Medrano v. City of Los Angeles, 973 F.2d 1499 (9th Cir. 1992) : Reversing a judgment for the defendants in a § 1983 action, the Court held that it was error to impeach the plaintiffs' witnesses by arrest records and by misdemeanor convictions for drug use and shoplifting. In United States v. Mehrmanesh, n38 the Court found it error (but harmless) to rule that a defendant's prior conviction for smuggling hashish was automatically admissible should he choose to testify. According to the Court, "Convictions for such surreptitious activity, not necessarily involving misrepresentations or falsification, do not bear directly on the likelihood that the defendant will testify truthfully." In United States v. Thompson, n39 the Court found no error in prohibiting cross-examination of a government witness about a prior marijuana conviction, since the misdemeanor was not one involving dishonesty or false statement within the meaning of the Rule.

[xiii] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- No Balancing

SEC v. Sargent, 229 F.3d 68 (1st Cir. 2000) : The defendants, charged with illegally trading securities on the basis of nonpublic information, had been convicted of lying to the Commission during its investigation of the incident. At trial on the civil charges, the Judge excluded evidence of the convictions on the ground that "you get all the probative value you need because the witness admitted he lied." Reversing a judgment as a matter of law entered for the defendants, the Court stated that the Commission was entitled to attack the defendants' credibility more forcefully than simply through their admission of lying, by presenting the fact that they had been convicted of knowingly and willfully making a materially false statement to a government official. There is no discretion to exclude prior convictions involving dishonesty or false statements, so the ruling below was error.

[xiv] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Receipt of Stolen Property

United States v. Foster, 227 F.3d 1096 (9th Cir. 2000) : In a narcotics case, the Court found reversible error in the admission of the defendant's prior misdemeanor conviction for receipt of stolen property. The conviction was admitted automatically under Rule 609(a)(2), but the Court found that the crime of receipt of stolen property "can be accomplished without any misrepresentation or deceit on the part of either the giver or the receiver."

[xv] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Smuggling

United States v. Mehrmanesh, 689 F.2d 822 (9th Cir. 1982) : The Court found it error (but harmless) to rule that a defendant's prior conviction for smuggling hashish was automatically admissible should he choose to testify. According to the Court, "Convictions for such surreptitious activity, not necessarily involving misrepresentations or falsification, do not bear directly on the likelihood that the defendant will testify truthfully."

Gust v. Jones, 162 F.3d 587 (10th Cir. 1998) : In a case arising out of a highway accident, the Court held that a plaintiff's prior conviction for smuggling drugs into a penitentiary was not admissible under Rule 609(a)(2), because that crime did not "per se, involve dishonesty or false statement." Nor was it an abuse of discretion to rule that the conviction was inadmissible under the balancing test set forth in Rule 609(a)(1).

[xvi] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Title or Nature of Prior Conviction

United States v. Cabrera, 201 F.3d 1243 (9th Cir. 2000) : The Court found no prosecutorial misconduct in an alien-smuggling case when the defendant was asked on cross-examination whether he had any prior convictions. The Trial Judge had ruled in response to a motion in limine that the defendant could be asked about his convictions for misdemeanors but without referring to the underlying act of placing a false sticker on a car. The Court further held that there was no misconduct when the prosecutor's question left it to the defendant's redirect examination to bring out that the prior conviction was only for a misdemeanor.

[xvii] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Weapons Convictions

United States v. Slade, 627 F.2d 293 (D.C. Cir. 1980) : The Court concluded that unlicensed possession of a pistol is not a dishonesty crime.

United States v. Cameron, 814 F.2d 403 (7th Cir. 1987) : Affirming a conviction for unlicensed firearms sales, the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence that a government witness had a misdemeanor conviction for possessing a switchblade. Whether or not the crime is a dishonesty offense under state law, the Court found that it "is not probative of his [the witness'] propensity to testify truthfully."

[xviii] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Worthless Check Convictions

Wagner v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 890 F.2d 652 (3d Cir. 1989) : In affirming a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action, the Court held that the plaintiff was properly impeached under Rule 609(a)(2) with evidence of his prior convictions for passing bad checks and forgery.

United States v. Cunningham, 638 F.2d 696 (4th Cir. 1981) : Accepting the argument that under some circumstances a conviction for "worthless checks" might qualify for admission under Rule 609(a)(2), the Court said that the party claiming that the conviction qualifies must demonstrate that it does.

United States v. Barb, 20 F.3d 694 (6th Cir. 1994) : Reversing a conviction for wire fraud, the Court held it was error to impeach the defendant with three misdemeanor convictions for writing bad checks. The Court relied upon State Court decisions that suggested that not all bad check convictions involved dishonesty. One Judge dissented on the ground that the applicable statutes required a fraudulent intent, so the crimes necessarily involved dishonesty.

United States v. Motley, 940 F.2d 1079 (7th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed false claims convictions, holding there was no error in precluding the defendant from impeaching a prosecution witness with a nine-year-old misdemeanor conviction for "check deception," as there was no indication that the offense actually involved fraud or dishonesty rather than simple negligence in overdrawing a checking account. See also United States v. Kane, 944 F.2d 1406 (7th Cir. 1991) (delivering a check knowing that it would not be paid or honored was a crime of dishonesty under applicable state law, so it was a proper crime with which to impeach).

United States v. Mucci, 630 F.2d 737 (10th Cir. 1980) : The Court concluded that a misdemeanor conviction for issuing, or causing to be issued or transferred, a check with knowledge that it could be dishonored is a dishonesty offense.

[g] Rule 609(a) -- Explaining the Conviction

United States v. Kane, 944 F.2d 1406 (7th Cir. 1991) : When the defendant in a fraud prosecution conceded that he had previously been convicted but asserted that he had entered a guilty plea in order to avoid having to go to Court, the prosecutor accused him of lying and implied that he had a dishonest character. The Court held this was error, but harmless because the defendant was able to present reasons for his plea with which the jury could sympathize, thereby blotting the effect of the prosecutor's improper accusations.

[h] Rule 609(a) -- Felony or Misdemeanor

United States v. Meserve, 271 F.3d 314 (1st Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions for robbery and firearms offenses, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to admit convictions for assault and disorderly conduct to impeach the defendant's brother as a witness. Generally, Maine law made these crimes misdemeanors, and the government, saying the burden was on the defense, offered no evidence that the assault qualified as a felony. But the Court held that the government, as the party seeking to introduce the evidence, had the burden of showing it was admissible.

[i] Rule 609(a) -- Good Faith Basis

United States v. Ruiz-Castro, 92 F.3d 1519 (10th Cir. 1996) : Affirming cocaine-related convictions, the Court found no error when the Trial Judge precluded questioning of a witness and a government agent regarding the witness' alleged prior convictions in Mexico. The Court found no evidence of a good faith basis for the questions, and noted that the defendants were given an opportunity to establish such a basis.

[j] Rule 609(a) -- "Impeaching" a Defendant Who Does Not Testify

United States v. Beeks, 224 F.3d 741 (8th Cir. 2000) : The Court reversed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, because the prosecutor referred to the defendant's prior conviction even though he never testified. Cross-examining a defense witness who testified to the defendant's employment history, the prosecutor sought to elicit how the defendant had responded to a question regarding prior convictions on an employment form he had filled out. An objection was sustained before the witness could answer, but the Court found prosecutorial misconduct because the implication of the question was that the defendant had been convicted of a crime and had lied to his employer about it. That was an improper attempt "to obtain the effect of impeachment even though Beeks did not testify."

[k] Rule 609(a) -- In Limine Motions

Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38 (1984) . See the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 103(a), § 103.02[13].

Ohler v. United States, 529 U.S. 753 (2000) . See the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 103(a), § 103.02[14].

United States v. Oakes, 565 F.2d 170 (1st Cir. 1977) : Affirming a firearms conviction, the Court encouraged Trial Judges "when feasible, [to] make reasonable efforts to accommodate a defendant by ruling in advance on the admissibility of a criminal record so that he can make an informed decision whether or not to testify," but it declined to mandate an in limine procedure for all cases.

United States v. Rivers, 693 F.2d 52 (8th Cir. 1982) : The Court affirmed a conviction for armed robbery of a savings and loan, finding there was no error in refusing to rule in limine where the Trial Judge did not know whether the prior convictions were felonies, whether the defendant would testify if his convictions were excluded, and what the nature of his testimony would be. The Court distinguished United States v. Burkhead, n40 which held it was an abuse of discretion not to rule on the defendant's motion to prohibit impeachment by prior convictions, where the defendant had been previously tried on five substantive counts and sought a ruling before his conspiracy trial.

United States v. Williams, 939 F.2d 721 (9th Cir. 1991) : The Court held that, by bringing out the fact of his prior conviction during direct examination, a defendant convicted for possession of cocaine had waived the right to appeal from an adverse in limine ruling. By the defendant's strategic choice at trial, the Trial Judge and the government were deprived of a last chance to reverse their prestated positions. In United States v. Browne, n41 the Court upheld the admission of a defendant's prior bank robbery conviction to impeach his testimony in an armed bank robbery prosecution. It found no error in the decision to await the defendant's testimony before ruling on his motion to exclude the conviction.

United States v. Martinez, 76 F.3d 1145 (10th Cir. 1996) : Affirming convictions for bribery and other offenses, the Court held that the defendant waived his right to object to the use of a prior conviction for a cocaine offense when he testified to the conviction on direct examination. The Trial Judge had declined to make a pretrial ruling on the admissibility of the prior conviction for impeachment purposes, and again declined to rule on admissibility prior to the defendant's taking the stand. The Court found no error in deferring a ruling, and observed that it "cannot speculate whether the government would have cross-examined the defendant about his cocaine conviction." In United States v. Sides, 944 F.2d 1554 (10th Cir. 1991) , the Trial Judge deferred until trial ruling on the defendant's motion in limine to exclude his prior convictions; after the prosecution rested, the Judge held a hearing in which the parties were questioned about the defendant's intention to testify. The Court affirmed the murder conviction, holding that by failing to make any objection during the hearing or when the impeaching evidence was introduced, the defendant had not preserved any issue for review. In United States v. Short, n42 the Trial Judge ruled in limine that the defendant, charged with manufacturing amphetamine, could be impeached with a prior felony conviction but that the government could not bring out that the conviction was for drug offenses. On cross-examination, the prosecutor nevertheless asked about the prior drug conviction. While not condoning the prosecutor's possible mistake in not seeking reversal or clarification of the ruling before asking the question, the Court held that refusal to grant a mistrial was harmless error in the circumstances.

[l] Rule 609(a) -- Nolo Contendere Pleas

United States v. Sonny Mitchell Center, 934 F.2d 77 (5th Cir. 1991) (per curiam): Affirming forfeiture of interests in a shopping center used for drug trafficking, the Court found no error in impeachment of one claimant by convictions entered pursuant to pleas of nolo contendere. The Circuit's former rule making such convictions inadmissible for impeachment did not survive adoption of the Federal Rules.

Brewer v. City of Napa, 210 F.3d 1093 (9th Cir. 2000) : The Court held that the plaintiff in a civil rights action was properly impeached with convictions based on nolo contendere pleas. The Court reasoned that Rule 410 did not preclude such impeachment, because that Rule "by its terms prohibits only evidence of pleas" while Rule 609 "permits admission for impeachment purposes of evidence of convictions." The Court also noted that the Advisory Committee considered an exception to Rule 609 for nolo convictions and ultimately rejected it.

[m] Rule 609(a) -- Opening the Door

United States v. Barrett, 766 F.2d 609 (1st Cir. 1985) : The Court held that a bank robbery defendant opened the door to the introduction of a death certificate for a man he had killed by testifying on direct examination concerning the circumstances of the shooting for which he had been convicted.

United States v. Williams, 272 F.3d 845 (7th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed cocaine related convictions, finding no error when the government was permitted to cross-examine a defendant about the details of his prior convictions. Ordinarily the details of a conviction are not admissible under Rule 609. However, in his direct testimony about the circumstances of his convictions, the defendant "revealed only selected details, tried to distance himself from responsibility, and claimed to be cooperating with the police whenever cooperation was requested of him following an arrest." In a prosecution for attempting to possess marijuana with intent to distribute, United States v. Rein, n43 the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a nine-and-one-half-year-old conviction for delivery of a controlled substance to impeach a defendant who testified that he had not previously engaged in the type of activity alleged.

United States v. Valencia, 61 F.3d 616 (8th Cir. 1995) : Affirming cocaine convictions, the Court held there was no error in admitting, for impeachment purposes, evidence that the defendant had been convicted for unlawful possession for sale and purchase for sale of a controlled substance. On direct examination, the defendant had admitted that he had a prior conviction for possession of cocaine but attempted to minimize his guilt as to that conviction. The Court concluded that the government properly cross-examined him in order to clarify the facts as to the prior conviction and thereby impeach his direct testimony. In United States v. Amahia, n44 the Court affirmed convictions arising from a fraudulent marriage scheme to procure immigration visas, holding there was no error in permitting the prosecution to cross-examine the defendant concerning details of prior felony convictions for insurance fraud. The defendant attempted to explain away the convictions, and the Court reasoned that "the defendant may be cross-examined on any facts which are relevant to the direct examination."

United States v. Perry, 857 F.2d 1346 (9th Cir. 1988) : Affirming income tax and mail fraud convictions, the Court held that a defendant opened the door to an inquiry into details of prior misdemeanor convictions for embezzlement and false pretenses by attempting to explain them away and offering his own version of the underlying facts. In United States v. Mehrmanesh, n45 a defendant in a heroin distribution case indicated at a hearing on a motion to limit cross-examination should he choose to testify that he planned to raise the question whether he ever was involved with narcotics. The Court upheld a ruling that the government could ask the defendant about a prior conviction for importation of hashish.

United States v. Wolf, 561 F.2d 1376 (10th Cir. 1977) : Affirming a conviction for mail fraud, the Court held that the government properly cross-examined the defendant about his testimony on direct examination relating to prior illegal conduct to which he pleaded guilty. The Court observed that ordinarily the government's examination should be confined "to a showing of the essential facts of convictions, the nature of the crimes, and the punishment," but that when the accused sets forth a favorable version of prior convictions to the jury, the government is entitled to cross-examine "on any facts which are relevant to the direct examination."

United States v. Vigliatura, 878 F.2d 1346 (11th Cir. 1989) : In a prosecution for theft from interstate commerce, there was no plain error in permitting extensive cross-examination of the defendant regarding a prior arrest and the factual details of his prior convictions, after he had given testimony on direct examination about some past convictions and "charges" and had denied any other charges or convictions than those about which he testified.

[n] Rule 609(a) -- Rebuttal Evidence

United States v. Carter, 953 F.2d 1449 (5th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug offenses, holding it was not error to introduce evidence that a defendant had been in prison for a crime not punishable by imprisonment of more than one year, as the evidence was not used to impeach but to contradict his testimony that he had been continuously employed during that period.

[o] Rule 609(a) -- Relationship to Rule 404(b)

United States v. Valencia, 61 F.3d 616 (8th Cir. 1995) : Affirming cocaine convictions, the Court held there was no error in admitting, for impeachment purposes, evidence that the defendant had been convicted for unlawful possession for sale and purchase for sale of a controlled substance. The Trial Judge had denied the government the use of the evidence in its case-in-chief, finding that its probative value under Rule 404(b) was outweighed under Rule 403 by its prejudicial effect. After the defendant had testified and attempted to minimize his prior criminal activity, however, the conviction was admitted under Rule 609. The Court observed that convictions offered under Rule 404(b) and 609 are offered for different purposes, so the probative value-prejudicial effect balance may differ under the two Rules. "The probative character of evidence under Rule 609 has to do with credibility of a witness, while 404(b) 'probativeness' essentially goes to the question of whether or not the accused committed the crime charged."

United States v. Cordoba, 104 F.3d 225 (9th Cir. 1997) : In the course of remanding a drug conviction on other grounds, the Court announced that it would not entertain a challenge to the admission of bad acts evidence under Rule 404(b) where that evidence had been properly admitted to impeach the defendant under Rule 609. The Court reasoned that when a conviction is properly admitted under Rule 609, any error in admitting the conviction under Rule 404(b) is automatically harmless.

[p] Rule 609(a) -- Uncounseled Conviction

United States v. Denetclaw, 96 F.3d 454 (10th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a conviction for assault and maiming, the Court concluded that evidence that the defendant had pled guilty in the Navajo Nation Tribal Court to the tribal misdemeanor offense of aggravated battery, arising out of the same events giving rise to this prosecution, was properly admitted. The Court reasoned that, even if the defendant were denied his Sixth Amendment right to counsel, his pleas in the Tribal Court were admissible for impeachment purposes.

[2] Rule 609(b) -- TIME LIMIT

[a] Rule 609(b) -- Discretion

[i] Rule 609(b) -- Accused and Defense Witnesses

United States v. Brown, 603 F.2d 1022 (1st Cir. 1979) : The Court held it was no abuse of discretion to admit the defendant's more than ten-year-old convictions for burglary and petit larceny to impeach him in a theft prosecution. Where the government's only eyewitness had been impeached with an extensive criminal record, and the defendant suggested that this witness actually committed the crime, the defendant's prior convictions were "highly important evidence."

United States v. Payton, 159 F.3d 49 (2d Cir. 1998) : Affirming a felon firearm possession conviction, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of two 13-year-old convictions, offered to impeach the defendant's mother. One conviction was for false statement under oath to a public official and the other was for third-degree larceny; both arose out of an application for food stamps. The Trial Court was within its discretion because the witness' testimony was "critical" to the case, and the impeachment value of the convictions was "substantial." In United States v. Martino, n46 the Court upheld heroin convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of an 11-year-old federal narcotics conviction to impeach the defendant.

United States v. Redditt, 381 F.3d 597 (7th Cir. 2004) : At the defendant's trial for stealing and opening mail, her 1992 conviction for stealing electricity was admitted. The defendant's credibility was a critical factor in the case "in light of the complete contradiction between the defendant's testimony and the testimony of the government's witness," so the Court held the Trial Judge's determination that the probative value of the conviction outweighed any prejudicial effect was not an abuse of discretion. In United States v. Shapiro, n47 the defendant's convictions for offenses related to the misapplication of bank funds were overturned because the government was erroneously permitted to impeach him with a 38-year-old bankruptcy fraud conviction and a 24-year-old income tax evasion conviction. The Court could find no "exceptional circumstances" (quoting the Senate Judiciary Committee Report) to justify admission of such dated convictions, especially because they were similar to the crimes for which the defendant was tried. One Judge dissented, emphasizing the discretion permitted Trial Judges.

United States v. Brown, 956 F.2d 782 (8th Cir. 1992) : Affirming a conviction for drug offenses, the Court held that where credibility was a critical factor because the jury essentially had to choose between the versions of events presented by the government's witnesses and by the defendant's, the defendant's 22-year-old burglary conviction was highly probative as impeachment evidence; thus, it was reasonable to find that the probative value of the conviction substantially outweighed any prejudicial effect. In United States v. Thomas, n48 the defendant, convicted for possession of a firearm that was found by officers executing a search warrant, sought to show the bias of the officers by calling his cousin to testify to an incident eight years earlier in which the officers had allegedly beaten the defendant and his cousin while making an arrest. The officers did not recall the arrest and denied the beating. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting impeachment of the cousin with his 17-year-old conviction of heroin possession, as the witness' credibility was a paramount issue. See also United States v. Keene n49(finding no abuse of discretion when a similar 1976 drug conviction was brought out only on cross-examination after the defendant's testimony implied no contact with the drug prior to 1982); United States v. Maichle n50(evidence of a conviction for a similar narcotics charge was admissible despite its age, where the defendant denied knowing that a package contained cocaine and his credibility was a significant factor); United States v. Spero n51(upholding impeachment of the defendant with a 22-year-old grand theft conviction in a trial for conspiracy to possess an unregistered destructive device where the credibility of the witness was crucial).

United States v. Bensimon, 172 F.3d 1121 (9th Cir. 1999) : The Trial Judge denied a motion in limine to admit evidence of the defendant's 17-year-old mail fraud conviction in his trial for cocaine possession, but reconsidered the ruling midway through cross-examination of the defendant and admitted the evidence. The Court reversed, finding that the Judge had mistakenly treated the defendant's testimony as portraying himself as always having been a law-abiding citizen, had erred in relying on the defendant's lack of memory as a reason for admitting the conviction (in fact, that in itself was useful impeachment evidence), and had improperly focused on the importance of the defendant's credibility to the government's case rather than how well the evidence would demonstrate the witness' lack of trustworthiness.

United States v. Gates, 10 F.3d 765 (11th Cir. 1993) : In a bank robbery case, the Court held there was no error in permitting cross-examination of the defendant about a drug conviction more than ten years old, as the evidence tended to establish that his answer on direct describing a single felony conviction was false. In United States v. Pritchard, 973 F.2d 905 (11th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed a conviction for bank robbery, holding there was no abuse of discretion in allowing the defendant to be impeached by a 13-year-old burglary conviction, as his credibility was a key issue. Although the circumstantial evidence was strong, the only direct witness for the prosecution was an accomplice who had pleaded guilty to the robbery and whose criminal record was known to the jury.

[ii] Rule 609(b) -- Discretion -- Prosecution Witnesses

United States v. Orlando-Figueroa, 229 F.3d 33 (1st Cir. 2000) : The Court held, in a bribery prosecution, that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that a cooperating witness had been convicted 13 years previously for mail fraud. A defense theory was that the witness, not the defendants, was the real culprit in the scheme. While that increased the value of the conviction to the defense, it also increased the prejudicial effect of the evidence. The defense may well have wanted to use the conviction not so much to show the witness' testimony was untrue as to show from a criminal propensity that the witness was as culpable as the defendants. The defense was given ample opportunity to attack the witness' credibility with more recent and more factually similar evidence than the mail fraud conviction.

United States v. Agnew, 385 F.3d 288 (3d Cir. 2004) : The defendant, charged with distributing crack cocaine and felon firearm possession, was not permitted to impeach a prosecution witness with his 16-year-old forgery conviction. The Court held that the probative value of the evidence "was sufficiently small that the 'interests of justice' did not warrant its admission, and that any error in refusing to admit the evidence was harmless."

United States v. Bibbs, 564 F.2d 1165 (5th Cir. 1977) : The Court upheld a ruling that barred impeachment of prosecution witnesses with convictions more than ten years old, saying that "Congress intended that Trial Judges be extremely cautious in admitting evidence of remote convictions."

United States v. Lochmondy, 890 F.2d 817 (6th Cir. 1989) : The District Court did not abuse its broad discretion in a marijuana possession case when it excluded evidence that the government's principal witness had two prior drug convictions more than ten years old and a misdemeanor conviction for disorderly conduct growing out of a shoplifting incident, also more than ten years old. The Court of Appeals cautioned, however, that careful consideration should be given to admission of past convictions of a principal government witness.

United States v. Peak, 856 F.2d 825 (7th Cir. 1988) : In a drug conspiracy prosecution, the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence of a government witness' prior, stale convictions that were offered for impeachment. There was other evidence of the convictions in the record, the probative value of the convictions was not great, and defense counsel had given inadequate notice.

United States v. Reeves, 730 F.2d 1189 (8th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed marijuana convictions, finding no error in the exclusion of an 18-year-old breaking-and-entering conviction of a government witness. The Court observed that the defense attacked the witness' credibility through other means and that the Trial Judge did not clearly err in finding that the stale conviction was insufficiently probative.

United States v. Linn, 31 F.3d 987 (10th Cir. 1994) : Affirming an arson conviction, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that a cooperating witness had been convicted of larceny and possession of stolen property 17 years before the trial. The convictions possessed little probative value because of their age and the evidence was prejudicial to the government's case.

United States v. Pope, 132 F.3d 684 (11th Cir. 1998) : The Court found there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to allow the defendant, charged with firearms offenses, to impeach a prosecution witness with her 28-year-old burglary conviction. In United States v. Tisdale, n52 the Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding there was no abuse of discretion in barring the defendant from impeaching an accomplice with evidence of stale convictions. The jurors were aware that the accomplice had an extensive criminal history and that his testimony was given in exchange for a plea agreement. In United States v. Solomon, n53 the Court affirmed convictions for truck hijackings and interstate transportation of stolen goods. Upholding a ruling that convictions more than ten years old could not be used to impeach a government witness, the Court observed that although the Rule's major concern is prejudice to defendants, it also protects the government from the use of stale convictions. The Court also noted that the witness was impeached in several other ways.

[iii] Rule 609(b) -- Discretion -- Witnesses in Civil Cases

Wierstak v. Heffernan, 789 F.2d 968 (1st Cir. 1986) : In a civil rights action for excessive force in making an arrest, the Court found that the plaintiff's prior convictions for breaking, entering, and larceny at night and for possession of a harmful drug were properly excluded where they were more than ten years old. Although the plaintiff's credibility was critical, the jury learned of more recent convictions for possession of heroin, attempted breaking and entering, and possession of burglary tools, so the evidence of the stale convictions would have been far more prejudicial than probative.

