical issues, to provide the jury with background information, or to offer an opinion on disputed technical issues. The appointment of experts by the court is rare, among other reasons, because of: (1) the cost involved; (2) the difficulty of finding truly neutral experts; (3) the concern that testimony from a court-appointed expert -- if the fact of court appointment is disclosed to the jury n6-- may be perceived as the court taking sides in the controversy; (4) the potential delay involved; and (5) the recurring problem that, by the time the need is known, the appointment may entail significant delay in the proceedings. See generallyFederal Judicial Center, Manual for Complex Litigation 3d § 21.51 (1995); Cecil & Willging, Court-Appointed Experts: Defining the Role of Experts Appointed Under Federal Rule of Evidence 706 (Federal Judicial Center 1993) ("Cecil & Willging, Court-Appointed Experts").

The court is not free to engage in substantive ex parte discussions with court-appointed experts on the merits of the case. Canon 3A(4) of the Code of Conduct for United States Judges, for example, provides: "A judge should ... except as authorized by law, neither initiate nor consider ex parte communications on the merits, or procedures affecting the merits, of a pending or impending proceeding." Subdivision (c) of this Standard is designed to afford the court the latitude it needs to communicate with the court-appointed expert while preserving the parties' rights to be fully apprised of discussions between judge and expert pertaining to the merits.

The procedures suggested in this Standard are drawn from a variety of sources, including the Reilly case; the Federal Judicial Center's Manual for Complex Litigation 3d § 21.51; Cecil & Willging, Court-Appointed Experts; and Cecil & Willging, Court-Appointed Experts, in Federal Judicial Center, Reference Manual on Scientific EvidencE 525-71 (1994); American Bar Association Section of Litigation, National Center for State Courts & State Justice Institute, Jury Trial Innovations § IV-4 (Munsterman et al. eds. 1997). See also Note, Improving Judicial Gatekeeping: Technical Advisors and Scientific Evidence, 110 Harv. L. Rev. 941, 954-58 (1997).

Most evidence codes permit the trial court, in its discretion, to disclose the fact of the appointment of the expert witness by the court. See, e.g., Fed. R. Evid. 706(c); Cal. Evid. Code § 722(a); and the numerous state evidence codes modeled on the Federal Rules. Joseph & Saltzburg, Evidence in America: The Federal Rules in the States at §§ 55.2, 55.3.

However, this Standard reflects the view -- borne out by Federal Judicial Center research -- that, if the expert's court-appointed status is disclosed, "concern about undue influence [on the jury] seems reasonable." Cecil & Willging, Court-Appointed Experts at 51.

The court may prohibit ex parte communications between the parties and a court-appointed expert. This may be impractical where, for example, the expert needs to contact one or more parties for specimens to examine. Subdivision (d)(ii) is operative only if the court has not prohibited such contact. Subdivision (d)(i) contemplates that, if the court-appointed expert is to testify at trial, the expert will be subject to the same type and degree of discovery (e.g., deposition, disclosure, interrogatories) as a party-proffered expert.

FOOTNOTES:

(n5)Footnote 4. Although the court has the power to call witnesses under Fed. R. Evid. 614(a) and analogous state provisions, this power is rarely exercised, probably because the court has no opportunity to prepare a witness to testify and may, by calling an unprepared witness, inject evidence into a case that might damage a party unfairly. The court, especially in a bench trial, may invite a party to explain the failure to call a witness, particularly when the failure to call a witness might give rise to an adverse inference. The court should, however, bear in mind that the party may have made a conscious and informed judgment not to call the witness, and that judgment should ordinarily be respected.

(n6)Footnote 5. In European countries in which judges decide civil cases to the exclusion of juries, court-appointed experts are not uncommon and, according to a noted comparative law scholar, "[t]he fear is spreading that courts are covertly delegating decision-making powers to an outsider without political legitimacy. ... Regularly subjected to dueling experts, adjudicators need not surrender to the authority of science as blindly as those confronted with a single opinion of their chosen expert: they can decide whom to believe by engaging their ordinary judgments of witness[es]' credibility." Damaska, Evidence Law Adrift 151-52 (1997).

