United States v. Tail, 459 F.3d 854 (8th Cir. 2006) : Appealing convictions for sexual abuse of a minor, the defendant argued that the Trial Judge violated his right to confrontation by excluding evidence that a victim had previously made false allegations of sexual abuse. Affirming, the Court noted that although the Confrontation Clause may require the admission of evidence otherwise barred by the rules of evidence, "it is clear that not all evidence that is the least bit probative of credibility must be admitted." Here, the evidence of false claims was "weak" and admission of the evidence "would have triggered mini-trials concerning allegations unrelated to Tail's case, and thus increased the danger of jury conviction and speculation."

[11] Sexual Activity with Others [Go To Main]

United States v. Seed, 572 F.3d 552 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for aggravated sexual abuse, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the complainant was involved in at least two sexual encounters with different men, one of whom was married, within days of the incident giving rise to the charges. The Court held that the defendant's claim that the complainant had a motive to falsely accuse him to protect her married paramour in the event she became pregnant or contracted a sexually transmitted disease was weak. The complainant had a tubal ligation, which made it extremely unlikely that she would have become pregnant during the course of her relationship with the married man. And a sexually transmitted disease is not readily observable and would only be known to the complainant's physician or married paramour, making it unlikely that the complainant would feel a need to make a false accusation to conceal the identity of the source of a feared disease that would not be publicly known.

United States v. Sarras, 575 F.3d 1191 (11th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a defendant's conviction for inducing his minor step-daughter to engage in sexually explicit conduct for the purpose of producing photos of the conduct. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence of the step-daughter's post-abuse sexual relationship with her boyfriend. Her testimony that she was traumatized by the defendant's sexual abuse did not open the door to questions about her sexual history, since "victims of sexual abuse can be traumatized whether or not they have had other sexual relations" and the victim's relationship with her boyfriend was irrelevant because "[t]he only issue is the identity of the male in the photos." The defendant had been permitted a constitutionally adequate opportunity to explore the step-daughter's possible motives for framing him.

[12] Source of Semen or Injury [Go To Main]

United States v. Seed, 572 F.3d 552 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for aggravated sexual abuse, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the complainant was involved in at least two sexual encounters with different men, one of whom was married, within days of the incident giving rise to the charges. The Judge had found that the argument that consensual sex with a third person might have caused the injuries to the complainant was too weak to justify admission of the evidence and the defendant did not make any offer of proof concerning the circumstances of the two sexual encounters that would have enabled the Judge to assess the likelihood of the injuries being caused by consensual sexual activity. In United States v. Tail, 459 F.3d 854 (8th Cir. 2006) , the defendant, appealing convictions for sexual abuse of a minor, argued that the Trial Judge committed error in excluding evidence that one of the victims had tested positive for Hepatitis B. The defendant reasoned that Hepatitis B is sometimes acquired through sexual contact, and he had tested negative, so the evidence suggested that a person other than the defendant was the source of semen, injury, or other physical evidence. Affirming, the Court held that the "exception to the general prohibition on admission of a victim's past sexual behavior permits only the introduction of specific instances of sexual behavior," and because the defendant had not offered any specific instance, the evidence was properly excluded.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 413 RULE 413

2-413 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 413.syn

§ 413.syn Synopsis to Chapter 413: RULE 413

413.01 Official Text

413.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Background of the Rule

[2] Scope of the Rule

[3] Relationship to Rule 403

[4] Proof of Uncharged Sexual Assaults

[5] Notice

413.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Constitutional Issues

[2] Offense of Sexual Assault

[3] Relationship to Rule 403

[4] Relationship to Rule 404(b)

[5] Subsequent Offenses

[413.04] Legislative History

[1] Public Law 103-322

[2] Report of Judicial Conference of United States on the Admission of Character Evidence in Certain Sexual Misconduct Cases

[3] Statements on the Floor of Congress Concerning Rules 413-415

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 413 RULE 413

2-413 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 413.01

413.01 Official Text

Rule 413. Evidence of Similar Crimes in Sexual Assault Cases

(a) In a criminal case in which the defendant is accused of an offense of sexual assault, evidence of the defendant's commission of another offense or offenses of sexual assault is admissible, and may be considered for its bearing on any matter to which it is relevant.

(b) In a case in which the Government intends to offer evidence under this rule, the attorney for the Government shall disclose the evidence to the defendant, including statements of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony that is expected to be offered, at least fifteen days before the scheduled date of trial or at such later time as the court may allow for good cause.

(c) This rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.

(d) For purposes of this rule and Rule 415, "offense of sexual assault" means a crime under Federal law or the law of a State (as defined in section 513 of title 18, United States Code) that involved --

(1) any conduct proscribed by chapter 109A of title 18, United States Code;

(2) contact, without consent, between any part of the defendant's body or an object and the genitals or anus of another person;

(3) contact, without consent, between the genitals or anus of the defendant and any part of another person's body;

(4) deriving sexual pleasure or gratification from the infliction of death, bodily injury, or physical pain on another person; or

(5) an attempt or conspiracy to engage in conduct described in paragraph (1)-(4).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 413 RULE 413

2-413 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 413.02

413.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Background of the Rule

This Rule is intended to provide for more liberal admissibility in cases involving sexual assault where the defendant has committed a prior act or acts of sexual assault. Congress passed this Rule, together with Rules 414 and 415 (which are substantively identical but applicable to different types of cases), as part of a general Crime Bill package, and bypassed the ordinary rulemaking process in doing so. n1 As a compromise, Congress provided for the possibility of reconsideration should the Judicial Conference make a timely objection to the new Rules. The Judicial Conference Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules, and subsequently the Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure and the Judicial Conference itself, concluded that the Rule embodied bad policy and recommended its reconsideration; Congress refused to do so.

As an alternative, the Advisory Committee drafted amendments to Rules 404 and 405 that would "both correct ambiguities and possible constitutional infirmities identified in new Evidence Rules 413, 414, and 415, and yet still effectuate Congressional intent." n2 The Advisory Committee proposal would have: (1) expressly applied the other rules of evidence, such as Rule 403 and the hearsay rule, to evidence offered under the new rules; (2) expressly allowed rebuttal; (3) expressly enumerated the factors that a Court must take into account in balancing under Rule 403; (4) rendered the notice provisions consistent with the existing notice provision of Rule 404(b); (5) eliminated the notice provisions in civil cases, so that notice would be required as provided in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure; and (6) permitted reputation and opinion evidence only after such evidence has been offered by the defendant. (The Advisory Committee proposal is set forth in the legislative history to this Rule, § 413.04[3]). Congress did not adopt any of these proposed changes, and so Rules 413-415, as originally enacted by Congress and set forth above, became effective on July 9, 1995.

[2] Scope of the Rule

Rule 413 applies only to sexual assault cases, and only covers evidence of the defendant's prior sexual assaults. So for example, if the defendant is charged with kidnapping, a prior sexual assault on the victim (or on any other victim, for that matter) is not covered by this Rule. Presumably the Rule is inapplicable even if the defendant kidnapped the victim with a motive of sexual assault. The Rule is limited to criminal cases "in which the defendant is accused of an offense" of sexual assault. A fair reading of the provision is that the defendant must actually be charged with a sexual assault. Likewise, if the defendant is charged with sexual assault, a previous act of kidnapping or aggravated battery is not covered by this Rule. n3

This is not to say that uncharged misconduct outside Rules 413-415 will be inadmissible. It is simply to say that admissibility is dependent upon Rules 404(b) and 403 and, if the defendant takes the stand, Rules 608 and 609.

Rule 413 appears to be an attempt to create an exception to Rule 404(b) in sexual assault cases, where the prosecution wishes to offer a previous act of sexual assault committed by the defendant. n4 If Rule 404(b) were applicable, the prosecution would have to articulate a not-for-character purpose for a prior act of sexual assault, such as intent or motive. The prosecution would be prohibited by Rule 404(b) from offering the prior sexual assault simply to prove that the defendant has a propensity to commit sex crimes. Under Rule 413, however, the prosecution can offer a prior act of sexual assault explicitly to prove the defendant's propensity to commit the sexual assault charged. n5 A limiting instruction is not required, because the jury is free to use the prior act of sexual assault as evidence that the defendant has a propensity to commit sex crimes. This is what the Rule means when it says that a prior sexual assault "may be considered for its bearing on any matter to which it is relevant." Given the liberal standard of relevance employed by the Federal Rules, a propensity to commit sex crimes is certainly relevant to whether the defendant committed the sex crime with which he is charged.

Rule 413 is unusual as compared to other Evidence Rules, in that it singles out sexual assault crimes for special treatment. Assume that a defendant is being tried for a rape-murder, and has two different prior bad acts in his past -- a rape and a murder. Under the Rule, the prior rape can be admitted even if it is offered solely to prove propensity, while the murder cannot be admitted without the articulation of a not-for-propensity purpose.

One justification for this differentiation, however, is that sexual assault crimes usually pose unique difficulties of proof. Often there is no physical evidence that ties the defendant to the charged crime; often the jury must make a credibility determination between the victim and the defendant. Given these limitations, one can at least understand, if not agree with, Congress' desire to single out sexual assault crimes for special treatment. n6

On the other hand, if Rule 413 is merely an exception to Rule 404, the necessity for the Rule is questionable. In the relatively few sex crime cases that have been tried in the Federal Courts, prosecutors have rarely had difficulty in articulating a not-for-character purpose for a prior act of sexual assault. As discussed in § 404.02[10], the Courts have looked on Rule 404(b) as a rule of inclusion. So long as the prosecution can articulate any colorable not-for-propensity purpose (e.g., intent, motive, absence of mistake), the Courts generally consider Rule 404(b) satisfied, and proceed to balance the probative value of the evidence against its prejudicial effect under Rule 403. Thus there is little evidence that an exception to Rule 404(b) was needed for prior sexual assault crimes. n7

[3] Relationship to Rule 403

The most important question about the scope of Rule 413 is whether the Rule permits the Trial Judge to invoke Rule 403 to exclude sexual assault evidence that is unduly prejudicial. It is unclear from the statutory language whether Rule 413 pre-empts Rule 403; but clearly the better reading of the Rule is that the Trial Judge retains discretionary power under Rule 403 to exclude some instances of sexual misconduct.

Some clues about the meaning of Rule 413 can be derived by comparing it with other Federal Rules that clearly displace Rule 403. The most prominent example, Rule 609, provides that crimen falsi convictions (covered by Rule 609(a)(2)) "shall be admitted." In addition, special balancing tests are specifically provided for convictions offered against the accused (Rule 609(a)(1)), and for convictions more than ten years old (Rule 609(b)). Similarly, Rule 412 sets forth an explicit balancing test for civil cases, different from that provided in Rule 403, for evidence of the victim's sexual activity, and Rule 703 does the same for otherwise inadmissible evidence relied upon by an expert in reaching an opinion.

In contrast to these Rules, Rule 413 contains neither mandatory language nor a special balancing test. The Rule states that evidence of a prior act of sexual assault "is admissible," not that it "shall be admitted." It further states that such evidence "may be considered for its bearing on any matter to which it is relevant." Notably, there is no specific balancing test set forth in the Rule, which would undoubtedly displace the Rule 403 test.

It should also be noted that the sponsors of the Rule indicated that it was not intended to pre-empt Rule 403. n8 While this is slender legislative history, it does support the conclusion that Rule 413 does not displace the Rule 403 balancing test. On the other hand, when the Advisory Committee received comments about Rules 413-415, many of the commentators were of the view that the Rules as drafted are mandatory; the Advisory Committee found that this position was "arguable because Rules 413-415 declare without qualification that such evidence 'is admissible.' " n9 Another contrary indicator to be mentioned is that Rule 412 provides that evidence thereunder "is admissible if it is otherwise admissible under these Rules." There is no such proviso in Rule 413.

Every Court to decide the matter has held that Rule 403 remains applicable to acts covered by Rules 413-415. n10 Some Courts have held that Rules 413 and 414 might be unconstitutional if the Trial Judge had no power to exclude evidence of an accused's prior sexual misconduct. Thus, these Courts read Rule 403 into the Rules as a kind of saving clause. n11

Assuming, as now seems clear, that Rule 403 remains applicable to prior acts of sexual assault, it appears that Rule 413 mandates a change in the way Courts have traditionally balanced the probative value and prejudicial effect of such acts. Under Rule 404(b) and Rule 403, the Trial Court must balance the probative value of the uncharged misconduct for the not-for-character purpose; it cannot consider, and weigh in favor of admissibility, the probative value for the forbidden propensity inference. In contrast, Rule 413 provides that the Trial Court must consider the prior act of sexual assault as probative of the defendant's propensity to commit the crime charged. Thus the propensity inference is part of the probative value that the Judge must balance under the Rule 403 test. Moreover, under Rules 404(b) and 403, the Trial Court, in weighing the risk of prejudice, must consider the possibility that the jury will convict the defendant because of his propensity to commit the crime charged -- this is "prejudice" because those Rules do not permit the jury to draw the propensity inference. In contrast, under Rules 413-415, the jury is allowed to draw the inference that because the defendant has committed sex crimes before, he has a propensity to commit them and therefore is more likely to have committed a sex crime on the occasion in question. Thus, the risk of drawing the propensity inference cannot be considered "prejudicial" when the Trial Judge conducts the Rule 403 balance in sexual misconduct cases under Rule 413. Consequently, the Rule 403 balancing test is far less likely to result in the exclusion of prior acts of sexual assault than was the case before Rules 413-415 were passed. Congress has instructed the Courts to find more probative value and less prejudicial effect in such evidence than the Courts were previously permitted to find. n12

In effect, a Rule 403 objection to sexual misconduct evidence is likely to be successful only in exceptional cases. One factor supporting exclusion is where the prior act is completely dissimilar from the charged act (e.g., the defendant is charged with molesting a child at his home, and the prior sexual misconduct involved a workplace incident with an adult). Another factor supporting exclusion is where the prior sexual misconduct occurred a long time ago, and there are no intervening acts of sexual misconduct. n13 Where these circumstances arise -- and especially if remoteness and dissimilarity are combined -- the propensity inference is weak and, for similar reasons, the evidence would seem to have minimal if any probative value for any Rule 404(b)-type not-for-character purpose. Most importantly the evidence of the dissimilar and/or remote act is prejudicial independent from any propensity inference -- it encourages the jury to convict the defendant not because he has a propensity to commit the crime charged (which is permissible) but rather because he is a bad person (which is impermissible even under Rules 413-15).

[4] Proof of Uncharged Sexual Assaults

The Rule states that evidence of the defendant's "commission" of an uncharged offense is admissible. Thus, the relevance of the prior act of sexual assault is conditioned on the defendant having committed it. There is every reason to believe that the conditional relevance analysis employed as to other acts of uncharged misconduct (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 404(b), § 404.02[18]) applies as well to evidence offered under this Rule. Thus, a prior sexual assault can be admissible even if the defendant was never convicted of the act. Applying Rule 104(b), evidence of prior sexual assaults should be admissible under this Rule (subject, again, to a potential Rule 403 analysis) when the government presents sufficient evidence to support a finding, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the defendant committed the prior act. n14

[5] Notice

The Rule requires the prosecution to notify the defendant of the intended use of sexual assault evidence. Notice must be provided at least fifteen days before the scheduled date of trial, unless the Court allows later notice for good cause shown.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See 113 Cong. Rec. H5439 (statement of Representative Hughes), noting that the "existing rule-making process involves a minimum of six levels of scrutiny or stages of formal review. This has gone through none. This is an amendment offered on the floor of the Senate after about 20 minutes' debate, without very much thought, and it is procedurally and substantively flawed." See also Aiken, Sexual Character Evidence in Civil Actions: Refining the Propensity Rule, 1997 Wis. L. Rev. 1221, 1236 (arguing that Rules 413-15 "are an example of the politicization of the Federal Rules of Evidence").

(n2)Footnote 2. Judicial Conference Report, set forth in the legislative history to this Rule, § 413.04.

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., United States v. Blue Bird, 372 F.3d 989 (8th Cir. 2004) (prior acts of soliciting sex from minors were not admissible under Rule 413, because the conduct did not involve touching any of the areas prohibited under 18 U.S.C. ch. 109A, and did not involve a "substantial attempt" toward commission of the prohibited crimes so as to constitute an "attempt".)

(n4)Footnote 4. See the statement of Senator Biden in § 413.04[3].

(n5)Footnote 5. See United States v. Withorn, 204 F.3d 790 (8th Cir. 2000) (stating that Courts must consider probative value of sexual misconduct evidence in light of Congress' policy judgment that such evidence is "exceptionally probative" of a propensity to commit sexual assaults).

(n6)Footnote 6. See 133 Cong. Rec. H5439 (statement of Representative Kyl): "In most rape or molestation cases, it is the word of the defendant against the word of the victim. If the defendant has committed similar acts in the past, the claims of the victim are more likely to be considered truthful if there is substantiation of other assaults."

(n7)Footnote 7. See Baker, Once a Rapist? Motivational Evidence and Relevancy in Rape Law, 110 Harv. L. Rev. 563 (1997) (arguing that Rule 413 is a "dangerous means of securing more rape convictions" because it is likely that defendants will be convicted because of their bad character; concluding that the "motive" and "absence of mistake" exceptions to Rule 404(b) "hold a great deal of promise" for obtaining fair convictions in rape cases).

(n8)Footnote 8. See 140 Cong. Rec. S12990 (Sept. 20, 1994) (statement of Senator Dole: evidence of past sexual misconduct will still be governed by the rules of evidence, "including the restrictions on hearsay evidence and the court's authority under Rule 403 to exclude evidence whose probative value is substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect"). See also 140 Cong. Rec. H8968-01 (Aug. 21, 1994) (statement of Representative Molinari, indicating that the Rule was drafted with the intent to permit the Trial Court to exclude prior acts of sexual misconduct under Rule 403).

(n9)Footnote 9. Report of the Judicial Conference of the United States on the Admission of Character Evidence in Certain Sexual Misconduct Cases 5 (1995), set forth in § 413.04[2].

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., United States v. Larson, 112 F.3d 600 (2d Cir. 1997) (construing the parallel Rule 414: "We view Rule 403 analysis in connection with evidence offered under Rule 414 to be consistent with Congress's intent."). The Court in Larson upheld two evidentiary rulings by the Trial Court. One excluded evidence of child molestation occurring 21-23 years before trial. The other ruling admitted evidence of child molestation occurring 16-20 years before trial, where the events "closely paralleled the events complained of" by the victim in the instant trial. It is notable that the government in Larson agreed that Rule 414 did not "eliminate the need for the court to conduct the analysis required under Rule 403."

See also Frank v. County of Hudson, 924 F. Supp. 620 (D.N.J. 1996) (statement concerning child molestation was excluded under Rule 403, despite the fact that Rule 415 held such evidence "admissible"); 113 Cong. Rec. H5438 (1993) (statement of Representative Kyl), stating that under the Rule, the "judge still has total discretion to exclude the evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the defendant."

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Enjady, 134 F.3d 1427 (10th Cir. 1998) : The Court recognized that "Rule 413 raises a serious constitutional due process issue" because it creates a danger that the defendant will be convicted because he is a bad person, not because he commtted the crime charged. The Court stated that "without the safeguards embodied in Rule 403, we would hold [Rule 413] to be unconstitutional." However, because Rule 403 is still applicable to prior sex crimes, the Rule provides sufficient protection to answer any due process concerns.

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., United States v. Withorn, 204 F.3d 790 (8th Cir. 2000) (applying the Rule 403 test to acts covered by Rules 413-415, the Trial Court must consider as part of the probative value the Congressional assumption that prior sexual misconduct is exceptionally probative of a propensity to commit similar acts; nor is the propensity inference prejudicial, since Congress has provided that the evidence is probative because it creates an inference of propensity); United States v. Gabe, 237 F.3d 954 (8th Cir. 2001) (no error in admitting prior sexual assaults under Rules 414 and 403; there was no risk of prejudice because the evidence was "prejudicial to Gave for the same reason it is probative -- it tends to prove his propensity to molest young children in his family when presented with an opportunity to do so undetected."). See also Aiken, Sexual Character Evidence in Civil Actions: Refining the Propensity Rule, 1997 Wisconsin L.Rev. 1221 (evaluating the substantively identical Rule 415):

> Rule 415 is not affected by Rule 404's character bar: inferring present behavior from past bad acts is allowed under Rule 415. Therefore, if the objection to Rule 415 evidence is based on alleged unfairness caused by the possibility that the jury would find the defendant liable based on a general propensity theory, a Rule 403 objection should fail because Rule 415 specifically allows the jury to draw those conclusions. The effect of broadening the basis for establishing probative value and narrowing the basis for finding prejudice should weaken a Rule 403 objection.

(n13)Footnote 13. See, e.g., Doe ex rel. Rudy-Glanzer v. Glanzer, 232 F.3d 1258 (9th Cir. 2000) (construing Rule 415; no error in excluding prior act of sexual misconduct where there was a significant time lapse between the two incidents, there was no evidence of any sexual misconduct in the interim, and the circumstances of the incidents were not similar). Compare United States v. Eagle, 137 F.3d 1011 (8th Cir. 1998) (construing Rule 414; prior act of sexual abuse of a minor was properly admitted; the fact that it occurred 10 years ago was of little moment because the defendant had spent six of those years incarcerated for that crime); United States v. Gabe, 237 F.3d 954 (8th Cir. 2001) (construing Rule 414; prior act of sexual abuse of a minor was properly admitted, even though 20 years old; the victim was the same age as the victim in the case, both were related to the defendant, and the acts were each committed in similar fashion when the defendant first got an opportunity to be with the victim alone).

(n14)Footnote 14. See, e.g., United States v. Mann, 193 F.3d 1172 (10th Cir. 1999) (construing Rule 414: prior sexual assault of a child was properly admitted; the testimony of the child-victim provided enough information for a reasonable juror to believe by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant committed the prior sexual assault).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 413 RULE 413

2-413 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 413.03

413.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Constitutional Issues

United States v. Julian, 427 F.3d 471 (7th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for traveling in foreign commerce to engage in sex with minors, the Court found no error in the admission of the defendant's 12-year-old conviction for sexually molesting his stepson. The Court rejected the argument that Rule 413 is a deprivation of equal protection and due process, noting that "Rule 413 implicates neither a fundamental right nor a suspect class," and it has a rational basis. Any due process concerns are answered by the Judge's authority under Rule 403 to exclude evidence of a prior assault if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice.

United States v. Mound, 149 F.3d 799 (8th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed a conviction for sexual abuse of a minor, in a case in which evidence of the defendant's prior sexual abuse conviction had been admitted. Following United States v. Enjady, infra, the Court found that Rule 413 does not violate the Due Process Clause; it also found no equal protection violation, since sex-offense defendants are not a "suspect class" and the classification implicit in the Rule bears a rational relation to the legitimate end of making decisions in these distinctive and difficult cases.

United States v. Enjady, 134 F.3d 1427 (10th Cir. 1998) : Appealing from a rape conviction in which consent was the disputed issue, the defendant argued that admission of evidence of a prior rape under Rule 413 violated his rights to due process and equal protection. The Court affirmed, although it recognized that "Rule 413 raises a serious constitutional due process issue," since it creates a danger that the defendant will be convicted because he is a bad person, not because he committed the crime charged. The Court stated that "without the safeguards embodied in Rule 403, we would hold [Rule 413] unconstitutional." However, the Court concluded that Rule 403 does apply to evidence offered under Rule 413, and this provided sufficient protection to answer any due process concerns. As to the equal protection argument, the Court found that Rule 413 was rationally based on Congress's legitimate interest in enhancing effective prosecution for sex assaults, because sex offense prosecutions frequently involve "victim-witnesses who are traumatized and unable to effectively testify, and offenders often have committed many similar crimes before their arrest on the crime charged."

[2] Offense of Sexual Assault

United States v. Blue Bird, 372 F.3d 989 (8th Cir. 2004) : The Court reversed a conviction for sexual abuse of a minor because evidence was improperly admitted of prior incidents in which the defendant solicited sexual acts with minors. Because the defendant's prior conduct did not involve touching any of the areas prohibited under 18 U.S.C. ch. 109A, and did not involve a "substantial step" toward commission of the prohibited crimes so as to be an "attempt," the evidence was inadmissible under Rule 413. The Court also held that the evidence was not admissible under Rule 404(b) and should have been excluded in any event under Rule 403.

[3] Relationship to Rule 403

United States v. Crawford, 413 F.3d 873 (8th Cir. 2005) (per curiam): Affirming a conviction for abusive sexual contact with an eight-year-old girl, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of the defendant's 1994 conviction for abusive sexual contact of an eight-year-old girl. The evidence was relevant because it involved a similar crime, and the Judge gave two cautionary instructions not to consider the conviction solely as propensity evidence, which decreased the danger of unfair prejudice. In a prosecution for forcible rape of a 12-year-old, United States v. Withorn, 204 F.3d 790 (8th Cir. 2000) , the Court found no abuse of discretion when evidence was admitted that the defendant had forcibly raped his cousin when she was 12 years old. Considering the "strong legislative judgment that evidence of prior sexual offenses should ordinarily be admissible," the Court noted the similarities between the incidents: the victims were approximately the same age, both assaults involved force, both occurred after the defendant had isolated the victim from others, in both the victims were threatened not to inform anyone what had occurred, and in each case the defendant had claimed that the victim had consented to the sexual activity. In United States v. Mound, n1 the Court affirmed a conviction for sexual abuse of a minor, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously been convicted of sexual abuse of a minor. The Trial Court was aware of its duty to apply Rule 403 and performed it, as shown by its exclusion of other evidence that the defendant had committed a sexual abuse offense and by its cautionary instruction to the jury when the conviction was introduced. The conviction was based on an offense similar to the one charged, and the prejudicial effect was not beyond "that which 'all propensity evidence in such trials presents,' but is now allowed by Rule 413."

United States v. Guardia, 135 F.3d 1326 (10th Cir. 1998) : The Court found no error in the exclusion of prior acts of sexual misconduct offered under Rule 413. The Court held that evidence admissible under Rule 413 can still be excluded under Rule 403, and that the Trial Judge properly considered that the prior acts of sexual misconduct offered against the defendant might unduly confuse the jury. The defendant was charged with committing sexual abuse in the course of conducting gynecological exams, and the uncharged activity was conducted under similar but distinct circumstances. Because the case depended on the medical propriety of the defendant's procedures, the introduction of the uncharged misconduct would have transformed the trial of two incidents "into the trial of six incidents, each requiring description by lay witnesses and explanation by expert witnesses. The subtle factual distinctions among these incidents would make it difficult for the jury to separate the evidence of the uncharged conduct from the charged conduct." The Court emphasized that in conducting a Rule 403 analysis with respect to evidence offered under Rule 413, the Trial Judge must recognize that evidence indicating a propensity to commit sex crimes is probative of whether the defendant committed the crime charged.

[4] Relationship to Rule 404(b)

United States v. Breitweiser, 357 F.3d 1249 (11th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for abusive sexual contact with a minor, the Court stated that evidence that the defendant had previously engaged in sexual conduct with children > was relevant to show [his] motive, intent, knowledge, plan and preparation, and lack of mistake when he touched A.B. The evidence was substantial, and it was not more prejudicial than it was probative. Because the evidence is admissible under Rule 404(b), we do not consider the admissibility of the evidence under Rule 413.

[5] Subsequent Offenses

United States v. Sioux, 362 F.3d 1241 (9th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a conviction for sexual abuse, holding that evidence of a similar sexual assault subsequently committed by the defendant was properly admitted. Looking at the plain language of Rule 413 and analogizing to the interpretation of "other" in Rule 404(b), the Court reasoned that "another" in Rule 413 imposed no temporal limit on the offenses that may be admitted under the Rule.

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Mound, 149 F.3d 799 (8th Cir. 1998) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 413 RULE 413

2-413 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual [413.04]

[413.04] Legislative History

[1] Public Law 103-322

[Editor's Note: Rule 413 is not a product of the usual procedure by which Federal Rules of Evidence are crafted. It was added to the Federal Rules of Evidence by Public Law 103-322, the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994. Public Law 103-322 was adopted September 13, 1994, and became effective July 9, 1995. The implementation procedure of the rule was set forth in section 320935 of Public Law 103-322 as follows:]

(b) Implementation. The amendments made by subsection (a) [adding Rules 413-415] shall become effective pursuant to subsection (d).

(c) Recommendations by Judicial Conference. Not later than 150 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Judicial Conference of the United States shall transmit to Congress a report containing recommendations for amending the Federal Rules of Evidence as they affect the admission of evidence of a defendant's prior sexual assault or child molestation crimes in cases involving sexual assault and child molestation. The Rules Enabling Act shall not apply to the recommendations made by the Judicial Conference pursuant to this section.

(d) Congressional action.

(1) If the recommendations described in subsection (c) are the same as the amendment made by subsection (a) [adding Rules 413-415], then the amendments made by subsection (a) shall become effective 30 days after the transmittal of the recommendations.

(2) If the recommendations described in subsection (c) are different than the amendments made by subsection (a) [adding Rules 413-415], the amendments made by subsection (a) shall become effective 150 days after the transmittal of the recommendations unless otherwise provided by law.

(3) If the Judicial Conference fails to comply with subsection (c), the amendments made by subsection (a) [adding Rules 413-415] shall become effective 150 days after the date the recommendations were due under subsection (c) unless otherwise provided by law.

(e) Application. The amendments made by subsection (a) [adding Rules 413-415] shall apply to proceedings commenced on or after the effective date of such amendments.

[2] Report of Judicial Conference of United States on the Admission of Character Evidence in Certain Sexual Misconduct Cases

[Editor's Note: In accordance with subsection (c), the Judicial Conference submitted its report concerning the proposed rules on February 9, 1995; its recommendations differed from the proposed rules. Congress neither followed the Conference's recommendations nor otherwise altered the proposed rules. As a result, according to subsection (d), the proposed rules became effective on July 9, 1995.

What follows is the Judicial Conference Report on Rules 413-15, including the Advisory Committee's alternative proposal to amend the existing Rules to accommodate Congressional concerns. Selected statements by members of Congress are included after the Judicial Conference Report.]

INTRODUCTION

This report is transmitted to Congress in accordance with the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994, Pub. L. No. 103-322 (September 13, 1994). Section 320935 of the Act invited the Judicial Conference of the United States within 150 days (February 10, 1995) to submit "a report containing recommendations for amending the Federal Rules of Evidence as they affect the admission of evidence of a defendant's prior sexual assault or child molestation crimes in cases involving sexual assault or child molestation."

Under the Act, new Rules 413, 414, and 415 would be added to the Federal Rules of Evidence. These Rules would admit evidence of a defendant's past similar acts in criminal and civil cases involving a sexual assault or child molestation offense for its bearing on any matter to which it is relevant. The effective date of new Rules 413-415 is contingent in part upon the nature of the recommendations submitted by the Judicial Conference.

After careful study, the Judicial Conference urges Congress to reconsider its decision on the policy questions underlying the new rules for reasons set out in Part III below.

If Congress does not reconsider its decision on the underlying policy questions, the Judicial Conference recommends incorporation of the provisions of new Rules 413-415 as amendments to Rules 404 and 405 of the Federal Rules of Evidence. The amendments would not change the substance of the congressional enactment but would clarify drafting ambiguities and eliminate possible constitutional infirmities.

BACKGROUND

Under the Act, the Judicial Conference was provided 150 days within which to make and submit to Congress alternative recommendations to new Evidence Rules 413-415. Consideration of Rules 413-415 by the Judicial Conference was specifically excepted from the exacting review procedures set forth in the Rules Enabling Act (codified at 28 U.S.C. §§ 2071-2077). Although the Conference acted on these new rules on an expedited basis to meet the Act's deadlines, the review process was thorough.

The new rules would apply to both civil and criminal cases. Accordingly, the Judicial Conference's Advisory Committee on Criminal Rules and the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules reviewed the rules at separate meetings in October 1994. At the same time and in preparation for its consideration of the new rules, the Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules sent out a notice soliciting comment on new Evidence Rules 413, 414, and 415. The notice was sent to the courts, including all federal judges, about 900 evidence law professors, 40 women's rights organizations, and 1,000 other individuals and interested organizations.

DISCUSSION

On October 17-18, 1994, the Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules met in Washington, D.C. It considered the public responses, which included 84 written comments, representing 112 individuals, 8 local and 8 national legal organizations. The overwhelming majority of judges, lawyers, law professors, and legal organizations who responded opposed new Evidence Rules 413, 414, and 415. The principal objections expressed were that the rules would permit the admission of unfairly prejudicial evidence and contained numerous drafting problems not intended by their authors.

The Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules submitted its report to the Judicial Conference Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure (Standing Committee) for review at its January 11-13, 1995 meeting. The committee's report was unanimous except for a dissenting vote by the representative of the Department of Justice. The advisory committee believed that the concerns expressed by Congress and embodied in new Evidence Rules 413, 414, and 415 are already adequately addressed in the existing Federal Rules of Evidence. In particular, Evidence Rule 404(b) now allows the admission of evidence against a criminal defendant of the commission of prior crimes, wrongs, or acts for specified purposes, including to show intent, plan, motive, preparation, identity, knowledge, or absence of mistake or accident.

Furthermore, the new rules, which are not supported by empirical evidence, could diminish significantly the protections that have safeguarded persons accused in criminal cases and parties in civil cases against undue prejudice. These protections form a fundamental part of American jurisprudence and have evolved under long-standing rules and case law. A significant concern identified by the committee was the danger of convicting a criminal defendant for past, as opposed to charged, behavior or for being a bad person.

In addition, the advisory committee concluded that, because prior bad acts would be admissible even though not the subject of a conviction, mini-trials within trials concerning those acts would result when a defendant seeks to rebut such evidence. The committee also noticed that many of the comments received had concluded that the Rules, as drafted, were mandatory -- that is, such evidence had to be admitted regardless of other rules of evidence such as the hearsay rule or the Rule 403 balancing test. The committee believed that this position was arguable because Rules 413-415 declare without qualification that such evidence "is admissible." In contrast, the new Rule 412, passed as part of the same legislation, provided that certain evidence "is admissible if it is otherwise admissible under these Rules." Rule 412(b)(2). If the critics are right, Rules 413-415 free the prosecution from rules that apply to the defendant -- including the hearsay rule and Rule 403. If so, serious constitutional questions would arise.

The Advisory Committees on Criminal and Civil Rules unanimously, except for representatives of the Department of Justice, also opposed the new rules. Those committees also concluded that the new rules would permit the introduction of unreliable but highly prejudicial evidence and would complicate trials by causing mini-trials of other alleged wrongs. After the advisory committees reported, the Standing Committee unanimously, again except for the representative of the Department of Justice, agreed with the view of the advisory committees.

It is important to note the highly unusual unanimity of the members of the Standing and Advisory Committees, composed of over 40 judges, practicing lawyers, and academicians, in taking the view that Rules 413-415 are undesirable. Indeed, the only supporters of the Rules were representatives of the Department of Justice.

For these reasons, the Standing Committee recommended that Congress reconsider its decision on the policy questions embodied in new Evidence Rules 413, 414, and 415.

However, if Congress will not reconsider its decision on the policy questions, the Standing Committee recommended that Congress consider an alternative draft recommended by the Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules. That Committee drafted proposed amendments to existing Evidence Rules 404 and 405 that would both correct ambiguities and possible constitutional infirmities identified in new Evidence Rules 413, 414, and 415 yet still effectuate Congressional intent. In particular, the proposed amendments:

> (1) expressly apply the other rules of evidence to evidence offered under the new rules;
>
> (2) expressly allow the party against whom such evidence is offered to use similar evidence in rebuttal;
>
> (3) expressly enumerate the factors to be weighed by a court in making its Rule 403 determination;
>
> (4) render the notice provisions consistent with the provisions in existing Rule 404 regarding criminal cases;
>
> (5) eliminate the special notice provisions of Rules 413-415 in civil cases so that notice will be required as provided in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure; and
>
> (6) permit reputation or opinion evidence after such evidence is offered by the accused or defendant.

The Standing Committee reviewed the new rules and the alternative recommendations. It concurred with the views of the Evidence Rules Committee and recommended that the Judicial Conference adopt them.

The Judicial Conference concurs with the views of the Standing Committee and urges that Congress reconsider its policy determinations underlying Evidence Rules 413-415. In the alternative, the attached amendments to Evidence Rules 404 and 405 are recommended, in lieu of new Evidence Rules 413, 414, and 415. The alternative amendments to Evidence Rules 404 and 405 are accompanied by the Advisory Committee Notes, which explain them in detail.

Attachment to Judicial Conference Report Advisory Committee's Proposal to Amend Rule 404 In Lieu of Adoption of Rules 413-15

Rule 404. Character Evidence Not Admissible To Prove Conduct; Exceptions; Other Crimes

[New matter is underlined.]

(a)

...

> (4) Character in sexual misconduct cases. Evidence of another act of sexual assault or child molestation, or evidence to rebut such proof or an inference therefrom, if that evidence is otherwise admissible under these rules, in a criminal case in which the accused is charged with sexual assault or child molestation, or in a civil case in which a claim is predicated on a party's alleged commission of sexual assault or child molestation.
>
> (A) In weighing the probative value of such evidence, the court may, as part of its rule 403 determination, consider:

(i) proximity in time to the charged or predicate misconduct;

(ii) similarity to the charged or predicate misconduct;

(iii) frequency of the other acts;

(iv) surrounding circumstances;

(v) relevant intervening events; and

(vi) other relevant similarities or differences.

(B) In a criminal case in which the prosecution intends to offer evidence under this subdivision, it must disclose the evidence, including statements of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony, at a reasonable time in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown.

(C) For purposes of this subdivision,

(i) "sexual assault" means conduct -- or an attempt or conspiracy to engage in conduct -- of the type proscribed by chapter 109A of title 18, United States Code, or conduct that involved deriving sexual pleasure or ratification from inflicting death, bodily injury, or physical pain on another person irrespective of the age of the victim -- regardless of whether that conduct would have subjected the actor to federal jurisdiction.

(ii) "child molestation" means conduct -- or an attempt or conspiracy to engage in conduct -- of the type proscribed by chapter 110 of title 18, United States Code, or conduct, committed in relation to a child below the age of 14 years, either of the type proscribed by chapter 109A of title 18, United States Code, or that involved deriving sexual pleasure or gratification from inflicting death, bodily injury, or physical pain on another person -- regardless of whether that conduct would have subjected the actor to federal jurisdiction.

(b) Other crimes, wrongs, or acts. Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith except as provided in subdivision (a) ... .

Advisory Committee Note to Proposed Amendment to Rule 404

The Committee has redrafted Rules 413, 414 and 415 which the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994 conditionally added to the Federal Rules of Evidence. These modifications do not change the substance of the congressional enactment. The changes were made in order to integrate the provisions both substantively and stylistically with the existing Rules of Evidence; to illuminate the intent expressed by the principal drafters of the measure; to clarify drafting ambiguities that might necessitate considerable judicial attention if they remained unresolved; and to eliminate possible constitutional infirmities.

The Committee placed the new provisions in Rule 404 because this rule governs the admissibility of character evidence. The congressional enactment constitutes a new exception to the general rule stated in subdivision (a). The Committee also combined the three separate rules proposed by Congress into one subdivision (a)(4) in accordance with the rules' customary practice of treating criminal and civil issues jointly. An amendment to Rule 405 has been added because the authorization of a new form of character evidence in this rule has an impact on methods of proving character that were not explicitly addressed by Congress. The stylistic changes are self-evident. They are particularly noticeable in the definition section in subdivision (a)(4)(C) in which the Committee eliminated, without any change in meaning, graphic details of sexual acts.

The Committee added language that explicitly provides that evidence under this subdivision must satisfy other rules of evidence such as the hearsay rules in Article VIII, and the expert testimony rules in Article VII. Although principal sponsors of the legislation had stated that they intended other evidentiary rules to apply, the Committee believes that the opening phrase of the new subdivision 'if otherwise admissible under these rules' is needed to clarify the relationship between subdivision (a)(4) and other evidentiary provisions.

The Committee also expressly made subdivision (a)(4) subject to Rule 403 balancing in accordance with the repeatedly stated objectives of the legislation's sponsors with which representatives of the Justice Department expressed agreement. Many commentators on Rules 413-415 had objected that Rule 403's applicability was obscured by the actual language employed.

In addition to clarifying the drafters' intent, an explicit reference to Rule 403 may be essential to insulate the rule against constitutional challenge. Constitutional concerns also led the Committee to acknowledge specifically the opposing party's right to offer in rebuttal character evidence that the rules would otherwise bar, including evidence of a third person's prior acts of sexual misconduct offered to prove that the third person rather than the party committed the acts in issue.

In order to minimize the need for extensive and time-consuming judicial interpretation, the Committee listed factors that a court may consider in discharging Rule 403 balancing. Proximity in time is taken into account in a related rule. See Rule 609(b). Similarity, frequency and surrounding circumstances have long been considered by courts in handling other crimes evidence pursuant to Rule 404(b). Relevant intervening events, such as extensive medical treatment of the accused between the time of the prior proffered act and the charged act, may affect the strength of the propensity inference for which the evidence is offered. The final factor -- "other relevant similarities or differences" -- is added in recognition of the endless variety of circumstances that confront a trial court in rulings on admissibility. Although subdivision (4)(A) explicitly refers to factors that bear on probative value, this enumeration does not eliminate a judge's responsibility to take into account the other factors mentioned in Rule 403 itself -- "the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, ... misleading the jury, ... undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence." In addition, the Advisory Committee Note to Rule 403 reminds judges that "The availability of other means of proof may also be an appropriate factor."

The Committee altered slightly the notice provision in criminal cases. Providing the trial court with some discretion to excuse pretrial notice was thought preferable to the inflexible 15-day rule provided in Rules 414 and 415. Furthermore, the formulation is identical to that contained in the 1991 amendment to Rule 404(b) so that no confusion will result from having two somewhat different notice provisions in the same rule. The Committee eliminated the notice provision for civil cases stated in Rule 415 because it did not believe that Congress intended to alter the usual time table for disclosure and discovery provided by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

The definition section was simplified with no change in meaning. The reference to "the law of a state" was eliminated as unnecessarily confusing and restrictive. Conduct committed outside the United States ought equally to be eligible for admission. Evidence offered pursuant to subdivision (a)(4) must relate to a form of conduct proscribed by either chapter 109A or 110 of title 18, United States Code, regardless of whether the actor was subject to federal jurisdiction.

Advisory Committee's Proposal to Amend Rule 405 In Lieu of Adoption of Rules 413-15

Rule 405. Methods of Proving Character [New matter is underlined.]

(a) Reputation or opinion. In all cases in which evidence of character or a trait of character of a person is admissible, proof may be made by testimony as to reputation or by testimony in the form of an opinion except as provided in subdivision (c) of this rule. On cross-examination, inquiry is allowable into relevant specific instances of conduct.

...

(c) Proof in sexual misconduct cases. In a case in which evidence is offered under rule 404(a)(4), proof may be made by specific instances of conduct, testimony as to reputation, or testimony in the form of an opinion, except that the prosecution or claimant may offer reputation or opinion testimony only after the opposing party has offered such testimony.

Advisory Committee Note to Proposed Amendment to Rule 405

The addition of a new subdivision (a)(4) to Rule 404 necessitates adding a new subdivision (c) to Rule 405 to govern methods of proof. Congress clearly intended no change in the preexisting law that precludes the prosecution or a claimant from offering reputation or opinion testimony in its case in chief to prove that the opposing party acted in conformity with character. When evidence is admissible pursuant to Rule 404(a)(4), the proponent's proof must consist of specific instances of conduct. The opposing party, however, is free to respond with reputation or opinion testimony (including expert testimony if otherwise admissible) as well as evidence of specific instances. In a criminal case, the admissibility of reputation or opinion testimony would, in any event, be authorized by Rule 404(a)(1). The extension to civil cases is essential in order to provide the opponent with an adequate opportunity to refute allegations about a character for sexual misconduct. Once the opposing party offers reputation or opinion testimony, however, the prosecution or claimant may counter using such methods of proof.

[3] Statements on the Floor of Congress Concerning Rules 413-415

Statement of Senator Dole:

... [T]oo often, crucial evidentiary information is thrown out at trial because of technical evidentiary rulings. This amendment is designed to clarify the law and make clear what evidence is admissible, and what evidence is not admissible, in sex crime cases.

The amendment would create a new rule 413 of the Federal Rules of Evidence. This new rule would provide that in a criminal case in which the defendant is accused of assault, evidence of the defendant's commission of another offense or offenses of sexual assault is admissible, and may be considered for its bearing on any matter to which it is relevant.

... .

... I think if somebody is a repeat offender, if you brought in eight or nine women, for example,... and he had one offense after another, it would be probative. If it had not happened for 10 years, it probably would not have any value.

We also provide protection for the defendant because we require the Government to disclose the evidence to the defendant, including a statement of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony expected to be offered at least 15 days before the scheduled date or trial, or at such later time as the court may allow for good cause.

... [I]f we are really going to get tough, and if we are really going to try to make certain that justice is provided for the victim as well as the defendant, of course, then I think we ought to look seriously at this.

113 Cong. Rec. S15072-3.

Statement of Senator Biden:

... [W]hat the Republican leader is doing is changing 404(b) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure [sic] ... . Right now the rule in a courtroom in a Federal court is you go in and if you wish to introduce evidence of a similar crime ... you can only do it under very limited circumstances ... as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of a mistake or accident. These are the only circumstances in which you can offer this as evidence ... . There is a reason for that. These rules of relevancy ... it took essentially 800 years to develop the rules of evidence under our English jurisprudence system ... . We found out from 800 years of experience that [evidence of prior crimes] tends to blind people [from] looking at the real facts before them and making an independent judgment, at this time, at this circumstance, at this situation, that this defendant did that thing.

113 Cong. Rec. S15072.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 413 RULE 413

2-413 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 413, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 413. Evidence of Similar Crimes in Sexual Assault Cases	Rule 413. Similar Crimes in Sexual-Assault Cases
(a) In a criminal case in	(a) Permitted Uses. In which the defendant is accused of an offense of sexual assault, evidence of the defendant's commission of another offense or offenses of sexual assault is admissible, and may be considered a criminal case in which a defendant is accused of a sexual assault, the court may admit evidence that the defendant committed any other sexual assault. The evidence may be consider sidered for its bearing on any matter to which it is relevant.		ed on any matter to which it is relevant.

(b)	In a case in which the Government intends to offer evidence under this rule, the attorney for the Government shall disclose the evid	(b)	Disclosure to the Defendant. If the prosecutor intends to offer this evidence, the prosecutor must disclose it to the defend

ence to the defendant, including statements of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony that is expected to be offered, at least fifteen days before the scheduled date of trial or at ant, including witnesses' statements or a summary of the expected testimony. The prosecutor must do so at least 15 days before trial or at a later time that the court allows for good cause.

	such later time as the court may allow for good cause.
(c)	This rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.	(c) Effect on Other Rules. This rule does not limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.
(d)	For purposes of	(d) Definition of this rule and Rule 415, "offense of sexual assault" means a crime under Federal law or the law of a State (as defined in section 513 of title 18, United States Code) that involved --	"Sexual Assault." In this rule and Rule 415, "sexual assault" means a crime under federal law or under state law (as "state" is defined in 18 U.S.C. § 513) involving:

(1) any conduct	(1) any conduct

	pro-scribed by chapter 109A of title 18, United States Code;		pro-hibited by 18 U.S.C. chapter 109A;
(2)	con-tact, without con-sent, between any part of the de-fendant's body or an ob-ject and the gen-itals or anus of an-oth-er per-son;	(2)	con-tact, without con-sent, between any part of the de-fendant's body -- or an ob-ject -- and an-oth-er per-son's gen-itals or anus;

(3)	contact, without consent, between the genitals or anus of the defendant and any part of another person's body;	(3)	contact, without consent, between the defendant's genitals or anus and any part of another person's body;
(4)	deriving sexual pleasure or gratification from the infliction of death, bod-	(4)	deriving sexual pleasure or gratification from inflicting death, bodily in-

	ily in- jury, or phys ical pain on an- oth- er per- son; or		jury, or phys ical pain on an- oth- er per- son; or
(5)	an at- tem pt or con- spir- acy to en- gage in con- duct de- scrib ed in para grap hs (1)-(4).	(5)	an at- tem pt or con- spir- acy to en- gage in con- duct de- scrib ed in sub- para grap hs (1)-(4).

Committee Note

The language of Rule 413 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 413 RULE 413

2-413 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 413.03

Supp. to § 413.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[.1] Balancing Factors [Go To Main]

United States v. Hawpetoss, 478 F.3d 820 (7th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for sexual assaults on three minor children, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding uncharged instances of molestation of two other children. The defendant argued that not all of the five factors listed by the Ninth Circuit in United States v. LeMay, 260 F.3d 1018, 1028 (9th Cir. 2001) -- similarity of the conduct, proximity in time, frequency of prior acts, presence or lack of intervening circumstances, and necessity for the evidence beyond the evidence already offered at trial -- had been satisfied. The Court took a more "flexible" approach because it was "hesitant to cabin artificially the discretion of the district courts through the imposition of a relatively rigid multi-factor test," although it considered the factors identified in LeMay "a helpful guide in making the discretionary determination on admissibility." Here, the Judge had given "careful, measured consideration" to the disputed evidence, determining it to be both relevant and non-violative of Rule 403.

United States v. Batton, 602 F.3d 1191 (10th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for interstate transportation of a minor for unlawful sexual relations, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously been convicted for oral sex with a 14-year-old boy. The offense charged encompassed "sexual assault," the prior act was highly probative because of the similarity with the "grooming" and sexual assault charged in this case, and any prejudicial effect was minimized by clear jury instructions.

[1.1] Notice Requirement [Go To Main]

United States v. Guidry, 456 F.3d 493 (5th Cir. 2006) : A police officer was convicted for violating civil rights by sexually assaulting several women. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge excused the15-day notice requirement of Rule 413(b) in admitting testimony regarding an uncharged sexual assault committed by the defendant. The government did not learn of the other offense until the trial had already started; it alerted defense counsel immediately; and it provided the content of the testimony in time for defense counsel to have at least three days to prepare before a hearing on admitting the testimony. Furthermore, the government was ordered to procure records and make available individuals that could shed light on the testimony.

United States v. Benais, 460 F.3d 1059 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for sexual abuse of a minor, the Court held that the notice requirement of Rule 413 was satisfied when the government disclosed the contents of the witness' testimony more than 15 days before trial, even though it did not specifically declare the intention to rely upon Rule 413 for admissibility.

[2] Offense of Sexual Assault [Go To Main]

United States v. Guidry, 456 F.3d 493 (5th Cir. 2006) : A police officer was convicted for violating civil rights by sexually assaulting several women. Affirming, the Court found no error in the admission under Rule 413 of evidence that the defendant sexually assaulted another woman. It held that the plain language of the Rule allowed evidence of other offenses even if they did not result in conviction.

United States v. Rogers, 587 F.3d 816 (7th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for attempting to entice a minor to engage in sexual activity and for using the Internet to attempt to transfer obscene material to a minor, the Court reversed on interlocutory appeal an order excluding evidence of the defendant's prior conviction for solicitation of a minor and of his prior conduct involving sexually explicit Internet conversations with a 14-year-old girl. The Court disagreed with the Trial Judge's interpretation of "without consent" in Rule 413 and held that "[m]inors lack the capacity to consent, and so sexual contact with a minor is always 'without consent.' " On remand, the Judge should reconsider whether the evidence should be excluded under Rule 403.

United States v. Blazek, 431 F.3d 1104 (8th Cir. 2005) : Affirming a conviction for attempted enticement of a minor for sex and for interstate travel to engage in prohibited sex acts with a minor, the Court found no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously been convicted of abusive sexual conduct for fondling his 11-year-old nephew. Although the charged crimes are not defined by 18 U.S.C. ch. 109A, the second count involves "conduct proscribed by" that chapter, so the defendant was charged with an "offense of sexual assault" as defined by Rule 413(d) and the evidence was made admissible under the Rule.

United States v. Batton, 602 F.3d 1191 (10th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for interstate transportation of a minor for unlawful sexual relations, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously been convicted for oral sex with a 14-year-old boy. The offense charged encompassed "sexual assault," the prior act was highly probative because of the similarity with the "grooming" and sexual assault charged in this case, and any prejudicial effect was minimized by clear jury instructions.

[2.1] Propensity Evidence [Go To Main]

United States v. Tail, 459 F.3d 854 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming convictions for sexual abuse, the Court found no abuse of discretion when evidence of the defendant's prior state court conviction for second-degree rape was admitted. The prior conviction was probative "because it involved the same victim and an act that occurred close in time and under circumstances similar to the crime charged in [the case at issue]." Although the prior conviction was harmful to the defendant's case, because it suggested propensity, that did not constitute unfair prejudice because "the policy articulated in Rule 413, unique to cases involving sexual assaults, renders the general prohibition on propensity evidence in Rule 404(b) inapposite." Thus, "to require the exclusion of this evidence based on the asserted inflammatory nature of sexual offenses would be at odds with the strong legislative judgment in favor of admitting such evidence that Congress expressed in adopting Rule 413."

United States v. Benally, 500 F.3d 1085 (10th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse of a minor under the age of 16 while in Indian country, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting as propensity evidence the testimony of four witnesses regarding the defendant's prior acts of sexual assault. The incidents all involved young females, the prior victims were of similar age to the victim of the charged offense, and many of the incidents involved either the use of force or a weapon as did the charged offense. The significant time lapse between three of the prior acts and the charged offense did not negate the probative value of the acts. The Court also observed that the jury was permitted to consider that all of the prior acts occurred while the defendant was drinking, and that the defendant claimed to have changed his drinking habits by the time of the charged offense.

[3] Relationship to Rule 403 [Go To Main]

United States v. Dillon, 532 F.3d 379 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed the conviction of a former assistant city attorney for depriving two women of their right to bodily integrity under color of law, after he sexually assaulted them. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding two uncharged sexual assaults allegedly committed by the defendant against two other women, although in one case there was no force or threat of force and in the other there was no act under color of law. The latter assaults were close in time to the charged offenses and probative of the defendant's intent to engage in sexual contact without the woman's consent. That probative value was not substantially outweighed by any risk of unfairly prejudicial effect.

United States v. Seymour, 468 F.3d 378 (6th Cir. 2006) : The defendant was convicted for sexual abuse of his sister-in-law and his niece. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding prior sexual assaults against two adult victims. Although the fact the niece was only seven years old at the time of the alleged assault made the evidence less probative as to propensity on that count, the fact that other victims' testimony was markedly similar to the claims of the victims in this case enhanced its probative value. As all four victims were part of the defendant's extended family and all four were allegedly assaulted on a bed after he arrived in an intoxicated state, there was no error in the determination that the probative value of the testimony outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice to the defendant.

United States v. Rogers, 587 F.3d 816 (7th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for attempting to entice a minor to engage in sexual activity and for using the Internet to attempt to transfer obscene material to a minor, the Court reversed on interlocutory appeal an order excluding evidence of the defendant's prior conviction for solicitation of a minor and of his prior conduct involving sexually explicit Internet conversations with a 14-year-old girl. The prior conduct was probative in three ways: First, it made it more likely that by chatting with the person he thought was a 13-year-old girl he intended to commit the charged crimes. Second, the evidence tended to prove motive. Third, the evidence demonstrated propensity. The Court observed that "Rule 413 affects the Rule 403 analysis of past sexual offenses introduced in sexual assault cases" because "Rule 404(b) identifies the propensity inference as improper in all circumstances, and Rule 413 makes an exception to that rule." Thus, "[b]ecause Rule 413 identifies this propensity inference as proper, the chance that the jury will rely on that inference can no longer be labeled as 'unfair' for purposes of the Rule 403 analysis." The Court cautioned, however, that "evidence of prior sexual offenses may still pose significant dangers against which the district court must diligently guard," because "[e]ven if the evidence does not create unfair prejudice solely because it rests on propensity; it may still risk a decision on the basis of something like passion or bias -- that is, an improper basis." The Court concluded that the Trial Judge did not acknowledge the probative value of the propensity inference or explain what about the defendant's prior conduct made it more prejudicial than probative, and remanded for reconsideration of the Rule 403 ruling.

United States v. Rodriguez, 581 F.3d 775 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for kidnapping resulting in death, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding the defendant's two prior sexual assault convictions that involved conduct similar to the charged offense -- approaching a young woman by herself, forcing her into a vehicle under threat of violence, and sexually assaulting her. In United States v. Benais, 460 F.3d 1059 (8th Cir. 2006) , the Court, affirming a conviction for sexual abuse of a minor, found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant raped another girl the same evening. The other assault was probative because it was very close in time and occurred under circumstances similar to the charged crime, "and the only prejudice was that prejudice made admissible by Rule 413," so there was no unfair prejudice. In United States v. Medicine Horn, 447 F.3d 620 (8th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse of a minor, finding no error in the admission of evidence of four other incidents in which the defendant allegedly assaulted a teenage girl after a party at which the victim had consumed alcohol, the defendant removed the victim's pants, and the defendant had used force and stopped the victim from crying out. There was no abuse of discretion in the Trial Judge's determination that in each instance the probative value of the evidence was not substantially exceeded by its unfair prejudicial effect.

[4.1] Relationship to Rule 414 [Go To Main]

United States v. Seymour, 468 F.3d 378 (6th Cir. 2006) : The defendant, convicted for sexual abuse of his sister-in-law and his niece, argued that evidence of prior sexual assaults against adult victims was inadmissible to prove the child molestation charge, on the ground that Rule 414 is the exclusive rule governing child molestation cases and it speaks only of evidence of prior sexual offenses against children. Affirming, the Court noted that both Rule 413 and Rule 414 specifically state that "[t] is rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule."

[4.2] Relevance of the Evidence [Go To Main]

United States v. Hitt, 473 F.3d 146 (5th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a Mann Act conviction arising from sexual abuse of a teenage boy, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that a defendant had sexually abused another victim. Although a Mann Act violation does not require proof that a sexual assault occurred, evidence that the other abuse occurred in the same way as the victim in this case charged was relevant to whether sexual activity occurred between the defendants and the victim, which was relevant to whether the defendants had the requisite intent to engage in illicit sexual activities across state lines.

[4.3] Remote Offenses [Go To Main]

United States v. Horn, 523 F.3d 882 (8th Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for abusive sexual contact, the Court found no abuse of discretion when testimony by the mother of one of the victims that the defendant raped her more than 11 years earlier was admitted. Congress expressly rejected any time limit in Rule 413 and the Rule reflects a strong legislative judgment that prior sexual offenses ordinarily should be admissible to prove the defendant's propensity to commit the crime charged. Nor was the probative value of the evidence substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect. The testimony was "prejudicial" for the same reason it was probative: "[I]t tends to prove his propensity to commit sexual assaults on vulnerable female members of his family when presented with an opportunity to do so undetected."

171 of 184 DOCUMENTS

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 414 RULE 414

2-414 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 414.syn

§ 414.syn Synopsis to Chapter 414: RULE 414

414.01 Official Text

414.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Background of the Rule

[2] Scope of the Rule

414.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Balancing Factors

[2] Constitutional Challenges

[3] Foundation for Other Acts

[4] Relationship to Other Rules

[a] Rule 403

[b] Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 404(b)

[5] Remote Acts

414.04 Legislative History

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 414 RULE 414

2-414 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 414.01

414.01 Official Text

Rule 414. Rule 414. Evidence of Similar Crimes in Child Molestation Cases

(a) In a criminal case in which the defendant is accused of an offense of child molestation, evidence of the defendant's commission of another offense or offenses of child molestation is admissible, and may be considered for its bearing on any matter to which it is relevant.

(b) In a case in which the Government intends to offer evidence under this rule, the attorney for the Government shall disclose the evidence to the defendant, including statements of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony that is expected to be offered, at least fifteen days before the scheduled date of trial or at such later time as the court may allow for good cause.

(c) This rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.

(d) For purposes of this rule and Rule 415, "child" means a person below the age of fourteen, and "offense of child molestation" means a crime under Federal law or the law of a State (as defined in section 513 of title 18, United States Code) that involved --

(1) any conduct proscribed by chapter 109A of title 18, United States Code, that was committed in relation to a child;

(2) any conduct proscribed by chapter 110 of title 18, United States Code;

(3) contact between any part of the defendant's body or an object and the genitals or anus of a child;

(4) contact between the genitals or anus of the defendant and any part of the body of a child;

(5) deriving sexual pleasure or gratification from the infliction of death, bodily injury, or physical pain on a child; or

(6) an attempt or conspiracy to engage in conduct described in paragraph (1)--(5).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 414 RULE 414

2-414 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 414.02

414.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Background of the Rule

This Rule is intended to provide for more liberal admissibility in criminal cases of child molestation where the defendant has committed a prior act or acts of child molestation. Congress passed this Rule, together with Rules 413 and 415 (which are substantively identical but applicable to different types of cases), as part of a general Crime Bill package, and bypassed the ordinary rulemaking process in doing so. As a compromise, Congress provided for the possibility of reconsideration should the Judicial Conference make a timely objection to the new Rules. The Judicial Conference Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules, and subsequently the Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure and the Judicial Conference itself, concluded that the Rule embodied bad policy, and recommended its reconsideration; Congress refused to do so.

As an alternative, the Advisory Committee drafted amendments to Rules 404 and 405, that would "both correct ambiguities and possible constitutional infirmities identified in new Evidence Rules 413, 414, and 415, and yet still effectuate Congressional intent." n1 This proposal is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 413, § 413.02[1], and is completely set forth in the Legislative History section to that Rule, § 413.04[2]. Congress did not adopt any of these proposed changes, and as a result, Rules 413-415, as originally enacted by Congress, and set forth above, became effective on July 9, 1995.

[2] Scope of the Rule

Rule 414 is essentially identical to Rule 413, with the exception that the term "child molestation" is substituted for the term "sexual assault." As such, the questions of scope considered under Rule 413 are equally applicable to Rule 414, and cases construing either Rule are applicable to both. For a full discussion of the scope of these Rules, see the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 413, §§ 413.02[2]-[5]. To summarize:

1. Rule 414 does not apply unless the defendant is charged with child molestation and the prior act offered is one of child molestation.

2. Rule 414 provides an exception to Rule 404(b). The prior act can be admitted explicitly to prove the propensity of the defendant to commit an act of child molestation.

3. The Rule is unclear on whether the Judge can use Rule 403 to exclude a prior act of child molestation on the ground that its probative value is substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. The better reading of the Rule, receiving support from statements by its sponsors in Congress, indicates that Rule 403 remains applicable, and the Courts have so held. n2

4. Even if Rule 403 is applicable, the balancing test is different from that traditionally applied to uncharged misconduct evidence. The Trial Judge must consider, as part of the probative value of a prior act of child molestation, the fact that it tends to establish a propensity to commit similar acts of sexual misconduct. And in assessing prejudice, the Trial Judge cannot consider the risk that the jury may draw a propensity inference, because the jury is specifically permitted to draw such an inference under Rule 414. The Trial Judge should consider, however, whether the jury might convict the defendant simply because he did something bad before or because he is a bad person, without respect to any current propensity to sexually assault children. Exclusion is thus left for exceptional cases in which the circumstances of the uncharged misconduct are completely different from those surrounding the crime charged, and/or the uncharged misconduct occurred long ago and there has been no misconduct in the interim.

5. Evidence of uncharged child molestation is admissible if the prosecution provides enough evidence to support a finding, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the defendant committed the act.

6. The Rule contains a notice requirement.

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. Judicial Conference Report, set forth in the legislative history to Rule 413, § 413.04[2].

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Larson, 112 F.3d 600 (2d Cir. 1997) ("We view Rule 403 analysis in connection with evidence offered under Rule 414 to be consistent with Congress's intent."). The Court in Larson upheld two evidentiary rulings by the Trial Court. One excluded evidence of child molestation occurring 21-23 years before trial. The other ruling admitted evidence of child molestation occurring 16-20 years before trial, where the events "closely paralleled the events complained of" by the victim in the instant trial. It is notable that the government in Larson agreed that Rule 414 did not "eliminate the need for the court to conduct the analysis required under Rule 403."

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 414 RULE 414

2-414 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 414.03

414.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Balancing Factors

United States v. Gabe, 237 F.3d 954 (8th Cir. 2000) : The defendant was charged with sexual abuse of his adopted daughter. The Court held that evidence of a 20-year old incident in which the defendant sexually abused another minor was properly admitted. The evidence was highly probative of the defendant's propensity: the victims were the same age; both were related to the defendant; and the manner of perpetrating the offenses was similar. The Court found that the evidence was not unfairly prejudicial under Rule 403: it "is prejudicial to Gabe for the same reason it is probative -- it tends to prove his propensity to molest young children in his family when presented with an opportunity to do so undetected." Finally, the Court rejected the argument that the evidence was inadmissible because of the 20-year lapse of time, noting that when Rule 414 was enacted, "Congress expressly rejected imposing any time limit on prior sex offenses." In United States v. Sumner, 204 F.3d 1182 (8th Cir. 2000) , the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the defendant's prior acts of child molestation in a prosecution arising out of sexual abuse of a minor. The Trial Judge had conducted a Rule 403 balancing analysis, and "the prior acts were relatively recent in time and were substantially similar to the charged assaults, while the prejudice was that which is presented by all propensity evidence in cases of child abuse."

United States v. Mann, 193 F.3d 1172 (10th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse of a minor, finding no error in the admission of testimony concerning a prior act of sexual assault committed by the defendant on another child. The Court stated that "in the sexual assault context, Rule 403 requires district courts to consider the following factors: (1) how clearly the prior act has been proved; (2) how probative the evidence is of the material fact it is admitted to prove; (3) how seriously disputed the material fact is; and (4) whether the government can avail itself of any less prejudicial evidence." In this case, the child-victim's testimony provided enough information for a juror to believe by a preponderance of the evidence that the sexual assault occurred; the prior sexual assault was extremely similar to the acts with which the defendant was charged; there was a serious dispute over the allegations; and the government did not have access to any less prejudicial evidence.

[2] Constitutional Challenges

United States v. LeMay, 260 F.3d 1018 (9th Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions for child molestation arising from oral sex between the defendant and his cousins while the defendant was babysitting, the Court rejected due process and equal protection arguments against the admission of evidence of similar conduct with his nieces that occurred a decade earlier when the defendant was 12 years old. As to due process, the Court declared that as long as the protections of Rule 403 "remain in place to ensure that potentially devastating evidence of little probative value will not reach the jury, the right to a fair trial remains adequately safeguarded." As to equal protection, the Court found that "Rule 414 does not discriminate against any group of individuals on the basis of a suspect or quasi-suspect class," and any disproportionate impact on Native Americans, "if true, would arise simply because the federal government only has jurisdiction over crimes such as child molestation when they arise on Indian Reservations, military bases, or other federal enclaves." On the Rule 403 question, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence.

United States v. Castillo, 140 F.3d 874 (10th Cir. 1998) : In a prosecution for sexual abuse of a minor, the Court found no violation of constitutional rights to due process, equal protection, and freedom from cruel and unusual punishment in the admission of uncharged acts of child sex abuse. The defendant's due process claim was rejected because of the "existence of procedural protections in Rule 402 and, in particular, Rule 403." The equal protection claim was rejected because child molesters are not a suspect class, and the decision to provide more liberal admissibility against child molesters had a rational basis, i.e., the particular need "for corroborating evidence in cases of sexual abuse of a child because of the highly secretive nature of these sex crimes and because often the only available proof is the child's testimony." Finally, the Eighth Amendment argument was rejected because Rule 414 is simply an evidentiary rule, not a rule of punishment. The Court nonetheless remanded for a determination of whether the uncharged sexual misconduct was properly admitted under Rule 403.

[3] Foundation for Other Acts

United States v. Norris, 428 F.3d 907 (9th Cir. 2005) : In a prosecution for sexually abusing a child, the defendant argued that evidence of an uncharged act of child molestation was improperly admitted, because the only evidence of its occurrence was his own confession to police officers when he was arrested on the instant charge. Affirming, the Court rejected the argument that Rule 414 incorporated the corpus delicti requirement applicable to convictions, i.e., that a conviction cannot stand solely on the confession of the accused. It declared that the Supreme Court's decision in Huddleston v. United States, n1 which held that the admissibility of other act evidence is governed by the conditional relevance standard of Rule 104(b), applies to Rules 413-415 as well as to Rule 404(b).

[4] Relationship to Other Rules

[a] Rule 403

United States v. Larson, 112 F.3d 600 (2d Cir. 1997) : In the defendant's trial for interstate transportation of a minor with intent to engage in criminal sexual conduct, the Judge applied a Rule 403 analysis to evidence offered under Rule 414, admitting evidence of similar acts of child molestation 16-20 years before trial and excluding evidence of acts 21-23 years previously. Affirming, the Court indicated that a Rule 403 analysis in connection with evidence offered under Rule 414 was consistent with Congress' intent. The Court also noted from the legislative history the presumption that evidence admissible under Rules 413-415 is relevant and that its probative value is not outweighed by any risk of prejudice, as well as the congressional intent that the temporal scope of the Rules be broad.

United States v. LeMay, 260 F.3d 1018 (9th Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions for child molestation arising from oral sex between the defendant and his cousins while the defendant was babysitting, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of similar conduct with his nieces that occurred a decade earlier when the defendant was 12 years old. The evidence was highly relevant because the prior acts of sexual misconduct were very similar to the charged crimes, and the evidence was also relevant to bolster the credibility of the witnesses; while this bolstering depended on the propensity inference (that because the defendant did it before it was more likely that the witnesses were being truthful in saying he did it again), this was the very sort of inference that Congress permitted under Rule 414. Though the evidence of prior sexual misconduct was prejudicial, the Court concluded that the Trial Judge "struck a careful balance between LeMay's rights and the clear intent of Congress that evidence of prior similar acts be admitted in child molestation prosecutions." In United States v. Withorn, 204 F.3d 790 (8th Cir. 2000) , a prosecution for forcible rape of a 12-year-old, the Court found no abuse of discretion when evidence was admitted that the defendant had forcibly raped his cousin when she was 12 years old. The Court noted the similarities between the incidents: the victims were approximately the same age, both assaults involved force, both occurred after the defendant had isolated the victim from others, in both the victims were threatened not to inform anyone what had occurred, and in each case the defendant had claimed that the victim had consented to the sexual activity. On retrial of the defendant in United States v. LeCompte n2 for abusive sexual contact with a minor, the government gave timely notice of an intent to offer evidence of prior incidents in which the defendant had committed sex offenses in a similar manner against another minor. The Trial Judge granted an in limine motion to exclude the evidence under Rule 403, on the grounds that there were some differences between the prior incidents and the charged offenses, the prior and charged acts were separated by eight years, and the evidence was "obviously highly prejudicial." On interlocutory appeal, the Court reversed, finding that "[i]n light of the strong legislative judgment that evidence of prior sexual offenses should ordinarily be admissible, we think the District Court erred in its assessment that the probative value of [the] testimony was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice." The prior and charged acts were substantially similar, and the time lapse was less significant than might appear, given that the defendant was imprisoned for a portion of the intervening time. As to excluding the evidence because of the "unique stigma" of child sexual abuse, "it is precisely such holdings that Congress intended to overrule." In United States v. Eagle, n3 the Court affirmed a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse of a minor, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of the defendant's prior conviction for the federal crime of carnal knowledge, which involves sexual abuse of a minor. The Trial Judge properly balanced the probative value and prejudicial effect of the prior crime under Rule 403. The defendant's claim that the conviction should not have been admitted because it was ten years old was "seriously weakened by the fact that he had spent six of those years incarcerated for that crime."

United States v. Charley, 189 F.3d 1251 (10th Cir. 1999) : The Court held that findings that invoked the stated general reasons for Rule 414's enactment -- specifically, by allusion to the similarity between the defendant's prior crime and the present charges and to the fact there was little corroborating evidence -- were sufficient to satisfy the Rule 403 balancing required for evidence offered under Rule 414. In United States v. Meacham, n4 the Court, affirming a conviction for transporting a minor for sexual activity, held that the Trial Judge properly admitted evidence of the defendant's prior sexual misconduct with children. The evidence was admitted under both Rule 404(b) and Rule 414 because of some uncertainty about the effective date of the latter Rule. The Court indicated that a Rule 403 balancing is required under both Rules.

[b] Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 404(b)

United States v. Meacham, 115 F.3d 1488 (10th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a conviction for transporting a minor for sexual activity, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly admitted evidence that the defendant had committed a previous sexual act on the victim several earlier, as well as evidence that he molested his two step-daughters when they were young girls more than 30 years earlier. The evidence was admitted under both Rule 404(b) and Rule 414 because of some uncertainty about the effective date of the latter Rule. The Court indicated that a Rule 403 balancing is required under both Rules and that in this case the evidence was properly admitted on the issue of intent and to show plan and preparation. It observed that the Trial Judge instructed the jury not to use the evidence for propensity to molest, which would be allowed under Rule 414.

[5] Remote Acts

United States v. Drewry, 365 F.3d 957 (10th Cir. 2004) : Affirming the defendant's convictions for physical and sexual abuse of four children, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony regarding acts of child molestation that occurred 25 years earlier. The Court reasoned that "[s]ufficient factual similarity can rehabilitate evidence of prior uncharged offenses that might otherwise be inadmissible due to staleness."

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 404.02[18].

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. LeCompte, 131 F.3d 767 (8th Cir. 1997) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Eagle, 137 F.3d 1011 (8th Cir. 1998) .

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Meacham, 115 F.3d 1488 (10th Cir. 1997) .

175 of 184 DOCUMENTS

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 414 RULE 414

2-414 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 414.04

414.04 Legislative History

[Editor's Note: Rule 414 is not a product of the usual procedure by which Federal Rules of Evidence are crafted adopted. It was added to the Federal Rules of Evidence by Public Law 103-322, the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994. Public Law 103-322 was adopted September 13, 1994, and became effective July 9, 1995. For full discussion of the implementation of this Rule, as well as Congressional discussion and the Report of the Judicial Conference of the United States on responding to this Rule, see the Legislative History of Rule 413, § 413.04.]

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 414 RULE 414

2-414 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 414, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 414. Evidence of Similar Crimes in Child Molestation Cases		Rule 414. Similar Crimes in Child-Molestation Cases
(a)	In a criminal case in	(a)	Permitted Uses. In which the defendant is accused of an offense of child molestation, evidence of the defendant's commission of another offense or offenses of child molestation is admissible, and may be a criminal case in which a defendant is accused of child molestation, the court may admit evidence that the defendant committed any other child molestation. The evidence may be consider considered for its bearing on any matter to which it is relevant.		considered on any matter to which it is relevant.

(b)	In a case in which the Government intends to offer evidence under this rule, the attorney for the Government shall disclose the	(b)	Disclosure to the Defendant. If the prosecutor intends to offer this evidence, the prosecutor must disclose it to the de-

evidence to the defendant, including statements of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony that is expected to be offered, at least fifteen days before the scheduled date of trial fendant, including witnesses' statements or a summary of the expected testimony. The prosecutor must do so at least 15 days before trial or at a later time that the court allows for good cause.

			or at such later time as the court may allow for good cause.
(c)	This rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.	(c)	Effect on Other Rules. This rule does not limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.
(d)	For purpose	(d)	Definition s of this rule and Rule 415, "child" means a person below the age of fourteen, and "offense of child molestation" means a crime under Federal law or the law of a State (as defined in section 513 of of "Child" and "Child Molestation." In this rule and Rule 415:

title 18, United States Code) that involved --

(1) any conduct proscribed by chapter 109A of title 18, United States Code, that was committed in relation to a child;

(1) "child" means a person below the age of 14; and

(2) any conduct proscribed by

(2) "child molestation" means a crime under federal law or under state law (as "state" is defined in 18 U.S.C. § 513) involving:

chapter 110 of title 18, United States Code;

(3) contact between any part of the defendant's body or an object and the genitals or anus of a child;

(A) any conduct prohibited by 18 U.S.C. chapter 109A and committed with a child;

(4) contact between the genitals or anus of the de-

(B) any conduct prohibited by 18 U.S.C. chapter

fendant and any part of the body of a child;

110;

(5) deriving sexual pleasure or gratification from the infliction of death, bodily injury, or physical pain on a child; or

(C) contact between any part of the defendant's body -- or an object -- and a child's genitals or anus;

(6) an attempt or conspir-

(D) contact between the de-

acy to engage in conduct described in paragraphs (1)-(5).

fendant's genitals or anus and any part of a child's body;

(E) deriving sexual pleasure or gratification from inflicting death, bodily injury, or physical pain on a child; or

(F) an attempt or con-

spiracy to engage in conduct describ ed in subpara grap hs
(A)- (E).

Committee Note

The language of Rule 414 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 414 RULE 414

2-414 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 414.03

Supp. to § 414.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Balancing Factors [Go To Main]

United States v. Kelly, 510 F.3d 433 (4th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for traveling in interstate commerce for the purpose of engaging in illicit sexual conduct with a 12-year-old child, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of the defendant's prior conviction for attempted rape of a 12-year-old child based on conduct that occurred 22 years before the acts charged in the instant case. The Court found that the similarity between the two offenses was "striking," so the fact that the conviction was 22 years old did not render it inadmissible. While the prior conviction was undoubtedly prejudicial, it was not unfairly so, because "it was prejudicial for the same reason it is probative -- it tends to prove the defendant's propensity to molest young children." The Court added that the government did not seek to elicit inflammatory testimony about the prior conviction, but instead presented only the official conviction record.

United States v. Hawpetoss, 478 F.3d 820 (7th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for sexual assaults on three minor children, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding uncharged instances of molestation of two other children. The defendant argued that not all of the five factors listed by the Ninth Circuit in United States v. LeMay, 260 F.3d 1018, 1028 (9th Cir. 2001) -- similarity of the conduct, proximity in time, frequency of prior acts, presence or lack of intervening circumstances, and necessity for the evidence beyond the evidence already offered at trial -- had been satisfied. The Court took a more "flexible" approach because it was "hesitant to cabin artificially the discretion of the district courts through the imposition of a relatively rigid multi-factor test," although it considered the factors identified in LeMay "a helpful guide in making the discretionary determination on admissibility." Here, the Judge had given "careful, measured consideration" to the disputed evidence, determining it to be both relevant and non-violative of Rule 403.

United States v. Bentley, 561 F.3d 803 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for sexual exploitation of children and possession of child pornography, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding the defendant's abuse of other children. The similarities between the incidents tended to show his propensity to molest young girls who were actual or virtual members of his family or living in his home when presented with an opportunity to do so undetected, and those similarities outweighed the differences in the nature of the offenses -- the defendant had penetrated the other victims and had not taken photographs of them. The Judge had also taken precautions to limit the prejudicial nature of the evidence, including repeated instructions about its permissible uses, explanations of the presumption of innocence and the applicable standard of proof, and cautions not to convict simply because the defendant may have committed other crimes.

[4] Relationship to Other Rules [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 403

United States v. Seymour, 468 F.3d 378 (6th Cir. 2006) : The defendant was convicted for sexual abuse of his sister-in-law and his niece. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding prior sexual assaults against two adult victims. Although the fact the niece was only seven years old at the time of the alleged assault made the evidence less probative as to propensity on that count, the fact that other victims' testimony was markedly similar to the claims of the victims in this case enhanced its probative value. As all four victims were part of the defendant's extended family and all four were allegedly assaulted on a bed after he arrived in an intoxicated state, there was no error in the determination that the probative value of the testimony outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice to the defendant.

United States v. Summage, 575 F.3d 864 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed child pornography convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant had photographed himself molesting his then-girlfriend's seven-year-old daughter in 1997. Although the prior conviction was overturned on appeal, the conduct was similar enough to the charged conduct (photographing abuse of an infant and toddler) to be admitted. The Court rejected the defendant's argument that he should have been permitted to offer evidence that his conviction had been overturned, noting that the government introduced the victim's testimony and did not rely on the fact that there had been a conviction. "In the absence of evidence of the conviction, evidence of the subsequent reversal would have confused the jury."

[c] Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 413

United States v. Seymour, 468 F.3d 378 (6th Cir. 2006) : The defendant, convicted for sexual abuse of his sister-in-law and his niece, argued that evidence of prior sexual assaults against adult victims was inadmissible to prove the child molestation charge, on the ground that Rule 414 is the exclusive rule governing child molestation cases and it speaks only of evidence of prior sexual offenses against children. Affirming, the Court noted that both Rule 413 and Rule 414 specifically state that "[t] is rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule."

[5] Remote Acts [Go To Main]

United States v. Kelly, 510 F.3d 433 (4th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for traveling in interstate commerce for the purpose of engaging in illicit sexual conduct with a 12-year-old child, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of the defendant's prior conviction for attempted rape of a 12-year-old child based on conduct that occurred 22 years before the acts charged in the instant case. The Court found that the similarity between the two offenses was "striking," so the fact that the conviction was 22 years old did not render it inadmissible. While the prior conviction was undoubtedly prejudicial, it was not unfairly so, because "it was prejudicial for the same reason it is probative -- it tends to prove the defendant's propensity to molest young children." The Court added that the government did not seek to elicit inflammatory testimony about the prior conviction, but instead presented only the official conviction record.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 415 RULE 415

2-415 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 415.syn

§ 415.syn Synopsis to Chapter 415: RULE 415

415.01 Official Text

415.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Background of the Rule

[2] Scope of the Rule

415.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Clear Record Required

[2] Notice

[3] Offense of Sexual Assault

[4] Relationship to Rule 403

415.04 Legislative History

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 415 RULE 415

2-415 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 415.01

415.01 Official Text

Rule 415. Evidence of Similar Acts in Civil Cases Concerning Sexual Assault or Child Molestation

(a) In a civil case in which a claim for damages or other relief is predicated on a party's alleged commission of conduct constituting an offense of sexual assault or child molestation, evidence of that party's commission of another offense or offenses of sexual assault or child molestation is admissible and may be considered as provided in Rule 413 and Rule 414 of these Rules.

(b) A party who intends to offer evidence under this Rule shall disclose the evidence to the party against whom it will be offered, including statements of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony that is expected to be offered, at least fifteen days before the scheduled date of trial or at such later time as the court may allow for good cause.

(c) This rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 415 RULE 415

2-415 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 415.02

415.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Background of the Rule

This Rule is intended to provide for more liberal admissibility in civil cases in which the plaintiff is alleging child molestation or sexual assault, and the defendant has committed a prior act or acts of child molestation or sexual assault. Congress passed this Rule, together with Rules 413 and 414 (which are substantively identical but applicable to different types of cases), as part of a general Crime Bill package, and bypassed the ordinary rulemaking process in doing so. As a compromise, Congress provided for the possibility of reconsideration should the Judicial Conference make a timely objection to the new Rules. The Judicial Conference Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules, and subsequently the Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure and the Judicial Conference itself, concluded that the Rule embodied bad policy, and recommended its reconsideration; Congress refused to do so.

As an alternative, the Advisory Committee drafted amendments to Rules 404 and 405, that would "both correct ambiguities and possible constitutional infirmities identified in new Evidence Rules 413, 414, and 415, and yet still effectuate Congressional intent." n1 This proposal is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 413, § 413.02[1], and is completely set forth in the Legislative History section to that Rule, § 413.04[2]. Congress did not adopt any of these proposed changes, and as a result, Rules 413-415, as originally enacted by Congress, and set forth above, became effective on July 9, 1995.

[2] Scope of the Rule

Rule 415 simply applies the admissibility principle of Rules 413 and 414 to civil cases involving sexual assault or child molestation. As such, the questions of scope considered under Rules 413 and 414 are equally applicable to Rule 415. To summarize:

1. Rule 415 does not apply unless relief is predicated on a party's commission of sexual assault or child molestation. n2 It does not apply to sexual discrimination or sexual harassment that does not involve sexual assault, as that term is defined in Rule 413. Moreover, the only bad acts admitted under the Rule are those involving sexual assault or child molestation (as defined in Rules 413 and 414). Other bad acts are not covered by the Rule, even if they would be probative to prove a claim of sexual assault or child molestation.

2. Rule 415 (by way of incorporating Rules 413 and 414) provides an exception to the limitation on character evidence set forth in Rule 404(b). A prior act of sexual assault or child molestation can be admitted explicitly to prove the propensity of the party to commit the act alleged by the offering party.

3. The Rule is unclear on whether the Judge can use Rule 403 to exclude a prior act of child molestation on the ground that its probative value is substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. The better reading of the Rule, receiving support from statements by its sponsors in Congress, indicates that Rule 403 remains applicable to Rules 413-15, and the Courts have so held. n3

4. Even if Rule 403 is applicable, the balancing test is different from that traditionally applied to uncharged misconduct evidence. The Trial Judge must consider, as part of the probative value of a prior act of sexual assault or child molestation, the fact that it tends to establish a propensity to commit similar acts of sexual misconduct. And in assessing prejudice, the Trial Judge cannot consider the risk that the jury may draw a propensity inference, because the jury is specifically permitted to draw such an inference under Rule 415. The Trial Judge should consider, however, whether the jury might hold the defendant liable simply because he did something bad before or because he is a bad person, without respect to any current propensity to sexually assault children. Exclusion is thus left for exceptional cases in which the circumstances of the uncharged misconduct are completely different from those surrounding the crime charged, and/or the uncharged misconduct occurred long ago and there has been no misconduct in the interim.

5. Evidence of uncharged child molestation or sexual assault is admissible if the proponent provides enough evidence to support a finding, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the defendant committed the act.

6. The Rule contains a notice requirement. The notice requirement apparently supplants the usual timetable for disclosure provided by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The Advisory Committee suggested that the notice provision be deleted because it "did not believe that Congress intended to alter the usual timetable" provided by the Civil Rules; but Congress rejected all suggestions for change to the Rule. n4

See the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 413, § 413.02, for further discussion.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. Judicial Conference Report, set forth in the legislative history to Rule 413, § 413.04[2].

(n2)Footnote 2. Professor Aiken notes, however, that the definition of sexual assault in Rule 413 is broad enough to cover a good number of sexual harassment claims. She contends that Rule 415 will reach more sexual harassment cases than Congress might have thought about or intended. See Aiken, Sexual Character Evidence in Civil Actions: Refining the Propensity Rule, 1997 Wisconsin L. Rev. 1221, 1231:

> The Code's definition of sexual assault ... greatly enlarges the number of claims in which sexual character evidence could be offered because the rule applies to more cases than just damage suits over criminal acts of sexual assault. Typical tort actions arising from sexual misconduct include claims of assault, battery, intentional infliction of emotional distress, false imprisonment, seduction, sexual harassment, transmission of sexually transmitted disease, negligent entrustment and negligent supervision. Sexual harassment suits often include allegations of unwanted sexual touching ... thus invoking the possibility of admission of other similar acts against harassers and their employers. Because Rule 415 will apply in sexual harassment cases in which there has been physical contact, it is likely to have a greater impact on the admission of evidence in federal courts than its companion rules 413 and 414. ... The application of Rule 415 to sexual harassment cases is likely to come as a surprise both to proponents of the new rules and to affected parties. ... The rule's justification, though perhaps politically appealing when describing child molesters, loses much of its impact when describing a fanny-pinching sexual harasser in the workplace.

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., Johnson v. Elk Lake School Dist., 283 F.3d 138 (3d Cir. 2002) (in a case of alleged sexual abuse, the Trial Court did not abuse discretion in excluding a prior act of sexual misconduct under Rule 403; the equivocal nature of the prior act made its probative value low, as did its dissimilarity from the facts at issue; and the evidence might have unfairly prejudiced the defendant and confused the jury).

(n4)Footnote 4. See the discussion of the Legislative History of Rules 413-415 in § 413.04.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 415 RULE 415

2-415 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 415.03

415.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Clear Record Required

Blind-Doan v. Sanders, 291 F.3d 1079 (9th Cir. 2002) : An arrestee sued a police sergeant claiming that he sexually assaulted her in a jail cell. Overturning a judgment for the sergeant, the Court found a failure to make a clear record justifying exclusion of evidence regarding alleged improper sexual conduct by the sergeant toward a different detainee. The Court noted that the trial occurred before its decision in Doe v. Glanzer, 232 F.3d 1258 (9th Cir. 2000) (§ 415.03[4]), setting forth a Trial Judge's obligations under Rule 415. A dissenting Judge argued that "it is most unfortunate that the hortatory language of Glanzer has now become an absolute rule--so absolute that it is now used to reverse a trial court decision which was made before the opinion even issued."

[2] Notice

Johnson v. Elk Lake School Dist., 283 F.3d 138 (3d Cir. 2002) : In a § 1983 action arising from alleged sexual abuse of a high school student by a guidance counselor, the plaintiff offered testimony from a friend of the counselor that on one occasion the counselor picked her up and threw her over his shoulder, during which his hand went up her skirt and touched her in the crotch area. He soon let her down and the two of them proceeded to sit down and eat lunch together. As an alternative ground for excluding the testimony, the Trial Judge relied on the notice provision of Rule 415(b), ruling that the plaintiff gave no special notification of her intent to introduce the evidence. While recognizing the desirability of special notice from a trial management standpoint, the Court found that the Rule's purpose of avoiding unfair surprise was adequately satisfied because defense counsel was present at the friend's deposition, where the incident had been inquired into by both parties, and because the deposition was included on the defendant's pretrial list of exhibits. The Court held that exclusion of the testimony was nevertheless justified as an exercise of discretion under Rule 403.

[3] Offense of Sexual Assault

Johnson v. Elk Lake School Dist., 283 F.3d 138 (3d Cir. 2002) : In a § 1983 action arising from alleged sexual abuse of a high school student by a guidance counselor, the plaintiff offered testimony from a friend of the counselor that on one occasion the counselor picked her up and threw her over his shoulder, during which his hand went up her skirt and touched her in the crotch area. He soon let her down and the two of them proceeded to sit down and eat lunch together. The Trial Judge excluded the evidence on the ground that the incident did not qualify as an "offense of sexual assault" under the applicable definition of Rule 413(d), because there was a serious question whether the touching was intentional. The Court noted that whether the defendant's conduct was intentional, and thus an offense of sexual assault, was a question of conditional relevancy under Rule 104(b), following Huddleston v. United States (see § 104.02[9]). It was not clear whether the Judge had employed that or the stricter standard of Rule 104(a), but in any event exclusion of the evidence was a proper exercise of discretion under Rule 403.

[4] Relationship to Rule 403

Johnson v. Elk Lake School Dist., 283 F.3d 138 (3d Cir. 2002) : In a § 1983 action arising from alleged sexual abuse of a high school student by a guidance counselor, the plaintiff offered testimony from a friend of the counselor that on one occasion the counselor picked her up and threw her over his shoulder, during which his hand went up her skirt and touched her in the crotch area. He soon let her down and the two of them proceeded to sit down and eat lunch together. The Trial Judge excluded the evidence on the grounds that the incident did not qualify as an "offense of sexual assault" under the applicable definition of Rule 413(d) and because there was insufficient notice given pursuant to Rule 415(b). Although the Court disagreed with those two grounds, it upheld exclusion as a proper balancing under Rule 403 of probative value against countervailing factors. The equivocal nature of the incident made the probative value of the evidence low, as did the substantial dissimilarity from the alleged abuse at issue, while admission of the evidence might have unfairly prejudiced the defendant, misled the jury, confused the issues, and wasted valuable trial time.

Doe v. Glanzer, 232 F.3d 1258 (9th. Cir. 2000) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in an action for alleged sexual abuse, the Court upheld the exclusion of evidence of a 15-year-old incident in which the defendant allegedly sexually assaulted a minor at a party. The Court reviewed the legislative history of Rules 413-415 and determined that the sexual misconduct covered by these Rules remains subject to exclusion under Rule 403. The Trial Court had properly exercised its discretion under Rule 403 in this case: there was a significant time lapse between the two incidents; there was no evidence of any sexual misconduct in the interim; the alleged victims, while both minors, differed substantially in age; and the circumstances of the alleged incidents were not similar.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 415 RULE 415

2-415 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 415.04

415.04 Legislative History

[Editor's Note: Rule 415 is not a product of the usual procedure by which Federal Rules of Evidence are enacted. It was added to the Federal Rules of Evidence by Public Law 103-322, the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994. Public Law 103-322 was adopted September 13, 1994, and became effective July 9, 1995. For full discussion of the implementation of this Rule, as well as Congressional discussion and the Report of the Judicial Conference of the United States on this Rule, see the Legislative History of Rule 413, § 413.04.]

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 415 RULE 415

2-415 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 415, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 415. Evidence of Similar Acts in Civil Cases Concerning Sexual Assault or Chil	Rule 415. Similar Acts in Civil Cases Involving Sexual Assault or Child Molesta

d Molestation	tion
(a)	In a civil case in which a claim for damages or other relief is predicated on a party's alleged commission of conduct constituting an offense of sexual assault or chil	(a)	Permitted Uses. In a civil case involving a claim for relief based on a party's alleged sexual assault or child molestation, the court may admit evidence that the party

d molestation, evidence of that party's commission of another offense or offenses of sexual assault or child molestation is admissible and may be considered as provided in Rule 413 and committed any other sexual assault or child molestation. The evidence may be considered as provided in Rules 413 and 414.

Rule 414 of these rules.

(b) A party who intends to offer evidence under this Rule shall disclose the evidence to the party against whom it will be offered, including statements of witnesses or a sum

(b) Disclosure to the Opponent. If a party intends to offer this evidence, the party must disclose it to the party against whom it will be offered, including witnesses'

	mary of the substance of any testimony that is expected to be offered, at least fifteen days before the scheduled date of trial or at such later time as the court may allow for good cause.	statements or a summary of the expected testimony. The party must do so at least 15 days before trial or at a later time that the court allows for good cause.
(c)	This rule	(c) Effect

shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.	on Other Rules. This rule does not limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 415 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 415 RULE 415

2-415 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 415.03

Supp. to § 415.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[2] Notice [Go To Main]

Doe v. Smith, 470 F.3d 331 (7th Cir. 2006) : In a suit for alleged child molestation by a school official, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the testimony of another victim who did not come forward until ten days before this trial was originally scheduled. The Judge barred the witness from testifying for failure to comply with the Rule 415 notice requirement, even though the trial was eventually continued. The Court found the Judge's refusal to reconsider the ruling, once the trial was continued, was unreasonable. It reasoned that any prejudice to the defendants could have been mitigated by permitting the witness to be deposed during the period of the continuance.

[3] Offense of Sexual Assault [Go To Main]

Doe v. Smith, 470 F.3d 331 (7th Cir. 2006) : In a suit for alleged child molestation by a school official, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude evidence that the official had been convicted of indecent solicitation of another child. It concluded, 2-1, that soliciting a minor for a sex act constituted a substantial step toward committing a sexual assault, and therefore qualified as an attempt; as such, it was within the crimes covered by Rules 413-415. The Court rejected the school district's contention that, even if the conviction was probative against the official it was not probative against the school district. The Court concluded that the official's "pedophilic conduct is a fact of consequence that is intertwined with the school district's potential civil liability."

Seeley v. Chase, 443 F.3d 1290 (10th Cir. 2006) : In a § 1983 action against a police officer for raping a woman in his patrol car, the plaintiff introduced testimony from two witnesses who had separately been stopped by the officer and fondled, in the one case, and had her underwear pulled down, in the other. Reviewing a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held that these were "sexual assaults" as defined in Rule 413(d), although they did not involve touching of the genitals, because they qualified as "attempts" to do so. However, the case was remanded for the limited purpose of making the required on-the-record Rule 403 balancing with respect to the other sexual assault evidence.

[4] Relationship to Rule 403 [Go To Main]

Martinez v. Cui, 608 F.3d 54 (1st Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in a patient's action alleging that her civil rights had been violated when an emergency room physician sexually assaulted her by digital penetration of her vagina. Finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the physician had inserted his finger in another woman's vagina during a postoperative examination, for which he had been charged with (although acquitted of) professional misconduct, the Court applied the usual rules regarding discretion under Rule 403, even though this evidence was being offered under Rule 415, and found that the evidence had minimal probative value because of the significantly different treatment situations and a high probability of consuming excessive time and confusing the issues.

Seeley v. Chase, 443 F.3d 1290 (10th Cir. 2006) : In a § 1983 action against a police officer for raping a woman in his patrol car, the plaintiff introduced testimony from two witnesses who had separately been stopped by the officer and fondled, in the one case, and had her underwear pulled down, in the other. Reviewing a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held that these were "sexual assaults" as defined in Rule 413(d), although they did not involve touching of the genitals, because they qualified as "attempts" to do so. However, the case was remanded for the limited purpose of making the required on-the-record Rule 403 balancing with respect to the other sexual assault evidence.

1 of 156 DOCUMENTS

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article V. Privileges
CHAPTER 501 RULE 501

2-501 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 501.syn

§ 501.syn Synopsis to Chapter 501: RULE 501

501.01 Official Text

501.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Federal and State Law

[2] Supreme Court's Approval of Specific Rules

[3] The Common Law and the Proposed, But Unenacted, Rules

[4] New Privileges

[5] Attorney-Client Privilege

[a] Common-Law Privilege

[b] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Legal Advice

[c] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Attorney Acting in Legal Capacity -- Necessary Agents

[d] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Protection of Communications

[e] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Communications Made in Confidence

[i] Expectation of Confidentiality

[ii] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Confidences -- Common Interest Doctrine

[iii] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Confidences -- Incidents of Representation

[f] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Communication From the Attorney

[g] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Corporate Representation

[h] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Government Attorneys

[i] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Permanent Protection

[j] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Invocation

[k] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Waiver

[i] Waiver as Forfeiture

[ii] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Waiver -- Who Can Waive the Privilege?

[iii] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Waiver -- Selective Waiver

[iv] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Waiver -- Advice of Counsel Defense

[v] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Waiver -- Inadvertent Disclosure

[l] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Exceptions

[i] Attorney Self-Defense

[ii] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Exceptions -- Fiduciaries

[iii] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Exceptions -- Crime-Fraud

[6] Psychotherapist-Patient and Related Privileges

[7] Executive and Governmental Privileges

[8] Marital Privileges

[9] Parent-Child Privilege

[10] Clergy-Communicant Privilege

[11] Trade Secrets Privilege

[12] Tax Preparer Privilege

[13] Journalist's Privilege

[14] Miscellaneous Privileges

[15] In Camera Review

501.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Accountant-Client

[2] Attorney-Client

[a] Comment on Exercise

[b] Attorney-Client -- Common Interest

[i] Action Between Joint Clients

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Common Interest -- Attorney Conflict of Interest

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Common Interest -- Government Attorneys

[iv] Attorney-Client -- Common Interest -- Miscellaneous Civil Cases

[v] Attorney-Client -- Common Interest -- Miscellaneous Criminal Cases

[vi] Attorney-Client -- Common Interest -- Waiver Issues

[c] Attorney-Client -- Communications from Attorney

[d] Attorney-Client -- Compulsory Process

[e] Attorney-Client -- Confidential Communications

[i] Failure To Prevent Third-Party Reception

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Confidential Communications -- Intention that Attorney Will Disclose Information Communicated

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Confidential Communications -- Miscellaneous Cases

[f] Attorney-Client -- Corporate Privilege

[i] Former Employees

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Corporate Privilege -- Generally

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Corporate Privilege -- Intracorporate Dissemination of Privileged Information

[iv] Attorney-Client -- Corporate Privilege -- Shareholder Suits

[g] Attorney-Client -- Death of Client

[h] Attorney-Client -- Evidence Delivered to Attorney

[i] Attorney-Client -- Exceptions

[i] Crime or Fraud

[A] Civil Cases

[B] Attorney-Client -- Exceptions -- Crime or Fraud -- Criminal Cases

[C] Attorney-Client -- Exceptions -- Crime or Fraud -- Procedures

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Exceptions -- Defense of Lawyer

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Exceptions -- Will Contests

[j] Attorney-Client -- Fact of Consultations

[k] Attorney-Client -- Fees, Client Identity and Address, etc.

[i] Attorney-Client -- Fees, Client Identity and Address, etc. -- Attorney Billing Issues

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Fees, Client Identity and Address, etc. -- Benefactor Payments

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Fees, Client Identity and Address, etc. -- Currency Transaction Reporting

[iv] Attorney-Client -- Fees, Client Identity and Address, etc. -- Incriminating Client

[v] Attorney-Client -- Fees, Client Identity and Address, etc. -- Miscellaneous Cases

[vi] Attorney-Client -- Fees, Client Identity and Address, etc. -- Revealing Confidential Communications

[l] Attorney-Client -- Fiduciary Litigation

[m] Attorney-Client -- Government Attorneys

[i] Civil Cases

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Government Attorneys -- Criminal Cases

[n] Attorney-Client -- Holder of Privilege

[i] Generally

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Holder of Privilege -- Individual or Entity

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Holder of Privilege -- Trustee

[o] Attorney-Client -- Legal Advice or Services

[i] Generally

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Legal Advice or Services -- Business Advice

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Legal Advice or Services -- Investigations

[iv] Attorney-Client -- Legal Advice or Services -- Tax Services

[p] Attorney-Client -- Limited Partnership

[q] Attorney-Client -- Patent Cases -- Law Applied

[r] Attorney-Client -- Patent Counsel

[s] Attorney-Client -- Procedures

[i] Identification of Privileged Items

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Procedures -- Immediate Appeal

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Procedures -- In Camera Inspection

[t] Attorney-Client -- Protected Communications

[u] Attorney-Client -- Protective Order

[v] Attorney-Client -- Reasonable Belief by Client

[w] Attorney-Client -- Relationship of Client and Attorney

[x] Attorney-Client -- Representative of the Attorney

[y] Attorney-Client -- Representative of the Client

[z] Attorney-Client -- Search Warrants

[aa] Attorney-Client -- Standing To Assert the Privilege

[bb] Attorney-Client -- Testimony by Attorney

[cc] Attorney-Client -- Trial Restriction on Material Privileged in Discovery

[dd] Attorney-Client -- Union Members

[ee] Attorney-Client -- Waiver

[i] Agreement To Waive

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication

[A] Common Interest

[B] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Contents or Fact of Communication

[C] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Court Order To Disclose

[D] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Disclosure by Agent or Attorney

[E] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Disclosure to Auditors, etc.

[F] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Failure to Assert Privilege

[G] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Government Investigations

[H] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Inaccurate Disclosure

[I] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Inadvertent Disclosure

[J] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Intent To Waive

[K] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Miscellaneous Cases

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Raising a Claim or Defense

[A] Civil Cases

[B] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Raising a Claim or Defense -- Criminal Cases

[C] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Raising a Claim or Defense -- Habeas Corpus Cases

[iv] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Scope of Waiver

[v] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Stolen Documents

[3] Clergy-Penitent

[4] Government

[a] Deliberative Process

[i] Federal Agencies

[A] Banking Agencies

[B] Government -- Deliberative Process -- Federal Agencies -- Miscellaneous Cases

[ii] Government -- Deliberative Process -- Prosecutors

[iii] Government -- Deliberative Process -- State Agencies and Governments

[b] Government -- Evidentiary Procedures

[c] Government -- Foreign Agencies and Governments

[d] Government -- Informant's Privilege

[i] Civil Cases

[ii] Government -- Informant's Privilege -- Criminal Cases

[e] Government -- Invocation by Head of Department

[f] Government -- Law Enforcement Investigation -- Waiver

[g] Government -- Presidential Communications

[h] Government -- Protective Function

[i] Government -- State or Military Secrets

[i] Civil Cases

[ii] Government -- State and Military Secrets -- Criminal Cases

[iii] Government -- State and Military Secrets -- Invoking the Privilege

[5] Marital

[a] Adverse Testimony

[i] Acts Prior to Marriage

[ii] Marital -- Adverse Testimony -- Civil Cases

[iii] Marital -- Adverse Testimony -- Joint Participants in Crime

[iv] Marital -- Adverse Testimony -- Miscellaneous Cases

[v] Marital -- Adverse Testimony -- Waiver

[b] Marital -- Common-law Marriage, Cohabitants

[c] Marital -- Confidential Communications

[i] Confidentiality

[ii] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Holder of Privilege

[iii] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Joint Participants in Crime

[iv] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Miscellaneous Cases

[v] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Statements in Furtherance of Crime or Fraud

[vi] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Waiver

[A] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Waiver -- Failure To Assert Privilege

[B] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Waiver -- Miscellaneous Cases

[C] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Waiver -- Testimony

[d] Marital -- Exceptions

[i] Agency Relationship

[ii] Marital -- Exceptions -- Crime Against Children

[e] Marital -- Fraudulent, Dissolved, or Failing Marriage

[6] Newsreporter

[a] Common-law Privilege for Sources

[b] Newsreporter -- Constitutional Privilege for Sources

[c] Newsreporter -- Editing Process

[d] Newsreporter -- Fiction Author

[e] Newsreporter -- Nonconfidential Information

[f] Newsreporter -- Other Privileges for News Gathering

[7] Physician-Patient

[a] Discovery

[b] Physician-Patient -- Generally

[8] Psychotherapists

[a] Basis of Privilege

[b] Employee Assistance Programs

[c] Psychotherapists -- Exceptions

[i] Child Victim

[ii] Psychotherapists -- Exceptions -- Crime or Fraud

[iii] Psychotherapists -- Exceptions -- Fees, Patient Identity, etc.

[iv] Psychotherapists -- Exceptions -- Threats

[d] Psychotherapists -- In the Course of Diagnosis or Treatment

[e] Psychotherapists -- Insanity Claims

[f] Psychotherapists -- Miscellaneous Cases

[g] Psychotherapists -- Privilege Not Qualified or Subject to Balancing

[h] Psychotherapists -- Waiver

[9] Required Reports

[10] Special Privileges

[a] Academic Research

[b] Special Privileges -- Bank Depositor

[c] Special Privileges -- Child Abuse and Juvenile Reports

[d] Special Privileges -- Employer-Stenographer

[e] Special Privileges -- Family Members

[f] Special Privileges -- Federal Statute

[g] Special Privileges -- Hospital Records

[h] Special Privileges -- Informant in Litigation

[i] Special Privileges -- Internal Investigations, Peer Review, and Self-Analysis

[j] Special Privileges -- Judicial Officers

[k] Special Privileges -- Legislative

[l] Special Privileges -- Mediation

[m] Special Privileges -- Ombudsman

[n] Special Privileges -- Social Worker-Client

[11] State Law

[a] Diversity Actions

[b] State Law -- Federal Claims

[c] State Law -- State and Federal Claims Combined

[12] Tax Practitioner

[13] Trade Secrets

501.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

[3] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

[4] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article V. Privileges
CHAPTER 501 RULE 501

2-501 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 501.01

501.01 Official Text

Rule 501. General Rule

Except as otherwise required by the Constitution of the United States or provided by Act of Congress or in rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority, the privilege of a witness, person, government, State, or political subdivision thereof shall be governed by the principles of the common law as they may be interpreted by the courts of the United States in the light of reason and experience. However, in civil actions and proceedings, with respect to an element of a claim or defense as to which State law supplies the rule of decision, the privilege of a witness, person, government, State, or political subdivision thereof shall be determined in accordance with State law.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article V. Privileges
CHAPTER 501 RULE 501

2-501 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 501.02

501.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Federal and State Law

This Rule is the only one that deals with the subject of privileges. It prescribes the common-law privileges as they may be interpreted by the Courts of the United States in the light of reason and experience for most cases. But if in a civil case a claim, defense, or an element of either a claim or defense is governed by state law, state rules of privilege apply.

This last provision reflects a deliberate attempt to establish an appropriate relationship between Federal Courts and state lawmaking bodies, both Courts and Legislatures. While deference in the Federal Rules to the state laws of privilege may not be constitutionally required, n1 Congress concluded that federal law should not supersede that of the States in arguably "substantive" areas such as privilege, absent a compelling reason. In civil cases, no compelling reason was found when state law provided the basis of decision. Similar concerns led to deference to state law in Rules 302 and 601.

A problem is presented when state and federal privilege laws conflict in cases in which state and federal claims are tried together, most commonly in cases of supplemental jurisdiction, but also where diversity claims are joined with federal question claims. n2 Where the privilege rules are in conflict, it makes no sense to apply the state law of privilege to the state claims and the federal law of privilege to the federal claims. To do so would confuse the jury, n3 and would subvert the policy of the jurisdiction that would apply the privilege.

Almost all Federal Courts, when confronted with this question, have held that the federal law of privilege applies to both the federal claim and the state claim. n4 These Courts reason that it would be impractical to apply two separate sets of privilege laws to federal and state claims; and since only one privilege law can apply, it should be federal law in a Federal Court. Application of federal law is considered consistent with the goal of national uniformity embodied in the Federal Rules.

[2] Supreme Court's Approval of Specific Rules

As originally approved by the Supreme Court, Article V of the Federal Rules contained thirteen Rules. These Rules defined nine separate privileges and delineated certain rules for controlling the use of privileges. All are set forth in Part

Three of this Manual. Aside from the Lawyer-Client privilege (proposed Rule 503), the Communications to Clergy privilege (proposed Rule 506), and the Political Vote privilege (proposed Rule 507), each of the nine privilege Rules was vigorously attacked by at least one critic.

Rule 502 (Required Reports Privileged by Statute) was attacked on the ground that states should not be permitted to tell the federal government what rules of privilege should apply in federal cases; a state may have a privilege that the federal government should be free to reject in federal question cases. Rule 504 (Psychotherapist-Patient Privilege) was one of the most controversial. In writing this privilege, the Advisory Committee rejected the traditional physician-patient privilege (which two-thirds of the states had) and substituted a narrower privilege dealing with psychotherapists. The medical profession attacked this move on the ground that it demonstrated an insensitivity to the problems of medicine and to the needs of both patients and doctors. Rule 505 (Husband-Wife Privilege) was attacked on the ground that, while it might represent the majority rule, it made no sense to give the spousal immunity privilege to the defendant spouse, when a marriage is surely in jeopardy if the nondefendant spouse is willing to testify. The proposed rule was also attacked because it recognized no privilege for confidential spousal communications. Rule 508 (Trade Secrets) was attacked as changing existing law.

Rule 509 (Secrets of State and Other Official Information) was perhaps the Rule that received the most criticism. Throughout the debates, it was contended that this Rule went well beyond anything that the Supreme Court had theretofore recognized. Rule 510 (Identity of Informer) was also criticized on the ground that it may have changed existing law.

Proposed Rule 511 would have provided that a voluntary disclosure of confidential information destroys a privilege. Rule 512 would have provided that erroneous compulsion of disclosure or disclosure by someone under circumstances where the holder of the privilege had no opportunity to claim the privilege would not result in any loss of the privilege. Rule 513 would have codified the majority view that no comment or inference is permissible when a testimonial privilege is invoked. States deal with these subjects in a variety of ways, and unanimity as to the wisdom of the proposed rules, if anticipated, certainly was never approached.

News reporters, social workers, and accountants complained of the failure to provide them with privileges.

But the major complaint with the Supreme Court draft was that the proposed Rule 501 would have applied the federal law of privilege to every claim heard in federal court. This was considered an affront to the states in cases where the state law provided the rule of decision. Given all the dispute over the privileges, Congress opted for a single Rule -- a minimal codification that mandates a common-law approach to privileges and defers to state privileges where state law provides the rule of decision.

[3] The Common Law and the Proposed, But Unenacted, Rules

One of the great ironies of the Rules is that privileges, many of which find their justification in the reliance of the public upon them, are left in the confused state they were in prior to the enactment of the Rules. Arguably, certainty here is more necessary than in other areas of evidence. n5 Yet neither the Supreme Court nor the Congress has indicated very much interest in tackling this controversial area in the years since enactment of the Federal Rules of Evidence. n6 The Advisory Committee has taken a cautious approach, partly due to the provision in the Enabling Act requiring affirmative approval by Congress of any rules of privilege (as opposed to the usual rulemaking process under which rules become law unless Congress affirmatively intervenes to reject or change the rule). n7

While common-law development is now mandated, the question remains whether the Federal Courts in developing the law of privileges should consider the proposed-but-rejected privileges as either persuasive or controlling. Most Courts have held that the recommendations of the Advisory Committee and the Supreme Court are a useful guide, though not controlling in determining the existence and scope of a federal privilege. As Judge Becker put it:

> [T]he proposed rules prove a useful reference point and offer guidance in defining the existence and scope of evidentiary privileges in the federal courts. ... The [Proposed rules] are the culmination of three drafts prepared by an Advisory Committee consisting of judges, practicing lawyers and academicians. ... Finally, they were adopted by the Supreme Court. ... The Advisory Committee in drafting the [Proposed rules] was for the most part restating the law currently applied in the federal courts. n8

The Supreme Court in Jaffee v. Redmond, 518 U.S. 1 (1996) , strongly supported Judge Becker's view of the matter. In adopting a psychotherapist-patient privilege, the Court relied heavily on the fact that it was one of the nine specific privileges originally recommended by the Advisory Committee. The Court also stressed the reverse proposition -- that if a privilege was not one of those proposed by the Advisory Committee, this would cut against its recognition under federal common law.

It would not be wise, however, to treat the Advisory Committee proposals as a totally accurate description of existing federal common law. For example, federal common law protects confidential marital communications. As noted above, the proposed Federal Rule 505 did not. Under Rule 501, the common law governs and the privilege for confidential marital communications continues, something one would not know from looking at the proposed Rule 505. Moreover, the proposed marital privilege rule gave the criminal defendant the right to bar a spouse's testimony, whereas the Supreme Court has since held that the testifying spouse has the sole right to claim the spousal immunity privilege. n9 And even in Jaffee, the Court, by extending the privilege to cover statements to social workers as well as statements to psychotherapists, went further than the Advisory Committee's proposal.

The most accurate statement about the relevance of the proposed rules on privilege is that they are a useful reference point for determining whether new privileges should be established under federal common law.

[4] New Privileges

Rule 501 adopts the privileges as they existed at common law, and provides that the federal common law of privilege shall be "interpreted" in the "light of reason and experience." An important question is whether Rule 501 permits the Federal Courts to promulgate and develop privileges that did not exist at common law. For example, neither the doctor-patient privilege nor the psychotherapist-patient privilege is a common-law privilege; both are creatures of statute in most states. Also, litigants sometimes argue for the development of a new privilege that has not been recognized either by statute or by common law. Some have argued for a "self-evaluation" privilege; others have argued for a "scholar's" privilege. Does Rule 501 circumscribe the authority of the Federal Courts with respect to privileges not recognized under the common law?

Before Jaffee v. Redmond, 518 U.S. 1 (1996) , many Federal Courts rejected attempts to develop privileges that were not recognized by common law at the time the Federal Rules were adopted. The Supreme Court in Jaffee, however, stressed that Rule 501 authorizes, and indeed requires, Federal Courts to establish new privileges where the need for the privilege outweighs the cost of the loss of reliable evidence that the privilege would impose. The Court stated as follows:

> Rule 501 of the Federal Rules of Evidence authorizes federal courts to define new privileges by interpreting "common law principles ... in the light of reason and experience." ... The Rule thus did not freeze the law governing the privileges of witnesses in federal trials at a particular point in our history, but rather directed federal courts to "continue the evolutionary development of testimonial privileges." Trammel v. United States, 445 U.S. 40, 47 (1980) .

The Jaffee Court laid out the following blueprint for establishing new privileges under federal common law: (1) the privilege must promote "sufficiently important interests to outweigh the need for probative evidence," i.e., the benefits of the privilege must outweigh the costs to the search for truth that the privilege would impose; (2) recognition of the privilege by the states cuts in favor of finding a privilege under federal law (due to the interest in promoting "comity"), while lack of recognition cuts against it; and (3) if the privilege was included in the original list of privileges proposed by the Advisory Committee (and subsequently rejected by Congress), this cuts in favor of adopting the privilege as a matter of federal law, while non-inclusion in the original Advisory Committee list cuts against adoption. (The relevance of this third factor, as discussed above, stems from the Court's recognition that the original Advisory Committee was composed of outstanding lawyers and scholars who spent considerable time determining just which privileges were appropriate for the federal courts).

The Jaffee opinion does not mean that new privileges should be recognized lightly. The burden of establishing the privilege is on the party who seeks to invoke it. For example, in University of Pennsylvania v. EEOC, 493 U.S. 182 (1990) , the EEOC issued a subpoena to investigate a claim of employment discrimination after an associate professor was denied tenure. The University asked the Court to establish a new privilege to protect the confidentiality of the peer review process. The Court rejected the University's claim, and began its analysis with a discussion of Rule 501:

> We do not create and apply an evidentiary privilege unless it promotes sufficiently important interests to outweigh the need for probative evidence. Inasmuch as testimonial exclusionary rules and privileges contravene the fundamental principle that the public has a right to every man's evidence, any such privilege must be strictly construed.
>
> Moreover, although Rule 501 manifests a congressional desire not to freeze the law of privilege but rather to provide the courts with flexibility to develop rules of privilege on a case-by-case basis, we are disinclined to exercise this authority expansively.

The Court in EEOC unanimously refused to establish the peer process privilege sought by the University. According to the Supreme Court, a new privilege may not be an impossibility, but it is a rarity.

We believe that Rule 501 provides a limited authority to Federal Courts to develop new privileges as circumstance and policy may warrant. However, the Federal Courts should not lightly adopt a new privilege. Simple claims of social policy should not suffice. Because a privilege is in derogation of the search for truth, new privileges should be limited to those that are critical to promoting both important public policy and substantial private interests. n10 Under Jaffee, the proponent of a new privilege has the burden of establishing that the benefits of the privilege outweigh the cost of the loss of reliable evidence that the privilege would entail.

Among the relationship-based privileges that have been rejected as failing to meet these stringent requirements are: an accountant-client privilege; n11 a doctor-patient privilege; n12 a probationer-probation officer privilege; n13 and a union member-representative privilege. n14

The Third Circuit opinion in Pearson v. Miller, 211 F.3d 57 (3d Cir. 2000) , is a good example of the approach that should be taken to new privileges after Jaffee. Pearson's daughter was sexually assaulted by Miller; at the time of the assault, Miller was a foster child under the supervision of two public agencies. Pearson brought a civil rights action against the agencies for a "state-created danger," alleging that the agencies knew that Miller had violent sexual propensities toward young girls, and yet permitted him to attend public school and to ride the school bus without supervision. During the discovery period, Pearson sought information concerning Miller's supervision and placement by the agencies, including the files kept by the agencies concerning Miller. The agencies filed motions for protective orders on the ground that this information would require the release of sensitive information concerning Miller.

In response to these motions, Pearson obtained from Miller an authorization to release the records. Miller signed the release voluntarily, apparently as part of a settlement of claims against him. The agencies argued that interests other than Miller's were at stake, requiring the protection of the sensitive information in the files despite Miller's waiver. Specifically, the agencies argued that three separate state statutes mandated confidentiality of placement and foster care records, whether or not the particular juvenile chose to waive his personal privacy interests. These statutes were: (1) a statute mandating the confidentiality of reports of child abuse; (2) a statute restricting access to files and records of juvenile courts, including child delinquency proceedings; and (3) a statute promoting mental health, providing that "all documents concerning persons in treatment shall be kept confidential."

The question for the Pearson Court was whether the confidentiality interests embodied in the state statutes should be recognized as a matter of federal law "in the light of reason and experience." The Court began its analysis by noting that privileges are in derogation of the search for truth. Therefore in assessing new privileges, "only the most compelling candidates will overcome the law's weighty dependence on the availability of relevant evidence."

Jaffee provides that the case for a new privilege is generally stronger if that privilege is widely recognized by the states. Yet the Court in Pearson perceptively recognized that the state's self-interest in creating and invoking a particular privilege should be taken into account as well. As the Court put it, the need for deference to the state law of privilege is diminished "in cases in which a defendant state actor alleged to have violated citizens' federal rights is asserting the privilege." n15 Thus, the fact that states recognize privileges for records of juveniles, child abuse reports, and mental health treatment carried little weight in the Court's analysis, because it was the state as an interested party that was invoking these privileges.

The Pearson Court proceeded to analyze just what confidentiality-based interests might be implicated -- other than those waived by Miller -- by disclosure of records concerning Miller's supervision. One interest asserted by the agencies was protection of the confidentiality of mental health records. But the Court held that any such privilege "is held by the patient, who is permitted to waive it and to allow the protected information to be released." In this sense, the asserted "mental health records" privilege was akin to the psychotherapist-patient privilege recognized in Jaffee, and notably the Jaffee Court found the psychotherapist-patient privilege to be held by, and waivable by, the patient.

The asserted privileges associated with juvenile records and reports of child abuse were not so readily dismissed, however, because parties other than the juvenile might have interests in maintaining the confidentiality of these records. For example, the privilege protecting reports of child abuse might protect not only the child, but also those who file child abuse reports, those who work with the child, and the state agencies themselves. The same might be true for information in juvenile records -- confidentiality may be necessary to protect those who report to the authorities about the juvenile, as well as those public officials and agencies who make decisions about the juvenile.

Unfortunately for the agencies, the very fact that would allow these privileges to survive after a waiver by the juvenile -- i.e., the fact that there are many individuals and entities with a confidentiality-based interest in the material -- rendered them "poor candidates" for privilege status under Rule 501. The Pearson Court explained that the privileges sought by the agencies "would be unlike any currently recognized Rule 501 privilege." Privileges such as attorney-client, husband-wife, and psychotherapist-patient are found in "bilateral confidential relations." In contrast "[c]omplex multilateral privileges such as the ones here sought would necessarily be extremely broad and unwieldy to enforce." For example, if there is a privilege protecting all who file child abuse reports, as well as all who maintain the reports, then the privilege could not be waived without the consent of a potentially vast number of privilege holders -- making the privilege effectively unwaivable. Clearly a Federal Court must give pause before establishing a privilege that could never be waived.

The Pearson Court considered the possibility of establishing a privilege for child abuse and juvenile records that would be held by the state, rather than by individual reporters and interested citizens. This would make the waiver power easier to wield and might protect against overbroad application, since it would be held by only one entity. However, even this state-based privilege was found to be a "poor fit" for the framework of Rule 501. If the waiver power were placed with the state, the individuals interested in confidentiality (such as those who report child abuse or those who work with the child) would not be able to control its application. The state might waive the privilege (perhaps to obtain some concession in litigation) without considering the confidentiality interests of these individuals. This would result in an uncertain privilege with respect to these interested parties -- they could never know, in advance of a confidential communication, whether it would or would not be disclosed at some later point. As the Court stated in Jaffee, an uncertain privilege "is little better than no privilege at all."

In sum, the confidentiality-based records privileges asserted by the agencies were either too unwieldy (therefore too costly), or too uncertain (therefore insufficiently beneficial). The Pearson Court concluded that "Rule 501 is unsuited for the kind of privilege that [the agencies] have requested: one that mandates its protection despite the express waiver of the primary holder of interests in confidentiality. Given the caution with which federal courts are to approach all questions of novel privileges, we have little trouble rejecting any such privilege."

An analysis under Evidence Rule 501 led the Pearson Court to a kind of all-or-nothing result. In rejecting the privilege, did the Court ignore the legitimate confidentiality interests that would be protected by privileges protecting child abuse reports in foster care records, as well as juvenile records, even after a waiver by the "primary holder"? If privilege law leads one to an all-or-nothing result, shouldn't the Court have opted for establishing an absolute privilege rather than rejecting the privilege absolutely?

The Pearson Court considered such an all-or-nothing dilemma a false dichotomy. In a particularly innovative section of the opinion, the Court reasoned that confidential information in the records could be protected without the necessity of establishing an absolute, overbroad, and unwieldy privilege. It was unnecessary to recognize an absolute privilege because there was a much more measured and precise remedial tool at hand: the District Court's power under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure Rule 26(c) to issue protective orders limiting or precluding the release of sensitive information. The Court stated that "Rule 26(c) provides district courts with the power to formulate a detailed solution that reflects the concerns of particular individual disputes" and therefore "provides a superior mechanism for the resolution of the present dispute than does Federal Rule of Evidence 501." Instead of an absolutist approach, a Court applying Rule 26(c) can tailor an order to the circumstances, so that particularly sensitive information can be protected without unnecessarily sacrificing the search for truth. Alternatively, the Court can order disclosure but under such conditions as will protect particular privacy interests, such as by redacting especially sensitive material or precluding the adversary from making a public disclosure.

The Court in Pearson used a well-reasoned and measured approach to evaluate a demand for a new privilege. It is an approach that should be emulated by other Courts. Specifically, (1) the burden is on the party seeking to invoke the new privilege to make a compelling showing that the benefits of the privilege are so substantial as to outweigh the cost to the search for truth that the privilege would impose; (2) if the new privilege would be held by more than one person or entity, the Court should consider the possibility that the privilege would be practically unwaivable and therefore overbroad; and (3) the Court should consider the possibility of a more tailored protection of confidentiality interests through the use of a protective order. By following Pearson, a Court can protect legitimate interests in confidentiality and yet refrain from carelessly establishing an overbroad and absolute privilege in derogation of the search for truth.

In Jaffee the Supreme Court, in recognizing the psychotherapist-patient privilege, stressed that the privilege was absolute where it applied. That is to say, where applicable, the privilege operates to exclude evidence without regard to the need of the adversary for the evidence. The Court reasoned that "[m]aking the promise of confidentiality contingent upon a trial judge's later evaluation of the relative importance of the patient's interest in privacy and the evidentiary need for disclosure would eviscerate the effectiveness of the privilege." Fairly read, this means that if a new privilege is to be recognized, the Court must be prepared to hold it absolute -- otherwise it is not worth establishing the privilege. Before Jaffee, it might have been permissible to limit the cost of a new privilege by recognizing it as a qualified one; this no longer seems an option after Jaffee. In our view, this means that a Court should be even more reluctant to establish a new privilege. An absolute privilege, while somewhat more certain in its application (though not absolutely certain given the possibility of waiver or exceptions such as crime-fraud), is also significantly more costly to the search for truth than is a qualified privilege.

[5] Attorney-Client Privilege

[a] Common-Law Privilege

The attorney-client privilege retains its position as the most widely accepted and applied common-law privilege. That it should be popular with Judges and lawyers is not surprising; they are naturally sympathetic to and understanding of the needs of the legal profession. n16

The shape of the basic privilege has not changed over the years. The client has a privilege with respect to communications made between the lawyer and client in confidence for the purpose of enabling the lawyer to render legal services to the client.

Analysis of the privilege can be broken down into eight relevant factors, taken roughly from the classic definition of the privilege set forth by Wigmore: n17

1. Advice must be sought on a legal matter;

2. From an attorney acting in his/her legal capacity;

3. The privilege protects only communications;

4. The communications must be made in confidence;

5. The communications protected are those of the client;

6. The protection is permanent;

7. The privilege protects against disclosure by both the client and the attorney; and

8. The privilege may be waived or subject to an exception.

A short discussion of each of these factors follows.

[b] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Legal Advice

A client may not "buy" a privilege by retaining an attorney to do something that a non-lawyer could do just as well. n18 The client must be seeking legal advice and assistance from the lawyer. n19 Accordingly, Courts have found that communications are not privileged when the lawyer is retained to do tasks that nonlawyers can also do. Examples of nonprivileged situations include:

(1) Preparation of tax returns is not legal advice, so communications made in the course of tax return preparation are not generally privileged. n20 However, the situation is different if the lawyer is retained to determine whether a tax position taken by a client could subject the client to legal liability. As one Court put it, " '[A] lawyer's analysis of the soft spots in a tax return and his judgments on the outcome of litigation on it" do constitute legal advice. n21

(2) The minutes of a board of directors meeting are not privileged merely because an attorney was in attendance or conducted the meeting. n22

(3) Where business documents are prepared and sent to attorneys to keep them apprised of business developments and not as a request for legal advice, the documents are not privileged. n23

(4) Where the client is communicating as part of a personal friendship or animus, and not in the course of seeking legal advice, the privilege will not apply. n24

(5) Where the attorney is merely acting as a conduit for information, i.e., as a messenger, the privilege is inapplicable. n25

(6) Communications made primarily to secure business rather than legal advice do not qualify under the privilege. For example, there is no privilege if the attorney is acting as a stockbroker, money manager, or business agent. n26

(7) Where patent attorneys are acting more like engineers or market analysts than like lawyers, the privilege will not attach. n27

The "legal advice" requirement can present difficult problems of line-drawing. One case presenting a very close question is In re Feldberg, 862 F.2d 622 (7th Cir. 1988) . A grand jury was investigating sports agents who signed amateur athletes to undisclosed professional contracts. The grand jury subpoenaed the agents' corporation for all contracts the agents had entered into with college football players. The corporate president engaged Feldberg, a lawyer, to assist with compliance. Feldberg turned over fifty-one contracts to the grand jury. These contracts appeared legal on their face. The grand jury was not satisfied and made a further request. Feldberg then turned over six more contracts, which had all been postdated to falsely indicate that they had been executed after the players' college careers had ended. The grand jury, suspecting obstruction of justice by the corporation (not by Feldberg), then subpoenaed Feldberg to determine why it had not received the six suspicious contracts with the original batch of fifty-one. Feldberg declared the privilege with respect to all information concerning why he thought the fifty-one contracts first produced were all the contracts responsive to the original subpoena.

The Feldberg Court reasoned that if Feldberg were retained solely to transmit a box of prepackaged documents to the grand jury, then no privilege would apply to any communication made to him. Similarly, if Feldberg were hired to search the files pursuant to instructions and act as a record custodian or a file clerk in turning over the documents, no privilege would attach. n28

However, if Feldberg were hired to determine which documents were responsive to the subpoena, and whether a document had to be produced assuming it was covered by the subpoena, that would call for legal advice; that is something a file clerk does not do. n29 If Feldberg were hired as both file clerk and attorney, we have an oft-recurring problem of the attorney wearing "two hats."

Given all the possible scenarios, the Seventh Circuit in Feldberg held that the claim of attorney-client privilege had to be evaluated on a question-by-question basis, and disclosure was prohibited only if the attorney's legal adviser role predominated as to the subject matter of any particular question. The Court held that the District Court would have to make a preliminary determination after an in camera hearing about Feldberg's role in producing the documents. It also noted the general rule that the party seeking to invoke the privilege has the burden of establishing that the requirements of the privilege are met. n30

Most Courts hold, in accordance with Feldberg, that if the client had a mixed motivation for consulting an attorney, the confidential communications are privileged if it can be shown that the client's predominant motivation was to seek legal advice. n31

A problem arising with increasing frequency is where a corporation retains counsel to conduct an investigation into suspected internal corporate misconduct. The question is whether communications made by corporate employees to the investigating lawyer are privileged. The argument against the privilege is that the lawyer is acting essentially as a factual investigator. But this argument has usually been rejected. Most Courts have held that the investigating attorney is rendering predominantly legal advice, given the important legal ramifications surrounding an investigation into internal corporate misconduct. The reason that the corporation seeks a lawyer rather than a factual investigator is that legal expertise is necessary to determine whether facts exist that can be proved in a Court. n32

A finding of privilege for a lawyer's internal investigation of misconduct receives strong support from the result in Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383, 1980-81 Trade Cas. (CCH) P63797 (1981) . In Upjohn, a law firm was retained to conduct an internal investigation into corporate misconduct. The question addressed by the Court, and discussed below, was whether statements from low-level employees to corporate counsel constituted statements from the "client." But in the course of its opinion, the Court never questioned the premise under which both parties were obviously operating -- that a factfinding investigation by a lawyer pertains to legal advice.

What if a law firm conducts an investigation of misconduct within the firm itself? This was the question in United States v. Rowe, 96 F.3d 1294 (9th Cir. 1996) . The senior partner of a law firm heard rumors that another attorney was mishandling client funds. The senior partner instructed two associates to conduct an internal investigation. A grand jury subpoenaed the associates, hoping to question them about their conversations with the senior partner. They claimed the privilege. The Rowe Court first cited Upjohn for the proposition that a lawyer's investigation into misconduct implicates legal advice. Then the Court addressed the government's argument that the privilege should not apply because the associates were simply employees of the law firm:

> The government argues that upholding the privilege in this case would reward a law firm just for being a law firm because another type of company that uses its own employees to investigate internal wrong-doing would not get the benefit of the privilege. But a firm whose employees are physicians or computer programmers would probably not use its own employees to investigate legal wrongdoing; they would likely hire lawyers to do the job. Here, the firm happens to have employees who are lawyers, which made it easier for the senior partner to "hire" a lawyer -- he needed only to walk down the hall. This, however, did not change the fact that he asked lawyers -- not secretaries, paralegals, librarians or other of the firm's employees -- to conduct the investigation.

The fact is that corporations (and law firms) hire lawyers, rather than private eyes, to investigate misconduct because they want to know what the legal consequences are. The chances of litigation arising from corporate misconduct approach 100%. Under these circumstances, corporations don't want to know what happened as much as they want to know what can be proved. Therefore, confidential internal communications received by a lawyer engaged in a factual investigation of corporate misconduct generally should be privileged.

[c] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Attorney Acting in Legal Capacity -- Necessary Agents

An attorney in the course of a representation often must retain non-lawyer agents, such as private investigators and psychiatric and forensic experts. If communications to these agents resulted in a loss of privilege, then the agents could not be used to their full effect, and the effectiveness of the representation (which the privilege serves to strengthen) would suffer. Accordingly, Courts have held that communications from the client to and through agents hired by the attorney in furtherance of the representation can qualify for the attorney-client privilege. n33

It is important for the attorney and the client to structure the agent's relationship correctly in order to preserve the privilege. For example, assume that the client is charged with securities fraud. If the client hires an accountant to determine his situation, any statements made to the accountant are not privileged. n34 But if the attorney hires the accountant to assist in the representation, then communications to the accountant can qualify for the privilege. n35

Sometimes it is difficult to determine whether the non-lawyer to whom the communication is made is the kind of agent whose services are necessary to further the legal representation. An example is United States v. Ackert, 169 F.3d 136 (2d Cir. 2001) , which arose after Goldman, Sachs, an investment banking firm, approached Paramount with an investment proposal. The proposed transaction was expected to reduce Paramount's federal income tax liability by generating significant capital losses that would offset Paramount's recent capital gains from the sale of a subsidiary. Ackert was employed by Goldman, Sachs and pitched the investment proposal to representatives of Paramount at an initial meeting. Subsequently, Eugene I. Meyers, Paramount's senior vice president and tax counsel, conducted legal research and analysis in order to advise Paramount about the tax implications of the proposed investment. In the course of this research, Meyers contacted Ackert, and the two men had several follow-up meetings to discuss various aspects of the Goldman, Sachs proposal. Meyers initiated these discussions to learn more about the details of the proposed transaction and its potential tax consequences, so that he could advise his client, Paramount, about the legal and financial implications of the transaction. Paramount ultimately decided to enter into the proposed investment. Seven years later the I.R.S. conducted an audit of Paramount and issued a summons to Ackert seeking his testimony about the 1989 investment proposal. Paramount asserted the attorney-client privilege with respect to questions concerning any conversations Ackert had with Meyers or in Meyers' presence.

Paramount argued that "it was impossible for Mr. Meyers to advise Paramount without these further contacts with Mr. Ackert, because he could not otherwise fully define the factual, and therefore legal, nature of the proposal." But the Court disagreed. The Court recognized that "the inclusion of a third party in attorney-client communications does not destroy the privilege if the purpose of the third party's participation is to improve the comprehension of the communications between attorney and client." However, in this case, "Meyers was not relying on Ackert to translate or interpret information given to Meyers by his client. Rather, Meyers sought out Ackert for information Paramount did not have about the proposed transaction and its tax consequences." The fact that the non-lawyer had information important to the lawyer was not sufficient to render the non-lawyer a necessary agent for the representation. Because Ackert's role "was not as a translator or interpreter of client communications with Meyers," the Court held that the communications with Ackert were not privileged.

[d] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Protection of Communications

The privilege protects communications, not underlying facts. Thus, in In re Six Grand Jury Witnesses, 979 F.2d 939 (2d Cir. 1992) , corporate employees were instructed by counsel to analyze certain contracts in anticipation of litigation. The Court held that the "underlying factual information" obtained by these employees was not protected by the privilege. They were not communications to an attorney. However, questions such as "With whom did you discuss this analysis?" were impermissible because the employee, in responding, "might be understood to be implying ... that he had conveyed privileged information to the lawyer."

Similarly, the privilege does not protect documents that were prepared independently of any communication between the attorney and the client -- such as corporate or business records preexisting the attorney-client relationship. n36

Nor does the privilege protect factual observations made by an attorney that are not dependent on client communications. n37

[e] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Communications Made in Confidence

[i] Expectation of Confidentiality

The attorney-client privilege applies only if the client communicates to the attorney with the reasonable expectation that the communication is, and will remain, confidential. If a person other than the attorney or an agent necessary to the effectuation of the attorney-client relationship could with reasonable effort hear the client's communication when it was made, then the communication as a general rule is not privileged. n38

The attorney-client privilege does not apply if the client anticipates that the attorney will disclose the information to a third party, even if the third party is not present at the time of the client's communication. n39 For example, if the client unconditionally gives the attorney information with which to prepare a prospectus, none of the information is privileged, even if the attorney later determines that some of the information need not be included in the prospectus. Under these circumstances, there is no reasonable expectation at the time of the communication that the information would remain with the lawyer. n40 The privilege will apply, however, if the client consults counsel about whether information must be disclosed. For example, the client might say, "Does this information have to be included in the prospectus? If so, then disclose it, if not, don't." Counsel is well-advised to structure client disclosures so that release of information is conditioned upon counsel's decision that disclosure is necessary to meet the client's legal obligations. n41

[ii] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Confidences -- Common Interest Doctrine

As discussed above, there is no privilege if the communication is made under circumstances where access is given to persons outside the attorney-client "unit" (which might be defined as the attorney, the client, and necessary agents). Furthermore, even if the communication was originally made in confidence, a later disclosure of the communication to third parties will ordinarily be deemed a waiver of the privilege. n42

Despite these limitations, the privilege can still apply where the "third party" and the communicating client share a common interest in a representation. n43

The rationale of the common interest rule is consistent with that of the attorney-client privilege. The privilege exists to promote full disclosure of the truth between client and attorney, in order to facilitate effective representation. n44 In many cases, it is necessary for clients to pool information in order to obtain effective representation. n45 So, to encourage information-pooling, the common interest rule treats all involved attorneys and clients as a single attorney-client unit, at least insofar as a common interest is pursued. n46 At a minimum, a privilege for exchanged information between allied parties promotes efficiency since it "makes savings in expense and effort likely." n47

Of course, even if a statement was made to further a common interest, all the other requirements of the privilege must be satisfied, e.g., the client must be seeking legal advice; only communications are protected; no disclosure must be anticipated beyond the attorney-client unit; and the communication must not be in furtherance of crime or fraud. n48

The justification for the common interest rule is not limited to codefendants in litigation, despite the frequent reference to the "joint defense" rule in the cases and literature. The need to protect the free flow of information from clients to attorneys, so as to facilitate effective representation, exists whenever multiple clients share a common interest about a legal matter. Wherever the privilege itself would apply, the common interest rule is applicable if the clients agree to share confidential information in pursuit of a common goal. n49

It follows that the common interest rule applies to allied plaintiffs in litigation to the same extent that it applies to allied defendants. n50 Likewise, the common interest rule applies to allied parties who pool information in anticipation of a lawsuit, because effective representation through information-pooling is equally important before and after litigation has begun. n51 And for similar reasons, the common interest rule applies to joint efforts to avoid litigation, even if the confidences are exchanged well before litigation has become probable. Information-pooling is every bit as necessary to avoid litigation as it is to pursue litigation. So, for example, in Davis v. Costa-Gavras, 580 F. Supp. 1082 (S.D.N.Y. 1984) , the plaintiff claimed that he had been libeled in the movie Missing. He sought disclosure of statements made by the author at a preproduction meeting with attorneys for several parties involved in making the movie. The Court held that the author's statements were protected by the common interest rule. While the statements were made before the movie was even made, all parties at the preproduction meeting had a common interest in avoiding a later libel suit, and the confidential communications were made pursuant to that end. n52

The fact that clients are present at a consultation in the common interest certainly should not preclude the application of the common interest rule, so long as the statements are otherwise intended to remain confidential and are made for purposes of obtaining legal advice in the common interest. n53 Thus, in United States v. McPartlin, 595 F.2d 1321 (7th Cir. 1979) , the Court applied the common interest privilege to shield communications from the client to an attorney who was representing another party in the common interest. The Court held that the other attorney was the communicating client's counsel for purposes of a communication made in the common interest. n54 This is consistent with the theory of the common interest doctrine -- that multiple clients and their lawyers are acting as a single attorney-client unit.

It should be noted, however, that the presence of clients at a conference in the common interest may create an undue risk. The client may make statements extraneous to the common interest, and these communications would not be privileged. Also, if the client is going to communicate to another attorney directly, it is crucial that the client consult with his own attorney before and after disclosure. Without such consultation, a Court is likely to find that the client was not acting pursuant to an agreed-upon common interest. As the First Circuit stated in rejecting the argument that a statement from a client to another attorney was protected by the common interest rule:

> When a person provides information to another without first consulting his own attorney, it is difficult to see how the information was given as part of a joint defense, even when the recipient may be viewed as a party with similar interests. The difficulty grows when the person fails to inform his attorney of what he has done for several months. This raises the inference that the information was not intended to be used for that person's defense much less a joint defense. Under these circumstances, the joint defense privilege is not available. n55

For similar reasons, Courts have refused to apply the common interest rule to statements made from one client to another when no attorneys are present; such communications among laypersons are not likely to be sufficiently tied to pursuing a legal matter in a common interest. n56

Given all these risks, the preferred approach to sharing client confidences is for each attorney individually to confer with his or her client, and then share the information with allied attorneys outside the presence of clients.

Relationships between clients are often more ambiguous than the extremes of united in interest and completely adverse. Sometimes it will occur that clients share a mutual interest as to one issue (such as discrediting a witness) but are adversarial as to many or all other issues. Most Courts have held that the common interest privilege can apply even if the clients are in conflict on some or most points, so long as the communication itself deals with a matter on which the parties have agreed to work toward a mutually beneficial goal. n57 Thus, in United States v. McPartlin, 595 F.2d 1321 (7th Cir. 1979) , codefendants with antagonistic positions pooled information for the purpose of discrediting a diary offered by the prosecution. The Court held that the communications respecting the diary were protected by the common interest doctrine. Although the codefendants had conflicting defenses in general, they had a common interest in having the diary discredited. n58

The mere fact that communications are made between parties with similar interests is insufficient to trigger the common interest rule. n59 It must be shown by the party claiming the privilege: (1) that all clients and attorneys with access to the communication had in fact agreed upon a joint approach to the matter communicated; and (2) that the information was imparted with the intent to further the common purpose. n60 As one Court has stated: "Only those communications made in the course of an ongoing common enterprise and intended to further the enterprise are protected." n61 Where the parties have not yet agreed to proceed jointly on the matter communicated, the common interest rule will not apply. n62 For example, in United States v. Melvin, 650 F.2d 641 (5th Cir. 1981) , statements made by certain codefendants in the presence of another codefendant were held not protected by a common interest privilege. The statements were made to enlist the codefendant in a common defense. But they were not protected because the codefendant had not yet agreed to cooperate with the others. n63 Thus, multiparty discussions must be approached with caution where it is not clear that the parties have agreed to pursue a common position on the matters to be discussed. n64 Any preliminary conversation to determine whether a joint strategy should be employed will not be privileged.

The parties need not agree in writing to pursue a common interest; the doctrine permits an exchange of confidential information when the parties have clearly and specifically agreed in some manner to pool information for a common goal. n65 Nonetheless, it is certainly prudent (and common) practice to execute a written agreement before significant communications are exchanged. n66 This would eliminate any doubt about whether the parties to the discussion were pursuing a common goal with respect to the matters communicated. Without a written agreement, the party's burden of proving that a statement was made in the common interest will undoubtedly be more difficult. n67

Even where the parties have agreed to pursue a common goal, the privilege will not apply if the statement is extraneous to the common interest and thus does not further the agreed-upon goal. Most typically this occurs where the communication deals with the communicating client's personal situation or motivations. Courts have held that statements concerning one client's individual situation are separate from the common purpose and thus not privileged when made in the presence of other parties. n68 This point again indicates that it is better for information-pooling to occur between attorneys, in the absence of clients.

The common interest doctrine, as stated above, protects confidential communications within the unit that shares a common interest. However, if members of that unit become adversaries in a later suit, the privilege does not apply inter sese. n69 This is because the exchange of information within the unit is inconsistent with later asserting a privilege over the exchanged information. So, before pooling information, counsel should inform the client that there is a risk that the client's communications can later be used against him if his "friends" become "enemies." Counsel who foresees later litigation between parties currently sharing a common interest must decide whether the advantage of a unified presentation at the present time is outweighed by the danger of a later suit by a former member of the unit, in which the client's communications would not be privileged.

The risk that statements made in the common interest could later be used against the client by those within the client "unit" can be eliminated by a provision in the common interest agreement providing that the signatories agree to waive all civil actions that they may now or later have against one another -- or, more narrowly, that they waive the right to use information shared in the common interest unit against any member of the unit. Of course, many parties would be unwilling to sign such provisions, depending on the nature of the common interest and the nature of anticipated adverse litigation. n70

Even if parties who once had a common interest later become adverse, the privilege still protects communications insofar as they are sought to be used by others outside the unit; the only parties who can use the communications are the parties who originally shared the common interest. Allowing "outsiders" to use the communications would create an undue risk for any discussion in the common interest, and would tend to destroy the utility of the common interest privilege. n71

The common interest privilege is not destroyed by action short of the drastic step of adversary litigation between the parties in the common unit. So, for example, if two criminal defendants pool information, and then one defendant decides to make a deal and testify against the other, the communications that were made by the remaining defendant at joint defense consultations remain privileged and cannot be used as evidence against the remaining defendant. The act of testifying as an adverse witness is not enough to destroy the unity of interest that was the basis for the privilege. If actions short of adversary litigation could destroy the privilege that had existed between parties with a common interest, the privilege would be so fragile that information-pooling could rarely occur. n72

The opposite side of this coin is that counsel who was privy to a common interest arrangement might not be permitted to use statements made by a former member of the group who is now an adverse witness. A former member of a common interest unit, who is now an adverse witness, has been considered by most Courts to be a former client of all attorneys in the unit. The reasoning is that those pursuing a common interest are conceptualized as being a single attorney-client unit. What follows from this reasoning is that an attorney cross-examining a withdrawn member of the common interest unit would be facing a conflict of interest. To zealously represent his "real" client, he might have to cross-examine the witness with confidential communications made by the witness during a common interest discussion; but such cross-examination would be unethical because a lawyer cannot use confidential information against a former client. This conflict between duties to current client and former client creates a potential for disqualification of counsel. As the Court stated in United States v. Anderson, 790 F. Supp. 231 (W.D. Wash. 1992) : "an attorney who acquires information from a potential witness pursuant to a joint defense agreement is in no different position than would be an attorney who acquires such information from a prior or jointly represented client." n73 In Anderson the Court ultimately decided against disqualification, after the defendant knowingly waived his right to conflict-free counsel. But it is notable that a Court can, in its discretion, reject the defendant's waiver and disqualify a counsel who is subject to a conflict of interest. n74

The Committee on Professional Responsibility of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York has raised the possibility that the risk of disqualification could be headed off by a written agreement among the members of the common interest unit, which provides for consent in advance to the use of confidential information during the cross-examination of any of the clients, i.e., prospective consent permitting disclosure of a participant's confidential communications upon leaving the common interest unit. The Committee notes, however, that there have been "no reported decisions as to the effect of this model agreement," and notes further "the practical flaw that this model would likely discourage the open dialogue among participants that the [common interest] doctrine is designed to protect." n75 The Eleventh Circuit has "solved" the disqualification problem by holding that when one of the members of a joint defense "flips" and cooperates with the government, he thereby waives his right to demand that the communications he made in the joint defense remain privileged. Therefore the attorney of a client remaining in the joint defense has no conflict because she is free to cross-examine the witness with communications he made while part of the joint defense. n76

[iii] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Confidences -- Incidents of Representation

For obvious reasons, the privilege protects preliminary communications with an attorney about the subject of the representation, even if an attorney-client relationship has not been formalized at that point. This is because confidentiality may be necessary in order to determine whether the attorney can take on the representation. n77

On the other hand, the privilege ordinarily does not protect the preliminary aspects of the attorney-client relationship itself. These matters, which have been referred to as the "incidents of representation," include the client's name, the amount and payment of a fee, and the fact of consultation. The identity of the client, the fee, and the fact and extent of representation generally have nothing to do with the free flow of information once that relationship has been established. n78 Thus, the focus of the privilege in most Courts is on those communications that the attorney can influence by informing the client that a free flow of information will not prejudice the client. Communications and information respecting the incidents of representation do not meet this standard. n79 As Judge Winter stated in the leading case of In re Shargel, 742 F.2d 61 (2d Cir. 1984) :

> Absent special circumstances, disclosure of the identity of the client and fee information stand on a footing different from communications intended by the client to explain a problem to a lawyer in order to obtain legal advice. ... A general rule requiring disclosure of the fact of consultation does not place attorneys in the professional dilemma of cautioning against disclosure and rendering perhaps ill-informed advice or learning all the details and perhaps increasing the perils to the client of disclosure. n80

A limited exception to the above rule exists, however: If information concerning the incidents of representation would, directly or indirectly, disclose a confidential communication, then this preliminary information is privileged. One example is where the disclosure of the fee payment or the fact of representation would reveal a confidential motive for seeking representation. n81 Another example is where communications have been disclosed, and yet they remain confidential as a practical matter because they have not been connected to an identifiable person. If disclosure of the client's identity would tie the client to the previously disclosed communications, then the client's identity is privileged.

n82 It is apparent from the mere delineation of this exception that it is very limited; in the vast majority of cases, disclosure of fee, identity, etc., says nothing about the motive for seeking representation, nor does it tie the client to a previously disclosed yet unattributed communication. n83 As the Court stated in Lefcourt v. United States, 125 F.3d 79 (2d Cir. 1997) :

> Although the contours of the special circumstance exception [to the rule that identity of the client is unprotected by privilege] have not been exhaustively developed, no doubt due to the fact special circumstances are seldom found to exist, it is clear that there is no special circumstance in this circuit simply because the provision of client-identifying information could prejudice the client in the case for which legal fees are paid.

[f] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Communication From the Attorney

The privilege is designed to encourage full disclosure between the client and the attorney. Some Courts consider the privilege as client-centered and have held that the privilege directly protects only the communication from the client to the attorney, and not vice-versa. Thus, communications by an attorney to the client are not automatically privileged in these Courts, even if they reflect legal advice. n84 However, the attorney's communication will be protected in these Courts if disclosure of that communication to the client would indirectly reveal the content of the client's confidential communication to the attorney. n85 But most Courts have held more broadly that an attorney's communication to a client in confidence can qualify as privileged in its own right, regardless of whether it would reveal a confidential statement from the client. n86 These Courts believe that the purpose of the privilege is to encourage two-way communication in the attorney-client relationship. They reason that it is just as important for the client to receive effective legal advice as it is for the attorney to receive all pertinent information from the client. n87

[g] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Corporate Representation

The privilege does not extend to information learned from individuals other than the client, even if the information forms the basis of legal advice given from the attorney to the client. n88 In the corporate context, the Courts have struggled with the question of who, within the corporate structure, can be considered the client for purposes of the attorney-client privilege.

The Supreme Court rendered a major decision on the scope of corporate attorney-client privilege in Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383 (1981) . In that case, Upjohn conducted an internal investigation to discover whether its officers were making "questionable payments" to foreign officials. The company voluntarily submitted a preliminary report to the SEC disclosing certain preliminary payments. A copy of the report was sent to the IRS, which began an investigation into the tax consequences of the payments. Upjohn refused to turn over to the IRS written statements that corporate employees had submitted to the company attorney and notes of interviews conducted with officers and employees.

The government in Upjohn asked the Court to adopt the "control group" test, under which only members of the corporate control group would be deemed "the client" for purposes of the privilege. But the Court declared that the control group test "frustrates the very purpose of the privilege by discouraging the communication of relevant information by employees of the client to the attorneys seeking to render legal advice to the client corporation." Opting for a case-by-case approach rather than some broad statement of principle, the Court found that the communications by corporate officers and employees made at the direction of corporate superiors to counsel, so that counsel would be in a position to render legal advice, were privileged. n89

The Upjohn Court's failure to set forth a definitive test sparked an objection from Chief Justice Burger, who concurred in the judgment. The Chief Justice stated that "the Court should make clear now that, as a general rule, a communication is privileged at least when, as here, an employee or former employee speaks at the direction of the management with an attorney regarding conduct or proposed conduct within the scope of employment."

Chief Justice Burger's articulation of the privilege in the corporate context has been borne out in cases after Upjohn. It is generally accepted that the privilege applies if the following criteria are met:

(1) the communications are made by corporate agents;

(2) the agents are communicating at the direction of corporate superiors;

(3) the communications are made to counsel for the corporation, who is rendering legal advice;

(4) the communications concern matters within the scope of the agents' corporate duties;

(5) the communications are reasonably anticipated to remain confidential when made and are kept confidential thereafter. n90

Lower Courts have generally applied Upjohn expansively, holding, for example, that: (1) the privilege can apply to communications made by agents of a subsidiary to an attorney for the parent corporation; n91(2) the privilege can apply to statements given to corporate counsel by former corporate employees; n92 and (3) the privilege can apply even if the corporate employees invoke their Fifth Amendment privilege and there is no access to the underlying facts, as the Court assumed there would be in Upjohn. n93

While Upjohn expands the corporate attorney-client privilege, it does nothing to protect the agent communicating to the corporate attorney. That is, the privilege is the corporation's, not the agent's. Corporate agents have often tried to argue that they have a privilege for their communications to the corporate attorney because: (1) the corporate attorney was also representing them personally; or (2) the corporation and the agent were pursuing a common interest at the time of the communication. But Courts have usually rejected these arguments. A recent example is In re Grand Jury Subpoena: Under Seal, 415 F.3d 333 (4th Cir. 2005) , where a grand jury subpoenaed documents by three former employees of AOL TimeWarner who claimed that the subpoenaed documents were protected by the attorney-client privilege. AOL Time Warner did not invoke its corporate privilege -- it was cooperating with the government and leaving the employees to fend for themselves. The Court agreed with the Trial Judge that the internal investigation in which the documents were created was conducted by the company's general counsel and outside counsel, who represented only the company and not the employees. The Court noted that the investigating attorneys never told employees they represented the employees, the employees did not ask the attorneys for representation or seek legal advice from the attorneys, and the employees were fully apprised that the information they provided could be disclosed at the company's discretion. The Court also held that there was no joint client or joint defense privilege, because the employees were unable to show that they shared a common interest about a legal matter when they were interviewed. It quoted from United States v. Weissman, 195 F.3d 96 (2d Cir. 1999) , and reasoned that "[a]n employee's cooperation in an internal investigation is not sufficient to establish a common interest; rather 'some form of joint strategy is necessary.' " n94

Of course it is unlikely that the corporate attorney would be permitted to represent both the corporation and the employee. To do so would usually lead to a conflict of interest. As the Court put it in In re Grand Jury Subpoena: Under Seal, 415 F.3d 333 (4th Cir. 2005) :

> Had the investigating [corporate] attorneys, in fact, entered into an attorney-client relationship with [the employees] they would not have been free to waive the appellants' privilege when a conflict arose. It should have seemed obvious that they could not have jettisoned one client in favor of another. Rather, they would have had to withdraw from all representation and to maintain all confidences. Indeed, the court would be hard pressed to identify how investigating counsel could robustly investigate and report > to management or the board of directors of a publicly-traded corporation with the necessary candor if counsel were constrained by ethical obligations to individual employees.

The bottom line is that communications made by employees to corporate counsel are privileged, but the privilege is held by the corporation, not by the employee.

[h] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Government Attorneys

Suppose a government official makes a confidential statement to a government attorney for the purpose of obtaining legal advice as to an appropriate course of conduct for the government, or the agent himself, to take. Is this information privileged?

By analogy to Upjohn, confidential statements from government agents to government attorneys, in the pursuit of legal advice, should be covered by an attorney-client privilege. The case law on this question is surprisingly sparse, however. There are a few civil cases applying an attorney-client privilege where the government is the "client," n95 at least where the communications were made for purposes of obtaining legal advice, as distinct from political or policy advice. n96 But the Courts are divided on whether the privilege will apply in a criminal prosecution of a government official.

In In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum, 112 F.3d 910 (8th Cir. 1997) , the question was whether the privilege applied to notes taken at a meeting held after Hilary Rodham Clinton, the First Lady, testified in a grand jury proceeding in the Whitewater matter. Attorneys and officials representing the White House (i.e., the institution of the Presidency) were at the meeting with Mrs. Clinton and her lawyers. The White House argued on the basis of Upjohn that communications from government agents to government attorneys, made in confidence, were entitled to the privilege. But the Court rejected that argument, at least in the context of a grand jury investigation. The Court declared that "the general duty of public service calls upon government employees and agencies to favor disclosure over concealment," and that the "difference between the public interest and the private interest is perhaps, by itself, reason enough to find Upjohn unpersuasive in this case." The Court concluded as follows:

> We believe the strong public interest in honest government and in exposing wrongdoing by public officials would be ill-served by recognition of a governmental attorney-client privilege applicable in criminal proceedings inquiring into the actions of public officials. We also believe that to allow any part of the federal government to use its in-house attorneys as a shield against the production of information relevant to a federal criminal investigation would represent a gross misuse of public assets. n97

The Grand Jury Court was not very concerned that its refusal to recognize a privilege in the criminal context would chill discussions between government officials and government attorneys:

> Because agencies and entities of the government are not themselves subject to criminal liability, a government attorney is free to discuss anything with a government official -- except for potential criminal wrongdoing by that official -- without fearing later revelation of the conversation. An official who fears he or she may have violated the criminal law and wishes to speak with an attorney in confidence should speak with a private attorney, not a government attorney.

We are somewhat more concerned than the Grand Jury Court about the risk of chilling frank communications between government officials and government attorneys. It is true that a government official has no right to consult a government attorney about the official's personal legal problems. Yet the lines between the personal and the institutional, and between the civil and the criminal, are not so easy to draw at the time when the official is deciding whether to disclose information to a government attorney. We are concerned that, in the absence of a privilege, government officials will be forced to turn to private counsel at even the hint of criminal implications for a proposed course of action. This would deprive officials of the special expertise that government attorneys would provide. It might also mean that the official, concerned about the prohibitive expense of private counsel, would proceed without any advice at all; and an uncounselled course of conduct is bound to have a negative effect not only on the official, but also on the government and the public.

In contrast to the Eighth Circuit, the Second Circuit has upheld a claim of government attorney-client privilege in a criminal prosecution. In In re Grand Jury Investigation, 399 F.3d 527 (2d Cir. 2005) , the Court reversed an order of the District Court that would have required the former chief legal counsel in the office of the Governor of Connecticut to reveal to a federal grand jury the contents of private conversations she had with the Governor and members of his staff for the purpose of providing them legal assistance. The grand jury was investigating possible criminal violations by the Governor and the staff members in receiving gifts from private parties who did business with the State. The government conceded (and the Court agreed) that a governmental attorney-client privilege may be invoked in civil suits between government agencies and private litigants. The government argued, however, that the privilege should not extend to criminal cases, and relied on the Eighth Circuit ruling as well as the views of two other circuits. But the Court rejected the government's argument and held that the governmental attorney-client privilege applies in criminal cases. It reasoned as follows:

> It is crucial that government officials, who are expected to uphold and execute the law and who may face criminal prosecution for failing to do so, be encouraged to seek out and receive fully informed legal advice. Upholding the privilege furthers a culture in which consultation with government lawyers is accepted as a normal, desirable, and even indispensable part of conducting public business. Abrogating the privilege undermines that culture and thereby impairs the public interest.

Essentially the Second Circuit held that the Upjohn rationale for applying the corporate attorney-client privilege to communications from employees applied with equal measure to the government context.

[i] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Permanent Protection

The traditional rule is that the privilege survives the termination of the attorney-client relationship, and it even survives the client. n98 But the concept that the privilege outlives the client is questionable if the justification for the privilege is to encourage full communication from the client to the lawyer. The assumption of the survival rule is that the client would be concerned about posthumous use of confidential information. This assumption seems dubious when applied as of the time the communication is made; most clients at that point would hardly be concerned with the consequences of after-death revelation. And this is especially so in criminal cases, because the client by definition cannot be concerned that communication to an attorney will land him in jail after he dies. n99

Nonetheless the Supreme Court in Swidler & Berlin v. United States, 524 U.S. 399 (1998) , held that the attorney-client privilege survives the death of the client. Consequently, counsel for Vincent Foster was not required to disclose confidential communications that Foster made to him shortly before his suicide. The Court rejected the argument of the Independent Counsel that the traditional rule -- providing that the privilege survives the client -- would unnecessarily thwart criminal investigations. The Court noted that scholars have criticized the traditional rule holding that the privilege survives the client, but declared as follows:

> Despite the scholarly criticism, we think there are weighty reasons that counsel in favor of posthumous application. Knowing that communications will remain confidential even after death encourages the client to communicate fully and frankly with counsel. While the fear of disclosure, and the consequent withholding of information from counsel, may be reduced if disclosure is limited to posthumous disclosure in a criminal context, it seems unreasonable to assume that it vanishes altogether. Clients may be concerned about reputation, civil liability, or possible harm to friends or family. Posthumous disclosure of such communications may be as feared as disclosure during the client's lifetime.

The Court concluded that "the Independent Counsel has simply not made a sufficient showing to overturn the common law rule embodied in the prevailing case law. Interpreted in the light of reason and experience, that body of law requires that the attorney client privilege prevent disclosure of the notes at issue in this case."

[j] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Invocation

While the privilege is held by the client, the attorney has the implicit authority to invoke it unless the client has made a decision to waive the privilege. Indeed, the attorney has an ethical duty to invoke the privilege, unless he or she hears to the contrary from the client. n100

[k] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Waiver

[i] Waiver as Forfeiture

Even where all the elements of the privilege are otherwise present, the privilege will not be recognized if it has been waived. The term "waiver" as used by the Courts actually encompasses more than the traditional definition of a knowing and voluntary waiver of a right. Courts often find a "waiver" that is really more appropriately considered a "forfeiture." Judge Posner has stated that many of the waiver doctrines -- such as the doctrine finding a waiver of the privilege in some circumstances when the party has mistakenly disclosed the privileged information -- are not "waiver in the standard sense in which the word is used in the law: the deliberate relinquishment of a right." Rather, a "waiver" of the privilege is sometimes found "in order to punish the person claiming the privilege for a mistake." n101"Waiver" in this broad sense includes the concept of forfeiture and follows from any conduct by the client that would make it unfair for the client thereafter to assert the privilege. n102 We use the term "waiver" herein because that is the term most often used by Courts and litigants.

[ii] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Waiver -- Who Can Waive the Privilege?

The client holds the privilege and the power to waive it. The lawyer generally has implicit authority to waive the privilege as well in the course of the representation. The identity of the client for purposes of waiver is a problematic issue in the corporate context. The Supreme Court held in CFTC v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343, 349 (1985) , that "the power to waive the corporate attorney-client privilege rests with the corporation's management and is normally exercised by its officers and directors." Therefore, in Weintraub, a person who had resigned as an officer no longer had authority to exercise or waive the privilege. n103 The Weintraub Court further stated that "when control of a corporation passes to new management, the authority to assert and waive the corporation's attorney-client privilege passes as well." Applying this rule, the Weintraub Court held that a trustee in bankruptcy succeeded to management's authority to waive the corporate privilege, over the objection of former and present corporate officers. n104 A sale of assets, however, generally does not transfer the power to waive the attorney-client privilege to the buyer. n105

[iii] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Waiver -- Selective Waiver

Waiver occurs when privileged information is disclosed to a third party. One controversial question is whether a party can "selectively" waive the privilege. For example, if a corporation discloses an internal report to the SEC in order to ward off an investigation, does this disclosure operate as a complete waiver of the privilege, or can the privilege be retained against other parties? And does it matter whether the SEC has signed a confidentiality agreement?

An example of the selective waiver problem arose in Westinghouse Elec. Corp. v. Republic of the Philippines, 951 F.2d 1414 (3d Cir. 1991) , where Westinghouse received a report from outside counsel who had conducted an internal corporate investigation. The internal investigation was in response to an inquiry by the SEC into allegations that Westinghouse had obtained certain contracts by bribing officials of the Philippine Government. Westinghouse cooperated with the SEC inquiry by turning over outside counsel's report. Later, the Department of Justice began to investigate whether Westinghouse obtained contracts from the Philippines through bribery. Again, Westinghouse cooperated by turning over the investigative report prepared by counsel. Thereafter, the Republic brought suit against Westinghouse for damages stemming from the alleged bribery of Philippine officials by agents of Westinghouse. The Republic sought access to counsel's investigative report.

The Court rejected the Westinghouse argument that the attorney-client privilege could be selectively waived. In doing so, it sided with the D.C. Circuit (see Permian Corp. v. United States, 665 F.2d 1214 (D.C. Cir. 1981)) , and disagreed with the result reached by the Eighth Circuit in Diversified Industries v. Meredith, 572 F.2d 596, 1978-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P61879 (8th Cir. 1977) (en banc). n106 The Court in Diversified Industries had reasoned that if disclosure to government agencies were to constitute a complete waiver, it would deter corporations from conducting internal investigations and from voluntarily cooperating with government investigations. But the Court in Westinghouse noted that the interest in conducting internal investigations had little to do with whether a waiver is found when the report is subsequently turned over to the government. That is, the decision whether to conduct an internal investigation is separate from whether to turn the completed investigative report over to the government. As to the interest in encouraging voluntary cooperation with government investigations, the Westinghouse Court found this policy objective to be "beyond the intended purposes of the attorney-client privilege." The Court noted voluntary disclosure of confidential information to the government does not serve the goal of the privilege, which is to enable clients to obtain informed and effective legal advice. The Westinghouse Court concluded that "because the selective waiver rule in Diversified protects disclosures made for entirely different purposes, it cannot be reconciled with traditional attorney-client privilege doctrine."

It could be argued that Westinghouse places the client in a dilemma: If the client wants to cooperate with the government, it can do so but only at the expense of completely waiving the privilege. However, this supposed "tough choice" is one that attorneys and clients routinely make in a variety of contexts. Waiver of the privilege often has advantages and disadvantages. For example, in In re John Doe Corp., 675 F.2d 482 (2d Cir. 1982) , a corporation conducted through counsel an internal investigation of its business practices. The resulting investigative report was shown to a lawyer representing an underwriter in connection with a public offering of the corporation's securities, so that underwriter's counsel could complete a due diligence review. The corporation argued that disclosure to underwriter counsel should not be considered a waiver because disclosure was "required" by the legal duty of due diligence and the millions of dollars riding on the public offering of registered securities. Hence the waiver, according to the corporation, was not voluntary. The Second Circuit responded:

> We view this argument with no sympathy whatsoever. A claim that a need for confidentiality must be respected in order to facilitate the seeking and rendering of informed legal advice is not consistent with selective disclosure when the claimant decides that the confidential materials can be put to other beneficial purposes. Once a corporate decision is made to disclose them for commercial purposes, no matter what the economic imperatives, the privilege is lost ... We hold that the calculated use of otherwise privileged materials for commercial purposes will waive the privilege. n107

The fact is that corporations will decide to turn over confidential information when it is beneficial to do so, even if the consequence is a waiver of the privilege. The Diversified rule of selective waiver is not required to encourage voluntary cooperation. As the Court in Westinghouse noted, Westinghouse disclosed the investigative report to the government even though the selective waiver rule was far from clearly established at the time. n108 It may be that rejection of selective waiver will discourage cooperation with the government at the margins, because the risk of a total waiver does indeed make cooperation more costly. But whatever lack of cooperation will result must be balanced against the inherent unfairness of allowing selective waiver. It is simply unfair to allow a party to use the privilege so strategically. In essence, the Court in Westinghouse found that disclosure to one party constituted a forfeiture of the privilege, because it would be unjust to allow Westinghouse to use the privilege in such a strategic and one-sided manner.

It is notable that the Westinghouse Court found a waiver of the privilege even though applicable SEC regulations indicated that the investigative report would "be deemed non-public" and even though the Department of Justice entered into a confidentiality agreement with Westinghouse. As the Court stated, the traditional waiver doctrine provides that a voluntary disclosure to a third party "waives the privilege even if the third party agrees not to disclose the communications to anyone else." Thus, the confidentiality arrangements did not bind third parties. n109 It should also be noted that the Court found the Westinghouse disclosure to the DOJ to be voluntary even though it was prompted by a grand jury subpoena. Again, traditional waiver doctrine provides that compliance with a subpoena waives the privilege. To preserve the privilege, the attorney must move to quash the subpoena, and produce the information only after being ordered by a Court to do so.

[iv] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Waiver -- Advice of Counsel Defense

The rule concerning waiver of the attorney-client privilege, as it relates to an advice of counsel defense, is easily stated: "Where a party asserts reliance on advice of counsel as an element of his defense, the party thereby waives the attorney-client privilege as to all communications to and from counsel concerning the transaction for which counsel's advice was sought." n110 Again, the use of the term "waiver" is somewhat of a misnomer. Courts are really holding that by referring to advice of counsel as a defense, the client is then disentitled from invoking the privilege to preclude any inquiry into the very issue that the client brought up. This is a forfeiture. n111 There is a compelling notion that the adversary "cannot be stonewalled by the simultaneous assertion of the [advice of counsel] defense and the privilege." n112 Put another way, the attorney-client privilege can be used to shield information, but it cannot be used as a sword against the adversary. n113

Accordingly, if an advice of counsel defense is asserted, it results in a waiver of all communications between the client and attorney that are pertinent to the subject matter of that defense. Moreover, the waiver applies to all communications on the subject matter that the client has made to any counsel, whether or not the client's defense is based upon reliance on the advice of that particular counsel. "Otherwise, a claim of reliance on counsel would be immune from a showing that, in fact, the defendant had received overwhelming advice to the contrary." n114 The waiver does not apply, however, to communications outside the subject matter that is the basis for the advice of counsel defense. n115

It is sometimes difficult to determine whether a litigant has interposed an advice of counsel defense. n116 The easy case is where a criminal defendant is charged with violating a statute that requires proof of wilfulness, and testifies that he consulted counsel about his prospective conduct, and counsel told him that his proposed course of conduct would be legal. This is clearly an advice of counsel defense, and both the adversary and the factfinder are entitled to know what was said between the client and the attorney to warrant such advice -- or indeed whether such advice was ever given. But what is the rule if the same defendant merely denies guilt, including the wilfulness element of the crime? Can a simple denial of guilt or liability, without an explicit attempt to defend with privileged communications, ever be deemed a reliance on an advice of counsel defense and a consequent waiver of the privilege?

Most Courts have answered this question in the negative. For example, in In re Burlington Northern, Inc., 822 F.2d 518 (5th Cir. 1987) , the plaintiff sued numerous railroad companies for conspiring to prevent construction of a pipeline by filing and defending lawsuits. The defendants asserted a Noerr-Pennington defense, under which an antitrust defendant may successfully defend a claim arising from litigious or petitioning activities by proving a genuine intent to influence government action in undertaking these activities. The Court found that the assertion of the Noerr-Pennington defense was not an interjection of an advice of counsel defense, but was instead a simple denial of liability. It stated that "this is not a case in which a party has asserted a claim or defense that explicitly relies on the existence or absence of the very communications for which he claims a privilege." Thus, under Burlington, a simple denial of liability is not enough to constitute a waiver. This rule makes sense, as a contrary rule would virtually require the defendant to confess judgment in order to retain the privilege.

The advice of counsel issue becomes more complex when the client goes beyond a simple denial of guilt or liability, and yet does not specifically refer to the fact that he received advice from an attorney. For example, in United States v.

Bilzerian, 926 F.2d 1285 (2d Cir. 1991) , the defendant was charged with violation of the securities laws. Bilzerian denied criminal intent and moved in limine for a ruling allowing him to testify without being subject to cross-examination concerning attorney-client communications. He argued that he would testify to his good-faith attempt to comply with the securities laws, without disclosing the content or even the existence of any privileged communications or reliance on the advice of counsel. The Trial Judge denied the motion and stated that if Bilzerian testified to his good faith on any ground, "it would open the door to cross-examination with respect to the basis for his belief, and that such cross-examination would allow inquiry into communications with his attorney." The Court of Appeals agreed with the Trial Judge that by testifying to good faith, a defendant puts "his knowledge of the law and the basis for his understanding of what the law required in issue," and that conversations with counsel are "directly relevant in determining the extent of his knowledge and, as a result, his intent." That is, when the defendant affirmatively testifies to his innocent state of mind, the jury is entitled "to know the basis of his understanding that his actions were legal." Thus, Bilzerian's attempt to carefully tailor his direct testimony was unavailing, because the advice of counsel issue, and the communications, if any, made to counsel, would be a fair topic for the prosecutor to address on cross-examination.

Thus, Bilzerian allows the defendant to testify to elements of the crime other than his state of mind, and to prove lack of intent through other witnesses and proof and through counsel's argument, but does not allow the defendant to testify to any aspect of his good faith.

[v] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Waiver -- Inadvertent Disclosure

One of the most difficult problems of waiver occurs when the disclosure of confidential information is a mistake. For example, the lawyer hits the wrong speed dial on the fax machine, and privileged information is thereby sent to the adversary. Or the lawyer painstakingly complies with a voluminous electronic discovery request, and privileged information (perhaps background or "meta" data) is mistakenly included in the cd sent to the adversary. Again, the loss of privilege that might occur here is really grounded in a theory of forfeiture rather than traditional waiver. The question is, what sort of conduct should be subject to the sanction of the loss of a privilege? The Courts have adopted various views on inadvertent disclosure, ranging from completely permissive to completely merciless.

Representative of the "strict liability" approach is In re Sealed Case, 877 F.2d 976 (D.C. Cir. 1989) . There, the Court held that the inadvertent disclosure of a few privileged documents in the course of a massive discovery response not only constituted a waiver of the privilege with respect to the documents, but also worked a "subject matter" waiver. So the client was forced to make a further production of all previously privileged documents covering the subject matter set forth in the documents inadvertently disclosed. The Court reasoned that the privilege was costly to the search for truth, and therefore that privileged information must be guarded "like the crown jewels." n117 The problem with this draconian rule is that it increases the costs of discovery and hence the costs of legal services; lawyers are likely to spend inordinate amounts of time making sure that privileged material does not slip through. This is probably not an efficient discovery model, in economic terms. Moreover, parties might fight tooth and nail during discovery over materials -- parties will be loath to produce a document in discovery, no matter how inconsequential, if a court might find it later on to be privileged, with the consequence being a subject matter waiver. Thus the D.C. Circuit view on inadvertent waiver is likely to lead to an increase in the number of privilege issues that a court will have to hear.

The clear trend in the Courts is to adopt a "culpability" approach to unintentional disclosure. Most Courts focus on whether reasonable precautions had been taken to avoid mistaken disclosure of privileged information, and on whether the party with the privilege moved quickly to rectify its error. For example, in Alldread v. City of Grenada, 988 F.2d 1425 (5th Cir. 1993) , the City inadvertently sent privileged tapes to the plaintiff in the course of complying with a massive discovery demand. The Court rejected a strict liability approach and held that the question of whether a waiver occurred must be assessed under a five-factor test. n118 These factors are: (1) the reasonableness of precautions taken to prevent disclosure of privileged material; (2) the amount of time taken to remedy the error; (3) the scope of discovery (the more massive the discovery, the more excusable the disclosure); (4) the extent of the disclosure of privileged information; and (5) the overriding issue of fairness. The Court held that under the circumstances the privilege had not been waived. It relied most heavily on the facts that the City had immediately asserted the privilege upon discovering the disclosure, and that considerations of fairness counseled in favor of the privilege. n119

Under the fault-based view of inadvertent waiver, there will be cases where the lawyer's work is so sloppy and inattentive that a mistaken disclosure will result in a forfeiture. Illustrative is SEC v. Cassano, 189 F.R.D. 83 (S.D.N.Y.1999) . The SEC was proceeding against investors for insider trading. The case was brought in New York but was handled by the Boston office of the SEC. A discovery protocol was set up under which all of the unprivileged SEC documents would be sent to New York, defense counsel would be allowed to investigate the documents, and then an SEC paralegal on the premises would copy whatever documents defense counsel selected, and send those documents to counsel within a month. Defense counsel, combing through the sea of boxes, found a smoking gun document -- an SEC staff memorandum, clearly privileged. He asked the paralegal if she could photocopy the document immediately so that he could take it with him that day. The paralegal telephoned SEC counsel in Boston, who immediately agreed to the unusual request, without checking the document number against the privilege log. A few weeks later, the SEC discovered its gaffe and sought an order requiring defense counsel to return the document. The Court held that the SEC's actions in response to defense counsel's request to photocopy the memorandum were so careless as to surrender any claim that it took reasonable steps to ensure its confidentiality; hence the privilege as to the document was forfeited. The Court noted that inadvertent production will constitute a forfeiture of the privilege only if the producing party's conduct was "so careless as to suggest that it was not concerned with the protection of the asserted privilege." The Court declared that the "circumstances of the request clearly should have suggested to the SEC attorney that defense counsel had found what they regarded as gold at the end of the proverbial rainbow. Any attorney faced with such a request in comparable circumstances should have reviewed the document immediately, if only to find out what the other side thought so compelling. ...Yet the SEC attorney authorized production of this document, sight unseen." SEC counsel was also found delinquent in discovering the disclosure of the privileged memorandum. n120

The risks of mistaken disclosure are obviously profound, and these risks increase in complex cases with voluminous discovery, especially discovery of electronic information. This has led parties in some cases to agree in advance that inadvertent disclosure of privileged documents by either side will not constitute a waiver. Courts have enforced these agreements, though such rulings would appear to be inconsistent with the rule of Westinghouse, that a party cannot limit waiver by agreement with a third party. n121 In a similar vein, the Manual for Complex Litigation encourages Courts in complex cases with massive discovery to enter a pretrial order providing that inadvertent disclosure will not constitute a waiver of the privilege unless the disclosure is completely reckless; if memorialized in a court order, a confidentiality agreement would appear to be binding on third parties. n122

[l] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Exceptions

[i] Attorney Self-Defense

The attorney may disclose a confidential client communication when it is necessary to defend himself from a charge of wrongful conduct, such as malpractice, ineffective assistance, or conspiring with the client. n123 In these circumstances, the privilege cannot be invoked, because it is unfair to render the attorney defenseless when charged with wrongful conduct in the course of the representation. The attorney may also use confidential communications to the extent necessary to establish a claim for compensation against the client -- though the fairness rationale becomes tenuous when applied to fee cases. n124

[ii] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Exceptions -- Fiduciaries

A "fiduciary exception" to the attorney-client privilege was established in the famous Fifth Circuit case of Garner v. Wolfinbarger, 430 F.2d 1093 (5th Cir. 1970) . The fiduciary exception has come to be known as the Garner doctrine. Garner was a derivative action in which the plaintiffs sought access to confidential communications made between management and counsel for the corporation. The Court found two competing principles at stake when the shareholders in a derivative action seek access to confidential communications from management to corporate attorneys. On the one hand, management does not manage for itself, it manages for the shareholders; so it seems anomalous to deny the shareholders access to communications presumptively made on their behalf. On the other hand, if shareholders were given an unlimited right of access on a mere showing of commonality of interest, this might chill the free flow of communications between management and corporate counsel, possibly leading to a deterioration of corporate legal representation. n125

To balance these competing considerations, the Court in Garner held that management had no absolute privilege to shield confidential communications from the shareholders, but that the shareholders must establish "good cause" for access to the communications. The Court set forth a nonexclusive list of factors that are pertinent to the determination of "good cause." The most important of these factors are: (1) the number of shareholders and the percentage of stock they represent; (2) whether the shareholders are in good faith; (3) the merits of the shareholders' claims; (4) the shareholders' need for the information; (5) whether the communications relate to past or prospective activity; (6) whether the advice concerned the instant litigation; and (7) whether the shareholders have made a particularized request or appear to be engaged in a fishing expedition. n126

A few Courts have held that the Garner doctrine should not be expanded beyond the peculiar circumstances of a shareholder derivative action. These Courts reason that the justification for the Garner doctrine is dubious when the action is not brought on behalf of the corporation, but rather on behalf of individual claimants. Under this view, the mutuality of interest at the heart of Garner does not exist outside the derivative suit. n127

Most Courts, however, have extended the Garner principle well beyond the derivative action, to any suit in which a fiduciary relationship is at issue. Thus, Garner has been applied beyond its facts to the following situations, among others: (1) individual shareholder actions for fraud; n128(2) actions against majority shareholders owing a fiduciary duty to the minority; n129(3) actions brought by employees for breach of fiduciary duty owed by the trustee of a pension plan under ERISA; n130(4) actions brought against a bank acting pursuant to a power of attorney in a commercial land transaction; n131 and (5) actions against a union and its officers brought by union members. n132

While Garner has received an expansive application in most Courts, we find the justification for the Garner doctrine to be questionable. It is of course true that a fiduciary acts on behalf of a beneficiary; but it hardly follows that the fiduciary should be deterred from seeking legal advice. Yet this is what occurs if the fiduciary cannot communicate with an attorney safe in the knowledge that what he says will not come back to haunt him. n133 The fact that fiduciaries have special duties of care provides more and not less reason to give them the opportunity to consult freely with counsel concerning the performance of their duties. Under Garner, the fiduciary's representation of the beneficiary may suffer in the long run, because the fiduciary may find it preferable to go without legal advice. n134 Therefore, we suggest that if Garner is to apply at all, it should be limited to the particular context of shareholder derivative litigation in which it arose. n135

It is important to note that the Garner doctrine is based on the premise that the fiduciary is communicating with the attorney on behalf of the beneficiaries. It follows that the Garner doctrine does not apply -- and the communication will be privileged -- if the fiduciary is communicating with an attorney out of concern for the fiduciary's own personal liability. Illustrative is United States v. Mett, 178 F.3d 1058 (9th Cir. 1999) , where administrators of pension plans were charged with embezzlement. The government argued that communications between the defendants and counsel concerning administration of the plans were not privileged under Garner. But the Court disagreed. At the time the defendant sought legal advice, "employees had begun asking difficult questions regarding the financial condition of the plans. Trouble was in the air. The defendants thus had good reason to seek advice from [the lawyer] regarding their personal exposure to additional civil and criminal liabilities resulting from the pension plan withdrawals."

[iii] Attorney-Client Privilege -- Exceptions -- Crime-Fraud

Statements made by the client to the attorney, even though in confidence, are not privileged if the purpose of the communication is to further crime or fraud. The crime-fraud exception is triggered when the party seeking the information provides prima facie evidence that the client was seeking the attorney's advice and services in furtherance of a preconceived plan of wrongdoing. n136 While the exception is referred to as the "crime-fraud exception," it has also been applied by some Courts where communications were made to further tortious conduct such as employment discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. n137

In United States v. Zolin, 491 U.S. 554 (1989) , the Court noted that there was "some confusion" in the Lower Courts concerning the application of the prima facie standard to the crime-fraud exception. There is dispute about the quantum of proof required, and about whether the privilege holder must be given an opportunity to rebut the prima facie case. n138 The Court in Zolin found it unnecessary to determine the specific quantum of proof required to establish a prima facie case of crime or fraud, or whether the proponent of the privilege should be allowed an opportunity to rebut a prima facie showing.

These ambiguities notwithstanding, it is clear that the prima facie standard is not an exacting one. For example in In re Grand Jury Investigation, 842 F.2d 1223 (11th Cir. 1987) , the Court found that a prima facie case was shown by a good-faith affidavit of the prosecutor describing the evidence submitted to a grand jury. n139

The Court in Zolin held that the Trial Judge, in determining whether a prima facie case of crime or fraud has been met, may take into account the allegedly privileged statements themselves. The Court reasoned that "no matter how light the burden of proof which confronts the party claiming the exception, there are many blatant abuses of privilege which cannot be substantiated by extrinsic evidence," and that a "per se rule that the communications in question may never be considered creates, we feel, too great an impediment to the proper functioning of the adversary process." n140 Of course, the Court's review of the allegedly privileged statements must be conducted in camera and outside the presence of the party demanding production of the statements. Otherwise the privilege will be lost before the Court even rules on the privilege question. n141 In some cases it might be possible that a Judge does not even need to hold an in camera review, because the client's plan of crime or fraud is so obvious. However, "district courts should be highly reluctant to order disclosure without conducting an in camera review of allegedly privileged materials." n142 This is because "a threshold showing of facts supporting the crime-fraud exception followed by an in camera review of the privileged materials helps ensure that legitimate communications ... are not deterred by the risk of compelled disclosure under the crime-fraud exception." n143

The crime-fraud exception can apply even if the attorney is an unwitting instrument in the crime or fraud. The basis of the exception is that the client cannot in bad faith exploit the privilege by using the attorney as an instrument of crime or fraud. Therefore it does not matter whether the attorney was knowingly involved in the client's scheme. n144 Yet some Courts have held that the crime-fraud exception applies if the attorney is the wrongdoer, even if the client is not knowingly involved. n145 This application of the exception makes little sense, because the privilege is held by the client and the exception is designed to prevent the client from abusing the relationship.

The crime-fraud exception applies only when the attorney is being used to further a future or ongoing scheme of misconduct. It does not apply to communications seeking legal representation with respect to a past act of crime or fraud; such statements are at the heart of the protection provided by the privilege. n146 Moreover, the exception will not apply if the client consulted with an attorney to determine whether a prospective course of conduct was lawful. As one Court put it:

> The crime-fraud exception has a precise focus: It applies only when the communications between the client and his lawyer further a crime, fraud or other misconduct. ... [The exception should not be applied to deny a client] the privilege where even its stern critics acknowledge that the justification for the shield is strongest -- where a client seeks counsel's advice to determine the legality of conduct before

the client takes any action. n147

On the other hand, the crime-fraud exception will apply if the client already knows that a prospective course of conduct is impermissible and is simply using counsel in an attempt to effectuate the plan. n148 Likewise, any communications made with a view to covering up past acts of misconduct are in fact made with the purpose of perpetrating a crime or fraud, and hence are not privileged. n149

The fact that a communication with counsel can be used to prove a crime or fraud is not sufficient to trigger the exception. n150 Timing is critical, and unless the scheme of crime or fraud was afoot at the time of the communication, the statements remain privileged. For example, assume that a corporation seeks legal advice to determine whether a large account receivable is, in fact, legally collectible. Counsel investigates and informs the corporation that the receivable is not legally collectible. A few months later, the corporation sells the receivable without informing the buyer about the advice received from counsel. Of course, counsel's report would be relevant to prove that the seller-client acted fraudulently. But in order for the crime-fraud exception to apply, the seller must establish a prima facie case that the seller had a fraudulent intent at the time that counsel's advice was sought. If not, the privilege will apply even though the client acted fraudulently subsequent to receiving the legal advice. n151

[6] Psychotherapist-Patient and Related Privileges

In Jaffee v. Redmond, 518 U.S. 1 (1996) , the Court established a psychotherapist-patient privilege under federal common law, and held that this privilege also applied to protect confidential statements made to a clinical social worker in a therapy session. The case arose after a police officer, responding to a call about a fight in an apartment complex, shot and killed the plaintiff's decedent. The facts of the shooting were hotly disputed between the parties. After the incident the defendant police officer received counseling from a clinical social worker. The plaintiff sought discovery of the communications made in these counseling sessions, in order to contradict the account of the shooting given by the defendant at trial. The Trial Court held that the communications were not privileged, and when both the defendant and the social worker refused to comply with a disclosure order, the Trial Court instructed the jury that it could draw a negative inference from this failure to disclose. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff.

The Court of Appeals reversed, finding that a psychotherapist-patient privilege existed under federal law and was fully applicable to statements made to clinical social workers. That Court held, however, that the privilege was a qualified one, i.e., the communications would be protected unless the adversary could establish a substantial need for them. The Court of Appeals found that no showing of substantial need had been made.

The Supreme Court affirmed the Court of Appeals, but held in contrast to that Court that the psychotherapist-patient privilege is absolute, not qualified. Justice Stevens, writing for the majority, made the following points:

(1) Rule 501 does not "freeze" the common law of privileges but rather provides an affirmative grant of authority to Federal Courts to develop new privileges where dictated by reason and experience.

(2) A new privilege can be adopted when the private and public interests supporting the privilege outweigh the cost to the search for truth that the privilege would impose.

(3) The private interests supporting a psychotherapist-patient privilege are substantial, because confidentiality is at the heart of the psychotherapist-patient relationship. The physician-patient relationship is distinguishable, because treatment for a physical ailment "can often proceed successfully on the basis of a physical examination, objective information supplied by the patient, and the results of diagnostic tests." In contrast, effective psychotherapy "depends upon an atmosphere of confidence and trust in which the patient is willing to make a frank and complete disclosure of facts, emotions, memories, and fears."

(4) To establish a privilege there must be more than private interests at stake; the privilege must also "serve public ends." The psychotherapist-patient privilege meets this requirement. The privilege "serves the public interest by facilitating the provision of appropriate treatment for individuals suffering the effects of a mental or emotional problem. The mental health of our citizenry, no less than its physical health, is a public good of transcendent importance." The public interest is especially furthered by protecting communications of law enforcement officials during therapy sessions. "The entire community may suffer if police officers are not able to receive effective counseling and treatment after traumatic incidents, either because trained officers leave the profession prematurely or because those in need of treatment remain on the job."

(5) The cost of the psychotherapist-patient privilege is minimal because the privilege will protect only those statements that are generated by a reliance on confidentiality. "Without a privilege, much of the desirable evidence to which litigants ... seek access -- for example, admissions against interest by a party -- is unlikely to come into being. This unspoken 'evidence' will therefore serve no greater truth-seeking function than if it had been spoken and privileged."