[b] Rule 609(b) -- Dishonesty Convictions

United States v. Orlando-Figueroa, 229 F.3d 33 (1st Cir. 2000) : The Court held, in a bribery prosecution, that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that a cooperating witness had been convicted 13 years previously for mail fraud. A defense theory was that the witness, not the defendants, was the real culprit in the scheme. While that increased the value of the conviction to the defense, it also increased the prejudicial effect of the evidence. The defense may well have wanted to use the conviction not so much to show the witness' testimony was untrue as to show from a criminal propensity that the witness was as culpable as the defendants. The defense was given ample opportunity to attack the witness' credibility with more recent and more factually similar evidence than the mail fraud conviction.

Zinman v. Black & Decker (U.S.), Inc., 983 F.2d 431 (2d Cir. 1993) : In an action by a former podiatrist who sued a manufacturer for an allegedly defective product, the Court reasoned that making a false statement to a government agency is akin to perjury, and found no error in admitting a Medicaid fraud conviction more than ten years old to impeach the plaintiff. Since the plaintiff was given two opportunities to seek a mistrial due to the lack of notice concerning the conviction, his failure to do so was deemed by the Court to be a waiver as to the sufficiency of notice.

United States v. Agnew, 407 F.3d 193 (3d Cir. 2005) : The defendant, charged with distributing crack cocaine and felon firearm possession, was not permitted to impeach a prosecution witness with his 16-year-old forgery conviction. The Court held that the probative value of the evidence "was sufficiently small that the 'interests of justice' did not warrant its admission, and that any error in refusing to admit the evidence was harmless." In a prosecution for interstate transportation of stolen property, United States v. Colletti, 984 F.2d 1339 (3d Cir. 1992) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding cross-examination about a prosecution witness' 1969 conviction for "disorderly person -- false pretense" because the defendants failed to provide sufficient information about the alleged conviction for a ruling on admissibility, there was insufficient advance notice, and the impeachment value of a 22-year-old conviction for what may well have been merely a summary offense akin to disorderly conduct was virtually nonexistent. In United States v. D'Agata, n54 the Court denied the government's motion in limine for admission of the defendant's 16-year-old conviction for perjury in a prosecution for conspiracy and receipt of stolen goods, as "the practical effect of allowing this impeachment" would deny the defendant "a fair opportunity to defend himself by testifying."

United States v. Cathey, 591 F.2d 268 (5th Cir. 1979) : The Court said that the fact that a conviction more than ten years old was for a crime of dishonesty is not enough to warrant admitting it; true necessity must be shown.

United States v. Sloman, 909 F.2d 176 (6th Cir. 1990) : Affirming convictions for mail fraud, the Court held there was no error in permitting a defendant to be asked about a 17-year-old conviction for a crime involving dishonesty, where the Trial Court conducted a hearing and stated its reasons for admitting the evidence, even though there were no exceptional circumstances calling for admission of the evidence.

United States v. Gray, 410 F.3d 338 (7th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for drug trafficking offenses, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendants were precluded from impeaching a cooperating coconspirator with evidence of a 12-year-old perjury conviction. The Court reasoned that the defendants had been permitted to impeach the witness with four serious felony convictions, and the perjury had occurred on a driver's license application rather than in testimony.

United States v. Singer, 660 F.2d 1295 (8th Cir. 1981) : Although the Court upheld convictions for conspiracy and theft, it found an abuse of discretion in the admission of 12-year-old grand larceny convictions offered to impeach the defendants. The Court observed that the convictions were of low probative value because of their age, more recent convictions also were used, and the government had little need for additional impeachment; furthermore, the presumption against admission of stale convictions is not so weak that it falls simply because a conviction was for a dishonesty offense.

American Home Assur. Co. v. American President Lines, Ltd., 44 F.3d 774 (9th Cir. 1994) : In an insurer's subrogation action for freeze damage to fruit, the defendant carrier attempted to offer evidence that a surveyor who assessed the damage had a 12-year-old Hong Kong fraud conviction. The Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the evidence, where the Trial Judge doubted that the conviction would be very probative of credibility, both because of its age and because of the witness' claims that the guilty plea was coerced.

[c] Rule 609(b) -- Findings on the Record

United States v. Ebner, 782 F.2d 1120 (2d Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a tax evasion conviction, holding that the Trial Judge's on-the-record findings were sufficient to support admission of prior federal and state convictions for securities fraud. See also United States v. Gilbert n55(upholding introduction in a securities law prosecution of a mail fraud conviction more than ten years old, where the Judge supported the ruling with "specific facts and circumstances"). In United States v. Mahler, n56 the Court affirmed convictions for securities violations, finding it was error (but harmless) when no on-the-record findings were made regarding convictions more than ten years old. Citing this Manual, the Court reasoned that: (1) "the language of the Rule clearly suggests such an on-the-record determination"; (2) "the legislative history of Rule 609(b), over and above that specifically related to the notice requirement, militates in favor of concluding that the Rule contemplates an on-the-record determination of admissibility"; (3) "the case law, while not entirely consistent, assumes that Rule 609(b) requires an on-the-record finding"; (4) "from a policy standpoint an on-the-record determination is a prudent requirement."

United States v. Cavender, 578 F.2d 528 (4th Cir. 1978) : The Court reversed a conviction for illegal possession of a firearm because the Trial Judge erroneously ruled that if the defendant chose to testify he could be impeached with three convictions that were more than ten years old. The Court indicated that an on-the-record determination, supported by "specific facts and circumstances," that the probative value of the conviction "substantially" outweighs its prejudicial effect is required by the Rule. A concurring opinion would have limited the requirement of an on-the-record statement of reasons to cases in which a request for such a determination was made by counsel. Cavender was followed in United States v. Beahm, 664 F.2d 414 (4th Cir. 1981) .

United States v. Avants, 367 F.3d 433 (5th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for aiding and abetting a racially motivated murder, the Court upheld the admission of 1966 state preliminary hearing testimony against the defendant by an aider and abetter (Jones) who was deceased at the time of the federal trial. Avants complained that he was not permitted to impeach Jones with his prior 1935 conviction for breaking and entering and his 1938 conviction for grand larceny. The Court ruled, however, that the Judge is not required to engage in on-the-record balancing for stale convictions when they are excluded; the balancing on the record is required only when stale convictions are admitted. In a marijuana prosecution, United States v. Acosta, n57 the Court vacated and remanded one defendant's conviction because the Trial Judge admitted a stale prior conviction as impeachment evidence without weighing its probative value against its prejudicial effect on the record.

United States v. Sims, 588 F.2d 1145 (6th Cir. 1978) : The Court adopted the Second Circuit's reading of Rule 609(b) as expressed in United States v. Mahler, supra.

United States v. Holmes, 822 F.2d 802 (8th Cir. 1987) : Affirming an escape conviction, the Court held there was no error in permitting the defendant to be impeached with four convictions more than 12 years old. It specifically declined to require specific findings on the record under Rule 609(b), as long as the record indicates that the Trial Judge carefully considered objections under the Rule; here, a prior escape conviction was excluded.

United States v. Murray, 751 F.2d 1528 (9th Cir. 1985) : The Court upheld admission of a conviction more than ten years old for receiving stolen property to impeach a defendant charged with conspiracy to conceal assets from a bankruptcy trustee, where the Trial Judge made requisite findings on the record. In Powell v. Levit, 640 F.2d 239 (9th Cir. 1981) , the Court found error in the admission of a stale conviction where the Trial Judge made no finding concerning the probative value and prejudicial effect of the evidence.

United States v. Davis, 787 F.2d 1501 (11th Cir. 1986) : Affirming drug conspiracy convictions, the Court found that the government was properly permitted to ask one defendant about a 1966 conviction involving conspiracy to possess illegal whiskey, after the defendant breached a stipulation that he would not present character evidence by testifying that he had never conspired to possess an illegal substance. The Trial Judge did not make on-the-record findings, and the Court found that they were not required where the conviction was admitted not to impeach the defendant by evidence of a prior conviction, but to impeach him by contradicting his denial that he had previously conspired.

[d] Rule 609(b) -- In Limine Motions

United States v. Johnson, 720 F.2d 519 (8th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, finding that the defendant waived his right to object to the government's use of a more than ten-year-old conviction to impeach him when his own counsel brought out the conviction during trial after he unsuccessfully attempted to have it excluded by an in limine motion before trial. The Court reasoned that pretrial rulings on stale convictions are "tentative," because a final ruling depends on the specific facts and circumstances of each case.

United States v. Bensimon, 172 F.3d 1121 (9th Cir. 1999) : The Trial Judge denied a motion in limine to admit evidence of the defendant's 17-year-old mail fraud conviction in his trial for cocaine possession, but reconsidered and reversed the ruling midway through cross-examination of the defendant and admitted the evidence. The Court reversed, finding that the Judge on reconsideration had improperly balanced the probative value and prejudicial effect of the evidence, including failing to consider any prejudice that would accrue to the defendant as a result of reversing a prior in limine ruling.

[e] Rule 609(b) -- Notice

United States v. Livingston, 816 F.2d 184 (5th Cir. 1987) : Affirming convictions involving stolen securities, the Court found no error in the exclusion of a government witness' stale bad check conviction, since the defendant had not given notice of an intention to offer it.

United States v. Huddleston, 811 F.2d 974 (6th Cir. 1987) , aff'd, 485 U.S. 681 (1988) : The government's failure to give written notice of its intention to impeach a defense witness with a 13-year-old misdemeanor conviction for failing to file a tax return was not fatal, since the government did not know the witness would be called until a few minutes ahead of his testimony and the defendant did not object to the absence of written notice.

United States v. Vgeri, 51 F.3d 876 (9th Cir. 1995) : The Court held in a cocaine conspiracy prosecution that there was no abuse of discretion in precluding cross-examination of an informant witness with her 18-year-old theft conviction. Although the defense did not learn of the conviction until the Friday before trial, it had at least one full business day to provide the requisite written notice.

[f] Rule 609(b) -- Probation Revocation and Subsequent Incarceration

United States v. Brewer, 451 F. Supp. 50 (E.D. Tenn. 1978) : For purposes of the ten-year time period, reconfinement pursuant to a parole violation is treated the same as confinement imposed for the original conviction.

United States v. Wallace, 848 F.2d 1464 (9th Cir. 1988) : Remanding a heroin case on a Jencks Act issue, the Court noted that the defendant's conviction in 1970 was time-barred, even though her parole was revoked in 1977 and she was recommitted to prison after she was convicted for perjury. It concluded that the perjury conviction was not substantively related to the original conviction and that the revocation did not constitute confinement for purposes of the Rule. We question this analysis, since a revocation followed by a recommitment decision suggests that the defendant is confined for two crimes and is serving the sentence concurrently. In United States v. McClintock, n58 a prosecution for fraudulently selling gemstones, the Court held that a defendant's prison time, which was imposed following a probation violation, was time served pursuant to the original conviction. The original conviction was for fraudulent fund raising, and the revocation resulted from violation of a probation condition barring the defendant from engaging professionally in charitable fund raising. The Court reasoned that the violation implicated the original dishonest activity and thus was confinement for that activity. It declined to rule, however, that "a district court may never look behind the circumstances of a probation violation to see if it was substantial or technical, dishonest or honest."

[g] Rule 609(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence

United States v. Norton, 26 F.3d 240 (1st Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for felon firearm possession, the defendant's 30-year-old conviction for unlawfully carrying a firearm was excluded in limine under Rule 609(b). At trial the defendant, when asked whether he had a gun in his possession when arrested on the current charge, stated that "I never had a gun in my life." On cross-examination, the prosecution was allowed to impeach the defendant with evidence of the prior conviction. The Court found no error, reasoning that Rule 609 "is not controlling in this context" because the conviction was not admitted to impeach the defendant's character for veracity but rather to contradict his assertion that he never had a gun in his life. As such, admissibility was governed by Rule 403. The Court found that the conviction was "highly relevant to contradict [his] specific misleading assertion."

United States v. Lopez, 979 F.2d 1024 (5th Cir. 1992) : The Court held that the Rule did not apply to exclude evidence of the defendant's 17-year-old conviction for marijuana possession, as it was offered to contradict his testimony that he did not recognize marijuana and not to impeach his credibility.

United States v. Davis, 787 F.2d 1501 (11th Cir. 1986) : Affirming drug conspiracy convictions, the Court found that the government was properly permitted to ask one defendant about a 1966 conviction involving conspiracy to possess illegal whiskey, after the defendant breached a stipulation that he would not present character evidence by testifying that he had never conspired to possess an illegal substance. The Trial Judge did not make on-the-record findings, and the Court found that they were not required where the conviction was admitted not to impeach the defendant by evidence of a prior conviction, but to impeach him by contradicting his denial that he had previously conspired.

[h] Rule 609(b) -- Timing of Prior Convictions

Trindle v. Sonat Marine, Inc., 697 F. Supp. 879 (E.D. Pa. 1988) : The Trial Judge ruled in limine in a personal injury action that for purposes of determining whether a prior conviction is more than ten years old, the question is whether ten years has expired at the time the witness testifies at trial.

United States v. Daniel, 957 F.2d 162 (5th Cir. 1992) : The Court held in affirming convictions for possession of stolen goods that the date of "release from confinement" should be the end of imprisonment, not the termination of a period of probation, so evidence of a government witness' prior conviction was properly excluded.

United States v. Lorenzo, 43 F.3d 1303 (9th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a ruling that precluded impeachment of a government witness with a conviction that was more than ten years old, the Court held that the Rule 609(b) period is measured from the date of the witness' release from confinement or conviction, whichever is later, until the date that the defendant is indicted. The defendant argued that Rule 609(b) should not have applied because the government delayed his indictment for almost two years after its investigation was completed. The Court found, however, that the delay was not in bad faith, but rather was a result of the defendant's continuing criminal activity.

United States v. Jefferson, 925 F.2d 1242 (10th Cir. 1991) , supplemented, 931 F.2d 1396 (10th Cir. 1991) : A defendant was arrested for the instant drug offense less than ten years following his most recent incarceration, but the trial began after ten years from his release. The Court found it unnecessary to decide whether the limitations period under the Rule had run, as admission of the particular prior conviction was not an abuse of discretion.

[i] Rule 609(b) -- Tolling the Limitations Period

United States v. Mullins, 562 F.2d 999 (5th Cir. 1977) :

> The defendant would not have had the protection of the ten-year limitation if he had not fled to avoid prosecution. By his voluntary wrongful act, he cannot gain the protection of Rule 609(b) ... . Refusal to toll the limitations in Rule 609(b) [for flight] would undercut the clear intent of Congress.

[3] Rule 609(c) -- Effect of Pardon, annulment, or Certificate of Rehabilitation

[a] Rule 609(c) -- Discretion of Trial Judge

Brown v. Frey, 889 F.2d 159 (8th Cir. 1989) : The Court held, in an inmate's civil rights action, that the Trial Judge had no discretion to allow the plaintiff to cross-examine a defendant-witness regarding his prior perjury conviction, as the witness received an amended pardon three days after the start of trial which stated that the pardon was based on rehabilitation.

[b] Rule 609(c) -- Finding of Rehabilitation Implied

United States v. Pagan, 721 F.2d 24 (2d Cir. 1983) : The Court reversed a heroin distribution conviction because the Trial Judge permitted the defendant to be impeached with a conviction that had been set aside under the Youth Corrections Act prior to expiration of the sentence. The Court reasoned that although the defendant received no certificate of rehabilitation, "a certificate setting aside a youthful offender's conviction and unconditionally discharging him from further probation prior to expiration of the maximum term of probation clearly implies a finding that no further supervision is required, i.e., that this offender has been rehabilitated."

United States v. Thorne, 547 F.2d 56 (8th Cir. 1976) : Affirming a conviction for escaping from custody, the Court upheld a ruling that a key government witness, who had been convicted of three offenses, had been rehabilitated on the basis of therapy, education, and work history. The Court concluded that no certificate of rehabilitation was necessary, emphasizing the Rule's inclusion of "other equivalent procedure based on a finding of the rehabilitation of the person convicted." See also United States v. Ferguson n59(finding a violation of neither Rule 609(c) nor the Confrontation Clause in the exclusion of a government witness' prior state controlled substance conviction that had been expunged by a State Court).

[c] Rule 609(c) -- No Finding of Rehabilitation

Zinman v. Black & Decker (U.S.), Inc., 983 F.2d 431 (2d Cir. 1993) : In an action by a former podiatrist who sued a manufacturer for an allegedly defective product, the Court held that a prior conviction for Medicare fraud was properly admitted to impeach the plaintiff. The fact that he had completed community service and had his podiatrist's registration renewed was not a finding of rehabilitation or innocence. In United States v. DiNapoli, n60 the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring to influence the outcome of horse races, upholding a ruling that a New York "certificate of relief from disabilities" issued to a convicted felon was not a certificate based on a finding either of rehabilitation or innocence and therefore was outside the scope of Rule 609(c). The Court found that although New York law allowed the issuance of a certificate when it would be an aid to rehabilitation, the state law did not require a determination that the convict already was rehabilitated.

Smith v. Tidewater Marine Towing, Inc., 927 F.2d 838 (5th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a Jones Act suit, holding that a pardon automatically given first offenders upon completion of their sentence was not based on rehabilitation, so the plaintiff was properly impeached by his state robbery conviction. In United States v. Wiggins, n61 the Court, discussing Rule 609(c)'s applicability to the defendant's release from a "halfway house" where he had been placed as a condition of his probation on a drug conviction, observed that Congress evinced "a desire to accord a controlling consideration to rehabilitation as opposed to executive grace or judicial invalidation." However, the defendant failed to show that he was found to be rehabilitated.

United States v. Jones, 647 F.2d 696 (6th Cir. 1981) : The Court held that a pardon granted to restore civil rights did not prove that a defendant was rehabilitated and did not make evidence of his prior conviction inadmissible.

U.S. Xpress Enter., Inc. v. J.B. Hunt Transport, Inc., 320 F.3d 809 (8th Cir. 2003) : The truck driver who allegedly caused a fatal accident had been convicted in Canada of possession of stolen property (punishable by imprisonment in excess of one year), but his conviction had been "absolved" under Canadian law. The Court held that the conviction was properly used to impeach the driver when he testified, since the absolution was not a finding of rehabilitation or innocence.

United States v. Wood, 943 F.2d 1048 (9th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a conviction for tax evasion, holding that the defendant had been properly impeached by evidence of a conviction that had been dismissed under state law, as the dismissal was not based upon a finding of rehabilitation.

United States v. Moore, 556 F.2d 479 (10th Cir. 1977) : In a prosecution for attempting to damage a federal courthouse, the Court held there was no error in denying the defendant's in limine motion to suppress the use of a California felony conviction as impeachment evidence. Although the conviction was expunged, California law provided that it could be used in a State Court for impeachment purposes. The Court held that under Rule 609(c) "the extent of such expungement, must in the instant case be determined by reference to California law."

Wilson v. Attaway, 757 F.2d 1227 (11th Cir. 1985) : In a civil rights action for unlawful arrest, the Court held that a plaintiff could be impeached with evidence that he had pleaded guilty to a first offense charge of battery, pursuant to a state procedure that permitted the plea without entry of judgment and that exonerated the defendant following a successful completion of probation. The Court found that the state law did not provide for rehabilitation and did not involve a finding of rehabilitation.

[d] Rule 609(c) -- Objection to Impeachment Required

United States v. Trejo-Zambrano, 582 F.2d 460 (9th Cir. 1978) : In a prosecution for marijuana offenses, the Court held that it was the defendant's burden to object to introduction of a conviction that had been automatically vacated pursuant to the Federal Youth Corrections Act. The dissenting Judge pointed out that this was a situation in which the prosecutor and defense were equally on notice that the conviction had been set aside.

[e] Rule 609(c) -- Vacated Convictions

United States v. Russell, 221 F.3d 615 (4th Cir. 2000) : The Court vacated a conviction for heroin possession on the ground of ineffective assistance of counsel because the defendant's attorney allowed him to be impeached with convictions, for armed assault with intent to kill and for arson, that had been vacated and were invalid at the time of trial.

United States v. Fisher, 106 F.3d 622 (5th Cir. 1997) : A defendant in a bank fraud prosecution was impeached with evidence of a state conviction for criminal contempt in failing to comply with a turnover order. Soon after the defendant was convicted in this case, the contempt conviction was overturned on the ground that the defendant had not received proper notice of the subject matter of the contempt motion. Reversing denial of his motion for a new trial, the Court held that because of the constitutional infirmity arising from lack of notice, the contempt conviction was improperly admitted against the defendant and the error was not harmless.

[4] Rule 609(d) -- Juvenile Adjudications

United States v. Rogers, 918 F.2d 207 (D.C. Cir. 1990) : Affirming a conviction for possessing crack with intent to distribute, the Court held that the Rule did not bar evidence of other drug possession offenses committed while the defendant was a juvenile when the evidence was admissible under Rule 404(b).

United States v. Ciro, 753 F.2d 248 (2d Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed convictions for cocaine offenses, finding no error in the exclusion of a government witness' juvenile adjudication. The Court observed that there was ample opportunity for the defendants to cross-examine the witness, although it added that it questioned "whether the government was well advised to press the objection" since "the additional evidence could hardly have had a significant effect on the jury's assessment of [the witness'] credibility, but the exclusion of the evidence provided defendants with a serious issue for appeal."

United States v. Ashley, 569 F.2d 975 (5th Cir. 1978) : The Court held that a conviction under the Federal Youth Corrections Act is a conviction of a crime, and that a conviction under the Act does not fall under Rule 609(d) when offered for impeachment purposes. The Court drew a line between a conviction of a crime and a finding of delinquency, holding that Rule 609(d) covers only the latter. In United States v. Decker, n62 the Court affirmed convictions for drug offenses, holding that evidence of a juvenile adjudication offered to impeach a government witness was properly excluded. Although it was not certain whether the Trial Judge relied upon the remoteness of the adjudication or its status as a "juvenile" adjudication, the proponent of the evidence failed to demonstrate that the probative value of the adjudication outweighed its prejudicial effect. The Court also rejected a claim that the Confrontation Clause guaranteed the right to impeach a witness with a juvenile adjudication and distinguished Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308 (1974) , as a case involving bias.

United States v. Morrow, 977 F.2d 222 (6th Cir. 1992) (en banc): Affirming convictions for carrying a firearm in relation to a drug trafficking offense, the Court held that the protections of Rule 609(d) did not apply where the defendant was 19 years old at the time of his arrest and conviction, even though the offense was prosecuted under the Federal Youth Corrections Act.

United States v. Jones, 557 F.2d 1237 (8th Cir. 1977) : Affirming a conviction for robbery of a savings and loan association, the Court held it was not an abuse of discretion to preclude the defendant from impeaching his former girlfriend by eliciting details of her juvenile conviction, after he elicited information that she had been adjudicated as a delinquent, sent to a reformatory, and convicted of a crime equivalent to a felony.

United States v. Williams, 963 F.2d 1337 (10th Cir. 1992) : Affirming convictions for crack cocaine distribution, the Court held there was no violation of confrontation rights when the defendants were prevented from introducing evidence of government witnesses' juvenile records, as the witnesses were not under probation likely to induce bias, the jury was aware of pending charges that might have motivated lying for the government, the witnesses were not key to the prosecution, and the defendants had substantial other evidence with which to impeach the witnesses' credibility.

Samples v. City of Atlanta, 916 F.2d 1548 (11th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the defendants in a § 1983 action by the parents of a youth fatally shot by a police officer, holding that evidence of the decedent's juvenile court records was admissible to impeach the mother's credibility by showing she had not fully disclosed her knowledge of his glue sniffing habit.

[5] Rule 609(e) -- Pendency of Appeal

[a] Rule 609(e) -- Conviction, But No Sentence or Judgment

United States v. Vanderbosch, 610 F.2d 95 (2d Cir. 1979) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, holding there was no error in a ruling that the defendant could be impeached on the basis of a jury's guilty verdict that had not been reduced to judgment and on which sentence had not been imposed.

United States v. Mitchell, 886 F.2d 667 (4th Cir. 1989) : Affirming convictions for obstructing a grand jury investigation, the Court held that the defendant was properly impeached by evidence of a prior conviction, where sentence had not yet been imposed and the time for appeal had not yet run, but his posttrial motions had been denied.

United States v. Klein, 560 F.2d 1236 (5th Cir. 1977) : Affirming convictions on drug charges, the Court upheld a ruling that a conviction by a jury in another case in which no judgment or sentence had yet been entered could be used to impeach the defendant if he chose to testify at trial. The Court analogized to Rule 609(e) and concluded that the difference between a jury verdict of guilty and the entry of the judgment is inconsequential. The Court emphasized that it was not deciding whether a plea of guilty would be admissible before the entry of judgment.

[b] Rule 609(e) -- State Law

United States v. Klayer, 707 F.2d 892 (6th Cir. 1983) : The Court found that federal law permitted impeachment of a defendant with a state conviction that was still on appeal, even though the state evidence law barred the use of a conviction for impeachment purposes until the appeal is decided.