APPENDIX C: CIVIL TRIAL PRACTICE STANDARDS

6-C Federal Rules of Evidence Manual PART THREE

PART THREE JUDICIAL CONTROL OVER TRIAL PRESENTATION

12. Limits on Trial Presentation.

a. Procedure. Limits on trial presentation should be imposed only after the court has:
i. Made an informed analysis of the case and of the parties' plans for trial;

ii. Discussed with the parties the possibility of voluntary, self-imposed limits; and

iii. Afforded the parties the opportunity to be heard as to the amount of time, or number of witnesses or exhibits, they believe they require in order to present their positions fairly.

b. Discretion. Subject to the judge's ultimate responsibility to ensure a fair trial and to afford the parties a fair opportunity to be heard, the court should consider whether to enforce voluntary limits agreed to by the parties or to impose reasonable limits on trial presentation, including limits on:

i. The total time to be allowed each party or side for all direct and cross-examinations;

ii. The length of examination and cross-examination of particular witnesses;

iii. The number of witnesses or exhibits to be offered on a particular issue or in the aggregate; and

iv. The length of opening statements and closing arguments.

c. Notice to Parties. The court should notify the parties of any limits it intends to impose sufficiently in advance of trial to permit them to prepare their cases accordingly.

d. Factors. In fashioning trial presentation limits, the court should consider:

i. The complexity of the case;

ii. The claims and defenses of the parties;

iii. The respective evidentiary burdens of the parties;

iv. The subject matter of evidence that is considered for limitation; and

v. Whether proposed limits allocate trial time fairly.

e. Types of Limits. If the court determines that limits are appropriate, it is generally preferable to limit the total amount of time allocated to each party or side, rather than to limit the number of witnesses or exhibits, or the duration of a particular examination.

f. Modification. The court should reassess imposed limits in light of developments during trial, and may grant an extension upon a showing of good cause. After trial has commenced, the court ordinarily should not shorten imposed limits, in light of the parties' reliance thereon, absent disposition of claims or defenses as to which evidence or argument was planned.

Comment

The power of the court to impose reasonable time limits on a trial derives from the inherent power of the court and from codified sources such as Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(c)(4) and (15), Fed. R. Evid. 403 and 611(a), and analogous provisions in force in most states. MCI Communications Corp. v. AT&T Co., 708 F.2d 1081, 1170-71 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 891 (1983); Hicks v. Commonwealth, 805 S.W.2d 144, 151 (Ky. App. 1991); Varnum v. Varnum, 586 A.2d 1107, 1114-15 (Vt. 1990); Federal Judicial Center, Manual for Complex Litigation 3d §§ 21.643, 22.35 (1995); 1 Joseph & Saltzburg, Evidence in America: The Federal Rules in the States §§ 13.2, 13.3 (Supp. 1994); 2 Id. §§ 45.2, 45.3.

The Federal Judicial Center counsels that "courts should be reluctant to interfere with counsel's control over the presentation of their case and should ensure that each side has the opportunity to present its case fully and fairly." Manual for Complex Litigation 3d § 22.35 (1995). This Standard is premised on this principle and the corollary that trial courts therefore "should not exercise this discretion as a matter of course," Duquesne Light Co. v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 66 F.3d 604, 609 (3d Cir. 1995), and witnesses should not be excluded "on the basis of mere numbers." MCI Communications Corp. v. AT&T Co., 708 F.2d 1081, 1170-71 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 891 (1983). In many cases, efficient management of court time can obviate the need for the imposition of time limits. See generally Final Report of the Civil Justice Reform Act Advisory Group for the United States District Court for the District of Columbia at Part D, Recommendations 31-34, pp. 66-68 (1993).

Tailored judicial scrutiny is necessary before any limits are imposed. The court should ascertain at the outset whether counsel can voluntarily satisfy the court's reasonable concerns about its docket and the jury since, by definition, they know the case far more intimately than the court. For the same reason, if limits are appropriate, it is generally preferable to limit the total amount of time allocated to each party or side, rather than to limit the number of witnesses or exhibits, or the duration of a particular direct or cross-examination. See Hon. Pierre N. Leval, From the Bench: Westmoreland v. CBS, 12 Litigation No. 1 at 7 (Fall 1985); Hon. William W. Schwarzer, Reforming Jury Trials, 132 F.R.D. 575, 579 (1990); American Bar Association Section of Litigation, National Center for State Courts & State Justice Institute, Jury Trial Innovations § IV-1 (Munsterman et al. eds. 1997).