(6) Federal recognition of this privilege is especially appropriate because a psychotherapist-patient privilege has been legislatively enacted in all fifty states and the District of Columbia. If a federal privilege were not recognized, the state privileges would be undermined because psychotherapists could not provide an absolute guarantee of confidentiality.

(7) Federal recognition of this privilege receives strong support from the fact that the psychotherapist-patient privilege was one of the privileges originally recommended by the Advisory Committee on the Federal Rules of Evidence. It is more difficult to establish a new privilege if it was not recognized in the Advisory Committee proposal.

(8) The rationale supporting the psychotherapist-patient privilege applies equally to statements made in confidence to clinical social workers. "Their clients often include the poor and those of modest means who could not afford the assistance of a psychiatrist or psychologist but whose counseling sessions serve the same public goals." While the recognition of such a privilege among the states is not unanimous, it is predominant.

(9) The psychotherapist-patient privilege is not a qualified privilege. "Making the promise of confidentiality contingent upon a trial judge's later evaluation of the relative importance of the patient's interest in privacy and the evidentiary need for disclosure would eviscerate the effectiveness of the privilege." Therefore, where the privilege applies, it is absolute, unless it is waived by the patient.

There are several open questions left by the Court's decision in Jaffee. The Court specifically declined to define the precise contours of the privilege, other than to say in a footnote that "we do not doubt that there are situations in which the privilege must give way, for example, if a serious threat of harm to the patient or to others can be averted only by means of a disclosure by the therapist." n152

One important question is whether the privilege applies to confidential communications to any social worker, or whether it is limited to statements made for purposes of therapy to licensed clinical social workers. As pointed out by Justice Scalia in his dissent (joined in this respect by Chief Justice Rehnquist), the term "social worker" is broad, and therapy is only a small part of the job of most social workers. Social workers differ from psychotherapists in this respect. The precise holding of Jaffee appears limited to statements made for purposes of therapy. It would appear, therefore, that Courts must now hold in camera hearings to determine which statements made to social workers were for therapeutic purposes and which were not. The Court in Jaffee failed to take this into account as one of the real costs of a social worker privilege.

Another question is whether a physician-patient privilege can or should be recognized as a matter of federal law after Jaffee. On the one hand, the Court distinguished the physician-patient relationship from the psychotherapist-patient relationship on the ground that confidential communications are more critical to the latter relationship than to the former. On the other hand, virtually every state has legislatively recognized a physician-patient privilege, n153 and this factor was important to the Court's recognition of the psychotherapist-patient privilege in Jaffee. But then again, the physician-patient privilege was not one of those recommended by the Advisory Committee, and the Court found this factor relevant in Jaffee as well. In the end, it seems unlikely that Jaffee can be used as a springboard to establish a federal physician-patient privilege -- a privilege that has not yet been recognized by any Federal Court. n154

Another question is whether Jaffee can be read as a complete rejection of the concept of a "qualified" privilege. Some well-established privileges have been recognized as qualified, in the sense that the information covered by the privilege must be disclosed if the adversary can establish a substantial need for the information. Most importantly, the privilege protecting the "deliberative process" of government officials has been recognized as a qualified privilege. (See the discussion in § 501.02[7].) While the Jaffee Court did not purport to Rule on the qualified nature of any privilege other than that before it, its categorical statement -- that an uncertain privilege is little better than none at all -- bodes ill for any qualification of a privilege that is found to exist. At a minimum, as discussed above, any "new" privilege recognized by the Courts will probably have to be found absolute after Jaffee -- making it less likely that the privilege will be recognized in the first place.

A final question about the scope of Jaffee revolves around the fact that the Court adopted the psychotherapist-patient privilege in a civil case. n155 In a criminal case, where a prosecution witness has made statements in therapy, the analysis might have to be different due to the criminal defendant's constitutional rights to confrontation and an effective defense. The Second Circuit, before Jaffee, adopted a psychotherapist privilege but held that the star prosecution witness' records of psychiatric commitment were nonetheless subject to disclosure and use by the criminal defendant in cross-examination. n156 That Court was clearly concerned that the privilege would unduly restrict the defendant's ability to cross-examine the witness. Thus, the Jaffee Court's promulgation of an "absolute" privilege must be tempered by constitutional considerations in criminal cases; a case-dependent balance between the need for the privilege and the defendant's need for the evidence will have to be conducted.

[7] Executive and Governmental Privileges

Several different privileges for the government (other than the attorney-client privilege in the government context, discussed in § 501.02[5][h]) have been recognized by Federal Courts. Most deference is given to claims of military secrets or national security. n157 If the claim on its face does seem to involve these matters, Federal Courts usually sustain the privilege claim. n158

Moreover, where the state secret privilege is applicable, it is absolute, not qualified. The privilege applies even if access to the information is essential to sustain a civil claim or a criminal conviction. n159 For example, in Bareford v. General Dynamics Corp., 973 F.2d 1138 (5th Cir. 1992) , the plaintiffs brought a manufacturing and design defect suit against the manufacturer of a military weapons system, for failure of the weapons system to intercept two missiles fired upon the U.S.S. Stark. The government intervened and moved to dismiss the complaint on the ground that the subject of the lawsuit was a state secret. The plaintiffs argued that they could bring their case on the basis of nonprivileged information in the public domain, including affidavits of the former captain of the Stark and affidavits from former employees of the defendant. However, the Court held that the plaintiffs could not prove their case without "proof of what the [weapons] system was intended to do and the ways in which it fails to accomplish these goals." The Court concluded: "Such an analysis of the capabilities of an advanced Navy frigate's defensive systems is the type of judicial disclosure of state secrets the doctrine blocks." Therefore the Court upheld the dismissal of the claim. n160

Another example of the draconian effect of the state secrets privilege arose in Sterling v. Tenet, 416 F.3d 338 (4th Cir. 2005) . The Court upheld the dismissal of a former CIA agent's employment discrimination claim, on the ground that pursuit of the suit would inevitably result in the disclosure of classified state secrets. The plaintiff was a covert operative, and the Court noted that "[t]here is no way for Sterling to prove employment discrimination without exposing at least some classified details of the covert employment that gives context to his claim." The Court also noted that many of the relevant witnesses would be covert CIA operatives, and that calling them to testify would risk their cover.

The Court recognized the drastic nature of the remedy of dismissal, but found no alternative:

> But where the very question on which a case turns is itself a state secret, or the circumstances make clear that sensitive military secrets will be so central to the subject matter of the litigation that any attempt to proceed will threaten disclosure of the privileged matters, dismissal is the proper remedy.
>
> Needless to say, litigation centering around a covert agent's assignments, evaluations and colleagues meets this test. Here, the whole object of the suit and of the discovery is to establish a fact that is a state secret, namely, the methods and operations of the Central Intelligence Agency.

The state secrets privilege may preclude a prosecution or a civil claim even if the party can show sufficient independent evidence to proceed with the case. For example, in Bareford the plaintiff had established a prima facie case with nonprivileged information, but the Court dismissed the case anyway. This was because the privileged and the nonprivileged information was "inextricably linked." Cross-examination at trial would be required as to witnesses who had access to highly sensitive and privileged data. The Court stated: "We are compelled to conclude that the trial of this case would inevitably lead to a significant risk that highly sensitive information concerning this defense system would be disclosed." n161

The state secrets privilege also applies to preclude a claim if the privileged material is necessary to mount a defense. In other words, the choice is made to place the cost of the state secrets privilege on the prosecution and the civil plaintiff, rather than on the civil or criminal defendant. n162

Less deference is given to claims of agency or government privilege that do not involve state secrets and national security. The privileges for official information outside the national security context are generally grouped under the term "deliberative process privilege." n163 The deliberative process privilege protects the free flow of ideas, comments, and expressions necessary for the government to make informed decisions. As the Supreme Court has stated, the "ultimate aim" of the privilege is to "prevent injury to the quality of agency decisions." n164

The Courts assume that confidentiality is required because government officials will be "chilled" if they know that their internal communications are subject to public disclosure. The fear is that officials may pull punches, and this will hurt the quality of advice that they give to their superiors. A secondary argument in support of the privilege is that it "protects the integrity of the decision-making process itself by confirming that officials would be judged by what they decided, not for matters they considered before making up their minds." n165 The concern is that the integrity of the government official's final decision -- which is public -- would be undermined if the public finds out about the way in which the decision was reached. The analogy is that nobody would eat sausage if they know how it is made.

Courts have applied the deliberative process privilege to protect a wide variety of information prepared by government officials. Some examples include: an intra-agency memorandum proposing underground storage of nuclear arms; n166 Navy cost estimates prepared in the course of selecting a port for a battleship group; n167 a report by an Inspector General on allegations that a Regional Administrator for the EPA interfered with enforcement actions of the EPA's Hazardous Waste Division regarding a hazardous waste site; n168 personal notes and evaluations used in preparing an EEOC report; n169 internal agency memos concerning strategy discussions with respect to a pending discrimination lawsuit; n170 and a report concerning an investigation of alleged wrongdoing by National Guard Officers, on which the Army ultimately took no action. n171

To qualify for the deliberative process privilege, the information prepared by the government must be both predecisional and deliberative. The "predecisional" requirement limits the privilege to the process of decisionmaking; the privilege is not designed to protect the final decision itself. The "deliberative" requirement protects the free flow of official opinions and advice and the exercise of judgment; the privilege is not designed to protect simple fact-gathering or action by the official as to which there is no discretion or thought. n172 While the "predecisional" and "deliberative" requirements appear straightforward, they are often difficult to apply to individual documents.

A Court will find a document to be predecisional if it was designed to assist a government official in arriving at a final decision. In contrast, if the document was prepared to explain or justify a decision that has already been made, it is not protected. However, the "future/past" time line is not an absolute. The privilege may apply even if the report was prepared after a final decision. This is because an agency may be in a continuing process of examining its standing policies and regulations. For example, in Mary Imogene Bassett Hospital v. Sullivan, 136 F.R.D. 42 (N.D.N.Y. 1991) , the hospital brought an action challenging the validity of regulations concerning Medicare reimbursement. The hospital sought six documents. Four documents were prepared while the challenged regulations were being drafted, and these were found predecisional. Two documents were drafted several years after the regulations were finalized, but the government argued that these documents were predecisional as well, because they were part of an "ongoing process of resolving policy issues that relate to the regulation." The Trial Judge noted the Supreme Court's view that "the line between predecisional documents and postdecisional documents may not always be a bright one," and that Lower Courts should be "wary of interfering" with an agency's "continuing process" of examining its policies. n173 The Judge examined the documents, and found that one of them merely dealt with "the application and implementation of the established policies in a given instance"; this document did not involve a reevaluation of an existing policy, but rather the simple implementation of existing policy to a certain fact situation. It was therefore postdecisional and unprotected by the privilege. The other document evaluated the challenged regulations and explored options in drafting new regulations on the point. This was found to be part of the agency's continuing process of evaluation and hence was predecisional. So, if a government document is crafted in terms of an ongoing review or critique of a final decision, it will be difficult for counsel to obtain it. On the other hand, if the document is merely implementing an unquestioned policy or directive, the deliberative process privilege will not apply.

Counsel seeking production of an internal government report must focus on the relationship between the author of the report and its recipient. If the report is traveling "upstream" from junior to senior official, then it is likely to have no binding effect and thus more likely to be considered predecisional. By contrast, a report traveling downstream "is far more likely to manifest decisionmaking authority and to be the denouement of the decisionmaking, rather than part of its give-and-take." n174

In determining whether government material is "deliberative," the Courts have applied a rough-hewn distinction between "opinion," which is protected, and "fact," which is not. The reasoning is that "the prospect of disclosure is less likely to make an adviser omit or fudge raw facts, while it is quite likely to have just such an effect" on the assertion of opinions. n175

Difficulties arise if a report contains both fact and opinion. It is possible that the report could be redacted, but this is only viable if the opinion and fact are segregable. As the Supreme Court has stated, "[M]emoranda consisting only of compiled factual material or purely factual material contained in deliberative memoranda and severable from its context would generally be available for discovery." n176 By negative implication, this means that if the factual material is so intertwined with the opinions and the process of judgment that it cannot be severed, then the factual material is privileged as well. n177

Facts can be within the deliberative process privilege if disclosure of the facts would also disclose the judgment or discretion that has been exercised in compiling the facts. For example, in Mapother v. Department of Justice, 3 F.3d 1533 (D.C. Cir. 1993) , the plaintiffs sought access to the "Waldheim Report." The Waldheim report was a 204-page report with twenty-six photographs attached, prepared by a DOJ attorney for use by the Attorney General in making his decision to exclude former Austrian President Kurt Waldheim from the United States and place him on a "watchlist" of excludable aliens. The report was clearly predecisional. But the plaintiffs argued that most of the report was not deliberative because it was essentially a compilation of facts about Waldheim's war activities. They contended that these statements of fact could be segregated from the conclusions and recommendations at the end of the report. The DOJ argued in response that the facts contained in the Waldheim report were the result of a process by which the DOJ attorney separated "the significant from the insignificant and the truthful from the untrue." Thus, according to the DOJ, disclosure of the facts in the report would reveal the thought process of the preparer -- what he thought would be most significant for the Attorney General to have before him.

The Court of Appeals in Mapother sided with the DOJ and concluded that a summary of factual material is ordinarily protected by the privilege. It reasoned that the process of separating relevant fact from irrelevant fact or rumor is a deliberative process, and that the privilege "was intended to protect not simply deliberative material, but also the deliberative process of agencies."

Most Courts have held, consistently with Mapother, that if the report is one that sifts through information, then the factual findings are privileged because their disclosure would expose the thought process of the official as to which facts were relevant. n178 Yet we think that this view is overbroad. It threatens to place a shroud over the government. We note that it is the rare government report that is a simple tabulation of unalloyed fact. The junior government official's job is usually to separate the relevant from the irrelevant -- to protect the busy and important senior official from having to look through "too much" information. If this winnowing-out process is considered deliberative, then virtually all predecisional reports are privileged. Such an expansive approach to the privilege is at odds with the axiom that privileges are in derogation of the search for truth and, as such, should be narrowly construed.

Unlike the state secrets privilege, the deliberative process privilege is, at least at this point, qualified rather than absolute -- though as discussed above, the Supreme Court's decision in Jaffee brings into question whether any privilege can be recognized as qualified rather than absolute. By "qualified," what is meant is that the information loses its protection if the government's need for secrecy is outweighed by the citizen's need for the information.

To determine whether the need for the evidence outweighs the government's interest in secrecy, most Courts apply a five-factor balancing test, taken from Judge Weinstein's opinion in In re Franklin National Bank Securities Litigation, 478 F. Supp. 577, 588 (E.D.N.Y. 1979) . Judge Weinstein found that the following factors should be balanced:

> (i) the relevance of the evidence sought to be protected; (ii) the availability of other evidence; (iii) the "seriousness" of the litigation and the issues involved; (iv) the role of the government in the litigation; and (v) the possibility of future timidity by government employees who will be forced to recognize that their secrets are violable. n179

Judge Weinstein's essential point is that the Court must assess the need for the information by the party seeking it (including its availability through reasonable alternatives), and whether the deliberative process will in fact be "chilled" in the future by disclosure today.

Walsh v. Chittenden Corp., 799 F. Supp. 405 (D. Vt. 1992) , provides an example of the balancing process leading to disclosure. The plaintiffs in a securities fraud litigation sought disclosure of examination reports prepared by the Vermont Department of Banking, Insurance and Securities. These reports concerned the allegedly unsafe and unsound banking practices by the defendant. The plaintiffs agreed that if they could obtain access to the reports, they would submit to a protective order under which the report would be used solely for purposes of the litigation and not disclosed to others, and that any confidential information filed with the Court would be under seal. But the Department nonetheless objected to disclosure even with these limits.

The Walsh Court found that the plaintiffs had a strong need for the evidence, because the plaintiffs would have to show that the defendant acted with scienter, and "information contained in the Department's records of Chittenden Corporation, probably unavailable elsewhere, may support the allegation of scienter." The Court recognized that in many cases, the government is the sole repository of information relevant to litigation.

The Walsh Court found that the plaintiffs' need for the evidence outweighed the governmental interests in secrecy and the integrity of the deliberative process. The Court noted that because of the confidentiality agreement between the parties, the public was unlikely to obtain access to the reports and thus there was no risk of a loss of public confidence in the bank review process. The moral of Walsh is that a party who agrees to some kind of tailored protective order is more likely to overcome the qualified deliberative process privilege than a party who refuses to compromise. n180

The government privileges are properly invoked only when asserted by a formal claim lodged by a high-level official of the department having control over the requested information -- many Courts require the invocation to be made by the actual head of the department. n181 Some Courts allow a qualified official to delegate his or her authority to claim the privilege, but only to a subordinate of high authority, and the delegation must be accompanied by specific guidelines on the use of the privilege. The assertion of the privilege must be based upon actual personal consideration of the facts by the relevant official. n182 It follows that the assertion of the privilege by a government attorney participating in the litigation is insufficient. n183 It also follows that the privilege cannot be invoked by a private litigant. n184 Finally, the agency claiming the privilege must provide "precise and certain" reasons for preserving the confidentiality of the information. n185

The reason for these formal procedural requirements is that the government privileges are in derogation of the search for truth, and are also in tension with the fundamental principle of access to government. As one Court has stated, the formal procedural requirements "are not merely technical requirements. Rather, their purpose is to insure that the privilege is claimed by someone in the executive branch with sufficient authority that the court can rely upon his judgment that the claim was prudently invoked." n186

Another government privilege is that protecting confidential communications to and by the President and the President's immediate advisers. The Supreme Court considered this privilege in United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974) . The Court found a qualified privilege to exist. The presidential communications privilege is analytically similar to the deliberative process privilege, but the former has been applied in the context of executive decisionmaking while the latter has been applied to agency decisionmaking. Moreover, the presidential privilege has been held to protect communications of purely factual information as well as deliberations. n187

A final government-based privilege is the law enforcement privilege. The law enforcement privilege is designed to protect informants and other confidential law enforcement activity, on the ground that disclosure would deter effective investigation. However, as the Supreme Court held in Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53 (1957) , the privilege will not apply where the state interest in the free flow of information is outweighed by an individual's right to prepare an effective defense. In Roviaro, the Court held that an informant's identity could not remain confidential where the informer was "the sole participant, other than the accused, in the transaction charged," and thus was "the only witness in a position to amplify or contradict the testimony of Government witnesses." n188 In contrast, the Court in United States v. Jenkins, 4 F.3d 1338 (6th Cir. 1993) , held that disclosure of an informant's identity was not required where the informant would simply have corroborated the testimony of the government's star witnesses.

In United States Dep't of Justice v. Landano, 508 U.S. 165 (1993) , the Supreme Court held that the government has the burden of establishing that an informant reported information to law enforcement officials with the expectation that his or her identity would be kept anonymous. Without such an expectation of anonymity, the privilege will not apply. The Court recognized, however, that the expectation need not be one of total and permanent anonymity. Obviously, an informant should reasonably anticipate that his identity would be disclosed if the matter ever went to trial. The Court stated: "A source should be deemed confidential if the source furnished information with the understanding that the FBI would not divulge the communication except to the extent the Bureau thought necessary for law enforcement purposes."

The Landano Court held that the government was not entitled to a presumption that all informants who report to law enforcement do so with an expectation of confidentiality. The Court explained: "It may be true that many, or even most, individual sources will expect confidentiality. But the Government offers no explanation, other than ease of administration, why that expectation should always be presumed."

The Court noted, however, that "more narrowly defined circumstances" may justify a presumption of expectation of confidentiality. As an example, the Court stated that "when circumstances such as the nature of the crime investigated and the witness' relation to it support an inference of confidentiality, the Government is entitled to a presumption." n189 The Court cited approvingly Parton v. United States Dep't of Justice, 727 F.2d 774 (8th Cir. 1984) , where prison officials who provided information to law enforcement about an attack on an inmate risked a "high probability of reprisal"; under those circumstances it was reasonable to presume those who made the report did so with the expectation that the report would not be disclosed to the community except when necessary for law enforcement purposes. And, of course, the privilege will apply if the government can demonstrate that the informer gave information on the express assurance that his identity would remain confidential until disclosure would become necessary at a criminal trial. n190

[8] Marital Privileges

Federal Courts have consistently recognized two separate privileges arising from the marital relationship. The adverse testimonial privilege prohibits testimony by one spouse against another in criminal cases; it is designed to protect marital harmony at the time the testimony is demanded and to protect a witness from the difficult choice of incriminating a spouse or going to jail for contempt. The confidential communications privilege prohibits disclosure, in civil and criminal cases, of confidential communications from one spouse to another; it is designed to protect and further marital intimacy as of the time the communication is made between the spouses. Notably, the original Advisory Committee's proposals included an adverse testimonial privilege, but did not include a privilege for confidential communications between spouses. As to the latter privilege, the Advisory Committee stated that it cannot "be assumed that marital conduct will be affected by a privilege for confidential communications of whose existence the parties in all likelihood are unaware." Yet Federal Courts have consistently recognized a privilege for confidential marital communications.

The different policies behind the two privileges result in substantially different application. In Trammel v. United States, 445 U.S. 40 (1980) , the Court held that the adverse testimonial privilege does not apply if the witness-spouse voluntarily takes the stand. This changed the previous Rule, under which the litigant had the right to keep his spouse off the stand. The Court's rationale was that "[w]hen one spouse is willing to testify against the other in a criminal proceeding -- whatever the motivation -- their relationship is almost certainly in disrepair; there is probably little in the way of marital harmony for the privilege to preserve." So, after Trammel, the witness-spouse cannot be compelled to give adverse testimony against the litigant-spouse, but if the witness-spouse chooses to testify, the adverse testimonial privilege is simply inapplicable. The privilege, as reconstituted by Trammel, is basically designed to protect the witness-spouse from an uncomfortable choice: to send a spouse to jail with incriminating testimony, or to go to jail herself for refusing to give incriminating testimony.

In contrast, the confidential communications privilege can be invoked by the litigant spouse to prevent disclosure of confidential communications between spouses made during the marriage, even if the other spouse is willing to testify. n191 This is because even if there is no marital harmony at the time of the testimony, the communicating spouse had the right to rely on marital intimacy at the time the confidential communication was made. n192 Consequently, where a spouse is willing to testify, he or she can generally testify about acts and nonconfidential communications, but not about confidential communications made during the marriage. n193 Like the privilege, the party asserting the privilege for confidential marital communications has the burden of showing that the communication was made with a reasonable expectation of confidentiality. n194

The adverse testimonial privilege does not apply if the witness and litigant are divorced or permanently separated at the time of the testimony. n195 Nor does the privilege apply to bar the introduction of a spouse's out-of-court statements under a hearsay exception. The reasoning is that the spouse is not being compelled to take the stand, and moreover, any damage to the marital relationship from a hearsay statement occurs at the time the spouse's out-of-court statement is made. n196

The adverse testimonial privilege does not apply if the marriage is a sham, i.e., if the parties married with the dominant intent of invoking the privilege. One Court, however, has held that the difficult proof problems that arise in determining a sham marriage warrant an exception to the adverse testimonial privilege for all premarital acts. n197 In fact, after Trammel the likelihood that a person will enter a sham marriage in order to invoke the privilege is remote. Under Trammel, the litigant-spouse has no right to keep the witness off the stand. Before Trammel, one could enter into a sham marriage secure in the knowledge that the "spouse" would never testify. But this is no longer the case.

The Federal Courts are split on the so-called "joint participants" exception to the adverse testimonial privilege. Some Courts have held that if the witness-spouse is a participant in the crime with which the litigant spouse is charged, then the witness is not entitled to invoke the privilege. The reasoning is that the marriage of persons jointly involved in crime is not worth protecting. n198 In Appeal of Koecher, 755 F.2d 1022 (2d Cir. 1985) , however, the Second Circuit rejected a joint participant exception to the adverse testimonial privilege. Judge Friendly, writing for the Court, reasoned that the exception would tend to swallow the Rule of privilege, because if the spouses have such a close relationship that one refuses to testify against the other, it is likely that they will also have some mutual involvement in the charged activity. n199 Therefore the joint participants exception would likely swallow the Rule.

The marital privilege for confidential communications focuses on the intent of the communicating spouse at the time of the communication. Consequently, the parties must be married at the time of the communication, but they need not be married at the time of trial. If the parties were divorced or permanently separated at the time of the communication, the privilege will not apply even if it was made in confidence. n200

Because the focus of the confidential communications privilege is on the intent of the communicating spouse, it follows that the privilege will not apply if the spouse is communicating in order to further a crime or fraud. Such a communication is no more worthy of protection than a similar statement made to an attorney. n201

Many Courts have, in apparent confusion, held that the confidential communications privilege is inapplicable where the spouses are joint participants in criminal activity. n202 While a joint participants exception may be applicable to the adverse testimonial privilege, which focuses on preservation of marital harmony at the time of the testimony (see the discussion of Koecher, supra), such an exception is not consistent with the rationale of the confidential communications privilege.

The confidential communications privilege is analogous to the attorney-client privilege, because it is communication-based. Like the privilege, there is good reason for a crime-fraud exception to the interspousal communications privilege. If the communication is in furtherance of crime or fraud, then it is not worthy of protection. However, a joint participant exception is not the same as a crime-fraud exception. The crime-fraud exception evaluates the intent behind the communication, while the joint participant exception looks solely to the status of the witness. n203 The distinction is important where one spouse makes a confession concerning a past event to a joint participant. Assuming that such a confession does not further a plan of crime or fraud, and was made in confidence, it should be protected by the confidential communications privilege. But it would not be protected under a joint participant exception. Conversely, if one spouse is using the other as a dupe in furtherance of a crime or fraud, the communications should not be protected by the privilege, even though it is questionable whether the duped spouse could be considered a joint participant in criminal activity.

Both the adverse testimonial privilege and the confidential communications privilege contain an exception for an action brought against a spouse for victimizing a family member. n204

[9] Parent-Child Privilege

While the interspousal privileges are well-established, Courts have refused to provide privilege similar protection for the parent-child relationship. Thus, a parent can be forced, on pain of contempt, to testify against her child, and vice-versa. n205 And neither a parent nor a child has the right to invoke a privilege for confidential communications made from one to the other. n206

It might be argued that after the Supreme Court's decision in Jaffee v. Redmond (see § 501.02[6]), which recognized a privilege for confidential statements made to psychotherapists and social workers, the Federal Courts should be more receptive to claims that the parent-child relationship is entitled to a privilege. But this has not been the case. In In re Grand Jury, 103 F.3d 1140 (3d Cir. 1997) , the Court refused to recognize either an adverse testimonial privilege or a confidential communications privilege for the parent-child relationship. The Court noted that even after Jaffee, privileges are to be strictly construed because they are in derogation of the search for truth. As to an adverse testimonial privilege, the Grand Jury Court considered it so costly to the search for truth that it was hardly worth discussing. As to a confidential communications privilege, the Court made the following points: (1) the overwhelming majority of Federal and State Courts have rejected a parent-child privilege for confidential communications; (2) unlike the psychotherapist-patient privilege recognized by the Supreme Court in Jaffee, the parent-child privilege was not included in the list of privileges submitted by the Advisory Committee and approved by the Supreme Court, and it is not generally accepted in the states; (3) it is unlikely that parents and children would even be aware of an evidentiary privilege, much less rely on the existence of a privilege in determining whether to confide in each other; (4) recognition of a parent-child privilege might prevent a parent from acting in the child's best interest in circumstances where it might be necessary to notify the authorities about the child's misconduct -- the parent would become a prisoner of the privilege; and (5) there are many questions about the scope of such a privilege (e.g., whether it applies only to unemancipated minors, whether it applies to step-parents, grandparents, etc.), which counsel deference to the legislature. The Court concluded: "Sympathy alone cannot justify the creation of a new and unprecedented privilege which does not meet the standards set by Congress, the Supreme Court and this court."

The Grand Jury Court's point on lack of reliance is a sound one; unlike the attorney-client relationship, where the attorney informs the client that information is privileged, a parent and child are ordinarily not aware of the rules of evidence when they are communicating. Moreover, even if parent and child know about the privilege, this knowledge will almost certainly not affect the parties' decision on whether to communicate. It is unlikely that a parent or child's thought process is so litigation-driven when they are deciding whether to share confidences. At least we can hope that it is not.

The real concern of supporters of a parent-child privilege is that forcing a parent to testify against the child, or the child against the parent, would ruin the relationship. Thus, Judge Mansmann, in her dissent in Grand Jury, notes that Roman law and ancient Jewish law "entirely barred family members from testifying against one another based on a desire to promote the solidarity and trust that support the family unit." Moreover, the parent or child witness, without a privilege, is put in a difficult situation. As Judge Mansmann put it: "[A] family member who is forced to testify against her will would face the unpleasant choice of aiding the criminal conviction of a loved one, perjuring herself on the stand, or risking a citation for contempt of court for refusing to testify."

Yet these arguments are really arguments for a broader privilege protecting a witness from being compelled to give any testimony adverse to a parent or child. They are not confidentiality-based. The harm to the parent-child relationship, the sense of betrayal, occurs when the parent testifies against the child, or vice versa, on any material fact. The trilemma of a parent or child witness -- testify and harm the relationship, don't testify and go to jail, or lie and go to jail -- is the same whether the negative information is a confidential communication or some other material fact. This raises the question whether a privilege against adverse parental or child testimony should be recognized instead of a confidential communications privilege. This broader privilege should not be lightly adopted, as it would be even more costly to the search for truth than a privilege protecting only confidences. On the other hand, one can certainly sympathize with the dilemma of a parent called to testify against his or her child, and vice-versa. Yet witnesses are often placed in a difficult situation during the course of litigation; they often have negative information about someone they love or like. Adverse testimony might well destroy friendships, business relationships, sexual relationships, and partner-associate relationships.

The question is whether the parent-child relationship is sufficiently special that it should be given protection from the harm caused by compelled adverse testimony. That is a difficult question for a Court to assess. In the end, the message of the Grand Jury majority is correct: where the existence of a privilege depends on sensitive social policy considerations, and difficult questions of scope, the whole matter is better left to the legislature.

The real protection against undue interference into the parent-child relationship comes from a proper exercise of prosecutorial discretion. If family relationships are abused in an attempt to obtain evidence, "the remedy lies not in the adoption of an exclusionary Rule, but instead in taking administrative or legal steps against those causing the abuse." n207

[10] Clergy-Communicant Privilege

Few members of the clergy are called to testify against those who have sought religious counseling from them. The cases rejecting privilege claims tend to involve clergy involved in nonreligious counseling. For example, in United States v. Dube, 820 F.2d 886 (7th Cir. 1987) , the Court refused to protect a statement made by the defendant to a pastor, where the defendant was seeking advice about his tax liability. The Court stated that "the taxpayer is not a penitent seeking spiritual relief from his sins, only a citizen seeking relief from his obligation to pay taxes." Where a communicant is seeking religious solace or counseling, the Courts have recognized a privilege. n208 Not only are the communications worthy of protection, but a rule requiring disclosure of confidential communications would put the cleric in an impossible position -- see, e.g., Montgomery Clift in I Confess.

[11] Trade Secrets Privilege

Proposed Rule 508 (set forth in Part Three of this Manual infra) appears to state the approach that Federal Courts have taken toward trade secrets. The privilege involves balancing the legitimate competitive interests of the privilege holder against someone else's need for evidence. Where possible, Courts try to provide access to evidence while simultaneously seeking to control what is done with the evidence. This can minimize the competitive harm associated with disclosure of business secrets. n209

In connection with the trade secrets privilege, one case to keep in mind is Kewanee Oil Co. v. Bicron Corp., 416 U.S. 470 (1974) . There, the Supreme Court held that the states may protect the kinds of intellectual property that may make up the subject matter of trade secrets, as long as state rules do not conflict with the operation of federal patent and copyright laws. The Court said that > [t]he subject of a trade secret must be secret, and must not be of public knowledge or of a general knowledge in the trade or business... . The protection accorded the trade secret holder is against the disclosure or unauthorized use of the trade secret by those to whom the secret has been confided under the express or implied restriction of nondisclosure or nonuse.

The Court analyzed the policies underlying patent law and the different considerations underlying trade secrets law and decided that "[c]ertainly the patent policy of encouraging invention is not disturbed by the existence of another form of incentive to invention." Moreover, the Court concluded that a trade secrets privilege is not inconsistent with the patent policy of encouraging disclosure of inventions to the public. Important to the Court's reasoning was the fact that "[t]rade secret law provides far weaker protection in many respects than the patent law." Presumably, a federal trade secrets privilege also would be consistent with federal patent policy.

[12] Tax Preparer Privilege

As discussed above, there is no privilege for accountants or tax preparers under common law. But Congress has established a limited privilege for confidential communications between tax preparers and clients. The IRS Restructuring and Reform Act added a new Section 7525 of the Internal Revenue Code, providing that "[w]ith respect to tax advice, the same common law protections of confidentiality which apply to a communication between a taxpayer and an attorney shall also apply to a communication between a taxpayer and any federally authorized tax practitioner [CPA, enrolled agent, enrolled actuary] to the extent that the communication would be considered a privileged communication if it were between a taxpayer and an attorney." This privilege applies only in noncriminal matters and only protects against disclosure to the IRS, not to other regulatory agencies or third parties in private actions. Tax shelter advice is not covered by this privilege.

[13] Journalist's Privilege

The Supreme Court held in Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972) , that the First Amendment does not guarantee the protection of a newsreporter's confidential sources. The Court in Branzburg (in a divided decision with Justice Powell casting the deciding vote in a concurring opinion) held that a journalist has no privilege to withhold from a grand jury information relevant to an investigation that was gained from confidential sources. n210 Despite continual assertions of a privilege, most Courts adhere to Branzburg and hold that a newsreporter can be compelled to disclose confidential sources if necessary to aid a criminal investigation or prosecution. Many Courts, however, appear to recognize a journalist's privilege outside the grand jury setting, and some go further and recognize a privilege even for nonconfidential information. Judge Posner, in McKevitt v. Pallasch, 339 F.3d 530 (7th Cir. 2003) , described the state of the law as follows:

> A large number of cases conclude, rather surprisingly in light of Branzburg, that there is a reporter's privilege, though they do not agree on its scope. See, e.g., In re Madden, 151 F.3d 125, 128-29 (3d Cir. 1998) ; United States v. Smith, 135 F.3d 963, 971 (5th Cir. 1998) ; Shoen v. Shoen, 5 F.3d 1289, 1292-93 (9th Cir. 1993) ; In re Shain, 978 F.2d 850, 852 (4th Cir. 1992) ; United States v. LaRouche Campaign, 841 F.2d 1176, 1181-82 (1st Cir. 1988) ; von Bulow v. von Bulow, 811 F.2d 136, 142 (2d Cir. 1987) ; United States v. Caporale, 806 F.2d 1487, 1504 (11th Cir. 1986) . A few cases refuse to recognize the privilege, at least in cases, which Branzburg was but this case is not, that involve grand jury inquiries. In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 5 F.3d 397, 402-03 (9th Cir. 1993) ; In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 810 F.2d 580, 584-86 (6th Cir. 1987) . ...
>
> Some of the cases that recognize the privilege, such as Madden, essentially ignore Branzburg; some treat the "majority" opinion in Branzburg as actually just a plurality opinion, such as Smith; some audaciously declare that Branzburg actually created a reporter's privilege, such as Shoen, and von Bulow v. von Bulow. The approaches that these decisions take to the issue of privilege can certainly be questioned. A more important point, however, is that the Constitution is not the only source of evidentiary privileges, as the Supreme Court noted in Branzburg with reference to the reporter's privilege itself. And while the cases we have cited do not cite other possible sources of the privilege besides the First Amendment and one of them, LaRouche, actually denies, though without explaining why, that there might be a federal common law privilege for journalists that was not based on the First Amendment, other cases do cut the reporter's privilege free from the First Amendment. See United States v. Cuthbertson, 630 F.2d 139, 146 n. 1 (3rd Cir. 1980) .
>
> ...
>
> Some cases that recognize a reporter's privilege suggest that it can sometimes shield information in a reporter's possession that comes from a nonconfidential source; in addition to the Madden, Schoen, and La Rouche cases cited above see Gonzales v. National Broadcasting Co., 194 F.3d at 33 ; United States v. Burke, 700 F.2d 70, 76, 78 (2d Cir. 1983) . Others disagree. United States v. Smith, supra ; In re Grand Jury Proceedings, supra. The cases that extend the privilege to nonconfidential sources express concern with harassment, burden, using the press as an investigative arm of government, and so forth.

> Since these considerations were rejected by Branzburg even in the context of a confidential source, these courts may be skating on thin ice.

Instead of recognizing a privilege either in the constitution or under common law, Judge Posner found the protections applicable to any demand for information to be sufficient:

> It seems to us that rather than speaking of privilege, courts should simply make sure that a subpoena duces tecum directed to the media, like any other subpoena duces tecum, is reasonable in the circumstances, which is the general criterion for judicial review of subpoenas. Fed. R. Crim. P. 17(c). We do not see why there need to be special criteria merely because the possessor of the documents or other evidence sought is a journalist. The approach we are suggesting has support in Branzburg itself, where the Court stated that "grand jury investigations if instituted or conducted other than in good faith, would pose wholly different issues for resolution under the First Amendment. Official harassment of the press undertaken not for purposes of law enforcement but to disrupt a reporter's relationship with his news sources would have no justification. Grand juries are subject to judicial control and subpoenas to motions to quash. We do not expect courts will forget that grand juries must operate within the limits of the First Amendment as well as the Fifth." 408 U.S. at 707 -08. n211

The journalist's privilege, if and where it exists, is a qualified privilege. Once the privilege is properly invoked, "the burden shifts to the requesting party to demonstrate a sufficiently compelling need for the journalist's materials to overcome the privilege." n212 The privilege is likely to be outweighed in libel cases, otherwise the privilege would be tantamount to immunity from suit. Again, the whole question of qualified privileges has been brought into doubt by Jaffee, where the Court held that the psychotherapist-patient privilege had to be absolute rather than qualified, otherwise it would be an uncertain privilege that is little better than none at all. The same question of uncertain applicability arises with a qualified newsreporter's privilege. On the other hand, if a newsreporter's privilege has to be absolute, it is far less likely that Courts will recognize it in the first place -- an absolute newsreporter's privilege may impose significant costs on people harmed by the media.

[14] Miscellaneous Privileges

As noted above, claims for new privileges have not fared well in the Federal Courts. Accountant-client, bank-depositor, and parent-child privilege claims are among those that have been rejected. n213 And, in University of Pennsylvania v. EEOC, 493 U.S. 182 (1990) , the Court refused to establish a privilege to protect the peer review process.

A handful of Courts have adopted a qualified privilege for self-critical analysis (also called the self-evaluation privilege), which protects internal reports prepared by an institution evaluating past performance of that institution. n214 The leading case is Bredice v. Doctors Hospital, Inc., 50 F.R.D. 249 (D.D.C. 1970) , in which the Court shielded from discovery a hospital investigation of a patient's death. The rationale for the privilege is that unimpeded self-criticism serves a social good that outweighs the cost of excluding the evidence. n215

Most Courts, however, have rejected the self-evaluation privilege as insufficiently compelling to overcome the costs to the search for truth. n216 The status of the self-evaluation privilege is questionable at best in light of EEOC, supra , where the Supreme Court rejected a peer review privilege; a privilege for self-critical analysis is similar, though not identical, to the peer-review privilege unanimously rejected by the Court.

At any rate, the privilege for self-critical analysis, assuming it exists, is inapplicable if the report is demanded by a government agency. The interest in expeditious administrative investigations outweighs any interest in unimpeded private investigation. n217

For a discussion of the scope of the federal Speech or Debate Clause, see United States v. Helstoski, 439 U.S. 1045

(1979) (barring any use of evidence of legislative votes); Hutchinson v. Proxmire, 439 U.S. 1066 (1979) (refusing to extend protection to press releases and newsletters to constituents); United States v. Gillock, 445 U.S. 360 (1980) (no common-law speech or debate privilege prohibits federal authorities from using evidence of legislative acts at the state level in federal prosecutions).

[15] In Camera Review

In United States v. Zolin, 491 U.S. 554 (1989) , the Supreme Court held that Rule 104(a) does not prohibit use of in camera review procedures when a District Court rules on privilege claims. The Court declined, however, to approve in camera review absent a threshold showing by the party opposing a privilege claim that such review is appropriate. It recognized (in the factual context of the crime-fraud exception to the privilege) that "[a] blanket rule allowing in camera review as a tool for determining the applicability of the crime-fraud exception ... would place the policy of protecting open and legitimate disclosure between attorneys and clients at undue risk." Accordingly, the Court ruled that > [b]efore engaging in in camera review to determine the applicability of the crime-fraud exception, the judge should require a showing of a factual basis adequate to support a good faith belief by a reasonable person, that in camera review of the materials may reveal evidence to establish the claim that the crime-fraud exception applies.

The Court added as follows:

> Once that showing is made, the decision whether to engage in in camera review rests in the sound discretion of the district court. The court should make that decision in light of the facts and circumstances of the particular case, including, among other things, the volume of the materials the district court has been asked to review, the relevant importance to the case of the alleged privileged information, and the likelihood that the evidence produced through in camera review, together, with other available evidence that is before the court, will establish that the crime-fraud exception does apply. The district court is also free to defer its in camera review if it concludes that additional evidence in support of the crime-fraud exception may be available that is not allegedly privileged, and that production of the additional evidence will not unduly disrupt or delay the proceedings.

The Court also held that "the party opposing the privilege may use any nonprivileged evidence in support of its request for in camera review, even if its evidence is not 'independent' of the contested communications... ." Thus, partial transcripts or other evidence that incompletely reflects the contents of contested communications may be considered by the District Court, even though it has not yet been determined whether the privilege should apply to such communications. The Supreme Court reasoned that "deterring the aggressive pursuit of third-party sources is not sufficiently central to the policies of the privilege to require us to adopt the exclusionary rule urged by respondents [who objected to reliance upon information that was derived from presumptively privileged communications]."

The "good faith belief" requirement of Zolin is applicable only when the party seeking the assertedly privileged information is asking the Court to consider that information as part of the submission. The Zolin Court was concerned that unlimited in camera review could impinge on the privilege, even though only the Court would have access to the assertedly privileged information. Where the party seeking the assertedly privileged information makes a submission solely on the basis of independent evidence, the privileged information is not at risk and therefore no "good faith belief" requirement is necessary. n218

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. Compare Testimony of Arthur Goldberg, Hearings on Rules of Evidence Before the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 93d Cong., 1st Sess., 142-158, with Ely, The Irrepressible Myth of Erie, 87 Harv. L. Rev. 693 (1974); see also Mishkin, Some Further Last Words on Erie -- The Thread, 87

Harv. L. Rev. 1682 (1974). Remember that the Federal Rules are "presumptively procedural" after Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460, 472 (1965) (finding no Erie violation as to Federal Rules covering "matters which, though falling within the uncertain area between substance and procedure, are rationally capable of classification as either").

(n2)Footnote 2. Obviously, if there is no conflict, then it does not matter which jurisdiction's privilege law will apply. See Sprague v. Thorn Americas, Inc., 129 F.3d 1355 (10th Cir. 1997) (state claims joined with federal claims in a federal question case; because both federal and Kansas law support the application of the attorney-client privilege,"we need not articulate an analytical solution here for conflicts in attorney-client privilege rules").

(n3)Footnote 3. Hancock v. Hobbs, 967 F.2d 462 (11th Cir. 1992) (applying federal rule of privilege to both federal and state claims, on the ground that the Federal Rules control federal claims, and "it would be impractical to apply two different rules of privilege to the same evidence before a single jury").

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., Hancock v. Dodson, 958 F.2d 1367 (6th Cir. 1992) (existence of pendent state claim did not relieve the Court of its obligation to apply the federal law of privilege); United States v. Prouse, 945 F.2d 1017 (8th Cir. 1991) (Minnesota statutory privilege against use of test result from employer's drug or alcohol testing program not applied due to Rule 501 instruction to apply federal common law to federal claims); von Bulow v. von Bulow, 811 F.2d 136 (2d Cir. 1987) (federal law controlled question of the existence of a journalist's privilege, in a case where state claims were joined with civil RICO claims); In re Combustion, Inc., 161 F.R.D. 51 (W.D. La. 1995) (holding that "the federal law of privilege provides the rule of decision with respect to privilege issues affecting the discoverability of evidence in this federal question case involving pendent state law claims"; this result is consistent with "the general policies of the federal rules favoring uniformity and simplicity"); Hansen v. Allen Mem. Hosp., 141 F.R.D. 115 (S.D. Iowa 1992) (a Federal Court in a claim arising under federal law with pendent state law claims need not apply a limited confidentiality privilege created solely under state law; the application of federal law to claims of state privilege in this context prevents the inconsistent application of state law privilege claims in the same case).

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383, 1980-81 Trade Cas. (CCH) P63797 (1981) ("An uncertain privilege, or one which purports to be certain but which results in widely varying applications, is little better than no privilege at all.").

(n6)Footnote 6. As discussed infra, Congress has from time to time proposed the codification of a few discrete privileges, but it has shown no interest in a general codification of the privilege rules.

(n7)Footnote 7. See 28 U.S.C. § 2072(b).

(n8)Footnote 8. In re Grand Jury Investigation, 918 F.2d 374, 380 (3d Cir. 1990) (adopting a clergy-penitent privilege and relying on the Advisory Committee's proposed rule). See also United States v. McPartlin, 595 F.2d 1321 (7th Cir. 1979) (applying the common interest rule of the attorney-client privilege, citing Proposed Rule 503(b)(3): "Although the Congress, in its revision of the Federal Rules of Evidence, deleted the detailed privilege rules ... the recommendations of the Advisory Committee, approved by the Supreme Court, are a useful guide to the federal courts in their development of a common law of evidence.").

(n9)Footnote 9. Trammel v. United States, 445 U.S. 40 (1980) .

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 103 F.3d 1140 (3d Cir. 1997) (rejecting a parent-child privilege and noting that the interests that would be protected by such a privilege do not overcome the heavy presumption against establishing new privileges and the strong interests in admitting relevant evidence: "privileges are tolerable only to the very limited extent that permitting a refusal to testify or excluding relevant evidence has a public good transcending the normally predominant principle of utilizing all rational means for ascertaining truth").

(n11)Footnote 11. United States v. Frederick, 182 F.3d 496 (7th Cir. 1999) (no accountant-client privilege under federal law); William T. Thompson Co. v. General Nutrition Corp., 671 F.2d 100 (3d Cir. 1982) .

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., Patterson v. Caterpillar, Inc., 70 F.3d 503 (7th Cir. 1995) (rejecting doctor-patient privilege); United States v. Bercier, 848 F.2d 917 (8th Cir. 1988) (rejecting doctor-patient privilege; collecting cases).

(n13)Footnote 13. United States v. Holmes, 594 F.2d 1167 (8th Cir. 1979) .

(n14)Footnote 14. See, e.g., Walker v. Huie, 142 F.R.D. 497 (D. Utah 1992) (communications between union member and nonlawyer union representative, during disciplinary proceedings, are not privileged: "While counseling at police disciplinary hearings is important, it simply does not rise to the level of the special relationships heretofore protected by the federal common law of privileges.").

(n15)Footnote 15. See also ACLU v. Finch, 638 F.2d 1336 (5th Cir. 1981) (noting a "special danger in permitting state governments to define the scope of their own privilege when the misconduct of their agents is alleged").

(n16)Footnote 16. See Developments in the Law: Privileged Communications, 98 Harv. L. Rev. 1450 (1985) (arguing that privileges are established by lawyers, so that it is not surprising that there is an aggressively enforced attorney-client privilege, but no accountant-client privilege). See also Thornburgh, Sanctifying Secrecy: The Mythology of the Corporate Attorney-Client Privilege, 69 Notre Dame L. Rev. 157 (1993) (arguing that the attorney-client privilege gives unjustified protection to entrenched interests); Zacharias, Rethinking Confidentiality, 74 Iowa L.Rev. 351 (1989) (criticizing the attorney-client privilege as a means of driving up lawyer fees, because clients pay a premium so that they can obtain a privilege for their communications, even though non-lawyers may be able to provide similar services more cheaply).

(n17)Footnote 17. See 8 Wigmore, Evidence § 2292 at 554 (McNaughton rev. 1961).

(n18)Footnote 18. See, e.g., In re Feldberg, 862 F.2d 622, 626 (7th Cir. 1988) ("A business that gets marketing advice from a lawyer does not acquire a privilege in the bargain; so too a business that obtains the services of a records custodian from a member of the bar.").

(n19)Footnote 19. See, e.g., In re Grand Jury Subpoena, Peek, 682 F. Supp. 1552, 1556 (M.D. Ga. 1987) (personal loan transaction between attorney and another person is not privileged: "Otherwise, everything that a lawyer does for himself or herself would be cloaked with a privilege just because he or she is a lawyer."); SCM Corp. v. Xerox Corp., 70 F.R.D. 508, 515, 1976-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P61207 (D. Conn. 1976) ("Legal departments are not citadels in which public, business or technical information may be placed to defeat discovery and thereby ensure confidentiality.").

(n20)Footnote 20. See, e.g., United States v. Frederick, 182 F.3d 496 (7th Cir. 1999) ("There is no common law accountant's or tax preparer's privilege, and a taxpayer must not be allowed, by hiring a lawyer to do the work that an accountant, or other tax preparer, or the taxpayer himself or herself, normally would do, to obtain greater protection from government investigators than a taxpayer who did not use a lawyer as his tax preparer would be entitled to do. To rule otherwise would be to impede tax investigations, reward lawyers for doing nonlawyers' work, and create a privileged position for lawyers in competition with other tax preparers -- and to do all this without promoting the legitimate aims" of the privilege); In re Schroeder, 842 F.2d 1223, 1224 (11th Cir. 1987) ("Courts generally have held that the preparation of tax returns does not constitute legal advice within the scope of the privilege.").

(n21)Footnote 21. United States v. Rockwell Int'l, 897 F.2d 1255 (3d Cir. 1990) .

(n22)Footnote 22. See, e.g., Simon v. G.D. Searle & Co., 816 F.2d 397 (8th Cir. 1987) (minutes of business meetings attended by attorneys are not automatically privileged); Misek-Falkoff v. International Bus. Machs. Corp., 144 F.R.D. 48 (S.D.N.Y. 1992) (corporate minutes did not indicate that legal, rather than business, advice was given, and the privilege did not apply merely because an attorney's name was included in the minutes).

(n23)Footnote 23. See, e.g., Simon v. G.D. Searle & Co., 816 F.2d 397 (8th Cir. 1987) (document of risk management department, compiling aggregate risk management figures for pending litigation, was prepared for business planning purpose -- to assess company's total possible liability -- and passing it to an attorney does not create a privilege).

(n24)Footnote 24. See, e.g., United States v. Tedder, 801 F.2d 1437 (4th Cir. 1986) (the defendant's admission of perjury to a fellow associate in his law firm was not privileged where the evidence indicated that the associate was consulted as a friend and not as a legal adviser; associate was not a criminal attorney, the conversation occurred in informal circumstances, no notes were taken, and the defendant asked for no advice); United States v. Fisher, 692 F. Supp. 488 (E.D. Pa. 1988) (general conversation about the effect of a conviction upon holding union office, where no legal advice was sought, was just a conversation among friends; since the attorney was not consulted in a legal capacity, statements made to him were not privileged). See also United States v. Alexander, 287 F.3d 811 (9th Cir. 2002) (client threatened to injure an attorney appointed to represent him; the threats were not privileged as they were not made in order to obtain legal advice).

(n25)Footnote 25. United States v. Johnston, 146 F.3d 785 (10th Cir. 1998) (lawyer's communications to his client's drug suppliers was not privileged; the lawyer was simply relaying a message from the client); In re Grand Jury Testimony of Attorney X, 621 F. Supp. 590 (E.D.N.Y. 1985) (information respecting a grand jury investigation given to the attorney from a third party and relayed by the attorney to his client is not privileged, since the attorney is not acting as a legal adviser but rather as a conduit for information). Compare United States v. Bauer, 132 F.3d 504 (9th Cir. 1997) (lawyer's communications to client instructing him that the client was signing a bankruptcy petition under penalty of perjury was privileged; the lawyer was not simply acting as the Court's messenger, but rather was delivering legal advice; moreover, the lawyer's communication would disclose communications from the client concerning the import of signing the petition).

(n26)Footnote 26. See, e.g., United States v. Huberts, 637 F.2d 630 (9th Cir. 1980) (no privilege where attorney's role was simply to oversee the sale of equipment).

(n27)Footnote 27. See, e.g., SCM Corp. v. Xerox Corp., 70 F.R.D. 508, 1976-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P61207 (D. Conn. 1976) .

(n28)Footnote 28. See In re Feldberg, 862 F.2d 622, 627 (7th Cir. 1988) :

> Most corporate records custodians are not lawyers. Answers to questions such as "where did you look for the documents?" will not reveal legal advice. ... Since questions about the adequacy of the search do not entail legal advice, the topic is not off limits just because an attorney plays a role.

(n29)Footnote 29. In re Feldberg, 862 F.2d at 627 :

> It is easy for a firm such as World Sports to hire an attorney to render advice on all legal matters while hiring a clerk to look through the records. The categories would merge if the clerk should find a questionable document, leading the firm to inquire of the lawyer whether the document fell within the scope of the subpoena (and whether, if it did, it had to be produced). Perhaps some of the conversations in this case were of that character, and if so they are privileged.

(n30)Footnote 30. See also United States v. Landof, 591 F.2d 36 (9th Cir. 1978) (party asserting the privilege has the burden of establishing that the communication was protected).

(n31)Footnote 31. See, e.g., In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum, 731 F.2d 1032 (2d Cir. 1984) (communications concerning a proposed corporate reorganization were primarily for the purpose of obtaining legal advice, even though the reorganization was proposed for business purposes); United States v. IBM, 66 F.R.D. 206, 212-13 (S.D.N.Y. 1974) (the test is whether the element of legal advice predominates; even legal advice may not be privileged if it is only incidental to business advice).

(n32)Footnote 32. See, e.g., In re Allen, 106 F.3d 582 (4th Cir. 1997) (attorney's factual investigation was privileged; the question is not whether the attorney was retained to conduct an investigation, but rather whether the investigation was related to the rendition of legal services); Pritchard-Keang Nam Corp. v. Jaworski, 751 F.2d 277 (8th Cir. 1984) ("The [attorney's] report resulted from the [corporation's] efforts to investigate allegations of prior misconduct. Allowing disclosure of the report could deter such inquiries, which should not be chilled as a matter of public policy.").

(n33)Footnote 33. See, e.g., Winchester Capital Mgt. Co., v. Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co., 144 F.R.D. 170 (D. Mass. 1992) (communications between a corporate attorney and a corporate consultant were privileged, where the consultant provided the attorney with necessary factual information and advice attendant to the drafting of an opinion letter); Golden Trade v. Lee Apparel Co., 143 F.R.D. 514 (S.D.N.Y. 1992) (communications with a patent agent assisting the attorney in the patent application process are protected by the attorney-client privilege). For a discussion of the relationship of lawyers and psychiatrists, see Saltzburg, Privileges and Professionals: Lawyers and Psychiatrists, 66 Va. L. Rev. 597 (1980).

(n34)Footnote 34. United States v. Adlman, 68 F.3d 1495 (2d Cir. 1995) (where the evidence showed that the corporate client, and not the corporate lawyer, retained an accountant for tax advice, the communications between the accountant and the lawyer were not privileged).

(n35)Footnote 35. United States v. Kovel, 296 F.2d 918 (2d Cir. 1961) (the privilege extends to communications by an attorney's client to an accountant hired by the attorney to assist the attorney in understanding the client's financial information).

(n36)Footnote 36. See, e.g., United States v. Robinson, 121 F.3d 971 (5th Cir. 1997) (written notice that was discoverable in the defendant's hands "did not become less so" when transferred by the defendant to his lawyer); In re Grand Jury, 959 F.2d 1158 (2d Cir. 1992) (telephone records transmitted to the attorney from the client are not privileged, since the records are preexisting documents, not attorney-client communications); United States Postal Service v. Phelps Dodge Refining Corp., 852 F.Supp. 156 (E.D.N.Y. 1994) (correspondence between corporate agents does not become privileged simply because counsel is sent copies).

(n37)Footnote 37. See, e.g., United States v. Sayan, 968 F.2d 55 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (statement by an accountant that, based on his conversation with the client, she was a "sly fox," did not breach the privilege; the accountant was covered by the attorney-client privilege because his services were necessary to further the attorney's representation; still, the testimony did not breach the privilege because it was merely based on observations, not the content of any communications).

(n38)Footnote 38. See, e.g., United States v. Hatcher, 323 F.3d 666 (8th Cir. 2003) (jailhouse conversations between inmates and counsel were not privileged because the parties were aware that their conversations were being recorded); Reed v. Baxter, 134 F.3d 351 (6th Cir. 1998) ("It is clear that the attorney-client privilege will not shield from disclosure statements made by a client to his or her attorney in the presence of a third party"); United States v. Gann, 732 F.2d 714, 723 (9th Cir. 1984) (no privilege where the defendant was speaking to his attorney while officers were searching his house; because "Gann knew, or should have known, that third parties were present, his attorney-client privilege claim must fail").

(n39)Footnote 39. See, e.g., United States v. Hubbard, 16 F.3d 694 (6th Cir. 1994) (information was not protected by the privilege because what the client communicated was to be conveyed to the bankruptcy trustee and the Court via a written pleading; thus, there was no expectation of confidentiality).

(n40)Footnote 40. See, e.g., In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 33 F.3d 342 (4th Cir. 1994) (information used by counsel to prepare SEC filings was not privileged, since all that was revealed were matters communicated to the attorneys "for their use in connection with public disclosures, which made the communications and data underlying them non-privileged under the relevant case law").

(n41)Footnote 41. See, e.g., United States v. (Under Seal), 748 F.2d 871 (4th Cir. 1984) (communications were not privileged where they were to be used by the attorney to prepare a public document, and where the client did not impose a conditional limitation on the disclosure of the information).

(n42)Footnote 42. See, e.g., In re von Bulow, 828 F.2d 94 (2d Cir. 1987) (privilege was waived as to communications set forth in a book written by the attorney and promoted by the client).

(n43)Footnote 43. See generally Capra, The Attorney-Client Privilege in Common Representations, 20 Trial Law. Q. 20 (1989); Kopta, Applying the Attorney-Client and Work Product Privileges to Allied Party Exchange of Information in California, 36 UCLA L. Rev. 151 (1988).

(n44)Footnote 44. See Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383 (1981) (privilege exists to protect "the giving of information to the lawyer to enable him to give sound and informed advice").

(n45)Footnote 45. See Welles, A Survey of Attorney-Client Privilege in Joint Defense, 35 U. Miami L. Rev. 321 (1981) (discussing the benefits of information-pooling).

(n46)Footnote 46. See In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum, 406 F. Supp. 381, 388 (S.D.N.Y. 1975) :

The layman's course through litigation must be evened by the assurance that he may, without penalty, invest his confidence in a professional counsellor. That assurance is no less important or appropriate where a cooperative program of joint defense is helpful ... to form and inform the representation of clients whose attorneys are each separately retained.

(n47)Footnote 47. In re LTV Sec. Litig., 89 F.R.D. 595, 604 (N.D. Tex. 1981) .

(n48)Footnote 48. See Cavallaro v. United States, 284 F.3d 236 (1st Cir. 2002) ("One cannot create a privilege, where previously there was none, simply by introducing a third party (with or without a common interest) into the circle within which documents are shared."). See also Kopta, Applying the Attorney-Client and Work Product Privileges to Allied Party Exchange of Information in California, 36 UCLA L. Rev. 151, 197 (1988) ("The analysis begins as it always has: All attorney client communications ... must satisfy existing requirements before they become or remain privileged. Once these requirements are satisfied, exchanged or jointly created material must pass an additional test: attorney-client communications must be disclosed pursuant to a common interest.").

(n49)Footnote 49. See, e.g., In re Regents of Univ. of California, 101 F.3d 1386 (Fed. Cir. 1996) (common interest doctrine applies to protect legal advice and communications between a patent applicant or patentee and attorneys of its optionee/licensee).

(n50)Footnote 50. See, e.g., Schachar v. American Academy of Opthalmology, Inc., 106 F.R.D. 187, 1985-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P66681 (N.D. Ill. 1985) (the exchange of confidences among coplaintiffs sharing a common interest is protected from disclosure).

(n51)Footnote 51. See, e.g., United States v. Schwimmer, 892 F.2d 237 (2d Cir. 1989) (common interest doctrine applied where the communications were made to prepare for a government investigation that could lead to indictment of two clients).

(n52)Footnote 52. See also SCM Corp. v. Xerox Corp., 70 F.R.D. 508, 513 (D. Conn. 1976) ("The privilege need not be limited to legal consultations ... in litigation situations. ... [Clients] should be encouraged to seek legal advice in planning their affairs to avoid litigation as well as in pursuing it."). But see In re Santa Fe Int'l Corp., 272 F.3d 705

(5th Cir. 2001) (communications made with common interest to protect against antitrust liability were not protected by the common interest doctrine because there was no litigation that was imminent).

(n53)Footnote 53. See United States v. Schwimmer, 892 F.2d 237 (2d Cir. 1989) (common interest protection exists where a party communicates with a codefendant's counsel, even though the communicating party's counsel was not present).

(n54)Footnote 54. See Kopta, Applying the Attorney-Client and Work Product Privileges to Allied Party Exchange of Information in California, 36 UCLA L. Rev. 151, 173 (1988):

> A client who directly confides in an allied lawyer in furtherance of a common interest ... is divulging confidences to, in effect, his lawyer to facilitate his legal representation. For that purpose and within the limited confines of the common interests of both clients, the allied lawyer should be considered the allied client's attorney.

(n55)Footnote 55. United States v. Bay State Ambulance & Hosp. Rent. Serv., 874 F.2d 20, 29 (1st Cir. 1989) .

(n56)Footnote 56. See, e.g., United States v. Gotti, 771 F. Supp. 535, 545 (E.D.N.Y. 1991) ("The defendants would extend the application of the joint defense privilege to conversations among the defendants themselves even in the absence of any attorney during the course of those conversations. Such an extension is supported neither in law nor in logic and is rejected.").

(n57)Footnote 57. See, e.g., Hunydee v. United States, 355 F.2d 183 (9th Cir. 1965) (husband and wife were represented by separate counsel due to the likelihood that their interests would conflict in a criminal prosecution; at a joint meeting, the husband made statements with respect to pleading guilty; these statements were held privileged, since they dealt with a matter of common interest between the parties -- whether the husband should plead guilty to avoid prosecution of the wife).

(n58)Footnote 58. See also Eisenberg v. Gagnon, 766 F.2d 770 (3d Cir. 1985) (statements by one defendant about another more culpable defendant are privileged; even though the defendants' interests are partially adverse, the communication dealt with a matter on which the defendants shared a common purpose).

(n59)Footnote 59. See, e.g., United States v. Bay State Ambulance & Hosp. Rent. Serv., 874 F.2d 20, 29 (1st Cir. 1989) (even though parties shared similar interests, the common interest privilege did not apply where the parties had not agreed to pursue a joint defense and the information was imparted without intent to further the joint defense); In re Grand Jury Subpoena: Under Seal, 415 F.3d 333 (4th Cir. 2005) (communications made by corporate agent to corporate counsel were not privileged as to the corporate agent; even if the agent was pursuing a common interest with the corporation, the communications were made before the parties agreed on a common defense).

(n60)Footnote 60. See, e.g., United States v. Furst, 886 F.2d 558 (3d Cir. 1989) (no common interest privilege where the defendant was called into the office to explain himself to new associates; the meeting was adversarial, and concerned matters that directly involved the defendant and not the other members at the meeting: "It was not a meeting at which the participants consulted with an attorney as to how to approach a common problem.").

(n61)Footnote 61. United States v. Schwimmer, 892 F.2d 237 (2d Cir. 1989) .

(n62)Footnote 62. See, e.g., United States v. Weissman, 195 F.3d 96 (2d Cir. 1999) (rejecting the defendant's argument that there was an implied joint defense agreement in place when he communicated with other corporate officials; at the time of the communications, the officials did not know that the defendant had acted unlawfully, so there was no cooperative effort to assist him in his defense at that point); In re Bevill, Bresler & Schulman Asset Mgt. Corp., 805 F.2d 120 (3d Cir. 1986) (statements by a corporate official to the attorney for the corporation were not covered by the common interest privilege; the official made no showing that, at the time of the communication, the corporation had agreed with him to pursue a joint defense strategy).

(n63)Footnote 63. See also In re Colocotronis Tanker Sec. Litig., 449 F. Supp. 828 (S.D.N.Y. 1978) (banks that were participants in a loan of a lead bank could not invoke the common interest rule with respect to communications made to the lead bank's attorney; no showing was made that a common defense was ever instituted or agreed upon by the participant banks and the lead bank, even though the participants paid part of the lead bank's attorney's fees in litigation respecting the loan).

(n64)Footnote 64. See United States v. Lopez, 777 F.2d 543 (10th Cir. 1985) (communications at a meeting between codefendants were not privileged, where the parties maintained potentially adverse interests, and no showing was made that the purpose of the meeting was to plan a joint defense).

(n65)Footnote 65. See, e.g., United States v. Schwimmer, 892 F.2d 237 (2d Cir. 1989) (applying common interest doctrine even though the parties had no written agreement to pursue a common interest).

(n66)Footnote 66. See Wilson, Using the Joint Defense Privilege, Nat'l L.J., March 14, 1983, at 13:

> It is therefore important at the outset to state clearly that the communications that will occur are in the interests of a joint effort, and to establish that each of the parties understands that his statements are being made within the context and in furtherance of a joint defense. Irreversible damage can occur at the first meeting of counsel if the requisite precautions are not taken.

For a good example of a common interest agreement, see the Report of the Committee on Professional Responsibility of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, Ethical Implications of Joint Defense/Common Interest Agreements, 51 Record of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York 115 (1996).

(n67)Footnote 67. See, e.g., In re Shopping Carts Antitrust Litig., 1984-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) & 65,823, at 67,451 (S.D.N.Y. 1983) (common interest privilege rejected where no written agreement had been made: "normally, when a joint defense is conducted in substantial litigation by competent and experienced counsel ... the co-defendants memorialize an agreement in writing which specifically addresses the issue of privileged communications of confidential materials, before any such data is surrendered.").

(n68)Footnote 68. See, e.g., United States v. Furst, 886 F.2d 558 (3d Cir. 1989) ("The meeting concerned matters which directly involved only Furst and not the other participants at the meeting ..."; the common interest privilege was inapplicable); United States v. Cariello, 536 F. Supp. 698, 702 (D.N.J. 1982) ("Palmieri did not communicate his desire to testify as part of a joint strategy of all defendants but simply in furtherance of his own defense.").

(n69)Footnote 69. See, e.g., Simpson v. Motorists Mut. Ins. Co., 494 F.2d 850 (7th Cir. 1974) (statements made by an insurer defending an insured can later be used by the insured in an action against the insurer for disclaimed coverage).

(n70)Footnote 70. See Uelmen, The Joint Defense Privilege: Know the Risks, 14 Litig. 35, 38 (Summer, 1988):

> This kind of agreement can be very helpful, but you may not be able to get it. Few lawyers would agree to a broad waiver of any civil actions against other signatories. Ultimately, how much you seek in a written agreement depends on how much you trust or mistrust your prospective allies.

(n71)Footnote 71. See, e.g., In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 406 F. Supp. 381 (S.D.N.Y. 1975) (statements made by a former CEO while the CEO and the corporation pursued a common interest cannot later be used by the government, even though the corporation subsequently sued the CEO; only those parties who were pursuing a common interest at the time the statements were made can later use the statements).

(n72)Footnote 72. As the Court stated in In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 406 F. Supp. 381, 394 (S.D.N.Y. 1975) : "How well could a joint defense proceed in the light of each co-defendant's knowledge that any one of the others might trade resultant disclosures to third parties as the price of his own exoneration or for the satisfaction of a personal animus?"

(n73)Footnote 73. See also United States v. Henke, 222 F.3d 633 (9th Cir. 2000) (defendant entered into joint defense agreement and then one of them made a deal and testified for the government; at trial defense counsel conducted no cross-examination of the witness, for fear that the examination would lead to inquiries into material covered by the common interest privilege; the Court reversed the defendants' convictions on the ground that counsel was operating under a conflict of interest that impaired the representation).

(n74)Footnote 74. Wheat v. United States, 486 U.S. 153 (1988) (upholding disqualification of counsel who had previously represented a government witness, despite the defendant's waiver).

(n75)Footnote 75. Ethical Implications of Joint Defense/Common Interest Agreements, 51 The Record of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York 115, 121 (1996).

(n76)Footnote 76. United States v. Almeida, 341 F.3d 1318 (11th Cir. 2003) (cooperating witness "does not get the benefit of the attorney-client privilege").

(n77)Footnote 77. See, e.g., In re Auclair, 961 F.2d 65 (5th Cir. 1992) (where three people go to an attorney on a matter that concerns them all, in order to determine whether the attorney can represent them all, the preliminary discussions with the attorney are presumptively protected under the common interest doctrine).

(n78)Footnote 78. See, e.g., In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 33 F.3d 1060 (9th Cir. 1994) (upholding a judgment of contempt resulting from an attorney's refusal to produce records pertaining to fee information and fee arrangements with a client; while that information might have indicated that the client retained the attorney to represent him in a grand jury investigation, this fact did not "in and of itself reveal any confidential information"); United States v. Olano, 62 F.3d 1180 (9th Cir. 1995) (no privilege where the testimony provided "only general descriptions of the work" that the lawyer performed; the lawyer did not disclose the defendant's "motives, strategies or goals").

(n79)Footnote 79. For more on this topic, see Capra, Deterring the Formation of the Attorney-Client Relationship: Disclosure of Client Identity, Payment of Fees, and Communications by Fiduciaries, 4 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 235 (1990).

(n80)Footnote 80. See also United States v. Leventhal, 961 F.2d 936 (11th Cir. 1992) (information concerning payment of more than $10,000 cash from a client to an attorney is not privileged, and can be obtained through enforcement of an IRS summons; fee arrangements and disclosure of the identity of the client are part of the preliminaries and incidents of the representation, and in the absence of extraordinary circumstances, they do not satisfy the requirement of the privilege that a communication must be made in the course of seeking legal advice); In re Grand Jury Matter No. 91-01386, 969 F.2d 995 (11th Cir. 1992) (identity of a client who paid the attorney with counterfeit bills held not privileged, where disclosure of identity "will not provide the government with a necessary link to, or revelation of, any confidential matters which fall within the attorney-client privilege"; disclosure of identity will only link the client with a payment by counterfeit money,"which is not a communication at all"); Tornay v. United States, 840 F.2d 1424 (9th Cir. 1988) (fee information not privileged as it is not a communication necessary to further legal advice).

(n81)Footnote 81. See, e.g., In re Subpoenaed Grand Jury Witness, 171 F.3d 511 (7th Cir. 1999) (fee payment and client identity privileged where "disclosure of this information would identify a client of Hagen's who is potentially involved in a targeted criminal activity which, on this record, would lead to revealing that client's motive to pay the legal bills for some of Hagen's other clients"). Compare Clarke v. American Commerce Nat'l Bank, 974 F.2d 127 (9th Cir. 1992) (billing statements containing information on the identity of the client, the case name for which the fee was paid, and the general nature of the services performed, are not protected by the attorney-client privilege; nothing in the statements reveals research or litigation strategy, or otherwise discloses the motive of the client in seeking representation); Vingelli v. United States, 992 F.2d 449 (2d Cir. 1993) (benefactor payment made by an attorney on behalf of a client is not privileged; the fact that the attorney made a benefactor payment does not indicate why the client may have sought the attorney's advice).

(n82)Footnote 82. See, e.g., United States v. Liebman, 742 F.2d 807 (3d Cir. 1984) (where the substance of a communication was already known, but not the identity of the communicator, then disclosure of identity would be tantamount to disclosure of a privileged communication).

(n83)Footnote 83. See, e.g., United States v. Blackman, 72 F.3d 1418 (9th Cir. 1995) (upholding an order enforcing an IRS summons requiring an attorney to identify a client paying more than $10,000 in cash and the nature of the services rendered in exchange for the cash: "We have repeatedly held that the attorney-client privilege does not apply where disclosure might incriminate the client or fee-payer, but only where it would convey information tantamount to a confidential communication."). The Blackman Court declared itself "hard pressed" to imagine a case in which the receipt of fees could be so intertwined with the subject of the representation as to obviate compliance with Treasury Department reporting requirements.

(n84)Footnote 84. See, e.g., American Std. Inc. v. Pfizer Inc., 828 F.2d 734, 745 (Fed. Cir. 1987) (opinion letter on the invalidity of another's patent was not privileged because "it did not reveal, directly or indirectly, the substance of the confidential communication"); In re Fischel, 557 F.2d 209 (9th Cir. 1977) (attorney's summaries of the client's business transactions with third parties were held not privileged because they did not reveal confidential client communications).

(n85)Footnote 85. See, e.g., United States v. (Under Seal), 748 F.2d 871, 874 (4th Cir. 1984) ("Because the privilege protects the substance of communications, it may also be extended to protect communications by the lawyer to his client, agents, or superiors or to other lawyers in the case of joint representation, if those communications reveal confidential client communications.").

(n86)Footnote 86. See Sprague v. Thorn Americas, Inc., 129 F.3d 1355 (10th Cir. 1997) (holding that any confidential communication from an attorney to the client in the course of giving legal advice is protected by the privilege).

(n87)Footnote 87. See, e.g., United States v. Amerada Hess Corp., 619 F.2d 980 (3d Cir. 1980) ("Legal advice or opinion from an attorney to his client, individual or corporate, has consistently been held by the federal courts to be within the protection of the privilege."); In re LTV Sec. Litig., 89 F.R.D. 595, 602 (N.D. Tex. 1981) (attorney-client privilege "protects from forced disclosure any communication from an attorney to his client when made in the course of giving legal advice").

(n88)Footnote 88. See, e.g., United States v. Ackert, 169 F.3d 136 (2d Cir. 2001) (no privilege where attorney obtained information from someone outside the attorney-client relationship; the fact that the information was critical to the attorney's legal representation did not make it privileged); United States v. Bonnell, 483 F. Supp. 1070 (D. Minn. 1979) (information obtained through sources other than the client held not privileged).

(n89)Footnote 89. For a critique of Upjohn, see Saltzburg, Corporate and Related Attorney-Client Privilege Claims: A Suggested Approach, 12 Hofstra L. Rev. 279 (1984).

(n90)Footnote 90. See, e.g., Admiral Ins. Co. v. United States Dist. Ct., 881 F.2d 1486 (9th Cir. 1989) (Upjohn held that "the privilege applies to communications by any corporate employee regardless of position when the communications concern matters within the scope of the employee's corporate duties and the employee is aware that the information is being furnished to enable the attorney to provide legal advice to the corporation").

(n91)Footnote 91. Id. (rejecting the claim that Upjohn would not apply if the corporate employee was employed by a subsidiary and spoke to an attorney for the parent corporation; noting that Upjohn rejected a mechanistic approach to applications of the attorney-client privilege in the corporate context).

(n92)Footnote 92. See, e.g., In re Coordinated Pretrial Proceedings, 658 F.2d 1355, 1981-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P64323, 1981-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P64323 (9th Cir. 1981) ("Former employees, as well as current employees, may possess the relevant information needed by corporate counsel to advise the client with respect to actual or potential difficulties."); In re Allen, 106 F.3d 582 (4th Cir. 1997) (statement made by former employee was privileged where the former employee was directed to speak to corporate counsel and the communication was about a matter within the scope of the former employment).

(n93)Footnote 93. See, e.g., Admiral Ins. Co. v. United States Dist. Ct., 881 F.2d 1486 (9th Cir. 1989) (no "hardship" exception to the attorney-client privilege).

(n94)Footnote 94. See also In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 274 F.3d 563 (1st Cir. 2001) (corporate agent has personal privilege only if this was clearly understood by corporate counsel and only if the communications concern the agent's personal liability; no common interest pursued).

(n95)Footnote 95. See, e.g., Town of Norfolk v. Corps of Engineers, 968 F.2d 1438 (1st Cir. 1992) (communications by agents of the Corps of Engineers to government attorneys were privileged, where made in confidence on matters in which litigation was foreseeable).

(n96)Footnote 96. See, e.g., Coastal Corp. v. Duncan, 86 F.R.D. 514 (D. Del. 1980) (to claim an attorney-client privilege, the agency must show that communications were made to obtain legal advice, not for policy-making purposes).

(n97)Footnote 97. See also In re Lindsey, 148 F.3d 1100 (D.C. Cir. 1998) (noting that a government attorney-client privilege does exist, but refusing to apply it to protect communications from the President to White House counsel concerning possible criminal activity: "When an executive branch attorney is called before a federal grand jury to give evidence about alleged crimes within the executive branch, reason and experience, duty, and tradition dictate that the attorney shall provide that evidence. ... Unlike a private practitioner, the loyalties of a government lawyer therefore cannot and must not lie solely with his or her client agency. ... [N]othing prevents government officials who seek completely confidential communications with attorneys from consulting personal counsel.").

(n98)Footnote 98. See generally Frankel, The Attorney-Client Privilege After the Death of the Client, 6 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 45 (1992).

(n99)Footnote 99. For a criticism of the survival rule, see Hood, The Attorney-Client Privilege and a Revised Rule 1.6: Permitting Limited Disclosure After the Death of the Client, 7 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 741 (1994).

(n100)Footnote 100. See Republic Gear v. Borg-Warner Corp., 381 F.2d 551, 556 (2d Cir. 1967) :

> Not only may an attorney invoke the privilege in his client's behalf when the client is not a party to the proceeding in which disclosure is sought, ... but he should do so, for he is duty-bound to raise the claim in any proceeding in order to protect communications made in confidence.

See also Schnell v. Schnall, 550 F. Supp. 650 (S.D.N.Y. 1982) (attorney-client privilege applies even though attorney disclosed the communication, where the client did not authorize the disclosure implicitly or explicitly). On the pertinent ethical standards, see ABA Model Rule of Professional Conduct 1.6 and Comment.

(n101)Footnote 101. International Oil, Chem. & Atomic Workers Local 7-517 v. Uno-Ven Co., 170 F.3d 779 (7th Cir. 1999) .

(n102)Footnote 102. See United States v. Yerardi, 192 F.3d 14 (1st Cir. 1999) ("The concept of waiver by conduct exists, but often amounts simply to a determination that the privilege holder's conduct makes it unfair to allow subsequent assertion of the privilege."). See also United States v. Jacobs, 117 F.3d 82 (2d Cir. 1997) (inaccurate disclosure of an attorney's communication found to be a waiver). See generally Marcus, The Perils of Privilege: Waiver and the Litigator, 84 Mich. L. Rev. 1605 (1986).

(n103)Footnote 103. See also In re Bevill, Bresler & Schulman Asset Mgt. Corp., 805 F.2d 120 (3d Cir. 1986) (communication by a corporate agent to a corporate attorney is privileged; the privilege is held by the corporation, and the agent has no authority to waive it, even though he made the communication); In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 274 F.3d 563 (1st Cir. 2001) (waiver by corporation was effective as to any privilege asserted by corporate agents)..

(n104)Footnote 104. See also United States v. Campbell, 73 F.3d 44 (5th Cir. 1996) (a partnership, like a corporation, is an artificial person that can act only through its agents: "Accordingly, the same rule that applies to corporations in bankruptcy should apply to a bankrupt limited partnership."); Odmark v. Westside Bancorp., Inc., 636 F. Supp. 552 (W.D. Wash. 1986) (after a bank's failure, the FSLIC was held to control the privilege).

(n105)Footnote 105. Yosemite Investment Inc. v. Floyd Bell Inc., 943 F.Supp. 882 (S.D. Ohio 1996) .

(n106)Footnote 106. See also United States v. Billmyer, 57 F.3d 31 (1st Cir. 1995) (corporation's disclosure of report to the government constituted a waiver of the privilege: "A risk of unfairness is evident where information is provided to one side in a case (here, the United States) and then an inquiry into its origin is shielded by a claim of privilege."); In re Columbia/HCA Healthcare Corp. Billing Practices Litigation, 293 F.3d 289 (6th Cir. 2002) (rejecting the concept of selective waiver, even in the face of an express confidentiality agreement).

(n107)Footnote 107. See also In re Martin Marietta Corp., 856 F.2d 619 (4th Cir. 1988) (disclosing confidential reports to government officials in order to avoid indictment works a waiver not only as to the disclosed reports, but also as to all confidential information concerning the same subject matter).

(n108)Footnote 108. See Note, The Limited Waiver Rule: Creation of an SEC-Corporation Privilege, 36 Stan. L. Rev. 789 (1984) (noting that in 1979, over 425 corporations took part in the SEC voluntary disclosure program, despite the absence of a limited waiver doctrine).

(n109)Footnote 109. Some courts have enforced selective waiver if the disclosure of the privileged information is made subject to an express confidentiality agreement. See, e.g., In re M & L Bus. Mach. Co., 161 B.R. 689, 697 (D. Colo. 1993) (prior disclosure to United States Attorney under a confidentiality agreement did not waive privilege against a private party).

(n110)Footnote 110. Kelsey-Hayes Co. v. Motor Wheel Corp., 155 F.R.D. 170 (W.D. Mich. 1991) .

(n111)Footnote 111. See In re von Bulow, 828 F.2d 94 (2d Cir. 1987) (privilege waived where the client's selective use of privileged information would be unfair to the adversary).

(n112)Footnote 112. Moskowitz v. Lopp, 128 F.R.D. 624, 638 (E.D. Pa. 1989) .

(n113)Footnote 113. See United States v. Workman, 138 F.3d 1261 (8th Cir. 1998) (defendant could not selectively assert the privilege to block the introduction of information harmful to his case after introducing other aspects of his conversations with his attorney for his own benefit); Harding v. Dana Transport, Inc., 914 F. Supp. 1084 (D.N.J. 1996) (privilege was waived where an employer relied on an attorney's investigation as a defense against a claim that the employer had created a hostile work environment; the corporation cannot use the fact of the lawyer's investigation as an affirmative defense without giving the plaintiff an opportunity to examine the investigation's content to determine whether it was adequate).

(n114)Footnote 114. SEC v. Forma, 117 F.R.D. 516 (S.D.N.Y. 1987) .

(n115)Footnote 115. See, e.g., Naglak v. Pennsylvania State Univ., 133 F.R.D. 18 (M.D. Pa. 1990) (where the plaintiff alleges that she and her attorney were misled into signing a release, the advice of counsel waiver applies only to communications concerning the release, and "does not permit blanket disclosure of all communications between her and her attorney").

(n116)Footnote 116. See, e.g., Chase Manhattan Bank v. Drysdale Sec. Corp., 587 F. Supp. 57 (S.D.N.Y. 1984) (no waiver where opposing party's pleading raises issues of reliance on counsel).

(n117)Footnote 117. See also In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 727 F.2d 1352 (4th Cir. 1984) (inadvertent disclosure of privileged information constitutes a waiver of the privilege regardless of the circumstances).

(n118)Footnote 118. See also Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Garvey, 109 F.R.D. 323 (N.D. Cal. 1985) (adopting a similar five-part test to determine whether inadvertent disclosure constitutes a waiver); McCafferty's, Inc. v. Bank of Glen Burnie, 179 F.R.D. 163 (D.Md. 1998) (discovery of privileged materials by person sifting through trash did not constitute a waiver; the client had taken sufficient precautions to preserve confidentiality by shredding documents and disposing of them in a sealed plastic bag in a private dumpster on private property).

For more detailed descriptions of the various approaches to inadvertent waiver, see John T. Hundley, Federal Law, 159 A.L.R. Fed. 153 (2005); Note, Jennifer A. Hardgrove, Scope of Waiver of Attorney-Client Privilege: Articulating a Standard That Will Afford Guidance to Courts, 1998 U. Ill. L. Rev. 643, 659.

(n119)Footnote 119. See also Parkway Gallery v. Kittinger/Pennsylvania House Group, 116 F.R.D. 46 (M.D.N.C. 1987) (applying a similar five-part test); Eigenheim Bank v. Halpern, 598 F. Supp. 988 (S.D.N.Y. 1984) (where privileged documents were inadvertently disclosed a second time, the privilege would not apply; the first disclosure was excusable, the second one was not).

(n120)Footnote 120. See also United States v. Gangi, 1 F. Supp.2d 256 (S.D.N.Y.1998) : In a prosecution for racketeering, securities fraud, wire fraud, extortion, and bank fraud, the government moved for the return of a prosecution memorandum that requested Department of Justice approval of an indictment. The Trial Court held that under the circumstances, the disclosure of the report amounted to a forfeiture of the attorney-client privilege. The government had failed to label the memo as confidential, acted without due care in its dissemination especially since the memo revealed witnesses and victims, and inadequately trained the FBI agent who distributed it while attached to the indictment. Nor did the government have the excuse of producing thousands of documents, so that it might be understandable that a few privileged documents might slip through. The Court also reasoned that fairness considerations supported disclosure, since (1) some defendants had not seen the memo (thus putting those who had not seen it at a competitive disadvantage); (2) redaction was possible to protect victims and witnesses; and (3) the defendants would eventually discover much of the information in the memo at any rate. The Court concluded that the Government "did not treat the document with the care required to protect its privilege. As a result, two defendants and their lawyers have seen it and dozens of copies are circulating in the public domain."

(n121)Footnote 121. See, e.g., Prescient Partners, L.P. v. Fieldcrest Cannon, Inc., 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18818 (S.D.N.Y. 1997) (enforcing a confidentiality agreement and refusing to find a waiver from an inadvertent disclosure of privileged information).

(n122)Footnote 122. See Rainer v. Union Carbide Corp., 402 F.3d 608 (6th Cir. 2005) (mistaken disclosure did not constitute a waiver because a stipulated protective order signed by all the parties "was clear in stating that a producing party waived no rights in the event a privileged document was accidentally produced."). See also Leslie, The Costs of Confidentiality and the Purpose of Privilege, 2000 Wis. L. Rev. 31, 73 (noting an "increasingly popular protective order" that allows parties protection from mistaken disclosures).

(n123)Footnote 123. See, e.g., Tasby v. United States, 504 F.2d 332, 336 (8th Cir. 1974) (privilege is no longer applicable where the client charges counsel with ineffective assistance); First Fed. Sav. & Loan v. Oppenheim, Appel, Dixon & Co., 110 F.R.D. 557 (S.D.N.Y. 1986) (where counsel was charged by a third party with securities fraud in an action arising out of the client's transactions, counsel was permitted to disclose confidential communications to defend himself). For a criticism of this doctrine, see Levine, Self-Interest or Self-Defense: Lawyer Disregard of the Attorney-Client Privilege for Profit and Protection, 15 HOFSTRA L. Rev. 783 (1987).

(n124)Footnote 124. See, e.g., Cannon v. U.S. Acoustics Corp., 532 F.2d 1118 (7th Cir. 1976) (attorney is permitted to reveal confidences to collect his fee).

(n125)Footnote 125. See, e.g., Cohen v. Uniroyal, Inc., 80 F.R.D. 480, 483 (E.D. Pa. 1978) . For an extensive criticism of the Garner doctrine, see Saltzburg, Corporate Attorney-Client Privilege in Shareholder Litigation and Similar Cases: Garner Revisited, 12 HOFSTRA L. Rev. 817 (1984).

(n126)Footnote 126. For a critique of the "good cause" factors, see Shirvani v. Capital Investing Corp., 112 F.R.D. 389, 390 (D. Conn. 1986) (the "rather vague" good cause exception "was ill-defined in origin and has been troublesome in application.").

(n127)Footnote 127. See, e.g., Weil v. Investment/Indicators Research & Mgt., 647 F.2d 18 (9th Cir. 1981) (Garner doctrine is limited to derivative suits).

(n128)Footnote 128. See, e.g., In re International Sys. & Controls Corp. Sec. Litig., 693 F.2d 1235 (5th Cir. 1982) (class action for fraud by former shareholders of the corporation).

(n129)Footnote 129. See, e.g., Fausek v. White, 965 F.2d 126 (6th Cir. 1992) (Garner doctrine applied in an action brought by minority shareholders against the majority for fraud and breach of fiduciary duty; communications by the majority shareholder to an attorney, concerning corporate transactions, were held not privileged vis-a-vis the minority).

(n130)Footnote 130. See, e.g., Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild v. Washington Star Co., 543 F. Supp. 906 (D.D.C. 1982) .

(n131)Footnote 131. See, e.g., Quintel Corp., N.V. v. Citibank, N.A., 567 F. Supp. 1357 (S.D.N.Y. 1983) (Garner doctrine applies to communications occurring during a fiduciary relationship, but not to communications occurring before the relationship is begun or after it is terminated; Garner doctrine applies even to communications made to determine the extent of the obligations owed by the fiduciary to the beneficiary).

(n132)Footnote 132. See, e.g., Nellis v. Air Line Pilots Ass'n, 144 F.R.D. 68 (E.D. Va. 1992) (Garner doctrine applied where airline pilots sued their union for breach of duty of good faith representation).

(n133)Footnote 133. See Saltzburg, Corporate Attorney-Client Privilege in Shareholder Litigation and Similar Cases: Garner Revisited, 12 HOFSTRA L. Rev. 817, 846 (1984):

> The word "fiduciary" has no talismanic quality that dictates abdication of the usual approach to attorney-client privilege whenever the word is invoked. Those who have fiduciary responsibility often want legal advice concerning their responsibilities. They should have the same opportunity to consult with counsel and to speak freely and without fear of making admissions as other clients.

(n134)Footnote 134. See, e.g., Shirvani v. Capital Investing Corp., 112 F.R.D. 389, 391 (D. Conn. 1986) ("Indeed, a curtailment or confusion of traditional privilege concepts eventually may not lead to more endpoint disclosure at all, but result instead in less open and candid attorney-client communication in the first place.").

(n135)Footnote 135. For a further discussion of the Garner doctrine, see Capra, Deterring the Formation of the Attorney-Client Privilege: Disclosure of Client Identity, Payment of Fees, and Communications by Fiduciaries, 4 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 235 (1990).

(n136)Footnote 136. See, e.g., In re Grand Jury, 845 F.2d 896 (11th Cir. 1988) :

> First, there must be a prima facie showing that the client was engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct when he sought the advice of counsel, that he was planning such conduct when he sought the advice of counsel, or that he committed a crime of fraud subsequent to receiving the benefit of counsel's advice. Second, there must be a showing that the attorney's assistance was obtained in furtherance of the criminal or fraudulent activity or was closely related to it.

Note that the exception can apply even if the client never actually committed a fraudulent or criminal act. The exception is triggered when the client communicates with the attorney with the intent to further a plan of crime or fraud. See United States v. Collis, 128 F.3d 313 (6th Cir. 1997) ("the crime or fraud need not have occurred for the exception to be applicable; it need only have been the objective of the client's communication"); In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 87 F.3d 377 (9th Cir. 1996) (government is not required to show that the client's plan succeeded, nor that the attorney's advice in fact helped the client in his plan).

(n137)Footnote 137. See, e.g., Coleman v. American Broadcasting Cos., 106 F.R.D. 201 (D.D.C. 1985) (referring to the "crime-fraud-tort exception," and collecting cases that have expanded the exception to cover tortious conduct). Contra Motley v. Marathon Oil Co., 71 F.3d 1547 (10th Cir. 1995) (memorandum furthering racial discrimination was held privileged; finding no exception for communications made in furtherance of tortious conduct generally).

(n138)Footnote 138. See, e.g., In re Sealed Case, 754 F.2d 395, 399 (D.C. Cir. 1985) :

> A prima facie violation is shown if it is established that the client was engaged in or planning a criminal or fraudulent scheme when it sought the advice of counsel to further the scheme. ... The government satisfies its burden of proof if it offers evidence that if believed by the trier of fact would establish the elements of an ongoing or imminent crime or fraud.

See also In re Antitrust Grand Jury, 805 F.2d 155 (6th Cir. 1986) (Court did not err in considering only the evidence submitted by the party seeking access to statements; the prima facie standard is not designed to allow a mini-trial); In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 857 F.2d 710 (10th Cir. 1988) (Court rejects the argument that privilege holder must have an opportunity to rebut the prima facie evidence); Parkway Gallery Furn. v. Kittinger Pa. House Group, 116 F.R.D. 46 (M.D.N.C. 1987) (prima facie standard serves to subject the privilege holder to the risk of nonpersuasion); Duplan Corp. v. Deering Milliken, Inc., 540 F.2d 1215, 1220 (4th Cir. 1976) (prima facie showing requires a party to present enough evidence to "subject the opposing party to the risk of non-persuasion if the evidence is left unrebutted."). See generally In re Feldberg, 862 F.2d 622 (7th Cir. 1988) (discussing the conflict in the circuits concerning the appropriate definition of the prima facie standard).

(n139)Footnote 139. See also In re Grand Jury Proceedings (Vargas), 723 F.2d 1461 (10th Cir. 1983) (prima facie foundation may be made by documentary evidence or good faith statements by the prosecutor as to testimony already received by the grand jury); White v. American Airlines, 915 F.2d 1414 (10th Cir. 1990) (prima facie proof that the corporate attorney asked a corporate employee to perjure himself was found solely on the basis of the corporate employee's self-serving testimony). Compare In re Grand Jury Subpoenas Duces Tecum, 773 F.2d 204 (8th Cir. 1985)

(party's failure to produce two out of 800 demanded documents is not prima facie evidence of crime or fraud).

(n140)Footnote 140. See also White v. American Airlines, 915 F.2d 1414 (10th Cir. 1990) (easily finding a prima facie case of crime-fraud on the basis of the allegedly privileged statements themselves; assuming that state law, applicable in this diversity case, would follow Zolin).

(n141)Footnote 141. See, e.g., In re General Motors Corp., 153 F.3d 714 (8th Cir. 1988) (where the Trial Court required the party asserting the privilege to produce the statements for the purpose of conducting an in camera hearing on the crime-fraud exception, it was error to conduct that hearing with both sides present: "By ordering disclosure, the district court effectively destroyed the confidentiality of the communications. Until it is established that the crime/fraud exception applies, the district court may not compel disclosure of allegedly privileged communications to the party opposing the privilege.").

(n142)Footnote 142. In re Bankamerica Corp. Secs. Litig., 270 F.3d 639, 643 (8th Cir. 2001) .

(n143)Footnote 143. Id.

(n144)Footnote 144. See, e.g., In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 87 F.3d 377 (9th Cir. 1996) : "Inasmuch as today's privilege exists for the benefit of the client, not the attorney, it is the client's knowledge and intentions that are of paramount concern to the application of the crime-fraud exception; the attorney need know nothing about the client's ongoing or planned illicit activity for the exception to apply."

(n145)Footnote 145. See, e.g., In re Impounded Case, 879 F.2d 1211 (3d Cir. 1989) (crime-fraud exception defeats the client's privilege where the pertinent illegality is that of the law firm; reasoning that the search for truth outweighs the client's interest in confidentiality); White v. American Airlines, 915 F.2d 1414 (10th Cir. 1990) (crime-fraud exception applies where attorney urges a corporate employee to commit perjury).

(n146)Footnote 146. See, e.g., Coleman v. American Broadcasting Cos., 106 F.R.D. 201 (D.D.C. 1985) ("Only communications in regard to ongoing or future misconduct fall outside the scope of the privilege. This distinction goes to the very core of the policies underlying the privilege.").

(n147)Footnote 147. United States v. White, 887 F.2d 267 (D.C. Cir. 1989) . See also In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 87 F.3d 377 (9th Cir. 1996) (crime-fraud exception should not be applied in such a way as to "discourage many would-be clients from consulting an attorney about entirely legitimate legal dilemmas").

(n148)Footnote 148. See, e.g., United States v. Reeder, 170 F.3d 93 (1st Cir. 1999) (client conferred with counsel in order to obtain "some ideas" on how to cover up a series of questionable loans, and proposed that the loans could be backdated; these communications were within the crime-fraud exception and not privileged; the Court rejected the defendant's argument that he was simply seeking the attorney's advice on whether a legal problem could be solved in a particular manner; the defendant did not merely ask whether backdating documents would be legal -- rather, he affirmatively sought the lawyer's assistance in a cover-up); United States v. Jacobs, 117 F.3d 82 (2d Cir. 1997) (crime-fraud exception was found where "the wrong-doer had set upon a criminal course before consulting counsel").

(n149)Footnote 149. See, e.g., In re Sealed Case, 754 F.2d 395 (D.C. Cir. 1985) :

> Communications with Doe and Roe concerning past crimes, including misconduct that occurred during the California litigation, remain privileged. To the limited extent that past acts of misconduct were the subject of the cover-up that occurred during the period of representation, however, the past violations properly may be a subject of grand jury inquiry.

See also United States v. Edwards, 303 F.3d 606 (5th Cir. 2002) (crime-fraud exception applied where the legal services sought by the defendant were "to conceal and cover up the crimes committed"; "[r]ather than merely defending himself from wrongdoing, [the client] was actively continuing the cover-up of extortion and perpetuating his tax fraud.").

(n150)Footnote 150. In re Richard Roe, Inc., 68 F.3d 38 (2d Cir. 1995) (it was improper for the Trial Court to order disclosure of privileged communications simply because they were relevant evidence of activity in furtherance of crime).

(n151)Footnote 151. See, e.g., Pritchard-Keang Nam Corp. v. Jaworski, 751 F.2d 277 (8th Cir. 1984) :

> That the report may help prove that a fraud occurred does not mean that it was used in perpetrating the fraud. ... Timing is critical, for the prima facie showing requires that the client was engaged in or planning a criminal or fraudulent scheme when he sought the advice of counsel to further the scheme.

See also In re Sealed Case, 107 F.3d 46 (D.C. Cir. 1997) (the mere fact that a person commits a fraud after consulting with counsel does not establish a prima facie case that the consultation was in furtherance of the fraud); Parkway Gallery Furn. v. Kittinger Pa. House Group, 116 F.R.D. 46 (M.D.N.C. 1987) ("The crime or fraud exception does not apply if the fraud occurred subsequent to the advice and that fact alone will not support further inquiry.").

(n152)Footnote 152. Most Courts after Jaffee have applied a "dangerous patient" exception only where disclosure of the communication at the time demanded is necessary to avoid serious harm to the patient or another. Assume a criminal case in which the defendant is charged with murder. The defendant told a psychiatrist the day before the murder that he was going to kill the victim. Most Courts hold that the "dangerous patient" exception would not apply to permit admission of this statement at the defendant's criminal trial. This is because disclosure at the trial is not necessary to protect against harm to the patient or another. That harm has already occurred. The "dangerous patient" exception would apply, however, in a proceeding to commit the patient on the ground that he was a danger to himself or others. See, e.g., United States v. Hayes, 227 F.3d 578 (6th Cir. 2000) ("dangerous patient" exception applies only when disclosure of communications is necessary to protect against imminent risk of harm at the time the disclosure is demanded; "compliance with the professional duty to protect does not imply a duty to testify against a patient in criminal proceedings, other than directly related to the patient's involuntary hospitalization"); United States v. Chase, 340 F.3d 978 (9th Cir. 2003) (en banc) (noting that the Advisory Committee's proposed privilege contained no dangerous patient exception, and that such an exception "would significantly injure the interests justifying existence of the privilege"). In contrast, the Tenth Circuit has held that a psychotherapist may testify about a patient's threat if it was serious when made and disclosure was the only means of averting harm. United States v. Glass, 133 F.3d 1356 (10th Cir. 1998) . See also Harris, The Dangerous Patient Exception to the Psychotherapist-Patient Privilege: The Tarasoff Duty and the Jaffee Footnote, 74 Wash. L. Rev. 33 (1999).

(n153)Footnote 153. See Developments in the Law: Privileged Communications, 98 Harv. L. Rev. 1450, 1533 (1985) (collecting state statutes).

(n154)Footnote 154. See, e.g., United States v. Bercier, 848 F.2d 917 (8th Cir. 1988) (rejecting a doctor-patient privilege, collecting federal cases); Patterson v. Caterpillar, Inc., 70 F.3d 503 (7th Cir. 1995) (holding that there is no doctor-patient privilege under federal law, and that any state privilege was inapplicable in an ERISA case).

While a federal privilege does not generally exist for doctor-patient relationships, statutes may protect certain information -- e.g., 42 U.S.C. § 290ee-3(a) (prohibition on revealing confidential information obtained in a drug abuse prevention program).

(n155)Footnote 155. The Court in In re Grand Jury Proceedings (Violette), 183 F.3d 71 (1st Cir. 1999) , held that the psychotherapist-patient privilege is inapplicable if the communications by the patient are made for the purpose of furthering a crime or fraud. See also United States v. Chase, 340 F.3d 978 (9th Cir. 2003) (finding it unnecessary to decide whether a crime-fraud exception applies, because patient's threats, made to his psychotherapist, were not intended to further a crime).

(n156)Footnote 156. In re Doe, 964 F.2d 1325 (2d Cir. 1992) .

(n157)Footnote 157. The Classified Information Procedures Act, 18 U.S.C. App., enacted in 1980, directs the Chief Justice, in Consultation with the Attorney General, the Director of the CIA, and the Secretary of Defense, to "prescribe rules establishing procedures for the protection against unauthorized disclosure of any classified information in the custody of the" Courts of the United States. The Chief Justice submitted rules to Congress which became effective in 1981. Key among the procedures is the designation by the Court of a "court security officer" in any case or appeal in which classified information may be in the Court's custody.

(n158)Footnote 158. See, e.g., Linder v. Department of Defense, 133 F.3d 17 (D.C. Cir. 1998) (upholding claim of state secrets privilege with respect to documents held by the CIA; the Agency had provided detailed information on the potential harm to national security, which the Judge considered in camera along with the withheld documents).

(n159)Footnote 159. See, e.g., United States v. Koreh, 144 F.R.D. 218 (D.N.J. 1992) (where the government shows that there is a reasonable danger that harm to the national security will result from disclosure, "the privilege is absolute and may not be pierced by any demonstration of need, no matter how compelling").

(n160)Footnote 160. See also Black v. United States, 62 F.3d 1115 (8th Cir. 1995) (dismissing the plaintiff's claim because the continuation of the plaintiff's suit presented a "reasonable danger" to the intelligence-gathering capabilities and diplomatic relations of the United States). The plaintiff in Black made an interesting argument: that the state secrets privilege was simply "a creature of the Cold War" that had outlived its usefulness. But the Court responded that "the absence of a relatively stable world order of the sort that prevailed during the Cold War makes the availability of the privilege in appropriate cases all the more important."

(n161)Footnote 161. See also Kasza v. Browner, 133 F.3d 1159 (9th Cir. 1998) (claims concerning inventory and removal of hazardous nuclear waste from nuclear testing sites had to be dismissed because information implicating national security interests was critical to pursuing the claims and defenses).

(n162)Footnote 162. See, e.g., Zuckerbraun v. General Dynamics Corp., 935 F.2d 544 (2d Cir. 1991) (dismissing a claim because the state secrets privilege would have deprived the defendant of a defense). See also United States v. North, 920 F.2d 940 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (noting the dismissal of certain criminal charges where state secrets would have been necessary to mount a defense).

(n163)Footnote 163. See In re Sealed Case, 121 F.3d 729, 737 (D.C. Cir. 1997) ("The most frequent form of executive privilege raised in the judicial arena is the deliberative process privilege; it allows the government to withhold documents and other materials that would reveal advisory opinions, recommendations and deliberations comprising part of a process by which governmental decisions and policies are formulated.").

(n164)Footnote 164. NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132 (1975) (stating that the privilege shelters "documents reflecting advisory opinions, recommendations and deliberations comprising part of a process by which governmental decisions and policies are formulated").

(n165)Footnote 165. Jordan v. Department of Justice, 591 F.2d 753, 772-73 (D.C. Cir. 1978) .

(n166)Footnote 166. EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73 (1973) .

(n167)Footnote 167. Quarles v. Department of Navy, 893 F.2d 390 (D.C. Cir. 1990) .

(n168)Footnote 168. Mehl v. EPA, 797 F. Supp. 43 (D.D.C. 1992) .

(n169)Footnote 169. Scott v. PPG Indus., 142 F.R.D. 291 (N.D. Va. 1992) .

(n170)Footnote 170. Bobkoski v. Board of Educ. of Cary Consol. Sch. Dist., 141 F.R.D. 88 (N.D. Ill. 1992) .

(n171)Footnote 171. Providence Journal Co. v. United States Dep't of the Army, 981 F.2d 552 (1st Cir. 1992) .

(n172)Footnote 172. See In re Sealed Case, 121 F.3d 729, 737 (D.C. Cir. 1997) ("The deliberative process privilege does not shield documents that simply state or explain a decision the government has already made or protect material that is purely factual, unless the material is so inextricably intertwined with the deliberative sections of documents that its disclosure would inevitably reveal the government's deliberations.").

(n173)Footnote 173. Quoting NLRB v. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151 , nn.18-19.

(n174)Footnote 174. Access Reports v. Department of Justice, 926 F.2d 1192, 1195 (D.C. Cir. 1991) .

(n175)Footnote 175. Quarles v. Department of the Navy, 893 F.2d 390, 392 (D.C. Cir. 1990) .

(n176)Footnote 176. EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73 (1973) (emphasis added).

(n177)Footnote 177. See, e.g., United States v. Fernandez, 231 F.3d 1240 (9th Cir. 2000) (in a case challenging the death penalty, the prosecution could not be ordered to turn over its predecisional death penalty evaluation form and memorandum; these documents were deliberative because they contained opinions, recommendations and advice about Justice Department policies; while the documents contained factual statements, the factual material was "so interwoven with the deliberative material that it is not severable").

(n178)Footnote 178. See, e.g., Providence Journal Co. v. United States Dep't of Army, 981 F.2d 552 (1st Cir. 1992) (report prepared by the Army Inspector General was privileged, even though it was largely factual, because the Inspector was faced with conflicting accounts of the event, so that the Inspector's findings of fact were a matter of judgment); Lead Indus. Ass'n v. OSHA, 610 F.2d 70 (2d Cir. 1979) (fact summaries prepared by OSHA officials were held privileged because disclosure would demonstrate "which facts in the massive Rule-making record were considered significant by the decisionmaker"); Dudman Commun. v. Department of Air Force, 815 F.2d 1565 (D.C. Cir. 1987) (preliminary drafts of military history were privileged, because disclosure would reveal editorial changes that were based on "creative thinking and candid exchange of ideas").

(n179)Footnote 179. See also In re Subpoena Served upon the Comptroller of the Currency, 967 F.2d 630 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (applying this five-part test).

(n180)Footnote 180. Compare Hinckley v. United States, 140 F.3d 277 (D.C. Cir. 1998) (action for release from mental hospital; the deliberative process privilege shielded the discussions that took place among members of the hospital review board before the board made its decision to deny release; the petitioner could not show a sufficient need for disclosure of these predecisional discussions; he had already received all the information that the review board had before it in making its decision, and he had received the board's ultimate decision complete with a written explanation; the petitioner could not show a compelling need for disclosure of the discussions that led to the board's conclusion).

(n181)Footnote 181. See, e.g., Doe v. Tenet, 329 F.3d 1135 (9th Cir. 2003) , rev'd on other grounds, 544 U.S. 1 (2005) (state secrets privilege was not properly invoked by government official other than the head of the relevant department: "It is invocation at the [head of department] level of the executive hierarchy, and with that degree of personal assurance, that lessens the possibility of reflexive invocation of the doctrine as a routine way to avoid adverse judicial decisions.").

(n182)Footnote 182. See Martin v. Albany Bus. Journal, 780 F. Supp. 927 (N.D.N.Y. 1992) (discussing and applying the formal requirements in detail).

(n183)Footnote 183. See, e.g., Resolution Trust Corp. v. Diamond, 137 F.R.D. 634 (S.D.N.Y. 1991) (privilege cannot be invoked by the government attorney who is litigating the case).

(n184)Footnote 184. See, e.g., Walker v. Huie, 142 F.R.D. 497 (D. Utah 1992) (police officer sued for excessive force cannot invoke an official information privilege to shield a preliminary investigation).

(n185)Footnote 185. See, e.g., Krikorian v. Department of State, 984 F.2d 461 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (requiring a formal index, known as a "Vaughn" index, for assertion of governmental privilege claims); Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d 820 (D.C. Cir. 1973) (requiring a document-by-document index, specially prepared for litigation purposes, in which the agency describes the contents of its records and the reasons why each of the disputed items is claimed to be exempt from disclosure).

(n186)Footnote 186. National Lawyers Guild v. Attorney Gen., 96 F.R.D. 390 (S.D.N.Y. 1982) .

(n187)Footnote 187. See Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Department of Justice, 365 F.3d 1108 (D.C. Cir. 2004) (executive privilege does not cover internal pardon documents held by the Department of Justice, because those documents were not solicited or received by the Office of the President; as such the documents were covered, if at all, by the deliberative process privilege); In re Sealed Case, 121 F.3d 729 (D.C. Cir. 1997) (distinguishing between the deliberative process privilege and the presidential communications privilege; finding that the presidential communications privilege "extends to cover communications which do not themselves directly engage the President, provided the communications are either authored or received in response to a solicitation by presidential advisers in the course of gathering information and preparing recommendations on official matters for presentation to the President").

(n188)Footnote 188. A variant of the informer's privilege is the "observation post" privilege. See, e.g., United States v. Foster, 986 F.2d 541 (D.C. Cir. 1993) , where a law enforcement officer in a drug case tried to invoke the "observation post" privilege to refuse to answer questions about the location from which the officer made his observations of the defendant's drug activity. The Court found that the observation post privilege is analogous to the informer's privilege; disclosing the names of persons who allowed the police to use their premises as observation posts might make such persons less willing to cooperate. However, the privilege is qualified, and it could not apply in this case, because the officer's testimony was crucial, and the defendant made a credible challenge to the accuracy of his identification; therefore the officer's distance from the scene and his line of vision were important matters for cross-examination. Compare United States v. Harley, 682 F.2d 1018 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (observation post privilege precludes cross-examination in a criminal trial where the witness was not essential, no question was raised about the witness' ability to observe events, the government produced a tape of the surveillance so that sight lines could be evaluated, and the officers had received assistance from unidentified citizens in setting up their observation post).

(n189)Footnote 189. See, e.g., Mays v. DEA, 234 F.3d 1324 (D.C. Cir. 2000) (report by informant concerning the defendant's distribution of cocaine was made under circumstances indicating an implied grant of confidentiality: "The pertinent question is whether the violence and risk of retaliation that attend this type of crime warrant an implied grant of confidentiality for such a source. They most assuredly do.").

(n190)Footnote 190. Manna v. United States Dep't of Justice, 51 F.3d 1158 (3d Cir. 1995) : "If a district court determines that a source provided information under an express assurance of confidentiality or under circumstances from which an assurance of confidentiality can reasonably be inferred, then all information provided by the source is protected."

(n191)Footnote 191. See United States v. Montgomery, 384 F.3d 1050 (9th Cir. 2004) (surveying case law and concluding that "either spouse may assert the privilege to prevent testimony regarding communications between spouses" and noting that "[v]esting the privilege in both spouses recognizes that allowing the communicating spouse to disclose one side of the conversation would eviscerate the privilege.").

(n192)Footnote 192. See, e.g., United States v. Lofton, 957 F.2d 476 (7th Cir. 1992) (noting that the communications privilege is "assertable by the defendant himself").

(n193)Footnote 193. See, e.g., United States v. Espino, 317 F.3d 788 (8th Cir. 2003) (no privilege where a willing spouse testifies to conduct by the defendant that was not communicative); United States v. Short, 4 F.3d 475 (7th Cir. 1993) (statements from the defendant to the witness-spouse were not protected by the confidential communications privilege, because they were made in the presence of third parties; also, much of the witness' testimony was not protected by the privilege because it dealt with the witness' observations rather than with the defendant's confidential communications; these acts would have been protected by the adverse testimonial privilege, but that privilege was inapplicable because the spouse chose to testify); United States v. Estes, 793 F.2d 465 (2d Cir. 1986) (where a spouse willingly testifies, acts observed by the spouse are not protected by any interspousal privilege).

(n194)Footnote 194. United States v. Strobehn, 421 F.3d 1017 (9th Cir. 2005) (no confidential communications privilege where husband wrote a letter, left in the kitchen, addressed to his wife and to other family members); United States v. Madoch, 149 F.3d 596 (7th Cir. 1998) (confidential privilege for marital communications was inapplicable where wife visited husband in prison and they talked over the prison telephone; the Court noted "the well-known need for correctional institutions to monitor inmate conversations").

(n195)Footnote 195. See, e.g., In re Witness Before Grand Jury, 791 F.2d 234 (2d Cir. 1986) (no privilege where the Court finds that the witness-spouse and the litigant-spouse are permanently separated at the time the testimony is demanded, even though they are not legally separated or divorced).

(n196)Footnote 196. See, e.g., United States v. Archer, 733 F.2d 354 (5th Cir. 1984) (introduction of the wife's hearsay statement, otherwise admissible under a hearsay exception, does not violate the adverse testimonial privilege).

(n197)Footnote 197. United States v. Clark, 712 F.2d 299 (7th Cir. 1983) (even though the parties clearly had a loving relationship, the witness-spouse could be compelled to testify to acts that occurred prior to the marriage).

(n198)Footnote 198. See, e.g., United States v. Byrd, 750 F.2d 585 (7th Cir. 1984) (spouse has no privilege to refuse to testify where she was a participant in the defendant's charged activity).

(n199)Footnote 199. The Supreme Court granted certiorari in Koecher to determine the status of the joint participant exception to the adverse testimonial privilege, but the case was mooted after oral argument when the Koechers, alleged spies for the then-Communist Czech government, were traded for Natan Scharansky. See also United States v. Ramos-Oseguera, 120 F.3d 1028 (9th Cir. 1997) (rejecting a joint participants exception to the adverse testimonial privilege).

(n200)Footnote 200. See, e.g., United States v. Porter, 986 F.2d 1014 (6th Cir. 1993) (the defendant's former wife testified that, shortly after she had moved out of the marital home, the defendant called her and admitted criminal activity; the confidential communications privilege is inapplicable if the communication was made at a time when the spouses were permanently separated, even if they were not legally separated or divorced; the status of the marriage at the time of the communication is a question of fact to be decided by the Judge; in this case, the witness had moved out at the time of the communication, and the defendant had not visited her during a time in which she was hospitalized; the Court found that the Trial Court did not abuse its discretion in finding a permanent separation, even though the spouses had not been separated for very long). See also United States v. Roberson, 859 F.2d 1376 (9th Cir. 1988) (requiring the Trial Court to undertake a specific detailed investigation into the irreconcilability of the marriage). The Court in

United States v. Murphy, 65 F.3d 758 (9th Cir. 1995) , after declaring that the marital communications privilege "does not apply if the couple was separated and the marriage was irreconcilable at the time of the communication," set forth the following approach for determining whether the marriage was irreconcilable at the time a confidential statement was made:

> Several factors guide a court's determination whether a marriage is irreconcilable. Those factors > include the duration of the separation, the stability of the marriage at the time of the communication, whether a divorce action had been filed and the conduct of the parties since that filing, whether a property settlement had been proposed, and, finally, any statement by the parties regarding irreconcilability or the reasons for separation.

In Murphy, the marriage was found irreconcilable. When the defendant made the communication, he had already told his wife he did not want to be married, he had filed for divorce, and the couple had been separated for seven years.

(n201)Footnote 201. See, e.g., United States v. Estes, 793 F.2d 465 (2d Cir. 1986) (no privilege where the defendant communicated with his wife in order to plan a crime).

(n202)Footnote 202. See, e.g., United States v. Bey, 188 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1999) (confidential communications not protected by privilege where the witness spouse had accepted drug proceeds from the defendant and had maintained his cover story for the benefit of the defendant's unsuspecting couriers); United States v. Hill, 967 F.2d 902 (3d Cir. 1992) (the defendant's confidential communications to his wife, concerning drug activity, were not protected by the interspousal privilege because the wife was a joint participant in the drug activity; the wife had accepted deliveries of drugs, informed the defendant of these deliveries, and counted drug proceeds; the witness-spouse need not be prosecuted in order to be considered a joint participant).

(n203)Footnote 203. Id. ("The admissibility of this testimony is governed by Mrs. Hill's role in Hill's criminal activity.").

(n204)Footnote 204. See, e.g., United States v. White, 974 F.2d 1135 (9th Cir. 1992) (marital confidential communications privilege is inapplicable where the litigant-spouse admits crime or abuse of a family member, or threatens such abuse: "Protecting threats against a spouse or a spouse's children is inconsistent with the purposes of the marital communications privilege: promoting confidential communications between spouses in order to foster marital harmony."); United States v. Allery, 526 F.2d 1362 (8th Cir. 1975) (applying a similar exception to the marital privilege against adverse testimony). See also United States v. Bahe, 128 F.3d 1440 (10th Cir. 1997) (finding an exception to the privilege for confidential marital communications where the defendant is charged with sexually assaulting a relative visiting the home: "It would be unconscionable to permit a privilege grounded on promoting communications of trust and love between marriage partners to prevent a properly outraged spouse with knowledge from testifying against the perpetrator of such a crime."). But see United States v. Jarvison, 409 F.3d 1221 (10th Cir. 2005) (refusing to establish an exception to the spousal testimonial privilege for acts of child abuse).

(n205)Footnote 205. See, e.g., United States v. Ismail, 756 F.2d 1253 (6th Cir. 1985) (child has no right to refuse to testify against his parent).

(n206)Footnote 206. See, e.g., In re Grand Jury, 103 F.3d 1140 (3d Cir. 1997) (no privilege for confidential communications from child to parent).

(n207)Footnote 207. Schlueter, The Parent-Child Privilege: A Response to Calls for Adoption, 19 St. Mary's L.J. 35, 69 (1987).

In the absence of common-law development of a parent-child privilege, Members of Congress have taken to proposing the codification of both a privilege for confidential communications and a privilege to refuse to give adverse testimony. The Judicial Conference has opposed each Bill that has proposed a codification of a parent-child privilege. See generally Sarson, The Child-Parent Testimonial Privilege: Attempts at Codification Have Missed Their Mark, 12 Geo. J. Leg. Eth. 861 (1999).

(n208)Footnote 208. See In re Grand Jury Investigation, 918 F.2d 374 (3d Cir. 1990) (recognizing a clergy-communicant privilege, in light of "reason and experience," under Federal Rule 501).

(n209)Footnote 209. Federal law may bar agencies from revealing trade secrets. See 18 U.S.C. § 1905, discussed in Chrysler Corp. v. Brown, 441 U.S. 281 (1979) .

(n210)Footnote 210. See also United States v. Smith, 135 F.3d 963 (5th Cir. 1998) (in criminal cases, Branzburg will protect the press only if "the government attempts to harass it. Short of such harassment, the media must bear the same burden of producing evidence of criminal wrongdoing as any other citizen.").

(n211)Footnote 211. Compare In re Special Proceedings, 373 F.3d 37 (1st Cir. 2004) (applying Branzburg but noting that outside the grand jury context, disclosure of confidential information from journalists "may not be compelled unless directly relevant to a nonfrivolous claim or inquiry undertaken in good faith; and disclosure may be denied where the same information is readily available from a less sensitive source").

(n212)Footnote 212. Shoen v. Shoen, 5 F.3d 1289 (9th Cir. 1993) (compelling need not found where the plaintiffs failed to exhaust all alternative means of obtaining the evidence).

(n213)Footnote 213. See, e.g., In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 5 F.3d 397 (9th Cir. 1993) (rejecting a scholar's privilege); William T. Thompson Co. v. General Nutrition Corp., 671 F.2d 100, 1982-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P64564 (3d Cir. 1982) (rejecting an accountant-client privilege); Harris v. United States, 413 F.2d 316 (9th Cir. 1969) (rejecting a banker-customer privilege); United States v. Holmes, 594 F.2d 1167 (8th Cir. 1979) (rejecting a probationer-probation officer privilege). See also In re Sealed Case, 148 F.3d 1073 (D.C. Cir. 1998) (refusing to recognize a "protective function" privilege that would protect Secret Service agents from being compelled to give testimony about possible criminal acts of public officials).

(n214)Footnote 214. See, e.g., In re Crazy Eddie Sec. Litig., 792 F. Supp. 197 (E.D.N.Y. 1992) (privilege for self-critical analysis applies to prevent disclosure of an internal review of an accountant's auditing practices in a securities fraud case).

(n215)Footnote 215. See Penk v. Oregon State Bd. of Higher Educ., 99 F.R.D. 506 (D. Or. 1982) (privilege based on need for unimpeded criticism).

(n216)Footnote 216. See, e.g., In re Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Co., 214 F.3d 586 (5th Cir. 2000) (rejecting claim of self-evaluation privilege, at least with respect to preaccident reports); Dowling v. American Hawaii Cruises, Inc., 971 F.2d 423 (9th Cir. 1992) (voluntary routine preaccident safety reviews are not protected by the privilege for self-critical analysis; the privilege is not necessary to encourage these reports, since corporations would find it crucial to prepare such reports anyway); Davidson v. Light, 79 F.R.D. 137 (D. Colo. 1978) (hospital report following discovery of patient's gangrenous leg is not privileged).

(n217)Footnote 217. See, e.g., In re Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Co., 214 F.3d 586 (5th Cir. 2000) (rejecting claim of self-evaluation privilege where report is sought by a government agency); Federal Trade Com. v. TRW, Inc., 628 F.2d 207, 1980-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P63374 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (assuming that a privilege for self-critical analysis exists, it does not protect against a demand by the FTC).

(n218)Footnote 218. See, e.g., In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 33 F.3d 342 (4th Cir. 1994) (where the government did not offer the privileged documents themselves as proof of crime or fraud, the "good faith belief" requirement for an in camera hearing was inapplicable: "Zolin does not proscribe all in camera reviews of in camera submissions absent the requisite threshold [good faith] showing. Rather, Zolin proscribes in camera review of the documents that are the subject of the subpoena and the asserted privilege in the absence of the requisite threshold showing.").

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article V. Privileges
CHAPTER 501 RULE 501

2-501 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 501.03

501.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Accountant-Client

United States v. Arthur Young & Co., 465 U.S. 805 (1984) , rev'g 677 F.2d 211 (2d Cir. 1982) : The Court of Appeals denied enforcement of an IRS summons to a taxpayer's accountant seeking tax accrual workpapers prepared by the accountant, reasoning that if the IRS could reach such papers, clients might conceal tax vulnerability from accountants, to the detriment of securities laws policies. The decision was grounded on the work product doctrine, not a privilege. Reversing, the Supreme Court distinguished the work product of a lawyer, "a loyal representative whose duty it is to present the client's case in the most favorable possible light," from that of the certified public accountant serving as an independent auditor, who "assumes a public responsibility transcending any employment relationship with the client." The Court observed that Congress gave the IRS broad investigative and enforcement powers and found that the public interest in full disclosure of all information relevant to tax liability outweighs the private need for work product protection.

Summit Ltd. v. Levy, 111 F.R.D. 40 (S.D.N.Y. 1986) : The Court held that a client who sent his accountant a copy of a letter from the client to his lawyer could not claim a privilege to prevent the accountant from disclosing the letter. It ruled that there is no accountant-client privilege and that the accountant was not serving as an agent of the lawyer.

Scotty's Contr. & Stone, Inc. v. United States, 326 F.3d 785 (6th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed an order denying a motion to quash summonses issued by the IRS to a taxpayer's accountant. The Kentucky accountant-client privilege did not protect the information sought by the IRS because the IRS's summonsing authority is not limited by any state-law accountant-client privilege and because the Kentucky statute has an exception for a "validly issued ... summons enforceable by order of a court."

United States v. Frederick, 182 F.3d 496 (7th Cir. 1999) : Frederick, a lawyer and an accountant, provided legal representation to and prepared the tax returns of taxpayers being investigated by the IRS. The Court upheld enforcement of an order directing Frederick to turn over documents created in connection with preparation of the taxpayers' returns. The Court reasoned that because there is no accountant's privilege under federal law, a taxpayer may not hire a lawyer to do the work that an accountant or other tax preparer normally would do and thereby obtain, through the privilege, greater protection than a taxpayer who does not use a lawyer as his tax preparer would be entitled to.

In re International Horizons, Inc., 689 F.2d 996 (11th Cir. 1982) : The Court held that there was no accountant-client privilege in federal law and that a Federal Court would not recognize out of comity a state privilege in a bankruptcy proceeding. To do so would "undermine the important federal interest in assuring complete and accurate disclosure in federal bankruptcy proceedings."

[2] Attorney-Client

[a] Comment on Exercise

United States v. Layton, 549 F. Supp. 903 (N.D. Cal. 1982) , rev'd on other grounds, 720 F.2d 548 (9th Cir. 1983) : Defense attorneys had retained a psychiatrist, Sukhdeo, to examine a murder suspect and the Court treated the doctor as an agent of the attorneys, so that all communications to the doctor were within the privilege. The government wished to ask any defense psychiatrists called at trial whether they had relied on Sukhdeo's materials in reaching a judgment concerning the defendant's mental condition. Although the Court indicated that if the testifying doctors had relied on the materials, they could be fully examined about them, it found that where they had not relied on them, the materials could not be mentioned. Any mention might be tantamount to a suggestion that the materials should be produced, and the privilege protects against such a suggestion.

[b] Attorney-Client -- Common Interest

[i] Action Between Joint Clients

Eureka Inv. Corp. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 743 F.2d 932 (D.C. Cir. 1984) : At one time an apartment building owner and a title insurance company were joint clients represented by a single firm, but the firm recognized that the interests of the parties diverged and undertook separate representation of the owner against the insurance company. In the action between the owner and the title insurance company, the Court held that communications made pursuant to this separate representation were privileged and did not fall within the exception to the privilege for disputes among clients who consulted counsel jointly. The Court noted that even if the law firm should not have continued to represent the owner, the client who relied on the privilege should not lose its protection.

Massachusetts Eye & Ear Infirmary v. QLT Phototherapeutics, Inc., 412 F.3d 215 (1st Cir. 2005) : The plaintiff and the defendant were involved in the development of a drug that treats vision loss. In intellectual property litigation between them, the Court affirmed a ruling that the plaintiff had a right to production of certain communications between the defendant and its counsel. The Court reasoned that the parties had both been represented by the one law firm regarding two matters in which they had a common interest, and although they also had some divergent interests during that time, they were joint clients and a joint-client relationship continues until an event affirmatively terminates it or readily implies that the joint relationship is over.

In re Sunrise Sec. Litig., 130 F.R.D. 560 (E.D. Pa. 1989): In securities litigation related to an insolvent savings and loan association, the Court held that the defendants' privilege for documents disclosed to the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation (successor to the insolvent association) in the course of a joint defense effort was waived when FSLIC subsequently asserted claims on behalf of the association against members of the joint defense group.

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Common Interest -- Attorney Conflict of Interest

United States v. Moscony, 697 F. Supp. 888 (E.D. Pa. 1988) : The Court disqualified counsel from representing defendants because the firm had jointly represented the defendants and three government witnesses. It also ruled that statements made by the witnesses to counsel during the period of joint representation could not be used by successor counsel for the defendants. The communications were privileged, and the witnesses were not adverse parties in a criminal proceeding against the defendants.

United States v. Henke, 222 F.3d 633 (9th Cir. 2000) : A prosecution for securities fraud and related offenses was originally brought against three defendants; these defendants and their attorneys engaged in joint defense strategy sessions. When one of the defendants decided to cooperate with the government, attorneys for the remaining defendants sought to withdraw on the ground that the duty to preserve the confidences of the government witness prevented them from cross-examining the witness with information learned during the pretrial meetings. The Trial Judge denied the motion to withdraw, reasoning that any privileged information would not even be learned by new counsel, so the defendants were no worse off in having current counsel cross-examine the witness without using that privileged information. At trial defense counsel conducted no cross-examination of the witness, for fear that the examination would lead to inquiries into material covered by the common interest privilege. The Court reversed the defendants' convictions on the ground that counsel were operating under a conflict of interest that impaired the representation. Noting that joint defense meetings are not "in and of themselves disqualifying," the Court emphasized that in this case defense counsel timely moved for disqualification, and the Judge erred in not fully acknowledging the conflict.

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Common Interest -- Government Attorneys

In re Lindsey, 158 F.3d 1263 (D.C. Cir. 1998) : Deputy White House Counsel Bruce Lindsey refused to answer certain questions before the grand jury investigating perjury and obstruction of justice charges against President Clinton. Among other things, Lindsey claimed that communications between and among himself, the President, and the President's personal lawyer were protected under the common interest privilege. Rejecting Lindsey's claim, the Court noted that Lindsey was an attorney for the Office of the President, not the President's personal attorney. The Court reasoned that government attorneys are obligated by law and by their oath to report criminal misconduct of government officials. Therefore, a government official's communications with a government attorney about possible criminal activity cannot be privileged in a criminal case. The Court concluded that "although the President in his personal capacity has at least some areas of common interest with the Office of the President, and although there may thus be reason for official and personal counsel to confer, the overarching duties of Lindsey in his role as a government attorney prevent him from withholding information about possible criminal misconduct from the grand jury."

In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum, 112 F.3d 910 (8th Cir. 1997) : The District Court quashed a grand jury subpoena for notes taken at a meeting held after the First Lady testified before a grand jury in the Whitewater matter. Present at the meeting were Mrs. Clinton, her personal attorneys, and White House counsel. The Office of Independent Counsel, which sought the notes, argued that the communications recorded were not privileged, because Mrs. Clinton was speaking to her attorney in the presence of others outside the unit. Mrs. Clinton responded that she and the White House were pursuing a common interest. Reversing, the Court reasoned that the interests of Mrs. Clinton and the White House (that is, the Presidency itself) were not sufficiently aligned: Mrs. Clinton's interest was in avoiding criminal prosecution, whereas "one searches in vain for any interest of the White House which corresponds to Mrs. Clinton's personal interest."

[iv] Attorney-Client -- Common Interest -- Miscellaneous Civil Cases

Cavallaro v. United States, 284 F.3d 236 (1st Cir. 2002) : Taxpayers resisted enforcement of an IRS summons addressed to accountants on the ground that the requested documents were privileged because they were communications related to legal services provided by attorneys (assisted by the accountants) who had been retained by some of the taxpayers in matters of common interest. Affirming enforcement of the subpoenas, the Court did not find it necessary to determine whether the taxpayers' interests were all aligned and whether the fact that some were not represented by counsel was significant, since the participation of the accountants -- who were found not to be assisting the attorneys and who had no privilege of their own -- meant that the communications were not confidential, vitiating the privilege.

In re Bairnco Corp. Sec. Litig., 148 F.R.D. 91 (S.D.N.Y. 1993) : In an action by purchasers of common stock against a corporation, its subsidiary, and the chief executive officer, the District Court held that documents containing communications from two multi-member organizations created to handle asbestos-related personal injury claims against member companies were not within a joint defense privilege. The documents related generally to statistics concerning litigation and were not communications pertaining to a defense strategy. In a libel action, Davis v. Costa-Gavras, n1 the District Court ruled that the privilege covered communications made at a "pre-production libel review" on behalf of a movie studio, even though the author of the book that was being made into a movie was present. The author and the studio were treated as potential codefendants entitled to claim a privilege as joint parties. In SCM Corp. v. Xerox Corp., n2 the District Court held that conversations and negotiations between joint-venturer corporations would be privileged only if the joint venturers had sufficiently common interests in the subject of the otherwise privileged information to warrant maintaining the privilege. In applying the common interest concept, the Court found that some relationships involved common interests and others did not. In In re Colocotronis Tanker Sec. Litig., n3 the District Court held that the privilege protected a lead lender's communications with its attorney over a now-defaulted loan against discovery by a bank that participated in making the loan. The Judge found that the participating bank was not a joint client along with the local bank and that no special fiduciary relationship existed.

In re Bevill, Bresler & Schulman Asset Mgt. Corp., 805 F.2d 120 (3d Cir. 1986) : Affirming a discovery ruling, the Court held that corporate officers could not assert a privilege after the corporation waived it, and that no joint defense privilege could be claimed where there was no showing that the corporation and the officers agreed to pursue a joint defense strategy. In a suit by investors against organizers of limited partnerships, Eisenberg v. Gagnon, n4 the Court held that "[c]ommunications to an attorney to establish a common defense strategy are privileged even though the attorney represents another client with some adverse interests." In North River Ins. Co. v. Philadelphia Reins. Corp., n5 the District Court affirmed a Magistrate Judge's denial of a motion to compel discovery of documents created in connection with alternative dispute resolution proceedings between the plaintiff reinsured and a third party. The defendant reinsurer asserted that it had been in a common interest situation with the plaintiff when the documents were created, but the Court held that the doctrine did not apply because the plaintiff had retained its own counsel wholly independent from the defendant and the defendant had no input into that relationship.

Sheet Metal Workers Int'l Ass'n v. Sweeney, 29 F.3d 120 (4th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed findings that communications between retained counsel for a union pension fund and outside counsel specially retained to represent the fund in connection with a grand jury investigation of it were not covered by the privilege. The retained counsel had been clearly informed both that the outside lawyers were representing only the fund and that the fund's interests were or would be adverse to his.

In re Santa Fe Int'l Corp., 272 F.3d 705, 2001 Trade Cas. (CCH) P73491 (5th Cir. 2001) : Denying a writ of mandamus to a defendant sued for conspiring with other companies to fix wages and employee benefits, the Court upheld a ruling that denied the privilege to a memo from the defendant's general counsel that had been shared with a codefendant. The Court found that the exchange of information between the companies was not privileged because there was no showing that at the time the communication was made the companies were potential codefendants acting under an actual or perceived threat of lititgation. In Hodges, Grant & Kaufmann v. United States Gov't, n6 the Court overturned the denial of an IRS request to enforce a subpoena, noting that the privilege is not waived "if a privileged communication is shared with a third person who has a common legal interest with respect to the subject matter of the communication."

Russell v. General Elec. Co., 149 F.R.D. 578 (N.D. Ill. 1993) : In a whistleblower action, the Court granted a motion to compel a management consultant hired by the defendant to answer deposition questions seeking to elicit what defense counsel told the consultant; the consultant was not entitled to claim a joint defense privilege since he was simply a potential witness. In an ADEA action, Bauman v. Jacobs Suchard, Inc., n7 the District Court held that the privilege applied to confidential communications between the EEOC and a plaintiff represented by a retained attorney, where the EEOC had brought a separate suit on behalf of other former employees. The privilege also extended to communications directed to an EEOC investigator acting as an agent for the attorneys. See also Leybold-Heraeus Tech., Inc. v. Midwest Instrument Co. n8(disclosure of privileged communications to an actual or potential codefendant or to their counsel in the course of a joint defense is not a waiver; disclosure of communications by a patentee to a related corporation did not amount to a waiver of the privilege).

Waller v. Financial Corp. of Am., 828 F.2d 579 (9th Cir. 1987) : The Court observed that communications by a client to his lawyer remain privileged when the lawyer shares them with codefendants pursuing a common defense. It held that a settlement between plaintiffs and one or more codefendants does not breach the privilege, even if the settling defendants have some financial incentive to assist the plaintiffs, as long as the settlement does not require disclosure of privileged information.

In re Regents of Univ. of Cal., 101 F.3d 1386 (Fed. Cir. 1996) : In a multidistrict patent litigation, the Court vacated a discovery order for communications between the university that had applied for a patent and attorneys for the company that was exclusive optionee (and subsequently became exclusive licensee) for the patent. The university and the company had substantially identical interests in obtaining strong and enforceable patents because of the potentially and ultimately exclusive nature of the license agreement, and thus the communications, made in order to meet legal requirements and plan conduct in compliance with law, were privileged.

[v] Attorney-Client -- Common Interest -- Miscellaneous Criminal Cases

In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 417 F.3d 18 (1st Cir. 2005) : In the course of a grand jury investigation, Lawyer I directed Client A to commit perjury before the grand jury after initially advising him to tell the truth. Lawyer I also represented Client B who might have had some connection with the perjury. Lawyer I consulted with Lawyer II and told Client A to recant the false testimony. Lawyer II represented other clients (Group C) connected with Client B and pertinent events; Lawyer II had a joint-defense arrangement with Lawyer I, which allowed them to exchange confidences that their clients may have confided to them separately. The grand jury summoned Lawyer I and asked him about the prior perjury of Client A, but Lawyer I invoked Client B's attorney-client privilege and the joint-defense privilege shared with Group C. The District Court ordered Lawyer I to answer specific questions before the grand jury and forbade him to disclose to anyone what he had been asked by the grand jury or other information relating to "the subject matter" of the grand jury investigation. The Court affirmed the grant of the motion to compel, based on the crime-fraud exception, as to Client B's privilege, vacated (without prejudice to the government) as to the Group C clients' privilege, and modified the order limiting disclosure. The Court noted that some difficult questions remained: "Now that Client B's privilege has been pierced, some of what the government seeks can conceivably be obtained by questions directed to Lawyer I tailored to avoid disclosures that would invade Group C's privilege; arguably Lawyer I-Client B conversations can be reached regardless of what information Lawyer I passed on to the Group C clients. How far Lawyer I may be questioned about the source of the information -- if it came from Lawyer II or the Group C clients -- may be more debatable." In United States v. Bay State Ambulance & Hosp. Rental Serv., n9 the Court held that a party claiming a joint defense privilege failed to demonstrate that his confidential communication was made as part of a joint defense and with the expectation that it would be kept confidential.

United States v. Weissman, 195 F.3d 96 (2d Cir. 1999) (per curiam): The defendant was the CFO of a health care insurer (Empire), which was being investigated by the U.S. Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations (PSI). At the request of Empire's counsel, the defendant assisted Empire's presentation to the PSI. As evidence of personal wrongdoing by the defendant began to surface, he hired his own counsel, and they worked with Empire and its counsel to present information to the PSI. After an Empire auditor had a conversation with the defendant and was not satisfied with his answers, the defendant's counsel invited attorneys for Empire to meet with him and the defendant. They met on two consecutive days, during which the defendant made damaging admissions. Affirming convictions for perjury and obstruction of justice, the Court held there was no error in rejecting the defendant's claim that the conversations on both days were covered by a joint defense agreement. Although the parties had made an agreement by the second day, the Court found that on the first day there was no joint defense agreement applicable because before that day's revelations Empire had no reason to know of the defendant's wrongdoing. The defendant failed to show any more than that on the first day Empire and he cooperated with respect to the PSI investigation into Empire. The Court noted that "[s]ome form of joint strategy is necessary to establish a [joint defense agreement], rather than merely the impression of one side as in this case." In United States v. Schwimmer, n10 a prosecution for conspiracy to illegally influence operations of employee benefit plans, the Court remanded for an evidentiary hearing to determine whether the government had violated the defendant's privilege by using information provided by an accountant who was hired by a codefendant's attorney to serve joint interests of the defendant and the codefendant. On remand, n11 no violation of the privilege was found. In In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum, n12 the Court relied heavily on two Ninth Circuit opinions -- Continental Oil Co. v. United States n13 and Hunydee v. United States n14-- in concluding "that the privilege covers communications to a prospective or actual co-defendant's attorney when those communications are engendered solely in the interests of a joint defense effort." The Court said that a codefendant's personal attorney need not be present for statements made in interviews in furtherance of the joint defense to be privileged, and that the privilege may still apply when the clients have some adverse interests. It also noted that the fact that one codefendant waived the privilege and elected to sue other codefendants did not destroy the privilege in the government's action against them.

United States v. Moscony, 697 F. Supp. 888 (E.D. Pa. 1988) : The Court disqualified counsel from representing defendants because the firm had jointly represented the defendants and three government witnesses. It also ruled that statements made by the witnesses to counsel during the period of joint representation could not be used by successor counsel for the defendants. The communications were privileged, and the witnesses were not adverse parties in a criminal proceeding against the defendants.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena: Under Seal, 415 F.3d 333 (4th Cir. 2005) : In the course of an investigation regarding a related company, attorneys for AOL Time Warner interviewed three AOL employees. Before each interview, the employee was told that the attorneys represented the company, that the conversations were privileged but the privilege was the company's and it would decide whether to waive it, and that the employee was free to consult his own attorney. Subsequently the SEC began an investigation of AOL and the related company. Shortly thereafter AOL and one of the employees entered into a "common interest agreement." When the SEC later deposed the employees, they asserted the attorney-client privilege regarding the interviews with AOL's attorneys. Finally, a grand jury issued a subpoena to AOL to provide records reflecting the interviews; AOL agreed to waive the privilege, but the employees moved to quash. Affirming denial of the motion to quash, the Court found no error in rejection of the one employee's assertion of the joint defense privilege, since the agreement to share information pursuant to a common interest did not exist at the time of the interviews.

In re Auclair, 961 F.2d 65 (5th Cir. 1992) : At the instance of a lawyer allegedly involved in a fraud scheme, the lawyer's secretary and her husband, together with the lawyer, consulted another attorney to see whether he would represent them in a pending grand jury investigation. After interviewing each of the three separately and together, the attorney declined to represent the secretary and her husband. The attorney was subsequently ordered to testify about the interviews, but the Court reversed, holding that: confidential communications made with a view to employing a lawyer are privileged even if employment is not accepted; this principle applies equally when persons with common interests consult an attorney together seeking common representation; the existence of a matter of common interest is presumed in the prerepresentation phase; the participants in this case had a reasonable expectation of confidentiality; and any waiver by the secretary or her husband did not defeat any privilege possessed by the client-lawyer.

United States v. Evans, 113 F.3d 1457 (7th Cir. 1997) : Before he was indicted for racketeering, the defendant went with a friend (Holden), who was a lawyer and who had represented his family in several matters, to meet with a criminal defense attorney. Holden was not permitted to represent Evans in this case because Holden was a police officer. The Court affirmed an in limine ruling that the defense attorney could be called to testify by the government because Holden was not present at the meeting in his capacity as legal adviser to Evans. Evans argued that, because Holden was required as a police officer to report what he learned about any crime to the Department and therefore was required to report what Evans confided to him, Holden and Evans shared a common interest, but the Court wrote that "it is difficult to imagine what necessity there could possibly be for the pooling or exchange of any information between Evans' defense attorneys and Holden vis-a-vis Holden's potential defense to a Departmental disciplinary proceeding." In United States v. McPartlin, n15 one defendant objected on privilege grounds when another defendant attempted to elicit testimony in their bribery trial from an investigator concerning information supplied to him by the first. The Court held that the objecting defendant was entitled to claim the privilege, since the statements were made in confidence to a representative of an attorney for a codefendant for a common purpose related to the defense of both the declarant and the client for whom the investigator's lawyer worked. Citing proposed Rule 503(b)(3), the Court concluded that the codefendants' defenses need not be compatible in all respects; it was sufficient that the clients had some interests in common. Affirming fraud convictions in United States v. Keplinger, n16 the Court stated that a person's subjective belief that he is represented individually by corporate counsel is not necessarily sufficient to entitle him to claim the privilege. The joint defense doctrine did not apply in this case to protect communications made by individuals to attorneys, since the individuals did not understand that their communications would be kept in confidence.

United States v. Zolin, 809 F.2d 1411 (1987) , modified en banc, 842 F.2d 1135 (9th Cir. 1988) , vacated on other grounds, 491 U.S. 554 (1989) : In a tax investigation the Court affirmed an order to a State Court clerk to produce some, but not all, sealed documents sought by the IRS that had been filed in a State Court action. The Court found that tapes of a meeting of nonlawyer church members were privileged, since all church members present were employees of the church who "had a common interest" in sorting out its affairs.

United States v. Lopez, 777 F.2d 543 (10th Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a drug conviction because testimony by the attorney for the defendant's companion was erroneously excluded. The government failed to show that the companion's statements, which were made in the presence of the defendant, were for the purpose of pursuing a joint defense and that they were made with an expectation of confidentiality.

[vi] Attorney-Client -- Common Interest -- Waiver Issues

In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 274 F.3d 563 (1st Cir. 2001) : When a grand jury subpoenaed a corporation's records, the corporation waived its privilege, but two of its former officers and its former attorney intervened and moved to quash. The intervenors claimed that the attorney had represented the officers as well as the corporation and that the representation of all was pursuant to an oral joint defense agreement making communications among the three clients jointly privileged. The Court affirmed denial of the motion to quash, holding that the individuals held no privilege as to communications made in their corporate capacities; therefore, any joint defense agreement was irrelevant and the corporation's waiver of its privilege was effective.

In re Grand Jury Subpoenas Duces Tecum, 406 F. Supp 381 (S.D.N.Y. 1975) : The Court concluded "that the attorney-client privilege covers communications to a prospective or actual co-defendant's attorney when those communications are engendered solely in the interests of a joint defense effort." The Court also noted that the fact that one codefendant waived the privilege and elected to sue other codefendants did not destroy the privilege in the government's action against them.

In re Grand Jury Subpoenas, 89-3 & 89-4, 902 F.2d 244 (4th Cir. 1990) : Reviewing a motion to quash subpoenas for papers held by a movant and its previously wholly owned subsidiary, the Court held that upon its divestiture the subsidiary's managers could waive the privilege with respect to documents it generated, but that to the extent the documents were generated in a matter of common interest with the movant, even if the parties were not joint defendants in that matter, waiver of the privilege required the movant's consent.

United States v. Newell, 315 F.3d 510 (5th Cir. 2002) : In a prosecution for money-laundering, the government introduced a letter from the defendant's in-house accountant to the accountant's attorney that recounted statements the defendant had made to the defendant's senior employees regarding communications between the defendant and the defendant's attorney. Holding that the privilege had been waived by disclosure of the communications to the employees, the Court noted that although the communications dealt with methods to alter billing procedures in order to avoid liability, there was no common interest among the defendant and the employees in defending against a pending or imminent investigation or prosecution, so the common interest privilege did not apply.

John Morrell & Co. v. Local Union 304A, 913 F.2d 544 (8th Cir. 1990) : In settling a prior action concerning a plant closing, the plaintiff employer had made a joint defense agreement with an employee class regarding cross-claims asserted by the defendant union. The employer waived its privilege as to certain documents given the employees for that case; five other documents were inadvertently turned over to the union by the employees. The Court held in this action for breach of a no-strike clause that the employees, sharing a joint defense privilege, could not waive the employer's privilege as to the five documents and that the employer's waiver as to the others did not extend to the five because the subject matter of the two sets was insufficiently linked.

United States v. Almeida, 341 F.3d 1318 (11th Cir. 2003) : Reversing in part a conviction for participating in a cocaine distribution scheme, the Court held it was error to limit the cross-examination of a government witness on the ground that the defendant and the witness at one time had a joint defense agreement. Counsel examining a witness with whom his client has had a joint defense agreement faces a potential conflict of interest because of the risk that the examination will disclose confidential attorney-client communications. However, when, as here, the witness has turned state's evidence, the witness has waived the privilege, so the potential conflict disappears. In essence, the Court held that the attorney-client privilege for communications by one client to another client's lawyer in a joint defense situation does not apply in a proceeding when the clients become adverse.

[c] Attorney-Client -- Communications from Attorney

Murphy v. Tennessee Valley Auth., 571 F. Supp. 502 (D.D.C. 1983) : In a Freedom of Information Act case, the Court held that the privilege covers communications from attorney to client based upon the client's confidential disclosures to the attorney. In Attorney General v. Covington & Burling, 430 F. Supp. 1117 (D.D.C. 1977) , the Court noted that a communication from the attorney to the client "is privileged not only if disclosure would tend to reveal a prior confidence of the client, but also if it would tend to reveal a subsequent communication -- an admission by adoption."

O'Brien v. Board of Educ., 86 F.R.D. 548 (S.D.N.Y. 1980) : The Court found that the privilege covered counsel's responses that would reveal the client's communications, even if the client's questions were put in hypothetical form.

Potts v. Allis-Chalmers Corp., 118 F.R.D. 597 (N.D. Ill. 1987) : The Court rejected a claim that all communications from a lawyer to a client are privileged, ordering a lawyer to answer questions unless the answers would disclose or rely upon confidential communications from a client.

In re Fischel, 557 F.2d 209 (9th Cir. 1977) : The Court affirmed a decision holding an attorney in contempt for refusing to produce certain summaries of business transactions with third party entities undertaken by a client to effectuate tax planning. Information in the summaries prepared by counsel was derived from the entities themselves, records maintained by counsel, and documents of the clients. After noting that the privilege protected an attorney's advice in response to confidential communications from the client, including papers prepared by an attorney that would tend to reveal the client's confidential communications, the Court held there was no adequate showing that the summaries would tend to reveal any confidential client communications.

Sprague v. Thorn Americas, Inc., 129 F.3d 1355 (10th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a grant of summary judgment in favor of the employer in a Title VII action, the Court held that a memorandum from in-house counsel to management, concerning charges of disparate treatment of employees, was properly found privileged. The Court noted a split of authority with respect to the privilege. The "narrow view" is that the privilege only protects communications from the client to the attorney, with the attorney's communications protected only insofar as they would disclose confidential client communications. The "broad view" provides independent protection for confidential communications from the attorney to the client. The Court opted for the broad view. Thus, the memorandum was protected by the privilege even though it did not disclose or refer to any confidential client communications.

American Standard, Inc. v. Pfizer, Inc., 828 F.2d 734 (Fed. Cir. 1987) : In a patent infringement case, the Court held that an opinion letter by outside counsel on the validity of a patent was not privileged, since it was based on nonconfidential, public records or documents and did not reveal, directly or indirectly, the substance of client communications.

[d] Attorney-Client -- Compulsory Process

Valdez v. Winans, 738 F.2d 1087 (10th Cir. 1984) : In a habeas corpus proceeding by a state prisoner, the Court found that the Sixth Amendment right to compulsory process did not compel a State Court to permit a defendant to offer a confession by another person that fell within the protection of that other person's privilege.

[e] Attorney-Client -- Confidential Communications

[i] Failure To Prevent Third-Party Reception

United States v. Lechoco, 542 F.2d 84 (D.C. Cir. 1976) : Reversing a conviction for kidnapping on other grounds, the Court upheld a ruling that a tape-recorded conversation between the defendant and his lawyer made while he was engaged in his illegal activity was admissible. The lack of privacy between attorney and client was entirely within the defendant's control.

United States v. Gann, 732 F.2d 714 (9th Cir. 1984) : The Court held there was no privilege where a suspect made a telephone call to his attorney while a search was ongoing and an officer was in a position to hear what the suspect said. In United States v. Landof, 591 F.2d 36 (9th Cir. 1978) , the Court held that no privilege covered communications between a client and lawyer when another lawyer was present who was not acting as an attorney or an agent.

United States v. Noriega, 917 F.2d 1543 (11th Cir. 1990) : Denying a television news network relief from an order prohibiting it from broadcasting intercepted communications between a detainee and his counsel, the Court noted that whether the detainee reasonably expected the communications to be confidential, after signing a release evidencing his understanding that all telephone conversations would be recorded, was an issue to be addressed by the District Court.

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Confidential Communications -- Intention that Attorney Will Disclose Information Communicated

United States v. Bohonnon, 628 F. Supp. 1026 (D. Conn. 1985) , aff'd, 795 F.2d 79 (2d Cir. 1985) : Enforcing an IRS summons, the Court ruled that "information transmitted to an attorney with the intention that it be included in the tax return is not covered by the privilege." The Court recognized that "the underlying papers or legal advice" might be protected.

United States v. Rockwell Int'l, 897 F.2d 1255 (3d Cir. 1990) : The District Court enforced an IRS subpoena, holding that a taxpayer's file analyzing potential tax liabilities and tax problems, which might be disclosed to independent auditors or the SEC, was not protected by the privilege. The Court vacated the order and remanded for specific factual findings as to the nature of the material in the file, who prepared and controlled it, and to whom it was disclosed, so that the Court could determine whether the conditions for the privilege were met or whether it was waived.

United States v. Aramony, 88 F.3d 1369 (4th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed in part the fraud conviction of the former CEO of the United Way of America, holding that communications with an investigative firm hired by UWA's general counsel to conduct an internal investigation were not privileged because, inter alia, there had been discussions from the time the firm was hired about making its report public. In In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 33 F.3d 342 (4th Cir. 1994) , a subsidiary, responding to a grand jury subpoena, refused to produce drafts, notes, and memoranda generated in connection with audit responses to an outside auditor. These documents were used by counsel for the subsidiary to prepare SEC filings. The Court held that the subsidiary's motion to quash the subpoena on grounds of privilege was properly rejected, since the documents revealed matters communicated to the attorneys "for their use in connection with public disclosures, which made the communications and data underlying them non-privileged under the relevant case law." In United States v. Oloyede, n17 the Court affirmed a lawyer's conviction for defrauding the Immigration and Naturalization Service by falsifying documents for citizenship applications, holding there was no violation of the privilege when the defendant's office was searched, because the information communicated by the clients was specifically intended to be used to file the applications and they had no intention that their communications be kept confidential. In United States v. Jones, n18 the Court affirmed denial of a motion to quash grand jury subpoenas issued to attorneys, expressing doubts as to whether the privilege attached when legal opinions were sought for inclusion in a lease promotion brochure. The Court relied upon Jones in In re Grand Jury Proceeding, n19 as it held that statements by a client and his joint-venturers relating to the subject matter of a prospectus that was being prepared were not privileged, since the statements were made with the expectation that they would be revealed. It did not matter, said the Court, whether or not the prospectus was ever published. In United States v. (Under Seal), n20 the Court cited its prior cases for the proposition that there is no privilege for communications made by a client who expects them to be used in a publication or distribution to others. The Court concluded, however, that the privilege does attach "if the client subsequently decides not to publish his communications and tells his attorney before the release of any of the communications," because in this situation the client's change of mind often will result from full and frank discussions with the attorney, and the privilege should promote such discussions.

United States v. Davis, 636 F.2d 1028 (5th Cir. 1981) : With respect to preparation of tax returns, the Court stated that "since part of the information that passes between the attorney and client will be disclosed on the tax returns directly or indirectly, that part at least is not a confidential communication and hence is not privileged."

United States v. Hubbard, 16 F.3d 694 (6th Cir. 1994) , rev'd in part on other grounds, 514 U.S. 695 (1995) : The Court affirmed a conviction for fraud and perjury in bankruptcy proceedings, holding that information elicited from the defendant's attorney was not protected by the privilege because what the defendant had communicated was to be conveyed to the bankruptcy trustee and the Court via a written pleading, so there was no expectation of confidentiality.

United States v. White, 950 F.2d 426 (7th Cir. 1991) : Affirming a defendant's conviction for bankruptcy fraud, the Court held that documents containing only information transmitted by the client so that it might be used on the bankruptcy schedules did not contain confidential communications protected by the privilege. See also United States v. White, 970 F.2d 328 (7th Cir. 1992) (companion case). In United States v. Windfelder, n21 the Court affirmed a defendant's conviction for understating his income in his federal tax return and for understating the estate of his aunt on an estate tax return. It found that documents submitted by the defendant to a law firm were not privileged, where the firm informed the defendant that it intended to comply with the IRS's request for information to explain discrepancies between the aunt's income tax returns and the estate return. Since the documents were provided for disclosure to the IRS, they were not confidential.

United States v. Spector, 793 F.2d 932 (8th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a cocaine conviction, the Court held that tapes made by an informant-witness concerning his daily activities on behalf of the government were protected by the privilege. The tapes had been made to assist the informant's lawyer in representing him and they were not given to the government. A dissenting Judge argued that the privilege did not apply because the tapes were ultimately to be given to the government to corroborate the witness' cooperation.

United States v. Abrahams, 905 F.2d 1276 (9th Cir. 1990) : Ordering enforcement of an IRS subpoena to an attorney-tax preparer, the Court held that the attorney had failed to show that his clients had communicated with him in confidence when they gave him information for their tax returns.

In re Pioneer Hi-Bred Int'l, Inc., 238 F.3d 1370 (Fed. Cir. 2001) : Monsanto sued Pioneer, its licensee of certain plant patents, alleging that the licenses did not survive the merger of Pioneer into a wholly-owned subsidiary of duPont. Monsanto sought in discovery to depose Pioneer's in-house counsel and obtain documents concerning information provided regarding the tax and intellectual property implications of the merger. The Trial Judge granted the request, on the ground that the privilege never applied because the information was intended to be disclosed in a proxy statement. Vacating most of the discovery order, the Court stated that "[a] party does not forego the privilege with respect to merger negotiations by disclosing the existence of the merger, the negotiations between the parties concerning the merger, or the property rights of the respective parties, and a waiver occurs only when a party relies on or discloses advice of counsel or other privileged information in connection with the merger." In this case such reliance and disclosure occurred only in the limited area of tax advice, where the proxy stated that the discussion of federal income tax consequences was the opinion of special counsel.

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Confidential Communications -- Miscellaneous Cases

In re Sealed Case, 737 F.2d 94, 1984-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P66062 (D.C. Cir. 1984) : The Court held that a former corporate attorney could be asked about hunches he had concerning the company's activities as long as the hunches were not based on information submitted confidentially by the company for the purpose of obtaining legal services. The Court also found that conversations on an airplane between the company's president and the attorney were privileged even though the president did not expressly state that his communications were confidential.

United States v. Moscony, 927 F.2d 742 (3d Cir. 1991) : During the grand jury investigation of a RICO fraud case, the defendant and several of his employees were all represented by a single lawyer. The employees made communications to the attorney, which he incorporated into affidavits and had them sign in the presence of the defendant, who notarized them. Affirming suppression of the affidavits, the Court held that the ultimate key to confidentiality is intent. There was ample support for the findings that the employees were unsophisticated lay persons who were not advised by counsel or anyone else that the information divulged would not be confidential, and that they did not intend to waive confidentiality by signing the affidavits.

United States v. Evans, 113 F.3d 1457 (7th Cir. 1997) : Before he was indicted for racketeering, the defendant went with a friend, who was a lawyer and who had represented his family in several matters, to meet with a criminal defense attorney. The friend was not permitted to represent the defendant in this case because the friend was a police officer. Affirming an in limine ruling to admit testimony by the defense attorney, the Court held there was no error in the findings below that the friend was not acting as a professional legal advisor and that the defendant knew that his friend's presence in the consultation threatened the confidentiality required for the privilege to apply.

United States v. Hatcher, 323 F.3d 666 (8th Cir. 2003) : The Court remanded a robbery conviction because the government had not been ordered to turn over tapes of jailhouse conversations between the cooperating coconspirators and their attorneys. The conversations were not privileged because the inmates and their counsel were aware that they were being recorded and thus could not reasonably expect that their conversations would remain private. The concurring Judge believed that the evidence in the record of whether the coconspirators knew that all phone calls were recorded was insufficient to conclude that the privilege had been waived, but that the government lacked standing to claim the privilege in resisting the discovery request. Affirming a cocaine conviction in United States v. Spector, n22 the Court held that tapes made by an informant-witness, who was cooperating with the government, concerning his daily activities on behalf of the government were protected by the privilege. The tapes had been made to assist the informant's lawyer in representing him and they were not given to the government. A dissenting Judge argued that the privilege did not apply because the tapes were ultimately to be given to the government to corroborate the witness' cooperation.

Gomez v. Vernon, 255 F.3d 1118 (9th Cir. 2001) : In the course of a civil rights action in which plaintiffs claimed that prison officials had retaliated against inmates who filed lawsuits or availed themselves of grievance procedures, defense counsel authorized and encouraged prison employees to search for and copy letters from opposing counsel that were kept in the inmates' legal files in the prison library. Appealing the imposition of sanctions for improper use of privileged materials, the defendants argued that any privilege had been waived because the inmates stored the files in an area accessible to prison employees. The Court found no error in the determination below that the inmates did all they could, in a prison context, to secure the documents' confidentiality by marking the binders with the name of the case, placing them on a restricted-access shelf, and requiring a sign-out procedure for use of the files. In United States v. Flores, n23 the Court held that an attorney was required to answer questions as to whether his client had provided information about an administrative claim the attorney filed alleging that a weapon had been improperly seized from the client, since the Court was entitled to ask whether the attorney had authority to file a document. However, confidential communications to the attorney were not a proper subject of inquiry. In United States v. Palmer, n24 the Court upheld a ruling that an attorney hired to transfer the defendant's personal effects from Utah to Washington could be required to answer questions concerning the material that was given to him by a third person to be shipped to the defendant, saying that "the communication was not confidential since a third party was involved."

In re Grand Jury Subpoena (Leen), 642 F. Supp. 230 (S.D. Fla. 1986) : The Court enforced a grand jury subpoena to an attorney-witness, holding that the identities of individuals who supplied counterfeit bills that the attorney placed in his bank account were not protected by the privilege. It expressed doubt that the payment was a confidential communication or something that was expected to be confidential, and reasoned that an attorney "cannot be used as a means of shielding potentially illegal activity, especially where the attorney/witness is a witness to a possible crime separate and apart from his representation of a client."

[f] Attorney-Client -- Corporate Privilege

[i] Former Employees

Amarin Plastics, Inc. v. Maryland Cup Corp., 116 F.R.D. 36 (D. Mass. 1987) : The Magistrate indicated that under some circumstances privilege will protect communications between former employees and corporate counsel. In Command Transp., Inc. v. Y.S. Line (USA) Corp., 116 F.R.D. 94 (D. Mass. 1987) , the Court applied state law in a diversity case, but concluded that State Courts would follow federal decisions, which indicated that communications between corporate counsel and a former employee were privileged.

In re Allen, 106 F.3d 582 (4th Cir. 1997) : Reversing a judgment of civil contempt against an attorney representing a state Attorney General and his Office, the Court held it was error to reject the privilege claim related to communications from a former Chief Deputy Attorney General, who had left the Office between the time of the relevant events and the time of the communications. Privileging such communications is consistent with the "need to know" focus of the Upjohn decision.

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Corporate Privilege -- Generally

Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383, 1980-81 Trade Cas. (CCH) P63797 (1981) : The Court held that the privilege extended in the corporate context to communications with employees beyond the "control group." This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 501.02[5][g].

Dowd v. Calabrese, 101 F.R.D. 427 (D.D.C. 1984) : In a libel action by former prosecutors against a reporter and his paper, the Court relied upon Upjohn to hold that information that an attorney related to the managing editor of the paper, which was the product of the attorney's talking with the paper's employees, was within the privilege.

Massachusetts v. First Nat'l Supermarkets, Inc., 112 F.R.D. 149, 1986-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P67327 (D. Mass. 1986) : The Court held that interrogatories submitted by an antitrust plaintiff that sought to compel the defendant's attorney to reveal the names, dates, and places of witness interviews invaded the privilege to the extent that they sought memoranda summarizing the results of interviews with corporate employees.

Hardy v. New York News, Inc., 114 F.R.D. 633 (S.D.N.Y. 1987) : In an employment discrimination action, a Magistrate ruled that if a corporation is to prevail on a claim of privilege with respect to documents, "in a situation where the author or recipient of allegedly privileged documents functions as a corporate manager as well as an attorney, efforts must include clear designation of those communications sent or received in his capacity as a legal advisor." In a patent infringement suit, Cuno, Inc. v. Pall Corp., n25 the District Court held that the privilege applied where an employee who communicated with counsel did so at the direction of a superior in order for the corporation to obtain legal advice, the subject matter of the communication related to the employee's duties, and the communication was not disseminated beyond the persons having a need to know. In Leucadia, Inc. v. Reliance Ins. Co., n26 the District Court ruled that where employees spoke to corporate counsel so that the corporation could obtain legal advice during its investigation of fraud by a former employee, their communications were privileged, whether or not the employees individually spoke in reliance on confidentiality. Ruling on discovery matters in Carter-Wallace, Inc. v. Hartz Mountain Indus., n27 the District Court found that employee interviews occurring during an internal investigation by the defendant company were privileged.

Tucker v. Fischbein, 237 F.3d 275 (3d Cir. 2001) : Affirming in part summary judgment for the defendants in a defamation action brought against news magazines and others, the Court held that the plaintiffs' motions to depose in-house counsel at the magazines were correctly denied. Where the communications with counsel were clearly for the purpose of rendering legal advice, the Court characterized the plaintiffs' argument that the privilege was waived because counsel reviewed stories "in the regular course of business" as "frivolous." In United States v. Amerada-Hess Corp., n28 the IRS sought to subpoena a report of the corporation's internal investigative committee (four outside directors) that interviewed officers and employees about possible improper foreign payments. Although the Court found that outside counsel's confidential report to the committee could fall within the privilege, it concluded that a list of persons interviewed that was attached to the report did not qualify as legal advice, nor did it threaten to disclose what anyone in the control group told outside counsel.

United States v. Mobil Corp., 149 F.R.D. 533 (N.D. Tex. 1993) : The Court denied an IRS petition to enforce a summons, finding that various documents were privileged, including a letter from tax counsel for a subsidiary to tax counsel for a parent, an internal memorandum from the tax department regarding foreign taxing authority, and other documents analyzing foreign tax law.

Henderson v. National R.R. Passenger Corp., 113 F.R.D. 502 (N.D. Ill. 1986) : In an employment discrimination claim by a discharged train attendant, the Court held that the privilege did not bar the defendant's former EEO investigator (i.e., the person who received complaints from other employees, investigated them, and reported to the legal department) from talking to the plaintiff's lawyer about the complaints made to her. The Court reasoned that the complaints were not privileged because they were antagonistic to the employer and they were not confidential, as the employees expected them to be relayed to third parties. In In re Sealed Case, n29 a securities fraud case arising when Seller Corporation sold stock of a Subsidiary to Purchaser, the Magistrate resolved disputes as to who held the privilege by reasoning that "[i]t is reasonable ... to treat the parties to a subsidiary divestiture by sale of stock as having contracted on the assumption that after the sale management of the divested corporation will control its privilege." However, as to a matter in which Seller and Subsidiary were joint clients prior to the sale, the rule requiring both clients to waive the privilege with respect to third parties applied.

Simon v. G.D. Searle & Co., 816 F.2d 397 (8th Cir. 1987) : Although various privilege questions turned on state law under Rule 501 in this product liability action, the Court applied federal law that: "the minutes of business meetings attended by attorneys are not automatically privileged"; "business documents sent to corporate officers and employees, as well as the corporation's attorneys, do not become privileged automatically"; and "[w]hen a client acts on privileged information from his attorney, the results are protected from discovery to the extent that they disclose the privileged matter, directly or indirectly." In Diversified Indus. v. Meredith, n30 after discussing and pointing out problems with the two then-prevailing tests of corporate privilege -- the control group and the scope of employment tests -- a majority of the en banc Court concluded that an employee's communications to a lawyer are privileged if the corporation bears the burden of showing: (1) that the communication was made for the purpose of securing legal advice by (2) an employee who was directed by a superior to make a communication (3) relating to his employment duties (4) so that the corporation could secure legal advice, (5) as long as the communication is not disseminated beyond those corporate persons who need to know its contents. This approach is similar to that advocated by Chief Justice Burger in his concurring opinion in Upjohn Co. v. United States.

United States v. Plache, 913 F.2d 1375 (9th Cir. 1990) : Affirming a conviction for securities fraud offenses, the Court held that the defendant could not assert the privilege for communications he had with attorneys who were representing not him but corporate entities in which he was interested, where the entities had been placed in receivership before the trial. Granting mandamus to vacate an order compelling production of statements obtained by the plaintiff's counsel in anticipation of a securities fraud action in Admiral Ins. Co. v. United States Dist. Court, n31 the Court held that the fact that one employee expressed an intent to invoke his self-incrimination privilege at a deposition did not abrogate the corporation's attorney-client privilege. The Court also held that the privilege was not lost even if the company planned to terminate an employee following his interview with counsel, and that communications between an employee of a subsidiary corporation and counsel for the parent corporation were privileged if the employee possessed information critical to the representation of the parent company and the communication concerned matters within the scope of employment.

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Corporate Privilege -- Intracorporate Dissemination of Privileged Information

FTC v. GlaxoSmithKline, 294 F.3d 141, 2002-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P73728 (D.C. Cir. 2002) : The Court reversed an order requiring the company to produce documents in the course of an FTC investigation concerning whether the company properly listed patented drugs in a compilation maintained by the FDA. The FTC argued that the attorney-client privilege was waived because documents were distributed too widely within the company, but the Court found that they went only to specifically named employees and contractors, most of whom were attorneys or managers and all of whom "needed to provide input to the legal department and/or receive the legal advice and strategies formulated by counsel." The Court also noted that the company was under no obligation to explain why each employee possessing a confidential document needed it to carry out his or her work, since a confidential document given to an employee with directions not to disseminate further can be presumed necessary for the employee's work.

[iv] Attorney-Client -- Corporate Privilege -- Shareholder Suits

In re Atlantic Fin. Mgt. Sec. Litig., 121 F.R.D. 141 (D. Mass. 1988) : The Court held that communications between former corporate officers and their counsel were privileged in a securities fraud action, since the conversations concerned corporate merger activity and sale of stock, and they occurred prior to the time stock was actually purchased and before a fiduciary relationship arose between the officers and shareholders.

In re Bairnco Corp. Sec. Litig., 148 F.R.D. 91 (S.D.N.Y. 1993) : In an action by purchasers of common stock against a corporation, its subsidiary, and the chief executive officer, the Trial Judge held that the Garner doctrine (infra) applied to actions by stock purchasers as well as to derivative suits and that good cause to abrogate the privilege was shown for eleven documents that he had reviewed in camera.

Garner v. Wolfinbarger, 430 F.2d 1093 (5th Cir. 1970) : The Court held in a shareholders' derivative action that the plaintiffs could obtain access to confidential communications between management and corporate counsel upon a showing of good cause. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 501.02[5][l][ii]. In In re LTV Sec. Litig., 89 F.R.D. 595 (N.D. Tex. 1981) , a securities fraud class action, the Trial Judge recognized a "good cause" exception to the privilege in actions brought by shareholders, but noted that no decision "subjects post-event communications to disclosure."

Fausek v. White, 965 F.2d 126 (6th Cir. 1992) : In an action by former shareholders alleging that the former majority shareholder, director, and CEO had abused his position, the corporation, which had not been sued, asserted the privilege when the plaintiffs attempted to depose the attorney who had advised the corporation and the defendant about his dealings in the corporation's stock. The Court affirmed denial of the privilege, holding that: the Garner doctrine (supra) applies to individual as well as derivative actions; the doctrine applies in actions to which the corporation is not a party when, as here, the defendant is the corporation's alter ego; and the corporation had a fiduciary duty to its shareholders under state law, which makes application of the privilege inappropriate when the plaintiffs have no other way to obtain the information.

Weil v. Investment/Indicators, Research & Mgt., Inc., 647 F.2d 18 (9th Cir. 1981) : The Court limited the Garner doctrine to the particular circumstances of derivative suits.

[g] Attorney-Client -- Death of Client

Swidler & Berlin v. United States, 524 U.S. 399 (1998) : The Court held that the privilege survives the death of the client. Consequently, counsel for a presidential aide was not required to disclose confidential communications that the aide made to him shortly before the aide committed suicide. The Court rejected the argument of the Independent Counsel that the traditional rule -- providing that the privilege survives the client -- should not be applied to thwart criminal investigations. It saw no reason to apply a different privilege rule for civil and criminal cases.

United States v. Osborn, 561 F.2d 1334 (9th Cir. 1977) :

> [T]he general rule with respect to confidential communications between attorney and client for the purpose of preparing the client's will is that such communications are privileged [not only] during the testator's lifetime [but] also after the testator's death, unless sought to be disclosed in litigation between the testator's heirs, legateees, devisees, or other parties, all of whom claim under the deceased client.

[h] Attorney-Client -- Evidence Delivered to Attorney

Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391 (1976) : Upon learning that taxpayers had transferred to their lawyers documents from their accountants relating to the accountants' preparation of tax returns, the IRS served summonses on the attorneys directing them to produce the documents. In upholding the validity of the summonses, the Supreme Court established that preexisting documents that can be demanded from the client cannot be secreted by transfer to a lawyer.

United States v. Strahl, 590 F.2d 10 (1st Cir. 1978) : The Court held that the privilege did not bar an attorney's testimony that a client passed him counterfeit bills, when there was no showing that the client sought legal advice with respect to the bills.

In re Grand Jury Subpoenas Dated Oct. 22, 1991 & Nov. 1, 1991, 959 F.2d 1158 (2d Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed an order to counsel for a grand jury target that required production of telephone records of the target's wholly owned corporations. As documents created by and received from an unrelated third party, the records did not become privileged by being given to an attorney in the course of seeking legal advice.

United States v. Robinson, 121 F.3d 971 (5th Cir. 1997) : The defendant was convicted of perjury after he denied that he had received a notice of forfeiture in connection with drug-related offenses. He did not claim that the government notice which he delivered to his counsel at the time was privileged; but he did assert that the fact of his transfer of the document, as well as his statements contemporaneous with that transfer, came within the privilege. Affirming the conviction, the Court found that delivering the document was intended merely to facilitate the representation and was not intended as a statement of communication. The defendant's receipt of the notice (which had been mailed to him at the jail) was quite public, so his subsequent possession of it was not intrinsically confidential; and he delivered it to the attorney seeking a representation in which it would reasonably be expected to be disclosed to others, so the possession was not in confidence. As for the contemporaneous statements, they were only a request for legal representation, which is generally not within the privilege.

[i] Attorney-Client -- Exceptions

[i] Crime or Fraud

[A] Civil Cases

Haines v. Liggett Group, Inc., 975 F.2d 81 (3d Cir. 1992) : Based on an in camera review and other evidence, the District Court had reversed a Magistrate Judge's order and held that the plaintiff in a cigarette wrongful death case would be entitled over a privilege claim to discovery of documents created by the special products division of the Council on Tobacco Research. The District Court held that there was prima facie evidence that the defendants were engaged in an ongoing fraud and that they had obtained attorney assistance to further that fraud. On petition for mandamus, the Court vacated the opinion because the District Court had improperly considered evidence that had not been presented to the Magistrate Judge, but noted that there had been no error in allocating the appropriate burdens and defining the quantum of proof necessary.

Horizon of Hope Ministry v. Clark County, 115 F.R.D. 1 (S.D. Ohio 1986) : The Court overruled motions for a protective order in a civil rights action, concluding that various materials were not privileged, because a prima facie showing had been made that they were prepared in order to perpetrate a tort.

Ferguson v. Lurie, 139 F.R.D. 362 (N.D. Ill. 1991) : In an action by limited partners alleging securities fraud in connection with a real estate partnership, the District Court found that the plaintiffs' reasonable belief that the advice sought by the defendants referred to future wrongdoing was insufficient to invoke the crime-fraud exception. In Sound Video Unlimited, Inc. v. Video Shack, Inc., n32 the District Court held that a client's communications concerning use and concealment of information obtained by wiretapping a telephone came within the crime or fraud exception where the client knew or recklessly disregarded the illegality of tapping. It also held that communications with attorneys concerning the installation and recording were privileged since they were not made in furtherance of illegal acts. In Leybold-Heraeus Tech., Inc. v. Midwest Instrument Co., n33 the District Court ruled that a prima facie case of fraud was made as to a patentee allegedly withholding information from the Patent Office in making a patent application and that, therefore, the exception applied.

In re BankAmerica Corp. Securities Litig., 270 F.3d 639 (8th Cir. 2001) : The Court granted a writ of mandamus to defendants in a securities fraud class action against a bank formed by a merger and individual officers of the merged and pre-merger banks. The Trial Judge had found that the crime-fraud exception applied to certain allegedly privileged communications, but the Court held that the plaintiffs had not made an adequate showing that the defendants had sought attorney help in furtherance of a fraud. Even if the defendants failed to disclose certain information about losses to shareholders, this did not establish that the defendants so informed their counsel and sought legal assistance to conceal information. In Pritchard-Keang Nam Corp. v. Jaworski, n34 the purchaser of subsidiaries, alleging that the insolvent parent corporation had committed fraud, sued the parent's counsel for negligently rendering an opinion letter without disclosing the companies' "sensitive payments" problems. The defendant resisted disclosing the report of an internal investigation into those problems that it had received from the parent's board some time before rendering the opinion letter. The Court held that the parent's failure to deliver the privileged report to the defendant counsel was not in furtherance of a fraud, and the privilege is not lost just because the client ultimately commits fraud with respect to matters in a privileged communication.

Motley v. Marathon Oil Co., 71 F.3d 1547 (10th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in an employment discrimination case brought by a plaintiff who was laid off, the Court found no error in upholding a claim of privilege as to a memorandum prepared by the employer's counsel concerning termination decisions. The plaintiff argued that the memorandum furthered illegal racial discrimination by urging layoffs of white employees and retention of underperforming minority employees. The Court, while recognizing some contrary authority on the point, held that the crime-fraud exception does not extend to tortious conduct generally. In White v. American Airlines, Inc., 915 F.2d 1414 (10th Cir. 1990) , an action by an employee alleging that he was wrongfully discharged in retaliation for refusing to commit perjury at the request of the defendant's outside counsel, the Court held that the alleged communications with the counsel were not privileged because of the crime-fraud exception. The employee's testimony provided a sufficient prima facie showing to trigger the exception.

Cox v. Administrator U.S. Steel & Carnegie, 17 F.3d 1386 (11th Cir. 1994) , modified on other grounds, 30 F.3d 1347 (11th Cir. 1994) : In an action by union members against the union and an employer, the Court held that the exception did not apply because there was no evidence that the union's communications with attorneys furthered or were closely related to any crime or fraud, even though the plaintiffs had evidence that might have demonstrated that the union was engaged in criminal or fraudulent conduct.

In re Spalding Sports Worldwide, Inc., 203 F.3d 800 (Fed. Cir. 2000) : The Magistrate Judge in a patent infringement suit ordered the plaintiff, assignee of the patent, to produce the invention record submitted by the inventors named on the patent to the plaintiff's corporate legal department. Granting the plaintiff's petition for mandamus, the Court held that the record was privileged and the crime-fraud exception did not apply. "Inequitable conduct" in a patent application is not the equivalent of common-law fraud because it does not require proof of a clear intent to deceive the examiner, and although there may have been a misrepresentation made to the Patent and Trademark Office in this case, there was no showing that the invention record at issue was made in furtherance of fraud during the prosecution of the patent.

[B] Attorney-Client -- Exceptions -- Crime or Fraud -- Criminal Cases

In re Sealed Case, 107 F.3d 46 (D.C. Cir. 1997) : Reversing an order to compel production of documents subpoenaed by a grand jury investigating campaign contribution violations, the Court held that the mere fact that a corporation's vice president violated the laws subsequent to a meeting with the corporation's counsel did not provide a sufficient showing that the corporation intended to further and commit a crime. Moreover, there was no way of knowing whether the vice president was acting on his own, against the advice of counsel, when he committed his violation. Therefore, on the material available at the in camera, ex parte review, it was improper to apply the crime or fraud exception to the privilege.

United States v. Reeder, 170 F.3d 93 (1st Cir. 1999) : Affirming convictions for wire fraud and interstate transportation of stolen property, the Court found no error when the defendant's former attorney was permitted to recount a conversation between the defendant and the attorney, in which the defendant proposed backdating documents and asked the attorney for "some ideas" on how to cover up a series of questionable loans. The Court held the testimony admissible under the crime-fraud exception and rejected the defendant's argument that he was simply seeking the attorney's advice about whether he could solve a problem in a particular manner. The defendant did not merely ask whether backdating documents would be legal; he affirmatively asked for the attorney's assistance in a cover-up. In United States v. Rakes, 136 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1998) , the victim of an extortion scheme lied under oath about why he sold his business; he testified that he did so voluntarily when in fact he was threatened with death unless he sold the business at below market value. In a perjury prosecution, the government sought to obtain privileged communications made by the victim to his attorney concerning the sale of the business and the reasons for the sale, on the theory that the communications were in furtherance of the extortion. The Trial Judge suppressed the communications, and the Court affirmed, declaring that under the crime-fraud exception, "it takes wrongful complicity by the privilege holder, not innocent or involuntary action, to forfeit the privilege."

In re Richard Roe, Inc., 168 F.3d 69 (2d Cir. 1999) : The Court reversed an order granted after remand n35 that required disclosure of documents from a major civil action to a grand jury investigating two corporations. The government's theory viewed the act of defending the lawsuit as itself being in furtherance of a fraud, but the Court believed that approach would collapse its two-part test for the crime-fraud exception, which requires both that the communication itself be in furtherance of the crime or fraud and that the communication was intended to facilitate or conceal the criminal activity. Absent a showing that the litigation had little or no factual or legal basis and was carried on substantially for the purpose of furthering the crime or fraud, the requisite finding that an otherwise privileged communication was intended to further the fraud cannot be made. In this case the defense hardly lacked any legal or factual basis, in camera examination of the subpoenaed material revealed only the kind of documents typically generated in the course of a legitimate defense of the particular kind of litigation, and there was no indication of an intent to create or present misleading or false evidence. In United States v. Jacobs, 117 F.3d 82 (2d Cir. 1997) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting letters to the defendant, who was charged with fraud, from his attorney, where there was evidence that the defendant knew the scheme was illegal and had set upon an illegal course before seeking the lawyer's advice, and where evidence showed that the defendant intended to use the lawyer's communications to further the scheme and did so. In In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum Dated Sept. 15, 1983 (Marc Rich & Co.), n36 the Court found a prima facie case that communications by a client to an attorney were in aid of a fraudulent sale of stock, but it rejected government claims that other communications were made for an improper purpose.

United States v. Inigo, 925 F.2d 641 (3d Cir. 1991) : The Court, reviewing Hobbs Act convictions, held there was no error in admitting testimony by a defendant's lawyers, as it all dealt with an extortion scheme that was ongoing at the time of the communications. In In re Impounded Case (Law Firm), n37 the Court held that the crime or fraud exception applies even where the client is innocent and the only criminal acts suspected are those of a lawyer.

United States v. Ruhbayan, 406 F.3d 292 (4th Cir. 2005) : The defendant was charged with obstruction of justice after he induced his girlfriend to testify falsely in his drug trial that she, and not he, possessed a pistol found in his van. Affirming, the Court held there was no error in admitting evidence that before his drug trial the defendant had asked his attorney about the possible sentences for possession of a firearm as a convicted felon and had told the attorney that the girlfriend claimed responsibility for the pistol. The communications were not privileged because they were made for the purpose of committing a crime or fraud upon the tribunal in the drug case. Affirming rulings upholding grand jury subpoenas to a bank being investigated for fraud in In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 102 F.3d 748 (4th Cir. 1996) , the Court held that the exception applies when the client communicates for purpose of committing or furthering a crime or fraud, regardless of the attorney's knowledge, and that the government made a prima facie case that the bank had acted with such a purpose.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 419 F.3d 329 (5th Cir. 2005) : The appellant's girlfriend expressed surprise when a pistol was seized in the house they shared, but shortly before his trial for felon firearm possession, she filed an affidavit claiming ownership of the weapon. As part of an investigation into whether the appellant and his girlfriend had conspired to obstruct justice or commit perjury, the appellant's attorney was subpoenaed to provide all written statements of the appellant and girlfriend and "all notes, records, and recordings of interviews" of them. Meanwhile, the girlfriend waived her rights and admitted that her pretrial affidavit was false, that she and the appellant had agreed she would change her original story, and that she had asked the attorney about the respective penalties for committing perjury and felon firearm possession. Based on the government's ex parte representations, the Judge conducted an in camera examination of the attorney and then denied the appellant's motion to quash the subpoena. The Court held that the government had made the required factual-basis showing to hold an in camera examination and the required prima facie showing to support application of the crime-fraud exception. However, it vacated the order to compel as being overbroad in applying to all communications with the appellant. The crime-fraud exception is limited to "those communications and documents in furtherance of the contemplated or ongoing criminal or fraudulent conduct"; here, the record did not indicate that the attorney's entire criminal representation of the appellant was based upon or sought for the sole purpose of perpetuating a crime or fraud. In United States v. Edwards, 303 F.3d 606 (5th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed convictions for racketeering and other offenses arising from schemes to make money from Louisiana's riverboat gambling licence process by using the governor's influence. Rejecting one defendant's argument that it was error to admit wiretapped conversations because of the attorney-client privilege, the Court found no clear error in the determination that the legal services sought by the defendant were "to conceal and cover up the crimes committed" with respect to extortion monies paid. Thus, "[r]ather than merely defending himself against wrongdoing, Brown was actively continuing the cover-up of extortion and perpetuating his tax fraud." In United States v. Neal, n38 the Court held there was no error in admitting evidence in a drug conspiracy prosecution that an attorney consulted by members of the conspiracy had informed them that their documents indicated an illegal money-laundering operation in which he would not become involved. Sufficient evidence supported the conclusion that the attorney had been consulted for advice to aid continuing or future illegal conduct. In United States v. Aucoin, n39 the Court held that the privilege had properly been denied to intercepted communications between the defendant bookmaker and his counsel, where the counsel, knowing of his client's participation in illegal activity and desiring to continue those activities, orchestrated a plan to recover seized gambling records and otherwise assisted the enterprise in its efforts to insulate itself from further raids by local authorities. In United States v. Soudan, n40 the Court noted that the "crime exception" applies whether or not the attorney knew that the client was seeking his services in aid of criminal acts. In United States v. Dyer, n41 the Court observed that an indictment charging fraud does not itself warrant disregard of the privilege.

United States v. Collis, 128 F.3d 313 (6th Cir. 1997) : The defendant was charged with obstruction of justice for submitting a forged letter from his employer to a Judge who was considering whether to revoke the defendant's parole. At trial the defendant's counsel at the parole revocation hearing testified that he received the letter from the defendant, who had stated that it was signed by his employer, and that counsel then submitted the letter to the Judge. The Court found that because the letter was undisputedly forged and there was probable cause to believe that the defendant was responsible for the fraudulent letter, the communications were in furtherance of the crime of obstruction of justice, and thus properly admitted. Even though there was no certainty, at the time the letter was submitted, that it would have any effect on the Judge's decision on whether to revoke parole, "the crime or fraud need not have occurred for the exception to be applicable; it need only have been the objective of the client's communication."

United States v. Hamilton, 128 F.3d 996 (6th Cir. 1997) : The defendant was convicted of tax evasion after the Judge excluded proffered receipts in reliance on a sealed pleading by a former defense counsel, which stated that she had reason to believe the defendant intended to commit perjury when testifying at trial. The Court held that the sealed pleading was not a breach of the privilege, because the counsel had an ethical obligation to disclose facts material to preventing a fraud being perpetrated upon the Trial Court.

United States v. Davis, 1 F.3d 606 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed denial of the defendant's motion in limine to preclude questioning of his attorney, who had represented him during a portion of the grand jury investigation that he was charged with obstructing. Because there was a prima facie case that the defendant had tricked the attorney into providing false information to the grand jury, the crime or fraud exception applied, and their conversations were not protected by the privilege.

United States v. Townsley, 843 F.2d 1070 (8th Cir. 1988) , modified on other grounds, 856 F.2d 1189 (8th Cir. 1988) (en banc): In a voting fraud case, the Court held that conversations between an attorney and various witnesses were not privileged, since the attorney "was interested in presenting a uniform, knowingly untruthful, story from the witnesses and actually coached them to that end." It also stated that "[a] conversation will not be cloaked with privilege when it is for the purpose of committing a crime." See also United States v. Horvath, 731 F.2d 557 (8th Cir. 1984) (testimony by an attorney did not violate the privilege, where the defendant-clients attempted to use the attorney to further ongoing criminal activity).

United States v. Martin, 278 F.3d 988 (9th Cir. 2002) : The defendant operated a fraudulent scheme in which he created an ostensible subsidiary office of a legitimate Hong Kong corporation. Without disclosing the scheme, he hired a lawyer to become counsel for the subsidiary. The lawyer also did a few small legal jobs for the defendant personally. When the lawyer began to suspect that the subsidiary was fraudulent, he disclosed his suspicions to the U.S. Attorney's office, which led to an investigation and the defendant's arrest, indictment, and conviction. Affirming, the Court held that the attorney's disclosures to the authorities were not privileged, so there was no error in refusing to suppress them. Even if there were an attorney-client communication, the privilege would not apply because the communications disclosed were all made for the purposes of furthering a crime or fraud, although the lawyer did not know that at the time. Reviewing a corporation's motion to quash a grand jury subpoena in United States v. Chen, 99 F.3d 1495 (9th Cir. 1996) , the Court held that there was sufficient evidence that privileged communications were in furtherance of crime or fraud to justify an in camera review. It reasoned that "[t]he privilege is the client's, so 'it is the client's knowledge and intentions that are of paramount concern to the application of the crime-fraud exception; the attorney need know nothing about the client's ongoing or planned illicit activity for the exception to apply. It is therefore irrelevant ... that [the lawyers] may have been in the dark.' " (The quotation is from In re Grand Jury Proceedings, n42 where the Court upheld a determination that communications were within the crime-fraud exception to the privilege, even though the attorney was unaware of the client's crimes and took no affirmative step that actually furthered them.) In United States v. Zolin, n43 the Court held on remand (after its prior decision was vacated by the Supreme Court, see the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 501.02[5][l][iii]) that partial transcripts of the communications at issue indicated that the purpose of the discussions was to cover up past wrongdoing and to plan for future frauds against the IRS, so the exception to the privilege applied.

In re Grand Jury Subpoenas, 144 F.3d 653 (10th Cir. 1998) : A hospital, its president, and others were targets of a grand jury investigation. When attorneys who had provided legal services to the hospital during the relevant period were called to testify, the president intervened to quash the subpoenas, and after that motion was denied, the attorneys asserted the privilege in response to virtually every question during their appearance. The Court held that the president could claim a personal privilege, but upheld a finding that the attorneys' legal services had been used in furtherance of the crimes under investigation, so the privilege was vitiated. In a prosecution for obstruction of justice and conspiracy, United States v. Sutton, n44 the Court held that the defendant's statement to his attorney that he could destroy certain records so the government would not get them was in furtherance of an illegal act and not privileged.