[c] Rule 609(e) -- Suspended Sentence

United States v. Collins, 552 F.2d 243 (8th Cir. 1977) : Affirming convictions for drug offenses, the Court held that one defendant was properly impeached with a prior felony conviction on which the sentence was suspended. "[T]his court fails to find a distinction between a conviction whose finality is still pending during appeal or which has been reversed on appeal and a conviction which is final but upon which a suspended sentence was imposed." We agree with the holding, but strongly urge that convictions reversed on appeal be deemed inadmissible for impeachment purposes.

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

As a means of impeachment, evidence of conviction of crime is significant only because it stands as proof of the commission of the underlying criminal act. There is little dissent from the general proposition that at least some crimes are relevant to credibility but much disagreement among the cases and commentators about which crimes are usable for this purpose. See McCormick § 43; 2 Wright, Federal Practice and Procedure: Criminal § 416 (1969). The weight of traditional authority has been to allow use of felonies generally, without regard to the nature of the particular offense, and of crimen falsi, without regard to the grade of the offense. This is the view accepted by Congress in the 1970 amendment of § 14-305 of the District of Columbia Code, P.L. 91-358, 84 Stat. 473. Uniform Rule 21 and Model Code Rule 106 permit only crimes involving "dishonesty or false statement." Others have thought that the trial judge should have discretion to exclude convictions if the probative value of the evidence of the crime is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Luck v. United States, 348 F.2d 763, 121 U.S. App. D.C. 151 (1965) ; McGowan, Impeachment of Criminal Defendants by Prior Convictions, 1970 Law & Soc. Order 1. Whatever may be the merits of those views, this rule is drafted to accord with the congressional policy manifested in the 1970 legislation. [Editor's Note: The Rule ultimately adopted by Congress, and as amended in 1990, provides for Trial Court balancing of probative value and prejudicial effect as to convictions not involving dishonesty or false statement.]

The proposed rule incorporates certain basic safeguards, in terms applicable to all witnesses but of particular significance to an accused who elects to testify. These protections include the imposition of definite time limitations, giving effect to demonstrated rehabilitation, and generally excluding juvenile adjudications.

Subdivision (a). For purposes of impeachment, crimes are divided into two categories by the rule: (1) those of what is generally regarded as felony grade, without particular regard to the nature of the offense, and (2) those involving dishonesty or false statement, without regard to the grade of the offense. Provable convictions are not limited to violations of federal law. By reason of our constitutional structure, the federal catalog of crimes is far from being a complete one, and resort must be had to the laws of the states for the specification of many crimes. For example, simple theft as compared with theft from interstate commerce. Other instances of borrowing are the Assimilative Crimes Act, making the state law of crimes applicable to the special territorial and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, 18 U.S.C. § 13, and the provision of the Judicial Code disqualifying persons as jurors on the grounds of state as well as federal convictions, 28 U.S.C. § 1865. For evaluation of the crime in terms of seriousness, reference is made to the congressional measurement of felony (subject to imprisonment in excess of one year) rather than adopting state definitions which vary considerably. See 28 U.S.C. § 1865, supra, disqualifying jurors for conviction in state or federal court of crime punishable by imprisonment for more than one year.

Subdivision (b). Few statutes recognize a time limit on impeachment by evidence of conviction. However, practical considerations of fairness and relevancy demand that some boundary be recognized. See Ladd, Credibility Tests -- Current Trends, 89 U. Pa. L. Rev. 166, 176-177 (1940). This portion of the rule is derived from the proposal advanced in Recommendation Proposing an Evidence Code, § 788(5), p. 142, Cal. Law Rev. Comm'n (1965), though not adopted. See California Evidence Code § 788. [Editor's Note: The Rule ultimately adopted by Congress provides for admissibility of convictions more than ten years old when the probative value substantially outweighs the prejudicial effect.]

Subdivision (c). A pardon or its equivalent granted solely for the purpose of restoring civil rights lost by virtue of a conviction has no relevance to an inquiry into character. If, however, the pardon or other proceeding is hinged upon a showing of rehabilitation the situation is otherwise. The result under the rule is to render the conviction inadmissible. The alternative of allowing in evidence both the conviction and the rehabilitation has not been adopted for reasons of policy, economy of time, and difficulties of evaluation.

A similar provision is contained in California Evidence Code § 788. Cf. A.L.I. Model Penal Code, Proposed Official Draft § 306.6(3)(e) (1962), and discussion in A.L.I. Proceedings 310 (1961).

Pardons based on innocence have the effect, of course, of nullifying the conviction ab initio.

Subdivision (d). The prevailing view has been that a juvenile adjudication is not usable for impeachment. Thomas v. United States, 121 F.2d 905, 74 App. D.C. 167 (1941) ; Cotton v. United States, 355 F.2d 480 (10th Cir. 1966) . This conclusion was based upon a variety of circumstances. By virtue of its informality, frequently diminished quantum of required proof, and other departures from accepted standards for criminal trials under the theory of parens patriae, the juvenile adjudication was considered to lack the precision and general probative value of the criminal conviction. While In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 87 S. Ct. 1428, 18 L. Ed. 2d 527 (1967) , no doubt eliminates these characteristics insofar as objectionable, other obstacles remain. Practical problems of administration are raised by the common provisions in juvenile legislation that records be kept confidential and that they be destroyed after a short time. While Gault was skeptical as to the realities of confidentiality of juvenile records, it also saw no constitutional obstacles to improvement. 387 U.S. at 25, 87 S. Ct. 1428 . See also Note, Rights and Rehabilitation in the Juvenile Courts, 67 Colum. L. Rev. 281, 289 (1967). In addition, policy considerations much akin to those which dictate exclusion of adult convictions after rehabilitation has been established strongly suggest a rule of excluding juvenile adjudications. Admittedly, however, the rehabilitative process may in a given case be a demonstrated failure, or the strategic importance of a given witness may be so great as to require the overriding of general policy in the interests of particular justice. See Giles v. Maryland, 386 U.S. 66, 87 S. Ct. 793, 17 L. Ed. 2d 737 (1967) . Wigmore was outspoken in his condemnation of the disallowance of juvenile adjudications to impeach, especially when the witness is the complainant in a case of molesting a minor. 1 Wigmore § 196; 3 id. §§ 924a, 980. The rule recognizes discretion in the judge to effect an accommodation among these various factors by departing from the general principle of exclusion. In deference to the general pattern and policy of juvenile statutes, however, no discretion is accorded when the witness is the accused in a criminal case.

Subdivision (e). The presumption of correctness which ought to attend judicial proceedings supports the position that pendency of an appeal does not preclude use of a conviction for impeachment. United States v. Empire Packing Co., 174 F.2d 16 (7th Cir. 1949) , cert. denied, 337 U.S. 959, 69 S. Ct. 1534, 93 L. Ed. 1758 ; Bloch v. United States, 226 F.2d 185 (9th Cir. 1955) , cert. denied, 350 U.S. 948, 76 S. Ct. 323, 100 L. Ed. 826 and 353 U.S. 959, 77 S. Ct.

868, 1 L. Ed. 2d 910 ; and see Newman v. United States, 331 F.2d 968 (8th Cir. 1964). Contra, Campbell v. United States, 176 F.2d 45, 85 U.S. App. D.C. 133 (1949) . The pendency of an appeal is, however, a qualifying circumstance properly considerable.

[2] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 277 (1999)

Rule 609 -- Impeachment With Prior Convictions

Rule 609 provides that certain prior convictions of a witness can be introduced to impeach the witness's character for veracity. As originally drafted by the Advisory Committee and approved by the Supreme Court, Rule 609(a) provided for automatic admission of all felony convictions, unless it had been more than ten years since the conviction or the witness' confinement thereon, in which case Rule 609(b) provided that the conviction would be absolutely inadmissible. The rule further provided for admissibility of misdemeanor convictions, but only if they involved dishonesty or false statement. The Advisory Committee Note sets forth opposing views on the admissibility of prior convictions. One view, which Congress had previously adopted for the District of Columbia courts, provided for automatic admission of all felonies, and automatic admission of misdemeanors based on dishonesty or false statement. A more moderate view provided that crimes involving dishonesty should be automatically admitted, while other convictions (e.g., murder, bank robbery, etc.) should be excluded. The judgment behind this latter view was that only convictions involving dishonesty or false statement (also called "crimen falsi" convictions) were truly probative of the witness's character for truthfulness. A third view provided, in the words of the Advisory Committee, that "the trial judge should have discretion to exclude convictions if the probative value of the evidence of the crime is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Luck v. United States, 348 F.2d 763, 121 U.S. App. D.C. 151 (1965) ."

The Advisory Committee expressed no view on the merits of these conflicting proposals. It opted for the automatic admissibility view because Congress, in 1970, had taken this position in providing rules of evidence for the District of Columbia courts. See section 14-30 5 of the District of Columbia Code. Rule 609(a) was "drafted to accord with the congressional policy manifested in the 1970 legislation."

Apparently Congress had a change of heart on the matter when it reviewed the proposed Federal Rules of Evidence. As to automatic admission of felonies, the House Committee on the Judiciary report expresses concern over "the danger of unfair prejudice ... and the deterrent effect upon an accused who might wish to testify, and even upon a witness who was not the accused" that would result from automatic admission of all felony convictions for impeachment. The House's position was that only crimen falsi crimes should be admissible. Eventually, Congress settled on a modified approach in Rule 609(a), whereby all recent crimen falsi crimes would be automatically admitted, while felony convictions not involving dishonesty or false statement would be admissible if they pass a judicial balancing of probative value and prejudicial effect; criminal defendants receive a somewhat more protective balancing test with respect to noncrimen falsi crimes, in deference to their constitutional right to testify. (The balancing process for non-crimen falsi crimes was clarified by a 1990 amendment to Federal Rule 609(a)(1).)

The end result is a complex rule. Anyone seeking to master it should not rely on the original Advisory Committee Note, however. It is completely out of sync with the rule as passed and later amended, since it describes the rule as automatically admitting all recent felony convictions, which is not the case. The Advisory Committee Comment to the 1990 amendment to Rule 609(a) is a far more accurate guide to the rule.

As to old crimes (i.e., where more than ten years have passed since conviction or confinement), Congress decided, contrary to the Advisory Committee's position, that they could have probative value in assessing the credibility of a witness. The Senate Committee on the Judiciary stated that "[A]lthough convictions over ten years old generally do not have much probative value, there may be exceptional circumstances under which the conviction substantially bears on the credibility of the witness." Accordingly, Rule 609(b) as adopted states that if more than ten years have passed since the date of conviction or confinement (whichever is later), the conviction can be admitted to impeach the witness, but only if the probative value of the conviction substantially outweighs the risk of prejudice. Yet the Rule 609(b) test, while exclusionary, does not exclude all old convictions. Thus a lawyer attempting to divine the meaning of Rule 609(b) should not look to the Advisory Committee Note. She would get the mistaken impression that convictions more than ten years old can never be admitted.

[3] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

The Advisory Committee note stated: "There is little dissent from the general proposition that at least some crimes are relevant to credibility but much disagreement among the cases and commentators about which crimes are usable for this purpose." The Subcommittee consideration of the Rule made this clear. Sentiment was expressed that only convictions of offenses bearing on credibility should be admissible; as proposed, the Rule had no limitation. Sentiment was expressed in support of the formulation of the 1971 draft -- no conviction should be admissible if "the judge determines that the probative value of the evidence of the crime is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice." Concern was voiced as to whether there should be an arbitrary time limitation such as that contained in subdivision (b), and whether and under what circumstances juvenile adjudications should be admissible.

The Subcommittee draft addresses and disposes of these considerations as follows:

> (1) Subdivision (a) was amended so that convictions of crimes involving dishonesty or false statements are always admissible to attack credibility. However, for all other crimes, convictions of only those which are felonies by Federal standards will be admissible unless the judge determines that the danger of unfair prejudice outweighs the probative value of the evidence of the convictions.
> (2) Subdivision (b) was amended to read in substance as set forth in the 1971 Advisory Committee draft as constituting a fairer, more reasonable, time measure than that in the draft submitted to the Congress.
>
> (3) Subdivision (c) was amended to reflect the Subcommittee's view that, with regard to pardons, annulments, etc., based on rehabilitation, only conviction of a subsequent serious crime (not any crime as the Court draft had proposed) should be sufficient to permit reference to the pardoned conviction for impeachment purposes.
>
> (4) Subdivision (d) was amended to confer upon a judge discretion to admit evidence of juvenile adjudications in criminal cases only. This appeared to be the intention of the Court, judging from the use of the word "accused" in the second sentence of subdivision (d) as submitted to the Congress.

[Subdivision (c) was not amended in the June 28, 1973 draft. Ed.]

[4] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Rule 609(a) as submitted by the Court was modeled after Section 133(a) of Public Law 91-358, 14 D.C. Code 305(b)(1), enacted in 1970. The Rule provided that:

> "For the purpose of attacking the credibility of a witness, evidence that he has been convicted of a > crime is admissible but only if the crime (1) was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year under the law under which he was convicted or (2) involved dishonesty or false statement regardless of the punishment."

As reported to the Committee by the Subcommittee, Rule 609(a) was amended to read as follows:

> "For the purpose of attacking the credibility of a witness, evidence that he has been convicted of a crime is admissible only if the crime (1) was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year, unless the court determines that the danger of unfair
> prejudice outweighs the probative value of the evidence of the conviction, or (2) involved dishonesty or false statement."

In full committee, the provision was amended to permit attack upon the credibility of a witness by prior conviction only if the prior crime involved dishonesty or false statement. While recognizing that the prevailing doctrine in the federal courts and in most States allows a witness to be impeached by evidence of prior felony convictions without restriction as to type, the Committee was of the view that, because of the danger of unfair prejudice in such practice and the deterrent effect upon an accused who might wish to testify, and even upon a witness who was not the accused, cross-examination by evidence of prior conviction should be limited to those kinds of convictions bearing directly on credibility, i.e., crimes involving dishonesty or false statement.

Rule 609(b) as submitted by the Court was modeled after Section 133(a) of Public Law 91-358, 14 D.C. Code 305(b)(2)(B), enacted in 1970. The Rule provided:

> "Evidence of a conviction under this rule is not admissible if a period of more than ten years has elapsed since the date of the release of the witness from confinement imposed for his most recent conviction, or the expiration of the period of his parole, probation, or sentence granted or imposed with respect to his most recent conviction, whichever is the later date."

Under this formulation, a witness' entire past record of criminal convictions could be used for impeachment (provided the conviction met the standard of subdivision (a)), if the witness had been most recently released from confinement, or the period of his parole or probation had expired, within ten years of the conviction.

The Committee amended the Rule to read in the text of the 1971 Advisory Committee version to provide that upon the expiration of ten years from the date of a conviction of a witness, or of his release from confinement for that offense, that conviction may no longer be used for impeachment. The Committee was of the view that after ten years following a person's release from confinement (or from the date of his conviction) the probative value of the conviction with respect to that person's credibility diminished to a point where it should no longer be admissible.

Rule 609(c) as submitted by the Court provided in part that evidence of a witness' prior conviction is not admissible to attack his credibility if the conviction was the subject of a pardon, annulment, or other equivalent procedure, based on a showing of rehabilitation, and the witness has not been convicted of a subsequent crime. The Committee amended the Rule to provide that the "subsequent crime" must have been "punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year," on the ground that a subsequent conviction of an offense not a felony is insufficient to rebut the finding that the witness has been rehabilitated. The Committee also intends that the words "based on a finding of the rehabilitation of the person convicted" apply not only to "certificate of rehabilitation, or other equivalent procedure," but also to "pardon" and "annulment."

[5] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

As proposed by the Supreme Court, the rule would allow the use of prior convictions to impeach if the crime was a felony or a misdemeanor if the misdemeanor involved dishonesty or false statement. As modified by the House, the rule would admit prior convictions for impeachment purposes only if the offense, whether felony or misdemeanor, involved dishonesty or false statement.

The committee has adopted a modified version of the House-passed rule. In your committee's view, the danger of unfair prejudice is far greater when the accused, as opposed to other witnesses, testifies, because the jury may be prejudiced not merely on the question of credibility but also on the ultimate question of guilt or innocence. Therefore, with respect to defendants, the committee agreed with the House limitation that only offenses involving false statement or dishonesty may be used. By that phrase, the committee means crimes such as perjury or subornation of perjury, false statement, criminal fraud, embezzlement or false pretense, or any other offense, in the nature of crimen falsi the commission of which involves some element of untruthfulness, deceit or falsification bearing on the accused's propensity to testify truthfully.

With respect to other witnesses, in addition to any prior conviction involving false statement or dishonesty, any other felony may be used to impeach if, and only if, the court finds that the probative value of such evidence outweighs its prejudicial effect against the party offering that witness.

Notwithstanding this provision, proof of any prior offense otherwise admissible under Rule 404 could still be offered for the purposes sanctioned by that rule. Furthermore, the committee intends that notwithstanding this rule, a defendant's misrepresentation regarding the existence or nature of prior convictions may be met by rebuttal evidence, including the record of such prior convictions. Similarly, such records may be offered to rebut representations made by the defendant regarding his attitude toward or willingness to commit a general category of offense, although denials or other representations by the defendant regarding the specific conduct which forms the basis of the charge against him shall not make prior convictions admissible to rebut such statement.

In regard to either type of representation, of course, prior convictions may be offered in rebuttal only if the defendant's statement is made in response to defense counsel's questions or is made gratuitously in the course of cross-examination. Prior convictions may not be offered as rebuttal evidence if the prosecution has sought to circumvent the purpose of this rule by asking questions which elicit such representations from the defendant.

One other clarifying amendment has been added to this subsection, that is, to provide that the admissibility of evidence of a prior conviction is permitted only upon cross-examination of a witness. It is not admissible if a person does not testify. It is to be understood, however, that a court record of a prior conviction is admissible to prove that conviction if the witness has forgotten or denies its existence.

Although convictions over ten years old generally do not have much probative value, there may be exceptional circumstances under which the conviction substantially bears on the credibility of the witness. Rather than exclude all convictions over ten years old, the committee adopted an amendment in the form of a final clause to the section granting the court discretion to admit convictions over ten years old, but only upon a determination by the court that the probative value of the conviction supported by specific facts and circumstances, substantially outweighs its prejudicial effect.

It is intended that convictions over ten years old will be admitted very rarely and only in exceptional circumstances. The rules provide that the decision be supported by specific facts and circumstances thus requiring the court to make specific findings on the record as to the particular facts and circumstances it has considered in determining that the probative value of the conviction substantially outweighs its prejudicial impact. It is expected that, in fairness, the court will give the party against whom the conviction is introduced a full and adequate opportunity to contest its admission.

[6] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

Rule 609 defines when a party may use evidence of a prior conviction in order to impeach a witness. The Senate amendments make changes in two subsections of Rule 609.

The House bill provides that the credibility of a witness can be attacked by proof of prior conviction of a crime only if the crime involves dishonesty or false statement. The Senate amendment provides that a witness's credibility may be attacked if the crime (1) was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year under the law under which he was convicted or (2) involves dishonesty or false statement, regardless of the punishment.

The Conference adopts the Senate amendment with an amendment. The Conference amendment provides that the credibility of a witness, whether a defendant or someone else, may be attacked by proof of a prior conviction but only if the crime: (1) was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year under the law under which he was convicted and the court determines that the probative value of the conviction outweighs its prejudicial effect to the defendant; or (2) involved dishonesty or false statement regardless of the punishment.

By the phrase "dishonesty and false statement" the Conference means crimes such as perjury or subornation of perjury, false statement, criminal fraud, embezzlement, or false pretense, or any other offense in the nature of crimen falsi, the commission of which involves some element of deceit, untruthfulness, or falsification bearing on the accused's propensity to testify truthfully.

The admission of prior convictions involving dishonesty and false statement is not within the discretion of the Court. Such convictions are peculiarly probative of credibility and, under this rule, are always to be admitted. Thus, judicial discretion granted with respect to the admissibility of other prior convictions is not applicable to those involving dishonesty or false statement.

With regard to the discretionary standard established by paragraph (1) of Rule 609(a), the Conference determined that the prejudicial effect to be weighed against the probative value of the conviction is specifically the prejudicial effect to the defendant. The danger of prejudice to a witness other than the defendant (such as injury to the witness's reputation in his community) was considered and rejected by the Conference as an element to be weighed in determining admissibility. It was the judgment of the Conference that the danger of prejudice to a nondefendant witness is outweighed by the need for the trier of fact to have as much relevant evidence on the issue of credibility as possible. Such evidence should only be excluded where it presents a danger of improperly influencing the outcome of the trial by persuading the trier of fact to convict the defendant on the basis of his prior criminal record.

The House bill provides in subsection (b) that evidence of conviction of a crime may not be used for impeachment purposes under subsection (a) if more than ten years have elapsed since the date of the conviction or the date the witness was released from confinement imposed for the conviction, whichever is later. The Senate amendment permits the use of convictions older than ten years, if the court determines, in the interests of justice, that the probative value of the convictions, supported by specific facts and circumstances, substantially outweighs its prejudicial effect.

The Conference adopts the Senate amendment with an amendment requiring notice by a party that he intends to request that the court allow him to use a conviction older than ten years. The Conferees anticipate that a written notice, in order to give the adversary a fair opportunity to contest the use of the evidence, will ordinarily include such information as the date of the conviction, the jurisdiction, and the offense or statute involved. In order to eliminate the possibility that the flexibility of this provision may impair the ability of a party-opponent to prepare for trial, the Conferees intend that the notice provision operate to avoid surprise.

[7] 1990 Amendment Advisory Committee's Note

1990 Amendment Advisory Committee's Note

[The following is the Advisory Committee Note accompanying the changes to subdivision (a) effective December 1, 1990:]

The amendment to Rule 609(a) makes two changes in the rule. The first change removes from the rule the limitation that the conviction may only be elicited during cross-examination, a limitation that virtually every circuit has found to be inapplicable. It is common for witnesses to reveal on direct examination their convictions to "remove the sting" of the impeachment. See, e.g., United States v. Bad Cob, 560 F.2d 877 (8th Cir. 1977) . The amendment does not contemplate that a court will necessarily permit proof of prior convictions through testimony, which might be time-consuming and more prejudicial than proof through a written record. Rules 403 and 611(a) provide sufficient authority for the court to protect against unfair or disruptive methods of proof.

The second change effected by the amendment resolves an ambiguity as to the relationship of Rules 609 and 403 with respect to impeachment of witnesses other than the criminal defendant. See Green v. Bock Laundry Machine Co., 490 U.S. 504, 109 S. Ct. 1981] (1989) . The amendment does not disturb the special balancing test for the criminal defendant who chooses to testify. Thus, the rule recognizes that, in virtually every case in which prior convictions are used to impeach the testifying defendant, the defendant faces a unique risk of prejudice -- i.e., the danger that convictions that would be excluded under Rule 404 will be misused by a jury as propensity evidence despite their introduction solely for impeachment purposes. Although the rule does not forbid all use of convictions to impeach a defendant, it requires that the government show that the probative value of convictions as impeachment evidence outweighs their prejudicial effect.

Prior to the amendment, the rule appeared to give the defendant the benefit of the special balancing test when defense witnesses other than the defendant were called to testify. In practice, however, the concern about unfairness to the defendant is most acute when the defendant's own convictions are offered as evidence. Almost all of the decided cases concern this type of impeachment, and the amendment does not deprive the defendant of any meaningful protection, since Rule 403 now clearly protects against unfair impeachment of any defense witness other than the defendant. There are cases in which a defendant might be prejudiced when a defense witness is impeached. Such cases may arise, for example, when the witness bears a special relationship to the defendant such that the defendant is likely to suffer some spill-over effect from impeachment of the witness.

The amendment also protects other litigants from unfair impeachment of their witnesses. The danger of prejudice from the use of prior convictions is not confined to criminal defendants. Although the danger that prior convictions will be misused as character evidence is particularly acute when the [criminal] defendant is impeached, the danger exists in other situations as well. The amendment reflects the view that it is desirable to protect all litigants from the unfair use of prior convictions, and that the ordinary balancing test of Rule 403, which provides that evidence shall not be excluded unless its prejudicial effect substantially outweighs its probative value, is appropriate for assessing the admissibility of prior convictions for impeachment of any witness other than a criminal defendant.

The amendment reflects a judgment that decisions interpreting Rule 609(a) as requiring a trial court to admit convictions in civil cases that have little, if anything, to do with credibility reach undesirable results. See, e.g., Diggs v. Lyons, 741 F.2d 577 (3d Cir. 1984) , cert. denied, 105 S. Ct. 2157 (1985) . The amendment provides the same protection against unfair prejudice arising from prior convictions used for impeachment purposes as the rules provide for other evidence. The amendment finds support in decided cases. See, e.g., Petty v. Ideco, 761 F.2d 1146 (5th Cir. 1985) ; Czajka v. Hickman, 703 F.2d 317 (8th Cir. 1983) .