Before imposing limits, the court should indicate to counsel its own view of the time that should be required for trial in cases in which the court believes that counsel's assessment is unrealistic or that the time requested is so clearly excessive as to amount to an unacceptable drain on public resources and imposition on the jury. The court should provide counsel with an opportunity to reassess their time requirements and seek, where possible, to reach a consensus on a realistic trial schedule before imposing its own view. In no event should the court permit any party to be prejudiced because of arbitrary time limits.

The substance of this Standard is drawn in part from the case law (see, e.g., General Signal Corp. v. MCI Telecommunications Corp., 66 F.3d 1500, 1508 (9th Cir. 1995); Duquesne Light Co. v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 66 F.3d 604, 609 (3d Cir. 1995)); the Federal Judicial Center's Manual for Complex Litigation 3d §§ 21.643, 22.35 (1995); and ABA Trial Management Standards 1, 2 and 3 (1992).

13. Interim Statements and Arguments.

a. Discretion. In cases of appropriate complexity, the court should afford counsel the opportunity during trial to address the jury to comment on, or to place in context, the evidence that has been, or will be, presented.

b. Factors. In deciding whether to permit counsel to address the jury during trial, the court should consider:

i. The duration of the trial;

ii. The number and complexity of the legal and factual issues; and

iii. The volume and complexity of the evidence.

c. Procedure.

i. The court should allow each side to address the jury.

ii. Time should be allocated equally to each side or equitably if there are conflicting interests among parties on the same side.

iii. The court may:

A. Allocate to each party or side a total amount of time that may be used at counsel's discretion at any reasonable point during the trial;

B. Allocate to each party or side a certain amount of time that must be used within prescribed intervals or will be forfeited; or

C. Schedule interim addresses at prescribed points during the trial.

iv. If timing is left to counsel's discretion pursuant to subdivision (c)(iii)(A) or (B), counsel may not choose a time that interferes with another party's presentation of evidence or with the court's schedule.

v. Counsel's remarks should be confined to the meaning or significance of the evidence and its relationship to the issues.

vi. The court should remind the jury of the difference between evidence and counsel's statements.

Comment

Permitting counsel to address the jury to comment on the evidence in long or complex cases, or cases dealing with particularly complicated evidence or issues, is endorsed by the Federal Judicial Center, Manual for Complex Litigation 3d §§ 22.21, 22.34 (1995), and is not uncommon. See, e.g., Consorti v. Armstrong World Indus., 72 F.3d 1003, 1008 (2d Cir. 1995); ACandS, Inc. v. Godwin, 340 Md. 334, 407-09, 667 A.2d 116, 152-53 (1995). See also Robert E. Litan (ed.), Verdict: Assessing the Civil Jury System 389 (Brookings 1993); Hon. Robert M. Parker, Streamlining Complex Cases, 10 Rev. Litig. 547, 553-54 (1991); Hon. Pierre N. Leval, From the Bench: Westmoreland v. CBS, 12 Litigation No. 1 at 66-67 (Fall 1985). This Standard adopts the flexible approach urged by these authorities, recognizing that juror comprehension may substantially be advanced by affording counsel the opportunity to summarize and place in context evidence that has been, or is to be, presented.

Whether these interim remarks to the jury should be characterized as "interim argument," which is the description frequently found in the cases (see, e.g., Armstrong and ACandS, supra), or "supplementary opening statements," which is the Federal Judicial Center's phrase (Manual for Complex Litigation 3d § 22.34), is less important than a clear recognition of the purpose: to afford counsel the opportunity to comment on the meaning and significance of evidence as it is presented. Highly inflammatory rhetoric is out of place. See, e.g., AcandS, 340 Md. at 407-09, 667 A.2d at 152-53.