In re Federal Grand Jury Proceedings 89-10 (MIA), 938 F.2d 1578 (11th Cir. 1991) : The Court reversed a document production order in connection with the grand jury investigation of a failed savings and loan association, holding that confidential memoranda between a client and his attorney were privileged even to the extent that they merely memorialized information that might be discoverable by other means under the crime-fraud exception. In In re Grand Jury Investigation, n45 the Court held that the crime-fraud exception applies when there is evidence that, if believed, would establish the elements of a criminal or fraudulent violation that is ongoing or about to be committed, and the communication is related to the violation. Here, an attorney was required to answer questions as to sources of income disclosed by a client during the time that the client was seeking legal advice related to his tax evasion.

[C] Attorney-Client -- Exceptions -- Crime or Fraud -- Procedures

United States v. Zolin, 491 U.S. 554 (1989) : The Supreme Court held that Rule 104(a) does not prohibit use of in camera review procedures in ruling on privilege claims and set forth the showing required to warrant in camera review in the context of a claim that the crime or fraud exception to the privilege warrants disclosure. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 501.02[15].

In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 417 F.3d 18 (1st Cir. 2005) : In the course of a grand jury investigation, Lawyer I directed Client A to commit perjury before the grand jury after initially advising him to tell the truth. Lawyer I also represented Client B who might have had some connection with the perjury. Lawyer I consulted with Lawyer II and told Client A to recant the false testimony. Lawyer II represented other clients (Group C) connected with Client B and the pertinent events; Lawyer II had a joint-defense arrangement with Lawyer I, which allowed them to exchange confidences that their clients may have confided to them separately. The grand jury summoned Lawyer I and asked him about the prior perjury of Client A, but Lawyer I invoked Client B's attorney-client privilege and the joint-defense privilege shared with Group C. The District Court ordered Lawyer I to answer specific questions before the grand jury and forbade Lawyer I to disclose to anyone what he had been asked by the grand jury or other information relating to "the subject matter" of the grand jury investigation. The Court affirmed the grant of the motion to compel as to Client B's privilege, vacated (without prejudice to the government) as to the Group C clients' privilege, and modified the order limiting disclosure. The government argued that the crime-fraud exception defeated the privilege claims of both Client B and the Group C clients, so a central issue was what showing was required to pierce the privilege. The Court noted that while United States v. Zolin (see § 501.02[5][l][iii]) indicated the prescribed showing to obtain an in camera review of allegedly privileged communications, it did not prescribe the level of proof needed to pierce the privilege itself. The Court concluded that "it is enough to overcome the privilege that there is a reasonable basis to believe that the lawyer's services were used by the client to foster a crime or fraud." The Court emphasized that it is the client's engagement in crime or fraud and the client's intent that governs, and that "[f]orfeiture of the privilege requires the client's use or aim to use the lawyer to foster the crime or the fraud." The Court was satisfied that the reasonable cause standard was satisfied as to Client B, but noted that the compelled testimony of Lawyer I or other evidence could vindicate Client B in which case "there may well be room for protective remedies if the privilege is initially pierced but this turns out to have been in error." The Court found, however, that there was scant evidence that Group C clients retained Lawyer II in furtherance of a crime or fraud. It indicated that the government could ask the District Court to make an in camera inquiry as to Group C clients.

In re John Doe, Inc., 13 F.3d 633 (2d Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed an order compelling a grand jury's targets' former attorney to testify before it, holding the targets were not denied due process when they were excluded from in camera proceedings at which the Judge reviewed a sealed affidavit from an FBI agent setting out the factual basis for the government's invocation of the crime-fraud exception. Disclosure of the affidavit might have jeopardized the investigation, nothing in it indicated a special need for adversary examination, and there was no danger the Trial Court relied on privileged material in making its determination. The Court also held there was no due process violation when the targets were excluded from the in camera examination of the attorney regarding applicability of the exception and were prohibited from questioning him afterwards.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 223 F.3d 213 (3d Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed denial of a motion to quash a subpoena compelling testimony and production of documents by the target of a grand jury investigation and his attorney, holding that it was within the District Court's discretion, and not violative of due process, to rely on an ex parte government affidavit in determining that the crime-fraud exception applies and to deny the witnesses access to the affidavit. In Haines v. Liggett Group, Inc., 975 F.2d 81 (3d Cir. 1992) , the District Court, based on an in camera review and other evidence, had reversed a Magistrate Judge's order and held that the plaintiff in a cigarette wrongful death case would be entitled over a privilege claim to discovery of documents created by the special products division of the Council on Tobacco Research. The District Court found that there was prima facie evidence that the defendants were engaged in an ongoing fraud and they had obtained attorney assistance to further that fraud. On petition for mandamus, the Court vacated the opinion because the District Court had improperly considered evidence that had not been presented to the Magistrate Judge, but noted that there had been no error in allocating the appropriate burdens and defining the quantum of proof necessary. A party challenging the privilege must present evidence that, if believed by the factfinder, would be sufficient to support a finding that the exception applies, at which point the party invoking the privilege has a right to be heard. When an in camera inspection is requested, however, only the presentation made by the party challenging the privilege need be considered and only a factual basis sufficient to support a good faith belief by a reasonable person that the materials may reveal evidence of a crime or fraud is required.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings #5, 401 F.3d 247 (4th Cir. 2005) : In a proceeding in which an attorney sought to quash a grand jury subpoena for documents and testimony relating to his representation of two individuals and their corporation, the individuals intervened and sought to quash the subpoena, asserting the attorney-client privilege. The Trial Judge conducted an in camera, ex parte hearing in which the government presented evidence. Without examining the documents that were the subject of the privilege claim, the Judge found that the government made out a prima facie case that the crime-fraud exception applied and ordered disclosure. Reversing, the Court held that the government had made out a prima facie case for an in camera examination of the documents, but it was an abuse of discretion to hold the documents not privileged without an in camera examination, since there was no other evidence that the documents were connected to crime or fraud. Likewise, it was an abuse of discretion to order the attorney to testify regarding communications, because there was an insufficient showing that the communications bore a close relationship to criminal conduct. The Court remanded for an in camera examination of the allegedly privileged documents. In In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 33 F.3d 342 (4th Cir. 1994) , the government made an in camera submission to the Trial Court to demonstrate a factual basis that allegedly privileged documents were subject to the crime-fraud exception. However, the government did not offer the privileged documents themselves. The Court held that under these circumstances, the "good-faith belief" requirement for an in camera hearing, established in United States v. Zolin, supra , was inapplicable. The Court asserted that "Zolin does not proscribe all in camera reviews of in camera submissions absent the requisite threshold [good faith] showing. Rather, Zolin proscribes in camera review of the documents that are the subject of the subpoena and the asserted privilege in the absence of the requisite threshold showing."

In re BankAmerica Corp. Securities Litig., 270 F.3d 639 (8th Cir. 2001) : The Court granted a writ of mandamus to defendants in a securities fraud class action against a bank formed by a merger and against individual officers of the merged and pre-merger banks. The Trial Judge had found that the crime-fraud exception applied to certain allegedly privileged communications, but the Court held that the plaintiffs had not made an adequate showing that the defendants had sought attorney help in furtherance of a fraud. The Court also held it was an abuse of discretion to order the disclosure of the documents without conducting an in camera review. In a wrongful death action, In re General Motors Corp., 153 F.3d 714 (8th Cir. 1998) , the plaintiffs sought disclosure of certain documents that had been identified by GM in a privilege log in an unrelated lawsuit in another jurisdiction. The District Judge found a reasonable basis to believe that the crime-fraud exception applied, reviewed eight documents in camera, and then ordered GM to produce six of the eight for an additional "in camera hearing" at which the plaintiffs would participate. Granting GM's motion for mandamus, the Court held that it was error to order disclosure of the documents, even under a protective order, before it was established that the exception applied.

United States v. Chen, 99 F.3d 1495 (9th Cir. 1996) : Reviewing a corporation's motion to quash a grand jury subpoena, the Court held that an ex-employee could not waive the privilege, which belonged to the corporation with respect to communications made by employees to corporate counsel at the direction of corporate superiors. Since the ex-employee had no authority to reveal communications made to corporate counsel, it was error to disclose these communications to the District Court before it made a Zolin finding and ordered disclosure for an in camera review. The error was harmless, however, since there was sufficient evidence aside from the privileged communications to make the required threshold showing and to justify in camera review. In In re Grand Jury Subpoena 92-1(SJ), 31 F.3d 826 (9th Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed the denial of a motion to quash a grand jury subpoena served on corporate counsel to the target of a grand jury investigation; it also affirmed an order to submit the subpoenaed documents for in camera review to establish whether they fell within the crime-fraud exception. The Court held that in the first step of the Zolin analysis -- determining whether there is an adequate factual basis to support a good faith reasonable belief that an in camera review would reveal evidence to establish that the exception applies -- the District Court should focus only on evidence presented by the party seeking review. The Judge may, but is not required to, consider evidence presented by the party asserting the privilege only at the second stage, when it determines whether to order the review in light of the facts and circumstances of the particular case. In a money laundering prosecution, United States v. de la Jara, n46 the Court held it was error to make a sua sponte ruling admitting a letter to the defendant from his attorney under the crime-fraud exception based on an in camera review of the letter, where there had been no prima facie showing by nonprivileged evidence sufficient to support the need for an in camera review. The error had been waived, however, because the defendant made no effort to recover the letter or protect its confidentiality during the six months between the government's seizure of it and its introduction into evidence. In In re Grand Jury Investigation, n47 which involved an investigation into possible Medicaid fraud, the Court held that a corporation met its burden of making a prima facie showing that 11 documents were within the privilege, but it was error to refuse an in camera review to determine whether the documents were privileged or the crime-fraud exception applied. The Judge had declined to engage in "speculation"; the proper threshold allows some speculation, as it requires only a showing that in camera review may reveal evidence to establish that the exception applied or the privilege was inapplicable. There was no abuse of discretion, however, as the government's showing was not so strong as to require review.

In re Grand Jury Subpoenas, 144 F.3d 653 (10th Cir. 1998) : A hospital, its president, and others were targets of a grand jury investigation. When attorneys who had provided legal services to the hospital during the relevant period were called to testify, the president intervened to quash the subpoenas, and after that motion was denied, the attorneys asserted the privilege in response to virtually every question during their appearance. The Court held that the president could claim a personal privilege, but upheld a finding that the attorneys' legal services had been used in furtherance of the crimes under investigation. The Court found no abuse of discretion when the president was not permitted to review the contents of the government's ex parte, in camera submission or to present rebuttal evidence at a hearing.

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Exceptions -- Defense of Lawyer

First Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Oppenheim, Appel, Dixon & Co., 110 F.R.D. 557 (S.D.N.Y. 1986) : In a securities action against a securities dealer, its partners, and house counsel, the Court said that an attorney's compelling interest in defending himself may provide "good reason for recognizing a self-defense exception to the privilege in appropriate circumstances." Although the exception could be abused, the Court determined that a standard of "reasonable necessity" for disclosure, when combined with in camera review, could assure that the client's interests in confidentiality are not unnecessarily trampled. It held that fairness to the client required disclosure of all documents relating to communications revealed by the lawyer under the exception. In In re Friend, n48 the District Court held that an attorney could turn client documents over to a grand jury apparently investigating both the client and the lawyer, in order to defend himself against a potential accusation of wrongdoing.

Willy v. Administrative Review Board, 423 F.3d 483 (5th Cir. 2005) : An attorney claimed that he had been discharged from employment because of his report following an internal environmental audit, not really because of lying about contacts with a state agency, as the employer claimed. In a Department of Labor proceeding for violation of federal whistleblower statutes, the attorney sought the report in discovery, but the employer's claim of attorney-client privilege was ultimately upheld by the Administrative Review Board. Vacating that ruling, the Court held that the client's privilege in this case was subject to the exception for communications relevant to an issue of breach of duty between client and attorney, and that this exception could be asserted both defensively (when the lawyer is charged with breaching a duty) and offensively, as here (when the lawyer is claiming the client breached a duty to him). In United States v. Ballard, n49 the Court affirmed a conviction for making false statements in a bankruptcy application, noting that the defendant had not waived the privilege by suing the lawyer for malpractice, except to the extent necessary to permit the lawyer to defend against the claim.

In re National Mtg. Equity Corp. Mtg. Pool Certificates Secs. Litig., 120 F.R.D. 687 (C.D. Cal. 1988) : In a suit by third parties against a law firm and its client based upon allegations of fraud in the sale of mortgage-backed certificates, the Judge held that federal common law recognizes a self-defense exception entitling attorneys to disclose otherwise privileged communications when reasonably necessary to vindicate their innocence of alleged wrongdoing.

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Exceptions -- Will Contests

United States v. Osborn, 561 F.2d 1334 (9th Cir. 1977) :

> [T]he general rule with respect to confidential communications between attorney and client for the purpose of preparing the client's will is that such communications are privileged [not only] during the testator's lifetime [but] also after the testator's death, unless sought to be disclosed in litigation between the testator's heirs, legatees, devisees, or other parties, all of whom claim under the deceased client.

[j] Attorney-Client -- Fact of Consultations

United States v. Olano, 62 F.3d 1180 (9th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a bank fraud conviction, the Court found no error in the admission of the testimony by a lawyer in the defendant's office that he opened a bank account for the defendant and reviewed and completed certain documents relating to the sale of condominiums. This testimony disclosed no privileged communications, since it provided "only general descriptions of the work" that the lawyer performed and did not disclose the defendant's "motives, strategies or goals." In United States v. Carrillo, 16 F.3d 1046 (9th Cir. 1994) , on cross-examination of the defendant, who was charged with cocaine distribution, the prosecutor asked whether he had discussed his testimony with his attorney prior to taking the stand and, after the defendant admitted he had, asked about an event the defendant had discussed during direct examination that was interrupted by a court recess. The prosecutor used this line of questioning to expose a subtle difference in the direct testimony before and after the recess and thus to create an inference that the defendant's attorney had coached him during the recess. The Court held that there was no violation of the defendant's privilege, as the prosecutor's questions did not reach the substance of the legal advice given and coaching is a proper subject of impeachment. We are concerned about this sort of cross-examination, since the witness' denial of having a conversation could only be corroborated by having the attorney testify and the implication of coaching from an admission could only be rebutted by revealing privileged communications.

[k] Attorney-Client -- Fees, Client Identity and Address, etc.

[i] Attorney-Client -- Fees, Client Identity and Address, etc. -- Attorney Billing Issues

Zeus Enters., Inc. v. Alphin Aircraft, Inc., 190 F.3d 238 (4th Cir. 1999) : In a breach of contract action, the plaintiff sought to recover as damages attorneys' fees in an agency proceeding, but claimed privilege when the lawyer was asked about the factual investigation and legal research that had been done. Finding the plaintiff thereby prevented any inquiry into the reasonableness of the lawyer's bills, the Trial Judge excluded the fee expenditure from any recoverable damages. Affirming, the Court noted that the privilege protects only confidential communications, not every aspect of the lawyer-client relationship, and held that the plaintiff's blanket assertion of privilege did not satisfy its burden of establishing that the information sought was protected, so there was no error in striking the request to recover attorneys' fees. In Chaudhry v. Gallerizzo, 174 F.3d 394 (4th Cir. 1999) , the plaintiffs brought an action under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, alleging that they were overbilled for work performed by a law firm representing a bank during negotiations after the plaintiffs' default on a loan. They sought unredacted copies of the firm's billing records. Because the bills revealed the identity of federal statutes researched by the firm in planning for future litigation arising out of the default, the Court found they would have divulged confidential information regarding legal advice, so the Trial Judge did not err in holding them privileged.

Clarke v. American Commerce Nat'l Bank, 974 F.2d 127 (9th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed an order enforcing an administrative subpoena for billing statements from outside counsel, holding that statements containing only the identity of the client, the case name, the amount of the fee, and the general nature of the services performed were not privileged. In a proceeding to recover funds illegally obtained from a bankrupt savings and loan, Federal Sav. & Loan Ins. Corp. v. Ferm, n50 a preliminary injunction freezing the defendant's assets was modified to permit withdrawal of reasonable fees, and FSLIC, alleging that unreasonable fees were being charged, then obtained an accounting order against the defendant's law firm. The Court affirmed the order, holding there was no violation of the privilege, as fees are not generally privileged and the order amply protected confidential communications by an in camera review of the invoices.

O'Neal v. United States, 258 F.3d 1265 (11th Cir. 2001) : In an action by a decedent's estate to obtain a refund of federal estate taxes and interest, the Court held that the estate was not entitled to deductions for attorney's fees paid before and after the decedent's death. The Trial Judge found that a proper accounting was lacking, after the estate declined on privilege grounds to produce copies of legal fee invoices. Affirming, the Court noted that "it is the law of this circuit that information involving receipt of attorney's fees from a client is generally not privileged," and reasoned "that the estate may not assert entitlement to a monetary benefit on the one hand, and then hide behind a claim of privilege on the other."

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Fees, Client Identity and Address, etc. -- Benefactor Payments

In re Grand Jury Subpoena for Attorney Representing Reyes-Requena, 913 F.2d 1118 (5th Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed a decision that had quashed a grand jury subpoena seeking disclosure of the amount of a fee and the identity of the person who agreed to pay it to an attorney representing a drug defendant. Noting that fee and client identity matters generally are not privileged, the Court concluded that the exceptions to that principle were not applicable in the case because the attorney described only the known defendant as his client and presented no evidence of confidential communications with any third-party fee payer nor evidence that any such communications were for the purpose of obtaining legal advice for the third party. The Court also held that, when properly read, its prior decision in In re Grand Jury Proceedings (United States v. Jones) n51 created no "last link doctrine" independent of confidential communications. On remand, the attorney appeared before the grand jury and revealed the identity and fee arrangements made for the drug defendant by a nonclient third party, but refused to reveal the identity or fee arrangements of a client. The Trial Judge then gave the attorney an in camera, ex parte hearing, concluded that documents submitted under seal revealed a relationship prior to the representation of the drug defendant, and denied a government motion to hold the attorney in contempt. The Court affirmed, 926 F.2d 1423 (5th Cir. 1991) , agreeing that revelation of the client's identity and fee arrangements would breach confidential communications inextricably intertwined with the client's confidential purpose for retaining the attorney.

In re Subpoenaed Grand Jury Witness, 171 F.3d 511 (7th Cir. 1999) : The Court relied on its decision in In re Grand Jury Proceeding (Cherney) (infra) to hold that a benefactor payment was protected by the privilege. The lawyer's client paid the legal bills for other clients, and the government demanded that the lawyer disclose the identity of the bill-paying client. The Court was convinced that disclosure would lead to revealing the client's "motive to pay the legal bills" for some of the lawyer's other clients. In In re Grand Jury Proceeding, Cherney, n52 the Court affirmed the quashing of a subpoena that ordered an attorney to disclose the identity of the person who paid the legal fees for a person he represented in a drug conspiracy case. In camera review of pertinent documents revealed that the fee payer sought legal advice concerning his involvement in the conspiracy and that he paid the legal fees for representation in the very same matter that gave rise to his client relationship with the attorney; thus, disclosure of his identity would necessarily reveal his motive for seeking legal advice and would in effect expose the substance of a confidential communication.

In re Grand Jury Subpoenas, 906 F.2d 1485 (10th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed orders holding attorneys in contempt for refusing to provide client identity and fee information to a grand jury investigating whether a third party may have paid the legal fees for their clients. The legal advice, last link, and confidential communication exceptions to the general rule holding client identity and fee information not privileged were inapplicable because the attorneys had not claimed that their fees were paid by a client or that legal advice about the matter under investigation had been sought by the source of the fees.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings in Matter of Freeman, 708 F.2d 1571 (11th Cir. 1983) : The Court found that the identities of persons who paid lawyers' fees for others were not covered by the privilege. Even if the fee payers sought advice from the lawyers and became clients, they were not clients in the matters for which the fees were paid.

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Fees, Client Identity and Address, etc. -- Currency Transaction Reporting

Lefcourt v. United States, 125 F.3d 79 (2d Cir. 1997) : A law firm, reporting the receipt of a cash payment in excess of $10,000, refused to disclose the name of the client from whom it received the cash. The firm argued that it could not be penalized because it had reasonable grounds to believe that the identity of the client was protected by the privilege. Upholding the penalty assessment, the Court reiterated its position that the identity of the client is generally unprotected by the privilege. The mere fact that the client could be incriminated by the disclosure of his name is not enough to trigger the privilege, and there was no "special circumstance" that could apply in this case to protect the identity of the client. In United States v. Goldberger & Dubin, P.C., 935 F.2d 501 (2d Cir. 1991) , the Court upheld IRS summonses requiring attorneys to report names of clients who paid them cash fees over $10,000, finding that the reports did not require disclosure of confidential information.

United States v. Sindel, 53 F.3d 874 (8th Cir. 1995) : In an action to enforce an IRS summons requesting an attorney to provide identifying information regarding sources of cash payments over $10,000, the Court found after examining the attorney's in camera testimony about his clients' special circumstances that the attorney could not release information on behalf of one client without revealing the substance of a confidential communication, but found no similar constraints upon disclosure of information about payments from another client.

United States v. Blackman, 72 F.3d 1418 (9th Cir. 1995) : The Court upheld an order enforcing an IRS summons that required an attorney to identify a client paying more than $10,000 in cash and the nature of the services rendered in exchange for the cash. The Court found no evidence that any of the lawyer's clients were currently the subject of an ongoing investigation, so its "last link" exception did not apply; nor would the disclosure of client identity be tantamount to disclosing any client's motivation for retaining a lawyer, or any other confidential communication.

United States v. Leventhal, 961 F.2d 936 (11th Cir. 1992) : An attorney resisted IRS summonses for information necessary to complete currency transaction returns on the ground that compliance would violate the privilege. The Court ordered enforcement of the summons in toto, holding that client identity and fee information are generally outside the scope of the privilege, and that the "last link" doctrine did not apply when the authorities were aware of the clients' identities, having already secured indictments against them for drug offenses.

[iv] Attorney-Client -- Fees, Client Identity and Address, etc. -- Incriminating Client

In re Grand Jury Proceedings (Doe), 602 F. Supp. 603 (D.R.I. 1985) : The Court compelled a lawyer to answer questions about the identity of a client and the source of fees, although it recognized that in some circumstances information about fees might be privileged if it would incriminate a client on the same charges for which the client sought legal assistance.

Vingelli v. United States, 992 F.2d 449 (2d Cir. 1993) : Where a grand jury inquired about the identity of the source of funds that one attorney transmitted to another who represented a third party, the Court affirmed a contempt finding against the first attorney. Neither exception to the rule holding client identity or fee information outside the privilege applied: disclosure of the client's name in this case would not be tantamount to disclosure of a confidential communication, nor would it result in disclosure of the source of a confidential communication that had already been revealed. Although the source of the funds might be concerned that disclosure would lead to guilt by association, revelation of the source's identity would not be tantamount to exposing the purposes for which legal advice had been sought.

In re Grand Jury Investigation, 723 F.2d 447 (6th Cir. 1983) : Affirming a contempt citation against a lawyer who failed to disclose to a grand jury the identity of a client who had given him a check for services rendered, the Court rejected the argument that identity need not be disclosed where it would be the last link in a chain of evidence to incriminate the client. Because the privilege exists to protect confidential communications, it may not be claimed unless disclosure of information would threaten to reveal such communications.

In re Witnesses Before Special March 1980 Grand Jury, 729 F.2d 489 (7th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that the privilege attaches only to records that might tend to reveal confidential communications. Although "billing sheets or time tickets which indicate the nature of documents prepared, issues researched or matters discussed could reveal the substance of confidential discussions between attorney and client," and thus could be privileged, the Court declined to accept the argument that fee information that would not reveal communications or discussions is subject to a claim of privilege simply because it might incriminate clients.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings 88-9 (MIA), 899 F.2d 1039 (11th Cir. 1990) : The Court noted that the "last link" doctrine extends the privilege's protection to nonprivileged information (i.e., client identity) when disclosure would necessarily disclose other, privileged communications (e.g., motive or strategy), and when the incriminating nature of the privileged communications has created in the client a reasonable expectation that the information would be kept confidential.

[v] Attorney-Client -- Fees, Client Identity and Address, etc. -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Legal Services for New York City, 249 F.3d 1077 (D.C. Cir. 2001) : The Court upheld summary enforcement of a subpoena requiring a Legal Service Corporation grantee to provide case service information to the LSC Inspector General. The grantee did not show that the subpoena called for the disclosure of a privileged communication, and merely requiring disclosure of the identity of clients and the subject matter of the representations does not violate the privilege.

DiBella v. Hopkins, 403 F.3d 102 (2d Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed judgments in a libel action, holding there was no error in permitting use of an unredacted time record of the plaintiff's attorney to prove that a meeting between the parties had taken place. Under the applicable New York law, attorney time records and billing statements that do not contain detailed accounts of the legal services rendered are not privileged. In In re Shargel, n53 the Court affirmed an order enforcing a subpoena requiring a lawyer to produce records of all fee arrangements and property transfers from, to, or on behalf of named individuals. It stated that fee information and client identity are generally outside of the scope of the privilege.

Gannet v. First Nat'l State Bank, 410 F. Supp. 585 (D.N.J. 1976) , rev'd on other grounds, 540 F.2d 619 (3d Cir. 1976) : Where an attorney sent the IRS a letter in which he enclosed a cashier's check for more than $142,000, the Court held that the privilege did not embrace the client's identity, and that the IRS summons to produce bank records did not invade the relationship, because it was directed at a third party.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 204 F.3d 516 (4th Cir. 2000) : A grand jury investigating allegations that a property was being used as an open air drug market issued a subpoena to the lawyer who had responded to requests for information addressed to the property's title holder of record. The subpoena sought testimony regarding, inter alia, the identity of the attorney's client. The Court upheld denial of the attorney's and client's motions to quash, finding that the client's purpose for the representation (which the client had authorized to be disclosed in the attorney's response) -- to retitle the property in his name and deal with the problems on the property -- contemplated a disclosure of his identity. That was inconsistent with his argument that disclosure would reveal a confidential communication, his motive or purpose for seeking legal advice, so no exception applied to the general rule that client identity is not protected by the privilege.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings (Doe), 575 F. Supp. 197 (N.D. Ohio 1983) , aff'd, 754 F.2d 154 (6th Cir. 1985) : The Court held that a retainer agreement was not privileged and must be disclosed to determine whether the attorney was retained to perform ministerial or clerical, as opposed to legal, services.

In re Walsh, 623 F.2d 489 (7th Cir. 1980) : The Court ruled that an attorney called to testify before a grand jury about his clients must appear, and could not refuse on privilege grounds to answer questions about: the number of years of legal service to the clients, the general nature of the legal services, the fact of communication (not the contents), the whereabouts of the client, meetings where third persons were present, information received from third parties, and matters regarding legal fees.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 791 F.2d 663 (8th Cir. 1986) : The Court held that an attorney could be compelled to testify to the authenticity of a client's signatures and photograph on documents bearing the signature of the attorney attesting that she prepared them. These matters were observable to the public and the attestations negated any assumption that the matters were intended to be concealed from third parties.

In re Subpoena to Testify Before Grand Jury, 39 F.3d 973 (9th Cir. 1994) : Upholding denial of an attorney's motion to quash a grand jury subpoena that demanded disclosure of the identity of a client who paid the attorney with counterfeit money, the Court noted that the communication of the client's name and counterfeit payment "were entirely distinct" from the traffic and assault matters on which the attorney represented the client. Accordingly, disclosure of the identity and payment of the client would not be "in substance a disclosure of the confidential communication in the professional relationship between the client and the attorney."

In re Grand Jury Matter No. 91-01386, 969 F.2d 995 (11th Cir. 1992) : The Court held that an attorney was required to disclose the identity of two of his clients, one of whom may have paid him with counterfeit money. Disclosure of client identity, which is usually nonprivileged information, would not result in linking the clients with, or the disclosure of, protected confidences, so it was error to quash the subpoena.

[vi] Attorney-Client -- Fees, Client Identity and Address, etc. -- Revealing Confidential Communications

United States v. Liebman, 742 F.2d 807 (3d Cir. 1984) : The Court reversed an order granting enforcement of an IRS summons to a law firm seeking the names of all clients who paid fees over a three-year period in connection with the acquisition of certain tax shelters. Although the Court stated that "[i]f the summons merely requested the names of clients who paid fees, the information would not be protected by the privilege," it reasoned that the IRS sought to have the firm indicate the names of persons whom it had given certain advice concerning deductions relating to a tax shelter. In effect, the IRS sought the substance of confidential communications and thus invaded the area of privileged communications.

United States v. Sanders, 979 F.2d 87 (7th Cir. 1992) : Testimony was admitted in a drug case that the defendant's attorney visited two alleged coconspirators who were incarcerated; he told them he represented the defendant and asked whether they had made statements to the police. The Court noted that since the defendant had not been charged at the time the lawyer made the visit, disclosing the representation might have conveyed the substance of the defendant's confidential communications. However, any privilege claim was waived by objecting only on (unavailing) hearsay grounds.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 33 F.3d 1060 (9th Cir. 1994) : The Court upheld a judgment of contempt resulting from an attorney's refusal to produce records pertaining to fee information and fee arrangements with a client. While that information might have indicated that the client retained the attorney to represent him in a grand jury investigation, the Court concluded that this fact did not "in and of itself reveal any confidential information." By contrast, in Ralls v. United States, 52 F.3d 223 (9th Cir. 1995) , the Court ordered that a subpoena served on Ralls, a defense attorney, be quashed on the basis of the privilege. The subpoena sought disclosure of the identity of the person who paid the fee for a criminal defendant represented by Ralls. Upon examination of Ralls' sealed affidavit, the Court held that the identity of the fee payer was privileged because the fee payer was also Ralls' client, and had specifically discussed his own criminal liability in connection with the same crime charged against the client whose fee was paid. The Court found that the client-fee payer's identity and the fee arrangements were "so intertwined with confidential communications that revealing either the identity or the arrangements would be tantamount to revealing a privileged communication." In In re Horn, n54 the Court reversed an order finding a criminal defense attorney in contempt for failing to satisfy a grand jury subpoena seeking production of, inter alia, any records relating to fee arrangements between him and named individuals and records of trust accounts, as well as all records pertaining to financial transactions by the clients. In order to comply fully with the subpoena, the attorney would have to produce retainer agreements and other documents that might reveal the client's motivation for seeking legal representation; this would be an unjustifiable intrusion into the relationship. The breadth of the subpoena excused the attorney from listing and describing even for the District Court the content of documents the government knew in advance were beyond its reach and from producing the requested documents for an in camera inspection. In Dole v. Milonas, n55 an action to enforce a subpoena under ERISA, the Court held that an attorney providing legal services was required to identify the recipients of the services, because his argument that the information might lead to disclosure that they had applied for amnesty and presumably were undocumented aliens was insufficient to show that disclosure of the client's identity would be tantamount to a disclosure of a confidential communication. The case was remanded, however, because the subpoena requiring production of documents "reflecting the nature and extent of the services rendered" would be virtually certain to result in disclosure of confidential communications.

[l] Attorney-Client -- Fiduciary Litigation

In re Long Island Lighting Co., 129 F.3d 268 (2d Cir. 1997) : In an action seeking relief under ERISA, the employees sought disclosure of communications made by the employer to counsel with respect to amendments to the employee benefit plan. The employer retained the same attorney for matters concerning both the administration of the plan and amendments to the plan. With respect to the administration of the plan, the employer acts in a fiduciary capacity under ERISA; however, the employer does not act as a fiduciary with respect to amendments to the plan. The employees argued that since communications pursuant to fiduciary duties are not privileged as against the beneficiary, the employer waived the right to protect the communications respecting amendments to the plan by using the same attorney for both fiduciary and non-fiduciary functions. But the Court disagreed. Since the tasks were divisible, there was no reason to find a loss of the privilege simply because the same lawyer was hired for both functions.

Wildbur v. Arco Chem. Co., 974 F.2d 631 (5th Cir. 1992) : In employees' ERISA litigation, the Court held that communications between the employer's trial counsel and the plan administrator were privileged because there had never been a mutuality of interest creating a fiduciary relationship with the plan beneficiaries and the communications all dealt with defending the pending lawsuit and not with plan administration. The Court expressed no opinion on the decision below that communications made after the lawsuit had been filed between in-house counsel and the plan administrator were also privileged, as they were in any event protected by the work product doctrine. In Garner v. Wolfinbarger, 430 F.2d 1093 (5th Cir. 1970) , the Court held that shareholders in derivative litigation could obtain access to privileged communications by corporate management on a showing of good cause. This case is discussed in § 501.02[5][l][ii].

Bland v. Fiatallis No. Am., Inc., 401 F.3d 779 (7th Cir. 2005) : Retired employees sued their former employer for breach of ERISA obligations after it replaced their health benefits plan with one less favorable to them. Although the Court reversed summary judgment that had been granted for the employer, it held that the plaintiffs were properly denied access to communications between the employer and its counsel regarding the replacement health plan. The plaintiffs argued that the communications came within the exception under which a fiduciary of an ERISA plan must make available to a beneficiary any communications with an attorney "that are intended to assist in the administration of the plan." Holding that the fiduciary-duty exception to the privilege was inapplicable in this case, the Court reasoned that "an employer acts as a fiduciary only when it undertakes plan management or administration," but it > acts in a dual capacity as both the manager of its business and as a fiduciary with respect to unaccrued welfare benefits[; it] is free to alter or eliminate such benefits without considering employees' interests[;] and [it] does not owe its employees a fiduciary duty when it amends or abolishes unaccrued benefits.

United States v. Mett, 178 F.3d 1058 (9th Cir. 1999) : The Court reversed convictions for embezzling from a pension plan because of the erroneous admission of legal memoranda advising the defendants, as trustees of the pension plan, about their personal civil and criminal exposure in light of their undocumented withdrawals of plan funds. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 501.02[5][l][ii]. In In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 162 F.3d 554 (9th Cir. 1999) , the Court held that the privilege did not protect communications between a trustee of an ERISA pension fund and the fund's attorney concerning allegations that the trustee was involved in receiving kickbacks. The Court relied on a line of cases beginning with Riggs National Bank v. Zimmer, n56 which hold that "trustees may not block inquiry by their own beneficiaries into the proper management of the assets entrusted to them by relying on the privilege." Although in this case it was the government, and not the beneficiaries, that was seeking access to the attorney-trustee communications, the Riggs doctrine was still applicable, because the government was standing in the shoes of the beneficiaries by investigating and prosecuting malfeasance in the administration of an ERISA fund. In In re Subpoenas Duces Tecum Dated March 16, 1992, n57 a corporate principal, sued by a creditors' committee appointed during the corporation's bankruptcy proceedings, subpoenaed documents relating to the corporation and the committee. Reversing a ruling that the privilege did not apply to confidential communications between a creditors' committee and its attorneys, the Court held that the committee's need for competent and effective representation justified recognizing the privilege even though the committee's activities were for the benefit of all creditors, especially where disclosure was sought by a person engaged in adversarial litigation with the committee and its counsel.

[m] Attorney-Client -- Government Attorneys

[i] Civil Cases

Tax Analysts v. IRS, 117 F.3d 607 (D.C. Cir. 1997) : A non-profit organization sought to compel the IRS to disclose memoranda that were prepared by the Office of Chief Counsel for the IRS in response to requests from field personnel for legal guidance. Although there is a relationship between the Office of Chief Counsel and the IRS, the Court held that the memoranda were simply statements of the IRS's legal position, as they did not reveal any confidential information about the IRS itself. To the extent that information about an individual taxpayer was revealed, this would not be privileged, since the taxpayer is not a client. The Court recognized, however, that any information in the memoranda concerning "the scope, direction or emphasis of audit activity" would be protected by the privilege, and that those portions, if they existed, would be exempt from disclosure. In Schlefer v. United States, n58 a Freedom of Information Act case, the Court held that indexed Chief Counsel Opinions of the Maritime Administration, which recorded important legal advice from the Chief Counsel concerning agency rulings on various matters, did not come within the privilege because the factual information contained in the opinions came from third parties seeking rulings, not from officials of the agency, and the officials added no new or confidential information when they transmitted the relevant facts to the Chief Counsel. In Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, n59 another FOIA case, the Court held that the privilege did not apply to memoranda prepared by the Department's lawyers in response to requests by Department auditors, responsible for checking compliance by private firms with agency regulations, for interpretations of the pertinent regulations. "If the auditors should encounter a problem of regulatory interpretation, a request for advice would be sent to the regional counsel, couched in a specific factual context, either real or hypothetical. The response would be a legal memorandum ... ." There was insufficient showing that the memoranda reflected confidential information or that they were kept confidential.

Maine v. United States Dep't of Interior, 298 F.3d 60 (1st Cir. 2002) : In an action by the State under the Freedom of Information Act seeking disclosure of documents from federal agencies relating to the listing of certain fish populations that are protected by the Endangered Species Act, the Court affirmed a ruling that various documents were not protected by the attorney-client privilege. The Court noted that the Department of the Interior "failed to explain, or even attempt to explain except in conclusory statements, how the documents claimed to be protected establish that they relate to a confidential client communication." In Texaco P.R., Inc. v. Department of Consumer Affairs, 60 F.3d 867 (1st Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed denial of the Department's petition for restitution of profits accrued during pendency of an injunction against enforcement of a Department regulation. It held there was no clear error in a ruling that certain correspondence between the Department and its outside counsel was not covered by the privilege, since the Department had delegated policymaking authority to counsel to such an extent that counsel ceased to function as lawyers and began to function as regulators. In Town of Norfolk v. United States Army Corps of Eng'rs, n60 an action under the Clean Water Act challenging the Corps' grant of a permit to fill wetlands, the Court held that communications between the Corps and the United States Attorney were protected by the privilege and properly not made part of the administrative record, as there was a relationship between the agencies, the communications were for the purpose of providing legal advice in reasonably anticipated litigation, and they had not been disclosed to third parties.

Department of Econ. Dev. v. Arthur Andersen & Co., 139 F.R.D. 295 (S.D.N.Y. 1991) : Rejecting claims of privilege by the Department, an agency of the British government, the Court held that although government agencies can be clients with agency lawyers functioning as attorneys, the Department failed to meet its burden of presenting the underlying facts or circumstances demonstrating the existence of the privilege. In Resolution Trust Corp. v. Diamond, 773 F. Supp. 597 (S.D.N.Y. 1991) , the District Court, ruling on privilege claims by the RTC in an action to repudiate leases, noted that the privilege does not protect communications between client and counsel where counsel are acting as regulatory decision-makers rather than as attorney advisors. In Mobil Oil Co. v. Department of Energy, n61 the District Court rejected for the most part the Department's privilege claim against production of certain documents, since neither the index of documents nor the documents themselves made clear "whether the communication relates to a fact of which the attorney was informed for the purpose of securing primarily either an opinion of law or legal services or assistance in some legal proceeding."

Coastal Corp. v. Duncan, 86 F.R.D. 514 (D. Del. 1980) : Rejecting the Department of Energy's claim of privilege in an action by oil refiners challenging DOE regulations, the Court noted that to claim the privilege the agency must show that documents were intended to be confidential and were kept confidential and that they were prepared in order to get legal advice, not for policy-making purposes.

Ross v. City of Memphis, 423 F.3d 596 (6th Cir. 2005) : The plaintiff, a black police officer, was one of 52 officers who were engaged in a long-running Title VII lawsuit against the City regarding a compromised promotion exam. As a result of disciplinary proceedings related to compromise of the exam, she was demoted in rank but subsequently restored to her previous position. She brought a civil rights action against the City and its former police director (as an individual) for her demotion. In discovery the director claimed that he went forward with the plaintiff's disciplinary proceeding upon the advice of counsel for the City, but the City objected that the communications were privileged. On interlocutory review of an order ordering the director to disclose the communications, the Court reversed. It held that municipalities may claim the attorney-client privilege for confidential legal communications between their attorneys and their employees, at least in civil actions, and that the City's interest was not to be balanced against the adversary's need for the information in pursuing her claim against the individual former employee, so his advice of counsel defense did not waive the City's privilege. However, there was some indication that the director had sought the advice in an individual capacity; if that were found on remand, the City would have no privilege and the director's defense would operate to waive his privilege. In a reverse discrimination case, Reed v. Baxter, 134 F.3d 351 (6th Cir. 1998) , the plaintiffs sought inquiry into statements made at a meeting between the city attorney, the city manager, and some city councilmen, which was called by the councilmen to seek some explanation after they had received complaints from constituents concerning the promotion process for public employees. The Court, assuming without deciding that the privilege applies to municipal corporations, found reversible error in a protective order against inquiry into the communications at the meeting. The privilege could not apply because the councilmen were not part of the client represented by the city attorney; as elected officials investigating the reasons for executive misbehavior, their interests and those of the city executives were not the same. Thus, the councilmen were third parties to the relationship between the city attorney and the city manager and communications made in their presence were not confidential.

Bogle v. McClure, 332 F.3d 1347 (11th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed judgments for library employees alleging that the county library board and library director engaged in racial discrimination in transferring the employees to other jobs. The Court found no error in admitting memoranda from the county attorney to the library director concerning the advisability and legality of the transfers, since the defendants had not satisfied their burden in showing that the memoranda were intended to be confidential. The memos were not designated as "privileged"; the defendants presented no evidence on how widely the memos were distributed, or whether there was any understanding that the memos were to be and remain confidential. And, most importantly, "it was not reasonable under the circumstances to expect the memoranda to be confidential because the memoranda might have been public records under the Georgia Open Records Act."

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Government Attorneys -- Criminal Cases

In re Lindsey, 158 F.3d 1263 (D.C. Cir. 1998) (per curiam): A Deputy White House Counsel refused on grounds of the attorney-client and executive privileges to give testimony before a grand jury investigating the President. Affirming an order compelling the testimony, the Court held that a government attorney may not invoke the privilege in response to grand jury questions seeking information relating to the possible commission of a federal crime. One Judge dissented on the grounds of the Presidency's unique need for confidential legal advice and the adverse consequences of abrogating the privilege for the President.

In re Grand Jury Investigation, 399 F.3d 527 (2d Cir. 2005) : The Court reversed an order that would have required the former chief legal counsel in the office of the Governor of Connecticut to reveal to a federal grand jury the contents of private conversations she had with the Governor and members of his staff for the purpose of providing them legal assistance. The grand jury was investigating possible criminal violations by the Governor and the staff members in receiving gifts from private parties who did business with the State. The government conceded that a governmental attorney-client privilege may be invoked in civil suits between government agencies and private litigants, but it argued that such a privilege does not extend to criminal cases, and relied on rulings to that effect in three Circuits. The Court held that the governmental attorney-client privilege applies in criminal, as well as civil, cases, reasoning:

> It is crucial that government officials, who are expected to uphold and execute the law and who may face criminal prosecution for failing to do so, be encouraged to seek out and receive fully informed legal advice. Upholding the privilege furthers a culture in which consultation with government lawyers is accepted as a normal, desirable, and even indispensable part of conducting public business. Abrogating the privilege undermines that culture and thereby impairs the public interest.

In re Witness Before the Special Grand Jury 2000-2, 288 F.3d 289 (7th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed an order compelling a state government attorney to testify before a grand jury concerning legal advice he provided to the Illinois Secretary of State's office. The Court noted that "at least in the civil and regulatory context, the government is entitled to the same attorney-client privilege as any other client," but it held that "the privilege between a government attorney and her official client does not extend to criminal proceedings, such as a grand jury investigation." The Court expressed no opinion on the decision below that the current Secretary of State was the holder of any privilege and had the authority to waive the privilege.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum, 112 F.3d 910 (8th Cir. 1997) : The District Court quashed a grand jury subpoena for notes taken at a meeting after the First Lady testified before a grand jury in the Whitewater matter. Present at the meeting were Mrs. Clinton, her personal attorneys, and White House counsel. The White House argued that communications from government agents to government attorneys, made in confidence, were entitled to the privilege. Reversing, the Court held that the privilege does not protect statements made to government attorneys, at least in the context of a grand jury investigation.

[n] Attorney-Client -- Holder of Privilege

[i] Generally

United States v. De Lillo, 448 F. Supp. 840 (E.D.N.Y. 1978) : When the former attorney of a union pension fund was called to testify about communications between himself and members (mostly former members) of the fund's board of trustees, the Court held that the "client" protected by the privilege could be viewed as the pension fund or possibly its board of trustees, but that, whichever view was taken, the "client" was not any individual trustee. Since the board of trustees in power at the time that the privilege was claimed was willing to waive it, the attorney could testify about the communications.

In re Grand Jury Subpoenas, 89-3 & 89-4, 902 F.2d 244 (4th Cir. 1990) : Reviewing a motion to quash subpoenas for papers held by a movant and its previously wholly owned subsidiary, the Court held that upon its divestiture the subsidiary's managers could waive the privilege with respect to documents it generated, but that to the extent the documents were generated in a matter of common interest with the movant, even if the parties were not joint defendants in that matter, waiver of the privilege required the movant's consent.

In re Auclair, 961 F.2d 65 (5th Cir. 1992) : At the instance of a lawyer allegedly involved in a fraud scheme, the lawyer's secretary and her husband, together with the lawyer, consulted another attorney to see whether he would represent them in a pending grand jury investigation. After interviewing each of the three separately and together, the attorney declined to represent the secretary and her husband. The attorney was subsequently ordered to testify about the interviews, but the Court reversed, holding, inter alia, that any waiver by the secretary or her husband did not defeat any privilege possessed by the client-lawyer.

United States v. Layton, 855 F.2d 1388 (9th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring to kill a Congressman, holding that the defendant could not claim the privilege for statements made by a cult leader to the cult's counsel, where the defendant made no showing that he was, or sought to be, represented by the lawyer. See also In re Boileau n62(a debtor who had been removed from any substantial participation in the management of his business during the pendency of a bankruptcy case retained no authority to assert the privilege; on the facts presented, waiver authority resided in an independent examiner who had been appointed to investigate the business).

In re Diasonics Sec. Litig., 110 F.R.D. 570 (D. Colo. 1986) : The Court held that where one corporation was acquired by another, and the officers of the acquired corporation became officers of the acquiring corporation, the right to claim the privilege rested with the acquiring corporation. It concluded that where two officers violated their fiduciary duty to the acquired corporation by seeking legal advice contrary to their responsibilities, the privilege would give way to the shareholders' right to discover the communications.

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Holder of Privilege -- Individual or Entity

In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 274 F.3d 563 (1st Cir. 2001) : When a grand jury subpoenaed a corporation's records, the corporation waived its privilege, but two of its former officers and its former attorney intervened and moved to quash. The intervenors claimed that the attorney had represented the officers as well as the corporation and that the representation of all was pursuant to an oral joint defense agreement making communications among the three clients jointly privileged. The Court affirmed denial of the motion to quash, holding that the individuals held no privilege as to communications made in their corporate capacities; therefore, any joint defense agreement was irrelevant and the corporation's waiver of its privilege was effective.

United States v. International Bhd. of Teamsters, 119 F.3d 210 (2d Cir. 1997) : During an investigation of a union election, the campaign organization of one candidate waived its privilege for communications with the organization's counsel. However, the campaign manager claimed a personal privilege for communications in which he participated. The Court upheld a ruling denying the manager's claim, holding that he held no privilege, where the communications concerned only matters relevant to the campaign and not to him as an individual and he neither sought nor received legal advice from the attorneys on personal matters. Although recognizing that the attorneys had not been as clear as they might have been regarding the possibility of conflicts and the fact that they represented the organization alone, the Court refused the manager's invitation to adopt a "reasonable belief" standard for employee disclosures to corporate counsel on corporate matters.

In re Bevill, Bresler & Schulman Asset Mgt. Corp., 805 F.2d 120 (3d Cir. 1986) : Affirming a discovery ruling, the Court held that corporate officers could not assert a privilege after the corporation waived it, and that no joint defense privilege could be claimed where there was no showing that the corporation and the officers agreed to pursue a joint defense strategy.

Ross v. City of Memphis, 423 F.3d 596 (6th Cir. 2005) : The plaintiff, a black police officer, was one of 52 officers who were engaged in a long-running Title VII lawsuit against the City regarding a compromised promotion exam. As a result of disciplinary proceedings related to compromise of the exam, she was demoted in rank but subsequently restored to her previous position. She brought a civil rights action against the City and its former police director (as an individual) for her demotion. In discovery, the director claimed that he went forward with the plaintiff's disciplinary proceeding upon the advice of counsel for the City, but the City objected that the communications were privileged. On interlocutory review of an order ordering the director to disclose the communications, the Court reversed. It held that municipalities may claim the attorney-client privilege for confidential legal communications between their attorneys and their employees, at least in civil actions, and that the City's interest was not to be balanced against the adversary's need for the information in pursuing her claim against the individual former employee, so his advice of counsel defense did not waive the City's privilege. However, there was some indication that the director had sought the advice in an individual capacity; if that were found on remand, the City would have no privilege and the director's defense would operate to waive his privilege. In United States v. Dakota, 197 F.3d 821 (6th Cir. 1999) , at the trial of an agent of a tribal organization for tax fraud and receiving kickbacks, the attorney for the tribe testified that he conferred with the defendant on two occasions and told him that payments he was receiving had to be disclosed to and approved by the tribal council. Affirming, the Court found that there was no evidence that the defendant contacted the lawyer "for legal advice as an individual as opposed to seeking advice from O'Leary in his position as tribal attorney," so the defendant had no right to claim a privilege.

United States v. Chen, 99 F.3d 1495 (9th Cir. 1996) : Reviewing a corporation's motion to quash a grand jury subpoena, the Court held that an ex-employee could not waive the privilege, which belonged to the corporation with respect to communications made by employees to corporate counsel at the direction of corporate superiors.

In re Grand Jury Subpoenas, 144 F.3d 653 (10th Cir. 1998) : A hospital, its president, and others were targets of a grand jury investigation. When attorneys who had provided legal services to the hospital during the relevant period were called to testify, the president intervened to quash the subpoenas, and after that motion was denied, the attorneys asserted the privilege in response to virtually every question during their appearance. The Court held that the president could claim a personal privilege, but that it extended only to the very small portion of communications in which he sought legal advice as to his personal liability without regard to any corporate considerations. The Court noted that a corporate officer claiming a personal privilege must show that it was clear when counsel was approached that the advice sought was in an individual rather than representative capacity, that counsel agreed to communicate in that capacity despite the possibility of conflicts, and that the communications did not concern company matters; the officer's reasonable belief that the representation by corporate counsel was on an individual basis is not sufficient to create a personal privilege.

In re Grand Jury Investig. No. 83-30557, 575 F. Supp. 777 (N.D. Ga. 1983) : Former corporate employees moved to intervene to stop the corporation's attorney from revealing their communications made to him while they worked for the corporation. The corporation waived its privilege and the Court ruled that the attorney would be permitted to testify unless the former employees could establish that they sought legal advice from the attorney, they made it clear they did so in their individual capacities, the attorney understood he was asked to advise them as individuals, and their communications were confidential and did not involve the corporation's business or their official corporate duties.

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Holder of Privilege -- Trustee

Commodity Futures Trading Comm'n v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343 (1985) , rev'g 722 F.2d 338 (7th Cir. 1983) : In a suit by the CFTC against a brokerage corporation, the parties agreed to a consent decree that provided for the appointment of a receiver and an investigation by the Commission. The receiver filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy on behalf of the corporation and was named trustee in bankruptcy. When the Commission sought to subpoena records held by the former corporate counsel, counsel invoked the corporation's privilege. Thereafter, the trustee in bankruptcy agreed to waive the privilege. Reversing a decision that the trustee held the privilege, the Court of Appeals found instead that where the corporation had officers and directors, it continued to hold the privilege and that the officers and directors, not the trustee, had authority to assert or waive the privilege. A unanimous Supreme Court reversed. Because the Bankruptcy Code gives the trustee wide-ranging management power while limiting severely the power of the debtor's directors, the trustee plays the role most closely analogous to a solvent corporation's management and should be able to assert or waive the debtor corporation's privilege.

Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild v. Washington Star Co., 543 F. Supp. 906 (D.D.C. 1982) : Even though an employee benefit plan was established and funded by an employer, the employer appointed the trustees who administered the plan, and the same law firm represented the employer and the plan, the privilege covering communications between the trustees and the plan's counsel was held by the plan, not the employer, and the trustees were free to waive the privilege.

United States v. Campbell, 73 F.3d 44 (5th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a conviction for bankruptcy fraud, the Court held that the bankruptcy trustee for a partnership has authority to waive the privilege on behalf of the partnership.

United States v. Evans, 796 F.2d 264 (9th Cir. 1986) : In a mail fraud and embezzlement prosecution, the Court held that an attorney hired by the defendant in his capacity as trustee of a pension plan was properly permitted to testify. The plan, not the defendant, was the client, so the defendant had no claim of privilege.

In re Foster, 188 F.3d 1259 (10th Cir. 1999) : A Chapter 7 trustee for an involuntary debtor sought documents prepared in connection with pending, pre-petition civil litigation by counsel that represented the debtor in both the civil litigation and related criminal litigation. The Bankruptcy Court ordered the turnover of all documents, and the District Judge affirmed. The Court of Appeals rejected the notion that a trustee always controls an individual's privilege as to pre-petition civil claims, since "[t]o let trustees do so may discourage client confidences; violate individuals' reasonable expectations that, so long as they do not abuse the privilege, they alone will decide when to waive it; and ignore the distinction that, while a trustee may control a corporate debtor as would its pre-bankruptcy management, a trustee can no more control an individual debtor than could someone who bought all of the debtor's assets." The Court remanded to the Bankruptcy Court to balance the harm to the debtor and to the privilege with the trustee's need for information.

[o] Attorney-Client -- Legal Advice or Services

[i] Generally

United States v. Wilson, 798 F.2d 509 (1st Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed income tax convictions, finding no privilege attached to a document sent by a former client to an attorney who was serving as a negotiator in connection with the buy-out of the defendant's interest in a corporation. No relationship existed at the time the document was sent, and the attorney was not providing legal advice to the defendant. In United States v. Strahl, 590 F.2d 10 (1st Cir. 1978) , the Court held that the privilege did not bar an attorney's testimony that a client passed him counterfeit bills, when there was no showing that the client sought legal advice with respect to the bills.

Montgomery County v. Microvote Corp., 175 F.3d 296 (3d Cir. 1999) : In a contract dispute related to electronic voting machines, the County interviewed election "consultants" and ended up retaining the law firm of which the only consultant holding both computer science and law degrees, Dr. Shamos, was a member. When the defendant manufacturer subsequently sought discovery of Dr. Shamos' reports to the County, the Trial Judge held they were not protected by the privilege because he was acting as a "consultant." The Court reversed, on the grounds that Dr. Shamos' firm was retained to perform legal services, and that the services he performed, principally negotiating and drafting an addendum agreement with the defendant's counsel, were legal services. The fact that the County initially explored retaining a consultant who was not a member of the bar was not relevant, given the subsequent relationship with Dr. Shamos. One Judge concurred in the result, on the ground that the documents sought were protected by the work-product privilege.

United States v. Clemons, 676 F.2d 124 (5th Cir. 1982) : In a prosecution for wilfully failing to appear for trial, the Court found that an attorney's message to his client concerning the date of trial is not a privileged communication because it does not constitute legal advice.

United States v. Spector, 793 F.2d 932 (8th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a cocaine conviction, the Court held that tapes made by an informant-witness concerning his daily activities on behalf of the government were protected by the privilege. The tapes had been made to assist the informant's lawyer in representing him and they were not given to the government. In United States v. Horvath, n63 the Court affirmed tax evasion convictions, holding that testimony by an attorney concerning financial transactions he conducted on behalf of two defendants did not disclose privileged communications, since the transferring of funds and related activities did not involve confidential communications made for the purpose of obtaining legal services.

United States v. Alexander, 287 F.3d 811 (9th Cir. 2002) : The defendant was convicted for making threats to injure others, including threats to an Assistant Federal Defender who had been appointed to represent the defendant on mail and wire fraud charges. The appointed lawyer was called to testify before a grand jury, he asserted the attorney-client privilege, and the Trial Judge ordered him to testify solely about the threats. The Court affirmed, holding that the threats were not communications made in order to obtain legal advice and were therefore not protected by the attorney-client privilege. In United States v. Martin, 278 F.3d 988 (9th Cir. 2002) , the defendant operated a fraudulent scheme in which he created an ostensible subsidiary office of a legitimate Hong Kong corporation. Without disclosing the scheme, he hired a lawyer to become counsel for the subsidiary. The lawyer also did a few small legal jobs for the defendant personally. When the lawyer began to suspect that the subsidiary was fraudulent, he disclosed his suspicions to the U.S. Attorney's office, which led to an investigation and the defendant's arrest, indictment, and conviction. Affirming, the Court held that the attorney's disclosures to the authorities were not privileged, so there was no error in refusing to suppress them. The Court held, inter alia, that there was no showing that any communication disclosed was made for the purpose of obtaining legal advice. In United States v. Bauer, n64 the Court reversed a conviction for making false statements in a bankruptcy petition because the defendant's attorney had been required to give testimony that he instructed his client that the petition and its attachments were signed under penalty of perjury. The Trial Judge had ruled that no privilege applied when the attorney is "acting as an officer of the court" and "simply advising the client of the rules of court that apply to the proceeding." That was erroneous, since the privilege applies to the attorney's advice given in response to confidential disclosures, and the attorney in giving this advice was not acting merely as a messenger but was delivering legal advice in the course of preparing the petition. Reviewing a corporation's motion to quash a grand jury subpoena in United States v. Chen, n65 the Court held that lawyers act in their legal capacity when they communicate their clients' positions to government agencies. Thus, the client's communications with a lawyer to enable the lawyer to be a spokesperson in representing the client were protected by the privilege. In United States v. Palmer, n66 the Court upheld a ruling that an attorney hired to transfer the defendant's personal effects from Utah to Washington could be required to answer questions concerning the material that was given to him by a third person to be shipped to the defendant, as "the testimony involved his attorney's role as a transfer-shipping agent dealing with material real evidence, not as a legal advisor concerning a confidential communication."

United States v. Johnston, 146 F.3d 785 (10th Cir. 1998) : The defendant, a lawyer, was charged with conspiracy to distribute marijuana by assisting a marijuana-selling client in evading debts owed to the client's drug suppliers. The Court found no error in the admission of wiretapped conversations, since the attorney's role was simply as a messenger to the drug suppliers, not to provide legal advice to the client. Alternatively, the communications between attorney and client were unprivileged because they were for the purpose of furthering a crime.

In re Spalding Sports Worldwide, Inc., 203 F.3d 800 (Fed. Cir. 2000) : The Magistrate Judge in a patent infringement suit ordered the plaintiff, assignee of the patent, to produce the invention record submitted by the inventors named on the patent to the plaintiff's corporate legal department. Granting the plaintiff's petition for mandamus, the Court held that although the invention record contained technical information, it was made for the purpose of obtaining legal advice. The communication was submitted to the legal department for the purpose of making patentability determinations, and the information communicated was relevant to making those determinations.

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Legal Advice or Services -- Business Advice

United States v. Knoll, 16 F.3d 1313 (2d Cir. 1994) : The Court held in a prosecution for bankruptcy fraud that letters seized from an attorney with whom a defendant had a business relationship were not privileged because their contents related purely to business transactions.

Rehling v. City of Chicago, 207 F.3d 1009 (7th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a judgment for the City in a police officer's action under the Americans with Disabilities Act, the Court found no clear error in a determination that the general counsel to the superintendent of police was acting in a legal capacity, and not in a business capacity as a decisionmaker on personnel matters, when he advised members of the police department about the plaintiff's reassignment. Although the applicability of the privilege to the facts was "a close question," the Judge's ruling was supported by evidence that the general counsel was not empowered to make a business decision.

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Legal Advice or Services -- Investigations

In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 599 F.2d 504 (2d Cir. 1979) : The Court held that to the extent that an internal corporate investigation is made by management itself, there is no privilege to cover the information that is discovered. To claim a privilege, the corporation must show that information was communicated for the purpose of securing legal advice, not for management purposes.

Hanson v. United States Agency for Int'l Dev., 372 F.3d 286 (4th Cir. 2004) : A lawyer representing a contractor embroiled in a dispute concerning a USAID-funded project in Egypt sought access under FOIA to a document prepared at USAID's request by a lawyer-engineer, Roy, to evaluate the negotiation process in the contracting dispute, the parties' positions, and the impediments to settlement. USAID argued that FOIA Exemption 5, which protects attorney-client communications, precluded production of the evaluation. Rejecting the plaintiff's argument that Roy was hired not as a lawyer, but as a construction consultant to observe the dispute negotiations, the Court concluded that "[s]o long as Roy was being asked to exercise his extensive legal skills, his engineering experience does nothing to disqualify him as an attorney." In In re Allen, 106 F.3d 582 (4th Cir. 1997) , the Court reversed a judgment of civil contempt against an attorney who withheld communications with her client, a state Attorney General and his Office, holding that it was error to reject the privilege claim on the ground that the communications were made in the course of an investigation conducted by the attorney. Upjohn makes it clear that an attorney's investigation may constitute a legal service, and here the record unequivocally supported the conclusion that the attorney was retained to conduct an investigation using her legal expertise. In United States v. Aramony, n67 the Court affirmed in part the fraud conviction of the former CEO of United Way of America, holding that communications made during the course of an internal investigation to UWA's general counsel, whom the defendant had known for 30 years, were not privileged because, inter alia, there was no indication the defendant was seeking legal advice.

Mission Nat'l Ins. Co. v. Lilly, 112 F.R.D. 160 (D. Minn. 1986) : In a dispute over a fire insurance policy, the District Court ruled that the insurer could not claim privilege with respect to documents prepared by outside counsel acting as a claims investigator as well as a legal advisor. Although "[i]t would not be fair to allow the insurer's decision in this regard to create a blanket obstruction to discovery of its claims investigation," work product protection was available for the mental processes and opinions of counsel.

United States v. Rowe, 96 F.3d 1294 (9th Cir. 1996) : A law firm's senior partner, hearing of possible irregularities in another partner's handling of client funds, assigned two associates to conduct an investigation. The two were later subpoenaed by a grand jury and asked about the investigation. Reversing an order compelling the associates to testify, the Court held that the privilege applied, since factfinding that pertains to legal advice counts as "professional legal services."

[iv] Attorney-Client -- Legal Advice or Services -- Tax Services

In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum Dated Sept. 15, 1983 (Marc Rich & Co.), 731 F.2d 1032 (2d Cir. 1984) : Reviewing denial of an intervenor's motion to quash a grand jury subpoena duces tecum, the Court held the following as being made for the purpose of securing legal services, and therefore privileged: communications concerning tax consequences under Swiss and American law for various forms of employee compensation plans; communications concerning the tax consequences of a reorganization; and communications concerning the lawfulness of selling stock in a subsidiary to an officer of a corporation.

United States v. Davis, 636 F.2d 1028 (5th Cir. 1981) : The Court said that "although preparation of tax returns by itself may require some knowledge of the law, it is primarily an accounting service. Communications relating to that service should therefore not be privileged even though performed by a lawyer."

United States v. Frederick, 182 F.3d 496 (7th Cir. 1999) : Frederick, a lawyer and an accountant, provided legal representation to and prepared the tax returns of taxpayers being investigated by the IRS. The Court upheld enforcement of an order directing Frederick to turn over documents created in connection with preparation of the taxpayers' returns. The Court reasoned that because there is no accountant's privilege under federal law, a taxpayer may not obtain a privilege by simply hiring a lawyer to do the work that an accountant or other tax preparer normally would do. Only communications made for the purpose of obtaining a lawyer's professional advice or assistance are privileged, and that does not include information furnished for the purpose of enabling the preparation of a tax return. The Court rejected the government argument that there was no privilege simply because the information from the client was to be transmitted to the IRS in a return; where the tax preparer was also the client's lawyer, it could not be assumed that everything communicated to the lawyer was to be transmitted to the IRS, so inquiry must be made whether the communication was related to the tax-preparation function or to the legal-representation function. The Court also rejected the government argument that numerical information could never fall within the privilege. The Court held that dual-purpose documents, created for use both in preparing tax returns and in litigation, are not privileged because of their unprivileged purpose. Even with documents prepared in connection with tax audits the relevant question is whether the attorney-accountant is doing attorney's or accountant's work -- if the audit is merely verifying the accuracy of a return, it is accountant's work and there is no privilege; but if the taxpayer is accompanied to the audit by a lawyer to deal with issues of statutory interpretation or case law raised by the revenue agent, the lawyer is doing lawyer's work and the privilege may attach.

[p] Attorney-Client -- Limited Partnership

Ferguson v. Lurie, 139 F.R.D. 362 (N.D. Ill. 1991) : In an action by limited partners alleging securities fraud in connection with a real estate limited partnership, the Court extended the Garner doctrine but found that in this case the plaintiffs had not shown good cause why the privilege should not be invoked against their document requests and proposed deposition questions.

[q] Attorney-Client -- Patent Cases -- Law Applied

In re Spalding Sports Worldwide, Inc., 203 F.3d 800 (Fed. Cir. 2000) : Upholding application of the privilege to an invention record submitted to the petitioner's legal department, the Court held that Federal Circuit, rather than First Circuit, law applies, because the privilege question "implicates, at the very least," substantive patent issues that should be subject to a uniform national standard.

[r] Attorney-Client -- Patent Counsel

Status Time Corp. v. Sharp Elec. Corp., 95 F.R.D. 27 (S.D.N.Y. 1982) : The Court held that communications to a foreign patent agent are not privileged.

Glaxo, Inc. v. Novopharm Ltd., 148 F.R.D. 535 (E.D.N.C. 1993) : In a patent infringement action, the Court held that a patent agent in the United Kingdom was an independent agent and not part of the corporate client for purposes of the privilege. Thus, communications between the agent and a United States attorney were not privileged unless the patent agent was either registered with the U.S. Patent Office or was acting under the control of an attorney. In Burroughs Wellcome Co. v. Barr Labs., 143 F.R.D. 611 (E.D.N.C. 1992) , a patent infringement action, the Trial Judge ruled that: the privilege may extend to communications with foreign patent agents; the privilege extends to prior art searches and discussions relating to prior art; and the privilege also extends to drafts of replies and responses prepared in response to questions or decisions of a patent examiner.

Foseco Int'l Ltd. v. Fireline, Inc., 546 F. Supp. 22 (N.D. Ohio 1982) : The Court said that "communications between an attorney and a patent agent, foreign or domestic, are privileged where the patent agent is acting under the direction and control of an attorney as his agent."

Mendenhall v. Barber-Greene Co., 531 F. Supp. 951 (N.D. Ill. 1982) : Observing that the law is unclear as to whether communications between lawyers and patent agents ordinarily are privileged, the Court concluded that the privilege should extend to a situation in which the patent agent acts as a functionary of the lawyer or where the patent agent under foreign law is rendering legal services. The privilege would not apply if the client's communications were passed from lawyer to patent agent for ultimate transmission to a patent office.

[s] Attorney-Client -- Procedures

[i] Identification of Privileged Items

United States v. Construction Prods. Research, Inc., 73 F.3d 464 (2d Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed an order to enforce a Nuclear Regulatory Commission subpoena, holding that the parties claiming privilege had not identified each document and the individuals who were party to the communication in sufficient detail to permit a judgment as to whether the document was potentially protected from disclosure.

United States v. Rockwell Int'l, 897 F.2d 1255 (3d Cir. 1990) : The District Court enforced an IRS subpoena, holding that a taxpayer's file analyzing potential tax liabilities and tax problems, which might be disclosed to independent auditors or the SEC, was not protected by the privilege. The Court vacated the order and remanded for specific factual findings as to the nature of the material in the file, who prepared and controlled it, and to whom it was disclosed, so that the Court could determine whether the conditions for the privilege had been met or whether it had been waived. The Court also noted that privilege claims must be asserted document by document, rather than in a single, blanket assertion.

Holifield v. United States, 909 F.2d 201 (7th Cir. 1990) : The Court held that a taxpayer could not resist an IRS subpoena served upon his attorney on privilege grounds without making a document-by-document assertion of the specific facts supporting the privilege claim.

PaineWebber Group v. Zinsmeyer Trusts Partnership, 187 F.3d 988 (8th Cir. 1999) : An arbitration award was vacated on the ground it was obtained by "undue means," because PaineWebber had hidden four documents from discovery by not fully and accurately describing them in its privilege log. Reversing, the Court reasoned that: (1) a party seeking to claim privilege must assert privilege as to all covered documents; (2) the tribunal conducting the proceeding may have to resolve the privilege claim if the parties cannot agree; (3) because the party seeking discovery cannot see the documents claimed to be privileged, the dispute is usually resolved by an in camera examination; (4) to make the process work, most tribunals require the party asserting privilege to provide a list or log that describes each document and the allegedly privileged communications each contains; and (5) this practice is now codified in Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(5). In this case, the Court found that PaineWebber did not employ "undue means" in asserting its privilege claims, since it provided a log listing most documents covered by the claims and showed others with a blue sheet in place of pages in a compliance officer's file.

Clarke v. American Commerce Nat'l Bank, 974 F.2d 127 (9th Cir. 1992) : Affirming an order enforcing an administrative subpoena for attorney billing statements from outside counsel, the Court held there was no error when the District Judge conducted an in camera inspection of attorney billing statements and ordered a line-by-line justification for assertion of the privilege.

FDIC v. United Pac. Ins. Corp., 152 F.3d 1266 (10th Cir. 1998) : In the course of remanding a case for improper denial of a motion seeking relief from judgment, the Court added in a footnote that the Trial Judge too quickly accepted the FDIC's claim that the detailed billing information that the defendants sought was privileged because it contained descriptions of work performed. A party seeking to claim the privilege has the burden of establishing its applicability and cannot simply claim that documents contain privileged information; the Trial Judge may review documents in camera to protect against disclosure of privileged matters but may not impose a blanket prohibition on discovery based on a party's bare assertion that documents contain privileged information.

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Procedures -- Immediate Appeal

United States v. Philip Morris Inc., 314 F.3d 612 (D.C. Cir. 2003) : In this lawsuit alleging racketeering violations by tobacco companies, the Trial Judge ordered defendant BATCo to produce a memorandum written by a British attorney for use in a deposition, after ruling that BATCo waived the privilege by not listing the memorandum on a privilege log. The Court held, 2-1, that the order was appealable under the collateral order doctrine, reasoning that the practical value of the attorney-client privilege would be destroyed if a party could not appeal an order compelling discovery until a final judgment is rendered. The majority declined to require a party to refuse to obey an order and suffer a civil contempt citation in order to be able to appeal, reasoning that there is no guarantee that a civil contempt order rather than a criminal contempt order or some other order would be entered in such circumstances, and the risk of a severe penalty might discourage parties with meritorious claims from pursuing them.

In re Grand Jury Subpoenas, 123 F.3d 695 (1st Cir. 1997) : The Court held that a client could immediately appeal the denial of a motion to quash a subpoena of assertedly privileged documents in the custody of the client's lawyer. Neither the lawyer nor the client had been cited for contempt, and ordinarily such a citation is required before an immediate appeal can be granted. However, where the subpoenaed documents are in the hands of a third party, a client may immediately appeal a privilege claim without waiting for the third party to be cited for contempt, since the third party, with no direct interest at stake, may turn over the materials to avoid the risk of a contempt citation and thus render any appeal a nullity. The Court found this rationale is no less applicable when the third party is an attorney, especially since "allowing an appeal only if the attorney accepts a contempt citation pits lawyers against their clients in a manner that we do not believe is in the interests of justice."

United States v. Amlani, 169 F.3d 1189 (9th Cir. 1999) : The Court held that neither the client nor the lawyer had the right to immediate appeal of the denial of a motion to quash a subpoena of allegedly privileged materials held by the client and the lawyer. The general rule is that a privilege ruling is not appealable until the party subpoenaed refuses to comply with a court order and has been held in contempt. An exception to the general rule arises when third parties are holding the assertedly privileged materials, since third parties cannot be expected to risk a citation for contempt in order to secure the client an opportunity for judicial review. The exception could not apply to the client, and the Court has refused to apply the "third party" exception "where the subpoena is directed at an attorney who is currently representing the party moving to quash the subpoena." The Court observed that nine other Circuits have taken a contrary position. See In re Grand Jury Subpoenas, 123 F.3d 695, 698 (1st Cir. 1997) (collecting cases; discussed supra). Ultimately, however, the Court did choose to exercise jurisdiction over the privilege claim by way of mandamus.

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Procedures -- In Camera Inspection

United States v. Zolin, 491 U.S. 554 (1989) : The Supreme Court held that Rule 104(a) does not prohibit use of in camera review procedures in ruling on privilege claims, but required a threshold showing that such review is appropriate. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 501.02[15].

[t] Attorney-Client -- Protected Communications

In re Sealed Case, 737 F.2d 94, 1984-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P66062 (D.C. Cir. 1984) : The Court held that a former corporate attorney could be asked about hunches he had had concerning the company's activities as long as the hunches were not based on information submitted confidentially by the company for the purpose of obtaining legal services. The Court also found that conversations on an airplane between the company's president and the attorney were privileged even though the president did not expressly state that his communications were confidential.

In re Six Grand Jury Witnesses, 979 F.2d 939 (2d Cir. 1992) : When a subcontractor learned it was suspected of defrauding the government, its counsel had company employees analyze the work performed to show that fair value had been received. Those employees were subsequently called before the grand jury and asked about the analyses they had done, but they refused to answer on grounds of privilege and work product. The Court affirmed an order compelling them to answer the questions, except as to what they had told attorneys, since the privileges do not protect underlying factual information.

In re Dayco Corp. Derivative Sec. Litig., 102 F.R.D. 633 (S.D. Ohio 1984) : The Court found that highly leading interrogatories in which the plaintiffs asked whether the defendants met with counsel to discuss particular subjects would, if answered, reveal the substance of communications. Therefore, the defendants did not have to answer the interrogatories as written, although they could be asked whether they had consulted with counsel and the general topics or reasons for consultation.

United States v. Weger, 709 F.2d 1151 (7th Cir. 1983) : The Court found no infringement of the privilege when a letter from the defendant to a former attorney was introduced for the limited purpose of comparing the characteristics of the style of type with another letter typed on the defendant's typewriter.

United States v. Spector, 793 F.2d 932 (8th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a cocaine conviction, the Court held that tapes made by an informant-witness concerning his daily activities on behalf of the government were protected by the privilege. The tapes had been made to assist the informant's lawyer in representing him and they were not given to the government. A dissenting Judge argued that the witness had waived the privilege by telling the government of the tapes' existence. In In re Grand Jury Proceedings, n68 the Court held that an attorney could be compelled to testify to the authenticity of a client's signatures and photograph on documents bearing the signature of the attorney attesting that she prepared them. These matters were observable to the public and the attestations negated any assumption that the matters were intended to be concealed from third parties.

United States v. Flores, 628 F.2d 521 (9th Cir. 1980) : The Court held that an attorney must answer questions concerning whether his client had provided information about an administrative claim filed by the attorney that alleged a weapon had been improperly seized from the client, since the Court is entitled to ask whether the attorney had authority to file a document. However, confidential communications to the attorney were not a proper subject of inquiry.

[u] Attorney-Client -- Protective Order

In re Dow Corning Corp., 261 F.3d 280 (2d Cir. 2001) : Although it denied a writ of mandamus, the Court held that a protective order is an inadequate surrogate for the attorney-client privilege. The Court noted that if an adverse party is provided access to privileged information, even subject to a protective order, "a pertinent aspect of confidentiality will be lost." Therefore, once the Trial Judge found that the privilege applied, he should not have ordered a deposition without a prior finding that the privilege had been waived or that an exception applied.

[v] Attorney-Client -- Reasonable Belief by Client

United States v. Ostrer, 422 F. Supp. 93 (S.D.N.Y. 1976) : "The testimonial privilege ... is applicable where the client entertains good faith beliefs (even if erroneous) that the person consulted is a lawyer, and is acting on his behalf."

In re Auclair, 961 F.2d 65 (5th Cir. 1992) : At the instance of a lawyer allegedly involved in a fraud scheme, the lawyer's secretary and her husband, together with the lawyer, consulted another attorney to see whether he would represent them in a pending grand jury investigation. After interviewing each of the three separately and together, the attorney declined to represent the secretary and her husband. The attorney was subsequently ordered to testify about the interviews, but the Court reversed, holding that: confidential communications made with a view to employing a lawyer are privileged although employment is not accepted; this principle applies equally when persons with common interests consult an attorney together seeking common representation; the existence of a matter of common interest is presumed in the prerepresentation phase; and the participants in this case had a reasonable expectation of confidentiality.

[w] Attorney-Client -- Relationship of Client and Attorney

United States v. Wilson, 798 F.2d 509 (1st Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed income tax convictions, finding no privilege attached to a document sent by a former client to an attorney who was serving as a negotiator in connection with the buy-out of the defendant's interest in a corporation. No relationship existed at the time the document was sent, and the attorney was not providing legal advice to the defendant.

United States v. Dennis, 843 F.2d 652 (2d Cir. 1988) : The Court held that statements made while a potential client intended to employ counsel were privileged, even though the employment was not accepted. See also United States v. Demauro, 581 F.2d 50 (2d Cir. 1978) (an attorney retained by a bank, who investigated an employee and warned him that the bank expected cooperation and that any employee who lied during the investigation might be terminated, was not consulted by the employee for the purpose of rendering legal services).

In re Grand Jury Subpoena: Under Seal, 415 F.3d 333 (4th Cir. 2005) : In the course of an investigation regarding a related company, attorneys for AOL Time Warner interviewed three AOL employees. Before each interview the employee was told that the attorneys represented the company, that the conversations were privileged but the privilege was the company's and it would decide whether to waive it, and that the employee was free to consult his own attorney. Subsequently the SEC began an investigation of AOL and the related company. Shortly thereafter, AOL and one of the employees entered into a "common interest agreement." When the SEC later deposed the employees, they asserted the attorney-client privilege regarding the interviews with AOL's attorneys. Finally, a grand jury issued a subpoena to AOL to provide records reflecting the interviews; AOL agreed to waive the privilege, but the employees moved to quash. Affirming denial of the motion to quash, the Court held that the communications were not privileged because the employees could not have reasonably believed AOL's attorneys represented them personally. There was no evidence that the employees were told they were represented or that they asked for representation; there was no evidence that the employees sought or were rendered legal advice; and the employees were explicitly told that the information could be disclosed at the company's discretion. The Court rejected the employees' claim that being told "we can represent you as long as no conflict appears" created a privileged relationship; that was quite distinct from being told "we do represent you," especially in the context of the entire warning from the investigating attorneys. In United States v. Tedder, n69 the Court found that a defendant in a marijuana prosecution failed to carry the burden of showing that he had a relationship with a lawyer to whom he admitted perjury. The defendant spoke to the lawyer as a friend and did not seek legal advice or expect communications to be confidential.

In re Auclair, 961 F.2d 65 (5th Cir. 1992) : See annotation in § 501.03[2][b][v].

United States v. Martin, 278 F.3d 988 (9th Cir. 2002) : The defendant operated a fraudulent scheme in which he created an ostensible subsidiary office of a legitimate Hong Kong corporation. Without disclosing the scheme, he hired a lawyer to become counsel for the subsidiary. The lawyer also did a few small legal jobs for the defendant personally. When the lawyer began to suspect that the subsidiary was fraudulent, he disclosed his suspicions to the U.S. Attorney's office, which led to an investigation and the defendant's arrest, indictment, and conviction. Affirming, the Court held that the attorney's disclosures to the authorities were not privileged, so there was no error in refusing to suppress them. The Court held, inter alia, that there was no sufficient showing of an attorney-client relationship, since the lawyer was hired to represent the bogus subsidiary rather than the defendant, and the information disclosed had nothing to do with the personal matters on which the lawyer worked. In United States v. Munoz, 233 F.3d 1117 (9th Cir. 2000) , a key government witness in a mail fraud trial arising from a Ponzi scheme was an attorney who had prepared an opinion letter for the corporate vehicle of the scheme. The attorney had been referred to the corporation by one of the individual defendants whom he had previously represented in an unrelated matter. The Court held there was no error in admitting the attorney's testimony that the defendant had told him the corporation was inadequately funded and in financial trouble, since the defendant did not sufficiently establish a relationship with the attorney. There was no evidence the attorney provided personal legal advice and all the evidence indicated that the attorney was retained by, communicating with, and being paid by only the corporation, not the defendant.

United States v. Schaltenbrand, 930 F.2d 1554 (11th Cir. 1991) : The defendant, an Air Force reserve officer charged with violating conflict of interest statutes, went to a JAG office seeking legal advice. He filled out a card describing himself as a client and the attorneys as his lawyers, and the attorneys spent an hour answering his questions and explaining conflict of interest regulations to him. Rejecting the government's argument that the attorneys were just giving a "briefing" about standards of conduct, the Court held the communications were privileged, but that the error in admitting them was harmless.

Shearing v. Iolab Corp., 975 F.2d 1541 (Fed. Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in an action for breach of a patent licensing agreement, holding there was no error in permitting an attorney to testify about communications with an alleged prior inventor whom he had interviewed as a potential witness in a trial involving the attorney's corporate client, as the inventor was not the attorney's client at the time of the communications.

[x] Attorney-Client -- Representative of the Attorney

Federal Trade Com. v. TRW, Inc., 628 F.2d 207, 1980-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P63374 (D.C. Cir. 1980) : A credit reporting agency engaged the Stanford Research Institute to prepare a study of the company's complex computerized credit reporting system. The Court held that documents prepared by SRI were not shown to have been prepared as a "translation" of material for corporate attorneys rendering legal advice and that the ambiguous state of facts meant that the company had not demonstrated the validity of its privilege claim.

Cavallaro v. United States, 284 F.3d 236 (1st Cir. 2002) : Taxpayers resisted enforcement of an IRS summons addressed to accountants on the ground that the requested documents were privileged because the accountants were assisting attorneys who were providing legal services to the taxpayers. The Court affirmed enforcement of the summons because the taxpayers had retained the accountants before consulting the attorneys, they had made no contemporaneous record that the accountants' engagement had changed to assisting the attorneys, and throughout the process the accountants were providing accounting advice rather than assisting the attorneys in providing legal services.

United States v. Adlman, 68 F.3d 1495 (2d Cir. 1995) : In planning for the combination of two subsidiaries, a corporation's Vice President for Taxes (an attorney) obtained from the corporation's auditor a detailed technical analysis of the tax implications of the proposed reorganization. When the IRS subsequently issued an administrative subpoena for the analysis, the Vice President asserted that it was privileged, on the ground that the corporation had imparted its information to him in confidence for the purpose of receiving his legal advice, and that he in turn had hired the auditor to help him understand the problem and had shared the client's information with the auditor for that limited purpose. Upholding a finding that the corporation had failed to sustain its burden of showing the privilege applied, the Court noted that the facts were subject to competing interpretations. The evidence supported the conclusion that the corporation consulted the auditors for tax advice, rather than that the Vice President, as the corporation's counsel, consulted the auditor to help him reach the understanding needed to furnish legal advice. The Vice President served not only as counsel but also as one of the corporation's officers. And the auditors regularly, and in connection with this merger, furnished extensive advisory services, including tax advice. There was no contemporaneous documentation supporting the view that the auditor, in this task alone, was assisting counsel rather than providing accounting and advisory services.

United States v. Alvarez, 519 F.2d 1036 (3d Cir. 1975) : The Court found that a psychiatrist retained by defense counsel was sufficiently within the defense team so that the defendant's statements to the psychiatrist could not be used against him without violating the privilege. The Court rejected the government's claim that by pleading insanity the defense waived the right to claim this privilege.

Foseco Int'l Ltd. v. Fireline, Inc., 546 F. Supp. 22 (N.D. Ohio 1982) : The Court said that "communications between an attorney and a patent agent, foreign or domestic, are privileged where the patent agent is acting under the direction and control of an attorney as his agent."

Mendenhall v. Barber-Greene Co., 531 F. Supp. 951 (N.D. Ill. 1982) : The Court observed that the law is unclear as to whether communications between lawyers and patent agents ordinarily are privileged. It concluded that the privilege should extend to a situation in which the patent agent acts as a functionary of the lawyer or where the patent agent under foreign law is rendering legal services. The privilege would not apply if the client's communications were passed from lawyer to patent agent for ultimate transmission to a patent office.

[y] Attorney-Client -- Representative of the Client

Miller v. Haulmark Transp. Sys., 104 F.R.D. 442 (E.D. Pa. 1984) : In an action to recover insurance benefits under a group policy, the Court held that an agent of the defendant insurer was present at a meeting with counsel for one of the individual defendants to assist in preparing an answer, so the agent's presence did not destroy confidentiality and abrogate the privilege.

United States v. Ackert, 169 F.3d 136 (2d Cir. 1999) : In order to advise his corporate client regarding the tax implications of a proposed investment, the corporation's tax counsel contacted an investment banker who had recommended the investment to the corporation for its tax advantages. Subsequently, the IRS audited the corporation and issued a summons to the investment banker seeking his testimony about the investment proposal. The Magistrate Judge upheld the corporation's assertion of the privilege concerning any conversations the investment banker had with the tax counsel. The corporation argued that the investment banker was interpreting the factual nature of the proposal on behalf of the client so that counsel could provide legal assistance. Reversing, the Court noted that not every communication to counsel for the benefit of a client is protected by the privilege and found that the investment banker in this case was not translating or interpreting information so much as providing information that the client did not have and therefore could not provide to counsel.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 947 F.2d 1188 (4th Cir. 1991) : The Court modified orders denying motions to quash a grand jury subpoena issued to an accountant. The Court held that discussions between the accountant and the target of the grand jury's investigation as they drove together to meet an attorney recommended by the accountant but not yet retained by the target were privileged, but that prior conversations between them about matters subsequently discussed at the meeting with the attorney were not protected because at the time of the conversations only accounting services were contemplated.

In re Bieter Co., 16 F.3d 929 (8th Cir. 1994) : The Court granted mandamus relief against an order compelling discovery, holding that an independent consultant's relationship to a land development partnership was such that the consultant was acting as representative of the client in dealing with counsel. Thus, confidential communications involving the consultant for purposes of providing legal assistance to the partnership were within the privilege.

[z] Attorney-Client -- Search Warrants

Klitzman, Klitzman & Gallagher v. Krut, 744 F.2d 955 (3d Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed an injunction requiring the return of documents and records seized at a law office pursuant to search warrants directed at an attorney who was the target of an investigation into an insurance fraud conspiracy. The Court found that the search was overbroad and expressed concern for privileged material, noting that no effort was made to protect privileged communications and that lawyers other than the one who was under investigation and their clients were affected by the search.

[aa] Attorney-Client -- Standing To Assert the Privilege

United States v. Ortega, 150 F.3d 937 (8th Cir. 1998) : At a trial on drug charges, the defendant's accomplice testified against him. On cross-examination, defense counsel questioned the accomplice about the nature of the deal he struck with the government. The prosecutor objected to some of these questions on the ground that they called for disclosure of communications between the accomplice and his attorney that took place as the deal was being negotiated. The Trial Judge sustained the objections, but the Court found this to be error. The prosecutor had no standing to assert the witness' privilege. The error was harmless, however.

[bb] Attorney-Client -- Testimony by Attorney

United States v. Bollin, 264 F.3d 391 (4th Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions arising from an investment fraud scheme and the subsequent coverup, the Court rejected one defendant's contention that it was error to permit his former attorney to testify for the government. The Court observed that the defendant did not identify any testimony that was allegedly privileged and noted that "[t]he privilege does not prevent an attorney from testifying as to non-confidential matters."

[cc] Attorney-Client -- Trial Restriction on Material Privileged in Discovery

Refuse & Environmental Sys. v. Industrial Servs., 120 F.R.D. 8 (D. Mass. 1988) : Expressing concern that the defendants might otherwise obtain an unfair advantage at trial, the Magistrate ruled in an antitrust case that the defendants could assert the privilege during a deposition to bar questions concerning advice of counsel, but "only on the condition that defendants will be barred from offering testimony from any witness with regard to the content of these communications."

Vicinanzo v. Brunschwig & Fils, Inc., 739 F. Supp. 891 (S.D.N.Y. 1990) : The Court held, in ruling on discovery motions related to a cross-claim for bad-faith adoption of an insurance premium structure, that references by the insurer to advice of counsel in adopting the structure did not waive the privilege, but that, unless the insurer made full and immediate disclosure of all legal opinions pertaining to the decision, it would be precluded at trial from asserting an advice-of-counsel defense.

Clark v. City of Munster, 115 F.R.D. 609 (N.D. Ill. 1987) : The Court upheld a privilege claim with respect to certain reports prepared by investigators employed by counsel. It ruled, however, that if the plaintiffs adhered to their privilege claim and did not produce the reports during discovery, they would not be permitted to waive the privilege and call the investigators as trial witnesses.

[dd] Attorney-Client -- Union Members

Cox v. Administrator U.S. Steel & Carnegie, 17 F.3d 1386 (11th Cir. 1994) , modified on other grounds, 30 F.3d 1347 (11th Cir. 1994) : In a class action by union members against the union and an employer, the Court held that, even if the Garner doctrine (discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 501.02[5][l][ii]) should apply to union members, its exception to the privilege would not apply when only a tiny percentage of the Union's members were members of the plaintiff class, and the interests of the class were adverse to those members who were not in the class.

[ee] Attorney-Client -- Waiver

[i] Agreement To Waive

Tennenbaum v. Deloitte & Touche, 77 F.3d 337 (9th Cir. 1996) : The agreement settling a class action that arose from a conspiracy to oversell resort timeshares provided that the trustee for the bankrupt entities would waive the privilege as to pre-petition communications between the entities and their counsel. Plaintiffs in a parallel action against the entities' auditors and three former officers sought to discover certain of those communications. Reversing an order to disclose, the Court held that a mere agreement in one action to waive the privilege, unaccompanied by any disclosure of privileged documents, did not constitute a waiver of the right to claim the privilege subsequently in another action.

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication

[A] Common Interest

FDIC v. Ernst & Whinney, 137 F.R.D. 14 (E.D. Tenn. 1991) : In an action arising out of various bank failures, the Magistrate Judge held, inter alia, that the FDIC had not waived its privilege by producing documents to other federal and state agencies that had an absolute commonality of interest with the FDIC in dealing with potentially criminal acts that occurred at the banks.

[B] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Contents or Fact of Communication

United States v. White, 887 F.2d 267 (D.C. Cir. 1989) : The Court reversed a defendant's conviction because privileged communications were erroneously admitted, noting that "[a] general assertion lacking substantive content that one's attorney has examined a certain matter is not sufficient to waive the privilege ... . An averment that lawyers have looked into a matter does not imply an intent to reveal the substance of the lawyers' advice."

United States v. Rakes, 136 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1998) : The victim of an extortion scheme was charged with perjury or lying under oath about why he sold his business; he testified that he did so voluntarily when in fact he was threatened with death unless he sold the business at below market value. The government sought to obtain privileged communications made by the victim to his attorney concerning the sale of the business and the reasons for the sale, arguing that the victim had waived the privilege because he had also told a friend about his reasons for selling the business. The Court affirmed suppression of the communications, holding that disclosure of the underlying facts was not enough to constitute a waiver where the victim had neither disclosed the communications nor disclosed the underlying information so completely and pervasively as to undermine a claim of privilege.

In re: Grand Jury Subpoena, 341 F.3d 331 (4th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed the denial of a motion to quash a subpoena that had been issued to the attorney representing a subject of a grand jury investigation. It held that the questions of whether the subject had consulted with the attorney regarding the filing of an immigration form and whether the attorney had advised a negative answer to a question on the form were protected by the attorney-client privilege, but that the client had waived the privilege by telling investigating FBI agents that he had answered "no" to the question under the advice of the attorney. That statement disclosed the substance of the attorney's advice and did not merely reveal that the subject acted in a particular way relying on the legal advice of an attorney. In United States v. Bollin, 264 F.3d 391 (4th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed convictions arising from an investment fraud scheme and the subsequent coverup. Rejecting one defendant's contention that it was error to permit his former attorney to testify for the government, the Court observed that the defendant "waived any privilege that may have attached when he testified to the grand jury regarding the same transactions and communications about which [the attorney] testified."

Industrial Clearinghouse, Inc. v. Browning Mfg. Div., 953 F.2d 1004 (5th Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed an order compelling former counsel for the plaintiff to produce certain documents concerning the representation, holding that the privilege was not waived when the plaintiff had brought a legal malpractice action against the attorneys. Although the petition in that action revealed some things that the attorneys told the plaintiff, it revealed no communication from the client either directly or by reference to the attorneys' statements.

United States v. O'Malley, 786 F.2d 786 (7th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a conviction for extortion, the Court found no error in the disqualification of a lawyer who had previously represented one of the two key government witnesses. The Court observed that the witness had not waived the privilege with respect to the former representation, since disclosure of the facts discussed with the lawyer did not waive the privilege where he did not disclose the actual communications made to the lawyer.

United States v. Spector, 793 F.2d 932 (8th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a cocaine conviction, the Court held that tapes made by an informant-witness concerning his daily activities on behalf of the government were protected by the privilege. The tapes had been made to assist the informant's lawyer in representing him and they were not given to the government. A dissenting Judge argued that the witness had waived the privilege by telling the government of the tapes' existence.

[C] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Court Order To Disclose

In re Continental Ill. Sec. Litig., 732 F.2d 1302 (7th Cir. 1984) : In ruling on a corporation's motion to terminate derivative claims, the District Judge ordered disclosure (with privilege claims expressly reserved) to the Judge and opposing counsel of the report made by the corporation's Special Litigation Committee, which had recommended termination. When news reporters were later granted access to the report, the Court affirmed, although it stated that it "need not go so far as to hold that the [attorney-client and work product] privileges are waived," since the corporation might have thought that the District Judge's order protected its privilege claims even after the report was admitted as evidence in connection with the motion.

[D] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Disclosure by Agent or Attorney

In re Richard Roe, Inc., 168 F.3d 69 (2d Cir. 1999) : The Court reversed an order granted after remand n70 that required disclosure of documents from a major civil action to a grand jury investigating two corporations. The Court found that a document written by a former attorney for a corporation, which reflected knowledge obtained in a relationship with the corporation, was privileged. Although the attorney no longer worked for the company when preparing the document, the information contained therein belonged to the client, not to the former attorney, and the former attorney had no authority to waive the client's privilege. In Schnell v. Schnall, 550 F. Supp. 650 (S.D.N.Y. 1982) , a securities action, the District Court reversed a Magistrate's order that a defendant produce an unredacted transcript of its attorney's testimony before the SEC. The Court held that there was no waiver when the attorney testified, since the client was not present at the SEC proceedings and there was no showing that the client had authorized disclosure.

United States v. Titchell, 261 F.3d 348 (3d Cir. 2001) : Affirming mail fraud convictions arising from a scheme to bill for fictitious renewals of Yellow Pages advertising, the Court held that the government was properly permitted to call the defendant's former attorney to testify about statements that the defendant had made to him, because the former attorney had testified for the defendant on the subject at a worker's compensation hearing. The Court reasoned that by calling the former attorney as a witness, the defendant waived the privilege "at least regarding the subject of the testimony adduced in the prior proceeding."

Velsicol Chem. Corp. v. Parsons, 561 F.2d 671 (7th Cir. 1977) : The Court held that testimony by a corporation's senior house counsel (himself also a target) before a grand jury waived the corporation's privilege, even though outside counsel had informed the government that the corporation claimed the privilege as to any conversations between itself and its outside counsel.

Hollins v. Powell, 773 F.2d 191 (8th Cir. 1985) : In a civil rights action for wrongful arrest, the Court held that the city waived its claim of privilege when the mayor testified about privileged communications.

United States v. Bump, 605 F.2d 548 (10th Cir. 1979) : A defendant who failed to establish that disclosures his lawyer made to the prosecutor during discovery were made without his consent was not permitted to complain that the prosecutor's use of the disclosures during cross-examination violated the privilege.

GFI, Inc. v. Franklin Corp., 265 F.3d 1268 (Fed. Cir. 2001) : Applying the law of the Fifth Circuit on the issue of attorney-client privilege, the Court affirmed a judgment that a patent was not enforceable due to inequitable conduct. It held that the patentee waived the attorney-client privilege for purposes of his patent infringement suit when his patent attorney testified in an earlier trial regarding the patentee's state of mind, knowledge of prior art, and communications with the patentee (including conversations about the duty of disclosure and nondisclosure of prior art).

[E] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Disclosure to Auditors, etc.

In re John Doe Corp., 675 F.2d 482 (2d Cir. 1982) : The Court held that a corporation had waived the privilege as to a report by counsel investigating its business practices when it showed the report to an outside accounting firm in connection with its annual audit. Rejecting a "pick and choose" theory of waiver, the Court said that once a decision to disclose privileged information is made "no matter what the economic imperatives, the privilege is lost, not because of voluntariness or involuntariness, but because the need for confidentiality served by the privilege is inconsistent with such disclosure."

United States v. El Paso Co., 682 F.2d 530 (5th Cir. 1982) : The Court enforced an IRS subpoena for workpapers that analyzed potential tax liabilities or tax problems, finding that disclosure of the tax pool analysis to independent auditors destroyed the confidentiality of the papers and removed them from the protection of the privilege.

Chevron Corp. v. Pennzoil Co., 974 F.2d 1156 (9th Cir. 1992) : The defendant in a Williams Act case asserted that it had, on the advice of its lawyers, acquired the plaintiff's stock for investment purposes only. In seeking discovery of documents supporting the defendant's position, the plaintiff asserted that any privilege had been lost because, inter alia, documents discussing the question had been disclosed to an outside auditor. Deciding that discovery should have been compelled, the Court held that disclosure to the auditor constituted waiver only as to communications about the matter actually disclosed and not every document touching on the general question.

Enforce Admin. Subpoenas of SEC v. Coopers & Lybrand, 98 F.R.D. 414 (S.D. Fla. 1982) : The Court held that disclosure of privileged communications to an accounting firm effected a waiver.

[F] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Failure to Assert Privilege

In re Grand Jury Investigation of Ocean Transp., 604 F.2d 672 (D.C. Cir. 1979) : The Court held the privilege had been waived for documents that a corporation's original counsel produced without claiming the privilege, and for documents marked with a P that the counsel said at the time were not privileged, although a year later it said they had been produced inadvertently.

United States v. Fisher, 692 F. Supp. 488 (E.D. Pa. 1988) : The Court found that any privilege that might have existed with respect to conversations between union officers and lawyers for their prepaid legal services plan was waived by the officers when they did not object to the introduction of tapes at their own trial.

Edens v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 858 F.2d 198 (4th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that a litigant waived the privilege by producing a memorandum during discovery.

Nguyen v. Excel Corp., 197 F.3d 200 (5th Cir. 1999) : In a Fair Labor Standards Act case, the defendant asserted a statutory good faith defense that its pay policy conformed to applicable administrative practices and enforcement policies. During depositions of the defendant's executives, they were unable to articulate the basis for the company's good faith belief without stating their reliance on counsel or taking a break to consult with counsel. As a result, the Magistrate Judge granted the plaintiffs' request to depose defense counsel. Affirming the order, the Court found it unnecessary to decide whether mere assertion of a good faith defense or generic references to communications with counsel would operate to waive the privilege. Rather, the defendant had waived the privilege when it failed to object to each question that was designed, by touching on the directions given to counsel and the legal material reviewed in addressing the question presented, to elicit information about the substance of an communication.

United States v. Dakota, 197 F.3d 821 (6th Cir. 1999) : Affirming a defendant's convictions arising out of paying kickbacks to an agent of an Indian tribal organization, the Court held that an Indian tribe's implicit consent to inspection of its documents obtained through subpoenas directed at tribal offices, which were occupied by a group that included people who were not tribal officers, waived the privilege as to the documents.

United States v. de la Jara, 973 F.2d 746 (9th Cir. 1992) : The Court held in a money laundering prosecution that an error in ruling a letter from the defendant to his attorney came within the crime-fraud exception had been waived because the defendant made no effort to recover the letter or protect its confidentiality during the six months between the government's seizure of it and its introduction into evidence. In United States v. Plache, 913 F.2d 1375 (9th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed a securities fraud conviction, holding that the defendant had waived the privilege for advice received from an attorney by testifying about the advice before the grand jury.

[G] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Government Investigations

In re Sealed Case, 676 F.2d 793 (D.C. Cir. 1982) : The Court rejected a claim of corporate privilege, holding that where a corporation submitted its investigative counsel's report to the SEC and otherwise complied with a voluntary disclosure program, it had waived any privilege claim with respect to the documents necessary for the SEC to evaluate the report, and that the waiver extended to a subsequent grand jury investigation. The Court relied and expanded upon In re Sealed Case in In re Subpoenas Duces Tecum, n71 which involved suits alleging manipulation of the sale of a company's stock. The Court held that voluntary disclosure to the SEC of the results of an investigation conducted by outside counsel was a waiver of privilege and work product claims as to material revealed. It stated that if voluntary disclosure programs are deemed important enough to be exempt from waiver principles, Congress or the SEC ought to so indicate.

In re Keeper of Records (Grand Jury Subpoena Addressed to XYZ Corp.), 348 F.3d 16 (1st Cir. 2003) : When XYZ Corp., a distributor of a medical device, learned that the device did not always function properly, it decided to withdraw the device from the market, but it first consulted its co-venturer, as their agreement required. In a telephone conference between the two companies that included their respective officers, XYZ's counsel argued for its position over the other side's strong counter-arguments. In a subsequent grand jury investigation of the incident, XYZ claimed attorney-client privilege regarding certain documents, but the government argued that the privilege had been waived by disclosures in discussions between XYZ and the government over the course of two years before the motion was made to compel production of the disputed documents. Reversing an order to compel production, the Court noted the circumstances of the case: XYZ repeatedly and consistently repeated its reservation of privilege, and the government did not raise the slightest question when these reservations were stated but rather kept the dialogue going and invited additional disclosures. Under these circumstances, the Court held that XYZ reasonably interpreted the government's silence as an acceptance of the reservations, which it would be unfair to allow the government to contradict at this late date. The Court noted that, besides being equitable, this conclusion comported with sound policy, since it would encourage arm's-length negotiations between the government and private parties in advance of an indictment, which would aid the truth-seeking process. In United States v. Massachusetts Inst. of Tech., 129 F.3d 681 (1st Cir. 1997) , which involved an investigation regarding MIT's tax exempt status, the IRS issued a summons for billing statements of law firms that had represented MIT and for minutes of MIT governing boards. MIT redacted the documents to avoid turning over materials it claimed were covered by the privilege. Affirming an order enforcing the subpoena for the documents without redaction, the Court held that the privilege had been waived when MIT gave the unredacted documents to the Defense Department audit agency pursuant to contracts with Department entities. In United States v. Billmyer, n72 a former employee of American Honda Motor Company, charged in an alleged commercial bribery scheme involving Honda dealers, served a subpoena duces tecum on Honda for a file containing an investigative report by Honda's outside counsel concerning internal corporate misconduct. Because the report contained factual information that Honda had turned over to the prosecution, the Court upheld a ruling that Honda had waived the privilege with respect to the factual information.

In re Grand Jury Subpoenas, 561 F. Supp. 1247 (E.D.N.Y. 1982) : The Court found a waiver where a corporation, without any attempt to reserve a privilege, disclosed to the House of Representatives Ethics Committee privileged documents concerning a pension agreement with a Congressman who was a former Chairman of the Board.

Westinghouse Elec. Corp. v. Republic of Philippines, 951 F.2d 1414 (3d Cir. 1991) : The Court held that after a corporation had confidentially disclosed to the SEC and the Justice Department documents generated in an internal investigation by its outside counsel into bribery of foreign officials, it could not claim the privilege when discovery of the documents was sought in an action by the foreign government. According to the Court, allowing selective waiver does not serve the purpose of encouraging full disclosure to the attorney in order to obtain informed legal assistance; it only encourages voluntary disclosure to government agencies, thus extending the privilege beyond its intended purpose. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 501.02[5][k][iii].

In re Martin Marietta Corp., 856 F.2d 619 (4th Cir. 1988) : Reviewing an attempt by a mail fraud defendant to discover certain documents held by his employer, the Court rejected a selective waiver argument, holding that prior disclosures to the government of quotations from the documents in an effort to resolve a criminal investigation resulted in a waiver of the disclosed information and the details underlying the information that was disclosed.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings, Oct. 12, 1995, 78 F.3d 251 (6th Cir. 1996) : The Court held that the owner and president of a laboratory waived the privilege when they told two government investigators that they had given a detailed description of a marketing plan to a Medicare attorney who advised them that there was "no problem" with it. Although the laboratory argued that it had not disclosed the substance of the attorney's advice, the Court concluded that the owner and president did discuss the substance of the attorney's advice and waived the privilege by revealing privileged communications to third parties. However, the Court reversed a ruling that the laboratory necessarily waived the privilege with respect to legal advice on parts of the marketing plan that were not disclosed to the investigators. On remand, the Trial Judge would have to decide whether the remaining points in the marketing plan constituted the same subject matter.

[H] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Inaccurate Disclosure

United States v. Jacobs, 117 F.3d 82 (2d Cir. 1997) : The Court held in a fraud prosecution that the defendant's extrajudicial disclosure of his attorney's advice, albeit in such a way as to distort the advice by 180 degrees, operated as a waiver of any privilege otherwise applicable to the letters disclosed (and distorted). Citing United States v.

Mendelsohn, 896 F.2d 1183, 1188-89 (9th Cir. 1990) , the Court stated: "An inaccurate statement of a privileged communication waives the privilege with respect to that communication."

[I] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Inadvertent Disclosure

In re Sealed Case, 877 F.2d 976 (D.C. Cir. 1989) : The Court held that a company's disclosure of one of six documents subject to a claim of privilege to a government auditor constituted a waiver, even if the disclosure was inadvertent. The Court concluded that the waiver applied to all communications relating to the same subject matter and remanded the case for a further assessment of how to define the subject matter of the disclosed document.

Texaco P.R., Inc. v. Department of Consumer Affairs, 60 F.3d 867 (1st Cir. 1995) : Affirming denial of the Department's petition for restitution of profits accrued during pendency of an injunction against enforcement of a Department regulation, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in a ruling that the Department had waived the privilege for 18 documents by inadvertently turning over four other privileged documents when complying with an order to permit Texaco counsel to review the administrative file.

Standard Chartered Bank PLC v. Ayala Int'l Holdings (U.S.) Inc., 111 F.R.D. 76 (S.D.N.Y. 1986) : The Magistrate stated that "[t]he inadvertent disclosure of one isolated document among many produced does not automatically effect a waiver." In Eigenheim Bank v. Halpern, n73 the District Court denied a motion by the defendants to compel the plaintiff to return a document. The defendants had inadvertently disclosed the document in a previous suit and later claimed privilege with respect to it, and the plaintiffs had specifically asked for this document, so the Court denied the privilege claim because the defendants had been lax and careless.

Parkway Gallery Furniture, Inc. v. Kittinger/Pennsylvania House Group, Inc., 116 F.R.D. 46 (M.D.N.C. 1987) : The Magistrate indicated that limited inadvertent disclosure would not necessarily result in waiver, and that inadvertent disclosure of documents did not require disclosure of other documents relating to the same subject matter where the disclosing party was not seeking to obtain unfair advantage from the disclosure. But see Thomas v. Pansy Ellen Prods., Inc. n74(holding that inadvertent disclosure of documents waived the privilege). See also Liggett Group, Inc. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp. n75(no unusual circumstances warranted holding that a party had not waived its privilege for inadvertently disclosed documents).

Alldread v. City of Grenada, 988 F.2d 1425 (5th Cir. 1993) : The Trial Judge had ordered the plaintiffs in a Fair Labor Standards Act suit to return privileged communications that the City inadvertently produced during discovery. Affirming a judgment for the City, the Court found no clear error in the order, considering the reasonableness of precautions taken to avoid disclosure, the short time taken to remedy the error, the scope of the discovery sought, the extent of disclosure, and the overriding issue of fairness.

Rainer v. Union Carbide Corp., 402 F.3d 608 (6th Cir. 2005) : The Court found that a mistaken disclosure did not constitute a waiver because a stipulated protective order signed by all the parties "was clear in stating that a producing party waived no rights in the event a privileged document was accidentally produced."

Dellwood Farms, Inc. v. Cargill, Inc., 128 F.3d 1122, 1997-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P71962 (7th Cir. 1997) : The Court wrote:

> What selective and inadvertent (also partial) disclosure have in common, however, is that neither is waiver in the standard sense in which the word is used in the law: the deliberate relinquishment of a right ... . When "waiver" is found in either type of case, the inadvertent or the selective, it is in order to punish the person claiming the privilege for a mistake, rather than to prevent him from changing his mind and retracting a benefit that he had consciously granted to the person from whom he wants to retract it ... . But failing to be careful -- committing a mistake that while careless may also be harmless -- is not by > itself a compelling reason for stripping a person of his privilege; and when we consider the reasons that the courts give for imposing such a harsh sanction for mistake or incaution, we find that they are inapplicable to a case such as this ... . [T]he severity of punishment for a mistake should be proportioned to the gravity of the mistake.

United States v. Zolin, 809 F.2d 1411 (1987) , modified en banc, 842 F.2d 1135 (9th Cir. 1988) , vacated on other grounds, 491 U.S. 554 (1989) : In a tax investigation, the Court affirmed an order to a State Court clerk to produce some, but not all, sealed documents sought by the IRS that had been filed in a State Court action. The Court found that there was no waiver resulting from the erroneous delivery of tapes of a privileged meeting to a third party.

Genentech, Inc. v. United States Int'l Trade Comm'n, 122 F.3d 1409 (Fed. Cir. 1997) : This proceeding before the Commission arose from Genentech's complaint that certain foreign companies were importing human growth hormone produced by processes that infringed its patents. At the same time, Genentech was involved in a multi-district consolidated patent infringement suit in District Court that related to the same patents. During the course of the latter litigation, Genentech erroneously produced 12,000 pages of documents it considered privileged. The District Court held that the privilege was waived as to the documents, although not as to their subject matter. n76 Because the documents were not produced in the Commission proceeding until the Administrative Law Judge learned of the District Court's ruling, the ALJ dismissed Genentech's complaint. The Court reversed the dismissal sanction, but held that because the disclosure was the result of inadequate screening procedures, the privilege for the documents had been lost for all purposes and in all forums, not just in the District Court suit.

[J] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Intent To Waive

United States v. Moscony, 927 F.2d 742 (3d Cir. 1991) : During the grand jury investigation of a RICO fraud case, the defendant and several of his employees were all represented by a single lawyer. The employees made communications to the attorney, which he incorporated into affidavits and had them sign in the presence of the defendant, who notarized them. Affirming suppression of the affidavits, the Court held that the ultimate key to confidentiality is intent. There was ample support for the findings that the employees were unsophisticated lay persons who were not advised by counsel or anyone else that the information divulged would not be confidential, and that they did not intend to waive confidentiality by signing the affidavits.

United States v. Mendelsohn, 896 F.2d 1183 (9th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed convictions for interstate gambling offenses, holding that the defendant waived his privilege by telling an undercover detective that his attorney had said selling a computer program for gambling was legal, even though the defendant did not intend to waive and he misstated what the attorney told him. In Weil v. Investment/Indicators, Research & Mgt., Inc., n77 the plaintiff in a securities action alleged that the defendant fund intended to defraud purchasers of its stock. During a deposition one of the fund's officers referred to legal advice received by the fund, and subsequently the fund disclosed a privileged communication from its attorney. The Court found a waiver by disclosure, whether or not waiver was intended, but reasoned that since the disclosures were early in the proceedings and made to opposing counsel rather than to the Court, waiver should be limited to the communications about the matter actually disclosed.

Champion Int'l Corp. v. International Paper Co., 486 F. Supp. 1328 (N.D. Ga. 1980) : The Court observed that a party who discloses privileged information may lose the benefits of the privilege even though there may be no intent to waive the privilege, but found that the slight disclosure made in this case did not amount to a waiver.

[K] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Miscellaneous Cases

In re von Bulow, 828 F.2d 94 (2d Cir. 1987) , modifying 114 F.R.D. 71 (S.D.N.Y. 1987) : In a suit on behalf of a wife whose husband had been acquitted of attempting to murder her, the District Judge held that the husband waived his privilege with respect to the subject matter and conversations published in a book written by one of the attorneys who represented him in the criminal prosecution. Although the husband refused to read the manuscript prior to publication, he actively encouraged the attorney to publish the book, which took the reader "inside" the criminal trial. The Court granted a writ of mandamus modifying the waiver decision. It distinguished between waivers in proceedings when a litigant seeks to disclose some, but not all, of privileged matter, and waivers outside of proceedings. Fairness requires that parties in litigation not be permitted to waive selectively; however, an extrajudicial disclosure does not involve this potential unfairness, so waiver in such cases extends only to the portions of confidential communications that are actually disclosed.

Hawkins v. Stables, 148 F.3d 379 (4th Cir. 1998) : In the plaintiff's suit against his former spouse for illegally wiretapping his phone while they were going through their divorce, the plaintiff called the defendant's divorce attorney as a witness, and asked the attorney whether he had ever told the defendant to take the wiretap off the phone. The Trial Judge sustained a claim of privilege, but the Court held this reversible error. The defendant's deposition testimony that she had never spoken to her attorney about any wiretap constituted a waiver of any privilege concerning the wiretap. Moreover, based on her own testimony, the defendant could not meet her burden of proving that there was any confidential communication to protect. In United States v. Jones, n78 the Court affirmed denial of a motion to quash grand jury subpoenas issued to attorneys, expressing doubts as to whether the privilege attached when legal opinions were sought for inclusion in a lease promotion brochure. Even if it did attach, the privilege was waived when the clients publicized portions of the legal opinions in the brochures and invited others to rely on them.

United States v. Newell, 315 F.3d 510 (5th Cir. 2002) : In a prosecution for money-laundering, the government introduced a letter from the defendant's in-house accountant to the accountant's attorney that recounted statements the defendant had made to the defendant's senior employees regarding communications between the defendant and the defendant's attorney. The Trial Judge rejected a privilege objection on the ground that the defendant had waived the attorney-client privilege by putting her good faith in issue. The Court noted that the privilege is not waived by a good faith defense in cases like this, where the defense is not based on advice of counsel but rather on a simple lack of knowledge of the wrongdoing and absence of intent to participate in it. However, the Court found that the defendant had waived the privilege by disclosing the communications to the employees. In a Fair Labor Standards Act case, Nguyen v. Excel Corp., 197 F.3d 200 (5th Cir. 1999) , the defendant asserted a statutory good faith defense that its pay policy conformed to applicable administrative practices and enforcement policies. During depositions of the defendant's executives, they were unable to articulate the basis for the company's good faith belief without stating their reliance on counsel or taking a break to consult with counsel. As a result, the Magistrate Judge granted the plaintiffs' request to depose defense counsel. Affirming the order, the Court found it unnecessary to decide whether mere assertion of a good faith defense or generic references to communications with counsel would operate to waive the privilege. Rather, the defendant had waived the privilege when the executives testified about the directions they provided their attorneys and the legal research undertaken by their attorneys, since disclosure of any significant portion of the communication waives the privilege as a whole.

In re Dayco Corp. Derivative Sec. Litig., 102 F.R.D. 468 (S.D. Ohio 1984) : The Court declined to find a waiver of the privilege when a newspaper published portions of a diary prepared by a corporate employee at the direction of a superior during an investigation. Neither counsel nor client had given the diary to the paper, and efforts had been made to restrict access to it.

Burden-Meeks v. Welch, 319 F.3d 897 (7th Cir. 2003) : Former city employees brought a civil rights action against the city and the mayor, and sought a report prepared by lawyers of an intergovernmental agency. The agency was created by municipalities to pool liability risks; it was not a party to the action. The report related to an investigation of whether the defendant city was doing enough to curtail litigation exposure. The Court affirmed a ruling that the agency waived any claim of attorney-client privilege by showing a copy of the report to the defendant mayor.

United States v. Willis, 565 F. Supp. 1186 (S.D. Iowa 1983) : The Court held that disclosure of information on a tax return effects a waiver as to the details that underlie the information actually reported, including "(1) the amount, character and source of the components represented by the reported figure, and (2) the mathematical computations employed to derive the reported figures and such figures' components." The Court concluded that preliminary drafts of legal instruments and even preliminary drafts of tax forms and schedules involved more than "mere underlying detail," so the privilege had not been waived as to them.

Perrignon v. Bergen Brunswig Corp., 77 F.R.D. 455, 460-61 n.4 (N.D. Cal. 1978) : The District Court said that to avoid a waiver of the privilege during a deposition, "[t]he attorney should ... halt the deposition and apply for a protective order."

Cox v. Administrator U.S. Steel & Carnegie, 17 F.3d 1386 (11th Cir. 1994) , modified on other grounds, 30 F.3d 1347 (11th Cir. 1994) : In an action by union members against the union and an employer, the Court held that the union did not waive its privilege merely because it permitted its counsel to testify in an earlier criminal trial and to file affidavits in certain other lawsuits. In United States v. Suarez, n79 the Court affirmed a firearms conviction, holding that once the defendant waived the privilege in order for his attorney to testify at a hearing on a motion to withdraw a guilty plea, the privilege could not be reinvoked at trial to bar the attorney from testifying to the same subject matter to which he previously testified. It declined to consider the defendant's claim that he should not have been compelled to choose between exercising his right to withdraw a guilty plea and his privilege, since the claim had not been raised in the District Court.

In re Pioneer Hi-Bred Int'l, Inc., 238 F.3d 1370 (Fed. Cir. 2001) : Monsanto sued Pioneer, its licensee of certain plant patents, alleging that the licenses did not survive the merger of Pioneer into a wholly-owned subsidiary of duPont. Monsanto sought in discovery to depose Pioneer's in-house counsel and obtain documents concerning information provided regarding the tax and intellectual property implications of the merger. The Trial Judge granted the request, on the ground that the privilege never applied because the information was intended to be disclosed in a proxy statement. Vacating most of the discovery order, the Court stated that "[a] party does not forego the privilege with respect to merger negotiations by disclosing the existence of the merger, the negotiations between the parties concerning the merger, or the property rights of the respective parties, and a waiver occurs only when a party relies on or discloses advice of counsel or other privileged information in connection with the merger." In this case such reliance and disclosure occurred only in the limited area of tax advice, where the proxy stated that the discussion of federal income tax consequences was the opinion of special counsel.

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Raising a Claim or Defense

[A] Civil Cases

Byers v. Burleson, 100 F.R.D. 436 (D.D.C. 1983) : In a legal malpractice action, the Court ruled that where the plaintiff claimed that she did not and could not reasonably have discovered the malpractice prior to a certain time she had waived the privilege with respect to a statute of limitations issue that she "has interjected into the case."

In re Bairnco Corp. Sec. Litig., 148 F.R.D. 91 (S.D.N.Y. 1993) : In an action by purchasers of common stock against a corporation, its subsidiary, and the chief executive officer, the Trial Judge reasoned that, although the company disclaimed any intention to raise a defense of advice of counsel, the public disclosures the plaintiffs relied upon specifically referred to the belief of both management and counsel. Moreover, the company had relied on conclusions of counsel in its motion papers to defeat a fraud exception to the privilege. Ruling on discovery motions related to a cross-claim for bad-faith adoption of an insurance premium structure in Vicinanzo v. Brunschwig & Fils, Inc., n80 the District Court held that references by the insurer to advice of counsel in adopting the structure did not waive the privilege, but that, unless the insurer made full and immediate disclosure of all legal opinions pertaining to the decision, it would be precluded at trial from asserting an advice-of-counsel defense. In a suit to recover on fidelity bonds, Leucadia, Inc. v. Reliance Ins. Co., n81 Leucadia moved for a protective order to prevent documents generated in its investigation of losses and fraud involving a former employee. Although the Court ruled that disclosure of information by the former employee to the insurer was not a waiver, it found that the plaintiff's claim of loss was based in large part on the results of an investigation and that it was necessary for the report containing those results to be shared with the insurer.

United States Fire Ins. Co. v. Asbestospray, Inc., 182 F.3d 201 (3d Cir. 1999) : The Court reversed a ruling in an interpleader action that the plaintiffs had waived their attorney-based privileges by arguing that their delay in filing the interpleader was justified. The plaintiffs had not asserted any claim or taken any affirmative step that placed the advice of counsel at issue; rather their argument was based on the record and a claim that the delay was objectively justified. In Livingstone v. North Belle Vernon Borough, 91 F.3d 515 (3d Cir. 1996) , a suit by a husband and wife against police officers and a municipality, the Court held that, under Town of Newton v. Rumery, n82 a party challenging a release agreement waives any claim of privilege with respect to communications between the party and the lawyer who negotiated the agreement. In Glenemede Trust Co. v. Thompson, n83 the Trust Company asserted as a defense in a suit arising from its role in a stock repurchase transaction that it was relying on counsel's advice that the Internal Revenue Code prohibited it from taking certain actions. Denying mandamus against orders directing the Trust Company's law firm to produce all files relating to the repurchase transaction, the Court held that the privilege was waived not only as to the cited opinion letter and communications pertaining to the letter, but also as to all communications regarding the transaction that was the subject of the letter, since fairness requires that the opponent be able to test whether counsel had been provided with all material facts, whether counsel gave a well-informed opinion, and whether the advice was heeded by the client. In Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Inc. v. Home Indem. Co., n84 a declaratory judgment action to determine coverage for AIDS-related claims arising from the insured's blood products, the insurers sought documents in which the insureds, their attorneys, and their accountants evaluated the insureds' potential liability before purchasing the coverage. The District Court affirmed the Magistrate Judge's order that the documents be disclosed, on the ground that any privilege had been waived by filing the action and putting in issue the insureds' knowledge of facts relating to the claims. On petition for mandamus, the Court vacated the order, holding that a party does not lose the privilege any time the client's state of mind is put in issue or the attorney's advice may be relevant to the matters in issue, but only when the client has taken the affirmative step of placing the advice of the attorney in issue.

Ross v. City of Memphis, 423 F.3d 596 (6th Cir. 2005) : The plaintiff, a black police officer, was one of 52 officers who were engaged in a long-running Title VII lawsuit against the City regarding a compromised promotion exam. As a result of disciplinary proceedings related to compromise of the exam, she was demoted in rank but subsequently restored to her previous position. She brought a civil rights action against the City and its former police director (as an individual) for her demotion. In discovery the director claimed that he went forward with the plaintiff's disciplinary proceeding upon the advice of counsel for the City, but the City objected that the communications were privileged. On interlocutory review of an order ordering the director to disclose the communications, the Court reversed. It held that municipalities may claim the attorney-client privilege for confidential legal communications between their attorneys and their employees, at least in civil actions, and that the City's interest was not to be balanced against the adversary's need for the information in pursuing her claim against the individual former employee, so his advice of counsel defense did not waive the City's privilege.

Lorenz v. Valley Forge Ins. Co., 815 F.2d 1095 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court reversed a judgment for insureds suing for bad faith failure to honor a claim, holding that the Magistrate erroneously admitted communications between the insurer and its former attorney. The insurer did not waive the privilege merely by denying the plaintiff's allegations, nor by listing the former attorney as a witness and permitting him to answer deposition questions without revealing confidential communications.

Sedco Int'l, S.A. v. Cory, 683 F.2d 1201 (8th Cir. 1982) : In a dispute growing out of an oil producing venture, the Court upheld a ruling that the company was not entitled to inquire into certain confidential communications between an opposing party, who alleged fraud by the company, and his counsel. Although the privilege may be waived by implication, the Court found that nothing that the party's attorney told him would have been relevant to assessing his reliance on information he had, so the fraud claim did not by implication open the door to an inquiry into confidential communications.

Columbia Pictures TV, Inc. v. Krypton Broadcasting of Birmingham, Inc., 259 F.3d 1186 (9th Cir. 2001) : The defendant in an action for copyright infringement, which arose from broadcasting four TV series after the license had been revoked, argued that the advice of counsel made the infringement non-willful. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the defense because the defendant had refused to make himself available for deposition on the issue. Since the attorney-client privilege is waived by assertion of an advice of counsel defense, the defendant must either submit to examination on that advise or forgo the defense. In Home Indem. Co. v. Lane Powell Moss & Miller, 43 F.3d 1322 (9th Cir. 1995) , the plaintiff insurer settled an action against it for bad faith refusal to settle a personal injury/wrongful death claim and then sued the law firm it had retained to represent the insureds in the underlying action for malpractice and contribution on the ground that the firm had negligently failed to convey the insurer's offer to the plaintiffs in the underlying action. The Court held that the plaintiffs in the underlying action did not waive the privilege by bringing the bad-faith claim, as their state of mind in making a settlement request was not relevant in light of the request they made. The Court also held that the insurer did not waive its privilege with respect to settlement of the bad-faith action by attempting to prove the reasonableness of the settlement amount, as the settlement amount was defended at trial on objective terms without relying on privileged communications. In a Williams Act case, Chevron Corp. v. Pennzoil Co., n85 the defendant asserted that it had, on the advice of its lawyers, acquired the plaintiff's stock for investment purposes only. The Court held that the defendant had waived its privilege by relying on the advice of counsel as support for its position on the merits.

Cox v. Administrator U.S. Steel & Carnegie, 17 F.3d 1386 (11th Cir. 1994) , modified on other grounds, 30 F.3d 1347 (11th Cir. 1994) : In an action by union members against the union and an employer, the Court held that, even though the union could have denied any criminal intent in changing its pension fund policy without specifically claiming that it believed that its change was lawful, it "injected the issue of its knowledge of the law into the case and thereby waived the privilege."

Zenith Radio Corp. v. United States, 764 F.2d 1577 (Fed. Cir. 1985) : Reversing a waiver ruling below, the Court held that the government had not waived its privilege by asserting it had been damaged by a preliminary injunction, subsequently dissolved, that Zenith had secured.

[B] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Raising a Claim or Defense -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Bilzerian, 926 F.2d 1285 (2d Cir. 1991) : The defendant in a securities fraud prosecution, who argued that he did not intend to violate the securities laws and believed his conduct was lawful, moved in limine for a ruling that would permit him to testify regarding his belief in the lawfulness of certain conduct without being subject to cross-examination on confidential communications he had with his attorney on this subject. The Court held there was no error in the ruling that, if the defendant so testified, he would open the door to cross-examination with respect to the basis for his belief, including inquiry into communications with his attorney. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 501.02[5][k][iv].

United States v. Newell, 315 F.3d 510 (5th Cir. 2002) : In a prosecution for money-laundering, the government introduced a letter from the defendant's in-house accountant to the accountant's attorney that recounted statements the defendant had made to the defendant's senior employees regarding communications between the defendant and the defendant's attorney. The Trial Judge rejected a privilege objection on the ground that the defendant had waived the attorney-client privilege by putting her good faith in issue. The Court noted that the privilege is not waived by a good faith defense in cases like this, where the defense is not based on advice of counsel but rather on a simple lack of knowledge of the wrongdoing and absence of intent to participate in it. However, the Court found that the defendant had waived the privilege by disclosing the communications to the employees. In a bankruptcy fraud case, United States v. Moody, 923 F.2d 341 (5th Cir. 1991) , when one defendant's counsel ran out of time in his opening statement, he stated that counsel representing a codefendant (the defendant's employee) would present certain information during his opening; the latter then indicated the defendant knew nothing about what went into the bankruptcy schedules except what his attorney in the bankruptcy had told him. The Court held there was no error when the bankruptcy attorney testified that the defendant had not objected to her listing certain items as assets, since the opening statement and subsequent examination indicated the privilege was being used improperly as a sword. In United States v. Miller, n86 the Court held that when a defendant asserts good faith reliance on advice of counsel as a defense, the government is entitled to examine the relevant communications between client and counsel.

United States v. Workman, 138 F.3d 1261 (8th Cir. 1998) : The defendant was charged with endorsing his father's railroad pension checks for six years after his father's death. He claimed that he had endorsed the checks on the advice of his attorney, but when his attorney was called as a witness at trial, the Judge ruled that the attorney could not testify about the content of the advice given the defendant. A mistrial was granted after the attorney gave testimony that included information the Judge considered privileged, and the government made an interlocutory appeal after the Judge denied a motion in limine to either bar the defendant from claiming advice of counsel or to permit the attorney to testify to his advice. Reversing, the Court held that the defendant could not selectively assert the privilege to block the introduction of information harmful to his case after introducing other aspects of his conversations with his attorney for his own benefit.

United States v. Amlani, 169 F.3d 1189 (9th Cir. 1999) : The defendant claimed that the prosecutor violated his right to counsel by disparaging his attorney in his presence, leading him to dismiss the attorney. In preparation for a hearing on the disparagement claim, the government sought to inquire into communications between the defendant and his attorneys regarding the circumstances of the defendant's dismissal of his counsel. The defendant's motion to quash the subpoena demanding privileged materials was dismissed, and the Court affirmed, finding that the defendant had waived his privilege. By claiming it was the disparaging remarks that caused him to discharge the attorney, the defendant put the communications between them in issue insofar as they related to his reasons for changing counsel.

[C] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Raising a Claim or Defense -- Habeas Corpus Cases

In re Lott, 424 F.3d 446 (6th Cir. 2005) : The Court held that a death row inmate seeking habeas corpus relief does not waive the attorney-client privilege by claiming actual innocence. It reasoned "that the contention of a habeas petitioner that he is innocent is not all that different from a criminal defendant's assertion that he is not guilty of a crime."

Bittaker v. Woodford, 331 F.3d 715 (9th Cir. 2003) (en banc): The Court affirmed a ruling that precluded use of privileged attorney-client materials for any purpose other than litigating a state prisoner's habeas corpus claim for ineffective assistance of counsel. Despite the long-established principle that a party waives attorney-client privilege by putting the lawyer's performance in issue, the Court emphasized that "[s]uch waivers by implication differ materially from the more traditional express waivers." The waiver by implication should be no broader than necessary to ensure fair proceedings, so the holder of the privilege may preserve it by abandoning the claim against the lawyer. Moreover, "if a party complies with the court's conditions and turns over privileged materials, it is entitled to rely on the contours of the waiver the court imposes, so that it will not be unfairly surprised in the future by learning that it actually waived more than it bargained for in processing its claims." The Court concluded that, in a habeas corpus proceeding, a narrow waiver rule should apply so that defendants with genuine constitutional claims are not deterred or precluded from bringing them. The majority held that California courts must respect the protective order and cannot claim waiver of the privilege by disclosure during the habeas action. Two concurring Judges were not convinced that the state attorney-client privilege must remain intact after the attorney-client privilege is waived in Federal Courts, and would have left to the states the first determination of whether a waiver occurred.

[iv] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Scope of Waiver

In re Sealed Case, 877 F.2d 976 (D.C. Cir. 1989) : The Court held that a company's inadvertent disclosure of one of six privileged documents constituted a waiver as to all communications relating to the same subject matter.

In re Keeper of Records (Grand Jury Subpoena Addressed to XYZ Corp.), 348 F.3d 16 (1st Cir. 2003) : When XYZ Corp., a distributor of a medical device, learned that the device did not always function properly, it decided to withdraw the device from the market, but it first consulted its co-venturer, as their agreement required. In a telephone conference between the two companies that included their respective officers, XYZ's counsel argued for its position over the other side's strong counter-arguments. In a subsequent grand jury investigation of the incident, XYZ claimed attorney-client privilege regarding certain documents, but the government argued that the privilege had been waived when XYZ's counsel had given legal advice in the presence of third parties and had disclosed legal advice previously provided to XYZ. In the government's view, this effected a waiver of the privilege as to all communications regarding the marketing and withdrawal of the device. Reversing an order compelling compliance with the subpoena, the Court held that the waiver did not extend beyond privileged information actually revealed during the telephone conference. To the contrary, it held that "the extrajudicial disclosure of attorney-client communications, not thereafter used by the client to gain adversarial advantage in judicial proceedings, cannot work an implied waiver of all confidential communications on the same subject matter." The attorney's participation in an extrajudicial meeting or negotiation "does nothing to cause prejudice to the opposition or to subvert the truth-seeking process" that would require revelation of all related exchanges. Furthermore, requiring broad subject matter waivers would provide perverse incentives, to exclude attorneys from participating out of fear that their inclusion would lead to wholesale disclosure of confidential information.

In re von Bulow, 828 F.2d 94 (2d Cir. 1987) : In a suit on behalf of a wife whose husband was acquitted of attempting to murder her, the District Judge held that the husband waived his privilege with respect to the subject matter and conversations published in a book written by one of the attorneys who represented him in the criminal prosecution. Although the husband refused to read the manuscript prior to publication, he actively encouraged the attorney to publish the book, which took the reader "inside" the criminal trial. The Court granted a writ of mandamus modifying the waiver decision. It distinguished between waivers in proceedings when a litigant seeks to disclose some, but not all, of privileged matter, and waivers outside of proceedings. Fairness requires that parties in litigation not be permitted to waive selectively; however, an extrajudicial disclosure does not involve this potential unfairness, so waiver in such cases extends only to the portions of confidential communications that are actually disclosed.

Smith v. Alyeska Pipeline Serv. Co., 538 F. Supp. 977 (D. Del. 1982) , aff'd, 758 F.2d 668 (3d Cir. 1984) : The Court held that when the plaintiff's former attorney sent the defendants in a patent infringement action a copy of an opinion letter written for the plaintiff, any privilege was lost as to all documents relating to the patent addressed in the letter. In another patent case, Hercules, Inc. v. Exxon Corp., n87 the District Court said that although voluntary waiver by the client as to one or more privileged documents waives the privilege as to all communications between the same attorney and the same client on the same subject, and although even inadvertent disclosure of facts or documents might waive a privilege, the waiver exception is to be narrowly construed and waiver is found "only if facts relevant to a particular, narrow subject matter have been disclosed in circumstances in which it would be unfair to deny the other party an opportunity to discover other relevant facts with respect to that subject matter."

Nye v. Sage Products, Inc., 98 F.R.D. 452 (N.D. Ill. 1982) : In a patent infringement action, the Court held that the plaintiffs' disclosure of privileged documents to the defendants waived the privilege as to the subject matter of the documents. The waiver extended to communications not only with the counsel involved in preparing the disclosed documents, but also with other counsel. The Court declined to hold, however, that the waiver extended to communications made after the disclosure. See also Leybold-Heraeus Tech., Inc. v. Midwest Instrument Co. n88(company waived by voluntarily disclosing selected portions of otherwise privileged communications, so other documents relevant to the subject matter of the disclosed communications were discoverable).

Chevron Corp. v. Pennzoil Co., 974 F.2d 1156 (9th Cir. 1992) : The defendant in a Williams Act case asserted that it had, on the advice of its lawyers, acquired the plaintiff's stock for investment purposes only. In seeking discovery of documents supporting the defendant's position, the plaintiff asserted that any privilege had been lost, first, because documents discussing the question had been disclosed to an outside auditor and, second, because the defendant had affirmatively placed at issue the very information for which it was claiming the privilege. Deciding that discovery should have been compelled, the Court held that disclosure to the auditor constituted waiver only as to communications about the matter actually disclosed and not every document touching on the general question, but that the privilege as to all the documents had been waived by relying on the advice of counsel as support for its position on the merits. In United States v. Mendelsohn, 896 F.2d 1183 (9th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed convictions for interstate gambling offenses, holding that the defendant waived his privilege by telling an undercover detective that his attorney had told him that selling a computer program for gambling was legal, even though the defendant did not intend to waive and he misstated what the attorney told him. The Trial Judge was properly careful to confine the attorney's testimony to the particular matter disclosed to the detective and not to permit inquiry generally about the representation of the client. In a securities action, Weil v. Investment/Indicators, Research & Mgt., Inc., n89 the plaintiff alleged that the defendant fund intended to defraud purchasers of its stock. During a deposition one of the fund's officers referred to legal advice received by the fund, and subsequently the fund disclosed a privileged communication from its attorney. The Court found a waiver by disclosure, whether or not waiver was intended, but reasoned that since the disclosures were early in the proceedings and made to opposing counsel rather than to the Court, waiver should be limited to the communications about the matter actually disclosed.

Fort James Corp. v. Solo Cup Co., 412 F.3d 1340 (Fed. Cir. 2005) : During discovery in patent litigation, the plaintiff produced an opinion of counsel, which it had also produced in previous litigation, and related documents. The defendant sought to compel production of an additional document, an invention disclosure statement. Reversing a ruling that the disclosure statement was privileged, the Court held that the plaintiff had waived the protection, reasoning that "[t]he widely applied standard for determining the scope of a waiver of attorney-client privilege is that the waiver applies to all other communications relating to the same subject matter," and "[t]he waiver extends beyond the document initially produced out of concern for fairness, so that a party is prevented from disclosing communications that support its position while simultaneously concealing communications that do not." In GFI, Inc. v. Franklin Corp., 265 F.3d 1268 (Fed. Cir. 2001) , the Court applied the law of the Fifth Circuit on the issue of attorney-client privilege, and affirmed a judgment that a patent was not enforceable due to inequitable conduct. It held that the patentee waived the attorney-client privilege for purposes of his patent infringement suit when his patent attorney testified in an earlier trial regarding the patentee's state of mind, knowledge of prior art, and communications with the patentee (including conversations about the duty of disclosure and nondisclosure of prior art). The Court concluded that "[w]hen a party voluntarily waives attorney-client privilege, that waiver extends to all communications pertaining to the subject matter of the communications."

[v] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Stolen Documents

Suburban Sew N'Sweep, Inc. v. Swiss-Bernina, Inc., 91 F.R.D. 254 (N.D. Ill. 1981) : The plaintiffs in an antitrust action obtained what otherwise would have been privileged communications between client and attorney by taking documents from the defendant's trash dumpster. Although it noted a trend toward protecting privileged communications divulged without notice to the holder, the Court concluded that the threat to future communications presented by the plaintiffs' conduct was insufficient to justify recognizing a privilege with respect to documents already discovered.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 466 F. Supp. 863 (D. Minn. 1979) , aff'd, 629 F.2d 548 (8th Cir. 1980) : The Court indicated that it would entertain a privilege claim as to documents removed from a grand jury target's corporate offices, even if stolen by an ex-employee, and would afford the parties an opportunity to address whether the corporation adequately protected the confidentiality of the documents.

[3] Clergy-Penitent

United States v. Gordon, 493 F. Supp. 822 (N.D.N.Y. 1980) , aff'd, 655 F.2d 478 (2d Cir. 1981) : Ruling in limine before the trial of a criminal case, the Trial Judge rejected a defendant's claim of the priest-penitent privilege regarding conversations relating to business transactions between the defendant and his salaried employee who was on a leave of absence from the priesthood.

In re Grand Jury Investigation, 918 F.2d 374 (3d Cir. 1990) : The Court vacated the denial of a government motion to compel a Lutheran clergyman to testify before a grand jury regarding subjects discussed during a family counseling session. The case was remanded for findings whether a husband, his wife, her adult son by a previous marriage, and the son's fiancee had communicated with the pastor in his spiritual or professional capacity with a reasonable expectation of confidentiality.

United States v. Dube, 820 F.2d 886 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed income tax evasion convictions, holding that conversations the defendant had with a pastor were not privileged, since they involved efforts to avoid income taxes rather than religious counseling.

United States v. Webb, 615 F.2d 828 (9th Cir. 1980) : Without deciding whether Rule 501 recognizes a priest-penitent privilege, the Court said that any privilege could not be claimed when a confession was made in the presence of both a prison chaplain and a security officer.

[4] Government

[a] Deliberative Process

[i] Federal Agencies

[A] Banking Agencies

In re Subpoena Duces Tecum, 145 F.3d 1422 (D.C. Cir. 1998) , on reh'g, 156 F.3d 1279 (D.C. Cir. 1998) : A bankruptcy trustee sued the FDIC to void, as fraudulent conveyances, the FDIC's transfers to an insolvent bank. The FDIC refused to produce documents in response to a subpoena requesting information as to the FDIC's decisionmaking process concerning the transfers to the bank. The Court held that the subpoena was enforceable, declaring that the deliberative process privilege does not apply "when a plaintiff's cause of action turns on the government's intent." The privilege "was fashioned in cases where the governmental decisionmaking process is collateral to the plaintiff's suit," while here the agency was itself the defendant in the underlying suit, and the government's intent was critical to the plaintiff's case. In First Eastern Corp. v. Mainwaring, 21 F.3d 465 (D.C. Cir. 1994) , the Court reversed an order quashing a subpoena for records related to a bank that was served on an independent management consultant that federal regulators required the bank to retain. The deliberative process privilege was inapplicable because the consultant's client was the bank; even if the consultant were somehow said to be working for the regulators, the government was not asserting the privilege, which belongs to it. In In re Subpoena Served upon Comptroller of Currency, n90 shareholders bringing a class action and derivative suit against a bank holding company subpoenaed bank examination reports and examiners' notes and memoranda, which the Trial Judge ordered produced to the extent they had previously been given to the company or were factual portions of the notes and memoranda. The Court affirmed in part, holding that the factual portions were not protected by the deliberative process privilege, but that sharing an examination report with the subject depository institution did not operate as a waiver of the bank examination privilege because providing such information is a fundamental part of the regulatory process.

Resolution Trust Corp. v. Diamond, 773 F. Supp. 597 (S.D.N.Y. 1991) : The Court, ruling on privilege claims by the RTC in an action to repudiate leases, held that certain of the documents were not privileged because they were neither predecisional nor deliberative, either because they involved mere instructions to subordinate officers as to the implementation of policy or because they contained purely factual information. In In re Franklin Nat'l Bank Sec. Litig., n91 the FDIC, as receiver, sought to compel the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency to produce its periodic examination reports and related documents concerning the failed Bank. In an opinion thoroughly discussing the privilege protecting intragovernmental expressions of opinion, the District Court held that the reports must be disclosed, since most of the information, even in the section labeled confidential, amounted to shorthand descriptions of what the bank examiner observed; however, the summaries and analyses of the reports were protected. The Judge suggested that the factors to be considered in balancing the interests include: the relevance of the evidence sought to be protected; the availability of other evidence; the seriousness of the litigation and the issues involved; the role of the government in the litigation; and the possibility of future intimidation of government employees. It also suggested that an in camera examination of the documents generally would be necessary to balance properly.

Franklin Sav. Ass'n v. Ryan, 922 F.2d 209 (4th Cir. 1991) : In an action by a savings association to remove a conservator appointed by the Director of the Office of Thrift Savings, the Court vacated a finding that the Director was in contempt for failing to answer deposition questions, since the questions went to the Director's mental processes and sought information given him by subordinates, information that was clearly inadmissible in the absence of extraordinary circumstances not present in this case.

[B] Government -- Deliberative Process -- Federal Agencies -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Weber Aircraft Corp., 465 U.S. 792 (1984) : A unanimous Court held that the Freedom of Information Act exemption for "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency" covered confidential statements, conclusions, findings, and recommendations in a safety investigation of an aircraft failure in flight. Although the Court recognized an established privilege and did not create a new one, its opinion referred to the legislative history of the FOIA as recognizing "a need for claims of privilege when confidentiality is necessary to ensure frank and open discussion and hence efficient governmental operations." The Court noted that Congress' failure to enact specific privileges does not represent rejection of any particular privilege.

Hinckley v. United States, 140 F.3d 277 (D.C. Cir. 1998) : An insanity acquittee's motion for conditional release was denied. On appeal, he argued that the District Judge erroneously considered the conclusions of a Hospital Review Board after ruling that the deliberative process privilege shielded a discussion among members of the Hospital Review Board before they ultimately decided to oppose his release. Affirming, the Court held that the Board's discussion was both predecisional and deliberative, and thus qualified for protection under the deliberative process privilege. The appellant could not show a superior need for the evidence, since he had already received all the information that was before the Board, as well as its ultimate decision. During a grand jury investigation of the former Secretary of Agriculture in In re Sealed Case, 121 F.3d 729 (D.C. Cir. 1997) , a subpoena was issued for documents pertaining to the White House Counsel's investigation of the Secretary. The District Judge upheld claims of deliberative process and presidential communications privileges for certain documents after reviewing them in camera, but the decision was vacated and remanded for a more detailed review. The Court concluded that the presidential communication privilege is narrower than the privilege for executive deliberative processes. In Tax Analysts v. IRS, n92 a non-profit organization sought to compel the IRS to disclose memoranda that were prepared by the Office of Chief Counsel for the IRS in response to requests from field personnel for legal guidance. The Court held that the memoranda were not protected by the deliberative process privilege, since they were neither "predecisional" nor "deliberative." They were statements of the agency's legal position and did not "reflect the 'give-and-take' that characterizes deliberative materials."

Town of Norfolk v. United States Army Corps of Eng'rs, 968 F.2d 1438 (1st Cir. 1992) : In an action under the Clean Water Act challenging the Corps' grant of a permit to fill wetlands, the Court held that a draft letter from the Corps' district engineer to a local agency was protected from disclosure by the deliberative process privilege, as it contained no factual information and reflected a preliminary position by the Corps that was subsequently rejected.

Tigue v. United States Dep't of Justice, 312 F.3d 70 (2d Cir. 2002) : In an FOIA suit by lawyers who represented clients in grand jury tax investigations and IRS proceedings, the plaintiffs sought a memorandum prepared by an Assistant United States Attorney in New York that was circulated to a task force established by the IRS to gather information and make suggestions on how to reform its Criminal Investigations Department. Affirming summary judgment for the Justice Department, the Court held that the document was a "predecisional document" that was protected by the deliberative process privilege. The circulation to the task force was to assist the IRS in its decisionmaking regarding the future of the Criminal Investigations Department. The fact that the author of the memorandum knew that the task force would issue a published report did not amount to a waiver of the privilege, nor did minor references to the memorandum in the task force's report.

United States v. Farley, 11 F.3d 1385, 1993-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P70441 (7th Cir. 1993) : In a proceeding arising out of the defendant's alleged violation of the Hart-Scott-Rodino reporting requirements, the Court held that the deliberative process privilege applied to FTC staff memoranda that led to the decision to sue. The fact that one document, the referral memorandum to the Department of Justice, was passed to another agency did not terminate its privileged status.

Exxon Shipping Co. v. United States Dep't of Interior, 34 F.3d 774 (9th Cir. 1994) : To support its defense in actions brought against it for the Exxon Valdez oil spill, Exxon commenced a discovery proceeding against five federal agencies. The District Court ruled that the federal housekeeping statute, 5 U.S.C. § 301, authorizes agency heads to prohibit their employees from testifying or producing documents in litigation in which the United States is not a party. Reversing, the Court held the statute does not provide such authority, but the government's concerns about its efficient functioning can be sufficiently balanced under the general rules of discovery and the qualified deliberative process privilege.

United States v. West, 672 F.2d 796 (10th Cir. 1982) : A criminal defendant, moving for a new trial on grounds of prosecutorial harassment, obtained an order requiring the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility to turn over relevant files. Granting mandamus to vacate the order, the Court recognized that claims of governmental privilege involve balancing, but found the files to be irrelevant to the criminal defense and concluded that dealing with claims of attorney misconduct should be confined to the Department's OPR.

Moye, O'Brien, O'Rourke, Hogan & Pickert, v. AMTRAK, 376 F.3d 1270 (11th Cir. 2004) : In an FOIA action, the Court held it was error to conclude that certain materials generated in an audit of Amtrak were not protected by the deliberative process privilege. The Court rejected as too restrictive the view that the privilege protects only those documents reviewed by the final decisionmaker, since it "fail[ed] to account for the significant role during the auditing process which the lower level staff play in Amtrak's ... deliberative process." The Court concluded that "the district court should have considered whether the documents reflected advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of a process by which Amtrak's OIG auditing policies were formulated." In Florida House of Representatives v. United States Dep't of Commerce, 961 F.2d 941 (11th Cir. 1992) , the Court reversed summary judgment for the plaintiffs on their FOIA request, holding that block level census data developed by the Department in the course of the 1990 census was deliberative process material within Exemption 5 of the Act, and that there had been no waiver of the privilege when the data had been disclosed pursuant to Court order and under threat of a congressional subpoena.

Zenith Radio Corp. v. United States, 764 F.2d 1577 (Fed. Cir. 1985) : In an action by the government to recover interest it had lost because of a delay in implementing a settlement, the Court reversed a ruling that required the government to disclose information concerning meetings where officials decided whether to seek interest. It reasoned that the privilege protecting deliberations among government officials involved "subtle and sensitive questions," and should not be breached simply because the government files suit.

[ii] Government -- Deliberative Process -- Prosecutors

United States v. Fernandez, 231 F.3d 1240 (9th Cir. 2000) : The Trial Judge had precluded the government from seeking the death penalty for defendants charged with committing murders in furtherance of racketeering, as a sanction for failing to turn over its confidential predecisional death penalty evaluation form and memorandum. Reversing, the Court reasoned that the documents are predecisional because they are submitted to a Justice Department Committee before the Attorney General makes the final decision on the death penalty; and they are deliberative because they contain opinions, recommendations, and advice about agency policies. Although the documents contained factual material not directly protected by the deliberative process privilege, the factual material was "so interwoven with the deliberative material that it is not severable."

[iii] Government -- Deliberative Process -- State Agencies and Governments

Walsh v. Chittenden Corp., 799 F. Supp. 405 (D. Vt. 1992) : Denying a motion by the state Department of Banking, Insurance, and Securities to quash a subpoena served by the plaintiffs in a securities fraud case, the Judge held that the deliberative process privilege did not bar discovery because the plaintiffs' interest in disclosure outweighed any claim of confidentiality. Noting that the privilege must be formally asserted and delineated, the Judge expressed doubts about whether the procedural prerequisites for assertion of the privilege were satisfied and about whether bank examination reports could ever be deemed predecisional material. In a civil rights action alleging excessive force by police, Skibo v. City of New York, n93 the District Court ruled that a police department's internal affairs procedural manual and effectiveness evaluations, as well as files of a civilian complaint review board containing complaints for the relevant years against officers in the precinct involved in this case, were discoverable. The plaintiffs' allegations of misconduct and of the City's acquiescence gave rise to an obvious need for the evidence and the defendants were unlikely to decline to investigate complaints as a result of disclosure, so the balance favored disclosure. Because the plaintiffs sought too many files created in response to complaints, the Court ordered a random sampling of a designated number of files plus all files containing complaints against the individual officers named in the suit.

Castle v. Jallah, 142 F.R.D. 618 (E.D. Va. 1992) : The Court held in a prisoner's civil rights action that governmental privilege did not bar discovery of factual statements in investigative reports concerning the incident, absent any indication that disclosure of the statements would have a chilling effect on police internal investigation candor or that the plaintiff's case was brought in bad faith. In a civil rights action by a pretrial detainee against police officers, Spell v. McDaniel, n94 the District Court held that documents relating to the police department's investigations into the plaintiff's injuries and into other incidents of police misconduct were not immune from discovery. Under the qualified privilege that covered the documents, the plaintiff's need for discovery outweighed any government interest in secrecy. However, the Court indicated that information from confidential informants might justifiably be deleted following an in camera examination of the documents. It also concluded that supervisory evaluations would not be protected or edited unless the defendants made "a strong showing that confidentiality is vital to the decision-making process of the municipality."

Bobkoski v. Board of Educ. of Cary Consol. School Dist. 26, 141 F.R.D. 88 (N.D. Ill. 1992) : The Court held in an age discrimination action against a school board that the deliberative process privilege extended to a board meeting at which the plaintiff's performance was not the central issue but which dealt more with case preparation, settlement options, and trial strategy.

Sanchez v. City of Santa Ana, 936 F.2d 1027 (9th Cir. 1990) , amended, (9th Cir. 1991): Affirming in part a judgment for the defendants in a civil rights action brought by Hispanic police officers, the Court held that police department personnel files are within the qualified privilege for official information. A protective order limiting discovery in the files to certain statistical information was properly granted.

Sirmans v. City of South Miami, 86 F.R.D. 492 (S.D. Fla. 1980) : In a civil rights action, the Court recognized a qualified governmental privilege to protect the files relating to ongoing criminal investigations.

[b] Government -- Evidentiary Procedures

Schreiber v. Society for Sav. Bancorp, Inc., 11 F.3d 217 (D.C. Cir. 1993) : The plaintiffs in a shareholder class action against a bank subpoenaed bank examination reports and other documents relating to the bank from federal bank regulatory agencies. The District Court, after holding a hearing but without conducting an in camera inspection, refused to enforce the subpoenas. The Court reversed for a failure to make findings about the factual (unprivileged) versus evaluative (qualifiedly privileged) nature of the documents sought; it noted that such findings are usually based on an in camera inspection of documents selected with the aid of a Vaughn index. The Court suggested if the subpoenas were enforced on remand, a protective order would be appropriate.

Association for Reduction of Violence v. Hall, 734 F.2d 63 (1st Cir. 1984) : The Court vacated a summary judgment for the defendants in a suit charging them with transferring prison inmates in retaliation for exercising First Amendment rights. The Trial Judge had properly considered in camera the plaintiffs' request for certain prison files and had not abused his discretion in finding that the files were privileged under the informant's privilege, a law enforcement investigation privilege, and/or a privilege for intra-governmental memoranda containing opinions or recommendations. Once the files were found to be privileged, however, it was error to consider information in them when ruling on the summary judgment motion. The Court suggested that if the defendants wanted to protect sensitive information without abandoning reliance on data also found in the files, the Judge might be able to protect legitimate governmental interests without denying the plaintiffs relevant information by editing or sanitizing the files, or by preparing a summary of the relevant information in the files and distributing it to the parties.

Coastal Corp. v. Duncan, 86 F.R.D. 514 (D. Del. 1980) : In an action seeking review of Energy Department regulations covering oil refiners, the Court noted that an agency head might be able to establish specific guidelines to govern privilege claims so that every document need not be personally inspected, but it was not proper for an agency to allow counsel to make the privilege claim without some form of specific direction from the agency head.

United States v. Kampiles, 609 F.2d 1233 (7th Cir. 1979) : The Court upheld in camera scrutiny of documents as to which a national security claim was made.

United States v. Amador-Galvan, 9 F.3d 1414 (9th Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed convictions for cocaine possession, remanding the case for, inter alia, an in camera hearing to determine whether confidential informants in fact had information that would have been relevant and helpful to the defendants. The Trial Judge had denied a request for a hearing on the ground that the defendants did not have any evidence independent of the informants themselves to support the defendants' theory, but the informants might have been able to provide eyewitness testimony or information leading to a firsthand source or circumstantial evidence that would have been helpful to the defense.

United States v. Feeney, 641 F.2d 821 (10th Cir. 1981) : After a criminal defendant sought information about sentencing and his motion for judgment of acquittal, the Deputy Attorney General directed federal officials to answer some questions but to refuse to answer others. The District Judge expressed reservations about the government's request that proceedings with respect to the privilege claim should all be in camera. When the government sought mandamus, it offered to provide certain testimony in camera with the defendant and his counsel present; in light of this offer, the Court remanded the case.

[c] Government -- Foreign Agencies and Governments

Department of Econ. Dev. v. Arthur Andersen & Co., 139 F.R.D. 295 (S.D.N.Y. 1991) : Rejecting claims of executive privilege by the Department, an agency of the British government, the Court held that either the privilege was waived by the agency bringing the action or the balance of interests tipped in favor of disclosure, especially given the strict order of confidentiality in place in the case and the defendants' need to learn the extent of the government's knowledge and reliance when they were charged with fraud.

[d] Government -- Informant's Privilege

[i] Civil Cases

United States Dep't of Justice v. Landano, 508 U.S. 165 (1993) : The Supreme Court held that the government has the burden of establishing an informant's expectation that his identity would be kept secret when making a report to law enforcement officials, if the privilege is to apply. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 501.02[7].

Mays v. DEA, 234 F.3d 1324 (D.C. Cir. 2000) : After being convicted for distributing cocaine, the defendant brought an action under FOIA to obtain documents from the DEA relating to its criminal investigation of him. DEA claimed Exemption 7(D), which protects against the disclosure of "information furnished by a confidential source," if the source was expressly or impliedly granted confidentiality by law enforcement officials. The government argued that the source reported to law enforcement about the defendant's distribution of cocaine, and the danger involved in making such a report implies that the source would have received an implied grant of confidentiality. The Court agreed that the violence and risk of retaliation that attend this type of crime warrant an implied grant of confidentiality for such a source.

Hoffman v. Reali, 973 F.2d 980 (1st Cir. 1992) : In a § 1983 action against a police officer for an allegedly unlawful arrest, the Court held there was no error in granting summary judgment for the defendant before allowing the plaintiff an opportunity to discover the identity of informants relied on in the defendant's application for an arrest warrant. A party seeking to force the state over its objection to reveal informers' identities and further particulars must establish relevance and a clear need, which the plaintiff failed to do. In United States v. One 1986 Chevrolet Van, 927 F.2d 39 (1st Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed an order for forfeiture of a van used in a drug transaction, holding there was no error in denying the claimant's request for the name of an informant referred to in a search warrant affidavit. The Court noted that the qualified privilege applies in civil forfeiture as well as in criminal cases, but the question is whether the informant's identity is essential to a fair determination of the civil party's claim (which it seldom is) rather than whether it is necessary to the accused's defense, so the privilege is less likely to yield in a civil case.

Halpern v. FBI, 181 F.3d 279 (2d Cir. 1999) : A researcher sought disclosure under FOIA of files concerning the FBI investigations of the meatpacking industry -- including investigations of allegations of Communist activity made during the McCarthy era. The Court found that the government had made a sufficient, particularized showing that the disclosure of these files would expose the identity of informants who had been given an implied guarantee of confidentiality, so the documents were exempt from disclosure. Although it was not reasonable to infer that all FBI criminal investigative sources are confidential, an implied guarantee of confidentiality could be inferred on the basis of "the nature of the crime that was investigated and the source's relation to it." The Court rejected the argument that confidentiality of the source was no longer necessary given the passage of time and the end of the Cold War, since "what counts is whether then, at the time the source communicated with the FBI, the source understood that confidentiality would attach."

Manna v. United States Dep't of Justice, 51 F.3d 1158 (3d Cir. 1995) : A federal prisoner convicted of RICO offenses brought an action under the Freedom of Information Act to obtain records in reference to himself, including records of electronic surveillance. Affirming summary judgment for the DOJ, the Court held, inter alia, that some of the records were protected from disclosure under FOIA Exemption 7(D), which authorizes the withholding of records compiled for law enforcement purposes to the extent necessary to protect a confidential source. DOJ showed that it had given these sources express assurances of confidentiality. The Court stated: "If a district court determines that a source provided information under an express assurance of confidentiality or under circumstances from which an assurance of confidentiality can reasonably be inferred, then all information provided by the source is protected." The Court distinguished United States Dep't of Justice v. Landano, supra , on the ground that in this case the informants gave information after an express assurance of confidentiality. In Pickel v. United States, n95 the Court held it was error to quash IRS summonses for failure to disclose an informant's identity, where the taxpayers did not show how the knowledge of the informant's identity would help establish their claim that the summonses were issued in aid of an FBI embezzlement investigation rather than for a proper tax investigation. The Court observed that if the IRS acted improperly in its investigation, the taxpayers would be protected by suppression of improperly acquired evidence in a criminal proceeding.

OKC Corp. v. Williams, 461 F. Supp. 540 (N.D. Tex. 1978) : The Court applied Fourth Amendment principles in a civil case, holding it would recognize an informant's conditional privilege as it would in a criminal case. The informant's testimony was to be filed and sealed and made available only to the Court.

Holman v. Cayce, 873 F.2d 944 (6th Cir. 1989) : In a suit by a burglary suspect who was shot by an officer acting on information provided by a confidential informant, the Court reversed an order holding the officer in contempt for refusing to reveal the informant's identity. A party must bear a considerable burden in establishing a justification for disclosure of an informant's identity where the informant was neither a witness to nor an active participant in the event that gives rise to a cause of action.

Simmons v. Police & Fire Comm'n, 37 F.3d 325 (7th Cir. 1994) : An arrestee, acting pro se in a § 1983 action, obtained a discovery order compelling disclosure to him of the identity of the informant upon whose information the defendant police officers had relied in conducting a strip search for narcotics. The Court dismissed the defendants' appeal of the order for lack of jurisdiction, but expressed great concern that the Magistrate Judge and the District Court had insufficiently considered the informant's safety in making the order. In Dole v. Local 1942, n96 the Court reversed dismissal of a suit by the Secretary of Labor against a union, finding that the union failed to establish a substantial need to overcome the Secretary's assertion of the informer's privilege to protect the names of witnesses who gave statements to the Secretary's investigators.

Brock v. Gingerbread House, Inc., 907 F.2d 115 (10th Cir. 1989) : An action for violation of the Fair Labor Standards Act was dismissed because the Secretary of Labor refused during discovery to disclose the identities of two employee informants. The Court reversed, holding there was a qualified privilege for the informants' identities that the defendants had not sufficiently shown a need to override.

[ii] Government -- Informant's Privilege -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Foster, 986 F.2d 541 (D.C. Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed a conviction for distributing crack cocaine because the government's objection to disclosing the location from which the principal witness had seen the transactions had been sustained under the "observation post privilege." Where, as here, the surveillance officer's testimony is crucial to the prosecution and the officer's identification of the defendant is challenged, the defendant's confrontation right to cross-examine the officer prevails over the government's interest in preserving the secrecy of the observation post. The "observation post privilege" was established in United States v. Green, 670 F.2d 1148 (D.C. Cir. 1981) , where the Court, drawing an analogy to the informant's privilege, concluded that there should be a qualified privilege to protect police surveillance locations from disclosure in a suppression hearing. The Court noted that a Trial Judge may consider in camera information about the location or observations or may direct the government to identify the location of an observation post to the defendant's counsel, who may be subject to a protective order not to disclose the location to his client or anyone else.

United States v. Lewis, 40 F.3d 1325 (1st Cir. 1994) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in failing to disclose the identity of, or in failing to give a missing witness instruction regarding, a confidential informant who merely provided information to arresting officers that the defendants possessed drugs and illegal weapons. The informant was not present when the arrests took place and thus was in no position to provide relevant, noncumulative testimony amplifying, contradicting, or clearing up the testimony of any government witness. In United States v. Cintolo, n97 the Court affirmed a lawyer's conviction for conspiring to obstruct justice, finding no error in the refusal to permit cross-examination of government witnesses as to the precise location of an electronic surveillance device used to record conversations. The Court recognized a qualified privilege for confidential surveillance information and concluded that the defendant was able to demonstrate through other cross-examination that not every person inside an apartment necessarily was in a position to hear all conversations. In United States v. Hemmer, n98 the Court affirmed bank robbery convictions, finding it was proper to sustain a government claim of informer privilege to protect the identity of a person who told authorities that three other people had robbed a bank. Since the informant's statement was hearsay and inadmissible, he had no personal knowledge of the crime for which the defendants were charged, and it was unclear what bank the informant referred to, the Court found no unfairness in the ruling.

United States v. Blevins, 960 F.2d 1252 (4th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed drug distribution conspiracy convictions, holding there was no error in refusing to disclose the identity of a government informant, where the defendants had made a strategic decision to forgo any attempt to convince the Trial Judge that disclosure was necessary.

United States v. Sanchez, 988 F.2d 1384 (5th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed heroin distribution convictions, holding the defendant was not entitled to discover the identity of an informant who was merely an observer of the transaction, whose identification would inculpate the defendant, and who feared for his and his children's lives if his identity became known to the defendant. In United States v. Silva, n99 a drug distribution conviction was reversed because the government had not disclosed the identity of an informant who supposedly had introduced the appellant to an undercover narcotics agent. Given his defense of mistaken identity, "the appellant needed the absent information in order to refute the undercover DEA Agent's testimony. Alternatively, assuming the absent informant would corroborate the Agent's testimony, the informant was essential to enable the appellant to develop his theory that he had been framed." In United States v. Doe, n100 the Court held that protection of an informant's identity was not a violation of the defendant's rights, where the Trial Judge's in camera interview of the informant indicated neither that he was unable to positively identify the defendant nor that he possessed some other evidence tending to exonerate the defendant.

In re Grand Jury Investigation (Detroit Police Dep't Special Cash Fund), 922 F.2d 1266 (6th Cir. 1991) : A grand jury investigating police department corruption in connection with a secret cash fund subpoenaed a witness to force disclosure of the names of confidential informers to whom he allegedly paid money from the fund. The Court affirmed a finding of contempt made after the witness refused to disclose the names, holding the informer's privilege inapplicable because it would not protect the informer from those who would have cause to resent his conduct, but rather would shield corrupt governmental bodies from scrutiny, thus distorting rather than preserving the interests protected by the privilege.

United States v. Herrero, 893 F.2d 1512 (7th Cir. 1990) : The Court held that the government did not waive its privilege to keep confidential the identity of an informant when it disclosed the informant's identity and the subject of his statements to the defendant's counsel during a sidebar conference and the Trial Judge issued a protective order against disclosure to the defendant.

United States v. Large, 729 F.2d 636 (8th Cir. 1984) : In a drug case, the Court upheld denial of the defendant's motion to compel disclosure of the current address of a confidential informant. Defense counsel knew the identity of the informant and that he had previously cooperated with the government, the defendant had known the informant for three years, and there was reasonable apprehension that disclosure might endanger the informant's family. Thus, the Court found that the defense was in a position to cross-examine the informant and that its need for the address was insufficient to warrant disclosure. In United States v. Partyka, n101 the Court held it was error to suppress the identity of an informant in a drug prosecution. Because the defendant claimed that someone named Faircloth might have framed him, it was vital to disclose to the defense whether Faircloth was the informant.

United States v. Amador-Galvan, 9 F.3d 1414 (9th Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed convictions for cocaine possession, remanding the case for, inter alia, an in camera hearing to determine whether confidential informants in fact had information that would have been relevant and helpful to the defendants. The Trial Court had denied a request for a hearing on the ground that the defendants did not have any evidence independent of the informants themselves to support the defendants' theory, but the informants might have been able to provide eyewitness testimony or information leading to a firsthand source or circumstantial evidence that would be helpful to the defense.

United States v. Martinez, 979 F.2d 1424 (10th Cir. 1992) : Affirming drug trafficking convictions, the Court held that the defendants, who asserted entrapment defenses, were not entitled to disclosure of an informant's identity, as an in camera hearing made it clear that the informant's testimony would not assist the defendants. In United States v. Bowser, 941 F.2d 1019 (10th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed a conviction for selling crack cocaine, holding there was no violation of confrontation rights when the defendant was not permitted to obtain the identity of a confidential informant, as the informant did not testify at trial nor did (s)he witness the alleged sales. Moreover, the defendant made no showing that direct confrontation with the informant would assist in establishing his duress defense at trial or that his case was prejudiced by the government's refusal to identify the informant.

[e] Government -- Invocation by Head of Department

Landry v. FDIC, 204 F.3d 1125 (D.C. Cir. 2000) : A bank officer petitioned for review of an order of the FDIC removing him from his position and barring him from further participation in bank operations. In support of his petition, he sought information under FOIA, but the Administrative Law Judge upheld the FDIC's claim that the materials were protected by the deliberative process privilege and the law enforcement privilege. The Court held that the privileges were properly asserted by the regional director of the FDIC's office of supervision, rather than by the head of the FDIC, since "the head of the appropriate regional division of the FDIC's supervisory personnel is of sufficient rank to achieve the necessary deliberateness in assertion of the deliberative process and law enforcement privileges." The Court noted that "decisions involving the more sensitive and absolute privilege for state and military secrets have been more insistent on assertion at the highest level."

Resolution Trust Corp. v. Diamond, 773 F. Supp. 597 (S.D.N.Y. 1991) : Ruling on privilege claims by the RTC in an action to repudiate leases, the Court held that certain of the documents were predecisional and deliberative material, but that there was no indication the head of the agency had inspected the individual documents and made the required determination that the public interest in confidentiality (as distinct from the government's interest in this litigation) outweighed the public interest in disclosure. The agency's blanket approach, asserting the privilege for all predecisional deliberative documents, was found unacceptably inflexible. In Mobil Oil Co. v. Department of Energy, n102 the District Court granted a portion of Mobil's motion to compel the Department to produce certain documents. Although the Court recognized a predecisional privilege, which protects "advisory opinions, recommendations and deliberations comprising part of a process by which governmental decisions and policies are formulated" and referred to the privilege as a "subcategory of the executive or governmental privilege," it denied the privilege claim because the head of the Department did not claim the privilege, the index of documents was not specific enough, and the Department failed to explain the need for confidentiality.

In re Nelson, 131 F.R.D. 161 (D. Neb. 1989) : The Court affirmed the Magistrate's order compelling production of documents belonging to a non-party, the Federal Intermediate Credit Bank, over a deliberative process privilege objection by the defendant's counsel. Even assuming the FICB is an agency of the government able to assert the privilege, only a head of the department after actual personal consideration may invoke the privilege; there must be a specific designation and description of the documents claimed to be privileged; and there must be specification of precise and certain reasons for the need to preserve the confidentiality of the documents.

[f] Government -- Law Enforcement Investigation -- Waiver

Dellwood Farms, Inc. v. Cargill, Inc., 128 F.3d 1122, 1997-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P71962 (7th Cir. 1997) : Plaintiffs in an antitrust class action brought against agricultural producers subpoenaed tape recordings made by the FBI as part of a criminal investigation into the producers' alleged conspiracy. Reversing a ruling that denied the government's motion to quash the subpoena, the Court held that the privilege had not been waived when some of the tapes were played for counsel representing a producer's outside directors in order to induce a guilty plea. The selective disclosure in this case did not require forfeiture of the privilege because: (a) maintaining the privilege would only delay, rather than permanently suppress, the evidence, since the tapes would eventually be disclosed in the criminal proceedings; (b) the privilege was not giving the government any strategic advantage, since it was not an adversary of the movants in the civil case; and (c) the circumstances of the disclosure did not raise questions whether the government had a good faith non-strategic interest in keeping the information confidential. It was a mistake not to subject the disclosure to a confidentiality agreement or protective order, but since there was no indication that the government was acting in bad faith or that the movants were hurt, the severity of the mistake did not call for forfeiture of the privilege.

[g] Government -- Presidential Communications

Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Department of Justice, 365 F.3d 1108 (D.C. Cir. 2004) : The Court held, 2-1, that the presidential communications privilege applies only to documents solicited and received by the President or the President's immediate White House advisers. Thus, the privilege did not justify nondisclosure in response to a FOIA request of internal pardon documents in the Justice Department's Office of the Pardon Attorney and Office of the Deputy Attorney General, as those documents were not solicited or received by the President or the Office of the President. The Court concluded that such documents are properly analyzed under the deliberative process privilege. The dissenting Judge argued that "documents originated for the sole purpose of advising the President on his pardon power are protected by the presidential communications privilege." During a grand jury investigation of the former Secretary of Agriculture in In re Sealed Case, 121 F.3d 729 (D.C. Cir. 1997) , a subpoena was issued for documents pertaining to the White House Counsel's investigation of the Secretary. The District Court upheld claims of deliberative process and presidential communications privileges for certain documents after reviewing them in camera, but the decision was vacated and remanded for a more detailed review. The Court concluded that the presidential communication privilege is narrower than the privilege for executive deliberative processes, but that it extends to communications that do not themselves directly engage the President, if they are written or received in response to solicitation by presidential advisors in the course of gathering information and preparing recommendations on official matters for presentation to the President. It also extends to communications by or solicited and received by members of an immediate White House advisor's staff who have broad and significant responsibility for investigating and formulating the advice to be given to the President on a particular matter. The Court found that the privilege applied to all the withheld documents, but the Office of Independent Counsel had not yet sufficiently demonstrated specifically why the evidence contained in the communications was important to the ongoing grand jury investigation and why the evidence was not available from another source. The Court held that the privilege had not been waived except to the extent that the specific text of the allegedly privileged communication had been disclosed. In Nixon v. Administrator of Gen. Servs., n103 the Court rejected former President Nixon's constitutional challenge to the statute that directed the Administrator to take custody of his presidential papers and tape recordings, and noted that despite some authority for the proposition that only an incumbent President can invoke a claim of presidential or executive privilege, it was assuming a former President could do so, although "such a claim is not as forceful as one raised by an incumbent."

[h] Government -- Protective Function

In re Sealed Case, 148 F.3d 1073 (D.C. Cir. 1998) (per curiam): Secret Service officers, subpoenaed to give testimony for a grand jury conducted by the Office of Independent Counsel investigating the President, asserted a "protective function privilege" against providing information obtained while performing their protective function in physical proximity to the President, except concerning observations providing reasonable grounds for believing that a felony had been, was, or would be committed. Affirming an order requiring the officers to testify, the Court held that the Secret Service had failed to carry its heavy burden of establishing the need for the privilege. The record raised doubts about the need for the proposed privilege, e.g., former Presidents were split on the question, Presidents have self-interest in effective protection, and agents do not now have confidentiality agreements. The Court also expressed concern about the efficacy of the proposed privilege, with its exception for felonies.

[i] Government -- State or Military Secrets

[i] Civil Cases

Linder v. Department of Defense, 133 F.3d 17 (D.C. Cir. 1998) : Reviewing subpoenas issued in connection with a family's wrongful death action against Nicaraguan Contra leaders operating out of Florida, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the Judge's determination that the CIA had properly justified its statutory claims of privilege over seven withheld documents. The Agency had provided detailed information as to the potential harms to national security, which the Judge considered in camera along with the withheld documents. In In re United States, n104 the Court denied a petition for mandamus filed by the government after the Trial Judge declined to dismiss on state secret grounds a suit in which the plaintiff alleged injuries to her and her deceased husband as a result of FBI intelligence activities. The majority held that an item-by-item determination of the state secrets privilege would accommodate the government's national security concerns and that an FBI official's affidavit did not demonstrate that evidence of the government's activities 20-30 years earlier would necessarily disclose state secrets today. The dissenting Judge argued that any further discovery would inevitably lead to disclosure of state secrets. See also Halkin v. Helms n105(upholding privilege claim of National Security Agency against request to disclose whether plaintiffs' international communications had been acquired by NSA and disseminated to other federal agencies).

Zuckerbraun v. General Dynamics Corp., 935 F.2d 544 (2d Cir. 1991) : The Court held that the state secrets privilege was properly invoked in an action for the death of a Navy seaman arising out of an antimissile defense system's alleged failure. Privileged information about the weapons systems and the rules of engagement was essential to the plaintiff's prima facie case, so dismissal of the claim was affirmed.

Sterling v. Tenet, 416 F.3d 338 (4th Cir. 2005) : The Court upheld the dismissal of a former CIA agent's employment discrimination claim, on the ground that pursuit of the suit would inevitably result in the disclosure of classified details of his covert employment. In addition, many of the relevant witnesses would be covert CIA operatives, and calling them to testify would risk their cover. Although the remedy of dismissal is drastic, the Court found no alternative, since "the whole object of the suit and of the discovery is to establish a fact that is a state secret, namely, the methods and operations of the Central Intelligence Agency."

In re Under Seal, 945 F.2d 1285 (4th Cir. 1991) : Summary judgment was granted for the defendants in an action by a former government contractor alleging malicious interference with a business opportunity that involved highly secret defense contracts. Affirming, the Court held that the state secrets privilege had been properly invoked by the government and that it was not possible to modify the protective discovery order in a way to permit the plaintiffs to develop a factual basis for their claim without endangering national security. See also Bowles v. United States, 950 F.2d 154 (4th Cir. 1991) (per curiam) (affirming dismissal of the United States as a party in a Federal Tort Claims action arising from an accident involving a U.S. Embassy vehicle in Oman, where the Secretary of State had properly invoked the state secrets privilege in response to discovery requests and the Court concluded that no amount of effort or care would safeguard the privileged information); Fitzgerald v. Penthouse Int'l, Ltd. n106(upholding dismissal of a defamation suit against a magazine that had charged the plaintiff with espionage, since "there was simply no way this particular case could be tried without compromising sensitive military secrets").

Bareford v. General Dynamics Corp., 973 F.2d 1138 (5th Cir. 1992) : Survivors of sailors killed when missiles penetrated the defenses of a Navy ship during the Iran-Iraq war brought an action against defense contractors responsible for the missile defense system. When the government intervened and asserted the state secret privilege, the Court upheld dismissal of the plaintiffs' case, holding that the privilege had been properly asserted and the action would necessarily threaten disclosure of important state secrets.

Tenenbaum v. Simonini, 372 F.3d 776 (6th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants in an action alleging that federal agency employees had conducted a criminal espionage investigation against one of the plaintiffs solely because he was Jewish. After reviewing materials produced by the defendants under seal, the Court agreed that the state secrets doctrine applied because of a reasonable danger that disclosing the information in court proceedings would harm national security interests, impair national defense capabilities, disclose intelligence-gathering methods or capabilities, or disrupt diplomatic relations with foreign governments. Because the state secrets doctrine would deprive the defendants of a valid defense to the plaintiffs' claims, it was proper to enter summary judgment.

Black v. United States, 62 F.3d 1115 (8th Cir. 1995) : The plaintiff alleged that he was the target of harassment and psychological attacks in retaliation for his contacts with a Soviet mathematician. Affirming dismissal of the case, the Court held that state secrets were implicated by the plaintiff's lawsuit, the Director of the CIA had properly invoked the state secrets privilege, and the continuation of the plaintiff's suit presented a "reasonable danger" to the intelligence-gathering capabilities and diplomatic relations of the United States. Rejecting the argument that the state secrets privilege was simply "a creature of the Cold War" that had outlived its usefulness, the Court stated that "the absence of a relatively stable world order of the sort that prevailed during the Cold War makes the availability of the privilege in appropriate cases all the more important."

Kasza v. Browner, 133 F.3d 1159 (9th Cir. 1998) : Former workers at a classified facility operated by the United States Air Force brought citizen suits under the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act, RCRA, seeking to compel compliance with hazardous waste inventory, inspection, and disclosure responsibility. The Trial Judge held that the state secrets privilege invoked by the Secretary of the Air Force made discovery and trial impossible, and granted summary judgment in favor of the Air Force. The Court affirmed, noting that the privilege was properly invoked by the Secretary, after a personal inspection of the documents. The Court rejected the argument that RCRA's provision authorizing the President to exempt certain sites from its requirements amounted to a preemption of the state secrets privilege; it found "no Congressional intent to replace the government's evidentiary privilege to withhold sensitive information in litigation by providing an exemption from RCRA's regulation of hazardous waste."

McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. United States, 323 F.3d 1006 (Fed. Cir. 2003) : In an action arising from termination of a government contract to develop stealth aircraft, the Court held that the contractors were properly precluded from pursuing a claim that the government's "superior knowledge" required it to disclose certain information related to other stealth aircraft, since that information was classified and the government had satisfied the requirements of the military and state secrets privilege. In Guong v. United States, n107 the Court upheld dismissal of a suit by an alleged recruit of the CIA, who sued to recover for breach of an employment contract. It found that the state secrets privilege excluded evidence of military matters affecting the national security, and that the plaintiff could not prevail without compromising state secrets.

[ii] Government -- State and Military Secrets -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Wilson, 586 F. Supp. 1011 (S.D.N.Y. 1983) : In a case alleging plots to assassinate witnesses, prosecutors, and others involved in prosecutions against the defendant, the District Court ruled pursuant to the Classified Information Procedures Act, 18 U.S.C.A. App., that classified information was not relevant to the defendant's claim that he lacked a motive to enter into the alleged plots.

United States v. Moussaoui, 382 F.2d 453 (4th Cir. 2004) : In a prosecution of the so-called "20th hijacker" for conspiracy relating to the September 11, 2001, attacks, the Court held that the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to compulsory process required the government to provide some kind of access to the testimony of possible exculpatory witnesses, even though the witnesses were in government custody outside the United States. The Court also held, however, that summaries of the witnesses' statements, which the government refused to make available on national security grounds, were available and they would provide the defendant with the evidence that otherwise might have been provided by the witnesses. One Judge, dissenting in part, argued that the summaries should be offered in more complete form. In United States v. Smith, 780 F.2d 1102 (4th Cir. 1985) (en banc), rev'g 592 F. Supp. 424 (E.D. Va. 1984) , a prosecution for violating the Espionage Act, the defendant asserted that he thought he was authorized by CIA officials to disclose information. The government sought to prohibit introduction of any classified material, on the ground that the defense was patently frivolous and that the defendant was attempting to use "greymail" -- i.e., needlessly to expose classified information in an effort to force the government to drop the prosecution. The District Court held that the Classified Information Procedures Act, 18 U.S.C. App., was not intended to deny the defendant the use of relevant and admissible classified documents. In its view, harm to national security was not a type of prejudice that would warrant exclusion under Rule 403, and whether the defense was not believable was a question for the jury. A panel of the Court of Appeals affirmed, n108 but the Court en banc reversed, holding (7-5) that harm to national security could be balanced against the probative value of evidence. The majority analogized to the informer's privilege in holding that "[t]he government has a substantial interest in protecting sensitive sources and methods of gathering information" such that the government has a qualified privilege to protect against disclosure, even though the defendant had access to the information before trial. The dissenting Judges argued that the Court's opinion was unnecessary and that Congress provided sufficient protection for the government in the CIPA, which the Trial Judge had followed.

United States v. Baptista-Rodriguez, 17 F.3d 1354 (11th Cir. 1994) : A defendant charged in a cocaine importation conspiracy had worked for the FBI and claimed he believed he was working as an authorized undercover civilian operative when he arranged the smuggling venture in 1987. Because the defendant's pre-1984 FBI work was classified, the Trial Judge held a hearing pursuant to the Classified Information Procedures Act, found that the details of the work were irrelevant to any legitimate defense, and allowed disclosure only of the fact of a relationship. The Court found no abuse of discretion in this conclusion. However, it reversed the defendant's conviction because after an FBI agent gave rebuttal testimony that there was documentary evidence the defendant's relationship with the FBI ended in 1983, the Trial Judge refused to order production of the classified document or to permit cross-examination about its contents. The Court found the defendant's confrontation rights were violated when he was not permitted to explore fully the witness' testimony regarding his alleged termination.

[iii] Government -- State and Military Secrets -- Invoking the Privilege

Ellsberg v. Mitchell, 709 F.2d 51 (D.C. Cir. 1983) : Plaintiffs complaining of warrantless surveillance were denied detailed information concerning the surveillance when the government asserted a state secrets privilege. The Court upheld the privilege claim except as to the identities of the Attorneys-General responsible. The Court noted that the privilege must be claimed by the head of the department, that "[w]henever possible, sensitive information must be disentangled from nonsensitive information to allow for the release of the latter," and that a showing of "reasonable danger" that harm to the national security will ensue from disclosure of secrets is sufficient to sustain a privilege claim. The party seeking disclosure has no right to be present for an in camera examination, but where a party shows a great need for information claimed to be privileged, close judicial scrutiny of the privilege claim is appropriate and is aided by a public disclosure of the basis for the claim prior to an in camera examination. Public disclosure is not required, however, where it might threaten the interests protected by the privilege.

[5] Marital

[a] Adverse Testimony

[i] Acts Prior to Marriage

In re Grand Jury Proceedings (86-2), 640 F. Supp. 988 (E.D. Mich. 1986) : The Court held that the marital privilege applied and that a spouse did not have to testify, even about things that occurred prior to the marriage, where the marriage was not a sham or collusive.

United States v. Clark, 712 F.2d 299 (7th Cir. 1983) : The defendant and his wife were indicted for stealing from a savings and loan association before their marriage. Affirming a judgment of criminal contempt against him for refusing to testify at her trial, the Court held the privilege could not be asserted with respect to acts occurring before the marriage, even when there was no evidence the marriage was collusive.

[ii] Marital -- Adverse Testimony -- Civil Cases

United States v. Premises Known as 281 Syosset Woodbury Rd., 71 F.3d 1067 (2d Cir. 1995) : In a civil forfeiture case, the wife of a drug trafficker claimed she was an innocent owner of property. The Trial Judge held that the spousal immunity rule did not apply in a civil action. Without reaching that question, the Court held that the rule does not apply except in proceedings where one spouse is a party and the other is called to testify. Thus, the privilege could not be claimed in this forfeiture action, brought against property belonging to the wife, who was the testifying spouse. See also United States v. Yerardi, 192 F.3d 14 (1st Cir. 1999) , discussed in § 501.03[5][a][iv].

Ryan v. Commissioner, 568 F.2d 531 (7th Cir. 1977) : The Court affirmed a decision holding taxpayers in contempt for refusing to answer interrogatories. Although the Tax Court had held the spousal immunity privilege was only available in criminal cases, the Court observed that the distinction between civil and criminal cases was not wholly satisfying, so a case-by-case policy-oriented approach was preferable. In this case it refused to expand the spousal immunity privilege to the civil context because the spouses were granted use immunity against criminal prosecution, the threat of criminal prosecution was minimal (if existent at all), the spouses did not complain of a threat to their marriage, and all other avenues for securing information were unavailable to the government.

[iii] Marital -- Adverse Testimony -- Joint Participants in Crime

In re Grand Jury Subpoena (Koecher), 755 F.2d 1022 (2d Cir. 1985) , rev'g 601 F. Supp. 385 (S.D.N.Y. 1984) , vacated & remanded as moot, 475 U.S. 133 (1986) : The Court of Appeals vacated an order holding a wife in contempt for refusing to answer questions before a grand jury concerning her husband's alleged conspiracy to communicate national defense documents and information to a foreign government. It declined to join other Courts that have recognized an exception to the spousal immunity privilege when the government makes a prima facie showing that spouses jointly participated in criminal activity. The Court observed that the privilege is aimed more broadly at protecting marital harmony than the marital communications privilege and that it often is difficult to consider whether the exception applies without first invading the privilege.

In re Malfitano, 633 F.2d 276 (3d Cir. 1980) : The Court held that a wife had a privilege not to answer questions of a grand jury that might implicate her husband in wrongdoing even though the government claimed that she was involved in her husband's criminal acts, since "recognition of an exception where it can be said that both spouses are involved will tend to undermine the marriage precisely in the manner that the privilege is designed to prevent." The government's offer not to use the wife's testimony against her husband in future proceedings was also insufficient to warrant disregard of the privilege, since her testimony might result in an indictment.

United States v. Freeman, 694 F. Supp. 190 (E.D. Va. 1988) : The Trial Judge denied a severance to a married couple jointly charged with cocaine offenses, noting that "the privilege against testifying adversely against a spouse does not apply to joint criminal participants."

United States v. Clark, 712 F.2d 299 (7th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed a criminal contempt finding, holding that a husband, who had been convicted in a bench trial of robbing a savings and loan, could not invoke the spousal immunity privilege in his wife's trial because the privilege did not apply where the spouses were joint participants in the robbery.

United States v. Ramos-Oseguera, 120 F.3d 1028 (9th Cir. 1997) : A husband and wife involved in a drug conspiracy were tried separately for their crimes. After the wife was convicted, she was called to testify at her husband's trial, but refused on grounds of the testimonial privilege. The Trial Judge ruled there was an exception to the privilege when spouses are jointly involved in a criminal enterprise and held the wife in contempt when she continued to refuse to testify. Reversing the contempt sanction, the Court held that because Trammel v. United States, 445 U.S. 40, 53 (1980) , said that "the witness may be neither compelled to testify nor foreclosed from testifying," there is no joint participant exception to the testimonial privilege.

[iv] Marital -- Adverse Testimony -- Miscellaneous Cases

Trammel v. United States, 445 U.S. 40 (1980) : The Supreme Court held that the witness-spouse, rather than the party-spouse, is the holder of the adverse testimonial privilege. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 501.02[8].

United States v. Yerardi, 192 F.3d 14 (1st Cir. 1999) : The defendant's husband was indicted on RICO charges that included criminal forfeiture; he was released on bail secured by an appearance bond that the defendant signed. When the government sought forfeiture of the bond for the husband's violation of his release conditions, the defendant testified without invoking the adverse spousal testimonial privilege. The husband later pleaded guilty to the RICO indictment and agreed to forfeit $916,000. In a proceeding to discover the husband's assets, the defendant refused to answer questions, asserting the adverse spousal testimony privilege. Vacating an order of contempt, the Court rejected the government argument that the privilege did not apply in criminal forfeiture proceedings because the "proceeding to achieve the forfeiture is itself 'more civil than criminal.' " Finding it unnecessary to decide whether the privilege might apply in civil cases, the Court concluded that the privilege applied in this case because it was ancillary to a criminal case, the action sought to recover a penalty under criminal rather than civil forfeiture proceedings, and it raised an appreciable risk of contributing to a future criminal prosecution of the husband. The Court noted that if the government considered the defendant's testimony essential to the forfeiture, it could overcome the adverse spousal testimony privilege by filing an affidavit promising that it would not use either directly or indirectly the compelled testimony of the wife in subsequent criminal proceedings against her husband. If no such affidavit is filed, the government would be entitled to depose the wife, but she would be entitled to invoke the privilege on a question-by-question basis.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena of Ford, 756 F.2d 249 (2d Cir. 1985) : The Court upheld a contempt citation against a husband who refused to testify before a grand jury investigating his wife. Since the government assured the husband that his testimony would not be used, directly or indirectly, against the wife, the Court found that the spousal privilege was unavailable.

In re Grand Jury Matter, 673 F.2d 688 (3d Cir. 1982) : The Court upheld a spousal immunity claim made by a wife called to testify by a grand jury investigating the activity of a third party where the testimony might have indirectly implicated her husband. Although the government promised that no indictment by the grand jury before whom the witness would testify would name her husband as a defendant or as an unindicted coconspirator, the testimony remained sufficiently adverse to the husband, since "all who are party to the action understand that the wife's testimony is sought, inter alia, in the hope that her husband will be indicted." One Judge suggested in a footnote that the Trial Court could confer "use-fruits" immunity to assure the wife that her testimony would not be used against her husband, but a concurring opinion suggested that the immunity footnote amounted to an advisory opinion. The dissenting Judge argued that there is "a qualitative difference in impact between testimony that itself causes a grand jury to indict the non-witness spouse, and testimony against a third party, who eventually may testify against the spouse before another grand jury."