Fewer decided cases address the question whether Rule 609(a) provides any protection against unduly prejudicial prior convictions used to impeach government witnesses. Some courts have read Rule 609(a) as giving the government no protection for its witnesses. See, e.g., United States v. Thorne, 547 F.2d 56 (8th Cir. 1976) ; United States v. Nevitt, 563 F.2d 406 (9th Cir. 1977) , cert. denied, 444 U.S. 847 (1979) . This approach also is rejected by the amendment. There are cases in which impeachment of government witnesses with prior convictions that have little, if anything, to do with credibility may result in unfair prejudice to the government's interest in a fair trial and unnecessary embarrassment to a witness. Rule 412 already recognizes this and excluded [sic] certain evidence of past sexual behavior in the context of prosecutions for sexual assaults.

The amendment applies the general balancing test of Rule 403 to protect all litigants against unfair impeachment of witnesses. The balancing test protects civil litigants, the government in criminal cases, and the defendant in a criminal case who calls other witnesses. The amendment addresses prior convictions offered under Rule 609, not for other purposes, and does not run afoul, therefore, of Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308 (1974) . Davis involved the use of a prior juvenile adjudication not to prove a past law violation, but to prove bias. The defendant in a criminal case has the right to demonstrate the bias of a witness and to be assured a fair trial, but not to unduly prejudice a trier of fact. See generally Rule 412. In any case in which the trial court believes that confrontation rights require admission of impeachment evidence, obviously the Constitution would take precedence over the rule.

The probability that prior convictions of an ordinary government witness will be unduly prejudicial is low in most criminal cases. Since the behavior of the witness is not the issue in dispute in most cases, there is little chance that the trier of fact will misuse the convictions offered as impeachment evidence as propensity evidence. Thus, trial courts will be skeptical when the government objects to impeachment of its witnesses with prior convictions. Only when the government is able to point to a real danger of prejudice that is sufficient to outweigh substantially the probative value of the conviction for impeachment purposes will the conviction be excluded.

The amendment continues to divide subdivision (a) into subsections (1) and (2) thus facilitating retrieval under current computerized research programs which distinguish the two provisions. The Committee recommended no substantive change in subdivision (a)(2), even though some cases raise a concern about the proper interpretation of the words "dishonesty or false statement." These words were used but not explained in the original Advisory Committee Note accompanying Rule 609. Congress extensively debated the rule, and the Report of the House and Senate Conference Committee states that "[b]y the phrase 'dishonesty and false statement,' the Conference means crimes such as perjury, subornation of perjury, false statement, criminal fraud, embezzlement, or false pretense, or any other offense in the nature of crimen falsi, commission of which involves some element of deceit, untruthfulness, or falsification bearing on the accused's propensity to testify truthfully." The Advisory Committee concluded that the Conference Report provides sufficient guidance to trial courts and that no amendment is necessary, notwithstanding some decisions that take an unduly broad view of "dishonesty," admitting convictions such as for bank robbery or bank larceny. Subsection (a)(2) continues to apply to any witness, including a criminal defendant.

Finally, the Committee determined that it was unnecessary to add to the rule language stating that when a prior conviction is offered under Rule 609, the trial court is to consider the probative value of the conviction for impeachment, not for other purposes. The Committee concluded that the title of the rule, its first sentence, and its placement among the impeachment rules clearly establish that evidence offered under Rule 609 is offered only for purposes of impeachment.

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 609, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Supp. to § 609.01 Official Text

[Go To Main]

Rule 609 has been amended effective December 1, 2006. The issues giving rise to the amendment are discussed in the Main Volume at § 609.02[5]. The Committee Note is set forth infra at § 609.04[7.1]. Following is the text of the amended Rule:

Rule 609 Impeachment by Evidence of Conviction of Crime

(a) General rule. -- For the purpose of attacking the The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [credibility] character for truthfulness of a witness,

(1) evidence that a witness other than an accused has been convicted of a crime shall be admitted, subject to Rule 403, if the crime was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year under the law under which the witness was convicted, and evidence that an accused has been convicted of such a crime shall be admitted if the court determines that the probative value of admitting this evidence outweighs its prejudicial effect to the accused; and

(2) evidence that any witness has been convicted of a crime shall be admitted, regardless of the punishment, if it readily can be determined that establishing the elements of the crime required proof or admission of an act of dishonesty or false statement by the witness.

(b) Time limit. -- Evidence of a conviction under this rule is not admissible if a period of more than ten years has elapsed since the date of the conviction or of the release of the witness from the confinement imposed for that conviction, whichever is the later date, unless the court determines, in the interests of justice, that the probative value of the conviction supported by specific facts and circumstances substantially outweighs its prejudicial effect. However, evidence of a conviction more than ten years old as calculated herein, is not admissible unless the proponent gives to the adverse party sufficient advance written notice of intent to use such evidence to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to contest the use of such evidence.

(c) Effect of pardon, annulment, or certificate of rehabilitation. -- Evidence of a conviction is not admissible under this rule if (1) the conviction has been the subject of a pardon, annulment, certificate of rehabilitation, or other equivalent procedure based on a finding of the rehabilitation of the person convicted, and that person has not been convicted of a subsequent crime The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [which] that was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year, or (2) the conviction has been the subject of a pardon, annulment, or other equivalent procedure based on a finding of innocence.

(d) Juvenile adjudications. -- Evidence of juvenile adjudications is generally not admissible under this rule. The court may, however, in a criminal case allow evidence of a juvenile adjudication of a witness other than the accused if conviction of the offense would be admissible to attack the credibility of an adult and the court is satisfied that admission in evidence is necessary for a fair determination of the issue of guilt or innocence.

(e) Pendency of appeal. -- The pendency of an appeal therefrom does not render evidence of a conviction inadmissible. Evidence of the pendency of an appeal is admissible.

[1] Rule 609(a) -- General Rule [Go To Main]

[b] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect

[i] Rule 609(a) -- Accused-Witness

[A] Rule 609(a) -- Error To Admit

United States v. Kemp, 546 F.3d 759 (6th Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for felon firearm possession, the defendant, whose stipulation to having been convicted of a felony had been read to the jury, was impeached with evidence that he had twice been convicted in 1987 of taking indecent liberties with a minor and sentenced to ten years. The Court concluded that "[o]n this record we can see little or no" impeachment value in having the jury know not only that the accused "was a felon simpliciter -- which they already knew -- but that he was this particular kind of felon." Furthermore, "the names of those convictions -- involving as they do sexual contact with minors -- were heavy with prejudice." However, because no sufficient objection was made at trial, the Court applied an "exceedingly deferential" standard of review and was unable to conclude that admission of the names of the crimes was so manifestly incorrect as to amount to plain error.

[B] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Accused-Witness -- Factors To Be Considered

United States v. Jackson, 546 F.3d 801 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed fraud convictions arising from a scheme to submit inflated insurance claims in connection with three motor vehicles that were stolen or damaged. It found no abuse of discretion when a defendant was impeached with his almost-10-year-old conviction for receiving stolen property. The Judge weighed the age of the conviction as a factor against admission, and properly considered that the conviction reflected conduct bearing on the witness' truthfulness (although receiving stolen property is not a crime of dishonesty per se) and that the defendant's credibility would be a key factor in assessing his testimony on the central issues of his intent and state of mind. Any prejudicial effect was mitigated by the standard instruction that the evidence was to be used only in evaluating truthfulness as a witness and for no other purpose.

United States v. Headbird, 461 F.3d 1074 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendant's prior convictions (which, although not specified in the opinion, were apparently for violent felonies) were admitted for impeachment purposes. Because the case hinged on credibility, the defendant's convictions were highly probative: " '[O]ne who has transgressed society's norms by committing a felony is less likely than most to be deterred from lying under oath.' " The Court further held that because the defendant had denied recollection of the convictions, the government was properly allowed to ask more specific questions than those typically allowed, i.e., as to the facts and nature of the previous convictions.

[v] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Prosecution Witnesses

United States v. Jackson, 549 F.3d 963 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed the conviction and death sentence of a federal prisoner charged with killing a fellow inmate, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was prohibited from impeaching a government witness by showing that he was a registered sex offender. The witness had been convicted in the 1980s of sexual assault, sentenced to probation, and required to register as a sex offender. The Court observed that "although the jury might have considered Richards more likely to be untruthful if it had known of his conviction, there is a significant danger that it would have instead improperly discounted his testimony because of personal revulsion for sex offenses"; and the jury already knew the witness had been convicted of other crimes, was currently incarcerated, and had a history of mental disturbance and drug abuse, and that the government would attempt to reduce his sentence in exchange for his testimony.

[vii] Rule 609(a) -- Balancing Probative Value Against Prejudicial Effect -- Title or Nature of Prior Conviction

United States v. Kemp, 546 F.3d 759 (6th Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for felon firearm possession, the defendant, whose stipulation to having been convicted of a felony had been read to the jury, was impeached with evidence that he had twice been convicted in 1987 of taking indecent liberties with a minor and sentenced to ten years. The Court concluded that "[o]n this record we can see little or no" impeachment value in having the jury know not only that the accused "was a felon simpliciter -- which they already knew -- but that he was this particular kind of felon." Furthermore, "the names of those convictions -- involving as they do sexual contact with minors -- were heavy with prejudice." However, because no sufficient objection was made at trial, the Court applied an "exceedingly deferential" standard of review and was unable to conclude that admission of the names of the crimes was so manifestly incorrect as to amount to plain error.

[b.1] Rule 609(a) -- Conviction After Testifying

United States v. Street, 548 F.3d 618 (8th Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for murder in furtherance of a drug transaction, the defense sought to impeach a government witness with not only his prior conviction but also the fact that the witness had testified at the trial, suggesting that the jury in that case had concluded that the witness had lied on the stand. Reversing on other grounds, the Court found no error in excluding the fact that the witness had testified at his trial. To go beyond proving the conviction after a jury trial "and to contest the truthfulness of Pospisil's individual past statements would be to relitigate his prior conviction." The Court noted that the scope of examination into prior convictions is "strictly limited" to the fact, date, and description of the crime charged, "in order to avoid the confusion resulting from the trial of collateral issues, and also to avoid unfairness to the witness."

[c] Rule 609(a) -- Corporate Convictions

Olin Corp. v. Certain Underwriters at Lloyd's London, 468 F.3d 120 (2d Cir. 2006) : In an action to recover indemnification for pollution remediation under CERCLA, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the corporate plaintiff and three employees had been convicted of a misdemeanor in 1979 for intentionally polluting and for knowingly submitting false reports that understated its release of mercury. Even assuming that a corporate representative may be impeached with the corporation's convictions, the probative value of the conviction did not substantially outweigh its prejudicial impact. It dealt with a different time frame than much of the initial pollution at issue in this case, and it may have been highly prejudicial in suggesting that the contamination at issue was intentional.

United States v. Estrada, 430 F.3d 606 (2d Cir. 2005) : The Court held that the Trial Judge "misapplied Rule 609(a)(1) by limiting the scope of impeachment of the government's witnesses, as a matter of policy, to the fact and date of the felony convictions without permitting inquiry into the statutory names of the witnesses' offenses of conviction." The Court noted that Rule 609 contemplates admitting "evidence" of a witness' conviction for impeachment purposes, and declared that the "overwhelming weight of authority" provides that, under Rule 609(a), "inquiry into the essential facts of the conviction, including the nature or statutory name of each offense, its date, and the sentence imposed is presumptively required by the Rule." The Court observed that the nature of the conviction bore on its probative value for impeachment, and thus it was contrary to the Rule 609(a)(1) balancing test to consider all felonies as equal.

United States v. Barnhart, 599 F.3d 737 (7th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a wire fraud conviction, holding that the government was properly permitted to question the defendant under Rule 608(b) about the specific conduct underlying his prior convictions for theft and deceptive practices. It noted that while impeachment under Rule 609 is limited to the fact of the conviction, Rule 608(b) allows inquiry into bad acts underlying the conviction unless their probative value as to the witness's truthfulness is substantially outweighed by their prejudicial effect. In this case, the underlying conduct was "highly relevant to Barnhart's character for truthfulness."

United States v. Osazuwa, 564 F.3d 1169 (9th Cir. 2009) : The Court reversed an inmate's conviction for assaulting a guard because he had been cross-examined extensively about the circumstances of a bank fraud conviction introduced to impeach him. It held that impeachment evidence relating to convictions falls within the exclusive purview of Rule 609, so the details of offenses (even though they involved dishonesty) are not admissible under Rule 608(b), and the scope of the inquiry under Rule 609(a) does not include, except in exceptional circumstances, details of the crime. The Court also rejected an argument that the defendant had opened the door to the cross-examination by testifying he served only one day in jail, thus minimizing the seriousness of the offense, since the testimony was an accurate answer to the question asked and he did not attempt to explain away or otherwise minimize his conviction.

United States v. Lopez-Medina, 596 F.3d 716 (10th Cir. 2010) : Affirming a conviction for possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defense was precluded, without a Rule 403 balancing, from asking a cooperating witness about details underlying his conviction that would have affected the possible penalty. The cross-examiner is entitled to elicit the nature of a conviction offered to impeach, but not to inquire as to the specific underlying facts and circumstances. In United States v. Commanche, 577 F.3d 1261 (10th Cir. 2009) , the Court reversed a conviction for assault with intent to do bodily harm arising from a fight in which the defendant, who claimed self-defense, used a box cutter. The Court held it was error to admit evidence that the defendant had twice been convicted of aggravated battery after altercations in which he brandished sharp cutting instruments: "That Commanche was twice convicted of aggravated battery was properly admissible. That the crimes involved cutting instruments consistent with the box cutter used in the present case was not."

[f] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi

[viii] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Larceny, Robbery, and Theft Offenses

[A] Rule 609(a) -- Shoplifting

Kunz v. DeFelice, 538 F.3d 667 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a judgment for an arrestee suing for excessive force, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the plaintiff had recently been convicted for retail theft.

Although the state considers theft to be a crime of dishonesty for the purposes of its version of Rule 609(a)(2), that designation is not binding on the federal courts. Thus, the evidence was subject to Rule 403 balancing, according to Rule 609(a)(1), and the Judge was entitled to conclude that it was cumulative of other convictions already introduced or inadmissible propensity evidence.

[B] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- Larceny, Robbery, and Theft Offenses -- Other Offenses

United States v. Estrada, 430 F.3d 606 (2d Cir. 2005) : The Court held that a larceny conviction of a government witness was not automatically admissible under Rule 609(a)(2).

United States v. Harper, 527 F.3d 396 (5th Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for drug offenses, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to exclude evidence of a prosecution witness' misdemeanor convictions for theft-by-check, as the offenses have as an element "an act of dishonesty or false statement" and the proof is not subject to Rule 403 balancing.

[xiii] Rule 609(a) -- Dishonesty or Crimen Falsi -- No Balancing

United States v. Harper, 527 F.3d 396 (5th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for drug offenses, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to exclude documentary evidence that a testifying confidential informant had been convicted for theft-by-check, a misdemeanor. The crime has as an element "an act of dishonesty or false statement," so the evidence is not subject to balancing, under Rule 609(a)(2), and the witness did not clearly admit to the convictions, but only indicated that he was "possibly" convicted.

United States v. Collier, 527 F.3d 695 (8th Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for felon firearm possession, the government and the defense stipulated to the fact of the defendant's conviction for the predicate offense, but the Judge rule in limine that the nature of the offense, credit card fraud, would be admissible if the defendant testified. The defendant testified, the impeachment evidence was introduced, and the defendant was convicted. Affirming, the Court rejected an argument that the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect, and held that because the prior conviction required proof of an act of dishonesty or false statement, it was automatically admissible under Rule 609(a)(2) and not subject to Rule 403 balancing. The Court also noted that the predicate felony would be admissible under Rule 609(a)(1), as the offense was highly probative of credibility and not highly prejudicial because "as felonies go it is not a very serious felony."

[k] Rule 609(a) -- In Limine Motions

United States v. Gunter, 551 F.3d 472 (6th Cir. 2009) : Affirming narcotics convictions, the Court held that the defendant failed to preserve a claim of error on the Judge's ruling that if he testified, the government could introduce his prior conviction for impeachment. The defendant did not testify at trial and, on appeal, argued that he was deprived of his constitutional right to testify. The Court noted that the "admissibility of a prior conviction is not appealable where a defendant does not testify." Additionally, there is no constitutional deprivation where a rule merely "deters" a defendant from taking the stand and does not actually "prevent" him from doing so.

United States v. El-Alamin, 574 F.3d 915 (8th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held that because the defendant had introduced his prior convictions, he waived his right to appeal the Judge's denial of his motion in limine to exclude evidence of the convictions.

[k.1] Rule 609(a) -- Misdemeanor Conviction To Prove Bias

United States v. Harper, 527 F.3d 396 (5th Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for drug offenses, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to exclude documentary evidence that a testifying confidential informant had been convicted of the misdemeanor offense of assault by bodily injury involving family violence. The witness admitted that he had been convicted of the offense, but indicated on cross-examination that he was not certain of precisely when he had been convicted. Records showing the dates of arrest and conviction on the family violence charges could have shown that he had a pending charge against him at the time of the defendant's alleged drug transaction and therefore that he would be motivated to "curry favor with the government."

United States v. Allen, 540 F.3d 821 (8th Cir. 2008) : The defendant was convicted of felon firearm possession after a loaded handgun was found under the front passenger seat of a car he was attempting to enter on the passenger side when he was arrested. At trial he called the driver of the car, who testified to borrowing the car from his father without permission and denied any knowledge of the gun's presence. On cross-examination the driver admitted having a misdemeanor conviction for domestic battery and assault. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admission of the conviction evidence. The evidence was not used to cast doubt on the witness' character for truthfulness, which would have violated Rule 609. Rather, because one convicted of misdemeanor domestic battery is prohibited by federal law from possessing a firearm, the evidence tended to show the witness' bias and motivation to deny any knowledge or possession of the gun.

[m] Rule 609(a) -- Opening the Door

United States v. Decoud, 456 F.3d 996 (9th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed convictions for a crack cocaine distribution conspiracy, holding that a defendant waived her right to challenge admission of prior convictions offered to impeach her because she testified about them on direct examination.

[m.1] Rule 609(a) -- Proving the Conviction

United States v. Harper, 527 F.3d 396 (5th Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for drug offenses, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding certified copies of conviction records offered to impeach a prosecution witness, as the witness had admitted the offenses on direct examination and had been cross-examined about the convictions.

[o.1] Summary Judgment

FDIC v. Jeff Miller Stables, 573 F.3d 289 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed partial summary judgment for the FDIC in an action to recover assets transferred by a bank embezzler. The defendants argued that Rule 609 required the Judge to draw the conclusion that the embezzler, a convicted felon, lied in his affidavit when he asserted that he had embezzled the funds that he then transferred to the defendants. The Court noted, however, that the Rule contains no language requiring the trier to draw the inference that an impeached witness's testimony is untrue, so it found no error when the Judge declined to draw an adverse inference as to the affiant's credibility.

[2] Rule 609(b) -- Time Limit [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 609(b) -- Discretion

[ii] Rule 609(b) -- Discretion -- Prosecution Witnesses

United States v. Nguyen, 542 F.3d 275 (1st Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for using extortionate means to collect an extension of credit, finding no abuse of discretion in excluding the victim's slightly more than 10-year-old state court conviction for auto entry. The Court noted that the conviction was stale, it was a property crime that "does not generate much traction along the road toward probative value in connection with the question of its perpetrator's veracity," and the case was not a "he said, he said" case in which the verdict depended on the victim's unsupported testimony. The Court rejected an argument that the witness' conviction should have been admitted to "counterbalance" the defendant's conviction that was admitted to impeach him when he testified, as it rested on a "logical fallacy" that the witness' conviction somehow became more probative of the witness' credibility once the defendant was impeached.

United States v. Heath, 447 F.3d 535 (7th Cir. 2006) : The defendant in a fraud case was permitted to impeach a cooperating coconspirator with nine convictions of the witness in the preceding ten years but no older convictions. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, as the defendant, who identified the precluded convictions only as involving theft, did not satisfy the burden of showing that their probative value substantially outweighed their prejudicial effect, and there were theft convictions among those admitted, so he had a sufficient opportunity to impeach the witness.

[iii] Rule 609(b) -- Discretion -- Witnesses in Civil Cases

Schmude v. Tricam Indus., 556 F.3d 624 (7th Cir. 2009) : The plaintiff in a product liability action arising from a ladder accident had been convicted in 1995 for the sale of firearms without a federal license by a convicted felon. The Judge in the 2008 trial ruled that the probative force of the conviction evidence to impeach substantially outweighed its prejudicial effect, but limited the description of the felony on cross-examination to the sale of firearms without a federal license. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court expressed "qualms about the judge's having rewritten history, so that the jury was given an erroneous description of the felony of which the plaintiff had been convicted." However, it concluded that the Judge made a reasonable choice to avoid having to allow the jury to hear either about two old convictions or about none.

Simpson v. Thomas, 528 F.3d 685 (9th Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed a judgment for a corrections officer sued by an inmate who alleged he was the victim of excessive force, holding it was reversible error to admit three prior convictions of the plaintiff, all of which were more than ten years old. Admitting the convictions on the ground that the prejudice did not outweigh the probative value was wrong for three reasons: "First, the language used by the district court inverts the requirement of Rule 609(b) by requiring the prejudice to outweigh the probative value. Second, the district court did not offer specific facts and circumstances to support its conclusion, as required by Rule 609(b). Third, the language of the Rule requires that the probative value substantially outweighs the prejudice."

[b] Rule 609(b) -- Dishonesty Convictions

Olin Corp. v. Certain Underwriters at Lloyd's London, 468 F.3d 120 (2d Cir. 2006) : In an action to recover indemnification for pollution remediation under CERCLA, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the corporate plaintiff and three employees had been convicted of a misdemeanor in 1979 for intentionally polluting and for knowingly submitting false reports that understated its release of mercury. Even assuming that a corporate representative may be impeached with the corporation's convictions, the probative value of the conviction did not substantially outweigh its prejudicial impact. It dealt with a different time frame than much of the initial pollution at issue in this case, and it may have been highly prejudicial in suggesting that the contamination at issue was intentional.

[g.1] Rule 609(b) -- Release from Confinement

United States v. Rogers, 542 F.3d 197 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to impeach the defendant at his 2005 trial with his 1993 conviction for distribution of cocaine. He had been released from prison on that conviction in 1994 but had remained on probation supervision until 1999. The Court held that "confinement" in Rule 609(b) referred to imprisonment and not to periods of probation or parole. On a post-verdict new trial motion, the Judge had reached the same conclusion and had found that the evidence did not satisfy the stricter balancing test of Rule 609(b), but denied the motion because the error was harmless.

[h] Rule 609(b) -- Timing of Prior Conviction

United States v. Nguyen, 542 F.3d 275 (1st Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for using extortionate means to collect an extension of credit, finding no abuse of discretion in excluding the victim's slightly more than 10-year-old state court conviction for auto entry. The Court was not persuaded that the conviction should have been admitted because it would not have been stale had his trial started a few months earlier, as did the trial of his codefendants. "[W]henever the law draws a line, some events will fall on the 'other' side," and there was no indication "that the government manipulated either the calendar or the scheduling process in order to postpone the trial and allow the clock to run on the auto entry conviction."

United States v. Watler, 461 F.3d 1005 (8th Cir. 2006) : In a trial on drug charges, the Judge admitted testimony about the defendant's previous conviction for grand theft under Rule 609(a), reasoning that it was less than ten years between the defendant's release from confinement and the date on which he was indicted on the instant charges. The Court held that this ruling was error, because the "ten-year time limit should be measured from the date of the conviction or release to the date that the trial begins." Thus, the conviction was admissible if at all under Rule 609(b), and as the government had not provided advance notice under that Rule, it was error to find the conviction admissible. However, the defendant had brought up the conviction on direct examination to reduce the sting, and therefore forfeited his right to appeal the error, under Ohler v. United States, 529 U.S. 753 (2000) .

Simpson v. Thomas, 528 F.3d 685 (9th Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed a judgment for a corrections officer sued by an inmate who alleged he was the victim of excessive force, holding it was reversible error to admit three prior convictions of the plaintiff, all of which were more than ten years old, when the Trial Judge had improperly applied Rule 609(b)'s balancing test. The Court also held that Rule 609(b) applies to a conviction more than ten years old even if has been used to enhance a sentence for a separate conviction that falls within the ten-year time limit: "[T]he plain language of 609(b) excludes evidence of a conviction if it has been more than ten years 'since the date of the conviction or the release of the witness from the confinement imposed for that conviction.' We see no reason to construe this language to mean anything other than exactly what it says."

[5] Rule 609(e) -- Pendency of Appeal [Go To Main]

[a.1] Rule 609(e) -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Jackson, 549 F.3d 963 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed the conviction and death sentence of a federal prisoner charged with killing a fellow inmate, finding no abuse of discretion when a defense witness was impeached with two convictions for capital murder. Although the Court had held, prior to the witness' testimony in the instant case, that the witness could not be convicted on two counts for the same offense, it had stayed the mandate, which did not issue until after the witness testified. The Court concluded that the witness was correctly impeached with both convictions given Rule 609(e), and commented that the defendant had the right to present information about the witness' appeal to ameliorate the impeachment.