14. Order of Proceedings. In cases of appropriate complexity, the court should exercise its discretion to alter the traditional order of trial where that will enhance jury comprehension and recollection or facilitate the effective presentation of evidence and argument, without unfair advantage to either side. Among the alternatives the court should consider are:

a. Venire Panel. In advance of voir dire, presenting to the entire venire panel: i. Preliminary instructions (see Standard 4(a), supra), and ii. Opening statements (in either abbreviated or complete form).

b. Issue Organization. Organizing the trial by issue, or clusters of issues, with each party presenting its opening statement and evidence on a designated subject matter before proceeding to the next.

c. Interim Instructions. Giving interim instructions (see Standard 5(b), supra).

d. Interim Statements and Arguments. Permitting interim statements and arguments (see Standard 13, supra).

e. Sequential Verdicts. Submitting issues or claims to the jury sequentially, if a decision on one issue may render others moot or may facilitate settlement, or if alternative claims involve differing or conflicting theories of liability or damages.

f. Post-Impasse Argument. Permitting additional arguments by counsel after the jury has reached an impasse in deliberations.

Comment

The court is vested with the inherent power to control the mode and order of proceedings before it, a power that is codified in part in Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(c)(13)-(14), 42, 50 and 52, and Fed. R. Evid. 611(a), and analogous provisions in force in most states. See, e.g., 2 Joseph & Saltzburg, Evidence in America: The Federal Rules in the States §§ 45.2, 45.3 (Supp. 1994).

This Standard is drawn from a variety of sources in addition to the general precepts of Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(c)(13)-(14), 42, 50 and 52, and Fed. R. Evid. 611(a), including Federal Judicial Center, Manual for Complex Litigation 3d §§ 22.34, 22.432 (1995) (sequencing of evidence and arguments; sequential verdicts; preliminary instructions); American Bar Association Section of Litigation, National Center for State Courts & State Justice Institute, Jury Trial Innovations § VI-11 (Munsterman et al. eds. 1997) (post-impasse argument); Hon. William W. Schwarzer, Reforming Jury Trials, 132 F.R.D. 575, 594-96 (1990) (issue organization; interim statements or summations); and Saltzburg, The Quality of Jury Decisionmaking, in Robert E. Litan (ed.), Verdict: Assessing the Civil Jury System 361 (Brookings 1993) (sequential verdicts).

15. Demonstrative Evidence.

a. Preview. As with all other exhibits, the court should afford each party an adequate opportunity to review, and interpose objections to, demonstrative evidence before it is displayed to the jury.

b. Unwieldy Evidence. Voluminous, complicated or other information that cannot conveniently be examined in court should be presented, when practicable, in the form of a chart, diagram, graph or other demonstrative evidence. At the request of a party, the court should provide guidance concerning admissibility before substantial expense is incurred.

Comment

Demonstrative evidence is the generic label applied to exhibits that share the common characteristic of visualizing for the factfinder data that have been, or can be, admitted into evidence. Common types include diagrams, charts, graphs, models, photographs, maps, plats, videotapes, animations, and computer simulations. Although demonstrative evidence has occasionally been contrasted with "real" evidence, most courts now hold that in some circumstances, and with a proper foundation, demonstrative evidence may be admitted for all. (See the Comment to Standard 8.) For example, a chart that summarizes voluminous, admissible data may be independently admissible into evidence under Rule 1006 of the Federal Rules of Evidence and analogous provisions in force in most states (2 Joseph & Saltzburg, Evidence in America: The Federal Rules in the States §§ 70.2-70.3 (Supp. 1994)). Similarly, photographs are admissible as substantive evidence. United States v. May, 622 F.2d 1000, 1007 (9th Cir.), cert. Denied, 449 U.S. 984 (1980); State v. Pulphus, 465 A.2d 153, 161 (R.I. Sup. Ct. 1983); 3 Wigmore, Evidence § 790 (Chadbourn rev.).

Subdivision (a). Because demonstrative evidence can be quite potent, it should not be shown to the jury until the court is satisfied that the evidence is admissible. This Standard therefore articulates the practical necessity that the opponent be afforded the opportunity to view the exhibit -- and raise any objection -- before it is shown to the jury. This Standard reflects the procedure suggested by the case law and the Federal Judicial Center. See, e.g., Robinson v. Missouri, 16 F.3d 1083, 1088 (10th Cir. 1994); Brandt v. French, 638 F.2d 209, 212 (10th Cir. 1981); Mills v. Nichols, 467 So. 2d 924, 930-31 (Miss. Sup. Ct. 1985); Federal Judicial Center, Manual for Complex Litigation 3d § 22.21 (1995). Under the 1993 amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Rules 26(a)(2)(B)-(C) and 26(a)(3)(C) require the pretrial disclosure of all non-impeachment exhibits, including demonstrative evidence. See also Standard 18 (Motions in Limine).