United States v. Hall, 989 F.2d 711 (4th Cir. 1993) : The Court overturned a conviction for cocaine offenses, finding reversible error when the prosecutor cross-examined the defendant using a written statement obtained from his wife, who had declined to testify against her husband at trial. Not only was the statement hearsay, but its use appeared to violate the wife's privilege not to testify against her husband. In United States v. Morris, 988 F.2d 1335 (4th Cir. 1993) , the Court reversed a conviction for narcotics offenses because the prosecutor had been allowed to cross-examine the accused's wife about her invocation of the marital privilege before the grand jury. To permit the jury to infer that she would have testified before the grand jury if she had something exculpatory to say would, in the Court's view, destroy the privilege.

United States v. Archer, 733 F.2d 354 (5th Cir. 1984) : Convictions of a husband and wife for conspiring to embezzle bank funds were affirmed as the Court found that statements by the wife to an FBI agent were admissible despite the husband's claim of marital privilege. It held that the spousal immunity privilege, which Trammel held could be raised only by a witness-spouse, was unavailable to a defendant-spouse objecting to introduction of the other spouse's out-of-court statements. The Court also held that there is no privilege to object to introduction of out-of-court statements made prior to trial, since the introduction of such statements would hardly threaten marital harmony and their exclusion would be unduly costly in terms of lost evidence.

United States v. Porter, 986 F.2d 1014 (6th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed a conviction for offenses arising out of the defendant's exchanging explosives for cocaine and cash, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by the defendant's former wife relating communications from him made while they were married. As the two were divorced at the time of trial, there was no violation of the adverse spousal testimony privilege.

United States v. Espino, 317 F.3d 788 (8th Cir. 2003) : The defendant's wife was a cooperating witness, giving testimony against him in a trial for methamphetamine offenses. The Court rejected his argument that the spousal privilege statute of Nebraska, the forum state, precluded her testimony against him without his consent, since the federal rule, established in Trammel v. United States, is that the adverse testimony privilege belongs to the witness-spouse. In United States v. Jackson, 939 F.2d 625 (8th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed bank robbery convictions, holding that the defendant could not claim the spousal immunity privilege for communications to his wife (from whom he had been separated 16 months), because she was willing to testify for the government. In United States v. Smith, n109 the Court affirmed two defendants' convictions for bank robbery. One defendant's wife asserted her privilege not to testify against her husband, but she was required to testify against the second defendant, her son. The Court indicated that nothing in the testimony implicated the husband.

United States v. Ramos-Oseguera, 120 F.3d 1028 (9th Cir. 1997) : A husband and wife involved in a drug conspiracy were tried separately for their crimes. After the wife was convicted, she was called to testify at her husband's trial, but refused on grounds of the testimonial privilege. The government then offered, under Rule 804(b)(3), transcripts of the wife's testimony from her own trial. The Court found it unnecessary to decide whether admission of the transcripts was proper, but it did note that the husband could not object to them on grounds of the spousal testimonial privilege, since that privilege lies with the testifying spouse, not the party spouse. In United States v. Tsinnijinnie, n110 the Court held that an excited utterance of one spouse could be admitted in a criminal trial against the other spouse. After noting authorities to the contrary, the Court concluded that the threat to a marriage posed by admitting hearsay statements was at best speculative and that it was outweighed by the state's need for evidence.

United States v. Jarvison, 409 F.3d 1221 (10th Cir. 2005) : During the pretrial stages of a prosecution for child sex abuse, the government moved to compel testimony of a witness; the witness invoked the privilege to refuse to give adverse testimony against her spouse. The government argued that the marriage was not valid, and even if it were, the Judge should recognize an exception to the spousal testimonial privilege when acts of child abuse are involved. The Court affirmed denial of the motion to compel. The defendant and the witness were Navajos who lived on the reservation, and the Court held that the question of the validity of the marriage was therefore to be determined by

Navajo law, which considered the marriage valid, even though the defendant and the witness were married in an unlicensed traditional ceremony, and even though the defendant had left the witness for a long period and fathered children by another woman. The Court further refused to establish an exception to the spousal testimonial privilege for acts of child abuse, distinguishing the exception it had established in such cases for the marital communications privilege in United States v. Bahe, 128 F.3d 1440 (10th Cir. 1997) , because no exception is currently recognized by any federal Court.

[v] Marital -- Adverse Testimony -- Waiver

United States v. Yerardi, 192 F.3d 14 (1st Cir. 1999) : The defendant's husband was indicted on RICO charges that included criminal forfeiture; he was released on bail secured by an appearance bond that the defendant signed. When the government sought forfeiture of the bond for the husband's violation of his release conditions, the defendant testified without invoking the adverse spousal testimonial privilege. The husband later pleaded guilty to the RICO indictment and agreed to forfeit $916,000. In a proceeding to discover the husband's assets, the defendant refused to answer questions, asserting the adverse spousal testimony privilege. The Court vacated an order of contempt. It rejected the argument that the privilege had been waived by the husband's plea agreement, since the privilege belongs to the witness-spouse, here the wife, rather than the party-spouse, here the husband. As for the argument that the defendant had waived the privilege by testifying regarding the husband's assets at the bail forfeiture hearing, the Court noted that it was possible that a pick-and-choose approach to answering questions could operate as a waiver, but the government had not provided a detailed comparison of the prior answers given and the more recent questions that the defendant refused to answer to determine whether the questions answered in the bail hearing were adverse to the husband.

United States v. Bad Wound, 203 F.3d 1072 (8th Cir. 2000) : Affirming convictions for fraud and related charges, the Court found no error in the admission of adverse testimony from the defendant's wife. The wife, represented by counsel, had entered into a plea agreement in which she agreed to provide "complete and truthful testimony before grand juries, at trial, and at other proceedings as required." She testified against her husband with "apparent reluctance." The Court found that the wife's plea agreement, although "broadly phrased," put the wife on notice that she might have to give adverse testimony, and thus was a voluntary waiver of the privilege.

[b] Marital -- Common-law Marriage, Cohabitants

United States v. Acker, 52 F.3d 509 (4th Cir. 1995) : The Court held in a bank robbery prosecution that there was no abuse of discretion in rejecting marital privilege claims. Although the defendant and the witness had lived together as man and wife for approximately 25 years, neither of the states in which they lived recognizes common-law marriages.

United States v. White, 545 F.2d 1129 (8th Cir. 1976) : Affirming a bank robbery conviction, the Court held there was no error in denying both the defendant and his alleged common-law wife the right to assert the spousal immunity privilege. Arkansas, the state in which they held themselves out to be spouses, does not recognize common-law marriage and the Federal Courts will look to state law to determine the validity of a marriage.

In re Ms. X, 562 F. Supp. 486 (N.D. Cal. 1983) : A woman called to testify before a grand jury claimed a marital privilege not to testify against a man to whom she was not formally married, but with whom she lived as husband and wife for six and one-half years. The man fathered her four children, and she held him out as her husband. The Court found "that we are rapidly approaching the era when greater recognition of the rights of parties in a non-formalized marital relationship must be acknowledged by our judicial system," but it refused to place greater weight on the policy of "promoting marital accord in non-marital settings" than on the public's right to evidence in a criminal investigation.

[c] Marital -- Confidential Communications

[i] Confidentiality

SEC v. Lavin, 111 F.3d 921 (D.C. Cir. 1997) : The Court reversed a decision to enforce an SEC subpoena requesting disclosure of telephone communications between a securities trader and his wife. The trader was a managing director of a firm and head of its Chicago office. He decided upon his arrival in Chicago that the office should have a system for routine taping of telephone calls with its customers. He claimed in response to the SEC subpoena for the tapes that he reasonably believed that the private phone in his office was not part of the taping system. The Court held that the broker should have been permitted to engage in some discovery to seek evidence to support his claim that he did not know his conversations with his wife were being taped, observing that without discovery the broker could not be expected to offer evidence to support his claim.

United States v. Taylor, 92 F.3d 1313 (2d Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed Hobbs Act convictions, finding that a taped conversation between a defendant and his wife, in which the defendant talked about carrying a gun and storing it in an office, was properly admitted. The Court found that the Trial Judge improperly placed the burden on the defendant to prove that third parties were not present, instead of presuming confidentiality, but also found that the government rebutted the presumption successfully.

United States v. Madoch, 149 F.3d 596 (7th Cir. 1998) : In a tax fraud prosecution, the Court held there was no error in the admission of tape-recorded conversations between the defendant and her incarcerated husband. Given the well-known need for correctional institutions to monitor inmate conversations, the defendant could not reasonably expect that her conversation with her husband, whom she knew to be in jail, would be confidential.

United States v. Strobehn, 421 F.3d 1017 (9th Cir. 2005) : On the day of the charged armed robbery, the defendant left seven pages (five sheets, with writing on both sides of two) on the kitchen table of the apartment he shared with his wife and children. The first one-and-a-third pages was a note addressed to his wife; he then drew a line across and wrote a note to his children that took up another third of the second page; there was then another line across and a note to others that carried over to the third page; and then followed other notes separated by lines across to various family members. The defendant argued that the evidence was privileged, but the Court, affirming, found that it was not a confidential marital communication because "as written the compilation was manifestly intended to be communicated to all twenty-four individuals to whom it was addressed." In United States v. Montgomery, 384 F.3d 1050 (9th Cir. 2004) , the Court reversed a mail fraud conviction because a letter to the defendant from his wife was erroneously admitted. The handwritten letter had been left on the kitchen counter of the couple's home and was found in their bedroom during execution of a search warrant. The Court noted that the nature of the communication was of a kind likely to be confidential. Although the letter implored the husband to communicate the substance of its concerns to a third person, there was no obvious implication that the wife "understood her request of Montgomery would be transmitted to O'Connor or that O'Connor would infer that Montgomery was acting at Mrs. Montgomery's direction." Nor did the letter's location on the kitchen counter indicate that it was not intended to be confidential. Even though the couple's children resided in the house, there was "no evidence that the children would likely have seen or read the letter or that Mrs. Montgomery acted without regard to whether the children would have seen it." The Court concluded: "We will not cast aside the presumption of confidentiality by speculating that the communication was made in the presence of, or was likely to be seen by, the couple's children."

[ii] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Holder of Privilege

United States v. Montgomery, 384 F.3d 1050 (9th Cir. 2004) : The Court reversed a mail fraud conviction because a letter to the defendant from his wife was erroneously admitted. The Trial Judge had overruled the defendant's objection to admission of the letter on the ground that the privilege for confidential marital communications belongs only to the communicating spouse, but the Court held, following the weight of authority, that either spouse may assert the privilege. Giving the privilege to both spouses avoids the risk of eviscerating it through attempts to prove circumstantially what one spouse said by proving what the other said.

[iii] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Joint Participants in Crime

United States v. Bey, 188 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a conviction for drug importation, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by the defendant's wife as to confidential communications between them. The government sufficiently established that she was a joint participant, by evidence that she knowingly assisted him with transportation and communications related to the scheme, knowingly accepted drug proceeds, and maintained his cover story. In a trial for a cocaine distribution conspiracy, United States v. Wood, 924 F.2d 399 (1st Cir. 1991) , the government offered a letter the defendant wrote to his wife when both were in jail after their arrests for the crimes at issue. The Court held the letter was a confidential communication and should not have been admitted, as it was written after the conclusion of the alleged conspiracy between the spouses, but the error was harmless. In United States v. Picciandra, n111 the Court affirmed income tax evasion convictions, ruling that communications concerning crimes in which spouses are jointly participating do not fall within the marital communications privilege.

United States v. Estes, 793 F.2d 465 (2d Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a conviction for testifying falsely before a grand jury, holding that the defendant's statement to his wife following a completed theft was within the marital communications privilege, since the wife could not be involved as an accessory after the fact unless she knew that a theft had taken place and the communication of that fact was a necessary prerequisite to her involvement. Thus, statements communicating the fact of the theft could not have been in furtherance of an ongoing crime. The Court also held that the wife's testimony concerning the defendant's counting and hiding of the money did not involve marital communications and was not privileged.

United States v. Hill, 967 F.2d 902 (3d Cir. 1992) : Affirming a conviction for drug and weapons offenses, the Court held there was no error in permitting the defendant's wife to testify to confidential communications between them, as she was a joint participant in the defendant's crimes, even though she later cooperated with the authorities. In a drug conspiracy case, United States v. Ammar, n112 the Court concluded that the marital communications privilege did not apply to communications relating to ongoing or future criminal activity.

United States v. Savage 390 F.3d 823 (4th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions arising out of a scheme to defraud several investors, especially single, older women, by inducing them to invest in phony business ventures. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by the defendant's ex-wife that he had dressed up as one of the women victims. The Court reasoned that, while the incident might have been distasteful to some jurors, it was probative of the defendant's fraudulent activities as to this victim. It rejected the defendant's argument that the sexual incident was a confidential marital communication, finding that when the communication was made the defendant and his wife were jointly involved in ongoing criminal activity. In a kidnapping and firearms case, United States v. Parker, n113 the Court held that a husband's statements to his wife came within the joint participant exception to the privilege, finding "no basis for making a distinction between marital communications that involve the initial discussion and commencement of joint criminal conduct between spouses, and marital communications made during the joint participation in that criminal conduct." In United States v. Broome, n114 the Court affirmed convictions arising out of a conspiracy to sell stolen cars, holding that "where marital communications have to do with the commission of a crime in which both spouses are participants, the conversation does not fall within the marital privilege."

United States v. Archer, 733 F.2d 354 (5th Cir. 1984) : After holding that neither a witness-spouse nor a defendant-spouse could successfully claim a spousal immunity privilege to exclude evidence of out-of-court statements made orally or in writing by one spouse to a government agent prior to trial, the Court recognized that the marital communications privilege might protect such statements. That privilege was unavailing in this case, however, because the communications were made in the course of the spouses' joint participation in criminal activity. See also United States v. Harrelson n115(in a prosecution for killing a Federal Judge, the Court found that marital communications were in furtherance of a conspiracy, and expressed doubts that conversations concerning past crimes would fall within the privilege).

United States v. Sims, 755 F.2d 1239 (6th Cir. 1985) : The Court recognized a joint participants exception to the marital communications privilege, although it limited the exception "to permit admission of only those conversations that pertain to patently illegal activity."

United States v. Westmoreland, 312 F.3d 302 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions arising out of a murder-for-hire scheme, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit the defendant's statement to his wife that he had supplied his coconspirator with the phone number of a hit-man. The wife was not a participant in the underlying crime, and the communication took place before she undertook any actions that made her an accessory-after-the-fact. The Court concluded: "The initial disclosure of a crime to one's spouse, without more, is covered by the marital communications privilege. If the spouse later joins the conspiracy, communications from that point certainly should not be protected. This distinction is consistent with the purpose of the marital communications privilege." In United States v. Short, 4 F.3d 475 (7th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed convictions for altering vehicle identification numbers and selling stolen cars with altered VINs, holding that confidential communications between a defendant and his then-wife were properly admitted because she had aided and abetted the conspiracy even though she was not indicted nor named as an unindicted coconspirator. To the extent that communications were made before she realized she was a participant, any error in admitting them was harmless. In United States v. Keck, n116 the Court affirmed convictions on drug charges, holding that neither marital privilege applied if spouses were joint participants in crime.

United States v. Evans, 966 F.2d 398 (8th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed convictions for manufacturing and distributing marijuana, holding that confidential communications between a defendant and his wife, who was not charged, were not privileged because she was also a participant in the crime. In adopting a partners in crime exception to the marital confidential communication privilege, the Court noted that the exception was limited to patently illegal activity.

United States v. Montgomery, 384 F.3d 1050 (9th Cir. 2004) : The Court reversed a mail fraud conviction because a letter to the defendant from his wife was erroneously admitted. Although the wife was charged with participating in her husband's conspiracy, the letter encouraged the husband to take action to end the fraud, and it was only after those efforts proved fruitless that the wife joined the conspiracy, so the exception to the privilege for joint participants did not apply. In a trial for tax fraud, United States v. Marashi, 913 F.2d 724 (9th Cir. 1990) , the government introduced testimony by the defendant's ex-wife that he had ordered her to erase entries in his appointment books and to hide a double-ledger scheme, and had also instructed her to underreport income. The Court held that the former communication was not privileged because of the presence of third parties and the latter because the communications were in furtherance of joint criminal activity, even though the ex-wife was never prosecuted for the underreporting.

[iv] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Hall, 989 F.2d 711 (4th Cir. 1993) : The Court overturned a conviction for cocaine offenses, finding reversible error when the prosecutor cross-examined the defendant using a written statement obtained from his wife, who had declined to testify against her husband at trial. Not only was the statement hearsay, but its use also appeared to violate the defendant's marital communications privilege to the extent that the statement related private communications between the spouses. In United States v. Parker, n117 the Court affirmed kidnapping and firearms convictions, finding that testimony by the defendant's wife did not violate the marital communications privilege. It reasoned that the privilege generally does not extend to acts and that verbal communications in the presence of a third party are not privileged. In United States v. Burton, n118 the Court found no privilege violation in the inclusion in a probation report of statements made by the defendant's spouse. Citing Trammel v. United States (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 501.02[8]), which dealt with spousal immunity rather than confidential communications, the Court found that the privilege applied to testimony, not to one spouse's providing information to the government outside of Court.

United States v. Koehler, 790 F.2d 1256 (5th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a firearms conviction, holding that testimony by a spouse concerning violent acts did not involve marital communications.

United States v. Hook, 781 F.2d 1166 (6th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a conviction for tax evasion, the Court found that the defendant's acts of giving his wife money to pay household bills were not communicative and were not privileged. In United States v. Klayer, n119 the Court held that the marital communications privilege did not prevent a wife from testifying in a fraud prosecution that her husband had asked her for permission to sign her name on an insurance claim, since the request was made over the telephone while an insurance adjuster was listening, so it was not confidential. In United States v. Robinson, n120 the Court affirmed convictions for racketeering offenses, finding that a wife's testimony concerning her discovery of a certain unexecuted bill of sale was properly admitted. The testimony described only acts, not communications, and therefore was outside the scope of the privilege.

United States v. Lofton, 957 F.2d 476 (7th Cir. 1992) : The Court held that testimony by the defendant's wife regarding his cocaine use and a package received at their home was properly admitted, as the privilege applies only to confidential communications and does not extend to acts observed by a spouse. It was error, but harmless, to hold the privilege was waived by the wife's testimony at a suppression hearing; she had not testified about any confidential communications at the hearing.

United States v. Espino, 317 F.3d 788 (8th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a conviction for methamphetamine offenses, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly preserved the marital confidential communications privilege by prohibiting testimony about private conversations between the defendant and his wife, and made no error in denying a motion in limine to the extent that it would have treated as privileged testimony from the wife (a cooperating witness) regarding the defendant's conduct that was not communicative. In United States v. McConnell, 903 F.2d 566 (8th Cir. 1990) , the Court held, in affirming convictions of a drug distribution conspiracy, that a defendant's ex-wife was properly permitted to testify against him, as none of the testimony referred to statements outside the presence of third parties.

United States v. Ferris, 719 F.2d 1405 (9th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug offenses, finding the defendant had no marital communications privilege to prevent his wife from testifying that she saw LSD in the trunk of his car. The privilege extends only to utterances or expressions intended to be communicative. In United States v. McCown, n121 the Court found that testimony by a defendant's wife that he had instructed her to write a check that was used by codefendants to purchase a firearm was not intended to be confidential. It was obvious to the codefendants that the wife had signed the check, it was a fair inference that she had done so at the defendant's request, and there was no indication that the defendant intended to keep his instruction to his wife secret. In In re Grand Jury Investigation, n122 the Court reversed a contempt ruling against a witness who claimed a marital communications privilege, holding that the privilege extends to both spouses and that it applies before a grand jury whether or not the nontestifying spouse is a target.

United States v. Bahe, 128 F.3d 1440 (10th Cir. 1997) : In a prosecution for sexual abuse of an 11-year-old female relative living in the defendant's home, the Trial Judge granted a pretrial order preventing the defendant's wife from testifying that the defendant would signify his interest in initiating sexual intercourse by digital penetration of her vagina. The Court noted that acts intended to convey a message are within the privilege, but reversed the order because the exception for crimes against children applied in this case. In New England Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Anderson, n123 an insurance company sued to set aside a life insurance policy as fraudulently procured by a beneficiary, who allegedly conspired to murder the insured, her first husband. The Court held it was proper to bar examination of the beneficiary's second husband regarding a newspaper reporter's interview with her because his testimony might reveal privileged communications. The witness was unable on voir dire to distinguish interview statements from those made to him in confidence. In United States v. Neal, n124 a bank robbery and homicide prosecution, the Court said that the Trial Judge had used an "abundance of caution" in excluding evidence concerning telephone conversations between the defendant and his wife that were taped by the FBI with her consent but without his knowledge. The Court's opinion discussed a crime-fraud exception applicable to other communications because the wife was an accessory after the fact, but the two concurring Judges said most of her testimony related to conduct, which is not covered by the privilege.

[v] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Statements in Furtherance of Crime or Fraud

United States v. Rakes, 136 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1998) : The government claimed that the victim of an extortion scheme lied under oath about why he sold his business; he testified that he did so voluntarily when in fact he was threatened with death unless he sold the business at below market value. The government brought perjury charges against the extortion victim. It sought to obtain privileged communications made by the victim to his spouse concerning the sale of the business and the reasons for the sale, on the theory that the communications were in furtherance of the extortion. The Court affirmed suppression of the communications, holding that under the crime-fraud exception, "it takes wrongful complicity by the privilege holder, not innocent or involuntary action, to forfeit the privilege."

United States v. Neal, 743 F.2d 1441 (10th Cir. 1984) : In a bank robbery and homicide prosecution, the Court's opinion adopted a "crime-fraud" exception to the marital communication privilege, under which the privilege would not apply to confidential communications from the defendant because the wife was an accessory after the fact. One concurring Judge would not adopt a crime-fraud exception and the other concurring Judge thought the exception inapplicable to this case, but both believed much of the wife's testimony related to conduct, which is not protected by the privilege.

United States v. Malekzadeh, 855 F.2d 1492 (11th Cir. 1988) : Affirming drug convictions and rejecting arguments concerning minimization of wiretaps, the Court observed that "[u]nder federal law, the marital privilege does not protect those conversations made in furtherance of a conspiracy."

[vi] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Waiver

[A] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Waiver -- Failure To Assert Privilege

Morganroth & Morganroth v. DeLorean, 123 F.3d 374 (6th Cir. 1997) : In an action against a former client for attorney's fees, the defendant's ex-wife gave deposition testimony that was introduced against him at trial. The Court held that he had waived the privilege by failing to make specific objections on that basis when the witness was deposed. The failure to object at that time deprived the plaintiffs of the opportunity to question the witness regarding the context of the conversations, which would have permitted determination of whether the privilege applied.

United States v. Vo, 413 F.3d 1010 (9th Cir. 2005) : Affirming a conviction for distributing methamphetamine, the Court held that the defendant had waived his privilege for marital confidential communications by failing to assert the privilege at a pretrial conference or to object at trial to his wife's testimony.

[B] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Waiver -- Miscellaneous Cases

SEC v. Lavin, 111 F.3d 921 (D.C. Cir. 1997) : A securities trader, who was a managing director of a firm and head of its Chicago office, decided upon his arrival in Chicago that the office should have a system for routine taping of telephone calls with its customers. When the SEC subpoenaed telephone communications between the trader and his wife, he asserted that he reasonably believed that the conversations on a private phone in his office were not taped. Reversing an order to enforce the subpoena, the Court held that when the couple failed to seek possession of the tapes of their conversations, they did not waive any privilege. For some time after the couple learned that their conversations had been taped, they had no reason to expect that any third party would seek to learn the contents of the conversation, but as soon as they learned that the firm had turned the tapes over to a government agency, they claimed privilege. Reasonable efforts to protect the confidentiality of privileged communications did not require that they institute formal legal proceedings to gain physical possession of the tapes. In addition, the Court held that the firm's giving the tapes to the government agency was not a waiver by the Lavins because they had not authorized the firm to deliver the tapes, nor was there a waiver when the couple submitted transcripts to the District Court for in camera review when ruling on the privilege claim.

United States v. Rakes, 136 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1998) : The victim of an extortion scheme was charged with perjury for lying under oath about why he sold his business; he testified that he did so voluntarily when in fact he was threatened with death unless he sold the business at below market value. The government sought to obtain privileged communications made by the victim to his spouse concerning the sale of the business and the reasons for the sale, arguing that the victim had waived the privilege because he had also told a friend on a separate occasion about his reasons for selling the business. The Trial Judge suppressed the communications. Affirming, the Court rejected the waiver argument because the victim had not disclosed his communications with his spouse; disclosure of the underlying facts was not enough to constitute a waiver. Nor was the victim's disclosure of the underlying information to the friend so complete and pervasive as to undermine a claim of privilege.

United States v. Lea, 249 F.3d 632 (7th Cir. 2001) : After a business deal went sour, the defendant was charged with contaminating a rendering works and causing a massive recall of its products. The defendant argued that the contamination was the work of a third party. Affirming a conviction, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding examination of the other party's wife concerning alleged inculpatory statements he made to her. The defendant did not overcome the presumption that private communications between spouses are privileged, and the fact that the husband had made statements to the FDA dealing with a similar topic did not waive the privilege, when he did not divulge the communication he had made to his wife.

[C] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Waiver -- Testimony

United States v. Premises Known as 281 Syosset Woodbury Rd., 71 F.3d 1067 (2d Cir. 1995) : In a civil forfeiture case, the wife of a drug trafficker claimed she was an innocent owner of property. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the decision below that the wife waived her marital communications privilege by testifying during her deposition about conversations with her husband prior to his arrest. The District Judge had reasoned that the wife could not selectively decide to testify concerning pre-arrest conversations and not to testify about post-arrest conversations.

[d] Marital -- Exceptions

[i] Agency Relationship

United States v. Nelson, 485 F. Supp. 941 (W.D. Mich. 1980) : A defendant charged with having his wife's signature forged on a bank loan application claimed that the indictment was invalid because his wife's privileged testimony was improperly used by the grand jury. The Court held that "testimony relating either to the existence or absence of spousal agency is not testimony about a protected communication."

United States v. Price, 577 F.2d 1356 (9th Cir. 1978) : After noting that in the Ninth Circuit, as distinguished from others, extrajudicial statements by one spouse come within the spousal immunity privilege, the Court concluded that the privilege did not apply "[w]hen one spouse is shown to be an agent of the other."

[ii] Marital -- Exceptions -- Crime Against Children

United States v. Allery, 526 F.2d 1362 (8th Cir. 1975) : Citing proposed Rule 505(b)(1), the Court affirmed a conviction for attempted rape and decided that the spousal incapacity privilege did not apply when a crime against a child of either spouse was charged. One Judge dissented on the ground that there was no need to expand exceptions from the privilege, especially in a case where the victim is competent to testify.

United States v. White, 974 F.2d 1135 (9th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for manslaughter of his stepdaughter, holding there was no error in admitting confidential marital communications, as the privilege does not apply to statements relating to a crime in which a spouse or a spouse's child is the victim.

United States v. Jarvison, 409 F.3d 1221 (10th Cir. 2005) : During the pretrial stages of a prosecution for child sex abuse, the government moved to compel testimony of a witness; the witness invoked the privilege to refuse to give adverse testimony against her spouse. The government argued that the marriage was not valid, and even if it were, the Judge should recognize an exception to the spousal testimonial privilege when acts of child abuse are involved. Affirming denial of the motion to compel, the Court refused to establish an exception to the spousal testimonial privilege for acts of child abuse, distinguishing the exception it had established in such cases for the marital communications privilege in United States v. Bahe, infra, because no federal Court currently recognizes an exception to compel adverse spousal testimony in cases of child abuse. In a prosecution for sexual abuse of an 11-year-old female relative living in the defendant's home, United States v. Bahe, 128 F.3d 1440 (10th Cir. 1997) , the Trial Judge granted a pretrial order preventing the defendant's wife from testifying that he would signify his interest in initiating sexual intercourse by digital penetration of her vagina. Reversing the order, the Court held that an exception to the marital communication privilege applies where a spouse has abused a minor child within the household, regardless of the child's relationship to the spouses.

[e] Marital -- Fraudulent, Dissolved, or Failing Marriage

In re Witness Before the Grand Jury, 791 F.2d 234 (2d Cir. 1986) : The Court held that the adverse testimonial privilege was inapplicable where the spouses had lived apart for eleven years at the time of a grand jury investigation and the husband had lived with and represented himself as married to another woman. The Court also held there was no marital communication privilege where the husband and wife had lived apart for four years prior to the first communication as to which the privilege was claimed and there was no possibility of reconciliation at the time of the communication.

United States v. Mathis, 559 F.2d 294 (5th Cir. 1977) : The Court reversed a conviction for a firearms offense, noting that "[i]t is well established that an exception to the husband-wife privilege exists if the trial judge determines that the marriage is a fraud." In United States v. Cameron, n125 the Court focused on several factors -- e.g., the absence of cohabitation at trial and the brief period in which the spouses had cohabited, and the defendant's fathering of a child with the woman with whom he actually lived -- and concluded that "where the evidence supported a finding that the marriage was no longer viable and its members had little hope or desire for reconciliation, reason, experience and common sense indicate that the traditional policy reasons for the privilege are non-existent."

United States v. Porter, 986 F.2d 1014 (6th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed a conviction for offenses arising out of the defendant's exchanging explosives for cocaine and cash, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by the defendant's former wife relating communications from him made while they were still legally married but ten to twelve days after she had permanently "moved out." Holding the marital communication privilege inapplicable where the spouses have permanently separated, the Court noted that there should be a factual finding on permanent separation if requested. As the two were divorced at the time of trial, there was no violation of the adverse spousal testimony privilege.

United States v. Hamilton, 19 F.3d 350 (7th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed convictions for bank robbery, holding there was no error in admitting confidential communications a defendant made to his supposed wife. After an issue was raised at a pretrial hearing that she was not legally divorced from her first husband at the time she married the defendant, the defendant failed to prove the validity of the marriage at trial. The Court also strictly interpreted the valid marriage requirement, so it rejected the defendant's argument that he made the communications in reliance on a belief that the two were validly married. In United States v. Byrd, n126 the Court sustained a husband's convictions for arson and conspiracy, rejecting his objection to the admission of marital statements. Proof that the defendant and his wife were permanently separated rendered the communications privilege "automatically inapplicable," because "society's interests in protecting the confidentiality of the relationships of permanently separated spouses is outweighed by the need to secure evidence in the search for truth that is the essence of a criminal trial."

United States v. Jackson, 939 F.2d 625 (8th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed bank robbery convictions, holding that the defendant could not claim the spousal immunity privilege for communications to his wife (from whom he had been separated 16 months), because she was willing to testify for the government. Neither could he claim the confidential communication privilege, because they were permanently separated without any semblance of a marital relationship at the time of the communications. In United States v. Brown, n127 the defendant left his wife two weeks after marrying her and had not seen her from that time until the trial; the Court found no testimonial privilege.

United States v. Murphy, 65 F.3d 758 (9th Cir. 1995) : Affirming convictions for violating environmental laws and making false statements, the Court held that the marital communications privilege "does not apply if the couple was separated and the marriage was irreconcilable at the time of the communication." Factors to be considered in determining whether a marriage is irreconcilable include the duration of the separation, the stability of the marriage at the time of the communication, whether a divorce action had been filed and the conduct of the parties since that filing, whether a property settlement had been proposed, and any statements by the parties regarding irreconcilability or the reasons for separation. Thus, a communication made after the defendant had told his wife he did not want to be married, and had filed for divorce, and after the couple had been separated for seven years, was properly found not privileged. In United States v. Roberson, n128 the Court affirmed a rape conviction, holding that the marital communications privilege did not apply to statements made by a husband after a dissolution action had been filed and he was no longer living with his wife when he communicated with her, even though the marriage was still valid under state law. In In re Grand Jury Proceedings (84-5), n129 the Court said that "mere suspicious timing of a marriage does not support a finding of a sham marriage, especially when other evidence, such as living together or intentions of living together as husband and wife, indicates that the marriage was entered into in good faith." Thus, it reversed an order holding a wife in contempt for refusing to testify before a grand jury to matters concerning her husband. In In re Grand Jury Investigation of Hugle, n130 the Court held that as to confidential communication made during the marriage, the marital communications privilege can be asserted even after the marriage ends, so it "must be available to a partner in an existing, albeit disharmonious marriage."

United States v. Knox, 124 F.3d 1360 (10th Cir. 1997) : Affirming convictions for mail fraud, the Court found no error in the admission of testimony by the defendant's former wife. The Court, citing this Manual, held that the confidential communications privilege does not apply if the spouses were divorced at the time of the communication. In United States v. Treff, 924 F.2d 975 (10th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for attempting to kill his former supervisor at the IRS, holding there was no error in admitting entries from a diary kept by the defendant's late wife over a marital communication privilege objection. The diary was kept on advice of the wife's counsel when the parties were having marital difficulties and the relevant entry was made just before both parties filed for divorce. See also United States v. Apodaca n131(denying adverse testimony privilege because defendant's marriage to key government witness three days before trial was a fraud).

United States v. Singleton, 260 F.3d 1295 (11th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a conviction for making false statements to a credit union, the Court found no abuse of discretion in rejecting a privilege claim for tapes that a husband made, at the request of the FBI, of his wife's statements. The Court reasoned that the privilege does not apply when a couple is permanently separated. The factors to be considered in determining separation are whether the couple was cohabiting, how long they had not been cohabiting, and whether either had filed for divorce; the burden is on the party claiming the privilege to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that it applies.

[6] Newsreporter

[a] Common-law Privilege for Sources

In re Grand Jury Subpoena, Judith Miller, 438 F.3d 1138 (D.C. Cir. 2006) : The Court held that the First Amendment does not afford journalists a constitutional right to refuse to divulge confidential sources in response to grand jury subpoenas. It found it unnecessary to decide whether such a privilege exists under federal common law, because even if such a privilege existed, it was a qualified privilege, and the reporter's interest in confidentiality was outweighed in this case by the interest of the grand jury in conducting a criminal investigation. In Clyburn v. News World Commun., Inc., 903 F.2d 29 (D.C. Cir. 1990) , the Court upheld summary judgment for the defendants in a defamation action, ruling that the privilege was properly applied because the plaintiff utterly failed to pursue obvious alternative sources of information.

Riley v. City of Chester, 612 F.2d 708 (3d Cir. 1979) : In a civil rights suit against a city mayor for alleged interference with a political candidate's campaign, the Court held that a newsreporter had a common-law privilege to refuse to disclose the source of news stories about the plaintiff's performance. In United States v. Cuthbertson, n132 the Court held that the common-law, qualified newsreporter-source privilege first recognized by the Circuit in Riley also applied in criminal cases. The Court said that before privileged materials are ordered to be produced, even for an in camera review, the party seeking them must show that he is unable to acquire the information from another source that does not enjoy the protection of the privilege. Statements of witnesses must be produced for in camera review if they are relevant evidentiary material; they need not be "centrally relevant." In United States v. Criden, n133 the Court held that a journalist could not refuse to affirm or deny that she had a conversation with a particular individual who had already testified that the conversation occurred, when the evidence was relevant to a defense allegation of prosecutorial misconduct.

Miller v. Transamerican Press, Inc., 621 F.2d 721 (5th Cir. 1980) : The Court held in a libel action that the plaintiffs could compel discovery of a confidential source of the journalist defendants. The Court avoided the question of which state's privilege law to apply by finding that all concerned jurisdictions followed the same rule.

Los Angeles Mem. Coliseum Comm'n v. National Football League, 89 F.R.D. 489 (C.D. Cal. 1981) : In a football team's action against the league in connection with the team's efforts to move the franchise, state claims were joined with a federal antitrust claim. The league sought to subpoena records of two newsreporters, but the Trial Judge, relying on both federal and state law, quashed the subpoenas. The Judge recognized a qualified federal common-law privilege for journalists and found that the league had not exhausted other means of obtaining the information sought from the reporters.

[b] Newsreporter -- Constitutional Privilege for Sources

Lee v. Department of Justice, 413 F.3d 53 (D.C. Cir. 2005) : Following press disclosures of an FBI investigation into allegations of espionage by a Department of Energy engineer, the engineer sued for violation of the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 522a. During discovery the engineer was unsuccessful in obtaining information about the source of the leaks from government officials, so he subpoenaed reporters who had published the disclosures. Affirming contempt orders issued after the reporters' motions to quash were denied, the Court reasoned that reporters have a qualified privilege under the First Amendment to refuse in civil cases to disclose confidential sources, but that in this case there was no abuse of discretion in ruling that the engineer had overcome application of the privilege. The information he sought went to "the heart of the matter," and he had exhausted "every reasonable alternative source of information" -- although perhaps not every possible source -- before seeking discovery from the reporters. In In re Grand Jury Subpoena, Judith Miller, 438 F.3d 1138 (D.C. Cir. 2006) , the Court held that the First Amendment does not afford journalists a constitutional right to refuse to divulge confidential sources in response to grand jury subpoenas. It found it unnecessary to decide whether such a privilege exists under federal common law, because even if such a privilege existed, it was a qualified privilege, and the reporter's interest in confidentiality was outweighed in this case by the interest of the grand jury in conducting a criminal investigation. In an action against Justice Department officials for leaking wiretap transcripts, Zerilli v. Smith, n134 the Court found that the plaintiffs had not made a sufficient showing to justify overriding a newsreporter's claim of privilege with respect to the sources of the transcripts that he published. Although a litigant's need for evidence is important in ruling on a privilege claim, the litigant's efforts to gain information from alternative sources also is of central importance. When, as here, the reporter is a source of information in a dispute among others, the case for recognizing a privilege is stronger than when the reporter is a party seeking to shield himself from liability.

In re Special Proceedings, 373 F.3d 37 (1st Cir. 2004) : A court order prohibited counsel from disclosing surveillance tapes made in a corruption investigation and furnished to defense counsel during discovery, but a local television station aired one of the videotapes. In an effort to determine whether the protective order had been violated by leaking the tapes, a special prosecutor was appointed. After interviewing approximately 14 individuals, the prosecutor subpoenaed a reporter for the station. The reporter asserted a "newsman's privilege" and refused to answer any questions regarding the identity of the person from whom he received the tape. Affirming an order of civil contempt against the reporter, the Court held that even following the Circuit's "heightened sensitivity" to First Amendment concerns, disclosure of confidential sources was proper in this case, where the request was for information highly relevant to a good-faith criminal investigation and reasonable efforts had been made to obtain the information elsewhere than from the reporter.

United States v. Sanders, 211 F.3d 711 (2d Cir. 2000) : In an unusual case arising out of the 1996 TWA flight 800 crash in the Atlantic, the Court affirmed the convictions of husband and wife journalists for conspiring to remove without authority parts of the aircraft. Their conduct apparently was an effort to prove the "real" cause of the crash. The prosecutor offered the couple immunity if they would identify the person or persons who violated a federal criminal statute by providing them samples from the crash. The couple refused immunity, and they were prosecuted and convicted despite their claim that "there is a journalist's privilege barring any government coercion to disclose a news source" absent a compelling governmental interest. The Court noted that its prior decisions recognizing a privilege had involved "the power of a court to supervise its own compulsory discovery processes." In contrast, the instant case involved "the power of a prosecutor to decide when and on what terms to bring charges against a defendant." The Court declined to extend the privilege to this situation. In von Bulow v. von Bulow, n135 a highly publicized case brought by the children of a woman whose husband was acquitted of attempting to murder her, the Court upheld a contempt citation against a third party who had refused to comply with an order to produce documents prepared as part of an effort to write a book about the criminal prosecution. The Court noted that a person claiming a First Amendment qualified privilege to protect news-gathering material must demonstrate "the intent to disseminate the information to the public." Here, the third party's motive at the time she commissioned reports on the prosecution was to vindicate the defendant, not to disseminate information. Finally, the Court determined that there was no showing that she assured sources that their information would be confidential.

Ashcraft v. Conoco, Inc., 218 F.3d 282 (4th Cir. 2000) : Reversing a civil contempt finding against a reporter who refused to divulge the sources for stories about a sealed multimillion-dollar settlement in an environmental tort action, the Court held there was no compelling interest in learning the sources in order to sanction violation of the sealing order, because the proper steps had not been followed before the settlement was sealed and thus the order was invalid. In In re Shain, 978 F.2d 850 (4th Cir. 1992) , four reporters refused to testify at a Hobbs Act prosecution of state legislators regarding statements made to them in the course of newsgathering. The Court held there was no qualified privilege, as the statements were not made in confidence and there was no evidence of government harassment or bad faith in seeking the information. The Justice Department regulation concerning the compelling of testimony from journalists could not be invoked, even had its procedures been followed, because it expressly disclaims creating any legally enforceable right and is to be enforced only administratively and not by the Courts through the exclusion of evidence. One Judge concurred specially, believing that the majority's focus on the absence of governmental bad faith was insufficiently sensitive to the interest in not routinely dragging reporters into the midst of cases they cover.

In re Selcraig, 705 F.2d 789 (5th Cir. 1983) : In an action by a discharged school teacher against a school district and several officials on a claim that they had publicized false, stigmatizing charges against him, the plaintiff sought to discover the confidential sources relied upon by a reporter who made inquiries that resulted in the publication of the charges. Vacating a contempt decree against the reporter, the Court recognized a qualified First Amendment privilege to protect reporters' sources. It found that the plaintiff had not yet established liability and that the reporter's source was relevant only to punitive damages if there was liability, so until the plaintiff could show at least a prima facie case of liability, there was no demonstrated necessity for disclosure of the source. The Court declined to treat the reporter more favorably than one who was a party to a case, and it rejected a suggestion by amicus curiae that the qualified privilege should be subject to invasion only where there is a "compelling" need for the information or where it is "absolutely critical" to a claim or defense.

McKevitt v. Pallasch, 339 F.3d 530 (7th Cir. 2003) : The plaintiff, being prosecuted in Ireland for terrorism, sought an order under 28 U.S.C. § 1782 directing journalists to produce tape recordings that he thought would be useful in the cross-examination of a key witness for the prosecution. The tape recordings were of interviews with the witness that the journalists had conducted in preparation for writing the witness' biography. The journalists argued that the tapes were protected from compelled disclosure by "a federal common law reporter's privilege rooted in the First Amendment." Explaining its refusal to stay an order to produce the tapes, the Court discussed the various lines of authority regarding a constitutional newsreporter's privilege. It noted that the principal concern of a privilege is in providing confidentiality of sources. In this case, however, not only was the source known but also he did not object to disclosure of his interviews to the plaintiff.

Continental Cablevision v. Storer Broadcasting Co., 583 F. Supp. 427 (E.D. Mo. 1984) : In an action alleging that the defendant's employees libeled a cablevision company by distributing a false statement to members of a city council, the Court recognized a First Amendment qualified privilege for newsreporters not to reveal confidential sources, but it refused to quash a subpoena to a reporter who had written about cable franchises. Reporters, like other witnesses, must attend a deposition and claim privilege specifically as to questions threatening the confidentiality of sources.

Price v. Time, Inc., 416 F.3d 1327 (11th Cir. 2005) : The former coach of the University of Alabama football team sued a magazine reporter and publisher for libel. The published report stated that the coach, while on a trip with the team, had taken two women to a hotel room and had sex with them. The plaintiff sought disclosure of the sources of the report and the defendants invoked the newsreporter's constitutionally-based qualified privilege against disclosure of confidential sources. The Court upheld the privilege claim, holding that the plaintiff had failed to show that he had "used reasonable means to discover the information from alternative sources." The Court stated that "[b]efore we can say that Price has exhausted all reasonable alternative means to discover the identity of the confidential source, he must depose the four women from whom he is most likely to discover that identity, especially since [under the facts] the source is almost certainly one of three."

[c] Newsreporter -- Editing Process

Herbert v. Lando, 441 U.S. 153 (1979) , rev'g 568 F.2d 974 (2d Cir. 1977) : In this libel action by a plaintiff classified as a public figure under New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, n136 the Court of Appeals created a privilege to protect the defendants against disclosure during discovery of a journalist's exercise of editorial control and judgment, relying on Branzburg v. Hayes n137 for the proposition that "without some protection for seeking out the news, freedom of the press could be eviscerated." The Supreme Court reversed, holding (6-3) that a libel action itself is a deterrent to speech and publication, that the plaintiff in a New York Times type of case bears a heavy burden of proving actual malice and needs the kind of evidence sought in this case, and that the privilege for the editorial process would be difficult to confine.

[d] Newsreporter -- Fiction Author

In re Madden, 151 F.3d 125 (3d Cir. 1998) : In an unfair trade action between professional wrestling promoters, the plaintiff deposed an employee of the defendant who produced tape-recorded commentaries related to professional wrestling for the defendant's 900-number hotline. The deponent, invoking a "journalist's privilege," refused to identify sources of certain allegedly false and misleading statements recorded for the hotline. The Court reversed an order that denied a motion to compel the deponent's testimony, and held that the privilege applies only to persons engaged in the process of "investigative reporting" or "news gathering" with the intent to disseminate the news to the public, not to persons like the deponent who are really just authors of entertaining fiction intending to provide advertisement and entertainment.

[e] Newsreporter -- Nonconfidential Information

Gonzales v. National Broadcasting Co., 194 F.3d 29 (2d Cir. 1999) : Both the plaintiffs and the defendant in a civil rights action subpoenaed "outtakes" from a televised report by the NBC news program "Dateline." The outtakes depicted stops of vehicles by the defendant police officer. NBC moved to quash the subpoenas, contending that there is a qualified privilege for newsreporters under federal law, to protect against disclosure of nonconfidential information. Affirming denial of the motion to quash, the Court recognized that the qualified privilege protecting press materials from disclosure applies to nonconfidential as well as confidential materials, since unrestricted discovery would burden the press with heavy costs of subpoena compliance and otherwise impair its ability to perform its duties. However, the Court held that the parties in this case had satisfied the less-demanding showing required for disclosure of nonconfidential press materials. Here, the outtakes were "of likely relevance to a significant issue in the case, and ... not reasonably obtainable from other available sources."

United States v. Smith, 135 F.3d 963 (5th Cir. 1998) : In a criminal proceeding, the Trial Judge granted a television station's motion to quash a subpoena for the unbroadcast portions of an interview with the defendant, finding that newsreporters had a qualified privilege under the Supreme Court's Branzburg decision, and that the government did not show a substantial need for the evidence. Reversing, the Court held that Branzburg did not establish a general, qualified privilege for newsreporters in criminal cases; at most it provided a privilege to refuse disclosure where the "grand jury investigation is not being conducted in good faith." In the Court's view, "Branzburg will protect the press if the government attempts to harass it. Short of such harassment, the media must bear the same burden of producing evidence of criminal wrongdoing as any other citizen." Here, there was no evidence of harassment -- the prosecution served a single subpoena, for nonconfidential information, after receiving clearance from the Attorney General.

[f] Newsreporter -- Other Privileges for News Gathering

United States v. LaRouche Campaign, 841 F.2d 1176 (1st Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed a pretrial ruling in a criminal case that enforced a subpoena to the National Broadcasting Company for "outtakes" of an interview of a prospective, key witness. A small portion of the interview was previously broadcast. The Trial Judge had recognized a qualified privilege, determined that the subpoenaed outtakes involved no confidential sources, and ordered that the outtakes be submitted for in camera review and possible release to the defendants. The Court approved the procedure, observing that the government had agreed to advise NBC when and if the Judge decided to release any material for use during trial.

In re Application to Quash Subpoena to National Broadcasting Co., 79 F.3d 346 (2d Cir. 1996) : The defendant in a product liability action brought in the District of Massachusetts obtained a subpoena in the Southern District of New York for out-takes from an NBC broadcast. Reversing denial of a motion to quash the subpoena, the Court held that New York State's Shield Law applied, and that the defendant had failed to carry its burden under the Shield Law of making a clear and convincing showing that the out-takes were critical and necessary to its defense and that the information sought was unavailable elsewhere. The Court noted that the standard required in the New York Shield Law was identical to that it had previously applied as a matter of federal law in United States v. Cutler, 6 F.3d 67 (2d Cir. 1993) . In United States v. Burke, n138 the Court affirmed convictions for RICO and conspiracy offenses arising out of a "point-shaving" scheme in college basketball. One of the participants in the scheme, who testified at trial, had collaborated on an article in a national sports magazine, and a defendant moved to subpoena all documents and tapes in the magazine's possession relating to the article. The Court said that its prior decisions required "a clear and specific showing that the evidence sought was highly material and relevant, necessary or critical to the maintenance of the claim, and not obtainable from other available sources" to overcome a claim of reporter's privilege. Here, the defendant had ample impeachment evidence and the information available from the magazine was cumulative, so the Court upheld the privilege claim.

In re Grand Jury Matter (Gronowicz), 764 F.2d 983 (3d Cir. 1985) (en banc): A divided Court affirmed a contempt citation against an author who refused to disclose information to a grand jury because he claimed that the purpose of the grand jury's investigation was to determine the truth of assertions made in his book, an inquiry prohibited by the First Amendment. The Court found that the grand jury properly investigated possible misrepresentations about the book, and the information sought was relevant to its inquiry.

Shoen v. Shoen, 5 F.3d 1289 (9th Cir. 1993) : Plaintiffs in a defamation action sought testimony, notes, and tape recordings from an investigative author who had interviewed the defendant while working on a book. Vacating an order holding the author in contempt, the Court held that an investigative book author has standing to invoke the journalist's privilege, that the privilege protects information and materials obtained without a guarantee of confidentiality, and that the plaintiffs had not shown a need for the information requested sufficient to overcome the interests favoring nondisclosure. The concurring Judge would have rested the decision on the nonconstitutional ground that it was an abuse of discretion under Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(1) to fail to require the plaintiffs to first seek information about the interviews from the defendant. The plaintiffs subsequently deposed the defendant and again demanded discovery from the author. Reversing a second contempt order, in Shoen v. Shoen, 48 F.3d 412 (9th Cir. 1995) , the Court held that where information sought is not confidential, a civil litigant is entitled to overcome a valid assertion of the journalist's privilege by a nonparty only upon a showing that the requested material is: unavailable despite exhaustion of all reasonable alternative sources; noncumulative; and clearly relevant (actually, not just potentially) to an important issue in the case. The Court found (2-1) that the requested information was not clearly relevant to an important issue and was cumulative of other evidence.

Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 563 F.2d 433 (10th Cir. 1977) : In an action against a corporation that allegedly violated a deceased woman's rights during her lifetime, the defendant gave notice to a filmmaker that his deposition was required and simultaneously served upon him a subpoena to produce all documents and writings in connection with his investigation of the deceased's death. The Court noted that there is no absolute privilege for reporters, but it concluded that the Supreme Court has recognized a qualified privilege and that a balancing of First Amendment rights against the needs of parties is required in civil litigation. The Court also concluded that a filmmaker had the same qualified privilege as a more traditional reporter.

United States v. Caporale, 806 F.2d 1487 (11th Cir. 1986) : Affirming racketeering convictions, the Court upheld a decision not to allow the defendants to compel reporters to answer interrogatories or testify about a story they wrote concerning a grand jury investigation into a bribe offered to a juror. The source of the information in the story was available to the defendants, and the defendants failed to show that the reporters' information was otherwise unavailable and that they had a compelling need for disclosure.

[7] Physician-Patient

[a] Discovery

Doe v. Eli Lilly & Co., 99 F.R.D. 126 (D.D.C. 1983) : In a suit against a drug manufacturer for a child's prenatal injuries, the District Court held that, where physical condition had been placed in issue and the plaintiffs conceded that the District of Columbia's doctor-patient privilege had been waived, the defendants were entitled to interview the plaintiffs' doctors. The Judge rejected the plaintiffs' argument that the doctors should be deposed rather than interviewed and ordered the plaintiffs to execute authorizations "to inform their physicians that no inhibitions of privilege exist with respect to the disclosure of any information they possess to defendant Eli Lilly and its agents which is relevant to the subject matter of these proceedings."

N.O. v. Callahan, 110 F.R.D. 637 (D. Mass. 1986) : In an action by inmates at a state mental health facility alleging systematic failures to provide adequate medical care, the plaintiffs sought medical records of nonparty patients. Although the District Court found that such records are privileged under state law, it held that a strong showing of need had been made and that the records could be discovered. The Judge required deletion of the names of the patients and limited disclosure of the records to counsel, clerical assistants, and experts.

United States v. University Hosp., 575 F. Supp. 607 (E.D.N.Y. 1983) , aff'd, 729 F.2d 144 (1984) : The District Court denied the government's motion to compel the hospital to provide medical records of a handicapped infant whose parents refused to consent to certain surgical procedures, although it observed that federal evidence law does not recognize a doctor-patient privilege.

Oslund v. United States, 128 F.R.D. 110 (D. Minn. 1989) : The plaintiff, who brought an action under the Federal Tort Claims Act alleging he had received herpes from an occupational therapy intern employed at a VA hospital, sought discovery of the intern's medical records. The District Court held that Minnesota's medical records privilege applied, because the FTCA now provides that the United States is to be substituted for an individual party defendant and is entitled to assert any defenses otherwise available to the individual employee. The Judge concluded, however, that the intern's medical records were discoverable under a protective order.

[b] Physician-Patient -- Generally

Hancock v. Dodson, 958 F.2d 1367 (6th Cir. 1992) : In a civil rights action on behalf of an arrestee rendered incompetent allegedly as a result of the arrest, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of physician-patient communications, as federal law governs federal question cases with pendent state law claims. The Federal Courts do not recognize a federal physician-patient privilege; and even if state law applied, the privilege was waived when the plaintiff voluntarily produced records of the treating physician without asserting the privilege.

Patterson v. Caterpillar, Inc., 70 F.3d 503 (7th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a judgment in an ERISA case for an employer that terminated an employee's disability benefits, the Court denied that the employee's doctor-patient privilege was violated when one of his treating physicians testified on behalf of the employer. There is no doctor-patient privilege under federal law, and any state privilege was inapplicable in an ERISA case.

United States v. Bercier, 848 F.2d 917 (8th Cir. 1988) : Affirming a conviction for involuntary manslaughter while driving intoxicated, the Court held that a physician-patient privilege is not recognized in federal criminal proceedings.

Physician-patient privilege cases involving psychotherapists are annotated in § 501.03[8].

[8] Psychotherapists

[a] Basis of Privilege

Jaffee v. Redmond, 518 U.S. 1 (1996) : The Court held that "confidential communications between a licensed psychotherapist and her patients in the course of diagnosis or treatment are protected from compelled disclosure under Rule 501 of the Federal Rules of Evidence." It further held, contrary to the Court of Appeals decision, that the privilege was not qualified by the need of the adversary to obtain the privileged information. Thus, where the privilege applies, it is absolute. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 501.02[6].

United States v. Schwensow, 151 F.3d 650 (7th Cir. 1998) : The defendant was charged with felon firearm possession after volunteer operators at an Alcoholics Anonymous hotline office found guns in a bag he left with them after they referred him to a detoxification center. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the decision that communications with the volunteers were not privileged. They neither possessed credentials qualifying them, nor acted or held themselves out, as counselors; their office did not contain any indicia that it provided counseling services; and the defendant did not speak with them for purposes of diagnosis or treatment, but only to obtain the address for a detoxification center, which he had already decided to enter.

[b] Employee Assistance Programs

Oleszko v. State Compensation Ins. Fund, 243 F.3d 1154 (9th Cir. 2001) : In a state employee's employment discrimination action, the Court found no error when the Fund's employee assistance program was not required to produce records or to testify about the substance of communications by other employees. The program was designed to assist employees in dealing with a range of personal issues -- health, marital, financial, substance abuse, and emotional problems. The program's staff contained no licensed psychiatrist, psychologist or social worker, but all of the staff had backgrounds in psychology or social work. The Court reasoned that "[t]he reasons for recognizing a privilege for treatment by psychiatrists or social workers apply equally to EAPs."

[c] Psychotherapists -- Exceptions

[i] Child Victim

United States v. Burtrum, 17 F.3d 1299 (10th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed a conviction for sexually abusing children, holding it would not recognize a psychotherapist-patient privilege in a criminal child sexual abuse case.

[ii] Psychotherapists -- Exceptions -- Crime or Fraud

In re Grand Jury Proceedings (Violette), 183 F.3d 71 (1st Cir. 1999) : The Court held that the psychotherapist-patient privilege is subject to a crime-fraud exception, reasoning that communications that are intended to further a crime or fraud are not "allied with bona fide psychotherapy and, thus, protecting such communications will not promote mental health." The Court emphasized "that the crime-fraud exception will apply only when the patient's purpose is to promote a particular crime or fraud." In this case the government had established a prima facie case that the client's communications were made as part of a scheme to defraud lenders and/or disability insurers.

In re Doe, 711 F.2d 1187 (2d Cir. 1983) : The Court held that it would not recognize a psychotherapist-patient privilege claim for patient records of a sham medical clinic that operated to dispense controlled substances. An in camera examination of the records revealed no intensely personal communications of the sort that the privilege might be thought to foster.

[iii] Psychotherapists -- Exceptions -- Fees, Patient Identity, etc.

In re Grand Jury Subpoenas Duces Tecum Dated Jan. 30, 1986, 638 F. Supp. 794 (D. Me. 1986) : The Court denied a psychiatrist's motion to quash a grand jury subpoena directed to his solely-owned corporation. Any privilege would not extend to portions of a doctor's records "documenting the times and lengths of patient appointments, fees, patient diagnoses, treatment plans and recommendations, and somatic therapies," or to patient identities. As for other documents, the doctor had not made a particularized claim of privilege as to specific items or categories, so the motion was denied without prejudice to reconsideration.

In re Zuniga, 714 F.2d 632 (6th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed enforcement of subpoenas duces tecum issued to psychotherapists by a grand jury investigating Medicaid fraud. The Court found that the information sought -- the identity of patients, the dates on which they were treated, and the length of treatment on each date -- was not privileged. Assuming arguendo that patient identity might be privileged, the Court also observed that the information had been disclosed to Blue Cross/Blue Shield, so the privilege would have been waived.

[iv] Psychotherapists -- Exceptions -- Threats

United States v. Hayes, 227 F.3d 578 (6th Cir. 2000) : The defendant was charged with making threats in several psychotherapy sessions to murder his supervisor at the United States Postal Service. The Court upheld exclusion of the therapist's expected testimony, and affirmed dismissal of the indictment. Although a "dangerous patient" exception appeared to have been recognized in a footnote in Jaffee v. Redmond, the Court believed that the footnote "was referring to the fact that psychotherapists will sometimes need to testify in court proceedings, such as those for the involuntary commitment of a patient, to comply with their duty to protect the patient or identifiable third parties."

United States v. Chase, 340 F.3d 978 (9th Cir. 2003) (en banc): In the course of his treatment for bipolar disorder, the defendant gave his psychiatrist a list of persons, including two FBI agents who had investigated complaints he had made, whom he thought about injuring or killing. The psychiatrist notified the FBI about the threatening statements, and when the defendant learned that federal officers were going to execute a search warrant at his home, he told a telephone operator at the clinic where the psychiatrist worked that "there are FBI Marshals that are on their way out to get me and if that happens, people are going to die." Affirming his conviction for threatening to murder the officers executing the warrant, the en banc Court held that it was error (but harmless) to admit the psychiatrist's testimony regarding the threats made during treatment sessions, because they were confidential statements made for the purposes of diagnosis and treatment and thus privileged under Jaffee v. Redmond, 518 U.S. 1 (1996) . The threats were properly disclosed to the authorities, but the Tarasoff exception to confidentiality does not take a communication out of the privilege, and the Court declined to recognize a dangerous-patient exception to the federal testimonial privilege. Three Judges, concurring in the result, would have recognized a dangerous-patient exception to the privilege, relying in part on dictum in Jaffee's footnote 19, which states that "we have no doubt that there are situations in which the privilege must give way, for example, if a serious threat of harm to the patient or to others can be averted only by means of a disclosure by the therapist."

United States v. Glass, 133 F.3d 1356 (10th Cir. 1998) : The defendant was voluntarily admitted to a mental health unit, and stated to the psychiatrist examining him that he wanted to "get in the history books like Hinkley [sic] and he wanted to shoot Bill Clinton and Hillary." In a prosecution for threatening the President, the Court held that the rationale of Jaffee v. Redmond applied to protect the defendant's statement, and therefore that the defendant's guilty plea (conditioned on the admissibility of the statement) had to be vacated. The Court recognized that Jaffee envisioned an exception to the psychotherapist-patient privilege "if a serious threat of harm to the patient or to others can be averted only by means of a disclosure by the therapist." However, in this case there was no indication that the threat was serious or that the threat could only be averted by means of disclosure.

[d] Psychotherapists -- In the Course of Diagnosis or Treatment

United States v. Romo, 413 F.3d 1044 (9th Cir. 2005) : The defendant, an inmate charged with threatening the President, had sought a meeting with a licensed professional counselor who had previously provided him with mental health treatment and at the meeting had admitted sending a threatening letter. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the Judge found that the meeting was not in the course of diagnosis or treatment and denied the psychotherapist privilege against the counselor's testimony. The Court reasoned that the fact that a therapist has previously provided mental health care does not itself indicate that a subsequent meeting involved therapy; special attention must be paid to the particulars of the meeting during which the allegedly privileged information was exchanged. Here, according to the majority, there was nothing to suggest that the defendant was seeking counseling and there was nothing about the meeting indicating that it involved treatment of any kind -- the defendant simply blurted out the information about the threat. The counselor's wide-ranging responsibilities as "program director" gave further evidence precluding an assumption that the meeting was a psychotherapy session. One Judge, concurring in the result, would have found the communication privileged, since the defendant had contacted the counselor to discuss a problem he was having and the communication was made in the course of discussing that problem.

[e] Psychotherapists -- Insanity Claims

Noggle v. Marshall, 706 F.2d 1408 (6th Cir. 1983) . In a habeas corpus case, the Court found no constitutional error in the government's responding to an insanity defense by calling as its witness a psychiatrist who had been retained by the defense and who had examined the defendant, but who was not called by the defense. The Court also held that a defendant retains his privilege against self-incrimination even after calling psychiatrists to testify in support of an insanity defense. If cross-examination of the defense psychiatrists elicits statements made by the defendant, a jury may use these statements only on the insanity issue, not to determine guilt or innocence. The Court concluded that a bifurcated proceeding was not constitutionally required.

[f] Psychotherapists -- Miscellaneous Cases

In re Doe, 964 F.2d 1325 (2d Cir. 1992) : Affirming a civil contempt order against a key government witness in an extortion investigation who refused to answer questions before trial about his psychiatric history, the Court recognized a psychotherapist-patient privilege but held that in the circumstances in camera discovery subject to a protective order against public disclosure was sufficient to safeguard the witness' privacy interests. The Court declined to rule whether the privilege could limit confrontation as to credibility at trial.

United States v. Schlette, 842 F.2d 1574 (9th Cir. 1988) , amended, 854 F.2d 359 (9th Cir. 1988) : A prosecutor's estate and a newspaper sought access to a psychiatric report and sentencing reports relating to a defendant who killed the prosecutor and committed suicide. The Court held that the reports should have been released, rejecting the government's attempt to assert a psychotherapist-patient privilege on behalf of the deceased defendant. It concluded that only the personal representative of the defendant "arguably would have standing to assert the privilege."

[g] Psychotherapists -- Privilege Not Qualified or Subject to Balancing

In re Sealed Case (Medical Records), 381 F.3d 1205 (D.C. Cir. 2004) : In an action by mentally disabled group home residents against a government agency and other defendants arising from alleged sexual assaults against residents by a mentally disabled co-resident, the agency was ordered to produce all of the co-resident's records in discovery. The Trial Judge, who did not screen the records in any way, had observed that "privileges are qualified or conditional for a number of reasons." Vacating the order, the Court responded that "[t]hat statement is incorrect with respect to the psychotherapist privilege. In Jaffee, the Court flatly rejected the suggestion that the privilege was subject to balancing." Thus, it was error to permit the plaintiff's counsel to see material covered by the privilege, regardless of the Judge's "assessment of the 'interests of justice.' "

[h] Psychotherapists -- Waiver

United States v. Snelenberger, 24 F.3d 799 (6th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed a conviction for threatening to murder an Administrative Law Judge, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by a psychotherapist regarding the defendant's threats. The defendant had waived the privilege by acknowledging to an FBI agent that he had expressed the threat to the psychotherapist. In In re Zuniga, n139 the Court affirmed enforcement of subpoenas duces tecum issued to psychotherapists by a grand jury investigating Medicaid fraud. The Court found that the information sought -- the identity of patients, the dates on which they were treated, and the length of treatment on each date -- was not privileged. Assuming arguendo that patient identity might be privileged, the Court also observed that the information had been disclosed to Blue Cross/Blue Shield, so the privilege would have been waived.

In re Pebsworth, 705 F.2d 261 (7th Cir. 1983) : The Court enforced a grand jury subpoena for a psychotherapist's records in an investigation of possible fraudulent insurance claims. The Court concluded that any privilege that might have existed was waived by the patients' explicit authorization of disclosure of the requested records to the medical insurers. A concurring Judge argued that "traditional waiver doctrines are inappropriate in the context of present-day medical insurance"; that insurance plans encourage doctor-patient relationships and reduce their costs; and that insurance plans and the privilege "go hand in hand."

Dixon v. City of Lawton, Okla., 898 F.2d 1443 (10th Cir. 1990) : In a civil rights wrongful death action, the Court held there was no error in admitting evidence of confidential communications between the decedent and psychotherapists. The Court said the plaintiff put the decedent's mental condition in issue by seeking damages for mental pain and suffering prior to death and the communications were brief, recent, and directly related to issues necessarily injected into the suit by the plaintiff. Even if the subject matter of the communication were viewed as pertaining only to the defense of the action, the Court would adopt the view that the privilege does not apply after the patient's death when any party relies on the condition as an element of a claim or defense.

[9] Required Reports

United States v. King, 73 F.R.D. 103 (E.D.N.Y. 1976) : In a prosecution for income tax evasion, the government subpoenaed New York City income tax returns filed by the defendant. After observing that proposed Rule 502 might have required granting the City's motion to quash the subpoena, the Court rejected the privilege claim under Rule 501. Placing greatest emphasis on the need of the trier of fact to have as much pertinent evidence as possible, the Court concluded that the local privilege did not furnish much of an incentive for honest reporting, especially because the City retained the right to share its information with other taxing authorities on a reciprocal basis.

In re Grand Jury Impaneled Jan. 21, 1975, 541 F.2d 373 (3d Cir. 1976) : When a federal grand jury sought production of lawyers' contingent fee agreements that a State Court rule required to be filed and "impounded subject to inspection only by Order of the Court, by the client or by the Disciplinary Board of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania," the Court refused to quash the subpoena. The Court recognized that proposed Rule 502 would have adopted a privilege for required records or reports, but stated that it would not assume that Congress' refusal to adopt the rule amounted to either approval or disapproval. Rather, the Court analyzed the scant precedent available and decided that the federal interest in providing full information to the grand jury outweighed the state interest in encouraging people to file reports because the state had other means available to compel compliance.

In re Medtronic, Inc., 184 F.3d 807 (8th Cir. 1999) : The Trial Judge in a product liability case entered discovery orders requiring a pacemaker manufacturer to contact 4000 patients about whom adverse event reports had been filed. The Judge refused to apply an FDA regulation making such required reports confidential, on the ground that the regulation created a privilege inconsistent with Rule 501 because only Congress and the Supreme Court had authority to modify common-law privileges. Granting a petition for mandamus, the Court held the orders invalid. First, the governing provision in this diversity case was the second sentence of Rule 501, which calls for reference to state law. Second, the regulation had no adverse impact on the applicable Arkansas Rule of Evidence, which gives patients control over disclosure of medical records and confidential communications made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment. Finally, any conflict between state and federal law must be resolved in favor of the federal provisions, and for these purposes regulations made within congressional authorization have the same preemptive effect as federal statutes.

In re Domestic Air Transp. Antitrust Litig., 141 F.R.D. 556 (N.D. Ga. 1992) : Granting motions to compel the defendants to produce government civil investigative demands and interrogatories and the answers thereto in their possession, the Court held that there was no required reports privilege where the statutory restrictions on disclosure apply only to the officers to whom the report is made and the statute does not expressly confer a privilege on the reporting party.

[10] Special Privileges

[a] Academic Research

Cusumano v. Microsoft Corp., 162 F.3d 708, 1998-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72373 (1st Cir. 1998) : In preparing to defend its antitrust case with the government, Microsoft sought to discover materials from two academic researchers who were bringing out a book on the "browser war," which was based in significant part on interviews with current and former Netscape Communications Corporation employees. The Court held there had been no abuse of discretion in the determination below that Microsoft's need for that particular information did not overcome the importance of preserving confidentiality for investigative materials gleaned in the course of pre-publication academic research.

In re American Tobacco Co., 880 F.2d 1520 (2d Cir. 1989) : The Court affirmed civil contempt citations against two nonparties, a medical school and the American Cancer Society, that refused to respond to subpoenas by tobacco companies for various research data that were compiled by their medical staffs. The companies expected that plaintiffs in product liability suits against them would present expert testimony relying on seminal studies by these medical staffs and sought the underlying data to prepare for examination of the experts. The Court found that the applicable New York law recognized at most only a qualified privilege for scholarly research and that the protective order entered by the Trial Judge properly protected the confidentiality of sensitive information. In In re Grand Jury Subpoena Dated Jan. 4, 1984, n140 the District Court recognized a scholar's privilege and quashed a grand jury subpoena for notes that a Ph.D. candidate had made while working as a waiter. Following a suspicious fire at the restaurant, the police had learned that he had made daily notes concerning activities at the restaurant in connection with his dissertation on American restaurants. Remanding without actually deciding whether to recognize a scholar's privilege, the Court stated that application of any such privilege > requires a threshold showing consisting of a detailed description of the nature and seriousness of the scholarly study in question, of the methodology employed, of the need for assurances of confidentiality to various sources to conduct the study, and of the fact that the disclosure requested by the subpoena will seriously impinge upon that confidentiality.

Buchanan v. American Motors Corp., 697 F.2d 151 (6th Cir. 1983) : In a product liability suit pending in North Carolina, the defendant manufacturer attempted to subpoena an expert residing in Michigan for a deposition that would require him to spend substantial time testifying and to disclose raw data that he collected over the course of long study. The Court recognized that the witness had no privilege to refuse to testify but decided it was no abuse of discretion to quash the subpoena as unduly burdensome.

Deitchman v. E.R. Squibb & Sons, 740 F.2d 556 (7th Cir. 1984) : In a product liability action against drug manufacturers, the Court recognized a qualified privilege for protection of scientific research. It found, however, that where the plaintiffs' experts intended to rely on articles written by the founder of a project at the University of Chicago to study the disease suffered by the plaintiffs, the defendants had great need to discover information in the project's possession that might enable it to cross-examine the plaintiffs' experts. Since the subpoena seeking all the project's documents was too broad, and the project's resistance to any discovery at all was unacceptable in the face of the company's need for information, the Court remanded with a suggestion to find a common ground that would permit some discovery.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 5 F.3d 397 (9th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed a judgment of contempt against a Ph.D. student who refused to respond to grand jury questions about vandalism by animal rights activists at a university's animal research facility, holding that there was neither a First Amendment nor a federal common-law privilege for confidential information received in the course of scholarly research.

[b] Special Privileges -- Bank Depositor

United States v. Grand Jury Investigation, 417 F. Supp. 389 (E.D. Pa. 1976) : Denying a motion to quash a grand jury's subpoena duces tecum, the District Court rejected an argument that a depositor had a privilege to prevent banking information from being obtained from the depositor's bank.

United States v. Prevatt, 526 F.2d 400 (5th Cir. 1976) : The Court rejected the defendant's claim of a bank-depositor privilege in an income tax prosecution.

[c] Special Privileges -- Child Abuse and Juvenile Reports

Pearson v. Miller, 211 F.3d 57 (3d Cir. 2000) : The Court declined to recognize a privilege based on confidentiality provisions in three state statutes that protected reports of child abuse, juvenile records, and mental health records. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 501.02[4].

[d] Special Privileges -- Employer-Stenographer

United States v. Schoenheinz, 548 F.2d 1389 (9th Cir. 1977) : The Court held that the Oregon employer-stenographer privilege could not be asserted in a proceeding to enforce an IRS summons, because such a privilege was not recognized by federal common law.

[e] Special Privileges -- Family Members

In re Grand Jury Subpoena (Matthews), 714 F.2d 223, 1983-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P65544 (2d Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed a contempt ruling against a witness who refused to testify before a grand jury investigating his in-laws. Although the Court indicated that it was aware of opinions recognizing a parent-child privilege, it rejected the claim of a family privilege to protect against testimony that might be adverse to in-laws.

In re Grand Jury, 103 F.3d 1140 (3d Cir. 1997) : In consolidated cases, two witnesses moved to quash subpoenas served by the grand jury. Both witnesses invoked a parent-child privilege; one witness was a parent subpoenaed to provide confidential information against his son, and the other witness was a daughter subpoenaed to provide evidence against her father. Upholding denial of the motions to quash, the Court refused to recognize a parent-child privilege. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 501.02[9].

United States v. Dunford, 148 F.3d 385 (4th Cir. 1998) : The defendant, convicted of illegal possession of firearms and ammunition, claimed error in the admission of statements by his minor children concerning his acts of child abuse and brandishing of weapons. Affirming, the Court found it unnecessary to decide whether a parent-child privilege existed under federal common law, because "even if such a privilege were to be recognized, it would have to be narrowly defined and would have obvious limits, perhaps such as where the family fractures itself or the child waives the privilege or where ongoing criminal activity would be shielded by assertion of the privilege." The defendant could not claim any parent-child privilege, because the children's statements indicated that he had illegally possessed guns "in circumstances where he was abusing his children and placing them at risk with those guns." In United States v. Jones, n141 a witness who was given immunity and called to testify before a grand jury claimed a privilege not to give evidence against his father. The Court noted that there was only "sparse authority" to support the claim, but did not hold that no "family" privilege existed under federal law. Instead, it limited its holding rejecting the privilege claim to a case involving an adult child where the grand jury was not asking about communications between father and son and was not inquiring into the son's "familial association" with his parent. It emphasized that "we do not endeavor to decide to what extent the age of the child and whether or not emancipation has occurred may or may not affect the decision as to whether any familial privilege exists."

United States v. Ismail, 756 F.2d 1253 (6th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed heroin convictions, ruling that an emancipated adult, if subpoenaed, must testify against a parent. It declined to "address situations involving, for instance, unemancipated minors who generally require much greater parental guidance and support than do emancipated adults."

United States v. Davies, 768 F.2d 893 (7th Cir. 1985) : The Court held that there is no parent-child privilege. The defendant, charged with involvement with stolen merchandise, had complained that the F.B.I. obtained from his daughter a telephone number that he had confided in private. Aside from rejecting the privilege claim, the Court observed that the government had not sought to have the daughter testify.

In re Agosto, 553 F. Supp. 1298 (D. Nev. 1983) : The Court recognized a parent-child privilege and held that it entitled a child to refuse to testify before a grand jury about confidential communications between him and his father and also to decline to testify adversely against his father in any criminal proceeding. The opinion contains a lengthy discussion of arguments in favor of expanding the scope of family privileges beyond spouses.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena (Santarelli), 740 F.2d 816 (11th Cir. 1984) : Affirming a contempt finding against a grand jury witness, the Court rejected a claim that a witness ought not to have to testify against his father. The Court cited In re Grand Jury Proceedings (Starr), 647 F.2d 511 (5th Cir. 1981) , which rejected a parent-child privilege, and stated that it was bound by that decision.

[f] Special Privileges -- Federal Statute

Baldrige v. Shapiro, 455 U.S. 345 (1982) : The Court held that because the Census Act guarantees that raw data reported by individuals as part of the census is to be held confidential and not to be disclosed, lists of addresses are not available to the public under the Freedom of Information Act or to litigants seeking pretrial discovery under Fed. R. Civ. P. 26. Citing Rule 501, the Court said "that Congress intended the confidentiality provision to constitute a 'privilege' " and that "[t]he wisdom of its classifications is not for us to decide."

Chiron Corp. v. NTSB, 198 F.3d 935 (D.C. Cir. 1999) : The petitioners sued to compel the NTSB to share information obtained during an investigation of a fire that destroyed an aircraft containing cargo owned and manufactured by them, arguing that they may face civil liability claims for the fire. In an opinion dismissing the petition for lack of standing, the Court observed that the governing statute makes the NTSB's report inadmissible in a civil action, but that factual accident reports by NTSB investigators are, by regulation, not reports of the Board and are thus admissible.

[g] Special Privileges -- Hospital Records

Hahnemann Univ. Hosp. v. Edgar, 74 F.3d 456 (3d Cir. 1996) : In a diversity action on behalf of a patient sexually assaulted by two other patients at a mental hospital, the Court held that Pennsylvania's Mental Health Procedures Act barred production of "incident reports" created as a result of the incident.

[h] Special Privileges -- Informant in Litigation

Powers v. Chicago Transit Auth., 890 F.2d 1355 (7th Cir. 1989) : The plaintiff in a civil rights action obtained a memorandum allegedly containing confidential information from the defendant's files and forwarded a copy to the media, but refused in a protective order proceeding to disclose who had provided the memorandum to him, citing a "confidential-informant-in-litigation" privilege. The Court affirmed rejection of the privilege and dismissal of the plaintiff's case for failure to comply with discovery orders, holding that the proposed privilege was overbroad and unsupported by any authority.

[i] Special Privileges -- Internal Investigations, Peer Review, and Self-Analysis

University of Pa. v. EEOC, 493 U.S. 951 (1990) : In the course of investigating a charge that the University had violated Title VII in denying tenure to a Chinese-American woman, the EEOC subpoenaed tenure files of the woman and five men alleged to have received more favorable treatment. The University's application to have the subpoena modified to exclude "confidential peer review information" was denied by the EEOC and the subpoena was ordered enforced. In a unanimous affirmance, the Supreme Court first refused to recognize a common-law privilege under Rule 501, noting that the balancing of conflicting interests of this type is particularly a legislative function and that Congress, while providing for some confidentiality in EEOC proceedings, had not created a privilege for peer review documents. Further, the Court noted that a peer review privilege for academic tenure decisions would be a substantial obstacle to investigating and remedying discrimination and that acceptance would lead to a wave of similar privilege claims by other employers. The Court distinguished the executive privilege recognized in United States v. Nixon, grounded in the separation of powers doctrine, and rejected the University's First Amendment claim, as the subpoena was neither an attempt to control the content of speech nor a direct infringement of academic freedom. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 501.02[7].

First Eastern Corp. v. Mainwaring, 21 F.3d 465 (D.C. Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed an order quashing a subpoena for records related to a bank that was served on an independent management consultant that federal regulators required the bank to retain. Because the bank had not raised the qualified self-evaluative privilege below, the Court refused to entertain the claim, but it indicated it would be unlikely to recognize such a privilege that had been found only in limited cases involving areas of public health or public safety. In FTC v. TRW, Inc., n142 the defendant credit reporting agency, fearing an FTC complaint about its practices, undertook a program in which in-house auditors checked branch offices for compliance with federal and state law. Auditors prepared reports and identified problems and branch managers submitted written responses to the reports. The Court said that "[w]hatever may be the status of the 'self evaluative' privilege in the context of private litigation, courts with apparent uniformity have refused its application where, as here, the documents in question have been sought by a governmental agency."

Whitman v. United States, 108 F.R.D. 5 (D.N.H. 1985) : In a malpractice action brought under the Federal Tort Claims Act, the Court indicated approval of a line of cases creating a privilege protecting hospital peer review records from disclosure during discovery. It found, however, that the privilege was waived in the instant case by the deposition testimony of one of the doctors who revealed the names of the individuals present at the peer review hearing and the experts' opinion on the procedure used during an operation.

In re Crazy Eddie Sec. Litig., 792 F. Supp. 197 (E.D.N.Y. 1992) : In a securities class action case, the District Judge recognized a privilege of critical self-analysis, but held that it was not absolute. The Magistrate Judge found that the information in the documents sought by the plaintiffs was available elsewhere, and the District Judge concluded that the plaintiffs failed to demonstrate a need for the documents sufficient to override the privilege. In an employment discrimination action, Hardy v. New York News, Inc., n143 a Magistrate ruled that the plaintiff's interest in proving discriminatory intent outweighed any interest in critical self-analysis that the defendant urged in support of a privilege to protect its efforts at self-improvement.

Virmani v. Novant Health Inc., 259 F.3d 284 (4th Cir. 2001) : In a suit by a physician who claimed that his hospital privileges were terminated because of his race and national origin, the defendant hospital claimed privilege as to peer review records. The Court rejected the privilege claim, framing the question as follows: "The issue before us is whether the interest in promoting candor in medical peer review proceedings outweighs the need for probative evidence in a discrimination case." The Court reasoned that the plaintiff's discrimination claim "arises from the peer review process itself," and relied on University of Pa. v. EEOC, 493 U.S. 182 (1990) , in which peer review privilege was rejected in a tenure denial case. The opinion did not address whether such a privilege might be recognized in another kind of case.

In re Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Co., 214 F.3d 586 (5th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed an order enforcing administrative subpoenas following an explosion at a bauxite processing plant. Without deciding whether a self-evaluation privilege should ever be recognized, it declined to do so for documents produced by a Kaiser committee formed in the 1970s to study the equipment at the plant and determine how procedures could be improved and liability minimized, since they were pre-accident documents sought by a government agency.

Lloyd v. Cessna Aircraft Co., 74 F.R.D. 518 (E.D. Tenn. 1977) : The Court held that an executive engineer for the defendant should answer deposition questions concerning internal meetings and discussions designed to review, analyze, and evaluate operations with an eye to continued self-improvement. The Court noted other decisions granting a qualified privilege for internal meetings to facilitate self-improvement, but distinguished those cases as involving requests for production of the actual minutes or other documents concerning the matters discussed in confidential meetings.

Memorial Hosp. v. Shadur, 664 F.2d 1058, 1981-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P64353, 1981-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P64353 (7th Cir. 1981) : Where one doctor sued others for restraint of trade, the Court held that it would not follow a state statute making records of hospital disciplinary proceedings privileged. Although the Court did say that a privilege might be recognized as a matter of comity, it concluded that the need for disclosure was particularly substantial in the instant case.

Agster v. Maricopa County, 406 F.3d 1091 (9th Cir. 2005) : In an action arising from the death of an inmate who died while in the custody of the county's sheriff's department, the Court affirmed an order requiring the defendant to produce the mortality review conducted by Correctional Health Services (whose employees had given medical care to the decedent). Although Arizona recognizes a privilege for peer review of the professional practices within a hospital or center, the Court observed that the suit raised a federal claim so that federal law governed. The Court relied upon two considerations in denying the privilege. First, it found that Congress granted immunity to participants in a medical peer review in the Health Care Quality Improvement Act of 1986, but did not privilege the report resulting from the peer review process. Second, it found that "[w]hereas in the ordinary hospital it may be that the first object of all involved in patient care is the welfare of the patient, in the prison context the safety and efficiency of the prison may operate as goals affecting the care offered." The Court concluded that "[i]n these circumstances, it is peculiarly important that the public have access to the assessment by peers of the care provided." In Dowling v. American Hawaii Cruises, Inc., 971 F.2d 423 (9th Cir. 1992) , the Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a Jones Act case, holding it was error to deny the plaintiff discovery of the ship's safety committee minutes under a privilege of "self-critical analysis." The Court held that the privilege, if it exists at all, only protects routine internal corporate reviews of matters related to safety concerns, and not voluntary routine preaccident safety reviews. In EEOC v. General Tel. Co. of Nw., Inc., n144 the Court reversed a finding that the defendant had not engaged in sex discrimination, holding that evidence of the defendant's equal opportunity efforts was improperly admitted after the EEOC had been precluded from discovering relevant self-critical material.

Hoffman v. United Telecommun., Inc., 117 F.R.D. 440 (D. Kan. 1987) : In an employment discrimination suit, the Magistrate ruled that a self-evaluation privilege applied to the subjective evaluations of a witness who had performed an analysis in preparation for an affirmative action plan required by the government. The privilege did not protect objective data generated by the analysis.

Scott v. McDonald, 70 F.R.D. 568 (N.D. Ga. 1976) : In an action alleging medical malpractice by a hospital, the Court granted the defendant's motion for a protective order, holding that a Georgia statute applied, rendering inadmissible records and proceedings of any hospital medical review committee, peer review committee, or medical organizational committee, and prohibiting the introduction of testimony concerning evidence presented to such committees.

[j] Special Privileges -- Judicial Officers

In re Certain Complaints Under Investigation, 783 F.2d 1488 (11th Cir. 1986) : Although the Court recognized a qualified privilege protecting confidential communications among Judges and their staffs, it found that a Judge's secretary could be compelled to produce appointment diaries, guest sign-in sheets, and telephone logs failing a showing that they would reveal communications concerning judicial business. Moreover, the Court held that subpoenas directed at a Judge's staff members were enforceable in this case in light of an Investigating Committee's need for information.

[k] Special Privileges -- Legislative

United States v. Gillock, 445 U.S. 360 (1980) : The Court held that in a federal criminal prosecution against a state legislator there is no legislative privilege barring the introduction of the defendant's legislative acts.

Searingtown Corp. v. North Hills, 575 F. Supp. 1295 (E.D.N.Y. 1981) : In a civil rights action, the Court ruled that a village mayor and members of the village board of trustees had a privilege to refuse to disclose their motivations for and deliberations concerning various legislative acts.

In re Grand Jury, 821 F.2d 946 (3d Cir. 1987) : The Court held that a common-law speech or debate privilege is not cognizable in Federal Courts, so a grand jury subpoena duces tecum to a state legislative committee should not have been quashed. The Court left open the possibility that a more narrowly drawn privilege for confidential deliberative communications might be recognized.

[l] Special Privileges -- Mediation

, In re Grand Jury Subpoena Dated Dec. 17, 1996, 148 F.3d 487 (5th Cir. 1998) : Individuals who had participated in a state mediation session under a federally funded agricultural loan program sought to quash a subpoena issued by a grand jury investigating financial irregularities in the mediation program. The individuals argued that the information was protected by a federal "mediation privilege," but the Court rejected this claim, noting that under the pertinent federal statute, federal funding is dependent on the mediation proceedings being confidential. However, " 'confidential' does not necessarily mean 'privileged,' " and the Court concluded that the confidentiality provision could not have been intended "to shield wrongdoing arising out of the state agricultural loan mediation process."

[m] Special Privileges -- Ombudsman

Carman v. McDonnell Douglas Corp., 114 F.3d 790 (8th Cir. 1997) : The Court reversed a summary judgment for an employer in an age discrimination suit, holding it was error to rule that confidential communications made by an employee to a company ombudsman were privileged. Although the Court agreed that "fair and efficient alternative dispute resolution techniques benefit society and are worthy of encouragement," it reasoned that "far more is required to justify the creation of a new evidentiary privilege." The corporate ombudsman promises strict confidentiality to employees and is bound by a code of ethics to keep that promise, but the Court observed that "when an aggrieved employee or an employee-witness is deciding whether or not to confide in a company ombudsman, his greatest concern is not likely to be that the statement will someday be revealed in civil discovery," since it is more likely that "the employee will fear that the ombudsman is biased in favor of the company, and that the ombudsman will tell management everything that the employee says."

[n] Special Privileges -- Social Worker-Client

Jaffee v. Redmond, 116 S. Ct. 1923 (1996) : The Court held that the federal psychotherapist-patient privilege "should also extend to confidential communications made to licensed social workers in the course of psychotherapy." This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 501.02[6].

[11] State Law

[a] Diversity Actions

Independent Petrochemical Corp. v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 117 F.R.D. 292 (D.D.C. 1987) : The Magistrate recognized that there is no federally recognized accountant-client privilege, but determined that state law governed the privilege question in the instant case. The Magistrate noted that the presiding Judge had determined that in the District of Columbia a local Court would apply the privilege law of the jurisdiction with the more substantial interest in the matter.

In re Application to Quash Subpoena to National Broadcasting Co., 79 F.3d 346 (2d Cir. 1996) : The defendant in a product liability action brought in the District of Massachusetts obtained a subpoena in the Southern District of New York for out-takes from an NBC broadcast. Reversing denial of a motion to quash the subpoena, the Court held that New York State's Shield Law applied, and that the defendant had failed to carry its burden under the Shield Law of making a clear and convincing showing that the out-takes were critical and necessary to its defense and that the information sought was unavailable elsewhere.

Hahnemann Univ. Hosp. v. Edgar, 74 F.3d 456 (3d Cir. 1996) : In a diversity action on behalf of a patient sexually assaulted by two other patients at a mental hospital, the Court held that Pennsylvania's Mental Health Procedures Act barred production of "incident reports" created as a result of the incident. In Samuelson v. Susen, n145 the Court upheld the Pennsylvania District Court's applying Ohio privilege law after finding that a Pennsylvania State Court would apply Ohio law.

Kappas v. Chestnut Lodge, Inc., 709 F.2d 878 (4th Cir. 1983) : In a diversity medical malpractice action, the Court found that a state statute making proceedings and files of medical review committees inadmissible was broad enough to cover staff conferences at a hospital, so it upheld a ruling excluding transcripts of those conferences and affirmed a judgment for the defendants.

In re: Avantel, S.A., 343 F.3d 311 (5th Cir. 2003) : In a diversity action by a Texas corporation against a Mexican corporation, when the defendant filed a petition for mandamus against an order to disclose allegedly privileged documents, it both included the documents in an appendix, without requesting that the volume be filed under seal, and sent an unredacted copy of the volume to opposing counsel. The Court held that Texas privilege law, including the Texas law rejecting waiver for inadvertent disclosures, applied and denied the plaintiff's motion to dismiss the petition for mootness, since the issue of inadvertency was for the Judge to decide. The Court also held there was no abuse of discretion when the Judge refused to apply the Mexican professional secret doctrine, as the defendant had requested. As the party claiming privilege, the defendant had the burden of proving the substance of the Mexican privilege law to a reasonable certainty, which it failed to do.

Credit Life Ins. Co. v. Uniworld Ins. Co., 94 F.R.D. 113 (S.D. Ohio 1982) : Ruling on a motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction in a diversity action for fraud and breach of contract, the Court determined that the law of Ohio did not recognize a privilege for tax returns, so the defendants were ordered to produce their returns.

Favala v. Cumberland Eng'g Co., 17 F.3d 987 (7th Cir. 1994) : In a product liability action, the plaintiff was barred from offering testimony by the defendant's former Vice President of Product Integrity, on the ground that he had been privy to confidential information and trial strategy discussions. Vacating a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that under the governing Illinois law, which does not follow Upjohn, there was no sufficient showing that the witness was a member of the control group; even if he were, there was no sufficient showing that his testifying would lead to disclosure of privileged information. In a libel action, Desai v. Hersh, 954 F.2d 1408 (7th Cir. 1992) , the plaintiff declined to seek disclosure of the defendant reporter's sources, as was permitted by state law, and sought only to preclude reliance on or reference to any unidentified sources at trial. The Court noted that although the applicability of the reporter's privilege was determined by state law, the collateral effects of invoking the privilege were subject to the Rules and the privilege must be strictly construed to give effect to federal evidentiary requirements. In this case, allowing the reporter to assert the privilege and then vouch for the unnamed sources had the effect of treating the privilege as absolute, which the court said could violate Rule 403; the plaintiff failed to preserve this argument for appeal, however. In Armour Int'l Co. v. Worldwide Cosmetics, Inc., n146 the Court, ruling on an interlocutory appeal in a diversity case arising out of a contract dispute, refused to apply the Illinois accountant privilege to protect documents, where all audits were performed by the accountant's employees in a foreign country and none of the employees were registered as accountants in Illinois.

In re Medtronic, Inc., 184 F.3d 807 (8th Cir. 1999) : The Trial Judge in a product liability case entered discovery orders requiring a pacemaker manufacturer to contact 4000 patients about whom adverse event reports had been filed. The Judge refused to apply an FDA regulation making such required reports confidential, on the ground that the regulation created a privilege inconsistent with Rule 501 because only Congress and the Supreme Court had authority to modify common-law privileges. Granting a petition for mandamus, the Court held the orders invalid. First, the governing provision in this diversity case was the second sentence of Rule 501, which calls for reference to state law. Second, the regulation had no adverse impact on the applicable Arkansas Rule of Evidence, which gives patients control over disclosure of medical records and confidential communications made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment. Finally, any conflict between state and federal law must be resolved in favor of the federal provisions, and for these purposes regulations made within congressional authorization have the same preemptive effect as federal statutes. In Pritchard-Keang Nam Corp. v. Jaworski, n147 the Court indicated that state law on privilege governed, but it suggested that "determining whether a prima facie showing of fraud has been made may be a question of federal law." We believe that the suggestion should be rejected, since the conditions for any exceptions are as much a part of state privilege law as the privileges themselves.

Feldman v. Allstate Ins. Co., 322 F.3d 660 (9th Cir. 2003) : In an action for coverage under a homeowner's policy, the Court reversed summary judgment for the insurer because the Judge had considered a tape recording of a conversation between the plaintiff and his then-wife, which had been made in violation of California law. Because this was a diversity civil action, the Erie doctrine required the Judge to follow the state provision, which makes such recordings inadmissible in order to advance the substantive state policy of protecting privacy. The Court held that the wife's testimony regarding the conversations was properly admitted, since it was not barred by the law regarding illegal recordings and the plaintiff had waived any privilege for spousal confidential communications. The plaintiff had explicitly stated he was not asserting the privilege during the wife's deposition, and the Court found no support in state law for a "selective waiver" rule. In Home Indem. Co. v. Lane Powell Moss & Miller, 43 F.3d 1322 (9th Cir. 1995), the plaintiff insurer settled an action against it for bad-faith refusal to settle a personal injury/wrongful death claim and then sued the law firm it had retained to represent the insureds in the underlying action for malpractice and contribution on the ground that the firm had negligently failed to convey the insurer's offer to the plaintiffs in the underlying action. The Court held that a state rule prohibiting negative inferences from a claim of privilege is part of the state law Federal Courts are required to apply when state law supplies the rule of decision. Therefore, the defendant was properly prohibited from asking questions of the plaintiff's witnesses that were designed to get the witnesses to invoke the privilege in the presence of the jury.

Somer v. Johnson, 704 F.2d 1473 (11th Cir. 1983): In a medical malpractice diversity action, the Court recognized that state law on privileges governed and held that the plaintiff's request for internal hospital reviews and personnel files of the doctors was properly denied where state law made such documents privileged.

[b] State Law -- Federal Claims

Linde Thomson Langworthy Kohn & Van Dyke, P.C. v. Resolution Trust Corp., 5 F.3d 1508 (D.C. Cir. 1993): The Court affirmed enforcement of a subpoena from the RTC to a dissolved law firm, holding that federal, rather than Missouri, privilege law applied. The law firm argued that the administrative investigation was merely a stage of subsequent litigation in State Courts. The Court concluded that the RTC's investigation was neither directed nor statutorily limited to possible state law violations.

In re Hampers, 651 F.2d 19 (1st Cir. 1981): A federal grand jury investigating an arson-fraud scheme subpoenaed tax records held by the Massachusetts Commissioner of Revenue. After finding that the State Courts would hold the records to be privileged under a scheme paralleling the provisions applicable to federal tax records, 26 U.S.C. § 6103, the Court concluded that there was a qualified privilege under Rule 501 that required the same showing for disclosure as would be required for disclosure of federal tax records.

United States v. Goldberger & Dubin, P.C., 935 F.2d 501 (2d Cir. 1991): The Court, upholding IRS summonses requiring attorneys to report names of clients who paid them cash fees over $10,000, held that federal, rather than New York, law applied, but that under either law the reports did not require disclosure of confidential information. In United States v. One Parcel of Prop. Located at 31-33 York St., 930 F.2d 139 (2d Cir. 1991), a proceeding to forfeit property used in drug transactions, the Court held that evidence derived from erased state records regarding the owner's sons' drug arrests could be used to rebut her "innocent owner" defense. The federal interest in eradicating the drug trade prevails over any state interest in the confidentiality of arrest records.

In re Grand Jury, 535 F. Supp. 537 (D.N.J. 1982): The Court granted a motion to quash a grand jury subpoena, adopting as a matter of federal common law "a qualified privilege for the disclosure of state tax returns patterned precisely on 26 U.S.C. § 6103(i)(1) respecting proceedings to enforce federal laws not relating to tax administration."

Willy v. Administrative Review Board, 423 F.3d 483 (5th Cir. 2005): A former in-house attorney claimed that he had been discharged from employment because of his report following an internal environmental audit, not really because of lying about contacts with a state agency, as the employer claimed. In a Department of Labor proceeding for violation of federal whistleblower statutes, the attorney sought the report in discovery, but the employer's claim of attorney-client privilege was ultimately upheld by the Administrative Review Board. Vacating that ruling, the Court first held that, regardless of the state privilege law, federal privilege law applied to this case based on federal law claims. It then held that the client's privilege in this case was subject to the exception for communications relevant to an issue of breach of duty between client and attorney, and that this exception could be asserted both defensively (when the lawyer is charged with breaching a duty) and offensively, as here (when the lawyer is claiming the client breached a duty to him). In Coughlin v. Lee, 946 F.2d 1152 (5th Cir. 1991) , the Court remanded a judgment for the defendants in an action by sheriff's deputies who alleged they were discharged in retaliation for exercising rights of free speech and political association, and held that the plaintiffs had been improperly denied discovery of sheriff's department personnel files. The Court noted that when considering a federal claim, federal common law rather than state law determines the existence and scope of a privilege, but Federal Courts will consider state policy supporting a privilege in weighing the government's interest in confidentiality. In a civil rights case, American Civil Liberties Union, Inc. v. Finch, n148 the Court held that a state statute sealing the records of a State Commission for 50 years did not require Federal Courts to recognize any evidentiary privilege that the statute might have created for State Courts.

Northwestern Mem'l Hosp. v. Ashcroft, 362 F.3d 923 (7th Cir. 2004) : The District Court quashed a subpoena by the Department of Justice for redacted medical records of abortion patients of a physician challenging the constitutionality of the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act, on the ground that the privacy provisions and regulations of the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act were superseded by more stringent provisions of state law, which held that even redacted medical records are not to be disclosed in judicial proceedings. The Court held that under Rule 501 the state medical records privilege did not apply in federal question suits and that no new federal common-law privilege for abortion records was appropriate. However, the order below was affirmed on the basis of Fed. R. Civ. P. 45(c)(3)(A)(iv), since the government's minimal showing of the probative value of the records meant that the benefit of producing material sought by the subpoena was exceeded by the burden of compliance with it. In a mail fraud prosecution, United States v. Wilson, 960 F.2d 48 (7th Cir. 1992) , the Court held that an Illinois privilege for unemployment compensation records did not apply. The state's interest in encouraging full and accurate reporting from claimants and employers by assuring confidentiality is relatively weak and is outweighed by the strong federal interest in enforcing federal criminal statutes, especially when, as here, the defendants were charged with scheming to defraud the unemployment compensation system. In a civil rights suit alleging a conspiracy in which the Chicago police department participated, Socialist Workers Party v. Grubisic, n149 the plaintiffs sought transcripts of a state grand jury investigation into illegal police activities. The Court observed that the need to protect state and federal grand jury materials was the same. Although federal law determines the scope of the privilege, the Court concluded that the party desiring discovery should first seek it in the State Court that supervised the grand jury.

United States v. Simmons, 964 F.2d 763 (8th Cir. 1992) : Affirming convictions for cocaine offenses, the Court held that it was error (but harmless) to exclude, because of a state law privilege, a probation report of a confidential informant. In federal criminal cases only federal privilege law applies, and the Court has rejected any privilege for confidential communications to probation officers. In United States v. Prouse, 945 F.2d 1017 (8th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed convictions for operating a commercial airliner while intoxicated, holding that blood tests initiated by the defendant's employer were admissible in spite of a state law providing that positive tests resulting from an employer alcohol testing program may not be used as evidence in a criminal action against the employee.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 832 F.2d 554 (11th Cir. 1987) : The Court held there was no error in denying motions by witnesses before a state grand jury to quash a federal grand jury's subpoenas for their testimony. It found that the state secrecy statute that governed grand juries did not create a privilege and was not designed to provide protection for witnesses. By so construing the statute, the Court avoided having to decide whether as a matter of comity it would have recognized such a broad state privilege in a federal action. In United States v. Silverman, n150 the Court affirmed an obstruction of justice conviction of an attorney who extorted money from his client, and upheld the issuance of a subpoena for complaints made against the defendant to the state bar. It recognized that such complaints might be confidential under state law, but concluded that the government was entitled to subpoena them in a federal criminal case in which it appeared that the defendant might testify and present character evidence.

[c] State Law -- State and Federal Claims Combined

In re Sealed Case (Medical Records), 381 F.3d 1205 (D.C. Cir. 2004) : In an action by mentally disabled group home residents against a government agency and other defendants arising from alleged sexual assaults against residents by a mentally disabled co-resident, the agency was ordered to produce all of the co-resident's records in discovery. Vacating the order, the Court observed that where a document is relevant to both federal and state claims but the federal and state privilege rules are > inconsistent, application of an inconsistent state rule in either direction could undermine the federal evidentiary interest. ... And where the primary source of the court's jurisdiction is the federal claim, to which the state claim is merely pendent (supplemental), it seems appropriate that the federal evidentiary interest -- whether in privilege or production -- should be primary as well.

First Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Oppenheim, Appel, Dixon & Co., 110 F.R.D. 557 (S.D.N.Y. 1986) : In a securities action against a securities dealer, its partners, and house counsel, the Court concluded that federal privilege law should apply with respect to pendent state claims.

Wm. T. Thompson Co. v. General Nutrition Corp., 671 F.2d 100, 1982-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P64564 (3d Cir. 1982) : The Court affirmed a ruling denying a protective order to enforce a state accountant-client privilege, observing that where state and federal questions would be tried together "[o]bviously applying two separate disclosure rules with respect to different claims tried to the same jury would be unworkable." It held that "when there are federal law claims in a case also presenting state law claims, the federal rule favoring admissibility, rather than any state law privilege, is the controlling rule." It observed, however, that it was not precluding "resort to state law analogies for the development of a federal common law of privileges in instances where the federal rule is unsettled."

Hancock v. Dodson, 958 F.2d 1367 (6th Cir. 1992) : In a civil rights action on behalf of an arrestee rendered incompetent allegedly as a result of the arrest, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of physician-patient communications, as federal law governs federal question cases with pendent state law claims and the Federal Courts do not recognize a federal physician-patient privilege.

FDIC v. Mercantile Nat'l Bank, 84 F.R.D. 345 (N.D. Ill. 1979) : In a federal securities action with a pendent state claim, the Court refused to apply a state accountant-client privilege to bar discovery.

[12] Tax Practitioner

United States v. BDO Seidman, 337 F.3d 802 (7th Cir. 2003) : Clients of an accounting and consulting firm sought to intervene in a proceeding in which the IRS sought firm records relating to allegedly abusive tax shelters in which they participated. The IRS argued that client identities are no more protected under the tax practitioner privilege of 26 U.S.C. § 7525 than under the attorney-client privilege, but the clients argued that disclosure of their identities in connection with the tax shelters would inevitably disclose their motive for seeking tax advice from the firm and thus impermissibly disclose confidential communications. Affirming the order denying intervention, the Court held that "[d]isclosure of the identities of the Does will disclose to the IRS that the Does participated in one of the 20 types of tax shelters described in its summonses. It is less than clear, however, as to what motive, or other confidential communication of tax advice, can be inferred from that information alone." More importantly, participation in potentially abusive tax shelters is information subject to full disclosure under the tax laws, so the clients could not reasonably expect their communications with the firm to be confidential. In United States v. Frederick, 182 F.3d 496 (7th Cir. 1999) , Frederick, a lawyer and an accountant, provided legal representation to and prepared the tax returns of taxpayers being investigated by the IRS. The Court upheld enforcement of an order directing Frederick to turn over documents created in connection with preparation of the taxpayers' returns, since he was doing accountant's rather than lawyer's work in connection with these documents. The Court also held that the privilege under 26 U.S.C. § 7525 for federally-authorized tax practitioners protects those nonlawyers only when they are doing lawyer's rather than accountant's or other preparer's work.

[13] Trade Secrets

Duplan Corp. v. Deering Milliken, Inc., 397 F. Supp. 1146 (D.S.C. 1974) : The Court observed that > [n]o absolute privilege protects trade secrets from disclosure through the discovery process. If the information sought is relevant and necessary, at the discovery stage of the litigation, to the preparation of the case of the applicant therefor, disclosure will be required. However, the courts are loath to order disclosure of trade secrets absent a clear showing of an immediate need for the information requested.

>
> This court finds that confidential business matters and technical information are trade secrets. That fact alone will not protect them from discovery. Once the privilege is asserted by the owner, the party seeking discovery must make a clear showing that the documents are relevant to the issues involved in this litigation. In doubtful situations, production will not be ordered ... . This court must determine: first, which communications are trade secrets; and second, whether the parties seeking discovery have made a clear showing that the trade secret privilege should not be honored because of the relevancy of the communications to the issues involved in this litigation.

Herrick v. Garvey, 298 F.3d 1184 (10th Cir. 2002) : The plaintiff brought a FOIA action to obtain aircraft plans and specifications filed with the FAA. The current corporate owner of the plans claimed an exemption from disclosure as a trade secret, but the plaintiff argued that the exemption had been waived by a predecessor owner. The Court agreed that where a submitter or owner of documents grants the government permission to loan or release them to the public, they no longer have trade secret protection, but it affirmed summary judgment for the agency because the plaintiff did not appeal the Judge's decision that it was possible for an owner to revoke the permission to disclose that had previously been given.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. Davis v. Costa-Gavras, 580 F. Supp. 1082 (S.D.N.Y. 1984) .

(n2)Footnote 2. SCM Corp. v. Xerox Corp., 70 F.R.D. 508 (D. Conn. 1976) , appeal dismissed, 534 F.2d 1031 (2d Cir. 1976) .

(n3)Footnote 3. In re Colocotronis Tanker Sec. Litig., 449 F. Supp. 828 (S.D.N.Y. 1978) .

(n4)Footnote 4. Eisenberg v. Gagnon, 766 F.2d 770 (3d Cir. 1985) .

(n5)Footnote 5. North River Ins. Co. v. Philadelphia Reins. Corp., 797 F. Supp. 363 (D.N.J. 1992) .

(n6)Footnote 6. Hodges, Grant & Kaufmann v. United States Gov't, 768 F.2d 719 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n7)Footnote 7. Bauman v. Jacobs Suchard, Inc., 136 F.R.D. 460 (N.D. Ill. 1990) .

(n8)Footnote 8. Leybold-Heraeus Tech., Inc. v. Midwest Instrument Co., 118 F.R.D. 609 (E.D. Wis. 1987) .

(n9)Footnote 9. United States v. Bay State Ambulance & Hosp. Rental Serv., 874 F.2d 20 (1st Cir. 1989) .

(n10)Footnote 10. United States v. Schwimmer, 892 F.2d 237 (2d Cir. 1989) .

(n11)Footnote 11. United States v. Schwimmer, 738 F. Supp. 654 (E.D.N.Y. 1990) , aff'd, 924 F.2d 443 (2d Cir. 1991) .

(n12)Footnote 12. In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum, 406 F. Supp. 381 (S.D.N.Y. 1975) .

(n13)Footnote 13. Continental Oil Co. v. United States, 330 F.2d 347 (9th Cir. 1964) .

(n14)Footnote 14. Hunydee v. United States, 355 F.2d 183 (9th Cir. 1965) .

(n15)Footnote 15. United States v. McPartlin, 595 F.2d 1321 (7th Cir. 1979) .

(n16)Footnote 16. United States v. Keplinger, 776 F.2d 678 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n17)Footnote 17. United States v. Oloyede, 982 F.2d 133 (4th Cir. 1992) .

(n18)Footnote 18. United States v. Jones, 696 F.2d 1069 (4th Cir. 1982) .

(n19)Footnote 19. In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 727 F.2d 1352 (4th Cir. 1984) .

(n20)Footnote 20. United States v. (Under Seal), 748 F.2d 871 (4th Cir. 1984) .

(n21)Footnote 21. United States v. Windfelder, 790 F.2d 576 (7th Cir. 1986) .

(n22)Footnote 22. United States v. Spector, 793 F.2d 932 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n23)Footnote 23. United States v. Flores, 628 F.2d 521 (9th Cir. 1980) .

(n24)Footnote 24. United States v. Palmer, 536 F.2d 1278 (9th Cir. 1976) .

(n25)Footnote 25. Cuno, Inc. v. Pall Corp., 121 F.R.D. 198 (E.D.N.Y. 1988) .

(n26)Footnote 26. Leucadia, Inc. v. Reliance Ins. Co., 101 F.R.D. 674 (S.D.N.Y. 1983) .

(n27)Footnote 27. Carter-Wallace, Inc. v. Hartz Mountain Indus., 553 F. Supp. 45 (S.D.N.Y. 1982) .

(n28)Footnote 28. United States v. Amerada-Hess Corp., 619 F.2d 980 (3d Cir. 1980) .

(n29)Footnote 29. In re Sealed Case, 120 F.R.D. 66 (N.D. Ill. 1988) .

(n30)Footnote 30. Diversified Indus. v. Meredith, 572 F.2d 596 (8th Cir. 1977) (en banc).

(n31)Footnote 31. Admiral Ins. Co. v. United States Dist. Court, 881 F.2d 1486 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n32)Footnote 32. Sound Video Unlimited, Inc. v. Video Shack, Inc., 661 F. Supp. 1482 (N.D. Ill. 1987) .

(n33)Footnote 33. Leybold-Heraeus Tech., Inc. v. Midwest Instrument Co., 118 F.R.D. 609 (E.D. Wis. 1987) .

(n34)Footnote 34. Pritchard-Keang Nam Corp. v. Jaworski, 751 F.2d 277 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n35)Footnote 35. In re Richard Roe, Inc., 68 F.3d 38 (2d Cir. 1995) .

(n36)Footnote 36. In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum Dated Sept. 15, 1983 (Marc Rich & Co.), 731 F.2d 1032 (2d Cir. 1984) .

(n37)Footnote 37. In re Impounded Case (Law Firm), 879 F.2d 1211 (3d Cir. 1989) .

(n38)Footnote 38. United States v. Neal, 27 F.3d 1035 (5th Cir. 1994) .

(n39)Footnote 39. United States v. Aucoin, 964 F.2d 1492 (5th Cir. 1992) .

(n40)Footnote 40. United States v. Soudan, 812 F.2d 920 (5th Cir. 1986) .

(n41)Footnote 41. United States v. Dyer, 722 F.2d 174 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n42)Footnote 42. In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 87 F.3d 377, 381-82 (9th Cir. 1996) .

(n43)Footnote 43. United States v. Zolin, 905 F.2d 1344 (9th Cir. 1990) .

(n44)Footnote 44. United States v. Sutton, 732 F.2d 1483 (10th Cir. 1984) .

(n45)Footnote 45. In re Grand Jury Investigation, 842 F.2d 1223 (11th Cir. 1987) .

(n46)Footnote 46. United States v. de la Jara, 973 F.2d 746 (9th Cir. 1992) .

(n47)Footnote 47. In re Grand Jury Investigation, 974 F.2d 1068 (9th Cir. 1992) .

(n48)Footnote 48. In re Friend, 411 F. Supp. 776 (S.D.N.Y. 1975) .

(n49)Footnote 49. United States v. Ballard, 779 F.2d 287 (5th Cir. 1986) .

(n50)Footnote 50. Federal Sav. & Loan Ins. Corp. v. Ferm, 909 F.2d 372 (9th Cir. 1990) .

(n51)Footnote 51. In re Grand Jury Proceedings (United States v. Jones), 517 F.2d 666 (5th Cir. 1975) .

(n52)Footnote 52. In re Grand Jury Proceeding, Cherney, 898 F.2d 565 (7th Cir. 1990) .

(n53)Footnote 53. In re Shargel, 742 F.2d 61 (2d Cir. 1984) .

(n54)Footnote 54. In re Horn, 976 F.2d 1314 (9th Cir. 1992) .

(n55)Footnote 55. Dole v. Milonas, 889 F.2d 885 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n56)Footnote 56. Riggs National Bank v. Zimmer, 355 A.2d 709 (Del. Ch. 1976) .

(n57)Footnote 57. In re Subpoenas Duces Tecum Dated March 16, 1992, 978 F.2d 1159 (9th Cir. 1992) .

(n58)Footnote 58. Schlefer v. United States, 702 F.2d 233 (D.C. Cir. 1983) .

(n59)Footnote 59. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854 (D.C. Cir. 1980) .

(n60)Footnote 60. Town of Norfolk v. United States Army Corps of Eng's, 968 F.2d 1438 (1st Cir. 1992) .

(n61)Footnote 61. Mobil Oil Co. v. Department of Energy, 102 F.R.D. 1 (N.D.N.Y. 1983) .

(n62)Footnote 62. In re Boileau, 736 F.2d 503 (9th Cir. 1984) .

(n63)Footnote 63. United States v. Horvath, 731 F.2d 557 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n64)Footnote 64. United States v. Bauer, 132 F.3d 504 (9th Cir. 1997) .

(n65)Footnote 65. United States v. Chen, 99 F.3d 1495 (9th Cir. 1996) .

(n66)Footnote 66. United States v. Palmer, 536 F.2d 1278 (9th Cir. 1976) .

(n67)Footnote 67. United States v. Aramony, 88 F.3d 1369 (4th Cir. 1996) .

(n68)Footnote 68. In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 791 F.2d 663 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n69)Footnote 69. United States v. Tedder, 801 F.2d 1437 (4th Cir. 1986) .

(n70)Footnote 70. In re Richard Roe, Inc., 68 F.3d 38 (2d Cir. 1995) .

(n71)Footnote 71. In re Subpoenas Duces Tecum, 738 F.2d 1367 (D.C. Cir. 1984) .

(n72)Footnote 72. United States v. Billmyer, 57 F.3d 31 (1st Cir. 1995) .

(n73)Footnote 73. Eigenheim Bank v. Halpern, 598 F. Supp. 988 (S.D.N.Y. 1984) .

(n74)Footnote 74. Thomas v. Pansy Ellen Prods., Inc., 672 F. Supp. 237 (W.D.N.C. 1987) .

(n75)Footnote 75. Liggett Group, Inc. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 116 F.R.D. 205 (M.D.N.C. 1986) .

(n76)Footnote 76. In re Recombinant DNA Tech. Patent & Contract Litig., 850 F. Supp. 769 (S.D. Ind. 1994) .

(n77)Footnote 77. Weil v. Investment/Indicators, Research & Mgt., Inc., 647 F.2d 18 (9th Cir. 1981) .

(n78)Footnote 78. United States v. Jones, 696 F.2d 1069 (4th Cir. 1982) .

(n79)Footnote 79. United States v. Suarez, 820 F.2d 1158 (11th Cir. 1987) .

(n80)Footnote 80. Vicinanzo v. Brunschwig & Fils, Inc., 739 F. Supp. 891 (S.D.N.Y. 1990) .

(n81)Footnote 81. Leucadia, Inc. v. Reliance Ins. Co., 101 F.R.D. 674 (S.D.N.Y. 1983) .

(n82)Footnote 82. Town of Newton v. Rumery, 480 U.S. 386 (1987) (holding that a voluntary release-dismissal agreement will bar a civil rights action unless public policy trumps the agreement).

(n83)Footnote 83. Glenemede Trust Co. v. Thompson, 56 F.3d 476 (3d Cir. 1995) .

(n84)Footnote 84. Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Inc. v. Home Indem. Co., 32 F.3d 851 (3d Cir. 1994) .

(n85)Footnote 85. Chevron Corp. v. Pennzoil Co., 974 F.2d 1156 (9th Cir. 1992) .

(n86)Footnote 86. United States v. Miller, 600 F.2d 498 (5th Cir. 1979) .

(n87)Footnote 87. Hercules, Inc. v. Exxon Corp., 434 F. Supp. 136 (D. Del. 1977) .

(n88)Footnote 88. Leybold-Heraeus Tech., Inc. v. Midwest Instrument Co., 118 F.R.D. 609 (E.D. Wis. 1987) .

(n89)Footnote 89. Weil v. Investment/Indicators, Research & Mgt., Inc., 647 F.2d 18 (9th Cir. 1981) .

(n90)Footnote 90. In re Subpoena Served upon Comptroller of Currency, 967 F.2d 630 (D.C. Cir. 1992) .

(n91)Footnote 91. In re Franklin Nat'l Bank Sec. Litig., 478 F. Supp. 577 (E.D.N.Y. 1979) .

(n92)Footnote 92. Tax Analysts v. IRS, 117 F.3d 607 (D.C. Cir. 1997) .

(n93)Footnote 93. Skibo v. City of New York, 109 F.R.D. 58 (E.D.N.Y. 1985) .

(n94)Footnote 94. Spell v. McDaniel, 591 F. Supp. 1090 (E.D.N.C. 1984) .

(n95)Footnote 95. Pickel v. United States, 746 F.2d 176 (3d Cir. 1984) .

(n96)Footnote 96. Dole v. Local 1942, 870 F.2d 368 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n97)Footnote 97. United States v. Cintolo, 818 F.2d 980 (1st Cir. 1987) .

(n98)Footnote 98. United States v. Hemmer, 729 F.2d 10 (1st Cir. 1984) .

(n99)Footnote 99. United States v. Silva, 580 F.2d 144 (5th Cir. 1978) .

(n100)Footnote 100. United States v. Doe, 525 F.2d 878 (5th Cir. 1976) .

(n101)Footnote 101. United States v. Partyka, 544 F.2d 345 (8th Cir. 1976) .

(n102)Footnote 102. Mobil Oil Co. v. Department of Energy, 102 F.R.D. 1 (N.D.N.Y. 1983) .

(n103)Footnote 103. Nixon v. Administrator of Gen. Servs., 408 F. Supp. 321 (D.D.C. 1977) , aff'd, 433 U.S. 425 (1977) .

(n104)Footnote 104. In re United States, 872 F.2d 472 (D.C. Cir. 1989) .

(n105)Footnote 105. Halkin v. Helms, 598 F.2d 1 (D.C. Cir. 1978) .

(n106)Footnote 106. Fitzgerald v. Penthouse Int'l, Ltd., 776 F.2d 1236 (4th Cir. 1985) .

(n107)Footnote 107. Guong v. United States, 860 F.2d 1063 (Fed. Cir. 1988) .

(n108)Footnote 108. United States v. Smith, 750 F.2d 1215 (4th Cir. 1984) .

(n109)Footnote 109. United States v. Smith, 742 F.2d 398 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n110)Footnote 110. United States v. Tsinnijinnie, 601 F.2d 1035 (9th Cir. 1979) .

(n111)Footnote 111. United States v. Picciandra, 788 F.2d 39 (1st Cir. 1986) .

(n112)Footnote 112. United States v. Ammar, 714 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1983) .

(n113)Footnote 113. United States v. Parker, 834 F.2d 408 (4th Cir. 1987) .

(n114)Footnote 114. United States v. Broome, 732 F.2d 363 (4th Cir. 1984) .

(n115)Footnote 115. United States v. Harrelson, 754 F.2d 1153 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n116)Footnote 116. United States v. Keck, 773 F.2d 759 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n117)Footnote 117. United States v. Parker, 834 F.2d 408 (4th Cir. 1987) .

(n118)Footnote 118. United States v. Burton, 631 F.2d 280 (4th Cir. 1980) .

(n119)Footnote 119. United States v. Klayer, 707 F.2d 892 (6th Cir. 1983) .

(n120)Footnote 120. United States v. Robinson, 763 F.2d 778 (6th Cir. 1985) .

(n121)Footnote 121. United States v. McCown, 711 F.2d 1441 (9th Cir. 1983) .

(n122)Footnote 122. In re Grand Jury Investigation, 603 F.2d 786 (9th Cir. 1979) .

(n123)Footnote 123. New England Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Anderson, 888 F.2d 646 (10th Cir. 1989) .

(n124)Footnote 124. United States v. Neal, 743 F.2d 1441 (10th Cir. 1984) .

(n125)Footnote 125. United States v. Cameron, 556 F.2d 752 (5th Cir. 1977) .

(n126)Footnote 126. United States v. Byrd, 750 F.2d 585 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n127)Footnote 127. United States v. Brown, 605 F.2d 389 (8th Cir. 1979) .

(n128)Footnote 128. United States v. Roberson, 859 F.2d 1376 (9th Cir. 1988) .

(n129)Footnote 129. In re Grand Jury Proceedings (84-5), 777 F.2d 508 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n130)Footnote 130. In re Grand Jury Investigation of Hugle, 754 F.2d 863 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n131)Footnote 131. United States v. Apodaca, 522 F.2d 568 (10th Cir. 1975) .

(n132)Footnote 132. United States v. Cuthbertson, 630 F.2d 139 (3d Cir. 1980) . See also a further opinion after remand of the case, 651 F.2d 189 (3d Cir. 1981) .

(n133)Footnote 133. United States v. Criden, 633 F.2d 346 (3d Cir. 1980) .

(n134)Footnote 134. Zerilli v. Smith, 656 F.2d 705 (D.C. Cir. 1981) .

(n135)Footnote 135. von Bulow v. von Bulow, 811 F.2d 136 (2d Cir. 1987) .

(n136)Footnote 136. New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964) .

(n137)Footnote 137. Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972) .

(n138)Footnote 138. United States v. Burke, 700 F.2d 70 (2d Cir. 1983) .

(n139)Footnote 139. In re Zuniga, 714 F.2d 632 (6th Cir. 1983) .

(n140)Footnote 140. In re Grand Jury Subpoena Dated Jan. 4, 1984, 750 F.2d 223 (2d Cir. 1984) .

(n141)Footnote 141. United States v. Jones, 683 F.2d 817 (4th Cir. 1982) .

(n142)Footnote 142. Federal Trade Com. v. TRW, Inc., 628 F.2d 207, 1980-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P63374 (D.C. Cir. 1980) .

(n143)Footnote 143. Hardy v. New York News, Inc., 114 F.R.D. 633 (S.D.N.Y. 1987) .

(n144)Footnote 144. EEOC v. General Tel. Co. of Nw., Inc., 885 F.2d 575 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n145)Footnote 145. Samuelson v. Susen, 576 F.2d 546 (3d Cir. 1978) .

(n146)Footnote 146. Armour Int'l Co. v. Worldwide Cosmetics, Inc., 689 F.2d 134 (7th Cir. 1982) .

(n147)Footnote 147. Pritchard-Keang Nam Corp. v. Jaworski, 751 F.2d 277 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n148)Footnote 148. American Civil Liberties Union, Inc. v. Finch, 638 F.2d 1336 (5th Cir. 1981) .

(n149)Footnote 149. Socialist Workers Party v. Grubisic, 619 F.2d 641 (7th Cir. 1980) .

(n150)Footnote 150. United States v. Silverman, 745 F.2d 1386 (11th Cir. 1984) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article V. Privileges
CHAPTER 501 RULE 501

2-501 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 501.04

501.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Deleted. [Part Three of this Manual sets forth the thirteen proposed federal rules on privilege together with the Advisory Committee's Notes. Ed.]

[2] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Article V as submitted to Congress contained thirteen Rules. Nine of those Rules defined specific non-constitutional privileges which the federal courts must recognize (i.e. required reports, lawyer-client, psychotherapist-patient, husband-wife, communications to clergymen, political vote, trade secrets, secrets of state and other official information, and identity of informer). Another Rule provided that only those privileges set forth in Article V or in some other Act of Congress could be recognized by the federal courts. The three remaining Rules addressed collateral problems as to waiver of privilege by voluntary disclosure, privileged matter disclosed under compulsion or without opportunity to claim privilege, comment upon or inference from a claim of privilege, and jury instruction with regard thereto.

The Committee amended Article V to eliminate all of the Court's specific Rules on privileges. Instead, the Committee, through a single Rule, 501, left the law of privileges in its present state and further provided that privileges shall continue to be developed by the courts of the United States under a uniform standard applicable both in civil and criminal cases. That standard, derived from Rule 26 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, mandates the application of the principles of the common law as interpreted by the courts of the United States in the light of reason and experience. The words "person, government, State, or political subdivision thereof" were added by the Committee to the lone term "witnesses" used in Rule 26 to make clear that, as under present law, not only witnesses may have privileges. The Committee also included in its amendment a proviso modeled after Rule 302 and similar to language added by the Committee to Rule 601 relating to the competency of witnesses. The proviso is designed to require the application of State privilege law in civil actions and proceedings governed by Erie R.R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938) , a result in accord with current federal court decisions. See Republic Gear Co. v. Borg-Warner Corp., 381 F.2d 551, 555-556 n.2 (2d Cir. 1967) . The Committee deemed the proviso to be necessary in the light of the Advisory Committee's view (see its note to Court Rule 501) that this result is not mandated under Erie.

The rationale underlying the proviso is that federal law should not supersede that of the States in substantive areas such as privilege absent a compelling reason. The Committee believes that in civil cases in the federal courts where an element of a claim or defense is not grounded upon a federal question, there is no federal interest strong enough to justify departure from State policy. In addition, the Committee considered that the Court's proposed Article V would have promoted forum shopping in some civil actions, depending upon differences in the privilege law applied as among the State and federal courts. The Committee's proviso, on the other hand, under which the federal courts are bound to apply the State's privilege law in actions founded upon a State-created right or defense, removes the incentive to "shop."

[3] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

Clearly, the most far-reaching House change in the rules as promulgated, was the elimination of the Court's proposed rules on privilege contained in article V. Article V purported to define the privileges to be recognized in the Federal courts in all actions, cases, and proceedings; any alleged privilege not enumerated in article V (e.g., that of a newsreporter) was deemed not to exist and could not be given effect unless of constitutional dimension. The privileges recognized included trade secret, lawyer-client, husband-wife, doctor-patient (but applicable only to psychotherapists), identity of informer, secrets of state, and official information.

From the outset, it was clear that the content of the proposed privilege provisions was extremely controversial. Critics attacked, and proponents defended, the secrets of state and official information privileges, with the nub of the disagreement being whether the rule defining them was merely codifying existing law. In addition, the husband-wife privilege drew fire as a result of the conscious decision of the Court to narrow its scope from that recognized under present Federal decisions. The partial doctor-patient privilege seemed to satisfy no one, either doctors or patients; and even the privilege as drafted came in for its share of criticism because of its failure to define representative of the client, a critical issue for corporations and organizations. Much controversy also attended the failure to include a newsman's privilege. Further, there was dissatisfaction with the policy of the Court's rule not to require application of State privilege in civil actions where the underlying issues were governed by substantive State law, a result which many legal scholars deemed mandated by Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins. Finally, some commentators questioned the wisdom of promulgating rules of privilege under the rules Enabling Act, on the ground that in their view, the codification of the law of privilege should be left to the regular legislative process.

Since it was clear that no agreement was likely to be possible as to the content of specific privilege rules, and since the inability to agree threatened to forestall or prevent passage of an entire rules package, the determination was made that the specific privilege rules proposed by the Court should be eliminated and a single rule (Rule 501) substituted, leaving the law in its current condition to be developed by the courts of the United States utilizing the principles of the common law. In addition, a proviso was approved requiring Federal courts to recognize and apply state privilege law in civil cases governed by Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, supra, as under present Federal case law.

The rationale underlying the proviso as passed by the House is that Federal law should not supersede that of the States in substantive areas such as privilege absent a compelling reason. This reflects the view that in civil cases in the Federal courts, where a claim or defense asserted is not grounded upon a Federal question, there is no Federal interest in the application, or in its resolution, of a uniform law of Federal privilege strong enough to justify departure from State policy. Another rationale for the proviso is that the Court's proposal would have prompted forum shopping in some civil actions, depending upon differences in the privilege law applied as among the State and Federal Courts. The House provision, on the other hand, under which the Federal Court is bound to apply the State's privilege law in actions founded on a State-created right, might limit the incentive to shop.

Your committee is in accord with the approach of the House with respect to Article V. Therefore, save for a technical amendment which is discussed infra, Rule 501, as passed by the House, was left undisturbed.

...

Article V as submitted to Congress contained 13 rules. Nine of those rules defined specific nonconstitutional privileges which the Federal courts must recognize (i.e., required reports, lawyer-client, psychotherapist-patient, husband-wife, communications to clergymen, political vote, trade secrets, secrets of state and other official information, and identity of informer). Many of these rules contained controversial modifications or restrictions upon common law privileges. As noted supra, the House amended Article V to eliminate all of the Court's specific rules on privileges. Through a single Rule, 501, the House provided that privileges shall be governed by the principles of the common law as interpreted by the courts of the United States in the light of reason and experience (a standard derived from Rule 26 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure) except in the case of an element of a civil claim or defense as to which State law supplies the rule of decision, in which event state privilege law was to govern.

The committee agrees with the main thrust of the House amendment: that a federally developed common law based on modern reason and experience shall apply except where the State nature of the issues renders deference to State privilege law the wiser course, as in the usual diversity case. The committee understands that thrust of the House amendment to require that State privilege law be applied in "diversity" cases (actions on questions of State law between citizens of different States arising under 28 U.S.C. § 1332). The language of the House amendment, however, goes beyond this in some respects, and falls short of it in others: State privilege law applies even in non-diversity, Federal question civil cases, where an issue governed by State substantive law is the object of the evidence (such issues do sometimes arise in such cases); and, in all instances where State privilege law is to be applied, e.g., on proof of a State issue in a diversity case, a close reading reveals that State privilege law is not to be applied unless the matter to be proved is an element of that state claim or defense, as distinguished from a step along the way in the proof of it.

The committee is concerned that the language used in the House amendment could be difficult to apply. It provides that "in civil actions ... with respect to an element of a claim or defense as to which State law supplies the rule of decision," State law on privilege applies. The question of what is an element of a claim or defense is likely to engender considerable litigation. If the matter in question constitutes an element of a claim, State law supplies the privilege rule; whereas if it is a mere item of proof with respect to a claim, then, even though State law might supply the rule of decision, Federal law on the privilege would apply. Further, disputes will arise as to how the rule should be applied in an antitrust action or in a tax case where the Federal statute is silent as to a particular aspect of the substantive law in question, but Federal cases had incorporated State law by reference to State law. Is a claim (or defense) based on such a reference a claim or defense as to which Federal or State law supplies the rule of decision?

Another problem not entirely avoidable is the complexity or difficulty the rule introduces into the trial of a Federal case containing a combination of Federal and State claims and defenses, e.g., an action involving Federal antitrust and State unfair competition claims. Two different bodies of privilege law would need to be consulted. It may even develop that the same witness-testimony might be relevant on both counts and privileged as to one but not the other.

The formulation adopted by the House is pregnant with litigious mischief. The committee has, therefore, adopted what we believe will be a clearer and more practical guideline for determining when courts should respect State rules of privilege. Basically, it provides that in criminal and Federal question civil cases, federally evolved rules on privilege should apply since it is Federal policy which is being enforced. Conversely, in diversity cases where the litigation in question turns on a substantive question of State law, and is brought in the Federal courts because the parties reside in different States, the committee believes it is clear that State rules of privilege should apply unless the proof is directed at a claim or defense for which Federal law supplies the rule of decision (a situation which would not commonly arise). [While such a situation might require use of two bodies of privilege law, federal and state, in the same case, nevertheless the occasions on which this would be required are considerably reduced as compared with the House version, and confined to situations where the Federal and State interests are such as to justify application of neither privilege law to the case as a whole. If the rule proposed here results in two conflicting bodies of privilege law applying to the same piece of evidence in the same case, it is contemplated that the rule favoring reception of the evidence should be applied. This policy is based on the present rule 43(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure which provides: In any case, the statute or rule which favors the reception of the evidence governs and the evidence shall be presented according to the most convenient method prescribed in any of the statutes or rules to which reference is herein made.] It is intended that the State rules of privilege should apply equally in original diversity actions and diversity actions removed under 28 U.S.C. § 1441(b).

Two other comments on the privilege rule should be made. The committee has received a considerable volume of correspondence from psychiatric organizations and psychiatrists concerning the deletion of rule 504 of the rule submitted by the Supreme Court. It should be clearly understood that, in approving this general rule as to privileges, the action of Congress should not be understood as disapproving any recognition of a psychiatrist-patient, or husband-wife, or any other of the enumerated privileges contained in the Supreme Court rules. Rather, our action should be understood as reflecting the view that the recognition of a privilege based on a confidential relationship and other privileges should be determined on a case-by-case basis.

Further, we would understand that the prohibition against spouses testifying against each other is considered a rule of privilege and covered by this rule and not by rule 601 of [sic] the competency of witnesses.

[Except for footnote 7, which we placed in the brackets in the second to last paragraph, all footnotes are deleted. Ed.]

[4] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

Rule 501 deals with the privilege of a witness not to testify. Both the House and Senate bills provide that federal privilege law applies in criminal cases. In civil actions and proceedings, the House bill provides that state privilege law applies "to an element of a claim or defense as to which State law supplies the rule of decision." The Senate bill provides that "in civil actions and proceedings arising under 28 U.S.C. § 1332 or 28 U.S.C. § 1335, or between citizens of different States and removed under 28 U.S.C. § 1441(b) the privilege of a witness, person, government, State or political subdivision thereof is determined in accordance with State law, unless with respect to the particular claim or defense, Federal law supplies the rule of decision."

The wording of the House and Senate bills differs in the treatment of civil actions and proceedings. The rule in the House bill applies to evidence that relates to "an element of a claim or defense." If an item of proof tends to support or defeat a claim or defense, or an element of a claim or defense, and if state law supplies the rule of decision for that claim or defense, then state privilege law applies to that item of proof.

Under the provision in the House bill, therefore, state privilege law will usually apply in diversity cases. There may be diversity cases, however, where a claim or defense is based upon federal law. In such instances, federal privilege law will apply to evidence relevant to the federal claim or defense. See Sola Electric Co. v. Jefferson Electric Co., 317 U.S. 173, 1942 Trade Cas. (CCH) P56245 (1942) .

In nondiversity jurisdiction civil cases, federal privilege law will generally apply. In those situations where a federal court adopts or incorporates state law to fill interstices or gaps in federal statutory phrases, the court generally will apply federal privilege law. As Justice Jackson has said:

> "A federal court sitting in a non-diversity case such as this does not sit as a local tribunal. In some cases it may see fit for special reasons to give the law of a particular state highly persuasive or even controlling effect, but in the last analysis its decision turns upon the law of the United States, not that of any state." D'Oench, Duhme & Co. v. Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., 315 U.S. 447, 471 (1942) (Jackson, J., concurring). When a federal court chooses to absorb state law, it is applying the state law as a matter of federal common law. Thus, state law does not supply the rule of decision (even though the federal court may apply a rule derived from state decisions), and state privilege law would not apply. See

> C.A. Wright, Federal Courts 251-52 (2d ed. 1970); Holmberg v. Armbrecht, 327 U.S. 392 (1946) ; DeSylva v. Ballentine, 351 U.S. 570, 581 (1956) ; 9 Wright & Miller, Federal Rules and Procedure § 2408[sic].

In civil actions and proceedings, where the rule of decision as to a claim or defense or as to an element of a claim or defense is supplied by state law, the House provision requires that state privilege law apply.

The Conference adopts the House provision.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article V. Privileges
Supp. To CHAPTER 501 RULE 501

2-501 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 501, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

ARTICLE V. PRIVILEGES	ARTICLE V. PRIVILEGES
Rule 501. General Rule	Rule 501. Privilege in General
Except as otherwise	The common law -- as in-required by the Constitution of the United States or provided by Act of Congress or in rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority, the privilege of a witterpreted by United States courts in the light of reason and experience -- governs a claim of privilege unless any of the following provides otherwise:

ness, person, government, State, or political subdivision thereof shall be governed by the principles of the common law as they may be interpreted by the courts of the United States in the light of reason and experience. However, in civil actions and proceedings, with respect to an element of a claim or defense as to which State law supplies the rule of decision, the privilege of a witness, person, government, State, or political subdivision thereof shall be determined in accordance with State law.

- the United States Constitution;
- a federal statute; or
- rules prescribed by the Supre me

Cou rt.

But in a civil case, state law governs privilege regard ing a clai m or defens
e for whic h state law supplies
the rule
of de-cisio
n.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 501 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article V. Privileges
Supp. To CHAPTER 501 RULE 501

2-501 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 501.03

Supp. to § 501.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[2] Attorney-Client [Go To Main]

[b] Attorney-Client -- Common Interest

[i] Action Between Joint Clients

In re Teleglobe Communications Corp., 493 F.3d 345 (3d Cir. 2007) : In an action by former subsidiaries against the parent company, the parent produced documents that it conceded were created to provide joint advice to it and its subsidiaries, but refused to produce documents that it claimed were provided solely to it and were not part of any joint representation. The parent's attorney-client privilege claim as to the latter documents was denied, but the Court reversed the order and remanded. The Court observed that the "default rule" is that all communications made in the course of a joint representation are discoverable when former co-clients sue each other, and it rejected the parent's argument that the default rule should be flipped when the litigation involves a parent company and a former subsidiary: Although case law recognizes that a corporate client includes subsidiaries and parents so that disclosure of confidential communications within the corporate structure does not involve a waiver, the parent should not be permitted "to have it both ways" -- i.e., treating the corporate group as a single client, but permitting the parent to own the privilege in perpetuity even when interests diverge. Thus, it concluded that "absent some compelling reason to disregard entity separateness, in the typical case courts should treat the various members of the corporate group as the separate corporations they are and not as one client." At the same time, the Court rejected the subsidiaries' argument that the parent waived the privilege in this case by agreeing to produce some documents: the parent produced documents that it believed fell within a joint representation and did not thereby impliedly waive the privilege as to other documents. It also rejected the subsidiaries' argument that they had waived the parent's privilege when they waived regarding joint client communications in Canadian insolvency proceedings: "[t]he general answer is bilateral control" -- i.e., each client may waive the privilege with respect to its own communications but not to the communications of another co-client. The Court remanded for fact finding on whether the parent and subsidiaries were joint clients. It advised the Trial Judge that the parent could reasonably expect that communications with outside counsel as to divestiture issues would be privileged and the privilege was not waived by sharing the communications with in-house counsel, even if in-house counsel jointly represented the parent and the subsidiaries and thus were in a conflict of interest. The fact that the lawyer was in conflict could not be held to abrogate the clients' expectation of confidentiality: "If the communications were outside the scope of the joint representation, then sharing them with a conflicted joint attorney is of no moment, even if the conflicted attorney acted improperly in accepting the communications... . If the communications were within the scope, then they are discoverable."

[v. 1] Attorney-Client -- Common Interest -- Tax Cases

United States v. BDO Seidman, LLP, 492 F.3d 806 (7th Cir. 2007) : In a proceeding to enforce administrative subpoenas issued by the IRS in connection with an investigation into abusive tax shelters, BDO asserted the attorney-client privilege against disclosure of a memorandum written by a lawyer-partner in the firm to an attorney at the firm's outside counsel, which subsequently came into the hands of an attorney at another law firm. Although that firm did not represent BDO, the two provided legal and accounting services, respectively, jointly to clients on the same or related matters. The recipient testified that she received the memorandum from BDO as input into an opinion letter regarding tax shelters that her firm was preparing for both BDO and their common clients. The Court affirmed a ruling holding that the memorandum was privileged under the common interest doctrine: "In essence, through the memorandum, two joint venturers, BDO and Jenkins & Gilchrist, undertook a consultation between their respective in-house counsel and BDO's outside counsel with respect to the legality of the proposed financial course of action they would recommend to their common clients." The voluntary disclosure of the memorandum did not waive BDO's claim of privilege.

[d] Attorney-Client -- Compulsory Process

Murdoch v. Castro, 609 F.3d 983 (9th Cir. 2010) (en banc): In his state murder trial, Murdoch sought to introduce a letter that an accomplice had written to his attorney containing statements to the effect that Murdoch had not been involved in the murder, but the Trial Judge upheld the accomplice's attorney's claim of attorney-client privilege regarding the communications. The accomplice then testified at trial against Murdoch, who was convicted. Murdoch sought habeas relief, arguing that the inability to use the accomplice's exculpatory statement violated his right to confront the accomplice at trial. The Court en banc upheld the denial of habeas relief, with a plurality holding that it has not been "clearly established" under federal law that an invocation of the attorney-client privilege can operate to deprive an accused of a constitutional right.

[e] Attorney-Client -- Confidential Communications

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Confidential Communications -- Intention that Attorney Will Disclose Information Communicated

United States v. Bauer, 551 F.3d 786 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions of a husband and wife for bankruptcy fraud and money laundering, holding that the wife waived her attorney-client privilege "by choosing to make her attorneys' performance the central element of her defense." In a footnote, the Court observed that "[a]s the government points out, it is not certain that the subject matter at issue -- information communicated from the Bauers to their attorneys for the purpose of disclosure in publicly filed bankruptcy schedules -- was even protected by the privilege."

United States v. Ruehle, 583 F.3d 600 (9th Cir. 2009) : The defendant, CFO of Broadcom Corporation, was indicted for his involvement in a backdating scheme that resulted in Broadcom restating its earnings. Ruehle had made statements to attorneys hired by Broadcom to conduct an internal investigation. Subsequently, Broadcom disclosed all the statements to outside auditors and to various federal agencies, in an attempt to work its way through the scandal. At a hearing when the government sought disclosure of the statements, the attorneys testified that they began their meeting with Ruehle by notifying him that they were representing the corporation, not him, but Ruehle denied any recollection of such warnings, and stated that he believed that the attorneys were acting as his counsel. The District Court held that the statements were privileged because Ruehle had a "reasonable belief" that the attorneys were acting on his behalf. Reversing on interlocutory review, the Court accepted the finding of fact that Ruehle thought he had a personal attorney-client relationship with Broadcom's lawyers, but it found that Ruehle could not have reasonably anticipated that his communications with the lawyers would remain confidential. He was the senior corporate executive with primary responsibility to Broadcom's financial affairs, and his duties encompassed "Broadcom's strict compliance with reporting and record keeping requirements imposed through the Securities and Exchange Act of 1934 and the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, among many other federal and state rules and regulations. As the head of finance, Ruehle cannot credibly claim ignorance of the general disclosure requirement imposed on a publicly traded company with respect to its outside auditors or the need to truthfully report corporate information to the SEC." Thus, his "statements to [the attorneys] were not 'made in confidence' but rather for the purpose of outside disclosure."

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Confidential Communications -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. DeFonte, 441 F.3d 92 (2d Cir. 2006) (per curiam): In the prosecution of a corrections officer, a former inmate who was to be called as a witness intervened to assert the attorney-client privilege with respect to a journal that had been taken from her cell, in which she had recorded attorney-client conversations and other matters. The Trial Judge denied the motion on the grounds that the documents were not protected by the privilege and the inmate had no expectation of privacy in the contents of her cell. The Court reversed, holding that incarcerated individuals retain the attorney-client privilege and the right to keep privileged documents confidential where not inconsistent with legitimate penological objectives. However, it left open on remand the question whether the inmate had treated the notes in such a careless manner as to negate her intent to keep them confidential. The Court also held that memorializations of private conversations between the inmate and her attorney were protected from disclosure. As to records of events made for the purpose of later discussions with the attorney, the Court said that "an outline of what a client wishes to discuss with counsel -- and which is subsequently discussed with one's counsel -- would seem to fit squarely within our understanding of the scope of the privilege," but "[a] rule that recognizes a privilege for any writing made with an eye toward legal representation would be too broad."

Jenkins v. Bartlett, 487 F.3d 482 (7th Cir. 2007) : Following an incident in which a police officer fatally shot a suspect, the officer was taken to police headquarters for a departmental investigation. While there preparing for his interview with Internal Affairs, he met with the president of the police officers' association and an attorney provided by the association. In a civil rights action on behalf of the suspect against the officer, the plaintiff argued that there was no privilege for communications between the officer and the attorney because of the presence of the president. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court upheld the decision sustaining the officer's claim of privilege, on the ground that the president was present solely to assist the attorney as he prepared to represent the officer.

[f] Attorney-Client -- Corporate Privilege

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Corporate Privilege -- Generally

In re Teleglobe Communications Corp., 493 F.3d 345 (3d Cir. 2007) : In an action by former subsidiaries against the parent company, the parent produced documents that it conceded were created to provide joint advice to it and its subsidiaries, but refused to produce documents that it claimed were provided solely to it and were not part of any joint representation. The parent's attorney-client privilege claim as to the latter documents was denied, but the Court reversed the order and remanded. The Court observed that the "default rule" is that all communications made in the course of a joint representation are discoverable when former co-clients sue each other, and it rejected the parent's argument that the default rule should be flipped when the litigation involves a parent company and a former subsidiary: Although case law recognizes that a corporate client includes subsidiaries and parents so that disclosure of confidential communications within the corporate structure does not involve a waiver, the parent should not be permitted "to have it both ways" -- i.e., treating the corporate group as a single client, but permitting the parent to own the privilege in perpetuity even when interests diverge. Thus, it concluded that "absent some compelling reason to disregard entity separateness, in the typical case courts should treat the various members of the corporate group as the separate corporations they are and not as one client." At the same time, the Court rejected the subsidiaries' argument that the parent waived the privilege in this case by agreeing to produce some documents: the parent produced documents that it believed fell within a joint representation and did not thereby impliedly waive the privilege as to other documents. It also rejected the subsidiaries' argument that they had waived the parent's privilege when they waived regarding joint client communications in Canadian insolvency proceedings: "[t]he general answer is bilateral control" -- i.e., each client may waive the privilege with respect to its own communications but not to the communications of another co-client. The Court remanded for fact finding on whether the parent and subsidiaries were joint clients. It advised the Trial Judge that the parent could reasonably expect that communications with outside counsel as to divestiture issues would be privileged and the privilege was not waived by sharing the communications with in-house counsel, even if in-house counsel jointly represented the parent and the subsidiaries and thus were in a conflict of interest. The fact that the lawyer was in conflict could not be held to abrogate the clients' expectation of confidentiality: "If the communications were outside the scope of the joint representation, then sharing them with a conflicted joint attorney is of no moment, even if the conflicted attorney acted improperly in accepting the communications... . If the communications were within the scope, then they are discoverable."

United States v. Graf, 610 F.3d 1148 (9th Cir. 2010) : The defendant in an insurance fraud case was not an officer, director, or employee of the company through which the fraud was committed, although he had formed the company and was heavily involved in all its operations. Affirming, the Court held there was no error in permitting the corporation's attorneys to disclose communications with the defendant, since he was a functional employee of the corporate client and his communications with the attorneys dealt with the legal affairs of the corporation. He did not have a personal attorney-client relationship because he had not sought personal legal advice from the corporate attorneys, and his subjective belief that the attorneys represented him was insufficient because that belief was either unreasonable or not manifested to those attorneys. In United States v. Ruehle, 583 F.3d 600 (9th Cir. 2009) , the defendant, CFO of Broadcom Corporation, was indicted for his involvement in a backdating scheme that resulted in Broadcom restating its earnings. Ruehle had made statements to attorneys hired by Broadcom to conduct an internal investigation. Subsequently, Broadcom disclosed all the statements to outside auditors and to various federal agencies, in an attempt to work its way through the scandal. At a hearing when the government sought disclosure of the statements, the attorneys testified that they began their meeting with Ruehle by notifying him that they were representing the corporation, not him, but Ruehle denied any recollection of such warnings, and stated that he believed that the attorneys were acting as his counsel. The District Court held that the statements were privileged because Ruehle had a "reasonable belief" that the attorneys were acting on his behalf. Reversing on interlocutory review, the Court accepted the finding of fact that Ruehle thought he had a personal attorney-client relationship with Broadcom's lawyers, but it found that Ruehle could not have reasonably anticipated that his communications with the lawyers would remain confidential. He was the senior corporate executive with primary responsibility to Broadcom's financial affairs, and his duties encompassed "Broadcom's strict compliance with reporting and record keeping requirements imposed through the Securities and Exchange Act of 1934 and the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, among many other federal and state rules and regulations. As the head of finance, Ruehle cannot credibly claim ignorance of the general disclosure requirement imposed on a publicly traded company with respect to its outside auditors or the need to truthfully report corporate information to the SEC." Thus, his "statements to [the attorneys] were not 'made in confidence' but rather for the purpose of outside disclosure."

[i] Attorney-Client -- Exceptions

[i] Crime or Fraud

[A] Civil Cases

Kilpatrick v. King, 499 F.3d 759 (8th Cir. 2007) : The plaintiff had been acquitted of child abuse, but the state Department of Health and Human Services listed him on its Central Register of Abuse and Neglect. The plaintiff then amended his civil rights complaint charging that the initial investigation and prosecution violated due process to add a claim that the Register listing was retaliatory. When one of the individual defendants sued for retaliation refused to answer deposition questions about consultations with HHS counsel, the plaintiff moved to compel discovery, arguing that the attorney-client privilege did not apply because the consultation was to further a crime or fraud (presumably the alleged conspiracy to retaliate). Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in denying the order to compel, as the plaintiff had not met his burden of presenting a factual basis to support his belief that the advice was sought in furtherance of any alleged retaliation.

[B] Attorney-Client -- Exceptions -- Crime or Fraud -- Criminal Cases

In re Grand Jury, 475 F.3d 1299 (D.C. Cir. 2007) : A corporation conducted an internal investigation into whether its past actions had violated federal campaign finance laws. The investigation was conducted by an outside law firm. John Doe, a corporate executive, retained separate counsel, and the corporation and its law firm entered into a joint defense agreement with Doe and his separate counsel. Pursuant to a DOJ demand, the corporation produced an unsigned copy of the minutes of a Board of Directors' meeting, which appeared to show that political activities proposed by Doe included illegal corporate contributions to federal political candidates. The corporation's law firm requested Doe to provide any recollections he had regarding the meeting, and Doe's personal attorney faxed to the law firm a signed copy of the minutes with Doe's "assignment recommendations" attached. The minutes seemed to indicate that there were no approved recommendations. The law firm contacted Doe and indicated that DOJ would want to know why the signed copy and the assignment recommendation were produced so late, and Doe responded that his assistant only recently had looked at his personal copy of the corporate minutes. Doe's personal counsel subsequently informed the corporation's law firm that the assignment recommendation was not a contemporaneous document and had been prepared later when Doe stated that his assistant had searched his personal files. The law firm informed DOJ that the assignment recommendations were not a contemporaneous record, and DOJ sought from corporate counsel the circumstances under which the document had been obtained and all conversations the law firm had with the persons who provided the document. The corporation originally claimed privilege, but relented when DOJ raised the crime-fraud exception. When confronted by DOJ with his conflicting statements concerning the manner in which the document had been provided to the corporation, Doe's attorney raised the attorney-client privilege. The District Court held that the assignment recommendations were not protected by the attorney-client privilege because they were simply a corporate document, and the conversations concerning the document were not protected because of the crime-fraud exception to the privilege. The Court of Appeals affirmed, noting that the government had demonstrated a prima facie case of crime-fraud, and the exception applied: "Corporate counsel's affidavit submitted with his motion to quash reveals that following production of that document Doe told corporate counsel on at least three occasions that his secretary had found the document and that he did not know when it was created, even though he later admitted that he created it at the time the signed minutes were found in his file."

In re Grand Jury Investigation, 445 F.3d 266 (3d Cir. 2006) : In an ongoing criminal investigation, the government became concerned that the Executive Director of an organization to whom subpoenas were issued might have been involved in the destruction of e-mails and obstruction of justice. The government sought to compel the attorney for the Director to testify regarding his discussions with the Director about her compliance with the subpoenas. The government also sought production of the attorney's notes of his conversation with the Director concerning the organization's compliance with the subpoena. The Trial Judge reviewed the government's ex parte affidavit in camera and concluded that there was sufficient evidence to satisfy the crime-fraud exception in a showing that the Director was in the process of obstruction of justice at the time of her conversation with the attorney and used the information provided by the attorney in furtherance of crime. The Court affirmed, accepting the government's argument that, while the attorney did nothing improper in advising the Director, there was evidence that the Director used the attorney's communication to determine the type of material that the government sought and used the information in furtherance of her obstruction of justice. The Court held that it did not matter that the Director did not initiate the communication with the attorney or solicit any advice, because the crime-fraud exception "is equally applicable in situations where there has been a prior attorney-client relationship and the communication at issue was made in the context of that relationship."

The Court also concluded that the Director's communications with counsel "furthered" crime or fraud, because in those conversations the Director was informed of the kinds of documents that the grand jury was seeking, and obtaining this advice could have assisted the Director in determining what kinds of documents to destroy. In United States v. Doe, 429 F.3d 450 (3d Cir. 2005) , the Court reversed a ruling quashing a grand jury subpoena on grounds of the attorney-client privilege. It held that the government had made a prima facie showing that the client's communications with the attorney were in furtherance of criminal acts, and found that the Trial Court used the wrong standard in evaluating the evidence. It "improperly relied on whether the consultation assisted or furthered the crime." Instead, the Judge should have focused on the intent of the client in communicating with the lawyer.

United States v. Lentz, 524 F.3d 501 (4th Cir. 2008) : The defendant, arrested for murder, had consulted with another inmate about hiring a hit man to murder some witnesses. In a recorded conversation with his attorney, the defendant asked questions to check on the other inmate's reliability in the scheme. Affirming, the Court found no error in denying suppression of the recorded conversation, as it fell within the crime-fraud exception to the attorney-client privilege.

United States v. Al-Shahin, 474 F.3d 941 (7th Cir. 2007) : Affirming convictions for mail fraud, the Court held that the crime-fraud exception applied to testimony by an attorney who worked with the FBI and posed as a lawyer whose mission was to find and represent clients in settling fraudulent accident claims with various insurance companies. The evidence demonstrated that the defendants who consulted with the attorney were engaged in bringing fraudulent insurance claims, and established a prima facie case that the attorney was being used as part of the fraudulent scheme.

[C] Attorney-Client -- Exceptions -- Crime or Fraud -- Procedures

United States v. BDO Seidman, LLP, 492 F.3d 806 (7th Cir. 2007) : In a proceeding to enforce administrative subpoenas issued by the IRS in connection with an investigation into abusive tax shelters, the Court found no abuse of discretion in a ruling that a document fell within the crime-fraud exception. It rejected the view ascribed to some Circuits, "which require enough evidence of crime or fraud to support a verdict in order to invoke the crime-fraud exception." Rather, it held that "[t]o invoke the crime-fraud exception, the party seeking to abrogate the attorney-client privilege must present prima facie evidence that 'gives colour to the charge' by showing some foundation in fact. [citations] The party seeking to abrogate the privilege meets its burden by bringing forth sufficient evidence to justify the district court in requiring the proponent of the privilege to come forward with an explanation for the evidence against it." Here, the Judge had conducted an in camera inspection, had found prima facie evidence of crime or fraud, and did not find the proponents' explanation to the contrary satisfactory.

Kilpatrick v. King, 499 F.3d 759 (8th Cir. 2007) : The plaintiff had been acquitted of child abuse, but the state Department of Health and Human Services listed him on its Central Register of Abuse and Neglect. The plaintiff then amended his civil rights complaint charging that the initial investigation and prosecution violated due process to add a claim that the Register listing was retaliatory. When one of the individual defendants sued for retaliation refused to answer deposition questions about consultations with HHS counsel, the plaintiff moved to compel discovery, arguing that the attorney-client privilege did not apply because the consultation was to further a crime or fraud (presumably the alleged conspiracy to retaliate). Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in denying the order to compel, as the plaintiff had not met his burden of presenting a factual basis to support his belief that the advice was sought in furtherance of any alleged retaliation, which was required before the Judge could review the allegedly privileged testimony and rule on the privilege claim. In In re Green Grand Jury Proceedings, 492 F.3d 976 (8th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed an order requiring disclosure to a grand jury of attorney-client documents generated in furtherance of the client's fraud. It held that the crime or fraud needs to be "established" to overcome the privilege, but that there need only be "probable cause to believe that a crime or fraud ha[s] been perpetrated" to call for in camera review. It rejected the client's claim that establishing the crime or fraud calls for clear and convincing evidence. Although it had previously suggested that in a civil case the party opposing the application of the crime-fraud exception is entitled to present countervailing evidence, it did not decide whether a different rule might apply in the grand jury context.

In re Napster, Inc., Copyright Litig., 479 F.3d 1078 (9th Cir. 2007) : Music industry companies alleged that the media conglomerate Bertelsmann was vicariously liable for copyright infringement by the Napster file sharing service and its users, on the ground that a multi-million dollar loan by Bertelsmann gave it control over Napster and prolonged its infringing operations. The companies sought discovery of attorney-client communications related to the loan, arguing that they came within the crime-fraud exception because they were in pursuance of a scheme to defraud and deceive the courts regarding the true nature of the "loan" transaction. The District Court ordered disclosure of the communications, upon a finding that a prima facie showing had been made; it concluded that it in determining whether the exception applied, it "need only consider the evidence offered by the moving party" and that it need not "consider conflicting evidence offered by the party seeking to uphold the privilege." Reversing, the Court held that when outright disclosure (as opposed to an in camera review) is requested, the party seeking to preserve the privilege has the right to introduce countervailing evidence, and that the party seeking disclosure has the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that the exception applies. Reviewing the evidence in this case, the Court held that the companies had not met their burden.

[k] Attorney-Client -- Fees, Client Identity and Address, etc.

[v] Attorney-Client -- Fees, Client Identity and Address, etc. -- Miscellaneous Cases

Reiserer v. United States, 479 F.3d 1160 (9th Cir. 2007) : During an investigation of an attorney and his firm for promoting abusive tax shelters, the IRS issued a summons to his bank for documents relating to accounts maintained by the firm. The attorney objected to disclosure of client identity and fee information, but the Court affirmed denial of a motion to quash the summons. The documents sought were not confidential attorney-client communications, and the client identity and fee information was not privileged because revelation of that information would not constitute acknowledgment of criminality. The summons was issued as part of an investigation of the attorney, not his clients; "[d]isclosure of the clients' identities may eventually lead them to become IRS targets, but disclosure in itself is not incriminating."

[l] Attorney-Client -- Fiduciary Litigation

In re Teleglobe Communications Corp., 493 F.3d 345 (3d Cir. 2007) : In an action by former subsidiaries against the parent company, the parent produced documents that it conceded were created to provide joint advice to it and its subsidiaries, but refused to produce documents that it claimed were provided solely to it and were not part of any joint representation. The parent's attorney-client privilege claim as to the latter documents was denied, but the Court reversed the order and remanded. The subsidiaries claimed that because the parent controlled them while they were insolvent, the parent owed fiduciary duties to the subsidiaries of which their creditors were the primary beneficiaries, and therefore that the fiduciary exception to the privilege recognized in Garner v. Wolfinbarger, 430 F.2d 1093 (5th Cir. 1970) , should apply. The Court concluded that "[t]he key ... is insolvency," because "[i]f the Debtors [subsidiaries] were not insolvent or in that hazy 'zone of insolvency,' ... at the time of the otherwise privileged communications, then BCE [the parent] was the only beneficiary of the Debtors' success, and it could not, therefore, breach its fiduciary duty to itself." The Court ultimately concluded that the dates on which each subsidiary became insolvent were issues of fact it could not resolve and alerted the Trial Judge to the requirement under Garner that there be a colorable claim of breach of fiduciary duty; it noted that generally a fiduciary "does not have a duty to guarantee or bail out a corporate family member when it loses money."

In re United States, 590 F.3d 1305 (Fed. Cir. 2009) : In a suit alleging that the United States had mismanaged trust assets and other funds of a Native American tribe, the Court denied a writ of mandamus against an order compelling the United States to disclose communications that it claimed were protected by the attorney-client privilege. The Court held that the fiduciary exception to the privilege applied to communications concerning management of an Indian trust, at least where the government has not considered a specific competing interest (such as statutes governing endangered species or natural resources) in those communications.

[o] Attorney-Client -- Legal Advice or Services

[i] Generally

In re County of Erie, 473 F.3d 413 (2d Cir. 2007) : In a class action challenging strip searches pursuant to a written policy of the County Sheriff's office, the Trial Judge ordered the discovery of e-mails between an Assistant County Attorney and County officials that discussed the propriety of the policy. The Judge determined that the e-mails were not privileged because they proposed changes to the existing policy and its implementation to make it constitutional, but that was the only "legal analysis" and "no legal advice [was] rendered apart from policy recommendations." Granting a writ of mandamus, the Court found that the Judge took too narrow a view of legal advice: "When a lawyer has been asked to assess compliance with a legal obligation, the lawyer's recommendation of a policy that complies (or better complies) with the legal obligation -- or that advocates and promotes compliance, or oversees implementation of compliance measures -- is legal advice." It explained that "[f]undamentally, legal advice involves the interpretation and application of legal principles to guide future conduct or to assess past conduct," and "[t]he complete lawyer may well promote and reinforce the legal advice given, weigh it, and lay out its ramifications by explaining: how the advice is feasible and can be implemented; the legal downsides, risks and costs of taking the advice or doing otherwise; what alternatives exist to present measures or the measures advised; what other persons are doing or thinking about the matter; or the collateral benefits, risks or costs in terms of expense, politics, insurance, commerce, morals, and appearances." Although it found that the e-mails were privileged, the Court remanded for a determination whether the privilege had been waived by the distribution of e-mail communications to people in the Sheriff's Department who had not requested advice.

Regional Airport Auth. v. LFG, LLC, 460 F.3d 697 (6th Cir. 2006) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendant in a CERCLA action, the Court found no error in a ruling denying attorney-client privilege protection to communications between the plaintiff's counsel and remediation consultants for the plaintiff, as the communications were not made to obtain legal advice.

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Legal Advice or Services -- Investigations

Sandra T.E. v. South Berwyn School Dist. 100, 600 F.3d 612 (7th Cir. 2009) : In a civil rights action arising from sexual assaults by a teacher upon students, the plaintiffs sought discovery of interview notes related to the case that had been prepared by a law firm retained by the school district. The Court reversed an order to compel disclosure of the notes, holding that the Judge had erroneously focused on the school district's announcement that it had retained the law firm to investigate the situation and had neglected the more significant engagement letter, which had provided that the firm would both investigate the district's response to allegations about the teacher and provide legal services in connection with the representation. Furthermore, the conduct of the attorneys and the treatment of their communications was consistent with their acting to provide legal services.

[t] Attorney-Client -- Protected Communications

United States v. Jones, 600 F.3d 847 (7th Cir. 2010) : The Court vacated the conviction of one defendant charged with conspiracy to distribute narcotics, because a detective identifying the voice on a tape recording indicated that he recognized the defendant's voice based on overhearing a courtroom conversation between the defendant and his attorney. It held that the detective's testimony did not violate the attorney-client privilege, as neither the contents nor the subject matter of the alleged conversation were revealed. However, the defendant challenged whether the conversation even occurred, but under the advocate-witness rule could not use his counsel to dispute the detective's story. The Court vacated the conviction because the Judge had not addressed the conflict of interest in ruling on a mistrial motion.

[aa] Attorney-Client -- Standing To Assert the Privilege

United States v. Smith, 454 F.3d 707 (7th Cir. 2006) : During defense cross-examination of a cooperating witness in a cocaine distribution case, the government objected on the basis of attorney-client privilege when the witness was asked what his counsel told him about the terms of his plea deal. Affirming, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to sustain the objection, when the witness had not asserted the privilege himself to at least one question regarding what his lawyer had told him and appeared ready to answer the defense questions without limitation. The Court noted that "the government did not act inappropriately in bringing the privilege issue to the court's attention," but that the privilege was not a proper basis for a government objection, since the privilege belonged solely to the witness.

[ee] Attorney-Client -- Waiver

[i.1] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Calling Attorney To Testify

United States v. Hyles, 479 F.3d 958 (8th Cir. 2007) : In a murder-for-hire trial arising from the murder of a witness against the defendant in a state drug trial, the defendant called his former attorney from the underlying case and asked him about discussions between them. Affirming, the Court led that the defendant had waived his privilege and could not assert it to bar the government from cross-examining the attorney.

[ii] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication

[C.1] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Delay in Asserting Privilege

United States v. Ary, 518 F.3d 775 (10th Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for fraud and stolen property offenses arising from transactions involving space artifacts, the Court found no error in a ruling that the defendant waived the attorney-client privilege and work product protection as to documents seized in a government search when he waited six weeks to assert protection after a Rule 16 discovery meeting. In a footnote, the Court suggested that it was "possible" that the defendant waived the privilege at the Rule 16 meeting itself, when he failed to raise any privilege claim despite the fact that the government provided an inventory of items seized in the search, which included the "black box" containing the allegedly privileged material.

[D] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Disclosure by Agent or Attorney

In re Grand Jury (Attorney-Client Privilege), 527 F.3d 200 (D.C. Cir. 2008) : The attorney for a psychiatrist being investigated for Medicaid fraud had shown copies of his client's patient records to the government in an effort to exonerate the client. When the government later subpoenaed the originals of the records for a forensic ink analysis to determine when they were created, the attorney and client moved to quash the subpoena, claiming attorney-client privilege. Affirming denial of the motion to quash, the Court held that sharing the records with the government destroyed whatever privilege might have attached to them by having been given to the attorney for the purpose of obtaining legal advice. In In re Grand Jury, 475 F.3d 1299 (D.C. Cir. 2007) , a corporation conducted an internal investigation into whether its past actions had violated federal campaign finance laws. The investigation was conducted by an outside law firm. John Doe, a corporate executive, retained separate counsel, and the corporation and its law firm entered into a joint defense agreement with Doe and his separate counsel. Pursuant to a DOJ demand, the corporation produced an unsigned copy of the minutes of a Board of Directors' meeting, which appeared to show that political activities proposed by Doe included illegal corporate contributions to federal political candidates. The corporation's law firm requested Doe to provide any recollections he had regarding the meeting, and Doe's personal attorney faxed to the law firm a signed copy of the minutes with Doe's "assignment recommendations" attached. The minutes seemed to indicate that there were no approved recommendations. The law firm contacted Doe and indicated that DOJ would want to know why the signed copy and the assignment recommendation were produced so late, and Doe responded that his assistant only recently had looked at his personal copy of the corporate minutes. Doe's personal counsel subsequently informed the corporation's law firm that the assignment recommendation was not a contemporaneous document and had been prepared later when Doe stated that his assistant had searched his personal files. The law firm informed DOJ that the assignment recommendations were not a contemporaneous record, and DOJ sought from corporate counsel the circumstances under which the document had been obtained and all conversations the law firm had with the persons who provided the document. The corporation originally claimed privilege, but relented when DOJ raised the crime-fraud exception. When confronted by DOJ with his conflicting statements concerning the manner in which the document had been provided to the corporation, Doe's attorney raised the attorney-client privilege. The Trial Judge rejected the claim of privilege, and the Court affirmed. It concluded that Doe waived any privilege, because "the disclosure of the document was more than inadvertent, its disclosure was actually the result of affirmative acts by the attorney and client now asserting the privilege."

In re Powerhouse Licensing, LLC, 441 F.3d 467 (6th Cir. 2006) : In an action over allegedly fraudulent asset transfers, the Trial Judge ordered the deposition of counsel for a judgment debtor and the production of allegedly privileged documents. Denying the debtor's petition for mandamus, the Court held that the privilege had been waived when the attorney submitted an affidavit regarding the challenged transactions that contained statements representing opinions based upon confidential attorney-client communications that went to the heart of the legal claims at issue.

[G] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Government Investigations

In re Qwest Communs. Int'l, 450 F.3d 1179 (10th Cir. 2006) : Adopting the majority position, the Court rejected the concept of "selective waiver," and held that disclosure of privileged information to a government regulator constituted a waiver for all purposes. It upheld the grant of the plaintiffs' motion to compel production of information given by the defendant to a government regulator in an attempt to cooperate with a government investigation. The Court concluded that "[t]he record does not establish a need for a rule of selective waiver to assure cooperation with law enforcement, to further the purposes of the attorney-client privilege or work-product doctrine, or to avoid unfairness to the disclosing party. ... [T]he rule Qwest advocates would be a leap, not a natural, incremental next step in the common law development of privileges and protections." It made no difference that Qwest had entered into a confidentiality agreement with the regulator before turning over the documents: "the confidentiality agreements gave the agencies broad discretion to use the Waiver Documents as they saw fit, and any restrictions on their use were loose in practice."

[I] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communications -- Inadvertent Waiver

Judson Atkinson Candies, Inc. v. Latini-Hohberger Dhimantec, 529 F.3d 371 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendants in an action by a judgment creditor seeking to set aside allegedly fraudulent transfers, the Court held there was no clear error in ordering return of an attorney's memorandum that had been produced to the plaintiff. The precautions taken to avoid disclosure were adequate, the disclosure was in a production of 30-40 boxes of documents, the memorandum did not appear to contain any evidence of crime or fraud, and the defendant's counsel took steps to rectify the error within three days of learning of the disclosure.

[J] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Disclosure of Privileged Communication -- Intent To Waive

United States v. Seale, 600 F.3d 473 (5th Cir. 2010) : The defendant was charged with a fatal kidnapping committed in 1964 after another participant gave a statement in 2006 to the FBI implicating the defendant. Affirming, the Court found no error in precluding the defense from calling the attorney for the informant to testify that he had recanted the statement, thereby impeaching his trial testimony, since there was no sufficient proof the informant intended to waive the privilege. Despite defense arguments that the informant knew his attorney was discussing his statement with defense counsel, at a hearing on whether the privilege had been waived, the informant's attorney flatly denied that his client had ever given him permission to speak to defense counsel or that his client had ever repudiated the statement he gave to the FBI. In any event, the defense declined to recall the informant as a witness to ask whether he intended to waive the privilege.

[iii] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Raising a Claim or Defense

[A] Civil Cases

In re County of Erie, 546 F.3d 222 (2d Cir. 2008) : In a class action suit challenging the constitutionality of strip searches of detainees, the Trial Judge found a waiver of attorney-client privilege as to certain e-mails between County officials and the County attorney's office on the ground that the County was claiming that it had qualified immunity and the lawyer's communications to the officials would bear upon its defense that the County had not violated clearly established law. The Court granted a mandamus petition and vacated the ruling below, holding that to constitute a waiver "a party must rely on privileged advice from his counsel to make his claim or defense." The Court "[d]ecline[d] to specify or speculate as to what degree of reliance is required because Petitioners here do not rely upon the advice of counsel in the assertion of their defense in this action." The "[p]etitioners do not claim a good faith or state of mind defense. They maintain only that their actions were lawful or that any rights violated were not clearly established." If a defense of lawful activity were enough to constitute a waiver of attorney-client privilege, then there could be a waiver in virtually every case in which a client consulted with an attorney in advance of an action.

In re Seagate Technology, LLC, 497 F.3d 1360 (Fed. Cir. 2007) (en banc): Seagate, threatened with suit and ultimately sued for patent infringement by Convolve, retained counsel to provide opinions regarding the validity of the patents. After Seagate indicated its intent to rely on the opinion letters in defending against willful infringement, Convolve moved to compel discovery of communications with other counsel, including trial counsel. The Judge held that the attorney-client privilege and work product protection were waived, and granted the order to compel. On mandamus review en banc, the Court granted Seagate's petition, holding that, as a general matter, asserting the advice of counsel defense and disclosing opinions of opinion counsel in response to a charge of willful infringement does not constitute waiver of the attorney-client privilege for communications with trial counsel. It reasoned that "the significantly different functions of trial counsel and opinion counsel advise against extending waiver to trial counsel. Whereas opinion counsel serves to provide an objective assessment for making informed business decisions, trial counsel focuses on litigation strategy and evaluates the most successful manner of presenting a case to a judicial decision maker ... in an adversarial process." The Court also overruled its prior standard for willful infringement, now requiring "at least a showing of objective recklessness," so "there is no affirmative obligation to obtain opinion of counsel." In In re Echostar Communs. Corp., 448 F.3d 1294 (Fed. Cir. 2006) , a patent infringement action, the defendants responded to an allegation of willful infringement that they had relied on the advice of in-house counsel. After the action was filed, they obtained additional legal advice from an outside firm but elected not to rely upon it. The plaintiffs obtained an order for discovery of documents in the possession of the defendant's in-house and outside counsel, after the Judge ruled that the attorney-client privilege and work product protection had been waived by the advice of counsel defense. On petition for mandamus, the Court held that the defense waived the privilege as to all attorney-client communications relating to the same subject matter, even though the defendants based the defense only on communications from the in-house counsel and outside counsel were not consulted until later. The Court concluded, however, that work product protection would continue to protect documents by the outside counsel that were not communicated to the defendants, as they would not bear on the defendants' belief as to infringement.

[B] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Raising a Claim or Defense -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Bauer, 551 F.3d 786 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions of a husband and wife for bankruptcy fraud and money laundering, holding that the wife waived her attorney-client privilege "by choosing to make her attorneys' performance the central element of her defense."

[C] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Raising a Claim or Defense -- Habeas Corpus Cases

United States v. Pinson, 584 F.3d 972 (10th Cir. 2009) : Dismissing an appeal from denial of a prisoner's § 2255 motion, the Court held that "[w]hen a habeas petitioner claims that he received ineffective assistance of counsel, he puts communications between him and his attorney directly in issue, and thus by implication waives the attorney-client privilege with respect to those communications." In this case, the Court found the scope of the order to the petitioner's attorney "a bit troubling," but found no abuse of discretion.

[iv] Attorney-Client -- Waiver -- Scope of Waiver

Hernandez v. Tanninen, 604 F.3d 1095 (9th Cir. 2010) : The plaintiff in an employment discrimination case added an allegation of conspiracy to cover up wrongdoing after a coworker, who had spoken with the plaintiff's attorney and agreed to provide a corroborative statement, later said that he "could not do that to" the supervisor. Realizing that he might now be a witness to the coworker's conduct, the attorney referred the case to another attorney. Subsequently, the defendants moved to compel production of the first attorney's entire file, arguing that because the plaintiff was relying on the attorney as a witness, fairness mandated that any privilege that once existed was waived entirely. The Court granted mandamus against an order compelling production of the entire file, holding that the privilege was waived only with respect to communications related to the attorney's communications with the coworker.

[3] Clergy-Penitent [Go To Main]

Varner v. Stovall, 500 F.3d 491 (6th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed the denial of habeas corpus relief to a state defendant convicted of assault with intent to commit murder for hiring a third party to shoot her abusive boyfriend. It held that Michigan did not violate the Religion Clauses of the First Amendment by limiting the clergy-penitent privilege to confidential communications with a minister in his or her professional capacity as a member of the clergy, and not extending the privilege to all religious communications. Thus, the privilege was properly denied to entries in her private journal, even if they might be construed as prayers.

[4] Government [Go To Main]

[a] Deliberative Process

[i] Federal Agencies

[B] Government -- Deliberative Process -- Federal Agencies -- Miscellaneous Cases

Loving v. Department of Defense, 550 F.3d 32 (D.C. Cir. 2008) : A soldier convicted of capital murder by a court-martial sued under the Freedom of Information Act seeking disclosure of memoranda prepared for the President in connection with his statutory review of the death sentence. Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, the Court held that the disputed documents came within FOIA Exemption 5 for documents protected by privilege. Memoranda from the Army and Defense Secretaries to the President advising him on his review fell squarely within the presidential communications privilege because they directly involved the President and their confidentiality "ensure[s] that presidential decision-making is of the highest caliber, informed by honest advice and full knowledge." The Judge Advocate General's recommendation, which was forwarded by the Army Secretary to the President, likewise fell within the presidential communication privilege, because the President solicited and received in a manner sufficient to bring it within the privilege. The Court held that a memorandum from the Department of Defense Office of General Counsel to the Counsel for the President came within the deliberative process privilege. The plaintiff's interest did not constitute a public interest in disclosure surmounting the privilege, and there was no abuse of discretion in the Judge's decision not to conduct in camera review to determine whether the document contained segregable factual portions that might be disclosed. In Judicial Watch, Inc., v. FDA, 449 F.3d 141 (D.C. Cir. 2006) , an action seeking enforcement of an FOIA request for all documents related to the FDA's approval of the drug mifepristone, the FDA asserted the deliberative process privilege with respect to certain of the documents. The petitioner argued that undated documents could not be predecisional, but the Court stated that dates are "but one way to illustrate a chronology" and noted that some of the documents in question were clearly predecisional because they were concerned with a filing made well before the FDA's approval of the drug. The Court noted, however, that some of the undated documents were not as clearly predecisional, and so remanded so that the FDA could provide more information about those documents. It also observed that even documents prepared after the approval of the drug might be predecisional "with respect to other nonfinal agency policies, including uses of the drug that the agency has not approved."

Stewart v. United States Dept. of Interior, 554 F.3d 1236 (10th Cir. 2009) : The Court reversed the grant of a FOIA request for documents prepared by a consultant to the Bureau of Land Management. The Judge had considered the consultant analogous to a nongovernmental consultant because his scholarly work in the field and his advocacy indicated that he had deep-seated views and thus was not a disinterested expert. The Court concluded, however, that materials prepared by a paid consultant to an agency come within the deliberative process privilege unless the consultant has a personal or economic stake in the outcome of the process.

[d] Government -- Informant's Privilege

[i] Government -- Informant's Privilege -- Civil Cases

In re United States Dep't of Homeland Sec., 459 F.3d 565 (5th Cir. 2006) : The Court dismissed the Department's petition for writ of mandamus against an order compelling disclosure of documents allegedly protected by the law enforcement privilege. The underlying action was one in which a surety company and a bonding agent sought to estop the Department from collecting bonds posted by aliens pending their removal. The Department argued that the documents contained information about "ongoing criminal investigations -- including investigative leads and identifying information relating to witnesses and law enforcement personnel." The Court first held that the Judge should have recognized the existence of the privilege because "in today's times the compelled production of government documents could impact highly sensitive matters relating to national security." It then remanded the matter for a review of the documents in camera and, by balancing "the government's interest in confidentiality against the litigant's need for the documents," a determination whether the documents were privileged. The Court advised that in making this determination, the Judge should consider the ten factors set out in Frankenhauser v. Rizzo, 59 F.R.D. 339 (E.D. Pa. 1973) : (1) the extent to which disclosure will thwart governmental processes by discouraging citizens from giving the government information; (2) the impact upon persons who have given information of having their identities disclosed; (3) the degree to which governmental self-evaluation and consequent program improvement will be chilled by disclosure; (4) whether the information sought is factual data or evaluative summary; (5) whether the party seeking the discovery is an actual or potential defendant in any criminal proceeding either pending or reasonably likely to follow from the incident in question; (6) whether the police investigation has been completed; (7) whether any intradepartmental disciplinary proceedings have arisen or may arise from the investigation; (8) whether the plaintiff's suit is non-frivolous and brought in good faith; (9) whether the information sought is available through other discovery or from other sources; and (10) the importance of the information sought to the requesting party's case.

[ii] Government -- Informant's Privilege -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Roberson, 439 F.3d 934 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming convictions for a crack cocaine distribution conspiracy, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the denial of a motion to disclose the identity of a confidential informant. The informant, who claimed to have witnessed a defendant possessing crack cocaine (but not to have witnessed a drug transaction), was a mere tipster, and disclosure would have been only marginal value to the codefendant's case.

United States v. Decoud, 456 F.3d 996 (9th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed convictions for a conspiracy to distribute crack cocaine, finding no abuse of discretion in the denial of a motion to disclose the identity of a confidential informant. While the informant, who was the source of information used to support a warrant application, might have testified to lack of knowledge of one defendant's involvement in the conspiracy, that fact was undisputed and could have been elicited with other information. Besides, the testimony would have been of little help to the defendant, because it would have done little to refute the affirmative proof of her involvement. Finally, the government did not rely on the informant in any aspect of its case against the defendant, and the informant was not involved in any transaction contained in the indictment.

United States v. Flores, 572 F.3d 1254 (11th Cir. 2009) : During a RICO trial of gang killings, a cooperating witness testified he did not buy drugs for personal use when he was not monitored and the ICE agent who directed him testified he knew that to be a fact because he "had another informant within the gang that would also provide me intelligence at the same time." When the defense sought the identity of this other informant, the Judge conducted an in camera review of unredacted government materials and concluded that they showed no direct criminal participation by the unidentified informant, his probable testimony would not aid in establishing a defense, and the government had a legitimate interest in nondisclosure. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, since the defendant did not satisfy his burden of establishing the relationship between his defense and the probable testimony of the informant, and the government cited interests in the informant's safety and his involvement in ongoing investigations.

[e] Government -- Invocation by Head of Department

Marriott Int'l Resorts, L.P. v. United States, 437 F.3d 1302 (Fed. Cir. 2006) : A partnership seeking readjustment of tax liabilities requested production of documents relied upon by the IRS in framing its regulations, but the government asserted "executive privilege" as to some of the documents, pursuant to invocation of the privilege by the IRS Assistant Chief Counsel, who had examined the voluminous documents at issue. Reversing a ruling that the invocation of privilege was procedurally flawed because it was not made by the head of the agency, the Court held that the "deliberative process" executive privilege, unlike the "military and state secrets" privilege, could be invoked by a subordinate officer to whom the authority had been properly delegated, as it was in this case. The Court noted that delegating review "undoubtedly results in a more thorough, more consistent, and timelier review." It justified the distinction between the privileges on the ground that the state secrets privilege is absolute and there is ordinarily no in camera judicial review possible of the highly sensitive withheld documents. One Judge dissented, arguing that limiting exercise of executive privilege to agency heads "helps ensure that the privilege is not abused or overused."

[e.1] Government -- Law Enforcement Investigation

Commonwealth of Puerto Rico v. United States, 490 F.3d 50 (1st Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed judgments for the United States in two actions by Puerto Rico to compel disclosure of materials related to activities of employees of the FBI. The Court noted that it and other federal circuits have recognized a privilege for law enforcement materials that was similar to the exemption in the Freedom of Information Act for law enforcement materials. The Court held that the privilege it recognized in United States v. Cintolo, 818 F.2d 980 (1st Cir. 1987) (see Manual § 501.03[4][d][ii]), for "confidential government surveillance information" would be extended to "law enforcement techniques and procedures."

In re City of New York, 607 F.3d 923 (2d Cir. 2010) : The plaintiffs, who were arrested for protesting during the Republican National Convention, brought an action for violation of their constitutional rights. Rejecting the City's invocation of the law enforcement privilege, the Judge ordered the disclosure of field reports submitted by undercover officers in advance of the convention, reasoning that the reports would be relevant to challenge the City's claim that its pre-convention investigation of violent protestors supported its policy of mass arrests of protestors during the convention, and that the City's interests could be protected by limiting access to "attorney's eyes only" or to keeping the reports "under seal." The Court granted a writ of mandamus and held that the privilege protected against any kind of disclosure of the reports. It was not at all convinced that the procedures of "under seal" or "attorney's eyes only" would be sufficiently protective, in light of the risk of leaks and the consequences of disclosure to the interests in public safety. It also held that the plaintiffs had not overcome the "strong presumption" against lifting the law enforcement privilege. Conducting its own review of the records, the Court found that the field reports were largely confirmatory of other information that the City had already produced.

[f.1] Government -- Mental Processes of Judges and Government Agents

United States v. Anderson, 560 F.3d 275 (5th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for sex trafficking of children, the defendant issued a subpoena to a Judge who in an unrelated case had accepted a plea on a failure-to-identify charge from one of the girls who allegedly worked for the defendant. Hoping to support his claim that he did not know the girl was a minor, the defendant sought to elicit from the subpoenaed Judge that he did not suspect she was a juvenile when accepting the plea. Affirming the conviction, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the subpoena was quashed, as the defendant sought discovery of the Judge's mental processes, which are protected from compelled testimony because disclosure " 'would be destructive of judicial responsibility.' "

[g] Government -- Presidential Communications

Loving v. Department of Defense, 550 F.3d 32 (D.C. Cir. 2008) : A soldier convicted of capital murder by a court-martial sued under the Freedom of Information Act seeking disclosure of memoranda prepared for the President in connection with his statutory review of the death sentence. Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, the Court held that the disputed documents came within FOIA Exemption 5 for documents protected by privilege. Memoranda from the Army and Defense Secretaries to the President advising him on his review fell squarely within the presidential communications privilege because they directly involved the President and their confidentiality "ensure[s] that presidential decision-making is of the highest caliber, informed by honest advice and full knowledge." The Judge Advocate General's recommendation, which was forwarded by the Army Secretary to the President, likewise fell within the presidential communication privilege, because the President solicited and received in a manner sufficient to bring it within the privilege. The Court held that a memorandum from the Department of Defense Office of General Counsel to the Counsel for the President came within the deliberative process privilege. The plaintiff's interest did not constitute a public interest in disclosure surmounting the privilege, and there was no abuse of discretion in the Judge's decision not to conduct in camera review to determine whether the document contained segregable factual portions that might be disclosed.

[i] Government -- State or Military Secrets

[i] Civil Cases

In re Sealed Case, 494 F.3d 139 (D.C. Cir. 2007) : In a DEA agent's Bivens action against State Department and CIA officials, the United States intervened and asserted the state secrets privilege regarding two internal investigations that had been conducted by agency inspectors general. The Court affirmed a ruling sustaining the privilege claims, although it reversed dismissal of the action, finding sufficient nonprivileged information to state a claim and no deprivation of a valid defense resulting from sustaining the privilege. The Court rejected an argument against the privilege in Bivens actions, finding no distinction from the statutory claims in Reynolds. It also noted that the Federal Rules, under which the privilege has been recognized, apply unless they offend the constitutional trial rights of litigants, which was not the case here. The Court found no abuse of discretion when the privilege was sustained after the Judge had conducted an ex parte, in camera review of the reports at issue.

Doe v. CIA, 576 F.3d 95 (2d Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed dismissal of claims by the wife and children of a former covert-status CIA employee related to his termination, finding no violation of the plaintiffs' constitutional right of access to the courts, where the agency properly asserted the state secrets privilege, and the District Judge properly reviewed the privilege claim ex parte and in camera and determined that the litigation could proceed no further without disclosure of the privileged information. The Court noted that the proceedings were conducted ex parte and in camera "for good and sufficient reason ... to ensure that legitimate state secrets were not lost in the process."

El-Masri v. United States, 479 F.3d 296 (4th Cir. 2007) : A suspected terrorist sued CIA officials, alleging that he had been illegally detained as part of the CIA's "extraordinary rendition" program, tortured, and subjected to other inhumane treatment. The Court found that dismissal was required because the plaintiff's claims and the government's defenses could not fairly be litigated without disclosure of state secrets. Although the existence of the "rendition" program may be widely known, the controlling inquiry "is not whether the general subject matter of an action can be described without resort to state secrets," but "whether an action can be litigated without threatening the disclosure of state secrets." In this case, proof of the plaintiff's claim would require "evidence that exposes how the CIA organizes, staffs, and supervises its most sensitive intelligence operations." Moreover, the defense would necessarily involve disclosure of information regarding the actual circumstances of the plaintiff's detention and treatment, by witnesses whose very identity is secret.

Al-Haramain Islamic Found., Inc. v. Bush, 507 F.3d 1190 (9th Cir. 2007) : In an action by an Islamic foundation designated as a terrorist organization to challenge the government's terrorist surveillance program (TSP), the government's motion to dismiss on state secret privilege grounds was denied, but the Court reversed and remanded. The Court first rejected the argument that the subject matter of the lawsuit was itself a state secret, because the government had publicly disclosed information about TSP: "the government's many attempts to assuage citizens' fears that they have not been surveilled now doom the government's assertion that the very subject matter of this litigation, the existence of a warrantless surveillance program, is barred by the state secrets privilege." However, the Court concluded that the privilege protected a "Top Secret" document erroneously provided to the Foundation in 2004 during a proceeding to freeze its assets. The Court agreed with the Trial Judge that the government had not waived the privilege by inadvertent disclosure. As to whether the document involved a state secret, the Court declared: "We take very seriously our obligation to review the documents with a very careful, indeed a skeptical eye, and not to accept at face value the government's claim or justification of privilege... . That said, we acknowledge the need to defer to the Executive on matters of foreign policy and national security and surely cannot legitimately find ourselves second-guessing the Executive in this arena." The government sustained its burden with "[d]etailed statements ... that disclosure of information concerning the means, sources and methods of intelligence gathering in the context of this case would undermine the government's intelligence capabilities and compromise national security." The Court concluded that without the information from the "Top Secret" document, the foundation was unable to establish standing to challenge the TSP. The Court remanded for consideration of whether the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act preempts the common-law state secrets privilege.

[ii] Government -- State and Military Secrets -- Criminal Cases

In re Terrorist Bombings of U.S. Embassies in E. Africa, 552 F.3d 93 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for al Qaeda terrorism in 1998, finding no violation of Fifth and Sixth Amendment rights to present a defense in Classified Information Procedures Act provisions limiting access to classified materials to persons holding a security clearance. In United States v. Aref, 533 F.3d 72 (2d Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed convictions for money laundering and providing material support for a terrorist organization. It found no abuse of discretion in permitting the government to file certain material under seal and in issuing orders under seal that withheld information from the defendants. Applying the Classified Information Procedures Act, the Court found the privilege to protect classified information and other state secrets applicable in this case, even though the government failed to assert the claim of privilege through the head of the department with control over the matter; it indicated that it expected the head of the department to properly make the claim in future cases. The Court reviewed the sealed material and noted that "the Government has established a reasonable danger that disclosure would jeopardize national security" and that "the district court did not deny the defendants any helpful evidence." Although it found that the sealed documents were properly withheld from the defendants and the public, the Court cautioned that "we reinforce the requirement that district courts avoid sealing documents in their entirety unless necessary" and that "[t]ransparency is pivotal to public perception of the judiciary's legitimacy and independence." It also added that "[w]e recognize, however, that transparency must at times yield to more compelling interests."