The amendment provides that Rule 609(a)(2) mandates the admission of evidence of a conviction only when the conviction required the proof of (or in the case of a guilty plea, the admission of) an act of dishonesty or false statement. Evidence of all other convictions is inadmissible under this subsection, irrespective of whether the witness exhibited dishonesty or made a false statement in the process of the commission of the crime of conviction. Thus, evidence that a witness was convicted for a crime of violence, such as murder, is not admissible under Rule 609(a)(2), even if the witness acted deceitfully in the course of committing the crime.

The amendment is meant to give effect to the legislative intent to limit the convictions that are to be automatically admitted under subsection (a)(2). The Conference Committee provided that by "dishonesty and false statement" it meant "crimes such as perjury, subornation of perjury, false statement, criminal fraud, embezzlement, or false pretense, or any other offense in the nature of crimen falsi, the commission of which involves some element of deceit, untruthfulness, or falsification bearing on the [witness's] propensity to testify truthfully." Historically, offenses classified as crimina falsi have included only those crimes in which the ultimate criminal act was itself an act of deceit. See Green, Deceit and the Classification of Crimes: Federal Rule of Evidence 609(a)(2) and the Origins of Crimen Falsi, 90 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 1087 (2000).

Evidence of crimes in the nature of crimina falsi must be admitted under Rule 609(a)(2), regardless of how such crimes are specifically charged. For example, evidence that a witness was convicted of making a false claim to a federal agent is admissible under this subsection regardless of whether the crime was charged under a section that expressly references deceit (e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 1001, Material Misrepresentation to the Federal Government) or a section that does not (e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 1503, Obstruction of Justice).

The amendment requires that the proponent have ready proof that the conviction required the factfinder to find, or the defendant to admit, an act of dishonesty or false statement. Ordinarily, the statutory elements of the crime will indicate whether it is one of dishonesty or false statement. Where the deceitful nature of the crime is not apparent from the statute and the face of the judgment -- as, for example, where the conviction simply records a finding of guilt for a statutory offense that does not reference deceit expressly -- a proponent may offer information such as an indictment, a statement of admitted facts, or jury instructions to show that the factfinder had to find, or the defendant had to admit, an act of dishonesty or false statement in order for the witness to have been convicted. Cf. Taylor v. United States, 495 U.S. 575, 602 (1990) (providing that a trial court may look to a charging instrument or jury instructions to ascertain the nature of a prior offense where the statute is insufficiently clear on its face); Shepard v. United States, 125. S.Ct. 1254 (2005) (the inquiry to determine whether a guilty plea to a crime defined by a nongeneric statute necessarily admitted elements of the generic offense was limited to the charging document's terms, the terms of a plea agreement or transcript of colloquy between judge and defendant in which the factual basis for the plea was confirmed by the defendant, or a comparable judicial record). But the amendment does not contemplate a "mini-trial" in which the court plumbs the record of the previous proceeding to determine whether the crime was in the nature of crimen falsi.

The amendment also substitutes the term "character for truthfulness" for the term "credibility" in the first sentence of the Rule. The limitations of Rule 609 are not applicable if a conviction is admitted for a purpose other than to prove the witness's character for untruthfulness. See, e.g., United States v. Lopez, 979 F.2d 1024 (5th Cir. 1992) (Rule 609 was not applicable where the conviction was offered for purposes of contradiction). The use of the term "credibility" in subsection (d) is retained, however, as that subdivision is intended to govern the use of a juvenile adjudication for any type of impeachment.

Rule 610. Religious Beliefs or Opinions

Evidence of the beliefs or opinions of a witness on matters of religion is not admissible for the purpose of showing that by reason of their nature the witness' credibility is impaired or enhanced.

CHAPTER 610 RULE 610

1-610 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 610.02

610.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Basic Rule

The religious beliefs or opinions of a witness cannot be the subject of inquiry for impeachment or rehabilitation purposes. In other words, a party cannot impeach witnesses by showing that their religious beliefs are of one type or another and cannot show that because of their religious beliefs their credibility is impaired or enhanced. The Rule is probably grounded in a judgment that such evidence is not highly probative, and that it is unseemly for Courts to invade unnecessarily this very personal sphere of a witness' life. As one Court put it, the purpose of the Rule is "to guard against the prejudice which may result from disclosure of a witness' faith." n1 The Rule protects against disclosure of traditional as well as non-traditional religious beliefs. n2

[2] Concern with Overbreadth

At first blush, Rule 610 appears to be so attuned to First Amendment and privacy concerns that it is beyond criticism. We fear, however, that it is overbroad. For example, if a fundamental tenet of a religion is that government is a false god that should be fought and not obeyed, a member of the religious group might not be a trustworthy witness. n3 At a time when religion and politics are difficult to separate, and when non-traditional religious groups seem to be proliferating, an absolute ban on evidence of membership may result in the exclusion of evidence that is quite probative of credibility.

[3] Relationship to Bias

Some Courts have implied that Rule 610 should not bar proof of religious affiliation when it is offered to show bias, i.e., a motive to testify falsely in the specific action. n4

An example of a case where a bias exception to Rule 610 should have been applied is Malek v. Federal Ins. Co., 994 F.2d 49 (2d Cir. 1993) . Malek was an insurance dispute in which the plaintiffs' financial stability became a contested issue. The plaintiffs, who were Hasidic Jews, called an accountant to testify. The Trial Court permitted defense counsel on cross-examination to bring out the fact that the accountant was a member of the Hasidic community, as were the plaintiffs, and that the accountant had many clients in the Hasidic community.

On appeal, the Court found that this cross-examination was prohibited by Rule 610, and it reversed the judgment for the defendants. The Court objected to what it stated was the defendant's attempt to show that the accountant's "character for truthfulness was affected by his religious beliefs." The Court found this line of inquiry particularly troubling because "the impeached witness' religious affiliation is the same as that of the plaintiffs."

We believe, however, that the dissenting Judge in Malek had the better of the argument. He concluded that "the questioning represented a completely legitimate attempt to impeach [the accountant] by showing that his livelihood depended in large part on his relationship with the Hasidic community, a community of which Mr. Malek was a member." Thus, the fact that the plaintiffs and the accountant had a shared religious affiliation was more, and not less, reason to allow the inquiry. As the dissenter noted, the questions on cross-examination were directed primarily at the witness' livelihood. The accountant was not asked whether he was devout, what his particular beliefs were, or any similar questions that would have dealt with his religious belief and thus would clearly have violated Rule 610. n5 In our view, a bias exception to Rule 610 should be applicable in a case such as Malek. While there may be cases requiring difficult line-drawing, Rule 610 should not be read to totally preclude all references to the witness' religion.

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Rushing, 313 F.3d 428 (8th Cir. 2002) (inquiry into witness' conversion to Christianity was barred by Rule 610).

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., United States v. Sampol, 636 F.2d 621, 666 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (no error to prohibit inquiry into a witness' belief in the "Luceme religion" so long as the witness stated on voir dire that he had no religious beliefs that would cause him to violate his oath to testify truthfully).

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., United States v. Teicher, 987 F.2d 112 (2d Cir. 1993) (impeachment of a Jewish witness for his belief in "Messianic thought," where the defendants were Jewish, was properly prohibited under Rule 610; that Rule does provide an exception to permit inquiry into religious beliefs to show a witness' bias; however, the witness' religious views were not probative of bias in this case, where he stated to the Trial Judge that he did not want to testify and that "one of the cardinal rules is that Jews aren't supposed to turn other Jews over").

(n5)Footnote 5. Compare Contemporary Mission, Inc. v. Bonded Mailings, Inc., 671 F.2d 81 (2d Cir. 1984) (Rule 610 precluded inquiry into the genuineness of a witness' religious devotion).

610.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

Malek v. Federal Ins. Co., 994 F.2d 49 (2d Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed a judgment against Hasidic Jewish insureds who sued to recover the proceeds of a fire policy, holding that it was error to permit impeachment of the plaintiffs' accountant, called to testify as to their financial stability, with questions about the other Hasidic people he represented. The Court concluded that the questions attempted to show that the witness' character was affected by his religious beliefs. The dissenting Judge argued that the questions went to bias, not religious belief. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 610.02[3]. In United States v. Kalaydjian, n1 the Court held that a defendant in a drug case was not entitled to cross-examine a government witness regarding his reasons for deciding to affirm rather than to swear on the Koran. It noted that not only does every witness have the right to affirm, but also that the defense inquiry would have violated Rule 610.

Government of Virgin Islands v. Petersen, 553 F.2d 324 (3d Cir. 1977) : Affirming the defendant's conviction for second-degree murder, the Court noted that the religious beliefs of a witness called by the defense were inadmissible under Rule 610 if used to enhance the witness' credibility. For any other purpose, the evidence would have been irrelevant.

Tisdale v. Federal Express Corp., 415 F.3d 516 (6th Cir. 2005) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in a Title VII retaliation case, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to allow reading into the record deposition testimony from a witness regarding his religious beliefs, on the ground it was "the witness's statement as to why he thinks he's a credible witness." Such use of evidence of religious beliefs to affect credibility is expressly prohibited by Rule 610.

Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. v. Thien, 63 F.3d 754 (8th Cir. 1995) : In a declaratory judgment action to determine whether a fellow-employee exclusion in a liability policy applied to a fatal crash of a company plane, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of certain witnesses' religious beliefs, which had been offered to show they were biased. Evidence that the witnesses were members of the church of which a defendant was pastor had been properly admitted to show bias, but their particular religious beliefs were irrelevant to showing bias and inadmissible under Rule 610 to impair credibility otherwise.

Advisory Committee's Note

While the rule forecloses inquiry into the religious beliefs or opinions of a witness for the purpose of showing that his character for truthfulness is affected by their nature, an inquiry for the purpose of showing interest or bias because of them is not within the prohibition. Thus disclosure of affiliation with a church which is a party to the litigation would be allowable under the rule. Cf. Tucker v. Reil, 51 Ariz. 357, 77 P.2d 203 (1938) . To the same effect, though less specifically worded, is California Evidence Code § 789. See 3 Wigmore § 936.

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 610, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 610 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

United States v. Dohan, 508 F.3d 989 (11th Cir. 2007) (per curiam): The Court affirmed convictions arising from a Ponzi scheme, finding no violation of Rule 610 when a cooperating witness said that he was a "moral, Christian man." The unsolicited comment came on redirect, after defense counsel had cross-examined the witness on why the jury should believe him at trial when he had previously committed perjury and other bad acts. The prosecutor did not ask further questions to show that the witness' credibility was enhanced by his religious beliefs, and defense counsel did not object, but instead attempted on recross to ask his own impermissibly religious question.

Rule 611. Mode and Order of Interrogation and Presentation

(a) Control by court. -- The court shall exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of interrogating witnesses and presenting evidence so as to (1) make the interrogation and presentation effective for the ascertainment of the truth, (2) avoid needless consumption of time, and (3) protect witnesses from harassment or undue embarrassment.

(b) Scope of cross-examination. -- Cross-examination should be limited to the subject matter of the direct examination and matters affecting the credibility of the witness. The court may, in the exercise of discretion, permit inquiry into additional matters as if on direct examination.

(c) Leading questions. -- Leading questions should not be used on the direct examination of a witness except as may be necessary to develop the witness' testimony. Ordinarily leading questions should be permitted on cross-examination. When a party calls a hostile witness, an adverse party, or a witness identified with an adverse party, interrogation may be by leading questions.

[1] Judicial Control Over Mode and Order of Proof

Rule 611(a) codifies the traditional role of the Judge, which is to exercise reasonable control over the manner in which proceedings are conducted in order to ensure that witnesses and parties are fairly treated and that the search for truth is not impaired by presentation of prejudicial, confusing, or extraneous material.

The Rule implicitly provides for balancing analogous to Rule 403. Subdivision (a) provides that the Court shall exercise control over the ways in which witnesses are interrogated and real evidence is presented in order to avoid wasting time and to protect witnesses from harassment, unnecessary embarrassment, or any other improper or abusive tactic. n1

Rule 611(a) can be invoked to supplement Rule 403 in situations in which a witness is being harassed or humiliated. Damage to the witness' personal interests (as distinct from a party's interest) is ordinarily not considered "prejudice" within the meaning of Rule 403, 608, or 609. That is, Courts have not used Rule 403 or 608 or 609 to prohibit cross-examination or impeachment on the ground that it is unduly prejudicial to the witness' interest independent from that of a party to the action. (See the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 608, § 608.02[4], for a discussion on this point.) However, under Rule 611(a), the Trial Court has authority to protect the interests of a witness when necessary, and presumably that means that cross-examination and impeachment could be limited if was unduly harassing or humiliating. It should also be remembered that in civil cases arising from sexual misconduct, Rule 412 specifically requires the Trial Court to consider the prejudice suffered by the victim in determining the admissibility of the victim's sexual history.

Of course, Rule 611(a) cannot be employed to limit the cross-examination of a prosecution witness where to do so would violate the defendant's right to confrontation. n2

Rule 611(a) is infrequently cited. Yet, it is a Rule that is continually used during a trial. It permits the Trial Judge to allow or disallow changes in the order of proof, rebuttal evidence, surrebuttal evidence, recall of witnesses, reopening of a case once a party has rested, and many other requests that are made in the course of a trial. n3 Also, Trial Courts have sometimes exercised authority under Rule 611(a) to permit a witness to testify in narrative form, when that would expedite the trial or assist the search for truth. n4 Rule 611(a) also provides the Trial Court the necessary authority to rule on traditional objections to questioning such as "argumentative," "compound," "asked and answered," etc.

Rule 611(a) also is significant in that it provides the authority for a Trial Judge to allow the use of summary charts and exhibits based on evidence adduced at trial. As discussed in our Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 1006, § 1006.02[5], many opinions have cited that Rule as authorizing summaries of trial evidence, even though the placement and language of Rule 1006 indicate that it is intended to provide a substitute for presentation at trial of voluminous evidence and an escape from the Best Evidence Rule. Rule 611(a) is much more apt authority for summaries of evidence that has already been presented at trial. The Rule plainly gives the Trial Judge leeway to permit or to disallow various forms of summary evidence in the interests of promoting a fair trial. n5

[2] Abuse of Discretion

Appellate Courts are understandably deferential to the Trial Judge's exercise of power over the trial under Rule 611(a). But there are limits; and occasionally an Appellate Court holds that a Trial Judge should have exercised some control and authority and did not. n6 Appellate Courts are especially sensitive to an imbalance in the presentation to the jury that might have been rectified by judicial intervention. For example, Loinaz v. EG & G, Inc., 910 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1990) , was a fraud and breach of contract case in which the evidence basically came down to a credibility determination among witnesses. The plaintiff had two witnesses (Diego Loinaz and Mary Loinaz), and the defendant had one (Mr. Francisco). After the plaintiffs' first witness testified, the defendant asked the Trial Judge that it be allowed, under Rule 611(a), to present its witness out of turn. The defendant explained that due to a personal emergency, Francisco would not be available after the close of the plaintiff's case-in-chief. The plaintiffs objected to this disruption of their order of proof, and argued that Francisco had been deposed and that the deposition could be used instead of live testimony. The Trial Judge sided with the plaintiffs and refused to change the usual order of proof, but the Court of Appeals found reversible error. The Court began its analysis by noting its discomfort at intervening in questions of trial management and presentation of witnesses:

> The defendant is asking us to rule that it was denied a fair trial because the judge refused to ... permit a witness to be presented out of turn. Such rulings by appellate courts are particularly distasteful. Decisions regarding the management of the trial calendar and the courtroom proceedings are particularly within the province of the trial judge, and her determinations will not be disturbed by us absent a finding that she abused her discretion. Appellate judges, reading sterile, written documents, cannot know all that preceded the challenged judgment, so they must be mindful that there may be factors the record does not reveal. They must also be wary of the tendency to employ hindsight that encompasses the entire case, to consider evidence and circumstances, including the ultimate outcome, that were not available to the judge at the time of her ruling.
> However, although the view from the appellate court is not perfect, a trial court's discretion is not unlimited. If we believe that the trial judge's discretionary decisions have resulted in undue prejudice to the appellant's case, we will reverse. [A] judge abuses her discretion when a relevant factor that should have been given significant weight is not considered, when an irrelevant or improper factor is considered and given significant weight, or when all proper and no improper factors are considered, but the court in weighing those factors commits a clear error of judgment.

Despite its reservations, the Court found an abuse of discretion because of the imbalance of proof that was created when the defendant's important witness testified by way of deposition:

> Because of the [Trial Court's] decision, the defendant could not present to the jury a person who would rebut the plaintiffs' version of the facts, a person whom the jury could evaluate in the same manner they had Diego and Mary Loinaz. The plaintiffs' presentation of Diego and Mary Loinaz to the jury was very important because the case was ... about two people who claimed to be harmed by the defendant's actions. ... Their testimony as witnesses made the case real -- here were the man and the > woman whose claims the jury must decide. The defendant could offer the jury nothing to compare with the persons of Diego and Mary Loinaz; all they had were "canned" answers read back by an employee of the court. ...

> If possible, it is always better if the jury can observe the witness firsthand to judge his or her demeanor. In this case, it was possible for the jury to observe Francisco firsthand, if the Rule 611 motion had been granted.

The Loinaz Court rejected the plaintiffs' argument that to grant the Rule 611 motion would have resulted in undue prejudice to the plaintiffs:

> The plaintiffs claim that they would have been prejudiced if the testimony of Francisco had been taken out of turn and allowed to interrupt their presentation of their case. Certainly, the general rule is that a party should be able to present his case and order that case as he sees fit. However, Rule 611 has carved out an exception to this general rule and requires the trial judge to control the presentation of evidence in the interest of ascertaining truth. The dynamics of a party's presentation may be compromised when the testimony of an opposing witness is allowed to interrupt that presentation, but Rule 611 recognizes that such an alteration in order may be necessary at times. ... The plaintiffs have failed to show that they would have been seriously affected by an interruption in their presentation of evidence. Certainly, their prejudice would not rise near that experienced by the defendant.
> Likewise, the trial judge failed to articulate any persuasive reasons that an interruption in the plaintiffs' order of proof would harm the court. The court's schedule would not have been compromised, and any confusion to the jury that the interruption might have created could have been cured by instructions from the judge. It is possible that a court's authority could be threatened by frivolous interruptions in the court's orderly administration of justice. However, this requested interruption was not frivolous, and the simplistic statement by the court that "this is not the way things are done" is inadequate. n7

We believe that the Court of Appeals in Loinaz failed to give the Trial Judge sufficient deference. n8 The Trial Court was presented with possible prejudice on both sides. Rejecting the Rule 611 motion meant that the defendant could not present a live witness. But granting the Rule 611 motion would have meant a disruption in the plaintiffs' order of proof, and undoubtedly an appeal for a Rule 611 violation if the plaintiffs had lost. It is possible that the defendants suffered more prejudice by the absence of live testimony than the plaintiffs would have suffered by a rearrangement of the order of proof. But where the possible harm on either side of a Rule 611 decision is even remotely equivalent, we believe that the Trial Judge must be given the benefit of the doubt. n9

[3] Completeness

Rule 611(a) can be and has been used by Trial Courts as a means of enforcing a rule of completeness with respect to testimonial evidence, i.e., a rule of "verbal completeness." The rule of completeness embodied in Rule 106 appears on its face to apply only to documents, though it has been applied more broadly. n10 However, any doubt as to the applicability of Rule 106 to testimony about an oral statement is mooted by the Trial Judge's authority under Rule 611(a) to apply the completeness principle to witness testimony. n11 A good example of the application of Rule 611(a) as a rule permitting verbal completeness is United States v. Castro, 813 F.2d 571 (2d Cir. 1987) . Castro was tried with Pozo for a drug crime. When he was arrested, he told the police officer that he knew that there were drugs at the scene, but that the drugs were Pozo's. At trial, the officer to whom the statement was made was called to testify to a redacted version of this statement. Redaction was required to protect Pozo's right to confrontation under Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123 (1968) . But if the statement were simply redacted to cut out all reference to Pozo, the officer would testify that "Castro told me he knew there were drugs at the scene." The Trial Court therefore exercised its authority under Rule 611(a), and required the witness to testify that "Castro said he knew there were drugs at the scene, but he denied that the drugs were his." The Court of Appeals found this to be an appropriate exercise of discretion under Rule 611(a). It analyzed the completeness question as follows:

> Rule 106 governs only writings, since in practice verbal precision cannot be expected when the source of evidence as to an utterance is the memory of a witness. However, ... while verbal precision may be unnecessary, the testimony should at least represent the tenor of the utterance as a whole, and not mere fragments of it.
> Moreover, Rule 611(a) empowers and obligates the district court to take account of these considerations. ... Accordingly, whether we operate under Rule 106's embodiment of the rule of completeness, or under the more general provision of Rule 611(a), we remain guided by the overarching principle that it is the trial court's responsibility to exercise common sense and a sense of fairness to protect the rights of the parties while remaining ever mindful of the court's obligation to protect the interest of society in the ascertainment of truth.

The Castro Court found that the Trial Judge had acted appropriately in recrafting Castro's statement so that "the gist of Castro's statement was presented without unduly prejudicing the right of Pozo to avoid being implicated by a codefendant's out-of-court statement, or the right of Castro to have his conduct and statement presented in context."

[4] Questioning by Jurors

Occasionally Trial Judges have invoked Rule 611(a) to permit the questioning of witnesses by jurors. While Appellate Courts have not found this practice to be a per se abuse of discretion, it is clear that the practice is frowned upon. As the Court noted in United States v. Bush, 47 F.3d 511 (2d Cir. 1995) , questioning by jurors "risks turning jurors into advocates" and "creates the risk that jurors will ask prejudicial or other improper questions." The Bush Court observed that prejudicial lines of questioning could not easily be remedied by the Trial Judge, because "remedial measures taken by the court to control jurors' improper questions may embarrass or even antagonize the jurors if they sense that their pursuit of the truth has been thwarted by rules they do not understand." Finally, the Court expressed concern that juror questioning "will often impale attorneys on the horns of a dilemma" because an attorney, by objecting to a question from a juror, risks alienating the jury. n12 The Bush Court concluded that the balance of the prejudicial effect arising from juror questioning, against the benefits of issue-clarification, will "almost always lead trial courts to disallow juror questioning, in the absence of extraordinary or compelling circumstances."

Assuming that compelling circumstances can be found which might permit the jurors to question witnesses, it is clear that the Trial Judge must maintain strict control over the procedure. The Court in United States v. Collins, 226 F.3d 457 (6th Cir. 2000) , set forth the following procedural safeguards that should be undertaken before jurors' questions are permitted:

> When a court decides to allow juror questions, counsel should be promptly informed. At the beginning of the trial, jurors should be instructed that they will be allowed to submit questions, limited to important points, and informed of the manner by which they may do so. The court should explain that, if the jurors do submit questions, some proposed questions may not be asked because they are prohibited by the rules of evidence, or may be rephrased to comply with the rules. The jurors should be informed that a questioning juror should not draw any conclusions from the rephrasing of or failure to ask a proposed question. Jurors should submit their question in writing without disclosing the content to other jurors. The court and the attorneys should then review the questions away from the jurors' hearing, at which time the attorney should be allowed an opportunity to present any objections. n13 The court may modify a question if necessary. When the court determines that a juror question should be asked, it is the judge who should pose the question to the witness. n14

[5] Scope of Cross-Examination

Most common-law jurisdictions adhere to the view that the scope of cross-examination as of right does not extend beyond the scope of the subject matter testified to on direct examination. This is the position taken by Rule 611(b). n15 Congress rejected the Advisory Committee's proposal that would have provided for cross-examination on any relevant subject about which the witness is knowledgeable.