Subdivision (b). Generally, "[c]ourts look favorably upon the use of demonstrative evidence because it helps the jury understand the issues raised at trial." People v. Burrows, 148 Ill. App. 3d 208, 213, 498 N.E.2d 682 (1986). See also Hon. William W. Schwarzer, Reforming Jury Trials, 132 F.R.D. 575, 588 (1990) ("Much evidence becomes more comprehensible when presented with visual aids, such as a chart summarizing data, a chronology, an enlarged picture of an object, a diagram of a building, or a map."). Exercising powers such as those codified in Federal Rule of Evidence 611(a), which most states have adopted (2 Joseph & Saltzburg, Evidence in America: The Federal Rules in the StateS §§ 45.2-45.3 (Supp. 1994)), the court should encourage counsel to package information in the most concise and understandable format. At the same time, because the reduction of voluminous or complicated data into demonstrative form can be expensive, the court should provide a requesting party with a preliminary ruling or at least parameters of admissibility before substantial expense is incurred. This subdivision reflects the view set forth in the Federal Judicial Center's Manual for Complex Litigation 3d §§ 21.492, 21.64, 21.642 (1995), and in American Bar Association Section of Litigation/Brookings Institution symposium report, Charting a Future for the Civil Jury System 22 (1992).

> 16. Multiple Parties & Questioning. In a case involving multiple parties, the court should encourage the parties to cooperate in, coordinate, and streamline, the presentation of evidence and the making of objections, and it should be receptive to their efforts to do so. Unless the parties agree to the contrary, the court should permit each separately-represented party to develop the testimony of each witness, subject to reasonable time limitations and avoidance of repetition.

Comment

In any case involving multiple plaintiffs, defendants or other parties on the same side of the caption, there is sometimes an understandable temptation to restrict counsel for co-parties from independently exploring the same subject matter. There is an inherent tension between the systemic need to avoid the needless presentation of cumulative evidence and the parties' need to ensure that salient evidence has been adequately elucidated. Because the parties are most familiar with the evidence, it is sensible in the first instance to encourage them to attempt to reach agreement on procedures that will facilitate the presentation of evidence -- e.g., by designating principal examiners or cross-examiners for particular witnesses -- and to permit an objection made by one party to extend to all parties on the same side of the caption. Except in unusual circumstances, and subject to reasonable time limitations and avoidance of repetition, the court should ordinarily be receptive to the parties' efforts in this regard.

While it is appropriate and necessary for the judge to be vigilant about avoiding waste of court time, the judge should simultaneously be sensitive to arguments that certain subject matter has not been covered, or has been only inadequately covered, by prior questioning. The court should also take into account the existence of any differences in position among parties that are ostensibly aligned in interest (whether or not those differences are in the nature of, or have maturedto, cross-claims, third-party claims or any other sort of formal adversity) and the risk of potential prejudice if apparent coordination by counsel on questioning might generate an inference on the part of the jurors going to the merits (e.g., in a case alleging civil conspiracy). Hence, if the parties are unable to reach agreement, each party should presumptively be afforded an opportunity to examine each witness in a non-repetitive, expeditious fashion.

With respect to voir dire in cases involving multiple parties, see Standard 1(b)(ii).

PART FOUR EXPERT AND SCIENTIFIC EVIDENCE

17. "Qualifying" Expert Witnesses. Except in ruling on an objection, the court should not, in the presence of the jury, declare that a witness is qualified as an expert or to render an expert opinion, and counsel should not ask the court to do so.

Comment

It is not uncommon for a proponent of expert testimony to tender an expert witness to the judge, following a recitation of the witness's credentials and before eliciting an opinion, in an effort to secure a ruling that the witness is "qualified" as an expert in a particular field. The tactical purpose, from the proponent's perspective, is to obtain a seeming judicial endorsement of the testimony to follow. It is inappropriate for counsel to place the court in that position.