United States v. Abu Ali, 528 F.3d 210 (4th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a defendant's convictions arising from his affiliation with al-Qaeda. It discussed the Classified Information Procedures Act and the balance that a Trial Judge must strike between nondisclosure of classified information and the defendant's right to prepare a defense. It held that, at a minimum, the Judge must provide the same version of evidence to the defendant that is provided to the jury. The Court declared that "[i]f the government does not want the defendant to be privy to information that is classified, it may either declassify the document, seek approval of an effective substitute, or forego its use altogether. What the government cannot do is hide the evidence from the defendant, but give it to the jury. Such plainly violates the Confrontation Clause." In this case, the Court found error and a confrontation violation, albeit harmless, in the Judge's providing the jury with unredacted versions of classified information while the defendant was given only redacted substitute versions.

[5] Marital [Go To Main]

[a] Adverse Testimony

[iv] Marital -- Adverse Testimony -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Thompson, 454 F.3d 459 (5th Cir. 2006) : Affirming convictions for bank robbery, the Court held there was no plain error in admitting at trial testimony given by a defendant's wife at a pre-trial detention hearing. Contrary to the defendant's argument, a right to have a spouse-witness affirmatively warned of the right not to testify against his or her spouse is not supported in the case law.

[b] Marital -- Common-law Marriage, Cohabitants

United States v. Rivera, 527 F.3d 891 (9th Cir. 2008) : Affirming drug conspiracy convictions, the Court rejected defense arguments that minimization procedures in conducting wiretaps had been inadequate. It noted that communications between one defendant and a woman were not covered by a marital privilege, since the only contention was that they had children together.

[c] Marital -- Confidential Communications

[i] Confidentiality

United States v. Griffin, 440 F.3d 1138 (9th Cir. 2006) : The Court held that the marital communications privilege was inapplicable to letters sent by a prisoner to his wife. The prisoner was incarcerated in California, where prison regulations indicated that mail may be read by prison authorities; therefore, there was no expectation of confidentiality.

[ii] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Holder of Privilege

United States v. Darif, 446 F.3d 701 (7th Cir. 2006) : The Court held that both spouses may claim the marital communications privilege.

[iii] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Joint Participants in Crime

United States v. Miller, 588 F.3d 897 (5th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for tax evasion, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony from the defendant's former wife about conversations with the defendant as to whether checks received in their business should go into business or personal accounts and regarding his decision not to file tax returns because he believed that filing was not necessary and unconstitutional. The communications related to joint criminal activity, even though the witness was not charged with a crime, and were thus not protected by the confidential marital communications privilege.

United States v. King, 541 F.3d 1143 (5th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to possess cocaine with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting transcripts of tape-recorded conversations between the defendant and his wife. Because the conversations involved potential criminal activity of hiding assets, the "joint participation" exception to the privilege for confidential spousal communications applied.

[v] Marital -- Confidential Communications -- Statements in Furtherance of Crime or Fraud

United States v. Darif, 446 F.3d 701 (7th Cir. 2006) : The defendant, charged with conspiracy to commit marriage fraud for allegedly paying an American citizen to marry him and help him obtain a visa, was also charged with witness tampering, based on a letter that he sent to his wife, while in jail pending trial, in which he urged her to contradict her grand jury testimony. Affirming, the Court upheld a ruling that the marital communications privilege did not apply because the defendant and his wife were joint participants in crime. (Thus, the Court applied a "joint participants" exception to the marital communications privilege, when in fact the proper exception -- as with the attorney-client privilege -- would have been for statements made in furtherance of crime or fraud.) In a footnote, the Court stated that "[o]ur analysis would be different if in fact the letter had no relation to the marriage fraud charges, and the letter represented the first time that Defendant suggested that Kirklin [the wife] change her testimony." In those circumstances, the communication would not have been in furtherance of a crime, but would have been a suggestion of a new crime that the wife would not yet have accepted.

[d] Marital -- Exceptions

[ii] Marital -- Exceptions -- Crime Against Children

United States v. Banks, 556 F.3d 967 (9th Cir. 2009) : The defendant was convicted for producing child pornography and related offenses in a case in which the victim was the defendant's grandson. The defendant's wife testified against him at trial, relating confidential communications that the defendant had made to her. The Judge admitted this testimony over a claim of marital communications privilege, reasoning that the exception for harm to children applied. Reversing, the Court held that the harm-to-child exception should apply only if the victim is a child or step-child of one or both of the marital partners, or a "functional equivalent of a birth or step-child." Here, the strong bond between the victim and his grandparents, infrequent overnight visits, and even regular day-care services did not satisfy the "functional equivalence" standard.

[6] Newsreporter [Go To Main]

[a] Common-law Privilege for Sources

New York Times Co. v. Gonzalez, 459 F.3d 160 (2d Cir. 2006) : The Times sought a declaratory judgment that phone records of its reporters in the hands of third party providers were shielded from a grand jury subpoena by reporters' privileges protecting the confidentiality of sources. The government argued that regardless of any privileges the reporters may have, they did not defeat a subpoena directed to a third party provider. The Court held that "so long as the third party plays an integral role in reporters' work, the records of third parties detailing that work are, when sought by the government, covered by the same privileges afforded to the reporters themselves." Because the telephone plays an integral role in a reporter's work, "any common law or First Amendment protection that protects the reporters also protects their third party telephone records sought by the government." After considering the government's compelling interest, whether the information was necessary and critical to the maintenance of the claim, and whether the information was obtainable from other sources, the Court concluded that any common-law privilege was overcome as a matter of law. It also held that reporters have no First Amendment right to shield their confidential sources from a grand jury investigation.

[b] Newsreporter -- Constitutional Privilege for Sources

New York Times Co. v. Gonzalez, 459 F.3d 160 (2d Cir. 2006) : The Times sought a declaratory judgment that phone records of its reporters in the hands of third party providers were shielded from a grand jury subpoena by reporters'

privileges protecting the confidentiality of sources. The government argued that regardless of any privileges the reporters may have, they did not defeat a subpoena directed to a third party provider. The Court held that "so long as the third party plays an integral role in reporters' work, the records of third parties detailing that work are, when sought by the government, covered by the same privileges afforded to the reporters themselves." Because the telephone plays an integral role in a reporter's work, "any common law or First Amendment protection that protects the reporters also protects their third party telephone records sought by the government." After considering the government's compelling interest, whether the information was necessary and critical to the maintenance of the claim, and whether the information was obtainable from other sources, the Court concluded that any common-law privilege was overcome as a matter of law. It also held that reporters have no First Amendment right to shield their confidential sources from a grand jury investigation.

[7] Physician-Patient [Go To Main]

[b] Physician-Patient -- Generally

United States v. Bek, 493 F.3d 790 (7th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for prescribing drugs without a proper medical purpose, the Court rejected a defense argument that patient records had been erroneously admitted in violation of the physician-patient privilege. The controlling law in this federal prosecution was federal common law, which provides no physician-patient privilege. The Court declined to adopt a physician-patient privilege in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Jaffee v. Redmond, finding "no circuit authority in support of a physician-patient privilege even after Jaffee" and seeing no reason to create such a privilege.

[8] Psychotherapists [Go To Main]

[c] Psychotherapists -- Exceptions

[iv] Psychotherapists -- Exceptions -- Threats

United States v. Auster, 517 F.3d 312 (5th Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution charging the defendant with extortion in connection with his workers' compensation claim, the government offered communications between the defendant and his therapist relating threats to harm others, arguing that they fell within the "dangerous patient" exception to the therapist-patient privilege. The Judge ruled that the exception did not apply, because by the time of the defendant's criminal trial disclosure was not necessary to protect anyone from imminent harm. On interlocutory appeal, the Court reversed, holding that the applicability of the dangerous patient exception was inapposite, because the statements to the therapist were not privileged in the first place. The defendant had been repeatedly warned that any threats to harm others that he made to his therapist would have to be reported to the authorities and to potential victims. Therefore he had no reasonable expectation of confidentiality when he made the threats.

[f] Psychotherapists -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Wilk, 572 F.3d 1229 (11th Cir. 2009) : The defendant was convicted for killing a police officer assisting in execution of a search warrant during a federal investigation. Affirming, the Court held that evidence and testimony relating to the defendant's medical records were not protected by the psychotherapist-patient privilege. The Judge had granted the defendant's motion to exclude two records authored by psychologists, and other records failed to show that the defendant ever consulted any personnel about his emotional wellbeing; they were also covered by an "informed consent" form that indicated they would be released "as specifically required by law." The Court found no abuse of discretion in the decision declining to adopt Florida's physician-patient privilege as to certain HIV-related medical records; in any event, the defendant continually relied on his mental status from HIV dementia as central to his defense.

[h] Psychotherapists -- Waiver

Koch v. Cox, 489 F.3d 384 (D.C. Cir. 2007) : In an employee's ADA action against the SEC for failing to accommodate his medical conditions, the Court reversed an order denying, on grounds of waiver, the plaintiff's motion to quash a subpoena for confidential records of communications with his psychoanalyst. The plaintiff's complaint had not alleged any psychological or mental injury from the SEC's conduct, nor asserted any claim of emotional distress damages. Although he acknowledged in a deposition suffering from depression and referred in discovery to "stress" and "humiliation," "those answers do not clearly make an allegation of, much less a claim to recovery for, emotional distress." And his waiver of his privilege as to his psychopharmacologist was unrelated to his mental or emotional condition; he claimed heart problems related to a lipid disorder for which that physician administered medication and managed its effects. The Court added that the defendant could not overcome the privilege by putting the plaintiff's mental state at issue.

In re Sims, 534 F.3d 117 (2d Cir. 2008) : In a prisoner's civil rights action for excessive force, the defendants obtained an order for disclosure of the plaintiff's psychiatric records, on the grounds that he "had put his psychiatric history at issue by relying on evidence that he suffered from a pre-existing physical condition to support his claim that he was attacked," and by claiming that the attack on him was unprovoked, since his "psychiatric records might show that he had masochistic or suicidal tendencies undermining his claim." Reversing the order on mandamus review, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to treat the plaintiff's psychotherapist privilege as being waived. Neither in his complaint nor in his deposition did he indicate he was seeking damages for mental or emotional injuries; his reference to prior psychiatric treatment was in a deposition for which he had requested and been denied assignment of counsel and where there was no indication he was even aware of his privilege; when represented by counsel he expressly disavowed any claim for unusual emotional injuries; he had not used his mental condition in an effort to support his claim; the defendants' efforts to put his mental condition in issue could not operate as a waiver; and merely seeking damages for "garden variety" pain and suffering accompanying physical injuries is not a waiver of the privilege.

Maday v. Public Libraries, 480 F.3d 815 (6th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in an age discrimination action brought by a former employee, the Court found no error in the admission of a record from the plaintiff's meeting with a social worker-therapist, which contained the social worker's statement that the plaintiff was "unhappy with her attorney who told her he didn't want to be used as a tool for revenge." The Court held that the plaintiff waived her psychotherapist-patient privilege when she "put her emotional state at issue in the case." Therefore, the records were subject only to Rule 403 balancing. Although the record referred to a private conversation between the plaintiff and her attorney, the attorney-client privilege had been waived by the plaintiff's disclosure of the conversation to the social worker. In the Court's view, "Maday's argument that the social-worker and attorney-client privileges should be combined is unavailing in a situation where, as here, both privileges have clearly been waived."

Doe v. Oberweis Dairy, 456 F.3d 704 (7th Cir. 2006) : In a Title VII action for sexual harassment, the Court held that the plaintiff had waived her psychotherapist-patient privilege by seeking damages for emotional distress.

[10] Special Privileges [Go To Main]

[0.1] Special Privileges -- Arbitration Materials

Gotham Holdings, LP v. Health Grades, Inc., 580 F.3d 664 (7th Cir. 2009) : The defendant in a litigation contended that an arbitration award supported its view of the merits and tendered the award and some of the documents exchanged in the arbitration. When the plaintiff asked to see related documents, the defendant refused on the ground that the parties to the arbitration had pledged confidentiality. Affirming an order enforcing a subpoena directed to the other party in the arbitration, the Court held that even if the confidentiality agreement had not provided that the materials could be disclosed in response to a subpoena, the confidentiality provision would not be effective. "Contracts bind only the parties. No one can 'agree' with someone else that a stranger[']s resort to discovery under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure will be cut off."

[i] Special Privileges -- Internal Investigations, Peer Review, and Self-Analysis

Adkins v. Christie, 488 F.3d 1324 (11th Cir. 2007) : Reversing summary judgment for the defendants in an action by an African-American physician claiming discriminatory termination of his hospital privileges, the Court found that the Trial Judge unduly limited discovery and held that it would decline in federal discrimination cases to recognize a peer review privilege for documents relating to medical peer review proceedings. While a peer review privilege is recognized by all 50 states and the District of Columbia, the state statutes address different policy concerns in their focus on malpractice suits.

[11] State Law [Go To Main]

[a] Diversity Actions

Babasa v. Lenscrafters, Inc., 498 F.3d 972 (9th Cir. 2007) : Affirming remand of a class action because removal was untimely, the Court agreed with the Trial Judge that a letter sent by plaintiffs' counsel to defense counsel clearly indicated that the amount in controversy satisfied federal jurisdictional requirements and that the defendant waited too long to file for removal. The Court declined to decide whether California's mediation privilege applied to the letter, because, even though the case was in the diversity jurisdiction, the question of jurisdictional amount is a federal question, and under Rule 501 the federal law of privilege controls. Moreover, the defendant waived any argument that the letter fell within a federal evidentiary privilege by failing to raise a privilege claim before the Trial Judge or in appellate briefs.

[12] Tax Practitioner [Go To Main]

Valero Energy Corp. v. United States, 569 F.3d 626 (7th Cir. 2009) : The IRS issued a summons to accountants seeking documents related to tax planning for a corporate merger. Affirming an order enforcing the summons, the Court held that some of the documents were unprotected by the tax practitioner-client privilege and others came within the exception for promotion of tax shelters. The Court noted that the privilege extends to tax practitioners only to the extent they are doing lawyers' work, so it is not enough that the communications raise federal tax topics, and to the extent that documents are used for both preparing tax returns and litigation, they are not protected. As for the exception, it encompasses any plan or arrangement whose significant purpose is to avoid or evade federal taxes, regardless of whether prepackaged or individualized, and it applies to documents encouraging participation in a tax shelter, but not those merely informing about such schemes, assessing such plans in a neutral fashion, or evaluating soft spots in tax shelters that the client has used in the past. In United States v. BDO Seidman, LLP, 492 F.3d 806 (7th Cir. 2007) , in a proceeding to enforce administrative subpoenas issued by the IRS in connection with an investigation into abusive tax shelters, the Court held that the tax practitioner privilege is subject to an exception for communications in connection with tax shelters and that the IRS has the burden of proving that a document falls within the exception.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 601 RULE 601

3-601 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 601.syn

§ 601.syn Synopsis to Chapter 601: RULE 601

601.01 Official Text

601.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Federal and State Law

[2] Judicial Discretion

[3] Competency of Hearsay Declarants

601.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Attorneys As Witnesses

[2] Children As Witnesses

[3] Compensated Lay Witness

[4] Competency of Hearsay Declarants

[5] Dead Man's Statute

[6] Drug Use and Intoxication

[7] Expert Witnesses

[8] Hypnotized Witnesses

[9] Mental Incompetence or Illness

[10] Miscellaneous Cases

[11] State Law

[12] Voir Dire

601.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 275 (1999)

[3] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

[4] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

[5] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

[6] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 601 RULE 601

3-601 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 601.01

601.01 Official Text

Rule 601. General Rule of Competency

Every person is competent to be a witness except as otherwise provided in these rules. However, in civil actions and proceedings, with respect to an element of a claim or defense as to which State law supplies the rule of decision, the competency of a witness shall be determined in accordance with State law.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 601 RULE 601

3-601 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 601.02

601.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Federal and State Law

The Rule states that where federal law controls the claim or defense, every person is considered to be competent to be a witness unless another Rule provides otherwise. n1 See, e.g., Rules 605 and 606(b). The focus is no longer on the witness's competency, but rather on the witness's credibility. n2

Rule 601 looks to the states for tests of competency to apply "to an element of a claim or defense as to which State law supplies the rule of decision." Most importantly, Rule 601 ensures that Dead Man's Statutes will govern all elements of claims and defenses for which state law provides the rule of decision. n3 States' Dead Man's Statutes do not apply to federal question cases. n4

The Advisory Committee's proposal contained no reference to state law at all. The Advisory Committee was of the view that Dead Man's Statutes should not be applicable in any federal litigation. Congress was concerned, however, that the Advisory Committee's position presented an Erie problem. The Senate initially approved different language for Rule 601, corresponding to the language it preferred for Rule 501, which is fully discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment accompanying that Rule, § 501.02[1]. The House version prevails in both Rules.

One problem that was not anticipated by Rule 601 is whether a Federal Court should accept a state's characterization of its own rule of evidence when state law supplies the rule of decision with respect to an element of a claim or defense. Some states' Dead Man's Statutes -- e.g., California, Connecticut, and Virginia -- do not declare the surviving party to a transaction to be incompetent, but instead allow hearsay statements of decedents to be admitted or require corroboration of the survivor's testimony. If these states do not deem their Dead Man's Statutes to be competency rules, Rule 601 is not by its own force applicable. Nor does any other Federal Rule require Federal Courts to follow the state rules on hearsay. However, the intent of Rule 601 is to defer to state policies regarding who can testify on issues relating to state-enacted law and to permit states to establish special protections in cases involving decedents. Therefore we think that Federal Courts should defer to state Dead Man Rules (as well as other rules preventing witnesses from testifying) even if states label their rules as something other than competency rules. n5

When state and federal issues are tried together, a problem arises similar to those previously analyzed in connection with Rule 501, see § 501.02[1]. In this context, the conflict is that the witness may be incompetent under state law to testify to state issues, but competent under federal law to testify to federal issues. The converse situation is quite unlikely to occur, given the liberal view as to competency provided by Rule 601.

In deciding whether enough evidence exists to go to a jury, the Trial Judge can use different competency rules for different claims. The Judge may also be able to do so in a nonjury case. But once the case is sent to the jury, it is doubtful that the jury will understand any limiting instruction that it should consider a witness to be competent as to some claims and incompetent as to others. A uniform application is thus required in these circumstances. Either the witness is incompetent as to both claims or competent as to both. As discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 501, our view is that when a conflict arises, the federal interest in obtaining testimony usually should predominate. n6

[2] Judicial Discretion

By referring to other Rules limiting the testimony of otherwise competent witnesses, Rule 601 leaves the Trial Court some discretion to exclude witnesses who are significantly impaired in their mental or emotional capacity. For example, the Judge retains the traditional discretion under Rule 403 to exclude a witness where the probative value of the testimony is substantially outweighed by the risks of unfair prejudice, undue time consumption, or jury confusion that might result from the witness' impaired state. Furthermore, if the witness is clearly not rational, the Judge has the discretion to exclude the witness under Rule 602, which requires the witness to be testifying on the basis of "personal knowledge." See also the Editorial Explanatory Comment accompanying Rule 603, § 603.02[2], suggesting that a witness' inability to satisfy the oath requirement might require rejection of the witness's testimony. n7

One problem in the drafting of Rule 601 is that it is not clear that the Trial Judge has the power to voir dire a witness in order to assess testimonial qualifications. Because the first sentence of Rule 601 states that every person is competent to be a witness, such voir dire would seem to be unnecessary. Yet, if we are correct in our assertion that Rule 403 allows the Trial Judge to exclude witnesses on the ground that their testimony would be substantially more prejudicial, time wasting, or confusing than probative, some form of interrogation of these witnesses may be necessary, and is certainly within the Judge's discretion. The same is true with the authority to exclude the witness under Rules 602 and 603. The Trial Judge should be able to put questions to the witness pursuant to these Rules, despite the first sentence of Rule 601. n8

[3] Competency of Hearsay Declarants

If it is assumed, as Courts have held, that the Trial Judge has the authority to exclude a witness on grounds of incompetency, a question arises whether the witness' hearsay statements should be excluded as well, even if they would otherwise fit a hearsay exception. This problem occurs fairly frequently in cases raising issues of child abuse, where the infant victim has made hearsay statements that would be admissible under a hearsay exception -- most commonly Rules 803(2), 803(4), or 807 -- and yet the child is found too young to appreciate the consequences of the oath and the responsibilities of being a witness. Most Courts have held that the child's incompetency to testify as a witness has no bearing on the admissibility of the hearsay statement. The reasoning is that the grounds for admitting the hearsay statement are unrelated to the child's ability to appreciate the oath and the consequences of testifying. For example, if the hearsay statement is an excited utterance, its truthfulness is supported by the fact that the child made the statement while under the influence of a startling event. If this is so, it does not matter that the child has no appreciation of the consequences of the oath; the hearsay statement is reliable anyway. Thus, the circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness surrounding the excited utterance substitute for the competency requirements at trial. n9 The same can be said for statements made for purposes of medical treatment or diagnosis (Rule 803(4)), n10 and statements reliable enough to be admitted under the residual exception (Rule 807). n11

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., United States v. Odom, 736 F.2d 104, 112 (4th Cir. 1984) :

> Under this rule, every witness is presumed to be competent. Neither feeble-mindedness nor insanity renders a witness incompetent or unqualified... The only grounds for disqualifying a party as a witness under Rule 601 ... are that the witness does not have knowledge of the matters about which he is to testify, that he does not have the capacity to recall, or that he does not understand the duty to testify truthfully.

See also United States v. Ramirez, 871 F.2d 582, 584 (6th Cir. 1989) (power to exclude testimony out of concern that the witness is impaired must be found "outside of Rule 601"; no abuse of discretion in admitting the testimony of a cocaine addict).

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Allen J., 127 F.3d 1292 (10th Cir. 1997) (Rule 601 places a "heavy burden on a party seeking to have a child declared incompetent to testify"; the fact that the 12-year-old witness suffered from fetal alcohol syndrome and had a learning disability was not enough to overcome this heavy burden; any problems with the witness' testimony "raise questions of credibility, not competence"); United States v. Hyson, 721 F.2d 856 (1st Cir. 1983) (there is no Rule permitting a witness's exclusion for mental incompetence; this is a credibility determination for the trier of fact).

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g. Brand v. Brand, 811 F.2d 74 (2d Cir. 1987) (under Rule 601, the Federal Court was required to apply the New York Dead Man's Statute in a diversity action); Waltzer v. Transidyne Gen. Corp., 697 F.2d 130 (6th Cir. 1983) (attorney's competency to testify as a witness in a diversity case is governed by state law). Dead Man's Statutes generally prohibit an interested witness from testifying to a transaction with a decedent when the decedent's estate is an adverse party. The rationale is to prevent unscrupulous claims against the estate. However, the consequence of the Dead Man's Rule is to confuse competency with credibility, and to preclude the enforcement of honest claims. For a thorough discussion of a typical Dead Man's Statute, see M. Martin & D. Capra, New York Evidence Handbook ch. 6 (Aspen, 2d ed. 2002).

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., Longoria v. Wilson, 730 F.2d 300 (5th Cir. 1984) (Dead Man's Statute is inapplicable to a civil rights action brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983).

(n5)Footnote 5. See Legg v. Chopra, 286 F.3d 286 (6th Cir. 2002) (expert properly excluded from testifying in a federal diversity action because Tennessee law requires experts in a medical malpractice case to be licensed either in Tennessee or in a contiguous state; the purpose of the law is to assure that only experts familiar with local standards of care should be permitted to testify; as such this is a competency rule).

(n6)Footnote 6. See Donohoe v. Consolidated Operating & Prod., 736 F. Supp. 845 (N.D. Ill. 1990) (Rule 601, which favors reception of evidence, applies to all claims when there is a mixture of federal and state claims).

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., United States v. Ramirez, 871 F.2d 582, 584 (6th Cir. 1989) (Trial Court can exercise control over impaired witnesses under three sources: (1) by balancing probative worth against prejudicial impact under Rule 403; (2) by excluding testimony of a witness who cannot "take or comprehend an oath or affirmation" under Rule 603; and (3) by finding the witness "impaired to the point that he would not be able to satisfy the personal knowledge requirement" of Rule 602). See also United States v. Hyson, 721 F.2d 856 (1st Cir. 1983) (Trial Court properly struck testimony on competency grounds, where the witness was incoherent due to drug use).

(n8)Footnote 8. See, e.g., United States v. Gutman, 725 F.2d 417 (7th Cir. 1984) ; (Trial Judge retains power, and sometimes the duty, to hold a hearing "to determine whether a witness should not be allowed to testify because insanity has made him incapable of testifying in a competent fashion"); United States v. Gates, 10 F.3d 765 (11th Cir. 1993) ("Notwithstanding Rule 601, a court has the power to rule that a witness is incapable of testifying, and in an appropriate case it has the duty to hold a hearing to determine that issue.").

(n9)Footnote 9. See Admissibility of Testimony Regarding Spontaneous Declarations Made by One Incompetent to Testify at Trial, 15 A.L.R. 4th 1043 (1987) (noting the difference between the grounds for admitting hearsay statements and the grounds for allowing witnesses to testify).

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., Morgan v. Foretich, 846 F.2d 941, 949 (4th Cir. 1988) ("The fact that a young child may be incompetent to testify at trial affects neither prong of the two-part test for admitting evidence under 803(4)").

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Dorian, 803 F.2d 1439 (8th Cir. 1986) (the incompetency of a child as a witness is irrelevant because admissibility under the residual hearsay exception does not depend on the declarant's ability to understand the purpose of questioning or the necessity to relate accurate information).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 601 RULE 601

3-601 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 601.03

601.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Attorneys As Witnesses

Complaint of Ta Chi Navigation (Panama) Corp., 677 F.2d 225 (2d Cir. 1982) : In a shipowner's action for exoneration from or limitation of liability for cargo damage claims, the Court found error where the corporation's attorney was excluded as a witness without considering the hardship to the client of having to forgo testimony that it could not have anticipated as necessary.

Ramey v. District 141, Int'l Ass'n of Machinists, 378 F.3d 269 (2d Cir. 2004) : The plaintiffs sued their union for breach of its duty of fair representation, arising from the treatment of their seniority status after a previous employer went bankrupt and a new employer took over. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court found no abuse of discretion when an attorney who had formerly represented the plaintiffs was permitted to testify to a central issue in the case, the union's hostility to the plaintiffs. The professional relationship between the attorney and the plaintiffs was of short duration, it had ended a decade before this case came to trial, and the attorney was not representing the plaintiffs in the trial.

Universal Athletic Sales Co. v. American Gym, Recreational & Athletic Equip. Corp., 546 F.2d 530 (3d Cir. 1976) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion (although it frowned on the practice) in permitting an associate in the law firm representing several defendants in a patent infringement action to testify as an expert witness. The Court commented in a footnote that "[i]t would be appropriate to consider incorporating within the body of evidentiary rules the current disciplinary norm proscribing the testimony of a lawyer for his client," although the Rules and existing precedent do not do so.

Grizzle v. Travelers Health Network, Inc., 14 F.3d 261 (5th Cir. 1994) : The Court held there was no error in precluding a paralegal employed by the plaintiff's counsel in an ADEA case from testifying as a "fact witness" as to the plaintiff's lost wages as derived from the EEOC's pay calculation computer program. Permitting testimony by an employee of an attorney who is assisting in the preparation and prosecution of a case is tantamount to permitting testimony by the attorney.

Waltzer v. Transidyne Gen. Corp., 697 F.2d 130 (6th Cir. 1983) : A subscriber sued a corporation for breach of a subscription agreement. Since state law governed the defense of rescission, the Court looked to the Michigan version of Rule 601 and found that an attorney for the corporation was competent to testify concerning contested issues. The Court suggested that the attorney should have withdrawn from representation when he should have foreseen that his testimony would be required.

Petrilli v. Drechsel, 94 F.3d 325 (7th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in a former employee's action challenging denial of severance and pension benefits, the Court held there was no error in taking testimony from the employer's in-house counsel, who was only a fact witness and not acting as advocate for the defendants. In Gusman v. Unisys Corp., 986 F.2d 1146 (7th Cir. 1993) , the Court held there was no reversible error in permitting an attorney for the plaintiff to authenticate a chart she prepared from materials the defendant produced in an age discrimination case. Especially where the defendant unexpectedly objected to the chart on foundational grounds, the Court was not inclined to find that the attorney's testimony presented the sort of conflict in roles that underlies the attorney-witness rule. In United States v. Ewing, n1 the Court affirmed a cocaine possession conviction, holding there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the defendant's attorney from testifying that his name was not written in two notebooks when they were seized by the police, although it appeared in them when they were introduced at trial. Because a paralegal who had accompanied the attorney testified to the alleged tampering, the attorney's testimony, although corroborative, would have been only cumulative. In an antitrust case, Will v. Comprehensive Accounting Corp., n2 the Court held that a lawyer for a franchiser was properly permitted to testify about advice he had given concerning the necessity of protecting trademarks and trade secrets, noting that a lawyer who has withdrawn from representation is not disqualified from testifying thereafter.

United States v. Watson, 952 F.2d 982 (8th Cir. 1991) : The prosecutor's opening statement in a drug trafficking case mentioned that the investigation began because of reports that one of the defendants was dealing at the location, while the investigating officer testified that the informant mentioned both defendants as sellers. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to allow examination of the Assistant U.S. Attorney to impeach the officer's testimony, as the AUSA's stated lapse of memory was not vital evidence and the ruling actually left the defendants in the superior position of being able to argue the incongruity without having any explanation introduced in evidence.

United States v. Edwards, 154 F.3d 915 (9th Cir. 1998) : The Court reversed a cocaine possession conviction as a result of improper vouching by the prosecutor. Although a bag containing crack cocaine was found in a car driven by the defendant, the car was registered to another person, and one officer who was present when the car was searched testified that there was nothing in the bag that established the identity of the owner. The night the officer testified, the prosecutor, in the presence of two police officers, examined the bag, which had been in the custody of the police for two years, and found a bail receipt bearing the defendant's name under a piece of cardboard at the bottom. The prosecutor called the two police officers who were present, and each testified as to the discovery of the bail receipt. The prosecutor identified the receipt as close to a "smoking gun" in closing argument. Observing that "the danger in having a prosecutor testify as a witness is that jurors will automatically presume the prosecutor to be credible and will not consider critically any evidence that may suggest otherwise," the Court reasoned that "[a]lthough the circumstances of this case do not fit neatly under either the advocate-witness rule or the vouching rule, there can be no question that the policies underlying both rules were directly contravened by the prosecutor's continued representation of the government."

Bickford v. John E. Mitchell Co., 595 F.2d 540 (10th Cir. 1979) : In a case involving patent rights, the Court held there was no error in permitting one of the defendant's lawyers to withdraw from the case and to be called as an expert witness on the value of the patents in question.

[2] Children As Witnesses

United States v. Thai, 29 F.3d 785 (2d Cir. 1994) : Affirming RICO convictions, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in a finding that a 61/2 -year-old was a competent witness, despite her youth.

United States v. Snyder, 189 F.3d 640 (7th Cir. 1999) : In a prosecution for producing child pornography, the defendant moved for a psychological examination of the 11-year-old complaining witness. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in denying the motion. The fact that some of the witness' statements were unfounded did not mean he was unable to differentiate between reality and fantasy; the fact he was taking medication that could make him incompetent did not mean the medication had in fact made him incompetent; and the defendant was able to effectively call the reliability of the witness' testimony into question on cross-examination.

United States v. Allen J., 127 F.3d 1292 (10th Cir. 1997) : Affirming an adjudication of juvenile delinquency resulting from the sexual assault of a minor, the Court found no error in the Trial Judge's finding that the victim was competent to testify. The Court noted that both Rule 601 and 18 U.S.C. § 3509(c)(2) place a "heavy burden on a party seeking to have a child declared incompetent to testify." The fact that the 12-year-old victim suffered from fetal alcohol syndrome and had a learning disability was not enough to overcome this heavy burden. The Court concluded that "[a]ny inconsistencies in the victim's story or problems with her testimony ... raise questions of credibility, not competence."

[3] Compensated Lay Witness

United States v. Davis, 261 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2001) : In a suit by a hazardous waste generator for contribution under CERCLA from potentially responsible parties, the Court found no error in the admission of deposition testimony by a driver who had hauled waste. The driver, who was unemployed and very ill at the time of his testimony (he died before trial), had been paid $700-800 by the plaintiff for the time he spent preparing and testifying. Rejecting arguments that the payments disqualified the driver as a witness and that his testimony should have been disregarded because he made inconsistent statements in affidavits he signed in an earlier Superfund case, the Court noted that the payment was not contingent on the outcome of the case, and that there were no direct inconsistencies between the affidavits and the testimony.

[4] Competency of Hearsay Declarants

United States v. Fields, 871 F.2d 188 (1st Cir. 1989) : Affirming bank robbery convictions, the Court held that a declaration against interest was properly admitted, even though the declarant was using drugs.

Morgan v. Foretich, 846 F.2d 941 (4th Cir. 1988) : In an action by a four-year-old child and her mother alleging child abuse on the part of the child's father and his parents, the Court reversed a judgment for the defendants, concluding that statements by the child were admissible under Rules 803(2) and 803(4) even if the child was not competent to testify as a witness.

[5] Dead Man's Statute

Rosenfeld v. Basquiat, 78 F.3d 84 (2d Cir. 1996) : In an art dealer's breach of contract action against an artist's estate, the Court held that testimony by the plaintiff regarding transactions with the artist was barred by New York's Dead Man's Statute.

Longoria v. Wilson, 730 F.2d 300 (5th Cir. 1984) : In this federal civil rights action, the Court held that a state Dead Man's Statute was inapplicable.

Sundstrand Corp. v. Sun Chem. Corp., 553 F.2d 1033 (7th Cir. 1977) : In this securities case, the Court noted that the Illinois Dead Man's Act did not apply when federal securities law was the basis for the suit.

Hanes v. Mid-America Petroleum, Inc., 577 F. Supp. 637 (W.D. Mo. 1983) : The Court found that the Petroleum Marketing Practices Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2801 et seq. , was enacted to establish a uniform set of rules governing the grounds for termination and nonrenewal of motor fuel marketing premises, that the Act did not displace state franchise law that would be used to fill the gaps in the Act, and that the federal approach to competency of witnesses would govern even though state law was incorporated by reference in the case. Thus, the Court held that the state Dead Man's Statute did not apply.

Equitable Life Assur. Soc'y of the U.S. v. McKay, 837 F.2d 904 (9th Cir. 1988) , after certified question answered, 861 F.2d 221 (9th Cir. 1988) : This interpleader action in the District Court for Oregon was governed by Washington law. The Trial Judge found the Dead Man's Statute substantive and applied the Washington statute. The Court of Appeals held that applicability of the Washington Dead Man's Statute depended on the choice of law rules of Oregon, and certified the question to the Oregon Supreme Court. The Oregon Supreme Court responded that the Washington Dead Man's Statute was procedural under Oregon law, so it was inapplicable in an Oregon Court.

[6] Drug Use and Intoxication

United States v. Hyson, 721 F.2d 856 (1st Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed the convictions for a narcotics conspiracy, approving the procedure followed after it appeared that a government witness might have been under the influence of narcotics. On the first day of the witness' testimony, the Judge asked whether he had taken any drugs before testifying and accepted the witness' "no" answer. On the second day, the witness appeared to have difficulty speaking, so the Judge suggested, and the government arranged for, a medical examination of the witness. Two days later, the examining physician reported that the witness had been under the influence of phencyclidine when testifying, causing him to be in "an acute confusional state." The doctor suggested the effects of the drug would clear in 24 hours; when he repeated his examination a day later, the witness was much improved and competent to testify. The Judge recalled the jurors, explained the situation, and told them that all of the second day's testimony of the witness was stricken. He also explained the doctor's examinations and findings and then permitted the witness to be recalled.

United States v. Van Meerbeke, 548 F.2d 415 (2d Cir. 1976) : Twice while testifying, the principal government witness in a drug case ingested some of the heroin that was offered into evidence. Although the Court affirmed the appellants' convictions, it criticized the Trial Judge for remaining silent at the time he first noticed the witness' actions. "Several courses were available, if sought: suspension of testimony for the day, a medical examination to determine the witness's capacity to continue with his testimony, and a stern warning to the witness outside the jury's hearing." The Court concluded it was not error to leave the jury with the task of evaluating the witness' credibility, especially since defense counsel brought out that the witness had ingested drugs on the stand.

United States v. Snead, 447 F. Supp. 1321 (E.D. Pa. 1978) , aff'd, 577 F.2d 730 (3d Cir. 1978) : The District Court held that a prosecution witness could testify about the occurrences on the day of a bank robbery, although he had been drinking slightly on that day.

United States v. Killian, 524 F.2d 1268 (5th Cir. 1975) : Affirming convictions for narcotics violations, the Court held there was no error in refusing to strike the testimony of an admitted drug user. In United States v. Jackson, n3 a prosecution of a doctor for unlawfully dispensing drugs, the defendant asked the Trial Judge to order psychiatric examinations of 13 government witnesses who used drugs. Affirming denial of the order, the Court noted that "[t]he fact that a witness is a narcotics user goes not to his competency but to his credibility," and that a Judge must consider in ruling on a motion for a psychiatric examination the invasion of a witness' privacy that would result.

United States v. Ramirez, 871 F.2d 582 (6th Cir. 1989) : The Court held that a coconspirator who was addicted to cocaine at the time of the incidents leading to trial was competent to testify, and that there was no error in barring expert testimony concerning the possible effect of drug usage.

United States v. Harris, 542 F.2d 1283 (7th Cir. 1976) : One government witness at a drug conspiracy trial testified that he had used heroin for years, that two days before the trial he had had a "fix," and that the day before trial he had received Demerol and Phenergon. On several occasions during his testimony the witness was observed to be bouncing or nodding, and a defense expert testified that a person receiving the dosages that the witness had received would experience some clouding of consciousness and difficulty in pinpointing accurate thoughts while testifying. Affirming, the Court emphasized that the witness' condition was a matter of credibility for evaluation by the jury. While using an intoxicated witness causes us concern, it is encouraging that the Court implied that the Trial Judge had discretion to exclude a witness who was intoxicated at the time of trial.

United States v. Callahan, 442 F. Supp. 1213 (D. Minn. 1978) , supplemented, 455 F. Supp. 524 (D. Minn. 1978) , rev'd on other grounds, 596 F.2d 759 (8th Cir. 1979) : The District Court read Rule 601 as establishing a presumption of competence, but as allowing a witness to be excluded if "drug use negated the threshold minimal level of competency required before a witness can take the stand."

[7] Expert Witnesses

Legg v. Chopra, 286 F.3d 286 (6th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in a diversity medical malpractice case, because the plaintiff's expert, a Texas physician, did not satisfy the Tennessee law holding only experts licensed in Tennessee or a contiguous state to be competent in medical malpractice cases. The Court held that the Tennessee statute governs "competency" within the meaning of Rule 601, since the law's structure reflects an intimate relationship between the standard of care and the qualification requirements of the medical expert who will establish that standard. The Court noted that Rule 601, as thus read, does not directly conflict with Rule 702, which governs the procedural issue of the reliability of an expert witness' opinions.

[8] Hypnotized Witnesses

Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44 (1987) : The defendant, charged with manslaughter for shooting her husband, underwent hypnosis with a trained neuropsychologist to refresh her memory. When she sought to testify that her gun had misfired, the state Trial Judge limited the testimony to matters remembered and stated to the psychologist before being hypnotized, even though her refreshed memory was consistent with defense expert testimony. Remanding, the Supreme Court held that the defendant's constitutional right to testify in her own behalf was violated by the ruling. Justice Blackmun's opinion for the Court recognized that "the right to present relevant testimony is not without limitation," but cautioned that "restrictions of a defendant's right to testify may not be arbitrary or disproportionate to the purposes they are designed to serve." The Court found that the Arkansas rule establishing a per se bar against posthypnosis testimony "operates to the detriment of any defendant who undergoes hypnosis, without regard to the reasons for it, the circumstances under which it took place, or any independent verification of the information it produced." Justice Blackmun concluded that Arkansas "has not justified the exclusion of all of a defendant's testimony that the defendant is unable to prove to be the product of prehypnosis memory," and that the State Courts had not considered the arguments for admitting Rock's testimony in light of the corroboration of recalled details.

Borawick v. Shay, 68 F.3d 597 (2d Cir. 1995) : The plaintiff brought a tort suit against her aunt and uncle for allegedly sexually abusing her when she was a child. Her proof consisted mainly of her hypnotically-refreshed memories. The Trial Judge excluded the hypnotically-refreshed testimony and entered summary judgment. Affirming, the Court adopted a totality-of-the-circumstances approach toward hypnotically-refreshed testimony, and set forth the following non-exclusive list of factors to be considered: (1) whether the hypnosis was used for the purpose of refreshing recollection, or whether it was conducted as part of therapy -- the latter being more reliable; (2) whether the witness was subject to suggestion; (3) whether a record of the session was kept; (4) whether the hypnotist was sufficiently qualified; (5) whether corroborating evidence exists to support the reliability of the hypnotically-refreshed memories; (6) whether the witness was highly hypnotizable and thus more prone to suggestion; and (7) expert testimony offered by the parties as to the procedures used in the case. In this case, the plaintiff's hypnotically-refreshed testimony was properly excluded because: the hypnotist was not licensed, and had not even attended college; no record of the hypnosis session was kept; and the plaintiff's assertions of abuse were "far-fetched and uncorroborated."

Mersch v. City of Dallas, 207 F.3d 732 (5th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed summary judgment against a plaintiff who alleged that police officers used excessive force in arresting her and rejected the plaintiff's claim that hypnotically-refreshed testimony about what happened during her arrest was sufficient to create a triable issue of fact. The Court listed as relevant factors in deciding whether to admit hypnotically enhanced testimony whether "1) the hypnosis is done by a psychologist or psychiatrist trained in its use and independent of either party; 2) the hypnosis is done in a neutral setting with only the hypnotist and the subject present; 3) an audio or video recording is made of all interrogations before, during and after hypnosis; 4) corroborating evidence exists; and 5) the pre-hypnosis and post-hypnosis statements substantially correspond." In this case, the hypnotically-enhanced evidence was per se inadmissible because it involved a hypnotized subject identifying for the first time a person she had reason to know was already under suspicion. The Court agreed with the approach of two cases from other Circuits, n4 which "impose on the proponent of the hypnotically-enhanced testimony the burden of proof during the proceeding and recommend that district courts conduct pretrial evidentiary hearings on the matter." In United States v. Valdez, n5 the Court reversed a conviction for extortion, finding that "when, as here, a hypnotized subject identifies for the first time a person he has reason to know is already under suspicion, the posthypnotic testimony is inadmissible whatever procedural safeguards were used to attempt to sanitize the hypnotic session." The Court noted that it was not making a rule that a hypnotized witness, or even post-hypnotic testimony, was per se incompetent under all circumstances. See also United States v. Harrelson n6(in a prosecution for killing a Federal Judge, the Court distinguished Valdez on the ground that two witnesses who made identifications had either identified or described a defendant prior to being hypnotized). In United States v. Bourgeois, n7 the Court affirmed tax fraud convictions, holding there was no error in refusing to exclude or limit, or give a cautionary instruction concerning, the testimony of a witness who had consulted a hypnotist for help in remembering a fact significant in the case. Evidence at a pretrial hearing supported a finding that the session was unsuccessful and the witness was never hypnotized, so the procedural protections of Valdez were not required.

United States v. Kimberlin, 805 F.2d 210 (7th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed convictions for firearm offenses and for damaging property, holding that the defendant was not denied a fair trial when six witnesses were hypnotized during the investigation of bombings in 1978. The jury had been instructed that it was to decide what effect the hypnosis had on the testimony. The Court rejected a "sweeping rule of inadmissibility" with respect to witnesses who have been hypnotized, but indicated that careful scrutiny of their testimony is required.

Sprynczynatyk v. General Motors Corp, 771 F.2d 1112 (8th Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a judgment for a plaintiff who alleged product liability and negligence in the design of automobile brakes, because of error in admitting videotapes of a hypnotic session and rejecting the defendant's request for a limiting instruction explaining that the videotapes were admitted only to evaluate the opinions of an expert witness. The Court also rejected a per se rule barring the use of hypnosis to refresh the recollection of a witness, holding instead that hypnotically refreshed testimony may be admitted if the procedures utilized were sufficient to guarantee reliability.

[9] Mental Incompetence or Illness

United States v. Devin, 918 F.2d 280 (1st Cir. 1990) : Affirming a conviction for RICO and extortion offenses, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in the determination that the principal prosecution witness was competent to testify although he had suffered a severe psychiatric episode 14 years earlier, as he had returned to the business world after two weeks' hospitalization and his ability to function at the time of trial was not called into serious question. The Court noted that the Trial Judge, who has broad latitude as to whether a competency hearing is even needed, had elected to hold one.

Government of Virgin Islands v. A., Leonard, 922 F.2d 1141 (3d Cir. 1991) : Affirming the defendant's conviction for raping his daughters, ages 13 and ten, the Court held there was no error in denying an order compelling them to undergo psychiatric testing before giving testimony. Even accepting the allegations that they were liars, there was no showing of a special need, such as mental illness, to justify such an examination.

United States v. Lightly, 677 F.2d 1027 (4th Cir. 1982) : The Court reversed a conviction for assault with intent to commit murder where a defense witness was not permitted to testify on the ground that he had been found criminally insane and incompetent to stand trial and was subject to hallucinations. The Court said that Rule 601 applies to persons considered to be insane to the same extent as to other persons and that where, as here, a treating physician indicated that the witness had a sufficient memory, understood the oath, and could communicate what he saw, he should have been permitted to testify. The Court also found that the government had no standing to claim that the witness did not understand the incriminating nature of what he might say. In United States v. Odom, n8 the Court held that because no objection was made to the competency of nursing home residents when they were called to testify in a prosecution arising out of a fraudulent absentee voting scheme, the defendants could not complain about a ruling that the residents were competent witnesses. The Court also indicated that the modern trend is toward finding witnesses competent, and stated that it would not reverse a finding of competency except for "clear error."

United States v. Saenz, 747 F.2d 930 (5th Cir. 1984) : Affirming convictions in a vote-buying conspiracy, the Court upheld a ruling that a witness was competent to testify, stating that "[a] witness is competent to testify if she is capable of communicating relevant material and understands she has an obligation to do so." In United States v. Roach, n9 the Court upheld the refusal to order a psychiatric examination of a witness, saying that "it is doubtful that mental incompetence would even be grounds for disqualification of a prospective witness." However, the Court left open the possibility that a Trial Judge might approve such an examination as necessary to assist a defendant in challenging a witness' credibility. In United States v. McRary, n10 the Court held that a kidnapping defendant should have been permitted a chance to show that his wife, who was found incompetent to stand trial, was capable of testifying at his trial.

United States v. Phibbs, 999 F.2d 1053 (6th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, holding there was no error in permitting two witnesses to testify even though both had psychiatric histories. The Trial Judge was not required to conduct a special examination into competency, and could have excluded testimony under Rule 403, 602, or 603 without any special examination. The Court noted that "[a]s long as a witness appreciates his duty to tell the truth, and is minimally capable of observing, recalling, and communicating events, his testimony should come in for whatever it is worth."

United States v. Zizzo, 120 F.3d 1338 (7th Cir. 1997) : Appealing from racketeering convictions, the defendants argued that it was error to allow the prosecution's star witness to testify without first ordering him to undergo a psychiatric examination. The witness had led a life of crime, deceit, and perjury, and on cross-examination stated that the oath meant nothing to him. Affirming the convictions, the Court stated that "[w]hether a witness should be forced to endure a psychiatric examination before being allowed to testify is a matter best left to the discretion of the district court." There was no abuse of discretion in this case, since "even the most dastardly scoundrels, cheats and liars are generally competent to testify." In United States v. Gutman, n11 the Court affirmed a Hobbs Act conviction, holding there was no error in refusing to order that a key government witness undergo a psychiatric examination or to hold a pretrial hearing on his competency. The majority recognized that the Trial Judge has the power to condition admissibility of a witness' testimony on willingness to take a psychiatric examination, but it cautioned that the power should be used sparingly. The mental history of the witness did not create a sufficient doubt as to competency to compel a pretrial hearing and the witness' testimony was not so "incoherent" that it should have been stricken.

Andrews v. Neer, 253 F.3d 1052 (8th Cir. 2001) : Reversing on other grounds a judgment for the daughter of a state hospital patient who sued for damages arising from the death of her father, the Court found no abuse of discretion in allowing the plaintiff to present the testimony of an involuntarily committed schizophrenic patient. In United States v. Skorniak, 59 F.3d 750 (8th Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed a conviction for drug and money laundering offenses, and held there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to order a mental examination of a government witness, as the bare assertion that the witness "was not competent to testify due to his mental state" was insufficient to overcome the presumption in Rule 601 that all witnesses are competent to testify. The defendant was given ample opportunity on cross-examination to explore the witness' psychological problems and his history of drug and alcohol abuse. In United States v. Peyro, n12 the Court affirmed a conviction for cocaine offenses, finding no error in the refusal to strike the testimony of a government witness who conceded that she was "emotionally unbalanced" and did not "remember anything very well." Citing Rules 601 and 602, it found that the jury could weigh the value, if any, of the witness' testimony.

United States v. Gates, 10 F.3d 765 (11th Cir. 1993) : The defendant in a bank robbery case sought to have a psychiatric examination of a government witness who had a history of mental problems, including institutionalization approximately ten days before the first of the charged robberies. The Court noted that, notwithstanding the Rule, a Trial Court has the power to rule a witness is incapable of testifying, and in an appropriate case it has the duty to hold a hearing to determine that issue. Because the witness was cross-examined vigorously and searchingly, his medical records were placed in evidence, and the institutionalization had occurred more than two years before trial, there was no abuse of discretion in not granting the examination or in not conducting a hearing on the issue of competency.

[10] Miscellaneous Cases

Moss v. Ole South Real Estate, Inc., 933 F.2d 1300 (5th Cir. 1991) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendants in a housing discrimination action, holding it was error to exclude testimony of government investigators whose reports the Magistrate Judge excluded. The witnesses were competent, even if the Magistrate Judge considered them untrustworthy, and any problem about admitting the reports through the back door could have been avoided by in limine rulings. In United States v. Villalta, n13 the Court ruled favorably on the government's interlocutory appeal, holding that a prosecution witness was competent to testify concerning situations in which the witness depended upon his knowledge of Spanish for comprehension of the events, since the witness was available for cross-examination as to his ability to understand Spanish and the jury also could consider two tape-recorded conversations between an undercover agent and the witness as independent evidence of the witness' ability to understand Spanish.

United States v. Bedonie, 913 F.2d 782 (10th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed felony-murder convictions, holding that even numerous prior inconsistent statements went only to a witness' credibility, an issue for the jury, not to the witness' competency, which is an issue for the Judge alone. See also United States v. Cook, 949 F.2d 289 (10th Cir. 1991) (witness not incompetent either because she gave contradictory testimony or because she was a drug abuser).

[11] State Law

Kowalski v. Gagne, 914 F.2d 299 (1st Cir. 1990) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in a wrongful death action brought by the widow against the man convicted of murdering her husband, the Court held that a Massachusetts competency rule barring testimony by a husband or wife as to private conversations with a spouse would have made the plaintiff's testimony regarding a conversation with her husband inadmissible, but the defendant failed to assert a specific objection on that ground.

Legg v. Chopra, 286 F.3d 286 (6th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in a diversity medical malpractice case, because the plaintiff's expert, a Texas physician, did not satisfy the Tennessee law holding only experts licensed in Tennessee or a contiguous state to be competent in medical malpractice cases. The Court held that the Tennessee statute governs "competency" within the meaning of Rule 601, since the law's structure reflects an intimate relationship between the standard of care and the qualification requirements of the medical expert who will establish that standard. The Court noted that Rule 601, as thus read, does not directly conflict with Rule 702, which governs the procedural issue of the reliability of an expert witness' opinions.

Andrews v. Neer, 253 F.3d 1052 (8th Cir. 2001) : Reversing on other grounds a judgment for the daughter of a state hospital patient who sued for damages arising from the death of her father, the Court found no abuse of discretion in allowing the plaintiff to present the testimony of an involuntarily committed schizophrenic patient. The Court upheld a ruling that a Missouri statute deeming mentally ill persons incompetent to testify did not govern in a § 1983 civil rights action, even if Missouri law was used to fill gaps in the federal statutory scheme, such as determining standing to sue.

Equitable Life Assur. Soc'y of the U.S. v. McKay, 837 F.2d 904 (9th Cir. 1988) , after certified question answered, 861 F.2d 221 (9th Cir. 1988) : This interpleader action in the District Court for Oregon was governed by Washington law. The Trial Judge found the Dead Man's Statute substantive and applied the Washington statute. The Court of Appeals held that applicability of the Washington Dead Man's Statute depended on the choice of law rules of Oregon, and certified the question to the Oregon Supreme Court. The Oregon Supreme Court responded that the Washington Dead Man's Statute was procedural under Oregon law, so it was inapplicable in an Oregon Court.

[12] Voir Dire

United States v. Spotted War Bonnet, 882 F.2d 1360 (8th Cir. 1989) , vacated on other grounds, 497 U.S. 1021 (1990) , adhered to on remand, 933 F.2d 1471 (8th Cir. 1991) : In affirming the defendant's conviction for sexual abuse of his daughters, the Court held that the victims (ages six and eight at the time of trial) were properly permitted to testify without a preliminary voir dire on their competency. The dissenting Judge said that a voir dire should have been conducted, as their testimony demonstrated significant problems with memory.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Ewing, 979 F.2d 1234 (7th Cir. 1992) .

(n2)Footnote 2. Will v. Comprehensive Accounting Corp., 776 F.2d 665, 1985-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P66833 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Jackson, 576 F.2d 46 (5th Cir. 1978) .

(n4)Footnote 4. Borawick v. Shay, 68 F.3d 597 (2d Cir. 1995) , and Sprynczynatyk v. General Motors Corp., 771 F.2d 1112 (8th Cir. 1985) .

(n5)Footnote 5. United States v. Valdez, 722 F.2d 1196 (5th Cir. 1984) .

(n6)Footnote 6. United States v. Harrelson, 754 F.2d 1153 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Bourgeois, 950 F.2d 980 (5th Cir. 1992) .

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Odom, 736 F.2d 104 (4th Cir. 1984) .

(n9)Footnote 9. United States v. Roach, 590 F.2d 181 (5th Cir. 1979) .

(n10)Footnote 10. United States v. McRary, 616 F.2d 181 (5th Cir. 1980) .

(n11)Footnote 11. United States v. Gutman, 725 F.2d 417 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n12)Footnote 12. United States v. Peyro, 786 F.2d 826 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n13)Footnote 13. United States v. Villalta, 662 F.2d 1205 (5th Cir. 1981) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 601 RULE 601

3-601 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 601.04

601.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

This general ground-clearing eliminates all grounds of incompetency not specifically recognized in the succeeding rules of this Article. Included among the grounds thus abolished are religious belief, conviction of crime, and connection with the litigation as a party or interested person or spouse of a party or interested person. With the exception of the so-called Dead Man's Acts, American jurisdictions generally have ceased to recognize these grounds.

The Dead Man's Acts are surviving traces of the common law disqualification of parties and interested persons. They exist in variety too great to convey conviction of their wisdom and effectiveness. These rules contain no provision of this kind. For the reasoning underlying the decision not to give effect to state statutes in diversity cases, see the Advisory Committee's Note to Rule 501. [This proposal by the Advisory Committee, providing that federal rules of competency applied even where state law provided the rule of decision, was subsequently rejected by Congress. Ed.].

No mental or moral qualifications for testifying as a witness are specified. Standards of mental capacity have proved elusive in actual application. A leading commentator observes that few witnesses are disqualified on that ground. Weihofen, Testimonial Competence and Credibility, 34 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 53 (1965). Discretion is regularly exercised in favor of allowing the testimony. A witness wholly without capacity is difficult to imagine. The question is one particularly suited to the jury as one of weight and credibility, subject to judicial authority to review the sufficiency of the evidence. 2 Wigmore §§ 501, 509. Standards of moral qualification in practice consist essentially of evaluating a person's truthfulness in terms of his own answers about it. Their principal utility is in affording an opportunity on voir dire examination to impress upon the witness his moral duty. This result may, however, be accomplished more directly, and without haggling in terms of legal standards, by the manner of administering the oath or affirmation under Rule 603.

Admissibility of religious belief as a ground of impeachment is treated in Rule 610. Conviction of crime as a ground of impeachment is the subject of Rule 609. Marital relationship is the basis for privilege under Rule 505 [deleted by the Congress. Ed.]. Interest in the outcome of litigation and mental capacity are, of course, highly relevant to credibility and require no special treatment to render them admissible along with other matters bearing upon the perception, memory, and narration of witnesses.

[2] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 275 (1999)

Rule 601 -- Competence

Rule 601 is a broad rule providing that every witness is presumed competent. The rule proposed by the Advisory Committee had only one sentence: "Every person is competent to be a witness except as otherwise provided by these Rules." The intent of the Advisory Committee was to wipe out all the ancient rules of incompetency--most particularly the Dead Man's statute. Dead Man's statutes generally provide that a person interested in an action brought against the estate of a dead person is incompetent to testify in his own behalf or interest as to a transaction or communication between himself and the dead person. The Advisory Committee Note to Rule 601 states that the "Dead Man's Acts are surviving traces of the common law disqualification of parties and interested persons. They exist in variety too great to convey conviction of their wisdom and effectiveness. These rules contain no provision of this kind."

The Advisory Committee thought, correctly, that Dead Man's statutes are misguided. Under the Dead Man's Rule, a person is disqualified from testifying because it is thought that he will be able to lie on the witness stand without the possibility of contradiction from someone now dead. Yet this is really a concern over credibility, that the factfinder is easily able to comprehend, and that can be addressed adequately through argument. For every piece of fraudulent testimony screened out by the Dead Man's statute, there are probably three or more meritorious claims that are dismissed because of the failure of proof. Moreover, the Dead Man's statutes are so complicated that they give rise to much wasteful litigation as to their precise meaning. For example, the New York Dead Man's statute uses over 300 words to establish a rule of incompetency. Not surprisingly, there are hundreds of reported cases attempting to divine the meaning of the New York Dead Man's statute. (For a discussion of the New York statute, see Martin, Capra & Rossi, New York Evidence Handbook, ch.6, Aspen Press 1997.)

So the Advisory Committee was undoubtedly correct to condemn Dead Man's statutes and to reject them in proposed Rule 601. The problem, however, is that many states still have a Dead Man's statute. The Advisory Committee proposal left no room for state Dead Man's statutes to apply, even in cases where state law provided the rule of decision in federal court. The Advisory Committee Note to Rule 601 specifically declares that state Dead Man's statutes are not to have effect in diversity cases. Congress, however, was concerned that Dead Man's statutes represent state policy that should not be disregarded in diversity cases. Therefore, Congress added a second sentence to Rule 601, providing that "in civil actions and proceedings with respect to an element of a claim or defense as to which State law supplies the rule of decision, the competency of a witness shall be determined in accordance with State law." Thus, the Advisory Committee's Note is incorrect in its comment on the inapplicability of state Dead Man's statutes in diversity cases.

[3] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Rule 601 as submitted to the Congress provided that "Every person is competent to be a witness except as otherwise provided in these rules." One effect of the Rule as proposed would have been to abolish age, mental capacity, and other grounds recognized in some State jurisdictions as making a person incompetent as a witness. The greatest controversy centered around the Rule's rendering inapplicable in the federal courts the so-called Dead Man's Statutes which exist in some States. Acknowledging that there is substantial disagreement as to the merit of Dead Man's Statutes, the Committee nevertheless believed that where such statutes have been enacted they represent State policy which should not be overturned in the absence of a compelling federal interest. The Committee therefore amended the Rule to make competency in civil actions determinable in accordance with State law with respect to elements of claims or defenses as to which the State law supplies the rule of decision. Cf. Courtland v. Walston & Co., Inc., 340 F. Supp. 1076, 1087-92 (S.D.N.Y. 1972) .

[4] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

The amendment to Rule 601 parallels the treatment accorded Rule 501 discussed immediately above.

[5] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

Rule 601 deals with competency of witnesses. Both the House and Senate bills provide that federal competency law applies in criminal cases. In civil actions and proceedings, the House bill provides that state competency law applies "to an element of a claim or defense as to which State law supplies the rule of decision." The Senate bill provides that "in civil actions and proceedings arising under 28 U.S.C. § 1332 or 28 U.S.C. § 1335, or between citizens of different States and removed under 28 U.S.C. § 1441(b) the competency of a witness, person, government, State or political subdivision thereof is determined in accordance with State law, unless with respect to the particular claim or defense, Federal law supplies the rule of decision."

The wording of the House and Senate bills differs in the treatment of civil actions and proceedings. The rule in the House bill applies to evidence that relates to "an element of a claim or defense." If an item of proof tends to support or defeat a claim or defense, or an element of a claim or defense, and if state law supplies the rule of decision for that claim or defense, then state competency law applies to that item of proof.

For reasons similar to those underlying its action on Rule 501, the Conference adopts the House provision.

[6] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Letter from Hon. Roszel C. Thomsen to Hon. James O. Eastland, May 22, 1974, and accompanying material, in Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 53-54, 60-61 (1974).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
Supp. To CHAPTER 601 RULE 601

2-601 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 601, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

ARTICLE VI. WITNESSES	ARTICLE VI. WITNESSES
Rule 601. General Rule of Competency	Rule 601. Competency to Testify in General
Every	Every

person is competent to be a witness except as otherwise provided in these rules. However, in civil actions and proceedings, with respect to an element of a claim or defense as to which person is competent to be a witness unless these rules provide otherwise. But in a civil case, state law governs the witness's competency regarding a claim or defense for which state law supplies the

State law supplies the rule of decision, the competency of a witness shall be determined in accordance with State law.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 601 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
Supp. To CHAPTER 601 RULE 601

2-601 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 601.03

Supp. to § 601.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Attorneys As Witnesses [Go To Main]

Macheca Transport v. Philadelphia Indem., 463 F.3d 827 (8th Cir. 2006) : In an action for breach of an insurance contract and vexatious refusal to pay, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to disqualify the plaintiff's lawyer on the ground that the lawyer had communicated with the insurance company and so was in a position to testify to whether the insurer's failure to pay was wilful and without reasonable cause. Attorneys may not be disqualified simply because they have personal knowledge of relevant evidence. Disqualification is necessary only when there is no alternative source to prove a disputed issue at trial. The plaintiff had stated that it could prove its case without calling the lawyer; and the Trial Judge never considered whether the lawyer was the only available witness to testify in support of the plaintiff's claim.

[11] State Law [Go To Main]

Greyhound Lines, Inc. v. Wade, 485 F.3d 1032 (8th Cir. 2007) : In an action by a bus company whose bus was rear-ended by a truck, the Court found no abuse of discretion in a finding that the bus driver, who suffered from a brain impairment, was competent to testify under Nebraska law. The Trial Judge was satisfied that the bus driver would recall the events at issue and that her testimony on the whole was accurate and reliable.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 602 RULE 602

2-602 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 602.syn

§ 602.syn Synopsis to Chapter 602: RULE 602

602.01 Official Text

602.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] General Requirement of Personal Knowledge

[2] Relationship to Hearsay Rule

[3] Relationship to Admissions

[4] Objections

602.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Charts and Graphs

[2] Drug Use

[3] Foundation Lacking

[4] Foundation Satisfied

[5] Hearsay Declarants

[6] Incomplete Personal Knowledge

[7] Lay Versus Expert Witnesses

[8] Regular Procedures

[9] Relationship to Other Rules

[10] Testimony About Another's State of Mind

602.04 Legislative History

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 602 RULE 602

2-602 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 602.01

602.01 Official Text

Rule 602. Lack of Personal Knowledge

A witness may not testify to a matter unless evidence is introduced sufficient to support a finding that the witness has personal knowledge of the matter. Evidence to prove personal knowledge may, but need not, consist of the witness' own testimony. This rule is subject to the provisions of rule 703, relating to opinion testimony by expert witnesses.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 602 RULE 602

2-602 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 602.02

602.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] General Requirement of Personal Knowledge

Except for experts, who are subject to the provisions of Rule 703, witnesses must have personal knowledge of the matters about which they testify. Testimony of ordinary lay witnesses should not be admitted without some evidence to demonstrate that the witnesses have personal knowledge of the subject matter of the testimony. n1 But personal knowledge may be proved by the witness's own testimony, including the witness's inferences and opinions, so long as these inferences and opinions are themselves based on personal knowledge. n2

As long as there is enough evidence to support a finding that the witness has personal knowledge, the Trial Judge must let the jury decide whether the witness is really knowledgeable. n3 If the jury believes that the witness has no personal knowledge, it will disregard the testimony. Thus, the personal knowledge requirement is a matter of conditional relevancy. n4 The witness need not be absolutely certain of the event related in order to satisfy the personal knowledge requirement; nor must the Judge be convinced. It is enough that a reasonable juror could find that the witness perceived the event. n5 Moreover, perfect knowledge is not required -- the witness can be vague about certain details, and still have enough knowledge to testify under Rule 602. n6 A problem in the witness's perception generally goes to weight and not admissibility. n7

The fact that Rule 701 allows a lay witness to testify in opinion form does not undercut the requirement of personal knowledge; in fact, Rule 701 effectively incorporates the personal knowledge requirement as a prerequisite to acceptance of opinions by lay persons. n8

[2] Relationship to Hearsay Rule

Sometimes the concept of personal knowledge becomes confused in the context of hearsay evidence. If, for example, police officers testify that the defendant confessed to murder, the evidence is admissible (assuming of course that the confession is voluntary) even though the officers are not personally knowledgeable about the murder. The officers are saying in effect: "We heard the defendant claim responsibility for the murder." The witnesses have personal knowledge only of what the defendant said. They cannot testify, "Defendant committed the murder," because they do not know this to be true. The officers only have personal knowledge of what they heard. n9 Of course, even if the witnesses' statements only concern what they heard, the declarant's statement must itself comply with the hearsay rule; in the above example, the hearsay rule is satisfied because the defendant's statement is a party admission. n10

A more difficult question is whether a hearsay declarant, whose out-of-court statement would otherwise be admissible under a hearsay exception, must have had personal knowledge as to the matters related in the statement. For example, assume that a hearsay declarant excitedly states, "The blue car ran the light and hit the other car!" The statement is offered to prove that the blue car ran the light and hit the other car. In response to the hearsay objection, the statement is offered as an excited utterance. Must it be shown, as a condition of admissibility under the hearsay exception, that the declarant had personal knowledge of the event related?

The answer must be "yes" as a general rule. When a statement is introduced under a hearsay exception, the declarant is in effect testifying in Court. The statement is considered for its truth in the same manner as in-court testimony. If the declarant were actually to testify in Court, personal knowledge would be required. There is no reason for a different rule when the declarant is "testifying" by way of hearsay. In addition, if a hearsay declarant makes a statement not based on personal knowledge, a strong argument can be made that the hearsay rule itself is not satisfied. The declarant may well be relying on other out-of-court sources when making the statement. If that is so, then a multiple hearsay problem is presented. Under Rule 805, the mere fact that the declarant's statement would qualify under a hearsay exception is not enough. The underlying information must qualify as well.

Accordingly, the Courts generally have held that the personal knowledge requirement applies to hearsay declarants whose out-of-court statements are offered under a hearsay exception. n11 The exception to the rule is admissions, where the declarant need not have personal knowledge for the statement to be admissible. n12 The reason for this exception is discussed in [3], immediately below.

It is obviously more difficult to apply the personal knowledge requirement to hearsay than it is to apply it to in-court testimony. Witnesses who are in Court can be asked directly about whether they have personal knowledge of the event related. When a witness attests to personal knowledge at trial, Rule 602 is satisfied unless no reasonable person could believe the witness's assertion of personal knowledge (e.g., where the witness testifies that he saw Napoleon leaving the scene of a crime). With hearsay, however, the declarant is ordinarily not in a position to tell the Court directly about personal knowledge. So the Court must determine whether the declarant had personal knowledge by considering the hearsay statement and the surrounding circumstances. For example, in United States v. Owens-El, 889 F.2d 913 (9th Cir. 1989) , the defendant challenged the admissibility of a hearsay statement from a prison guard who was beaten with a heavy pipe. Shortly after the attack, the guard identified Owens as the perpetrator, and this statement was admitted at trial under a hearsay exception. Owens argued that the guard had no personal knowledge upon which to base his conclusion that Owens had hit him. But the Court held that a reasonable juror could have found that the guard possessed the requisite personal knowledge. Among other things, the Court noted that the guard had suffered "defensive wounds" on his face and arms, "which circumstantially indicate a frontal attack and face-to-face confrontation." Also, the description of the beating was so detailed that an inference of personal knowledge could be drawn by a reasonable factfinder. n13

[3] Relationship to Admissions

There is at least one common exception to the rule that both an in-court witness and an out-of-court declarant must have personal knowledge of the subject matter of their testimony. It is generally held that a party's admissions are admissible even though the party had no personal knowledge of the subject of the admission. n14 Apparently, the common law assumed that parties who admit things probably have some reason for doing so and thus once an admission is made, a party should not be permitted to claim absence of knowledge, since such a claim is too easily made. Parties can explain to the factfinder why they spoke without knowledge, and the factfinder can decide what weight to give the statement in light of the explanation.

Another argument for this exception is that the personal knowledge requirement is designed to provide some assurance that a statement is reliable, and admissions are brought before the trier of fact whether or not they are reliable. Admissions are a function of the adversary system. If parties or their agents make statements that are detrimental to the party's case, it is not up to the Court to protect the party from an unreliable statement. Rather, it is up to the party to try to explain the statement. n15

[4] Objections

Objections on the basis of a lack of personal knowledge should be made at the earliest possible time. Once a witness has given testimony, a motion to strike is the only available remedy. Such a motion is never a perfect remedy, and rarely is it as desirable as barring inadmissible evidence before it is offered. Although there is some reason to allow experts to state their conclusions before providing the basis for their opinions, other witnesses almost always can state the basis for their testimony before providing details. Thus, even though Rule 701 allows lay witnesses to give opinions and Rule 704 allows opinions on the ultimate issue, it is generally desirable to have some showing of personal knowledge before a witness goes very far in offering opinions, especially on an important issue in a case.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., Hart v. O'Brien, 127 F.3d 424 (5th Cir. 1997) (officer should not have been permitted to give his opinion about the motivation or intent of other officers during an arrest and incarceration of a suspect; the officer did not participate in the investigation or arrest, and there was nothing in the record to support a finding of personal knowledge); Kemp v. Balboa, 23 F.3d 211 (8th Cir. 1994) (error to allow a witness to testify to events related in medical records, where the witness had no first-hand knowledge that these events occurred); McCrary-El v. Shaw, 992 F.2d 809 (8th Cir. 1993) (in a case concerning alleged use of excessive force against an inmate, a fellow inmate's testimony was properly excluded, because no reasonable person could have found that the inmate was able to see anything of relevance about the incident).

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Doe, 960 F.2d 221 (1st Cir. 1992) (in a trial for firearm possession, the owner of a sporting goods store could properly testify that Taurus pistols are made in Brazil, even though he had never been to Brazil; under Rule 602, personal knowledge included "inferences and opinions, so long as they are grounded in personal observation and experience"; a reasonable juror could find that the witness "had firsthand knowledge from which he could infer that the pistol was made outside Massachusetts, indeed in Brazil, particularly since his testimony to this effect was unchallenged").

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., United States v. Hickey, 917 F.2d 901 (6th Cir. 1990) ("Testimony should not be excluded for lack of personal knowledge unless no reasonable juror could believe that the witness had the ability and opportunity to perceive the event that he testifies about"; witness's testimony was admissible despite the fact that it may have been, "in large part, unbelievable to some and in spite of the possibility that his perception was sometimes impaired").

(n4)Footnote 4. See Advisory Committee Note to Rule 602 ("It will be observed that the rule is in fact a specialized application of the provisions of Rule 104(b) on conditional relevancy.").

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., M.B.A.F.B. Federal Credit Union v. Cumis Ins. Soc'y, 681 F.2d 930 (4th Cir. 1982) :

> [Rule 602] does not require that the witness' knowledge be positive or rise to the level of absolute certainty. Evidence is inadmissible under the rule only if in the proper exercise of the trial court's discretion it finds that the witness could not have actually perceived or observed that which he testifies to.

See also United States v. Peyro, 786 F.2d 826 (8th Cir. 1986) (testimony was admissible under Rule 602 even though the witness admitted that she had substantial memory problems, where she also stated that "certain moments I know I remember, but nothing at all specific in any of it").

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., United States v. Powers, 75 F.3d 335 (7th Cir. 1996) ("[t]he fact that a witness cannot recall specific dates does not require exclusion of that testimony," since inability to recall specific dates does not demonstrate an absence of personal knowledge; the opponent's remedy is not exclusion but rather cross-examination and impeachment).

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Peyro, 786 F.2d 826 (8th Cir. 1986) (witness who admitted substantial memory and emotional problems nonetheless had sufficient personal knowledge to testify; the Court noted that the witness's "recall and emotional problems were laid bare for the jury's consideration").

(n8)Footnote 8. See, e.g., Visser v. Packer Engineering Assoc., 924 F.2d 655 (7th Cir. 1991) (lay inferences or opinions must be "grounded in personal knowledge or experience" and cannot be "flights of fancy, speculations, hunches, intuitions, or rumors about matters remote from that experience").

(n9)Footnote 9. See, e.g., United States v. Stratton, 779 F.2d 820, 829 (2d Cir. 1985) :

> When A testifies that B told him of an event, A usually has personal knowledge only of B's report. It is B who has personal knowledge of the event. Thus, the hearsay rules require that the declarant, B in our example, have personal knowledge of the events recounted, not that the witness have such personal knowledge.

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., Kaczmarek v. Allied Chemical Corp., 836 F.2d 1055 (7th Cir. 1987) ("a witness cannot offer the contents of a hearsay statement as his personal knowledge"). See also United States v. Mandel, 591 F.2d 1347, 1369 (4th Cir. 1979) : Where a governor was tried for mail fraud and racketeering, Senators testified to their beliefs as to the governor's position on a veto override:

> While this testimony is not hearsay in form, the feeling and beliefs expressed therein were often based in whole or in part on impermissible hearsay. To the extent it was based on hearsay, this testimony is inadmissible because the witness lacked the requisite first-hand knowledge. [But where the beliefs were based on] admissible evidence, such as direct statements or acts by one of Governor Mandel's agents, [then the testimony was admissible].

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., Bemis v. Edwards, 45 F.3d 1369 (9th Cir. 1995) (a 911 tape describing police brutality was properly excluded because the citizen caller apparently lacked personal knowledge of the events that he was reporting; the "requirement that a declarant have personal knowledge of the events described applies to the present sense impression exception," and "[s]imilarly, the excited utterance exception is only available if the declarant has firsthand knowledge of the subject matter of her statement"); Brown v. Keane, 355 F.3d 82 (2d Cir. 2004) (hearsay statements in 911 call could not be admitted because there was insufficient indication that the caller witnessed the events related; the hearsay exceptions for present sense impressions and excited utterances apply "only to reports of what the declarant has actually observed through the senses, not to what the declarant merely conjectures."); United States v. Owens-El, 889 F.2d 913 (9th Cir. 1989) ("the person who made the out-of-court statement must have had personal knowledge of the event on which he based his statement"); United States v. Lang, 589 F.2d 92, 97 (2d Cir. 1978) (it was reversible error to admit a statement against penal interest where the declarant lacked personal knowledge of the event described in his statement).

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., Mahlandt v. Wild Canid Survival & Research Center, Inc., 588 F.2d 626 (8th Cir. 1978) (rejecting the contention that personal knowledge is required on the part of a declarant whose statement is otherwise admissible as an agency-admission under Rule 801(d)(2)(D)); United States v. Ammar, 714 F.2d 238 (3d Cir.

1983) (the declarant need not have personal knowledge for statements to be admissible under the hearsay exception for coconspirator statements).

(n13)Footnote 13. See also United States v. Tocco, 135 F.3d 116 (2d Cir. 1998) (excited utterance properly admitted; a reasonable trier of fact could have concluded that the declarant had personal knowledge that he had set a fire on the defendant's behalf; the property that was burned was the defendant's clothing store, and the evidence indicated that the declarant entered the store after hours with a key; a "trier of fact could reasonably believe that [the declarant] obtained the key from the store owner and therefore was aware that the arson was committed at the owner's direction").

(n14)Footnote 14. See the Advisory Committee Note to Rule 801(d)(2) (noting the freedom that admissions have enjoyed "from the restrictive influences of the opinion rule and the rule requiring firsthand knowledge").

(n15)Footnote 15. See the Advisory Committee Note to Rule 801(d)(2) ("Admissions by a party-opponent are excluded from the category of hearsay on the theory that their admissibility in evidence is the result of the adversary system rather than satisfaction of the conditions of the hearsay rule. No guarantee of trustworthiness is required in the case of an admission.").

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 602 RULE 602

2-602 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 602.03

602.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Charts and Graphs

United States v. Lemire, 720 F.2d 1327 (D.C. Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed convictions of three individuals and a corporation for wire fraud and other offenses, holding that an FBI agent properly used four charts, which summarized the testimony of government witnesses, to explain to the jury how cash flowed through certain companies. Since the witness had knowledge of the transcripts and exhibits on which he relied to prepare the charts, Rule 602 was satisfied.

[2] Drug Use

United States v. Franklin, 415 F.3d 537 (6th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed bank robbery convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by a witness who claimed he was intoxicated before the grand jury and at trial. There was no record evidence corroborating the claim of intoxication, and the threshold for admitting testimony under Rule 602 is "low," so the Trial Judge's decision not to credit the witness' post hoc representations was not clear error. In a cocaine distribution prosecution, United States v. Hickey, 917 F.2d 901 (6th Cir. 1990) , the Court held that a reasonable juror could believe that a principal witness perceived the events to which he testified, even though his testimony may have been in large part unbelievable to some and his perception was sometimes impaired by his admitted drug addiction.

[3] Foundation Lacking

FDIC v. Houde, 90 F.3d 600 (1st Cir. 1996) : The defendants gave a note to a bank that subsequently failed and was taken over by the FDIC. When the FDIC sought to enforce the note, it presented a witness, but no documentary evidence, to show that it had transferred the note to a bridge bank and then regained the note as receiver on the bridge bank's dissolution. Affirming a judgment for the defendants rendered because the FDIC failed to show its enforceable title to the note, the Court held there was no error in striking the testimony, as the witness, who took over the file just two weeks before trial, had no personal knowledge of the events about which he testified.

Elizarraras v. Bank of El Paso, 631 F.2d 366 (5th Cir. 1980) : The drawer of a check alleged that the defendant's refusal to honor the check resulted in certain penalties being imposed by the payee bank. The Court said that the drawer had no personal knowledge concerning the penalties that were imposed and that statements by the payee bank officials concerning penalties were hearsay.

United States v. Lanci, 669 F.2d 391 (6th Cir. 1982) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy and bribery of an FBI employee, the Court upheld a ruling excluding testimony of an unavailable codefendant in an earlier state Court proceeding that he "imagined" that the defendant's fingerprints appeared on FBI documents because of the defendant's curiosity about them. Because the codefendant also said that he did not know whether the defendant "read them [the documents] or glanced through them or what," the testimony was inadmissible under Rule 602.

Unterreiner v. Volkswagen of Am., Inc., 8 F.3d 1206 (7th Cir. 1993) : The plaintiff in an age discrimination action, who was seeking to avoid a limitations bar by showing that the defendant failed to post a required notice, testified at his deposition that he did not remember what was posted on a bulletin board, but in an affidavit a year later said there was no notice on the board. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held that statements founded on what the plaintiff admitted to be faulty recollection were not sufficiently probative to defeat summary judgment. The Court further noted that it was possible the factfinder would not be allowed to hear the kind of testimony in the affidavit because the plaintiff's insufficient recollection would make him incompetent under the Rule. In the view of the dissenting Judge, the Rule does not disqualify witnesses with faulty memory, only those with none at all. In Visser v. Packer Eng'g Assoc., 924 F.2d 655 (7th Cir. 1991) (en banc), the Court affirmed a summary judgment for the defendant in an age discrimination case, holding that affidavits by coemployees had been properly excluded; they stated no facts, and contained only conclusory inferences of impermissible motivation for the plaintiff's discharge. In Palucki v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., n1 the Court affirmed summary judgment granted for the defendant in an age discrimination case brought by a discharged store manager, holding that a deponent's "gut feeling" regarding the defendant's motivation would not be admissible personal knowledge creating a genuine issue of material fact. In Kaczmarek v. Allied Chem. Corp., n2 a suit by the driver of a truck who was doused with sulfuric acid while unloading it, the Court found reversible error when the company's safety director was permitted to testify about safety rules that were in effect five years before he went to work for the company. His testimony could not have been based upon personal knowledge, and no showing was made that he was an expert who did not need personal knowledge. The Court found, however, that testimony by a division head concerning meetings on safety that all drivers were required to attend did satisfy the personal knowledge rule, even if the witness could not remember specifically that the plaintiff attended the meetings. In Gorby v. Schneider Tank Lines, n3 the Court sustained a judgment for the wife of a motorist killed in an accident with a truck, finding no error in the exclusion of testimony by an eyewitness that the truck driver did everything that he could to avoid the accident. The witness had no personal knowledge of what the truck driver actually did in his cab and could not have known when the driver saw the other vehicle.

McCrary-El v. Shaw, 992 F.2d 809 (8th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed a judgment for correctional officers sued for using excessive force against an inmate, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by a fellow inmate on the ground that he was not able to see anything of relevance about the incident. In Kern v. Levolor Lorentzen, Inc., 899 F.2d 772 (9th Cir. 1990) , a wrongful termination case, the Trial Judge excluded testimony by the defendant's personnel manager as to the meaning of a disputed word in a letter sent to the plaintiff. The Court reasoned that the witness did not hold a position with the defendant until after the relevant time period and thus did not have personal knowledge concerning the proper interpretation of the letter.

Latman v. Burdette, 366 F.3d 774 (9th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a judgment holding that the Bankruptcy

Court had erroneously admitted bank records submitted as an attachment to a supplemental declaration of the Trustee's counsel, because the counsel had no personal knowledge as to the authenticity of the records, and there was no other proof of authenticity.

Nationalist Movement v. City of Cumming, 913 F.2d 885 (11th Cir. 1990) , vacated & reh'g en banc granted, 921 F.2d 1125 (1990) , panel opinion reinstated, 934 F.2d 1482 (11th Cir. 1991) , aff'd, 505 U.S. 123 (1992) : The Court held there was no error in striking a witness' testimony offered to authenticate purported business records of the plaintiff, as the witness had been appointed "acting secretary" of the organization on the morning of the hearing and had no knowledge of the records, could not identify them, and had never seen them until they were presented by the plaintiff's attorney that morning.

[4] Foundation Satisfied

United States v. Doe, 960 F.2d 221 (1st Cir. 1992) : In a prosecution of a felon for criminal possession of a firearm that had moved in interstate commerce, the Court held that a reasonable trier of fact could believe that a sports shop owner had firsthand knowledge from which he could infer that a pistol was made in Brazil. Personal knowledge includes inferences and opinions, so long as they are grounded in personal observation and experience.

Malek v. Federal Ins. Co., 994 F.2d 49 (2d Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed a judgment against insureds who sued to recover the proceeds of a fire policy, holding that it was error to exclude the case notes and testimony of a social worker who was responsible for a file on the children of a couple renting the insured's house. The Court found that the evidence was based on personal knowledge and might have supported a claim that the renters rather than the insureds caused the fire. The dissenting Judge was unpersuaded that the record demonstrated personal knowledge on the part of the social worker. In Folio Impressions, Inc. v. Byer Cal., 937 F.2d 759 (2d Cir. 1991) , a textile importer's copyright infringement action, the Court held that a defense witness had sufficient personal knowledge to testify even though she stated only that she "believed" the fact asserted, as she was not testifying upon conjecture or hearsay. In United States v. McGrath, n4 the Court suggested that circumstantial evidence would support a finding of personal knowledge by the maker of out-of-court records.

M.B.A.F.B. Fed. Credit Union v. Cumis Ins. Soc'y, 681 F.2d 930 (4th Cir. 1982) : Affirming a plaintiff's judgment on a bond that covered loss from the failure of the plaintiff's employees to perform their duties faithfully, the Court found that a witness had sufficient personal knowledge to testify even though he was not positive about his testimony. A dissenting Judge argued that the witness made an assumption about a crucial fact and that he had not shown any basis for personal knowledge.

United States v. Cantu, 167 F.3d 198 (5th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a drug conspiracy conviction, holding there was no error in finding that a witness had personal knowledge of the defendant's relationship with another person, based on the witness' testimony that she believed the defendant was the boss because she had observed the defendant giving the other person orders while they were unloading and storing marijuana at her house. In United States v. MMR Corp. (LA), 907 F.2d 489, 1990-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P69136 (5th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed convictions for bid rigging and mail fraud, holding that a witness who had significant contact with the president of one of the bidders and was present at both meetings between the bidders concerned had sufficient personal knowledge to testify about the agreement between the bidders even though another person had negotiated the agreement and the witness testified he was unsure how he had come to know about it. In United States v. Davis, n5 the Court affirmed a felon firearms possession conviction. The Court observed that in determining whether a witness has shown sufficient personal knowledge, > the trial court has some discretion in evaluating ... an initial showing, and generally does not abuse that discretion by accepting as provisionally adequate a witness' testimony that he has personal knowledge, when other evidence indicates that the witness had a personal connection to the subject matter, there is nothing to suggest that the witness likely did not have or could not have had such knowledge, and its probable absence could be easily shown, but opposing counsel, despite full opportunity to do so, wholly fails to make any such showing.

United States v. Oliver, 908 F.2d 260 (8th Cir. 1990) : The defendant, charged with aiding and abetting the forgery of a check, denied that she knew the true last name of the forger when she endorsed the check. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by a detective that he had seen the two together more than once and he had no doubt that she knew the forger's name.

Stuart v. Unum Life Ins. Co. of Am., 217 F.3d 1145 (9th Cir. 2000) : The Trial Judge remanded an insurance dispute removed from State Court on the ground that the defendants had not carried their burden of showing that the company's group plan was an ERISA plan, which would have subjected the case to federal jurisdiction. Reversing an order granting the plaintiffs costs and expenses for improper removal, the Court held that it was error to exclude the declaration of the company's vice president for corporate services regarding the particular condition required for ERISA coverage, since the record showed that he not only had reviewed the insurance policy but also had personal knowledge of the facts showing the condition was satisfied. In United States v. Owens-El, n6 on remand of United States v. Owens n7(discussed under Rule 801(d)(1)(C), §§ 801.02[3][c], [3][d], [5]), the Court held that there was sufficient evidence that a witness had personal knowledge of the identity of his attacker when making an out-of-court identification, since the witness' wounds circumstantially indicated a frontal attack, the detail of the description suggested he remembered it at the time of the statement, and the witness testified at trial that the attack was vivid in his mind at the time of making the statement.

United States v. Van Dorn, 925 F.2d 1331 (11th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed racketeering convictions, holding that a witness' associations with a crime family were sufficient for him to testify that a defendant was a member of that crime family, even if the witness had no firsthand knowledge that would serve as the basis for his statements.

United States v. Sutton, 795 F.2d 1040 (Temp. Emer. Ct. App. 1986) : Affirming a judgment for the United States in a restitution action against crude-oil resellers, the Court held that a witness who supervised the audit and summarized the work of 20 auditors on a project could testify concerning the audit, since he satisfied the personal knowledge requirement.

[5] Hearsay Declarants

United States v. Tocco, 135 F.3d 116 (2d Cir. 1998) : In an arson case the defendant's alleged accomplice had run to his friend's house three hours after the defendant's business establishment had burned and people had been trapped inside. He told his friend that he had set the fire for the defendant. This statement was admitted at trial as an excited utterance. The Court rejected a challenge, made on the ground that there was no showing that the declarant had personal knowledge, to the portion of the statement implicating the defendant. Because the property that burned was the defendant's clothing store, and the evidence indicated that the declarant entered the store with a key, "[a] trier of fact could reasonably believe that [the declarant] obtained the key from the store owner and therefore was aware that the arson was committed at the owner's direction."

Bemis v. Edwards, 45 F.3d 1369 (9th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a judgment for police officers alleged to have used excessive force, the Court held that a 911 tape describing the alleged event was properly excluded because the citizen caller apparently lacked personal knowledge of the events that he was reporting. The Court held that "this requirement that a declarant have personal knowledge of the events described applies to the present sense impression exception," and that "[s]imilarly, the excited utterance exception is only available if the declarant has firsthand knowledge of the subject matter of her statement." The Court also observed that the proponent of a hearsay declaration has "the burden of establishing personal perception by a preponderance of the evidence."

[6] Incomplete Personal Knowledge

Hallquist v. Local 276, 843 F.2d 18 (1st Cir. 1988) : Affirming a judgment for a plumber who successfully claimed sex discrimination by an employer, the Court held that the plaintiff was properly permitted to testify that work was available on the job site, even if she did not have knowledge of all of the circumstances that the employer encountered. The extent of her personal knowledge went to weight, not admissibility.

United States v. Powers, 75 F.3d 335 (7th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a cocaine conspiracy conviction, the Court held that "[t]he fact that a witness cannot recall specific dates does not require exclusion of that testimony," since a witness' inability to recall specific dates does not demonstrate absence of personal knowledge. The opponent's remedy is not exclusion but rather cross-examination and impeachment.

[7] Lay Versus Expert Witnesses

Hunters Int'l Mfg. Corp. v. Christiana Metals Corp., 561 F. Supp. 614 (E.D. Mich. 1982) , aff'd, 725 F.2d 683 (1983) : The District Court granted judgment n.o.v. for the defendants in a contract action, finding that an accountant, who testified as a lay person because he was not identified as an expert during discovery, testified concerning lost profits without personal knowledge of the facts on which he based his projections.

Kemp v. Balboa, 23 F.3d 211 (8th Cir. 1994) : In a prisoner's civil rights suit for wrongful deprivation of medication to control his epilepsy, a licensed practical nurse at the correctional center testified that the prisoner had failed to pick up his medication on seven occasions. The Court granted the plaintiff a new trial on damages, holding that the nurse's testimony, which was based only on review of the prisoner's medical file (not introduced into evidence), should not have been admitted, as she was testifying only as a lay witness and she had no personal knowledge of the matter.

[8] Regular Procedures

First Nat'l Bank v. Lustig, 96 F.3d 1554 (5th Cir. 1996) : In an action by a bank against sureties that had issued a blanket bond, the Court affirmed in part a judgment for the bank as to coverage and bad faith. The Court held that testimony of a bank employee as to a loan committee's practice of relying on certain bank officers was properly admitted, even though the employee was not present when certain loans were approved. The employee had personal knowledge of the practice, which was the subject matter of the testimony. In United States v. Quezada, n8 the Court affirmed a conviction for illegal entry by an alien after deportation, holding that an INS agent had sufficient personal knowledge concerning the normal procedure in executing a warrant of deportation, even though he personally had not physically observed the execution of a warrant.

[9] Relationship to Other Rules

Agfa-Gevaert, A.G. v. A.B. Dick Co., 879 F.2d 1518 (7th Cir. 1989) : The defendant in a breach of contract action sought to prove that defects in the quality of copiers it was purchasing were a ground for its termination of the contract, but the Trial Judge excluded statements by the plaintiff's expert witness and the defendant's board of directors regarding the quality of the copiers on the ground that they were based on information by customers and engineers and were therefore hearsay. The Court disagreed, holding that assessments of a product's quality by business people are inferential, not first hand, and as long as they are the sort of inferences that business people customarily draw, they count as personal knowledge, not hearsay. The same principles apply to the acquisition of knowledge by expert witnesses, as Rule 703 recognizes.

Ostad v. Oregon Health Sciences Univ., 327 F.3d 876 (9th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for a former resident at a medical university who claimed that he was terminated in retaliation for questioning a physician's billing practices, the Court upheld the admission of testimony by one doctor that he had concerns about another doctor's billing practices. Since the testifying doctor was speaking about his own concerns, his testimony was based on personal knowledge even if the concerns arose from conversations with a third party.

[10] Testimony About Another's State of Mind

Hart v. O'Brien, 127 F.3d 424 (5th Cir. 1997) : Reviewing absolute and qualified immunity issues in a civil rights suit brought by a plaintiff who was arrested, charged with possession of marijuana, and detained in jail for two weeks, the Court found that the deposition testimony of one officer in which he speculated about the motivation or intent of other officers was inadmissible. The deposed officer did not participate in the investigation or surveillance, and was not involved in the decision to arrest the plaintiff. Thus, the Court found that there was nothing in the record to support a finding of personal knowledge on the part of the deposed officer.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. Palucki v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 879 F.2d 1568 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n2)Footnote 2. Kaczmarek v. Allied Chem. Corp., 836 F.2d 1055 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n3)Footnote 3. Gorby v. Schneider Tank Lines, 741 F.2d 1015 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. McGrath, 613 F.2d 361 (2d Cir. 1979) .

(n5)Footnote 5. United States v. Davis, 792 F.2d 1299 (5th Cir. 1986) .

(n6)Footnote 6. United States v. Owens-El, 889 F.2d 913 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Owens, 484 U.S. 554 (1988) .

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Quezada, 754 F.2d 1190 (5th Cir. 1985) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 602 RULE 602

2-602 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 602.04

602.04 Legislative History

Advisory Committee's Note

"[T]he rule requiring that a witness who testifies to a fact which can be perceived by the senses must have had an opportunity to observe, and must have actually observed the fact" is a "most pervasive manifestation" of the common law insistence upon "the most reliable sources of information." McCormick § 10, p. 19. These foundation requirements may, of course, be furnished by the testimony of the witness himself: hence personal knowledge is not an absolute but may consist of what the witness thinks he knows from personal perception. 2 Wigmore § 650. It will be observed that the rule is in fact a specialized application of the provisions of Rule 104(b) on conditional relevancy.

This rule does not govern the situation of a witness who testifies to a hearsay statement as such, if he has personal knowledge of the making of the statement. Rules 801 and 805 would be applicable. This rule would, however, prevent him from testifying to the subject matter of the hearsay statement, as he has no personal knowledge of it.

The reference to Rule 703 is designed to avoid any question of conflict between the present rule and the provisions of that rule allowing an expert to express opinions based on facts of which he does not have personal knowledge.

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendments are technical. No substantive change is intended."

Following the 1987 amendments to Rule 602, the Supreme Court sent to Congress a technical amendment correcting capitalization, which took effect on November 1, 1988.]

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
Supp. To CHAPTER 602 RULE 602

2-602 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 602, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 602. Lack of Personal Knowledge	Rule 602. Need for Personal Knowledge
A witness may not testify to a matter unless	A witness may testify to a matter only if less evidence is introduced sufficient to support a finding that the witness has personal knowledge of the matter. Evidence to prove personal knowledge may, but need not, consist of the witness' own witness' own testimony. This rule is subject to the provisions of rule 703, relating to opinion testimony by expert witnesses.	testimony. This rule does not apply to a witness' s expert testimony under Rule 703.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 602 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
Supp. To CHAPTER 602 RULE 602

2-602 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 602.03

Supp. to § 602.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[3] Foundation Lacking [Go To Main]

Alpert v. United States, 481 F.3d 404 (6th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the IRS in a taxpayer's action for a refund, holding that an affidavit by the taxpayer that certain named creditors and other unsecured creditors had written off the debt of his subchapter-S corporation in particular years was insufficient to establish a discharge of debt at that time. The statement regarding the writing off of debts by the other unsecured creditors was based upon his "belief" and did not demonstrate the required personal knowledge.

United States v. Becerril-Lopez, 541 F.3d 881, 888 (9th Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for being a deported alien found in the United States, the Border Patrol agent operating the night scope at the time of the defendant's entry testified on direct that he had tracked several people crossing the border and then directed another agent to their hiding place. However, on cross-examination he conceded that he had no independent recollection of the facts and was relying on a report by the other agent. Affirming, the Court held it was a clear abuse of discretion (but harmless error) not to strike the agent's testimony, which lacked personal knowledge and "in the end, amounted to reading in portions of Agent Rivera's report."

Zokari v. Gates, 561 F.3d 1076 (10th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the employer in a Title VII action, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by a union steward, based on review of employee evaluations, that African-Americans and minorities had "a difficult time with regard to evaluations and ratings and mentoring and on-the-job training." Although the witness knew the evaluation scores for employees, he could not know if the evaluations were discriminatory because he knew nothing regarding the work performance of any employee except himself, so his testimony was properly excluded for lack of personal knowledge.

Corwin v. Walt Disney Co., 475 F.3d 1239 (11th Cir. 2007) : The plaintiff claimed that the defendant's theme park infringed the copyright of a painting that was a rendering of a third party's idea for an international theme park in miniature. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court found that affidavits offered to prove the defendant's access to the painting were properly disregarded because the affiants had no personal knowledge of the facts they asserted.

[4] Foundation Satisfied [Go To Main]

United States v. Famania-Roche, 537 F.3d 71 (1st Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, holding that a cooperating witness had sufficient personal knowledge of the inner workings of a drug conspiracy to testify that the defendant controlled a certain drug point and to describe quantities of drugs sold at different drug points on a weekly basis. The witness operated her own drug point, was present at the place where the conspirators gathered to discuss the drugs they sold at various drug points, and had personally seen the defendant sell drugs to customers she sent to him. In United States v. Munoz, 487 F.3d 25 (1st Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed convictions of former bank executives for bank fraud, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting an officer of the affected bank to testify regarding board meetings nearly 20 years previously. Statements such as, "I don't recall that it was discussed. I believe that if it was discussed I would remember and it is not reflected in the minutes," provided a sufficient showing that the witness had enough recall to testify from his personal knowledge about information given to the board.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 603 RULE 603

2-603 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 603.syn

§ 603.syn Synopsis to Chapter 603: RULE 603

603.01 Official Text

603.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Basic Requirement

[2] Relationship to Competency

[3] Miscellaneous Proceedings

[4] Procedure

603.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Absence of Objection

[2] Admonishing Witness

[3] Child Witness

[4] Oath by Atheist

[5] Refusal To Swear or Affirm

[6] Renunciation of the Oath

[7] Translator

[8] Trial Counsel

603.04 Legislative History

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 603 RULE 603

2-603 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 603.01

603.01 Official Text

Rule 603. Oath or Affirmation

Before testifying, every witness shall be required to declare that the witness will testify truthfully, by oath or affirmation administered in a form calculated to awaken the witness' conscience and impress the witness' mind with the duty to do so.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 603 RULE 603

2-603 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 603.02

603.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Basic Requirement

Along with cross-examination, the requirement of an oath is designed to ensure that every witness gives accurate and honest testimony. Although some critics have suggested that the oath is not really a substantial deterrent to false testimony, Courts have imposed the requirement on the ground that it provides some assurance that the truth will be told. n1 This, of course, is especially the case where there is a threat of a perjury conviction, which is contingent upon testimony having been made under oath. n2

Rule 603 states that a witness need not swear an oath, but may merely affirm that he or she will testify truthfully. The affirmation can be given in any form calculated to awaken the conscience of the witness and impress upon the witness the duty to tell the truth. By permitting affirmation as well as oath, the rule appears to alleviate any of difficulty faced by certain members of some religious groups with the traditional oath requirement. Witnesses may not be cross-examined about their decision to affirm rather than swear; if questioning were allowed, the right to affirm rather than swear would be meaningless. n3

Rule 603 does not mandate that the oath or affirmation be given in a specific form. n4 Flexibility might well be required, for example, to accommodate beliefs and opinions protected by the First Amendment. Thus, in United States v. Ward, 989 F.2d 1015 (9th Cir. 1992) , the defendant refused to testify because the Trial Judge did not permit him to take an altered version of the standard oath. The defendant would have taken an oath that substituted the term "fully integrated honesty" for the word "truth." The Court of Appeals held that it was error to refuse to accede to the defendant's demand. It found the defendant's objection to the standard oath to be based on "beliefs that are protected by the First Amendment." The Court noted that there is no rigid formula for an acceptable oath. Under Federal Rule 603, an oath is sufficient if it is in a form "calculated to awaken the witness' conscience and impress the witness' mind with the duty" to tell the truth. The Court stated, however, that the Trial Judge can refuse a proffered form of oath if it is nothing but "a cleverly worded oath that creates loopholes for falsehood or attempts to create a safe harbor for perjury." For example, a proffered oath that "I would not tell a lie to stay out of jail" has been properly rejected. Witnesses taking such an oath might wiggle out of a perjury charge by saying that the oath was not violated, because they lied for some purpose other than to stay out of jail, such as to protect a relative. n5 In Ward, the Court found that the proffered oath was not a means to evade the sanction of perjury. n6

Flexibility in the form of the oath might also be necessary for child-witnesses, who might be hard-pressed to understand the formal version. n7 Some child-witnesses may be so young as to be incapable of appreciating the importance of telling the truth in a courtroom, no matter how flexible the oath; in these limited cases, we believe that the Trial Judge must declare the child incompetent. See the discussion in [2], immediately below.

[2] Relationship to Competency

The Advisory Committee's Note states that Rule 603 "is designed to afford the flexibility required in dealing with religious adults, atheists, conscientious objectors, mental defectives, and children." Presumably the Note refers to the requirement that the oath or affirmation be "administered in a form calculated to awaken the witness' conscience and impress the witness' mind" with a duty to testify truthfully. As our Editorial Explanatory Comment in § 601.02[2] suggests, however, it is hard to believe that the Trial Judge has no discretion under any circumstances to reject a witness on competency grounds. A Court does have discretion to exclude a witness, despite Rule 601, if that witness cannot understand the meaning of an oath or an equivalent. n8

[3] Miscellaneous Proceedings

If Rule 1101 is read literally, witnesses do not have to testify under oath pursuant to Rule 603 when testifying on preliminary questions of fact, in sentencing proceedings, in probation revocation proceedings, and in other proceedings in which witnesses have traditionally testified under oath. This is because the Federal Rules of Evidence are not applicable to such proceedings. There is no indication, however, that Congress in Rule 1101 intended to open the door to in-court testimony without an oath. Whenever a witness is testifying in a proceeding, an oath is desirable, Rule 1101 notwithstanding.

[4] Procedure

Trial Judges who take the view that administration of an oath to witnesses is a solemn and important part of a judicial proceeding are much more likely, in our view, to impress upon witnesses the importance of honest, careful testimony.

Counsel who know that a witness will affirm but not swear to tell the truth should ask that the clerk, or whoever administers the oath, request the witness to make an affirmation. If this is done before the witness is asked to take an oath, the witness is spared the embarrassment of having to refuse to "swear" to tell the truth, and the jury is spared confusion. n9

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See United States v. Hawkins, 76 F.3d 545 (4th Cir. 1996) (Trial Judge erred in a criminal contempt prosecution in permitting the prosecutor to identify the defendant as the person who had been recalcitrant and uttered obscenities when called as a witness in a criminal case: "testimony taken from a witness who has not given an oath or affirmation to testify truthfully is inadmissible").

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Zizzo, 120 F.3d 1338 (7th Cir. 1997) ("The idea behind [Rule 603] is to preserve the integrity of the judicial process by awakening the witness' conscience and making the witness amenable to perjury prosecution if he fibs.").

(n3)Footnote 3. See United States v. Kalaydjian, 784 F.2d 53 (2d Cir. 1986) (Trial Court did not err in refusing to permit the defendants to cross-examine witnesses about why they did not choose to swear on the Koran, as they had the opportunity to do).

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., United States v. Armijo, 5 F.3d 1229 (9th Cir. 1993) (Court translator had translated a recorded conversation; when she testified about the taped conversation, she was asked only to swear that she translated the tape to the best of her ability; the Court held there was no error in failing to obtain a general oath that the translator would tell the truth; the translator's testimony related only to the accuracy and validity of the translation, and her oath specifically covered the subject matter of the testimony); United States v. Salim, 855 F.2d 944 (2d Cir. 1988) (admission of a deposition taken in France in the absence of an oath did not violate Rule 603, where the French Judge "took pains to press upon [the deponent] the need to answer truthfully, and the witness promised that she would do so").

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., United States v. Fowler, 605 F.2d 181 (5th Cir. 1979) (Trial Court properly refused testimony from a defendant who was only willing to say that he was a truthful man and would not lie to stay out of jail; Rule 603 does not require the Trial Court to give the witness a safe harbor for perjury).

(n6)Footnote 6. See also Ferguson v. Commissioner, 921 F.2d 588 (5th Cir. 1991) (Trial Court erred in refusing to allow a witness to testify where she said that she would "declare" rather than "swear" or "affirm" the truth).

(n7)Footnote 7. Spigarolo v. Meachum, 934 F.2d 19 (2d Cir. 1991) (oath was sufficient where the child was told to raise her right hand and was asked twice whether she would tell the truth: "When children testify, the trial court may fashion an oath or affirmation that is meaningful to the witness.").

(n8)Footnote 8. See, e.g., United States v. Ramirez, 871 F.2d 582, 584 (6th Cir. 1989) (Trial Court can exercise control over impaired witnesses by excluding testimony of a witness who cannot "take or comprehend an oath or affirmation" under Rule 603). Compare United States v. Saget, 991 F.2d 702 (11th Cir. 1993) (witness was not incompetent to testify simply because he swore an oath to God despite being an atheist; the record reflected the witness' cognizance of his solemn duty to tell the truth, and this is sufficient under Rule 603).

(n9)Footnote 9. See, e.g., United States v. Rabb, 394 F.2d 230 (3d Cir. 1968) (questioning on preliminary points concerning the proper form of oath should take place outside the jury's hearing, especially where the witness is "a follower of a minority religion which is unpopular with many persons in the community").

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 603 RULE 603

2-603 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 603.03

603.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Absence of Objection

United States v. Odom, 736 F.2d 104 (4th Cir. 1984) : In a prosecution for mail fraud arising out of a fraudulent absentee voting scheme, the Trial Judge refused to permit nine witnesses for the government to be sworn when they indicated on the witness stand that they could not respond to their names or they gave such contradictory responses that they appeared to lack competency. Although the defendants subsequently complained that it was error for the Judge to permit the witnesses to testify at all without administering an oath, a majority of the Court held that the failure to object to the absence of an oath at the time the witnesses took the stand waived any objection. The majority also noted that the Trial Judge had offered to recall the witnesses and to permit a re-cross examination, but the defendants indicated that they would withdraw their objection. A concurring Judge would have found a waiver of the objection in the defendants' failure to object to the closing jury instructions concerning the credibility of the unsworn witnesses.

[2] Admonishing Witness

United States v. Greer, 806 F.2d 556 (5th Cir. 1986) : Upholding convictions for racketeering, the Court held that the Trial Judge did not err in admonishing a defense character witness about the oath requirement after the witness asked the prosecutor conducting cross-examination if he wanted the truth.

[3] Child Witness

United States v. Thai, 29 F.3d 785 (2d Cir. 1994) : Affirming RICO convictions, the Court held that a 13-year-old witness had not been allowed to give "unsworn" testimony when he assured the Trial Judge that he appreciated the difference between truth and falsehood and knew it would be improper to lie, and promised to tell the truth. When children testify, the Trial Judge may fashion an oath or affirmation that is meaningful to the witness; no special verbal formulation is required.

[4] Oath by Atheist

United States v. Saget, 991 F.2d 702 (11th Cir. 1993) : Affirming narcotics convictions, the Court held that a witness was not incompetent to testify because he swore an oath to God despite being an atheist. Noting that an oath to God is not required, the Court concluded that the record reflected the witness' cognizance of his solemn duty to tell the truth.

[5] Refusal To Swear or Affirm

Ferguson v. Commissioner, 921 F.2d 588 (5th Cir. 1991) (per curiam): The Tax Court dismissed a petition for lack of prosecution because the taxpayer refused on religious grounds to swear or affirm at a hearing. The Court reversed, holding that the Judge should have attempted to accommodate the taxpayer by inquiring into her objections and considering her proposed alternative. In United States v. Fowler, n1 the Court affirmed the Trial Judge's refusal to allow a defendant to testify after he refused to either swear or affirm that he would tell the truth or submit to cross-examination.

United States v. Ward, 989 F.2d 1015 (9th Cir. 1992) , amended (9th Cir. 1993): The Court reversed the defendant's conviction for tax evasion, holding it was an abuse of discretion to refuse to allow the defendant to swear on an oath that substituted "fully integrated Honesty" for the word "truth." The Trial Court's interest in administering its precise form of oath must yield to the defendant's First Amendment rights. A dissenting Judge believed that the majority was accommodating purely secular philosophical concerns unprotected by the Constitution, which would lead to numerous wasteful and time-consuming attacks on the oath. In Gordon v. Idaho, n2 the Court reversed a dismissal of a civil rights action imposed as a penalty for the plaintiff's refusal to comply with a discovery order that required him to take an oath or affirmation. It concluded that the Trial Judge "should have explored the least restrictive means of assuring that Gordon would testify truthfully at his deposition."

[6] Renunciation of the Oath

United States v. Zizzo, 120 F.3d 1338 (7th Cir. 1997) : Affirming racketeering convictions, the Court found no plain error in the failure to strike the testimony of a government witness who admitted on cross-examination that the oath meant "nothing" to him. The Court, citing Rule 603, reasoned as follows:

> The idea behind the rule is to preserve the integrity of the judicial process by awakening the witness' conscience and making the witness amenable to perjury prosecution if he fibs. In this case Patrick swore to tell the truth and repeatedly acknowledged the district judge's admonishments that he was under oath. Patrick was also aware of the consequences of perjury [having suffered upward departures in sentencing for previous acts of perjury]. It follows, then, that this single remark on cross-examination did not require the district judge to sua sponte strike his entire 3-days' worth of testimony.

[7] Translator

United States v. Armijo, 5 F.3d 1229 (9th Cir. 1993) : In a prosecution for cocaine distribution, a Court translator had translated a recorded conversation; when she testified, she was asked only to swear that she translated the tape to the best of her ability, but she did not take a standard witness' oath. The Court held there was no error, since her testimony related only to the accuracy and validity of the translation. The dissenting Judge believed that: the failure to inform the witness of her duty to tell the truth on the stand and of the penalty for perjury denied the defendant's right to meaningful confrontation; the examination of the witness tested her credibility as well as the accuracy of her translation; and the standing oath she had taken as an interpreter was insufficient as an oath for a witness.

[8] Trial Counsel

United States v. Hawkins, 76 F.3d 545 (4th Cir. 1996) : The Court held that it was error in a criminal contempt prosecution to permit the prosecuting attorney to identify Hawkins as the person who had been recalcitrant and uttered obscenities when called as a witness in a criminal case, since "testimony taken from a witness who has not given an oath or affirmation to testify truthfully is inadmissible."

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Fowler, 605 F.2d 181 (5th Cir. 1979) .

(n2)Footnote 2. Gordon v. Idaho, 778 F.2d 1397 (9th Cir. 1985) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 603 RULE 603

2-603 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 603.04

603.04 Legislative History

Advisory Committee's Note

The rule is designed to afford the flexibility required in dealing with religious adults, atheists, conscientious objectors, mental defectives, and children. Affirmation is simply a solemn undertaking to tell the truth; no special verbal formula is required. As is true generally, affirmation is recognized by federal law. "Oath" includes affirmation, 1 U.S.C. § 1; judges and clerks may administer oaths and affirmations, 28 U.S.C. §§ 459, 953; and affirmations are acceptable in lieu of oaths under Rule 43(d) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Perjury by a witness is a crime, 18 U.S.C. § 1621.

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendments are technical. No substantive change is intended."]

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
Supp. To CHAPTER 603 RULE 603

2-603 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 603, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 603. Oath or Affirmation	Rule 603. Oath or Affirmation to Testify Truthfully
Before testifying, every witness	Before testifying, a witness must shall be required to declare that the witness will testify truthfully, by oath or affirmation administered in a form calculated to awaken the witness' conscience and impress the witness' mind with give an oath or affirmation to testify truthfully. It must be in a form designed to impress that duty on the witness' conscience.

the duty
to do so.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 603 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 604 RULE 604

2-604 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 604.syn

§ 604.syn Synopsis to Chapter 604: RULE 604

604.01 Official Text

604.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Basic Requirement

[2] Special Transcription Procedures

[3] Miscellaneous Proceedings

[4] Finding Interpreters

[5] Family Member as Interpreter

604.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Constitutional Right

[2] Court-Appointed Interpreter

[3] Failure To Object

[4] Family Member As Interpreter

[5] Oath

[6] Witness' Need for Interpreter

604.04 Legislative History

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 604 RULE 604

2-604 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 604.01

604.01 Official Text

Rule 604. Interpreters

An interpreter is subject to the provisions of these rules relating to qualification as an expert and the administration of an oath or affirmation to make a true translation.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 604 RULE 604

2-604 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 604.02

604.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Basic Requirement

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, and the Court Interpreters Act n1 all provide for appointment of interpreters in appropriate cases. This Rule states that an interpreter is subject to the provisions of the Evidence Rules relating to qualification as an expert. If the interpreter's skill in language is helpful to the Judge and jury, and the interpreter has expertise in translating the relevant languages, then the interpreter qualifies as an expert. An interpreter willing to take an oath or affirmation to make a true translation can assist the Court and jury in the trial process. n2

[2] Special Transcription Procedures

One interesting question not discussed anywhere in the Rules is what special transcription procedures, if any, should be required if an interpreter is employed at trial. Assuming that the average Court reporter is not multilingual, or that even a multilinguist may find a language he or she is incapable of transcribing and understanding, it is clear that total dependence on a Court reporter to transcribe proceedings will sometimes result in a record of only the English version of who said what at trial. Because interpreters may err, we suggest that during any part of a trial when an interpreter is employed for purposes of explaining a question or answer to the Court, the jury and the parties, a sound recording of the proceedings should be made.

[3] Miscellaneous Proceedings

There is a problem with this Rule that is similar to the problem identified in the Editorial Explanatory Comment accompanying Rule 603, § 603.02[3]. When Congress adopted Rule 1101, it indicated its desire to have most of the technical rules of evidence rendered inapplicable in many pretrial and posttrial proceedings. Unfortunately, Rule 1101 now provides that Rule 604 does not apply in situations in which other Evidence Rules are inapplicable. This is most unfortunate, because Rule 604 ought to apply whenever an interpreter is used, and an interpreter ought to be used whenever possible in order to ensure that non-English speaking people, or nonspeaking people, are treated fairly in Federal Courts. We suggest that the Court exercise its supervisory authority to appoint and regulate interpreters where necessary, even where Rule 604 is technically inapplicable.

[4] Finding Interpreters

Appointment of an interpreter, like appointment of counsel, is probably constitutionally required if necessary to enable criminal defendants to understand the proceedings being conducted against them. n3

The difficulty of finding adequate interpreters has been reduced by the enactment of the Court Interpreters Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1827 and 1828. Section 1827 requires the Director of the Administrative Office of the Federal Courts to establish a program to facilitate the use of interpreters in Federal Courts by inter alia: (1) prescribing, determining, and certifying the qualifications of interpreters; (2) maintaining a list of qualified interpreters; and (3) prescribing a fee schedule for interpreters. Presiding Judges are to use the most qualified available interpreter in criminal and civil actions (including habeas corpus actions) when a party or witness speaks only or primarily a language other than English or suffers from a hearing impairment (whether or not suffering also from a speech impairment). By a 1988 amendment to the section, the interpretation is to be in the simultaneous mode for any party to a criminal proceeding or other judicial proceeding instituted by the United States and in the consecutive mode for witnesses, unless the presiding judicial officer determines that simultaneous or consecutive interpretation "will aid in the efficient administration of justice." Section 1828 provides that the Director shall establish a program for special interpretative services that "shall provide a capacity for simultaneous interpretation services in multidefendant criminal actions and multidefendant civil actions."

[5] Family Member as Interpreter

In some cases, it may be necessary, or at least helpful, to appoint a family member of the witness as an interpreter. For example, in United States v. Ball, 988 F.2d 7 (5th Cir. 1993) , the prosecution called a witness who was deaf and whose speech was unintelligible to the Judge and jury. The Trial Judge permitted the witness' wife to serve as an interpreter. The Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in appointing the witness' wife as an interpreter. The obvious concern in such an appointment is that the interpreter will have a suspect motivation; but here, the Court noted that the wife's only connection to the case was that she was married to a witness who himself had no stake in the outcome. It was also important that the nature of the witness' disability made it necessary to appoint someone familiar with the witness. n4 Obviously, the appointment of a family member would not be justified if the witness spoke a foreign language; an unaffiliated translator can be found in such circumstances.

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. 28 U.S.C. §§ 1827, 1828.

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Armijo, 5 F.3d 1229 (9th Cir. 1993) (when a translator testified, she was asked only to swear that she translated a tape to the best of her ability; this was not error, because her testimony related only to the accuracy and validity of the translation, and her oath thus encompassed the entirety of her testimony).

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., Jackson v. Garcia, 665 F.2d 395 (1st Cir. 1981) (the right to an interpreter "is of federal constitutional dimension" if the defendant is otherwise unable to understand the proceedings).

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Bell, 367 F.3d 452 (5th Cir. 2004) (no abuse of discretion in allowing the sister of a victim (a deaf mute) to interpret the victim's testimony at trial; the Trial Judge found that the sister was the only member of the limited pool of interpreters who had no personal knowledge of the events in issue).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 604 RULE 604

2-604 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 604.03

604.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Constitutional Right

United States v. Mayans, 17 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed cocaine convictions, finding, inter alia, that the defendant's Fifth Amendment right to testify in his own behalf was violated when the Judge removed an interpreter and insisted that the defendant try to proceed in English before the jury. The Court concluded that a determination that a witness requires an interpreter requires personal observation of the witness, which must initially be made outside the hearing of the jury.

[2] Court-Appointed Interpreter

United States v. Moon, 718 F.2d 1210 (2d Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed convictions arising out of the filing of false tax returns, holding that under the Court Interpreters Act of 1978, 28 U.S.C. § 1827, the defendant could not have his own interpreter translate his testimony if he took the stand. The defendant was permitted to use his own interpreter to translate the proceedings for him. The Court found that the requirement of a court-appointed interpreter for testimony was intended to prevent parties from using untrustworthy interpreters who might disrupt the proceedings.

[3] Failure To Object

United States v. Miller, 806 F.2d 223 (10th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a rape conviction, the Court held that a defendant could not complain that an interpreter was unqualified where the defendant consented to the trial procedure and the interpreter was used only sparingly at trial.

[4] Family Member As Interpreter

United States v. Bell, 367 F.3d 452 (5th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions for aggravated sexual abuse, finding no abuse of discretion in allowing the sister of one victim, a deaf mute, to interpret the victim's testimony at trial. Although a defendant complained that the sister was devoted to the victim, the Trial Judge found that she was the only member of the limited pool of available interpreters who had no personal knowledge of the events at issue. The Court noted that the defense was allowed to call another potential interpreter to challenge the sister's interpretation. In United States v. Ball, 988 F.2d 7 (5th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed a conviction for possession of a stolen Treasury check, holding there was no abuse of discretion in appointing the witness' wife as interpreter for a deaf witness whose speech was unintelligible. The Court recognized that an interpreter must have no interest in the outcome of the proceeding, but found that the wife's only connection to the defendant was that she was married to a witness. The Court also observed that the nature of the witness' disability made it necessary to appoint someone familiar with the witness.

[5] Oath

United States v. Pluta, 176 F.3d 43 (2d Cir. 1999) : The defendant was convicted of smuggling aliens. His first language, as well as that of many of the witnesses, was Polish. He contended that the Trial Judge committed error by failing to administer proper oaths to the interpreters at trial. The Judge asked the interpreters if they were going to "literally interpret" the testimony and proceedings, and each answered "yes." Affirming the convictions, the Court noted that "this colloquy may have been somewhat less than what is envisioned by the Rules' requirement of a dialogue sufficient to awaken the interpreter's conscience and impress the interpreter's mind with his or her duties." But the defendant had not shown "any shortfall that caused him prejudice" and could not point to any instance in which the interpreters failed to interpret literally or accurately.

United States v. Armijo, 5 F.3d 1229 (9th Cir. 1993) : In a prosecution for cocaine distribution, a Court translator had translated a recorded conversation; when she testified, she was asked only to swear that she translated the tape to the best of her ability, but she did not take a standard witness' oath. The Court held there was no error, since her testimony related only to the accuracy and validity of the translation. The dissenting Judge believed that the standing oath she had taken as an interpreter was insufficient as an oath for a witness.

[6] Witness' Need for Interpreter

United States v. Mayans, 17 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed cocaine convictions, finding, inter alia, that the defendant's rights were violated when the Judge removed an interpreter and insisted that the defendant try to proceed in English before the jury. The Court concluded that a determination of the need for an interpreter must be based on personal observation of the witness, which must initially be made outside the hearing of the jury.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 604 RULE 604

2-604 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 604.04

604.04 Legislative History

Advisory Committee's Note

The rule implements Rule 43(f) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and Rule 28(b) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, both of which contain provisions for the appointment and compensation of interpreters.

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendment is technical. No substantive change is intended."]

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
Supp. To CHAPTER 604 RULE 604

2-604 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 604, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 604. Interpreters	Rule 604. Interpreter
An interpreter is subject to the provisions of these rules	An interpreter must be qualified and must give an oath or affirm relating to qualification as an expert and the administration of an oath or affirmation to make a true translation.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 604 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 605 RULE 605

2-605 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 605.syn

§ 605.syn Synopsis to Chapter 605: RULE 605

605.01 Official Text

605.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Basic Rule

[2] Alternatives to Testifying

[3] Collateral Proceedings

[4] Summary and Comment on the Evidence

605.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Collateral Proceedings

[2] Judges As Witnesses

[3] Judicial Employees

[4] Special Master

[5] Summary and Comment

[6] View by Judge

605.04 Legislative History

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 605 RULE 605

2-605 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 605.01

605.01 Official Text

Rule 605. Competency of Judge as Witness

The judge presiding at the trial may not testify in that trial as a witness. No objection need be made in order to preserve the point.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 605 RULE 605

2-605 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 605.02

605.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Basic Rule

A Judge who presides at trial may not testify in that trial as a witness. This is such an important principle that no objection need be made in order to preserve a claim of error for appeal. Another reason for the "automatic objection" is to avoid putting counsel in the difficult position of asking the Trial Judge to rule on his or her own conduct.

28 U.S.C. § 455(b) already provides that a Judge must disqualify himself or herself in any case in which he or she is "likely to be a material witness in the proceeding." n1 Consequently, Rule 605 is rarely invoked, because Trial Judges who are likely to be witnesses at the trial are also likely to have recused themselves before trial. However, the drafters of the Federal Rules of Evidence wanted to ensure that there is absolutely no possibility of the Trial Judge being both witness and Judge in the same proceeding.

The policy of the absolute exclusionary principle of Rule 605 is eminently sound. If the Judge were to testify for one side or the other, the jury would likely be biased toward the side with whom the Judge would be identified. n2 At a minimum, the jury is bound to be confused by the Judge's having taken on two incompatible roles. It would also be unworkable to have Judges rule on objections to their own testimony, or to have Judges determine the permissible scope of their own cross-examination. Furthermore, Judges would be conflicted in ruling on directed verdict and new trial motions, because they would have to weigh their own testimony. Finally, at least one litigant would be put in the impossible position of cross-examining the Judge and objecting to the Judge's testimony.

While the Advisory Committee and the Congress do not raise the point, it is also possible that it would be unconstitutional in a criminal case for a Judge both to preside and testify. The argument that testimony aligns the Judge with a party or with an issue and thus raises the possibility of partiality, which is enough under the Due Process Clause to require disqualification, would find support in Ward v. Village of Monroeville, 409 U.S. 57 (1972) (finding a violation of the right to a fair trial where the Trial Judge in a traffic case was also the Mayor, who was responsible for municipal finances), and Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510 (1927) (biased Judge taints the proceedings, requiring per se reversal for a constitutional violation).

[2] Alternatives to Testifying

The one instance in which a Judge might be tempted to testify is after seeing parties or witnesses violate a sequestration order. Often, the Judge can explore this on the record without becoming a witness by having the relevant parties or witnesses explain their conduct. If they deny doing what the Judge saw or deny saying what the Judge heard, the Judge may have to declare a mistrial in order to become available to testify in a second trial.

[3] Collateral Proceedings

Is a Trial Judge who is called to testify in a habeas corpus proceeding competent to testify as to what happened at trial? Yes, the Trial Judge is permitted to testify in a collateral proceeding. Rule 605 only precludes testimony in the trial at which the Judge presides. There are times, in fact, where it is absolutely necessary that a Trial Judge be called as a witness. This is especially true when the attack on the conviction comes in the form of an attack on the actions or motives of the Trial Judge. n3

28 U.S.C. § 2245 provides that a state Judge may file a written explanation of what happened at a state trial in the case of a federal collateral attack. This obviates the need to call the Judge as a witness in some, but not all, cases. For a Supreme Court case in which a state Judge testified in a federal habeas corpus proceeding, see Castaneda v. Partida, 430 U.S. 482 (1977) (testimony concerning the exclusion of Hispanics from a grand jury).

[4] Summary and Comment on the Evidence

Nothing in Rule 605 is intended to bar Trial Judges from exercising their traditional powers to summarize and comment upon the evidence. The Supreme Court approved a rule (Rule 105, in Part Three of this Manual) codifying the Federal Judges' traditional powers to summarize and comment, but the House Judiciary Committee deleted it, noting that it was highly controversial because those powers were not given to most state Judges. The Senate Committee acceded to the deletion "with the understanding that the present Federal practice, taken from the common law, ... is left undisturbed." n4

On the other hand, Rule 605 does more than prohibit the Judge from the extreme conduct of leaving the bench and taking the witness stand. The intent of the Rule is to prohibit the Judge from acting as an unsworn witness as well. n5 So there is a line between commenting on the evidence, which is permissible, and acting as an unsworn fact witness in the case, which is not. n6

Illustrative of this admittedly vague dividing line is United States v. Pritchett, 699 F.2d 317 (6th Cir. 1983) . In a drug case, the prosecution sought on cross-examination to associate the defendant with one Lee Miles, who had been previously convicted for cocaine distribution. The defendant admitted that he knew Miles, but stated that he did not know that Miles had been convicted on a cocaine charge. As it happened, the Trial Judge in Pritchett's case was the Judge who had sentenced Miles. When defense counsel objected to this line of questioning, the Trial Judge denied the objection, and informed the jury that, indeed, Miles had been convicted of cocaine distribution.

On appeal, the Court held that the entire line of questioning concerning the defendant's connection with Miles constituted impermissible character evidence. But the Court declared that it would not reverse the conviction on this ground alone, because "Pritchett's innocent answers to the prosecutor's questions and the brevity of the exchange in the context of the lengthy trial mitigated its potentially damaging effect." The Court found it more disturbing -- and reversible error -- that the Trial Judge engaged in "what we can only characterize as improper testimony" by confirming what the prosecutor had unsuccessfully attempted to solicit from Pritchett, i.e., that Miles was a convicted cocaine dealer. The Court reasoned as follows: "By his interjection here, the judge below lent the weight of the bench to a line of inquiry we have already determined was impermissibly prejudicial. Moreover, because of the context in which his editorial occurred -- immediately following the defendant's negative answers -- his remarks created a two-fold danger. Not only was the possibility that the jury would draw the prohibited inference strengthened, but there arose simultaneously the possibility that the jury would take the judge's confirmation as an impeachment of Pritchett's credibility. Whether or not either of the two possibilities actually come to fruition is impossible to say and, we think, irrelevant. We are persuaded that the risk is sufficiently great to justify reversal and remand for a new trial."

The Trial Judge's comment in Pritchett was not a permissible comment on the evidence, because there was no evidence presented that Miles was a convicted drug dealer. If some evidence is presented on a point, however, and the Trial Judge gives her evaluation of that evidence to the jury, this will not be a violation of Rule 605, unless, perhaps, the Judge's evaluation is vastly overstated. n7

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. For a lengthy discussion of 28 U.S.C. § 455, see Liteky v. United States, 510 U.S. 540 (1994) (recusal was not required merely because the Trial Judge showed antagonism to the defendant as a result of conduct and information elicited during the trial).

(n2)Footnote 2. See United States v. Nickl, 427 F.3d 1286 (10th Cir. 2005) ("Adherence to Rule 605 also prevents prejudice which may arise from a judge's testimony because of the judge's influential position with the jury.").

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., Hamilton v. Vasquez, 17 F.3d 1149 (9th Cir. 1994) (finding no bar in a habeas proceeding to testimony by the Trial Judge).

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., Wilson v. Bicycle South, Inc., 915 F.2d 1503 (11th Cir. 1990) (finding no error when the Trial Judge commented on the evidence and the testimony of the plaintiff's expert; the Judge's exercise of the "time-honored, though little used, right and duty of a federal judge" to comment did not prejudice the parties and did not result in an incorrect instruction to the jury).

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., United States v. Paiva, 892 F.2d 148 (1st Cir. 1989) (Trial Court's explanation of how a field test for drugs was conducted was error -- it went beyond the Trial Court's power to comment on the evidence).

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., Lillie v. United States, 953 F.2d 1188 (10th Cir. 1992) (Rule 605 was violated where the Trial Judge in a bench trial viewed the scene where the accident allegedly happened, without notice and without providing counsel for either party the opportunity to accompany him, and then made findings of fact); United States v. Maceo, 947 F.2d 1191 (5th Cir. 1991) (during cross-examination concerning a plea bargain made by a government witness, the Trial Judge stated that defense counsel had "misstated" the law on plea bargains; this was within the Judge's power to comment, because the Judge did not "impermissibly testify as to any fact issue"); United States v. Sanchez, 790 F.2d 245 (2d Cir. 1986) (flight instruction should not have been given; however, it was not "purported or implied testimony by the Judge," and thus there was no violation of Rule 605).

(n7)Footnote 7. See also United States v. Nickl, 427 F.3d 1286 (10th Cir. 2005) : A cooperating witness (Steward) testified at the defendant's trial for bank fraud; she gave conflicting testimony about her intent to defraud the bank, first claiming that she had no intent to injure the bank, and then admitting she had pleaded guilty to having intent to defraud. On cross-examination, defense counsel suggested that Steward pled guilty to defrauding the bank, even though not guilty, "just to get it over with." The Trial Judge, who had taken Steward's plea, then interjected that he would never have taken the plea unless he was convinced that Steward had committed the crime. The Court found that this interjection was reversible error: "Here, as in Pritchett ... the presiding judge's commentary about Steward's intent to defraud the bank added new evidence which the prosecution was otherwise unable to establish. Steward had given conflicting testimony as to her intent, and the judge added evidence when he told the jury he was convinced Steward intended to defraud the bank. The judge's comment did not summarize Steward's testimony, it reshaped it. It converted Steward's equivocations into a definitive answer on the question of intent and improperly addressed an ultimate factual issue to be decided by the jury. ... Accordingly, the comment constituted impermissible testimony in violation of Rule 605."

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 605 RULE 605

2-605 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 605.03

605.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Collateral Proceedings

Hamilton v. Vasquez, 17 F.3d 1149 (9th Cir. 1994) : The Court held that in a habeas corpus proceeding there is no bar to the State Trial Judge giving testimony as a fact witness to supplement the State Court record.

[2] Judges As Witnesses

Robinson v. Commissioner, 70 F.3d 34 (5th Cir. 1995) : In an action to determine the portion of settlement proceeds allocable to punitive damages, the Court held that the taxpayers were not entitled to subpoena a State Court Judge to testify as to his understanding and knowledge of the settlement agreement, since that would inevitably lead to an impermissible inquiry into his mental processes in reaching a decision.

United States v. Frankenthal, 582 F.2d 1102 (7th Cir. 1978) : In an eavesdropping prosecution the government called a Federal District Judge to testify that he had been consulted by a defense witness who wanted the trial date in the case postponed because he had a business interest in the outcome of the trial. Affirming the conviction, the Court noted that Federal Judges should be called with caution, but concluded it was proper to admit the evidence with an instruction to the jury that the Judge's testimony was to be used only to assess the defense witness' credibility and not as evidence against the accused.

United States v. Nickl, 427 F.3d 1286 (10th Cir. 2005) : The defendant was convicted of aiding and abetting in the misapplication of bank funds by a bank employee who had pleaded guilty. The employee gave conflicting testimony on her intent to defraud, which was an element of the aiding and abetting crime, and when the defense asked on re-cross whether she pleaded guilty just to "get it over with," the Judge interrupted and said that he took her plea after a "specific lengthy inquiry" and he would never have accepted it unless convinced she had acted with the requisite intent to defraud. The Court reversed, holding that the Judge's commentary violated Rule 605, because it added new evidence that the prosecution was otherwise unable to establish: "It converted [the witness'] equivocations into a definitive answer ... and improperly addressed an ultimate factual issue to be decided by the jury."

[3] Judicial Employees

Kennedy v. Great Atl. & Pac. Tea Co., 551 F.2d 593 (5th Cir. 1977) : A central issue in a personal injury action was whether the injured party slipped because of a wet spot on the floor. After the first trial ended in a mistrial because of the injured party's death, the Trial Judge's law clerk went with a friend to the accident scene out of curiosity. It was raining at the time, and they saw a puddle approximately where the original complainant had fallen. The clerk reported to the Judge what he saw, and then phoned defense counsel to inform him of his observation and remark that the information might have a bearing on a settlement. Before the retrial the Judge also disclosed the information to the plaintiff's counsel, who called the clerk and the friend to testify. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held that the testimony of the clerk, who was so closely associated with the Judge, distorted the proceedings. Citing Rule 605 as persuasive authority, the Court expressed its concern that the jury might have concluded that the clerk's information had special importance and that the defendant would not be able to attack the credibility of the clerk because of his identification with the Trial Judge.

Price Bros. Co. v. Philadelphia Gear Corp., 629 F.2d 444 (6th Cir. 1980) : In an action for breach of contract and warranties, the Judge had sent his law clerk to visit the plaintiff's plant to observe machinery before the bench trial. The Court remanded, observing that "[w]e believe that, where a suit is to be tried without a jury, sending a law clerk to gather evidence is so destructive of the appearance of impartiality required of a trial judge" that a hearing on the allegation was required. After the remand, 649 F.2d 416 (6th Cir. 1981) , the Court held (2-1) that the presumption of prejudice arising from the law clerk's report of off-the-record observations had been overcome by evidence establishing that the sole purpose of the clerk's visit was to observe the machine and describe it to the Judge so that he might better understand the evidence at trial.

[4] Special Master

Gary W. v. Louisiana, 861 F.2d 1366 (5th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that a special master, who was appointed to ensure compliance with a protective order during the remedial phase of a class action case involving mentally retarded and emotionally disturbed children, was performing a quasi-judicial function when she submitted her formal recommendation. Thus, an examination into her mental processes in making the recommendation was prohibited.

[5] Summary and Comment

United States v. Paiva, 892 F.2d 148 (1st Cir. 1989) : During a trial for cocaine distribution offenses, a detective identified as cocaine a substance that he had field tested and sent to a lab. In the course of directing the jury to disregard any reference to the lab report, the Judge explained a field test. The Court held that this was an impermissible exercise of the Judge's power to explain, summarize, and comment on the facts and evidence. The error was harmless, however.

United States v. Brown, 946 F.2d 1191 (6th Cir. 1991) : Where the defendant was convicted for selling cocaine to an addict-informant, the Court held there was no error in refusing to give a special cautionary instruction regarding the informant's credibility, as the charge is discretionary and failure to give it will not constitute plain error where there is corroborating evidence. One Judge dissented, on the grounds that there was no corroboration of the critical facts and that the Trial Court's decision was erroneously based on a belief that it could not comment on the evidence.

Wilson v. Bicycle South, Inc., 915 F.2d 1503 (11th Cir. 1990) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in a product liability action, the Court held that there was no error when the Trial Judge commented on the evidence and the testimony of the plaintiff's expert. The Judge's exercise of the "time-honored, though little used, right and duty of a federal judge" neither excited a prejudice affecting the substantial rights of the parties nor incorrectly instructed the jury.

[6] View by Judge

Lillie v. United States, 953 F.2d 1188 (10th Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a judgment against the plaintiff in a Federal Tort Claims Act case because the Trial Judge, who was the trier of fact, had viewed the scene where the accident allegedly happened without notice and without providing counsel for either party the opportunity to accompany him.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 605 RULE 605

2-605 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 605.04

605.04 Legislative History

Advisory Committee's Note

In view of the mandate of 23 U.S.C. § 455 that a judge disqualify himself in "any case in which he ... is or has been a material witness," the likelihood that the presiding judge in a federal court might be called to testify in the trial over which he is presiding is slight. Nevertheless the possibility is not totally eliminated.

The solution here presented is a broad rule of incompetency, rather than such alternatives as incompetency only as to material matters, leaving the matter to the discretion of the judge, or recognizing no incompetency. The choice is the result of inability to evolve satisfactory answers to questions which arise when the judge abandons the bench for the witness stand. Who rules on objections? Who compels him to answer? Can he rule impartially on the weight and admissibility of his own testimony? Can he be impeached or cross-examined effectively? Can he, in a jury trial, avoid conferring his seal of approval on one side in the eyes of the jury? Can he, in a bench trial, avoid an involvement destructive of impartiality? The rule of general incompetency has substantial support. See Report of the Special Committee on the Propriety of Judges Appearing as Witnesses, 36 A.B.A.J. 630 (1950); cases collected in Annot., 157 A.L.R. 311; McCormick § 68, p. 147; Uniform Rule 42; California Evidence Code § 703; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-442; New Jersey Evidence Rule 42. Cf. 6 Wigmore § 1909, which advocates leaving the matter to the discretion of the judge, and statutes to that effect collected in Annot., 157 A.L.R. 311.

The rule provides an "automatic" objection. To require an actual objection would confront the opponent with a choice between not objecting, with the result of allowing the testimony, and objecting, with the probable result of excluding the testimony but at the price of continuing the trial before a judge likely to feel that his integrity had been attacked by the objector.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
Supp. To CHAPTER 605 RULE 605

2-605 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 605, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 605. Competency of Judge as Witness	Rule 605. Judge's Competency as a Witness
The judge presiding at the trial may not testi	The presiding judge may not testify as a wit-

fy in that trial as a witness. No objection need be made in order to preserve the point.	ness at the trial. A party need not object to preserve the issue.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 605 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
Supp. To CHAPTER 605 RULE 605

2-605 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 605.03

Supp. to § 605.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[2] Judges As Witnesses [Go To Main]

United States v. Blanchard, 542 F.3d 1133 (7th Cir. 2008) : The defendant was prosecuted for manufacturing methamphetamine and felon firearm possession after his adult son reported his criminal activity. The son gave testimony before the grand jury implicating the defendant in possession of firearms, but at a subsequent suppression hearing he claimed that the firearms were in his own exclusive possession. Confronted with his prior statements, the Judge's comments that the testimony was not credible, and threats of a perjury prosecution, he recanted and gave testimony consistent with that before the grand jury at a reopened suppression hearing and again at trial. Defense counsel sought to impeach him by getting him to admit that the government had told him that he could be charged with perjury. On redirect the prosecutor then elicited that it was the Judge (who presided at both the suppression hearing and the trial) who had first suggested the exculpatory testimony was not truthful, and quoted at length from the Judge's comments at the first suppression hearing. Overruling repeated objections, the Judge said that it was "a direct statement of the Court in a judicial proceeding... . This is reading judicial testimony." Vacating the conviction, the Court held that it was an abuse of discretion for the Judge to allow introduction of his own suppression-hearing comments on the credibility of a key government witness. Rule 605 prohibits a presiding Judge from making comments based on his personal knowledge of matters external to the trial, and that bar applies as well when the Judge's comments were read into the record by the prosecutor, especially when the Judge acknowledged them as his own. Furthermore, the danger of unfair prejudice from this "judicial testimony," which placed the weight of the Judge's authority behind the witness' government-friendly testimony, significantly outweighed its probative value, which was slight given the other evidence on the son's credibility.

United States v. Berber-Tinoco, 510 F.3d 1083 (9th Cir. 2007) : Although it affirmed a conviction for unlawful re-entry after deportation, the Court held that the Trial Judge violated Rule 605 when, in a suppression hearing, he interjected his own observations regarding the location of stop signs along a certain road near the border and the narrowness of the road, as well as when he relied on his personal knowledge that no speed limit was posted on a certain road near the border and that the speed limit was therefore 55 miles per hour. The Court noted, however, that the Judge did not violate Rule 605 in drawing fair inferences from evidence in the record.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 606 RULE 606

2-606 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 606.syn

§ 606.syn Synopsis to Chapter 606: RULE 606

606.01 Official Text

606.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Objections to Jurors as Witnesses

[2] Post-Verdict Inquiries

[3] Inquiry into Bias

[4] External Influences

[5] Misunderstood Instructions, Clerical Errors, and the 2006 Amendment to Rule 606(b)

[6] Effect of Extraneous Information and Outside Influences on Juror Deliberations

[7] Alternate Forms of Proof

[8] Supporting Verdicts

[9] Habeas Corpus Cases

606.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Rule 606(a) -- At the Trial

[2] Rule 606(b) -- Inquiry Into Validity of Verdict or Indictment

[a] Rule 606(b) -- Bench Trials and Mental Processes of Judges

[b] Rule 606(b) -- Bias of Jurors

[c] Rule 606(b) -- Collateral Estoppel Inquiry

[d] Rule 606(b) -- Competency of Juror

[e] Rule 606(b) -- Compromise Verdicts

[f] Rule 606(b) -- Drug and Alcohol Use

[g] Rule 606(b) -- Errors in Verdicts

[h] Rule 606(b) -- Experiments

[i] Rule 606(b) -- Extraneous Prejudicial Information

[i] Rule 606(b) -- Civil Cases

[ii] Rule 606(b) -- Extraneous Prejudicial Information -- Criminal Cases

[j] Rule 606(b) -- Habeas Corpus Proceedings

[k] Rule 606(b) -- Improper Contacts or Threats to Jury

[l] Rule 606(b) -- Improper Exhibits in Jury Room

[m] Rule 606(b) -- Instructions to the Jury

[n] Rule 606(b) -- Interpreter in Jury Room

[o] Rule 606(b) -- Interviews with Jurors

[p] Rule 606(b) -- Judicial Discretion

[q] Rule 606(b) -- Jurors' Notebooks

[r] Rule 606(b) -- Jury Misconduct

[s] Rule 606(b) -- Mental Processes

[i] Rule 606(b) -- Civil Cases

[ii] Rule 606(b) -- Mental Processes -- Criminal Cases

[t] Rule 606(b) -- Official Contacts

[u] Rule 606(b) -- Partial Verdicts

[v] Rule 606(b) -- Pre-Deliberation Statements of Jurors

[w] Rule 606(b) -- Sentencing

[x] Rule 606(b) -- Time Pressure

[y] Rule 606(b) -- Verdict Forms

606.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

[3] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

[4] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

[5] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

[6] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 606 RULE 606

2-606 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 606.01

606.01 Official Text

[Go To Supp]

Rule 606. Competency of Juror as Witness

(a) At the trial. -- A member of the jury may not testify as a witness before that jury in the trial of the case in which the juror is sitting. If the juror is called so to testify, the opposing party shall be afforded an opportunity to object out of the presence of the jury.

(b) Inquiry into validity of verdict or indictment. -- Upon an inquiry into the validity of a verdict or indictment, a juror may not testify as to any matter or statement occurring during the course of the jury's deliberations or to the effect of anything upon that or any other juror's mind or emotions as influencing the juror to assent to or dissent from the verdict or indictment or concerning the juror's mental processes in connection therewith, except that a juror may testify on the question whether extraneous prejudicial information was improperly brought to the jury's attention or whether any outside influence was improperly brought to bear upon any juror. Nor may a juror's affidavit or evidence of any statement by the juror concerning a matter about which the juror would be precluded from testifying be received for these purposes.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 606 RULE 606

2-606 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 606.02

606.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Objections to Jurors as Witnesses

Like Trial Judges, members of trial juries are prohibited from testifying in the same trial in which they sit. This is because jurors who testify would be put in the conflicted role of having to weigh their own testimony, and one of the parties would be put in the uncomfortable role of risking enmity with the jury by cross-examining and impeaching the juror-witness. Consequently, Rule 606 establishes a firm rule, perhaps constitutionally based. n1 Of course, the Rule seldom needs to be applied, since even the most casual voir dire will result in the disqualification of a juror who has enough personal knowledge about the case to testify about it.

In our view, calling a juror to testify is so obviously improper that its prohibition should not depend upon timely objection. But Rule 606(a) does require an objection, presumably with the normal rules of timeliness applying, although the objection can be made outside the hearing of the jury. Allowing the objection to be made outside the jury's hearing makes eminent sense, because otherwise counsel runs the risk of offending the jurors in making the objection.

[2] Post-Verdict Inquiries

While there is general agreement that the mental operations and the emotional reactions of jurors during the deliberative process should not be the subject of subsequent inquiry, there has been some disagreement as to whether a juror should be able to impeach a verdict by testifying about other matters. The Advisory Committee proposed a version of Rule 606(b) permitting a juror to testify on the question of whether extraneous prejudicial information was improperly brought to the jury's attention or whether any outside influence was improperly brought to bear upon any juror. This was changed in the House of Representatives to permit juror testimony about other matters. The House drew the line between mental operations and emotional reactions on the one hand, and objective factors which could occur inside or outside the jury room, on the other hand. The latter could be the subject of inquiry. Under the House view, a quotient verdict, for example, would be subject to attack; it would not be subject to attack under the Rule promulgated by the Advisory Committee.

Opting for finality in litigation and privacy of deliberations, the Senate chose to take the Advisory Committee's approach and limit jury testimony to inquiries into whether extraneous prejudicial information was improperly brought to the jury's attention or whether any outside influence was improperly brought to bear upon any juror. No inquiry could be made as to any matter or statement occurring during the course of the jury's deliberation. This would limit impeachment of jury verdicts by denying any opportunity to inquire into whether a quotient verdict was employed, whether other objectionable forms of compromise were agreed to, or whether improper arguments were made by the jurors. The Senate version prevailed in conference. n2 Thus, the Advisory Committee's original proposal is reinstated in Rule 606(b); the subject of post-verdict inquiry through juror testimony is strictly limited to the existence of outside influences or extraneous information upon the jury. n3

As adopted, Rule 606(b) furthers at least five policies. The Third Circuit has described these policies as follows:

> (1) discouraging harassment of jurors by losing parties eager to have the verdict set aside; (2) encouraging free and open discussion among jurors; (3) reducing incentives for jury tampering; (4) promoting verdict finality; and (5) maintaining the viability of the jury as a judicial decisionmaking body. n4

[3] Inquiry into Bias

Rule 606(b) would appear to preclude testimony concerning the effect of a juror's racial or other bias on deliberations. n5 However, assuming that voir dire is minimally adequate, jurors who are unwavering in their bias are likely to have lied during voir dire; and these lies would ordinarily be considered material misrepresentations, because prospective jurors who truthfully answer that they are unalterably biased will be struck for cause. Rule 606(b) applies to juror deliberations, but it does not preclude an inquiry into whether a juror lied during voir dire. n6 Accordingly, evidence could be presented about the juror's lies on voir dire in an attempt to overturn a verdict. n7 The primary focus would be on what the jurors did and how they felt before the deliberations, rather than on anything done during the deliberations. However, Rule 606(b) would prohibit inquiry into the effect that a biased juror might have had on other jurors; such an inquiry would intrude into the thought processes of the jurors during deliberations. See the discussion in [6], infra .

Despite the salutary policies behind Rule 606(b), Courts in criminal cases are understandably reluctant to limit their inquiry to the voir dire stage when there are allegations that jurors relied on racial or other prejudices during their deliberations. As the Second Circuit has stated, Courts "have hesitated to apply the rule dogmatically" in the face of the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to an impartial jury. n8 While the Court must remain sensitive to the policies of finality and protection of the jury, these policies must be tempered by the criminal defendant's right to a fair trial. n9 Therefore, Rule 606(b) should be construed to permit juror testimony as to racial or other bias of one or more of the jurors, as well as to the effect that the bias might have had on deliberations.

[4] External Influences

The Supreme Court in Tanner v. United States, 483 U.S. 107 (1987) , emphasized the limited scope of the "outside influence" exception to Rule 606(b). After their conviction, the defendants in Tanner called to the Trial Judge's attention a juror's statement that several jurors had consumed alcohol at lunch throughout the trial, causing them to sleep through the afternoon sessions. The defendants also presented an affidavit from a juror stating that several members of the jury, including the affiant, consumed alcohol during the trial and that some jurors used illegal drugs. Justice O'Connor, writing for the majority, held that Rule 606(b) prevented proof of these matters. According to Justice O'Connor, instances of substance abuse are not "outside" or "extraneous" influences that can impeach a jury verdict. She also rejected the argument that the failure to inquire into juror intoxication denies a defendant a fair trial before an impartial and competent jury. She reasoned that other aspects of the trial process -- including voir dire of jurors, observations by the Trial Judge and courtroom participants, and observations during the trial reported by other jurors -- are adequate to assure a constitutionally fair trial. Justice O'Connor emphasized that the benefits of Rule 606(b), i.e., preservation of the privacy and finality of jury deliberations, outweigh the expense of suffering possibly inaccurate jury verdicts. n10

Accordingly, after Tanner, inquiry under Rule 606(b) generally must be limited to influences outside the evidence presented at trial, such as prejudicial publicity, pressure placed on jurors from outside sources, use of extrajudicial information, and the like -- again with the probable exception for evidence of racial or other bias. n11 Examples of alleged misconduct that have been held immune from inquiry under Rule 606(b) after Tanner include: intimidation of one juror by another; n12 unfair inferences drawn from the evidence; n13 assumptions that a defendant who failed to take the stand must be guilty; n14 misunderstandings about the death penalty; n15 and a vote for conviction because extended deliberation would cut into the juror's vacation. n16 The Court in United States v. Ruggiero, 56 F.3d 647, 652 (5th Cir. 1995) , summed it up by stating that Rule 606(b) bars juror testimony on "at least four topics: (1) the methods or arguments of the jury's deliberations, (2) the effect of any particular thing upon an outcome in the deliberations, (3) the mindset or emotions of any juror during deliberations, and (4) the testifying juror's own mental process during deliberations."

[5] Misunderstood Instructions, Clerical Errors, and the 2006 Amendment to Rule 606(b)

After the strict construction given to Rule 606(b) by the Supreme Court in Tanner, it would appear that any post-verdict inquiry into jury deliberations on the ground of a jury's misunderstanding (or simply not following) Trial Court instructions would be doomed to defeat. n17 This generally has been borne out in the Courts, but the opinions are not uniform. An example of a proper application of Rule 606(b) is Plummer v. Springfield Terminal Ry., 5 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1993) , where the jury in a FELA case found the defendant 12% at fault and the plaintiff 88% at fault. The jury was then given an interrogatory on damages. The Trial Judge instructed the jury not to make any reduction from the damage amount for contributory fault, because the Trial Judge would make the necessary reduction. Then the jury returned with a damage amount that was exactly 12% of what the plaintiff had claimed, a rather coincidental amount given the jury's previous findings as to fault. The Trial Judge discharged the jury and entered a judgment for 12% of the amount in the interrogatory answer. So instead of receiving 12% of his damage demand pursuant to the Judge's instructions, the plaintiff received 12% of 12% of his damage demand. The plaintiff argued that the jury clearly misunderstood the Trial Judge's instructions, and requested a voir dire of the jury to "clarify" their verdict. But the Court held that the Trial Judge properly rejected this request, since it would amount to inquiring into the thought processes attendant to jury deliberations. In other words, a question such as "how did you interpret the Judge's instructions, and did you follow them?" would tread upon the subjective thoughts of the jurors, in violation of Rule 606(b). n18

The Rule as currently written (and applied in Tanner) would not appear to permit juror proof even if the verdict is incorrectly transcribed onto the verdict form. Yet all Courts have held that Rule 606(b) does not prohibit inquiry into whether the jury made a "clerical error." The exception makes sense if limited to purely clerical errors; as so limited, jury testimony would only be allowed to the extent necessary to prove that the verdict rendered was mistranscribed or improperly stated, and therefore it would not intrude into the internal deliberations of the jury. n19 As so limited, a clerical error exception would not be applicable in a case like Plummer, because the jury's error in that case resulted from either a misunderstanding of or a complete disregard of the Trial Judge's instructions. This was not a clerical error, such as marking the wrong box in a verdict form, or misplacing a decimal point in a damages award. As the Plummer Court noted, "[T]he number that the jury chose is not in dispute." Rather, the dispute "went to what the jurors were thinking when they chose the number that they did and whether their thinking was sound." An inquiry into these matters should be prohibited by Rule 606(b), notwithstanding an exception for clerical error. n20

Yet some courts have extended the clerical error exception to situations in which the jury simply misunderstood, misapplied, or ignored the Court's instructions. These Courts have permitted juror proof when the verdict that the jury intended is different from the one actually rendered. n21 Under this broader exception of "clerical error," juror proof would be allowed in a case like Plummer, because the jury in that case intended the plaintiff to receive a different award than the one that the Judge reduced in accordance with his instructions.

The Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules proposed an amendment to Rule 606(b) that would codify the judicially-engrafted "clerical error" exception, but would also resolve the conflict in the Courts over the breadth of the exception. The Advisory Committee opted for a narrow view of the exception, so that it would apply only when the verdict is incorrect because it was mistranscribed on the jury form. As of this writing, the amendment to Rule 606(b) has been approved by the Judicial Conference and the Supreme Court, and it is scheduled to go into effect on December 1, 2006.

The amendment and the Committee Note are set forth below. Note that the Committee Note provides a justification for choosing a narrow definition of clerical error--a justification that lies in the rationale of the Rule itself. The Committee Note also points out that the problem of clerical errors can be largely avoided by polling the jury before it is excused.

2006 Amendment to Rule 606(b)

Rule 606. Competency of Juror as Witness

...

(b) Inquiry into validity of verdict or indictment. -- Upon an inquiry into the validity of a verdict or indictment, a juror may not testify as to any matter or statement occurring during the course of the jury's deliberations or to the effect of anything upon that or any other juror's mind or emotions as influencing the juror to assent to or dissent from the verdict or indictment or concerning the juror's mental processes in connection therewithThe material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [,] . The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [except that] But a juror may testify The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [on the question] about (1) whether extraneous prejudicial information was improperly brought to the jury's attention, (2) The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [or] whether any outside influence was improperly brought to bear upon any juror, or (3) whether there was a mistake in entering the verdict onto the verdict form. The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [Nor may a] A juror's affidavit or evidence of any statement by the juror The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [concerning] may not be received on a matter about which the juror would be precluded from testifyingThe material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [be received for these purposes].

* * *

Committee Note

Rule 606(b) has been amended to provide that juror testimony may be used to prove that the verdict reported was the result of a mistake in entering the verdict on the verdict form. The amendment responds to a divergence between the text of the Rule and the case law that has established an exception for proof of clerical errors. See, e.g., Plummer v. Springfield Term. Ry., 5 F.3d 1, 3 (1st Cir. 1993) ("A number of circuits hold, and we agree, that juror testimony regarding an alleged clerical error, such as announcing a verdict different than that agreed upon, does not challenge the validity of the verdict or the deliberation of mental processes, and therefore is not subject to Rule 606(b)."); Teevee Toons, Inc., v. MP3.Com, Inc., 148 F.Supp.2d 276, 278 (S.D.N.Y. 2001) (noting that Rule 606(b) has been silent regarding inquiries designed to confirm the accuracy of a verdict).

In adopting the exception for proof of mistakes in entering the verdict on the verdict form, the amendment specifically rejects the broader exception, adopted by some courts, permitting the use of juror testimony to prove that the jurors were operating under a misunderstanding about the consequences of the result that they agreed upon. See, e.g., Attridge v. Cencorp Div. of Dover Techs. Int'l, Inc., 836 F.2d 113, 116 (2d Cir. 1987) ; Eastridge Development Co., v. Halpert Associates, Inc., 853 F.2d 772 (10th Cir. 1988) . The broader exception is rejected because an inquiry into whether the jury misunderstood or misapplied an instruction goes to the jurors' mental processes underlying the verdict, rather than the verdict's accuracy in capturing what the jurors had agreed upon. See, e.g., Karl v. Burlington Northern R.R., 880 F.2d 68, 74 (8th Cir. 1989) (error to receive juror testimony on whether verdict was the result of jurors' misunderstanding of instructions: "The jurors did not state that the figure written by the foreman was different from that which they agreed upon, but indicated that the figure the foreman wrote down was intended to be a net figure, not a gross figure. Receiving such statements violates Rule 606(b) because the testimony relates to how the jury interpreted the court's instructions, and concerns the jurors' 'mental processes,' which is forbidden by the rule."); Robles v. Exxon Corp., 862 F.2d 1201, 1208 (5th Cir. 1989) ("the alleged error here goes to the substance of what the jury was asked to decide, necessarily implicating the jury's mental processes insofar as it questions the jury's understanding of the court's instructions and application of those instructions to the facts of the case"). Thus, the exception established by the amendment is limited to cases such as "where the jury foreperson wrote down, in response to an interrogatory, a number different from that agreed upon by the jury, or mistakenly stated that the defendant was 'guilty' when the jury had actually agreed that the defendant was not guilty." Id.

It should be noted that the possibility of errors in the verdict form will be reduced substantially by polling the jury. Rule 606(b) does not, of course, prevent this precaution. See 8 C. Wigmore, Evidence, § 2350 at 691 (McNaughten ed. 1961) (noting that the reasons for the rule barring juror testimony, "namely, the dangers of uncertainty and of tampering with the jurors to procure testimony, disappear in large part if such investigation as may be desired is made by the judge and takes place before the jurors' discharge and separation") (emphasis in original). Errors that come to light after polling the jury "may be corrected on the spot, or the jury may be sent out to continue deliberations, or, if necessary, a new trial may be ordered." C. Mueller & L. Kirkpatrick, Evidence Under the Rules at 671 (2d ed. 1999) (citing Sincox v. United States, 571 F.2d 876, 878-79 (5th Cir. 1978)) .

[6] Effect of Extraneous Information and Outside Influences on Juror Deliberations

While Rule 606(b) permits post-verdict inquiry into extraneous information and outside influences, it does not permit juror testimony as to the actual effect of these matters on the testifying juror or on any other juror. n22 Testimony as to the actual impact of outside intrusions would be testimony concerning the deliberative process of the jury. This is clearly prohibited by Rule 606(b). n23 So in assessing whether a new trial is required as a result of extraneous information and outside influences on the jury, the Trial Judge must reason by inference as to the effect that these matters might have had on jury deliberations. n24

[7] Alternate Forms of Proof

The preceding sections highlight the reach of this Rule; it covers testimony by jurors, affidavits of jurors, and any other evidence (including writings and testimony by nonjurors, such as newspaper accounts of juror interviews) offered as a substitute for juror testimony. If jury testimony is barred by Rule 606(b), all other derivative forms of proof are also barred. n25

[8] Supporting Verdicts

In our view Rule 606(b) clearly applies to attempts to support as well as to impeach a jury verdict. This reading is the fairest reading of the text of the Rule and finds support in the first sentence of the original Advisory Committee Note accompanying Rule 606(b). Unfortunately, the Advisory Committee confined most of its Note to a discussion of impeaching jury verdicts. This has led some Courts to assume mistakenly that the Rule does not apply when a juror's affidavit is offered to support a verdict. n26 Other Courts, however, have properly applied the Rule. For example, in Wiedemann v. Galiano, 722 F.2d 335 (7th Cir. 1983) , the plaintiff alleged that the defendant negligently operated a syringe in a medical procedure. The plaintiff discovered that, after the syringe was admitted into evidence and before it was sent to the jury room, the defendant and his attorney lubricated it so that it would not stick if the jury experimented with it. The plaintiff brought this to the attention of the Trial Judge in a new trial motion. But the Trial Judge, in denying the motion, relied upon affidavits of jurors stating that the mechanical condition of the syringe had not affected their deliberations. The Court of Appeals found that the affidavits could not be used under Rule 606(b), even though in this case they were used to support the verdict. The alteration of the syringe was an outside influence; but juror testimony about the effect that an outside influence had on the deliberations is precluded by the Rule. On remand, the Trial Judge was instructed to assess the likely effect of the extraneous influence on a reasonable juror.

[9] Habeas Corpus Cases

An interesting question arises as to whether Rule 606(b) governs in a habeas corpus case in which a state conviction is challenged. We think that a Federal Court should protect state verdicts and indictments under Rule 606(b) to the same extent as federal verdicts and indictments. n27 As federal law governs federal habeas corpus actions, our view is in accord with Rule 601. It also comports with Rule 1101(e). It should be noted, however, that if a state evidence rule allows broader inquiry into jury actions than the Federal Rule, and if in the process of exhausting state remedies a broader inquiry is made, we see nothing in Rule 606(b) that would bar the Federal Court from considering relevant information brought out in the state proceedings. In such a case no juror would be testifying before the Federal Court, so the last sentence of the Rule should not apply as the juror would have been permitted to testify in the State Court. However, it should be a very rare case in which the evidence would be relevant because of the limited nature of federal habeas corpus actions and the presumption that what cannot be the subject of inquiry in a federal action cannot be germane to a valid constitutional claim. Of course, an inquiry into a constitutional violation cannot be prohibited by a state evidence rule that is even more restrictive than Rule 606(b). n28

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., Parker v. Gladden, 385 U.S. 363 (1966) (discussing the Sixth Amendment right to an impartial jury free from improper influence).

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Ford, 840 F.2d 460, 465-66 (7th Cir. 1988) (as finally promulgated, Rule 606(b) "is designed not only to protect the jurors from being pestered by lawyers after verdicts are rendered, but also to protect the judicial process from efforts to undermine verdicts by scrutinizing the jurors' thoughts and deliberations"); Multiflex, Inc. v. Samuel Moore & Co., 709 F.2d 980, 1983-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P65507 (5th Cir. 1983) (Rule 606(b), as ultimately promulgated, prohibits inquiry into juror deliberations, even though it appears that the jury rendered a quotient verdict; Senate version of the Rule "makes clear the drafters' intent that a jury's verdict should not be open to searching the minds and motives of the jurors, and must be affirmed if there is adequate support for the award").

(n3)Footnote 3. For some examples of outside influence and extraneous information, see § 606.03[2][i].

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Stansfield, 101 F.3d 909 (3d Cir. 1996) (holding that Rule 606(b) prohibits inquiry into a partial verdict rendered by a jury continuing deliberations).

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., Martinez v. Food City, Inc., 658 F.2d 369 (5th Cir. 1981) (evidence of "improper motives of individual jurors" is excluded under Rule 606(b); such biases should be uncovered when the jury is being selected); United States v. Duzac, 622 F.2d 911 (5th Cir. 1980) (a verdict "may not be disturbed if it is later learned that personal prejudices were not put aside during deliberations"; Trial Judge properly refused to conduct an inquiry into allegations that some jurors allowed their prejudices to affect their decision, since the questions that the Judge would have had to ask were precluded by Rule 606(b)).

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., United States v. Henley, 238 F.3d 1111 (9th Cir. 2001) (ordering an inquiry into whether a juror used racial epithets during the trial):

> Where, as here, a juror has been asked direct questions about racial bias during voir dire, and has sworn that racial bias would play no part in his deliberations, evidence of that juror's racial bias is indisputably admissible for the purpose of determining whether the juror's responses were truthful. Hard v. Burlington N. Railroad, 812 F.2d 482, 485 (9th Cir. 1987) ("Statements which tend to show deceit during voir dire are not barred by Rule 606(b)"). If appellants can show that a juror failed to answer honestly a material question on voir dire, and then further show that a correct response would have provided a valid basis for a challenge for cause, then they are entitled to a new trial.

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., United States v. Colombo, 869 F.2d 149 (2d Cir. 1989) (accepting an affidavit from an alternate juror, averring that another juror deliberately failed to reveal a matter on voir dire because she thought it would hurt her chances to sit on the case: "Courts cannot administer justice in circumstances in which a juror can commit a federal crime in order to serve as a juror in a criminal case and do so with no fear of sanction so long as a conviction results."); Hard v. Burlington N. R.R., 812 F.2d 482 (9th Cir. 1987) (Trial Court erred in failing to hold an evidentiary hearing to investigate an allegation that a juror had concealed the fact on voir dire that he and his father were former employees of the defendant).

(n8)Footnote 8. Wright v. United States, 732 F.2d 1048 (2d Cir. 1984) .

(n9)Footnote 9. See Shillcutt v. Gagnon, 827 F.2d 1155 (7th Cir. 1987) (Court properly reviewed the internal deliberative process of the jury to determine whether a racial slur during deliberations had an effect on the verdict; no denial of due process was found where only one racially derogatory comment was made during five hours of deliberations, and that comment was unrelated to any discussion of the facts; the Court concluded that Rule 606(b) "cannot be applied in such an unfair manner as to deny due process" and therefore a juror's racial bias and its effect on the deliberations was a proper subject of post-verdict inquiry).

(n10)Footnote 10. See also Peveto v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 807 F.2d 486 (5th Cir. 1987) (Rule 606(b) is the result of a "policy decision that the social costs of [jury] error are outweighed by the need for finality to litigation, to protect jurors from harassment after a verdict is rendered, and to prevent the possible exploitation of disgruntled ex-jurors.").

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Caldwell, 83 F.3d 954 (8th Cir. 1996) (proof that a juror's husband entered the jury room during breaks in deliberation was not barred by Rule 606(b), since these incidents constituted possible external influence on the jury; however, a new trial was not warranted, because the defendant offered no evidence that the juror's husband "gained improper knowledge from watching the trial and then imparted that knowledge to the jury or even that any communication between the husband and the jurors occurred"); United States v. Ruggiero, 56 F.3d 647 (5th Cir. 1995) (Rule 606(b) did not preclude proof that one juror received information from an associate that the government's witness was a "good guy" and that one of the defendants was a thief; however, a new trial was not warranted, because the extraneous information did not prejudice the jury determination); United States v. Robinson, 645 F.2d 616 (8th Cir. 1981) (Rule 606(b) does not preclude a juror from testifying about publicity, attempted tampering and similar matters). Compare United States v. Tallman, 952 F.2d 164 (8th Cir. 1991) (there was no error in denying a new trial based on assertions in a juror's note that other jurors were harassing and insulting; to admit proof of contentiousness and conflict to impeach a verdict would be to eviscerate Rule 606(b)); United States v. Brooks, 677 F.2d 907 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (the Trial Court properly rejected an affidavit of a juror who had remembered seeing the defendant prior to trial so that he may have had a subconscious memory of the defendant during the deliberations; noting that the juror did not lie on voir dire, the Court cited Rule 606(b) in support of its conclusion that this was not a case in which improper information was brought before a juror, but one in which the defendant improperly sought to inquire into the mental processes of a juror).

(n12)Footnote 12. United States v. Briggs, 291 F.3d 958 (7th Cir. 2002) (juror's complaint that she was intimidated by other jurors was not an outside influence; juror testimony on the intimidation was barred by Rule 606(b)); United States v. Stansfield, 101 F.3d 909 (3d Cir. 1996) ("intimidation or harassment of one juror by another falls squarely within the core prohibition of the Rule").

(n13)Footnote 13. United States v. DiSalvo, 34 F.3d 1204 (3d Cir. 1994) (Trial Court properly refused to inquire into the statement of a juror made during deliberations, that "you can't get into this situation without being guilty"; the "courts have strictly enforced this mandate and have precluded inquiries regarding alleged jury misconduct or bias absent the existence of extra-record information or extra-jury influence").

(n14)Footnote 14. United States v. Rutherford, 371 F.3d 634 (9th Cir. 2004) (jurors learned of defendant's failure to testify "through their personal observations during trial, not through a prohibited route or improper ex parte contact"; no error in finding that juror testimony regarding the effect of the defendant's failure to take the stand was inadmissible under Rule 606(b)); United States v. Tran, 122 F.3d 670 (8th Cir. 1997) (the defendant's failure to testify "was not extraneous prejudicial information, because it was known to the jurors as a result of their presence at trial, not as a result of something disclosed to them that had not occurred in the courtroom"); United States v. Voigt, 877 F.2d 1465 (10th Cir. 1989) (Trial Court properly refused to conduct inquiry after receiving juror's affidavit that the defendant was convicted because he refused to take the stand).

(n15)Footnote 15. Gosier v. Welborn, 175 F.3d 504 (7th Cir. 1999) (juror provided a statement that he voted for the death penalty after concluding that he could not convince any other juror to vote for a life sentence; this statement reflected that the juror misunderstood the jury instruction, which stated that a single juror could block capital punishment; but this evidence is inadmissible under Rule 606(b) because it is proof of the juror's mental process during deliberations).

(n16)Footnote 16. United States v. Murphy, 836 F.2d 248 (6th Cir. 1988) (the defendant was not permitted to inquire into whether jury deliberations were affected by one juror's vacation plans).

(n17)Footnote 17. See, e.g., United States v. Tines, 70 F.3d 891 (6th Cir. 1995) (Trial Judge properly declined to investigate allegations from a juror that the jury misinterpreted and misapplied the Trial Judge's "deadlock" instruction: a jury's "interpretation and application of the court's instructions is a part of the deliberative process and was correctly excluded under Rule 606(b)"); Wilkerson v. Amco Corp., 703 F.2d 184 (5th Cir. 1983) (Trial Judge properly exercised discretion in refusing permission to a losing party to interview jurors in order to find whether the jury employed an improper method of breaking a deadlock; the jurors would not have been permitted to testify about whether they followed instructions from the Trial Judge after they expressed an inability to agree on a verdict, thus any information developed in the proposed inquiry would have been inadmissible); Abatino v. United States, 750 F.2d 1442 (9th Cir. 1985) (holding that a juror's affidavit on the effect of an instruction was not admissible under Rule 606(b)).

(n18)Footnote 18. See also Morgan v. Woessner, 975 F.2d 629 (9th Cir. 1992) (the defendants were not entitled to a new trial on the ground that jurors said afterwards that they had discussed whether damages should cover the plaintiff's attorney's fees; these "subjective thoughts and beliefs" cannot be proved under Rule 606(b)); Robles v. Exxon Corp., 862 F.2d 1201 (5th Cir. 1989) (Trial Judge erred in refusing to enter judgment upon the first verdict that the jury returned, which was for the defendant; the Judge violated Rule 606(b) in eliciting testimony from the jurors that they misunderstood the Judge's instructions); Karl v. Burlington N. R. Co., 880 F.2d 68 (8th Cir. 1989) (where the jury responded with inconsistent answers to special interrogatories regarding apportionment of responsibility and damages, the Trial Judge attempted to "clarify" by interviewing the foreperson; this was impermissible, because the inquiry went to the jurors' understanding or intentions and was forbidden by the Rule).

(n19)Footnote 19. See, e.g., United States v. Dotson, 817 F.2d 1127 (5th Cir. 1987) , modified, 821 F.2d 1034 (1987) (Trial Judge properly corrected a jury verdict after the jury was discharged, to acquit the defendants on one count; there is an exception from the general prohibition of Rule 606(b) for situations in which a clerical error in a verdict is corrected to reflect the intent of the jury); Eastridge Dev. Co. v. Halpert Assocs., 853 F.2d 772 (10th Cir. 1988) (Trial Judge properly interrogated the jury foreman about a possible clerical error in the verdict and permissibly corrected the verdict when an obvious clerical error was discovered).

(n20)Footnote 20. See also Karl v. Burlington N. R. Co., 880 F.2d 68 (8th Cir. 1989) (the "clerical error" exception to Rule 606(b) applies only when the verdict is misreported due to some oversight or mistake, such as mistakenly stating that a defendant was guilty when the jury had actually agreed that he was not guilty; but the clerical error exception does not apply where the verdict "truly stated what the jury agreed to," even though the jury may have misinterpreted the Judge's instructions).

(n21)Footnote 21. Attridge v. Cencorp Div., 836 F.2d 113 (2d Cir. 1987) (inquiry of jurors is permissible where the goal was to determine whether the verdict intended by the jury was different from the judgment announced); McCullough v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 937 F.2d 1167 (6th Cir. 1991) (no error in amending a verdict sheet after the Trial Judge determined that the jury unanimously intended the award on the verdict sheet to be a net rather than a gross award).

(n22)Footnote 22. United States v. Lloyd, 269 F.3d 228 (3d Cir. 2001) ("Thus, a court may inquire into the verdict if prejudicial information was improperly brought to the jury's attention or if any outside influence was improperly brought to bear upon any juror. However, the court may only inquire into the existence of extraneous information, and not into the subjective effect of such information on the particular jurors.").

(n23)Footnote 23. See, e.g., Rinehart v. Wedge, 943 F.2d 1158 (9th Cir. 1991) (Rule 606(b) permits proof of external intrusions on the deliberative process, but does not permit inquiry into the "subjective effect" of such intrusions); United States v. Simpson, 950 F.2d 1519 (10th Cir. 1991) (juror may testify as to "whether any extraneous prejudicial information was improperly brought to bear" on juror deliberations, but "a juror may not testify as to the effect the outside information had upon the juror").

(n24)Footnote 24. See, e.g., United States v. Berry, 92 F.3d 597 (7th Cir. 1996) (affirming an order for a new trial, in light of evidence that the jury was given a transcript of taped conversations never admitted as evidence: "a district court must ignore a juror's comment regarding how a particular piece of material disposed the juror toward a particular verdict, and the district court must make an independent determination of the likely effect of the extraneous material").

(n25)Footnote 25. See, e.g., United States v. Elder, 90 F.3d 1110 (6th Cir. 1996) (Trial Judge properly denied a defense request to examine juror notebooks; because jurors may not be questioned about thought processes, their notebooks may not be examined as an inquiry into thought processes); Hard v. Burlington N. R. Co., 870 F.2d 1454, 1461 (10th Cir. 1989) (Rule 606(b) "bars not just juror testimony but evidence of any sort as to a statement by a juror concerning jury deliberations, so long as a juror would be barred from making the same statement in the form of testimony in court"); Ohanian v. Avis Rent A Car Sys., 779 F.2d 101 (2d Cir. 1985) (notes by jury, made while determining damages, fall within Rule 606(b) and thus "may not be used to attack the verdict").

(n26)Footnote 26. See, e.g., Government of Virgin Islands v. Gereau, 523 F.2d 140 (3d Cir. 1975) (inquiry by the Court into the deliberative process of the jury in an attempt to save, not to impeach, the verdict was permitted).

(n27)Footnote 27. See, e.g., Pyles v. Johnson, 136 F.3d 986 (5th Cir. 1998) (in a habeas corpus proceeding, Rule 606(b) was applied to preclude proof of juror deliberations in the state criminal trial); McDowell v. Calderon, 107 F.3d 1351 (9th Cir. 1997) (in a habeas corpus proceeding, Federal Rule 606(b), and not the state rule of evidence, applies to determine the admissibility of a juror's testimony offered to impeach a State Court verdict).

(n28)Footnote 28. See, e.g., Durr v. Cook, 589 F.2d 891 (5th Cir. 1979) , holding that a state statute barring a juror from testifying to his own misconduct could not constitutionally bar an inquiry of a juror as to whether the juror brought extraneous information into the jury room.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 606 RULE 606

2-606 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 606.03

606.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Rule 606(a) -- At the Trial

United States v. Kills Enemy, 3 F.3d 1201 (8th Cir. 1993) : Although it affirmed a cocaine conviction, the Court expressed its "concern about the government's actions" in calling a member of the jury venire in the case to testify. It concluded that this was "a close case," and that "the result might well be different" in another case "with a developed record of real harm."

[2] Rule 606(b) -- Inquiry Into Validity of Verdict or Indictment

[a] Rule 606(b) -- Bench Trials and Mental Processes of Judges

Morrison v. Kimmelman, 650 F. Supp. 801 (D.N.J. 1986) : Finding that a lawyer's failure to discover and seek suppression of unconstitutionally seized evidence prejudiced a defendant, the Court held that the state Trial Judge could not be called to testify regarding his thought processes in convicting the defendant.

Washington v. Strickland, 693 F.2d 1243 (5th Cir. 1982) (en banc), rev'd on other grounds, 466 U.S. 668 (1984) : Following the denial of habeas corpus relief to a petitioner sentenced to death for three murders, the Court of Appeals remanded the case, finding it was error to permit the State Judge who sentenced the petitioner to testify that his sentence would not have changed even if defense counsel had presented mitigating character evidence. Relying on Rule 606(b), the Court concluded that by waiving a jury the petitioner substituted the State Trial Judge for the jury, and the same strong policy reasons for not inquiring into the mental processes of jurors applied in this case.

Proffitt v. Wainwright, 685 F.2d 1227 (11th Cir. 1982) : The Court held in a habeas corpus case that a Federal Court cannot consider postdecision statements by a State Trial Judge as to his mental processes in sentencing.

[b] Rule 606(b) -- Bias of Jurors

Wright v. United States, 559 F. Supp. 1139 (E.D.N.Y. 1983) , aff'd, 732 F.2d 1048 (2d Cir. 1984) : Denying a postconviction motion to vacate conspiracy and extortion convictions, the District Court observed that Federal Courts faced with the question whether a defendant was prejudiced by racial bias in the jury room "have hesitated to apply the rule [606(b)] dogmatically" in light of the Sixth Amendment's guarantee of a fair and impartial jury. In this case, the defendant had not made a sufficient showing of prejudice to warrant a hearing, as the only evidence indicative of prejudice was a racial epithet used in reference to the defendant by one juror to a coworker. In Tobias v. Smith, n1 a state prisoner sought habeas corpus relief on the ground, inter alia, that several members of the jury had racial prejudice against him. Citing Rule 606(b) and the Sixth Amendment fair trial right, the District Court held that juror bias or prejudice may be an extraneous influence that can be the subject of inquiry, especially if statements made during deliberations indicate that a juror lied during voir dire. The Court decided that it was necessary to have a hearing in this case to inquire into the claim of bias.

United States v. Duzac, 622 F.2d 911 (5th Cir. 1980) : A post-verdict inquiry was deemed inappropriate with respect to a jury note to the Trial Judge indicating there were "certain prejudices" among the jury that prevented a verdict on one count. The Judge had responded by telling the jury to decide the case on the evidence and without regard to prejudice or sympathy.

Shillcutt v. Gagnon, 827 F.2d 1155 (7th Cir. 1987) : Although recognizing that testimony concerning an alleged racial slur during jury deliberations in State Court generally could not be admitted in a habeas corpus case governed by Rule 606(b), the Court observed that "[t]he rule of juror incompetency cannot be applied in such an unfair manner as to deny due process"; in this case there was no substantial probability that the alleged slur made a difference in the outcome of the trial.

Smith v. Brewer, 444 F. Supp. 482 (S.D. Iowa 1978) , aff'd, 577 F.2d 466 (8th Cir. 1978) : The District Court found that under the facts of this habeas corpus case racial bias evident in the jury room was not a proper subject of inquiry under the Rule, but suggested that fundamental fairness might require such an inquiry in some cases.

[c] Rule 606(b) -- Collateral Estoppel Inquiry

United States v. Barragan-Cepeda, 29 F.3d 1378 (9th Cir. 1994) : A defendant charged as a deported alien who illegally reentered the United States defended on the ground that he had been acquitted of similar charges in 1980 on a finding that he was a citizen. The Court held it was error to exclude affidavits from two jurors in the 1980 trial, as the defendant was not seeking to impeach that verdict but to rely upon it.

[d] Rule 606(b) -- Competency of Juror

Sullivan v. Fogg, 613 F.2d 465 (2d Cir. 1980) : In a habeas corpus case, the Court said that due process required a hearing into a juror's competence at trial, when one month after trial the juror complained to the prosecutor of "harassment by 'voices' " and indicated that he had heard "vibrations" throughout the trial, particularly in the jury room.

Government of Virgin Islands v. Nicholas, 759 F.2d 1073 (3d Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed (2-1) the rejection without an evidentiary hearing of a collateral attack on murder, robbery, and other convictions based on a claim that a juror's hearing was impaired. Reasoning that post-verdict inquiries should be resisted in most instances, even when a juror's competency is attacked, the Court found the showing of the juror's difficulty in understanding the evidence insufficient to warrant a hearing.

Weaver v. Puckett, 896 F.2d 126 (5th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed denial of habeas corpus relief where the petitioner alleged that a juror was so hearing-impaired as to offend Sixth Amendment rights. Juror competency is an "internal" matter not provable by the juror's testimony, and even if the common-law exception still applied where there is substantial if not wholly conclusive evidence of incompetency, in this case the requisite extremely strong showing from nonjuror sources that would permit a post-verdict inquiry of the juror was not made.

[e] Rule 606(b) -- Compromise Verdicts

United States v. Straach, 987 F.2d 232 (5th Cir. 1993) : The Court sustained the denial of a mistrial motion, which was made when two jurors came forward after the verdicts were returned in a firearms sale case and said that they had consistently maintained that the defendant was not guilty on all counts, but had been pressured into compromising their verdicts on two counts. The Court concluded that any "pressure" did not count as an outside influence.

[f] Rule 606(b) -- Drug and Alcohol Use

Tanner v. United States, 483 U.S. 107 (1987) : The Court held that Rule 606(b) prevented proof of a juror's allegations that several jurors had used drugs and alcohol during deliberations. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 606.02[4].

[g] Rule 606(b) -- Errors in Verdicts

Plummer v. Springfield Terminal Ry., 5 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1993) : The jury in a FELA case found the defendant 12 percent at fault and subsequently answered an interrogatory on damages (which said not to make any deduction for the plaintiff's fault) with an amount that was exactly 12 percent of what the plaintiff had claimed. The Trial Judge discharged the jury and entered a judgment for 12 percent of the amount in the interrogatory answer. Rejecting the view taken in some Circuits, and construing the "clerical error" exception to the Rule narrowly, the Court held there was no error in refusing the plaintiff's request to conduct a voir dire of the jury to clarify their verdict or to obtain affidavits from jurors, as the Rule bars inquiry into the juror's thought processes and understanding of the instructions.

Robles v. Exxon Corp., 862 F.2d 1201 (5th Cir. 1989) : The Court reversed a judgment for a plaintiff in a personal injury case, holding it was error to refuse to enter judgment upon the first verdict that the jury returned, which was for the defendant. The Court concluded that the Judge violated Rule 606(b) in eliciting unsworn testimony from the jurors that they misunderstood the instructions and in directing the jury to resume deliberations. The Court distinguished cases in which testimony is received that the verdict announced was not that agreed to in deliberations or a clerical error is corrected. In United States v. Dotson, n2 the Court affirmed drug-related convictions, holding that the Trial Judge properly corrected a jury verdict after the jury was discharged to acquit the defendants on one count. The Court recognized an exception from the general prohibition of Rule 606(b) for situations in which a clerical error in a verdict is corrected to reflect the intent of the jury.

[h] Rule 606(b) -- Experiments

Simon v. Kuhlman, 488 F. Supp. 59 (S.D.N.Y. 1979) : In a state prisoner's habeas corpus action, the Court held that the petitioner was entitled to a hearing on his claim that jurors improperly experimented by placing a stocking over one juror's face. Citing Rule 606(b) as persuasive authority for its constitutional ruling, the Court said the hearing could inquire into how any experiment came about, how many jurors were involved, whether jurors discussed the results of the experiment and, if so, at what point in the deliberations.

United States v. Castello, 526 F. Supp. 847 (W.D. Tex. 1981) : The Court granted a new trial to a defendant convicted of assault with a dangerous weapon when one juror conducted a ballistics experiment during a weekend recess and reported the results to the other jurors.

In re Beverly Hills Fire Litig., 695 F.2d 207 (6th Cir. 1982) : After the verdict was returned in an action against manufacturers of aluminum wiring alleged to be responsible for a fire in a supper club that killed many people, one juror wrote an anonymous letter to a newspaper indicating that he had experimented at home with aluminum wiring. At a post-trial hearing, the Trial Judge learned that the juror communicated his information to at least six other jurors during the trial. Under these circumstances, the Court found that reversal of a judgment for the defendants was required and suggested that at a second trial the Judge and counsel should consider the possibility that jurors may become concerned with the wiring in their own homes, and the desirability of more explicit precautionary instructions concerning proper juror behavior.

[i] Rule 606(b) -- Extraneous Prejudicial Information

[i] Rule 606(b) -- Civil Cases

Wilson v. Vermont Castings, Inc., 170 F.3d 391 (3d Cir. 1999) : The plaintiff in a product liability action had been severely burned when her dress caught fire as she warmed herself by a woodburning stove on which she had left open a door. Before trial, the defendant stove manufacturer's motion in limine to exclude any evidence of the existence or contents of the stove owner's manual was granted, on the ground that the plaintiff had never read or seen the manual. Following a verdict for the defendant, the plaintiff moved for a new trial on the ground that a juror who owned a stove made by the same manufacturer had told the other jurors during deliberations: (a) about personal experience with the stove, (b) that the stove came with a manual, (c) the content of the manual's warnings, and (d) that even in light of what she knew from the trial and from a review of the manual she would continue to operate the stove with the door open. The Court held that the manual and its contents were "extraneous information," but the information was not prejudicial because the plaintiff had prevailed on the issue of defect, which was the only issue to which the manual was relevant in this case. The juror's statements regarding her own conduct, by contrast, were not "extraneous information" and inquiry into the effect of those statements on the jurors' thinking is barred by Rule 606(b). Thus, there was no error in denying the new trial motion.

Carson v. Polley, 689 F.2d 562 (5th Cir. 1982) : The Court affirmed the grant of a new trial when, following a jury verdict for a civil rights plaintiff who claimed that deputy sheriffs used excessive force against him, it appeared that several exhibits ruled inadmissible had mistakenly been submitted to the jury.

In re Beverly Hills Fire Litig., 695 F.2d 207 (6th Cir. 1982) : After the verdict was returned in an action against manufacturers of aluminum wiring alleged to be responsible for a fire in a supper club that killed many people, one juror wrote an anonymous letter to a newspaper indicating that he had experimented at home with aluminum wiring. At a post-trial hearing, the Trial Judge learned that the juror communicated his information to at least six other jurors during the trial. Under these circumstances, the Court found that reversal was required.

Hard v. Burlington N. R.R., 812 F.2d 482 (9th Cir. 1987) : The Court remanded for a determination whether a juror failed to answer honestly material questions asked during voir dire. Several jurors submitted affidavits stating that one juror made statements concerning the railroad's settlement practices, and the plaintiff, a railroad employee, learned that this juror and his father were former railroad employees. On voir dire, the juror had indicated that he had no prior contacts with the railroad. The Court concluded that the plaintiff's evidence concerned extraneous influences and was not barred by Rule 606(b), but added that the plaintiff "must still establish that the error or defect in the proceedings affected the substantial rights of the parties to be entitled to a new trial."

[ii] Rule 606(b) -- Extraneous Prejudicial Information -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Boney, 68 F.3d 497 (D.C. Cir. 1995) : The defendant challenged his conviction on narcotics charges after it was discovered that the foreman of his jury had a prior felony conviction, which he did not reveal on his juror qualification form or on voir dire. Remanding for an evidentiary hearing to determine whether the foreman's felony status constituted "actual bias," the Court held that Rule 606(b) did not bar inquiry into whether the foreman had disclosed his prior felony or experiences with the criminal justice system to other jurors during deliberations: "Although it is expected that jurors will bring their various life experiences into the jury room, [the foreman's] experience as a felon is the one matter that should not have been before the jury at all because no ex-felons should have been on the panel. Therefore, any discussion of [the foreman's] felon status would surely seem to be 'extraneous,' and possibly 'prejudicial' as well." In United States v. Brooks, n3 a defendant convicted of murder challenged his 13-year-old conviction by offering an affidavit from a juror, who said he remembered seeing the defendant prior to trial so that he may have had a subconscious memory of the defendant during the deliberations. Distinguishing cases in which a juror lies on voir dire, the Court cited Rule 606(b) in support of its conclusion that this was not a case in which improper information was brought before a juror, but one in which the defendant improperly sought to inquire into the mental processes of a juror.

Government of Virgin Islands v. Gereau, 523 F.2d 140 (3d Cir. 1975) : To support a new trial motion, defendants convicted of murder in a pre-Rules trial supplied affidavits from two jurors that cited rumors of other killings in the Virgin Islands that circulated among the jurors. Citing Rule 606, the Court suggested that the only extraneous information for which a verdict could be impeached would involve that relating specifically to the guilt of those on trial or something actually happening to one or more jurors that threatens impartiality.

United States v. Duncan, 598 F.2d 839 (4th Cir. 1979) : The Court concluded that it was proper for a juror to testify that she consulted a dictionary, but that neither she nor any other juror could testify to the effect of the extraneous influence on the deliberations.

United States v. Ruggiero, 56 F.3d 647 (5th Cir. 1995) : After the defendants had been convicted for securities violations, one of the jurors disclosed that she learned information during the trial concerning the principal prosecution witness and one defendant. Affirming denial of a new trial, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in the conclusion that the government had rebutted the presumption that the extrinsic information prejudiced the jury. Although the juror's testimony that the information had no effect on her ability to be fair and impartial might have been inadmissible, there was no indication the Trial Judge considered it when making the required assessment of the content of the extrinsic material, the manner in which it came to the jury's attention, and the weight of the evidence against the defendant.

United States v. Hill, 688 F.2d 18 (6th Cir. 1982) : The Court found no prejudicial error in one juror's reading a law book in the jury room without permission, where the juror was dismissed by stipulation before deliberations began and testified in chambers that he had not discussed what he had read with another juror.