The rationale of the Rule is that the party who calls the witness ordinarily should be allowed its own order of proof, and that cross-examination beyond the subject matter of direct would be an unwarranted disruption. Of course, the Rule does not mean that the witness can never be asked about the unrelated subject matter. The solution is for the adverse party to call the witness during its own case-in-chief. n16 Because the Rule is simply a timing mechanism, its application does not violate the defendant's constitutional right to develop adequately the testimony of adverse witnesses. n17

The Rule provides that the Judge has discretion to permit a broader scope of cross-examination. It appears that Judges have often exercised this discretion, especially where the witness would be substantially inconvenienced by having to testify on two separate occasions, or where expanded cross-examination might expedite the proceedings or assist in the search for truth. n18

Of course, the scope limitation of Rule 611(b) does not restrict impeachment of the witness' credibility. n19 A party can impeach a witness on cross-examination even if the subject matter of the witness' credibility was not addressed on direct. This is because the witness' credibility is always an underlying issue, independent of the subject matter of the direct testimony. n20

A party who goes beyond the scope of the direct examination, with the Court's permission, may not ask leading questions (unless the witness is hostile); that is, the examination must be conducted as if it were the witness' direct examination. n21

[6] Leading Questions

Rule 611(c) codifies the traditional common-law rule that leading questions should be confined to cross-examination and should not be asked on direct examination. The Rule does state that leading questions may be asked on direct examination if necessary to develop the testimony of the witness. Often leading questions are asked in order to refresh the recollection of a witness or to quicken the pace of a trial. Also, leading questions may be necessary if the witness is a young child, or is frightened or uncommunicative. n22

A hostile witness, an adverse party, or a person identified with an adverse party may be interrogated on direct examination by leading questions. n23 The final two sentences of Rule 611(c) leave the state of the law confused with respect to whether the party who cross-examines a witness that the Judge has identified as hostile or adverse to the adversary can ask leading questions. To the extent that the direct examination has produced favorable evidence for the party calling the witness, leading questions by the other side would appear to be warranted. If the direct examination is favorable to the cross-examiner, Courts have justifiably treated the cross-examination as delayed direct examination and have denied the cross-examiner a chance to lead an already favorable witness. n24

The rule against leading questions is obviously a flexible one. An Appellate Court will rarely, if ever, reverse on the sole ground of a violation of Rule 611(c). n25 Such an error, if it exists, is extremely unlikely to be prejudicial enough to warrant a reversal. This is because counsel who continually lead friendly witnesses are probably doing the client a disservice; the factfinder wants to hear testimony from the witness, not from counsel. Moreover, the lawyer who feels the need to construct a leading question for a friendly witness runs the risk that the witness may not even understand what the question is. n26

[7] Hostile or Adverse Witnesses

Is any witness who gives unfavorable testimony to a party a hostile or adverse witness within the meaning of Rule 611? This is a difficult question to answer. At common law, more of a showing of hostility was needed than simply a demonstration that the witness had adverse testimony to give. The requirement of a greater showing before leading questions were allowed went hand in hand with the rule that a party could not impeach its own witness. This tandem tended to place direct examiners in an uncomfortable position in dealing with witnesses whose testimony they wished to probe, and even to pick apart, in order to prove their case. Rule 607 provides that a party may impeach its own witness. Since one form of impeachment is asking leading questions to test the witness' credibility, one might think that the party who called a witness who gave damaging testimony against that party should be able to ask leading questions for impeachment. Such a reading of the Rules would result in prohibition of leading questions on direct examination where the witness is favorable to the calling party but would recognize that leading questions may be a form of impeachment when a witness gives unfavorable testimony. To us this reading makes good sense. But the proper relationship between impeachment and scope of examination is largely developed on a case-by-case basis.

It is clear, however, that a witness is not "hostile" to a party simply because he or she is named on the adversary's witness list. n27 Rule 607 allows a party to call hostile witnesses, so a mere listing by a litigant is an insufficient basis upon which to consider the witness hostile to the other side.

[8] Cross-Examination of Criminal Defendants

Nothing in Rule 611 resolves the continuing controversy over the proper scope of cross-examination of a defendant who waives the privilege against self-incrimination and testifies. We agree with the Advisory Committee that "the extent of the waiver of the privilege against self-incrimination ought not to be determined as a by-product of a rule on scope of cross-examination." Congress demonstrated its concern that the privilege not be unnecessarily invaded in the second paragraph of Rule 608 as well as in Rule 104(d), which states that an accused "does not, by testifying on a preliminary matter, become subject to cross-examination as to other issues in the case." A similar concern leads us to recommend that the defendant be subject to cross-examination only to the extent necessary to fairly test the statements made upon direct examination and clear inferences that might be drawn from such statements. In other words, a rule of "verbal completeness" would be an appropriate test with which to determine the scope of a waiver. This position respects the privilege, but ensures that it does not give the defendant an extra tactical weapon not contemplated by the Constitution. n28

We note that the accused who elects to testify opens the door to impeachment under Rules 608 and 609 that can be damaging. n29 Thus, the decision to waive the privilege involves costs as well as benefits.

Soto-Beniquez, 350 F.3d 131 (1st Cir. 2003)* (rebuttal evidence properly permitted where the defendant opened the door to an issue not addressed in the government's principal case); United States v. Puckett, 147 F.3d 765 (8th Cir. 1998) (no abuse of discretion where the Trial Court allowed the prosecution to recall law enforcement witnesses during the trial so that evidence could be presented in chronological order); Berroyer v. Hertz, 672 F.2d 334 (3d Cir. 1982) (no abuse of discretion under Rule 611(a) where the Trial Court permitted the plaintiff to call a "rebuttal" witness in her case-in-chief after the defendant obtained permission to call its expert out of turn); United States v. Burgess, 691 F.2d 1146 (4th Cir. 1982) (upholding the Trial Judge's exclusion of surrebuttal evidence that was repetitive of evidence offered in the case-in-chief for the defense); United States v. Gaertner, 705 F.2d 210 (7th Cir. 1983) (the Trial Judge did not err in permitting the government to offer rebuttal evidence to refute specific testimony of defense witnesses and in rejecting surrebuttal testimony, which would have been a repetition of the defense testimony that the government had rebutted).

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., United States v. Young, 745 F.2d 733, 761 (2d Cir. 1984) (a Trial Judge "has broad discretion in deciding whether or not to allow narrative testimony"; it was proper in the instant case to permit narrative testimony to explain videotape evidence).

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., United States v. Stiger, 371 F.3d 732 (10th Cir. 2004) (charts were not admissible under Rule 1006 because they summarized expert opinion rather than voluminous evidence not admitted at trial; but the charts were admissible under Rule 611(a) because they assisted the jury in putting together the testimony in a complex trial); United States v. Posada-Rios, 158 F.3d 832 (5th Cir. 2000) (no abuse of discretion where the government was permitted to display throughout the trial a time-line and organizational charts; the charts were not admitted into evidence, but were simply pedagogical devices, and the jury was repeatedly instructed as to their proper purpose); United States v. Johnson, 54 F.3d 1150 (4th Cir. 1995) (in a complex conspiracy case, the prosecution relied upon a detective to explain the testimony given by prior witnesses and to lay the foundation for an organizational chart that was admitted into evidence; the Trial Judge properly exercised discretion under Rule 611(a) to admit the chart and foundational testimony; the chart helped the jury understand the testimony, and the Trial Judge took proper precautions by assuring that the person who prepared the chart was available for cross-examination, and instructing the jury that it had to weigh the significance of the underlying testimony when looking at the chart); United States v. Paulino, 935 F.2d 739 (6th Cir. 1991) (no error in permitting a witness to give testimony explaining an organizational chart that showed the various players and their roles in the alleged drug conspiracy and a chart that indicated the cash generated from cocaine sales for a specified period; a proper cautionary instruction was given at the close of evidence, the defendants had full opportunity to cross-examine the witness, and the charts were not substantially inconsistent with the evidence adduced at trial).

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., United States v. Taylor, 210 F.3d 311 (5th Cir. 2000) (reversing the defendant's drug convictions because a government chart purporting to list the players in a conspiracy did not accurately reflect the testimony at trial; it showed connections to the defendant that did not exist and gave her a more central role in the conspiracy than the evidence supported); United States v. Noushfar, 78 F.3d 1442 (9th Cir. 1996) (the Trial Judge committed reversible error in sending to the jury room, over the defendant's objection, 14 tapes that had not been played in the courtroom, together with a tape recorder; the Trial Judge "completely abdicated control of the presentation of the evidence," and "made no analysis of whether undue emphasis might be placed on some of the recorded conversations"). See also Patrick v. City of Detroit, 906 F.2d 1108 (6th Cir. 1990) (error under Rule 611(a) for the Trial Court to refuse to allow the defendant to recall the plaintiff during the defendant's case).

(n7)Footnote 7. See also First Nat'l Bank & Trust Co. v. Hollingsworth, 931 F.2d 1295 (8th Cir. 1991) (the defendant did not attend the initial stage of the trial because the plaintiff never subpoenaed him, so the plaintiff read his extensive pretrial deposition into the record as an admission; when the defendant later attempted to testify as part of the defense case, the Trial Judge excluded the testimony on the ground the defendant had already testified at length through his deposition; the Court of Appeals found it an abuse of discretion and plain error not to give the defendant an opportunity to allow the jury to observe his demeanor and pass upon his credibility).

(n8)Footnote 8. For a case with facts similar to Loinaz, where the Court expressed concern about the Trial Court's resolution but found no reversible error, see Traylor v. Husqvarna Motor, 988 F.2d 729 (7th Cir. 1993) (the plaintiff's expert testified on direct on Friday, and stated that he would not be available for cross-examination on Monday; the Judge decided that the cross-examination would be videotaped on Saturday and played for the jury on Monday; the plaintiffs argued that the witness should have instead been recalled for cross-examination on Tuesday or Wednesday, when he would have been available; the Court of Appeals stated: "Although we have no objection to videotaped testimony and do not believe that the fact that this witness's direct testimony was live and his cross-examination taped was a reversible error, we do think this sort of dual media testimony is generally a bad idea"; the Court cited studies showing that live testimony is more effective than other forms of presenting evidence).

(n9)Footnote 9. See United States v. Branham, 97 F.3d 835 (6th Cir. 1996) (the Trial Court did not abuse its discretion in declining to require the government to play all audiotapes of conversations involving two defendants and a government informant in chronological order in its case-in-chief; the Trial Judge told the defendants that they could play the tapes in their suggested order as part of the defense case; this was sufficient to ensure that the jury would not be confused or misled).

(n10)Footnote 10. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 106, § 106.02[2], for a discussion of this point.

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Li, 55 F.3d 325 (7th Cir. 1995) (Rule 611(a) gives Trial Judges the same authority regarding oral statements as Rule 106 grants regarding written and recorded statements).

(n12)Footnote 12. See also United States v. Collins, 226 F.3d 457 (6th Cir. 2000) , in which the Court listed the following dangers inherent in juror questioning of witnesses: "jurors can find themselves removed from their appropriate role as neutral fact-finders; jurors may prematurely evaluate the evidence and adopt a particular position as to the weight of that evidence before considering all the facts; the pace of trial may be delayed; there is a certain awkwardness for lawyers wishing to object to juror-inspired questions; and there is a risk of undermining litigation strategies." Also, there is a risk "that a sense of camaraderie among jurors may lead them to attach more significance to questions propounded by fellow jurors than those posed by counsel."

(n13)Footnote 13. See also United States v. Ricketts, 317 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 2003) (error for the Trial Court to permit jurors to submit questions to witnesses without counsel first being allowed to review those questions).

(n14)Footnote 14. See also United States v. Douglas, 81 F.3d 324 (2d Cir. 1996) (the Trial Judge employed proper procedure by requiring juror questions to be in writing, and by asking the questions himself, after reviewing them with counsel; however, the Judge "exceeded his allowable discretion by inviting questions both at the start of the trial and at the end of each witness' testimony"; this error was harmless, however, because the juror questions were directed at only two witnesses, neither of whom was the defendant, and the questions were "few in number and of slight significance").

(n15)Footnote 15. See, e.g., United States v. Vasquez, 858 F.2d 1387 (9th Cir. 1988) (in a drug prosecution, the Court held that questions concerning items in the defendant's apartment -- i.e., drugs and cash -- were within the scope of direct examination where the defendant claimed that he had left his apartment and had left alone).

(n16)Footnote 16. See, e.g., United States v. Southers, 583 F.2d 1302 (5th Cir. 1978) (Trial Judge properly prevented the defendant from offering his good character evidence under Rule 404(a) by cross-examining government witnesses; the defendant could subsequently call these witnesses to testify for the defense).

(n17)Footnote 17. See, e.g., United States v. McLaughlin, 957 F.2d 12 (1st Cir. 1992) (no abuse of discretion or Confrontation Clause violation where the defendant was precluded from cross-examining government agents about an unrelated fraud scheme, as the evidence went beyond the scope of the direct examination; had the defendant wished to adduce new evidence in support of his defense, he could have called the agents as defense witnesses).

(n18)Footnote 18. See, e.g., Sturm v. Clark Equip. Co., 547 F. Supp. 144 (W.D. Mo. 1982) , aff'd, 732 F.2d 161 (1984) (in a product liability action, the District Court ruled that it was proper for the defendant to examine the plaintiff's witness with regard to his familiarity with the product and warnings to the injured person -- subject matter beyond the scope of direct examination -- where leading questions were not permitted and the procedure made it unnecessary for the witness to be recalled later in the trial).

(n19)Footnote 19. See, e.g., United States v. Lara, 181 F.3d 183 (1st Cir. 1999) (no violation of Rule 611(b) where questions asked on cross-examination were pertinent to the witness' credibility).

(n20)Footnote 20. See, e.g., United States v. Smalley, 754 F.2d 944, 951 (11th Cir. 1985) ("Matters affecting the credibility of the witness are always relevant on cross-examination."); United States v. Arnott, 704 F.2d 322, 324 (6th Cir. 1983) ("The subject matter of direct examination and issues of witness credibility are always open to cross-examination.").

(n21)Footnote 21. See, e.g., MDU Resources Group v. W.R. Grace & Co., 14 F.3d 1274 (8th Cir. 1994) :

> Grace should not be permitted to ask leading questions in its attempt to establish its statute of limitations defense through cross-examination of witnesses called by MDU in its case-in-chief, unless those witnesses' direct testimony bears significantly on the limitations issue, or unless Grace can sufficiently demonstrate that those witnesses are hostile.

(n22)Footnote 22. See, e.g., United States v. Grassrope, 342 F.3d 866 (8th Cir. 2003) (leading questions permitted in child sex abuse prosecution: "It is not uncommon that the precise physiological details of sexual assault must be elicited by focused questioning. We have repeatedly upheld the use of leading questions to develop the testimony of sexual assault victims, particularly children."); United States v. Archdale, 229 F.3d 861 (9th Cir. 2000) (no error in the prosecution's use of leading questions in the examination of a child allegedly the victim of sexual abuse; the witness was having a difficult time testifying about a very personal matter); United States v. Rodriguez-Garcia, 983 F.2d 1563 (10th Cir. 1993) (no abuse of discretion in permitting the prosecutor to ask leading questions of a witness testifying through an interpreter because he did not speak English).

(n23)Footnote 23. See, e.g., United States v. Olivo, 69 F.3d 1057 (10th Cir. 1995) (the Trial Judge did not abuse his discretion in permitting the government to treat its key witness as hostile and ask that witness leading questions: "It is unclear from the record whether he was recalcitrant or merely forgetful; however he did state he was uncomfortable in the courtroom and hesitant to testify.").

(n24)Footnote 24. See, e.g., Woods v. Lecureux, 110 F.3d 1215, 1221 (6th Cir. 1997) ("a district court should be hesitant to authorize the use of leading questions when it is cross-examination in form only").

(n25)Footnote 25. See, e.g., United States v. Ranney, 719 F.2d 1183 (1st Cir. 1983) (rejecting the defendants' claim that the prosecutor's questions were impermissibly leading and stating that "[r]arely, if ever, will an appellate court interfere with the trial judge's broad discretion to control the mode and order of interrogation"); United States v. DeFiore, 720 F.2d 757 (2d Cir. 1983) (rejecting the claim that the Trial Judge should not have permitted the prosecutor to lead government witnesses; the Court noted that the Rule contains "words of suggestion, not command," and indicated that reversals for improper use of leading questions will be extremely rare); Stine v. Marathon Oil Co., 976

F.2d 254 (5th Cir. 1992) (the Court noted its almost total unwillingness to reverse for improper use of leading questions).

(n26)Footnote 26. See, e.g., Woods v. Lecureux, 110 F.3d 1215, 1221 (6th Cir. 1997) ("Far from suggesting an answer to the witness, this particularly egregious line of questioning confused the witness such that he did not even know what the question was.").

(n27)Footnote 27. See, e.g., Suarez Matos v. Ashford Presbyterian Community Hosp., 4 F.3d 47 (1st Cir. 1993) (leading questions should not have been permitted on direct examination, where the only indication of hostility was that the witness had been named on the adversary's witness list).

(n28)Footnote 28. See, e.g., United States v. Hearst, 563 F.2d 1331 (9th Cir. 1977) (where the defendant testified that she was under duress at the time of a bank robbery, she waived the privilege with respect to questions on cross-examination concerning a later period in which she acted voluntarily; the government's questions were "reasonably related" to the defendant's testimony). See also Lesko v. Lehman, 925 F.2d 1527 (3d Cir. 1991) (a defendant who testifies at a capital sentencing hearing concerning biographical information does not waive the privilege with respect to the circumstances of the crime).

(n29)Footnote 29. See, e.g., United States v. Palmer, 536 F.2d 1278 (9th Cir. 1976) (if the defendant takes the stand he may be impeached like any other witness, and the breadth of the waiver of the privilege against self-incrimination is determined by the permissible scope of direct examination).

611.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Rule 611(a) -- Control by Court

[a] Rule 611(a) -- Avoiding Needless Consumption of Time

United States v. Levine, 180 F.3d 869 (7th Cir. 1999) : Affirming a mail fraud conviction, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the Judge repeatedly told counsel to desist from a line of cross-examination and move to another; counsel repeatedly ignored orders to move along, insisted on returning to subjects that had been foreclosed, and could not explain why he wanted to pursue lines of inquiry that mystified the Judge.

United States v. Cody, 114 F.3d 772 (8th Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed a cocaine conviction, finding no error when defense counsel was prohibited from using a tape recording of suppression hearing testimony to impeach a police officer. The Trial Judge had indicated that he would permit defense counsel to impeach the witness by playing portions of the tape-recorded testimony provided that it was cued to the proper spot, but defense counsel wanted a five-minute recess to cue the tape after each allegedly inconsistent statement. The Court concluded that the Judge had wide discretion to decide that this procedure would cause unnecessary delay and waste of time.

[b] Rule 611(a) -- Completing Oral Statements

United States v. Castro, 813 F.2d 571 (2d Cir. 1987) : This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 611.02[3].

United States v. Li, 55 F.3d 325 (7th Cir. 1995) : In the trial of a kickback scheme between a union and a health care provider, the government called the union president to testify to a conversation in which the defendant admitted making payments to his codefendant. The president was not permitted to testify, however, that when he asked the defendant why he did not report the codefendant's apparent extortion earlier, the defendant replied that the codefendant

"would put an axe in my head." Reiterating its analysis in United States v. Haddad, 10 F.3d 1252 (7th Cir. 1993) , that Rule 611(a) gives Trial Judges the same authority regarding oral statements as Rule 106 grants regarding written and recorded statements, the Court found there was no abuse of discretion. The alleged threat was not necessary to explain or understand the defendant's admission, and it was not needed to avoid misleading the jury, since the defendant had explicitly not pursued a coercion defense.

[c] Rule 611(a) -- Cross-Examination of Friendly Witness

Argentine v. United Steel Workers of Am., 287 F.3d 476 (6th Cir. 2002) : In an action challenging imposition of a trusteeship on a local of a labor union, the plaintiffs called an auditor employed by the defendant USWA during their case in chief. Concluding that the witness was essentially a USWA witness, the Judge did not allow cross-examination of the witness after the direct examination but instead required USWA to call the witness during its case-in-chief a week later. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in delaying USWA's examination, as it would be a cross-examination only be in form and not in fact.

[d] Rule 611(a) -- Deposition Testimony

Stine v. Marathon Oil Co., 976 F.2d 254 (5th Cir. 1992) : In partially reversing the judgment in an action on an oil lease, the Court noted its great concern regarding the Trial Judge's practice of having excerpts of depositions provided for the jury to read overnight, instead of having deposition testimony read in open Court. This "takeout evidence" was a substantial burden on the jurors, with risks of their reading the excerpts totally outside the Judge's control and of their perhaps even returning the excerpts unread, but both parties agreed to the procedure and the Court presumed that the jury followed instructions to read the material, so the procedure was not plain error.

R.B. Matthews, Inc. v. Transamerica Transp. Servs., 945 F.2d 269 (9th Cir. 1991) : The defendant in a breach of contract action refused to produce two of its employees or bring them within subpoena range, so the plaintiff read excerpts from their depositions. The Court held that an order precluding the defendant from thereafter offering their live testimony was not an abuse of discretion, as it would not skew discovery and the defendants had engaged in gamesmanship.

Gracia v. Lee, 976 F.2d 1344 (10th Cir. 1992) : The plaintiffs in a medical malpractice action took a "discovery" deposition of the defendant and later, because of his ill health, a "preservation" deposition. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding at trial excerpts from the first deposition, which the plaintiffs contended would have undermined the relatively stronger case the defendant was able to present through the second deposition. The Court reasoned that the plaintiffs had elected not to use the excerpts when taking the second deposition, which would have provided the defendant with an opportunity to address, on videotape for the benefit of the jury, any concerns raised by his earlier testimony.

[e] Rule 611(a) -- Documents Referenced in Testimony

United States v. Marshall, 307 F.3d 1267 (10th Cir. 2002) : In a prosecution for felon firearm possession, the defense cross-examined a police officer regarding his testimony that he saw the defendant pulling and tugging at his waistband as he fled from the police. The defense noted that the officer did not mention this in his incident report, but the officer responded that he had noted it in his arrest affidavit. Affirming, the Court upheld the admission of both the incident report and the arrest affidavit, noting that "[a]dmission of both reports allowed the jury to accurately weigh the officer's credibility without a potentially confusing series of second-hand accounts from witnesses regarding the contents of the incident report and the arrest affidavit."

[f] Rule 611(a) -- Examination of Adverse Party

Rodriguez v. Banco Cent. Corp., 990 F.2d 7 (1st Cir. 1993) : In a civil racketeering suit, the Court affirmed a directed verdict for the defendants, holding there was no error when the plaintiffs were precluded from using leading questions to examine certain defendants. Although the Court observed that the rules generally permit leading questions to be used against an adverse party, it indicated that Rule 611(a) might empower a Trial Judge to disallow such questions, for example, if they would tend to distort the testimony of a witness. In any event, the plaintiffs made no showing of specific information that might have been elicited with leading questions, so any error was harmless. In an antitrust action by a physician who had been denied hospital privileges, Elgabri v. Lekas, 964 F.2d 1255, 1992-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P69838 (1st Cir. 1992) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in limiting the plaintiff's direct examination of defendants to subject matter that could not be obtained in any other manner. There is no unfettered right to call an adverse party on direct examination as part of one's case-in-chief, and the plaintiff was able vigorously to cross-examine the defendants when they presented their own cases.

Patrick v. City of Detroit, 906 F.2d 1108 (6th Cir. 1990) : The plaintiff in a civil rights suit against police officers for using excessive force in making an arrest had been cross-examined by counsel for one of the officers regarding liability but not the extent of damages. The Court held that Rule 611(a) did not authorize precluding the officer from calling the plaintiff as an adverse witness after a directed verdict motion had been denied and cross-examining him regarding the extent of damages, especially when counsel had indicated his intention to do so and the Judge had not indicated disapproval.

[g] Rule 611(a) -- Exclusion of Party Testimony

First Nat'l Bank & Trust Co. v. Hollingsworth, 931 F.2d 1295 (8th Cir. 1991) : The defendant did not attend the initial stage of the trial on a civil RICO claim because the plaintiff never subpoenaed him, so the plaintiff read his extensive pretrial deposition into the record as an admission. When his counsel later attempted to call the defendant to testify as part of the defense case, the Trial Judge excluded the testimony on the ground that the defendant had already testified at length through his deposition. The Court vacated a judgment for the plaintiff, holding that in the absence of some proper basis in the record it was an abuse of discretion and plain error not to give the defendant an opportunity to allow the jury to observe his demeanor and pass upon his credibility. The case was remanded for a determination whether the defendant's testimony would have any evidentiary value helpful to the defense.

[h] Rule 611(a) -- Exhibits

United States v. Hans, 738 F.2d 88 (3d Cir. 1984) : The Court reversed a bank robbery conviction on the ground that the jury was permitted to inspect two "windbreakers" during its deliberations, even though they had not been admitted as evidence, and the jury was not informed that the chief prosecution witness did not believe the windbreakers were the ones worn by the robbers. In Hughes v. Hemingway Transp., Inc., n1 the Judge observed that even where state law provides the rule of decision, the determination as to whether exhibits may be taken to the jury room is left to the sound discretion of the Federal Court.

United States v. Salerno, 108 F.3d 730 (7th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a conviction for murder in a racketeering enterprise, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the jurors to file past a scale model of the crime scene. Although the defense objected that the procedure was overly dramatic, suggesting mourners filing past a casket, the Court noted that the Trial Judge had been concerned whether all the jurors could view the model from the jury box, and had taken precautions against the jurors having contact with government witnesses, agents, or attorneys when viewing the model. The Court also held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the model to go into the jury room during deliberations.

United States v. Noushfar, 78 F.3d 1442 (9th Cir. 1996) : Reversing convictions for illegal importation of goods and money laundering, the Court held it was error to send to the jury room, over the defendants' objection, 14 tapes that had not been played in the courtroom, together with a tape recorder. The Court said that the Trial Judge "completely abdicated control of the presentation of the evidence," and "made no analysis of whether undue emphasis might be placed on some of the recorded conversations."

[i] Rule 611(a) -- Headphones

United States v. Talley, 194 F.3d 758 (6th Cir. 1999) : The defendant in a drug trial argued that the jurors should have listened to audiotaped evidence through one loudspeaker rather than through separate headphones, as the quality of the headsets could differ and different jurors would end up hearing different things. The Court held that in the absence of any evidence of technical or hearing difficulties, there was no abuse of discretion in using headsets, which were adopted in an attempt to ensure that the jurors properly and clearly heard the evidence.