A judicial ruling that a proffered expert is "qualified" prior to the time that counsel has posed a precise question eliciting expert testimony is premature and -- unless an objection is interposed -- unnecessary. In the words of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, "the key question is not the expert's general qualifications in some field, but whether the precise question on which he will be asked to opine is within his field of expertise or meets some other test. ..." Berry v. City of Detroit, 25 F.3d 1342, 1351 (6th Cir. 1994) (citation and internal quotations omitted).

Experts are no different from other witnesses in this regard. It is unnecessary for the court to rule on the competency of any witness prior to the time that the witness has been asked a question to which an objection -- on competency grounds -- is interposed. Only if competency is challenged need the court rule on that subject.

Because expert testimony is not entitled to greater weight than other testimony, the practice of securing what may appear to be a judicial endorsement is undesirable for that reason as well. As United States District Judge Charles R. Richey has observed in a related context, "It may be an inappropriate judicial comment ... for the court to label a witness an'expert.' " Hon. Charles R. Richey, Proposals to Eliminate the Prejudicial Effect of the Use of the Word "Expert" Under the Federal Rules of Evidence in Civil and Criminal Jury Trials, 154 F.R.D. 537, 554 (1994). The prejudicial effect of this practice is accentuated in cases in which only one side can afford to, or does, proffer expert testimony.

6-C Federal Rules of Evidence Manual PART FIVE

PART FIVE MOTIONS IN LIMINE

18. Motions & Rulings.

a. Timing & Subjects. In advance of trial, counsel should seek, and the court should provide, judicial resolution of significant evidentiary and legal issues that are susceptible of pretrial adjudication and are likely to have an impact of consequence on the trial. Counsel should refrain from making, and the court should defer ruling on, any motion in limine if the nature of the evidence at issue cannot fairly be discerned, or its relevance or significance determined, prior to trial.

b. Conferral Requirement. Counsel should be required to confer in an effort to resolve motions in limine before filing any with the court.

c. Rulings. The court should issue its ruling before opening statements begin, stating for the record whether its decision is final or whether it prefers to revisit the issue during trial if the objection or proffer is renewed.

Comment

The use of the motion in limine (literally a "threshold motion") to secure a ruling on the admissibility of evidence prior to trial is firmly established in state and federal court. See generally Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(c)(3)-(4) and analogous state provisions; Saltzburg, Tactics of the Motion in Limine, 9 Litigation No. 4 at 17 (1983); Hyde, The Motion in Limine, 27 U. Fla. L. Rev. 531 (1975). This Standard is predicated on the recognition that certain types of evidentiary rulings often require context -- e.g., whether certain evidence is: (1) relevant; (2) more probative than prejudicial; (3) cumulative; (4) unduly delaying, time-consuming or confusing; and (5) sufficiently trustworthy to fall within certain hearsay exceptions.

The Standard also operates to mitigate some of the practical problems associated with the fact that the rules as to the appealability of in limine decisionsare far from clear. Compare United States v. Vest, 842 F.2d 1319, 1325 (1st Cir.) (absence of objection at trial is "fatal"), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 965 (1988); Allison v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 979 F.2d 1187, 1200 (7th Cir. 1992) ("the law in this circuit is that an unsuccessful motion in limine does preserve the issue for appeal"); American Home Assurance Co. v. Sunshine Supermarket, Inc., 753 F.2d 321, 324 (3d Cir. 1985) ("test is whether an objection at trial would have been more in the nature of a formal exception or in the nature of a timely objection calling the court's attention to a matter it need consider"); Palmerin v. City of Riverside, 794 F.2d 1409, 1411 (9th Cir. 1986) (circuit's position is "unclear").

This issue can largely be resolved if the court makes it clear whether its pretrial ruling is final. See, e.g., Rosenfeld v. Basquiat, 78 F.3d 84, 90 (2d Cir. 1996) ("Because the district court at the outset made a definitive ruling ... on the admissibility..., there was no need ... to challenge admissibility again during the trial when plaintiff asked to introduce the testimony."). This is consistent with the trend toward efficient judicial case management through effective and meaningful pretrial proceedings. A clear record not only permits parties to plan their trial strategy -- and, potentially, their approach to settlement -- but also avoids unnecessary appellate issues relating to appealability.