United States v. Paneras, 222 F.3d 406 (7th Cir. 2000) : In a prosecution for fraud and related charges arising out of his shady business and personal affairs, the defendant argued that a new trial should have been granted because one of the jurors created a cartoon depicting his perception of the defendant and the events described at trial; this cartoon was shown to the jurors and the defendant contended that at least one of the jurors changed her mind after seeing the cartoon. The Court affirmed the rejection of the motion for a new trial, saying it was "not convinced that a juror's cartoon rendering of the events at trial constitutes an extraneous influence." But even if it were extraneous, Rule 606(b) precludes proof that a juror's decision was influenced by it. In United States v. Herrero, 893 F.2d 1512 (7th Cir. 1990) , after a bailiff discovered a map that had not been admitted in evidence in the jury room during deliberations in a cocaine conspiracy prosecution, the Trial Judge brought the matter to the parties' attention, but did not examine the jurors until after the verdict was rendered. The Court held that the defendants waived any assertion of error attributable to the timing of the examination by not making a timely objection, but noted that in any event Rule 606(b) would permit a post-verdict inquiry regarding the map, as it was "extraneous ... information." See also United States v. Sababu n4(finding no abuse of discretion in refusing to conduct a voir dire of the jury when it was discovered during deliberations that inadmissible evidence had been sent to the jury room; Rule 606(b) is inapplicable to preverdict inquiries). In United States v. Bruscino, n5 the Court affirmed conspiracy and murder convictions, finding there was no reasonable possibility that two documents not admitted as evidence that went to the jury room prejudiced the defendants.

United States v. Brown, 108 F.3d 863 (8th Cir. 1997) : Affirming the grant of a new trial in a Medicaid/Medicare kickback case, the Court held there was no error in asking jurors on post-verdict voir dire whether some jurors had been told that a codefendant had pleaded guilty just before the trial. In United States v. Caldwell, 83 F.3d 954 (8th Cir. 1996) , the defendant sought to overturn a verdict against him on the ground that a husband of one of the jurors entered the jury room during several breaks. The Court held that proof of these incidents was not barred by Rule 606(b), since these incidents constituted possible external influence on the jury. Nonetheless, relief was properly denied, since the defendant offered no evidence that the juror's husband "gained improper knowledge from watching the trial and then imparted that knowledge to the jury or even that any communication between the husband and the jurors occurred." Although the Court found in United States v. Bassler, n6 that a juror's taking notes in violation of the Trial Judge's instructions and taking notes on a book about jury duty that was not in evidence amounted to "an extrinsic influence," the Court concluded that the conduct was not prejudicial. In United States v. Robinson, n7 the Court stated that the Rule does not preclude a juror from testifying about publicity, attempted tampering, and similar matters.

United States v. Maree, 934 F.2d 196 (9th Cir. 1991) : The Court remanded a drug conviction for a new trial, holding that a juror's affidavits that she discussed the evidence with friends during the trial should have been admitted. The affidavits factually explained the outside influence and information presented to the juror; only the subjective effect of that influence is inadmissible under the Rule. In a RICO prosecution, United States v. Bagnariol, n8 the Court ruled that it was proper to elicit testimony from jurors concerning one juror's visit to the public library to do independent research.

United States v. Davis, 60 F.3d 1479 (10th Cir. 1995) : In a prosecution for Medicaid fraud, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in denying the defendant's request for a hearing in connection with a new trial motion alleging that jurors had watched TV news reports of the trial with the sound muted. Once the fact of potential misconduct is brought to the attention of the Trial Judge, who is uniquely able to assess the relative severity of the allegations, an evidentiary hearing may be an exercise in futility, since further questioning of jurors as to the effect of the misconduct is precluded by the Rule.

Isaacs v. Kemp, 778 F.2d 1482 (11th Cir. 1985) : In granting a state prisoner habeas corpus relief from a murder conviction, the Court considered, inter alia, that a juror in his case had previously sat through a trial of three others charged in the crime and heard testimony of an accomplice who had confessed and pleaded guilty. The Court referred to this fact as "historical, objective" and concluded it was not barred by Rule 606(b). In United States v. Gaffney, n9 the Court granted a new trial in a mail fraud case because of extraneous influences upon the jury, including: several jurors were aware that the Judge had denied motions for judgment of acquittal, several jurors were aware of one defendant's criminal record, a number of jurors watched or heard news reports about the trial, and at least two jurors were contacted by a person who told them not to believe the evidence.

[j] Rule 606(b) -- Habeas Corpus Proceedings

Bibbins v. Dalsheim, 21 F.3d 13 (2d Cir. 1994) : Affirming denial of a habeas corpus petition based on alleged juror misconduct, the Court noted that Rule 606(b) would be applied in determining whether there was actual prejudice flowing from the jury's erroneous consideration of extrarecord evidence.

United States v. Cheek, 94 F.3d 136 (4th Cir. 1996) : A defendant convicted for conducting a continuing criminal enterprise petitioned for habeas corpus relief on the ground that his codefendant had improperly contacted a juror during the trial. Reversing denial of the petition, the Court found that the government had not rebutted the presumption of prejudice and held that it was error to ask the juror whether he had listened to and considered all the evidence and to rely on this evidence of his mental processes in ruling on the petition.

Pyles v. Johnson, 136 F.3d 986 (5th Cir. 1998) : Pyles' defense at trial for murdering a police officer was that he thought the victim was a robber, not a police officer, when the victim confronted him outside a closed convenience store. He sought habeas relief because a juror had made an unauthorized visit to the crime scene. To support his claim, he submitted affidavits of the juror, who admitted that she visited the scene; that the visit gave her a new perspective because the actual scene was "much smaller" than that painted at trial; and that as a result of her visit, she was convinced that the defendant must have been aware that the victim arrived in a police car and was a police officer. The Court held that almost all of the assertions in these affidavits were inadmissible under Rule 606(b), because the vast majority of the assertions described the juror's mental impressions. The only extraneous prejudicial information contained in the affidavits was the bare fact that the juror had visited the crime scene. Because the juror's unauthorized visit itself constituted harmless error, the denial of habeas corpus relief was affirmed. In Williams v. Collins, 16 F.3d 626 (5th Cir. 1994) , the Court held that the Rule precluded use at the evidentiary hearing on a habeas corpus petition of testimony from trial jurors as to the effects if mitigating evidence had been presented.

Gosier v. Welborn, 175 F.3d 504 (7th Cir. 1999) : Following the trial in a state capital murder case, a juror told an investigator that he voted for the death penalty after concluding that he could not persuade any other juror to vote for lenience, and that he forgot that a single juror could block capital punishment. Affirming denial of habeas corpus, the Court noted that Rule 606(b) precludes admission of such evidence concerning a juror's mental processes in collateral attacks on state judgments as well as in direct attacks on federal verdicts. In Jacobs v. Marathon County, 73 F.3d 164 (7th Cir. 1996) , after a defendant was acquitted on five counts of murder, the state sought to try him for kidnapping and false imprisonment. The Court affirmed denial of habeas corpus relief sought on double jeopardy grounds. In the determination of the issues resolved by the first prosecution, the defendant relied upon five identical affidavits from jurors in the murder trial stating the grounds of their verdict. The Court held that the affidavits were admissible since they were not an inquiry into the validity of a verdict, but that "admissibility does not compel a finding of believability." These affidavits were lawyer-generated, they were in "quasi-legalese," and they were obtained three years after the first trial, so they were insufficient proof of the defendant's double jeopardy claim.

McDowell v. Calderon, 107 F.3d 1351 (9th Cir. 1997) , amended, 116 F.3d 364 , vacated in part on other grounds en banc, 130 F.3d 833 (9th Cir. 1997) : The Court held that in a habeas corpus proceeding, Federal Rule 606(b), and not the state rule of evidence, applies to determine the admissibility of a juror's testimony offered to impeach a State Court verdict. In this case, the juror's affidavit was properly excluded. The juror stated that she and other jurors operated under two misconceptions: that if the defendant received a life sentence, he would be paroled, and that if he received the death penalty, he would not really be executed. Juror misconceptions about the consequences of a life or death sentence do not constitute extraneous influences that can be permissibly proved under Rule 606(b).

Capps v. Sullivan, 921 F.2d 260 (10th Cir. 1990) : The Court held that evidence from two jurors, who indicated they would have voted differently had they been given an entrapment instruction in the petitioner's state trial, was erroneously considered in a federal habeas proceeding.

[k] Rule 606(b) -- Improper Contacts or Threats to Jury

United States v. Cheek, 94 F.3d 136 (4th Cir. 1996) : A defendant convicted for conducting a continuing criminal enterprise petitioned for habeas corpus relief on the ground that his codefendant had improperly contacted a juror during the trial. Reversing denial of the petition, the Court found that the government had not rebutted the presumption of prejudice and held that it was error to ask the juror whether he had listened to and considered all the evidence and to rely on this evidence of his mental processes in ruling on the petition.

Port Terminal & Warehousing Co. v. John S. James Co., 92 F.R.D. 100, 1982-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P64594 (S.D. Ga. 1981) , aff'd, 695 F.2d 1328, 1982-83 Trade Cas. (CCH) P65147 (11th Cir. 1983) : When the plaintiffs' counsel learned following the verdict in this antitrust action that one of the defendants may have made an improper overture to a juror during the trial, the Court ordered a hearing after instructing all counsel not to discuss the matter outside their law firms. Although the Court found that the factual showing at the hearing raised a presumption of prejudice, it concluded that the defendants were not actually hurt by anything that happened and denied a new trial request.

[l] Rule 606(b) -- Improper Exhibits in Jury Room

Carson v. Polley, 689 F.2d 562 (5th Cir. 1982) : The Court affirmed the grant of a new trial when, following a jury verdict for a civil rights plaintiff who claimed that deputy sheriffs used excessive force against him, it appeared that several exhibits ruled inadmissible had mistakenly been submitted to the jury.

United States v. Herrero, 893 F.2d 1512 (7th Cir. 1990) : After a bailiff discovered a map that had not been admitted into evidence in the jury room during deliberations in a cocaine conspiracy prosecution, the Trial Judge brought the matter to the parties' attention, but did not examine the jurors until after the verdict was given. The Court held that the defendants waived any assertion of error attributable to the timing of the examination by not making a timely objection, but noted that in any event Rule 606(b) would permit a post-verdict inquiry regarding the map, as it was "extraneous ... information." In United States v. Bruscino, n10 the Court affirmed conspiracy and murder convictions, finding there was no reasonable possibility that two documents not admitted as evidence that went to the jury room prejudiced the defendants.

[m] Rule 606(b) -- Instructions to the Jury

United States v. Black, 843 F.2d 1456 (D.C. Cir. 1988) : Affirming a tax evasion conviction, the Court held that a juror's affidavit, offered to prove that the Trial Judge's anti-deadlock instructions were coercive, not only failed to prove this fact, but also were inadmissible under Rule 606(b).

Moores v. Navitrade S.A., 94 F.R.D. 340 (D. Me. 1982) , aff'd, 705 F.2d 440 (1st Cir. 1983) : The District Court denied a motion for a new trial based on an affidavit by the plaintiff's agent offered to support the conclusion that the jury did not follow the Court's instructions. The allegation involved an inquiry into the mental processes of the jury, which would be impermissible.

Robles v. Exxon Corp., 862 F.2d 1201 (5th Cir. 1989) : The Court reversed a judgment for a plaintiff in a personal injury case, holding it was error to refuse to enter judgment upon the first verdict that the jury returned, which was for the defendant. The Trial Judge violated Rule 606(b) in eliciting unsworn testimony from the jurors that they misunderstood the instructions and in directing the jury to resume deliberations. The Court distinguished cases in which testimony is received that the verdict announced was not that agreed to in deliberations or a clerical error is corrected. In Peveto v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., n11 the Court affirmed a judgment based upon a jury verdict finding the user of an electrical saw 96 percent at fault, holding that even if the jury was erroneously instructed on contributory negligence, this was not an extraneous influence.

United States v. Tines, 70 F.3d 891 (6th Cir. 1995) : Affirming convictions of prison guards for violating inmates' civil rights, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly declined to investigate allegations from a juror that the jury misinterpreted and misapplied a "deadlock" instruction. The Court concluded that "[a] jury's interpretation and application of the court's instructions is a part of the deliberative process and was correctly excluded under Rule 606(b)," and that "[h]ow the jury interprets an Allen charge to come to a verdict is no exception to this principle."

United States v. Bussell, 414 F.3d 1048 (9th Cir. 2005) : When the defendant's codefendant-husband died during jury deliberations in their trial for bankruptcy fraud, the jury was given a supplemental instruction that the husband's case "has been disposed of and is no longer before you" and that the jurors were not to "guess or speculate as to the reason for the disposition." The defendant attacked the guilty verdict against her, relying on interviews of four jurors indicating that the jury had speculated that the husband had entered a guilty plea. Affirming denial of the defendant's new trial motion, the Court held that the juror interviews were inadmissible under Rule 606(b), rejecting the argument that the jurors' speculation was "extraneous prejudicial information." The alleged source of speculation--the supplemental instruction--was not extraneous. "It did not enter the jury room through an external, prohibited route, but rather was part of the trial." In Abatino v. United States, n12 the Court held that a juror's affidavit on the effect of the Judge's instructions was not admissible under Rule 606(b).

[n] Rule 606(b) -- Interpreter in Jury Room

United States v. Dempsey, 830 F.2d 1084 (10th Cir. 1987) : The Court stated that when an interpreter is present in the jury room to assist a deaf juror, a Trial Judge should inquire of the interpreter and the jurors as to whether the interpreter abided by the oath and refrained from participating in deliberations. Although the Judge did not inquire of the jurors in this case, the Court found that there was no allegation that the interpreter's representation that the oath was complied with was untrue.

[o] Rule 606(b) -- Interviews with Jurors

United States v. Bailey, 834 F.2d 218 (1st Cir. 1987) : The Court held that a defendant convicted of corruptly endeavoring to influence a juror should have been permitted Court-controlled interviews with jurors who served with the juror who the defendant was charged with contacting. Such interviews might have provided the defendant with evidence concerning the key juror's credibility and character.

United States v. Moon, 718 F.2d 1210 (2d Cir. 1983) : Affirming convictions for filing false tax returns, the Court found that the Trial Judge had made an adequate inquiry into whether the jury had been exposed to improper influences during the trial. It approved the Judge's order barring the attorneys, the defendants, and their agents from contacting jurors without prior consent of the Court.

United States v. Gravely, 840 F.2d 1156, 1988-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P67906 (4th Cir. 1988) : Affirming antitrust and obstruction of justice convictions, the Court held that a defendant was not entitled to permission to conduct posttrial interviews with jurors absent a showing of outside influence. In United States v. Barber, n13 the Court affirmed a RICO conviction and upheld the Trial Judge's post-verdict refusal to permit the defendant to interview two jurors who stated after they left the courtroom that they were "gravely disturbed" by the verdict. The Court noted that "[t]he opportunities for other abuses which would greatly exceed the possibly unfortunate consequences of not pursuing belated, post-verdict claims of intimidation by fellow jurors are obvious."

United States v. Davila, 704 F.2d 749 (5th Cir. 1983) : The Court upheld convictions for sexually abusing illegal aliens, finding no error in denying the defendants' request to interview the jurors after the verdict, as they made no preliminary showing of misconduct and sought "simply to discover what happened in the jury's deliberations in the hope of uncovering an impropriety." The Court upheld a local rule barring attorneys and parties from contacting jurors without permission of the District Judge in Big John, B.V. v. Indian Head Grain Co. n14 In Wilkerson v. Amco Corp., n15 the Court found no abuse of discretion in refusing a losing party permission to interview jurors in order to find whether the jury employed an improper method of breaking a deadlock. Absent some claim of misconduct, the Court expressed a preference for avoiding chances of jury tampering and "ransacking the jurors." The jurors would not have been permitted to testify whether they followed the Judge's instructions, and any information developed in the proposed inquiry would have been inadmissible.

United States v. Miller, 806 F.2d 223 (10th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a rape conviction, the Court held it was proper to deny a motion by the defendant to interview a juror who had contacted defense counsel to express her reservations about the verdict. Any inquiry could not result in evidence that would be admissible under Rule 606(b).

[p] Rule 606(b) -- Judicial Discretion

United States v. Aimone, 715 F.2d 822 (3d Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed RICO convictions, finding no error in the denial of a postjudgment inquiry into jury deliberations. One juror had expressed concern about separation from her husband and about the pressure of deliberations imposed by actions of the foreperson. The Trial Judge spoke with her and consulted counsel for both sides concerning the action he should take. Ultimately, he gave a supplemental charge to the jury that discussed the role of the foreperson. The Court found that since the charge was given to all jurors in open Court, there was no need for inquiry into what the one juror might have told others about her conversations with the Judge.

Resolution Trust Corp. v. Stone, 998 F.2d 1534 (10th Cir. 1993) : In a suit alleging racketeering and fraud, the Court found no violation of Rule 606(b) in asking the jury foreman to clarify the verdict.

United States v. Ayarza-Garcia, 819 F.2d 1043 (11th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that a Trial Judge properly decided not to conduct an investigation after a juror published an article describing jury deliberations. No extraneous influences were alleged.

[q] Rule 606(b) -- Jurors' Notebooks

United States v. Elder, 90 F.3d 1110 (6th Cir. 1996) : The Court held there was no error in prohibiting counsel from reviewing jurors' trial notebooks when an issue of exposure to prejudicial information arose, as the notebooks could contain statements barred by the Rule concerning the jurors' thought processes, comments, or calculations.

[r] Rule 606(b) -- Jury Misconduct

Tanner v. United States, 483 U.S. 107 (1987) : The Supreme Court rejected the defendants' claim that substance abuse was an "outside" or "extraneous" influence that could impeach a jury verdict. The Court also rejected the argument the failure to inquire into juror intoxication denies a defendant a fair trial before an impartial and competent jury, reasoning that other aspects of the trial process -- voir dire of jurors, observations by the Trial Judge and courtroom participants, and observations and reports by fellow jurors -- were adequate to assure defendants fair trials. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 606.02[4].

United States v. Connolly, 341 F.3d 16 (1st Cir. 2003) : Affirming the conviction of a former FBI agent for racketeering and other offenses, the Court found no violation of Rule 606(b) when the defendant's post-trial request to inquire into whether jurors took notes into the jury room was refused. The Judge had explained to the jurors that he did not permit note-taking during the trial, but a newspaper report published after the trial revealed that jurors went home and jotted down notes, which they took into deliberations. The Court agreed that this was not a violation of the Judge's instructions. Moreover, the Court held that juror notes were not extrinsic evidence, but were intrinsic because they reflected juror impressions and recollections.

Anderson v. Miller, 346 F.3d 315 (2d Cir. 2003) : A State prisoner sought a writ of habeas corpus, presenting affidavits from two jurors indicating that they felt coerced by other jurors into finding the defendant guilty. The Court upheld the denial of the writ on the ground that while the jurors might have felt pressured, no reasonable juror would have thought herself to be facing a physical assault if she refused to vote for conviction. In the course of its opinion, the Court noted that Rule 606(b) could not prohibit proof that there were threats or acts of physical violence during jury deliberations. It stated if Rule 606(b) were construed to preclude hearing juror testimony when there are credible allegations that a juror's safety was threatened by fellow jurors, "it would raise serious constitutional concerns with respect to a defendant's right to a fair trial."

United States v. Stansfield, 101 F.3d 909 (3d Cir. 1996) : The jury in a mail fraud and witness tampering case rendered a partial verdict of guilty on certain counts and had just returned to the jury room to commence deliberations on the remaining count when three jurors abruptly left the jury room and refused to return, stating that they had been intimidated by gender-based insults. The Court held that Rule 606(b) bars juror testimony concerning intimidation or harassment of one juror by another.

United States v. Brito, 136 F.3d 397 (5th Cir. 1998) : In a marijuana-importation prosecution, the Court found no abuse of discretion in denial of new trial motions based on juror affidavits that the jury improperly discussed extraneous general information concerning sentencing and the defendants' rights of appeal, contrary to specific instructions not to consider punishment, where nothing suggested that the information came to the jury's attention from an outside source. In United States v. Martinez-Moncivais, 14 F.3d 1030 (5th Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed convictions for drug trafficking offenses, holding there was no abuse of discretion in denying the defendant's motion for a new trial. A juror's affidavit that two other jurors suggested that if the defendant were innocent he would have taken the stand in his own defense did not show that external influences were brought to bear on the deliberative process.

United States v. Logan, 250 F.3d 350 (6th Cir. 2001) : Affirming fraud and related convictions, the Court found no error in the Trial Judge's preclusion of post-verdict interviews with jurors regarding possibly premature deliberations. The alleged misconduct constituted a potential internal rather than external influence on the jury, and because juror testimony about internal influences is prohibited by Rule 606(b), there was no point in allowing the interviews.

United States v. Briggs, 291 F.3d 958 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court held that the Trial Judge did not err in refusing to conduct a hearing into a juror's complaints that she had been "intimidated" by other jurors into finding the defendant guilty. Because this complaint involved only "intrajury influences on the verdict," and there was no allegation of any extraneous prejudicial information or outside influence, the juror's allegations were not admissible under Rule 606(b).

United States v. Tran, 122 F.3d 670 (8th Cir. 1997) : The defendant, convicted of conspiracy to traffic in counterfeit checks, sought a hearing on jury misconduct, proffering affidavits from jurors indicating that the defendant's failure to testify at trial was used as evidence against him in jury deliberations. The Court held that the Trial Judge properly denied the motion for a hearing, because the affidavits were inadmissible under Rule 606(b). The defendant's failure to testify "was not extraneous prejudicial information, because it was known to the jurors as a result of their presence at trial, not as a result of something disclosed to them that had not occurred in the courtroom." The Court distinguished United States v. Swinton, 75 F.3d 374 (8th Cir. 1996) , a case in which the jurors were informed of a prior conviction of the defendant that had not been admitted at trial. See also United States v. Rodriguez, 116 F.3d 1225 (8th Cir. 1997) , similarly holding inadmissible a juror's statement that the jury considered the defendant's failure to testify as an admission of guilt. In United States v. Blumeyer, n16 the Court held (2-1) that it was error to grant defendants in a fraud case a new trial based upon juror taint. One juror, who had hesitated to affirm the verdict when the Trial Judge first polled the jurors, contacted defense counsel and indicated regret about the verdict. The Judge interviewed the juror, who stated that the jury foreman had asked an attorney friend a question of law and mentioned the contact during deliberations. Subsequently, four other jurors indicated that the foreman had mentioned the contact during deliberations. The majority concluded that the Judge erred in considering the subject matter of the deliberations at the time the foreman mentioned the contact, since Rule 606(b) bars inquiry into the mental processes and deliberations of the jury. The dissent argued that an inquiry into the relationship between the subject matter of the deliberations and the foreman's statement was permissible on the issue whether extraneous prejudicial information was brought to the jury's attention or outside influence was improperly brought to bear upon any juror. In United States v. Tallman, n17 the Court, affirming convictions for cocaine offenses, held there was no error in denying a new trial based on assertions in a juror's note during deliberations that other jurors were harassing and insulting. Total placidity is not the nature of jury deliberation, and to admit proof of contentiousness and conflict to impeach a verdict would be to eviscerate the Rule.

United States v. Casamayor, 837 F.2d 1509 (11th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that alleged harassment or intimidation of one juror by another may not be used to impeach a verdict.

[s] Rule 606(b) -- Mental Processes

[i] Rule 606(b) -- Civil Cases

Moores v. Navitrade S.A., 94 F.R.D. 340 (D. Me. 1982) , aff'd, 705 F.2d 440 (1st Cir. 1983) : The Court denied a motion for a new trial based on an affidavit of the plaintiff's agent offered to support the conclusion that the jury did not follow the Court's instructions. The allegation involved an inquiry into the mental processes of the jury, which is impermissible.

Ohanian v. Avis Rent A Car Sys., 779 F.2d 101 (2d Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an employee who sued for breach of contract, but denied his cross-appeal on the damage issue. It found that juror notes were not admissible to impeach the damage portion of the verdict.

McNulty v. Borden, Inc., 542 F. Supp. 655, 1982-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P64953 (E.D. Pa. 1982) : The Court held that a juror's affidavit to the effect that he had been mistaken as to the judgment that would be entered on the basis of answers to interrogatories did not establish exposure to erroneous prejudicial information.

Robles v. Exxon Corp., 862 F.2d 1201 (5th Cir. 1989) : The Court reversed a judgment for a plaintiff in a personal injury case, holding it was error to refuse to enter judgment upon the first verdict that the jury returned, which was for the defendant. The Judge violated Rule 606(b) in eliciting testimony from the jurors that they misunderstood the instructions and in directing the jury to resume deliberations. In Multiflex, Inc. v. Samuel Moore & Co., n18 the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff as to liability in an antitrust case, but reversed as to damages. The jury had awarded different sums under two sections of the Sherman Act, and the Court found no basis for the difference. It held that the Trial Judge properly disregarded juror affidavits that suggested that the jury might have been attempting to award damages for injury to the plaintiff's reputation or to punish the defendant. These affidavits related to the jury's decision-making processes, not to external influences, and were barred by Rule 606. In Carson v. Polley, n19 the Court held that a new trial was properly refused after the jury foreman, during deliberations, sent the Trial Judge a letter stating that the plaintiff had put on almost no evidence. This letter indicated the juror's mental processes, but did not amount to extraneous information.

Wilsmann v. Upjohn Co., 572 F. Supp. 242 (W.D. Mich. 1983) : Both sides made offers of proof that related posttrial conversations with jurors, but the Court refused to receive evidence concerning how a jury reached a damage award in a securities case on the ground that its receipt would violate Rule 606(b).

Haugh v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 949 F.2d 914 (7th Cir. 1991) : The Court upheld the grant of a new trial to the defendant in a personal injury action after a marshal told jurors they would be kept in custody until they reached a verdict. The Court noted that it was improper under the Rule for the Trial Judge to ask jurors whether they reached the verdict because they believed in it or because they wanted to go home. See also Artis v. Hitachi Zosen Clearing, Inc., 967 F.2d 1132 (7th Cir. 1992) (noting the impropriety of questioning jurors whether their deliberations were prejudiced by extraneous information or outside influences). The plaintiff in Wiedemann v. Galiano, n20 who alleged that the defendant negligently operated a syringe, had discovered that, after the syringe was admitted into evidence and before it was sent to the jury room, the defendant and his attorney lubricated it so that it would not stick if the jury experimented with it. The Court reversed denial of the plaintiff's new trial motion because the Trial Judge improperly admitted juror affidavits stating that the mechanical condition of the syringe had not affected their deliberations.

Karl v. Burlington N. R. Co., 880 F.2d 68 (8th Cir. 1989) : In an action by a motorist injured in a car-train collision, the jury gave inconsistent answers to special interrogatories regarding apportionment of responsibility and damages, which the Trial Judge attempted to "clarify" by interviewing the foreperson. The Court reversed the judgment on the "true verdict" subsequently entered, holding that the mistake made by the jury was not merely clerical, but one that went to the validity of the verdict, so inquiry into the jurors' understanding or intentions was forbidden by the Rule. See also Scogin v. Century Fitness, Inc. n21(the Trial Judge properly refused to inquire whether the jury reached its verdict by a quotient method).

E.F. Hutton & Co. v. Arnebergh, 775 F.2d 1061 (9th Cir. 1985) : Expressing concern about the Trial Judge's reconvening the jury several weeks after it was discharged, interviewing it in camera, and asking the jury to advise him of the result it intended by its verdict, the Court observed that Rule 606(b) appeared to prohibit juror testimony concerning the intent of their verdict, but affirmed because both parties preferred the procedure to a new trial.

McElroy v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 894 F.2d 1504 (11th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action, holding there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to permit posttrial interviews with jurors. The plaintiff had wanted to question jurors about an incident when a juror became distraught during deliberations, but, as his allegations went only to the juror's own emotional state of mind and its possible effect on other jurors and not to any prejudicial information or outside influence brought to bear on the jury, the inquiry would not be consistent with Rule 606(b).

[ii] Rule 606(b) -- Mental Processes -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Campbell, 684 F.2d 141 (D.C. Cir. 1982) : The Court affirmed convictions for giving and receiving an illegal gratuity, finding that the Trial Judge acted properly in making no further inquiry after a juror reported that she had indicated that she would go along with a unanimous vote of the other jurors, since an inquiry would have delved into the mental processes of the jurors, something not permitted by the Rule.

United States v. DiSalvo, 34 F.3d 1204 (3d Cir. 1994) : In a RICO and extortion prosecution, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly refused to inquire into a juror's statement, made during deliberations, that "[y]ou [i.e., the defendant] can't get into this situation without being guilty." Since the jury had not considered prejudicial extra-record information, Rule 606(b) prohibited an inquiry into the juror's statement. Upholding RICO convictions over arguments of pretrial publicity prejudicing the jury in United States v. Gilsenan, 949 F.2d 90 (3d Cir. 1991) , the Court held that it could consider the affidavit of a juror who was excused during the trial, as her mental state had nothing to do with the verdict. In United States v. Friedland, n22 the Court agreed that it was proper to deny a request, following a newspaper story that jurors in a criminal trial discussed the defendant's failure to testify, that the jurors be examined about their deliberations.

United States v. Jones, 132 F.3d 232 (5th Cir. 1998) , aff'd, 527 U.S. 373 (1999) : The Court held that a defendant challenging a death sentence for murder was not permitted to undermine the verdict by juror affidavits alleging confusion caused by the instructions regarding the unanimity requirement. The reasons for not allowing jurors to impeach verdicts in trials apply with equal force to sentencing hearings.

United States v. Gonzales, 227 F.3d 520 (6th Cir. 2000) : The defendant sought to attack his guilty verdict through a juror's statement that she felt pressured to vote guilty; that the jurors thought that it was no problem to vote guilty because the defendant would only get a "slap on the wrist"; and that the foreman stated that he had seen the defendant's counsel represent another client and that counsel "always represented guilty clients." The Court held that none of this information was admissible to attack the verdict. All of it dealt with internal juror deliberations; none of it referred to extraneous influences. In United States v. Murphy, 836 F.2d 248 (6th Cir. 1988) , the Court held that the Trial Judge properly precluded the defendant from inquiring whether a juror's plan to leave on vacation affected deliberations.

United States v. Berry, 92 F.3d 597 (7th Cir. 1996) : Upholding a new trial granted in a drug case after the Judge's post-verdict discussion with jurors revealed that a transcript had improperly gone into the jury room, the Court held that in finding a reasonable possibility of prejudice the Judge correctly disregarded one juror's comment that the transcript actually helped one defendant. The Court observed that "a district court must ignore a juror's comment regarding how a particular piece of material disposed the juror toward a particular verdict, and the district court must make an independent determination of the likely effect of the extraneous material." See also United States v. Ford n23(a juror's letter alleging extreme and excessive pressure on jurors to change votes did not allege extraneous influence).

United States v. Arpan, 887 F.2d 873 (8th Cir. 1989) (en banc): The Court said that a letter from a juror raising concerns about coercion resulting from the Trial Judge's response to questions during deliberations should be disregarded. Dissenting Judges thought that although the letter could not serve as a basis for a new trial, it could be used to corroborate the conclusion that a reasonable juror could have misunderstood the Judge's response. See also United States v. Krall n24(a juror's affidavit in a tax prosecution saying that she feared an IRS investigation if she voted to acquit could not be considered because it related the juror's mental processes).

United States v. Weiner, 578 F.2d 757 (9th Cir. 1978) : The Court approved a ruling that one juror's affidavit to the effect that she voted guilty "with reservation," which was supported by affidavits of two fellow jurors, could not be used to impeach a verdict. See also United States v. Marques n25(holding that a compromise verdict could not be impeached).

United States v. Sjeklocha, 843 F.2d 485 (11th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that a juror affidavit and statement to a newspaper concerning the effect that newly discovered evidence would have had on the verdict was inadmissible.

[t] Rule 606(b) -- Official Contacts

Peterson v. Wilson, 141 F.3d 573 (5th Cir. 1998) : In a civil rights action, the Trial Judge met with jurors after they rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, and on the basis of the jurors' comments, granted a new trial for the defendant. Relying on Rule 606(b), the Court reversed and reinstated the verdict. The Court stated that a Trial Judge's post-verdict ex parte discussion with jurors "is highly irregular if not impermissible, and, more important, that impeachment of the jury verdict on the basis of information obtained in such a discussion constitutes abuse of discretion per se."

Haugh v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 949 F.2d 914 (7th Cir. 1991) : In upholding the grant of a new trial to the defendant in a personal injury action after a marshal told jurors they would be kept in custody until they reached a verdict, the Court noted that it was improper under the Rule for the Trial Judge to ask jurors whether they reached the verdict because they believed in it or because they wanted to go home.

United States v. Scisum, 32 F.3d 1479 (10th Cir. 1994) : Reversing a Mann Act conviction because of the Trial Judge's ex parte contact with a juror, the Court noted that Rule 606(b) precluded consideration of the juror's statement in her affidavit that had she not met with the Judge she would have dissented from the guilty verdict when polled. In United States v. Greer, n26 the Court overturned drug convictions, because at a lunch break during trial a marshal informed jurors of sentencing possibilities. The Court said that any ex parte contact between jurors and Court officials about the matter being tried is presumptively prejudicial, and that Rule 606(b) limited the opportunities for jurors to claim not to have been affected by extraneous information.

[u] Rule 606(b) -- Partial Verdicts

United States v. Stover, 329 F.3d 859 (D.C. Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed four defendants' drug-related convictions. Five days after the jury returned a verdict of guilty against Stover, it told the Judge that it was hung as to another defendant and that some jurors wanted to redeliberate as to Stover. The Judge ruled that no further inquiry was required and that the jury's deliberations would be terminated. The Court, relying on United States v. Dakins, 872 F.2d 1061 (D.C. Cir. 1989) , found no abuse of discretion, because Rule 606(b) "bars eliciting juror testimony here to impeach the verdict against Stover, which was unanimously rendered, as the contemporaneous polling confirmed."

United States v. Hockridge, 573 F.2d 752 (2d Cir. 1978) : The Court held that Rule 606(b) prevents impeachment of a partial verdict returned under Fed. R. Crim. P. 31(b) on the ground that some jurors pressured others to agree to the verdict. "While the freedom of jury deliberations is less threatened by impeachment of partial verdicts than by impeachment of verdicts generally, it is, nevertheless, clearly impinged."

United States v. Ortiz, 942 F.2d 903 (5th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug offenses, holding there was no error in denying a new trial based on affidavits by three jurors that they had not agreed to return guilty verdicts on several counts. The exception to the Rule that allows consideration of jurors' statements to determine whether a verdict was in fact reached is not so broad as to allow a juror to contradict four earlier statements made by that juror in open Court unequivocally expressing agreement with the verdict.

[v] Rule 606(b) -- Pre-Deliberation Statements of Jurors

United States v. Richards, 241 F.3d 335 (3d Cir. 2001) : The defendant moved for a new trial on the basis of an affidavit from an alternate juror stating that he had overheard two jurors state before deliberations that the defendant was guilty. The Trial Judge denied the motion and the Court affirmed. It stated that evaluating evidence of misconduct after the verdict was rendered "would require the District Court to interview the jurors in contravention of Rule 606(b)." Although the statements allegedly made by the jurors occurred prior to deliberation, "the jurors would necessarily be queried as to their thought process to determine whether or not the premature statements affected their verdict." Such questioning is prohibited by the Rule.

[w] Rule 606(b) -- Sentencing

United States v. Ramos-Oseguera, 120 F.3d 1028 (9th Cir. 1997) : A husband and wife involved in a drug conspiracy were tried separately for their crimes. After the wife was convicted, her lawyer delivered to the Judge letters from four jurors explaining their beliefs that the wife had been severely abused by her husband. The Court found that the Judge's decision not to consider the letters in sentencing was not an abuse of discretion, since a practice of doing so could lead to harassment of jurors.

[x] Rule 606(b) -- Time Pressure

Poches v. J.J. Newberry Co., 549 F.2d 1166 (8th Cir. 1977) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action, the Court rejected an attempt to impeach the verdict with a showing that a juror may have rushed to judgment because of prior business commitments.

[y] Rule 606(b) -- Verdict Forms

Tanno v. S.S. President Madison Ves., 830 F.2d 991 (9th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that statements that a jury put in parentheses on a special verdict form had to be disregarded in deciding whether the verdict was inconsistent, since the statements were explanations of the mental processes of the jury that may not impeach the verdict.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. Tobias v. Smith, 468 F. Supp. 1287 (W.D.N.Y. 1979) .

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Dotson, 817 F.2d 1127 (5th Cir. 1987) , modified, 821 F.2d 1034 (1987) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Brooks, 677 F.2d 907 (D.C. Cir. 1982) .

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Sababu, 891 F.2d 1308 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n5)Footnote 5. United States v. Bruscino, 687 F.2d 938 (7th Cir. 1982) (en banc).

(n6)Footnote 6. United States v. Bassler, 651 F.2d 600 (8th Cir. 1981) .

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Robinson, 645 F.2d 616 (8th Cir. 1981) .

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Bagnariol, 665 F.2d 877 (9th Cir. 1981) .

(n9)Footnote 9. United States v. Gaffney, 676 F. Supp. 1544 (M.D. Fla. 1987) .

(n10)Footnote 10. United States v. Bruscino, 687 F.2d 938 (7th Cir. 1982) (en banc).

(n11)Footnote 11. Peveto v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 807 F.2d 486 (5th Cir. 1987) .

(n12)Footnote 12. Abatino v. United States, 750 F.2d 1442 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n13)Footnote 13. United States v. Barber, 668 F.2d 778 (4th Cir. 1982) .

(n14)Footnote 14. Big John, B.V. v. Indian Head Grain Co., 718 F.2d 143 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n15)Footnote 15. Wilkerson v. Amco Corp., 703 F.2d 184 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n16)Footnote 16. United States v. Blumeyer, 62 F.3d 1013 (8th Cir. 1995) .

(n17)Footnote 17. United States v. Tallman, 952 F.2d 164 (8th Cir. 1991) .

(n18)Footnote 18. Multiflex, Inc. v. Samuel Moore & Co., 709 F.2d 980, 1983-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P65507 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n19)Footnote 19. Carson v. Polley, 689 F.2d 562 (5th Cir. 1982) .

(n20)Footnote 20. Wiedemann v. Galiano, 722 F.2d 335 (7th Cir. 1983) .

(n21)Footnote 21. Scogin v. Century Fitness, Inc., 780 F.2d 1316 (8th Cir. 1985) .

(n22)Footnote 22. United States v. Friedland, 660 F.2d 919 (3d Cir. 1981) .

(n23)Footnote 23. United States v. Ford, 840 F.2d 460 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(n24)Footnote 24. United States v. Krall, 835 F.2d 711 (8th Cir. 1987) .

(n25)Footnote 25. United States v. Marques, 600 F.2d 742 (9th Cir. 1979) .

(n26)Footnote 26. United States v. Greer, 620 F.2d 1383 (10th Cir. 1980) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 606 RULE 606

2-606 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 606.04

606.04 Legislative History

[Go To Supp]

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

Subdivision (a). The considerations which bear upon the permissibility of testimony by a juror in the trial in which he is sitting as juror bear an obvious similarity to those evoked when the judge is called as a witness. See Advisory Committee's Note to Rule 605. The judge is not, however, in this instance so involved as to call for departure from usual principles requiring objection to be made; hence the only provision on objection is that opportunity be afforded for its making out of the presence of the jury. Compare Rule 605.

Subdivision (b). Whether testimony, affidavits, or statements of jurors should be received for the purpose of invalidating or supporting a verdict or indictment, and if so, under what circumstances, has given rise to substantial differences of opinion. The familiar rubric that a juror may not impeach his own verdict, dating from Lord Mansfield's time, is a gross oversimplification. The values sought to be promoted by excluding the evidence include freedom of deliberation, stability and finality of verdicts, and protection of jurors against annoyance and embarrassment. McDonald v. Pless, 238 U.S. 264, 35 S. Ct. 785, 59 L. Ed. 1300 (1915) . On the other hand, simply putting verdicts beyond effective reach can only promote irregularity and injustice. The rule offers an accommodation between these competing considerations.

The mental operations and emotional reactions of jurors in arriving at a given result would, if allowed as a subject of inquiry, place every verdict at the mercy of jurors and invite tampering and harassment. See Grenz v. Werre, 129 N.W.2d 681 (N.D. 1964) . The authorities are in virtually complete accord in excluding the evidence. Fryer, Note on Disqualification of Witnesses, Selected Writings on Evidence and Trial 345, 347 (Fryer ed. 1957); Maguire, Weinstein, et al., Cases on Evidence 887 (5th ed. 1965); 8 Wigmore § 2349 (McNaughton Rev. 1961). As to matters other than mental operations and emotional reactions of jurors, substantial authority refuses to allow a juror to disclose irregularities which occur in the jury room, but allows his testimony as to irregularities occurring outside and allows outsiders to testify as to occurrences both inside and out. 8 Wigmore § 2354 (McNaughton Rev. 1961). However, the door of the jury room is not necessarily a satisfactory dividing point, and the Supreme Court has refused to accept it for every situation. Mattox v. United States, 146 U.S. 140, 13 S. Ct. 50, 36 L. Ed. 917 (1892) . Under the federal decisions the central focus has been upon insulation in the manner in which the jury reached its verdict, and this protection extends to each of the components of deliberation, including arguments, statements, discussions, mental and emotional reactions, votes, and any other feature of the process. Thus testimony or affidavits of jurors have been held incompetent to show a compromise verdict, Hyde v. United States, 225 U.S. 347, 382 (1912) ; a quotient verdict, McDonald v. Pless, 238 U.S. 264 (1915) ; speculation as to insurance coverage, Holden v. Porter, 405 F.2d 878 (10th Cir. 1969) and Farmers Coop. Elev. Ass'n v. Strand, 382 F.2d 224, 230 (8th Cir. 1967) , cert. denied, 389 U.S. 1014 ; misinterpretation of instructions, Farmers Coop. Elev. Ass'n v. Strand, supra ; mistake in returning verdict, United States v. Chereton, 309 F.2d 197 (6th Cir. 1962) ; interpretation of guilty plea by one defendant as implicating others, United States v. Crosby, 294 F.2d 928, 949 (2d Cir. 1961) . The policy does not, however, foreclose testimony by jurors as to prejudicial extraneous information or influences injected into or brought to bear upon the deliberative process. Thus a juror is recognized as competent to testify to statements by the bailiff or the introduction of a prejudicial newspaper account into the jury room, Mattox v. United States, 146 U.S. 140 (1892) . See also Parker v. Gladden, 385 U.S. 363 (1966) .

This rule does not purport to specify the substantive grounds for setting aside verdicts for irregularity; it deals only with the competency of jurors to testify concerning those grounds. Allowing them to testify as to matters other than their own inner reactions involves no particular hazard to the values sought to be protected. The rule is based upon this conclusion. It makes no attempt to specify the substantive grounds for setting aside verdicts for irregularity.

See also Rule 6 (e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and 18 U.S.C. § 3500, governing the secrecy of grand jury proceedings. The present rule does not relate to secrecy and disclosure but to the competency of certain witnesses and evidence.

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendments are technical. No substantive change is intended."]

[2] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

As proposed, subdivision (b) limited testimony by a juror in the course of an inquiry into the validity of a verdict or indictment. He could testify as to the influence of extraneous prejudicial information brought to the jury's attention (e.g. a radio newscast or a newspaper account) or an outside influence which improperly had been brought to bear upon a juror (e.g. a threat to the safety of a member of his family); he could not testify as to other irregularities which occurred in the jury room. Under this formulation a quotient verdict could not be attacked through the testimony of a juror, nor could a juror testify to the drunken condition of a fellow juror which so disabled him that he could not participate in the jury deliberations.

The 1969 and the 1971 drafts would have permitted a member of the jury to testify concerning irregularities occurring in the jury room. The Advisory Committee comment to subdivision (b) in the 1971 draft stated that "the door of the jury room is not a satisfactory dividing point, and the Supreme Court has refused to accept it." The Advisory Committee further commented in the 1971 draft that:

> The trend has been to draw the dividing line between testimony as to mental processes, on the one hand, and as to the existence of conditions or occurrences of events calculated improperly to influence the verdict, on the other hand, without regard to whether the happening is within or without the jury room ... . The jurors are the persons who know what really happened. Allowing them to testify as to matters other than their own inner reactions involves no particular hazard to the values sought to be protected. The rule is based upon this conclusion. It makes no attempt to specify the substantive grounds for setting aside verdicts for irregularity.

Objective jury misconduct may be testified to in California, Florida, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, New Jersey, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Tennessee, Texas, and Washington.

Persuaded that the better practice is that provided for in the earlier drafts, the Subcommittee approved subdivision (b) in the text of those drafts.

[3] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Deleted; virtually identical to Subcommittee Note.

[4] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

As adopted by the House, this rule would permit the impeachment of verdicts by inquiry into, not the mental processes of the jurors, but what happened in terms of conduct in the jury room. This extension of the ability to impeach a verdict is felt to be unwarranted and ill-advised.

The rule passed by the House embodies a suggestion by the Advisory Committee of the Judicial Conference that is considerably broader than the final version adopted by the Supreme Court, which embodied long-accepted Federal law. Although forbidding the impeachment of verdicts by inquiry into the jurors' mental processes, it deletes from the Supreme Court version the proscription against testimony "as to any matter or statement occurring during the course of the jury's deliberations." This deletion would have the effect of opening verdicts up to challenge on the basis of what happened during the jury's internal deliberations, for example, where a juror alleged that the jury refused to follow the trial judge's instructions or that some of the jurors did not take part in deliberations.

Permitting an individual to attack a jury verdict based upon the jury's internal deliberations has long been recognized as unwise by the Supreme Court. In McDonald v. Pless, the Court stated:

> let it once be established that verdicts solemnly made and publicly returned into court can be attacked and set aside on the testimony of those who took part in their publication and all verdicts could be, and many would be, followed by an inquiry in the hope of discovering something which might invalidate the finding. Jurors would be harassed and beset by the defeated party in an effort to secure from them evidence of facts which might establish misconduct sufficient to set aside a verdict. If evidence thus secured could be thus used, the result would be to make what was intended to be a private deliberation, the constant subject of public investigation --to the destruction of all frankness and freedom of discussion and conference. [238 U.S. 264, 267 (1915) .]

As it stands then, the rule would permit the harassment of former jurors by losing parties as well as the possible exploitation of disgruntled or otherwise badly motivated ex-jurors.

Public policy requires a finality to litigation. And common fairness requires that absolute privacy be preserved for jurors to engage in the full and free debate necessary to the attainment of just verdicts. Jurors will not be able to function effectively if their deliberations are to be scrutinized in post-trial litigation. In the interest of protecting the jury system and the citizens who make it work, Rule 606 should not permit any inquiry into the internal deliberations of the jurors.

[5] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

Rule 606(b) deals with juror testimony in an inquiry into the validity of a verdict or indictment. The House bill provides that a juror cannot testify about his mental processes or about the effect of anything upon his or another juror's mind as influencing him to assent to or dissent from a verdict or indictment. Thus, the House bill allows a juror to testify about objective matters occurring during the jury's deliberation, such as the misconduct of another juror or the reaching of a quotient verdict. The Senate bill does not permit juror testimony about any matter or statement occurring during the course of the jury's deliberations. The Senate bill does provide, however, that a juror may testify on the question whether extraneous prejudicial information was improperly brought to the jury's attention and on the question whether any outside influence was improperly brought to bear on any juror.

The Conference adopts the Senate amendment. The Conferees believe that jurors should be encouraged to be conscientious in promptly reporting to the court misconduct that occurs during jury deliberations.

[6] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Letter from Ronald L. Carlson to Hon. William L. Hungate, February 27, 1973, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 389-90 (1973).

Letter from Ronald L. Carlson to Hon. William L. Hungate, April 16, 1973, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 27 (1973).

Debate in the House of Representatives, 120 Cong. Rec. H550-H551 (daily ed. February 6, 1974).

Letter from Hon. Roszel C. Thomsen to Hon. James O. Eastland, May 22, 1974, and accompanying material, in Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 53-54, 61 (1974).

Prepared Statement of W. Vincent Rakestraw, June 5, 1974, in Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 109-11 (1974).

Debate in the House of Representatives, 120 Cong. Rec. H12259 (December 18, 1974).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
Supp. To CHAPTER 606 RULE 606

2-606 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 606, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 606. Competency of Juror as Witness		Rule 606. Juror's Competency as a Witness
(a)	At the trial. A member of the jury may	(a)	At the Trial. A juror may not testify as a not testify as a witness before that jury in the trial of the case in which the juror is sitting. If the juror is called so to testify, the opposing party shall be afforded an opportunity to object outside the jury's presence.

ject out of the presence of the jury.

(b) Inquiry into validity of verdict or indictment. Upon an inquiry into the validity of a verdict or indictment, a juror may not testify as to any matter or

(b) During an Inquiry into the Validity of a Verdict or Indictment.

state men t occurring during
the cour se of
the jury' s de-liberations or to the effect
of any-thin g upo n that or any other
jur-or's min d or emo tions
as in-flu-en-cing
the juror to assent to or dissent

from the verdict or indictment or concerning the juror's mental processes in connection therewith. But a juror may testify about (1) whether extraneous prejudicial information was improperly brou ght to the jury's attention, (2) whether any outside influence was improperly brought to bear upon any juror, or (3) whether there was a mistake in entering the verdict onto the verdict form

. A juror's affidavit or evidence of any statement by the juror may not be received on a matter about which the juror would be precluded from testifying.

(1) Prohibited Testimony or Other Evidence.

During an inquiry into the validity of a verdict or indictment, a juror may not testify about any statement made or incident that occurred during the jury's deliberations; the effect of any-thin g on that jur-or's or an-other

jur-or's vote
; or any jur-or's men tal process es con-cerni ng
the verdict or indict-men
t.
The
cour t
may not re-ceiv e a jur-or's affi-davit or evid ence of a jur-
or's

statement on these matters.

(2) Exceptions. A juror may testify about whether:

(A) extraneous prejudicial information was improperly brought to the jury's attention;

(B) an outside influence was improperly brought to bear on any juror; or

(C) a mistake was made in entering the verdict on the verdict form.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 606 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
Supp. To CHAPTER 606 RULE 606

2-606 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 606.01

Supp. to § 606.01 Official Text

[Go To Main]

Rule 606(b) has been amended, effective December 1, 2006. The amendment limits the scope of the "clerical error" exception that is discussed in the Main Volume at § 606.02[5]. The Committee Note is set forth infra at § 606.04[1.1]. Following is the text of the amended Rule:

Rule 606. Competency of Juror as Witness

(a) At the trial. -- A member of the jury may not testify as a witness before that jury in the trial of the case in which the juror is sitting. If the juror is called so to testify, the opposing party shall be afforded an opportunity to object out of the presence of the jury.

(b) Inquiry into validity of verdict or indictment. -- Upon an inquiry into the validity of a verdict or indictment, a juror may not testify as to any matter or statement occurring during the course of the jury's deliberations or to the effect of anything upon that or any other juror's mind or emotions as influencing the juror to assent to or dissent from the verdict or indictment or concerning the juror's mental processes in connection therewithThe material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [,].The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [except that] But a juror may testify The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [on the question] about (1) whether extraneous prejudicial information was improperly brought to the jury's attention, (2) The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [or] whether any outside influence was improperly brought to bear upon any juror, or (3) whether there was a mistake in entering the verdict onto the verdict form. The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [Nor may a] A juror's affidavit or evidence of any statement by the juror The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [concerning] may not be received on a matter about which the juror would be precluded from testifying The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [be received for these purposes].

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
Supp. To CHAPTER 606 RULE 606

2-606 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 606.03

Supp. to § 606.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[2] Rule 606(b) -- Inquiry into Validity of Verdict or Indictment [Go To Main]

[b] Rule 606(b) -- Bias of Jurors

United States v. Decoud, 456 F.3d 996 (9th Cir. 2006) : After the verdict in a crack cocaine distribution case, the defendants moved for a new trial on the ground that a juror had been improperly dismissed during deliberations. Although the dismissal had been at the juror's request on religious grounds, she allegedly stated later that she had felt pressure from fellow jurors as the only African-American in a case involving black defendants. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the denial of a hearing on whether bias motivated the juror to request dismissal. It reasoned that its suggestion in United States v. Henley, 238 F.3d 1111 (9th Cir. 2001) (see Manual § 606.02[3] n.6), that evidence of racial prejudice might be exempt from Rule 606(b)'s restriction on post-trial evidence applied to racial bias against the defendant. Here, the most the defendants' affidavit presented was an allegation that the juror "implied" she felt racial pressure because she was a "hold-out." "While the dismissed juror and the appellants are African-American, this fact alone does not warrant piercing the secrecy and sanctity of jury deliberations or disrupting the finality of the process." One Judge dissented, arguing that until "an evidentiary hearing is held, ... the specter of racial prejudice hangs over the trial and undermines public confidence in the verdict."

[g] Rule 606(b) -- Errors in Verdicts

Craig Outdoor Advertising, Inc. v. Viacom Outdoor, Inc., 528 F.3d 1001 (8th Cir. 2008) : Small billboard companies alleged that the defendant, a billboard operator acting as leasing agent for railroads, had wrongfully appropriated for itself billboard sites for which the plaintiffs had applied. The jury returned verdicts for the plaintiffs, indicating on a special verdict form the identical damages for each of the three state-law claims asserted; the form did not indicate the total damages to be awarded to each plaintiff. The defendant filed a motion seeking formation of the judgment in the amount stated for one claim, arguing that because there was a single indivisible injury there should not be multiple recoveries. The plaintiffs responded with an argument, supported by juror affidavits, that the jurors were confused and intended that the damages amount noted for each separate theory of recovery should be totaled. Affirming rejection of the plaintiffs' argument, the Court held that the Judge did not err in refusing to consider the juror affidavits, as the plaintiffs' charges of mistake or ambiguity in the verdict form could not be characterized as simply a clerical error.

[i] Rule 606(b) -- Extraneous Prejudicial Information

[ii] Rule 606(b) -- Extraneous Prejudicial Information -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Stewart, 433 F.3d 273 (2d Cir. 2006) : In an obstruction of justice prosecution, evidence was admitted with an instruction that it was admissible only against the defendant and not against a codefendant. In post-verdict interviews with jurors, one indicated that they had used the evidence against both defendants. The codefendant argued that the evidence was extraneous as to him and prejudicial, so evidence from the juror should have been admitted in support of his new trial motion. Affirming, the Court held that the alleged impermissible influence was not the result of information the jurors learned through outside contacts or that entered the jury room through an external, prohibited route, so it could not be considered extraneous information.

Garcia v. Andrews, 488 F.3d 370 (6th Cir. 2007) : The petitioner in this habeas corpus proceeding alleged that his trial had been tainted because one juror was fearful of retaliation from the petitioner's family and had informed two other jurors of this subjective fear. Affirming denial of the writ, the Court found that Rule 606(b) barred proof of the allegations, since there was no evidence of "any outside influence on any of the jurors at any point during either the trial or jury deliberations."

United States v. Wintermute, 443 F.3d 993 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for making a false statement to the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in denying an evidentiary hearing when the defendant introduced postverdict affidavits from two jurors stating that another juror had asked during deliberations "what kind of message will be sent to the [defrauded] investors if we do not convict?" The statement was not extraneous, since it referred to investor losses that were subject to extensive evidence at trial.

United States v. Benally, 546 F.3d 1230 (10th Cir. 2008) : In the prosecution of a Native American for assaulting a Bureau of Indian Affairs officer, the Trial Judge granted a new trial after a juror provided an affidavit that the foreman and other jurors had made racist statements about Native Americans during the deliberations. Reversing, the Court held that the affidavit violated Rule 606(b) and did not come within the exceptions regarding extraneous prejudicial information or outside influences, as none of the statements were "specific extra-record facts relating to the defendant," but were only "generalized statements, ostensibly based on the jurors' personal experience."

[j] Rule 606(b) -- Habeas Corpus Proceedings

Helmig v. Kemna, 461 F.3d 960 (8th Cir. 2006) : A man convicted in state court for murder argued that his conviction should be vacated because the jurors requested, obtained, and consulted a highway map that was not admitted into evidence. Affirming dismissal of the habeas corpus petition, the Court noted that in order to be able to proffer testimony from the jurors, the petitioner had to prove that the evidence was both extraneous and prejudicial. Here, the petitioner failed to prove that the map was extraneous; he provided no evidence that the map was conveyed to the jury from an outside source, and he did not attempt to refute testimony that everything given to the jury had been approved by the Trial Judge.

[r] Rule 606(b) -- Jury Misconduct

Garcia v. Andrews, 488 F.3d 370 (6th Cir. 2007) : The petitioner in this habeas corpus proceeding alleged that his trial had been tainted because one juror was fearful of retaliation from the petitioner's family and had informed two other jurors of this subjective fear. Affirming denial of the writ, the Court found that Rule 606(b) barred proof of the allegations, since there was no evidence of "any outside influence on any of the jurors at any point during either the trial or jury deliberations."

United States v. Siegelman, 561 F.3d 1215 (11th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions in a public corruption case, finding no abuse of discretion in the denial of a new trial based upon purported e-mails exchanged between jurors during trial and deliberations which were mailed anonymously to the defense. The Court noted that "[t]he district court said that it had serious reservations about the authenticity of these purported e-mails, but concluded that the law barred it from questioning the jurors about their deliberations, or about the e-mails purporting to suggest that the jurors deliberated improperly." The Court agreed and added that the fact that the jury acquitted on many of the charges supported the conclusion that the jury carefully weighed the evidence and reached a reasoned verdict free of undue influence. This is an unusual case, since it does not simply involve a claim that jurors might have prematurely deliberated or that some jurors might have had conversations with other jurors that were not heard by all members of the jury. The idea that jurors would be e-mailing one another during the trial raises questions of whether the e-mails are a form of extrinsic evidence that jurors should not be considering. In the end, however, the Trial Judge examined the e-mails and simply concluded that a new trial was not warranted, not that the e-mails were not cause for concern.

[s] Rule 606(b) -- Mental Processes

[ii] Rule 606(b) -- Mental Processes -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Lloyd, 462 F.3d 510 (6th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a bank robbery conviction, the Court found no abuse of discretion in denial of a defense motion to question a juror who had told another attorney that "he did not vote his mind as a juror." There was no need to inquire whether this was the result of any extraneous influence or pressure, since the letter to the judge from the attorney clearly stated that the pressure under which the juror buckled was "pressure from the other jurors." In United States v. Kelley, 461 F.3d 817 (6th Cir. 2006) , defendants convicted of extortion argued that a juror engaged in misconduct when he spoke to the Detroit Free Press about whether the defendants should have testified on their own behalf. The Court held that because the juror did not learn of the defendants' failure to testify "through improper channels," the exceptions for extraneous prejudicial information and outside influence were inapplicable. Thus, the juror's thoughts about the trial were inadmissible.

United States v. Honken, 541 F.3d 1146 (8th Cir. 2008) : During the penalty phase of a capital murder case, allegations were made that the boss of one juror had made improper, prejudicial comments to her. The Judge questioned the juror and the parties agreed to remove her from further deliberations. Then, each of the jurors was asked what he or she had heard about the comments, following which the Judge denied a mistrial motion, giving the defense the option of proceeding with 11 jurors or replacing the removed juror with an alternate. Following a death penalty verdict by the jury with an alternate, the Judge held a post-trial evidentiary hearing to investigated the boss's purported comments further. In that hearing, the removed juror, when asked about the effect of her boss's comments, stated that she ignored them and they had no effect on her decision in the case. Affirming, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to ask those questions, as "Rule 606(b) prohibits a juror from testifying at a post-verdict hearing as to whether extraneous information or an outside influence affected that juror's ability to be impartial."

[w] Rule 606(b) -- Sentencing

United States v. Jackson, 549 F.3d 963 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed the conviction and death sentence of a federal prisoner charged with killing a fellow inmate, finding no error in the rejection of an affidavit from an investigator who interviewed the jurors. The affidavit concluded that some jurors believed that if the defendant was sentenced to life imprisonment, it was still possible that he could be released. This belief was contrary to the Trial Judge's specific instruction on the point. Under Rule 606(b) the affidavit could not be received, as the rule does not permit proof that the jury misunderstood the Judge's instructions.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
Supp. To CHAPTER 606 RULE 606

2-606 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 606.04

Supp. to § 606.04 Legislative History

[Go To Main]

[1.1] 2006 Amendment Committee Note [Go To Main]

Rule 606(b) has been amended to provide that juror testimony may be used to prove that the verdict reported was the result of a mistake in entering the verdict on the verdict form. The amendment responds to a divergence between the text of the Rule and the case law that has established an exception for proof of clerical errors. See, e.g., Plummer v. Springfield Term. Ry., 5 F.3d 1, 3 (1st Cir. 1993) ("A number of circuits hold, and we agree, that juror testimony regarding an alleged clerical error, such as announcing a verdict different than that agreed upon, does not challenge the validity of the verdict or the deliberation of mental processes, and therefore is not subject to Rule 606(b)."); Teevee Toons, Inc., v. MP3. Com, Inc., 148 F. Supp. 2d 276, 278 (S.D.N.Y. 2001) (noting that Rule 606(b) has been silent regarding inquiries designed to confirm the accuracy of a verdict).

In adopting the exception for proof of mistakes in entering the verdict on the verdict form, the amendment specifically rejects the broader exception, adopted by some courts, permitting the use of juror testimony to prove that the jurors were operating under a misunderstanding about the consequences of the result that they agreed upon. See, e.g., Attridge v. Cencorp Div. of Dover Techs. Int'l, Inc., 836 F.2d 113, 116 (2d Cir. 1987) ; Eastridge Development Co., v. Halpert Associates, Inc., 853 F.2d 772 (10th Cir. 1988) . The broader exception is rejected because an inquiry into whether the jury misunderstood or misapplied an instruction goes to the jurors' mental processes underlying the verdict, rather than the verdict's accuracy in capturing what the jurors had agreed upon. See, e.g., Karl v. Burlington Northern R.R., 880 F.2d 68, 74 (8th Cir. 1989) (error to receive juror testimony on whether verdict was the result of jurors' misunderstanding of instructions: "The jurors did not state that the figure written by the foreman was different from that which they agreed upon, but indicated that the figure the foreman wrote down was intended to be a net figure, not a gross figure. Receiving such statements violates Rule 606(b) because the testimony relates to how the jury interpreted the court's instructions, and concerns the jurors' 'mental processes,' which is forbidden by the rule."); Robles v. Exxon Corp., 862 F.2d 1201, 1208 (5th Cir. 1989) ("the alleged error here goes to the substance of what the jury was asked to decide, necessarily implicating the jury's mental processes insofar as it questions the jury's understanding of the court's instructions and application of those instructions to the facts of the case"). Thus, the exception established by the amendment is limited to cases such as "where the jury foreperson wrote down, in response to an interrogatory, a number different from that agreed upon by the jury, or mistakenly stated that the defendant was 'guilty' when the jury had actually agreed that the defendant was not guilty." Id.

It should be noted that the possibility of errors in the verdict form will be reduced substantially by polling the jury. Rule 606(b) does not, of course, prevent this precaution. See 8 C. Wigmore, Evidence, § 2350 at 691 (McNaughten ed. 1961) (noting that the reasons for the rule barring juror testimony, "namely, the dangers of uncertainty and of tampering with the jurors to procure testimony, disappear in large part if such investigation as may be desired is made by the judge and takes place before the jurors' discharge and separation") (emphasis in original). Errors that come to light after polling the jury "may be corrected on the spot, or the jury may be sent out to continue deliberations, or, if necessary, a new trial may be ordered." C. Mueller & L. Kirkpatrick, Evidence Under the Rules at 671 (2d ed. 1999) (citing Sincox v. United States, 571 F.2d 876, 878-79 (5th Cir. 1978)) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 607 RULE 607

2-607 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 607.syn

§ 607.syn Synopsis to Chapter 607: RULE 607

607.01 Official Text

607.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Departure From the Common Law

[2] Impeachment With Otherwise Inadmissible Evidence

[3] Impeachment of Favorable Witnesses

[4] Plea Agreements of Government Witnesses

[5] Other Limitations on Impeachment

[6] Traditional Forms of Impeachment Not Mentioned by the Rules

[7] Impeachment and Constitutional Law

607.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Bias

[a] Civil Cases

[b] Bias -- Criminal Defense Witnesses

[c] Bias -- Inconsistent Statements

[d] Bias -- Prosecution Witnesses

[i] Impeachment Denied

[ii] Bias -- Prosecution Witnesses -- Impeachment Permitted or Required

[iii] Bias -- Prosecution Witnesses -- Limiting Examination on Guilty Plea or Immunity

[e] Bias -- Racial Bias

[f] Bias -- Rehabilitation

[2] Bolstering the Witness

[a] Generally

[b] Bolstering the Witness -- Opening the Door

[c] Bolstering the Witness -- Vouching by Prosecutor

[3] Coaching

[4] Contradiction

[5] Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity

[a] Impeachment Use

[i] Instructions on Use

[ii] Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity -- Impeachment Use -- Other Proper Use

[iii] Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity -- Impeachment Use -- Proper Use on Direct Examination

[iv] Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity -- Impeachment Use -- Use Improper

[b] Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity -- Polygraph and Truthfulness Provisions

[c] Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity -- Potential Sentence

[6] Defense Witness' Guilty Plea

[7] Drug Use

[8] Group Membership

[9] Habit Evidence

[10] "Impeaching" an Accused Who Does Not Testify

[11] Impeachment, and Anticipating Impeachment, on Direct Examination

[a] Hearsay Evidence

[i] Offered by Accused

[ii] Impeachment, and Anticipating Impeachment, on Direct Examination -- Hearsay Evidence -- Offered by Prosecution

[iii] Impeachment, and Anticipating Impeachment, on Direct Examination -- Hearsay Evidence -- Offered in Civil Case

[b] Impeachment, and Anticipating Impeachment, on Direct Examination -- Miscellaneous Cases

[c] Impeachment, and Anticipating Impeachment, on Direct Examination -- Prejudicial Evidence

[d] Impeachment, and Anticipating Impeachment, on Direct Examination -- Prior Crimes or Bad Acts

[12] Impeachment of Inadmissible Testimony

[13] Limitations on Cross-Examination

[a] Contradiction

[b] Limitations on Cross-Examination -- Cumulative Questioning

[c] Limitations on Cross-Examination -- Impeachment for Bias

[d] Limitations on Cross-Examination -- Impeachment by Inconsistent Statement or Action

[e] Limitations on Cross-Examination -- Impeachment Generally

[f] Limitations on Cross-Examination -- Jury Confusion

[14] Mental Condition

[15] Not-Guilty Plea

[16] Opening the Door

[17] Prior Consistent Statements

[18] Redirect Examination

[19] Reference to Prior Trial

[20] Silence or Invocation of Privilege

[21] Summary Judgments and Directed Verdicts

[22] Threats to Witnesses -- Admissible To Explain Changed Testimony

607.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] 1987 Amendment Advisory Committee Note

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 607 RULE 607

2-607 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 607.01

607.01 Official Text

Rule 607. Who May Impeach

The credibility of a witness may be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness.

52 of 156 DOCUMENTS

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 607 RULE 607

2-607 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 607.02

607.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Departure From the Common Law

At common law, a party calling a witness ordinarily could not attack the credibility of that witness. The common-law rule, commonly referred to as the "voucher rule," is abandoned in the Federal Rules. Rule 607 specifically provides that any party, including the party who calls the witness, may attack the credibility of any witness. The rationale for the common-law rule was never very persuasive. It rested on assumptions concerning a party's presumptive support of a witness called by that party, and the need to protect the witness from harassment. The Federal Rule recognizes the practical reality that a party does not necessarily vouch for a witness; in fact, a party may have no choice but to call an adverse witness in order to prove a case. Even at common law, if the Trial Judge were willing to call a witness, both parties traditionally were given the right to cross-examine and to impeach that witness. And when a witness was viewed as hostile, or counsel made an effective claim of surprise following damaging testimony by a witness, counsel was given the right to impeach the witness. All of these considerations led the Advisory Committee and Congress to conclude that there was no sound reason for denying either side the right to impeach.

[2] Impeachment With Otherwise Inadmissible Evidence

By its terms, Rule 607 would appear to permit some abusive practices, such as in the following hypothetical: A prosecutor calls a witness who has made a previous statement implicating the defendant in a crime; that statement would be excluded as hearsay if offered for its truth; the prosecutor knows that the witness has repudiated the statement and if called will testify in favor of the defendant; nonetheless, the prosecutor calls the witness for the ostensible purpose of "impeaching" him with the prior inconsistent statement. The reason that this practice appears abusive is that there is no legitimate forensic purpose in calling a witness solely to impeach him. If impeachment were the real purpose, the witness would never be called, since the most that could be accomplished is a net result of zero. As one Court put it: "The maximum legitimate effect of the impeaching testimony can never be more than the cancellation of the adverse answer." n1 Thus, the prosecutor in the above example must have had some other purpose for calling a witness who has made a prior inconsistent statement, and that purpose is obvious: the prosecutor is trying to bring before the jury, in the guise of "impeachment," hearsay evidence that the jury could not otherwise consider. Obviously such a practice should be prohibited. As Judge Posner put it, it would be an abuse of Rule 607 for a party "to call a witness that it knew would not give it useful evidence, just so it could introduce hearsay evidence ... in the hope that the jury would miss the subtle distinction between impeachment and substantive evidence -- or, if it didn't miss it, would ignore it." n2

Accordingly, despite the permissive language of Rule 607, the Courts have held that a party may not call a witness solely to impeach him with otherwise inadmissible evidence. n3 This limitation on the flexibility provided by Rule 607 has most often been applied against prosecutors who call adverse witnesses, but it has also been applied against criminal defendants and civil litigants. n4

The above-stated limitation, however, applies only when the party calls the witness for the impermissible purpose of impeaching that witness with evidence not otherwise admissible. If instead the party calls the witness for a good faith purpose, then the limitation will not apply. n5 For example, if a witness is called with the expectation that he will testify favorably, and the party is then surprised by negative testimony, the party is permitted to recoup its losses by impeaching the witness. n6 Thus, the common-law doctrine of "surprise" has been revived in cases where a party calls a witness and then seeks to impeach him with otherwise inadmissible evidence. n7 Of course, the claim of surprise must be credible to permit impeachment with otherwise inadmissible evidence; it can't be a mere hope that the witness will have "seen the light" and change his stated course when he takes the stand. The Trial Judge should require counsel who seeks to offer an inconsistent statement as impeachment of a witness on direct examination to make a proffer to justify a claim of surprise, and should permit opposing counsel to voir dire the witness outside the presence of the jury to obtain assurance that the witness had not alerted the calling party that the testimony would be inconsistent with a previous hearsay statement.

A party also would be in good faith in impeaching a witness with otherwise inadmissible evidence if it "called an adverse witness that it thought would give evidence both helpful and harmful to it, but it also thought that the harmful aspect could be nullified by introducing the witness' prior inconsistent statement." n8 If a witness is needed to corroborate parts of a case, the party should be allowed to impeach that witness where some aspects of the testimony are adverse to the party's case; the party should not be put to the poor choice of either forgoing the corroborating witness or forgoing the impeachment. n9 For similar reasons, a party must be allowed to call a witness, even when anticipating the need for impeachment with inadmissible evidence, when the failure to call the witness might lead the jury to draw a negative inference against the party. n10 The need to avoid such a negative inference is certainly a good-faith reason to call the witness.

Finally, the limitation on Rule 607 applies only if the impeachment evidence is not otherwise admissible. So for example, if a witness has made a prior statement under oath at a trial or hearing, the witness may be called and the statement may be introduced even if counsel knows that the witness will repudiate the statement and testify adversely. This is because such a prior inconsistent statement is admissible for its truth under Rule 801(d)(1)(A), and therefore the witness is not being called solely to be impeached with otherwise inadmissible evidence. n11 There is no abuse of the hearsay rule in these circumstances.

[3] Impeachment of Favorable Witnesses

There will be some situations in which a witness gives testimony favorable to a party and the party knows that impeachment evidence would be less damaging if it were brought out as part of the party's case, rather than by the adversary. Impeachment on direct examination may take the wind out of the sails of the expected impeachment by the adversary. A party's impeachment of its own witnesses under these circumstances is permitted by Rule 607. n12 The Court-imposed limitation on Rule 607, discussed above, is not applicable in these circumstances, because the party is not calling a witness solely for impeachment. Rather, the witness is called to give favorable testimony and the party makes a judgment that the inevitable impeachment is less damaging when it occurs on direct examination. The evil to be guarded against is a party's attempting to impeach a wholly unfavorable witness with evidence that is not otherwise admissible.

Nonetheless, there is a legitimate question whether a party should be able to impeach a favorable witness if the adversary would probably not choose to attack the witness on the point. For example, in United States v. Frappier, 807 F.2d 257 (1st Cir. 1986) , Frappier was on trial for murdering her husband. The prosecution called Frappier's daughter, who implicated her mother in the crime. For the ostensible purpose of defusing impeachment for bias, the prosecution brought out the fact that Frappier had slept with her daughter's husband. Frappier argued that this impeachment was impermissible because there was no basis for the prosecution to conclude that she would ever impeach her daughter with information that put Frappier herself in such a negative light; in fact, at trial, Frappier had stated that she would not use this information to impeach her daughter's credibility.

The Court in Frappier was not unsympathetic to the defendant's argument. It found it a close question whether the Trial Judge should have allowed the government to impeach its witness with an arguably prejudicial fact that appellant had explicitly stated she would not use in challenging the witness' credibility, arguably eliminating the possibility of any potential sting from disclosure of that information on cross-examination. Nevertheless, the Court found no abuse of discretion because the "appellant may have sought to challenge her daughter's credibility in other ways."

We do not see how it would have made any difference if Frappier were to attack her daughter's credibility "in other ways." That would not make the impeachment at issue in Frappier any more probative. For example, if the defendant were to impeach her daughter with prior convictions or inconsistent statements, the prosecution would not be taking the sting out of that expected impeachment by introducing evidence of bias. Rather, the prosecution would simply be adding fuel to the fire.

On the other hand, the prosecution may be concerned that without the evidence of bias, the jury may look draw some unfair inferences against the witness. Even without impeachment from the defendant, Frappier's daughter looks disloyal in "ratting out" her mother. The jury in such a case may speculate on improper motives that the daughter may have had. This speculation does not go away simply because the defendant fails to bring out the bias evidence on cross-examination. Alternatively, the jury may simply tune out the witness who voluntarily testifies against a parent; this risk arises even if the defendant agrees not to bring out the bias evidence. In other words, the prosecution may have a legitimate reason to impeach its own witness even when an attack from the adversary is unlikely. So while the Court's reasoning in Frappier (that the defendant may have attacked the daughter on other grounds) is unpersuasive, the result seems correct. n13

[4] Plea Agreements of Government Witnesses

A special subset of the problem of impeachment of favorable witnesses arises when the government in a criminal case offers evidence of the plea agreements entered into by witnesses testifying on its behalf. Undoubtedly, there are permissible purposes for such evidence, e.g., to anticipate defense impeachment and show the trier of fact that nothing is hidden on direct examination. n14 But there also is a danger in any jury trial when plea agreements are introduced by the prosecution.

Three concerns are raised when the government introduces a plea agreement on direct examination of a cooperating witness. The first, and probably least serious, is that the government is engaged in "bolstering" the credibility of its witness. The general rule is that it is unnecessary to provide information to support a witness' credibility until such time as that credibility has been attacked. If parties were permitted to bolster their witnesses, a lot of court time would be spent in introducing information that might ultimately be unnecessary. If the witness' credibility is never attacked, there is no reason to provide this supporting evidence, since the shared presumption is that witnesses are presumed credible unless there is reason to think otherwise. n15 Moreover, a good deal of otherwise inadmissible information might be introduced in the guise of supporting credibility, such as prior statements of the witness that would otherwise be hearsay. Admitting this evidence for "credibility" purposes seems a substantial cost that ought to be avoided at least until the opponent attacks that credibility. n16

The second concern with admitting plea agreements is that the government may somehow "vouch" for the credibility of the cooperating witness. It is the jury's job to assess the witness' credibility on the basis of the testimony and evidence presented. It would therefore be improper for the government to assert that it knew the witness was telling the truth, possibly on the basis of extrinsic information not admitted at trial. As applied to plea agreements, the vouching problem could arise when there is something in the agreement indicating the government's belief that the witness is telling the truth. An example is a clause in the agreement stating that the government had independently verified the truth of the witness' account. Alternatively, there might be a clause in the agreement that the government could emphasize at trial as demonstrable evidence that the witness had to be telling the truth. An example is a clause providing that the witness has agreed to submit to a polygraph examination as part of the deal.

The third and most substantial concern with introducing plea agreements of cooperating witnesses is that the jury will misuse the agreement as evidence of the defendant's guilt. At least this is so where the witness pleads guilty to committing a crime that is tied in some way to the defendant. The classic case is where the defendant is charged with conspiracy and the witness has pleaded guilty to the same conspiracy. As the Third Circuit stated in United States v. Toner, 173 F.2d 140 (3d Cir. 1949) :

> From the common sense point of view a plea of guilty by an alleged fellow conspirator is highly relevant upon the question of the guilt of another alleged conspirator. If A's admission that he conspired with B is believed, it is pretty hard to avoid the conclusion that B must have conspired with A. This is one of the cases, therefore, where evidence logically probative is to be excluded because of some countervailing policy. ... The foundation of the countervailing policy is the right of every defendant to stand or fall with the proof of the charge made against him, not against somebody else. Acquittal of an alleged fellow conspirator is not evidence for a man being tried for conspiracy. So, likewise, conviction of an alleged fellow conspirator after a trial is not admissible as against one now being charged. The defendant had a right to have his guilt or innocence determined by the evidence presented against him, not by what has happened with regard to a criminal prosecution against someone else.

The Courts have generally downplayed the three concerns set forth above, to the point where plea agreements are almost always admissible, in full, on direct examination. The three dangers from admitting plea agreements on direct examination are generally treated as follows:

1. The concern over bolstering. Courts have answered that the government has the right to anticipate that defense counsel will bring up the plea agreement in an attempt to show that the cooperating witness has a motive to falsify. The Courts conclude that the agreement therefore can be brought out on direct examination to "remove the sting" from the anticipated impeachment and to prevent the jury from thinking that the government was hiding negative evidence. n17

2. The concern over vouching. Courts have held that the government does not vouch for its witnesses simply by introducing their plea agreements. Rather, vouching is a concern only in those unusual cases in which the agreement includes implicit or explicit government assertions of veracity, e.g., that the witness has told the truth or that the witness has agreed to take a polygraph examination. n18

3. The concern over misuse of the plea agreement as evidence of the defendant's guilt. The Courts have generally held that plea agreements are admissible under Rule 403 despite their prejudicial effect. They reason that the prejudicial effect of the plea agreement can be diminished somewhat by an instruction to the jury directing it to use the evidence only on the question of the credibility of the cooperating witness. Courts usually find that this prejudicial impact, as diminished by the instruction, does not substantially outweigh the probative value of the plea agreement for such purposes of assessing the witness' credibility. n19

Some have argued that it is inappropriate to admit a plea agreement on direct examination. It seems to us, however, that if the defendant is going to introduce the agreement on cross-examination in an attempt to show the witness is lying in order to get a deal, it is only fair to permit the government to bring out the agreement on direct. The government should be able to blunt the impact of an anticipated attack; otherwise the impeachment evidence will look much more important than it really is. n20 More importantly, if the government cannot refer to the plea agreement on direct, it will suffer a negative consequence when the agreement is raised on cross-examination. The jury may think that the government was trying to hide the fact that a deal was made with the witness. This would be an unfair inference if the agreement was barred from direct by an evidence rule rather than by the government's own decision. Moreover, under Rule 607, the prosecution has the right to impeach a witness it calls. To the extent a plea agreement impeaches a witness for bias, the prosecution would much rather conduct that impeachment in a relatively gentle manner on direct examination.

Does the admissibility question change, however, if the defendant promises not to refer to the agreement on cross-examination or elsewhere in the trial? It seems that there is no need to remove the sting of anticipated impeachment if the defendant promises that the impeachment will not occur. But most Courts have not seen it that way. n21 The Third Circuit's en banc opinion in United States v. Universal Rehabilitation Services (PA), Inc., 205 F.3d 657 (3d Cir. 2000) , discussed in detail in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 403, § 403.02[8], held that a plea agreement was admissible on direct despite the defendants' concession that they would not raise any issue pertinent to the agreement on cross-examination. The Court was clearly concerned that the defendants "concession" would be hard to administer. It would raise issues such as: (1) whether the defendants "raise" the plea agreement by generally questioning the veracity of the cooperating witness, or by asking whether the witness has conferred with the government; (2) the effect if the defendants do raise the plea agreement on cross-examination after the prosecution has been precluded from raising it on direct; and (3) the effect if the defendants raise the agreement for the first time in closing argument.

But beyond these practical concerns, the Universal Court was convinced that a plea agreement remains probative on the cooperating witness' credibility even if the defendant never impeaches the witness. Specifically, the plea agreement remains probative (1) to prevent the jury from speculating that the defendant is a victim of selective prosecution; and (2) to explain how the witness has first-hand knowledge concerning the subject of the testimony. n22 The Court found no abuse of discretion in the Trial Court's Rule 403 ruling admitting the agreements on direct; the plea agreements retained probative value despite the defendants' concession, and the risk of prejudice to the defendants did not substantially outweigh this probative value. The Court noted that the risk of prejudice was diminished by the fact that the jury was instructed a number of times not to use the plea agreements as substantive evidence of the defendants' guilt.

It does not follow, however, that the decision in Universal means that plea agreements of cooperating witnesses will be automatically admitted in all trials, no matter what the defendant does. The Court in Universal did not hold that Trial Courts must admit these agreements. It simply held that the Trial Court did not abuse its wide discretion in admitting the plea agreements. We hope that Trial Courts will use their discretion to exclude plea agreements from jury consideration when the defendants make a solid, clear commitment that they will not raise (1) the plea or plea agreement, (2) any attack on the witness' motive to falsify that might arise from an interest in cooperation or cutting a deal, or (3) any inference that the defendant was selectively prosecuted. If the Trial Court does the right thing and excludes the plea agreement when such a promise is made, it should instruct the jurors upon request that they should concern themselves only with the guilt or innocence of the defendant and not with the possibility of selective prosecution or the involvement of the witnesses in the crimes charged. In this way, the prosecution's need to admit the plea agreement to counteract jury speculation will be minimized.

It should be noted that impeachment on cross-examination is not the only way to attack the credibility of a witness. If the defendant in any way attacks a prosecution witness as having a motive to falsify -- for example, by impugning the motive of the witness in opening argument -- then the prosecution should, in fairness, be able to introduce aspects of the plea agreement that are responsive to the attack. n23 In these circumstances, the prosecution is not trying to remove the sting of anticipated impeachment which may never happen; rather, it is trying to rehabilitate a witness who has already been attacked. As one Court put it: "A defendant will not be heard to complain of its admission when he instigates such admission, or attempts to exploit the evidence by frequent, pointed, and direct references to the coconspirator's guilty plea." n24

Finally, it must be remembered that even if the plea agreement is admissible as probative of a cooperating witness' credibility, the defendant is entitled upon request to a strong limiting instruction that the agreement is not to be used as substantive evidence of the defendant's guilt. n25

[5] Other Limitations on Impeachment

Although Rule 607 has liberalized impeachment by generally permitting all parties to impeach all witnesses, it does not require that a Trial Judge admit all impeaching evidence offered in a case. Other Rules -- particularly Rules 403 and 611(a) -- provide authority for the Trial Judge to limit impeachment that is unduly harassing or that is repetitive, unhelpful, or prejudicial to one of the parties. The cases annotated in § 607.03 indicate that the Courts of Appeals have no hesitancy in affirming Trial Judges who limit impeachment evidence to protect a witness from unfair questioning or to speed up a trial. There may be some reason for concern, however, about a judicial tendency to view any evidence that duplicates previously admitted evidence as unhelpful. One powerful way of increasing the probative value of evidence is to corroborate it. By definition, much corroborative evidence is cumulative; often witnesses testify to exactly what other witnesses have said.

It is doubtful that any hard and fast rule can govern impeachment rulings. Counsel must be careful when impeachment evidence is excluded to make offers of proof that demonstrate not only the substance of the excluded evidence, but also why the evidence is offered. If corroboration is the purpose, it should be stated explicitly. Moreover, counsel may persuade the Trial Judge to admit additional impeachment evidence by explaining the importance of a witness in the case and the need for impeachment. In criminal cases confrontation claims may be strengthened with careful offers of proof.

It must be remembered that the hearsay rules are often inapplicable to a party's attempt to impeach a witness. This is because impeachment evidence is usually not offered for its truth, but rather for its bearing upon the witness' credibility. n26

[6] Traditional Forms of Impeachment Not Mentioned by the Rules

Under Rule 402, all relevant evidence is admissible. One type of relevant evidence is impeachment evidence. Although the Federal Rules of Evidence contain a number of Rules that dictate how witnesses may be impeached and restrict certain forms of impeachment (specifically evidence of the witness' character for veracity and prior inconsistent statements), there is no serious attempt in the Rules to specifically treat all traditional methods of impeaching a witness. However, any impeachment not barred by the Constitution, statutes, or other Rules that is relevant to the credibility of a witness is admissible under Rule 402. The Supreme Court recognized this in United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45 (1984) . In that case, the Trial Judge permitted a defense witness to be questioned by the government concerning his membership in the same secret prison gang to which a defendant also belonged, and concerning the tenets of the gang. The Court observed that bias evidence is not specifically covered by the Federal Rules of Evidence, even though it is a well-known form of impeachment. But because bias evidence is relevant to credibility, the Court reasoned that it certainly is admissible under Rule 402, subject to the balance of probative value and prejudicial effect set forth in Rule 403. n27 Other traditional forms of impeachment recognized by Courts, though not mentioned in any of the Federal Rules, include inability to recall or relate, n28 emotional or psychiatric impairment, n29 and contradiction. n30 Of course, all these forms of impeachment are subject to the balance of probative value and prejudicial effect, confusion, and delay set forth in Rule 403. n31 Cases applying Rule 403 to impeachment evidence -- especially the determination of whether an effort to impeach goes to a collateral matter -- are set forth in the Annotations to Rule 403, § 403.03.

[7] Impeachment and Constitutional Law

It can be important in criminal cases to determine whether impeachment is barred by a constitutional rule.

One important decision of the Supreme Court on the subject of impeachment is Jenkins v. Anderson, 447 U.S. 231 (1980) . Before Jenkins, the Court had held in Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976) , that it is fundamentally unfair to use a defendant's silence after Miranda warnings as impeachment evidence when the defendant takes the stand at trial. n32 But Jenkins holds that it violates neither due process nor self-incrimination concepts to use silence before arrest as impeachment evidence once a defendant takes the stand to testify. The rule is different concerning pre-arrest silence because, at the time of the silence, the government had made no promises, as it had in Doyle by way of Miranda warnings. As long as the evidence of pre-arrest silence is relevant it may be used without violating the Constitution. After Jenkins, the Court decided Fletcher v. Weir, 455 U.S. 603 (1982) , holding that silence after arrest but before Miranda warnings also may be used as impeachment evidence.

These decisions raise the question whether silence before grand juries or other tribunals can be subsequently used for impeachment. Despite Jenkins and Fletcher, Courts have thus far refused to allow a person's silence at a grand jury to be used for impeachment when the person testifies at trial. Undoubtedly this is because the witnesses are ordinarily informed about the right to silence when they are called before the grand jury. Even if the warning does not come from the government, so that Doyle is inapplicable, being silent after being made aware that anything you say can be used against you is not very probative. Whatever probative value exists is substantially outweighed by the risk that the jury will use the silence not for impeachment purposes but as an admission of guilt. n33

Absent some warnings about the right to remain silent, Jenkins and Fletcher appear to say that the Constitution does not prohibit the use of prior silence as impeachment evidence. But it will be important for Courts to focus on whether the choice to remain silent is relevant to impeachment, and whether the probative value is substantially outweighed by the risk of jury confusion. That is, even if silence is constitutionally admissible, it may be subject to exclusion under Rule 403. n34

Another situation in which constitutional law bears on impeachment arises when the accused seeks to impeach a witness and the Trial Judge precludes the attack. The usual grounds for preclusion are that the attack is cumulative, a waste of time, without foundation, or simply not very probative of the witness' credibility. Constitutional issues arise here because the accused has a constitutional right to an effective defense. This right is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 412, § 412.02[3], which presents an analogous situation of the accused being precluded from attacking a witness and claiming that precluding the attack violates the defendant's right to an effective defense. As discussed under Rule 412, the Courts engage in a balancing process, considering the importance of the witness, the strength of the impeachment evidence, whether the witness has been impeached on other grounds, and the costs of admitting the impeachment evidence in terms of waste of time, prejudice, and confusion of the jury. In essence, the Court uses the same balancing approach as is employed under Rule 403. Constitutional error has been found when the defendant is precluded from impeaching a critical witness with evidence that would have been highly effective in attacking the witness' credibility. n35 No error will be found if the impeachment is cumulative, concerns remote matters, is without foundation, or would confuse the jury. n36

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Crouch, 731 F.2d 621, 623 (9th Cir. 1984) .

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Webster, 734 F.2d 1191, 1192 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., United States v. Ince, 21 F.3d 576 (4th Cir. 1994) (conviction was reversed because the government's "only apparent purpose for impeaching one of its own witnesses was to circumvent the hearsay rule and to expose the jury to otherwise inadmissible evidence"); United States v. Hogan, 763 F.2d 697 (5th Cir. 1985) ("Because the government called a witness for the primary purpose of impeaching him with otherwise inadmissible hearsay evidence, we reverse."); United States v. Crouch, 731 F.2d 621, 623 (9th Cir. 1984) ("a party is not permitted to get before the jury, under the guise of impeachment, an ex parte statement of a witness, by calling him to the stand when there is good reason to believe he will decline to testify as desired").

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Sebetich, 776 F.2d 412 (3d Cir. 1985) (criminal defendant cannot call a witness "for the purposes of circumventing the hearsay rule by means of Rule 607"); Whitehurst v. Wright, 592 F.2d 834 (5th Cir. 1979) (plaintiff could not call a witness to the stand for the purpose of bringing out an inconsistent statement, when that statement was inadmissible for substantive purposes).

(n5)Footnote 5. See United States v. Kane, 944 F.2d 1406, 1411 (7th Cir. 1991) ("The test is whether the prosecution exhibited bad faith by calling a witness sure to be unhelpful to its case.").

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., United States v. Peterman, 841 F.2d 1474 (10th Cir. 1988) (impeachment was permissible after the prosecutor previously interviewed the witness and determined that the witness was going to give testimony favorable to the government's case; the prosecutor had not received any subsequent information that the witness had changed his mind).

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., United States v. Crouch, 731 F.2d 621 (9th Cir. 1984) (prosecutor was not surprised by adverse testimony because the witness had already given testimony exculpatory to the defendant on voir dire; therefore it was impermissible for the prosecution to call the witness and impeach him with otherwise inadmissible evidence); United States v. Kane, 944 F.2d 1406 (7th Cir. 1991) (the prosecution had not improperly called the defendant's wife merely to introduce inconsistent hearsay statements; the prosecution had a sincere reason to call her because she had firsthand knowledge of the scheme charged, and there was no reason to believe she would be hostile or would supply an opportunity for impeachment).

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Webster, 734 F.2d 1191, 1193 (7th Cir. 1984) . See also United States v. DeLillo, 620 F.2d 939 (2d Cir. 1980) (the Court upheld the government's impeachment of the unfavorable portions of its own witness' testimony where the overall testimony was favorable to the government in many respects).

(n9)Footnote 9. United States v. Eisen, 974 F.2d 246 (2d Cir. 1992) (where the government has called a witness whose corroborating testimony is instrumental in constructing its case, it has a right to question the witness, and to attempt to impeach him, about those aspects of his testimony that conflict with the government's account of the same events; the prejudicial effect of the impeachment in this case did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the favorable portions of the testimony).

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., United States v. Gilbert, 57 F.3d 709 (9th Cir. 1995) (the government acted properly in calling two eyewitnesses and impeaching them with prior statements, not independently admissible, concerning the defendant's possession of a gun; if the government had not called these two witnesses, "the jury would have been left to ponder why the government was reluctant to question these eye-witnesses").

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Medley, 913 F.2d 1248 (7th Cir. 1990) (no error in permitting the government to impeach a witness when his testimony was inconsistent with his grand jury testimony; because the prior statement was under oath and thus admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(A), the witness was not called to introduce otherwise inadmissible hearsay).

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., United States v. Rivera-Medina, 845 F.2d 12 (1st Cir. 1988) (upholding the government's effort to elicit from its witnesses testimony that they committed 100 crimes in order to anticipate a defense attack and to reduce its impact); United States v. Marroquin, 885 F.2d 1240 (5th Cir. 1989) (government witness was properly permitted to testify concerning other frauds he had perpetrated, since he could have been cross-examined about them and the government is permitted to "blunt the sword" by revealing the information first).

(n13)Footnote 13. The result in Frappier seems especially correct in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Old

Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172 (1997) , where the Court declared that the prosecution should be permitted to proffer evidence on a point in order to guard against jury speculation in the absence of evidence, even if the defendant offers to concede the point. See the extensive discussion of Old Chief in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 403, §§ 403.02[7]-[11].

(n14)Footnote 14. See, e.g., United States v. Darden, 70 F.3d 1507 (8th Cir. 1995) (Trial Judge properly permitted the government, on direct examination, to elicit from a witness the fact that the witness had made a deal with the government to receive a life sentence for certain crimes, and thus avoided exposure to the death penalty: "disclosure of a guilty plea in order to blunt attacks on a witness' credibility during cross-examination is permissible and serves a legitimate purpose"); United States v. Gambino, 926 F.2d 1355 (3d Cir. 1991) (the government could properly elicit guilty pleas of testifying accomplices on direct examination to dampen subsequent attacks on credibility and to foreclose any suggestion that the party producing the witness was concealing evidence, so long as the jury was instructed on the limited purposes of a coconspirator's guilty plea); United States v. Countryman, 758 F.2d 574 (5th Cir. 1985) (it was permissible for the government to elicit on direct examination an alleged coconspirator's testimony concerning his guilty plea in order to blunt the impact of expected cross-examination, but the prosecutor may not attempt to use the plea as affirmative evidence of the defendant's guilt).

(n15)Footnote 15. See 1 McCormick on Evidence (5th ed. 1999) at 123: "[A]s a general proposition, bolstering evidence is inadmissible. As of the direct examination, it is uncertain whether the cross-examiner will attack the witness' credibility; the counsel might waive cross-examination or cross-examine solely for the purpose of eliciting new facts on the merits which support the counsel's theory of the case. If the opposing counsel does so, all the time devoted to the bolstering evidence on direct examination will have been wasted. For that reason, the witness's proponent must ordinarily hold information favorable to the witness's credibility in reserve for rehabilitation."

(n16)Footnote 16. This is why a prior consistent statement of a witness is not admissible to support credibility unless the witness' credibility has been attacked and the statement is probative in rebuttal. See generally Tome v. United States, 513 U.S. 150 (1995) , discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 801(d)(1)(B), § 801.02[4][c].

(n17)Footnote 17. See, e.g., United States v. Universal Rehabilitation Services, 205 F.3d 657 (3d Cir. 2000) (plea agreements may be introduced to remove the sting of anticipated impeachment for bias).

(n18)Footnote 18. See, e.g., United States v. Thornton, 197 F.3d 241 (7th Cir. 1999) (the government should avoid "unnecessary references to truthfulness" in the agreement); United States v. Binker, 795 F.2d 1218 (5th Cir. 1986) (clause in agreement attesting to government's independent verification was improperly admitted because it amounted to government vouching for the credibility of the witness); United States v. Brown, 720 F.2d 1059 (9th Cir. 1983) (prosecutor improperly referred to the fact that as part of plea bargain agreements several government witnesses agreed to submit to polygraph tests); United States v. Hilton, 772 F.2d 783 (11th Cir. 1985) (it was error to permit the government to introduce plea bargain documents containing references to polygraph examinations and to argue that its witnesses were credible because they agreed to take such examinations). Clauses in the agreement under which the witness agrees to testify truthfully are, by contrast, admissible, so long as the prosecutor does not improperly rely on such a clause to specifically argue that the witness must have been telling the truth. Truthtelling clauses are considered to add nothing to the witness' already-existing obligation to tell the truth. See, e.g., United States v. Tocco, 200 F.3d 401 (6th Cir. 2000) (no abuse of discretion in the admission of a cooperating witness' plea agreement that contained a promise to provide truthful information; introduction of the entire agreement permitted the jury to consider fully the witness' possible conflicting motivations, and the prosecutor did not improperly rely on the truthfulness provision in closing argument to vouch for the witness); United States v. Trujillo, 376 F.3d 593 (6th Cir. 2004) (no improper vouching by eliciting testimony that cooperating witnesses were required to testify truthfully under their plea agreements; "the prosecutor did not offer any personal observations or opinions as to the veracity" of the witnesses, "nor did she place the prestige of the Government behind their credibility.").

(n19)Footnote 19. See, e.g., United States v. Plumley, 207 F.3d 1086 (8th Cir. 2000) ("We have held that a prosecutor may inquire into the terms of a cooperating witness's plea agreement so long as this information is not used as evidence of the defendant's guilt and the jury understands its duty to judge witness credibility independently"); United States v. Romer, 148 F.3d 359, 1998-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72197 (4th Cir. 1998) (plea agreement properly admitted where no attempt was made to argue improper inferences about the defendant's guilt).

(n20)Footnote 20. The rule that a party may "remove the sting" of anticipated cross-examination and impeachment is not solely for the benefit of prosecutors. Defense counsel often find it advisable to refer in direct examination to the prior convictions of their witnesses. See generally Wilson v. Williams, 182 F.3d 562 (7th Cir. 1999) (en banc) (defendant permitted to bring out his prior convictions on direct examination, in order to remove the sting of anticipated impeachment).

(n21)Footnote 21. See, e.g., United States v. McNeill, 728 F.2d 5 (1st Cir. 1984) (the government properly elicited from two of its witnesses the fact that they had been immunized and compelled to testify, even though the defendant indicated that he would not ask about immunity on cross-examination: "The fact of immunity and compulsion orders aids the jury function regardless of whether defendant intended to attack the credibility of the witnesses.").

(n22)Footnote 22. The Court in United States v. Montani, 204 F.3d 761 (7th Cir. 2000) , found another ground of probative value for a plea agreement even after a defendant's concession not to raise it: the agreement provides an answer to possible juror speculation as to why the witness would take the stand and admit to criminal activity: "The jury could not help but wonder why Israel was testifying for the government and whether he had been charged in the crime. His credibility was impeached by his own testimony. No case in this Circuit holds that the government must wait for the defense to impeach a witness with evidence of a guilty plea before the government may answer with its own evidence of that plea."

See also United States v. Alex Janows & Co., 2 F.3d 716, 1993-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P70323 (7th Cir. 1993) (guilty plea was admissible for credibility purposes even in the absence of an attack from the adversary, because the jury may question why a coconspirator would give such obviously self-damaging testimony; however, the prosecution may have "overplayed the card" by eliciting the details of the transactions to which the codefendants pleaded guilty; but there was no objection at trial, and this practice did not rise to the level of plain error).

(n23)Footnote 23. See, e.g., United States v. Knowles, 66 F.3d 1146 (11th Cir. 1995) (the government properly entered its witnesses' plea agreements into evidence on direct examination, since the defendants had attacked the credibility of these witnesses in their opening statements); United States v. Cosentino, 844 F.2d 30 (2d Cir. 1988) (plea agreement may be introduced on direct when the defendant's opening statement challenges the credibility of the witness); United States v. Sanders, 893 F.2d 133 (7th Cir. 1990) (there was no abuse of discretion in admitting former codefendants' guilty pleas during the government's case-in-chief, as the defense trial strategy implying that the defendant was singled out and the former codefendant-witness went unpunished made admission of the plea evidence inevitable, and the jury was properly instructed not to consider the pleas as substantive evidence against the defendant).

(n24)Footnote 24. United States v. Samak, 7 F.3d 1196 (5th Cir. 1993) .

(n25)Footnote 25. See, e.g., Government of the Virgin Islands v. Mujahid, 990 F.2d 111 (3d Cir. 1993) (if a coconspirator's guilty plea is offered for credibility purposes, the Trial Judge must give a limiting instruction that the plea is completely inadmissible in assessing the defendant's guilt; in this case, the Judge's instruction warned the jury that it should not give undue weight to an accomplice who has pleaded guilty; this instruction was insufficient, because it made no reference to the fact that the jury could not in any way use the guilty plea as proof of the defendant's guilt; however, the defendant did not object to the instruction at trial, and the error did not rise to the level of plain error); United States v. Ramirez, 973 F.2d 102 (2d Cir. 1992) (reversible error to refuse to instruct the jury that it should not consider a testifying codefendant's guilty plea as evidence of the defendant's guilt).

(n26)Footnote 26. See, e.g., United States v. Royal, 972 F.2d 643 (5th Cir. 1992) (evidence that a defense witness' mother tried to convince him to say that guns and drugs in the defendant's house belonged to the witness and not the defendant was admissible over a hearsay objection as relevant to the witness' bias).

(n27)Footnote 27. See also Douglas v. Owens, 50 F.3d 1226 (3d Cir. 1995) (reversing a judgment for a prison inmate who alleged that he was beaten by guards after a prison riot; the defendants were improperly restricted from cross-examining a witness as to bias; the witness, who had been a Muslim cleric at the prison, corroborated the plaintiff's claims that he exhibited bruises and abrasions during the relevant time period; the defendants were improperly precluded from bringing out the fact that the cleric had been fired by the Department of Corrections because of his involvement with the rioting inmates and his failure to cooperate with an investigation of the riots).

Of course, the proponent must establish a foundation that the evidence offered to prove bias is in fact probative of bias. See United States v. Elkins, 70 F.3d 81 (10th Cir. 1995) (reversing a defendant's firearm convictions on the ground that the Trial Judge erred in permitting a defense witness to be questioned about his gang membership and gang activity, in a purported attempt to show the witness' bias; no evidence supported the conclusion that the witness and the defendant were members of the same gang).

(n28)Footnote 28. See, e.g., United States v. Kaplan, 832 F.2d 676 (1st Cir. 1987) (the defendant should have been permitted to cross-examine a witness concerning his regular use of cocaine to impeach the witness' ability to observe and remember).

(n29)Footnote 29. See, e.g., Revels v. Vincenz, 382 F.3d 870 (8th Cir. 2004) (no error in permitting the defendants' to question the plaintiff as to whether he heard voices in the past: "We have specifically approved the use of a witness's mental condition to challenge his credibility."); Chnapkova v. Koh, 985 F.2d 79 (2d Cir. 1993) (hospital records showing that the plaintiff-witness had a history of psychiatric problems should have been admitted to impeach the witness' credibility).

(n30)Footnote 30. See, e.g., United States v. Lopez, 979 F.2d 1024 (5th Cir. 1992) (where the defendant asserted on direct examination that he had never seen and did not recognize marijuana, he could be contradicted with evidence of a seventeen-year-old conviction for marijuana possession). See generally McMunigal & Sharpe, Reforming Extrinsic Impeachment, 33 Conn. L. Rev. 363 (2001), for a thorough discussion of the rules governing contradiction.

(n31)Footnote 31. See, e.g., Jones v. Southern Pac. R.R., 962 F.2d 447 (5th Cir. 1992) (in a negligence action arising from a train accident, the plaintiff could not introduce the conductor's previous safety infractions to contradict his testimony that he had not been ticketed for speeding or improper braking; these prior safety infractions, nearly all of which occurred several years before the accident took place, were not directly related to the issues in the case, and thus were properly excluded under Rule 403).

(n32)Footnote 32. In Wainwright v. Greenfield, 474 U.S. 284 (1986) , the Court reaffirmed Doyle and held that evidence of postarrest, post-Miranda warnings silence could not be used to impeach a defendant's claim of insanity at the time. Subsequently, in Brecht v. Abrahamson, 507 U.S. 619 (1993) , the Court unanimously affirmed the constitutional vitality of the Doyle rule.

In Anderson v. Charles, 447 U.S. 404 (1980) , the Supreme Court distinguished Doyle and said that if a person waives his rights after receiving Miranda warnings and speaks to the police, he can be asked at trial why his earlier statement differs from trial testimony. Doyle holds that the government violates due process when it tells the defendant (via Miranda warnings) that he has a right to remain silent, and then uses the silence against him at trial. This principle was not implicated in Anderson, where the defendant was told that he could remain silent and yet gave a statement.

(n33)Footnote 33. See, e.g., Nezowy v. United States, 723 F.2d 1120 (3d Cir. 1983) : The Court held it was error for a prosecutor to ask a witness whether she had invoked her privilege against self-incrimination before a grand jury:

Because of the ever present danger that a jury might misunderstand the context in which such fifth > amendment questioning occurs, and because ... we ... find it difficult to imagine any circumstance where such examination would be relevant and appropriate, we hold that questioning of a witness by the Government as to whether he had previously claimed the constitutional right to refuse to testify at a grand jury proceeding will constitute trial error.

See also United States v. Bustamante, 45 F.3d 933 (5th Cir. 1995) (error, though harmless, to cross-examine the defendant about his invocation of the privilege against cross-examination before the grand jury: "The rule is well-established that a witness generally may not be cross-examined about her choice to invoke the fifth amendment privilege in grand jury proceedings."; the defendant did not open the door to such impeachment by testifying that he had been waiting a long time for his trial date to arrive; that statement could not be "interpreted as a complaint that he had never before had a chance to speak to the government or the grand jury.").

(n34)Footnote 34. See, e.g., United States v. Johns, 734 F.2d 657 (11th Cir. 1984) (stating that the Trial Judge must rule on the probative value of silence for impeachment purposes in the context of a particular case; the Trial Judge might consider "the strength of the alibi, the witness' proximity to the investigation, how soon the witness finds out about the arrest, and what steps were available to him"; the Judge should conduct such an inquiry outside the presence of the jury).

(n35)Footnote 35. See, e.g., United States v. Sarracino, 340 F.3d 1148 (10th Cir. 2003) (error to prohibit inquiry into bias of the government's lead investigator); United States v. Manske, 186 F.3d 770 (7th Cir. 1999) (reversible error to preclude cross-examination of the principal government witness about past incidents in which the witness had threatened and intimidated potential witnesses in a criminal trial in which he was the defendant); United States v. Turner, 198 F.3d 425 (4th Cir. 1999) (error to preclude inquiry into important details of cooperating witness' agreement with the government); United States v. Stavroff, 149 F.3d 478 (6th Cir. 1998) (error to preclude defense counsel from questioning a cooperating witness about the witness' hopes and expectations in pleading guilty; the defendant had a constitutional right to impeach the witness for bias).

(n36)Footnote 36. See, e.g., United States v. Zaccaria, 240 F.3d 75 (1st Cir. 2001) (no error in precluding inquiry into an alleged bad act of the witness, where the defendant presented no foundation that the event ever occurred); United States v. Rahman, 189 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 1999) (no error in precluding evidence offered for bias, where the foundation was weak and the evidence was not very probative); United States v. Williamson, 202 F.3d 974 (7th Cir. 2000) (no error to preclude impeachment where the defendant had already attacked the witness on several grounds; Trial Judge has discretion to exclude cumulative evidence even though it is offered to attack an important witness); United States v. McGuire, 200 F.3d 668 (10th Cir. 1999) (no error to preclude impeachment with convictions remote in time, where the defendant was permitted to conduct an extensive and searching cross-examination of the witness' suspect motives and lack of credibility).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 607 RULE 607

2-607 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 607.03

607.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Bias

[a] Civil Cases

Brady v. Chemical Constr. Corp., 740 F.2d 195 (2d Cir. 1984) : The Court held that a letter from an insurance company to an employee covered by a fidelity bond asking him to pay the amount of loss or to notify the company that the claim was false had been properly admitted to show the bias of the employee, who testified for the company.

Douglas v. Owens, 50 F.3d 1226 (3d Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed a judgment for an inmate who alleged that he was beaten by guards after a prison riot. A Muslim cleric who had been employed at the prison corroborated the plaintiff's claims that he exhibited bruises and abrasions during the relevant time period. The jury was permitted to hear only that the cleric had been "terminated" from his position, but not that he had been fired by the Department of Corrections because of his involvement with the rioting inmates and his failure to cooperate with an investigation of the riots. The Court stated that the circumstances of the cleric's discharge were critical to showing that he was not only biased against the prison, but also biased in favor of prisoners, such as the plaintiff.

Hafner v. Brown, 983 F.2d 570 (4th Cir. 1992) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in an arrestee's § 1983 action, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding cross-examination of the plaintiff's witness about her prior arrests. The defendants were permitted to ask about prior convictions and bad acts probative of the witness' credibility, as well as about her relationships with the police and directly whether she had any bias. Evidence of arrests is of dubious value on credibility and bias and the defendants did not provide persuasive arguments that the line of questioning they proposed would have gotten them further than the cross-examination that was permitted.

[b] Bias -- Criminal Defense Witnesses

United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45 (1984) : In Abel's armed robbery trial, a defense witness, Mills, testified that he had been in prison with Abel and a government witness, Ehle, and that Ehle had told him that Abel was not one of the robbers, but that he would implicate Abel in order to obtain a shorter sentence for himself. On cross-examination, the prosecutor asked Mills whether he and Abel were members in a secret prison organization whose members would lie to protect each other. Mills denied this, and the prosecution recalled Ehle to testify that Abel and Mills were, in fact, members of such an organization. The Court of Appeals found the impeachment was improper because it involved a "group tenet," rather than a personal tenet on the part of Mills. A unanimous Supreme Court reversed, holding that bias impeachment was permissible, although not specifically mentioned in the Rules, and that the type of organization to which members belong can be relevant in assessing the nature or extent of a witness' bias.

United States v. Spencer, 25 F.3d 1105 (D.C. Cir. 1994) : The Court held there was no error in permitting the prosecutor in a narcotics case to cross-examine a defense witness about a pending armed robbery charge against her, as other evidence indicated her antipathy toward law enforcement and the cross-examination suggested a possible source of that bias.

United States v. Rios Ruiz, 579 F.2d 670 (1st Cir. 1978) : The Court affirmed a police officer's civil rights conviction for beating and assaulting a suspect in a drug raid. After two police witnesses for the defendant testified that he did not mistreat either of the complaining parties in the case, the prosecution was permitted to show that the witnesses had themselves been suspended for the excessive use of force on unrelated occasions. Emphasizing "that there is a significant difference between introducing misconduct evidence as to the defendant and as to a witness not on trial," the Court found that the evidence was properly admitted on the question of possible bias of the witnesses.

United States v. Pettigrew, 77 F.3d 1500 (5th Cir. 1996) : The Court held in a bank fraud prosecution that there was no error in cross-examining a defense witness about whether a transaction in which he and the defendant had engaged was itself the subject of an investigation. While neither a witness' prior bad acts nor the mere fact that he has been arrested or indicted is generally admissible for impeachment, where the arrest or accusation grows out of transactions at issue, or related transactions, the evidence is admissible to show the witness' potential bias. In United States v. Royal, 972 F.2d 643 (5th Cir. 1992) , a cocaine distribution prosecution, the Court held that evidence a defense witness' mother tried to convince him to say that guns and drugs in the defendant's house belonged to the witness and not the defendant was admissible as relevant to the witness' bias. In United States v. Smith, n1 the Court upheld convictions for conspiracy and misapplying government funds, noting that testimony relating a conversation between two defense witnesses that suggested one had gone over her testimony with a defendant was admissible to establish bias.

United States v. Thompson, 359 F.3d 470 (7th Cir. 2004) : The defendant was charged with possession of ammunition by a felon after bullets were found in a jacket in a car in which he and his girlfriend had been traveling. Shortly after the arrest, she told police that the jacket and the bullets belonged to the defendant, but at trial she testified for the defense that they were hers. Although an in limine ruling precluded mention of the defendant's prior convictions and status as a suspect in uncharged crimes, the government was permitted to ask the girlfriend on cross-examination about past threats he had made against her and past charges she had brought against him. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, since even without evidence that the witness was intimidated, the evidence of threats was probative of the witness' bias and its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice.

United States v. Elkins, 70 F.3d 81 (10th Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession because evidence of the defendant's and a defense witness' gang membership and gang activity was improperly admitted to impeach the witness. There was no evidence that the two were members of the same gang or that the witness' testimony was biased because of fear of gang discipline. In United States v. Keys, 899 F.2d 983 (10th Cir. 1990) , a prosecution for possessing a weapon in a federal penitentiary, the defendant and two of his witnesses, also prisoners, denied they were gang members; on rebuttal, prison officers testified that the defendant had previously said he was a member of a gang with 60 members who would do him favors. The Court held that the evidence was properly admitted not to show bias due to common membership, as there was no showing the three prisoners belonged to the same gang, but to show bias due to fear, in that the witness' testimony might have been influenced by fear of the defendant and his gang. Because credibility was crucial to resolution of the case, the probative value of mentioning the prison gang was not significantly outweighed by its prejudicial effect.

United States v. Frazier, 944 F.2d 820 (11th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a conviction for making false statements before a grand jury, holding there was no error in admitting evidence that the defendant's lawyer was paid by her employer, whose fraudulent conduct was the focus of the grand jury's investigation.

[c] Bias -- Inconsistent Statements

United States v. Hudson, 970 F.2d 948 (1st Cir. 1992) : After witnesses, including the defendant's brother, testified under a grant of immunity about drug transactions, the defense offered evidence that the witnesses had participated in jailhouse conversations indicating that the defendant was not involved in drugs and that the brother was upset at the defendant for beating him out of gambling money and not taking care of his family. The Court held it was error to exclude the evidence, which was inconsistent with the witnesses' testimony and indicative of bias.

United States v. Betts, 16 F.3d 748 (7th Cir. 1994) : The Trial Judge in a drug prosecution had excluded evidence that a prosecution witness had said he would testify against the defendants in exchange for a government promise to have his sentence reduced, because the principal witness had not been given an adequate opportunity to explain or deny the statement on cross-examination before the extrinsic evidence was offered. The Court held there was no error, finding the weight of authority to require that a party seeking to prove bias through extrinsic evidence of a witness' prior statement must first give the witness an opportunity to explain or deny the statement, "even though Rule 613(b) is not strictly applicable." We would observe that even if that Rule were applicable, it does not by its terms (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 613, § 613.02[1]) require the opportunity to explain or deny be given before the extrinsic evidence is admitted. See also United States v. Marzano n2(suggesting that a foundation must be laid before showing the bias of a witness by a prior inconsistent statement, the Court left open the question whether a different rule should be applied where conduct rather than a statement is involved).

[d] Bias -- Prosecution Witnesses

[i] Impeachment Denied

United States v. Watson, 409 F.3d 458 (D.C. Cir. 2005) : The defendant, an African-American, was stopped by an officer for a window-tint violation, and a search of his car uncovered drugs and firearms. At trial for weapons and drug offenses, the defendant wanted to cross-examine the officer about 30 instances in which he stopped black men for window-tint violations but eventually arrested them on drug charges. Affirming, the Court found no error in prohibiting this inquiry. It concluded that the relevance of the evidence to impeach the witness for bias "was not readily apparent given the lack of information regarding [the officer's] arrests of members of other demographic groups, and its probative value was substantially outweighed by the threat of undue delay or confusion of issues inherent in a drawn-out inquiry into the details of [the officer's] history of arrests."

United States v. Jarabek, 726 F.2d 889 (1st Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed Hobbs Act convictions, finding it was proper to preclude cross-examination of a government witness concerning alleged improprieties in his handling of his daughter's 1980 tax return. Since the witness began cooperating with the government's investigation in 1979 and the government did not discover any possible improprieties until four days before trial in 1982, the Court reasoned that the evidence did not tend to show that the witness cooperated in order to curry favor with the government. In United States v. Keithan, n3 the Court sustained convictions arising out of a fraudulent scheme selling insurance policies to elderly persons. It held there was no error in preventing the defendant from cross-examining a government witness, who testified to a conversation in which a codefendant described the fraudulent scheme, about letters he had written while in prison for conduct similar to that alleged against the defendant. The letters expressed the witness' belief that the government was concentrating on drug cases rather than insurance fraud, so others like him might escape conviction, and his regret at having pleaded guilty. Although the Court reasoned that every "worthwhile citizen" would feel the way the witness did, we believe that this kind of appellate review usurps the jury's function. It seems impossible to be certain that the witness, who regretted admitting guilt, had exactly the same feelings as any other citizen and that he had no greater urge to convict others charged with similar crimes than any ordinary citizen would have.

United States v. Rahman, 189 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 1999) : The Court upheld convictions arising from the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, finding no error when defense counsel was prevented from cross-examining a government informant about racial bias he allegedly harbored against Black Muslims while working on an investigation of Muslim defendants of Arab descent. The Court reasoned that the foundation for the cross-examination was weak and the alleged bias was not against any defendant or members of a defendant's racial group. In United States v. Lanese, n4 defendants convicted of extortion offenses alleged denial of confrontation rights because they were not permitted to explore on cross-examination the details of a key government witness' prior arrest. The Court affirmed, holding that the circumstances of the prior arrest were not probative of bias and that the jury was given full information as to the witness' immunity agreements, enrollment in the witness protection program, and gambling compulsion sufficient for the jury to pass on the witness' credibility. In United States v. Glover, n5 a drug conspiracy case, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge barred cross-examination of one of the government's primary witnesses concerning psychiatric treatment she received 12 years earlier, even though the defense claimed the treatments were prompted by various romantic setbacks and provided a motive for the witness to shade her testimony in favor of her lover (one of the conspirators). The Court emphasized the remoteness of the treatments, their tenuous connection with the witness' reliability at trial, and the fact that the witness was fully examined about her romantic involvement.

United States v. Thorn, 917 F.2d 170 (5th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a fraud conviction, holding there was no error in excluding evidence of a state indictment for drug offenses pending against the government's key witness, absent a showing that the federal prosecutor had any ability to influence the disposition of the state charges and given that the evidence could have a highly prejudicial effect on the way the jury viewed the witness' testimony. In United States v. Leslie, n6 the Court affirmed convictions on drug charges, holding that the defendant was properly denied an opportunity to offer extrinsic evidence of bias of a government witness. It reasoned that Rule 613 governs where a party seeks to introduce extrinsic evidence to impeach a witness' trial testimony and demonstrate bias. In this case, the defendant failed to afford the witness a chance to explain or deny the statement that the defendant wished to offer to prove bias.

United States v. Beverly, 369 F.3d 516 (6th Cir. 2004) : Affirming convictions for bank robberies and firearms offenses, the Court found no abuse of discretion in precluding defense counsel from cross-examining a government witness about the witness' alleged attempts to molest the defendant's 12-year-old daughter. The Court found the evidence "only marginally relevant and highly prejudicial," as there was no evidence that the witness had ever been accused of molestation or knew that anyone suspected him of committing the offenses.

United States v. Jakoubek, 411 F.3d 951 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a murder-for-hire conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when the defense was not permitted to elicit evidence of State Court charges pending against the government's key witness. In the Court's view, it was sufficient that the jury was informed of the witness' extensive criminal history and the terms of his cooperation agreement: "there was no indication that [the witness] would or could receive assistance from the government regarding his warrant on pending state charges, let alone that he altered his testimony or sought to 'entrap' Jakoubek in exchange for such assistance." In a prosecution for armed bank robbery and interstate transportation of a stolen car, United States v. Mansaw, n7 a defendant was precluded from eliciting testimony that a cooperating witness had charged that the defendant and two codefendants had committed another robbery and that local authorities had not charged the defendant with that crime. The Court found that this evidence failed to prove either bias or that the witness had made a false charge against the defendant. The defendant had a substantial opportunity to question the witness about her bargain with the government, so the limitation on cross-examination concerning the report of the other robbery was proper.

United States v. Monks, 774 F.2d 945 (9th Cir. 1985) : The Court found no error in precluding one defendant from cross-examining a witness about another bank robbery with a codefendant, since evidence that there was any resulting bias was purely speculative.

United States v. Taylor, 417 F.3d 1176 (11th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a drug possession and firearm conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was not permitted to introduce, as evidence of the arresting officer's bias and tendency for untruthfulness, civilian complaints charging the officer with brutality, planting evidence, and harassment. As all the complaints were unproven and there was no evidence that they had led to discipline or conviction of the officer, any probative value they might have was substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice to the prosecution. In United States v. Oliveros, 275 F.3d 1299 (11th Cir. 2001) , a money-laundering prosecution, the principal government witness had faced detention for an immigration violation, but the government obtained favorable treatment for him in exchange for his testimony. The Court found no error in the exclusion of testimony by an expert on immigration law that the witness had been subject to a far longer detention on the immigration charges than he had admitted in his testimony. The testimony would have shown the extent of the benefit the witness actually received for cooperating, but the relevant factor in determining his motive to lie was the benefit he believed he was receiving. In a criminal tax evasion case, United States v. Williams, n8 the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that a government witness, the defendant's personal secretary, had previously had an illicit love affair with a man who was later involved in litigation with the defendant. The defendant showed no connection among the affair, the prior litigation, and the instant prosecution; besides, the defendant had been permitted to show the secretary's limited knowledge and that she had previously testified against him.

[ii] Bias -- Prosecution Witnesses -- Impeachment Permitted or Required

Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. 673 (1986) : Justice Rehnquist wrote for the Court as it held that a defendant was denied his confrontation right in a state murder case when he was prohibited from questioning a prosecution witness concerning the dismissal of a pending public drunkenness charge. This was evidence "that a jury might reasonably have found furnished the witness a motive for favoring the prosecution in his testimony," "a prototypical form of bias on the part of the witness."

United States v. Akitoye, 923 F.2d 221 (1st Cir. 1991) : Affirming a conviction for drug offenses, the Court held that an objection was properly sustained when the defendant was asked on cross-examination whether a previous witness was lying, and that there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the defendant to be asked instead whether he knew of any reason why the previous witness would lie, as the latter question went to bias.

United States v. Lawson, 736 F.2d 835 (2d Cir. 1984) : The Court reversed a bank robbery conviction on another ground, but said that the defendant should have been permitted to question a government witness about acts of prostitution that she may have committed on behalf of another government witness who had been a participant in the robbery, since her answers might have proved bias on her part.

United States v. Williams, 892 F.2d 296 (3d Cir. 1989) : A government witness in a prosecution for possessing a gun as a convicted felon was also a convicted felon and was also found in possession of a gun. The Court held the witness' conviction was not admissible to impeach her under Rule 609, as it was more than ten years old, but it should have been admitted as relevant to show the witness' motive to ingratiate herself with the government. Although exclusion violated the Confrontation Clause, the error was held harmless.

United States v. Turner, 198 F.3d 425 (4th Cir. 1999) : In a prosecution for engaging in a continuing criminal enterprise, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to prohibit defense counsel from cross-examining a government witness about her fear of facing the death penalty for involvement in the murder that was the subject of the prosecution. Although the Trial Judge reasoned that questions as to what charges the witness thought she might be facing when she agreed to testify were irrelevant because sentencing was up to the Judge, the Court stated that "the crux of the inquiry is the witness's state of mind." The fact that the witness feared the death penalty was thus relevant even if the Judge might not have imposed it had she not testified. In United States v. Dorta, n9 the Court affirmed drug-related convictions, stating that a defendant is constitutionally entitled to explore a government witness' understanding of the benefits that will result from his testimony.

United States v. Garza, 754 F.2d 1202, 1985-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P66440 (5th Cir. 1985) : In a prosecution of police officers for civil rights violations, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude evidence of the arrest records of several government witnesses, since it was relevant to show bias on the part of the witnesses.

United States v. Stavroff, 149 F.3d 478 (6th Cir. 1998) : Affirming a tax fraud conviction, the Court found it was error (but harmless) when the Judge sua sponte precluded defense counsel from cross-examining a cooperating witness about the witness' hopes and expectations in pleading guilty, since the defendant has a constitutional right to impeach the witness for bias.

United States v. McGee, 408 F.3d 966 (7th Cir. 2005) : The defendants in a drug trafficking conspiracy trial sought to impeach a cooperating witness with two letters that the witness had written to the prosecutor in which he said he was "not a bad person" and was "riding with the government 100%" and that he knew enough information so that "we can make arrangements for [me] to go home." The Court noted that "the better practice would have been" for the Judge to allow each defense attorney some leeway to cross-examine the witness on the letters, as evidence of his biases and motivations for testifying, but that any error was harmless. The Court rejected the government's assertion that the letters were inadmissible hearsay, noting that they were "textbook examples of impeachment evidence." In United States v. Manske, 186 F.3d 770 (7th Cir. 1999) , the defendant was convicted for cocaine distribution solely on testimony from cooperating witnesses and evidence of his having met regularly with them; there was no physical evidence or admission by the defendant. The defendant likewise had no physical or documentary evidence supporting his claim that the regular meetings involved gambling activities and the cooperating witnesses were framing him. Although the case turned on the credibility of the prosecution witnesses, the defense was precluded from cross-examining a principal government witness about incidents in which he had threatened and intimidated potential witnesses against him. The defense was also precluded from inquiring into other witnesses' potential bias in favor of that witness because the Judge believed there was no link between the threat evidence and any fear one of the witnesses might have had. Reversing, the Court held that threats to other witnesses were probative of the witness' untruthfulness under Rule 608(b), and that precluding examination of the other witnesses' bias resulting from the threats violated the defendant's Sixth Amendment rights. The Court also held that no foundation questions were necessary before asking about facts or events logically relevant to show bias.

United States v. Williams, 194 F.3d 886 (8th Cir. 1999) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) to preclude cross-examination of a prosecution witness on misdemeanor charges because they were "wanteds" or pending charges. The Court reasoned that "[t]he presence of outstanding warrants together with [the witness'] status as a probationer may serve as a basis to contend that these circumstances influenced the witness to testify favorably for the prosecution."

United States v. Takahashi, 205 F.3d 1161 (9th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a conviction for drug possession with intent to distribute, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant and a favorable witness belonged to a secretive Japanese organized crime group whose members will perjure themselves for one another. The evidence was probative of bias, and the Judge both gave a limiting instruction and induced the government not to show photographs of the gang's distinctive tattoos on the defendant. In United States v. Harris, 185 F.3d 999 (9th Cir. 1999) , a prosecution for embezzling from an ERISA pension plan, one of the principal government witnesses was the defendant's sister, who was also the widow of the defendant's frequent investment partner. At the time she testified, the pension trust was suing her husband's estate on a promissory note. The estate's theory was that the note was not valid, and convicting the defendant of fraud would support that theory. The widow thus would benefit from the defendant's conviction, but the Judge would not let the defense ask her anything about the other lawsuit, apparently on the ground that the examination would go too far afield from the direct examination. The Judge also limited cross-examination of former employees suing the defendant for breach of fiduciary duty to questions about the nature of their dispute but not how much they were suing him for. The Court held these rulings limiting cross-examination of the prosecution witnesses were an abuse of discretion, although harmless error. The defense has a Confrontation Clause right to show possible motivations that prosecution witnesses may have to falsify their testimony, and the Judge's discretion to avoid undue consumption of time and confusion of issues cannot justify so severe a limitation on cross-examination as to prevent the jury from learning information needed to judge rationally whether witnesses might be shading the truth. In United States v. Ray, n10 the Court overturned a conviction for cocaine offenses, finding it was an abuse of discretion to preclude the defendant from cross-examining a key government witness as to his continued trafficking in cocaine following a plea agreement, which might have biased him against the defendant. As long as the allegations by the defendant were shown to have some grounding in reality, the Court found that the danger that a defendant would falsely report criminal acts by a government witness in order to be able to examine the witness about the nonexistent acts was not great enough to deny the defendant a chance to impeach an important witness by inquiring into a real possibility of bias. See also United States v. Jones n11(reversing a conviction for interfering with commerce by threats of violence, because evidence that the defendant had rebuffed a homosexual advance by a government witness was erroneously excluded). Note, however, that a defendant does not always have the right to inquire into the details relating to a bias claim. See United States v. Brutzman n12(counsel for a mail fraud defendant was permitted to show that a government witness was involved in civil litigation with the defense counsel, but was not permitted to inquire into the details of the complaint that had been filed in the civil case).

United States v. Sarracino, 340 F.3d 1148 (10th Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions for murder, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to limit cross-examination of the government's lead investigator, who, between the incident and the trial, had gotten in trouble with his employer and had resigned while under investigation for misuse of a government computer. Limiting defense counsel to asking whether the witness was still employed as a government investigator and precluding inquiry into the reasons for the termination of employment gave the defense insufficient opportunity to show the witness' motivation to help the government. Thus, this limitation violated defendant's confrontation rights.

United States v. Williams, 954 F.2d 668 (11th Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed convictions for conspiring to distribute marijuana because evidence that an informant-witness was to receive 25 percent of all seized assets for his assistance had been excluded as irrelevant and unduly prejudicial. The Court noted that the jury has the right to know what may be motivating a witness and if the amount paid is felt to be too prejudicial for a jury to hear, the solution is for the government to make reasonable payments, not for the evidence to be excluded. Although the Court suggested in United States v. Bulman n13 that it might have been better to permit a defendant to cross-examine a DEA informant concerning prior arrests and dispositions thereof, it found no abuse of discretion in limiting the cross-examination, since questions were allowed concerning the informant's employment and compensation by the DEA.

[iii] Bias -- Prosecution Witnesses -- Limiting Examination on Guilty Plea or Immunity

United States v. Kone, 307 F.3d 430 (6th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed convictions involving violations of the immigration laws, finding no abuse of discretion in limiting the cross-examination of prosecution witnesses as to whether they had an expectation of favorable treatment in exchange for their testimony. As to one witness, the Court concluded that the jury possessed sufficient information--immunity and compensation were provided--to make a judgment about bias. The Court concluded that defense counsel did not make clear what impeachment was being attempted as to two other witnesses.

United States v. Arocho, 305 F.3d 627 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming drug-related convictions, the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in restricting the defendants in their cross-examination of two witnesses who entered into plea agreements with the government. The defense was permitted to elicit from the witnesses that charges had been dropped and they expected to obtain a substantial benefit from cooperation, but was not permitted to question in more detail as to the specific sentences and guideline ranges they faced before entering into the plea agreements.

[e] Bias -- Racial Bias

United States v. Rahman, 189 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 1999) : The Court upheld convictions arising from the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, finding no error when defense counsel was prevented from cross-examining a government informant about racial bias he allegedly harbored against Black Muslims while working on an investigation of Muslim defendants of Arab descent. The Court reasoned that the foundation for the cross-examination was weak and the alleged bias was not against any defendant or members of a defendant's racial group.

[f] Bias -- Rehabilitation

United States v. Sumlin, 271 F.3d 274 (D.C. Cir. 2001) : Affirming cocaine convictions, the Court found no plain error in the admission of a drug agent's testimony that a confidential informant had assisted the government in other investigations that had resulted in numerous arrests. The Court stated that it did not know for what purpose the government offered the evidence, since the defendant raised no objection to which the government would have had to respond. It noted, however, that in United States v. Smith, 232 F.3d 236 (D.C. Cir. 2000) , it had dismissed a relevance challenge to similar evidence because the fact that an informant has cooperated in the past bears on his motive to testify in the present. Thus, it was possible that the agent's testimony in the instant case was offered to rebut a bias attack and its admission could not be plain error.

United States v. Pintar, 630 F.2d 1270 (8th Cir. 1980) : The Court reversed Hatch Act convictions, holding it was improper to permit "rehabilitation" of a witness impeached for bias by evidence of other acts that justified rather than explained away the witness' hostility.

[2] Bolstering the Witness

[a] Generally

United States v. Vazquez-Rivera, 407 F.3d 476 (1st Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring to distribute heroin, holding that the case agent did not improperly vouch for the defendant's brother as a witness when the agent explained how he obtained a statement from the brother during a "safety valve" interview. The brother had testified for the defendant and contradicted the statement he made during the interview, so rather than vouching for the brother as a witness, the agent was testifying to a prior inconsistent statement and to the circumstances in which it was made. In United States v. Perez-Ruiz, 353 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2003) , a drug conspiracy case, the Court ruled that a DEA agent's testimony purporting to express belief in an informant's testimony and stating that there were other witnesses who could also corroborate the testimony was improper bolstering. Despite its harsh criticism of the prosecutor and the DEA agent for a "flagrant breach" in offering testimony that "was improper and never should have seen the light of day," the Court found no plain error. In United States v. Tom, 330 F.3d 83 (1st Cir. 2003) , the Court affirmed cocaine-related convictions, holding that the prosecutor did not engage in any improper vouching by asking a DEA agent whether, in the course of his investigation, he came upon any information to indicate that a cooperating witness had not been truthful with him. The Court reasoned that the agent did not vouch for the witness's credibility, but simply stated that he had no facts that caused him to believe that the witness had deceived him. In United States v. Rosario-Diaz, n14 the Court held it was error (but harmless) to permit an FBI agent to bolster the testimony of a cooperating witness by opining that particular statements of the witness were "lies" and by representing that the statements not singled out as lies had been "tested" and verified through interrogation techniques. Although the agent could properly have testified to facts within his personal knowledge that supported another witness' testimony and to actions he took to corroborate the testimony, it was impermissible for him to put the prestige of his professional knowledge behind the cooperating witness' testimony. n15

United States v. Lewis, 10 F.3d 1086 (4th Cir. 1993) : The Court held, in a cocaine conspiracy prosecution, that the prosecutor had not improperly bolstered the testimony of its witnesses when a case officer testified about the investigative techniques employed by the government. The witness did not testify as to anyone's trustworthiness, but only put evidence before the jury from which they could evaluate for themselves whether the witnesses were trustworthy.

United States v. Martinez, 253 F.3d 251 (6th Cir. 2001) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) in a drug case for the prosecutor to elicit from a narcotics deputy that information from the government's main witness in seven prior investigations had "always been credible, ... accurate and truthful." Although the Court found that the testimony did not amount to a prosecutor's placing personal prestige behind the key witness and noted that the prosecutor could properly seek to support the witness's credibility, it held that error occurred because the prosecutor failed to ask the deputy what evidence there was to confirm the witness's previous reliability and instead simply asked the deputy to assert that the witness had been accurate and truthful. That meant that the prosecutor was implying a guarantee of truthfulness based on facts outside the record, which is impermissible. In United States v. Francis, 170 F.3d 546 (6th Cir. 1999) , the Court reversed money laundering convictions because of prosecutorial misconduct. The misconduct included eliciting from an agent that he had corroborated information from a cooperating witness, without also eliciting the details of the corroboration. Where the defendants in a marijuana possession case, United States v. Lochmondy, n16 attacked the credibility of a government witness, the Court held it was proper to admit testimony thereafter that the witness had cooperated on other cases that resulted in convictions.

United States v. Darby, 744 F.2d 1508 (11th Cir. 1984) : In a drug smuggling prosecution, the Court sustained the introduction of testimony by a government witness that he had been told by a lawyer associated with the defendants that "they know where your brother is at." The evidence was relevant to an assessment of the witness' credibility, in that it tended to demonstrate the witness' resolve in testifying. The Court declined to hold that the testimony was unduly prejudicial.

[b] Bolstering the Witness -- Opening the Door

United States v. Knowles, 66 F.3d 1146 (11th Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, holding that the government properly entered its witnesses' plea agreements into evidence on direct examination, since the defendants had attacked the credibility of these witnesses in their opening statements. One defendant's complaint that a polygraph clause was improperly introduced was rejected because the defendant's own counsel had elicited testimony about that clause.

[c] Bolstering the Witness -- Vouching by Prosecutor

United States v. Binker, 795 F.2d 1218 (5th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed marijuana convictions, finding that the government properly questioned its witnesses about their plea agreements, which included promises to testify truthfully. Admission of an unredacted plea agreement stating that the government had independently verified the witness' statements was error, but was harmless in this case. The Court cautioned prosecutors against attempting to bolster a witness by vouching for credibility and implying that the government possesses extrinsic evidence not presented to the jury that supports the witness.

United States v. Trujillo, 376 F.3d 593 (6th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to possess marijuana with intent to distribute, the Court rejected the defendant's argument that the government improperly vouched for the testimony of two coconspirators by eliciting testimony that they had to truthfully cooperate or they would breach their plea agreements. The Court observed that "the prosecutor did not offer any personal observations or opinions as to the veracity" of either witness, "nor did she place the prestige of the Government behind their credibility." In United States v. Francis, 170 F.3d 546 (6th Cir. 1999) , the Court reversed money laundering convictions because of prosecutorial misconduct, which included improperly vouching for cooperating witnesses by disclosing, in addition to the terms of their plea agreements, that favorable sentencing recommendations would be made because the terms had been adhered to. It also included the prosecutor's reference to having terminated plea discussions "abruptly" because the witness "wasn't telling the truth," and subsequently offering an agreement when she had a subsequent meeting and believed him.

United States v. Edwards, 154 F.3d 915 (9th Cir. 1998) : The Court reversed a cocaine possession conviction as a result of improper vouching by the prosecutor. Although a bag containing crack cocaine was found in a car driven by the defendant, the car was registered to another person, and one officer who was present when the car was searched testified that there was nothing in the bag that established the identity of the owner. The night the officer testified, the prosecutor, in the presence of two police officers, examined the bag, which had been in the custody of the police for two years, and found a bail receipt bearing the defendant's name under a piece of cardboard at the bottom. The prosecutor called the two police officers who were present, and each testified as to the discovery of the bail receipt. The prosecutor identified the receipt as close to a "smoking gun" in closing argument. Observing that "the danger in having a prosecutor testify as a witness is that jurors will automatically presume the prosecutor to be credible and will not consider critically any evidence that may suggest otherwise," the Court reasoned that "[a]lthough the circumstances of this case do not fit neatly under either the advocate-witness rule or the vouching rule, there can be no question that the policies underlying both rules were directly contravened by the prosecutor's continued representation of the government." In United States v. Frederick, 78 F.3d 1370 (9th Cir. 1996) , the Court, reversing a defendant's convictions for aggravated sexual assault against his stepdaughter, found that the prosecutor improperly vouched for the credibility of the stepdaughter by referring to inadmissible prior consistent statements made by the complaining witness. In United States v. Kerr, n17 the Court reversed drug-related convictions, finding that "an experienced United States attorney deliberately introduced into the case his personal opinion of the witnesses' credibility."

[3] Coaching

United States v. Ebens, 800 F.2d 1422 (6th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a conviction for interfering with a citizen's civil rights, finding that the defendant should have been permitted to play tape-recorded interviews of three principal government witnesses, which had been conducted by an attorney who had been instrumental in publicizing the events giving rise to the prosecution. The defendant claimed that the witnesses were coached to testify as they did. Although the Court did not refer to this as bias impeachment, the defendant's theory closely resembles an attack on the ground that a witness has been influenced to disfavor one side of a case.

United States v. Carrillo, 16 F.3d 1046 (9th Cir. 1994) : On cross-examination of the defendant, who was charged with cocaine distribution, the prosecutor asked whether he had discussed his testimony with his attorney prior to taking the stand and, after the defendant admitted he had, asked about an event the defendant had discussed during direct examination that was interrupted by a Court recess. The prosecutor used this line of questioning to expose a subtle difference in the direct testimony before and after the recess and thus to create an inference that the defendant's attorney had coached him during the recess. The Court held that there was no violation of the defendant's attorney-client privilege, as the prosecutor's questions did not reach the substance of the legal advice given and coaching is a proper subject of impeachment. We are concerned about this sort of cross-examination, since the witness' denial of having a conversation could only be corroborated by having the attorney testify, and the implication of coaching from an admission could only be rebutted by revealing privileged communications.

United States v. Plotke, 725 F.2d 1303 (11th Cir. 1984) : In a mail fraud and conspiracy case, a witness was unable to identify one of several defendants during an evidentiary hearing on the admissibility of conspirator statements. After a recess, he purported to make a positive identification. The Trial Judge held a hearing to determine whether the witness' ability to make the identification was the product of improper coaching and ultimately forbade the witness from identifying the defendant before the jury. The Judge barred two other defendants from impeaching the witness by asking questions about events that occurred during the recess, and the Court affirmed. It found that the defendants had ample latitude to attack the witness and that further impeachment on a collateral matter was not necessary to satisfy the demands of the Confrontation Clause.

[4] Contradiction

Neuren v. Adduci, Mastriani, Meeks & Schill, 43 F.3d 1507 (D.C. Cir. 1995) : In a female lawyer's Title VII action against a law firm, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that the plaintiff had had difficulty in getting along with staff and in meeting deadlines at a firm where she had worked previously. The evidence did not properly impeach her by showing character for untruthfulness or by contradicting her explanation of why she left the prior firm.

United States v. Benedetto, 571 F.2d 1246, 1250 (2d Cir. 1978) : Reviewing a ruling that permitted other crimes evidence to be introduced in a public corruption case, the Court observed that "[o]nce a witness (especially a defendant-witness) testifies as to any specific fact on direct testimony, the trial judge has broad discretion to admit extrinsic evidence tending to contradict the specific statement, even if such statement concerns a collateral matter in the case." The Court also observed that "Rule 607 appears to allow the continuation of federal practice in admitting extrinsic evidence to impeach specific errors or falsehoods in a witness' direct testimony, subject to Rule 403 considerations."

United States v. Payne, 102 F.3d 289 (7th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a conviction for cocaine distribution, the Court found no error when the defendant was precluded from offering evidence to contradict a prosecution witness. The witness, a participant in the drug deal, stated that neither his family nor his girlfriend knew that he was a drug dealer. The defendant was not permitted to call the girlfriend, who would have testified that she knew that the witness was a drug dealer. The Court held that the girlfriend's testimony was properly precluded under the "collateral issue rule," since it would not have dealt at all with the defendant's guilt or innocence. In United States v. Kozinski, 16 F.3d 795 (7th Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed drug trafficking convictions, noting that presenting evidence that part or all of a witness' testimony is incorrect is a valid method of impeachment. However, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony that would only contradict government witnesses on matters irrelevant to issues in the trial.

United States v. Callaway, 938 F.2d 907 (8th Cir. 1991) : Where the defendant, charged with transferring a firearm knowing it would be used to commit a crime of violence, testified on direct that he had not been involved in any robberies, there was no error in asking him about a 1972 conviction for grand larceny and a 1969 theft. The Court held that the cross-examination directly attacked the credibility of the defendant's denial of involvement in any robberies or thefts. In United States v. LeAmous, 754 F.2d 795 (8th Cir. 1985) , the defendant, by painting a picture of himself on direct examination as someone who protected young girls by encouraging alternatives to prostitution, opened himself up to cross-examination concerning particular instances of conduct.

[5] Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity

[a] Impeachment Use

[i] Instructions on Use

United States v. Ramirez, 973 F.2d 102 (2d Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a conviction for narcotics and firearms offenses, holding it was error to refuse to instruct the jury that they should not consider a testifying codefendant's guilty plea as evidence of the defendant's guilt.

United States v. Werme, 939 F.2d 108 (3d Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to violate the Travel Act, noting that evidence of another party's guilty plea is not admissible to prove the defendant's guilt but may be admitted to show the witness' bias. The Court held it was error, but harmless, to fail to give a requested limiting instruction when a coconspirator's guilty plea was introduced.

United States v. Modena, 302 F.3d 626 (6th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to defraud, holding it was error (but not plain error) for the Judge to fail to issue a cautionary instruction after a cooperating witness for the government acknowledged that he had been convicted in connection with the conspiracy. In United States v. Christian, n18 the Court affirmed drug convictions, holding there was no plain error in the failure to give a limiting instruction sua sponte concerning a codefendant's guilty plea. After observing that a plea by a codefendant can be especially prejudicial, the Court reasoned that the potential for prejudice is greatly reduced where the codefendant testifies regarding the specific facts underlying the crimes in issue.

United States v. Lawrence, 934 F.2d 868 (7th Cir. 1991) : Affirming tax evasion convictions arising out of a "skimming" scheme, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in giving, at the government's instance, an instruction to consider carefully testimony from a prosecution witness who had been given immunity. Although the instruction is ordinarily given on behalf of the defense, the witness was basically a hostile witness, and the Rule permits any party to attack a witness' credibility.

United States v. Harris, 738 F.2d 1068 (9th Cir. 1984) : The Court said that it was unfortunate that the jury was instructed not to speculate on the reasons why two coconspirators pleaded guilty and testified for the government. The defendants attempted to use the pleas to prove that the coconspirators had a motive to testify as the government wanted, and the instruction tended to undercut the attempt at impeachment. However, the Court found that another instruction fairly informed the jury that it should carefully examine the testimony of confessing codefendants.

United States v. Baez, 703 F.2d 453 (10th Cir. 1983) : The Court found plain error in the Trial Judge's statement to the jury in a drug conspiracy case that two codefendants had pleaded guilty. The Court recognized that where codefendants testify, the government or the defense may reveal guilty pleas for the jury to consider in evaluating credibility, and it reiterated the importance of instructions to the jury on the permissible use of a guilty plea. In this case, however, one of the codefendants did not testify and the Judge gave no instruction concerning the plea by the one codefendant who did testify.

[ii] Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity -- Impeachment Use -- Other Proper Use

United States v. Basic Constr. Co., 711 F.2d 570, 1983-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P65472 (4th Cir. 1983) : Affirming bid-rigging convictions, the Court held there was no error in a ruling that either side could bring out the fact that a codefendant had pleaded guilty. The Court noted, however, that it might be preferable to tell the jury only that the case against the codefendant had been disposed of. In United States v. McEachern, 675 F.2d 618 (4th Cir. 1982) , the Court found that where the defense made a strenuous attack on a government witness by bringing out the fact that he had pleaded guilty and made a deal, the government was entitled to show that the deal was not as good as the attack by the defense suggested.

United States v. Lochmondy, 890 F.2d 817 (6th Cir. 1989) : The Court held there was no error in admitting the guilty pleas of codefendants who testified at trial, not as evidence of the defendants' guilt, but as evidence of the witness' credibility after it had been attacked.

United States v. Roth, 736 F.2d 1222 (8th Cir. 1984) : The Court observed that admission of "evidence that a codefendant has pled guilty to the same offense is not error unless elicited as substantive proof of the defendant's guilt. Such evidence is clearly admissible to show the witness' acknowledgment of participation in the offense, or to reflect on his credibility."

United States v. Mayans, 17 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 1994) : Reversing convictions for cocaine offenses on other grounds, the Court noted that it was error to sustain best evidence objections when the defendant attempted to cross-examine codefendant witnesses about their understanding of their plea agreements. The witnesses' understanding of the terms of the agreements was relevant in assessing credibility.

United States v. Dunn, 841 F.2d 1026 (10th Cir. 1988) : In a drug prosecution, the Court held that "[i]f a coconspirator testifies, the government or defense may question the witness about the plea in order for the jury to assess the credibility of the witness," but it added that the Judge should caution the jury as to the purpose for which the evidence is admitted.

United States v. Edwards, 716 F.2d 822 (11th Cir. 1983) : The Court held that the government could rehabilitate its witness, who was cross-examined in a way that implied he might have something to gain in exchange for his testimony, by showing that he had already been convicted and sentenced.

[iii] Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity -- Impeachment Use -- Proper Use on Direct Examination

United States v. Spriggs, 996 F.2d 320 (D.C. Cir. 1993) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court applied the rule followed in a majority of Circuits, that the government may elicit evidence of the contents of a cooperation agreement on direct examination, and observed that there is no reason to believe such evidence improperly bolsters the credibility of a witness.

United States v. Richardson, 421 F.3d 17 (1st Cir. 2005) : The defendant was convicted for perjury before a grand jury investigating Medicare/Medicaid fraud, when she lied about illegal discounts for pharmaceuticals from her employer. The prosecution introduced testimony from a former supervisor that the employer expected accurate reports from employees and gave bonuses to increase sales, and it also introduced evidence that the witness had pleaded guilty to charges of fraud against the government based on conduct while working for the employer. The defendant argued that evidence of the witness' guilty plea was prejudicial in suggesting the defendant's guilt by association, the risk of prejudice substantially outweighed the weak probative value of the substantive testimony, and the preemptive impeachment was unnecessary because the defendant offered to forgo impeachment of the witness. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion, since the evidence was relevant, and any risk of undue prejudice was minimized by lengthy and repeated cautionary instructions to the jury. In United States v. Martin, n19 the Court upheld a conviction for transporting stolen autos, finding no error when the government was permitted to read its witnesses' plea agreements to the jury in their entirety. It reasoned that redaction of the agreements "would leave the jury with a slanted and false picture of what the bargain entailed." In United States v. McNeill, n20 the Court affirmed a mail fraud conviction, holding that the government properly elicited from two of its witnesses the fact that they had been immunized and compelled to testify, although the defendant had indicated that he would not ask about immunity on cross-examination. The Court reasoned that "[t]he fact of immunity and compulsion orders aids the jury function regardless of whether defendant intended to attack the credibility of the witnesses." Although recognizing "that evidence of a grant of immunity may ... have bolstered the witnesses' credibility," it concluded that "the very need for the immunity and compulsion orders ... undercut the credibility of these witnesses," and that it was important for the jury to draw its own inferences from the circumstances under which the witnesses testified.

United States v. Fernandez, 829 F.2d 363 (2d Cir. 1987) : The Court observed that the existence of an agreement may be adduced on direct examination to preclude any inference of concealment by the government, but that the agreement itself may be admitted on redirect examination only as a proper response to cross-examination. The Court reasoned that not every cross-examination that attempts to undermine the testimony of a government witness warrants admission of an agreement, e.g., an examination that did not challenge credibility but merely suggested some confusion on the witness' part would not justify admission of the agreement. In this case, any error in admitting the agreement was found to be harmless. The Court stated in United States v. Cosentino n21 that the text of a cooperation agreement may be introduced during direct examination when the defendant's opening statement challenges the credibility of the witness. See also United States v. Borello n22(the defendant's convictions for smuggling goods into the United States were reversed after the government improperly introduced a witness' written cooperation agreement on direct examination).

United States v. Universal Rehabilitation Servs. (PA), Inc., 205 F.3d 657 (3d Cir. 2000) (en banc): In the prosecution of a corporation and its director of operations for Medicare fraud, the Court found no abuse of discretion in denying a defense motion in limine to bar the government from introducing evidence that two prosecution witnesses, former employees of the corporation, had pleaded guilty to fraud in the scheme, although defense counsel represented that they would not challenge the credibility of the two witnesses. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 607.02[4]. In United States v. Gambino, 926 F.2d 1355 (3d Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed convictions for drug offenses, holding that the government could properly elicit guilty pleas of testifying accomplices on direct examination to dampen subsequent attacks on credibility and to foreclose any suggestion that the party producing the witness was concealing evidence, so long as the jury understands the limited purposes of a coconspirator's guilty plea. See also United States v. Frankenberry n23(the government may elicit on direct examination that a witness is in a protection program and has received substantial benefit, as long as it does not exploit any inference of threats by the defendant).

United States v. Romer, 148 F.3d 359, 1998-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72197 (4th Cir. 1998) : The Court found no error when the cooperating witness testified on direct that he had entered into a plea agreement with the government. The Court held that the protections that it set forth in United States v. Henderson, 717 F.2d 135 (4th Cir. 1983) , had been met, specifically: (1) the prosecutor's questions did not imply that the government had special knowledge of the witness' veracity; (2) the Trial Judge instructed the jury to be cautious in evaluating the witness' testimony; and (3) the prosecutor's closing argument contained no improper use of the witness' promise of truthful cooperation.

United States v. Valley, 928 F.2d 130 (5th Cir. 1991) : Affirming a conviction arising from stolen Treasury checks, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting the government to refer to testifying coconspirators' guilty pleas in its opening statement and on direct examination, when the defense, even though moving in limine to exclude mention of the pleas, had not made a timely and unequivocal commitment not to use the convictions. See also United States v. Countryman, 758 F.2d 574 (5th Cir. 1985) (the government may elicit a coconspirator's guilty plea on direct examination to blunt the impact of expected cross-examination, but it may not attempt to use the plea as affirmative evidence of the defendant's guilt).

United States v. Montani, 204 F.3d 761 (7th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a conviction for fraud, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the government to introduce evidence of the cooperating witness' guilty plea on his direct examination, even though the defendant offered before trial to stipulate that he would not use the plea to impeach the witness' testimony. Admitting the guilty plea evidence on direct avoids a piecemeal presentation and supplies an answer to the jurors' natural question why the witness would testify about crimes in which he was a participant. Any prejudicial effect was cured by an instruction that the guilty plea evidence could be considered only for credibility. In United States v. Robbins, 197 F.3d 829 (7th Cir. 1999) , the Court affirmed convictions arising out of a large-scale marijuana operation. It noted that "[o]ur case law permits the prosecutor to elicit testimony on direct examination concerning the witness' plea agreement; indeed, he may place the entire plea agreement in evidence." Rejecting defense arguments that the introduction of proffer letters and plea agreements was improper, the Court observed that "we have cautioned the Government to avoid unnecessary repetitive references to truthfulness in its plea agreements," but it found that there was no overemphasis in this case. In United States v. Sanders, n24 the Court, affirming fraud convictions, found no abuse of discretion in admitting former codefendants' guilty pleas during the government's case-in-chief, as defense trial strategy implying that the defendant was singled out and the former codefendant-witness went unpunished made admission of the plea evidence inevitable, and the jury was properly instructed not to consider the pleas as evidence against the defendant. See also United States v. McGrath n25(the government properly elicited from a codefendant testimony that he had pleaded guilty to similar charges, since the indictment charging both the defendant and the codefendant was read to the jury); United States v. LeFevour n26(no error in the government's bringing out a witness' immunity agreement even if no cross-examination was expected); United States v. Davis n27(testimony of unindicted coconspirators who had pleaded or been found guilty was properly admitted to anticipate cross-examination and avoid any impression that the government was concealing information).

United States v. Tulk, 171 F.3d 596 (8th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed convictions arising out of a narcotics conspiracy, and found no error in the introduction of evidence of prosecution witness plea agreements, noting that "the prosecutor's questioning did not suggest that the government had independently verified the testimony or that acceptance of the agreement implied that the proposed testimony was accurate." In United States v. Darden, n28 the Court affirmed racketeering convictions involving drug trafficking, holding that the government was properly permitted to elicit from a witness on direct examination the fact that the witness had made a deal with the government to receive a life sentence for certain crimes, and thus avoided exposure to the death penalty. In United States v. Kroh, n29 a bank fraud conspiracy prosecution, the government introduced during its case-in-chief a witness' guilty plea to a conspiracy with the defendant to defraud the banks in question, ostensibly to show the credibility of the witness and his admitted participation in the conspiracy. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting direct examination of the witness regarding his plea agreement, as the government did not focus on the quid pro quo involved and did not even mention that the conspiracy to which the witness had pleaded was the one with the defendant. When the defendant, on cross-examination, asked the witness whether he had agreed with the defendant to defraud the bank, the door was opened for the government to bring out that the witness had pleaded guilty to a conspiracy with the defendant. Three Judges dissented on the ground that the government unfairly called the witness merely to introduce evidence of his guilty plea.

United States v. Halbert, 640 F.2d 1000 (9th Cir. 1981) : The Court said that a prosecutor could bring out that a witness called by the government had pleaded guilty to the crime for which the defendants are being tried.

United States v. Lord, 907 F.2d 1028 (10th Cir. 1990) : Noting that a majority of the Circuits permit the government to introduce evidence of the truthfulness provisions of a witness' plea or cooperation agreement on direct examination, before any challenge to the witness' credibility, the Court held in affirming wire fraud convictions that Rule 608(a)(2)'s requirement that credibility be attacked before evidence of the witness' truthful character can be introduced was not violated by bringing out plea and cooperation agreements on direct, since the evidence impeaches as well as bolsters the witness' credibility. In United States v. Davis, n30 the Court said that the prosecution may use evidence of guilty pleas by codefendant witnesses to bolster their claim of first-hand knowledge and to blunt defense efforts at impeachment.

United States v. Smith, 893 F.2d 1269 (11th Cir. 1990) : After the beginning of a trial of a drug conspiracy, two codefendants made a plea agreement and testified for the government. The Court held that evidence of the plea agreement was properly offered by the government to counter an anticipated contention of bias and that instructions made it clear that the evidence was not to be used as substantive evidence of guilt. See also United States v. Melton n31(upholding the government's eliciting from a witness his agreement to plead guilty and the bargain for dismissal of charges against his wife).

[iv] Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity -- Impeachment Use -- Use Improper

United States v. Dworken, 855 F.2d 12 (1st Cir. 1988) : The Court noted that a codefendant's plea may be elicited on direct to dampen the likely effects of an attack by a defendant, but cautioned that prosecutors may not use such a plea to support an inference of guilt on the part of other defendants. Although it found misconduct in the prosecutor's statements in the instant case, it determined that reversal was not required.

United States v. Runnels, 833 F.2d 1183 (1987) , vacated on other grounds, 877 F.2d 481 (6th Cir. 1989) (en banc): The Court observed that the government's revelation that a witness had entered a guilty plea "smack[ed] of sharp practice, at the least," since the only purpose for offering the evidence was to mislead the jury into thinking that the witness had no motive to be favorable to the government.

[b] Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity -- Polygraph and Truthfulness Provisions

United States v. Musacchia, 900 F.2d 493 (1990) , vacated in part on other grounds, 955 F.2d 3 (2d Cir. 1991) : The Court, in reviewing a tax evasion case, found error in admitting three prosecution witnesses' testimony on direct about "truth-telling" provisions in their cooperation agreements, but the error was harmless. See also United States v. Jones n32(truth-telling portions of cooperation agreements were properly admitted once the defendant questioned the motive of government witnesses and inquired into their immunity status); United States v. Borello n33(convictions for smuggling goods into the United States were reversed after the government improperly introduced a witness' written cooperation agreement on direct examination).

United States v. Porter, 821 F.2d 968 (4th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that it was error, but harmless, to introduce a plea agreement containing a requirement that a government witness take a polygraph test. See also United States v. Herrera n34(evidence of plea agreements that referred to a witness' possibly taking a polygraph examination was improperly admitted, since it amounted to bolstering the witness' credibility with inadmissible evidence); United States v. Henderson n35(finding no error in the government's bringing out a witness' plea agreement, although the defendant had not indicated whether he planned to question the witness about it, or in disclosing a truthful-testimony promise in the agreement, where the prosecutor never implied the government had special knowledge concerning the witness' truthfulness).

United States v. Tocco, 200 F.3d 401 (6th Cir. 2000) : In a RICO prosecution of a Mafia leader, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a cooperating witness' plea agreement that contained a promise to "provide truthful and complete information." Introduction of the entire plea agreement permitted the jury to consider fully the witness' possible conflicting motivations, and the prosecutor did not improperly rely on the truthfulness provision in closing argument to vouch for the witness. In United States v. Townsend, n36 the Court affirmed convictions for mail fraud and altering odometers, holding that the government was properly permitted to elicit testimony showing that its witness had entered into a plea bargain and that the agreement contained a promise the witness would testify truthfully.

United States v. Collins, 223 F.3d 502 (7th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting cooperation and plea agreements for ten government witnesses. Introduction of the agreements, which contained stipulations to provide "complete and truthful" information and testimony, and eliciting testimony from each witness that s/he was obligated to be truthful did not constitute impermissible "unnecessarily repetitive references to truthfulness." The Court reiterated its caution to prosecutors from United States v. Thornton, infra. In United States v. Robbins, 197 F.3d 829 (7th Cir. 1999) , the Court affirmed convictions arising out of a large-scale marijuana operation. It found no abuse of discretion when the defense was barred from asking witnesses, whose plea agreements and proffer letters stated that each of them was willing to submit to a polygraph examination at the request of the government, whether they had taken the polygraph tests. The Court reasoned that "even the threshold question as to whether a polygraph test had been administered would confuse and cause speculation among the jury." In a drug conspiracy prosecution, United States v. Thornton, n37 the government introduced plea agreements for the nine cooperating witnesses and proffer letters for most of those witnesses. Each proffer letter made three references to truthfulness, and each plea agreement made five references to truthfulness. The Court approved admission, but it repeated its warning to prosecutors to avoid "unnecessarily repetitive references to truthfulness," noted that three references in the proffer letters and five in the plea agreements came "perilously close" to the line, and observed that the proffer letters in particular seemed overkill, since they had no distinct evidentiary purpose when a superseding plea agreement has been reached. The plea agreements also contained a sentence in which the witness agreed to submit to a polygraph examination upon the government's request (no requests were made, and none of the witnesses ever took a test); the Judge redacted this sentence from all the plea agreements. However, the proffer letters of two witnesses also contained the sentence. The Court said it was a mistake to admit the proffer letters without redacting the polygraph reference, but that any error was rendered harmless by a cautionary instruction not to pay attention to whether the witness might have taken a polygraph test. In United States v. Mealy, n38 a marijuana prosecution, the government was properly permitted to introduce codefendants' plea agreements; references to truthful testimony were not disproportionately emphasized and the prosecutor did not vouch for the witnesses.

United States v. Plumley, 207 F.3d 1086 (8th Cir. 2000) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy to transport a stolen vehicle, perjury, and making a false statement, the Court held there was no error in permitting the prosecutor to elicit testimony from three prosecution witnesses that they had entered into cooperation agreements that required them to tell the truth. The Court observed that "[w]e have held that a prosecutor may inquire into the terms of a cooperating witness's plea agreement so long as this information is not used as evidence of the defendant's guilt and the jury understands its duty to judge witness credibility independently." The Court noted that the prosecutor said nothing to imply that the defendant must be guilty because his friends had pleaded guilty.

United States v. Dadanian, 818 F.2d 1443 (1987) , vacated in part on other grounds, 856 F.2d 1391 (9th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that admission of a plea agreement in which a witness agreed to testify truthfully and to cooperate did not amount to improper vouching for credibility. See also United States v. Kats n39(a co-perpetrator's partially redacted plea agreement, which contained promises to give truthful testimony and allowed the government to rescind an immunity grant for untruthfulness, was properly admitted after the defendant attacked the witness' credibility). In United States v. Brown, n40 the Court reversed heroin distribution convictions because the prosecutor improperly brought to the jury's attention the fact that as part of plea bargain agreements several government witnesses agreed to submit to polygraph tests. The government may bring out that it has made a bargain with a witness, but it may not elicit every fact that might be mentioned in the agreement.

See also United States v. Bowie, 892 F.2d 1494 (10th Cir. 1990) (the error, if any, in permitting an FBI agent to mention the "truthfulness" portion of witnesses' cooperation agreements during direct examination was harmless, given defense counsel's attack during cross-examination).

United States v. Dennis, 786 F.2d 1029 (11th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, finding that the government was properly permitted to introduce the terms of a plea agreement, which included a promise to testify truthfully, once the defendant attacked a witness on cross-examination. In United States v. Cruz, n41 a prosecution of a large cocaine distribution conspiracy, the Court held that a prosecutor properly introduced truth-telling provisions in plea agreements of government witnesses on direct examination where the witnesses' credibility came under heavy attack from the first opening statements by the defense. In United States v. Hilton, n42 the Court reversed drug convictions because the government was permitted to introduce plea bargain documents containing references to polygraph examinations and to argue that its witnesses were credible because they agreed to such examinations. A dissenting Judge argued that the evidence of the offers to take examinations did not bolster credibility.

[c] Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity -- Potential Sentence

United States v. Cropp, 127 F.3d 354 (4th Cir. 1997) : The Court held in a crack distribution conspiracy prosecution that there was no abuse of discretion in prohibiting cross-examination of cooperating witnesses regarding the specific penalties that they would have received absent cooperation or that they hoped to receive due to their cooperation. Defense counsel were permitted to ask the witnesses whether they faced a "severe penalty" prior to cooperating and whether they expected to receive a lesser sentence because of their cooperation. Any additional probative value from quantitative questions was outweighed by the certain prejudice to the government that would result when a sympathetic jury learns that a finding of guilt results in 10-20 years of imprisonment.

[6] Defense Witness' Guilty Plea

United States v. Chilcote, 724 F.2d 1498 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court upheld a cocaine conviction, finding that a defense witness was properly impeached with a guilty plea as to his own involvement in the transactions that included the defendant. The Court noted that the defendant did not object to the evidence of the plea at trial and found that the government did not take unfair advantage with the evidence.

[7] Drug Use

United States v. Kaplan, 832 F.2d 676 (1st Cir. 1987) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) to prohibit a defendant from cross-examining a witness concerning his regular use of cocaine, in order to impeach his ability to observe and remember.

Smalley v. United States, 798 F.2d 1182 (8th Cir. 1986) : In a prosecution for conspiracy to falsify firearms dealers' records, the Court found no error in the exclusion of a pharmacist's testimony concerning the effects of a drug that a witness had taken, since the offer of proof indicated that the pharmacist could not render an opinion as to whether the drug would reduce inhibitions against lying.

[8] Group Membership

United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45 (1984) : In Abel's armed robbery trial, a defense witness, Mills, testified that he had been in prison with Abel and a government witness, Ehle, and that Ehle had told him that Abel was not one of the robbers, but that he would implicate Abel in order to obtain a shorter sentence for himself. On cross-examination, the prosecutor asked Mills whether he and Abel were members in a secret prison organization whose members would lie to protect each other. Mills denied this, and the prosecution recalled Ehle to testify that Abel and Mills were, in fact, members of such an organization. The Court of Appeals found the impeachment was improper because it involved a "group tenet," rather than a personal tenet on the part of Mills. A unanimous Supreme Court reversed, holding that bias impeachment was permissible and that the type of organization to which members belong can be relevant to assessing the nature or extent of a witness' bias.

United States v. Elkins, 70 F.3d 81 (10th Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed a conviction for being a felon in possession of a firearm because evidence of the defendant's and a defense witness' gang membership and gang activity was improperly admitted to impeach the witness. There was no evidence that the two were members of the same gang or that the witness' testimony was biased because of fear of gang discipline.

[9] Habit Evidence

United States v. Ible, 630 F.2d 389 (5th Cir. 1980) : Reversing a conviction for possession of counterfeit currency on another ground, the Court noted that "it is well settled that impeachment of a witness by presenting testimony of a general habit of intemperance unrelated to veracity is improper."

[10] "Impeaching" an Accused Who Does Not Testify

United States v. Beeks, 224 F.3d 741 (8th Cir. 2000) : The Court reversed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, because the prosecutor referred to the defendant's prior conviction even though he never testified. Cross-examining a defense witness who testified to the defendant's employment history, the prosecutor sought to elicit how the defendant had responded to a question regarding prior convictions on an employment form he had filled out. An objection was sustained before the witness could answer, but the Court found prosecutorial misconduct because the implication of the question was that the defendant had been convicted of a crime and had lied to his employer about it. That was an improper attempt "to obtain the effect of impeachment even though Beeks did not testify."

[11] Impeachment, and Anticipating Impeachment, on Direct Examination

[a] Hearsay Evidence

[i] Offered by Accused

United States v. Sebetich, 776 F.2d 412 (3d Cir. 1985) : The Court found that the defendants were properly precluded from calling a witness for the purpose of offering an inconsistent statement that was not admissible as substantive evidence.

United States v. Fay, 668 F.2d 375 (8th Cir. 1981) : The Court held there was no error in refusing to permit a defendant charged with assault to call a witness for the sole purpose of subsequently offering a prior out-of-court statement not admissible as substantive evidence.

[ii] Impeachment, and Anticipating Impeachment, on Direct Examination -- Hearsay Evidence -- Offered by Prosecution

United States v. Johnson, 802 F.2d 1459 (D.C. Cir. 1986) : Although the Court affirmed a cocaine conviction, it found that the prosecution acted improperly in calling a witness for the sole purpose of bringing out the witness' postarrest statement that was not independently admissible.

United States v. Zackson, 12 F.3d 1178 (2d Cir. 1993) : The Court held it was error, but harmless, for the prosecutor to call an unwilling witness solely to get before the jury inadmissible hearsay under the guise of refreshing recollection.

United States v. Ince, 21 F.3d 576 (4th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a conviction for assault with a dangerous weapon, finding that "the United States' only apparent purpose for impeaching one of its own witnesses was to circumvent the hearsay rule and to expose the jury to otherwise inadmissible evidence of [the defendant]'s alleged confession." In United States v. Brewer, 1 F.3d 1430 (4th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed a cocaine conviction, finding that the defendant failed to preserve a claim that the government called a witness solely to elicit testimony (after she denied that the defendant was a drug dealer) that she had told federal marshals the defendant was such a dealer. A dissenting Judge believed that the error was preserved and that "the prosecution attempted to set up its own witness as a straw man whom it could impeach by the use of inadmissible hearsay."

United States v. Livingston, 816 F.2d 184 (5th Cir. 1987) : Affirming convictions involving stolen securities, the Court observed that a prosecutor may not introduce a prior inconsistent statement under the guise of impeachment when its real purpose is to place incriminating hearsay before the jury. Here, the government called a witness to testify against the defendant and properly anticipated defense impeachment by offering the witness' prior inconsistent statement. In United States v. Hogan, n43 the Court reversed a marijuana conviction "[b]ecause the government called a witness for the primary purpose of impeaching him with otherwise inadmissible hearsay evidence." It reasoned that the danger is that "[t]he jury will hear the impeachment evidence, which is not otherwise admissible and is not substantive proof of guilt, but is likely to be received as such proof."

United States v. Shoupe, 548 F.2d 636 (6th Cir. 1977) : Armed bank robbery convictions were overturned because the prosecution had been permitted "to recite to a recalcitrant government witness a litany of leading questions which incorporated the entire substance of his unsworn, oral statements inculpating the Appellants." The witness, an accomplice who had pleaded guilty, maintained at trial that he had no recollection who was with him in the bank, and the prosecutor attempted to lay a foundation for introducing prior oral statements that the witness made to FBI agents. The Court held it was error to use the prior unsworn statements, although limited impeachment of the witness using the substance of an FBI agent's memorandum would have been permissible under Rule 613(a).

United States v. Medley, 913 F.2d 1248 (7th Cir. 1990) : Affirming bribery convictions, the Court held there was no error in permitting the government to impeach a previously convicted accomplice when his testimony was inconsistent with his plea colloquy and grand jury testimony. The impeachment was not used just to introduce otherwise inadmissible hearsay. In United States v. Kane, 944 F.2d 1406 (7th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed a fraud conviction, holding that the prosecution had not improperly called the defendant's wife merely to introduce inconsistent hearsay statements. The prosecution had a sincere reason to call her because she had firsthand knowledge of the scheme, and had no reason to believe she would be hostile or would supply an opportunity for impeachment. In United States v. Webster, n44 the Court observed that it would be an abuse of the Rule for a party to call a witness in order to put before a jury inconsistent statements not qualifying for admission under Rule 801. Here, however, the prosecutor asked the Trial Judge for permission to voir dire a witness outside the hearing of the jury because she did not know what he would say, and the Judge denied permission following an objection by defense counsel, which indicated that the prosecutor believed in good faith that the witness would be favorable, although she could not be certain what he would say. The Court also observed that statements offered by a prosecutor for impeachment might be excluded under Rule 403, even though the prosecutor acted in good faith.

United States v. Gilbert, 57 F.3d 709 (9th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held that the government acted properly in calling two eyewitnesses and impeaching them with prior statements, not independently admissible, concerning the defendant's possession of a gun. The Court observed that, if the government had not called these two witnesses, "the jury would have been left to ponder why the government was reluctant to question these eye-witnesses." In United States v. Gomez-Gallardo, 915 F.2d 553 (9th Cir. 1990) , the Court reversed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, finding plain error when the purpose for which the government called a witness was impeaching the witness and thereby introducing otherwise inadmissible evidence, rather than using the witness' testimony, which it knew would be false. Sustaining a bank robbery conviction in United States v. Crouch, n45 the Court held it was error (but harmless) for the government "overzealously" to call a witness knowing that she would deny having said certain things in order to "impeach" her with prior statements that were not admissible under Rule 801.

United States v. Carter, 973 F.2d 1509 (10th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring to distribute cocaine, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a government witness' prior statement made to the police. Although the witness had said a week prior to trial that he was fearful and would not testify, that fact was not sufficient to establish that the prosecutor had an improper purpose in calling the witness to the stand and offering his prior statement when the witness failed to testify consistently with that statement. In United States v. Johnson, 977 F.2d 1360 (10th Cir. 1992) , a prosecution for drug-manufacturing and firearms offenses, the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting an accomplice witness' prior statement that one of the defendants had been armed, as the government had been surprised by the witness' testimony on direct (contrary to his grand jury testimony) that the defendant did not possess a gun -- or at least that he did not recall whether the defendant possessed a gun -- at the relevant time. In United States v. Peterman, n46 the Court affirmed fraud convictions, finding that the government was properly permitted to introduce the prior conviction of a coperpetrator called as a government witness, after the witness' testimony took it by surprise. The Court recognized that a prosecutor may not use impeachment as a guise for putting inadmissible evidence before a trier of fact, but it concluded that the government's offer of the evidence was for a legitimate purpose.

[iii] Impeachment, and Anticipating Impeachment, on Direct Examination -- Hearsay Evidence -- Offered in Civil Case

Balogh's of Coral Gables, Inc. v. Getz, 798 F.2d 1356 (11th Cir. 1986) (en banc), reinstating 778 F.2d 649 (11th Cir. 1985) : In an antitrust case, the Court held that a statement, allegedly made by a former employee of a defendant company, that was handwritten by the plaintiff's counsel and initialed by the former employee was properly excluded as hearsay. The Court added that "a witness may not be called solely for the purpose of impeaching him and thereby obtaining otherwise inadmissible testimony."

[b] Impeachment, and Anticipating Impeachment, on Direct Examination -- Miscellaneous Cases

Robinson v. Watts Detective Agency, 685 F.2d 729 (1st Cir. 1982) : In a suit by a bankruptcy trustee company to recover assets allegedly misappropriated from a security company, the Court upheld the trustee's calling an adverse party and impeaching that party with evidence of a prior conviction. It noted that "[i]mpeachment under Rule 607 is not limited to occasions where the party calling the witness is surprised or misled by the testimony."

United States v. Louis, 814 F.2d 852 (2d Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed heroin convictions, finding no error in the prosecutor's eliciting on direct examination of a government witness that the witness had been convicted of the same crimes for which the defendant was on trial. The testimony did not impermissibly suggest that the defendant's lack of knowledge defense had been rejected, since the witness never mentioned the defense.

United States v. Livingston, 816 F.2d 184 (5th Cir. 1987) : Affirming convictions involving stolen securities, the Court found no error when a government witness was permitted to say that he had recanted his prior version of the events and to give an explanation on direct, since the defense certainly would have elicited the same information. In United States v. Fusco, 748 F.2d 996 (5th Cir. 1984) , the Court held that it was permissible in a marijuana importation case for the government to show that an informant-witness had been paid money for participation in investigations, to prove that payments were not for "saying the right things on the stand." The Trial Judge has authority under Rule 611(a) to permit the government to anticipate an attack, but the Court suggested that ordinarily anticipation of impeachment should be avoided.

United States v. Faymore, 736 F.2d 328 (6th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a doctor's convictions for narcotics offenses, finding that the government properly elicited testimony from a witness who had worked with drug enforcement agents in the case that tended to impeach her credibility. The evidence related to the witness' drug dependence, the government's payment of money to her, and its promise to aid her incarcerated husband. Under the Rule a party is not required to leave impeachment for the cross-examiner.

United States v. Giles, 246 F.3d 966 (7th Cir. 2001) : In the prosecution of a Chicago Alderman for, inter alia, receiving bribes from a government mole (Christopher), the Court found no error in precluding the defendant from calling the mole, who was in a witness protection program, as a defense witness ostensibly to prove that the government scripted his conversations with Giles. The Court found that a party may not call a witness for the sole purpose of impeaching him, noting that "it seems clear here that the true defense reason (and we can understand the desire to do it) for wanting to put Christopher on the stand was to expose his warts to the jury and float the inference that the FBI should not play footsie with a sleazeball." Further, the defendant did not make an offer of proof as to the substance of the testimony he believed in good faith that Christopher would give. In United States v. Holly, 167 F.3d 393 (7th Cir. 1999) , the Court affirmed fraud convictions, finding no error when the government was permitted to bring out on direct examination that the defendant had threatened witnesses, since defense counsel indicated that he intended to use the witnesses' prior statements exculpatory of the defendant on cross-examination. In United States v. Ienco, n47 the Court reversed a conviction for extortion offenses because the Trial Judge had, inter alia, not permitted the defendant to use leading questions to impeach his own witness during a suppression hearing.

United States v. Spears, 827 F.2d 705 (11th Cir. 1987) : Reversing a judgment denying the government's motion in limine and dismissing an indictment that charged prison officials with excessive use of force, the Court held that the government could anticipate the impeachment of witnesses who made prior inconsistent statements and could elicit explanations that the witnesses believed they would lose their jobs if they did not make such statements.

[c] Impeachment, and Anticipating Impeachment, on Direct Examination -- Prejudicial Evidence

United States v. Rodriguez-Cardona, 924 F.2d 1148 (1st Cir. 1991) : On direct examination of an informant in a drug prosecution, the government brought out that he had come to the FBI's attention during an investigation of several murders. Noting its concern that this sort of "context" evidence could easily be misused by placing a defendant in the midst of extensive criminal activity unrelated to the offense charged, the Court nevertheless held that here the prosecution had a need to get the damaging evidence about the informant in front of the jury prior to cross-examination. As the testimony did not implicate the defendant in the murders and the Judge gave a cautionary instruction, there was no possible prejudice and admission of the testimony was not error. In United States v. Frappier, n48 the Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for procuring the premeditated murder of her husband. The Court upheld the government's calling the defendant's daughter to testify and eliciting the fact that the defendant had married the daughter's ex-husband, but observed that it was a close question whether the government should have been permitted to call the daughter and to impeach her with such a prejudicial fact.

United States v. Eisen, 974 F.2d 246 (2d Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed RICO convictions for a law firm's fraudulent conducting of personal injury litigation, holding there was no abuse of discretion in allowing the government to call witnesses that it had said "have refused to give up the lie." Where the government has called a witness whose corroborating testimony is instrumental in constructing its case, it has a right to question the witness, and to attempt to impeach him, about those aspects of his testimony that conflict with the government's account of the same events. The prejudicial effect of the impeachment in this case did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence.

United States v. Melia, 691 F.2d 672 (4th Cir. 1982) : The Court reversed a conviction for receipt of stolen property, finding it was improper to admit evidence that witnesses had been threatened in showing the good character and credibility of key government witnesses. The Court said that the government may use evidence that a witness is participating in a witness protection plan to counter inferences of bias or improper motivation, and that such evidence might be offered on direct examination. However, the evidence must be handled with caution, since it can be unduly prejudicial to a defendant, as in this case.

United States v. West, 22 F.3d 586 (5th Cir. 1994) : In a bankruptcy fraud prosecution, the government called a witness who was an associate of the defendant's, and impeached the witness on direct by questioning him about his three felonies. The defendant argued that such impeachment was not necessary to take the "sting" out of expected impeachment of the witness by the defendant, because the defendant had "guaranteed" that he would not bring out the convictions on cross-examination, and that the prosecutor had introduced the convictions solely for the purpose of proving the defendant's guilt by association with the witness. The Court held that the impeachment was permissible because the witness' testimony was critical, and the jury had been instructed to use the convictions solely in judging the credibility of the witness. The Court did not directly answer, however, why the prosecution would find it necessary to take the "sting" out of an expected impeachment that the defendant had "guaranteed" would never occur.

United States v. Gorny, 732 F.2d 597 (7th Cir. 1984) : In a fraud and racketeering prosecution, the Court found that the government did not seek unfair advantage in charging the defendant with several counts involving a close friend, calling the friend as a witness, and subsequently eliciting evidence on redirect examination that impeached the witness. The defendant claimed that the government endeavored to hurt him unfairly by bringing out unrelated incidents concerning his friend that would spill over to him. The Court concluded, however, that the charges fit in with others contained in the indictment and that the government only offered its impeachment evidence after the defendant elicited testimony from the witness that his only motive in doing favors for the defendant was his personal friendship for the defendant. Although it approved the impeachment in this case, the Court observed that "[i]t is possible for a party to abuse this rule [607], and prosecutorial conduct, in particular, must be carefully scrutinized to ascertain that a witness has not been called merely for the purpose of introducing irrelevant evidence or of establishing the defendant's guilt by association with the witness." In United States v. Boroni, n49 the Court reversed (2-1) a conviction for cocaine offenses, finding it was error to permit the government to elicit evidence from a key witness that his immunity agreement covered an unrelated cash register skimming scheme involving him and the defendant. The unrelated crime was inadmissible under Rule 404(b) and was prejudicial.

[d] Impeachment, and Anticipating Impeachment, on Direct Examination -- Prior Crimes or Bad Acts

United States v. Flemmi, 402 F.3d 79 (1st Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed the convictions of a retired Boston police officer arising from his assistance in hiding weapons and impeding an investigation of a criminal enterprise in which his brother was a controlling member. It held that the prosecution properly elicited from the key witness testimony regarding three murders committed in his presence and his involvement in the unlawful acquisition of a liquor store. The Court reasoned that the prosecution may elicit potential impeachment evidence on direct examination, and it was clear to the jury that the defendant was not involved in the crimes about which the witness testified. In an extortion case, United States v. Rivera-Medina, 845 F.2d 12 (1st Cir. 1988) , the Court upheld the government's effort to elicit from its witnesses testimony that they committed 100 crimes in order to anticipate a defense attack and to reduce its impact.

United States v. Marroquin, 885 F.2d 1240 (5th Cir. 1989) : The Court held that a government witness was properly permitted to testify concerning other frauds he had perpetrated, since he could have been cross-examined about them and the government is permitted to "blunt the sword" by revealing the information first.

United States v. Douglas, 403 F.3d 922 (7th Cir. 2005) : The defendant was charged with selling crack cocaine to a confidential informant, who the government chose not to call as a witness at trial, probably because of his substantial criminal history. When the defense indicated that it planned to call the informant, the Judge ruled in limine that the defense could call the informant as a transactional witness and impeach him with prior inconsistent statements concerning the circumstances, but because the informant's "credibility was not at issue[,] ... his criminal history was irrelevant." Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the ruling. Because the government's case rested entirely on the testimony of the undercover officers who set up the transactions, the informant's credibility "would be irrelevant and inadmissible. ... A party is not free to impeach the credibility of a witness simply for the sake of doing so."

United States v. Bad Cob, 560 F.2d 877 (8th Cir. 1977) : Affirming a larceny conviction, the Court explained that permitting defense counsel to introduce the defendant's prior criminal record "has been justified on the ground that it serves a twofold purpose: (a) to bring out the witness' 'real character,' the whole person, particularly his credibility, and (b) to draw the teeth out of [an] adversary's probable use of the same evidence on cross-examination."

[12] Impeachment of Inadmissible Testimony

United States v. Foster, 376 F.3d 577 (6th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed drug and firearm convictions, holding that the government was properly permitted to impeach the defendant's ex-girlfriend, who testified as a defense witness to the events surrounding the defendant's arrest. The girlfriend's direct testimony that the defendant had gone into a dumpster with her and her son to look for the defendant's cell phone was contradicted by a prior inconsistent statement she made to the police. This was standard impeachment. Then, on cross-examination the prosecution asked the witness whether she had ever seen the defendant selling PCP. The Judge permitted a voir dire of the witness in response to Rule 403 and Rule 404(b) objections. The witness said she never saw the defendant with or selling PCP. The government was then permitted to ask the witness the same question in the presence of the jury and then to impeach her with a prior inconsistent statement. The Court affirmed, on the ground that this also was standard impeachment. In our view, that holding is suspect. When the prosecutor went beyond the scope of the direct, ordinarily the prosecutor is proceeding "as if on direct examination" pursuant to Rule 611(b). Had the prosecutor called the girlfriend as a witness, he could not do so for the purpose of offering the inconsistent statement because it was not admissible for its truth under Rule 801(d)(1)(A). It seems that the prosecutor essentially circumvented the rule that a witness may not be asked questions for the purpose of offering inconsistent statements not admissible for their truth. The prosecutor knew the witness would deny seeing the defendant selling PCP, and in going beyond her direct testimony to explore the issue the prosecutor appears to have wanted her prior statement in evidence.

[13] Limitations on Cross-Examination

[a] Contradiction

United States v. Kohan, 806 F.2d 18 (2d Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a conviction for bank fraud, finding it was error to preclude the defendant from cross-examining a government witness in an effort to show that the witness, not the defendant, might have been engaged in a conspiracy to defraud the bank. The evidence in the case supported this theory of defense, and the Trial Judge, although possessing broad discretion in ruling on the scope of cross-examination, should allow wide latitude for defense cross-examination of a government witness. In United States v. Pedroza, n50 the Court reversed kidnapping conspiracy convictions because the defendants were not permitted to ask witnesses whether the kidnapped boy's father had voluntarily entrusted his son to them. The Court found that in its questioning of the father, the government opened the inquiry into whether he had consented to give his son to the defendants and that, even if the government had not asked such questions, there was an evidentiary basis for them.

United States v. Meacham, 626 F.2d 503 (5th Cir. 1980) : The Court reversed a drug conviction because counsel was not permitted to cross-examine a government agent about recorded calls made to him by the defendant. Although the calls made reference to other defendants and were inadmissible hearsay as to them, the Court said cross-examination would have revealed inconsistencies between the calls and the agent's testimony. The Court suggested that granting a severance would have been a prudent course of action.

[b] Limitations on Cross-Examination -- Cumulative Questioning

United States v. Williamson, 202 F.3d 974 (7th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a conviction for cocaine possession, the Court held that the Trial Judge provided the defendant with numerous opportunities to attack the informant who had purchased cocaine from the defendant. The Court noted that a Judge has discretion to exclude cumulative evidence even though such evidence is offered to impeach an important witness.

United States v. Beardslee, 197 F.3d 378 (9th Cir. 1999) , amended, 204 F.3d 983 (9th Cir. 2000) : The Trial Judge in an arson-fraud conspiracy prosecution limited the defense cross-examination of two cooperating witnesses. The Court held that the error, if any, in barring examination of one witness regarding his being on probation was harmless, since the relevance of the evidence was "marginal, at best," and the witness was adequately examined on other issues touching his credibility and bias against the defendant, such as his failure to fully implicate her in his first ATF interview. There was also no abuse of discretion in barring examination of the other witness regarding traffic citations for which he had not paid the fine and an arrest warrant had been issued. The marginal relevance of the evidence would likely have been outweighed by the risk of confusing the jury; furthermore, the witness admitted on cross-examination that he did not "live up to" his obligation under the plea agreement to "obey all laws," and that he believed he had not been sanctioned because he was cooperating, so the failure to specify what laws he had not obeyed would have been largely irrelevant to his credibility.

United States v. McGuire, 200 F.3d 668 (10th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a carjacking conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was precluded from cross-examining a cooperating witness about juvenile convictions for misdemeanor theft and being on probation at the time of the incident. The defense had been permitted to conduct an extensive and searching cross-examination exposing the witness' credibility, motives, and biases.

[c] Limitations on Cross-Examination -- Impeachment for Bias

United States v. Lin, 101 F.3d 760 (D.C. Cir. 1996) : The Court held in a Hostage Taking Act prosecution that there was no abuse of discretion or Confrontation Clause violation in precluding defense counsel from asking a witness whether he was involved in a gambling business allegedly competing with the defendant's. Although the evidence might go to the witness' bias, the defense provided no basis aside from the defendant's unsworn assertions for initiating such a highly prejudicial line of questioning. In United States v. Anderson, n51 the Trial Judge in a cocaine trafficking case did not permit the defendants to cross-examine a key prosecution witness, who was testifying under immunity, about a prior charge of murder that had been dismissed without prejudice to reinstatement. The Court held the ruling violated the defendants' confrontation rights because even if there were no promises of leniency, the jury might reasonably have found that the government's right to reinstate the murder charge furnished the witness with a motive for favoring the prosecution in her testimony.

United States v. Twomey, 806 F.2d 1136 (1st Cir. 1986) : Affirming convictions of a former federal prosecutor for the sale of law enforcement information to a drug smuggler, the Court held there was no error in precluding cross-examination of the purchaser of the information as to allegations that he had been involved in two murders, since the unsubstantiated allegations were highly prejudicial and of little probative value. The jury was sufficiently able to assess the witness' motivations on the basis of evidence that he had entered into an arrangement whereby the government recommended a favorable sentence in return for his cooperation in the prosecution. See also United States v. Pitocchelli n52(a limitation on cross-examination of a coconspirator concerning acts of retaliation against the defendant was permissible where the jury had other evidence as to the conspirator's violent nature and attitude toward the defendant); United States v. Kepreos n53("If the jury has sufficient evidence ... bearing on the witness' bias, the court need not permit unending excursions into each and every matter touching upon veracity."); United States v. Barrett n54(the Judge properly limited cross-examination as the defendant otherwise sufficiently showed the bias of a government witness).

United States v. Tindle, 808 F.2d 319 (4th Cir. 1986) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in restricting defense cross-examination to the offenses actually charged against a government witness and to his plea agreement, and in preventing questions about the witness' possible exposure to a life sentence for participation in a continuing criminal enterprise; the jury already had ample evidence of his incentives to please the government.

United States v. Mayer, 556 F.2d 245 (5th Cir. 1977) : The Court reversed convictions for filing of false statements with the VA, holding it was error to limit cross-examination of three prosecution witnesses to their guilty pleas and not permit evidence of the underlying bargains that could be relevant to bias.

United States v. Christian, 786 F.2d 203 (6th Cir. 1986) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court held that the defendants were not unfairly treated when they were denied an opportunity to cross-examine a witness about dismissal of her state drug charge, since they did elicit evidence that the government was paying her and that she sought to help her husband by cooperating. See also United States v. Touchstone n55(the jury in a drug case had ample evidence to make a credibility judgment without hearing that a government witness had been given immunity for two homicides in exchange for his cooperation, where another defendant might have been prejudiced by evidence of the homicides).