[j] Rule 611(a) -- Jurors' Questioning of Witnesses

United States v. Cassiere, 4 F.3d 1006 (1st Cir. 1993) : In a complex wire fraud prosecution arising out of a "land flip" scheme, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting 11 juror questions, which were relatively bland in character and designed to clarify and explain testimony already given, but cautioned that the practice should be reserved for exceptional situations.

United States v. Ajmal, 67 F.3d 12 (2d Cir. 1995) : Reversing a heroin conviction, the Court held that allowing the jury to question witnesses (including the defendant) was an abuse of discretion. The Court observed that "jurors may prematurely evaluate the evidence and adopt a particular position as to the weight of that evidence before considering all the facts," and "juror questioning is particularly troublesome when it is directed at the defendant himself in a criminal trial." In United States v. Bush, 47 F.3d 511 (2d Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, finding no plain error when jurors were permitted to ask limited questions clarifying confusion about certain relevant physical facts during the defendant's testimony. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 611.02[4]. In United States v. Douglas, n2 the Court held that the Trial Judge employed proper procedures, but "exceeded his allowable discretion by inviting questions both at the start of the trial and at the end of each witness' testimony." The error was harmless, however, because the questions were directed at only two witnesses (not the defendant) and were "few in number and of slight significance." See also United States v. Thompson n3(it was error, but harmless, where the Judge invited the jurors to submit questions as each witness had finished testifying on direct and cross-examination; only a minimal number of questions were actually submitted, and they were in the nature of clarification rather than argumentation).

United States v. Hernandez, 176 F.3d 719 (3d Cir. 1999) : The Court held in a hijacking case that there was no abuse of discretion where jurors were permitted to pose questions for witnesses. As a matter of first impression in the Circuit, the Court approved the procedure used in the case: the jurors could submit handwritten questions to the Judge, who would review them and permit counsel to see them and make any objections deemed appropriate; the Judge would determine the propriety of the questions outside the jury's hearing before asking them; and the Judge, rather than the jurors or the attorneys, would put the questions to the witness. The Court noted that "the dangers of allowing jurors to ask questions orally far outweighs any perceived benefit of allowing juror questioning of witnesses."

United States v. Polowichak, 783 F.2d 410 (4th Cir. 1986) : In a marijuana importation case, the Court disapproved of the Trial Judge's inviting juror questioning and permitting a juror to ask questions in the hearing of other jurors. Reversal of the convictions was not required, however. In DeBenedetto v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., n4 the Court affirmed a judgment for a tire manufacturer in a product liability case. Although it found that the Trial Judge had discretion to permit a juror's question to be asked, it also observed that "the practice of juror questioning is fraught with dangers which can undermine the orderly progress of the trial to verdict."

United States v. Ricketts, 317 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions for various offenses involving a drug conspiracy, the Court held it was error (but harmless) for the Trial Judge to permit jurors to submit five questions to witnesses without counsel first being allowed to review those questions. In a case in which the Trial Judge invited jurors to submit written questions to witnesses, United States v. Collins, 226 F.3d 457 (6th Cir. 2000) , the Court held that "while allowing jurors to ask questions during criminal trials is permissible and best left to the discretion of the trial judge, the routine practice of juror questioning should be discouraged. Nonetheless, we discern no abuse of discretion in this case." This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 611.02[4].

United States v. Feinberg, 89 F.3d 333 (7th Cir. 1996) : The Court expressed serious reservations regarding the practice, but found no plain error in permitting the jurors to ask questions orally of witnesses during an extortion trial.

United States v. Johnson, 914 F.2d 136 (8th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed convictions for offenses connected with the defendant's operation of a "chop shop" for stolen and wrecked vehicles, finding no error in permitting the jurors to question witnesses. The questions were asked only after counsel had completed their examinations, the Trial Judge considered the questions before allowing answers to be given, counsel were allowed to re-examine the witnesses after the questions, and the record did not reveal that the jury's neutrality was affected or its judgment altered by the questions asked.

United States v. Richardson, 233 F.3d 1285 (11th Cir. 2000) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when jurors were permitted to pose questions for the witnesses in a complex six-week money laundering, fraud, and embezzlement trial. The Trial Judge had employed all the recommended prophylactic measures, requiring written submissions, providing counsel with the opportunity to object privately, and exercising discretion about which questions to ask, and had several times through the trial instructed the jury as to the limited purpose of the questions, the proper use of the procedure, and the danger of reaching conclusions before all the evidence had been received.

[k] Rule 611(a) -- Limitations on Examination

Other cases involving limitations on examination are annotated in § 607.03[13].

[i] Abuse of Discretion

United States v. Foster, 982 F.2d 551 (D.C. Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed a conviction for possessing crack cocaine with intent to distribute because counsel was not permitted to cross-examine the key prosecution witness on, inter alia, his explanation why the defendant had much less cash on him at the time of arrest than would be expected of someone who had just made two drug sales. In Harbor Ins. Co. v. Schnabel Found. Co., 946 F.2d 930 (D.C. Cir. 1991)

, a negligence action to determine financial responsibility arising out of damage at a construction site, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to limit cross-examination of the defendant's principal expert witness where the purpose of the cross-examination was to show that the witness lacked personal knowledge of the sites he had described as comparable to the project at issue.

United States v. Vega Molina, 407 F.3d 511 (1st Cir. 2005) : In the trial of multiple defendants for murders following a botched robbery, the Judge significantly limited one codefendant's cross-examination of a cooperating witness in order to prevent introduction of another codefendant's prior bad acts. The Court reversed the first codefendant's conviction, holding that the restrictions violated his Confrontation Clause rights because he was prevented from exploiting subjects that would have cast serious doubt on the witness' trustworthiness and from presenting his main theory of defense, that the witness and the second codefendant had conspired to frame him. In a bank fraud prosecution, United States v. Mulinelli-Navas, 111 F.3d 983 (1st Cir. 1997) , the Court held that the defendant was denied her Sixth Amendment rights when she was precluded on relevancy grounds from eliciting that a cooperating witness had been introduced to her by the highest officer of the bank. That restriction kept her from presenting a theory of defense that the witness had conspired not with her but with the officer in the fraud scheme.

Nemir v. Mitsubishi Motors Corp., 381 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 2004) : When the plaintiff in a personal injury action attempted to impeach a defense causation expert with an excerpt from a book co-authored by another expert, Spitz, who was retained by the defendant, the Judge instructed the plaintiff to save such questioning for Sptiz's testimony. Then, when the plaintiff attempted to cross-examine Spitz about the excerpt, the Judge prohibited the questioning as beyond the scope of his direct testimony. Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the plaintiff was erroneously prevented by the Judge's rulings from introducing relevant impeachment evidence. Affirming a tax fraud conviction in United States v. Stavroff, 149 F.3d 478 (6th Cir. 1998) , the Court found it was error (but harmless) when the Judge precluded defense counsel from cross-examining a cooperating witness about the witness' hopes and expectations in pleading guilty, since the defendant has a constitutional right to impeach the witness for bias. Excluding a question sua sponte and in front of the jury unduly highlights the question for the jury and may unfairly cast defense counsel in a bad light.

United States v. Schoneberg, 396 F.3d 1036 (9th Cir. 2005) : A cooperating witness in a marijuana distribution and money laundering case had already been sentenced and had been told by doctors that he could expect to die in prison from cystic fibrosis. To counter the inference that the witness had nothing to gain by lying, the defense introduced evidence that he had a plea bargain, but it was precluded from cross-examining the witness about whether his testimony was affected by the possibility of a sentence reduction and from getting the witness to confirm that the U.S. Attorney would be the sole judge of the truthfulness of his testimony for the purpose of seeking a sentence reduction. Reversing, the Court held that the restrictions left the jury not fully informed about the witness' motivation to lie and were an abuse of discretion. In United States v. Wilmore, 381 F.3d 868 (9th Cir. 2004) , a prosecution witness at a trial for felon firearm possession testified to the events of the day but denied having seen the defendant with a gun. The government then introduced the witness' grand jury testimony that she saw him with a gun. When the prosecutor then asked whether she lied to the grand jury, she claimed her Fifth Amendment privilege. On cross-examination, the defense was limited to exploring her testimony about the events but prohibited from asking about her grand jury testimony. Reversing, the Court held it was a violation of the Confrontation Clause not to permit inquiry into whether the witness was testifying in return for leniency for legal troubles of her own or had lied to obscure the fact that the coat in which the gun was found was hers. The Court noted that it had established a general rule that where a government witness invokes the Fifth Amendment on cross-examination, the witness' direct testimony must be stricken unless the refusal to answer concerns only collateral matters. In a wire fraud case, United States v. Adamson, n5 the defendant had told a Hewlitt-Packard investigator that improper payments to two H-P employees had been solicited by the employees, and the defendant's brother, also present at the interview, said little more than "That's true." When the brother subsequently testified for the government that they had been bribing the employees, the defendant sought to impeach him, arguing that his silence was an adoption of the defendant's account. The Court held it was an abuse of discretion and a violation of confrontation rights to limit impeachment of the brother to the statements he had made at the interview and to exclude the defendant's statements as hearsay more prejudicial than probative under Rule 403. The defendant's statements at the interview were needed to place the witness' statements and silence in context; they were not hearsay because they were not being offered for their truth; and they were "exceedingly probative and only minimally, if at all, prejudicial." In a prosecution for embezzling from an ERISA pension plan, United States v. Harris, n6 one of the principal government witnesses was the defendant's sister, who was also the widow of the defendant's frequent investment partner. At the time she testified, the pension trust was suing her husband's estate on a promissory note. The estate's theory was that the note was not valid, and convicting the defendant of fraud would support that theory. The widow thus would benefit from the defendant's conviction, but the Judge would not let the defense ask her anything about the other lawsuit, apparently on the ground that the examination would go too far afield from the direct examination. The Judge also limited cross-examination of former employees suing the defendant for breach of fiduciary duty to questions about the nature of their dispute but not how much they were suing him for. The Court held these rulings were an abuse of discretion, although harmless error. The defense has a Confrontation Clause right to show possible motivations that prosecution witnesses may have to falsify their testimony, and the Judge's discretion to avoid undue consumption of time and confusion of issues cannot justify so severe a limitation on cross-examination as to prevent the jury from learning information needed to judge rationally whether witnesses might be shading the truth. In United States v. Jones, n7 the Court reversed a conviction for marijuana smuggling because the Trial Judge's absolute ban on recross-examination, even when new matter was brought out on redirect, violated the defendant's confrontation rights.

[ii] Rule 611(a) -- Limitations on Examination -- No Abuse of Discretion

United States v. Callipari, 368 F.3d 22 (1st Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed the conviction of a stock options trader for wire fraud, holding there was no abuse of discretion when the defense was limited in cross-examining representatives of the victim regarding their lack of diligence or lack of knowledge concerning the situation. The defense was given sufficient opportunity to present its theory, while the limitations on examination were reasonable to protect against repetition and confusion.

United States v. Wilkerson, 361 F.3d 717 (2d Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a Hobbs Act conviction arising from a fatal armed robbery, holding there was no abuse of discretion when the Judge permitted cross-examination of a prosecution witness about variances between her testimony at the prior trial of a codefendant but did not permit any reference to the outcome of that trial, as that information could be prejudicial. In United States v. Sasso, 59 F.3d 341 (2d Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed convictions for firearms offenses, holding there was no abuse of discretion in precluding cross-examination of a prosecution witness regarding her psychiatric history and her ingestion of antidepressant drugs. The witness' depression was a predictable result of a specific catastrophic event, so its recency did not suggest the condition had any probative value; further, there was no evidence that the depression had put her in a delusional state or that any medications would have affected her ability to perceive or understand the events about which she testified.

United States v. Ambers, 85 F.3d 173 (4th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a drug conspiracy conviction, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in prohibiting the defendant from cross-examining cooperating witnesses about how the Sentencing Guidelines would apply, since such examination might do more to confuse jurors than enlighten them and the defendant had an adequate opportunity to explore the witnesses' subjective motives for testifying.

United States v. Martinez, 151 F.3d 384 (5th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed drug trafficking convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge limited cross-examination of government witnesses by: permitting only one defense counsel to examine a cooperating witness concerning any benefits he would receive for his testimony; confining cross-examination to the scope of the direct; and barring repetitive questions. Defense counsel and the jurors were told at the beginning of trial about these restrictions and the jury was cautioned not to construe against a defendant the fact that his counsel did not ask the same question that had already been asked by another defense attorney; the defendants did not show that these limitations or the way they were applied were prejudicial toward them. In United States v. Clinical Leasing Serv., 982 F.2d 900 (5th Cir. 1992) , an action to hold corporate officers personally liable for fines imposed against their corporation, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in terminating one officer's direct testimony. His attorney had been specifically warned not to lead the witness, after having been warned about leading questions at least seven times previously.

United States v. Brown, 946 F.2d 1191 (6th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a conviction for cocaine offenses in late 1989, holding there was no abuse of discretion when cross-examination of the government's key witness regarding his drug addiction and sale of drugs prior to that year was limited in order to avoid unnecessarily prolonging the examination. Careful scrutiny of the record revealed that defense counsel was able to effectively cross-examine the witness, to disclose that he was an addict-informant, and to fully explore his potential bias and truthfulness. Evidence of his prior drug use was inadmissible, as it did not bear on his character for truthfulness or untruthfulness.

United States v. Rettenberger, 344 F.3d 702 (7th Cir. 2003) : A husband and wife were tried for fraudulently obtaining insurance payments for his faked mental disability. After the wife testified, the Judge ruled that the husband's counsel could not cross-examine her, even when counsel vowed not to use argumentative or leading questions, because the Judge viewed her as a witness favorable to the husband's position. Affirming, the Court found no confrontation violation, even though some of the wife's testimony might have been adverse to the husband's interests, because the husband was given an opportunity (of which he ultimately did not avail himself) to examine her during his case. In United States v. Smith, 308 F.3d 726 (7th Cir. 2002) , the defendant, charged with marijuana and tax offenses, sought to show that a cooperating witness was lying when he said his affidavit was original by cross-examining him with a police officer's affidavit, the first paragraph of which was virtually identical to a paragraph in the witness' affidavit. Holding there was no error in precluding the cross-examination, the Court noted that "[l]imitations on cross-examination rise to the level of a Sixth Amendment violation when they prevent exposure of a witness's bias and motivation to lie," and are thus subject to de novo, rather than the usual abuse of discretion, review. Here, the defendant was given ample opportunity to expose bias, including calling the officer and eliciting from him that the language the witness had claimed as his own was included in two other witnesses' statements as well as in the officer's affidavit. In United States v. Ward, n8 the Court affirmed convictions for a large-scale drug distribution conspiracy, finding no abuse of discretion when cross-examination of a cooperating witness was limited. The defense was permitted to bring out that federal prosecutors helped to clear a warrant against the witness for unrelated state charges as a result of the witness' cooperation. However, it was not allowed to inquire into the nature of the state charges, which were based on allegations of spousal and child abuse. The Court held that the jury had a sufficient basis to make a discriminating appraisal of the witness' motive and bias without hearing the highly inflammatory nature of the charges. In United States v. Plescia, n9 the Court affirmed drug conspiracy convictions, holding there was no error in limiting impeachment of the chief prosecution witness. The defense was given sufficient opportunity to bring out that the witness had previously given creative and detailed lies under oath, had lied in telling people of the murder of African-American gang members, and had lied at a departmental hearing regarding his drug use as a police officer; further inquiry into the details was unnecessary and probably prejudicial. There was also no error in precluding cross-examination of the witness regarding his use of anti-depressive and anti-anxiety medications, since the defense did not offer any expert testimony regarding the effects of the medications, and mention of the drug Prozac would likely be prejudicial.

United States v. Beardslee, 197 F.3d 378 (9th Cir. 1999) : The Trial Judge in an arson-fraud conspiracy prosecution limited the defense cross-examination of two cooperating witnesses. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in barring examination of one witness regarding his being on probation, since the relevance of the evidence was "marginal, at best," and the witness was adequately examined on other issues touching his credibility and bias against the defendant, such as his failure to fully implicate her in his first ATF interview. There was also no abuse of discretion in barring examination of the other witness regarding traffic citations for which he had not paid the fine and an arrest warrant had been issued. The marginal relevance of the evidence would likely have been outweighed by the risk of confusing the jury; furthermore, the witness admitted on cross-examination that he did not "live up to" his obligation under the plea agreement to "obey all laws," and that he believed he had not been sanctioned because he was cooperating, so the failure to specify which laws he had not obeyed would have been largely irrelevant to his credibility. In United States v. Miller, n10 the Court affirmed a conviction for receiving stolen goods, and upheld a ruling that defense counsel could not read prior testimony of the victim into evidence, where the victim had been questioned extensively about prior inconsistent statements and on cross-examination the government did not raise any issue that would have justified further inquiry into the inconsistent statements.

United States v. McGuire, 200 F.3d 668 (10th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a carjacking conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was precluded from cross-examining a cooperating witness about juvenile convictions for misdemeanor theft and being on probation at the time of the incident. The defense had been permitted to conduct an extensive and searching cross-examination exposing the witness' credibility, motives, and biases and presenting the defendant's theory of the case, that the witness rather than he had been the violent aggressor.

[iii] Rule 611(a) -- Limitations on Examination -- Time Limits

Akouri v. State of Fla. Dept. of Transp., 408 F.3d 1338 (11th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed the judgment in a Title VII action, finding no abuse of discretion when the Judge set time limits on the plaintiff's testimony. It was clear that the restrictions imposed were flexible and the Judge made reasonable accommodations as necessary, including extending the time allowance by an hour and fifteen minutes when the plaintiff's counsel indicated that he would be unable to present his case fully in the time originally given.

[l] Rule 611(a) -- Limitations on Proof

United States v. Janati, 374 F.3d 263 (4th Cir. 2004) : The Judge presiding over a prosecution concerning a complex healthcare fraud conspiracy limited the government's case-in-chief to presentation of the 61 overt acts alleged in the indictment and ruled that charts and summary testimony regarding 1300 transactions within the scope of the conspiracy could only be presented in rebuttal if necessary. On interlocutory appeal, the Court held the ruling to be an abuse of discretion. While the Judge's concern for managing the complexity of the trial was understandable, the government has a right to present acts committed in furtherance of a charged conspiracy even though they are not specifically described in the indictment, and since the additional transactions were within the scope of the indictment, evidence regarding them would not be unduly prejudicial.

[m] Rule 611(a) -- Order of Proof

Loinaz v. EG & G, Inc., 910 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1990) : A judgment for the plaintiff in an employment contract dispute was reversed because the Trial Court, although not abusing its discretion in denying a continuance due to the unavailability of a key defense witness, abused its discretion in denying a motion to call that witness out of turn, as the defendant was thereby precluded from presenting any live rebuttal to the plaintiff's testimony. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 611.02[2].

Berroyer v. Hertz, 672 F.2d 334 (3d Cir. 1982) : In a medical malpractice action the Court found no abuse of discretion when the plaintiff was permitted to call a "rebuttal" witness during her case-in-chief, after the defendant obtained permission to call its expert out of turn.

Martin v. American Petrofina, Inc., 779 F.2d 250 (5th Cir. 1985) , modified on other grounds, 785 F.2d 543 (5th Cir. 1986) : In a suit by a pipe fitter against various asbestos manufacturers, the Court held there was no error in permitting the plaintiff to introduce evidence of his medical condition before evidence of the defective nature of the manufacturers' product. In Cranberg v. Consumer Union, n11 the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in a libel action brought pro se by a plaintiff who claimed that his product had been disparaged. It cited Rule 611(a) in approving the Trial Judge's request that the engineers who had tested the product testify first and that the defendants proceed first in examining the witnesses.

United States v. Branham, 97 F.3d 835 (6th Cir. 1996) : In a drug case the Court found no error when the government was not required to play all audiotapes of conversations involving two defendants and a government informant in chronological order in its case-in-chief. The Trial Judge told the defendants that they could play the tapes in their suggested order as part of the defense case, and the Court concluded that this was sufficient to ensure that the jury would not be confused or misled. In United States v. Lash, 937 F.2d 1077 (6th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed fraud conspiracy convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion when the government was permitted to call fewer than all of the victim witnesses first. There was no showing that the order was ineffective for the ascertainment of truth or otherwise violated the Rule's requirements.

Stone v. Peacock, 968 F.2d 1163 (11th Cir. 1992) : The Court held, in an employee's civil rights action, that there was no error in requiring the plaintiff to testify first, without being cross-examined at the time, so that some chronology would be laid out at the beginning of the trial.

[n] Rule 611(a) -- Overview Witness

United States v. Casas, 425 F.3d 23 (1st Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed drug-trafficking convictions, holding it was error (but harmless) when a government agent gave preliminary "overview" testimony regarding the existence and operation of a drug smuggling organization involving the defendants. The agent's testimony went well beyond his personal knowledge. In United States v. Garcia-Morales, 382 F.3d 12 (1st Cir. 2004) , although the Court affirmed a drug conspiracy conviction, it found that the testimony of the government's first witness, the Customs Service agent in charge of the investigation, was hearsay testimony based upon information provided by others. The Court reiterated its position, stated in United States v. Casas, 356 F.3d 104 (1st Cir. 2004) , and United States v. Mazza, 792 F.2d 1210 (1st Cir. 1986) , that "overview" testimony at the outset of a case is "inherently problematic." The agent in this case provided testimony that the defendant was a member of the conspiracy before any evidence of conspiracy was presented, and also testified to an informant's conversation with a conspirator even though he was not a witness to the conversation.

United States v. Griffin, 324 F.3d 330 (5th Cir. 2003) : In a prosecution for mail fraud, conspiracy, bribery, and money laundering, the Court held it was error to permit an FBI agent to testify as the second government witness and to use a chart containing pictures of persons and symbols for the entities involved in the alleged conspiracy. Although the Court recognized that there is an established tradition permitting summaries of trial evidence to be used with proper limiting instructions, it commented that "[h]ere, of course, the evidence had not yet been presented so that the witness was used as an overview witness." The Court "unequivocally" condemned the use of an overview witness "as a tool employed by the government to paint a picture of guilt before the evidence has been introduced." Because the chart was not admitted into evidence or sent to the jury room and the overview testimony was supported by other witnesses and exhibits, the Court found the use of the overview witness to be harmless error.

[o] RULE 611(a) -- Pretrial Orders and Witness Lists

United States v. Cox, 752 F.2d 741 (1st Cir. 1985) : Upholding cocaine convictions, the Court found there was no unfair prejudice when the government was permitted to call a witness not named on a pretrial witness list. The defense was aware of the existence of the witness and the Trial Judge allowed five days to prepare for the witness' testimony.

[p] Rule 611(a) -- Privilege Claims

United States v. Colyer, 571 F.2d 941 (5th Cir. 1978) : The Court suggested that, although a Trial Judge should be solicitous of a witness' privilege not to incriminate himself, the Judge should not automatically assume that a witness will invoke the privilege whenever possible. Rather, the witness should be asked whether he desires to claim the privilege or to consult with counsel.

United States v. Arnott, 704 F.2d 322 (6th Cir. 1983) : The defense in a drug case represented that a witness would testify in support of an entrapment claim and requested a ruling that would limit the scope of cross-examination to the subject matter of the direct examination so that the witness would not have to claim the privilege against self-incrimination. The Trial Judge invited the defense to indicate the questions that would be put on direct examination, but the invitation was declined. The Court found no error in this procedure, since the Judge could not properly rule on the scope of cross-examination or on the witness' right to claim the privilege without knowing what would be said on direct examination and exactly what might be asked on cross-examination.

[q] Rule 611(a) -- Protecting the Witness

United States v. Sorrentino, 726 F.2d 876 (1st Cir. 1984) : In a prosecution for income tax evasion, the Court upheld a ruling limiting defense counsel's cross-examination of a government agent on the grounds that it was cumulative and harassing.

United States v. Toner, 728 F.2d 115 (2d Cir. 1984) : Convictions for firearms offenses were affirmed as the Court found that the Trial Judge, after permitting wide cross-examination of a government informant-witness, properly barred inquiry into the informant's reasons for coming to the FBI, since the inquiry apparently would have jeopardized other ongoing FBI investigations.

United States v. McMillon, 14 F.3d 948 (4th Cir. 1994) : The Court held in a drug prosecution that it was not an abuse of discretion to preclude a defendant from cross-examining a cooperating coconspirator about the witness' use of drugs to force men to engage in sexual acts with him. Testimony regarding the witness' sexual life is not probative of his character for truthfulness; rather, it impairs the search for truth and harasses, annoys, or humiliates the witness in the process.