19. Submissions & Rulings.

a. Ruling from Bench. In deciding the appropriateness of ruling from the bench at the conclusion of a trial to the court, the judge should consider the duration of the trial, the complexity of the legal and factual issues involved, the trial briefs, pretrial order or other submissions previously received from the parties, and the prospective advantage afforded by an opportunity to review the transcript, and to receive post-trial submissions from the parties, before ruling. Rulings should be made in a timely fashion.

b. Submissions from Counsel. Prior to rendering its decision, the court should permit counsel to furnish an oral or written statement of position on the law and facts. If complicated legal or factual issues are involved, and depending on the nature and extent of other submissions previously received, the court should ordinarily invite the parties to submit proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law (or like submissions however denominated under applicable law).

Comment

The desire to issue decisions promptly should be tempered by the realization that, as a trial progresses, it is not necessarily a great deal easier for the court than for a jury to keep in mind all of the evidence, and to apply the law to it, particularly where complex legal and factual issues are involved. The present Standard urges the court to permit the parties to submit proposed findings and conclusions to facilitate the decisional process. At the same time, this Standard recognizes that, in particular cases, the parties' prior submissions may suffice and the cost and additional delay will not offset the potential benefit of written post-trial submissions.

20. Continuity of Proceedings. Subject to the exigencies of its calendar and the needs of the parties, the court should endeavor to hear bench trials without lengthy continuances and interruptions in the proceedings, striving for the same level of continuity it insists on in jury trials.

Comment

Jury trials are ordinarily tried continuously, from opening statement to closing argument, in deference to the schedules of the jurors and in recognition of the adverse effect that lengthy continuances have on jury comprehension. Bench trials, in contrast, are sometimes tried very sporadically, with days or weeks intervening between witnesses or in the midst of a single witness's testimony. This approach not only causes hardship to the parties -- who must pay for constant refreshers of counsel -- and to the witnesses, whose schedules may repeatedly be interrupted by readiness alerts, but can also have an adverse effect on the judicial finder of fact.

This Standard takes the position that, subject to the exigencies of its calendar, the court should endeavor to try bench trials in the same continuous fashion that it tries jury trials. It recognizes, however, that in some circumstances the needs of the parties -- e.g., the availability of witnesses or the most expeditious sequencing of the proceedings (see Standard 23) -- may warrant an exception to the presumption that bench trials ought to be tried continuously. See generally Final Report of the Civil Justice Reform Act Advisory Group for the United States District Court for the District Of Columbia at Part D, Recommendation 31, pp. 66-67 (1993).

PART SEVEN GENERAL

21. Computer-Readable Submissions. The court should consider requiring the parties to serve and file court papers in computer readable form inaddition to, or in lieu of, hard copy, unless doing so would work undue hardship on a party.

Comment

The overwhelming preponderance of court papers are generated electronically, by computer or other form of word processor. Consequently, serving and filing a disk together with a hard copy of a court paper typically works no hardship on a litigant, but it can substantially facilitate the work of court and counsel. It is suggested that, at a minimum, the court consider ordering the parties to exchange and file in electronic format lengthy briefs and affidavits (exclusive of appendices and exhibits that have not been computer-generated), and all draft orders, jury questionnaires, voir dire questions, jury instructions, findings and conclusions, and forms of verdict.

22. Televised Court Proceedings. In deciding whether or in what respects to permit a court proceeding to be televised, where that is permitted by applicable law, the court should consider all relevant factors, including:

a. The identity of the parties;

b. The nature and subject matter of the proceeding, including any significant social, political or legal issues involved, and any public interest served by televising it;

c. The identity of participants to the proceeding, including whether witnesses, jurors or minors are involved;

d. The extent and duration of contemplated television coverage, including:
i. Whether the entirety of the proceeding, or only portions, would be televised; and

ii. What the broadcast equipment should, and should not, disseminate;

e. The impact of television coverage on the proceeding and any prospective later proceeding (such as trial), including any potential prejudice to:

i. The importance of maintaining public trust and confidence in, and promoting public access to, the judicial system;

ii. The advancement of a fair trial;

iii. The ability to impanel an impartial jury at the time or subsequently; and

iv. The rights of any party, prospective witness, victim, juror or other participant, including any right to privacy, confidentiality or witness sequestration.

f. The impact of television coverage on any law enforcement activity;

g. The objections of any party, prospective witness, victim, juror or other participant in the proceeding; and

h. The physical structure of the courtroom, including whether broadcast equipment can be installed and operated without disturbance to the proceeding or any other proceeding in the courthouse.