United States v. McGee, 408 F.3d 966 (7th Cir. 2005) : The defendants in a drug trafficking conspiracy trial sought to impeach a cooperating witness with two letters the witness had written to the prosecutor in which he said he was "not a bad person" and was "riding with the government 100%" and that he knew enough information so that "we can make arrangements for [me] to go home." The Court noted that "the better practice would have been" for the Judge to allow each defense attorney some leeway to cross-examine the witness on the letters, as evidence of his biases and motivations for testifying, but that any error was harmless. The Court rejected the government's assertion that the letters were inadmissible hearsay, noting that they were "textbook examples of impeachment evidence." In United States v. Muelbl, n56 the Court upheld restrictions placed on the cross-examination of government witnesses, where defense counsel was able to develop the apparent motives and biases of the witnesses.

United States v. Jakoubek, 411 F.3d 951 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a murder-for-hire conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when the defense was not permitted to elicit evidence of State Court charges pending against the government's key witness. In the Court's view, it was sufficient that the jury was informed of the witness' extensive criminal history and the terms of his cooperation agreement, since "there was no indication that [the witness] would or could receive assistance from the government regarding his warrant on pending state charges, let alone that he altered his testimony or sought to 'entrap' Jakoubek in exchange for such assistance."

United States v. Jackson, 756 F.2d 703 (9th Cir. 1985) : Where a witness was examined concerning his payment for an agreement to notify authorities of contact by the defendant, the Court held that it was not error to restrict further examination into his later paid cooperation with the FBI. It reasoned that "no violation of the confrontation clause occurs unless the restriction relates to an area of considerable relevancy, and the denial was prejudicial."

United States v. Sarracino, 340 F.3d 1148 (10th Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions for murder, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to limit cross-examination of the government's lead investigator, who, between the incident and the trial, had gotten in trouble with his employer and had resigned while under investigation for misuse of a government computer. Limiting defense counsel to asking whether the witness was still employed as a government investigator and precluding inquiry into the reasons for the termination of employment gave the defense insufficient opportunity to show the witness' motivation to help the government. Thus, this limitation violated the defendant's confrontation rights. In United States v. DeSoto, 950 F.2d 626 (10th Cir. 1991) , the Court reversed a conviction for unlawful possession of a firearm because the defendant was not permitted to cross-examine the principal government witness to bring out that she was the girlfriend of a man from whom the defendant had been accused of embezzling $10,000. In United States v. Young, n57 the defendant, charged with defrauding a bank in a scheme involving a fictitious account of her physician-employer, sought to examine him on his bias toward her for confronting him about potential medical malpractice liability. The Court held there was no Confrontation Clause violation in barring the examination, as its probative value was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice.

United States v. Lankford, 955 F.2d 1545 (11th Cir. 1992) : Reversing a conviction for extortion and filing false income tax returns, the Court held that exclusion of evidence that the chief prosecution witness' sons had been arrested for selling marijuana violated the defendant's Sixth Amendment right. A reasonable juror could have concluded that the witness' testimony was the result of a desire to protect his sons. In United States v. De Parias, n58 the Court affirmed extortion convictions, holding there was either no error or harmless error when the defendant was permitted to ask a prosecution witness whether the government had promised to assist him in avoiding prosecution, but was not permitted to elicit testimony that the witness was facing a murder charge. The general contours of the plea agreement would have enabled a jury to assess the witness' motivation and any error in limiting cross-examination would not have affected the jury's verdict.

[d] Limitations on Cross-Examination -- Impeachment by Inconsistent Statement or Action

United States v. Stock, 948 F.2d 1299 (D.C. Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, holding it was error (but harmless) to preclude cross-examination of an arresting officer regarding his testimony that the defendant said "I don't have anything," when he had not included this statement in his police report, the affidavit with the complaint, or his grand jury testimony. A jury might reasonably have found the omission unnatural and the prior statements inconsistent with the trial testimony.

United States v. Ayotte, 741 F.2d 865 (6th Cir. 1984) : The Court reversed drug convictions because defense counsel was not permitted to question a government agent concerning his omission of material from a written report and his grand jury testimony. The Court reasoned that "no other witness corroborated the testimony in question [of the agent], which we consider to be critical to Ayotte's convictions."

[e] Limitations on Cross-Examination -- Impeachment Generally

United States v. Drougas, 748 F.2d 8 (1st Cir. 1984) : The Court upheld limitations on defense impeachment and examination of government witnesses in a marijuana conspiracy case, noting that the Trial Judge may limit the scope of impeachment evidence or cross-examination "so long as his discretion is exercised with caution and solicitude for the defendant's sixth amendment rights."

United States v. Mourad, 729 F.2d 195 (2d Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, holding that the defendants were not denied confrontation when the Trial Judge refused to strike the testimony of a government witness who failed to return to Court for completion of his cross-examination. The defendants had almost completed cross-examination and it was the government that had been hurt by the witness' disappearance, since there was no opportunity for rehabilitation of the witness who had been impeached in substantial ways.

United States v. Adams, 759 F.2d 1099 (3d Cir. 1985) : The Court found no error in the Trial Judge's limitation on cross-examination about threats leading to a witness' participation in a witness protection program, since additional testimony might have prejudiced other defendants.

United States v. Baresh, 790 F.2d 392 (5th Cir. 1986) : Affirming marijuana convictions, the Court found no improper restriction of cross-examination of government witnesses. The pertinent question is "whether the trial court imposed unreasonable limits on cross-examination such that a reasonable jury might have received a significantly different impression of a witness' credibility had defense counsel pursued his proposed line of cross-examination." See also United States v. Carlock n59(the Court properly limited cross-examination of a government witness concerning payments for a girlfriend's abortion and for an apartment shared with someone else after permitting questions about the witness' pocketing of money); United States v. Kimble n60(where a key government witness was adequately tested by questions about his prior perjury and a plea bargain, there was no error in limiting questions concerning various unrelated state crimes).

United States v. Padin, 787 F.2d 1071 (6th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, stating that cross-examination of government witnesses is a matter of right but that the Trial Judge may limit an examination when it goes beyond providing the jury with sufficient information to assess credibility.

United States v. Robinson, 832 F.2d 366 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that it is not an abuse of discretion to preclude repetitive and confusing cross-examination. In a cocaine case, United States v. Navarro, n61 the Court found that the Trial Judge did not err in barring defense counsel from eliciting the home address and place of employment of the key government witness, where the Judge permitted cross-examination concerning the city of residence, the nature of the witness' employment, and the general location of the employer, and the Judge determined in camera that further disclosure would not have been helpful.

United States v. Lee, 743 F.2d 1240 (8th Cir. 1984) : The Court stated that a Trial Judge's limitation on the scope of cross-examination that represents a considered judgment that a matter was adequately explored will not be reversed except for an abuse of discretion.

United States v. Domina, 784 F.2d 1361 (9th Cir. 1986) : Upholding a bank robbery conviction, the Court approved a limitation on questions concerning a government witness' drug use. It observed that the defendant's confrontation right is "subject to the broad discretion of a trial judge to preclude harassment or unduly prejudicial interrogation," and that "the issue of narcotics use must be handled with some sensitivity because it can result in unnecessary prejudice and hostility toward a witness." See also United States v. Whitworth n62(sustaining an espionage conviction where the defendant had ample opportunity to cross-examine and impeach the key government witness). In United States v. Rangel, n63 the Court held that although questioning an informant as to his true name, home address, and phone number is presumptively proper under Smith v. Illinois, 390 U.S. 129 (1968) , there was no abuse of discretion in barring such questions upon a showing that the informant's life had been threatened.

United States v. Atwell, 766 F.2d 416 (10th Cir. 1985) : The Court said that "[a]s long as the defendant's basic confrontation right is protected, it is within the trial court's discretion to limit the scope of cross-examination." In United States v. Swingler, n64 the Court held that it was permissible to bar cross-examination as to a government witness' involvement in an alleged prior homicide, where the Judge permitted extensive cross-examination concerning various crimes and it was not clear that the death in question was a criminal homicide. See also United States v. Morales-Quinones n65(in a prosecution for transporting illegal aliens, there was no abuse of discretion in limiting cross-examination of a government witness concerning illegal entries into the country, where the witness was asked about entries resulting in convictions, and additional questions might have confused the jury).

United States v. Rubin, 733 F.2d 837 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court upheld limitations on cross-examination imposed in an effort to prevent cumulative testimony. See also United States v. Pepe n66(finding no error to preclude cross-examination as to the home addresses of witnesses in a protection program and a witness who was in danger). In United States v. Plotke, n67 a mail fraud and conspiracy case, a witness was unable to identify one of several defendants during an evidentiary hearing on the admissibility of conspirator statements. After a recess, he purported to make a positive identification. The Trial Judge held a hearing to determine whether the witness' ability to make the identification was the product of improper coaching and ultimately forbade the witness from identifying the defendant before the jury. The Judge barred two other defendants from impeaching the witness by asking questions about events that occurred during the recess, and the Court affirmed. It found that the defendants had ample latitude to attack the witness and that further impeachment on a collateral matter was not necessary to satisfy the demands of the Confrontation Clause. See also United States v. Perry n68(no error in prohibiting the defendant's cross-examination about some of the details of a government witness' prior drug conviction); United States v. Alonso n69(finding that cross-examination about additional bad acts was not necessary).

[f] Limitations on Cross-Examination -- Jury Confusion

United States v. Mikutowicz, 365 F.3d 65 (1st Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions for tax offenses, holding that the Trial Judge properly limited the cross-examination of an IRS agent who testified as to why the IRS concluded that the defendant and his companies took unwarranted deductions. The defendant tried to cross-examine the agent regarding various judicial opinions, even though the agent was not qualified as an expert on tax law. The Court concluded: "Had the cross-examination proceeded as Mikutowicz proposed, it would have involved defense counsel reading excerpts of cases to the jury, without the jury having a context for evaluating the import of the information that it was receiving. ... The district court was well within its discretion in concluding that such an 'examination' would have exceeded the scope of the direct examination and confused the jury."

[14] Mental Condition

United States v. Butt, 955 F.2d 77 (1st Cir. 1992) : Affirming convictions of two police officers for participating in a payoff scheme involving prostitutes, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a hospital report made following a government witness' suicide attempt, as there was no indication her mental instability at that time affected her ability to perceive or recall events or testify accurately about them. In United States v. Peters, n70 the Court affirmed the convictions of a corporation and its president for mail fraud and conspiracy, finding no error in a bar on cross-examination of a government witness concerning his psychiatric history, where the Trial Judge concluded that a prior anxiety ailment would not have affected the witness' ability to observe or to communicate.

Chnapkova v. Koh, 985 F.2d 79 (2d Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed a judgment for a patient who sued a plastic surgeon claiming that surgery had left her face scarred. It concluded that hospital records showing that the patient had a history of psychiatric problems, and did not complain of facial scarring after the surgery, should have been admitted.

Not only did the records impeach her credibility, but they also were relevant to the doctor's defense that any scarring was due to some other surgery, not his. In United States v. Bari, n71 a prison escape case, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding cross-examination of a government witness concerning hospitalization for schizophrenia for a 15-month period more than ten years before the trial.

United States v. Cecil, 836 F.2d 1431 (4th Cir. 1988) (en banc): A majority of the en banc Court concluded in a drug prosecution that there was no error in barring the defendant from eliciting evidence of a psychiatrist's unsworn opinion of a key government witness' inability to tell the truth. The psychiatrist had examined the witness three years earlier when the witness had indicated an intention to assert a diminished capacity and insanity defense to another charge. The Court found that the earlier diagnosis was irrelevant to the witness' competency to testify. The dissenters argued that the defense had a right to cross-examine with respect to mental impairment, especially since the defendant represented that he wished to show that the witness either was doubtful about his mental condition in the past or that the witness was prepared to misrepresent his condition to manipulate the judicial process.

United States v. Jimenez, 256 F.3d 330 (5th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed convictions for arson, holding there was no abuse of discretion when the defendants were not permitted to impeach a witness with evidence of his mental history. While the witness had been treated for self-destructive behavior, he was never diagnosed with a psychosis and there was "only a tenuous argument" that he suffered from an impairment affecting his ability to comprehend and tell the truth. The defendants were permitted to cross-examine him extensively regarding his drug use, criminal activity, and allegedly inconsistent statements to police.

Revels v. Vincenz, 382 F.3d 870 (8th Cir. 2004) : An involuntarily committed psychiatric patient brought a civil rights action against state hospital employees alleging Eighth Amendment violations. The Court affirmed judgments for the defendants, holding that there was no plain error in the defendants' questioning the plaintiff as to whether he heard voices in the past: "We have specifically approved the use of a witness's mental condition to challenge his credibility." In United States v. Love, 329 F.3d 981 (8th Cir. 2003) , the Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding that restrictions on cross-examination violated the defendant's Confrontation Clause right. The Court held that the defense should have been permitted to cross-examine the key government witness, who testified that he saw the defendant with a rifle or shotgun and a little revolver and that the defendant offered to sell the guns, regarding a diagnosis of schizophrenia and an impairment of his short- and long-term memory. Memory loss is a condition that implicates a witness's ability to know and relate the truth, and there was evidence that the witness suffered for years from the condition. In a prosecution for food stamp violations, United States v. Marvin, n72 the Court held that the defendant had adequate opportunity to impeach a government witness, finding no error in the exclusion of evidence that the witness had voluntarily received treatment for drug and alcohol abuse in a mental hospital.

United States v. Antone, 981 F.2d 1059 (9th Cir. 1992) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in refusing the defendant in a child abuse case access to the victim's psychiatric records, as in camera inspection revealed nothing suggesting that the victim's story was fabricated or that she suffered from any psychosis, mental defect, or addiction, or that otherwise reflected on her credibility.

United States v. Pino, 827 F.2d 1429 (10th Cir. 1987) : Affirming assault convictions, the Court found no error in the denial of a defendant's motion for a psychiatric examination of a government witness and observed that the Trial Judge has broad discretion in deciding whether to allow such an examination for purposes of impeachment.

United States v. Thompson, 976 F.2d 666 (11th Cir. 1992) : The girlfriend of a defendant had been arrested attempting to deliver methamphetamine for him and, after cooperating with the authorities, had been admitted to a hospital for treatment of her drug addiction. At trial, use of notes taken by her counselors in the hospital was permitted only on cross-examination to the extent they were inconsistent with her answers to questions about whether she had problems with telling the truth or with being manipulative. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion, as the records, reflecting treatment for drug addiction rather than mental disorders, were not as a whole probative of her credibility. In United States v. Lindstrom, n73 the Court reversed fraud and conspiracy convictions, finding that the Trial Judge improperly placed limitations on cross-examination of the chief prosecution witness concerning her prior psychiatric treatment and erroneously limited defense access to the witness' psychiatric history. The Court rejected an argument that privacy interests could justify restrictions on psychiatric evidence that was pertinent to an attack on the witness' motivation in testifying. See also United States v. Phelps n74(upholding a ruling that permitted cross-examination of a witness concerning his psychiatric condition for five years prior to trial, but prohibited examination as to more remote periods).

[15] Not-Guilty Plea

United States v. Norris, 910 F.2d 1246 (5th Cir. 1990) : On cross-examination, the prosecutor in an amphetamine distribution case elicited that a defendant had previously been convicted of marijuana delivery after pleading not guilty to the charge of which he knew he was guilty. The Court reversed the defendant's conviction, holding that the questioning, and argument based thereon that the defendant was dishonest, penalized him for exercising his constitutional right to plead not guilty and put the government to its proof.

[16] Opening the Door

United States v. Brown, 921 F.2d 1304 (D.C. Cir. 1990) : In a trial for PCP possession, an arresting officer testified on cross-examination that an informant had said she had previously met the defendant, but the officer had not recorded that fact in his notes. On redirect, he testified that the informant could identify the defendant from previous dealings of PCP. The Court held that mention of the PCP dealings was error, as that was hearsay not rehabilitating the officer's credibility, and defense counsel had not opened the door to otherwise inadmissible evidence, since the cross-examination question called for testimony admissible under the prior identification exception.

United States v. Gambino, 951 F.2d 498 (2d Cir. 1991) : A defendant charged with drug offenses attempted to explain his participation in a narcotics sale by saying he believed only phony drugs were being sold and that he was lying when he boasted of his drug connections. Affirming his conviction, the Court held that he had opened the door to cross-examination about his relationship with several individuals who were either narcotics traffickers or Mafia members.

United States v. Scott, 267 F.3d 729 (7th Cir. 2001) : In a drug trafficking prosecution, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that a cooperating witness had given testimony in other cases that assisted in obtaining indictments and convictions. The evidence was relevant to rebut any suggestion that the witness had falsely implicated the defendant, since it tended to show that he had less reason to deal in the particular case. The same point is made in United States v. Curry, 187 F.3d 762 (7th Cir. 1999) , and United States v. Lindemann, 85 F.3d 1232 (7th Cir. 1996) .

United States v. Zimmerman, 832 F.2d 454 (8th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that the government properly elicited from the defendant in a tax fraud case testimony concerning knowledge of the government's successful lawsuit against another member of the church to which the defendant belonged. This testimony was elicited after the defendant testified that the church had never lost a case.

United States v. Whitworth, 856 F.2d 1268 (9th Cir. 1988) : Although the Court affirmed an espionage conviction, it held that a government witness was erroneously permitted to speculate on redirect examination about the defendant's state of mind. On cross-examination, defense counsel asked the witness whether he had suspicions about the defendant's sincerity. The answer called for the witness to speak about his own state of mind, and the Court held that the rule of "curative admissibility" or "opening the door" "does not permit the introduction of evidence that is related to a different issue or is irrelevant to the evidence previously admitted." The questions on redirect examination went to the defendant's state of mind, not the witness'.

McEwen v. City of Norman, Okla., 926 F.2d 1539 (10th Cir. 1991) : In a civil rights action alleging that excessive force was used during the chase and arrest of a motorcyclist after a collision with a police car, the Court held there was no plain error in allowing cross-examination of an eyewitness called by the plaintiff regarding his use of an alias, outstanding bench warrants, and his drinking habits. The plaintiff had opened the door by eliciting testimony that the witness gave a fictitious name at the scene because he was intimidated due to past experiences and fear of what the arresting officer could do to him, that the witness was arrested by the officer after giving a deposition in the case, and that the officer was "out to get" the witness.

[17] Prior Consistent Statements

United States v. Stover, 329 F.3d 859 (D.C. Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed drug-related convictions, holding held that a witness's prior statements to the FBI were properly admitted on redirect examination after the witness was cross-examined concerning an inconsistency between the witness's trial testimony and one statement he had made to the FBI. The Court concluded that statements were not offered for their truth, but only to clarify or rebut an inconsistency raised on cross-examination, so they were not governed by Rule 801(d)(1)(B) or the timing rule adopted by the Supreme Court in Tome v. United States, 513 U.S. 150 (1995) . Although some of the statements offered were not relevant to rebut inconsistencies, any error in admitting them was harmless.

[18] Redirect Examination

United States v. Naiman, 211 F.3d 40 (2d Cir. 2000) : The defendant was convicted of misapplication of funds, bribery, and mail fraud in a scheme to use a non-profit community organization as a front to obtain and then misapply state funding. On cross-examination of two government witnesses who had been employed by the non-profit organization, one testified that she did not think she had done anything wrong when she had accepted a grant designated for student tuition in lieu of a raise, and the other testified that she did not think she had done anything wrong by helping the organization to provide state-subsidized health insurance to individuals whom the organization did not employ. The Court found no error when the government was allowed to introduce evidence on redirect examination of the witnesses that each had entered into an immunity agreement with the government, since the defendant opened the door to redirect by eliciting the testimony that the witnesses not think they had done anything wrong. The Court noted that redirect examination "may be used to rebut false impressions arising from cross-examination and the trial judge is in the best position to determine whether such a false impression was created."

[19] Reference to Prior Trial

United States v. Giovanelli, 945 F.2d 479 (2d Cir. 1991) : In a RICO prosecution based in part on offenses of which the defendant had previously been acquitted in State Court, the Court held it was error, but harmless, to preclude defense counsel from referring to the prior trials. Although revealing the verdict of the prior trial may unfairly prejudice the government's case, it was essential for the defendants to substantiate their claims that the witnesses were deliberately or subliminally refining their testimony in light of the prior trial. The Court commented that the prudent course would have been for the District Judge simply to have explained that it is permissible for the federal government to prosecute an individual for the same offense that has previously been the subject of prosecution by the state, and then to have revealed during the trial that the jury would hear references to testimony given at prior state trials, instructed the jurors not to speculate about the outcome of the prior trials, and permitted counsel to refer to the trials but not to their outcome.

[20] Silence or Invocation of Privilege

Perez v. Jones, 935 F.2d 480 (2d Cir. 1991) : Affirming dismissal of a habeas corpus petition, the Court held there was no denial of due process when the prosecutor attempted to impeach a defense witness with repeated questions to which the witness asserted his privilege against self-incrimination, as inferences drawn from invocation of the privilege could not have been used to build the state's case-in-chief or add critical weight to the state's case.

United States v. Cummiskey, 728 F.2d 200 (3d Cir. 1984) : The Court read the Supreme Court's decision in Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976) , as holding "that when the action of remaining silent occurs after the witness has received Miranda warnings, that action is not relevant as a prior inconsistent assertion." Since the relevance of the silence depends on the absence of warnings, the Court held "that when a testifying defendant makes an objection to the prosecutor's cross-examination with respect to postarrest silence, it is the prosecutor's burden, under Rule 104(b), to establish that Miranda warnings were not given prior to the silence relied upon for impeachment purposes." In Nezowy v. United States, n75 the Court found that it was error (but harmless) for a prosecutor to ask a nonparty witness whether she had invoked her privilege against self-incrimination before a grand jury, since "a jury might misunderstand the context in which such fifth amendment questioning occurs, and it [is] difficult to imagine any circumstance where such examination would be relevant and appropriate."

United States v. Blankenship, 746 F.2d 233 (5th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed mail fraud convictions, finding that the prosecutor was properly permitted to ask questions about the defendant's prearrest contact with a postal inspector and that the prosecutor had not sought to comment on post-Miranda silence.

United States v. Aguwa, 123 F.3d 418 (6th Cir. 1997) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in a drug case when an alibi witness, the defendant's wife, was impeached with evidence that she had failed to come forward with the alibi until the eve of trial and had not spoken about this "alibi" to anyone else. The witness clearly would have been aware of the pending charges and cognizant of the significance of timely providing the defendant with an alibi. Particularly since the defendant never even attempted to provide an explanation for the delay, there was no basis for concluding that the adverse inference was confusing, misleading, or unfairly prejudicial.

United States v. Johns, 734 F.2d 657 (11th Cir. 1984) : Affirming convictions for cocaine offenses, the Court found that a prosecutor properly questioned an alibi witness concerning his reasons for not coming forward with his information long before the trial. The Court declined to adopt a per se rule rejecting such cross-examination; rather, the Trial Judge must rule on the probative value of the cross-examination in the context of a particular case, considering "the strength of the alibi, the witness' proximity to the investigation, how soon the witness finds out about the arrest, and what steps were available to him."

[21] Summary Judgments and Directed Verdicts

Inventive Music Ltd. v. Cohen, 617 F.2d 29 (3d Cir. 1980) : Reversing a directed verdict for the defendants in an action related to the sale of a business, the Court rejected an argument that the plaintiffs were bound by testimony of their witness: "Because Rule 607 abandons the restriction on impeaching one's own witness, it necessarily follows that a party is not strictly bound by his own witness."

Utility Control Corp. v. Prince William Constr. Co., 558 F.2d 716 (4th Cir. 1977) : The Court reversed summary judgment granted to the plaintiff in a contract action after its first witness, the former president of one of the defendants, had given direct testimony as an adverse witness. When no cross-examination was permitted, the nonmoving party had been denied its right under Fed. R. Civ. P. 56 to rebut the motion for summary judgment. The Court emphasized that because Rule 607 permits any party to impeach a witness, the defendant could not be precluded from impeaching or contradicting the witness' testimony.

[22] Threats to Witnesses -- Admissible To Explain Changed Testimony

United States v. Perez-Montanez, 202 F.3d 434 (1st Cir. 2000) : Affirming carjacking and firearm convictions, the Court held that a coconspirator who testified as a government witness was properly permitted to testify about threats that he received and believed were from a defendant, since "[t]he evidence was admitted not to prove the truth of the threats or their origin but to show Serrano's [the witness's] motivation for having changed his version of events, which he did several times before trial."

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Smith, 550 F.2d 277 (5th Cir. 1977) .

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Marzano, 537 F.2d 257 (7th Cir. 1976) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Keithan, 751 F.2d 9 (1st Cir. 1984) .

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Lanese, 890 F.2d 1284 (2d Cir. 1989) .

(n5)Footnote 5. United States v. Glover, 588 F.2d 876 (2d Cir. 1978) .

(n6)Footnote 6. United States v. Leslie, 759 F.2d 366 (1985) , rev'd on other grounds, 783 F.2d 541 (5th Cir. 1986) (en banc), vacated on other grounds, 479 U.S. 1074 , remanded on other grounds, 813 F.2d 658 (5th Cir. 1987) .

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Mansaw, 714 F.2d 785 (8th Cir. 1983) .

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Williams, 875 F.2d 846 (11th Cir. 1989) .

(n9)Footnote 9. United States v. Dorta, 783 F.2d 1179 (4th Cir. 1986) .

(n10)Footnote 10. United States v. Ray, 731 F.2d 1361 (9th Cir. 1984) .

(n11)Footnote 11. United States v. Jones, 766 F.2d 412 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n12)Footnote 12. United States v. Brutzman, 731 F.2d 1449 (9th Cir. 1984) .

(n13)Footnote 13. United States v. Bulman, 667 F.2d 1374 (11th Cir. 1982) .

(n14)Footnote 14. United States v. Rosario-Diaz, 202 F.3d 54 (1st Cir. 2000) .

(n15)Footnote 15. See also United States v. Torres-Galindo, 206 F.3d 136 (1st Cir. 2000) , where the Court noted it was troubled by testimony from the same agent regarding a defendant's custodial statements.

(n16)Footnote 16. United States v. Lochmondy, 890 F.2d 817 (6th Cir. 1989) .

(n17)Footnote 17. United States v. Kerr, 981 F.2d 1050 (9th Cir. 1992) .

(n18)Footnote 18. United States v. Christian, 786 F.2d 203 (6th Cir. 1986) .

(n19)Footnote 19. United States v. Martin, 815 F.2d 818 (1st Cir. 1987) .

(n20)Footnote 20. United States v. McNeill, 728 F.2d 5 (1st Cir. 1984) .

(n21)Footnote 21. United States v. Cosentino, 844 F.2d 30 (2d Cir. 1988) .

(n22)Footnote 22. United States v. Borello, 766 F.2d 46 (2d Cir. 1985) .

(n23)Footnote 23. United States v. Frankenberry, 696 F.2d 239 (3d Cir. 1982) .

(n24)Footnote 24. United States v. Sanders, 893 F.2d 133 (7th Cir. 1990) .

(n25)Footnote 25. United States v. McGrath, 811 F.2d 1022 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n26)Footnote 26. United States v. LeFevour, 798 F.2d 977 (7th Cir. 1986) .

(n27)Footnote 27. United States v. Davis, 838 F.2d 909 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(n28)Footnote 28. United States v. Darden, 70 F.3d 1507 (8th Cir. 1995) .

(n29)Footnote 29. United States v. Kroh, 915 F.2d 326 (8th Cir. 1990) (en banc).

(n30)Footnote 30. United States v. Davis, 766 F.2d 1452 (10th Cir. 1985) .

(n31)Footnote 31. United States v. Melton, 739 F.2d 576 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n32)Footnote 32. United States v. Jones, 763 F.2d 518 (2d Cir. 1985) .

(n33)Footnote 33. United States v. Borello, 766 F.2d 46 (2d Cir. 1985) .

(n34)Footnote 34. United States v. Herrera, 832 F.2d 833 (4th Cir. 1987) .

(n35)Footnote 35. United States v. Henderson, 717 F.2d 135 (4th Cir. 1983) .

(n36)Footnote 36. United States v. Townsend, 796 F.2d 158 (6th Cir. 1986) .

(n37)Footnote 37. United States v. Thornton, 197 F.3d 241 (7th Cir. 1999) .

(n38)Footnote 38. United States v. Mealy, 851 F.2d 890 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(n39)Footnote 39. United States v. Kats, 871 F.2d 105 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n40)Footnote 40. United States v. Brown, 720 F.2d 1059 (9th Cir. 1983) .

(n41)Footnote 41. United States v. Cruz, 805 F.2d 1464 (11th Cir. 1986) .

(n42)Footnote 42. United States v. Hilton, 772 F.2d 783 (11th Cir. 1985) .

(n43)Footnote 43. United States v. Hogan, 763 F.2d 697 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n44)Footnote 44. United States v. Webster, 734 F.2d 1191 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n45)Footnote 45. United States v. Crouch, 731 F.2d 621 (9th Cir. 1984) .

(n46)Footnote 46. United States v. Peterman, 841 F.2d 1474 (10th Cir. 1988) .

(n47)Footnote 47. United States v. Ienco, 92 F.3d 564 (7th Cir. 1996) .

(n48)Footnote 48. United States v. Frappier, 807 F.2d 257 (1st Cir. 1986) .

(n49)Footnote 49. United States v. Boroni, 758 F.2d 222 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n50)Footnote 50. United States v. Pedroza, 750 F.2d 187 (2d Cir. 1984) .

(n51)Footnote 51. United States v. Anderson, 881 F.2d 1128 (D.C. Cir. 1989) .

(n52)Footnote 52. United States v. Pitocchelli, 830 F.2d 401 (1st Cir. 1987) .

(n53)Footnote 53. United States v. Kepreos, 759 F.2d 961 (1st Cir. 1985) .

(n54)Footnote 54. United States v. Barrett, 766 F.2d 609 (1st Cir. 1985) .

(n55)Footnote 55. United States v. Touchstone, 726 F.2d 1116 (6th Cir. 1984) .

(n56)Footnote 56. United States v. Muebl, 739 F.2d 1175 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n57)Footnote 57. United States v. Young, 952 F.2d 1252 (10th Cir. 1991) .

(n58)Footnote 58. United States v. De Parias, 805 F.2d 1447 (11th Cir. 1986) .

(n59)Footnote 59. United States v. Carlock, 806 F.2d 535 (5th Cir. 1986) .

(n60)Footnote 60. United States v. Kimble, 719 F.2d 1253 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n61)Footnote 61. United States v. Navarro, 737 F.2d 625 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n62)Footnote 62. United States v. Whitworth, 856 F.2d 1268 (9th Cir. 1988) .

(n63)Footnote 63. United States v. Rangel, 534 F.2d 147 (9th Cir. 1976) .

(n64)Footnote 64. United States v. Swingler, 758 F.2d 477 (10th Cir. 1985) .

(n65)Footnote 65. United States v. Morales-Quinones, 812 F.2d 604 (10th Cir. 1987) .

(n66)Footnote 66. United States v. Pepe, 747 F.2d 632 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n67)Footnote 67. United States v. Plotke, 725 F.2d 1303 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n68)Footnote 68. United States v. Perry, 740 F.2d 854 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n69)Footnote 69. United States v. Alonso, 740 F.2d 862 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n70)Footnote 70. United States v. Peters, 732 F.2d 1004 (1st Cir. 1984) .

(n71)Footnote 71. United States v. Bari, 750 F.2d 1169 (2d Cir. 1984) .

(n72)Footnote 72. [United States v. Marvin, 687 F.2d 1221 (8th Cir. 1982) .

(n73)Footnote 73. United States v. Lindstrom, 698 F.2d 1154 (11th Cir. 1983) .

(n74)Footnote 74. United States v. Phelps, 733 F.2d 1464 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n75)Footnote 75. Nezowy v. United States, 723 F.2d 1120 (3d Cir. 1983) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 607 RULE 607

2-607 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 607.04

607.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

The traditional rule against impeaching one's own witness is abandoned as based on false premises. A party does not hold out his witnesses as worthy of belief, since he rarely has a free choice in selecting them. Denial of the right leaves the party at the mercy of the witness and the adversary. If the impeachment is by a prior statement, it is free from hearsay dangers and is excluded from the category of hearsay under Rule 801(d)(1). [Editor's Note: This categorical statement is not correct. Congress changed the Advisory Committee's version of Rule 801(d)(1). As enacted, Rule 801(d)(1) exempts prior inconsistent statements from the hearsay rule only if the statements are made under oath at a formal proceeding.] Ladd, Impeachment of One's Own Witness -- New Developments, 4 U. Chi. L. Rev. 69 (1936); McCormick § 38; 3 Wigmore §§ 896-918. The substantial inroads into the old rule made over the years by decisions, rules, and statutes are evidence of doubts as to its basic soundness and workability. Cases are collected in 3 Wigmore § 905. Revised Rule 32(a)(1) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure allows any party to impeach a witness by means of his deposition, and Rule 43(b) has allowed the calling and impeachment of an adverse party or person identified with him. Illustrative statutes allowing a party to impeach his own witness under varying circumstances are Ill. Rev. Stats. 1967, c. 110, § 60; Mass. Laws Annot. 1959, c. 233 § 23; 20 N.M. Stats. Annot. 1953, § 20-2-4; NYCPLR § 4514 (McKinney 1963); 12 Vt. Stats. Annot. 1959, §§ 1641a, 1642. Complete judicial rejection of the old rule is found in United States v. Freeman, 302 F.2d 347 (2d Cir. 1962) . The same result is reached in Uniform Rule 20; California Evidence Code § 785; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-420. See also New Jersey Evidence Rule 20.

[2] 1987 Amendment Advisory Committee Note

1987 Amendment Advisory Committee Note

The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is the following: "The amendment is technical. No substantive change is intended."

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
Supp. To CHAPTER 607 RULE 607

2-607 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 607, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 607. Who May Impeach	Rule 607. Who May Impeach a Witness
The credibility of a witness may be attacked	Any party, including the party that called the by any party, including the party calling the witness. witness, may attack the witness's credibility.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 607 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
Supp. To CHAPTER 607 RULE 607

2-607 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 607.03

Supp. to § 607.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Bias [Go To Main]

[b] Bias -- Criminal Defense Witnesses

United States v. Allen, 540 F.3d 821 (8th Cir. 2008) : The defendant was convicted of felon firearm possession after a loaded handgun was found under the front passenger seat of a car he was attempting to enter on the passenger side when he was arrested. At trial he called the driver of the car, who testified to borrowing the car from his father without permission and denied any knowledge of the gun's presence. On cross-examination the driver admitted having a misdemeanor domestic battery and assault conviction. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admission of the conviction evidence. The evidence was not used to cast doubt on the witness' character for truthfulness, which would have violated Rule 609. Rather, because one convicted of misdemeanor domestic battery is prohibited by federal law from possessing a firearm, the evidence tended to show the witness' bias and motivation to deny any knowledge or possession of the gun.

[d] Bias -- Prosecution Witnesses

[i] Impeachment Denied

United States v. Mahdi, 598 F.3d 883 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed drug trafficking convictions, finding no abuse of discretion when the defense was precluded from introducing evidence that a witness, who had denied having handled a gun, had shot and killed another man with a gun. The Trial Judge had properly excluded the extrinsic evidence for use in impeachment by contradiction, and the Court held that because the government was not aware of the shooting until the defense brought it up, the evidence had no tendency to impeach by showing bias.

United States v. Eagle, 498 F.3d 885 (8th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for involuntary manslaughter in Indian country, the Court held that the defendant was permitted to explore sufficiently the bias of two witnesses by eliciting testimony that one witness had previously accused the defendant's brother of sexual assault and the witness had testified against the brother, and that the defendant was not denied a fair opportunity to confront the witnesses when evidence that the brother had been acquitted was excluded. The Court noted that the bias of the witnesses was established by their having given statements against the brother, regardless of the outcome of the brother's trial.

United States v. Al-Rekabi, 454 F.3d 1113 (10th Cir. 2006) : The defendant, charged with possession of a stolen pistol, sought to impeach a prosecution witness who had been involved in the incident with his conviction under state law for criminal mischief. The defendant argued that the conviction could be characterized as a "misdemeanor crime of domestic violence" making possession of a firearm illegal under federal law, which gave the witness a motive to lie and testify that he never took possession of the pistol, contrary to the defendant's testimony. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the impeachment, as the state crime of criminal mischief does not include the elements of "use or threatened use of physical force" or "threatened use of a deadly weapon" that are required for a "misdemeanor crime of domestic violence."

United States v. Sarras, 575 F.3d 1191 (11th Cir. 2009) : The defendant was convicted for persuading his minor step-daughter to engage in sexually explicit conduct for the purpose of producing photos of the conduct. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendant was barred from cross-examining law enforcement officers about the Sheriff's Office's financial interest in the forfeiture of the defendant's house. The Court observed that "the officers' interest in the case is best described as ... indirect, impersonal, and tenuous," and concluded that "[t]o suggest that the officers were biased because the Sheriff's Office that employed them may have benefitted from a forfeiture is rank speculation" and "such testimony had the potential to confuse the jury and distract it from the central issues."

[ii] Bias -- Prosecution Witnesses -- Impeachment Permitted or Required

United States v. Harper, 527 F.3d 396 (5th Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for drug offenses, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to exclude evidence of an informant's misdemeanor conviction for assault, as the date of the conviction shortly after the witness made a drug buy in this case indicated that he had a pending charge against him at the time of the defendant's alleged transaction and therefore would be motivated to curry favor with the government.

United States v. Salem, 578 F.3d 682 (7th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for witness tampering, the Court vacated the denial of a motion for a new trial and remanded for an evidentiary hearing as to whether the prosecution's failure to turn over exculpatory evidence required a new trial. The Court noted that "[f]or impeachment purposes, a criminal defendant on trial is entitled to reveal to the jury not only what benefits a witness is receiving, but also what he perceives he may receive."

United States v. Watler, 461 F.3d 1005 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a drug conviction, the Court held that the defendant's Sixth Amendment confrontation right was violated (but the error was harmless) when he was not permitted to cross-examine a coconspirator about any threats made by the witness against him. The Court explained: "A witness's desire to kill the defendant is probative of bias in a way that is distinct from a witness's acceptance of a plea agreement in exchange for testimony. While a plea deal engages a witness's self-interest, a death threat suggests personal animus toward the defendant."

[f] Bias -- Rehabilitation

United States v. White, 519 F.3d 342 (7th Cir. 2008) : The lead prosecution witness in a drug case testified on direct that he was testifying pursuant to a plea agreement in the hope that his sentence would be reduced. On cross-examination, defense counsel attacked the witness's credibility, focusing on the fact that he was relying on the government to seek to reduce what would otherwise be a mandatory minimum sentence. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the prosecutor to introduce evidence that information from the witness had led to a forfeiture and guilty pleas in other cases. The evidence tended to rehabilitate the witness, whose credibility had been attacked, by making the jury aware that he had "other, 'multiple bargaining chips' vis-a-vis the government, making it less likely that he was lying in this case out of self-interest."

[4] Contradiction [Go To Main]

United States v. Ramirez, 609 F.3d 495 (2d Cir. 2010) : The defendant in a drug prosecution testified that during the time charged in the indictment he had served as a driver but did not know that he was driving people to drug transactions, and that he never saw drugs during that time. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to allow the defendant to be impeached with evidence of his involvement in a drug transaction that occurred after the end of the indicted conspiracy. Because the defendant limited his testimony to lack of knowledge during the indicted conspiracy, and never "forswore, as a universal matter, ever having seen drugs of any kind," the later drug transaction did not contradict his testimony. In contrast, testimony from another witness that the defendant was directly involved in drug transactions during the time of indictment was properly admitted for contradiction. The Court noted that "[i]t is an open question in our Court whether the government can present extrinsic evidence to impeach by contradiction a statement made by the defendant on cross-examination, where such evidence would otherwise be barred by the Federal Rules of Evidence."

United States v. Greenidge, 495 F.3d 85 (3d Cir. 2007) : In a bank fraud prosecution, the defendant testified that she was an honest businesswoman, and denied that she ever had any criminal problems or received any complaints about her honesty in business. The Court held there was no error in then allowing the government to cross-examine the defendant about two complaints filed against her, one for failing to return trucks she had rented and the other for refusing to release property to a customer. Using a Rule 403 analysis, the Court found that the defendant's volunteered denials opened the door to an inquiry into her business ethics; her "unqualified denial rendered the impeachment by contradiction more probative of her credibility"; and the government was not permitted to introduce the complaints into evidence, thus limiting the risk of prejudice, confusion, and delay.

United States v. Kincaid-Chauncey, 556 F.3d 923 (9th Cir. 2009) : Affirming convictions of a former county commissioner for fraud and other offenses, the Court stated that impeachment by contradiction is an exception to the rule prohibiting extrinsic evidence of impeachment, and that "[i]mpeachment by contradiction is permitted to prevent witnesses from engaging in perjury and then using the prohibition on collateral fact testimony to conceal the perjury." Finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was barred from offering witnesses to contradict testimony elicited by the defendant on cross-examination, the Court reasoned that during cross-examination, "impeachment by contradiction is far less likely to achieve its intended purpose of rooting out perjury because opposing counsel may manipulate questions to trap an unwary witness into 'volunteering' statements on cross-examination." The Court noted, however, that "the general rule need not be rigidly enforced so as to exclude all impeachment by contradiction of testimony given during cross-examination."

United States v. Crockett, 435 F.3d 1305 (10th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for conspiring to defraud the IRS and aiding and assisting in the preparation of false and fraudulent tax returns, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the prosecutor was permitted to cross-examine the defendant about his failure to file his personal tax returns for the years 1992-1998. The defendant testified on direct examination that he would never advise or assist anyone in cheating on their taxes, and the Court explained that "when a defendant makes a false statement during direct testimony, the prosecution is allowed to prove, either through cross-examination or by rebuttal witnesses, that the defendant lied as to that fact." With evidence in the record showing that the defendant earned income sufficient to require filing of returns, the prosecutor was entitled to inquire into the defendant's failure to file the returns "[u]nder the doctrine of specific contradiction."

[5] Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity [Go To Main]

[a] Impeachment Use

[iii] Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity -- Impeachment Use -- Proper Use of Direct Examination

United States v. Setser, 568 F.3d 482 (5th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for operating a multimillion-dollar Ponzi scheme, and found no error when the prosecution was allowed to make various references to guilty pleas entered by coconspirators. The Judge gave thorough limiting instructions, most references were for the permissible purpose of rebutting anticipated impeachment and other references were quite limited, and the defense itself devoted significant attention to the plea agreement by a central witness.

United States v. Thornton, 609 F.3d 373 (6th Cir. 2010) : Affirming drug and firearms convictions, the Court found no error in allowing the government on direct examination to question a cooperating witness about the details of his plea agreement. The Court held that the prosecutor is allowed to "place the plea before the jury so as to blunt defense efforts at impeachment and dispel the suggestion that the government has something to hide." In United States v. Carson, 560 F.3d 566 (6th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed convictions of three police officers for offenses arising from the use of excessive force while making an arrest. The Court observed that, with a limiting instruction, a prosecutor may elicit evidence of a guilty plea on direct examination so that the jury may fully assess the credibility of a witness. It warned, however, that the use of such a plea may become illegitimate if a prosecutor suggests to the jury in closing argument that the jury use the plea as proof of the defendant's guilt. There was no plain error in the prosecutor's closing argument in this case.

[iv] Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity -- Impeachment Use -- Use Improper

United States v. Benson, 591 F.3d 491 (6th Cir. 2010) : Affirming convictions for drug conspiracy offenses, the Court observed that, "[a]lthough guilty pleas may be elicited by the prosecutor on direct examination so that the jury may assess the credibility of the witness, a legitimate introduction of a plea may rise to the level of prejudicial error if the prosecutor suggests in closing argument that the jury use the plea for a prohibited purpose." The "introduction of guilty pleas may only be used for credibility purposes and is not substantive evidence of the defendant's guilt." In this case, the prosecutor mentioned in closing argument that "a number of the co-conspirators who testified in this case have already pled guilty to this conspiracy, which would certainly further support the fact that the conspiracy existed." The Court indicated that this and other statements may have been improper, but the erroneous use of the guilty pleas was harmless.

[b] Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity -- Polygraph and Truthfulness Provisions

United States v. Edwards, 581 F.3d 604 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court held that a prosecutor did not engage in improper vouching by asking a government informant on direct examination what would happen to his plea agreement if he did not testify truthfully. The question was "innocent" in that it "merely probed Beagle's understanding of the consequences of lying on the stand. The prosecutor was not implying that he had any secret information that Beagle would have been afraid to lie because of the consequences if he did." The Court noted that case law "allows the government to present evidence that plea deals are conditioned on truthful testimony."

United States v. McClellon, 578 F.3d 846 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of cocaine base with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion when the government was permitted to introduce a cooperating witness' plea agreement (including a promise to testify truthfully) on direct examination. It noted that "'while the existence of a plea agreement may support his or her interest in testifying truthfully, the plea agreement may also impeach the witness' credibility by showing his or her interest in testifying as the government wishes regardless of the truth.'" Thus, introducing the whole agreement helps the jury in fully assessing the witness' credibility.

United States v. Jones, 468 F.3d 704 (10th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to manufacture and distribute cocaine base, the Court held that disclosure of a plea bargain in which the witness was to be given sentencing consideration only if he "continued to cooperate ... in an honest and truthful manner" did not constitute impermissible vouching by suggesting that the witness had already provided honest and truthful information. It was merely a representation by the witness that he had testified truthfully and would continue to do so.

[c] Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity -- Potential Sentence

United States v. Walley, 567 F.3d 354 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed methamphetamine convictions, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was precluded from cross-examining a coconspirator about the specific maximum (40 years) and minimum (five years) sentences he was facing. The government objected that the questioning was really an attempt to educate the jury about the defendant's possible sentence because the defendant and the witness were charged with the same crime. The Judge permitted the defendant to ask the witness whether he was facing a "significant sentence." The Court agreed that the ruling was reasonable and distinguished both United States v. Caldwell, 88 F.3d 522 (8th Cir. 1996) , vacated on other grounds, 531 U.S. 1049 (2000) (prosecution had agreed to dismiss charges), and United States v. Roan Eagle, 867 F.2d 436 (8th Cir. 1989) (witness had already received the benefit of a reduction in charges).

United States v. Larson, 495 F.3d 1094 (9th Cir. 2007) (enbanc): In United States v. Larson, 460 F.3d 1200 (9th Cir. 2006) , a panel of the Court had affirmed convictions for conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine, finding no abuse of discretion when the defense was not permitted to elicit on cross-examination that a cooperating witness faced a mandatory life sentence. On rehearing, the en banc Court held that the District Court had abused its discretion in barring the questions, but also held that the resulting error was harmless, because defense counsel did explore the witness's "criminal past, history as a drug user and seller, and desire to obtain a lesser sentence through his testimony against his co-conspirators. We note, too, that the court instructed the jury that it should view the testimony of the cooperating witnesses with greater caution than that of other witnesses."

[7] Drug Use [Go To Main]

United States v. Vitale, 459 F.3d 190 (2d Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for bank fraud, the Court found no Sixth Amendment confrontation violation when the defendant was denied access to a witness's substance abuse treatment records. Defense counsel had subpoenaed the records from a drug rehabilitation clinic after learning that a government witness (Trantino) was enrolled in a drug abuse treatment program there. The defendant argued that since "Trantino had admitted to the heavy use of painkillers during the bank fraud scheme and drug addiction when he was discussing the case with the FBI ... access to the records was necessary to cross-examine Trantino." The Court held that "when records do not reflect treatment for mental disorders but rather reflect treatment for drug addiction, the introduction of the complete records is not warranted because they are not, as a whole, probative of ... credibility." It also noted that "although defense counsel was not allowed to review the physical records, the trial court did not limit the scope or nature of defense counsel's cross-examination in any way." The Court implied that had Trantino testified inconsistently with the documents, their production may have been warranted.

United States v. Gallardo, 497 F.3d 727 (7th Cir. 2007) : Affirming convictions for drug distribution offenses, the Court found no error in the exclusion of testimony by a defense expert regarding the effects of the past use of drugs on the ability to remember. The Judge permitted the defendants to ask government witnesses whether they were currently addicted to drugs and whether they had been addicted at any time during the four-year period of the conspiracy and to offer extrinsic evidence of the witnesses' drug use during this period. The Court held it was a reasonable conclusion that the expert testimony would not help the jury, because there was no evidence of the witnesses' past drug use or addiction; it noted that evidence of drug use may be unduly prejudicial and may be limited where memory or mental capacity is not genuinely in issue.

United States v. Hodge, 594 F.3d 614 (8th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed convictions for a conspiracy to manufacture methamphetamine. Addressing a challenge to the credibility of the government's witnesses, it noted that "[p]rior drug abuse may be relevant when the witness's memory or mental abilities are legitimately before the court. [citation] Prior drug abuse or drug addiction, however, has no automatic effect on the credibility of a witness ... . [I]t is the jury's prerogative to evaluate the credibility of witnesses in light of their prior drug abuse or addiction."

United States v. Robinson, 583 F.3d 1265 (10th Cir. 2009) : The Court reversed a firearm conviction because the defendant was not permitted inquiry into the mental health history of the star witness for the government, the confidential informant who allegedly sold the defendant the gun. The witness' mental health records indicated that he: was a major user of illegal drugs (contradicting his trial testimony that he had not regularly used drugs); suffered visual and auditory hallucinations; and was taking a variety of medications upon discharge from a mental hospital. Under these circumstances, the Court found that the ruling violated the defendant's right to confrontation; if the defendant had been able to use the evidence, he could have fruitfully attacked both the witness' capacity and his character for veracity.

[9] Immigration Status [Go To Main]

United States v. Lopez-Medina, 596 F.3d 716 (10th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute, holding there was no abuse of discretion when the government elicited on cross-examination of the defendant that he had been illegally in the United States for over 13 years. The evidence was relevant to rebut efforts on direct exam to portray the defendant as a nice, law-abiding person who had never committed a crime.

[11] Impeachment, and Anticipating Impeachment, on Direct Examination [Go To Main]

[a] Hearsay Evidence

[ii] Impeachment, and Anticipating Impeachment, on Direct Examination -- Hearsay Evidence -- Offered by Prosecution

United States v. Burt, 495 F.3d 733 (7th Cir. 2007) : At a trial on child pornography charges, a government witness testified about his online relationship with the defendant but denied that the defendant had ever sent him photos of naked boys. The prosecution was then permitted to prove that the witness had made statements inconsistent with that denial when he was interviewed after his arrest. Affirming, the Court found no error in permitting the prosecution to impeach a witness it had called with inconsistent statements, as there was no evidence that the government had acted in bad faith in calling the witness. When, as here, a witness who might provide evidence harmful to the government is also expected to provide helpful evidence, the prosecutor should not be put to the choice of forgoing impeachment or forgoing the helpful evidence.

[13] Limitations on Cross-Examination [Go To Main]

[c] Limitations on Cross-Examination -- Impeachment for Bias

United States v. Rodriguez-Velez, 597 F.3d 32 (1st Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to possess drugs with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in limiting cross-examination of a government informant who testified about statements made by two coconspirators who were brothers of the defendant's wife. The defense sought to ask whether the witness was aware that the defendant had been unfaithful to his wife, but whether the witness knew of the infidelity shed no light on whether the brothers-in-law knew; there was no reason to believe that the brothers-in-law thought they were speaking with an informant and thus no reason for them to vilify the defendant even if they were aware of the infidelity; and their statements tended to glorify rather than vilify the defendant. In United States v. Bunchan, 580 F.3d 66 (1st Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed a mail fraud conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when the defense was permitted to ask a government witness about pending state criminal charges for assault but was not permitted to bring out that the charges were for indecent assault and battery of a child. The Judge's ruling permitted elicitation of the witness' motive to ingratiate himself with the government but avoided unnecessary and unfair prejudice against the witness. The Court also noted that reference to the particular nature of the charges was not admissible under Rule 608(b) because it was not relevant to the witness' character for truthfulness.

[e] Limitations on Cross-Examination -- Impeachment Generally

United States v. Smith, 451 F.3d 209 (4th Cir. 2006) : In a drug case, police officers testified that the defendant had been arrested in two previous cases with drugs on his person, and that the drugs found in the previous arrests had been destroyed by the police. Defense efforts to cross-examine each witness about the circumstances of the destruction were denied on the grounds of limited relevance and waste of time. The Court found that precluding this cross-examination violated the defendant's constitutional right to an effective defense, although it was harmless error. The Court noted that "the availability of appropriate cross-examination by an accused is ... essential when the physical evidence, about which the witnesses are testifying, no longer exists," and explained that "the examination Smith sought to conduct was highly relevant to the issues in the case, in that the prosecution witnesses were testifying that the substances were contraband and had been seized from Smith. The trustworthiness and competence of these witnesses related directly to the charges in the indictment, and their credibility was crucial to the jury's assessment of the prosecution's case." In particular, an officer's testimony that drugs were destroyed when state charges were dismissed because of pending federal charges "raised obvious concerns." Where the officer testified that he was unaware of the pending federal charges when the evidence was destroyed, but the state charges were dismissed precisely because of the pending federal charges, cross-examination "would have cut to the core of [the officer's] credibility and was highly relevant to the issues before the jury. And any resulting prejudice to the prosecution from a thorough examination on the facts surrounding the evidence's destruction was plainly outweighed by Smith's right to inquire into the pertinent circumstances." The Judge's contrary conclusion -- that the relevance of such cross-examination would have been "extremely slight" -- was thus based on a "clearly erroneous assessment of the evidence" and constituted an abuse of discretion.

United States v. Street, 548 F.3d 618 (8th Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for aiding and abetting murder in furtherance of drug trafficking, the defense had been permitted to cross-examine a government witness regarding her arrest after a high-speed chase over several hours, but had been precluded from bringing out that she had told her teenaged companion to shoot at the pursuing officers during the chase. Although the Court reversed the conviction on other grounds, it found no abuse of discretion in the limitation on the witness' cross-examination, since the defendant had adequate opportunity to impeach the witness. The Court noted that evidence of the instructions to shoot at the pursuing officers "would tend to show her willingness to engage in illegal or reckless behavior to advance her own interests and was relevant on the issue of whether she would have hesitated to falsify her testimony had she believed it would curry favor with prosecutors." Further, it was "not clear that any potential prejudice from introducing this evidence on cross examination would have outweighed its relevance." However, even if there was an abuse of discretion, the error would have been harmless.

[f] Limitations on Cross-Examination -- Jury Confusion

United States v. Franco, 484 F.3d 347 (6th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for cocaine possession, the Court found no abuse of discretion or unfairness in the limitations imposed on cross-examination of a government witness who had participated in the controlled sale of cocaine that led to the prosecution. The defendant claimed entrapment and there was evidence that in 1992 the witness had engaged in unethical conduct as an informant that led to a decision not to prosecute the target of an investigation, who had claimed entrapment. Because entrapment was the defense in both the 1992 case and the instant case and there was similar misconduct by the informant-witness in both cases, the government's reasons for not prosecuting the 1992 were "arguably relevant to a small degree." However, questioning about the past case could have been substantially more prejudicial than probative because it would have been confusing, particularly since the defendant had been permitted to cross-examine the witness about several past bad acts.

[14] Mental Condition [Go To Main]

United States v. George, 532 F.3d 933 (D.C. Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for bank robbery, the star prosecution witness was the defendant's sister. Affirming, the Court found no error in precluding him from impeaching his sister with her mental health history, which indicated that she suffered from bipolar disorder. The sister had already been impeached with "much more damning evidence" -- including her interest in obtaining a reward, her plea bargain, her violent acts and hatred toward her family members, and her use of PCP over a 20-year period. The Court noted that impaired mental health does not necessarily cast doubt on a witness's credibility: "The days are long past when any mental illness was presumed to undermine a witness's competence to testify. The category of mental illnesses includes a wide variety of conditions, of varying degrees of severity and substantially different effects. Simply labeling a witness as having 'mental health problems,' or alluding to her 'issues with rage, anger, and racing thoughts,' [quoting the defendant's arguments] does not provide a basis for thinking she cannot correctly perceive reality." The defendant's proffer gave no indication why bipolar disorder would cause his sister difficulty in perceiving reality or motivate her to hurt her brother.

United States v. Vitale, 459 F.3d 190 (2d Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for bank fraud, the Court found no Sixth Amendment confrontation violation when the defendant was denied access to a witness's substance abuse treatment records. Defense counsel had subpoenaed the records from a drug rehabilitation clinic after learning that a government witness (Trantino) was enrolled in a drug abuse treatment program there. The defendant argued that since "Trantino had admitted to the heavy use of painkillers during the bank fraud scheme and drug addiction when he was discussing the case with the FBI ... access to the records was necessary to cross-examine Trantino." The Court held that "when records do not reflect treatment for mental disorders but rather reflect treatment for drug addiction, the introduction of the complete records is not warranted because they are not, as a whole, probative of ... credibility." It also noted that "although defense counsel was not allowed to review the physical records, the trial court did not limit the scope or nature of defense counsel's cross-examination in any way." The Court implied that had Trantino testified inconsistently with the documents, their production may have been warranted.

[17] Prior Consistent Statements [Go To Main]

United States v. Hoover, 543 F.3d 448 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for using a firearm in connection with a drug trafficking offense. It held that, whether or not witnesses' prior statements were made before a motive to falsify arose, there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the statements to show that there was really no inconsistency between the prior statements and trial testimony. The jury was properly instructed that the statements could only be used to evaluate the witnesses' credibility, insofar as they might explain the alleged inconsistencies.

[20.1] State Law Regarding Credibility [Go To Main]

United States v. Bruce, 550 F.3d 668 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of cocaine base with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in the denial of a defense request to give an instruction that state law requires custodial interrogations to be recorded and that evidence of unrecorded statements should be viewed with caution. Federal, not state, law governs the admissibility of evidence in federal criminal trials, and any relevance the absence of a recording might have came from the choice to stop recording the interview -- a fact of which the jury was made aware -- not from the presence or absence of a state law governing recordings.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 608 RULE 608

2-608 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 608.syn

§ 608.syn Synopsis to Chapter 608: RULE 608

608.01 Official Text

608.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Bad Character for Truthfulness

[2] Reputation and Opinion Evidence

[3] Prior Bad Act Impeachment

[4] Relationship to Rule 403

[5] Claim-Mindedness

[6] Specific Acts to Bolster Credibility

[7] Extrinsic Evidence

[8] The Breadth of the Extrinsic Evidence Ban and the 2003 Amendment to Rule 608(b)

[9] Good-Faith Basis for Questions

[10] Denial of Bad Acts

[11] Acquittals

[12] Relationship to Rule 607

[13] Relationship to Rule 404(b)

[14] Relationship to Rule 609

[15] Relationship to Rule 613(b)

[16] Plea Agreements of Government Witnesses

[17] Privilege Against Self-Incrimination

608.03 Annotated Cases

[1] RULE 608(a) -- OPINION AND REPUTATION EVIDENCE OF CHARACTER

[a] RULE 608(a) -- Character Evidence To Impeach

[i] RULE 608(a) -- Cumulative Evidence

[ii] RULE 608(a) -- Character Evidence To Impeach -- Miscellaneous Cases

[iii] RULE 608(a) -- Character Evidence To Impeach -- Prejudicial Testimony

[iv] RULE 608(a) -- Character Evidence To Impeach -- Qualifications of Witness

[b] RULE 608(a) -- Expert Testimony

[c] RULE 608(a) -- Other Proceedings Offered To Affect Credibility

[d] RULE 608(a) -- Other Purposes for Evidence

[e] RULE 608(a) -- Rehabilitation Evidence

[i] RULE 608(a) -- Attacks Permitting Rehabilitation

[ii] RULE 608(a) -- Rehabilitation Evidence -- Cross-Examination Insufficient to Permit Rehabilitation

[iii] RULE 608(a) -- Rehabilitation Evidence -- Evidence Responsive to Attack

[iv] RULE 608(a) -- Rehabilitation Evidence -- Evidence Not Responsive to Attack

[v] RULE 608(a) -- Rehabilitation Evidence -- Polygraph

[f] RULE 608(a) -- Witness' Own Opinion

[2] RULE 608(b) -- SPECIFIC INSTANCES OF CONDUCT

[a] RULE 608(b) -- Bias

[b] RULE 608(b) -- Character Witnesses

[i] RULE 608(b) -- Impeaching

[ii] RULE 608(b) -- Character Witnesses -- Specific Instances on Redirect

[c] RULE 608(b) -- Collateral Matter To Impeach

[d] RULE 608(b) -- Explaining the Misconduct

[e] RULE 608(b) -- Extrinsic Evidence

[i] RULE 608(b) -- Error To Admit

[ii] RULE 608(b) -- Extrinsic Evidence -- Evidence Admissible for Other Purpose

[iii] RULE 608(b) -- Extrinsic Evidence -- Generally Inadmissible

[iv] RULE 608(b) -- Extrinsic Evidence -- Opening the Door

[v] RULE 608(b) -- Extrinsic Evidence -- Third-Party Accusations

[vi] RULE 608(b) -- Extrinsic Evidence -- Witness Admits Bad Acts

[f] RULE 608(b) -- In Limine Rulings

[g] RULE 608(b) -- Privilege Against Self-Incrimination

[h] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness

[i] RULE 608(b) -- Acquittals

[ii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Alcohol Consumption

[iii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Arrests

[iv] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Bad Faith Impeachment

[v] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Bribery

[vi] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Bribery and Forgery

[vii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Bribery and Fraud

[viii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Bribery and Perjury

[ix] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Civil Complaints

[x] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Crimes Involving Force or Violence

[xi] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Disciplinary Actions

[xii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Discretion To Limit

[xiii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Failure To File Tax Returns

[xiv] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Failure To Pay Debts

[xv] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Failure To Register Gun

[xvi] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- False Statements

[A] RULE 608(b) -- Accused-Witness Charged with Falsification Offense

[B] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- False Statements -- Other Witnesses

[xvii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Foundation Required

[xviii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Fraud

[xix] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Group Associations

[xx] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Immigration Violations

[xxi] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Missing Evidence or Witness

[xxii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Narcotics

[xxiii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Not-Guilty Plea

[xxiv] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Opening the Door

[xxv] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Prejudicial Effect

[xxvi] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Sexual Conduct

[xxvii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Theft Offenses

[xxviii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Threatening Witnesses

[xxix] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Witness' Statements

[i] RULE 608(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules

[i] RULE 608(b) -- Relationship to Rule 404(b)

[ii] RULE 608(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 609(a)

[iii] RULE 608(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 611(a)

[iv] RULE 608(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 613(b)

[v] RULE 608(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 702

[j] RULE 608(b) -- Use of Documents

608.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 276 (1999)

[3] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

[4] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

[5] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 608 RULE 608

2-608 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 608.01

608.01 Official Text

Rule 608. Evidence of Character and Conduct of Witness

(a) Opinion and reputation evidence of character. -- The credibility of a witness may be attacked or supported by evidence in the form of opinion or reputation, but subject to these limitations: (1) the evidence may refer only to character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, and (2) evidence of truthful character is admissible only after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise.

(b) Specific instances of conduct. -- Specific instances of the conduct of a witness, for the purpose of attacking or supporting the witness' character for truthfulness, other than conviction of crime as provided in rule 609, may not be proved by extrinsic evidence. They may, however, in the discretion of the court, if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness, be inquired into on cross-examination of the witness (1) concerning the witness' character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, or (2) concerning the character for truthfulness or untruthfulness of another witness as to which character the witness being cross-examined has testified.The giving of testimony, whether by an accused or by any other witness, does not operate as a waiver of the accused's or the witness' privilege against self-incrimination when examined with respect to matters that relate only to character for truthfulness.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 608 RULE 608

2-608 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 608.02

608.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Bad Character for Truthfulness

One of the ways of impeaching a witness is to introduce evidence that the witness has a bad character for truthfulness, i.e., a propensity to tell lies. The rationale is that a witness who has a propensity to lie will act in accordance with that propensity while testifying. Such impeachment is excepted from the limitations on character evidence in Rule 404, and is expressly permitted by Rule 608, subject to certain important limitations discussed below.

Rule 608 continues the common-law limitation on the use of character evidence to bolster the credibility of the witness. Evidence of truthful character is only admissible after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked in some manner.

The Courts have made clear that in order for evidence of truthful character to be admissible, the witness must have been specifically attacked on grounds of bad character. n1 As one Court put it:

> Under Rule 608, evidence of a truthful character is admissible only after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise. Vigorous cross examination and/or the fact that a witness is contradicted by other evidence in the case does not constitute such an attack. n2

The Rules set forth two means by which to attack a witness' character for veracity. Rule 608(a) provides that a party may call a qualified witness to testify about another witness' bad character for truthfulness. n3 This is not a preferred method of impeachment, however, for at least three reasons. First, the witness who is being attacked usually will have testified well before the character witness will testify, i.e., in the adversary's case-in-chief. So as a matter of timing, the character witness may serve only to highlight and refresh the jury's recollection of the first witness' testimony. Second and more important, the character witness is limited to testifying in the form of opinion or reputation. So the attack on the witness' character is relatively truncated and conclusory. Third, the character witness can be tested by being asked about specific truthful acts of the witness whose character is being attacked. This is the same form of testing by way of specific acts that is authorized in Rule 405, and discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to that Rule, § 405.02[4]-[7]. All in all, the calling of a witness to impugn the character of another witness is usually unlikely to advance the proponent's case and may sometimes backfire.

The second and ordinarily more productive way to attack a witness' character for veracity is to inquire about specific bad acts that are pertinent to untruthfulness, while the witness is testifying. n4 Not only is this an immediate form of impeachment, but a specific act is ordinarily more potent than general testimony as to character or reputation. And finally, while witnesses are permitted to explain or deny the specific acts, they are not permitted to refer to unrelated specific good acts in rebuttal.

Rule 608(b) allows a party to refer to pertinent specific acts to impeach a witness' character for veracity. If the party wants to use prior convictions to show the witness' bad character for veracity, Rule 609 applies. n5

Under Rule 608 (and Rule 609), there is only one character trait that can be made the subject of an attack, and that is the character trait for untruthfulness. No other character trait is considered pertinent to the witness' propensity to lie on the stand. For example, in United States v. Robinson, 956 F.2d 1388 (7th Cir. 1992) , the defendants wanted to inquire into the past drug use of two prosecution witnesses. They argued that evidence of drug use would impeach the character of the witnesses. The Trial Judge prohibited the impeachment and the Court of Appeals affirmed. The Court rejected the proposition that "witnesses who have previously used narcotics are more likely to tell lies." It found that evidence of drug use would really have been offered to prove a character trait other than a character for untruthfulness, and this was not permitted by Rule 608. n6

Of course, evidence of drug use may be useful for a different type of attack on a witness' credibility: it may show impairment of the witness' ability to recall and relate. n7 However, in Robinson, the defendants did not even purport to argue that the witnesses' drug use affected their memory of relevant events or impaired their capacity to relate these events at trial. Therefore, the evidence of drug use was properly excluded. n8

[2] Reputation and Opinion Evidence

The Advisory Committee drafted Rule 608(a) in such a way that character evidence could be presented by either reputation or opinion evidence. At common law, only reputation testimony could be used. Whether or not opinion testimony should be permitted received much discussion in Congress. Ultimately, Congress concluded that character evidence can be based on either reputation or opinion, thus departing from common-law doctrine, as we discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment accompanying Rule 405, § 405.02[3]. We shall not repeat the discussion of reputation and opinion evidence, which can be found there.

The limitation in the Rule to opinion and reputation evidence mean that a character witness cannot be used as a subterfuge for getting specific acts of untruthfulness in front of the jury. Thus, if witness A has based his or her "opinion" of witness B's character for untruthfulness solely on the basis of a single bad act by B, then Witness A may not testify, because he or she is not really an opinion witness within the meaning of Rule 608(a). n9

[3] Prior Bad Act Impeachment

Rule 608(b) provides that for the purpose of attacking a witness' character for veracity, specific instances of conduct of a witness may be inquired into when that witness is testifying. Whenever specific instances of conduct are so used to impeach a witness, they must relate to the witness' character for untruthfulness as discussed above. Prior bad act impeachment was the product of little debate and may have escaped the attention of many members of Congress who had a fixation on Rule 609.

[4] Relationship to Rule 403

In a sense, all bad acts of a witness are pertinent to the witness' character for untruthfulness. If the act is "bad," it ordinarily indicates some transgression of law or ethics. If the witness was willing to disrespect the law or act unethically, that is at least somewhat probative of the proposition that the witness is also willing to disrespect the oath and lie on the stand. Yet Rule 608 clearly does not contemplate automatic impeachment with all of a witness' bad acts. n10 As the Advisory Committee stated in its Note to Rule 608, the Trial Court must also apply Rule 403 to determine whether the probative value of the bad act as to the witness' untruthful character is substantially outweighed by the risk of prejudice, confusion and delay. n11

We suggest that the following factors, among others, should be taken into account in assessing the probative value and prejudicial effect of bad acts when offered to impeach the witness' character trait for veracity:

(1) Dishonest nature of the act. While every bad act is somewhat probative of veracity, it is clear that acts that involve dishonesty or lying are more probative of a propensity to lie on the stand than are acts that do not. n12 Rule 609 draws a distinction in its text between crimes of dishonesty and other crimes in the text of the Rule, and there is every reason for Courts applying Rules 608 and 403 to take account of this distinction as a matter of logic, even it is not specified in those Rules. n13

(2) Remoteness of the act. As originally proposed, Rule 608(b) prohibited the admission of "remote" acts of misconduct. In order to provide for more flexibility, Congress deleted this limitation. However, remoteness remains an important consideration, because the older the act, the less it says about the witness' current propensity to lie on the stand. n14 Of course, the remoteness factor cannot be applied independently. If the act occurred long ago and yet it strongly indicates dishonest character, it may still be sufficiently probative to justify consideration by the factfinder. n15

(3) Impeachment on other grounds. If the witness has already been impeached by other methods, then use of bad acts becomes less probative. As discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 403, § 403.02[5], the probative value of a particular piece of evidence must be assessed in light of the other evidence that is or can be proffered to prove the point. Thus, if a witness has already been impeached with a prior inconsistent statement and evidence of bias, the Court should be more receptive to prohibiting inquiry into a bad act.

(4) Importance of the witness' credibility. In some cases, the credibility of a certain witness is crucial to the outcome, and in some cases it is not. The more important the witness' credibility is to the case, the more permissive the Court should be in allowing inquiry into the witness' character for truthfulness. For example, if the case comes down to a testimonial dispute between two witnesses, bad acts may well be fair game where they would not be if the witness was simply a foundation witness for an unexceptional document. n16

(5) Inflammatory nature of the act. While all bad acts are prejudicial simply because they are "bad," it is clear that some acts create a greater risk of an emotional response from the jury than others. The Trial Judge should be particularly sensitive to bad acts that will inflame the passions of the jurors to such a degree that a witness' probative testimony will be ignored unfairly. n17

(6) Similarity of the bad act to the issues in the case. The risk of prejudice is especially acute if the witness' bad act is similar or identical to the issues disputed in the case. The similarity may encourage the jury not simply to disregard the witness' testimony, but also to decide a substantive issue improperly. For example, if a criminal defendant is being tried for extortion and is impeached with prior acts of extortion, there is a great danger that the jury will use these acts for the impermissible character purposes that are otherwise prohibited under Rule 404(b); as such, exclusion should be more likely than if the bad act were dissimilar to the facts being tried.

(7) The relationship of the witness to the case. Under Rule 403, the prejudice that the Court must consider is not the humiliation suffered by the witness -- although that may be a factor for the Trial Judge to consider under Rule 611(a) in exercising discretion to exclude bad acts evidence, and under Rule 412 in protecting a rape victim. The prejudice to be considered under Rule 403 is that which will be suffered by the party whose testimony the witness favors. In this regard, the prejudice will vary depending on who the witness is. If the witness is simply an unaffiliated fact witness, the only prejudice suffered by the party is that the witness' testimony may be unfairly disregarded by the jury. But if the witness is somehow affiliated with the party -- such as a family member, friend, or business associate -- the prejudice derived from the witness' bad act is greater, because the jury may not merely disbelieve the witness; it may also unfairly conclude that "birds of a feather flock together." And, of course, if the witness is the party, the possible prejudice derived from a bad act will be at its highest. n18

[5] Claim-Mindedness

One difficult question that has arisen under Rule 608 is whether a defendant in a civil case can introduce evidence of the plaintiff's litigiousness or "claim-mindedness." For example, in Hemphill v. Washington Metro. Area Transit Auth., 982 F.2d 572 (D.C. Cir. 1993) , Hemphill sued the Transit Authority, alleging that the negligent conduct of a bus driver caused another car to crash into Hemphill's car. Hemphill lacked memory of the collision, and relied on the testimony of the driver whose car ran into hers to prove the Transit Authority's responsibility for the accident. Hemphill did testify at trial to her injuries and their relationship to the accident. On cross-examination Hemphill was asked about eight other injuries she had suffered in the span of thirty years. These injuries stemmed from four car crashes, two slip-and-fall incidents, one criminal assault, and one instance in which she was hit on the head by a falling object. She stated on cross-examination that she had pursued legal action following most of these injuries. The defendant did not contend, however, that any of these prior claims were in any way fabricated.

Over Hemphill's objection, the Trial Judge gave a "claims-minded plaintiff" instruction, allowing the jury to consider "whether the plaintiff was merely unlucky or whether or not she is claims-minded," and stating that the jury could take into account that "it is unusual for a person not engaged in a hazardous activity to suffer negligent injuries repeatedly within a short period of time and at the hands of different persons."

The Court of Appeals held that this instruction was error and reversed the judgment for the defendant. According to the Court, a claims-minded plaintiff instruction will always be in error unless the defendant presents evidence to indicate that the prior claims were false or fraudulent. This is because the mere existence of prior claims, on which the instruction is based, cannot pass the probative value/prejudice balance mandated by Rule 403. The mere fact that the plaintiff has brought claims, no matter how many, was found by the Hemphill Court as not sufficiently probative of veracity, in the absence of a showing that the claims were false.

There are several possible purposes for proffering evidence of a plaintiff's prior claims, but all such purposes appear problematic under the Federal Rules. One possibility is that the defendant is attempting to impeach the plaintiff's character for veracity. If so, the defendant must satisfy Rules 608 and 403. As discussed in the preceding section, prior bad acts of a witness cannot be inquired into if the prejudicial effect of the bad acts substantially outweighs the probative value of the evidence as it bears on credibility. The Court in Hemphill reasoned that, in the absence of a showing that the prior claims were false, the claims say little if anything about the plaintiff's propensity to lie on the stand. Against this minimal probative value there is significant prejudicial effect because the jury may believe, through the mere volume of claims, that the plaintiff is "litigious" and prone to bringing meritless claims. As the Second Circuit has stated: "The charge of litigiousness is a serious one, likely to result in undue prejudice against the party charged, unless the previous claims made by the party are shown to have been fraudulent." n19

Another possibility is that a defendant may be trying to introduce prior claims to show that the plaintiff has a character trait for litigiousness, and was acting in accordance with this trait in bringing the instant action. Under this scenario, the evidence would have probative value whether or not the plaintiff testified. But this possibility is even less likely to succeed than an attempt to impeach the plaintiff as a witness, because evidence of character would be barred by Rule 404, which prohibits character evidence to prove conduct in a civil case. n20

One possibility in some cases is that the defendant may argue that prior claims are probative of the plaintiff's bias against the defendant. This argument could not be made by the Transit Authority in Hemphill because the plaintiff's lawsuits were brought against various defendants and alleged injury by various methods. However, if the plaintiff has brought several cases against the same defendant, or the same type of defendant, then the prior claims may have some probative value as to bias.

A close case on bias was presented in Outley v. City of New York, 837 F.2d 587 (2d Cir. 1988) , where an African-American plaintiff brought police brutality claims against the City of New York, alleging excessive force on the part of white police officers. The City brought out at trial that Outley had filed numerous claims against white police officers. On appeal from a verdict against the plaintiff, the City argued that the evidence of prior lawsuits was designed to show Outley's bias against white police officers. The City properly pointed out that impeaching a witness for bias is different from trying to prove that the witness has a general propensity to make a false statement. n21 An attack on character is an attempt to show that the witness is generally a liar. An attack for bias is an attempt to show that the witness has a specific motive to provide false testimony in a specific litigation.

The Outley Court concluded that an attempt to show bias is a legitimate method of impeachment and also a legitimate not-for-character purpose under Rule 404(b). However, a defendant proffering prior lawsuits to prove the bias of a witness must still show that the probative value is not substantially outweighed by the prejudice that the plaintiff will suffer when the jury learns of his litigious background, together with the confusion and delay that may be caused when these various actions are introduced. In other words, the defendant must still satisfy the balancing test of Rule 403. The Court in Outley held that the prior actions proffered by the City failed to satisfy the Rule 403 test. According to the Court, the prejudice suffered by Outley when the jury heard about the other claims was substantial. In contrast, the probative value of the claims as to bias was "too remote." The Court explained that the mere fact that the suits were brought was not very probative of whether Outley harbored a bias against white police officers.

The Court in Outley recognized that the probative value of the prior claims as to bias would have been much greater if there was evidence that the claims were unjustified, fraudulent, or frivolous. But this could not be established by the mere fact that the claims were brought. The Outley Court reasoned that in order to establish probative value, the defendant would have to provide proof as to the lack of merit of the prior claims. But this proof process would itself implicate Rule 403 concerns, because it would "likely lead to multifariousness and a confusion of issues." Given the difficult and collateral nature of the inquiry into the merits of the plaintiff's other claims, the Outley Court concluded that "at least in this case, it is an area of examination better left closed." On the other hand, if there is clear and easily provable evidence that the plaintiff's prior claims were frivolous -- e.g., if the Trial Court in a prior case imposed sanctions on the plaintiff for frivolous litigation -- the result may be different.

It also bears noting that if the defendant in Hemphill had focused only on the plaintiff's injuries, as opposed to her claims, then these injuries could well have been relevant to the extent of damage suffered by Hemphill in the accident that was the subject of the suit. n22

[6] Specific Acts to Bolster Credibility

Can the direct examiner elicit evidence of specific acts of truthful conduct of the witness whose character has been attacked? The answer is ordinarily "no," because subdivision (a), which provides for positive character evidence after the witness' character for veracity has been attacked, makes clear that reputation and opinion evidence are permissible, but not specific acts.

But in two situations the direct examiner should be permitted at least to refer to specific truthful acts after the witness' character for truthfulness has been brought into question: First, if a witness admits during cross-examination to having previously committed an untruthful act, fairness requires that the witness be permitted to explain the circumstances surrounding, and perhaps mitigating, the act. So for example, witnesses who have admitted to perjury should be allowed to explain that they turned themselves in to the government and recanted their perjury or that they voluntarily attempted to correct their actions. Without this evidence, the prior bad act is blown out of proportion. This principle of fairness allows witnesses to refer to some specific acts of truthfulness in a limited way. It does not, however, allow witnesses to bring in all the truthful acts that they might ever have done.

Second, a party calling a character witness is permitted, following "have you heard" or "do you know" cross-examination, to put the character witness' testimony in proper perspective by testing the character witness' qualifications; this permits some limited reference to specific truthful acts.

Consider the following case: Witness X is asked, "You have testified that a prior witness Y is reported to be highly credible. But have you heard that Y was charged in 1970 with perjury by the federal government?" X answers, "Yes." X responds to later questions by indicating that the charge did not affect Y's reputation. The party sponsoring X should probably be able to elicit that X also heard that charges were dropped against Y for lack of evidence, that X learned Y was cleared, that Y offered to take a lie detector test, or that Y proved the truth of his sworn statements, etc. Some of this supportive evidence may involve specific acts, but will probably be allowed, because it bears on the weight of the witness' testimony.

Thus, we believe that a proper reading of the Rule produces the following conclusions: (1) both the direct examiner and the cross-examiner are free to impeach witnesses with specific bad act evidence; (2) except in very limited circumstances, the party seeking to bolster the credibility of a witness whom that party called may not use specific instances of conduct.

[7] Extrinsic Evidence

Rule 608(b) prohibits the introduction of extrinsic evidence to prove specific instances of conduct of a witness when the only purpose of introducing these acts is to impeach the witness' character for veracity. Therefore, although a witness can be questioned about a particular event -- subject to the Trial Court's balancing of probative value and prejudicial effect under Rule 403 -- the examiner must accept the witness' affirmation or denial of the event. n23 The purpose of the ban on extrinsic evidence is "to avoid holding mini-trials on irrelevant or collateral matters." n24

The exclusionary principle of Rule 608(b) applies only if the sole purpose in offering the specific act is to impeach the witness' character for veracity. If the specific act is offered to impeach the witness on other grounds, then the absolute preclusion of extrinsic evidence is inapplicable. This point was made clear by the Supreme Court in United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45 (1984) . Abel was charged with bank robbery, and called Mills to testify on his behalf. The prosecution sought to impeach Mills with the fact that both he and Abel were members of the Aryan Brotherhood, a secret prison gang in which members swore to protect each other, by perjury if necessary. When Mills denied his membership in the prison gang, the Trial Court permitted the prosecution to rebut the denial with testimony from another witness. Abel objected that this violated the Rule 608(b) limitation on extrinsic evidence. But the Court unanimously rejected Abel's argument in the following analysis:

> It seems clear to us that the proffered testimony with respect to Mills' membership in the Aryan Brotherhood sufficed to show potential bias in favor of [Abel]; because of the tenets of the organization described, it might also impeach his veracity directly. But there is no rule of evidence which provides that testimony admissible for one purpose and inadmissible for another purpose is thereby rendered inadmissible; quite the contrary is the case. It would be a strange rule of law which held that relevant, competent evidence which tended to show bias on the part of a witness was nonetheless inadmissible because it also tended to show that the witness was a liar.

Thus, if Mills were simply an unaffiliated fact witness in a personal injury case, his Aryan Brotherhood membership could be the subject of inquiry (because he joined an organization sworn to perjury), but extrinsic proof would be prohibited by Rule 608(b) because the only purpose for the evidence would be to show that Mills had a character trait for lying. But because Mills also had a specific motive to falsify testimony on behalf of a fellow Aryan Brother in Abel, the Rule 608(b) limitation was found inapplicable.

Abel does not hold that extrinsic impeachment evidence must always be admitted when it is offered for a purpose other than proving the witness' character for veracity. The Court specified that Rule 403 may be used to exclude extrinsic evidence when it is unduly prejudicial, confusing, or time-consuming. n25

Similarly, extrinsic evidence offered for contradiction is not barred by Rule 608(b), but it can be excluded if the probative value as to the witness' credibility would be substantially outweighed by the risk of prejudice, confusion, and delay. Traditionally the admissibility of extrinsic evidence offered as contradiction was governed by whether the evidence was "collateral" or not. But the Federal Rules do not follow that traditional, undeniably fuzzy, term. Rules 402 and 403 displace the common-law rules prohibiting impeachment on "collateral" matters. n26

[8] The Breadth of the Extrinsic Evidence Ban and the 2003 Amendment to Rule 608(b)

Until 2003, the text of Rule 608(b) was somewhat broader than the reasonable reading given to it by the Court in Abel. The Rule provided that extrinsic evidence was inadmissible when offered "for the purpose of attacking or supporting the witness' credibility." The term "credibility" is obviously broader than the term "character for truthfulness." Professor Schmertz, in Emerging Problems Under the Federal Rules of Evidence at 161, noted that "[r]ead literally, the first sentence of [the pre-2003] Rule 608(b) could bar extrinsic evidence for bias, competency and contradiction impeachment since they too deal with credibility."

The Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules determined that a number of cases had misapplied the Rule to preclude extrinsic evidence offered to impeach on non-character grounds. The Advisory Committee was also concerned that litigators might read the Rule literally and fail to proffer extrinsic evidence even to impeach a witness on non-character grounds. So in 2001 the Committee resolved to propose an amendment to Rule 608(b).

The Committee considered whether Rule 608(b) as originally intended is indeed the correct approach to the admissibility of extrinsic evidence offered for impeachment. That approach distinguishes a character attack (as to which extrinsic evidence is absolutely inadmissible) from all other forms of impeachment (as to which extrinsic evidence can be admitted subject to Rule 403). The Committee unanimously agreed that the basic approach of the Federal Rules -- distinguishing between an attack on the witness' character and other forms of impeachment -- is correct and should not be changed. An attack on a witness' character for truthfulness can be overbroad and extraneous to the issues in the case; extrinsic proof of bad acts will almost always result in a waste of time and confusion of the jury on a collateral matter. It makes sense, therefore, to employ a categorical rule of exclusion of extrinsic evidence when offered to attack a witness' character for truthfulness. Extrinsic evidence of other forms of impeachment might well be more central to the issues in the case (e.g., contradiction of a material fact, or an inconsistency in a prior statement that is material to the witness' testimony), and so a case by case approach under Rule 403 was appropriate.

The Advisory Committee's proposed amendment to Rule 608(b) became effective on December 1, 2003. It simply substituted the correct term "character for truthfulness" for the overbroad term "credibility" in Rule 608(b). The Committee Note makes clear that other forms of impeachment are governed by Rules 402 and 403 and not by the absolute bar on extrinsic evidence. The Committee Note also emphasizes that the limitation on extrinsic evidence also bars reference to the consequences that a witness might have suffered from a bad act:

> It should be noted that the extrinsic evidence prohibition of Rule 608(b) bars any reference to the consequences that a witness might have suffered as a result of an alleged bad act. For example, Rule 608(b) prohibits counsel from mentioning that a witness was suspended or disciplined for the conduct that is the subject of impeachment, when that conduct is offered only to prove the character of the witness. See United States v. Davis, 183 F.3d 231, 257, n. 12 (3d Cir. 1999) (emphasizing that in attacking the defendant's character for truthfulness "the government cannot make reference to Davis's forty-four day suspension or that Internal Affairs found that he lied about" an incident because "[s]uch evidence would not only be hearsay to the extent it contains assertion of fact, it would be inadmissible extrinsic evidence under Rule 608(b)"). See also Stephen A. Saltzburg, Impeaching the Witness: Prior Bad Acts and Extrinsic Evidence, 7 Crim. Just. 28, 31 (Winter 1993) ("counsel should not be permitted to circumvent the no-extrinsic-evidence provision by tucking a third person's opinion about prior acts into a question asked of the witness who has denied the act.").

[9] Good-Faith Basis for Questions

When the Rule 608(b) limitation on extrinsic evidence applies, it means that a specific act cannot be proved. However, this does not mean that the party can ask about a pertinent bad act without any proof that the witness actually committed the act. To control the risk of abuse, the Courts have held that a party must have a "plausible basis" to believe that the witness committed the bad act before it can be made the subject of inquiry. n27 The evidence supporting a plausible basis need not satisfy the admissibility requirements of the Federal Rules, but the party must be prepared to articulate a plausible factual basis to the Judge upon objection by the adversary. n28

[10] Denial of Bad Acts

Should a party be permitted to cross-examine a witness about a bad act knowing that the witness will deny it? This was the question in United States v. Cudlitz, 72 F.3d 992 (1st Cir. 1996) , an arson case. The Court held that the government was properly permitted to inquire, on cross-examination of Cudlitz, about his prior attempt to solicit arson. Cudlitz had testified on direct that, when previously faced with an unprofitable business venture, he had duly paid his debts, had never had a fire connected with any other enterprise, and had never made a claim for fire damage on any of his other properties. Cudlitz argued that it was improper to allow the government to ask about a prior arson, when the government knew that Cudlitz would deny it (based on his direct testimony), and where the government would be prohibited from proving the event through extrinsic evidence. The Court analyzed this argument as follows:

> An observer might well [ask] how it could possibly be proper for the government to ask a prejudicial question that it knows will be answered negatively, that cannot be pursued with extrinsic proof, and that serves only to suggest to the jury (contrary to the standard instruction) the fact implied by the question.
>
> The only answer is that the cross-examination of this kind is part of a system of checks and balances that the law has developed to caution a credulous jury against possible perjury. Thus, while the question may be asked, the government must on demand supply a good faith basis for the question; the witness may vigorously deny the suggestion and explain the basis for the denial; with rare exceptions, the government must accept the answer without offering extrinsic evidence; and the court will normally provide a limiting instruction. With these protections, and Rule 403, the defendant must be content.

The fact that the witness is certain to deny the allegation makes it less probative in assessing the witness' character. Still, the Court should have the discretion to allow the question despite the certainty of a denial -- otherwise, a witness could unilaterally preclude any reference to bad acts, by simply notifying the adversary in advance that he will deny them.

It has been argued that the limitation on extrinsic evidence leaves the witness free to lie by simply denying an act with no fear of contradiction. This is an overreaction. A witness takes an oath to tell the truth. If the witness violates that oath, the witness is subject to prosecution for perjury or a perjury-type crime. Moreover, cross-examination as to the bad act is not cut off by the witness' denial. All that Rule 608(b) does is to prevent the focus of a trial from turning from the merits of a dispute to the issue of whether a witness committed a particular act, the only relevance of which is that, if it was committed by the witness, that fact might affect the jury's assessment of credibility.

[11] Acquittals

Because a party needs only a plausible basis to believe that a bad act occurred before it can be used for impeachment under Rule 608(b), would it make any difference if the witness has been acquitted of the bad act? In United States v. Schwab, 886 F.2d 509 (2d Cir. 1989) , the Court held that an acquittal barred the government from inquiring into alleged misconduct of the defendant-witness. The Court relied on Rule 403, and stated that an acquittal "will normally alter the balance between probative force and prejudice which is already a close matter in many cases where prior misconduct of a defendant is offered."

We agree with the reasoning in Schwab that an acquittal will ordinarily diminish the probative value of the underlying alleged conduct to such an extent that Rule 403 will mandate exclusion. Indeed, there is much to be said for a bright line rule of exclusion on the ground that a case-by-case application of the Rule 403 balancing test, where the witness has been acquitted, will ordinarily result in exclusion anyway. We recognize that conduct for which a defendant has been acquitted can be admitted for a not-for-character purpose, such as proof of intent, under Rule 404(b). However, the difference between the Rules is that if the bad act is offered under Rule 404(b) it is proved at trial, so the jury can decide to its satisfaction whether the defendant really committed the act. In contrast, a bad act offered under Rule 608(b) cannot be proved in front of the jury. Thus there is a far greater risk that the jury, with no basis to assess whether the act occurred or not, will give the accusation more weight than it is worth, even when informed that the witness was acquitted. This is the kind of prejudicial effect that the Court must take into account under Rule 403. Accordingly, we suggest that Trial Courts prohibit any reference to a bad act offered to impeach a witness' character for veracity if the witness has been acquitted of charges arising from the act.

[12] Relationship to Rule 607

In our view, any examiner, whether on direct or on cross, who seeks to impeach a witness under Rule 608(b) can elicit evidence of prior bad acts. We read "cross-examination" as meaning "impeachment." In other words, a direct examiner who wishes to impeach a witness or who believes that a witness will be impeached on cross-examination may ask the witness about specific acts. This result is consistent with Rule 607.

[13] Relationship to Rule 404(b)

The basic distinction between evidence offered under Rule 404(b) and impeachment attempted under Rule 608(b) is that evidence is generally offered under the former Rule as affirmative proof of a disputed issue, while evidence may only be offered under the latter Rule to impeach a witness. See § 404.02[25] for a complete discussion of the interrelationship between these Rules.

[14] Relationship to Rule 609

Rule 609(d) provides that juvenile adjudications generally are not admissible for impeachment. One question that may arise in connection with the relationship between Rules 608 and 609 is whether a juvenile's act that resulted in a delinquency adjudication may be the subject of inquiry under Rule 608. Our view is that the basic policy of Rule 609(d) is to treat actions by juveniles as youthful indiscretions that should be forgiven and forgotten except when they have special probative value. We would extend the policy to Rule 608 and bar inquiry into juvenile acts as not shedding sufficient light on credibility to warrant reference to them, and we would rely on Rule 403 to support exclusion.

Both Rule 608 and Rule 609 come into play when a witness' conviction is based on some underlying acts that may be probative of a character for truthfulness. This interrelationship is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 609, § 609.02[5]-[6].

[15] Relationship to Rule 613(b)

When the witness is impeached for having an untruthful character, the charge is that the witness generally lies and therefore may be lying on the stand. In contrast, when the witness is impeached for having made a prior inconsistent statement, there is no charge that the witness is a liar by nature. The contention is rather that the witness has told different stories about the matters in dispute, and therefore may not be telling the truth at the trial. From the point of view of the Evidence Rules, the difference between impeachment with a prior inconsistent statement under Rule 613(b) and impeachment for untruthful character under Rule 608(b) is that extrinsic evidence cannot be admitted to prove character, but extrinsic evidence (specifically the prior statement) can be admitted to prove an inconsistency, subject to Rule 403. The line between these two forms of impeachment is sometimes difficult to draw, however.

An excellent primer on the differentiation between the two forms of impeachment was provided by Judge Selya in United States v. Winchenbach, 197 F.3d 548 (1st Cir. 1999) . Defense witness Flint testified that the defendant was not at his home at the time that a drug transaction occurred there and various parties were arrested. On cross-examination, Flint was asked whether he had told a police officer at the time of the drug bust that the officers had missed several ounces of cocaine that were buried in the yard outside the defendant's home. Flint denied making this statement. The prosecution then called the officer to whom Flint had spoken. That officer testified that Flint had indeed made the statement about the buried cocaine. The Winchenbach Court first rejected the defendant's argument that the extrinsic evidence should have been barred because one purpose for the evidence was to impeach the witness' character through evidence of prior drug use. The Court stated that the defendant's contention was "an overbroad generalization which, among its other vices, contradicts the time-honored tenet that prior inconsistent statements ordinarily may be used to impeach a witness's credibility. In the bargain, this interpretation of Rule 608(b) leaves no room at all for the admission of extrinsic impeachment evidence under the auspices of Rule 613(b). Thus, we reject it."

The Winchenbach Court set forth "a principled distinction between the types of evidence covered by the two rules." Specifically:

> Rule 613(b) applies when two statements, one made at trial and one made previously, are irreconcilably at odds. In such an event, the cross-examiner is permitted to show the discrepancy by extrinsic evidence if necessary -- not to demonstrate which of the two is true but, rather, to show that the two do not jibe (thus calling the declarant's credibility into question). [citations omitted] In short, comparison and contradiction are the hallmarks of Rule 613(b).
>
> In contrast, Rule 608(b) addresses situations in which a witness's prior activity, whether exemplified by conduct or by a statement, in and of itself casts significant doubt upon his veracity. [citation omitted] Thus, Rule 608(b) applies to, and bars the introduction of, extrinsic evidence of specific instances of a witness's misconduct if offered to impugn his credibility. So viewed, Rule 608(b) applies to a statement, as long as the statement in and of itself stands as an independent means of impeachment without any need to compare it to contradictory trial testimony. [citations omitted]

Applying this analysis to the facts, the Court found that the officer's testimony about the defense witness' statement was covered by Rule 613(b) -- and therefore the extrinsic evidence was not absolutely prohibited. The witness' denial of a prior statement about the location of drugs clearly presented an inconsistency with his trial testimony. Rule 608(b) would apply to bar the extrinsic evidence only if the prior statement concerning the drugs, standing alone and without any reference to the witness' trial testimony, was pertinent to the witness' character for truthfulness. The Court stated that the evidence of the witness' prior statement failed that test because it was simply evidence of prior drug activity that is not pertinent to truthfulness. It concluded that "the appellant does not squarely argue that the mere assertion that the officers missed some buried jars of cocaine during their search of the premises, offered in an effort to cooperate with law enforcement, sinks to the level of an affirmative example of Flint's misconduct such as would significantly affect Flint's credibility, and such an argument, if made, would be unconvincing. It is only the comparison of the earlier statement with Flint's trial testimony that imbues the evidence with probative value for impeachment purposes."

The Winchenbach Court noted that extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement, while not controlled by Rule

608(b), was still subject to the balancing test of Rule 403. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the extrinsic evidence. It reasoned that Flint was an important alibi witness, and that the inconsistency was clearly probative of the witness' credibility. n29

[16] Plea Agreements of Government Witnesses

The Editorial Explanatory Comments under Rules 403 and 607 discuss the important question of whether the prosecution can introduce the plea agreement of a cooperating witness on direct examination. The prosecution has several reasons to want to admit the plea agreement on direct examination, among them: (1) taking the sting out of anticipated impeachment by the defense; (2) deterring jury speculation that the defendant is being singled out for prosecution while other cohorts go free; and (3) corroborating the witness' claim of personal knowledge of the underlying events.

As discussed under Rules 403 and 607 (see §§ 403.02[8], 607.02[5]), the Courts have generally allowed the prosecution to offer plea agreements on direct examination of cooperating witnesses, even if the defendant agrees not to raise the agreement on cross-examinaton. But is such a practice permissible under Rule 608? In United States v. Universal Rehabilitation Services, 205 F.3d 657 (3d Cir. 2000) (en banc), the dissenters made a half-hearted attempt to argue that admission of the cooperating witnesses' plea agreements on direct violated Rule 608. Judge Roth stated: "Arguably, under Rule 608(a), absent an attack on [the cooperating witnesses'] credibility, their guilty pleas are inadmissible."

This argument is not borne out by the language of Rule 608(a), however. Rule 608(a) states that the credibility of a witness may be attacked or supported "by evidence in the form of opinion or reputation" but subject to the limitation that "evidence of truthful character is admissible only after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise." By its terms, Rule 608(a) limits only the forms of proof of a witness' credibility. It imposes limits on opinion or reputation evidence of credibility. But a plea agreement is neither opinion nor reputation evidence. Moreover, the Rule precludes evidence of "truthful character," and a plea agreement is not evidence of truthful character (unless the government is offering polygraph clauses or affirmations in the agreement that the witness has told the truth, which clauses are inadmissible under Rule 403 anyway). When an agreement is introduced to deter speculation about selective prosecution, nothing is being said about the character of the witness. Nor is character raised if the agreement is offered to corroborate the witness' assertion of personal knowledge. Put another way, inveterate liars can and do sign plea agreements. For all these reasons, Rule 608(a) does not prevent the prosecution from introducing plea agreements on direct examination.

In Universal, Judge Roth argued that in admitting the plea agreements on direct examination the Trial Court acted "at odds with Rule 608(b)." But this argument is weak. For one thing, it is not clear that a plea agreement is "conduct" of a witness within the meaning of the Rule. For another, the Rule simply states that certain evidence pertinent to credibility may not be proved by "extrinsic evidence." The Rule itself imposes no limitation on referring to or testifying to evidence of credibility on direct examination. It simply provides that the information covered by the Rule cannot be proved by extrinsic evidence. Thus, at most, the Rule would prohibit introduction of the plea agreement itself into evidence; it does not prohibit the prosecutor from asking the witness about the agreement, from eliciting testimony about the terms of the agreement and the witness' understanding of it, etc.

But most importantly, Rule 608(b) applies only when the evidence is offered to attack or support the witness' character for truthfulness. The Rule does not apply to evidence offered to prove other aspects of the witness' credibility, such as bias/motive to falsify, inconsistent statements, contradiction, and capacity. The Supreme Court made this clear in United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45 (1984) , see [7], above. A plea agreement of a cooperating witness is not offered to prove the witness' character for truthtelling. Entering into a plea agreement is no indication of whether the witness is generally a liar. In sum, Rule 608 provides no authority for the Trial Court to exclude the plea agreement of a cooperating witness. Whatever protection exists for defendants must come from Rule 403. n30

[17] Privilege Against Self-Incrimination

The last paragraph of Rule 608(b) provides that a witness who takes the stand does not waive the privilege against self-incrimination by being examined with respect to matters relating only to character for truthfulness. So for example, a defendant who is charged with robbery and takes the stand to deny the charge may invoke the privilege against self-incrimination if asked whether he or she committed a previous embezzlement for which no charge has been laid (assuming that such a question would relate to truthfulness and that the Judge would otherwise allow it). n31 Similarly, a government witness may take the stand and refuse to answer questions about conduct unrelated to the case at bar where a statement about that conduct could tend to incriminate the witness. n32

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., United States v. Drury, 344 F.3d 1089 (11th Cir. 2003) (no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of the defendant's good character for truthfulness; the government did not attack the defendant's character for truthfulness by using cross-examination to point out inconsistencies in his testimony and then arguing to the jury that the defendant's story was not credible); United States v. Danehy, 680 F.2d 1311 (11th Cir. 1982) (Trial Judge did not err in excluding character testimony concerning the defendant's honesty after the government pointed out inconsistencies in his testimony; this was not an attack on his character for truthfulness, so rehabilitation evidence was not called for).

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Thomas, 768 F.2d 611, 618 (5th Cir. 1985) . See also United States v. Hedgcorth, 873 F.2d 1307 (9th Cir. 1989) (FBI agent could not testify that he thought the defendant was a truthful person, because the government had not attacked the defendant's truthfulness as a witness: "The fact that some of the evidence may have shown that defendant conspired to cover up his crime does not mean that defendant's character for truthfulness has been attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise.").

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., United States v. Tedder, 403 F.3d 836 (7th Cir. 2005) (no error in permitting the defendant's brothers to testify that they had low opinions of his honesty, even though they had not spoken with him in a decade; "Rule 608(a) does not contain a time limit," and "[t]he long break in family relations was a subject for cross-examination."); Wilson v. City of Chicago, 6 F.3d 1233 (7th Cir. 1993) (abuse of discretion to exclude testimony by a journalist that one of the defense witnesses was a liar; the journalist had interviewed the witness and members of his "community" sufficiently both to give an opinion and to testify to the witness' reputation for truthfulness). Compare United States v. Ruiz-Castro, 92 F.3d 1519 (10th Cir. 1996) (no error where the Trial Court denied two defendants the opportunity to testify concerning the reputation of a prosecution witness; the defendants "alleged no facts to suggest that they were personally familiar with Garcia or his alleged reputation for dishonesty").

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., United States v. Whitmore, 359 F.3d 609 (D.C. Cir. 2004) (reversible error to prohibit defendant from cross-examining the key government witness about the witness having given false testimony on a prior occasion); United States v. Bustamante, 45 F.3d 933 (5th Cir. 1995) (failure to report income and solicitation of bribes are probative of dishonesty and thus the government was properly permitted to refer to these acts while cross-examining the defendant).

(n5)Footnote 5. See generally Elcock v. Kmart Corp., 233 F.3d 734 (3d Cir. 734) (discussing the relationship between Rules 608 and 609 and noting that a conviction might be admissible under Rule 609 while the acts underlying the conviction might be admissible under Rule 608).

(n6)Footnote 6. See also United States v. Anderson, 139 F.3d 291 (1st Cir. 1998) (witnesses could not be impeached with the fact that they had engaged in prostitution; commercial sexual activity is not relevant to a person's character for veracity); United States v. Meserve, 271 F.3d 314 (1st Cir. 2001) (error to permit the prosecution to impeach a defense witness with evidence of violent activity as that had "no bearing" on the witness' character for truthfulness); United States v. Parker, 133 F.3d 322 (5th Cir. 1998) (no error in precluding the defendant from asking the witness about murder charges pending against her: "Violent crimes are irrelevant to a witness' character for truthfulness"); United States v. McMillon, 14 F.3d 948 (4th Cir. 1994) (an attack on a witness' sexual preference is not permissible under Rule 608: the witness' "sexual life is not probative of his character for truthfulness. Instead, it is exactly the type of cross-examination strategy ... that impairs the search for the truth and harasses, annoys or humiliates the witness in the process.").

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., United States v. Kaplan, 832 F.2d 676 (1st Cir. 1987) (defendant should have been permitted to cross-examine a witness concerning his regular use of cocaine to impeach his ability to observe and remember); Jarrett v. United States, 822 F.2d 1438, 1445 (7th Cir. 1987) ("A witness' use of drugs is only relevant as to the ability of the witness to perceive the underlying events and testify lucidly at trial."); United States v. DiPaolo, 804 F.2d 225 (2d Cir. 1986) (evidence of alcoholism "tells us nothing of the witness's testimonial incapacity unless it involves actual intoxication at the time of the event observed or at the time of testifying. Hence, because its bearing on moral character does not involve the veracity trait it will usually not be admissible" to attack the witness' character).

(n8)Footnote 8. See also United States v. Geston, 299 F.3d 1130 (9th Cir. 2002) (proper to exclude witness' alcoholism and acts of violence, as this was not probative of the witness' character for truthfulness).

(n9)Footnote 9. See, e.g., United States v. Thomas, 768 F.2d 611 (5th Cir. 1985) (polygraph expert may not testify as to his personal opinion that a witness is either a truthful or untruthful person; such testimony, based upon a single incident, is not character opinion testimony within the meaning of Rule 608).

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., Ad-Vantage Tel. Directory Consultants, Inc. v. GTE Directories, 37 F.3d 1460 (11th Cir. 1994) (reversible error when the Trial Court permitted the defendant to impeach the plaintiff's expert witness, an accountant, by inquiring about the witness' bankruptcy and the fact that he borrowed money from his clients and failed to pay it back; "seeking discharge in bankruptcy does not show a disregard for truth that would cast doubt on a witness's veracity"; and even if the witness' borrowing from clients was unethical, "[t]o infer untruthfulness from any unethical act paves the way to the exception that swallows the rule.").

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Dakins, 872 F.2d 1061 (D.C. Cir. 1989) (applying Rule 403 and holding that the Trial Court did not err in excluding specific acts offered to impeach a witness' character for veracity); Williams v. Chevron U.S.A., Inc., 875 F.2d 501, 504 (5th Cir. 1989) (citing to Advisory Committee Note to Rule 608(b), the Court stated that "the admissibility of specific instances of conduct is circumscribed by Rule 403").

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., United States v. Redditt, 381 F.3d 597 (7th Cir. 2004) (no error in permitting defendant to be cross-examined about her false denial on an employment action that she had ever been convicted of a crime); Deary v. City of Gloucester, 9 F.3d 191 (1st Cir. 1993) (filing a false overtime report is highly probative of witness' bad character for veracity).

(n13)Footnote 13. See, e.g., United States v. Beros, 833 F.2d 455 (3d Cir. 1987) (Trial Judge properly permitted the government to cross-examine the defendant concerning his false swearing on a marriage license application; such an act is highly probative of a person's propensity to lie on the witness stand). Compare United States v. Simonelli, 237 F.3d 19 (1st Cir. 2001) (error to allow the prosecution to cross-examine the defendant about losing a contract because he violated his customer's policy against giving gratuities to the customer's employees; there was no showing that the defendant had acted fraudulently or dishonestly); United States v. Flaharty, 295 F.3d 182 (2d Cir. 2002) (no error in prohibiting defendant from cross-examining government witness about his involvement in a murder, as this is "generally not a crime of dishonesty" and so was not sufficiently probative of the witness' character for truthfulness).

(n14)Footnote 14. See, e.g., United States v. Kennedy, 714 F.2d 968 (9th Cir. 1983) (witness' involvement with the Hell's Angels ten years earlier was properly excluded under Rule 608(b) since "it detracted only minimally from his credibility").

(n15)Footnote 15. See, e.g., United States v. Weichert, 783 F.2d 23, 26 (2d Cir. 1986) (the government was permitted to cross-examine the defendant about his disbarment which occurred twelve years earlier: "That the disbarment occurred twelve years before the trial decreased its probative value but did not require exclusion.").

(n16)Footnote 16. See, e.g., Chnapkova v. Koh, 985 F.2d 79 (2d Cir. 1993) (because the plaintiff's credibility was crucial, the Trial Judge should have permitted the defense to question her about her failure ever to file tax returns); Varhol v. National R.R. Passenger Corp., 909 F.2d 1557 (7th Cir. 1990) (the plaintiff was properly cross-examined about a suspension from work he had received for purchasing stolen train tickets from his boss, because the connection between such acts and honesty and integrity, and between honesty and integrity and credibility, was sufficient to allow admission when credibility was a key issue and the plaintiff was given an opportunity to minimize any adverse inference on redirect examination); United States v. Leake, 642 F.2d 715 (4th Cir. 1981) (discretion to limit cross-examination must focus on "the importance of the testimony [of the witness being cross-examined] to the government's case, the relevance of the conduct to the witness' truthfulness, and the danger of prejudice, confusion, or delay raised by evidence sought to be adduced"; here, it was error to prevent cross-examination about bad acts when the witness was the key witness for the government.).

(n17)Footnote 17. See, e.g., United States v. Wolf, 787 F.2d 1094 (7th Cir. 1986) (the prosecutor's cross-examination of the defendant concerning his contracting venereal disease on a trip to Thailand, his recommendation of an abortion for a woman, and his relationship with a 14-year-old girl was prejudicial and improper).

(n18)Footnote 18. See, e.g., United States v. Blake, 941 F.2d 334 (5th Cir. 1991) (error, but harmless, to permit the defendant in a drug and weapons prosecution to be asked whether he had said he had killed ten people; this inflammatory question was unrelated to the substantive issues before the jury, and its probative effect on credibility was only cumulative of other impeachment evidence).

(n19)Footnote 19. Outley v. City of New York, 837 F.2d 587 (2d Cir. 1988) (error to admit prior claims by plaintiff). See also Raysor v. Port Authority, 768 F.2d 34 (2d Cir. 1985) (a plaintiff's litigiousness "may have some slight probative value, but that value is outweighed by the substantial danger of jury bias against the chronic litigant.").

(n20)Footnote 20. See, e.g., Outley v. City of New York, 837 F.2d 587 (2d Cir. 1988) ("Litigiousness is the sort of character trait with which Rule 404(b) is concerned.").

(n21)Footnote 21. See United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45 (1984) (evidence that was inadmissible to impeach the witness' character for veracity was nonetheless admissible to show the witness' bias and motive to falsify).

(n22)Footnote 22. See Hemphill, 982 F.2d at 575 (permitting cross-examination about prior claims when "relevant to the cause and extent of a claimant's injuries").

(n23)Footnote 23. See, e.g., United States v. Brooke, 4 F.3d 1480 (9th Cir. 1993) (the defendant in a murder trial was accused of having feigned terminal cancer; extrinsic evidence of "cancer fraud" could not be introduced if its only purpose was to attack the defendant's character for veracity: "Under this explicit rule [Rule 608(b)], the government was stuck with whatever response Brooke gave about her cancer; the government could attempt on further cross-examination to elicit a response contradicting her prior testimony, but it could not improperly impeach Brooke through extrinsic evidence.").

(n24)Footnote 24. Deary v. City of Gloucester, 9 F.3d 191, 197 (1st Cir. 1993) (calling a witness to the stand to rebut the denial by a previous witness of a bad act "was an unnecessary foray, resulting in a waste of the court's time," and was prohibited by Rule 608(b)).

(n25)Footnote 25. See, e.g., United States v. Phillips, 888 F.2d 38 (6th Cir. 1989) (Trial Court did not err in prohibiting extrinsic evidence of bias where "the only bias defendant can point to is a desire by the government witnesses to save their jobs by allegedly lying on cross-examination about a remote matter as opposed to lying about a fact material to the case."); United States v. Soundingsides, 825 F.2d 1468 (10th Cir. 1987) (extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement was properly excluded where the witness admitted having made the statement: "since the substance of the statements had already been repeated before the jury and acknowledged, the overkill of testimony by the Agents again repeating the statements, with its prejudicial risk of use as substantive evidence, was error.").

(n26)Footnote 26. See, e.g., United States v. Tarantino, 846 F.2d 1384 (D.C. Cir. 1988) (admissibility of extrinsic evidence offered to contradict a witness is governed by Rules 402 and 403, not by the common-law "collateral" rule).

(n27)Footnote 27. See, e.g., United States v. Whitmore, 359 F.3d 609 (D.C. Cir. 2004) ("the general rule is that the questioner must be in possession of some facts which support a general belief that the witness committed the offense or the degrading act to which the question relates"); United States v. Elizondo, 920 F.2d 1308 (7th Cir. 1990) (the prosecutor's reference to a bad act was error as it implied a factual predicate that the prosecutor knew could not be supported by evidence).

(n28)Footnote 28. See, e.g., United States v. Schwab, 886 F.2d 509 (2d Cir. 1989) (finding that the government had a plausible basis for cross-examining a witness as to prior misconduct, and noting that the government brought up the bad act only after receiving approval from the Trial Court).

(n29)Footnote 29. For cases following the Winchenbach analysis, see United States v. Bolzer, 367 F.3d 1032 (8th Cir. 2004) (prior statement was raised because it showed bad character, and its inconsistency with the witness' testimony was not on a disputed issue in the case; therefore extrinsic evidence was impermissible); United States v. McGee, 408 F.3d 966 (7th Cir. 2005) (the force of impeachment was not based on an inconsistency with the witness' testimony, but rather on the fact that the prior statement was an elaborate lie, therefore Rule 608(b) applied and it was error for the Trial Court to allow extrinsic evidence).

(n30)Footnote 30. See generally Edward Imwinkelried, The Silence Speaks Volumes: A Brief Reflection on Whether it is Necessary or Even Desirable to Fill the Seeming Gaps in Article VI of the Federal Rules of Evidence, 1998 UNIV. ILL. L. REV. 1013. Professor Imwinkelried concluded that for the most part misapplication of the Article VI rules has occurred because some Courts have failed to recognize that Rule 403 operates as a default provision for impeachment questions that are not specifically treated in Article VI.

(n31)Footnote 31. See, e.g., Air et Chaleur, S.A. v. Janeway, 757 F.2d 489 (2d Cir. 1985) (in a breach of contract action, the Trial Judge did not err in sustaining one plaintiff's claim of the privilege against self-incrimination in response to questions concerning alleged nonpayment of Belgian income taxes and in refusing to permit comment on the claim).

(n32)Footnote 32. United States v. McClurge, 311 F.3d 866 (7th Cir. 2002) (no error in refusing to strike the testimony of a government witness who refused to answer questions about criminal activity unrelated to the charges involved in the instant case).

60 of 156 DOCUMENTS

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 608 RULE 608

2-608 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 608.03

608.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] RULE 608(a) -- OPINION AND REPUTATION EVIDENCE OF CHARACTER

[a] RULE 608(a) -- Character Evidence To Impeach

[i] RULE 608(a) -- Cumulative Evidence

United States v. Haynes, 554 F.2d 231 (5th Cir. 1977) : Affirming convictions for drug offenses, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to allow the defendants to call more than one witness to testify that an undercover DEA agent had a bad reputation for truth and veracity. We suggest that Judges should not be too quick to declare character evidence cumulative, since the fact that more than one person is willing to come forward and testify to a witness' poor reputation may make the character evidence far more persuasive than if only one person testifies.

United States v. Melton, 739 F.2d 576 (11th Cir. 1984) : Upholding conspiracy and wire fraud convictions, the Court held there was no error in permitting the government to call five witnesses, after the defendant testified, to state that they would not believe him under oath. The Court reasoned that "if Melton was able to convince individuals to trade expensive cars for worthless gems, the trial judge could well have concluded that the government should be allowed to call five witnesses to counteract any effect Melton's obviously believable personality might have on the jury."

[ii] RULE 608(a) -- Character Evidence To Impeach -- Miscellaneous Cases

Deary v. City of Gloucester, 9 F.3d 191 (1st Cir. 1993) : In a civil rights action for use of excessive force, the commanding officer was asked on cross-examination about another officer's reputation for truthfulness, responded that he had never known the officer to be untruthful, and then denied knowing of an incident in which the other officer had been disciplined for an untruthful overtime report. The other officer was then recalled to the stand and admitted the incident ten years previously; documents regarding the incident were also admitted. The Court held that the commander was properly asked about the credibility of the other officer, who had previously testified, and that there was no abuse of discretion in permitting cross-examination of the commander, as character witness, with the ten-year-old disciplinary incident. The Court noted, however, that the other officer should not have been recalled and the documents should not have been admitted, as that was extrinsic evidence of specific conduct for the purpose of attacking the witness' credibility; questioning about the incident should have stopped when the commander denied any knowledge. The error was harmless, however, because the other officer could have been asked about the incident when he first testified and the evidence was not likely to inflame the jury against the defense.

United States v. Basic Constr. Co., 711 F.2d 570, 1983-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P65472 (4th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed bid-rigging convictions, finding (2-1) harmless the Trial Judge's error in excluding opinion evidence offered by a defendant to impeach a government witness.

United States v. Lashmett, 965 F.2d 179 (7th Cir. 1992) : Where defense witnesses testified that the principal prosecution witnesses had bad reputations for dishonesty, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to prohibit them from adding their personal opinions that the others were dishonest. In United States v. Pacione, 950 F.2d 1348 (7th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed a conviction for threatening a revenue officer, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting rebuttal witnesses to testify about the defendant's reputation for untruthfulness and their opinions of his untruthfulness. Although he had been convicted in connection with the business out of which their knowledge arose, it was defense counsel who brought out his prior bad acts.

United States v. Nazarenus, 983 F.2d 1480 (8th Cir. 1993) : The Court held in a prosecution for aggravated sexual abuse that it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that the defendant frequently drove fast, because it was not connected with his character for truthfulness. In United States v. Malady, 960 F.2d 57 (8th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, holding that an objection was properly sustained when a deputy sheriff was asked on cross-examination whether he believed another prosecution witness. Assuming the deputy had sufficient contact with the witness, he could have been asked for his general opinion of the witness' truthfulness, but not whether he believed the witness' story.

United States v. Melton, 739 F.2d 576 (11th Cir. 1984) : Upholding conspiracy and wire fraud convictions, the Court held there was no error in permitting the government to call five witnesses, after the defendant testified, to state that they would not believe him under oath. The Court reasoned that "if Melton was able to convince individuals to trade expensive cars for worthless gems, the trial judge could well have concluded that the government should be allowed to call five witnesses to counteract any effect Melton's obviously believable personality might have on the jury."

[iii] RULE 608(a) -- Character Evidence To Impeach -- Prejudicial Testimony

United States v. Herzberg, 558 F.2d 1219 (5th Cir. 1977) : The Court affirmed convictions for mail fraud after a trial at which the government impeached one of the testifying defendants with a character witness who testified that the defendant had a bad reputation in the community for truthfulness. The Court rejected the argument that the evidence should have been excluded under Rule 403 as unduly prejudicial.

[iv] RULE 608(a) -- Character Evidence To Impeach -- Qualifications of Witness

United States v. Whitmore, 359 F.3d 609 (D.C. Cir. 2004) : The defendant was convicted of felon firearm possession upon testimony provided by a single police officer. The Court reversed because the defendant was improperly restricted in asking the officer about prior bad acts under Rule 608(b), but it upheld rulings regarding reputation and opinion character witnesses. None of the three witnesses was found to have a sufficient basis to testify to the officer's reputation. One, a reporter, was not personally acquainted with defendant or with his reputation in the community. Any knowledge possessed by the reporter, or by a second witness, an acquaintance of the officer, was also too remote in time. As for the third witness, a defense attorney, the Court did not resolve whether the "court community" is pertinent for a police officer's reputation, but found in any event that this testimony was inadmissible because it relied on the attorney's conversations with only a few criminal defense attorneys, a "subset" of the proposed community. The Court noted that the relevant "community" for character testimony is not limited to a particular neighborhood or locality. The Court also noted that the foundational requirement for opinion evidence regarding a witness' character for truthfulness is less stringent than that for reputation evidence, but upheld exclusion of proposed opinion testimony because it was not supported by sufficient facts and was thus unduly prejudicial under Rule 403.

United States v. Mandel, 591 F.2d 1347 (4th Cir. 1979) , vacated, 602 F.2d 653 (4th Cir. 1979) (en banc): Overturning mail fraud and racketeering convictions on other grounds, the Court of Appeals panel cited this Manual and indicated that character evidence offered to impeach a witness (or to respond to impeachment evidence) could take the form of reputation or opinion based in the locality where a witness worked as well as the locality where the witness lived. An equally divided en banc Court reinstated the convictions, but did not comment on this point.

United States v. Dotson, 799 F.2d 189 (5th Cir. 1986) : Basing their opinions solely on their investigation of this firearms case, government agents testified that the defendant and his associates were not to be believed under oath. Reversing, the Court held that the opinions were inadmissible in the absence of some underlying basis to demonstrate that they were more than "bare assertions." Although the Court did not "hold that government agents may never testify as to the truthfulness of a defendant or defense witnesses," or that "a government agent's opinion of a witness' character may never be based exclusively on what the agent learned in an official investigation," it concluded that the basis was insufficient in this case.

United States v. Tager, 788 F.2d 349 (6th Cir. 1986) : Affirming securities fraud convictions, the Court found no error when a defense witness was prohibited from stating that a government witness' truthfulness was "very bad," based on an incident that occurred 11 years before the trial. The incident was remote and the testimony was essentially cumulative. We would also point out that the witness was not qualified to opine as to the other witness' character on the basis of a single act. Moreover, allowing such testimony would be a way of getting otherwise inadmissible specific acts in through the back door of "opinion."

United States v. Tedder, 403 F.3d 836 (7th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to defraud the United States and money laundering, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting the defendant's brothers to testify that they had low opinions of his honesty, even though they had not spoken with him in a decade. The Court reasoned that "Rule 608(a) does not contain a time limit," and "[t]he long break in family relations was a subject for cross-examination." In Wilson v. City of Chicago, 6 F.3d 1233 (7th Cir. 1993) , a civil rights plaintiff, who had shot and killed two policemen, alleged that police had tortured him in extracting a confession. In reversing a judgment for the individual defendants, the Court noted that it had been an abuse of discretion to exclude testimony by a British journalist that one of the defense witnesses was a liar. Although there was no error in excluding evidence that a story from the witness being investigated by the journalist had turned out to be false (because that was evidence of a specific act), the journalist had interviewed the witness and members of his "community" sufficiently both to give an opinion and to testify to the witness' reputation for truthfulness.

United States v. Bear, 357 F.3d 730 (8th Cir. 2004) : The Court reversed a conviction for aggravated sexual assault because the defense was erroneously prevented from introducing a lay witness' opinion that one of the alleged victims (who testified) "was untruthful" and "didn't always tell the truth." The witness was the foster care parent with whom the child had lived following the initial report and investigation of abuse. She saw him on a daily basis during the four to six months that he resided with her, so her opinion about his credibility was more than a "bare assertion" or "conclusory observation." In United States v. McMurray, 20 F.3d 831 (8th Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed cocaine convictions, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was impeached by opinion testimony of a character witness who had lent the defendant a credit card in order to buy presents for his children, but had ended up having to pay large travel expenses incurred by the defendant and his wife. That experience provided a rational basis for the witness' opinion as to the defendant's truthfulness. We question whether this was not simply a ruse to get specific act evidence in through the back door of "opinion." In United States v. Cortez, n1 the Court held it was error (but harmless) for two law enforcement officers to testify that they believed a government witness who reported jailhouse conversations with the defendant to them. Where neither officer had participated in the investigation of the witness or of the defendant or had known the witness until he came forward with information concerning the conversations, they had insufficient knowledge on which to base an opinion as to the witness' character for truthfulness.

United States v. Ruiz-Castro, 92 F.3d 1519 (10th Cir. 1996) : Affirming cocaine-related convictions, the Court found no error where two defendants were not permitted to testify concerning the reputation of an undercover informant, Garcia. The Court observed that the defendants were permitted to cross-examine Garcia and other witnesses with respect to Garcia's credibility, and concluded that the defendants "alleged no facts to suggest that they were personally familiar with Garcia or his alleged reputation for dishonesty." In United States v. Bedonie, 913 F.2d 782 (10th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed the Navajo defendants' convictions of felony-murder in Indian country, holding that a principal for three years of a school that was the focal point for community activities was qualified to testify to the defendants' reputation for truthfulness, even though he did not speak the Navajo language and lived with white teachers in a compound set apart from the Navajos. In Cooper v. Asplundh Tree Expert Co., n2 the Court affirmed a finding of age discrimination, holding that one employee, who had worked with a defense witness for 11 years and who had dealt regularly with the witness for almost two years, was qualified to testify concerning the witness' reputation for veracity.

United States v. Watson, 669 F.2d 1374 (11th Cir. 1982) : Reversing convictions for conspiracy to possess marijuana with intent to distribute, the Court held it was error to preclude defense witnesses from giving opinion and reputation testimony concerning the key government witness. Although the Court said that a reputation witness must show a reasonable foundation for his testimony, it relied on United States v. Lollar, 606 F.2d 587 (5th Cir. 1979) , and held that an opinion witness need not lay a foundation, but need only show personal knowledge.

[b] RULE 608(a) -- Expert Testimony

United States v. Gonzalez-Maldonado, 115 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 1997) : The Court held in this cocaine-related money laundering case that it was error to exclude testimony by a psychiatrist who had examined a coconspirator whose conversations were tape recorded and who was found incompetent to stand trial. Although parties do not have unlimited authority to offer expert testimony on the question of credibility, there is no legal bar to expert testimony simply because it relates to credibility. The Court viewed this case as quite unusual because the jury could not observe and evaluate the incompetent witness. This made the expert testimony that the witness had a mental illness that led to verbosity, grandeza, and exaggeration especially important. In United States v. Shay, 57 F.3d 126 (1st Cir. 1995) , the government, prosecuting the defendant for attempting to blow up his father's car, relied upon incriminating statements the defendant made to the police, the media, and fellow inmates. The Court held it was reversible error to exclude testimony for the defense from a psychiatrist that the defendant suffered from a mental disorder known as Munchausen's Disease, which caused him to "spin out webs of lies which are ordinarily self-aggrandizing and serve to place him in the center of attention." The Court relied upon the Advisory Committee's Notes to Rules 405 and 608 to conclude that expert testimony may be offered to establish a witness' truthful or untruthful character. In United States v. Piva, n3 the Court affirmed a marijuana conviction, but it expressed concern about the prosecution's use of professional government witnesses to vouch for the credibility of an informant.

Skidmore v. Precision Printing & Pkg., Inc., 188 F.3d 606 (5th Cir. 1999) : In an employee's action for sexual harassment and intentional infliction of emotional distress, the Court held that the Trial Judge did not err in admitting the testimony of a psychiatrist who examined the plaintiff. It held that his opinion that the plaintiff had not lied to him or fabricated her symptoms was not an impermissible opinion as to her credibility, but amounted to a proper opinion that her symptoms seemed genuine.

United States v. Waters, 194 F.3d 926 (8th Cir. 1999) : The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting rebuttal testimony by a social worker that "children rarely tell you everything about an abuse the first time they are asked" and that they often leave out details of abuse because they are embarrassed. The witness never gave her opinion as to whether the victim was telling the truth, but only informed the jury of the characteristics of sexually abused children. In United States v. Azure, n4 the Court reversed a defendant's conviction for carnal knowledge of his common-law wife's young daughter, because a physician who was an expert on child abuse was erroneously permitted to testify that the daughter was believable. This went beyond reputation and opinion evidence and invaded the province of the jury. The Court added, however, that a social worker could testify that the daughter knew the difference between truth and lies. In a motorist's product liability action against an automobile manufacturer, Bastow v. General Motors Corp., n5 the Court held it was not an abuse of discretion to exclude, under Rule 403, expert testimony offered by the defense to show that the "plaintiff had an antisocial behavior disorder and hence a character for untruthfulness." In United States v. Roy, n6 the Court affirmed a murder conviction, although it was "deeply troubled" by an FBI agent's testimony, as an expert in criminal investigations, that "amounted to an impermissible opinion that the accomplices' testimony was consistent and truthful.

United States v. Candoli, 870 F.2d 496 (9th Cir. 1989) : The Court found it was error (but harmless) to permit one expert witness to testify concerning the favorable professional reputation of another government expert in a prosecution for arson and fraud. The Court observed that reputation evidence should have been limited to truthfulness and excluded until the witness who was supported by the reputation evidence had been attacked. In United States v. Binder, n7 the Court reversed convictions for sexual offenses upon minor children, holding (2-1) that it was error to admit government expert testimony concerning the victims' ability to distinguish truth from falsehood and reality from fantasy. The majority reasoned that the experts went beyond aiding the jury "in understanding credibility evaluations or problems common to all children of the victim's age," and testified instead "that these particular children in this particular case could be believed." In United States v. Awkard, n8 the Court held that the use of hypnosis to enhance the memory of a government witness was proper, but that it was error (albeit harmless) to permit a government expert to testify about the general reliability of hypnosis before the witness whose memory was enhanced was attacked and to allow the expert to state that the enhanced memory of the government's witness was accurate. The Court expressed concern about the prejudicial impact of such evidence on the defendants and strongly stated that expert testimony on a particular witness' ability to recall is inadmissible under Rule 608.

United States v. Piccinonna, 885 F.2d 1529 (11th Cir. 1989) (en banc): Overturning its prior rule holding polygraph evidence inadmissible per se, the Court en banc vacated a conviction for knowingly making false statements to a grand jury and held that polygraph evidence was now sufficiently accepted as reliable that it could be admitted on stipulation or for impeachment or corroboration under Rule 608 upon adequate notice and opportunity for the opponent also to conduct a polygraph examination, subject to the discretion of the Trial Judge.

[c] RULE 608(a) -- Other Proceedings Offered To Affect Credibility

United States v. Lopez, 944 F.2d 33 (1st Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to possess heroin, holding there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the defendant from asking a police officer about a prior trial in which he had given testimony and in which the Judge had granted a new trial, in part because he disbelieved the officer's testimony. There was little utility in permitting the officer to be asked whether he had given untruthful testimony at the other trial, because no extrinsic evidence could be introduced to rebut his anticipated denial; moreover, the jury's knowledge of a credibility assessment made at an unrelated trial would have created a great risk that the jury might avoid its responsibility to assess the officer's credibility at the present trial.

United States v. Cruz, 894 F.2d 41 (2d Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a conviction for cocaine offenses, holding that there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to allow cross-examination of a government witness with a transcript from another drug case in which the Judge had held that the witness, an informant in both cases, was not credible. The finding was only that he lacked credibility in that case, not that he was lacking in veracity generally. In a narcotics case, United States v. Terry, n9 the government asked a "voice expert" offered by the defendant whether his testimony in other cases had been criticized as unworthy of belief. The Court upheld this cross-examination, citing Rules 608(b) and 613. Neither Rule is applicable, however. Under Rule 608(b), specific acts that the witness himself admits would be proper to attack credibility, but not the opinions of the witness' critics concerning his testimony on other occasions. And criticisms by others hardly amount to an inconsistent statement by him. The cross-examination was an effort to demonstrate that some people doubted the expert in other cases, which is the kind of opinion evidence that does not go to general character for truthfulness and is inadmissible. The Court likewise improperly allowed extrinsic evidence of a third party's opinion in United States v. Bagaric, n10 a RICO prosecution in which the government was permitted to ask a defendant, who testified on direct examination that he had sought and been denied political asylum in the United States, whether he had testified under oath at a deportation proceeding and whether the Immigration Judge had found his testimony not to be credible.

United States v. Dowling, 855 F.2d 114 (3d Cir. 1988) , aff'd, 493 U.S. 342 (1989) : Affirming convictions arising out of a bank robbery, the Court held there was no error in barring cross-examination of an eyewitness who had sued the bank to recover money he alleged was on the counter during the robbery. The Court noted that the jury verdict against the witness was not necessarily a reflection on his credibility and that the danger of confusion may well have outweighed the probative value on the witness' veracity.

United States v. Fernandez-Roque, 703 F.2d 808 (5th Cir. 1983) : The Court held it was not error to exclude evidence that a jury acquitted the defendants in a related case in which the same government witness testified. The acquittal in the prior case established only that the jury had a reasonable doubt as to those defendants' guilt; it did not foreclose the conviction of a different defendant. We would also note that even if it were clear that the prior jury did not believe the witness, nothing in Rule 608 permits this kind of impeachment. Opinions as to general credibility, not truthfulness on a particular occasion, are all that the Rule permits, and evidence that the prior jury did not believe the witness is opinion evidence.

United States v. Zizzo, 120 F.3d 1338 (7th Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed racketeering convictions, and found no error in the exclusion of four statements made by government prosecutors in other cases in which they called one hearsay declarant and one witness in the instant case liars. The Court reasoned that, even if the statements satisfied the hearsay rule, the Trial Judge could properly have excluded them as confusing, since the statements addressed other matters, and as unhelpful, since whether the prosecutor believes a witness is generally irrelevant. We would add that Rule 608(a) is limited to opinion testimony about a witness' character for truthfulness or untruthfulness and does not permit an opinion as to whether particular testimony is true or false. In Schultz v. Thomas, n11 an action against police officers who allegedly used excessive force, the Court reversed a judgment for the arrestee because the Judge in the state prosecution for disorderly conduct was erroneously permitted to testify that he had found the police officers' testimony in that action was unbelievable. The state Judge's opinions were inadmissible, since they represented his opinion as to credibility on a single occasion. In United States v. Wright, n12 the Court affirmed a conviction for heroin offenses, rejecting the defendant's argument that a government informant called as a witness could be impeached by evidence that he testified in two previous trials in which the defendants were acquitted. "The issue was whether [the informant] was credible in the eyes of the present jury, not whether twelve other persons believed or disbelieved him."

King v. Ahrens, 16 F.3d 265 (8th Cir. 1994) : The Court held in a medical malpractice case that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the defendant's medical license had been suspended eight years earlier, as any probative value the evidence had on the absence of mistake in failing to note critical information on the medical chart and on the doctor's credibility was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect, given the remoteness in time and the dissimilarity between the incidents.

United States v. Sorondo, 845 F.2d 945 (11th Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed cocaine convictions, finding plain error in the admission of evidence that a government witness had provided assistance that led to the conviction of well over 100 defendants. This evidence posed a danger that the defendant's jury would rely upon the judgment of other juries that the witness was credible.

[d] RULE 608(a) -- Other Purposes for Evidence

United States v. Henderson, 409 F.3d 1293 (11th Cir. 2005) : The Court upheld the convictions of a former police officer for pistol whipping an arrestee, submitting a misleading report about the incident, and making a false statement to an FBI agent. It found no abuse of discretion in permitting a detective to testify that he originally believed the defendant's version of events but then changed his mind and believed the arrestee. The detective was not purporting to testify as to the truthfulness of the arrestee, but to explain, after he was cross-examined about his reports, why he originally did not record the arrestee's complaints in his original police reports.

[e] RULE 608(a) -- Rehabilitation Evidence

[i] RULE 608(a) -- Attacks Permitting Rehabilitation

United States v. Lechoco, 542 F.2d 84 (D.C. Cir. 1976) : A defendant charged with kidnapping presented two doctors to support his insanity defense. The government emphasized on cross-examination that the doctors' testimony depended on the truth of statements made in psychiatric interviews with the defendant and attempted to point out reasons why he might be less than truthful. The defense then sought to offer testimony by a fellow worker who would have testified as to the defendant's reputation for truthfulness and honesty. The Court held it was reversible error to exclude this evidence, as the government had opened the door to the introduction of the character testimony by its cross-examination.

United States v. Angelini, 678 F.2d 380 (1st Cir. 1982) : Reversing a methaqualone possession conviction because the defendant was denied a chance to offer character testimony that he was a law-abiding person, the Court also observed that he was properly denied an opportunity to offer character evidence regarding truthfulness, as it was not pertinent to the crime charged and the cross-examination was insufficiently "slashing" to warrant rehabilitation.

Raysor v. Port Auth., 768 F.2d 34 (2d Cir. 1985) : In a civil rights action for false arrest and malicious prosecution, the Court upheld the exclusion of evidence concerning a defendant's religion, long-term marriage, and support of her children, since the evidence was used to bolster character that had not been attacked. In United States v. Arroyo-Angulo, n13 the Court held that in a criminal case the government cannot rehabilitate a witness until the witness is attacked, and that this principle applies to rehabilitation attempts other than by offering reputation and character evidence. In United States v. Medical Therapy Sciences, Inc., n14 the Court upheld the government's rehabilitation of its witness. Although the government properly anticipated defense impeachment by bringing out its witness' prior convictions on direct examination, this did not entitle the government to proceed to rehabilitate the witness. However, sharp cross-examination can qualify as an attack, which may permit the direct examiner to rehabilitate a witness.

Renda v. King, 347 F.3d 550 (3d Cir. 2003): The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in an action against a police officer for malicious prosecution, because the defendant was not permitted to offer evidence of his good character for truthfulness after the plaintiff's opening statement argued that the defendant was corrupt in the conduct of an official investigation. The Court held that the attack on the defendant went beyond showing his bias as a witness to impugning his character, so "counterproof of good character should no doubt be admitted." In United States v. Murray, 103 F.3d 310 (3d Cir. 1997) , a principal witness for the government in a continuing criminal enterprise trial was subjected to extended and vigorous cross-examination regarding his various illegal and sordid activities. In response, the government presented a police officer, who testified that the witness had "made" 65 or 66 cases as a confidential informant and had been extremely reliable in the information provided. The Court held that the cross-examination constituted an attack on the witness' character for truthfulness that permitted introduction of evidence to support his credibility. However, it was reversible error to admit the testimony as to specific instances relevant to the witness' character for truthfulness.

United States v. Thomas, 768 F.2d 611 (5th Cir. 1985) : Affirming cocaine convictions, the Court held that a vigorous cross-examination or contradiction of a witness is not an attack on credibility warranting admission of character evidence to rehabilitate the witness. In Stokes v. Delcambre, n15 the Court affirmed a damage award for the plaintiff, who had been injured while in the custody of the defendant sheriff and his deputy. It held that the plaintiff had not attacked the deputy's character for truthfulness merely by attributing a statement to the deputy that he denied making, so it was not error to exclude rehabilitating character testimony concerning the deputy's reputation for truthfulness.

United States v. Bonner, 302 F.3d 776 (7th Cir. 2002) : In a fraud prosecution for swindling a widow out of her VA benefit payments, the Court held there was no plain error (and would not have been an abuse of discretion, had the defendant objected) when the government elicited evidence bolstering the widow's trustworthiness during its case in chief. The evidence was proper to rehabilitate her credibility after the defense opening statement, and cross-examination of the widow when she testified, both of which implied that she might have gained some advantage from cooperating with the government's case.

United States v. Santiago, 46 F.3d 885 (9th Cir. 1995) : Appealing a conviction for the murder of a fellow inmate, the defendant complained that prosecution witnesses were permitted to testify on direct examination that they feared retaliation from the Mexican Mafia, a prisoner group with which the defendant was affiliated. The defendant argued that this testimony constituted impermissible bolstering because it was offered to show that the witnesses had no incentive to lie to assist the government. The Court held, however, that the testimony was properly admitted because the defense counsel, in his opening statement, accused the witnesses of lying to receive some advantage. The witnesses were therefore properly rehabilitated on direct examination. In United States v. Dring, 930 F.2d 687 (9th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed a conviction for drug offenses, holding that because government attacks on the defendant's testimony were direct rather than circumstantial, by showing bias, presenting contradiction evidence, and cross-examining vigorously, the defendant's proffered rehabilitative character testimony was properly excluded. In United States v.

Hedgcorth, n16 the Court stated that the fact that some government evidence might have suggested that the defendant conspired to cover up his crime does not mean that his truthfulness has been attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise.

United States v. Danehy, 680 F.2d 1311 (11th Cir. 1982) : Although it reversed a conviction for forcibly resisting and interfering with Coast Guardsmen on another ground, the Court said it was not error to exclude character testimony concerning the defendant's honesty. That the government pointed out inconsistencies in his testimony and argued that his version was not credible was not an attack on his character for truthfulness permitting rehabilitation evidence.

[ii] RULE 608(a) -- Rehabilitation Evidence -- Cross-Examination Insufficient to Permit Rehabilitation

United States v. Drury, 344 F.3d 1089 (11th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a conviction for murder-for-hire, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence offered by the defendant of his good character for truthfulness. The government did not an attack the defendant's character for truthfulness within the meaning of Rule 608 by simply using cross-examination to point out inconsistencies in his testimony and arguing therefrom that the testimony was not credible.

[iii] RULE 608(a) -- Rehabilitation Evidence -- Evidence Responsive to Attack

United States v. Lochmondy, 890 F.2d 817 (6th Cir. 1989) : Where the defendants in a marijuana possession case attacked the credibility of a government witness, the Court held it was proper to admit testimony thereafter that the witness had cooperated on other cases that resulted in convictions.

[iv] RULE 608(a) -- Rehabilitation Evidence -- Evidence Not Responsive to Attack

Zinman v. Black & Decker (U.S.), Inc., 983 F.2d 431 (2d Cir. 1993) : In an action by a former podiatrist who sued a manufacturer for an allegedly defective product, the Court held that the plaintiff was not entitled to respond to evidence of his prior conviction for Medicare fraud with evidence of law-abiding and community-minded behavior following his conviction, because the evidence did not bear on his truthfulness and therefore did not serve to rebut any false impression created by the conviction.

Beard v. Mitchell, 604 F.2d 485 (7th Cir. 1979) : The Court held that reputation evidence was properly admitted following impeachment with an inconsistent statement. In our view, the Court confused the various means of impeachment and the responses appropriate to each.

United States v. Marshall, 173 F.3d 1312 (11th Cir. 1999) : An informant allegedly received crack cocaine from the defendants and turned it over to the police later that day or the next day. At trial the DEA agent supervising the operation responded in the negative when asked, "Do you believe that [the informant] acquired the crack cocaine ... from another source [than the defendants]?" Vacating the defendants' convictions, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit the testimony, since the agent was a lay witness and he had no personal knowledge regarding the origin of the cocaine provided by the informant. The Court rejected the government's contention that the witness' opinion was rehabilitation evidence countering defense attacks on the informant's credibility. The question asked was primarily a question regarding a fact (the source of the crack) and only incidentally a question regarding the informant's truthfulness.

[v] RULE 608(a) -- Rehabilitation Evidence -- Polygraph

United States v. Thomas, 768 F.2d 611 (5th Cir. 1985) : Affirming cocaine convictions, the Court held that a vigorous cross-examination or contradiction of a witness is not an attack on credibility warranting admission of character evidence to rehabilitate the witness. Moreover, the Court expressed doubts that a polygraph examiner's opinion as to truthfulness was truly opinion evidence falling within Rule 608.

[f] RULE 608(a) -- Witness' Own Opinion

United States v. Yarns, 811 F.2d 454 (8th Cir. 1987) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to counterfeit, the Court held that extrinsic evidence of the defendant's boasts concerning his ability to lie were properly admitted. This is the rare case in which the party-witness' own admissions provide impeaching character evidence.

[2] RULE 608(b) -- SPECIFIC INSTANCES OF CONDUCT

[a] RULE 608(b) -- Bias

United States v. Gomes, 177 F.3d 76 (1st Cir. 1999) : Appealing from drug trafficking convictions, the defendants argued that it was error to exclude extrinsic evidence on three matters pertinent to the testimony of a cooperating government witness -- that the witness purchased cocaine for himself while cooperating with the government; that the witness had boasted of torturing another drug dealer; and that the witness had threatened a person with bodily harm -- because the evidence was relevant to show bias, and thus not barred by Rule 608(b). The Court found that the evidence of the cocaine purchase might show bias, since that conduct might cause the government to tear up the cooperation agreement, thus giving the witness an even greater incentive to slant his testimony in favor of the government. However, the Court concluded that it was not an abuse of discretion "to exclude such an excursion into extrinsic evidence that would distract from the main issues and in this case would add little of practical value to the defense." As to the other matters, their connection with bias was "remote," so extrinsic evidence was properly excluded.

United States v. Hatchett, 918 F.2d 631 (6th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a conviction for tax evasion, holding that the defendant's law partner, who testified for the defense about the partnership and the defendant's efforts to pay his taxes, was properly questioned on cross-examination about his own failure to file income tax returns, as the evidence demonstrated bias, which is permissible under the Rule because it goes to the witness' character for truthfulness. A better view is that failing to file income tax returns is not an act directly probative of a character trait of untruthfulness that would be admitted under Rule 608, but that to the extent it is probative of bias it may be admitted under Rules 401-403.

United States v. Lindemann, 85 F.3d 1232 (7th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed an insurance fraud conviction, holding that after the defendant suggested that a witness falsely implicated him to obtain a plea agreement, the government was properly permitted to prove that the witness cooperated against a number of people. Such evidence tended to rebut the suggestion that the witness' testimony was a lie he told in his own self-interest. The Rule 608(b) exclusion of extrinsic evidence was inapplicable, because the credibility issue was bias rather than character for veracity.

United States v. Collins, 90 F.3d 1420 (9th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed a firearm conviction, holding there was no error in barring the defendant from asking a government witness whether he transported drugs and lied to his friends about an incident involving the police, since neither of these questions suggested bias or relevance to the facts in dispute. In our view, the Court misread Rule 608(b), which permits questions about any acts by a witness that might suggest bad character for veracity. It requires neither a showing of bias nor of a relationship of the acts to the facts underlying the crime charged.

[b] RULE 608(b) -- Character Witnesses

[i] RULE 608(b) -- Impeaching

United States v. Whiting, 28 F.3d 1296 (1st Cir. 1994) : In a narcotics case, an undercover police officer was the star witness for the government. The defendants called the government witness' former commanding officer, who testified that the witness was not a truthful individual and had a reputation for untruthfulness. On cross-examination, the supervisor was led to acknowledge various commendations which the government witness had received, as well as the fact that the witness had been injured in the line of duty. The Court rejected the defendants' contention that introduction of these specific instances violated Rule 608(b), since the government was not simply trying to prove the good character of its witness, but was using the specific instances to test the supervisor's familiarity with the government witness' character. In Deary v. City of Gloucester, 9 F.3d 191 (1st Cir. 1993) , a civil rights action for use of excessive force, the commanding officer was asked on cross-examination about another officer's reputation for truthfulness, responded that he had never known the officer to be untruthful, and then denied knowing of an incident in which the other officer had been disciplined for an untruthful overtime report. The Court held that the commander was properly asked about the credibility of the other officer, who had previously testified, and that there was no abuse of discretion in permitting cross-examination of the commander, as character witness, with the ten-year-old disciplinary incident.

United States v. McNeill, 887 F.2d 448 (3d Cir. 1989) : In a prosecution for soliciting a crime of violence, the defendant called witnesses to testify to the character of the government's principal witness, but the Court held he was properly precluded from asking them about occasions when the witness had solicited them for crimes, because that was impermissible extrinsic evidence, and from asking the prosecution witness about those occasions, because the events were not probative of truthfulness. In United States v. Coleman, n17 the Court upheld a former IRS officer's convictions, finding that it was proper for the government to question character witnesses concerning specific instances of the defendant's conduct, although such cross-examination is subject to a Rule 403 analysis.

United States v. Edwards, 549 F.2d 362 (5th Cir. 1977) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy to possess counterfeit money, the Court emphasized that in questioning a character witness, a cross-examiner (i.e., a party attempting to test whether the character witness is credible) can ask the character witness about events that are more than ten years old, because the ten-year limitation of Rule 609(b) has no application to such questioning. It must be kept in mind, however, that under Rule 403 the Trial Judge can limit the questions asked character witnesses.

[ii] RULE 608(b) -- Character Witnesses -- Specific Instances on Redirect

United States v. McNatt, 931 F.2d 251 (4th Cir. 1991) : In a trial for cocaine possession, a state prosecutor testified to her opinion that a former police officer testifying for the government was not truthful, but on cross-examination said that when she had worked with him in State Court she believed he was truthful. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the defendant from asking on redirect what had changed the witness' mind, as the Rule does not allow the party calling a witness to inquire into specific instances of conduct of the person about whose character the witness is testifying.

[c] RULE 608(b) -- Collateral Matter To Impeach

United States v. Beauchamp, 986 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1993) : Affirming a check forgery conviction, the Court held there was no error in precluding the defendant from calling a witness to testify that a government witness did not live at the address he testified to. Drawing an analogy to Rule 608(b)'s ban on extrinsic evidence, the Court reasoned that "[i]t is well established that a party may not present extrinsic evidence to impeach a witness by contradiction on a collateral matter." The Court concluded that the power to exclude evidence offered to impeach on a collateral matter is a particular example of the Trial Judge's authority to exclude evidence under Rule 403.

United States v. Bonner, 302 F.3d 776 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a fraud conviction for swindling a widow out of her VA benefit payments, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony of a defense witness, offered to rebut the widow's testimony that she had not spoken to the witness on the telephone. The evidence was relevant only for impeachment, so it was a collateral matter and properly excluded. In an interstate theft case, United States v. Miller, 159 F.3d 1106 (7th Cir. 1998) , a witness testified that he saw one of the defendants use a backhoe to dig a hole, in which some of the stolen property was later found. The defendant called another witness to testify that he, not the defendant, dug the hole. Morris was called in rebuttal and corroborated the first witness; on cross-examination by the defendant, Morris denied recently talking with another defendant, Love. The defendant was not permitted to call Love to contradict Morris' testimony, and the Court affirmed. Love's testimony would only serve to impeach; it had neither an independent purpose nor an independent ground for admission. Therefore, it was "precisely the type of collateral impeachment testimony expressly prohibited" by Rule 608(b). We would note that contradiction is not covered by Rule 608(b) but rather by Rules 401-403.

[d] RULE 608(b) -- Explaining the Misconduct

United States v. Lawton, 366 F.3d 550 (7th Cir. 2004) : In a trial for false statements in connection with a gun purchase, the prosecution was permitted under Rule 608(b) to question the defendant about writing four checks on a closed bank account over a 16-day period. However, the defendant was not permitted on re-direct to explain that he subsequently paid the merchants to whom he had written the bad checks and that he had accepted responsibility for them. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence: while it was consistent with the notion that the defendant wrote the checks inadvertently, it was not particularly indicative of his state of mind at the time he wrote the checks. In a drug and money laundering case, United States v. Marzano, 160 F.3d 399 (7th Cir. 1998) , the Court held it was error (but harmless) to preclude the defendant from explaining the nature of a prior conviction used in impeaching him. In explaining why he had not disclosed a conviction in his application for a seat on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange, the defendant testified that it was a 12-year-old misdemeanor that he had forgotten about when he filed the application, but he was not permitted to explain that the conviction "was merely the forfeiture of a $50 bond that he had posted when arrested on a charge of buying a ticket to a Cubs game from a scalper in violation of an obscure Chicago ordinance, and was realistically the equivalent of a traffic violation." The Court reasoned that had the defendant been allowed to explain the conviction, "the credibility of his testimony that he had forgotten it when he filled out the form would have been enhanced."

[e] RULE 608(b) -- Extrinsic Evidence

[i] RULE 608(b) -- Error To Admit

Deary v. City of Gloucester, 9 F.3d 191 (1st Cir. 1993) : In a civil rights action for use of excessive force, the commanding officer was asked on cross-examination about another officer's reputation for truthfulness, responded that he had never known the officer to be untruthful, and then denied knowing of an incident in which the other officer had been disciplined for an untruthful overtime report. The other officer was then recalled to the stand and admitted the incident ten years previously; documents regarding the incident were then admitted. The Court held that the commander was properly asked about the credibility of the other officer, who had previously testified, and that there was no abuse of discretion in permitting cross-examination of the commander, as character witness, with the ten-year-old disciplinary incident. The Court noted, however, that the other officer should not have been recalled and the documents should not have been admitted, as that was extrinsic evidence of specific conduct for the purpose of attacking the witness' credibility; questioning about the incident should have stopped when the commander denied any knowledge. The error was harmless, however, because the other officer could have been asked about the incident when he first testified and the evidence was not likely to inflame the jury against the defense.

United States v. Murray, 103 F.3d 310 (3d Cir. 1997) : A principal witness for the government in a continuing criminal enterprise trial was subjected to extended and vigorous cross-examination regarding his various illegal and sordid activities. In response, the government presented a police officer, who testified that the witness had "made" 65 or 66 cases as a confidential informant and had been extremely reliable in the information provided. The Court held that the cross-examination constituted an attack on the witness' character for truthfulness that permitted introduction of evidence to support his credibility. However, it was reversible error to admit the testimony as to specific instances relevant to the witness' character for truthfulness.

United States v. Taylor, 900 F.2d 779 (4th Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed a drug possession conviction because, inter alia, the government bolstered the credibility of its informant witness by extrinsic evidence that he had provided reliable information and testimony that resulted in several convictions.

United States v. Cluck, 544 F.2d 195 (5th Cir. 1976) : The Court reversed a conviction on the ground that the government attacked a witness' credibility with extrinsic evidence of prior bad acts.

United States v. DeSantis, 134 F.3d 760 (6th Cir. 1998) : The defendant was convicted for mail and securities fraud in selling interests in a limited partnership, which collapsed when bars that it owned lost their liquor licenses. The government contended that the investor loss was caused by the defendant hiding excessive commissions when selling the interests; the defendant claimed that the loss occurred because his partner had sabotaged the business after they had a falling out by falsely representing to the state liquor control commission that the defendant still controlled the bars although he was required to dispose of them when convicted of another felony. On cross-examination of the defendant, he was compelled to read into evidence a State Appellate Court decision affirming administrative agency findings that he had not relinquished control over the bars. The Court reversed the conviction in this case, holding that it was improper to prove the findings by extrinsic evidence, even when read by the defendant. Two Judges, concurring in the judgment, would have excluded the evidence under Rule 403 and not reached the Rule 608(b) issue.

United States v. McGee, 408 F.3d 966 (7th Cir. 2005) : In the trial of a drug trafficking conspiracy, the prosecutor, trying on cross-examination to get one defendant to admit that he often made things up and told stories, asked him whether he had phoned his employer and told him a story. When the defendant stated that he was not sure what the prosecutor was talking about, the prosecutor played a tape-recording of a phone conversation the defendant had with his employer after he was placed in custody in which he offered a false explanation of why he was absent from work. The government argued that the tape was offered to "refresh recollection," but the Court observed that if the prosecutor wanted to refresh recollection, the proper way would have been to play the tape outside the presence of the jury. In response to the government's argument that the tape was admissible as a prior inconsistent statement, the Court responded that, even though it sometimes is difficult to distinguish between Rule 608 (b) and Rule 613 evidence, it was clear in this case that the prosecutor was seeking to prove that the defendant lied to his employer and thus the tape was extrinsic evidence and inadmissible. The error was harmless, however. In Taylor v. National R.R. Passenger Corp., 920 F.2d 1372 (7th Cir. 1990) , a jury verdict for the plaintiff in a FELA case was reversed because 14-year-old military medical records indicating complaints of back pain and a job application not mentioning back injuries had been erroneously admitted. The Court held that the records were irrelevant to the plaintiff's injury claim and were collateral extrinsic evidence inadmissible to impeach his testimony.

Berry v. Oswalt, 143 F.3d 1127 (8th Cir. 1998) : A female prisoner was awarded damages for sexual harassment by a corrections officer. The Court found reversible error in the admission of testimony concerning prior uncharged sexual misconduct by the corrections officer. The testimony was admitted as "impeachment," but the Court concluded that it really went to the substance of the claim. Even if this could be characterized as impeachment of the defendant's testimony that he never engaged in such conduct, the Court noted, it was impermissible extrinsic evidence that should have been excluded under Rule 608(b).

United States v. Brooke, 4 F.3d 1480 (9th Cir. 1993) : A conviction for offenses arising out of a pipe bombing was reversed for improper admission of evidence that the defendant had falsely claimed to friends to be suffering from terminal cancer. Extrinsic evidence was inadmissible to impeach the defendant's credibility.

United States v. Reed, 700 F.2d 638 (11th Cir. 1983) : The Court reversed a conviction for embezzlement and mail offenses because the prosecutor not only asked the defendant on cross-examination whether he recalled being in possession of a marijuana cigarette at the time of arrest and making a statement admitting marijuana use, but also offered an agent to contradict the defendant's answers. The Court observed that Rule 608 does not permit impeachment by extrinsic evidence, and it refused to read Rule 611(b), governing the scope of cross-examination, as permitting extrinsic evidence barred by Rule 608. In our view, the questions about marijuana use did not relate to credibility and should not have been asked; the extrinsic evidence compounded the problem of the improper questions.

[ii] RULE 608(b) -- Extrinsic Evidence -- Evidence Admissible for Other Purpose

United States v. Blum, 62 F.3d 63 (2d Cir. 1995) : In a prosecution of a pesticide plant owner for obstructing an EPA investigation by, inter alia, presenting a false pesticide production logbook, evidence that the principal government witness (who had been the production manager of the plant being inspected) had falsified the logbook himself in order to hide his own defalcations was excluded under Rule 608 as extrinsic evidence. Reversing, the Court found exclusion of the evidence was error, since it was not being offered primarily to impeach the witness' credibility, but to show the motive for creation of the false logbook, which was directly relevant to the question of the defendant's guilt.

United States v. Opager, 589 F.2d 799 (5th Cir. 1979) : After a government informant testified that he had observed the defendant engage in drug transactions while the two worked together in a beauty salon, the defendant offered the salon's business records to prove that the informant never worked there. Holding that the records should not have been excluded under Rule 608(b), the Court noted that they were not extrinsic evidence of prior bad acts, but "were introduced to disprove a specific fact material to Opager's defense."

United States v. Swanson, 952 F.2d 175 (8th Cir. 1991) : When an informant in a heroin distribution case indicated that her motive for arranging the buys was revenge for the defendant's reintroducing her to heroin use after a period of abstinence, the defendant offered another witness to testify that it was the informant who introduced the defendant to heroin use. The Court held it was error, but harmless, to exclude the testimony under Rule 608(b), as it did not just reflect on the informant's credibility but had a material bearing on the crime at issue.

United States v. Calle, 822 F.2d 1016 (11th Cir. 1987) : The Court reversed a conviction for cocaine offenses, holding it was error to bar a defense rebuttal witness from testifying that the prosecution's star witness was involved with large amounts of cash in drug trafficking. The excluded testimony would have contradicted the picture the government's witness painted of himself as a small-time drug user and would have supported the defendant's theory that the government witness, not the defendant, was the source of cocaine in this case.

[iii] RULE 608(b) -- Extrinsic Evidence -- Generally Inadmissible

United States v. Morrison, 98 F.3d 619 (D.C. Cir. 1996) : The Court held, in a drug conspiracy case, that the Trial Judge properly sustained an objection to defense counsel's asking a government witness whether a complaint was filed against her, after the witness denied ever making false accusations against anyone. The Court held that defense counsel was improperly attempting to introduce extrinsic evidence.

United States v. Marino, 277 F.3d 11 (1st Cir. 2002) : Affirming racketeering convictions, the Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence that would have contradicted the testimony of two government witnesses. Some of the evidence simply contradicted the witnesses as to their denial of certain acts and was barred by the no-extrinsic evidence provision in Rule 608(b), and it was a proper exercise of discretion to exclude the other evidence under Rule 403. In United States v. Lopez, 944 F.2d 33 (1st Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to possess heroin, holding there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the defendant from asking a police officer about a prior trial in which he had given testimony and in which the Judge had granted a new trial, in part because he disbelieved the officer's testimony. There was little utility in permitting the officer to be asked whether he had given untruthful testimony at the other trial, because no extrinsic evidence could be introduced to rebut his anticipated denial. In United States v. Espinal, n18 the Court sustained a cocaine conviction, ruling it was proper to exclude extrinsic evidence offered to contradict a government witness who denied ever using another name.

United States v. Aponte, 31 F.3d 86 (2d Cir. 1994) : In a postal robbery conspiracy case, the Trial Judge excluded as hearsay evidence that a government witness had given a fabricated statement and false descriptions of "robbers." The Court held that the statements were not hearsay because they were offered to show the witness' capacity for deception, not for the truth of the matter asserted; however, the statements were properly excludable under Rule 608(b) as extrinsic evidence of the character and conduct of the witness. In United States v. DiPaolo, n19 the Court affirmed convictions for intimidating witnesses, as it found that defendants were properly barred from offering extrinsic evidence as to two acts that a government witness denied.

Nicholas v. Pennsylvania State Univ., 227 F.3d 133 (3d Cir. 2000) : In a tenured professor's action for wrongful termination, the plaintiff attempted to call a rebuttal witness to testify that the plaintiff's supervisor, who was a defendant and a witness against him, had previously submitted inaccurate information in a government grant application. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the rebuttal witness' testimony, since Rule 608(b) prohibits using extrinsic evidence of specific acts to impeach a witness' character for truthfulness. In United States v. Davis, 183 F.3d 231 (3d Cir. 1999) , amended, 197 F.3d 662 (3d Cir. 1999) , the Court reversed the convictions of a former New York Transit police officer, but found no error when the prosecutor was permitted to cross-examine the defendant about misappropriating departmental gasoline, and about lying about taking a subway pass from a man and ripping it up. The Court, in a very careful analysis, observed that the government could only cross-examine the defendant about the events, and cautioned that it could not ask questions about whether the defendant was suspended or deemed a liar by the police department's Internal Affairs division. The Court noted that questions about and evidence of disciplinary actions and findings by others are a form of extrinsic evidence that should not be permitted, because they inject the views of a third person into the case to contradict the witness. A footnote stated that "[a] few courts have allowed cross-examination about other bad acts under Rule 404(b) to challenge credibility, though we think that the correct view is that such questions are allowable under Rule 608." In United States v. Oxman, n20 the Court upheld the exclusion of extrinsic evidence that a government witness had committed a prior fraudulent act.

United States v. White, 972 F.2d 590 (5th Cir. 1992) : In a prosecution for cocaine distribution, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding extrinsic evidence that the government's star witness had previously offered to fabricate testimony against an individual in exchange for government leniency in charges pending against him. In United States v. Gordon, n21 the Court affirmed conspiracy and fraud convictions, holding that the defendant was properly barred from questioning one witness about a prior statement he had made concerning another witness. The questioning was impermissible because it amounted to introduction of extrinsic evidence concerning the other witness' acts. In United States v. Reed, n22 the Court affirmed extortion convictions, finding that extrinsic evidence of prior bad acts could not be admitted to impeach the victim who complained of extortion attempts.

United States v. Miller, 91 F.3d 1160 (8th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed methamphetamine-related convictions, holding that the defendant was properly precluded from impeaching the testimony of a government witness with extrinsic evidence that the witness had attempted to bribe police officers, apparently in matters unrelated to the trial. In United States v. Martz, 964 F.2d 787 (8th Cir. 1992) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a defendant charged with distributing LSD to cross-examine the key prosecution witness about prior guilty pleas to state drug charges but excluding the documentary evidence of the plea agreements themselves. As the agreements required no cooperation or testimony, they had no bearing on the witness' potential bias or prejudice, and the Rule otherwise bars extrinsic evidence of prior bad acts merely to show a witness' general character for untruthfulness. In United States v. Bussey, n23 the Court affirmed convictions for tax evasion, holding that expert testimony as to accounting procedures was properly excluded when offered to impeach the defendant's accountant's testimony that he had told the defendant to amend a return. The Rule prohibits use of extrinsic evidence of a witness' conduct to attack his credibility.

Bonin v. Calderon, 59 F.3d 815 (9th Cir. 1995) : A convicted murderer seeking habeas corpus relief on the ground of ineffective assistance of counsel sought to admit State Bar records of fraud complaints against his lawyer. Affirming denial of the petition, the Court held that Rule 608(b) prevented use of the records to impeach the lawyer's testimony. In Lewy v. Southern Pac. Transp. Co., n24 the Court held that an employee in a FELA action would not have been entitled to testify in his direct examination concerning a witness' alleged embezzlement in order to attack the witness' credibility.

Wilson v. Muckala, 303 F.3d 1207 (10th Cir. 2002) : In a sexual harassment action by a nurse, the Court found no error in excluding evidence of the defendant doctor's extra-marital affairs, which was offered to impeach his deposition testimony that he never had an adulterous relationship while employed by the hospital. The Court held that evidence of the affairs was excluded by Rule 608(b)'s ban on extrinsic evidence. We note, however, the Rule 608(b) ban applies only if the extrinsic evidence is offered to prove the witness' character for untruthfulness, and here the purpose of the impeachment was not to show that the doctor had a propensity to lie, but rather to contradict the doctor's testimony. Nonetheless, we believe that the extrinsic evidence was properly excluded, but under Rule 403, because the probative value for contradiction on such a collateral matter was substantially outweighed by the risks of prejudice, delay, and jury confusion. In United States v. Olivo, 80 F.3d 1466 (10th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed a conviction for drug offenses, holding there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the defendant from introducing an affidavit of arrest showing that the principal government witness had made a false claim for insurance, as the affidavit was impermissible extrinsic evidence on a collateral matter. Likewise, there was no abuse of discretion in restricting rebuttal examination of the witness about the false claim, as the examination was cumulative. In United States v. Bowie, n25 a defendant asserted ineffective assistance of trial counsel because a government witness testified on cross-examination that he had falsified a signed statement under the counsel's supervision in an unrelated case in which the counsel had represented the defendant. The Court held that was insufficient to show counsel's conflict of interest, as the witness' admission of prior untruthfulness was before the jury and Rule 608(b) in any event precluded the counsel from pursuing the matter further.

United States v. Corbin, 734 F.2d 643 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court sustained drug conspiracy and related convictions, holding it was proper to exclude extrinsic evidence that a government witness had shot another man in a prior drug transaction unrelated to the instant case, after the witness denied the shooting on cross-examination. The evidence might have been admissible if the defendants provided any evidence that the witness had reason to believe that he might benefit in a prosecution arising from the shooting from his testimony in this case. In United States v. Edwards, n26 the Court upheld a ruling that witnesses could not testify to specific acts by a government witness. The defendants did not claim that the evidence was admissible for any purpose other than bad act impeachment until they claimed on appeal, when it was too late, that the evidence tended to prove that the witness was the source of a drug attributed to them.

[iv] RULE 608(b) -- Extrinsic Evidence -- Opening the Door

Bonilla v. Yamaha Motors Corp., 955 F.2d 150 (1st Cir. 1992) : Reversing a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action arising out of a motorcycle accident, the Court held that it was error to cross-examine the plaintiff about speeding violations inadmissible under Rule 404(b) simply in the hope that he would deny them, thus raising a "red herring" for impeachment. See also United States v. Ruiz-Batista, 956 F.2d 351 (1st Cir. 1992) (strongly condemning the government procedure of asking the defendant whether he had possessed cocaine on other occasions and, after receiving a denial, seeking to show such occasions for purpose of impeachment). In United States v. Babbitt, n27 the Court affirmed convictions on cocaine charges, holding there was no error in admitting evidence of two remote arrests of a defendant who claimed on direct examination that he had no police record.

United States v. Beverly, 5 F.3d 633 (2d Cir. 1993) : A defendant charged with crack cocaine and firearms offenses testified that he had never possessed a gun in Albany, New York, had only very limited familiarity with guns, and was not in Albany on specified dates. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting rebuttal evidence that he had committed two shootings on specified dates in Albany, although it noted "with distress" that the government overreached by including in its impeachment evidence the facts that the defendant had fired guns in Albany into a house, at a woman, and into the leg of a man. In United States v. Garcia, 900 F.2d 571 (2d Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed a conviction for crack cocaine distribution, holding that the prosecutor was properly permitted to introduce a record of the defendant's prior arrest for drug possession after the defendant, who had testified on direct never to have been accused of selling drugs and who had denied on cross-examination ever having been involved with drugs, on redirect created the false impression that the arrest had not involved drugs.

United States v. Billups, 692 F.2d 320 (4th Cir. 1982) : When a labor official charged with various offenses took the stand and testified that he had never accepted "anything" from waterfront employers, the door was opened, according to the Court, to government rebuttal evidence showing that he had received gratuities over the course of several years.

United States v. Blake, 941 F.2d 334 (5th Cir. 1991) : In a prosecution for drug and weapons offenses, the government elicited testimony from police officers that the defendant had admitted involvement in the crimes charged and in other criminal activity, but on direct and cross-examination the defendant denied making any incriminating statements to the police officers. The Court held there was no error in admitting rebuttal evidence of the defendant's involvement in the uncharged crimes, as it corroborated the original testimony about his confession that he was involved in drug trafficking, which was clearly a material issue in the case. A dissenting Judge contended that the government may not rebut with extrinsic evidence a contradiction elicited on cross-examination about a collateral matter. In Carson v. Polley, n28 the Court reversed a judgment for deputy sheriffs who allegedly used excessive force against the plaintiff, finding that a department performance evaluation report stating that one deputy "needs to learn to control his temper" should have been admitted to impeach the deputy after he testified, over objection, that he had not had problems in learning to control his temper. The Court said that this was evidence on a material issue and thus should have been admitted notwithstanding the limitation on extrinsic evidence under Rule 608(b). In our view, the Court was right about Rule 608(b), but wrong about the result. Rule 608 was inapplicable because the report did not reflect on the deputy's character as a witness for veracity. However, Rule 404 barred the question, and the contradicting report, as evidence of the deputy's character for using excessive force. In United States v. Vaglica, n29 the Court reversed the conviction for marijuana offenses of a defendant who offered evidence that he feigned involvement, intending to report the drug activity to law enforcement activity as he had done on a previous occasion. After defense counsel argued that the government had not offered any evidence to refute the defendant's claim that he had indeed reported criminal activity on the prior occasion, the prosecutor commented to the jury that the government offered no evidence because the "Federal Rules of Criminal Evidence" [sic] prohibited it from doing so. The Court observed that the prosecutor's statement of the law was erroneous, since extrinsic evidence could have been offered, not to prove a prior bad act for impeachment purposes, but to negate the very defense evidence that had been offered to show innocent intent.

United States v. Cusmano, 729 F.2d 380 (6th Cir. 1984) : Affirming a Hobbs Act conviction that grew out of coercive tactics directed at employees, the Court concluded that evidence of the defendant's conduct in his trucking firm's bankruptcy proceedings was properly admitted to respond to his claim on direct examination that he had close business relationships with his employees.

United States v. Kehm, 799 F.2d 354 (7th Cir. 1986) : The Court held that videotapes of a defendant bragging about his role in earlier smuggling ventures were admissible in a drug prosecution to rebut the defendant's claim that he had been too busy running a business to engage in the smuggling that was charged.

United States v. Jackson, 882 F.2d 1444 (9th Cir. 1989) : The Court held there was no error when the defendant, a disbarred lawyer charged with mail and tax fraud, was impeached with his signed statement that he had been disciplined for misappropriating client funds 14 years earlier. The Court found that while remoteness is a relevant factor, there is no time limit in Rule 608(b), and that use of the statement in cross-examining the defendant was permissible. As long as the prosecutor used the prior statement to refresh recollection and to bring home to the defendant that any denial of misconduct might involve perjury, we believe that the Court is certainly correct, but we disagree with the additional observation that under Rule 613(b), a prior statement by a witness could be used to impeach a denial of a prior act that is the subject of a Rule 608(b) examination. Using a prior statement after a witness denies an act is impermissibly offering extrinsic evidence, as the dissenting Judge noted.

United States v. Fleming, 19 F.3d 1325 (10th Cir. 1994) : Affirming convictions for firearms violations, the Court held that the Rule 608(b) ban on extrinsic evidence did not prevent a party from demonstrating that testimony elicited on direct examination (even regarding a collateral matter) was false: "A defendant may not make false statements on direct examination and rely on the government's inability to challenge his credibility as to the truth of those statements." The Court recognized, however, that Rule 403 may support exclusion of some rebuttal testimony.

United States v. Cousins, 842 F.2d 1245 (11th Cir. 1988) : In a prosecution for conspiracy to import cocaine and tax evasion, the Court held that evidence of the defendant's prior drug use was properly admitted after the defendant claimed on direct examination that he had always been "an anti-drug person." In United States v. Blanton, n30 a prosecution of a physician charged with improper dispensing of drugs, the Court held that cross-examination of the defendant concerning his wife's death, which was partially attributable to an overdose of a drug he had obtained for her, was proper where the defendant portrayed himself as meticulously careful.

[v] RULE 608(b) -- Extrinsic Evidence -- Third-Party Accusations

Young v. James Green Mgmt., Inc., 327 F.3d 616 (7th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant employer in a race discrimination action, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting a property manager employed by the defendant to be cross-examined as to whether a former employer had accused him of stealing documents. The Court suggested that this was permissible under Rule 608(b), but we disagree. A witness may be asked whether he stole something from a former employer, because that is a question about a prior act related to honesty. But asking about the employer's accusation focuses not on what the witness did but on what the employer said, which is extrinsic evidence and also hearsay.

[vi] RULE 608(b) -- Extrinsic Evidence -- Witness Admits Bad Acts

Carter v. Hewitt, 617 F.2d 961 (3d Cir. 1980) : In an inmate's action against prison officials, the Court held that a letter from the plaintiff to another inmate suggesting how to bring a brutality suit, a "set-up," was properly admitted, in part because the plaintiff admitted writing the letter. Rule 608(b)'s ban on extrinsic evidence serves to keep collateral matters (i.e., whether impeaching conduct happened) from assuming prominence out of proportion to their significance, but there was no danger of a "minitrial" here. In our view, there is even less reason to allow proof through extrinsic evidence when the witness admits the bad act than if the witness denies the act. However, if the timing of the letter and its language suggested a planned fraud (something challenged in the dissent), the letter was correctly admitted as showing a plan to bring a fraudulent suit, which is not simply a prior bad act offered to impeach credibility.

United States v. Zandi, 769 F.2d 229 (4th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed an opium possession conviction, finding that extrinsic evidence of documents on which the defendant gave false information was properly used by the government during cross-examination, since the defendant admitted providing the false information. In our view, this was error, since if the witness admits the bad act, there is even less reason to allow proof through extrinsic evidence than if the witness denies the act. Of course, error in admitting the extrinsic evidence would almost always be harmless, since the only consequence would be to waste the Court's time.

[f] RULE 608(b) -- In Limine Rulings

United States v. Goldman, 41 F.3d 785 (1st Cir. 1994) : The Court held that a defendant charged with drug offenses could not appeal a ruling permitting the government to cross-examine him about prior acts of drug dealing for impeachment purposes. Since the defendant did not testify, the Court relied upon Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38 (1984) , and concluded that "[a]lthough Luce involved impeachment by conviction under Rule 609, the reasons given by the Supreme Court for requiring the defendant to testify apply with full force to the kind of Rules 403 and 404 objections that are advanced by Goldman in this case."

United States v. Weichert, 783 F.2d 23 (2d Cir. 1986) : The Court relied upon Luce v. United States to hold that defendants in a fraud case could not challenge an in limine ruling permitting the government to ask an attorney-witness about his disbarment if he testified, since the defendants never called him as a witness.

United States v. Sanderson, 966 F.2d 184 (6th Cir. 1992) : In a prosecution for theft of government property, the Trial Judge ruled that evidence of prior thefts by the defendant was not admissible on the government's direct case but would be admissible under Rule 608(b) to impeach the defendant if he took the stand. The Court held that the defendant was precluded from appealing that ruling because he did not testify at trial.

United States v. Daniele, 886 F.2d 1046 (8th Cir. 1989) : The Court found no error in the Trial Judge's declining to rule in advance of the defendant's taking the stand on the scope of cross-examination concerning whether he had lied to IRS investigators. It reasoned that "the trial court generally balances each question's relevance to honesty and veracity with its prejudicial impact," and found that the Judge in this case indicated that such balancing would be done.

[g] RULE 608(b) -- Privilege Against Self-Incrimination

United States v. Pelusio, 725 F.2d 161 (2d Cir. 1983) : In a prosecution for unlawful receipt of firearms, the Court found there was no error in permitting the direct examination of the arresting officer to stand, even though he invoked his privilege against self-incrimination when asked about unrelated departmental charges pending against him. In Air et Chaleur, S.A. v. Janeway, n31 the Court affirmed a verdict for stockholders who sued for breach of a contract to purchase their stock, finding no error in rulings sustaining one plaintiff's claim of the privilege against self-incrimination in response to questions concerning alleged nonpayment of Belgian income taxes and refusing to permit comment on the claim.

United States v. Viera, 819 F.2d 498 (1987) , adhered to on reh'g en banc, 839 F.2d 1113 (5th Cir. 1988) : In reviewing cocaine distribution convictions, a panel of the Court held there was no error in limiting the cross-examination of the alleged principal in order to protect his privilege against self-incrimination on collateral offenses. The panel observed that the defendant was able to explore the principal's potential bias and to demonstrate reasons why the jury might doubt his credibility. On rehearing en banc, the Court vacated the panel's reversal of the defendant's convictions, but adopted the prior opinion regarding the limitation of cross-examination.

United States v. McClurge, 311 F.3d 866 (7th Cir. 2002) : In a trial on kidnapping and related charges, the defendants attempted to impeach a prosecution witness by questioning him about criminal activity that was unrelated to the facts at issue. The witness refused to answer and invoked the Fifth Amendment privilege; the defendants moved to strike the witness' direct testimony, but the Trial Judge denied the motion. The Court, relying on the Advisory Committee Note to Rule 608(b), found no error. It noted that the questions were "collateral" to the culpability of the defendants and therefore were aimed solely at impugning the witness' credibility, "an attempt which must cease at the threshold of [the witness'] own Fifth Amendment rights."

[h] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness

[i] RULE 608(b) -- Acquittals

United States v. Schwab, 886 F.2d 509 (2d Cir. 1989) : The Court held that it was error, but harmless, for the defendant in a bribery case to be asked on cross-examination about a 1970 tax fraud of which he was acquitted and 1965 perjury charges that had been dismissed after two mistrials.

[ii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Alcohol Consumption

United States v. Geston, 299 F.3d 1130 (9th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a police officer's convictions for unreasonable use of force and assault with a dangerous weapon, holding that evidence that the victim was previously involved in two violent incidents after drinking alcohol was properly excluded, since neither of the prior incidents constituted conduct that was probative of the victim's character for truthfulness or his credibility.

[iii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Arrests

Hafner v. Brown, 983 F.2d 570 (4th Cir. 1992) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in an arrestee's § 1983 action, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding cross-examination of the plaintiff's witness about her prior arrests. The defendants were permitted to ask about prior convictions and bad acts probative of the witness' credibility, as well as about her relationships with the police and directly whether she had any bias. Evidence of arrests is of dubious value on credibility and bias and the defendants did not provide persuasive arguments that the line of questioning they proposed would have gotten them further than the cross-examination permitted.

United States v. Pettigrew, 77 F.3d 1500 (5th Cir. 1996) : The Court held in a bank fraud prosecution that there was no error in cross-examining a defense witness about whether a transaction in which he and the defendant had engaged was itself the subject of an investigation. While neither a witness' prior bad acts nor the mere fact that he has been arrested or indicted is generally admissible for impeachment, where the arrest or accusation grows out of transactions at issue, or related transactions, the evidence is admissible to show the witness' potential bias. In United States v. Farias-Farias, 925 F.2d 805 (5th Cir. 1991) , the Court held it was permissible for a prosecutor to ask a defendant charged with marijuana smuggling about prior arrests for drunk driving, alien smuggling, and weapons offenses. The evidence was inconsistent with his telling the customs agent when he was arrested that he had only one prior arrest, and tended to impeach his credibility. In an action for personal injuries by a contractor's employee against the owner of a drilling platform on which he was working, Williams v. Chevron U.S.A., Inc., n32 the Trial Judge did not err in precluding the defendant from introducing a 1971 arrest record that showed the plaintiff's weight as much less than he testified it was at that time, since the unfair prejudice that would be produced by the evidence substantially outweighed its probative value.

[iv] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Bad Faith Impeachment

United States v. Elizondo, 920 F.2d 1308 (7th Cir. 1990) : A defendant charged with conspiracy to distribute marijuana attempted to offer as alibi evidence a Mexican accident report, and the prosecutor asked on cross-examination whether the report had been purchased and whether the accident ever happened. The Court held the questioning was error (but not reversible), as it implied a factual predicate that the prosecutor knew could not be supported by evidence.

[v] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Bribery

United States v. Simonelli, 237 F.3d 19 (1st Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions for tax fraud, the Court found it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to cross-examine the defendant about losing a contract because he violated his customer's policy against giving gratuities to its employees. There was no showing of the contents of the policy or whether the alleged violation demonstrated trustworthiness.

Vichare v. AMBAC, Inc., 106 F.3d 457 (2d Cir. 1997) : After discovery in a Title VII action disclosed that the plaintiff had received kickbacks from a subcontractor, the defendants asserted a counterclaim for breach of fiduciary duty. On cross-examination of the plaintiff, he was asked about the kickbacks. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion, as the evidence was admissible to impeach under Rule 608(b), and it did not run afoul of the policy expressed in McKennon v. Nashville Banner Publ. Co., 513 U.S. 352 (1995) , against an employer using after-acquired evidence to defeat a cause of action for employment discrimination.

[vi] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Bribery and Forgery

United States v. Waldrip, 981 F.2d 799 (5th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed convictions for bank fraud offenses, holding there was no plain error in questioning the defendant about acts of forgery and bribery. Although the forgery was very similar to the conduct for which she was on trial, any error was harmless.

[vii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Bribery and Fraud

United States v. Rosa, 891 F.2d 1063 (3d Cir. 1989) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug offenses, holding that the defendants were properly prohibited from cross-examining a government witness regarding his alleged involvement in bribing public officials in connection with an insurance fraud, because bribery is not the kind of conduct that bears on truthfulness or untruthfulness. The defendants had properly been permitted to inquire concerning the fraudulent insurance claim itself, as well as the witness' conspiratorial oath of loyalty to his crime family to the extent it bore on truthfulness.

[viii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Bribery and Perjury

United States v. Hurst, 951 F.2d 1490 (6th Cir. 1991) : On direct examination of a defendant charged with gambling offenses, his previous guilty plea to attempted obstruction of justice was elicited. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting cross-examination to bring out that the conviction arose from an attempt to bribe a police officer to make false official records, as subornation of perjury could be probative of truthfulness.

United States v. Wilson, 985 F.2d 348 (7th Cir. 1993) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to impede the IRS, the Court held that a defendant was properly cross-examined about acts of perjury and acts of bribery.

[ix] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Civil Complaints

United States v. Morrison, 98 F.3d 619 (D.C. Cir. 1996) : The Court held, in a drug conspiracy case, that it was not an abuse of discretion to preclude the defense from asking a witness whether a civil complaint had been filed against her, as "the mere filing of a complaint is not 'probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness,' regardless of whether the allegations in the complaint, if true, would seriously undermine the witness' credibility."

United States v. Dowling, 855 F.2d 114 (3d Cir. 1988) , aff'd, 493 U.S. 342 (1990) : Affirming convictions arising out of a bank robbery, the Court held there was no error in barring cross-examination of an eyewitness who had sued the bank to recover money he alleged was on the counter during the robbery. The Court noted that the jury verdict against the witness was not necessarily a reflection on his credibility and that the danger of confusion might well have outweighed probative value.

[x] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Crimes Involving Force or Violence

United States v. Meserve, 271 F.3d 314 (1st Cir. 2001) : Although the Court affirmed convictions for robbery and firearms offenses, it found error when the prosecution questioned the defendant's brother about whether he was a "tough guy" and had been in a lot of fights, since the evidence was completely irrelevant to his credibility as a witness, in the circumstances of this case.

United States v. Flaharty, 295 F.3d 182 (2d Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for drug conspiracy offenses, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendants were not permitted to cross-examine a key government witness, a former leader of the conspiracy, about his involvement in a murder. The Court noted that "[m]urder generally is not a crime of dishonesty, and nothing about the Evans murder suggested that it would in any way reflect on [the witness'] truthfulness."

United States v. Parker, 133 F.3d 322 (5th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed convictions for public bribery, finding no error when the defense was precluded from cross-examining a prosecution witness about pending state charges that she had murdered her husband, since "[v]iolent crimes are irrelevant to a witness' character for truthfulness." In United States v. Bynum, n33 the Court upheld a ruling that a government witness could not be cross-examined about prior bad acts of holding foster children against their will to work at his racetrack, since the acts shed little light on credibility.

United States v. Manske, 186 F.3d 770 (7th Cir. 1999) : The defendant was convicted for cocaine distribution solely on testimony from cooperating witnesses and evidence of his having met regularly with them; there was no physical evidence or admission by the defendant. The defendant likewise had no physical or documentary evidence supporting his claim that the regular meetings involved gambling activities and the cooperating witnesses were framing him. Although the case turned on the credibility of the prosecution witnesses, the defense was precluded from cross-examining a principal government witness about past incidents in which the witness had threatened and intimidated potential witnesses against him. Reversing, the Court held that threats to other witnesses were probative under Rule 608(b) of the likelihood that the witness would seek to gain advantage for himself by giving false testimony against the defendant.

United States v. Young, 567 F.2d 799 (8th Cir. 1977) : The Court affirmed rejection of a defendant's attempt to impeach a witness by cross-examining her concerning her alleged offer to pay $10,000 to have her former husband killed, stating that "the proposed question was not relevant to veracity and honesty and would have been highly prejudicial."

United States v. Van Dorn, 925 F.2d 1331 (11th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed racketeering convictions, holding there was no error in prohibiting evidence that a key prosecution witness had allegedly threatened federal judicial officers in his prior drug prosecution, as the evidence had nothing to do with truthfulness or untruthfulness and was in any event barred under the Rule because it was extrinsic.

[xi] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Disciplinary Actions

Deary v. City of Gloucester, 9 F.3d 191 (1st Cir. 1993) : In a civil rights action for use of excessive force, the commanding officer was asked on cross-examination about another officer's reputation for truthfulness, responded that he had never known the officer to be untruthful, and then denied knowing of an incident in which the other officer had been disciplined for an untruthful overtime report. The other officer was then recalled to the stand and admitted the incident ten years previously; documents regarding the incident were then admitted. The Court held that the commander was properly asked about the credibility of the other officer, who had previously testified, and that there was no abuse of discretion in permitting cross-examination of the commander, as character witness, with the ten-year-old disciplinary incident. The Court noted, however, that the other officer should not have been recalled and the documents should not have been admitted, as that was extrinsic evidence of specific conduct for the purpose of attacking the witness' credibility; questioning about the incident should have stopped when the commander denied any knowledge. The error was harmless, however, because the other officer could have been asked about the incident when he first testified and the evidence was not likely to inflame the jury against the defense. In Navarro de Cosme v. Hospital Pavia, 922 F.2d 926 (1st Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in an action by the parents of a stillborn fetus, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting cross-examination of the plaintiffs' expert witness about another case in which he had submitted an inflated invoice for fees earned as an expert witness, about the suspension of his notary's license for failure to submit required reports, and about his being a defendant in three medical malpractice cases. The matters all pertained to his credibility as a witness. In a civil rights case against police officers, De San Miguel v. Sbert, n34 the plaintiff was not entitled to ask a defendant officer whether he had been disciplined on unrelated matters, since this did not tend to prove untruthfulness.

United States v. Davis, 183 F.3d 231 (3d Cir. 1999) , amended, 197 F.3d 662 (3d Cir. 1999) : The Court reversed the convictions of a former New York Transit police officer, but found no error when the prosecutor was permitted to cross-examine the defendant about misappropriating departmental gasoline, and about lying about taking a subway pass from a man and ripping it up. The Court, in a very careful analysis, observed that the government could only cross-examine the defendant about the events, and cautioned that it could not ask questions about whether the defendant was suspended or deemed a liar by the police department's Internal Affairs division. The Court noted that questions about and evidence of disciplinary actions and findings by others are a form of extrinsic evidence that should not be permitted, because they inject the views of a third person into the case to contradict the witness.

United States v. Whitehead, 618 F.2d 523 (4th Cir. 1980) : The Court held that a defendant could be cross-examined about his suspension from the practice of law and the underlying facts.

United States v. Simpson, 709 F.2d 903 (5th Cir. 1983) : A defendant charged in a drug scheme claimed that he was involved in legitimate business activities and that certain conversations with others involved "role playing" where he pretended to go along with them. The Court found that it was proper for the government to cross-examine the defendant concerning a civil injunction obtained against him by the SEC. Admission of the judgment itself was an improper use of extrinsic evidence, but harmless in this case.

United States v. Stoecker, 215 F.3d 788 (7th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed convictions for making false statements to financial institutions and giving or receiving bribes, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was barred from asking a government witness about an administrative complaint against him that led to his voluntarily surrendering his real estate license. The Court observed that the complaint against the witness was over 15 years old, no assessment of guilt was ever made, and the witness was never required to pay restitution. Even had the witness been convicted of a crime, the conviction would have been barred by the ten-year rule of Rule 609(b). Thus, the Trial Judge did not err in finding that the probative value for impeachment purposes was substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice. In an action by an injured railroad worker, Varhol v. National R.R. Passenger Corp., 909 F.2d 1557 (7th Cir. 1990) , the Court held that the plaintiff was properly cross-examined about a suspension from work he had received for purchasing stolen train tickets from his boss, because the connection between such acts and honesty and integrity, and between honesty and integrity and credibility, is sufficient to allow admission when credibility was a key issue and the plaintiff was given an opportunity to minimize any adverse inference on redirect examination.

United States v. Hastings, 577 F.2d 38 (8th Cir. 1978) : The Court held that it was proper to preclude the defendant from cross-examining a witness about events leading to his less-than-honorable discharge from the military for failure to wear his uniform, since the evidence did not relate to credibility.

Hampton v. Dillard Dep't Stores, Inc., 247 F.3d 1091 (10th Cir. 2001) : African-American plaintiffs, who had been stopped by a security guard for suspected shoplifting, brought a § 1981 action against the store. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in questioning the guard about his suspension 20 years previously from the state highway patrol for falsifying a report. Although the event was remote in time, it was probative of his character for truthfulness. In United States v. Rosario Fuentez, 231 F.3d 700 (10th Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed drug convictions, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was precluded from cross-examining the undercover officer who participated in her arrest concerning disciplinary proceedings after the officer made a false statement to his supervisor investigating an unauthorized undercover drug operation. The Trial Judge indicated that it was "not at all clear" that Rule 608 would sanction introduction of evidence of the investigation and the officer's misrepresentations. The Court concluded that "the admission of testimony regarding the investigation would have been proper," but, finding the issue "close," it held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the inquiry, given the Judge's concern that it would have been confusing, the fact that the defense brought out other evidence related to the officer's credibility, and the fact the officer's testimony was corroborated by other evidence.