Comment

Debate has long raged over whether televising of court proceedings should be permitted. See, e.g., Hunt, Cameras in the Courts After O.J. -- A Mixed Legacy, 22 Litigation News No. 2 at 16 (Jan. 1997); Note, Electronic Media Access to Federal Courtrooms: A Judicial Response, 23 U. Mich. J.L. Ref. 769 (1990); Note, Cameras and the Need for Unrestricted Electronic Media Access to Federal Courtrooms, 69 S. Cal. L. Rev. 827 (1996). Many state courts permit the practice, in the discretion of the trial judge. See, e.g., Cal. Rule 980; McKinney's 1996 New York Rules of Court § 131. Although the Judicial Conference of the United States in March 1996 adopted a resolution "strongly urging" each federal judicial council to adopt an order prohibiting television coverage of district court proceedings, some federal judges permit it, and one has found a "presumptive First Amendment right of the press to televise as well as publish court proceedings, and of the public to view those proceedings." Katzman v. Victoria's Secret Catalog Div., 923 F. Supp. 580, 589 (S.D.N.Y. 1996).

It is not the intent of these Standards to take a position on the pros and cons of televising judicial proceedings, but simply to articulate the factors to be considered if the court is weighing whether to do so. The criteria set forth in this Standard are drawn from the cases and from a variety of court rules. Cal. Rule 980; McKinney's 1997 New York Rules of Court § 131.4(c); former S.D.N.Y./E.D.N.Y. Gen. Rules, App. D., R. 4(c); Katzman, 923 F. Supp. at 587-88; Marisol A. v. Giuliani, No. 95 Civ. 10533 (RJW), 1996 WL 91638 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 1, 1996).

23. Courtroom Technology.

a. Receptivity. Judges should be receptive to using technology in managing the trial and the presentation of evidence.

b. Hardware. The parties should be encouraged to agree on common courtroom hardware, consistent with their rights to confidentiality of, and exclusive access to, work product and privileged information.

Comment

Subdivision (a) of this Standard is modeled on ABA Trial Management Standard 9 (1992). It is also the recommendation made in the American Bar Association Section of Litigation/Brookings Institution symposium report, Charting a Future for the Civil Jury System 19-20 (1992). Types of 1995-vintage courtroom technology are described in Federal Judicial Center, Manual for Complex Litigation 3d § 34.3 (1995).

Subdivision (b) recognizes that there is a finite amount of space available in any courtroom and that certain hardware can be shared by the parties without risk of divulging privileged or protected information -- e.g., videotape recorders, monitors, and easels. To the extent that the amount of hardware can be contained, it is in the interests of all concerned to limit it. See Federal Judicial Center, Manual for Complex Litigation 3d § 22.32 (1995).

24. Videotaped Testimony.

a. Edited by Subject Matter.

i. If it will assist the jury to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, the court should permit the parties to edit and present videotaped testimony by subject matter.

ii. The testimony of a single witness, or of multiple witnesses, relating to designated subject matter may be combined into a single presentation.

b. Advance Ruling. Objections to, and rulings on, the admissibility of videotaped testimony should be made sufficiently in advance of its presentation to the jury to permit it to be edited to reflect the court's rulings.

Comment

This Standard operates to apply the same rules to videotape that already apply to textual depositions. It is well settled that "[v]ideotape is generally more effective [than reading a transcript] for the presentation of deposition testimony, for impeachment and rebuttal, and for reference during argument." Federal Judicial Center, Manual for Complex Litigation 3d § 22.332 (1995), citing Michael J. Henke, The Taking and Use of Videotaped Depositions, 16 Am. J. Trial Advoc. 151, 165 (1992) and Joseph, Modern Visual Evidence § 3.03[2][f] (1984; Supp. 1997). See, e.g., Sandidge v. Salen Offshore Drilling Co., 764 F.2d 252, 259 n.6 (5th Cir. 1985); United States v. Tunnell 667 F.2d 1182, 1188 (5th Cir. 1982); *Weiss v. This Standard addresses only one of the myriad of issues associated with the introduction of videotaped deposition evidence.