[xii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Discretion To Limit

United States v. Tillem, 906 F.2d 814 (2d Cir. 1990) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge in an extortion prosecution prevented cross-examination of a government witness about illegally engaging in structured transactions to avoid currency transaction reporting requirements. The probative value of the evidence, if any, as to truthfulness was outweighed by its prejudicial effect.

Elcock v. Kmart Corp., 233 F.3d 734 (3d Cir. 2000) : In a personal injury action arising from a slip-and-fall, the Trial Judge admitted evidence that one of the plaintiff's expert witnesses had pleaded guilty to embezzlement, but forbade questions regarding the amount embezzled or the facts and circumstances of the crimes. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff on other grounds, the Court noted that the guilty pleas were properly admitted under Rule 609(a)(2). The underlying misconduct, involving dishonesty, was probative of the witness' character for truthfulness, and thus admissible, at the Judge's discretion (governed by Rules 403 and 611), under Rule 608(b). The Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding reference to the underlying acts, but it noted that the amount of money misappropriated and the manner in which it was done were certainly relevant to prove the witness' dishonesty. On remand, the Judge was free to balance once again whether the gain from this probative value justified the time required to ask about the details.

United States v. Leake, 642 F.2d 715 (4th Cir. 1981) : Reversing convictions for offenses involving misappropriation of federal funds, the Court held the defense was improperly restricted from inquiring into prior acts of the key government witness. While the Trial Judge has discretion to limit cross-examination, such discretion must focus on "the importance of the testimony [of the witness being cross-examined] to the government's case, the relevance of the conduct to the witness' truthfulness, and the danger of prejudice, confusion, or delay raised by evidence sought to be adduced."

United States v. Brown, 946 F.2d 1191 (6th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a conviction for cocaine offenses in late 1989, holding there was no abuse of discretion when cross-examination of the government's key witness regarding his drug addiction and sale of drugs prior to that year was limited in order to avoid unnecessarily prolonging the examination. Careful scrutiny of the record revealed that defense counsel was able to cross-examine the witness effectively, to disclose that he was an addict-informant, and to explore fully his potential bias and truthfulness. Evidence of his prior drug use was inadmissible, as it did not bear on his character for untruthfulness.

United States v. Marvin, 720 F.2d 12 (8th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed a conviction for illegal possession of a firearm, upholding a ruling that the defense could not ask a government witness about drug use and involvement in insurance fraud after the witness indicated outside the hearing of the jury that she would deny the conduct mentioned in the questions. The Court also sustained the exclusion under Rule 403 of questions about the witness' complaints that the defendant had sexually harassed her.

United States v. Rosario Fuentez, 231 F.3d 700 (10th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was precluded from cross-examining the undercover officer who participated in her arrest concerning disciplinary proceedings after the officer made a false statement to his supervisor investigating an unauthorized undercover drug operation. The Trial Judge was concerned that the inquiry would lead to a "trial within a trial" because the disciplinary action was on appeal and there was some controversy as to exactly what happened in the investigation; further, it was "not at all clear" to the Judge that Rule 608 would sanction introduction of evidence of the investigation and the officer's misrepresentations. The Court concluded that "the admission of testimony regarding the investigation would have been proper," but, finding the issue "close," it held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the inquiry, given the Judge's concern that it would have been confusing, the fact that the defense brought out other evidence related to the officer's credibility, and the fact the officer's testimony was corroborated by other evidence.

United States v. Taylor, 417 F.3d 1176 (11th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a drug possession and firearm conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was not permitted to introduce, as evidence of the arresting officer's bias and tendency for untruthfulness, civilian complaints charging the officer with brutality, planting evidence, and harassment. As all the complaints were unproven and there was no evidence that they had led to discipline or conviction of the officer, any probative value they might have was substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice to the prosecution. In a drug prosecution, United States v. Novaton, 271 F.3d 968 (11th Cir. 2001) , the Court found no abuse of discretion in barring the defendants from cross-examining a police detective about his suspension from the force for a four-month period in 1987 while he was investigated and before he ultimately was reinstated, and from cross-examining an agent about a pending investigation into whether he had stolen drugs. The Court held that a Judge has discretion to exclude the questioning under Rule 403 and that, even though a defendant has a right of confrontation and it is important for a defendant to be able to examine a "star witness," the evidence was inadmissible because there was no finding of any bad act and the evidence was substantially more prejudicial than probative.

[xiii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Failure To File Tax Returns

Chnapkova v. Koh, 985 F.2d 79 (2d Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed a judgment for a patient who sued a plastic surgeon claiming that surgery had left her face scarred, holding that, because the plaintiff's credibility was crucial, the defense should have been permitted to question her about her failure ever to file tax returns.

[xiv] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Failure To Pay Debts

Ad-Vantage Tel. Directory Consultants, Inc. v. GTE Directories Corp., 37 F.3d 1460 (11th Cir. 1994) : In an antitrust action, the Court found reversible error in permitting the defendant to impeach the plaintiff's expert witness, an accountant, by inquiring about the witness' bankruptcy and the fact that he borrowed money from his clients and failed to pay it back. The Court held that "seeking discharge in bankruptcy does not show a disregard for truth that would cast doubt on a witness's veracity." The Court also stated that even if the witness' borrowing from clients was unethical, "[t]o infer untruthfulness from any unethical act paves the way to the exception that swallows the rule."

[xv] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Failure To Register Gun

United States v. Miles, 207 F.3d 988 (7th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed convictions for attempted bank robbery and use of a firearm. The government offered evidence that a security guard fired shots at the defendant, the defendant had gunshot wounds when arrested, and the bullet recovered from the defendant's leg matched the security guard's gun. The Court held that there was no error in preventing the defendant from asking the security guard about his failure to register his gun with the City of Chicago. The security guard had purchased the gun while employed as a police officer in another city and possessed a valid state firearm owner's identification card as well as a gun registration card issued by the state. Thus, the failure to register the gun with the City did not implicate fraud, deceit, or dishonesty and would not bear on his truthfulness.

[xvi] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- False Statements

[A] RULE 608(b) -- Accused-Witness Charged with Falsification Offense

United States v. Simonelli, 237 F.3d 19 (1st Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed convictions for filing false tax returns, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was cross-examined about altering time cards, inflating bills, and removing records that he later told an investigator were unavailable because there had been a fire.

United States v. Jones, 900 F.2d 512 (2d Cir. 1990) : The Court held there was no error when the defendant, charged with making false statements before the grand jury, was impeached by asking her about false statements she made on employment, driver's license, and loan applications, and on income tax returns.

United States v. Sanders, 343 F.3d 511 (5th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed convictions for bank fraud and making a false statement to the SBA, finding no abuse of discretion when the prosecutor was permitted to question the defendant about reneging on an agreement with the real estate agent who sold the defendant's home. The Court reasoned that, because the defendant's conduct may have involved fraud, it addressed his character for truthfulness; thus, the Judge could find that any prejudicial effect did not substantially outweigh its probative value. In United States v. Cole, n35 the Court found no error in the government's asking a defendant charged with willful misapplication of funds whether he had submitted a false excuse for being absent from work to a former employer.

United States v. Hartmann, 958 F.2d 774 (7th Cir. 1992) : A man was murdered as part of a scheme by his wife and others to defraud life insurance companies. The Court held that a defense witness was properly asked on cross-examination about an illegal handgun sale in which he offered to "create" paperwork naming a fictitious person as purchaser.

United States v. Amahia, 825 F.2d 177 (8th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed convictions arising from a fraudulent marriage scheme to procure immigration visas, holding it was not error to permit cross-examination of the defendant concerning specific acts of insurance fraud.

United States v. Girdner, 773 F.2d 257 (10th Cir. 1985) : The Court found no error in the cross-examination of a defendant, charged with making false statements in connection with an absentee ballot fraud prosecution, concerning prior falsehoods and deceitful acts in the ballot fraud scheme.

[B] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- False Statements -- Other Witnesses

United States v. Whitmore, 359 F.3d 609 (D.C. Cir. 2004) : The Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession because the defendant was improperly restricted in cross-examining the key government witness, a police officer, about three instances of past misconduct: alleged false testimony before a court four years earlier, the suspension of his driver's license five years earlier and his failure to report the suspension to his supervisors, and failure to make child support payments. The Court concluded that the proposed cross-examination was "strongly probative" of the officer's character for untruthfulness, as "[n]othing could be more probative of a witness's character for untruthfulness than evidence that the witness has previously lied under oath."

United States v. Fortes, 619 F.2d 108 (1st Cir. 1980) : In a bank robbery case, the Court approved a ruling preventing the defense from asking a government witness about involvement in a sale of cocaine, since this was not probative of untruthfulness. The Court also said it was proper to permit an extensive inquiry by the defense into whether the government witness had told the truth on previous occasions, but to limit to some extent the number of questions asked. In United States v. Nogueira, n36 the Court upheld a ruling barring the defense in a bank robbery case from questioning a key government witness about an alleged false statement on an employment application, as it was remote in time and involved a failure to mention a juvenile adjudication, which the witness' probation officer had told him was not a criminal record for employment purposes.

Hynes v. Coughlin, 79 F.3d 285 (2d Cir. 1996) : In an inmate's § 1983 action against prison guards, the plaintiff was precluded from asking one of the defendants on cross-examination whether he had previously claimed a knee injury on the job which the Worker's Compensation Board had found not to be job related and whether he had previously been suspended three months without pay for giving false information to a lieutenant. The Court vacated a judgment for the defendants, and said that on remand the cross-examination questions would be proper, assuming there was a good faith basis and the Trial Judge did not determine that they should be excluded under Rule 403. In a RICO prosecution, United States v. Bagaric, n37 the Court concluded that the government was properly permitted to ask a defendant, who testified on direct examination that he had sought and been denied political asylum in the United States, whether he had testified under oath at a deportation proceeding and whether the Immigration Judge had found his testimony not to be credible. In our view, the Court's conclusion is inconsistent with Rule 608. The government could have asked the witness whether he lied under oath during a proceeding. A denial would have concluded the inquiry. However, the government may not suggest that some third party did not believe the witness, as this smuggles in extrinsic evidence of a third party's opinion, which is barred by the Rule.

United States v. Irizarry, 341 F.3d 273 (3d Cir. 2003) : Affirming RICO convictions, the Court held that the prosecutor properly cross-examined the defendant about why he had a driver's license in another person's name in his wallet at the time of arrest and why he had numerous blank social security cards in his apartment. The Court concluded that the questions were permissible to establish the defendant's lack of truthfulness. In Johnson v. Elk Lake School Dist., 283 F.3d 138 (3d Cir. 2002) , a § 1983 action arising from alleged sexual abuse of a high school student by a guidance counselor, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the plaintiff was not permitted to ask the counselor on cross-examination if he had lied about having made the dean's list in college when he first applied for a job with the school district nine years before the trial. The remoteness in time substantially diminished the probative value of the evidence, and the lying, while duplicitous and wrong, "was not so indicative of moral turpitude as to be particularly probative" of his character for untruthfulness. In United States v. Sullivan, n38 the Court affirmed a police commander's extortion conviction, finding that the prosecution properly cross-examined the defendant concerning the accuracy of federal income tax forms and financial disclosure forms. In United States v. Beros, n39 the Court held that the government was properly permitted to cross-examine the defendant concerning his false swearing on a marriage license application.

United States v. Hitchmon, 609 F.2d 1098 (5th Cir. 1979) : The Court reversed convictions for assaulting federal officers because the defendants were restricted in cross-examining the assaulted officers in an effort to show they previously had perjured themselves in the case.

United States v. Sherlin, 67 F.3d 1208 (6th Cir. 1995) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a defendant charged with arson to be cross-examined about a prior investigation into two unrelated fires, where he had initially denied any knowledge of the fires and subsequently admitted that he had originally lied and that he knew who set the fires. The admitted lies were probative of his character for truthfulness or untruthfulness and the evidence was not unfairly prejudicial.

United States v. Dawson, 425 F.3d 389 (7th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for a narcotics trafficking conspiracy, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to preclude cross-examination of three government agents about rulings in other cases that the Judges there had disbelieved their testimony. The defendants were not proposing to use extrinsic evidence, but only question the witnesses about specific conduct for the purpose of attacking their character for truthfulness. In a prosecution for stealing and opening mail, United States v. Redditt, 381 F.3d 597 (7th Cir. 2004) , the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendant was cross-examined about her false denial on an employment application that she had ever been convicted. Furthermore, the defense waived any challenge on appeal to admission of the application form when counsel stated that he had no objections when the document was introduced. In United States v. Holt, n40 the Court affirmed a conviction for masterminding a bank robbery, finding that the prosecution properly questioned the defendant's wife concerning occasions on which she had someone sign her name to checks in order to make purchases and later reported the checks as stolen, since a witness' statement to an investigator provided a good faith basis for the questions. In Simmons, Inc. v. Pinkerton's, Inc., n41 the Court affirmed a judgment for a warehouse owner who sought to recover damages against the defendants as a result of a fire. It found that the plaintiff was properly permitted to elicit from an employee of the defendants that he had falsely told the defendants' investigator that he had taken and passed a polygraph examination regarding the circumstances of the fire. The question was directed at the fact that the witness had lied, a bad act relating to credibility that was the proper subject of inquiry under Rule 608(b); whether or not a test had been taken or its results would have otherwise been admissible was irrelevant. In United States v. Covelli, n42 the Court sustained convictions arising out of the robbery of a shop and the disposition of stolen goods, finding that one defendant was properly asked on cross-examination whether he had faked insanity previously when charged with burglary. See also United States v. Howard n43(it was permissible for the government to cross-examine the defendant concerning false statements on employment applications).

Crimm v. Missouri Pac. R.R., 750 F.2d 703 (8th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed an employer's judgment in an age discrimination action, finding no error in the exclusion of the employee's questions to company witnesses concerning one witness' false answer on an application form, which the witness subsequently corrected, and use of marijuana. It concluded that the Trial Judge had discretion to find that the questions would not have contributed much to an assessment of the credibility of the witnesses and would have been unduly prejudicial.

United States v. Carlin, 698 F.2d 1133 (11th Cir. 1983) : Affirming a conviction for interstate transportation of stolen and forged securities, the Court found that after the defendant testified on direct examination concerning his application for two used car dealer licenses, the government was entitled to ask him whether, on his verified application for the licenses, he answered truthfully a question concerning previous conviction of a felony.

[xvii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Foundation Required

United States v. Whitmore, 359 F.3d 609 (D.C. Cir. 2004) : The Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession because the defendant was improperly restricted in cross-examining the key government witness, a police officer, about three instances of past misconduct: alleged false testimony before a court four years earlier, the suspension of his driver's license five years earlier and his failure to report the suspension to his supervisors, and failure to make child support payments. The Judge barred the questions, concluding that the probative value was not high and there was a risk of diverting the jury's attention from the facts of the case. The Court held that the proposed cross-examination was "strongly probative" of the officer's character for truthfulness, and found that the defense had a "reasonable basis" in copies of the records for asking the questions.

[xviii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Fraud

United States v. Sanders, 343 F.3d 511 (5th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed convictions for bank fraud and making a false statement to the SBA, finding no abuse of discretion when the prosecutor was permitted to question the defendant about reneging on an agreement with the real estate agent who sold the defendant's home. The Court reasoned that, because the defendant's conduct may have involved fraud, it addressed his character for truthfulness; thus, the Judge could find that any prejudicial effect did not substantially outweigh its probative value.

United States v. Munoz, 233 F.3d 1117 (9th Cir. 2000) : At a mail fraud trial arising from a sale-leaseback scheme, one of the defendants mentioned on direct examination another sale-leaseback investment in which he had been involved that had failed. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting inquiry on cross-examination of the defendant about a third sale-leaseback investment he had sold more than ten years earlier. The evidence was relevant to the truthfulness of the defendant's claim that he was an unwitting participant in the charged scheme, since the terms of the two schemes were similar, and the evidence was not too remote to be probative of his truthfulness.

[xix] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Group Associations

United States v. Dickens, 775 F.2d 1056 (9th Cir. 1985) : Reversing drug convictions, the Court found error in the cross-examination of one defendant concerning his belonging to "the mob," since "[a] defendant's guilt may not be proven by associating him with unsavory characters," and "[e]vidence of association with others associated with the 'mob,' even though the others may have been engaged in criminal activity, did not bear on [his] truthfulness."

[xx] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Immigration Violations

United States v. Thiongo, 344 F.3d 55 (1st Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed convictions arising from a conspiracy to gain illegal admission into the United States for Kenyan nationals, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the prosecutor to ask the defendant on cross-examination whether she served as a legal witness to a sham marriage (between her current husband and another woman) designed to avoid immigration laws. The Court found that willingness to do so "is fairly probative of Defendant's truthfulness."

[xxi] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Missing Evidence or Witness

United States v. Smith, 792 F.2d 441 (4th Cir. 1986) : The Court upheld the government's cross-examination of the defendant as to his procuring the absence of a material prosecution witness.

[xxii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Narcotics

United States v. Atherton, 936 F.2d 728 (2d Cir. 1991) : Affirming a conviction for distributing cocaine, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding cross-examination of a prosecution witness about use of illegal drugs during the period he was acting as a government informant, as the evidence was not probative of either the witness' bias or his credibility.

United States v. McDonald, 905 F.2d 871 (5th Cir. 1990) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) to cross-examine a defendant charged with importing marijuana about his prior use of speed and cocaine, as drug use is not probative of truthfulness.

United States v. Brown, 946 F.2d 1191 (6th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a conviction for cocaine offenses in late 1989, holding there was no abuse of discretion when cross-examination of the government's key witness regarding his drug addiction and sale of drugs prior to that year was limited in order to avoid unnecessarily prolonging the examination. Careful scrutiny of the record revealed that defense counsel was able to cross-examine the witness effectively, to disclose that he was an addict-informant, and to explore fully his potential bias and truthfulness. Evidence of his prior drug use was inadmissible, as it did not bear on his character for untruthfulness.

United States v. Bentley, 706 F.2d 1498 (8th Cir. 1983) : Affirming convictions in a drug case, the Court found no error in prohibiting a defendant from asking a government witness whether he had been indicted in a prior drug investigation. The indictment did not result in a conviction and the underlying act of involvement in a drug operation was not so clearly indicative of untruthfulness that it had to be permitted.

United States v. Kizer, 569 F.2d 504 (9th Cir. 1978) : The Court held it was not error to bar cross-examination of a government witness about past drug use and hospitalization for addiction.

United States v. Wilson, 244 F.3d 1208 (10th Cir. 2001) : Although the Court affirmed cocaine-related convictions, it found that it was error (but harmless) to permit cross-examination of one defendant about his past drug-related arrests. The questioning was impermissible under Rule 608(b) because "the drug crimes themselves (the 'conduct' at issue) have no relation to truth or untruth." In Bennett v. Longacre, n44 the Court held in an automobile accident case that it was proper under Rule 608(b) to disallow examination of the defendant concerning prior use of alcohol and marijuana, since that would not shed light on the witness' character for truthfulness.

United States v. Clemons, 32 F.3d 1504 (11th Cir. 1994) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) for one defendant in a trial for the murder of a DEA agent to cross-examine his codefendant about prior use or sale of drugs, as the evidence was neither probative of the witness' truthfulness or his capacity to testify nor relevant to the facts of the case. Affirming convictions for violating a theft suspect's civil rights by allowing a codefendant to beat him, the Court in United States v. Sellers, 906 F.2d 597 (11th Cir. 1990) , held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the complainant had a year prior to the incident checked himself into a mental hospital saying he had a problem with drug and alcohol abuse and that he previously used drugs. The story at the hospital was made up at a time he had domestic troubles, and the defendants offered no proof he suffered any mental disorder impairing his perceptions at the time of the incident; nor could they show any drug or alcohol impairment or even use during the year preceding the incident. Neither the prior drug use nor the lies to the hospital staff while he was emotionally distressed were probative of his truthfulness at trial. In United States v. Massell, n45 the Court found no error in a ruling that if the defendant asked a witness about her drug use, the witness would be permitted to indicate that she used drugs while married to the defendant and together with him. See also United States v. Holman n46(permitting the defense to ask a key government witness in a marijuana smuggling case about his drug use at approximately the time of the smuggling, but not about drug use at other times).

[xxiii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Not-Guilty Plea

United States v. Norris, 910 F.2d 1246 (5th Cir. 1990) : On cross-examination, the prosecutor in an amphetamine distribution case elicited that a defendant had previously been convicted of marijuana delivery after pleading not guilty to the charge, of which he knew he was guilty. The Court reversed the defendant's conviction, holding that the questioning, and argument based thereon that the defendant was dishonest, penalized the defendant for exercising his constitutional right to plead not guilty and put the government to its proof.

[xxiv] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Opening the Door

United States v. Cusmano, 729 F.2d 380 (6th Cir. 1984) : Affirming a Hobbs Act conviction that grew out of coercive tactics directed at employees, the Court concluded that cross-examination of the defendant concerning his assault on one of his truck drivers was proper following his direct examination in which he denied ever threatening anyone, including any drivers.

Young v. James Green Mgmt., Inc., 327 F.3d 616 (7th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant employer in a racial discrimination action, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a property manager employed by the defendant was cross-examined as to whether a former employer had accused him of stealing documents. The Court noted that the witness testified on direct examination that he was accused of taking a client's documents and turning them over to opposing counsel, which he portrayed in a charitable light. This testimony opened the door to cross-examination on the theft accusation. In a prosecution for firearms offenses, United States v. Taylor, n47 the government's apparent theory was that the defendant might have had weapons to protect cocaine and other items. The defendant claimed he had no drugs and that the weapons were left by a friend, and on cross-examination he denied any familiarity with cocaine. The Court held there was no error in permitting the prosecutor to ask about an arrest for cocaine possession and about the discovery of cocaine at his residence a few months after the firearms were found.

United States v. Beckman, 298 F.3d 788 (9th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for marijuana importation offenses, the Court held it was error (but harmless) for the prosecutor to ask the defendant about an arrest in San Diego for attempted burglary and a misdemeanor conviction in San Bernardino for trespassing. The government argued that the questions were intended to show that when he said on direct that he had "hit the road" to "see ... unexplored territory," his implication that Southern California was "unexplored territory" was false, because the arrest and conviction showed he had been there before. The Court observed that he could have been traveling through California to get to unexplored territory or exploring parts of Southern California as yet unexplored, notwithstanding his prior trips. The vague statement on direct examination hardly counted as a claim that he had never been to San Diego before the charged crime, and in no way provided cover for introducing other crimes under "the guise of impeachment." In United States v. Palmer, n48 the Court affirmed a conviction for obtaining cocaine by misrepresentation, holding that there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the prosecutor to cross-examine the defendant as to whether he had diverted to his personal use any of the cocaine that was ostensibly for use in his dental practice, when his direct testimony implied that he had used no cocaine personally.

United States v. Drake, 932 F.2d 861 (10th Cir. 1991) : In a prosecution for wire fraud, the prosecutor referred on cross-examination of the defendant to college records inconsistent with his description of his academic record. The Court held that preliminary testimony on direct regarding educational background opened the area to cross-examination and provided a potential target for impeachment, and that the prosecutor's examination did not include impermissible extrinsic evidence.

Shiley, Inc. v. Bentley Labs., 794 F.2d 1561 (Fed. Cir. 1986) : In a patent infringement action, the Court found that the plaintiff was properly permitted to impeach a defense witness by questioning him about an adverse judgment of willful infringement in prior litigation with a third party, after he testified that he had a policy of avoiding infringement.

[xxv] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Prejudicial Effect

United States v. Dakins, 872 F.2d 1061 (D.C. Cir. 1989) : The Court affirmed a drug conviction, finding no error when the defendant was barred from offering evidence that the undercover officer, who the defendant claimed entrapped him, had failed to intercede when the defendant was involved in an altercation with another officer. The Court suggested that, if the evidence was relevant, it was more prejudicial than probative.

Perez v. Jones, 935 F.2d 480 (2d Cir. 1991) : Affirming dismissal of a habeas corpus petition, the Court held there was no denial of due process when the prosecutor attempted to impeach a defense witness with repeated questions to which the witness asserted his privilege against self-incrimination, since inferences drawn from invocation of the privilege could not have been used to build the state's case-in-chief or add critical weight to the state's case.

United States v. Blake, 941 F.2d 334 (5th Cir. 1991) : The Court held it was error, but harmless, to permit the defendant in a drug and weapons prosecution to be asked whether he had said he had killed ten people, as this inflammatory question was entirely unrelated to any substantive issue before the jury, and its probative effect on credibility was only cumulative of other impeachment evidence.

[xxvi] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Sexual Conduct

United States v. Thiongo, 344 F.3d 55 (1st Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions arising from a conspiracy to gain illegal admission into the United States for Kenyan nationals, the Court indicated that it was receptive to the defendant's claim that evidence that she bore one man's child while married to another was not probative of truthfulness, but any error was harmless. In a prosecution for transportation across state lines for purposes of illegal sexual activity, United States v. Anderson, 139 F.3d 291 (1st Cir. 1998) , two minors testified that the defendants transported them to New Jersey and employed them as prostitutes. Affirming, the Court found no error when the defendants were not permitted to cross-examine the minors about prostitution activities that the minors engaged in both before and after the time period charged. The Court rejected the argument that commercial sexual activity was relevant to credibility as a witness, declaring that "[s]uch a position seems to us to embody a particularly offensive form of stereotyping to which we are loath to give credence."

United States v. Crowley, 318 F.3d 401 (2d Cir. 2003) : Affirming a conviction for attempted aggravated sexual abuse, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defense was precluded from asking the victim during cross-examination about previous cases in which she made false accusations of rape. On a voir dire examination, the victim denied making false claims; because Rule 608(b) would keep the defense from attempting to refute these denials, the only evidence before the jury would have been the accusation and the victim's denial. Allowing cross-examination before the jury "would thus have produced little of probative value" and "the prejudicial impact of engendering speculation about the subject outweighed the minimal probative value of permitting the jury to evaluate [the victim's] demeanor during the question and answer." We believe that this analysis proves too much: it would prohibit cross-examination with bad acts whenever the witness makes it clear that he will deny they occurred, giving the witness unilateral control over bad acts cross-examination. In a drug case, United States v. Rabinowitz, n49 the Court said that prior acts of sodomy upon young children and consequent psychiatric treatment bore no relationship to the credibility of a witness.

United States v. McMillon, 14 F.3d 948 (4th Cir. 1994) : The Court held in a drug prosecution that it was not an abuse of discretion to preclude a defendant from cross-examining a cooperating coconspirator about the witness' use of drugs to force men to engage in sexual acts with him. Testimony regarding a witness' sexual life is not probative of his character for truthfulness; rather, it impairs the search for truth and harasses, annoys, or humiliates the witness in the process.

United States v. Colyer, 571 F.2d 941 (5th Cir. 1978) : The Court stated that the fact that a witness is a homosexual has nothing to do with his character for truthfulness.

United States v. Smith, 831 F.2d 657 (6th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that evidence that a witness dressed as a prostitute or engaged in prostitution was inadmissible, since it had little relevance to credibility. Although defense counsel sought to argue that the evidence was relevant to prove bias, the record did not indicate that a bias theory was suggested during the trial.

United States v. Wolf, 787 F.2d 1094 (7th Cir. 1986) : Reversing Mann Act convictions, the Court found that cross-examination of the defendant concerning his contracting venereal disease on a trip to Thailand, his recommendation of an abortion for a woman, and his relationship with a 14-year-old girl was prejudicial and improper.

[xxvii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Theft Offenses

United States v. Badger, 983 F.2d 1443 (7th Cir. 1993) : Answering a cross-examination question, a defendant on trial for drug crimes said he was against thievery; the prosecutor then brought out that he had been convicted of a misdemeanor theft offense more than ten years previously and asked whether he and another conspirator had dealt in stolen goods. The Court held the misdemeanor questions permissible, but it was improper (although not plain error) to ask about dealing in stolen goods because there was no basis for the questions and they did not serve to impeach his earlier testimony.

[xxviii] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Threatening Witnesses

United States v. Manske, 186 F.3d 770 (7th Cir. 1999) : The defendant was convicted for cocaine distribution solely on testimony from cooperating witnesses and evidence of his having met regularly with them; there was no physical evidence or admission by the defendant. The defendant likewise had no physical or documentary evidence supporting his claim that the regular meetings involved gambling activities and the cooperating witnesses were framing him. Although the case turned on the credibility of the prosecution witnesses, the defense was precluded from cross-examining a principal government witness about past incidents in which the witness had threatened and intimidated potential witnesses against him. Reversing, the Court held that the threats to other witnesses were probative under Rule 608(b) of the likelihood that the witness would seek to gain advantage for himself by giving false testimony against the defendant.

[xxix] RULE 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Witness' Statements

United States v. Bartelho, 129 F.3d 663 (1st Cir. 1997) : In an armed bank robbery case, one prosecution witness was an inmate who recounted admissions purportedly made by the defendant while he was held before trial. The defendant sought to cross-examine the witness on statements the witness had allegedly made to other inmates after giving testimony at the defendant's first trial (which ended in a hung jury). The government objected that the witness' statements explaining his testimony were made for his own protection. While not necessarily agreeing with the Judge's ruling that the statements were not sufficiently probative of untruthfulness to be admissible, the Court found no abuse of discretion in their exclusion.

United States v. Studley, 892 F.2d 518 (7th Cir. 1989) : In affirming a conviction for knowingly disposing of farm equipment pledged to the Farmers Home Administration, the Court held that the defendant was properly asked on cross-examination about statements he made several months after the charged crime in which he purported to announce that he was no longer bound by the laws of the United States. The evidence was relevant to his credibility, as a person making such statements may well not feel bound by the oath, and to the credibility of his story, as the anger expressed in the statement may have reflected his motivations at the time of the crime.

[i] RULE 608(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules

[i] RULE 608(b) -- Relationship to Rule 404(b)

Bonilla v. Yamaha Motors Corp., 955 F.2d 150 (1st Cir. 1992) : Reversing a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action arising out of a motorcycle accident, the Court held that it was error to cross-examine the plaintiff about speeding violations inadmissible under Rule 404(b) simply in the hope that he would deny them, thus raising a "red herring" for impeachment. See also United States v. Ruiz-Batista, 956 F.2d 351 (1st Cir. 1992) (strongly condemning the government's procedure of asking the defendant whether he had possessed cocaine on other occasions and, after receiving a denial, seeking to show such occasions for purpose of impeachment).

United States v. Smith Grading & Paving, Inc., 760 F.2d 527, 1985-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P66573 (4th Cir. 1985) : In a prosecution for a conspiracy to rig bids, the Court upheld the introduction of one defendant's previous bidrigging to prove knowledge and intent to enter a conspiracy. It held that extrinsic evidence may be properly admitted under Rule 404(b) even though it could not be used under Rule 608(b), but it suggested that "the better practice is for the prosecutor to introduce this type of evidence in his or her case in chief," rather than on rebuttal, in an effort "to have the last say through evidence of a defendant's prior misconduct."

United States v. Jensen, 41 F.3d 946 (5th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed convictions stemming from a fraudulent scheme that led to a failure of certain savings and loan institutions, holding that documents showing that the defendant had previously made false statements were properly admitted. The government offered the documents into evidence while cross-examining the defendant, and the Court recognized that this use of extrinsic evidence would be error under Rule 608(b). However, the Court found that the documents were independently admissible under Rule 404(b) to prove intent to commit the crimes with which the defendant was charged. In United States v. Tomblin, 46 F.3d 1369 (5th Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed convictions for bribery and extortion, holding that the government was not required to comply with the notice requirement of Rule 404(b) when it cross-examined the defendant about alleged acts of fraud, bribery, and embezzlement, as the acts were probative of his character for truthfulness and the questions were permissible under Rule 608(b).

United States v. Chevalier, 1 F.3d 581 (7th Cir. 1993) : The defendant had been indicted for tax fraud committed in 1984-86 and for a bank fraud in 1989 but the charges were severed. Affirming the defendant's conviction for tax fraud, the Court held there was no error in cross-examining him about the bank fraud after he testified, as he thereby put his credibility in issue, and the evidence was probative of his truthfulness.

King v. Ahrens, 16 F.3d 265 (8th Cir. 1994) : The Court held in a medical malpractice case that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the defendant's medical license had been suspended eight years earlier, as any probative value the evidence had on the absence of mistake in failing to note critical information on the medical chart and on the doctor's credibility was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect, given the remoteness in time and the dissimilarity between the incidents.

United States v. Montelongo, 420 F.3d 1169 (10th Cir. 2005) : Officers at a border checkpoint stopped a truck co-driven by the defendants and found marijuana packed in duffle bags beneath the mattress in the sleeping compartment. The defendants, charged with possession, obtained an in limine ruling excluding evidence that a few months before they were arrested, a truck owned by the same owner had been stopped and marijuana packed in duffle bags was found hidden in the sleeping compartment. The co-drivers in that case claimed that they had found the marijuana by the side of the road and had hidden it themselves; the owner was not charged in the case. At trial in this case the owner testified for the government that he had inspected the truck just before the defendant picked it up and had found no marijuana in it. The defendants sought to cross-examine the owner about the prior incident, as evidence that he was operating a drug ring of which they were unaware, but the Judge ruled that the cross-examination was not permissible under Rules 404(b) and 608(b). Reversing, the Court held that the cross-examinations should have been permitted as "reverse 404(b)" evidence, and that Rule 608(b) had no application to the case, since the cross-examination was not intended to attack the owner's character for truthfulness but rather to negate the defendants' guilt by circumstantial evidence

United States v. Cardenas, 895 F.2d 1338 (11th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed the defendant's drug possession and conspiracy convictions, holding that evidence of prior drug usage and dealing admitted under Rule 404(b) could also have been admitted under Rule 608(b) to contradict the defendant's testimony that he had never given cocaine to the witness, had never sold it, and had not used it for several years.

[ii] RULE 608(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 609(a)

Elcock v. Kmart Corp., 233 F.3d 734 (3d Cir. 2000) : In a personal injury action arising from a slip-and-fall, the Trial Judge admitted evidence that one of the plaintiff's expert witnesses had pleaded guilty to embezzlement, but forbade questions regarding the amount embezzled or the facts and circumstances of the crimes. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff on other grounds, the Court noted that the guilty pleas were properly admitted under Rule 609(a)(2). The underlying misconduct, involving dishonesty, was probative of the witness' character for truthfulness, and thus admissible, at the Judge's discretion (governed by Rules 403 and 611), under Rule 608(b). The Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding reference to the underlying acts, but it noted that the amount of money misappropriated and the manner in which it was done were certainly relevant to prove the witness' dishonesty. On remand, the Judge was free to balance once again whether the gain from this probative value justified the time required to ask about the details.

United States v. Hurst, 951 F.2d 1490 (6th Cir. 1991) : On direct examination of a defendant charged with gambling offenses, his guilty plea to attempted obstruction of justice was elicited. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting cross-examination to bring out that the conviction arose from an attempt to bribe a police officer to make false official records, as subornation of perjury could be probative of truthfulness. Because guilty pleas often result from plea bargaining and the name of the offense is rarely informative about the nature of the offense to which guilt is acknowledged in the allocution, it is often appropriate to describe some details of the offense so that the witness' credibility can be evaluated. While this is not possible under Rule 609, which permits use only of the conviction itself, it is possible under Rule 608, subject to the Court's discretion to exclude unduly prejudicial details pursuant to Rule 403.

[iii] RULE 608(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 611(a)

United States v. McMillon, 14 F.3d 948 (4th Cir. 1994) : The Court held in a drug prosecution that it was not an abuse of discretion to preclude a defendant from cross-examining a cooperating coconspirator about the witness' use of drugs to force men to engage in sexual acts with him. Testimony regarding a witness' sexual life is not probative of his character for truthfulness; rather, it impairs the search for truth and harasses, annoys, or humiliates the witness in the process.

United States v. Drake, 932 F.2d 861 (10th Cir. 1991) : On cross-examination of a defendant charged with wire fraud, the prosecutor referred to college records inconsistent with the defendant's description of his academic record. The Court held that preliminary testimony on direct examination regarding educational background opened the area to cross-examination and provided a potential target for impeachment, and that the prosecutor's examination did not include impermissible extrinsic evidence. The Court suggested, however, that the questions were arguably improper because they assumed facts not in evidence.

[iv] RULE 608(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 613(b)

United States v. Winchenbach, 197 F.3d 548 (1st Cir. 1999) : Affirming a cocaine distribution conviction, the Court held that a government agent was properly permitted to testify that Flint, the defendant's alibi witness, had told him that agents who had searched the defendant's trailer had missed some cocaine. Flint had denied on cross-examination having any knowledge that the defendant was involved in drugs. The Court recognized "the time-honored tenet that prior inconsistent statements ordinarily may be used to impeach a witness's credibility," and noted that the Trial Judge had erred in relying on Rule 608(b), rather than Rule 613(b), to admit the statement. In this case, the officer's testimony about the defense witness' repudiation of a prior statement about the location of drugs clearly presented an inconsistency, and thus was covered by Rule 613(b), so the extrinsic evidence was not absolutely prohibited. Rule 608(b) would apply only if the prior statement concerning the drugs, standing alone and without any reference to the witness' trial testimony, was pertinent to the witness' character for veracity.

United States v. McGee, 408 F.3d 966 (7th Cir. 2005) : In the trial of a drug trafficking conspiracy, the prosecutor, trying on cross-examination to get one defendant to admit that he often made things up and told stories, asked him whether he had phoned his employer and told him a story. When the defendant stated that he was not sure what the prosecutor was talking about, the prosecutor played a tape-recording of a phone conversation the defendant had with his employer after he was placed in custody in which he offered a false explanation of why he was absent from work. The government argued that the tape was offered to "refresh recollection," but the Court observed that if the prosecutor wanted to refresh recollection, the proper way would have been to play the tape outside the presence of the jury. In response to the government's argument that the tape was admissible as a prior inconsistent statement, the Court responded that, even though it sometimes is difficult to distinguish between Rule 608(b) and Rule 613 evidence, it was clear in this case that the prosecutor was seeking to prove that the defendant lied to his employer and thus the tape was extrinsic evidence and inadmissible. The error was harmless, however.

[v] RULE 608(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 702

United States v. York, 933 F.2d 1343 (7th Cir. 1991) : Affirming convictions for mail fraud and arson, the Court held there was no error in permitting the government to conduct a voir dire in the jury's presence focusing on prior unprofessional conduct of an expert pathologist. The defendant had qualified the witness before the jury, the questions were relevant to the weight to be accorded the expert's testimony, the prosecutor had a good-faith basis for the questions, and qualification is a preliminary question to which Rule 608(b) does not apply.

[j] RULE 608(b) -- Use of Documents

Kasuri v. St. Elizabeth Hosp. Med. Center, 897 F.2d 845 (6th Cir. 1990) : The plaintiff in a Title VII action had said at her deposition that she had been promised acceptance into a residency program, but at trial testified only that the director of the program had been encouraging to her. The defendant impeached the witness with her deposition and then, over a Rule 608(b) objection, offered the director's deposition (pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 32(a)(3)) to bolster the impeachment by demonstrating that the plaintiff changed her story after the director's deposition was taken, in order to make it consistent with his deposition. The Court held that Rule 608(b) was inapposite, as the deposition testimony did not present a specific act of conduct of the plaintiff.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Cortez, 935 F.2d 135 (8th Cir. 1991) .

(n2)Footnote 2. Cooper v. Asplundh Tree Expert Co., 836 F.2d 1544 (10th Cir. 1988) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Piva, 870 F.2d 753 (1st Cir. 1989) .

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Azure, 801 F.2d 336 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n5)Footnote 5. Bastow v. General Motors Corp., 844 F.2d 506 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n6)Footnote 6. United States v. Roy, 843 F.2d 305 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Binder, 769 F.2d 595 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Awkard, 597 F.2d 667 (9th Cir. 1979) .

(n9)Footnote 9. United States v. Terry, 702 F.2d 299 (2d Cir. 1983) .

(n10)Footnote 10. United States v. Bagaric, 706 F.2d 42 (2d Cir. 1983) .

(n11)Footnote 11. Schultz v. Thomas, 832 F.2d 108 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n12)Footnote 12. United States v. Wright, 542 F.2d 975 (7th Cir. 1976) .

(n13)Footnote 13. United States v. Arroyo-Angulo, 580 F.2d 1137 (2d Cir. 1978) .

(n14)Footnote 14. United States v. Medical Therapy Sciences, Inc., 583 F.2d 36 (2d Cir. 1978) .

(n15)Footnote 15. Stokes v. Delcambre, 710 F.2d 1120 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n16)Footnote 16. United States v. Hedgcorth, 873 F.2d 1307 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n17)Footnote 17. United States v. Coleman, 805 F.2d 474 (3d Cir. 1986) .

(n18)Footnote 18. United States v. Espinal, 757 F.2d 423 (1st Cir. 1985) .

(n19)Footnote 19. United States v. Di Paolo, 804 F.2d 225 (2d Cir. 1986) .

(n20)Footnote 20. United States v. Oxman, 740 F.2d 1298 (3d Cir. 1984) , vacated on other grounds, 473 U.S. 922 (1985) .

(n21)Footnote 21. United States v. Gordon, 780 F.2d 1165 (5th Cir. 1986) .

(n22)Footnote 22. United States v. Reed, 715 F.2d 870 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n23)Footnote 23. United States v. Bussey, 942 F.2d 1241 (8th Cir. 1991) .

(n24)Footnote 24. Lewy v. Southern Pac. Transp. Co., 799 F.2d 1281 (9th Cir. 1986) .

(n25)Footnote 25. United States v. Bowie, 892 F.2d 1494 (10th Cir. 1990) .

(n26)Footnote 26. United States v. Edwards, 696 F.2d 1277 (11th Cir. 1983) .

(n27)Footnote 27. United States v. Babbitt, 683 F.2d 21 (1st Cir. 1982) .

(n28)Footnote 28. Carson v. Polley, 689 F.2d 562 (5th Cir. 1982) .

(n29)Footnote 29. United States v. Vaglica, 720 F.2d 388 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n30)Footnote 30. United States v. Blanton, 730 F.2d 1425 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n31)Footnote 31. Air et Chaleur, S.A. v. Janeway, 757 F.2d 489 (2d Cir. 1985) .

(n32)Footnote 32. Williams v. Chevron U.S.A., Inc., 875 F.2d 501 (5th Cir. 1989) .

(n33)Footnote 33. United States v. Bynum, 566 F.2d 914, 923 (5th Cir. 1978) .

(n34)Footnote 34. De San Miguel v. Sbert, 611 F.2d 935 (1st Cir. 1979) .

(n35)Footnote 35. United States v. Cole, 617 F.2d 151 (5th Cir. 1980) .

(n36)Footnote 36. United States v. Nogueira, 585 F.2d 23 (1st Cir. 1978) .

(n37)Footnote 37. United States v. Bagaric, 706 F.2d 42 (2d Cir. 1983) .

(n38)Footnote 38. United States v. Sullivan, 803 F.2d 87 (3d Cir. 1986) .

(n39)Footnote 39. United States v. Beros, 833 F.2d 455 (3d Cir. 1987) .

(n40)Footnote 40. United States v. Holt, 817 F.2d 1264 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n41)Footnote 41. Simmons, Inc. v. Pinkerton's, Inc., 762 F.2d 591 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n42)Footnote 42. United States v. Covelli, 738 F.2d 847 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n43)Footnote 43. United States v. Howard, 774 F.2d 838 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n44)Footnote 44. Bennett v. Longacre, 774 F.2d 1024 (10th Cir. 1985) .

(n45)Footnote 45. United States v. Massell, 823 F.2d 1503 (11th Cir. 1987) .

(n46)Footnote 46. United States v. Holman, 680 F.2d 1340 (11th Cir. 1982) .

(n47)Footnote 47. United States v. Taylor, 728 F.2d 864 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n48)Footnote 48. United States v. Palmer, 691 F.2d 921 (9th Cir. 1982) .

(n49)Footnote 49. United States v. Rabinowitz, 578 F.2d 910 (2d Cir. 1978) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 608 RULE 608

2-608 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 608.04

608.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

Subdivision (a). In Rule 404(a) the general position is taken that character evidence is not admissible for the purpose of proving that the person acted in conformity therewith, subject, however, to several exceptions, one of which is character evidence of a witness as bearing upon his credibility. The present rule develops that exception.

In accordance with the bulk of judicial authority, the inquiry is strictly limited to character for veracity, rather than allowing evidence as to character generally. The result is to sharpen relevancy, to reduce surprise, waste of time, and confusion, and to make the lot of the witness somewhat less unattractive. McCormick § 44.

The use of opinion and reputation evidence as means of proving the character of witnesses is consistent with Rule 405(a). While the modern practice has purported to exclude opinion, witnesses who testify to reputation seem in fact often to be giving their opinions, disguised somewhat misleadingly as reputation. See McCormick § 44. And even under the modern practice, a common relaxation has allowed inquiry as to whether the witnesses would believe the principal witness under oath. United States v. Walker, 313 F.2d 236 (6th Cir. 1963) , and cases cited therein; McCormick § 44, pp. 94-95, n.3.

Character evidence in support of credibility is admissible under the rule only after the witness' character has first been attacked, as has been the case at common law. Maguire, Weinstein, et al., Cases on Evidence 295 (5th ed. 1965); McCormick § 49, p. 105; 4 Wigmore § 1104. The enormous needless consumption of time which a contrary practice would entail justifies the limitation. Opinion or reputation that the witness is untruthful specifically qualifies as an attack under the rule, and evidence of misconduct, including conviction of crime, and of corruption also fall within this category. Evidence of bias or interest does not. McCormick § 49; 4 Wigmore §§ 1106, 1107. Whether evidence in the form of contradiction is an attack upon the character of the witness must depend upon the circumstances. McCormick § 49 (Cf. 4 Wigmore §§ 1108, 1109.

As to the use of specific instances on direct by an opinion witness, see the Advisory Committee's note to Rule 405 supra .

Subdivision (b). In conformity with Rule 405, which forecloses use of evidence of specific incidents as proof in chief of character unless character is an issue in the case, the present rule generally bars evidence of specific instances of conduct of a witness for the purpose of attacking or supporting his credibility. There are, however, two exceptions: (1) specific instances are provable when they have been the subject of criminal conviction, and (2) specific instances may be inquired into on cross-examination of the principal witness or of a witness giving an opinion of his character for truthfulness.

(1) Conviction of crime as a technique of impeachment is treated in detail in Rule 609, and here is merely recognized as an exception to the general rule excluding evidence of specific incidents for impeachment purposes.

(2) Particular instances of conduct, though not the subject of criminal conviction, may be inquired into on cross-examination of the principal witness himself or of a witness who testifies concerning his character for truthfulness. Effective cross-examination demands that some allowance be made for going into matters of this kind, but the possibilities of abuse are substantial. Consequently safeguards are erected in the form of specific requirements that the instances inquired into be probative of truthfulness or its opposite and not remote in time. [Editor's Note: The Advisory Committee's proposal precluded reference to bad acts that were remote in time. This provision was deleted by Congress in favor of a case-by-case balancing of probative value and prejudicial effect.] Also, the overriding protection of Rule 403 requires that probative value not be outweighed by danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of issues, or misleading the jury, and that of Rule 611 bars harassment and undue embarrassment.

The final sentence constitutes a rejection of the doctrine of such cases as People v. Sorge, 301 N.Y. 198, 93 N.E.2d 637 (1950) , that any past criminal act relevant to credibility may be inquired into on cross-examination, in apparent disregard of the privilege against self-incrimination. While it is clear that an ordinary witness cannot make a partial disclosure of incriminating matter and then invoke the privilege on cross-examination, no tenable contention can be made that merely by testifying he waives his right to foreclose inquiry on cross-examination into criminal activities for the purpose of attacking his credibility. So to hold would reduce the privilege to a nullity. While it is true that an accused, unlike an ordinary witness, has an option whether to testify, if the option can be exercised only at the price of opening up inquiry as to any and all criminal acts committed during his lifetime, the right to testify could scarcely be said to possess much vitality. In Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609, 85 S. Ct. 1229, 14 L. Ed. 2d 106 (1965) , the Court held that allowing comment on the election of an accused not to testify exacted a constitutionally impermissible price, and so here. While no specific provision in terms confers constitutional status on the right of an accused to take the stand in his own defense, the existence of the right is so completely recognized that a denial of it or substantial infringement upon it would surely be of due process dimensions. See Ferguson v. Georgia, 365 U.S. 570, 81 S. Ct. 756, 5 L. Ed. 2d 783 (1961) ; McCormick § 131; 8 Wigmore § 2276 (McNaughton Rev. 1961). In any event, wholly aside from constitutional considerations, the provision represents a sound policy.

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendments are technical. No substantive change is intended."

Following the 1987 amendments to Rule 608, the Supreme Court sent to Congress a technical amendment correcting capitalization, effective November 1, 1988.]

Advisory Committee Note to 2003 Amendment to Rule 608(b)

The Rule has been amended to clarify that the absolute prohibition on extrinsic evidence applies only when the sole reason for proffering that evidence is to attack or support the witness' character for truthfulness. See United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45 (1984) ; United States v. Fusco, 748 F.2d 996 (5th Cir. 1984) (Rule 608(b) limits the use of evidence "designed to show that the witness has done things, unrelated to the suit being tried, that make him more or less believable per se"); Ohio R.Evid. 608(b). On occasion the Rule's use of the overbroad term "credibility" has been read "to bar extrinsic evidence for bias, competency and contradiction impeachment since they too deal with credibility." American Bar Association Section of Litigation, Emerging Problems Under the Federal Rules of Evidence at 161 (3d ed. 1998). The amendment conforms the language of the Rule to its original intent, which was to impose an absolute bar on extrinsic evidence only if the sole purpose for offering the evidence was to prove the witness' character for veracity. See Advisory Committee Note to Rule 608(b) (stating that the Rule is "[i]n conformity with Rule 405, which forecloses use of evidence of specific incidents as proof in chief of character unless character is in issue in the case ...").

By limiting the application of the Rule to proof of a witness' character for truthfulness, the amendment leaves the admissibility of extrinsic evidence offered for other grounds of impeachment (such as contradiction, prior inconsistent statement, bias and mental capacity) to Rules 402 and 403. See, e.g., United States v. Winchenbach, 197 F.3d 548 (1st Cir. 1999) (admissibility of a prior inconsistent statement offered for impeachment is governed by Rules 402 and 403, not Rule 608(b)); United States v. Tarantino, 846 F.2d 1384 (D.C. Cir. 1988) (admissibility of extrinsic evidence offered to contradict a witness is governed by Rules 402 and 403); United States v. Lindemann, 85 F.3d 1232 (7th Cir. 1996) (admissibility of extrinsic evidence of bias is governed by Rules 402 and 403).

It should be noted that the extrinsic evidence prohibition of Rule 608(b) bars any reference to the consequences that a witness might have suffered as a result of an alleged bad act. For example, Rule 608(b) prohibits counsel from mentioning that a witness was suspended or disciplined for the conduct that is the subject of impeachment, when that conduct is offered only to prove the character of the witness. See United States v. Davis, 183 F.3d 231, 257 n.12 (3d Cir. 1999) (emphasizing that in attacking the defendant's character for truthfulness "the government cannot make reference to Davis's forty-four day suspension or that Internal Affairs found that he lied about" an incident because "[s]uch evidence would not only be hearsay to the extent it contains assertion of fact, it would be inadmissible extrinsic evidence under Rule 608(b)"). See also Stephen A. Saltzburg, Impeaching the Witness: Prior Bad Acts and Extrinsic Evidence, 7 Crim. Just. 28, 31 (Winter 1993) ("counsel should not be permitted to circumvent the no-extrinsic-evidence provision by tucking a third person's opinion about prior acts into a question asked of the witness who has denied the act.").

For purposes of consistency the term "credibility" has been replaced by the term "character for truthfulness" in the last sentence of subdivision (b). The term "credibility" is also used in subdivision (a). But the Committee found it unnecessary to substitute "character for truthfulness" for "credibility" in Rule 608(a), because subdivision (a)(1) already serves to limit impeachment to proof of such character.

Rules 609(a) and 610 also use the term "credibility" when the intent of those Rules is to regulate impeachment of a witness' character for truthfulness. No inference should be derived from the fact that the Committee proposed an amendment to Rule 608(b) but not to Rules 609 and 610.

[2] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 276 (1999)

Rule 608 provides for impeachment of a witness's character for veracity. Rule 608(b) states that a witness's character can be attacked through specific instances of misconduct on the witness's part. Thus, a witness can be asked on cross-examination about his having lied to Congress. The inference is that if he lied to Congress, he has a propensity to lie, and therefore he is more likely to be lying on the witness stand. The Advisory Committee's proposed Rule 608 permitted specific instances of conduct to be brought out on cross-examination of the witness being attacked, within the discretion of the trial judge, if probative on the witness's character for veracity, "and not remote in time." The Advisory Committee Note to Rule 608, provides, correspondingly, as follows:

> Effective cross-examination demands that some allowance be made for going into matters of this kind, but the possibilities of abuse are substantial. Consequently safeguards are erected in the form of specific requirements that the instances inquired into be probative of truthfulness or its opposite and not remote in time.

Congress, however, deleted the language precluding the use of acts remote in time to impeach a witness's character for veracity. Congress was of the view that the reference to remoteness in time was confusing. Would remoteness be determined by the time between the bad act and trial, or the time between the bad act and the incident involved at trial? Congress believed that the reference to judicial discretion in the rule was sufficient to protect against impeachment with truly stale bad acts.

Counsel confronted with bad acts of a witness that have occurred years before the trial should not place much reliance on the Advisory Committee's proposed total exclusion of acts that are remote in time. Congress's reference to judicial discretion is the key to making an argument to admit or exclude bad acts that occurred long ago. Contrary to the Advisory Committee's implication, there are no ironclad rules. Cases can be found admitting acts that might well be considered "remote in time." For example, in United States v. Jackson, 882 F.2d 1444 (9th Cir. 1989) , the court found no error when the defendant, a disbarred lawyer charged with mail and tax fraud, was impeached with his acts of misappropriating client funds fourteen years earlier. The defendant argued that the acts could not be the subject of impeachment because they were "remote in time." The court found that while remoteness is a relevant factor, there is no time limit in Rule 608(b), and that the court did not abuse its discretion in allowing inquiry into the bad acts. The acts were clearly probative of the defendant's character for veracity. On the other hand, in United States v. Kennedy, 714 F.2d 968 (9th Cir. 1983) , the court held that a witness's involvement with the Hell's Angels ten years earlier was properly excluded, the court remarking that the bad acts "detracted only minimally" from the witness's credibility.

Thus, remoteness, while not dispositive as it would appear to be under the Advisory Committee's Note, remains an important factor because the older the act, the less it says about the witness's current propensity to lie on the stand. Still, if the act occurred long ago and yet evidences dishonest character, it may be sufficiently probative to justify consideration by the factfinder.

[3] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

See Note to Rule 405 with respect to the change in subdivision (a).

The second sentence of subdivision (b) as proposed permitted specific instances of misconduct of a witness to be inquired into on cross-examination for the purpose of attacking his credibility, if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness and not remote in time. Such cross-examination could be of the witness himself or of another witness who testifies as to "his" character for truthfulness or untruthfulness.

The Subcommittee redrafted the second sentence to emphasize the discretionary role of the court in permitting such testimony and deleted the reference to remoteness in time as being unnecessary and confusing (remoteness from time of trial or remoteness from the incident involved?). The Subcommittee is of the view that explicitly referring to the discretion of the court and deleting the reference to remoteness is a more practical way to deal with the subject. As recast, the subdivision makes clear the antecedent of "his" in the original.

[4] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Rule 608(a) as submitted by the Court permitted attack to be made upon the character for truthfulness or untruthfulness of a witness either by reputation or opinion testimony. For the same reasons underlying its decision to eliminate the admissibility of opinion testimony in Rule 405(a), the Committee amended Rule 608(a) to delete the reference to opinion testimony. [Editor's Note: The Rule was subsequently changed back to permit the use of opinion testimony.]

The second sentence of Rule 608(b) as submitted by the Court permitted specific instances of misconduct of a witness to be inquired into on cross-examination for the purpose of attacking his credibility, if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness, "and not remote in time." Such cross-examination could be of the witness himself or of another witness who testifies as to "his" character for truthfulness or untruthfulness.

The Committee amended the Rule to emphasize the discretionary power of the Court in permitting such testimony and deleted the reference to remoteness in time as being unnecessary and confusing (remoteness from time of trial or remoteness from the incident involved?). As recast, the Committee amendment also makes clear the antecedent of "his" in the original Court proposal.

[5] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

The Senate amendment adds the words "opinion or" to conform the first sentence of the rule with the remainder of the rule.

The Conference adopts the Senate amendment.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
Supp. To CHAPTER 608 RULE 608

2-608 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 608, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 608. Evidence of Character and Conduct of Witness	Rule 608. A Witness's Character for Truthfulness or Untruthfulness
(a) Opinion and rep	(a) Reputation or

utation evidence of character. The credibility of a witness may be attacked or supported by evidence in the form of opinion or reputation, but subject to these limitations: (1) the evidence	Opinion Evidence. A witness's credibility may be attacked or supported by testimony about the witness's reputation for having a character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, or by testi may refer only to character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, and (2) evidence of truthful character is admissible only after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked by opinion or mony in the form of an opinion about that character. But evidence of truthful character is admissible only after the witness's character for truthfulness has been attacked.

	reputation evidence or otherwise.
(b) Specific instances of conduct.	Specific instances of the conduct of a witness, for the purpose of attacking or supporting the witness' character for truth	(b) Specific Instances of Conduct. Except for a criminal conviction under Rule 609, extrinsic evidence is not admissible to prove specific instances of a wit-

ful-ness,
other than con-vic-tion
of crim e as prov ided
in rule 609, may not be prov ed
by extrins ic evid ence.
The y
may, how ever,
in
the discre-tion
of
the cour t, if probative
of truth ful-ness
or ness'
s conduct
in order to attack
or support
the witness'
s char acter for truth ful-
ness.
But
the cour t
may, on cros sexami nation, allow
the m to be inquir
ed into if they are pro-
bat-
ive

untruthfulness, be inquired into on cross-examination of the witness (1) concerning the witness' character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, or (2) concerning the character for truthfulness of the character for truthfulness or untruthfulness of:

or untruthfulness of another witness as to which character the witness being cross-examined has testified.

(1) the witness; or

(2) another witness whose character the witness being cros sexami

ned has testified abou
t.

The giving of testimony, whether by an accused or by any other witness, does not operate as a waiver of the accused's or the witness' privilege against self-in-

By testifying on another matter, a witness does not waive any privilege against self-incrimination for testimony that relates only to the witness's character crimination when examined with respect to matters that relate only to character for truthfulness.	for truthfulness.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 608 has been amended as part of the general restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

The Committee is aware that the Rule's limitation of bad-act impeachment to "cross-examination" is trumped by Rule 607, which allows a party to impeach witnesses on direct examination. Courts have not relied on the term "on cross-examination" to limit impeachment that would otherwise be permissible under Rules 607 and 608. The Committee therefore concluded that no change to the language of the Rule was necessary in the context of a restyling project.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
Supp. To CHAPTER 608 RULE 608

2-608 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 608.03

Supp. to § 608.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Rule 608(a) -- Opinion and Reputation Evidence of Character [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 608(a) -- Character Evidence To Impeach

[iv] Rule 608(a) -- Character Evidence To Impeach -- Qualifications of Witness

United States v. Garza, 448 F.3d 294 (5th Cir. 2006) : In a drug case, the defense proffered a witness who would have testified that in his opinion a police officer who testified for the government was an untruthful person, based on an investigation that he conducted as an investigator for the Department of Justice, after he received a report that the police officer had made representations to a United States Attorney that were not true. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the proffered character witness, because the investigation of the police officer that the witness conducted was not completely thorough, and did not result in referring any charges for prosecution.

[b.1] Rule 608(a) -- Opinion That Another Witness Lied

United States v. Robinson, 473 F.3d 387 (1st Cir. 2007) : Affirming drug and firearms convictions, the Court held it was error (but harmless) when the prosecutor asked the defendant on cross-examination whether two law enforcement witnesses had lied on the witness stand. The Court reiterated that it is improper for an attorney to ask a witness whether another witness lied, and it is unfair to force a defendant to choose between recanting and calling a law enforcement witness a liar.

United States v. Harris, 471 F.3d 507 (3d Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, holding it was error (but not plain error) for the prosecutor to cross-examine the defendant on whether the police witnesses against him had lied. "Such questions invade the province of the jury and force a witness to testify as to something he cannot know, i.e., whether another is intentionally seeking to mislead the tribunal. In addition, ... such questions force defendants into choosing to either undermine their own testimony or essentially accuse another witness of being a liar." The Court noted that such cross-examination might be proper if the witness opened the door by stating on direct that another witness lied, and that cross-examination focusing on the differences and similarities between the witness' testimony and another's is often necessary and permissible, provided the witness is not asked to testify as to the other witness' veracity.

[c] Rule 608(a) -- Other Proceedings Offered To Affect Credibility

United States v. Burns, 526 F.3d 852 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed crack cocaine convictions, but it found that the prosecution improperly attempted to vouch for a cooperating witness in the cross-examination of a defense witness who was called to testify that the cooperating witness's reputation for truthfulness was not good. The prosecutor asked whether the character witness was aware that the cooperating witness had testified in a very similar case and the jury found her to be truthful. The Trial Judge sustained an objection to the question and instructed the jury to disregard questions where an objection was sustained. The Court found that the improper vouching did not render the defendant's trial unfair.

[e] Rule 608(a) -- Rehabilitation Evidence

[iv] Rule 608(a) -- Rehabilitation Evidence -- Evidence Not Responsive to Attack

United States v. Harris, 491 F.3d 440 (D.C. Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for possession with intent to distribute cocaine base, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendant was precluded from eliciting testimony regarding his truthful character. The defendant's truthfulness as a witness had not been attacked, so the evidence was inadmissible under Rule 608(a)), and his character trait for truthfulness was not pertinent to his propensity to commit a drug crime, so the evidence was inadmissible under Rule 404(a).

[2] Rule 608(b) -- Specific Instances of Conduct [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 608(b) -- Bias

United States v. Bishop, 453 F.3d 30 (1st Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court found no abuse of discretion in limiting the cross-examination of a government witness who the defendant alleged had on another occasion falsely accused him of rape. The Court reasoned that the cross-examination posed the likelihood of diversion and prejudice and the unlikelihood that the defendant would be able to counter any denial by the witness in light of Rule 608(b). We question the reliance on Rule 608(b), given that the defendant's apparent motive in cross-examination was to suggest that the witness was biased against him. Extrinsic evidence of specific acts tending to show bias (as opposed to untruthfulness) is not excluded by Rule 608(b).

United States v. Skelton, 514 F.3d 433 (5th Cir. 2008) : Affirming an extortion conviction, the Court held that the defendant was adequately permitted to explore the potential bias of the alleged victim of the extortion. It rejected a defense argument that the fact that victim may have stolen money and lied to the IRS was "intrinsic" to the crime charged, since the extortion charge related to the defendant's conduct, not the victim's. However, the victim's conduct might provide a motive for the victim to divert attention from his own misdeeds and to curry favor with the government. The Court emphasized that Rule 608(b)'s bar on extrinsic evidence applies only where evidence is introduced to show a witness's general character for truthfulness and is no bar to extrinsic evidence of bias. Thus, the Court concluded that evidence of the victim's possible bias should have been admitted, but that Rule 403 was properly used to limit the amount of bias evidence presented. The defendant had been permitted to explore sufficiently whether the victim was lying to protect himself and whether he had received any assurances from the government that he would not be prosecuted.

[e] Rule 608(b) -- Extrinsic Evidence

[ii] Rule 608(b) -- Extrinsic Evidence -- Evidence Admissible for Other Purpose

Gaillard v. Jim's Water Serv., Inc., 535 F.3d 771 (8th Cir. 2008) : After he was injured in a motorcycle accident, the plaintiff filed supplemental tax returns claiming additional income of as much as $120,000 per year. He produced the supplemental returns in the course of discovery in his personal injury action and used them in the first trial of the action (which ended with a hung jury) to support his lost income claim. Before the retrial, he moved unsuccessfully to exclude the returns as more prejudicial than probative. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court found no abuse of discretion in allowing the returns to be admitted and utilized to impeach the credibility of the plaintiff and his expert witness. The Court explained that the returns were "highly relevant to the defense of this case. First, past income as established by tax returns is highly relevant to a loss of income claim. Second, the tax returns were probative of his character for truthfulness and thus relevant to keeping any damage award to a reasonable and fair level." Although the Court cited Rule 608(b) for the latter proposition, we observe that no attention was apparently paid to the Rule's bar on extrinsic evidence. And as to the first proposition, the supplemental return in particular was not being offered in that trial to prove the loss of income, but only to affect credibility. The Court also noted that the returns "were relevant to impeach the credibility of [the plaintiff's] economic expert, who testified he typically relies upon an individual's income tax return as the most reliable source of wage verification, yet ignored," the plaintiff's, "because he could not 'trust them' and they might be 'pure fiction.' " The Court said, "It matters not that [the plaintiff's] expert did not rely on the returns. The district court properly found the tax returns were admissible as impeachment evidence under Rule 608(b)," but it did not reconcile its ruling with either the "cross examination" or the "witness's own conduct" provisions of the Rule.

[iii] Rule 608(b) -- Extrinsic Evidence -- Generally Inadmissible

United States v. Thomas, 467 F.3d 49 (1st Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for drug smuggling, finding no error when, after a witness denied on cross-examination that he had retained for himself part of a drug shipment in another case in which he had participated as an informant, the defendant was not permitted to call another witness to prove that the first witness was lying. Under Rule 608(b), extrinsic evidence is not admissible to impeach a witness by contradiction on a collateral matter. Even if the proposed evidence were offered to show bias rather than character, it would nevertheless be inadmissible under Rule 403.

United States v. Seymour, 468 F.3d 378 (6th Cir. 2006) : The defendant was convicted for sexual abuse of his sister-in-law and his niece. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion the exclusion of testimony by the defendant's friend that he had seen the adult victim and the defendant hugging and kissing two years after the alleged sexual assault. The testimony was not admissible as an attack on the victim's character for truthfulness through testimony about a specific act, because Rule 608(b) bars extrinsic evidence for that purpose.

United States v. Neighbors, 590 F.3d 485 (7th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for cocaine offenses, the defense asked a cooperating witness if he "ever told anyone that you have either lied in this particular case or intended to lie in this particular case?" When the witness responded negatively, the defense sought unsuccessfully to introduce letters in which the witness said, "I did lie on that Haitian N." Affirming, the Court held that the letters were governed by Rule 608(b), not Rule 613, because their probative value came from the underlying lie, not the contradiction between testimony at trial and the content of the letters. As such, the letters were extrinsic evidence inadmissible under Rule 608(b).

[g] Rule 608(b) -- Privilege Against Self-Incrimination

United States v. Rivera-Rangel, 466 F.3d 158 (1st Cir. 2006) : The defendant, a former executive assistant to the Governor of Puerto Rico, was convicted of Hobbs Act violations largely on the testimony of two businessmen who testified that they gave money to the defendant in exchange for access to high-ranking government officials. One of the businessmen, when asked during cross-examination about payments he had received from the other businessman while the witness was himself a government official (years before the charged conduct), invoked his privilege against self-incrimination. The defendant moved for a mistrial when the privilege claim was upheld, but the Court found no error in the denial of that motion. The defendant's explanation of why he wished to inquire into the payments raised issues collateral to the dispute; a different argument the defendant made on appeal for why the payments were central to the case was waived by not raising it at trial. Citing Rule 608(b), the Court noted that impeachment through reference to a witness's prior conduct is always subject to the Trial Judge's sound discretion. It observed that the defendant had several other effective ways of attacking the witness's credibility, including eliciting testimony that the witness had pleaded guilty to related charges and was hoping for a lenient sentence.

[h] Rule 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness

[iv] Rule 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Bad Faith Impeachment

United States v. Cawthorn, 429 F.3d 793 (8th Cir. 2005) , vacated on other grounds, 128 S. Ct. 1060, 169 L. Ed. 2d 801 (2008) : The Court affirmed a crack cocaine conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was denied the opportunity to ask questions like "Do you lie to authorities?"; "Do you generally lie?"; and "Would you lie to authorities to get something for it?" There was no showing that the defendant had no plausible (i.e., good-faith) basis for the questions.

[x] Rule 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Crimes Involving Force or Violence

United States v. Williams, 464 F.3d 443 (3d Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed convictions for a cocaine distribution conspiracy, finding no abuse of discretion when the defense was precluded from asking the principal prosecution witness, who had claimed on direct that he had never committed a murder, about having once stabbed an individual to death. The evidence that he had in fact committed the murder was extremely weak, posing the potential for an unnecessary mini-trial, and even if it had been strong, it was not clearly relevant to the witness' truthfulness and it had a strong potential to prejudice the jury.

United States v. Haskell, 468 F.3d 1064 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming convictions for murdering a federal witness, the Court found no error when the defendant was precluded from cross-examining Hunter, a government witness, about the multiple assaults that Hunter committed while in prison. "Additional cross-examination into Hunter's prison behavior would not have led a reasonable jury to have a different impression of Hunter's credibility, given that the jury was informed of the nature of Hunter's cooperation with the government." The defendant also argued that he was unfairly precluded from cross-examining one of his coconspirators (Jones) about murder and misdemeanor charges against Jones, as well as Jones' recanted confession. The Court held that the murder charge "was not relevant to prove truthfulness and [therefore] an improper subject for impeachment," and that the circumstances surrounding the recanted confession were irrelevant because although "at the time of the initial statement, Jones may have had an incentive to implicate Haskell, no incentive existed at the time of Haskell's trial, because Jones had been acquitted." Similarly, since "Jones testified that he had no deal with the government and had been offered no consideration for his testimony at Haskell's trial," the "information about the pending trials charges was irrelevant and an improper subject for cross-examination."

[xii] Rule 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Discretion To Limit

Hollins v. City of Milwaukee, 574 F.3d 822 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed judgments for the defendants in an arrestee's § 1983 action alleging excessive force by police officers. Under a ruling in limine, the plaintiff was not permitted to introduce during his case-in-chief evidence concerning an investigation into an allegation that one officer had falsified police reports. On cross-examination of the officer, the plaintiff was permitted to ask whether he had been asked to leave the department because of fabrication but was not permitted follow-up questions after the officer's negative answer. Finding no abuse of discretion in the rulings, the Court noted that extrinsic evidence is inadmissible to prove specific instances of misconduct offered to attack a witness' character for truthfulness, and that because the particular allegations of misconduct in this case had never been proven or found to have any merit, further inquiry would have had little probative value.

[xii.1] Rule 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Failure To Correct Misstatements

Rahn v. Hawkins, 464 F.3d 813 (8th Cir. 2006) : In arrestee's civil rights action, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to preclude the plaintiff from asking a defendant about statements contrary to her testimony in a commemorative booklet she received when she was awarded a commendation for her role in his arrest. The Court observed that "[i] she knew about the booklet's contents before accepting the award, but yet said nothing, the jury may infer that she has a tendency to dissemble," and while there was no evidence that she did know beforehand, the plaintiff should have been able to question her. Furthermore, if a reasonable person would have spoken up in the circumstances, the witness' silence could be treated as an adoption of the statements, which could then be used to impeach her inconsistent trial testimony.

[xvi] Rule 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- False Statements

[A] Rule 608(b) -- Accused-Witness Charged with Falsification Offense

United States v. Shinderman, 515 F.3d 5 (1st Cir. 2008) : Affirming a doctor's conviction for unauthorized use of another doctor's name and DEA registration number, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting the government to cross-examine the defendant about false answers in his application for a medical license. The Court reasoned that "[a]fter all, a witness's willingness to lie to the government in an application for a license is highly probative of his character for truthfulness." It added that, because the central issue in the case was the defendant's intent, "his credibility was highly relevant to the outcome of the case." In examining the defendant's claim of unfair prejudice, the Court noted that the Trial Judge permitted the defendant to explain why he thought his answers were accurate when he made them.

[B] Rule 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- False Statements -- Other Witnesses

United States v. Mejia, 597 F.3d 1329 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : The defendant, convicted for conspiring to import cocaine, argued that the government knowingly used false testimony from a key witness, who had testified in other cases arising from the same DEA-initiated Central American sting operation. In one earlier trial, the Judge concluded that the witness was "not entirely truthful." In the trial of another case, the witness was asked about that conclusion and denied any knowledge of it. In the instant case, the witness was asked whether he was aware that a Judge had made a finding that he was not entirely truthful, and the witness said he was not, but he admitted that he had been asked about it in the later trial. Affirming, the Court held that this cross-examination was proper, and that there was no evidence that the witness testified falsely. We question whether the defendant should have been permitted to ask any questions about a Judge's conclusion in another case, since that is not a prior act of the witness, but the hearsay statement of a third party. The correct question is "were you not entirely truthful in a previous case," and the party asking the question is bound by the answer of the witness.

United States v. Seymour, 472 F.3d 969 (7th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the defense from cross-examining the arresting officer who found the gun about his failure to mention in a report about arresting a jaywalker that he had used force causing a concussion. Learning that he used excessive force against a minor lawbreaker was likely to prejudice the jury, but even though his omission was dishonest in the circumstances, the Court concluded that the evidence had "no probative value at all," since the defendant did not contest the officer's testimony or impugn his conduct. In United States v. Dawson, 434 F.3d 956 (7th Cir. 2006), government moved for rehearing in a narcotics trafficking conspiracy case because it was concerned about the stare decisis effect of a statement in the prior opinion, 425 F.3d 389 (7th Cir. 2005) (see the Main Volume of the Manual), that it was error (but harmless in the case) to bar defendants from asking a witness whether a Judge believed him or her in a prior case. The government relied in part upon the Committee Note accompanying the 2003 amendment to Rule 608(b), which quoted an article by one of the authors of this Manual, Stephen A. Saltzburg, Impeaching the Witness: Prior Bad Acts and Extrinsic Evidence, 7 Crim. Just. 28 (Winter 1993). Upon rehearing, the Court indicated that it continues to believe that a cross-examiner may ask a witness, "Has any federal Judge ever found that you lied on the stand?" We respectfully observe, however, that the Court did not explain how such a question can be viewed as "specific instances of the conduct of the witness ... [that] may ... be inquired into on cross-examination." A Judge's finding is a separate act and cannot be said to be conduct of the witness. Moreover, the purpose of the limitation on extrinsic evidence is to make a witness's denial of an act final, so that the act does not become a disputed issue. If the cross-examiner can ask about a third party's opinion of a witness's conduct, presumably on re-direct the examiner would be permitted to have the witness explain why the third party's opinion is incorrect. This seems precisely the kind of dispute the "no extrinsic evidence" rule is intended to prohibit.

United States v. No Neck, 472 F.3d 1048 (8th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for sexual abuse of two children, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to preclude the defendant from cross-examining the victims' mother about previously falsely accusing her brother of a similar offense.

[xviii] Rule 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Fraud

United States v. Beck, 557 F.3d 619 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in limiting the cross-examination of the arresting officer as to his involvement in a ticket scalping scandal. The officer's testimony was merely duplicative of other testimony, and discrediting the officer's testimony would have had little impact on the government's case.

[xx] Rule 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Immigration Violations

United States v. Almeida-Perez, 549 F.3d 1162 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for alien possession of firearms, finding no plain error in the Magistrate Judge's questioning of witnesses at a suppression hearing. It noted that "the fact that the suppression motion was tried to a Magistrate Judge, rather than to a jury, decreases the danger or prejudice to the defendants from the Magistrate Judge's questioning." The Court also observed that the Magistrate Judge's questions as to the circumstances under which witnesses entered this country might have been relevant under Rule 608(b) to assessing credibility, but added that "[a]t the same time, we must say that the use of such evidence is fraught with the danger of prejudice to a defendant by introducing the possibility of invidious discrimination on the basis of alienage" and "the relevance of an immigration violation to character for truthfulness is at the least debatable and would depend on the facts of the particular violation since many immigration violations do not involve a false statement."

[xxii] Rule 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Narcotics

United States v. Holden, 557 F.3d 698 (6th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for false reporting to the Environmental Protection Agency, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the principal witness for the government had been treated for marijuana dependency, which caused short-term memory loss, more than nine years before the charged events. The defense was properly permitted to question the witness about his ability to perceive the events that were the subject of his testimony, but his prior drug use was not relevant to his character for truthfulness. That he may have misrepresented his drug use at the time of treatment or experienced memory loss at that time had little if any relevance to his ability to testify truthfully about an unrelated subject more than a decade later.

United States v. Apperson, 441 F.3d 1162 (10th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for conspiring to manufacture LSD, the Court found no error in prohibiting the defendant from cross-examining a witness concerning prior drug use. The defendant was intending to impeach the witness's character for truthfulness, but the Court noted that a witness's use of drugs "may not be used to attack his or her general credibility, but only his or her ability to perceive the underlying events and testify lucidly at the trial."

[xxiv.1] Rule 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Polygraph Examination Results

United States v. Apperson, 441 F.3d 1162 (10th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for conspiring to manufacture LSD, the Court found no error in prohibiting the defendant from cross-examining a cooperating witness about the witness's failing a polygraph test during the investigation. The defendant was intending to impeach the witness's character for truthfulness, but the Court noted that a failed polygraph test "had the potential to be overvalued by the jury, and thus was excludable under Rule 403."

[xxvi] Rule 608(b) -- Questioning Principal Witness -- Sexual Conduct

United States v. Bunchan, 580 F.3d 66 (1st Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a mail fraud conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when the defense was permitted to ask a government witness about pending state criminal charges for assault but was not permitted to bring out that the charges were for indecent assault and battery of a child. The Judge's ruling permitted elicitation of the witness' motive to ingratiate himself with the government but avoided unnecessary and unfair prejudice against the witness. The Court also noted that reference to the particular nature of the charges was not admissible under Rule 608(b) because it was not relevant to the witness' character for truthfulness.

[i] Rule 608(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules

[ii] Rule 608(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 609(a)

United States v. Barnhart, 599 F.3d 737 (7th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a wire fraud conviction, holding that the government was properly permitted to question the defendant under Rule 608(b) about the specific conduct underlying his prior convictions for theft and deceptive practices. It noted that while impeachment under Rule 609 is limited to the fact of the conviction, Rule 608(b) allows inquiry into bad acts underlying the conviction unless their probative value as to the witness's truthfulness is substantially outweighed by their prejudicial effect. In this case, the underlying conduct was "highly relevant to Barnhart's character for truthfulness."

United States v. Osazuwa, 564 F.3d 1169 (9th Cir. 2009) : The Court reversed an inmate's conviction for assaulting a guard because he had been cross-examined extensively about the circumstances of a bank fraud conviction introduced to impeach him. It held that impeachment evidence relating to convictions falls within the exclusive purview of Rule 609, so the details of offenses (even though they involved dishonesty) are not admissible under Rule 608(b), and the scope of the inquiry under Rule 609(a) does not include, except in exceptional circumstances, details of the crime. The Court also rejected an argument that the defendant had opened the door to the cross-examination by testifying he served only one day in jail, thus minimizing the seriousness of the offense, since the testimony was an accurate answer to the question asked and he did not attempt to explain away or otherwise minimize his conviction.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 609 RULE 609

3-609 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 609.syn

§ 609.syn Synopsis to Chapter 609: RULE 609

609.01 Official Text

609.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Basic Rule

[2] Legislative Debate

[3] Crimes of Dishonesty or False Statement

[4] Categorizing Crimes

[5] Facts Underlying the Conviction, and the 2006 Amendment to Rule 609(a)(2)

[6] Facts Underlying the Conviction and the Relationship with Rule 608

[7] Balancing Test

[8] Determination on the Record

[9] Limiting Instructions

[10] Old Convictions

[11] Relationship to Contradiction

[12] In Limine Rulings

[13] Pardons and Annulments

[14] Juvenile Adjudications

[15] Pending Appeals

609.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Rule609(a) -- General Rule

[a] Rule 609(a) -- Arrests

[b] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect

[i] Rule 609(a) -- Accused-Witness

[A] Rule 609(a) -- Error To Admit

[B] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Accused-Witness -- Factors To Be Considered

[C] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Accused-Witness -- Miscellaneous Cases

[D] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Accused-Witness -- Prior Convictions in the Same Case

[E] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Accused-Witness -- Procedure

[F] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Accused-Witness -- Similarity Between Convictions and Crimes Charged

[ii] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Civil Cases

[A] Rule 609(a) -- Civil Rights Cases

[B] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Civil Cases -- Other Cases

[iii] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Criminal Defense Witnesses

[iv] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Different Balancing Tests

[v] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Prosecution Witnesses

[vi] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Statement of Reasons

[vii] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Title or Nature of Prior Conviction

[c] Rule 609(a) -- Corporate Convictions

[d] Rule 609(a) -- Deferred Adjudications

[e] Rule 609(a) -- Details of the Conviction

[f] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi

[i] Rule 609(a) -- Assault

[ii] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Counterfeiting and Forgery

[iii] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Embezzlement

[iv] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- False Statements

[v] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Food Stamp Offenses

[vi] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Fraud

[vii] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Income Tax Offenses

[viii] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Larceny, Robbery, and Theft Offenses

[A] Rule 609(a) -- Shoplifting

[B] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Larceny, Robbery, and Theft Offenses -- Other Offenses

[ix] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Lewd Conduct

[x] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Miscellaneous Offenses

[xi] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Motor Vehicle Offenses

[xii] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Narcotics Offenses

[xiii] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- No Balancing

[xiv] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Receipt of Stolen Property

[xv] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Smuggling

[xvi] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Title or Nature of Prior Conviction

[xvii] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Weapons Convictions

[xviii] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Worthless Check Convictions

[g] Rule 609(a) -- Explaining the Conviction

[h] Rule 609(a) -- Felony or Misdemeanor

[i] Rule 609(a) -- Good Faith Basis

[j] Rule 609(a) -- "Impeaching" a Defendant Who Does Not Testify

[k] Rule 609(a) -- In Limine Motions

[l] Rule 609(a) -- Nolo Contendere Pleas

[m] Rule 609(a) -- Opening the Door

[n] Rule 609(a) -- Rebuttal Evidence

[o] Rule 609(a) -- Relationship to Rule 404(b)

[p] Rule 609(a) -- Uncounseled Conviction

[2] Rule 609(b) -- TIME LIMIT

[a] Rule 609(b) -- Discretion

[i] Rule 609(b) -- Accused and Defense Witnesses

[ii] Rule 609(b) -- Discretion -- Prosecution Witnesses

[iii] Rule 609(b) -- Discretion -- Witnesses in Civil Cases

[b] Rule 609(b) -- Dishonesty Convictions

[c] Rule 609(b) -- Findings on the Record

[d] Rule 609(b) -- In Limine Motions

[e] Rule 609(b) -- Notice

[f] Rule 609(b) -- Probation Revocation and Subsequent Incarceration

[g] Rule 609(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence

[h] Rule 609(b) -- Timing of Prior Convictions

[i] Rule 609(b) -- Tolling the Limitations Period

[3] Rule 609(c) -- Effect of Pardon, annulment, or Certificate of Rehabilitation

[a] Rule 609(c) -- Discretion of Trial Judge

[b] Rule 609(c) -- Finding of Rehabilitation Implied

[c] Rule 609(c) -- No Finding of Rehabilitation

[d] Rule 609(c) -- Objection to Impeachment Required

[e] Rule 609(c) -- Vacated Convictions

[4] Rule 609(d) -- Juvenile Adjudications

[5] Rule 609(e) -- Pendency of Appeal

[a] Rule 609(e) -- Conviction, But No Sentence or Judgment

[b] Rule 609(e) -- State Law

[c] Rule 609(e) -- Suspended Sentence

609.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 277 (1999)

[3] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

[4] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

[5] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

[6] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

[7] 1990 Amendment Advisory Committee's Note

[8] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 609 RULE 609

3-609 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 609.01

609.01 Official Text

[Go To Supp]

Rule 609. Impeachment by Evidence of Conviction of Crime

(a) General rule. -- For the purpose of attacking the credibility of a witness,

(1) evidence that a witness other than an accused has been convicted of a crime shall be admitted, subject to Rule 403, if the crime was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year under the law under which the witness was convicted, and evidence that an accused has been convicted of such a crime shall be admitted if the court determines that the probative value of admitting this evidence outweighs its prejudicial effect to the accused; and

(2) evidence that any witness has been convicted of a crime shall be admitted if it involved dishonesty or false statement, regardless of the punishment.

(b) Time limit. -- Evidence of a conviction under this rule is not admissible if a period of more than ten years has elapsed since the date of the conviction or of the release of the witness from the confinement imposed for that conviction, whichever is the later date, unless the court determines, in the interests of justice, that the probative value of the conviction supported by specific facts and circumstances substantially outweighs its prejudicial effect. However, evidence of a conviction more than ten years old as calculated herein, is not admissible unless the proponent gives to the adverse party sufficient advance written notice of intent to use such evidence to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to contest the use of such evidence.

(c) Effect of pardon, annulment, or certificate of rehabilitation. -- Evidence of a conviction is not admissible under this rule if (1) the conviction has been the subject of a pardon, annulment, certificate of rehabilitation, or other equivalent procedure based on a finding of the rehabilitation of the person convicted, and that person has not been convicted of a subsequent crime which was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year, or (2) the conviction has been the subject of a pardon, annulment, or other equivalent procedure based on a finding of innocence.

(d) Juvenile adjudications. -- Evidence of juvenile adjudications is generally not admissible under this rule. The court may, however, in a criminal case allow evidence of a juvenile adjudication of a witness other than the accused if conviction of the offense would be admissible to attack the credibility of an adult and the court is satisfied that admission in evidence is necessary for a fair determination of the issue of guilt or innocence.

(e) Pendency of appeal. -- The pendency of an appeal therefrom does not render evidence of a conviction inadmissible. Evidence of the pendency of an appeal is admissible.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 609 RULE 609

3-609 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 609.02

609.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Basic Rule

In some respects, Rule 609 covers the same ground as Rule 608. Both Rules are concerned with a particular form of impeachment: proving that a witness has a character for untruthfulness. Both Rules permit, with some limitations, an inquiry into specific conduct in the witness' past, to raise the inference that such conduct has some bearing on the witness' bad character for veracity. The two Rules are different in scope and effect, however. If the misconduct was a bad act, it is covered by Rule 608, and inquiry into the act is dependent on balancing probative value and prejudicial effect under Rule 403; also, extrinsic evidence is not admissible to prove the act occurred. In contrast, if the misconduct resulted in a conviction, it is covered by Rule 609, and inquiry is controlled by a complex set of rules dependent in part on the type of conviction and in part on the witness being impeached; also, if inquiry is permitted, it can be proved by extrinsic evidence.

One reason for the difference in treatment is that the drafters of the Rules, and Congress, felt that the exclusion of extrinsic evidence found in Rule 608(b) should not apply where the impeachment was with prior convictions. This is because a conviction, unlike a bad act, can be proved easily if the witness denies it. There is no risk of a mini-trial on a collateral issue. Also, the denial of a bad act may result from simply inadvertence, but it is not so likely that the witness has simply forgotten about a conviction.

The more important reason for differential treatment is that prior convictions were thought to be more serious, and more probative of a propensity to lie on the stand than other bad acts. Whether this is true or not, it is clear that Congress believed it to be so. It is also clear that Rule 609 received much more attention in the drafting and approval process than did Rule 608.

Subdivision (a) is the dominant provision in the Rule, covering convictions that Congress considered to be "recent" enough to have substantial probative value as to the witness' character for veracity. The most crucial inquiry under Rule 609(a) is whether the conviction that is the subject of impeachment falls under subdivision (a)(1) or subdivision (a)(2). The legislative presumption is that crimes that involve dishonesty or false statement (covered by subdivision (a)(2)) are highly probative of the witness' character for veracity, while other convictions (covered by subdivision (a)(1)) are somewhat less probative.

Rule 609(a)(2) provides that if a witness has been convicted of any crime of "dishonesty or false statement," then the conviction "shall be admitted" to impeach the witness. n1 In contrast, if the conviction did not involve dishonesty or false statement, then Rule 609(a)(1) provides that the conviction is admissible only if it is a felony n2 and only if it satisfies a specified balancing test. If the conviction is covered by Rule 609(a)(1), the Judge must balance the conviction's probative value in proving the witness' untruthful character against the prejudice that would arise from introducing the conviction. If the witness is a criminal defendant, the conviction can be admitted under Rule 609(a)(1) only if the probative value of the conviction outweighs its prejudicial effect. The conviction of any other witness is admissible so long as its probative value is not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect; that is, the general balancing test of Rule 403 applies if the witness is not the accused. n3

[2] Legislative Debate

Probably no single Rule provoked as much controversy in Congress as Rule 609. In the House of Representatives, the prevailing view was that a prior conviction should be introduced only if the crime involved dishonesty or false statement.

Under the bill originally approved by the Senate, witnesses other than the accused could also be impeached by crimes punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year if the Court determined that the probative value of the evidence outweighed its prejudicial effect.

The actual Rule represents a compromise of sorts. More impeachment is permissible under the Rule than under the House draft. But felony convictions not amounting to crimen falsi can be used to impeach any witness, including a defendant, which represents an abandonment of the Senate's limitation.

The Rule as originally promulgated was anomalous in several respects, however. First, it referred to proving convictions on "cross-examination," but it is clear, especially in light of Rule 607, that a party should be able to bring out otherwise admissible prior convictions on direct examination as well. Second, Rule 609(a)(1) was ambiguous as to whether the Trial Judge could exclude unduly prejudicial convictions when offered against prosecution witnesses or witnesses in civil cases; the Rule referred only to prejudice "against the defendant." n4

In 1990, the Rule was amended to delete the reference to cross-examination and to clarify that, under Rule 609(a)(1), the Trial Judge must balance probative value and prejudicial effect as to all witnesses in all cases -- though the balancing test is tilted more toward exclusion when the criminal defendant is the witness.

The Rule has again been amended (with the amendment scheduled to take effect on December 1, 2006) to clarify and limit the convictions that are subject to automatic admissibility under Rule 609(a)(2). That amendment is discussed below, § 609.02[5].

[3] Crimes of Dishonesty or False Statement

It is critical for the parties in both civil and criminal cases to determine whether a witness' conviction was one of "dishonesty or false statement." The offering party will always wish to characterize a conviction as one of dishonesty or false statement, because then it will be automatically admitted. The nonoffering party will always wish to characterize a conviction as not one of dishonesty or false statement, because then there will be an opportunity to have the conviction excluded pursuant to the Rule 609(a)(1) weighing process; and if such a conviction is not a felony, it cannot be admitted under the Rule.

If the conviction is found to be one of dishonesty or false statement, it must be admitted no matter how prejudicial it is, no matter who the witness is, and no matter how cumulative it may be as to impeachment of the witness. While the Rule

403 test is applied as a backstop to many other Rules (see, e.g., Rules 404(b), 407, 608 and 702), this is not the case with Rule 609(a)(2). Rule 609(a)(2) is cast in mandatory language. Any possible doubt was erased by the 1990 amendment, which makes clear that the Rule 403 test is inapplicable to convictions of dishonesty or false statement. The amendment added the Rule 403 test to govern most convictions offered under Rule 609(a)(1), but pointedly did not add such a test to Rule 609(a)(2). n5

[4] Categorizing Crimes

Rule 609(a)(2) does not define or list those crimes that are automatically admissible, and there has been significant disagreement among the Courts as to which crimes should qualify for mandatory admission under Rule 609(a)(2). For example, is shoplifting or burglary a crime of dishonesty or false statement? What about a drug crime?

When the Rule was amended in 1990, the Advisory Committee refused to add any language clarifying which crimes must be admitted for impeachment under Rule 609(a)(2). The Committee's explanation for not proposing an amendment to Rule 609(a)(2) is as follows:

> The Committee recommended no substantive change in subdivision (a)(2), even though some cases raise a concern about the proper interpretation of the words "dishonesty or false statement." These words were used but not explained in the original Advisory Committee Note accompanying Rule 609. Congress extensively debated the rule, and the Report of the House and Senate Conference Committee states that "by the phrase dishonesty and false statement, the Conference means crimes such as perjury, subornation of perjury, false statement, criminal fraud, embezzlement, or false pretense, or any other offense in the nature of crimen falsi, commission of which involves some element of deceit, untruthfulness, or falsification bearing on the accused's propensity to testify truthfully." The Advisory Committee concluded that the Conference Report provides sufficient guidance to trial courts and that no amendment is necessary, notwithstanding some decisions that take an unduly broad view of "dishonesty," admitting convictions such as for bank robbery or bank larceny.

There is general agreement that crimes containing a statutory element requiring proof of deceit are covered by Rule 609(a)(2). Examples include perjury, fraud, falsifying government forms, and counterfeiting. Defendants cannot be convicted of these crimes unless the prosecution proves that they have lied in some way. The fact that witnesses have essentially been convicted for lying is obviously probative of whether they are lying on the stand -- so probative, in fact, that Congress mandated admission no matter how prejudicial the convictions would be. n6 As the Seventh Circuit has stated:

> The essential characteristic of these offenses [such as perjury, false statement, criminal fraud, embezzlement or false pretenses] is that the witness, acting in a calculated and deliberate manner, has committed acts of falsification for the very purpose of deceiving. It is this essential characteristic that makes these crimes probative of a witness' propensity to lie on the stand. n7

Disagreement exists with respect to theft crimes. On the one hand, it can be argued that a shoplifter or burglar acted deceitfully or at least underhandedly, and that this activity is just as probative of a propensity to lie on the stand as is the dishonesty inherent in a perjury conviction. On the other hand, deceit is not necessarily a statutory element or an obvious avenue of proof for the crime of theft, nor is false statement; so it is not as obvious that the conviction is as probative of credibility as, for example, a conviction in which the government of necessity proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the witness had acted dishonestly and made a false statement. n8 Some types of theft crimes, like bank robbery, are even more questionable as to their pertinence to the witness' credibility, because a person could rob a bank without engaging in a single act of deceit or falsification. n9

We believe that if a conviction does not on its face contain an element of deceit, there is good reason to subject it to the balancing test of Rule 609(a)(1). Exemplary of our reasoning is the Ninth Circuit's en banc opinion in United States v. Brackeen, 969 F.2d 827 (9th Cir. 1992) . Brackeen was tried for aiding and abetting an armed bank robbery, and when he took the stand, he was impeached with his guilty pleas to two unarmed bank robberies that occurred within days of the charged crime. The Trial Judge allowed the impeachment, reasoning that the bank robberies were crimes involving dishonesty or false statement, and thus were to be automatically admitted under Rule 609(a)(2). But the Court of Appeals reversed. It concluded that "Congress intended Rule 609(a)(2) to apply only to those crimes that factually or by definition entail some element of misrepresentation or deceit, and not to those crimes which, bad though they are, do not carry with them a tinge of falsification." n10

The importance of characterizing bank robbery as a crime that does not involve dishonesty or false statement is apparent in a case such as Brackeen. Brackeen took the stand at trial to testify that he was not a bank robber. If his previous convictions were automatically admitted under Rule 609(a)(2), there would be an unacceptable risk that the jury would use the prior convictions for the impermissible inference that "once a bank robber, always a bank robber." Given that risk, there is a strong possibility that the defendant would not take the stand at all. On the other hand, if the convictions are subject to the balancing test provided by Rule 609(a)(1), then there is at least a fair chance that they could be kept from the jury. A defendant is undeniably prejudiced when the jury hears about crimes similar to that with which he is charged; and a conviction of a criminal defendant-witness is not admissible under Rule 609(a)(1) unless its probative value outweighs its prejudicial effect. At a minimum, there is a possibility in a case like Brackeen that the Trial Judge would exclude one of the bank robbery convictions on the ground that it is cumulative as to the defendant's character for truthfulness. n11 Such exclusion would not be possible under the Rule 609(a)(2) provision for automatic admission. So at the very least, the broader view of Rule 609(a)(1), and the correspondingly more limited view of Rule 609(a)(2), means that the defendant receives some judicial oversight into the use of these prejudicial convictions.

Another crime the characterization of which is in dispute is the willful failure to file a tax return. For example, in Cree v. Hatcher, 969 F.2d 34 (3d Cir. 1992) , the plaintiff in a malpractice case called an expert pathologist, who was impeached with his prior misdemeanor conviction for willful failure to file a tax return in violation of 26 U.S.C. § 7203. The Trial Judge held that the conviction fell under Rule 609(a)(2) and therefore admission was required, but the Third Circuit reversed. The Court of Appeals reasoned that Rule 609(a)(2) should be narrowly construed, because it is a radical provision that deprives the Trial Judge of the discretion to weigh the prejudicial effect of admitting the evidence against its probative value in proving the witness' credibility. n12 The Court noted that to obtain a conviction for willful failure to file a tax return, the government is not required to show that a defendant acted with the deceitful purpose of concealing any tax liability. Rather, all that is required is proof that the defendant acted voluntarily and with the deliberate intent to violate the law. The Court concluded therefore that a conviction under section 7203 did not "necessarily connote dishonesty or a false statement within the narrow ambit of Rule 609(a)(2)." n13

The result in Cree is in conflict with the Eleventh Circuit's opinion in United States v. Gellman, 677 F.2d 65 (11th Cir. 1982) , where the Court reasoned that a violation of Section 7203 was "sufficiently reprehensible to meet the exception of Rule 609(a)(2)." n14 The Cree Court, however, cogently pointed out that Rule 609(a)(2) does not measure the reprehensibility or the severity of a crime, but rather focuses on whether the crime is especially probative of the witness' propensity to lie. It is the deceit factor in the conviction that makes it so probative of the witness' credibility that admission is mandated. n15

It is notable that because a conviction under Section 7203 is a misdemeanor (it is not punishable by a term of imprisonment in excess of one year), the result in Cree means that a witness can never be impeached under Rule 609(a)(1) with that conviction; while Rule 609(a)(2) provides for mandatory admission of all convictions covered by the Rule, Rule 609(a)(1) does not permit admission of misdemeanors. So it was critical to the plaintiff in Cree to have her expert's prior conviction defined as one that did not involve dishonesty or false statement. n16

A strict construction of Rule 609(a)(2) is sound policy: Because almost every criminal act is in some broad sense a dishonest act in either preparation or execution, a broad construction of Rule 609(a)(2) would swallow up Rule

609(a)(1) and would lead to mandatory admission of almost all prior convictions, even though many of these convictions would have slight probative value as to the witness' character for truthfulness and would carry significant prejudicial effect. n17 Given the predominance of the Rule 403 balancing approach throughout the Federal Rules and the general grant of discretion that the Rules provide to Trial Judges, it makes sense to limit where possible a Rule that mandates admission and thus prohibits the use of judicial discretion and balancing. As the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals has stated:

> Rule 609(a)(2) is to be construed narrowly; it is not carte blanche for admission on an undifferentiated basis of all previous convictions for purposes of impeachment; rather, precisely because it involves no discretion on the part of the trial court, Rule 609(a)(2) must be confined to a narrow subset of crimes -- those that bear directly upon the accused's propensity to testify truthfully. n18

We believe that, while it is important for the jury to get a sense of the witness' character for veracity, it is also important that the rules on impeachment not unduly discourage parties from calling witnesses -- especially criminal defendant-witnesses -- to the stand. We think that Rule 609(a)(1) is a good-faith attempt to strike a balance of competing interests; therefore, automatic admission under Rule 609(a)(2) should be the very limited exception, not the rule.

[5] Facts Underlying the Conviction, and the 2006 Amendment to Rule 609(a)(2)

What if the witness was convicted of a crime that does not itself contain an element of deceit, but the crime was committed in a manner that involved deceit? For example, the crime of murder contains no statutory element of deceit, but a particular defendant may have acted dishonestly in order to get the victim to a certain place where the murder would occur. Can the Court go behind the conviction itself to the supporting facts and hold that the manner of committing the crime requires admission under Rule 609(a)(2)? The Courts are in dispute on this question, and a pending amendment to Rule 609(a)(2) seeks to resolve this conflict.

Most Circuits have held that a conviction is subject to admission under Rule 609(a)(2), even where dishonesty or false statement is not an essential element of the crime, if the proponent can show that the conviction rested in some way on facts indicating that the witness was actually dishonest or deceitful in committing the crime. n19

We submit that it is unwise to apply Rule 609(a)(2) so broadly as to permit a Trial Court to go behind the witness' crime and determine whether the crime was committed in a deceitful manner. The premise for such a broad approach is that a conviction for a crime such as drug distribution will have more or less probative value depending on how it was committed. While this may or may not be true, the fact is that if the conviction is admitted, the jury will generally hear only that the conviction was rendered and that a certain punishment was meted out. Rule 609 does not allow the jury to hear the underlying facts of the conviction. n20 The Courts have consistently held that evidence of the conviction is limited to "the crime charged, the date, and the disposition." n21 This is part of the reasoning for dispensing with an extrinsic evidence exclusion such as that found in Rule 608(b) -- the conviction itself can be easily proved, without a need to delve into the facts. Consequently, whatever greater probative value there is in the manner that a crime was committed will be lost on the jury.

More importantly, an approach permitting the Trial Court to go behind the conviction in every case will make Rule 609(a)(2) the predominant rule, and not the exception. This is because there is probably some act of deceit in almost every crime. Thus, Rule 609(a)(2) will swallow up Rule 609(a)(1), even though the balancing approach of the latter Rule is more consistent with the general framework of the Federal Rules.

Finally, it is to say the least an indeterminate inquiry for a Trial Court to decide retrospectively just what facts actually led to the witness' conviction. If a witness has been convicted of drug distribution, how is the Trial Judge to determine whether the jury in that prior case found beyond a reasonable doubt that the witness had acted deceitfully in committing the crime? The general verdict of guilty is obviously an insufficient indication. Should the Trial Judge look at the indictment? At the record? Should the Trial Judge hold a hearing and essentially retry the prior case, when the only goal is to determine whether the conviction is "automatically" admitted? The process of going behind the crime to the underlying facts hardly seems "automatic."

For these reasons, some Courts have rejected the majority approach and have held that convictions such as for murder, drug distribution, etc., can never be automatically admitted even if they were allegedly committed in a deceitful manner. For example, in Cree, see § 609.02[4], the Third Circuit recognized that "it is certainly possible, and perhaps even likely, that in some instances individuals who willfully fail to file federal income tax returns do so with the conscious intent to conceal their tax liability." However, the Court concluded that "the manner in which a particular defendant commits a crime is irrelevant; what matters is whether dishonesty or false statement is an element of the statutory offense."

The Advisory Committee's amendment to Rule 609(a)(2) rejects both approaches in the cases. That is, it rejects the notion that a Court can or should always go behind a conviction to try to determine whether some of the underlying facts were dishonest or deceitful; such an approach is inefficient and indeterminative. On the other hand, the Committee was persuaded (or one might say overwhelmed) by the Justice Department's view that a pure "elements" approach to Rule 609(a)(2), while easy to apply, would unduly limit impeachment. The Justice Department's major concern was with a prior conviction for obstruction of justice. Deceit or dishonesty is not an element of that crime, because it can be committed, for example, by threatening a witness or contumaciously destroying evidence. On the other hand, many convictions for obstruction will be grounded on dishonest conduct (e.g., lying to authorities), and the centrality of these acts to the conviction might well be evident without having to speculate or to retry the case. For example, the indictment might itself provide sufficient indication that proof of dishonest acts was fundamental to the conviction.

While there is much to be said, as above, for a strict elements approach to Rule 609(a)(2), the Advisory Committee determined that it would not be able to get an amendment approved in the face of staunch opposition from the Department of Justice; and that a test could be proposed that would at least limit some of the problems of allowing or requiring a Court to go behind every conviction to look for deceitful or dishonest acts. The Committee Note tries to limit the damage of the Justice Department's demand that Rule 609(a)(2) cover crimes other than those in which deceit or dishonesty is part of a statutory element.

The amendment to Rule 609(a), and the Committee Note, accordingly provide as follows:

Rule 609. Impeachment by Evidence of Conviction of Crime

(Amendment effective December 1, 2006)

> (a) General rule.--For the purpose of attacking the The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [credibility] character for truthfulness of a witness,
>
> (1) evidence that a witness other than an accused has been convicted of a crime shall be admitted, subject to Rule 403, if the crime was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year under the law under which the witness was convicted, and evidence that an accused has been convicted of such a crime shall be admitted if the court determines that the probative value of admitting this evidence outweighs its prejudicial effect to the accused; and evidence that any witness has been convicted of a crime shall be admitted, regardless of the punishment, if it readily can be determined that establishing the elements of the crime required proof or admission of an act of dishonesty or false statement by the witness.

* * *

Committee Note

The amendment provides that Rule 609(a)(2) mandates the admission of evidence of a conviction only when the conviction required the proof of (or in the case of a guilty plea, the admission of) an act of dishonesty or false statement. Evidence of all other convictions is inadmissible under this subsection, irrespective of whether the witness exhibited dishonesty or made a false statement in the process of the commission of the crime of conviction. Thus, evidence that a witness was convicted for a crime of violence, such as murder, is not admissible under Rule 609(a)(2), even if the witness acted deceitfully in the course of committing the crime.

The amendment is meant to give effect to the legislative intent to limit the convictions that are to be automatically admitted under subsection (a)(2). The Conference Committee provided that by "dishonesty and false statement" it meant "crimes such as perjury, subornation of perjury, false statement, criminal fraud, embezzlement, or false pretense, or any other offense in the nature of crimen falsi, the commission of which involves some element of deceit, untruthfulness, or falsification bearing on the [witness's] propensity to testify truthfully." Historically, offenses classified as crimina falsi have included only those crimes in which the ultimate criminal act was itself an act of deceit. See Green, Deceit and the Classification of Crimes: Federal Rule of Evidence 609(a)(2) and the Origins of Crimen Falsi, 90 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 1087 (2000).

Evidence of crimes in the nature of crimina falsi must be admitted under Rule 609(a)(2), regardless of how such crimes are specifically charged. For example, evidence that a witness was convicted of making a false claim to a federal agent is admissible under this subsection regardless of whether the crime was charged under a section that expressly references deceit (e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 1001, Material Misrepresentation to the Federal Government) or a section that does not (e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 1503, Obstruction of Justice).

The amendment requires that the proponent have ready proof that the conviction required the factfinder to find, or the defendant to admit, an act of dishonesty or false statement. Ordinarily, the statutory elements of the crime will indicate whether it is one of dishonesty or false statement. Where the deceitful nature of the crime is not apparent from the statute and the face of the judgment -- as, for example, where the conviction simply records a finding of guilt for a statutory offense that does not reference deceit expressly -- a proponent may offer information such as an indictment, a statement of admitted facts, or jury instructions to show that the factfinder had to find, or the defendant had to admit, an act of dishonesty or false statement in order for the witness to have been convicted.Cf. Taylor v. United States, 495 U.S. 575, 602 (1990) (providing that a trial court may look to a charging instrument or jury instructions to ascertain the nature of a prior offense where the statute is insufficiently clear on its face); Shepard v. United States, 125. S.Ct. 1254 (2005) (the inquiry to determine whether a guilty plea to a crime defined by a nongeneric statute necessarily admitted elements of the generic offense was limited to the charging document's terms, the terms of a plea agreement or transcript of colloquy between judge and defendant in which the factual basis for the plea was confirmed by the defendant, or a comparable judicial record). But the amendment does not contemplate a "mini-trial" in which the court plumbs the record of the previous proceeding to determine whether the crime was in the nature of crimen falsi.

The amendment also substitutes the term "character for truthfulness" for the term "credibility" in the first sentence of the Rule. The limitations of Rule 609 are not applicable if a conviction is admitted for a purpose other than to prove the witness's character for untruthfulness.See, e.g., United States v. Lopez, 979 F.2d 1024 (5th Cir. 1992) (Rule 609 was not applicable where the conviction was offered for purposes of contradiction). The use of the term "credibility" in subsection (d) is retained, however, as that subdivision is intended to govern the use of a juvenile adjudication for any type of impeachment.

[6] Facts Underlying the Conviction and the Relationship with Rule 608

The underlying facts of a conviction might be a subject of inquiry when the witness testifies, even if the conviction is not itself admissible under Rule 609. For example, if a drug seller misrepresents the quality of the heroin that he sells, that misrepresentation may impeach the seller as a witness even though the conviction was for the sale, not the misrepresentation. In fact, the misrepresentation may be considered even if the seller was never convicted of any crime. United States v. Lewis, 626 F.2d 940 (D.C. Cir. 1980) . This is because Rule 608 permits impeachment with the witness' prior bad acts, even if the acts did not result in conviction.

It must be remembered, however, that unlike convictions covered by Rule 609(a)(2), prior bad acts are not automatically admissible to impeach the witness' character for veracity. Rather, admissibility of such acts is regulated by the Rule 403 balancing test. n22 Also, because of Rule 608(b)'s exclusion of extrinsic evidence, the details on which the conviction is based cannot be proved if the witness denies them.

Interestingly, if the underlying facts are not permitted to bootstrap a conviction into automatic admission under Rule 609(a)(2), it may be the case, at least where the accused is the witness, that the deceitful manner in which the crime was committed may be a subject of inquiry while the conviction itself may not. This is because the deceitful acts might be more probative of credibility than the bare fact of a conviction that does not contain a statutory element requiring proof of deceit. Furthermore, the deceitful acts can be brought out unless their prejudicial effect substantially outweighs their probative value under Rule 403; whereas at least in the case of an accused-witness, the conviction itself is only admissible if its probative value outweighs its prejudicial effect. The Rule 609(a)(1) balancing test is far more beneficial to the criminal defendant than is the balancing test employed under Rules 403 and 608.

On the other hand, if the conviction is automatically admitted under Rule 609(a)(2), it makes it less likely that the underlying facts will be admitted under Rule 608. This is because the jury has already been informed that the witness has committed a crime involving dishonesty or false statement. Adding in the details will usually be "piling on," so that the costs of delay and prejudice are likely to substantially outweigh the minimal incremental probative value of the underlying facts in proving credibility. n23

[7] Balancing Test

As mentioned above, Rule 609(a)(1) provides a special balancing test when the criminal defendant is the witness. The prosecution must show that the probative value of the conviction outweighs the prejudicial effect that the accused will suffer when the jury hears about the conviction. This is more protective of defendants than the Rule 403 test, under which the prejudicial effect must substantially outweigh the probative value for the evidence to be excluded. As a practical matter this means that a defendant's convictions stand a chance of exclusion when: (1) they are similar to the crime with which the defendant is charged; (2) they are particularly inflammatory; or (3) the defendant has been impeached in other ways, such as with inconsistent statements or with convictions that are automatically admitted under Rule 609(a)(2). n24

In the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 608, § 608.02[4], we provide a nonexclusive list of factors that the Trial Court should take into account when assessing the probative value and prejudicial effect of a bad act offered to impeach a witness' character for veracity. These factors are equally applicable to the probative value-prejudice balance mandated for convictions under Rule 609(a)(1). As with impeachment under Rule 608, it is important to note that the prejudice that the Trial Court is to take into account is not the "prejudice" that the witness may suffer in terms of humiliation (though that factor may be considered by the Trial Court exercising its powers under Rule 611). The Trial Court operating under Rule 609 must consider the prejudice suffered by the party whose testimony the witness favors. It is also important to remember that the probative value of impeachment evidence increases as the witness' credibility becomes more important in the case. n25

[8] Determination on the Record

Most Appellate Courts have urged Trial Judges to hold a hearing before making a Rule 609 ruling, and to make findings on the record. n26 Requiring a hearing with on-the-record findings is most desirable because it assures careful consideration by the Trial Judge and expedites appellate review. If the conviction falls under Rule 609(a)(1), the Trial Court should provide some statement concerning the factors it used in the balancing process.

The Advisory Committee on the Federal Rules of Evidence has considered the following language as a possible amendment to Rule 609, to provide some structure for Trial Courts to employ under this complex Rule:

> The court shall articulate on the record the factors considered in making its determination of admissibility of evidence offered under either subdivision (a)(1) or subdivision (b) of this rule. The court may consider such factors, among others, as (i) the degree to which a conviction of the crime is indicative of veracity; (ii) the point in time of the conviction and the witness' subsequent history; (iii) the similarity between the conviction offered for impeachment and the charged crime if the witness is either a defendant in a criminal case or a witness who would be associated with the criminal defendant; (iv) the importance of the witness' testimony; (v) the importance of credibility to the outcome of the action; (vi) other evidence offered or to be offered by the party to impeach the witness; and (vii) whether the witness testified in the case in which he or she was convicted. If a conviction is admitted at trial under this Rule, the court must, upon request, instruct the jury on the specific purpose for which the evidence can be used, and expressly advise the jury that the evidence cannot be used as proof of criminal disposition.

The Advisory Committee ultimately decided against proposing the amendment, on the ground that it simply codified what Courts were generally doing under the Rule already. But the proposed language is, we believe, a helpful guideline for Trial Judges to employ. The factors set forth in the proposed amendment are the factors that are often discussed by the Courts. n27

[9] Limiting Instructions

A limiting instruction is critical in helping the jury to understand the difference between impeachment and substantive evidence, and it is instrumental in controlling, at least to some extent, the prejudice that will be suffered by the party associated with the witness impeached with a prior conviction.

The Federal Judicial Center has suggested the following limiting instruction when the criminal defendant is impeached with a prior conviction:

> You have been told that the defendant was found guilty in [year] of [e.g., bank robbery]. This conviction has been brought to your attention only because you may wish to consider it when you decide, as with any witness, how much you will believe of his testimony in this trial. The fact that the defendant was found guilty of another crime does not mean that he committed this crime, and you must not use his guilt for the crime of [bank robbery] as proof of the crime charged in this case. You may find him guilty of this crime only if the government has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that he committed it. n28

The FJC suggests that the following instruction be given whenever a witness other than the accused is impeached with a prior conviction:

> You have heard that the witness,_____, was convicted in [year] of [e.g., armed robbery]. This conviction has been brought to your attention only because you may wish to consider it when you decide, as with any witness, whether you believe his testimony. n29

[10] Old Convictions

Rule 609(b) provides a time limit on the rules set forth in Rule 609(a). Evidence of a prior conviction is generally not admissible for purposes of impeachment if a period of more than ten years has elapsed since the date of the conviction or the release of the witness from confinement, whichever is the later date. For example, if a witness was convicted of robbery in 1994 and was confined for two years for the offense, Rule 609(a) would govern impeachment with the prior conviction until 2006. After 2006, the more exclusionary balancing test of Rule 609(b) takes over.

The House would have precluded the use of any conviction over ten years old, while the Senate favored use of such a conviction if the Court determines in the interests of justice that the probative value of the conviction supported by specific facts and circumstances substantially outweighs its prejudicial effect. The Senate's preference was written into the final Rule with a provision that a party must give notice of an intention to introduce a conviction falling outside the ten-year period. The Conferees anticipated that the notice would be in writing and would specify the date, nature, and place of conviction. n30 Notice provides some assurance that both sides are prepared to argue about the appropriate balance between probative value and prejudicial effect.

Besides the notice requirement, Rule 609(b) differs from Rule 609(a) in three respects:

(1) There is no distinction made between crimes that involve dishonesty or false statement and those that do not. But of course a perjury conviction, though dated, is logically more probative of the witness' current veracity than is a stale assault conviction. So crimes involving dishonesty or false statement are far more likely to survive the Rule 609(b) balancing test. n31

(2) There is no difference in treatment between criminal defendants and other witnesses. All old convictions of all witnesses are subject to the same balancing test.

(3) The balancing test, unlike the tests provided in Rule 609(a)(1), contains a strong presumption that old convictions should be excluded. The proponent must show that the probative value of the conviction substantially outweighs the prejudicial effect. This is a "reverse 403" test.

As a practical matter, the exclusionary presumption of the Rule 609(b) test means that an old conviction should almost always be excluded, and this is especially so if one of the following circumstances exist: (1) the witness has already been impeached with other evidence; (2) the old conviction is highly inflammatory; or (3) the conviction is that of a party or an affiliate of a party and it bears a similarity to the subject matter of the action. n32

[11] Relationship to Contradiction

The special rules set forth in Rule 609 are applicable only if the proponent is attempting to use prior convictions to impeach the witness' character for truthtelling. If there is another purpose for introducing the conviction, then Rule 609 poses no bar, and the Trial Court should admit the conviction subject to the balancing test of Rule 403. For example, in United States v. Lopez, 979 F.2d 1024 (5th Cir. 1992) , the defendant in a drug case testified to his innocence and implied that he had never been in contact with drugs. On cross-examination the government asked the defendant whether he had ever personally seen marijuana. He answered that he had not. The prosecution then offered in rebuttal, and the Trial Court admitted, the defendant's 15-year-old conviction for possession of marijuana. The jury was given a limiting instruction. The Court of Appeals held that the government's questioning as to the defendant's knowledge of marijuana was permissible and did not go beyond the scope of direct examination. The Court also held that Rule 609 did not apply because that Rule has nothing to say about "the admissibility of relevant evidence introduced to contradict a witness's testimony as to a material issue." The Court reasoned that the admissibility of the remote conviction should be determined under Rule 403, rather than under the more exclusionary balancing test of Rule 609(b). It found that Rule 403 provided valid grounds to admit Lopez's prior conviction: since the defendant had brought up his unfamiliarity with drugs on his own, the prejudicial effect of the old conviction did not substantially outweigh the probative value. n33

[12] In Limine Rulings

The Supreme Court established in Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38 (1984) , that Courts of Appeals cannot review Trial Judges' in limine rulings that indicate the extent to which defendants (and presumably other witnesses) may be impeached if they testify, unless the defendants (or other witnesses) testify and actually are impeached. The decision is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 103, § 103.02[13], as are the cases that have extended Luce to comparable situations. In many cases, Trial Judges will want to give defendants the benefit of knowing the scope of impeachment they face if they testify. The decision to take the stand is of critical importance in most criminal cases, and if it is possible for the Trial Judge to rule on impeachment prior to a defendant's making the decision, the defendant may be able to make a more informed choice. Now that Trial Judges know that defendants cannot appeal in limine rulings without testifying, they can make advance rulings without worrying that defendants may have no intention of testifying and may be trying to create hypothetical issues for appellate purposes in the event of a conviction.

In limine rulings need not necessarily be made at the outset of trial. The Court might want to see how much the defense impeaches government witnesses, and how important the credibility questions are, before deciding on the scope of impeachment of the defendant and other defense witnesses. If the Court chooses not to rule prior to trial, it might be more willing to make an advance ruling at the conclusion of the government's case. The Court may request an offer of proof prior to ruling and make any ruling conditional on the accuracy of the offer.

Motions in limine should not only assist the defendant in making an informed decision on whether to testify, but they should also provide the government and the Court with advantages. If the government is aware prior to the defendant's testimony of the permissible scope of impeachment, it will be able to plan its cross-examination and, if some prior convictions are excluded, decide what other evidence it wishes to offer or to emphasize during cross-examination. Thus, the government may actually benefit from knowing the scope of impeachment.

The advantage to the Trial Judge of an in limine ruling is that there is time to consider the delicate balancing required by Rule 609(a)(1) or 609(b), where those Rules are applicable. Also, a motion in limine gives the Judge advance notice of the need for a ruling and time to prepare a statement of reasons for the record.

[13] Pardons and Annulments

Rule 609(c) provides that a conviction that has been the subject of a pardon, annulment, or any other equivalent procedure based on a finding that the person convicted has been rehabilitated cannot be used for impeachment as long as the witness has not been convicted of a subsequent crime that is punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year. The theory of this Rule is that someone who has been rehabilitated should no longer be subject to impeachment by a conviction that took place prior to the rehabilitation. Once a subsequent serious crime is committed, however, the notion of rehabilitation disappears.

If the pardon, or the other equivalent procedure, is based on a finding of innocence, the conviction may not be used for impeachment purposes irrespective of the subsequent criminal record of the witness. Conversely, a pardon or annulment that is not based on a finding of rehabilitation leaves the conviction intact for impeachment purposes.

[14] Juvenile Adjudications

At common law, evidence of juvenile adjudications is generally not admissible. Rule 609(d) departs from the common-law tradition slightly. It provides that evidence of juvenile adjudications is generally not admissible, but permits the Judge in a criminal case to admit evidence of a juvenile adjudication of any witness other than an accused, if the adjudication involves the kind of offense that would be admissible as a prior conviction to attack the credibility of an adult and if the Court is satisfied that the evidence is necessary for a fair determination of the issue of guilt or innocence. n34

Rule 609(d) is based in part on a belief that several Supreme Court decisions providing juveniles with certain procedural due process protections ensure greater reliability in juvenile adjudications than previously, when these adjudications were not considered reliable enough to be used. The Rule also recognizes the policy of the juvenile Courts to do everything reasonably possible to ensure that a juvenile adjudication at an early age will not stigmatize the juvenile any more than is necessary. Weighing the relative accuracy of juvenile adjudications against the policy of juvenile law, Rule 609(d) provides that juvenile adjudications should be excluded unless they are necessary. It also assures that no criminal defendants will suffer because of their own juvenile adjudications.

[15] Pending Appeals

The fact that a conviction is being appealed does not prohibit its introduction into evidence. Subdivision (e) so states. The pendency of the appeal, is, however, a circumstance that may be introduced to qualify the probative value of the evidence. Presumably, the qualification value of the pendency of an appeal will be dependent on the grounds for appeal. If, for example, the appeal is based on a Fourth Amendment violation, it should not at all limit the impeachment power of the conviction -- the Fourth Amendment has nothing to do with the witness' innocence of the crime for which he was convicted. If, on the other hand, the appeal is for insufficient evidence or ineffective assistance of counsel, it would appear to have more probative value in rebutting the impeachment power of the conviction.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., United States v. Kiendra, 663 F.2d 349 (1st Cir. 1981) (convictions for crimes of dishonesty are automatically admissible because Rule 609(a)(2) provides that they "shall" be admitted; the Trial Judge has no discretion to exclude such convictions).

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Wiman, 77 F.3d 981 (7th Cir. 1996) (a misdemeanor conviction for driving under the influence of alcohol is not admissible under Rule 609(a)(2) because it does not involve dishonesty or false statements, and it is not admissible under Rule 609(a)(1) because it is not a felony).

(n3)Footnote 3. See United States v. Tse, 375 F.3d 148 (1st Cir. 2004) , for an extensive discussion of the different balancing tests in Rule 609(a)(1).

(n4)Footnote 4. See Green v. Bock Laundry Mach. Co., 490 U.S. 504 (1989) (noting that the pre-amendment rule could not be applied as written, because it provided for automatic admissibility of all crimes of plaintiffs and their witnesses, but provided for possible exclusion of crimes of civil defendants and their witnesses pursuant to judicial balancing; there was no rational basis for this distinction in civil cases).

(n5)Footnote 5. See Rule 609 Advisory Comm. Note to 1990 Amendment. See also Green v. Bock Laundry Mach. Co., 490 U.S. 504 (1989) (Trial Court has no discretion to exclude convictions falling within Rule 609(a)(2)).

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., United States v. Tracy, 36 F.3d 187 (1st Cir. 1994) (conviction for uttering a false prescription is automatically admissible to impeach a witness under Rule 609(a)(2)); United States v. Noble, 754 F.2d 1324 (7th Cir. 1985) (counterfeiting conviction is automatically admissible under Rule 609(a)(2)); United States v. Hans, 738 F.2d 88 (3d Cir. 1984) (conviction for knowingly transporting forged securities is automatically admissible to impeach the witness).

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Cameron, 814 F.2d 403, 407 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Johnson, 388 F.3d 96 (3d Cir. 2004) (conviction for purse snatching was improperly admitted under Rule 609(a)(2)).

(n9)Footnote 9. Walker v. Horn, 385 F.3d 321 (3d Cir. 2004) (robbery convictions improperly admitted under Rule 609(a)(2) as they did not involve "communicative or expressive dishonesty").

(n10)Footnote 10. (Emphasis added.) The Brackeen Court noted that the majority of Circuits have held that theft and robbery crimes are not per se admitted under Rule 609(a)(2). See, e.g., United States v. Foster, 227 F.3d 1096 (9th Cir. 2000) (crime of receiving stolen property does not involved dishonesty or false statement within the meaning of Rule 609(a)(2) because it "can be accomplished without any misrepresention or deceit on the part of either the giver or the receiver"); United States v. Seamster, 568 F.2d 188 (10th Cir. 1978) (Rule 609(a)(2) covers only those convictions "involving some element of deceit, untruthfulness or falsification which would tend to show that a witness would be likely to testify untruthfully"); Coursey v. Broadhurst, 888 F.2d 338 (5th Cir. 1989) (a cattle theft conviction is not automatically admissible); United States v. Grandmont, 680 F.2d 867 (1st Cir. 1982) (robbery and purse snatching are not automatically dishonesty crimes); United States v. Ashley, 569 F.2d 975 (5th Cir. 1978) (conviction for shoplifting does not involve dishonesty within the meaning of Rule 609(a)(2)); United States v. Scisney, 885 F.2d 325 (6th Cir. 1989) (same). But see United States v. Brown, 603 F.2d 1022 (1st Cir. 1979) (burglary and petit larceny are automatically admitted under Rule 609(a)(2)).

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Bagley, 772 F.2d 482 (9th Cir. 1985) (the defendant's prior bank robbery convictions could not be admitted under Rule 609(a)(1) in a bank robbery prosecution; the government had little need for the impeachment evidence, because it had two forgery convictions available for impeachment use); United States v. Jackson, 405 F. Supp. 938 (E.D.N.Y. 1975) (the defendant's prior assault conviction was held inadmissible to impeach him in a bank robbery prosecution).

(n12)Footnote 12. See also the discussion by Judge Posner in Altobello v. Borden Confectionary Prods., Inc., 872 F.2d 215 (7th Cir. 1989) , in which he concludes that Rule 609(a)(2) must be construed narrowly to avoid swallowing Rule 609(a)(1) and its balancing test.

(n13)Footnote 13. See also United States v. Cameron, 814 F.2d 403 (7th Cir. 1987) , where the Court, construing Rule 609(a)(2) narrowly, held that a conviction for carrying a switchblade was not automatically admissible. The defendant, who wished to impeach a prosecution witness, argued that carrying a switchblade was a crime involving dishonesty because a switchblade is made so as not to appear to be a weapon though in fact it is. The Court rejected this argument on the ground that the only element of the crime was actual possession; thus the prosecution did not have to prove that the witness had an intent to deceive when he carried the switchblade.

(n14)Footnote 14. See also United States v. Wilson, 985 F.2d 348 (7th Cir. 1993) (placing questionable reliance on cases holding that prior convictions for filing false tax returns are automatically admissible).

(n15)Footnote 15. The Supreme Court granted certiorari in Cree to resolve this conflict in the federal cases, but then, almost immediately, certiorari was dismissed. See 506 U.S. 1017 (1992) . See also United States v. Mejia-Alarcon, 995 F.2d 982 (10th Cir. 1993) (conviction for illegal acquisition of food stamps was not automatically admissible under Rule 609(a)(2); that Rule should be narrowly construed, to apply only to those crimes "characterized by an element of deceit or deliberate interference with the truth"; the Court concluded that the crime of illegal acquisition of food stamps does not include an element of untruthfulness, though it noted that a different question may have been presented had the defendant been convicted of unlawful negotiation of food stamps).

(n16)Footnote 16. See also United States v. Farmer, 923 F.2d 1557 (11th Cir. 1991) (misdemeanor theft conviction is not automatically admissible under Rule 609(a)(2), and not admissible under the terms of Rule 609(a)(1)).

(n17)Footnote 17. A broad view of Rule 609(a)(2) would cover drug crimes, but consistently with our view, most Courts have held that drug crimes do not on their face involve dishonesty or false statement within the meaning of the Rule. See, e.g., United States v. Begay, 144 F.3d 1336 (10th Cir. 1998) (drug convictions evaluated under Rule 609(a)(1)); Gust v. Jones, 162 F.3d 587 (10th Cir. 1998) (conviction for drug smuggling was not admissible under Rule 609(a)(2) because that crime did not "per se, involve dishonesty or false statement").

(n18)Footnote 18. United States v. Fearwell, 595 F.2d 771 (D.C. Cir. 1978) .

(n19)Footnote 19. See, e.g., United States v. Foster, 227 F.3d 1096 (9th Cir. 2000) (conviction for receipt of stolen property is not admitted automatically under Rule 609(a)(2) because the crime can be accomplished without any misrepresentation or deceit; however, the conviction can be admitted under Rule 609(a)(2) if the Trial Court finds that the crime "was actually committed by fraudulent or deceitful means"); United States v. Dunson, 142 F.3d 1213 (10th Cir. 1998) (shoplifting conviction is not the type of crime that is automatically admitted under Rule 609(a)(2); however, the Trial Judge can, upon request, go behind the elements of the crime to determine whether the particular conviction rested on facts establishing dishonesty or false statement); United States v. Yeo, 739 F.2d 385 (8th Cir. 1984) (the proponent has the burden of producing facts demonstrating that the particular conviction involved fraud or deceit); United States v. Whitman, 665 F.2d 313 (10th Cir. 1981) (larceny offense that was actually committed by fraudulent or deceitful means is automatically admitted under Rule 609(a)(2)).

(n20)Footnote 20. See United States v. Albers, 93 F.3d 1469 (10th Cir. 1996) (the Trial Judge erred in permitting the prosecutor to bring out the underlying facts of a prior conviction for grand theft: "The defendant was entitled to the protection of the rule that only the prior conviction, its general nature, and punishment of felony range were fair game for testing the defendant's credibility"); United States v. Pandozzi, 878 F.2d 1526 (1st Cir. 1989) (the underlying factual details of a conviction cannot be inquired into on cross-examination); Campbell v. Greer, 831 F.2d 700 (7th Cir. 1987) (when the witness was impeached with a rape conviction, it was error to inquire where a prior rape occurred); United States v. Beckett, 706 F.2d 519 (5th Cir. 1983) (a testifying witness is required "to give answers only as to whether he has been previously convicted of a felony, as to what the felony was, and as to when the conviction was had"); Radtke v. Cessna Aircraft Co., 707 F.2d 999 (8th Cir. 1983) (impeachment with a prior conviction is limited to the recitation of the conviction itself).

(n21)Footnote 21. Gora v. Costa, 971 F.2d 1325, 1330 (7th Cir. 1992) ("it is error to elicit any further information for impeachment purposes").

(n22)Footnote 22. See, e.g., United States v. Hurst, 951 F.2d 1490 (6th Cir. 1991) (details of a conviction to which the defendant entered a guilty plea were not admissible under Rule 609, but they were the proper subject of inquiry under Rules 403 and 608 where they were probative of the defendant's character for untruthfulness and not unduly prejudicial).

It is also possible that the details underlying a conviction may be admissible to rebut the witness' attempt to explain away the conviction. See, e.g., United States v. Valencia, 61 F.3d 616 (8th Cir. 1995) (it was permissible to cross-examine on the details of a conviction where the defendant, on direct examination, attempted to minimize his guilt as to that conviction). The Valencia Court concluded that the government properly cross-examined the defendant in order to clarify the facts as to the prior conviction and thereby impeach his direct testimony. See also United States v. Perry, 857 F.2d 1346 (9th Cir. 1988) (the defendant opened the door to an inquiry into details of a prior misdemeanor convictions for embezzlement and false pretenses by attempting to explain them away and offering his own version of the underlying facts).

(n23)Footnote 23. See, e.g., Elcock v. Kmart Corp., 233 F.3d 734 (3d Cir. 2000) : The plaintiff's expert witness was impeached with a prior conviction for embezzlement. The Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of the amount of money the witness embezzled and the fact that the conviction resulted from a longstanding scheme. The amount of money embezzled and the length of the scheme carry probative value independent of the conviction itself, because a "juror could rationally conclude that one who embezzles a million dollars from the Government over a long period of time has a worse character for veracity than a person who steals five dollars once." However, there was no error in excluding these details because the chief probative force of the conviction was that the witness committed crimes of dishonesty, and this evidence came out during trial: "Filling in the details surrounding these crimes would doubtless have taken a fair bit of trial time, and would have been cumulative insofar as doing so would only result in proving the same points--i.e., that [the witness] has a character for being untruthful and his expert opinions should not be believed.."

(n24)Footnote 24. See, e.g., United States v. Sanders, 964 F.2d 295 (4th Cir. 1992) (error in an assault prosecution to impeach the defendant with his prior conviction for assault).

(n25)Footnote 25. See, e.g., United States v. Causey, 9 F.3d 1341 (7th Cir. 1993) (admitting the defendant's prior conviction for a similar offense was not error, where the defendant's credibility was critical to the jury's determination).

(n26)Footnote 26. See, e.g., United States v. Preston, 608 F.2d 626 (5th Cir. 1979) (remanding in the absence of an on-the-record determination); United States v. Moore, 917 F.2d 215 (6th Cir. 1990) (Trial Court should hold a hearing to determine the admissibility of prior convictions offered under Rule 609(a)(1), and should make an explicit finding as to whether the probative value outweighs the prejudicial effect).

(n27)Footnote 27. See generally United States v. Lipscomb, 702 F.2d 1049 (D.C. Cir. 1983) , and United States v. Givens, 767 F.2d 574 (9th Cir. 1985) , for excellent discussions of these factors. See also United States v. Toney, 27 F.3d 1245 (7th Cir. 1994) (considering the similarity between the prior conviction and the crime charged).

(n28)Footnote 28. Federal Judicial Center, Pattern Criminal Jury Instruction 41 (1987).

(n29)Footnote 29. Federal Judicial Center Pattern Criminal Jury Instruction 30 (1987). See also United States v. Mitchell, 1 F.3d 235 (4th Cir. 1993) (error to introduce a prior conviction of the defendant's brother, who testified for the defendant, where the Trial Court failed to instruct the jury that it was to be considered only to impeach the brother).

(n30)Footnote 30. See, e.g., United States v. Colletti, 984 F.2d 1339 (3d Cir. 1992) (conviction more than 20 years old; Trial Court did not err in excluding it where the defendants failed to give advance notice to the prosecution). Compare United States v. Pritchard, 973 F.2d 905 (11th Cir. 1992) (the pretrial notice requirement was excused where the Trial Court offered the defendant a continuance, and the defendant declined).

(n31)Footnote 31. See, e.g., United States v. Payton, 159 F.3d 49 (2d Cir. 1998) (no abuse of discretion in admitting 13-year-old convictions for false statement and larceny; the witness' testimony was "critical" and the impeachment value of the convictions was "substantial").

(n32)Footnote 32. See, e.g., United States v. Privett, 68 F.3d 101 (5th Cir. 1995) (in a felon-firearm case, the Trial Judge erred (harmlessly) in admitting evidence of four felony convictions of the defendant, each of which was more than ten years old; the defendant's prior convictions for burglary, theft, escape, and aggravated robbery did little to rebut the direct examination, and erroneously demonstrated a criminal predisposition; their probative value as to credibility did not substantially outweigh the risk of prejudice to the defendant); United States v. Hamilton, 48 F.3d 149 (5th Cir. 1995) (a prosecution witness' old convictions for armed robbery and theft by check were properly excluded: "[t]he general rule is inadmissibility" for convictions offered under Rule 609(b)).

(n33)Footnote 33. See also United States v. Norton, 26 F.3d 240 (1st Cir. 1994) (in a felon-firearm prosecution, the Trial Court properly allowed the government to introduce the defendant's prior firearm conviction; the defendant had testified on direct that he had never possessed a gun in his life, so the prior conviction provided proper contradiction).

(n34)Footnote 34. The evidence is admissible only in a criminal case. "The trial court has no discretion to admit such evidence in a civil proceeding." Powell v. Levit, 640 F.2d 239 (9th Cir. 1981) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 609 RULE 609

3-609 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 609.03

609.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Rule609(a) -- General Rule

[a] Rule 609(a) -- Arrests

United States v. Wilson, 244 F.3d 1208 (10th Cir. 2001) : Although the Court affirmed cocaine-related convictions, it found that it was error (but harmless) to permit cross-examination of one defendant about his past drug-related arrests. Questions about arrests do not qualify under Rule 609; "Rule 609 was enacted to curb the potentially prejudicial use of conviction evidence, and arrests receive more protection than convictions."

[b] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect

[i] Rule 609(a) -- Accused-Witness

[A] Rule 609(a) -- Error To Admit

United States v. Sanders, 964 F.2d 295 (4th Cir. 1992) : Reversing a conviction for assault with a dangerous weapon in a prison, the Court held it was error to admit evidence of the defendant's prior convictions for inmate assault and contraband possession. Even had there been an explicit balancing inquiry before admitting the evidence, it would have been inadmissible under the Rule because of the high likelihood of prejudice that accompanies the admission of such similar prior convictions.

United States v. Martinez, 555 F.2d 1273 (5th Cir. 1977) : The Court reversed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine on the ground that the defendant was improperly impeached with evidence of an aiding and abetting conviction arising out of the same narcotics transaction. The prior conviction was of little value in assessing the credibility of a defendant who had his first brush with the law in connection with the disputed transaction, and, said the Court, "we can hardly conceive of a more prejudicial prior conviction."

United States v. Bagley, 772 F.2d 482 (9th Cir. 1985) : The Court found an abuse of discretion, although it was harmless, in the admission of a defendant's prior robbery convictions in a bank robbery prosecution. The Court noted that the defendant had not sought to misrepresent his character and stated that "[t]o allow evidence of a prior conviction for the very crime for which a defendant is on trial may be devastating in its potential impact on a jury." Also, the government had little need for this particular evidence, since it had two forgery convictions available for impeachment use. In United States v. Larsen, n1 the Court observed that it was plain (but not reversible) error to permit the government to use two child molesting convictions to impeach a defendant charged with uttering counterfeit bills, since they were of minimal value with respect to credibility.

[B] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Accused-Witness -- Factors To Be Considered

United States v. Brito, 427 F.3d 53 (1st Cir. 2005) : In a prosecution for possession of a firearm by an illegal alien, the Court found no error when the defendant was impeached with three drug-trafficking convictions. The Court noted that prior drug-trafficking crimes "are generally viewed as having some bearing on veracity." The convictions were not very prejudicial because the offenses underlying the convictions were not similar to the offense charged. And because "the jury had to decide whether to believe the appellant or the police officers[, t]he salience of the credibility issue weighs in favor of admitting the convictions."

United States v. Hawley, 554 F.2d 50 (2d Cir. 1977) : The defendant in a bank robbery trial was impeached with evidence that he had been convicted of another offense committed subsequently. Affirming, the Court said the Trial Judge had properly exercised his discretion in this bench trial. Among the factors the Court emphasized should be considered in ruling on a Rule 609 balancing question are: the nature of the crime, the time of conviction, the similarity between the past crime and charged crime, and the importance of the testimony of the witness and the centrality of the credibility issue.

United States v. Givens, 767 F.2d 574 (9th Cir. 1985) : The Court identified the five factors that must be balanced under Rule 609(a)(1) as: the impeachment value of the prior crime; the point in time of the conviction and the witness' subsequent history; the similarity between the past crime and the current charge; the importance of the defendant's testimony; and the centrality of the credibility issue. It upheld the admission of prior convictions for robbery, attempted robbery, and assault with a deadly weapon on a police officer in this prosecution for armed postal robbery.

[C] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Accused-Witness -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Lattner, 385 F.3d 947 (6th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a cocaine conviction, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendant's two prior felony drug convictions were admitted to impeach him. The probative value of the convictions was high because credibility was crucial, and the prejudicial effect was minimal in light of the introduction under Rule 404(b) of the defendant's prior involvement in drug transactions.

United States v. Gant, 396 F.3d 906 (7th Cir. 2005) : In a felon firearm possession trial, three government witnesses testified that the defendant had a gun and used it to strike his daughter and her boyfriend. The defendant conceded striking the two but claimed that he had a lead pipe rather than a gun. The Court held that evidence that the defendant had been convicted for possession of a controlled substance with intent to distribute had been properly admitted to impeach, reasoning that the defendant's credibility was important. We question the reasoning. Since the charge was that the defendant was a convicted felon in possession of a gun, the jury already knew that the defendant had a record. Moreover, the conviction was not very probative of the defendant's credibility, because the crime was not necessarily one in which veracity was involved. At the same time, the ruling might have prejudiced the defendant in view of the frequent connection between drugs and guns. It also must be remembered that the balancing test of Rule 609(a)(1) favors defendants: the probative value as to credibility must outweigh the prejudice to the defendant. In United States v. Montgomery, 390 F.3d 1013 (7th Cir. 2004) , the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession and upheld the admission for impeachment of the defendant's prior felony convictions for drug crimes, obstruction of justice, aggravated sexual abuse, and failure to register as a sex offender. The Trial Judge engaged in a careful balancing test, as articulated in United States v. Mahone, 537 F.22d 922 (7th Cir. 1976), and had properly concluded that the importance of the defendant's testimony and the centrality of his credibility were factors that turned the balancing toward admission of the evidence.

[D] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Accused-Witness -- Prior Convictions in the Same Case

United States v. Joost, 133 F.3d 125 (1st Cir. 1998) : The defendant was convicted under the Hobbs Act for conspiracy to rob an armored truck and for felon firearm possession in the same incident, but the firearms conviction was reversed for failure to give an entrapment charge. His motion in limine to exclude evidence of the Hobbs Act conviction on retrial of the firearms charge was denied, and the objection was not renewed at trial. The Court held that error was not preserved, but in any event there was no abuse of discretion in the finding that the probative value of the conviction for impeachment purposes was not substantially outweighed by its potentially prejudicial effect.

United States v. Martinez, 555 F.2d 1273 (5th Cir. 1977) : The Court reversed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine on the ground that the defendant was improperly impeached with evidence of an aiding and abetting conviction arising out of the same narcotics transaction. The prior conviction was of little value in assessing the credibility of a defendant who had his first brush with the law in connection with the disputed transaction, and, said the Court, "we can hardly conceive of a more prejudicial prior conviction."

United States v. Kimberlin, 805 F.2d 210 (7th Cir. 1986) : The defendant had been convicted on some counts of an indictment and a mistrial declared as to other counts. The Court held that it was proper for the government to use the convictions to impeach the defendant when he testified at the retrial of the latter counts.

United States v. Moore, 735 F.2d 289 (8th Cir. 1984) : In a prosecution for illegal firearms possession by a felon, the Court upheld impeachment of the defendant with convictions for drug offenses in connection with charged incident.

[E] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Accused-Witness -- Procedure

United States v. Lipscomb, 702 F.2d 1049 (D.C. Cir. 1983) (en banc): Affirming a heroin distribution conviction, the Court wrote that "(1) all convictions that meet the Rule 609(a)(1) threshold are at least somewhat probative of credibility; (2) the trial court has discretion to decide how much background information, if any, it needs to perform Rule 609(a)(1)'s balance of probativeness against prejudice to the defendant." It found no abuse of discretion in the Trial Judge's rulings that he did not need to hear background information concerning an eight-year-old robbery conviction in order to determine admissibility and that the defendant could be impeached with the conviction.

United States v. Moore, 917 F.2d 215 (6th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed armed robbery convictions, holding that a defendant-witness was properly impeached with a 1979 armed robbery conviction. When the government advised that it wished to use several prior convictions, the Trial Judge held a hearing outside the jury's presence and made a specific finding that the probative value on the witness' credibility of only the 1979 conviction outweighed any prejudicial effect.

[F] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Accused-Witness -- Similarity Between Convictions and Crimes Charged

United States v. Tracy, 36 F.3d 187 (1st Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for felon firearm possession, which resulted from the defendant's armed robbery of a grocery store, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of convictions for assault and stolen firearms to impeach the defendant. Since the defendant pleaded not guilty by reason of insanity, a central issue was whether he could appreciate the wrongfulness of his conduct, and the prior convictions were relevant to show "that Tracy had reason to know that his conduct was improper." In United States v. Beltran, n2 the Court upheld marijuana convictions, finding no error in the refusal to permit one defendant to impeach other defendants with evidence of prior drug-smuggling convictions. In United States v. George, n3 the Court upheld the admission of a prior conviction for a similar crime that was used to impeach the defendant in a drug prosecution.

United States v. Sanders, 964 F.2d 295 (4th Cir. 1992) : Reversing a conviction for assault with a dangerous weapon in a prison, the Court held it was error to admit evidence of the defendant's prior convictions for inmate assault and contraband possession. Even had there been an explicit balancing inquiry before admitting the evidence, it would have been inadmissible under the Rule because of the high likelihood of prejudice that accompanies the admission of such similar prior convictions. Compare United States v. Wilson n4(a rape defendant was properly impeached with a German rape conviction).

United States v. Shaw, 701 F.2d 367 (5th Cir. 1983) : Upholding convictions for murder and other crimes, the Court found no error when the defendant was impeached with prior convictions for rape and assault with intent to rape. The Trial Judge had ruled before trial that the jury could be told that the defendant had been convicted of a crime punishable by more than a year in prison and ultimately decided that it would be less prejudicial to tell the jury the nature of the crimes than to permit speculation as to whether the prior crimes might have been murders. We question whether the prior convictions should have been used at all, since they had little to do with credibility and the heinous nature of the offenses might well have prejudiced the jury.

United States v. Hernandez, 106 F.3d 737 (7th Cir. 1997) : The Court held in a prosecution for kidnapping, which was related to a drug transaction, that there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the defendant to be impeached by a five-year-old conviction for possession of cocaine and marijuana. In United States v. Toney, 27 F.3d 1245 (7th Cir. 1994) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting cross-examination of the defendant about a 1986 burglary conviction and a 1983 aggravated battery conviction in his trial for felon firearm possession. Although there was some similarity between the latter conviction and the facts surrounding the charge, there was no similarity with the burglary conviction, so the prejudice to the defendant was minimal. Furthermore, the defendant's credibility was crucial because his coercion defense to the possession charge turned on his state of mind, about which he testified.

United States v. Booker, 706 F.2d 860 (8th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession. The defendant offered to stipulate to a prior felony, but the Court held that the government was entitled to prove multiple felony convictions for firearms offenses as impeachment evidence under Rule 609 when the defendant testified. Despite the Supreme Court's suggestion in Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172 (1997) (see the Editorial Explanatory Comments, §§ 403.02[6]-[11], 404.02[16]), that the prosecution need not accept a stipulation unless the prior offenses are offered only to establish status, we believe that the similarity of the offenses presents a high probability that the jury would use the evidence substantively (which is impermissible under Rule 404) rather than just for impeachment, so it is difficult to see how the probative value of prior convictions for firearms offenses outweighs their possible prejudicial effect when the offense charged is another firearms crime. See also United States v. Moore n5(in a felon firearm possession case, the Court upheld impeachment of the defendant with convictions for drug offenses in connection with the charged incident). In United States v. Levine, n6 the Court affirmed a conviction for mail theft, finding no error in a pretrial decision to admit a 1978 conviction for possession of stolen mail and a 1975 conviction for grand larceny as impeachment evidence if the defendant chose to testify.

United States v. Alexander, 48 F.3d 1477 (9th Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed bank robbery convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of a defendant's prior robbery conviction to impeach him. The Court noted that its decision in United States v. Brackeen n7 held only that bank robbery is not a crime of dishonesty automatically admissible to impeach under Rule 609(a)(2); it did not foreclose admission of a prior robbery conviction under the balancing test of Rule 609(a)(1). In this case, the balance of the five factors identified in United States v. Givens n8 favored admissibility, even though the similarity between the charged bank robbery and the prior residential robbery weighed in favor of exclusion. In United States v. Wallace, n9 the Court, after deciding to remand a heroin case on a Jencks Act issue, held that the defendant's prior heroin conviction should have been excluded. The government had evidence of a prior perjury conviction, and there was a clear risk that the heroin conviction would be misused as character evidence. In United States v. Browne, n10 the Court affirmed an armed bank robbery conviction, holding that the government was properly permitted to impeach the defendant with evidence of a prior bank robbery conviction. Although the similarity of the prior conviction and the crime charged "did counsel against admissibility," the Court found that "the importance of the defendant's testimony and the centrality of his credibility to the defense" justified admission of the evidence. The Court also emphasized that the timing of the two crimes (less than a year elapsed between his release from jail on the earlier conviction and the charged offense) and the defendant's testimony about his war record and character left the government with a strong need for fair impeachment.

United States v. Smith, 10 F.3d 724 (10th Cir. 1993) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's prior robbery and burglary convictions after he testified in a bank robbery prosecution, as the evidence was probative on the credibility of his duress defense and the jury was instructed on the limited purpose for which it was admitted. In United States v. Short, 947 F.2d 1445 (10th Cir. 1991) , the Trial Judge ruled in limine that the defendant, charged with manufacturing amphetamine, could be impeached with a prior felony conviction but that the government could not bring out that the conviction was for drug offenses. On cross-examination, the prosecutor nevertheless asked about the prior drug conviction. While not condoning the prosecutor's possible mistake in not seeking reversal or clarification of the ruling before asking the question, the Court held that refusal to grant a mistrial was harmless error in the circumstances.

United States v. Harris, 720 F.2d 1259 (11th Cir. 1983) : In a drug prosecution, the Trial Judge decided that if the defendant chose to testify, a prior conviction on drug charges would be admitted under Rule 404(b) to prove intent and also under Rule 609(a). The Court affirmed, noting that not only would the conviction have been admissible under Rule 404 whether or not the defendant testified, but also that the defendant vigorously used evidence of prior convictions to attack government witnesses.

[ii] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Civil Cases

[A] Rule 609(a) -- Civil Rights Cases

Abshire v. Walls, 830 F.2d 1277 (4th Cir. 1987) : Affirming a judgment for a pretrial detainee against officers who strip-searched him, the Court held evidence of the plaintiff's prior convictions was properly excluded on the ground that their probative value was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice.

Doe v. Sullivan County, Tenn., 956 F.2d 545 (6th Cir. 1992) : In a prisoner's civil rights action, the Trial Judge admitted evidence that a defendant-witness had been convicted of a felony but precluded questioning about the number and details of the witness' convictions. Without mentioning the 1990 amendment to the Rule, the Court concluded that the plaintiff had a right to introduce the nature of the crime, the number of counts, and the date of disposition of the witness' convictions; the error was harmless, however. In Donald v. Wilson, n11 the Court affirmed judgments for officers sued in a civil rights case by a prisoner, holding that there was no error under Rule 403 in admitting evidence of the plaintiff's past conviction for rape. In Murr v. Stinson, n12 the Court affirmed a civil rights judgment for a plaintiff who sued a sheriff, holding that the sheriff was properly impeached with cocaine convictions, since the recent convictions were more probative than prejudicial.

Gora v. Costa, 971 F.2d 1325 (7th Cir. 1992) : In a civil rights action brought against police officers, the defense brought out that one of the plaintiff-witnesses had been convicted of burglary and was currently incarcerated. The Court held that going beyond the crime charged, the date, and the disposition was ordinarily improper impeachment under the Rule, but that admitting evidence of current incarceration was not an abuse of discretion in this case because the witness and his family, in claiming damages for emotional distress, had already indicated a negative perception of the law enforcement community and this evidence was relevant to the cause of that negative perception.

Jones v. TEK Indus., Inc., 319 F.3d 355 (8th Cir. 2003) : Inmates sued for alleged religious discrimination by a private corporation that ran a manufacturing facility in the prison. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when defense counsel was permitted to ask the plaintiff to state the names of the crimes of which they had been convicted. Since " 'most jurors probably do not understand the range of offense connoted by the term felony, ... [they may] need to know the specific crime in order to evaluate its effect on credibility.' " Prejudicial effect was minimized by omitting any details of the crimes and the victims and by instructions limiting use of the evidence to credibility. In an arrestee's civil rights action against police officers, Jones v. Board of Police Comm'rs, n13 the Court, applying Rule 403, found no unfair prejudice in admission of convictions for robbery, rape, and forcible sodomy in a case "in which the jury had to choose between conflicting versions of the same occurrence." In an inmate's civil rights case, Lewis v. Sheriff's Dep't, n14 the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants, finding that prior convictions used to impeach the plaintiff were not unduly prejudicial. In Jones v. Collier, n15 the Court found that a civil rights plaintiff had waived his objection to the use of prior convictions for impeachment. It observed, however, that when prior convictions do not involve dishonesty, "the trial court must take particular care to balance the probative value of the evidence against its prejudicial effect." The Court added that when credibility is "all important, the trial court will not abuse its discretion by admitting such evidence."

[B] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Civil Cases -- Other Cases

Green v. Bock Laundry Mach. Co., 490 U.S. 504 (1989) : This decision, which held there was no balancing test applicable to witnesses in civil cases (and government witnesses in criminal cases), was negated by the 1990 amendment to the Rule, which made evidence of convictions of those witnesses subject to Rule 403's general balancing test (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 609.02[2]).

Shows v. M/V Red Eagle, 695 F.2d 114 (5th Cir. 1983) : The Court reversed a Jones Act judgment for the defendants, finding that evidence of the plaintiff's conviction for armed robbery and his prison sentence was unduly prejudicial under Rule 403. The Court rejected a claim that the evidence was properly used to demonstrate inconsistencies in the plaintiff's testimony.

Radtke v. Cessna Aircraft Co., 707 F.2d 999 (8th Cir. 1983) : In a product liability case against an airplane manufacturer, the Court held that a prior conviction was properly admitted to impeach the pilot of the aircraft in which the plaintiff passengers were riding when they were injured. Although the Judge failed to make an explicit balancing ruling, the Court found that he had examined in limine all relevant factors. The Court approved the manufacturer's reading to the jury a portion of the judgment of conviction, which involved several drug counts, since the pilot testified about the convictions on cross-examination in an ambiguous and incomplete manner. The Court said that admission of the judgment "near the end of Cessna's case-in-chief might not be acceptable in most cases," but it was not error in a case in which the impeached witness testified by videotape deposition and Cessna was not in a position to offer the impeachment evidence except as part of its own case.

Wilson v. Union Pac. R.R., 56 F.3d 1226 (10th Cir. 1995) : The Court held there was no error in precluding the defendant employer in a FELA case from introducing evidence of the plaintiff's prior conviction for drug possession during the liability phase of the trial, as the crime was not highly relevant to the issue of veracity and it was likely to arouse jury sentiment against the plaintiff. The Court also affirmed exclusion of the evidence during the damages phase, since admission would have resulted in a needless proliferation of collateral issues related to the cause of his termination from the job and his subsequent employability.

[iii] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Criminal Defense Witnesses

United States v. Fawley, 137 F.3d 458 (7th Cir. 1998) : The defendant was charged with perjury after he denied before a grand jury any knowledge that his employer was harboring illegal aliens. At trial the defense called the employer as a witness and elicited that he had been convicted of a felony; during cross-examination the government brought out that the employer had been convicted of harboring illegal aliens, as well as the names of the aliens (who also happened to be witnesses in the perjury trial). The Court found no abuse of discretion, since it had previously held that "when questions asked on direct examination of a witness concerning prior crimes have been perfunctory in nature, a prosecutor is entitled to amplify them," and the balancing test applicable to witnesses other than the accused calls for admission unless the probative value of the prior conviction for impeachment is substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect. In this case, the limited amplification that was permitted and the instructions to the jury avoided substantial prejudice.

[iv] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Different Balancing Tests

United States v. Tse, 375 F.3d 148 (1st Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a conviction for distributing cocaine, but held it was error as a matter of law to use the same balancing test in determining the admissibility of prior convictions of the defendant and a confidential informant who was the key government witness. Both the defendant and the informant had prior convictions for assault and battery. The Court observed that the 1990 amendment to Rule 609 created more protection for the accused than for other witnesses: "The court may exclude a prior conviction of the accused, offered for the purpose of impeachment, if the prejudicial effect of the conviction merely outweighs its probative value; the court may exclude a conviction of a government witness, offered by the accused for the purpose of impeachment, only if the danger of unfair prejudice from the conviction substantially outweighs its probative value."

[v] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Prosecution Witnesses

United States v. Gray, 410 F.3d 338 (7th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for drug trafficking offenses, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendants were precluded from impeaching a cooperating coconspirator with evidence of a 12-year-old perjury conviction. The Court reasoned that the defendants had been permitted to impeach the witness with four serious felony convictions, and the perjury had occurred on a driver's license application rather than in testimony. Surprisingly, the Court referred to the conviction as subject to a balancing test under Rule 609(a), but perjury is the classic dishonesty offense and under Rule 609(a)(2) is not subject to balancing. The Court also cited Rule 609(b), which also has a (different) balancing test and to which dishonesty convictions are subject, but the opinion does not make clear which balancing test was being applied. In United States v. Galati, 230 F.3d 254 (7th Cir. 2000) , the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendant in a bank robbery case was precluded from impeaching a witness with a drug possession conviction. The witness was a store clerk who testified she saw the defendant trying on a baseball cap identical to that worn by the perpetrator, her testimony came five years after she served her sentence of one year probation, nothing about the possession conviction actually suggested that she would be dishonest or deceitful, and the likelihood of unfair prejudice was great. In United States v. Cavender, n16 a prosecution for conspiring to possess and distribute cocaine base, the principal government witness testified on direct and reiterated on cross that he had not used, sold, or dealt drugs when he previously lived in Chicago. The defense was not permitted to introduce evidence that the witness had been convicted of a felony in Chicago for possession of a controlled substance. Reversing, the Court held it was error under Rule 609(a)(1) to exclude the evidence of the conviction. Under the applicable Rule 403 balancing test, the evidence was highly probative in contradicting the witness' testimony and would not be cumulative or a waste of time.

United States v. Rowe, 92 F.3d 928 (9th Cir. 1996) : The Court held in a carjacking prosecution that there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the defendant from impeaching the victim with her prior conviction for theft, as the jury might improperly infer that the victim had stolen the car she was driving on the night of the carjacking. The Court had serious reservations about limiting cross-examination of the victim as to a recent drug possession conviction, but the error, if any, was harmless.

United States v. Howell, 285 F.3d 1263 (10th Cir. 2002) : The Court reversed a correctional officer's conviction for depriving inmates of civil rights, finding it was an abuse of discretion to exclude evidence of numerous prosecution witnesses' prior convictions without conducting a balancing analysis under Rule 403. The Judge had made a blanket ruling that only the fact and date of the witnesses' felony convictions could be admitted, but the Court noted that ordinarily evidence of the nature of a witness' felony convictions and their number should be admitted. In United States v. Begay, 144 F.3d 1336 (10th Cir. 1998) , the Court affirmed a conviction for robbery, finding no error when prior convictions of two prosecution witnesses were excluded. The drug conviction of one of the witnesses was not very relevant to credibility, "and is potentially prejudicial in arousing sentiment against a witness." The rape and burglary convictions of the other witness were also of minimal probative value as to credibility, especially since they were almost ten years old.

United States v. Burston, 159 F.3d 1328 (11th Cir. 1998) : The defendant in a postal and bank robbery case sought to impeach a witness with evidence of his four felony convictions -- two for theft, one for aggravated assault, and one for armed robbery. However, he was permitted to bring out only that the witness had "a felony conviction." The Court held that precluding evidence of the nature and number of the witness' convictions was an abuse of discretion, albeit harmless error. Despite the Trial Judge's apparent belief that those facts lacked probative value, the implicit assumption of Rule 609(a) is that prior convictions have probative value, and that probative value is likely to vary depending on the number and type of convictions. And here there was no finding, or basis for a finding, that the evidence would have created a substantial danger of prejudice, confusion, or delay.

[vi] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Statement of Reasons

United States v. Oakes, 565 F.2d 170 (1st Cir. 1977) : Affirming a firearms conviction, the Court indicated that the Trial Judge's statement of reasons for his ruling balancing prejudicial effect and probative value aided appellate review.

United States v. Gray, 852 F.2d 136 (4th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed convictions for extortion and related crimes, observing that, although the Trial Judge might have offered a more detailed analysis to support the introduction of a prior conviction to impeach the defendant, the defendant did not object to the explanation given, so the Judge was not on notice that the defendant desired a more detailed finding.

United States v. Turner, 960 F.2d 461 (5th Cir. 1992) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when convictions for sexual abuse, burglary, and weapons possession were admitted in the defendant's trial for threatening Judges. The Trial Judge made a finding on the record concluding that the prejudice of the convictions did not outweigh their probative value and gave explicit limiting instructions restricting the convictions to impeachment and distinguishing the evidence from substantive evidence of guilt. In United States v. Preston, n17 the Court strongly suggested that Trial Judges give reasons for rulings under Rule 609(a)(1) following a hearing on the record.

United States v. Alvarez, 833 F.2d 724 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court reiterated the utility of explicit balancing, but found no error in the admission without specific findings of evidence to impeach a defendant. In United States v. Mahone, n18 the Court affirmed a conviction for possession of a sawed-off shotgun, finding no error in a ruling that the defendant could be impeached with a prior conviction for robbery if he chose to testify. The Court urged Trial Judges to make explicit findings that the prejudicial effect of Rule 609 evidence to the defendant will be outweighed by its probative value after a hearing on the record.

United States v. Walker, 817 F.2d 461 (8th Cir. 1987) : Affirming an assault conviction, the Court indicated that the Trial Judge's statement of reasons for admitting a prior conviction -- in this case for arson -- can be of great utility on appeal. It concluded, however, that if the failure to make such a statement was error, the error was harmless. In United States v. Key, n19 the Court affirmed a kidnapping conviction, finding no error in a ruling that the defendant's prior convictions for aiding and abetting forgery, second-degree burglary, and escape could be admitted for impeachment. The Court observed that the Trial Judge did not indicate on the record, as it preferred, that he had balanced the prejudicial effects of the convictions against their probative value, but it presumed that he must have done the balancing when he made his ruling immediately after a bench conference in which counsel for both sides argued about probative value and prejudicial effect.

United States v. Love, 746 F.2d 477 (9th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed an aggravated robbery conviction, finding no error in the admission of a prior robbery conviction to impeach the defendant. Although the Court noted that there was ambiguity about the reasons for admission of the conviction and that the Trial Judge made no finding in support of admission, it stated that there is no requirement of findings and found that any error was harmless. See also United States v. McCollum n20(the panel noted that the Court has not definitively held that Trial Judge must state reasons for admitting a conviction under Rule 609(a)(1); one Judge opined that they should be required to do so); United States v. Portillo n21(affirming an armed bank robbery conviction after the defendant was impeached by theft and armed robbery convictions, the Court said that a simple statement that probative value outweighed prejudicial effect was not adequate to support a Rule 609 ruling, but the error was harmless).

United States v. Rosales, 680 F.2d 1304 (10th Cir. 1981) : In a prosecution for assaulting a prison officer, the Court found no error in impeaching defense witnesses with crimes not involving dishonesty and said that no findings were required. The Court emphasized the utility of on-the-record balancing in United States v. Lamb, n22 as it upheld the impeachment of a defendant with armed robbery and battery convictions.

[vii] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Title or Nature of Prior Conviction

United States v. Joost, 133 F.3d 125 (1st Cir. 1998) : The defendant, charged with felon firearm possession, stipulated to his prior conviction for interfering with civil rights. After he testified in his own defense, the government was permitted to show the nature of the prior felony on cross-examination. The Court found no abuse of discretion, both because the defendant had opened the door by describing the prior felony on direct examination and had waived the error by failing to make a contemporaneous objection, and because Rule 609(a) permits evidence of a prior conviction to impeach the credibility of a testifying defendant if its probative value outweighs its prejudicial effect.

United States v. Johnson, 302 F.3d 139 (3d Cir. 2002) : Affirming drug-related convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting the government to impeach the defendant and a defense witness with evidence of prior felony convictions. The prosecutor asked the defendant only whether he had been convicted of a felony, and did not inquire as to the nature of the offense for which he was convicted. The prosecutor elicited from the defense witness that he had two felony convictions, but the Trial Judge precluded mention that they were drug offenses. The Court found that credibility of the defendant was important and that the impeachment value of the prior conviction outweighed any potential prejudice and found no plain error in the impeachment of the witness.

United States v. Smith, 131 F.3d 685 (7th Cir. 1997) : In a bank robbery case, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the titles of the defendant's prior convictions when he was impeached with them. The convictions were similar to the crime at issue and the defendant had offered to stipulate to their number if the titles were excluded, but the convictions were within the ten-year time limit and the credibility of the defendant's testimony was a central issue. Furthermore, the jury was clearly instructed to consider the prior convictions only for impeachment purposes.

United States v. Hursh, 217 F.3d 761 (9th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed marijuana convictions relating to the defendant's attempt to enter the United States in a car that contained marijuana in the gas tank. It upheld a ruling that permitted the government to impeach the defendant by showing that he was previously convicted of a felony. The ruling permitted the government to elicit only the fact that there was a felony conviction, not the specific nature of the conviction (possession of heroin). In United States v. Jimenez, 214 F.3d 1095 (9th Cir. 2000) , a prosecution for felon firearm possession, the government sought to impeach the defendant with his prior felony convictions for burglary and for assault with a deadly weapon. The Trial Judge granted the request, but ordered that the assault conviction be referred to as a "felony involving a firearm." The Court reversed the defendant's conviction because the Judge's well-meaning attempt to mitigate the prejudice to the defendant inadvertently made it worse. Altering the nature of the assault conviction from one involving a deadly weapon to one involving a firearm increased rather than decreased the likelihood that the jury would draw an impermissible inference, since the only issue in dispute was whether the defendant in fact possessed a firearm.

United States v. Howell, 285 F.3d 1263 (10th Cir. 2002) : The Court reversed a correctional officer's conviction for depriving inmates of civil rights, finding it was an abuse of discretion to exclude evidence of numerous prosecution witnesses' prior convictions without conducting a balancing analysis under Rule 403. The Judge had made a blanket ruling that only the fact and date of the witnesses' felony convictions could be admitted, but the Court noted that ordinarily evidence of the nature of a witness' felony convictions and their number should be admitted.

United States v. Burston, 159 F.3d 1328 (11th Cir. 1998) : The defendant in a postal and bank robbery case sought to impeach a witness with evidence of his four felony convictions -- two for theft, one for aggravated assault, and one for armed robbery. However, he was permitted to bring out only that the witness had "a felony conviction." The Court held that precluding evidence of the nature and number of the witness' convictions was an abuse of discretion, albeit harmless error. Despite the Trial Judge's apparent belief that those facts lacked probative value, the implicit assumption of Rule 609(a) is that prior convictions have probative value, and that probative value is likely to vary depending on the number and type of convictions. And here there was no finding, or basis for a finding, that the evidence would have created a substantial danger of prejudice, confusion, or delay.

[c] Rule 609(a) -- Corporate Convictions

Walden v. Georgia-Pacific Corp., 126 F.3d 506 (3d Cir. 1997) : Addressing a question of first impression, the Court held that "Rule 609 does not permit corporate convictions to be used to impeach the credibility of employee witnesses who were not directly connected to the underlying criminal act."

[d] Rule 609(a) -- Deferred Adjudications

United States v. Hamilton, 48 F.3d 149 (5th Cir. 1995) : Affirming convictions for postal theft and counterfeiting, the Court held there was no error in precluding impeachment of the principal government witness by evidence of a deferred adjudication on a state charge of felony theft by check. Although "conviction" status for the purpose of Rule 609 is properly determined by federal law, it was not an abuse of discretion to follow the state practice of treating a deferred adjudication as not a conviction. In this case, enough information about the deferred adjudication was admitted to adequately argue the witness' possible bias to the jury.

[e] Rule 609(a) -- Details of the Conviction

United States v. Baylor, 97 F.3d 542 (D.C. Cir. 1996) : Affirming convictions for distributing cocaine base, the Court noted that it might have been proper to permit further cross-examination of a prosecution witness regarding the circumstances of a conviction offered to impeach. The witness had attempted to explain the circumstances, his substantive testimony was central to the case, the defense was attempting to cast doubt on his credibility, and there was no risk of prejudice to the defendant in inquiring about the facts underlying the witness' conviction. Any error in limiting the cross-examination was harmless, however.

United States v. Pandozzi, 878 F.2d 1526 (1st Cir. 1989) : The defendant in a perjury prosecution argued that he should have been permitted to bring out the fact the victim had been a child when showing a principal prosecution witness' conviction for sexual assault. The Court held that the Rule does not require exploration of underlying factual details irrelevant to credibility, so long as the defendant was able to impeach the witness by evidence of the conviction itself.

United States v. Weisser, 417 F.3d 336 (2d Cir. 2005) : Affirming a conviction for using interstate commerce to engage in sexual acts with a minor, the Court held that the defendant had not been given inadequate assistance of counsel when no objection was made to introduction of his criminal history, including a 1986 conviction for child molestation. The defendant had opened the door by testifying that he was not sexually interested in minors, so the government could use the circumstances of the conviction on cross-examination to impeach his credibility and any objection would be futile.

Elcock v. Kmart Corp., 233 F.3d 734 (3d Cir. 2000) : In a personal injury action arising from a slip-and-fall, the Trial Judge admitted evidence that one of the plaintiff's expert witnesses had pleaded guilty to embezzlement, but forbade questions regarding the amount embezzled or the facts and circumstances of the crimes. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff on other grounds, the Court noted that the guilty pleas were properly admitted under Rule 609(a)(2). The underlying misconduct, involving dishonesty, was probative of the witness' character for truthfulness, and thus admissible, at the Judge's discretion (governed by Rules 403 and 611), under Rule 608(b). The Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding reference to the underlying acts, but it noted that the amount of money misappropriated and the manner in which it was done were certainly relevant to prove the witness' dishonesty. On remand, the Judge was free to balance once again whether the gain from this probative value justified the time required to ask about the details.

United States v. Gordon, 780 F.2d 1165 (5th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed conspiracy and fraud convictions, holding that the defendant was properly barred from inquiring into the particular facts of a government witness' prior convictions. In United States v. Beckett, n23 a prosecution for possession of an illegally made and unregistered firearm, the defendant was asked whether he told a federal agent that because he had been convicted of a felony (which he had admitted on direct examination) he could not have firearms. The Court found that this suggestion of an offense not charged was improper, reiterating that a testifying defendant is required " 'to give answers only as to whether he ha[s] been previously convicted of a felony, as to what the felony was, and as to when the conviction was had.' " The Court found that the prosecutor's improper question was harmless error, but directed the District Court to hold a hearing on whether he should be disciplined for repeated misconduct. In United States v. Tumblin, n24 the Court held that the prosecutor erred in cross-examining the defendant about the details of prior convictions including "such matters as the length of confinement, the interim period of freedom between a particular release date and defendant's next arrest for a crime, and defendant's unemployment between confinements."

United States v. Bender, 265 F.3d 464 (6th Cir. 2001) : One charge against a defendant in a drug distribution case was felon firearm possession. Rather than requiring the government to introduce evidence of the prior conviction, the parties agreed to stipulate that the defendant was convicted of a felony in 1987, and the defendant's cross-examination was to be limited to getting her to confirm that she agreed to the stipulation. However, after the defendant twice testified that she never sold drugs, the government was permitted to bring out on cross-examination that her prior conviction was for distribution of powder cocaine. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, since the defendant's misleading testimony opened the door to the impeachment proof and limiting instructions minimized any prejudicial effect.

United States v. Douglas, 408 F.3d 922 (7th Cir. 2005) : Before the defendant's trial for selling crack cocaine, the Judge granted his motion in limine to exclude one stale prior drug conviction, and denied his motion to exclude a 1993 drug conviction. The Judge indicated that the prosecution could only impeach the defendant by asking whether he had a prior conviction and could not mention the name or nature of the conviction, but warned the defendant that he might open the door to additional details about the conviction. When the defendant testified that he offered to cooperate with the police despite his innocence because he had "never been through nothing like that," the Judge permitted the government to cross-examine about both prior drug convictions. The Court found no abuse of discretion and indicated that, even if there were some error, it would be harmless. The prosecutor did not dwell on the prior convictions, but merely elicited that the defendant had twice been in situations where police interrogation was likely, and this cast doubt on the defendant's testimony without causing undue prejudice. In an action for allegedly discriminatory discharge, Young v. James Green Mgmt., Inc., 327 F.3d 616 (7th Cir. 2003) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant employer, finding no abuse of discretion when a property manager employed by the defendant was cross-examined concerning details of his prior convictions for automobile theft and aggravated battery. The witness' direct testimony about his relationship with a particular woman and his redirect testimony regarding the theft opened the door to cross-examination and re-cross examination. In United States v. Williams, 272 F.3d 845 (7th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed cocaine-related convictions, finding no error when the government was permitted to cross-examine a defendant about the details of his prior convictions. Ordinarily the details of a conviction are not admissible under Rule 609. However, here the defendant in giving direct testimony about the circumstances surrounding his convictions "revealed only selected details, tried to distance himself from responsibility, and claimed to be cooperating with the police whenever cooperation was requested of him following an arrest." In United States v. White, n25 the Trial Judge ruled in limine that the defendant, charged with bank robbery and kidnapping, could be impeached with his prior conviction for sexual abuse. On direct examination, the defendant sought to explain that he was convicted for having consensual sex with a girl under the age of 17 when he was 20. The government on cross-examination relied on the police report of the incident to assert that the girl was only 13, that the sex was not consensual, and that the girl was taken to a hospital for treatment. Although it found that the defendant had opened the door to these details by giving his own version of the events, the Court stressed that "the prosecution is limited to using only the information for which it has a good faith belief that there is supporting evidence." In this case, the police report was sufficient to support a good faith belief, even though there was a good deal of evidence that the sex was consensual, as indicated by the fact that the defendant received no jail time for the offense. Since the police report was not in evidence, the Court found that the government had committed misconduct (although the error was harmless) by emphasizing in closing argument its version of the events underlying the prior conviction. In United States v. Robinson, n26 a defendant charged with fraud testified on direct examination that he had been convicted as an accessory after the fact of attempted murder; on cross-examination, the prosecutor brought out that the intended victim was a woman grand jury witness. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to reveal details of the prior conviction.

United States v. Jackson, 310 F.3d 1053 (8th Cir. 2002) (per curiam): On direct examination, the defendant acknowledged that he had two years previously been convicted of attempted capital murder and then asserted that the jury had sentenced him to the statutory minimum because "[t]here's no self-defense law in Arkansas." The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the prosecutor was permitted to elicit on cross-examination that evidence in the attempted murder trial indicated that after an argument with the victim, the defendant had followed him in his car, stopped him, shot him, and continued to shoot him after he fell to the ground. The cross-examination was properly allowed to impeach the defendant's credibility in implying that he had acted in self-defense. In Foulk v. Charrier, 262 F.3d 687 (8th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed a judgment against a correctional officer for using excessive force, and upheld the decision below to admit evidence that the plaintiff had prior felony convictions but to exclude the details (that the convictions were for rape and sodomy). Distinguishing its prior decision in Cummings v. Malone, (infra), the Court concluded that the Trial Judge here carefully balanced the relevant interests and found that "[t]he evidence in question in the present case was not similarly probative on the issue of credibility." In United States v. Swanson, n27 the Court affirmed a conviction for manufacturing marijuana, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the defendant to be cross-examined regarding the circumstances underlying his previous conviction for felony menacing. He had testified on direct about the details in an attempt to minimize his guilt, so the government was properly permitted to bring out any relevant facts on cross-examination. In Cummings v. Malone, n28 the Court reversed a judgment for a prisoner who alleged use of excessive force by prison officials, holding, inter alia, that it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the plaintiff's "face sheet" to prove his specific prior felony convictions. Although there is discretion under Rule 403 to limit inquiry into past convictions, in this case credibility was critical, so the jury had a need to know both the number of felony convictions and the specific crimes involved. The Court noted that "[t]he ability to introduce the specific crime is not a license to flaunt its details, however; cross-examiners are limited to eliciting the name, date and disposition of the felony committed." Distinguishing Cummings, the Court held in United States v. Ford, 17 F.3d 1100 (8th Cir. 1994) , that it was not an abuse of discretion to preclude evidence that the felony conviction of the prosecution's primary witness had been for a sex offense against a minor. Introduction of the specific felony could easily have distracted the jury without adding any real probative information.

United States v. Albers, 93 F.3d 1469 (10th Cir. 1996) : The Court held in a prosecution for conspiring to manufacture methamphetamine that it was error (but harmless) to bring out on cross-examination the facts underlying the defendant's prior conviction for grand theft after the defense revealed the conviction on direct. The Court stated that "the defendant was entitled to the protection of the rule that only the prior conviction, its general nature, and punishment of felony range were fair game for testing the defendant's credibility."

[f] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi

[i] Rule 609(a) -- Assault

United States v. Harvey, 588 F.2d 1201 (8th Cir. 1978) : Reversing a conviction for possession and uttering of a stolen Treasury check, the Court concluded that the prosecutor committed plain error in asking the defendant about prior misdemeanors involving assault, which does not involve dishonesty or false statement.

[ii] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Counterfeiting and Forgery

United States v. Hans, 738 F.2d 88 (3d Cir. 1984) : The Court held that a conviction for knowingly transporting forged securities is a crimen falsi offense.

United States v. Morrow, 977 F.2d 222 (6th Cir. 1992) (en banc): The Court held in a drug prosecution that counterfeiting is a dishonesty offense.

United States v. Noble, 754 F.2d 1324 (7th Cir. 1985) : The Court held that counterfeiting is a dishonesty offense.

United States v. Jackson, 680 F.2d 561 (8th Cir. 1982) : The Court approved the use of a prior conviction for transporting forged securities in interstate commerce to impeach a defendant charged with illegal possession of a firearm, finding that this was a dishonesty offense.

United States v. Cuozzo, 962 F.2d 945 (9th Cir. 1992) : Affirming fraud convictions, the Court held that dealing in counterfeit obligations or securities is a dishonesty offense. In United States v. Bay, n29 a bank robbery case, the Court observed that the Trial Judge had no discretion to deny the defendant the right to impeach a government witness with a five-year-old forgery conviction. Since forgery is a dishonesty offense, the Court stated that it was automatically admissible as long as it fell within the ten-year time period specified in the Rule. In United States v. Harris, n30 the Court ruled that passing counterfeit money is a dishonesty offense.

[iii] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Embezzlement

Elcock v. Kmart Corp., 233 F.3d 734 (3d Cir. 2000) : In a personal injury action arising from a slip-and-fall, the Trial Judge admitted evidence that one of the plaintiff's expert witnesses had pleaded guilty to embezzlement, but forbade questions regarding the amount embezzled or the facts and circumstances of the crimes. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff on other grounds, the Court noted that the guilty pleas were properly admitted under Rule 609(a)(2).

[iv] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- False Statements

United States v. Lester, 749 F.2d 1288 (9th Cir. 1984) : The Court found in an obstruction of justice case that exclusion of defense evidence that a government witness had been convicted of the misdemeanor of filing a false police report was error (but harmless), since dishonesty convictions are not subject to discretionary exclusion.

[v] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Food Stamp Offenses

United States v. Mejia-Alarcon, 995 F.2d 982 (10th Cir. 1993) : Affirming drug and firearm convictions, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to permit impeachment of the defendant with a misdemeanor conviction for possessing and acquiring food stamps illegally. Neither the elements of the crime nor the specific circumstances of the case demonstrated that the defendant engaged in deceitfulness or untruthfulness.

[vi] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Fraud

United States v. Wong, 703 F.2d 65 (3d Cir. 1983) : A defendant convicted of mail fraud and racketeering was impeached with evidence of prior convictions for mail fraud and Medicare fraud. Affirming, the Court held that there is no discretion to exclude prior convictions coming within Rule 609(a)(2).

United States v. Cook, 557 F.2d 1149 (5th Cir. 1977) : Although it reversed the defendant's conviction on 15 counts of fraud, the Court noted that he was properly impeached with a previous fraud conviction, because fraud falls within the automatic impeachment provision of Rule 609(a)(2).

United States v. Kuecker, 740 F.2d 496 (7th Cir. 1984) : The Court upheld mail and wire fraud convictions, finding that the Trial Judge properly ruled in limine that a prior conviction for mail fraud could be used to impeach the defendant if he testified. The Court ruled that "the trial court had no discretion to prevent introduction, for impeachment purposes, of evidence of prior convictions for crimes involving dishonesty or false statement, subject only to the ten-year time limit embodied in rule 609(b)."

United States v. Brashier, 548 F.2d 1315 (9th Cir. 1976) : Affirming convictions for securities law and income tax violations, the Court held that a conviction for conspiracy to issue unauthorized securities and mail fraud was a crime involving dishonesty within the meaning of the Rule.

United States v. Whitman, 665 F.2d 313 (10th Cir. 1981) : Upholding a conviction for making false statements to a federally insured bank, the Court approved a ruling that the defendant could be impeached with a prior land fraud conviction if he chose to testify. The Court treated a larceny offense committed by fraudulent or deceitful means as a crime involving dishonesty or false statement.

[vii] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Income Tax Offenses

Cree v. Hatcher, 969 F.2d 34 (3d Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant physician in a medical malpractice suit, holding it was error to permit impeachment of the plaintiff's expert pathologist with his 1984 misdemeanor conviction for willful failure to file an income tax return. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 609.02[4].

Zukowski v. Dunton, 650 F.2d 30 (4th Cir. 1981) : The Court held that a civil defendant's misdemeanor conviction for willfully failing to provide information for income tax purposes was sufficiently reprehensible to be used for impeachment under Rule 609(a)(2).

United States v. Wilson, 985 F.2d 348 (7th Cir. 1993) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to impede the IRS, the Court held that a conviction for failure to file tax returns involved dishonesty.

Dean v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 924 F.2d 805 (9th Cir. 1991) : The Court held in a wrongful discharge action that it was error, but harmless, to exclude evidence of the plaintiff's misdemeanor conviction for failure to file a tax return. The Court noted that the conviction was based on deliberate filing of an incomplete return rather than on a complete failure to file a return, and concluded that it involved an element of misrepresentation and thus qualified as a dishonesty offense under the Rule.

United States v. Gellman, 677 F.2d 65 (11th Cir. 1982) : In a prosecution for failure to file an income tax return, the Court held that a defense witness was properly questioned about a similar conviction because the crime was a dishonesty offense.

[viii] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Larceny, Robbery, and Theft Offenses

[A] Rule 609(a) -- Shoplifting

United States v. Ashley, 569 F.2d 975 (5th Cir. 1978) : The Court held that a conviction for shoplifting is not a conviction involving dishonesty or false statement within the meaning of the Rule.

McHenry v. Chadwick, 896 F.2d 184 (6th Cir. 1990) : In an inmate's civil rights action against correctional officers, the Trial Judge excluded evidence of the plaintiff's prior misdemeanor convictions for shoplifting and concealing stolen property. The Court held that shoplifting did not involve dishonesty or false statement. Although concealing stolen property was a dishonesty offense, the error was harmless because the jury already knew the plaintiff had been convicted of burglary. In United States v. Scisney, n31 a bank robbery prosecution, the Court held that evidence of the defendant's prior misdemeanor shoplifting conviction was improperly admitted as a conviction involving dishonesty or false statement, but the error was harmless.

United States v. Owens, 145 F.3d 923 (7th Cir. 1998) : The defendant, charged with crack cocaine distribution, was not permitted to show that the principal prosecution witness had previously pleaded guilty to misdemeanor retail theft for stealing a car stereo. Noting that petty shoplifting does not, in and of itself, qualify as a crime of dishonesty under Rule 609(a)(2), the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence in this case, since the witness had already been impeached with a felony conviction. See also United States v. Galati, 230 F.3d 254 (7th Cir. 2000) (evidence that principal prosecution witness was convicted 20 years ago as a college student for shoplifting a cassette tape was properly excluded). In United States v. Amaechi, n32 the Court affirmed a drug conviction, holding that the defendant was properly precluded from offering evidence of a government witness' prior conviction for shoplifting, as such a crime does not involve an element of misrepresentation or other indication of a propensity to lie.

United States v. Ortega, 561 F.2d 803 (9th Cir. 1977) : The Court noted that shoplifting is not a dishonesty conviction.

United States v. Dunson, 142 F.3d 1213 (10th Cir. 1998) : Appealing a cocaine conviction, the defendant complained that he was not permitted to impeach the star prosecution witness with the witness' prior misdemeanor conviction for shoplifting. The Court found no error, and held that shoplifting is not the type of crime that is automatically admissible under Rule 609(a)(2).

[B] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Larceny, Robbery, and Theft Offenses -- Other Offenses

United States v. Fearwell, 595 F.2d 771 (D.C. Cir. 1978) : The Court held it was error to rule that a defendant charged with conspiracy to violate the Food Stamp Act could be impeached with a prior conviction for attempted petit larceny. Because the crime appeared to be a misdemeanor, the Court said that it could only be used if it satisfied Rule 609(a)(2), which it did not, because there was no suggestion of fraud or deceit associated with the prior conviction.

United States v. Grandmont, 680 F.2d 867 (1st Cir. 1982) : Affirming bank robbery and related convictions, the Court held that purse snatchings did not qualify as dishonesty offenses, but the convictions were properly admitted under subdivision (a)(1).

United States v. Johnson, 388 F.3d 96 (3d Cir. 2004) : The Court vacated a conviction for carjacking because the defendant's prior conviction for purse snatching was improperly admitted to impeach him. In Walker v. Horn, 385 F.3d 321 (3d Cir. 2004) , the Court held it was error (but harmless) for the Trial Judge to admit the defendant's robbery convictions under Rule 609(a)(2) without balancing probative value and prejudicial effect. While robbery is a serious crime, "it does not involve communicative or expressive dishonesty." In Government of Virgin Islands v. Toto, n33 the Court reversed a conviction for distributing marijuana, indicating that under the Rules it was error to impeach the defendant with a prior misdemeanor conviction for petit larceny, because this was not a crimen falsi offense.

United States v. Newman, 849 F.2d 156 (5th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that convictions for theft-forgery and theft by deception qualified for admission as dishonesty crimes. In United States v. Carden, n34 the Court held that a defendant could be impeached with a petty larceny conviction, as the crime involved dishonesty.

United States v. Wiman, 77 F.3d 981 (7th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court found no error in prohibiting the defendant from impeaching a prosecution witness with a misdemeanor conviction for theft of gas from a gas station. The Court concluded that the crime did not involve dishonesty or false statements. In Altobello v. Borden Confectionary Prods., Inc., n35 the Court held that meter tampering is always a crime of deception, since it always involves an attempt to deceive the meter reader. In United States v. Papia, n36 the Court held that a conviction for theft of less than $100, which was a plea bargain reduction of a forgery charge, was a crime involving dishonesty.

United States v. Yeo, 739 F.2d 385 (8th Cir. 1984) : After deciding to reverse a conviction for extortion on another ground, the Court added that a theft conviction was improperly admitted, absent evidence that it involved fraud or deceit.

United States v. Brackeen, 969 F.2d 827 (9th Cir. 1992) (en banc; per curiam): The Court resolved an intra-Circuit conflict of precedents, unanimously holding that bank robbery is not per se a crime of "dishonesty" under the Rule. The Court concluded that "Congress intended Rule 609(a)(2) to apply only to those crimes that factually or by definition entail some element of misrepresentation or deceit, not to 'those crimes which, bad though they are, do not carry with them a tinge of falsification.' " This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 609.02[4]. In United States v. Glenn, n37 the Court found it was error (but harmless) to permit impeachment of a defendant charged with drug offenses with evidence of prior burglary and grand theft convictions, since there was no showing that the crimes were committed "by fraudulent or deceitful means."

United States v. Farmer, 923 F.2d 1557 (11th Cir. 1991) : Affirming a conviction for civil rights violations, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in prohibiting cross-examination of the victim regarding his prior criminal record and pending theft charges, as prior misdemeanor theft convictions are usually not sufficiently probative of veracity to be admissible under Rule 609(a)(2).

[ix] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Lewd Conduct

United States v. Colbert, 116 F.2d 395 (9th Cir. 1997) : The Court held that the Trial Judge properly excluded a witness' prior misdemeanor conviction for lewd conduct. Quoting United States v. Walker, 613 F.2d 1349, 1354 (5th Cir. 1980) , the Court stated that "a conviction for prostitution does not involve dishonesty or false statement and is not admissible under 609(a) for impeachment purposes."

[x] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Miscellaneous Offenses

United States v. Tracy, 36 F.3d 187 (1st Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for felon firearm possession, the Court held that a conviction for uttering a false prescription was automatically admissible to impeach the defendant under Rule 609(a)(2).

[xi] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Motor Vehicle Offenses

United States v. Lossiah, 537 F.2d 1250 (4th Cir. 1976) : The defendant's murder conviction was reversed because he was improperly asked about a 17-year-old juvenile adjudication, a disorderly conduct conviction seven years previously, and convictions for drunken driving and public drunkenness. The Court concluded that the last two convictions were misdemeanors that did not have a bearing on truth and veracity or involve moral turpitude. In our view, the Court should not have relied on such general "moral turpitude" language, when Rule 609(a)(2) specifically requires "dishonesty or false statement."

United States v. Wiman, 77 F.3d 981 (7th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a conviction for felon gun possession, the Court found no error in prohibiting the defendant from impeaching a prosecution witness with a misdemeanor conviction for driving under the influence of alcohol. The Court concluded that the crime did not involve dishonesty or false statements.

United States v. Nichols, 808 F.2d 660 (8th Cir. 1987) : Affirming a conviction for distributing cocaine, the Court held that the defendant was properly precluded from asking an FBI agent about a misdemeanor conviction for driving while intoxicated, as the offense did not involve dishonesty or false statement.

[xii] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Narcotics Offenses

United States v. Logan, 998 F.2d 1025 (D.C. Cir. 1993) : A defense witness in a drug prosecution was improperly impeached with misdemeanor convictions for taking property without a right and distributing marijuana and PCP, but the Court held the error was harmless because it was a witness rather than a defendant who was impeached, the prosecution did not emphasize the convictions, a proper limiting instruction was promptly given, the witness' story was confirmed in part by another witness, and the other evidence against the defendant was strong. The dissenting Judge observed that when a defendant does not testify and presents his case through others, improper impeachment (particularly of the defendant's chief witness) is likely to be prejudicial and not harmless.