United States v. Santos, 201 F.3d 953 (7th Cir. 2000) : The Chicago City Treasurer was charged with illegally soliciting political contributions from banks and securities firms. At trial the defense was not permitted to cross-examine one of the Treasurer's office employees, a lesbian, about her alleged hostility to the defendant because the defendant had fired the witness' lover. Reversing for this and other evidentiary errors, the Court held that, because the witness was openly lesbian and a lesbian activist, the Judge could not preclude the cross-examination on the ground of protecting the witness against anti-homosexual stigmatization. In United States v. Ford, 21 F.3d 759 (7th Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed RICO convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion when defense counsel was precluded from asking a cooperating government witness whether he had been known by another name, as the witness was in a witness protection program and needed to protect his new identity; furthermore, the question was only an attempt to catch the witness in a lie, so the evidence would only have been collateral.

[r] Rule 611(a) -- Reading from Exhibits

United States v. Moskowitz, 215 F.3d 265 (2d Cir. 2000) : Affirming securities fraud convictions, the Court upheld a ruling that admitted certain letters into evidence but did not permit the defendant to read aloud from them: "There was thus no error in the district court's discretionary ruling limiting the manner in which the evidence was presented to the jury."

[s] Rule 611(a) -- Rebuttal and Surrebuttal

United States v. Soto-Beniquez, 350 F.3d 131 (1st Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions in a complex drug conspiracy case, the Court held that one defendant had opened the door to rebuttal evidence by arguing that the government did not have sufficient evidence to indict him for murdering a government informant, which was why it accepted a guilty plea to the charge of accessory after the fact. After the defendant made this argument, the government was properly permitted to offer rebuttal evidence to prove that the weapon used in another murder, to which the defendant had pleaded guilty, was the same one used to kill the informant. In a prosecution for embezzlement from the Department of Veterans Affairs, United States v. Le'on- Delfis, 203 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 2000) , the government offered evidence that a defendant made two large bank deposits in 1996, which allegedly related to money laundering charges against him. The defendant's wife testified for the defense that their family finances in 1996 were such that the deposit could have come from personal funds. On cross-examination she was asked about money seized in a civil forfeiture proceeding related to the criminal case; she said the amount seized was the family's entire savings, and she did not think the sum exceeded $200,000. When questioned about the legitimate sources of the money seized, she could explain only $105,500. On rebuttal the government proved that the amount seized was $203,000; it argued that this evidence impeached the wife's testimony and was circumstantial evidence of the defendant's wrongdoing. The Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendant was precluded from offering evidence on surrebuttal that other individuals claimed part of the seized money. The defense could have offered the evidence during its case, following the wife's cross-examination. Further, the evidence did not impeach or explain away the proof that the government had offered on rebuttal: it did not suggest that the amount seized was less than $203,000, nor did it add anything to the wife's testimony on direct that other persons made claims to the money. In Kines v. Butterworth, n12 the Court, affirming dismissal of habeas corpus petitions, upheld the exclusion of surrebuttal evidence with the following comment:

> While rebuttal testimony which is offered to impeach the credibility of a key witness cannot ordinarily be viewed as collateral, United States v. Uramoto, 638 F.2d 84 (9th Cir. 1980) , yet when the testimony is offered at a late stage of the trial in surrebuttal, and it is repetitious of evidence presented earlier to the jury, the trial judge's exercise of discretion should not be interfered with unless the ruling is so prejudicial that it necessarily prevents a fair trial.

United States v. Tejada, 956 F.2d 1256 (2d Cir. 1992) : Affirming a conviction for conspiring to distribute cocaine, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a surveillance agent to testify on the government's rebuttal that he had seen a conspirator enter a building empty-handed and return carrying a box. The testimony was not mere bolstering, but a proper rebuttal of testimony by a defense investigator to the effect that a previous government witness could not have seen the building entrance as he claimed.

United States v. Barnette, 211 F.3d 803 (4th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed murder convictions resulting from a hijacking, but vacated the defendant's death sentence and remanded for further proceedings. At the capital phase, the defendant called experts who testified that in their opinion the defendant would not be a future danger in prison. In rebuttal, the government called an expert in forensic psychology who testified that the defendant was a psychopath and therefore would be dangerous in prison. The Trial Judge refused to allow the defense to recall one of its experts for surrebuttal testimony to challenge the government expert's conclusions. The Court found error in the refusal to permit this surrebuttal testimony. Surrebuttal testimony is to be permitted when necessary "to respond to any new matter brought up on rebuttal," and here no mention had been made of the defendant being a psychopath until the government began its rebuttal case. In United States v. Burgess, n13 the Court affirmed (2-1) a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, and upheld the exclusion of surrebuttal evidence pertaining to a posttraumatic stress disorder that was repetitive of evidence offered in the case-in-chief for the defense.

Rodriguez v. Olin Corp., 780 F.2d 491 (5th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a judgment entered for a valve manufacturer on a plant owner's claim arising out of an accident at a chemical plant. It found that the owner should have been permitted to offer expert rebuttal testimony in response to the manufacturer's evidence, since the owner was "under no obligation to anticipate and negate in its own case in chief any facts or theories that may be raised on defense," and the rebuttal evidence was critical to the owner's case.

Toth v. Grand Trunk R.R., 306 F.3d 335 (6th Cir. 2002) : A railroad employee sued for injuries allegedly caused by a defective operating lever while he was coupling railroad cars. A defense witness testified that the railroad's inspection program would have detected the defect before the car left the yard, but the plaintiff was not permitted to introduce rebuttal evidence that not all cars were inspected. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude the evidence. Although evidence of deficiencies in the inspection practices would have been relevant to prove the existence of a defect, it was not necessary for the plaintiff to pursue this theory in his case-in-chief. So the evidence was proper to rebut the theory after it was introduced by the defense. In an employment discrimination action, EEOC v. Monarch Mach. Tool Co., n14 the Court remanded, finding that the District Judge erred in requesting the employer to submit certain evidence at the conclusion of the trial and in relying upon that evidence without giving the company a chance to present any rebuttal evidence.

United States v. Wilson, 134 F.3d 855 (7th Cir. 1998) : The government attempted to connect one defendant with a cocaine conspiracy by showing that a person with his name had registered at a motel in El Paso, but the record introduced had no vehicle or driver's license number. After the defendant denied in his testimony that he had ever been in El Paso, the government presented as rebuttal evidence a registration card from the motel which included the defendant's driver's license number, together with testimony from an employee that the desk clerk would not write down the number without verifying it against the actual license. The defendant was not permitted to introduce surrebuttal evidence that he did not possess a driver's license at the time in question. The Court held that excluding the surrebuttal evidence was an abuse of discretion, since it was relevant to meet evidence first presented by the government on rebuttal, but the error was harmless. In United States v. O'Brien, 119 F.3d 523 (7th Cir. 1997) , the Court affirmed fraud convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to permit the defendant to take the stand again to offer surrebuttal testimony after a witness had given rebuttal testimony of uncharged acts to impeach the defendant's testimony in her case in chief. The surrebuttal testimony would only have been cumulative of testimony the defendant had already given; and the defendant had been permitted to offer surrebuttal evidence on the impeaching witness' bad reputation for truthfulness. In United States v. Gaertner, n15 the Court affirmed a conviction for cocaine possession, holding there was no error in permitting the government to offer rebuttal evidence to refute specific testimony of defense witnesses and in rejecting surrebuttal testimony, which would have been a repetition of the defense testimony that the government had rebutted: "It is well established that the admission of rebuttal evidence lies within the sound discretion of the trial court and appellate courts will not interfere with the trial court's ruling unless there is a clear abuse of discretion."

Smith v. Conley, 584 F.2d 844 (8th Cir. 1978) : The Court upheld a ruling under Rule 611(a) that an expert witness called by the plaintiff in this civil rights action should be excluded because the witness was available during the plaintiff's case-in-chief but was not called until rebuttal evidence was offered. In United States v. Calvert, 523 F.2d 895 (8th Cir. 1975) , the Court found no abuse of discretion in allowing the government to offer rebuttal evidence that was available during the government's case-in-chief.

United States v. McCollum, 732 F.2d 1419 (9th Cir. 1984) : The Court found no error in the Trial Judge's rejection of an additional expert offered as a surrebuttal witness, where the defense had bypassed the opportunity to call the expert during its case-in-chief.

Tanberg v. Sholtis, 401 F.3d 1151 (10th Cir. 2005) : In an action by arrestees alleging excessive force by a police officer, the Trial Judge granted the defendants' motion in limine against introduction of the police department's Standard Operating Procedures on the grounds that they were irrelevant to the plaintiffs' federal constitutional claim and that even if they were relevant on the state law claims, their probative value was substantially outweighed by risks of prejudice and confusion. At trial, however, the defense asserted that the officer had acted in accordance with his training, and the plaintiffs sought to introduce the SOPs on rebuttal. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the evidence, noting that although "[w]hen a party opens the door to a topic, the admission of rebuttal evidence on that topic becomes permissible," "permissible does not mean mandatory" and "the decision whether to admit or exclude rebuttal testimony remains within the trial court's sound discretion." Here, the SOPs themselves "would have added nothing to the evidence Plaintiffs were allowed to adduce," and expert testimony related to the SOPs that the plaintiffs sought to introduce would have risked jury confusion.

United States v. Glass, 709 F.2d 669 (11th Cir. 1983) : In a drug prosecution the Court sustained the Trial Judge's refusal to permit surrebuttal testimony, saying that "[s]urrebuttal testimony should go to the essence of the rebuttal testimony" and that the testimony offered in this case did not. In United States v. Haimowitz, n16 the government presented two character witnesses to testify that the defendant's reputation for truthfulness was bad and that in their opinion he was not truthful. The Court found no abuse of discretion when defense counsel was denied a continuance to obtain surrebuttal witnesses to testify about credibility.

[t] Rule 611(a) -- Recalling Witnesses

United States v. Dent, 984 F.2d 1453 (7th Cir. 1993) : In a felon firearm possession case, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the government to recall an expert witness after the Trial Judge received two notes by a juror asking several questions. Although disapproving of the practice of recalling witnesses in order to answer individual jurors' questions, the Court noted that here the Judge properly instructed the jury that it was not responding directly to the questions, the testimony concerned tangential issues in the case, and the government had not rested. In United States v. Raineri, n17 the Court upheld a Trial Judge who quashed a defense subpoena to recall for further impeachment a government witness who already had been impeached.

United States v. Puckett, 147 F.3d 765 (8th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed convictions for a crack distribution conspiracy, finding no abuse of discretion when the government was permitted to recall law enforcement witnesses during the course of the trial so the evidence could be presented in chronological order. The witnesses testified about different subject matter each time, the defendants were free to cross-examine them about any of their testimony, and there was no indication that the government recalled the witnesses to bolster their credibility. In United States v. Jackson, n18 the Court, affirming convictions in a complex drug conspiracy case, approved the government's trial tactics in calling an agent, who was personally involved in many of the narcotic sales at issue, numerous times rather than once. The Court stated that "the manner in which [the agent] was called to testify lent a praiseworthy degree of order to this complicated trial." Noting that after each appearance the agent was subject to cross-examination on the subject matter of that appearance as well as to his credibility, the Court found that no confrontation right of the defendant was violated.

United States v. Clark, 617 F.2d 180 (9th Cir. 1980) : The Court found no abuse of discretion in refusing to allow a bank robbery defendant to recall a psychiatric expert during rebuttal, when no offer of proof was made as to what the witness would add to the case. In United States v. Perry, n19 drug distribution convictions were affirmed despite the defendants' contention that a government witness who was impeached with several testimonial inconsistencies was improperly permitted to take the stand a second time to clarify the inconsistencies. "The extent to which counteracting and rehabilitative evidence may be received after the credibility of a witness has been attacked is a matter in which the trial judge necessarily has broad discretion."

United States v. McLean-Davis, 785 F.2d 1534 (11th Cir. 1986) , modified, 795 F.2d 957 (11th Cir. 1986) : Affirming marijuana convictions, the Court found that the Trial Judge properly told the defendant, at the close of his testimony, that he would have to submit to further cross-examination if he called a witness on his behalf. The ruling was within the Judge's power to control the order of proof. In a cocaine distribution case, United States v. Butera, n20 the Court found no error in permitting sequential testimony of the principal governmental investigating officer, where there was an opportunity for cross-examination after each appearance.

[u] Rule 611(a) -- Reopening the Evidence

Blinzler v. Marriott Int'l, Inc., 81 F.3d 1148 (1st Cir. 1996) : In a negligence action against a hotel for failing to summon aid promptly on behalf of a guest suffering a heart attack, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the plaintiff to reopen its case to produce witnesses on the causation issue, as there was no indication that the plaintiff withheld the proof as a strategic matter or that the defendant suffered any prejudice as a result.

Goldberg v. National Life Ins. Co., 774 F.2d 559 (2d Cir. 1985) : The Court held it was not error to exclude an additional witness for the plaintiff after the plaintiff rested, where the witness would have changed the theory of the case in a way that might have confused the jury.

United States v. Terry, 729 F.2d 1063 (6th Cir. 1984) : The Court upheld the denial of two defendants' motion to reopen their case for further impeachment of a government witness who had already been extensively impeached.

United States v. Hoover, 246 F.3d 1054 (7th Cir. 2001) : Affirming CCE and drug convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting one defendant to testify after the defense had rested, even though the defendant's testimony implicated himself and other defendants. The harm to the other defendants was the same as if the defendant had testified before the defense rested. There was no basis for a grant of mistrial, since the Judge allowed the other defendants adequate opportunity to respond to the testimony.

[v] Rule 611(a) -- Summary Charts and Testimony

Fraser v. Major League Soccer, L.L.C., 284 F.3d 47, 2002-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P73620 (1st Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a professional soccer league and its investor/owners in an antitrust suit brought by soccer players, and held that the Trial Judge properly admitted a chart summarizing the testimony of two defense witnesses. The Court observed that "[i]t is hard to imagine an issue on which a trial judge enjoys more discretion than as to whether summary exhibits will be helpful," and "[n]othing precludes their use with respect to oral testimony." The Court further noted that "[a]lthough the court admitted the charts as 'evidence,' its instruction made clear that they were merely aids and that the testimony controlled."

United States v. Yousef, 327 F.3d 56 (2d Cir. 2003) : In the prosecution of a conspiracy to bomb United States commercial airliners in southeast Asia and for crimes relating to the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center, the Court held that it was not an abuse of discretion to admit the government's summary charts of telephone records, but this brief portion of the Court's lengthy opinion is muddled. The Court affirmed the admission of the charts under Rule 1006, while commenting that "any possible prejudice was cured by the District Court's limiting instruction stating that the charts were not evidence; they were only graphic demonstrations of the underlying evidence, and the jury had to determine for itself whether they fairly and accurately summarized the underlying evidence." The confusion arises because summaries under Rule 1006 are evidence; they summarize voluminous material that cannot practically be brought to court. Summaries of trial evidence are Rule 611(a) summaries and may or may not be admitted as illustrative exhibits.

United States v. Janati, 374 F.3d 263 (4th Cir. 2004) : The Judge presiding over a prosecution concerning a complex healthcare fraud conspiracy limited the government's case-in-chief to presentation of the 61 overt acts alleged in the indictment and ruled that charts and summary testimony regarding 1300 transactions within the scope of the conspiracy could only be presented in rebuttal if necessary. On interlocutory appeal, the Court held that the limitation on the case-in-chief was an abuse of discretion. Although the Judge had not ruled on any specific summary chart, the Court noted that Rule 1006 could be used to provide independent evidence of voluminous records if the chart is an accurate compilation of records otherwise admissible in evidence that have been made available to the opposing party. To the extent that the charts would summarize witness' conclusions or opinions, they would be pedagogical charts subject to regulation under Rule 611(a). In United States v. Johnson, 54 F.3d 1150 (4th Cir. 1995) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when a detective, at the end of the government's case-in-chief, offered an organizational chart based on prior witness' testimony that diagrammed drug transactions among members of the charged conspiracy. After an extended discussion of summary testimony from expert witnesses, the Court concluded that the summary chart would be helpful because of the complexity of the case. Furthermore, appropriate safeguards were utilized to minimize any potential prejudice to the defendants: the parties stipulated that the chart accurately reflected the testimony of prior witnesses; the detective was voir dired before giving testimony as to the chart, and extensively cross-examined regarding the chart's creation; the defendants were given a recess to prepare the cross-examination regarding the chart; and numerous limiting instructions were given. The Court likewise held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting summary testimony from the detective, but it cautioned that the dangers inherent in the dual roles of expert and summary witness make the practice inappropriate in the ordinary drug prosecution lacking the complexity of this case.

United States v. Fullwood, 342 F.3d 409 (5th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed convictions arising from a scheme to submit false crop insurance claims, finding no plain error in the government's calling as its last witness a special agent to recap a significant part of the testimony previously given. It noted that "[f]or complex cases, we have allowed summary witnesses in a limited capacity," but concluded that "there are limits that may have been exceeded here, because, as the final rebuttal witness, the Special Agent was allowed, without justification, to simply recap substantial portions of the Government's case-in-chief." The Court added that "in light of the ... dangers and the seemingly increased use of such witnesses by the Government, we strongly caution, once again, against use of summary witnesses in this fashion, especially in a non-complex case." In a prosecution for misapplying federal grant payments, United States v. Buck, 324 F.3d 786 (5th Cir. 2003) , the Court held that it was error to admit into evidence and allow into the jury room a diagram showing connections between the defendant and the misapplied payments, but the error was harmless because the diagram accurately summarized testimony and other evidence that had been properly admitted and was thus already before the jury. Although the defendant argued the issue in terms of Rule 1006, the Court, quoting this Manual, noted that pedagogical aids such as the diagram in this case are properly analyzed under Rule 611. In United States v. Hart, n21 the defendant was convicted of making false statements in applications for farm loans by omitting debts from Farm and Home Plans (computer-generated projections of the borrower's plan of operation). At trial, an employee of the loan servicing agency was permitted to introduce, as summaries under Rule 1006, revised FHPs that she had prepared, which the government said illustrated what the results would have been if all the debts testified to by the prosecution witnesses had been included on the actual FHPs. Reversing, the Court held that the government had failed to adduce any evidence in support of the assumptions and conclusions that the witness drew when preparing her versions of the "proper" FHPs. While the government had shown undisclosed debts, it had not shown that the full amount of those debts belonged on a properly prepared FHP, so the "summary" impermissibly assumed what the government "was required to prove beyond a reasonable doubt as operative facts of the alleged offense." In United States v. Taylor, n22 the Court reversed convictions for drug trafficking offenses because a government chart purporting to list the players in the conspiracy and their positions within the hierarchy was improperly admitted into evidence; the chart did not accurately reflect the underlying testimony. In a massive drug trafficking case, United States v. Posada-Rios, n23 the Court found no abuse of discretion when the government was permitted to display throughout the trial a time-line and organizational charts on eight large poster boards on easels. The charts were not admitted into evidence, but were pedagogical devices, and the jury was repeatedly instructed as to their proper purpose.

United States v. Bray, 139 F.3d 1104 (6th Cir. 1998) : In a postal clerk's trial for embezzling money received from stamp purchases, the government introduced charts summarizing the forms that kept daily track of the clerk's transactions. Affirming, the Court held there was no error in refusing to give a limiting instruction that the charts were not evidence or proof of facts. Such an instruction may be appropriate when a summary is a pedagogical device, governed by Rule 611(a), but the charts in this case were properly introduced under Rule 1006 as primary evidence of records so voluminous that they could not be conveniently examined in court, and so constituted the evidence to be considered by the factfinder. In United States v. Paulino, 935 F.2d 739 (6th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed convictions for conspiring to possess and distribute cocaine, holding there was no error in permitting a witness to give testimony explaining an organizational chart that showed the various players and their roles in the conspiracy and a chart that indicated the cash generated from cocaine sales for a specified period. A proper cautionary instruction was given at the close of evidence, the defendants had a full opportunity to cross-examine the witness, and the charts were not substantially inconsistent with the evidence adduced at trial.

United States v. Pree, 384 F.3d 378 (7th Cir. 2004) : In a trial for filing false tax returns, the government introduced two summary charts prepared by a testifying IRS agent. The defendant did not challenge the accuracy of the charts, and the Judge gave a pattern instruction stating that the charts accurately summarized voluminous books, records, or documents. That instruction was problematic because the charts summarized evidence already admitted, and thus were akin to "a teaching device rather than ... substantive evidence." Although the Court recognized that the preferred practice when such charts are offered is to instruct the jury that the charts are not evidence and only purport to summarize already admitted evidence, it declined to find plain error in view of the absence of any challenge to the accuracy of the charts. Further, the Court found no plain error when the agent was permitted to testify as a summary witness, noting that a summary witness may testify as to his analysis of a transaction based upon the testimony of other witnesses and explain the analysis based upon his special expertise. The nature of such testimony makes "the line between summary testimony and expert testimony indistinct." The Court found no problem in the "selective summary of the Government's evidence," as the defendant could cross-examine the witness and offer her own evidence. As part of its proof that the defendant had aided and abetted tampering with motor vehicle identification numbers in United States v. Petty, 132 F.3d 373 (7th Cir. 1997) , the government introduced certain telephone records. The computer-generated records were cumbersome, were difficult to read, and contained much irrelevant information, so an FBI technical analyst prepared charts summarizing the relevant phone calls. For "reasons unapparent to [the Court]," the Trial Judge declined to admit the charts as summary evidence under Rule 1006, but did permit the analyst to use them as demonstrative aids under Rule 611(a). The Court found no abuse of discretion, nor would it have had the charts been admitted into evidence, since they summarized complex evidence that was admissible.

United States v. Baker, 10 F.3d 1374 (9th Cir. 1993) : In a complex narcotics manufacturing prosecution, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an FBI agent to present a summary including a total value of the narcotics transactions and expenditures testified to during the government's case. The Court noted that the agent was presenting neither summary evidence under Rule 1006 nor expert evidence under Rule 702; rather, the testimony was permissible under Rule 611(a) as clarifying the government's presentation for the jury. Because of the dangers of undue prejudice, such summaries should be admitted only in exceptional cases, but in this case careful precautions had been taken (e.g., a week's continuance for the defense to examine the materials, a full opportunity to cross-examine the agent, and thorough limiting instructions three times during the testimony).

United States v. Stiger, 413 F.3d 1185 (10th Cir. 2005) : In a complex narcotics conspiracy case, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit a chart purporting to detail the organizational structure of the conspiracy, which the officer presenting the chart had constructed from both trial testimony and interviews conducted during the investigation. In United States v. Ray, 370 F.3d 1039 (10th Cir. 2004) , the Court affirmed drug-conspiracy convictions, upholding the use of summary charts during the testimony of a law enforcement agent at the end of the government's case-in-chief. The summary of trial testimony was not admissible under Rule 703 (because it did not serve as the basis of an expert opinion); nor was it admissible under Rule 1006 (because it did not purport to summarize voluminous admissible information that was not proffered at trial). But the Court held it was admissible under Rule 611(a) because of the complexity of the case and the precautions taken to avoid prejudice (here, full cross-examination of the agent who prepared the charts and clear instruction to the jury on the proper use of the charts and summary testimony).

United States v. Richardson, 233 F.3d 1285 (11th Cir. 2000) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in a complex six-week trial for money laundering, fraud, and embezzlement when a government witness was permitted to present charts summarizing the transaction histories of the accounts of the 14 alleged embezzlement victims. The Trial Judge issued numerous limiting instructions to the jury, the expert specifically testified that the label "unauthorized transaction" on one of the columns represented his opinion, the expert was available for cross-examination, and the label was ultimately changed to "questioned transaction" before the charts went to the jury.

[w] Rule 611(a) -- Unruly Witness

Lee v. Rapid City Area School Dist. No. 51-4, 981 F.2d 316 (8th Cir. 1992) (en banc): In an age discrimination action by a teacher whose contract was not renewed, the Trial Court admitted evidence that school administrators had received complaints about the plaintiff from students and parents but it refused, on grounds that the evidence was hearsay and the witnesses repeatedly volunteered nonresponsive statements, to allow testimony about the substance of the complaints unless they had been documented. The Court of Appeals held, inter alia, that there had been no abuse of discretion in the Trial Court's actions to control witnesses it deemed unruly. Three Judges dissented from this point, on the basis that the key rulings were made on the mistaken hearsay ground rather than to control overly voluble witnesses.

[x] Rule 611(a) -- Videotaped Testimony

Traylor v. Husqvarna Motor, 988 F.2d 729 (7th Cir. 1993) : In an action for injuries caused by a defective maul, the defendant's expert gave direct testimony on Friday; when he said he could not appear on Monday, the Magistrate Judge permitted him to be cross-examined Saturday on videotape (which was shown to the jury on Monday), rather than having him recalled on Tuesday or Wednesday for cross-examination in person. Reversing on other grounds, the Court noted its disapproval of this procedure, which gave artificially greater salience to the direct testimony.

[2] Rule 611(b) -- Scope of Cross-Examination

[a] Rule 611(b) -- Discretion of Trial Judge

United States v. Eniola, 893 F.2d 383 (D.C. Cir. 1990) : During a codefendant's cross-examination of a defendant in a drug conspiracy case, a new issue arose that had not been covered during direct examination, so all counsel were given an opportunity to ask further questions. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the prosecution was permitted to recross-examine, even though the defendant did no redirect examination, as he had every opportunity to do so and there were legitimate reasons for allowing the prosecution to explore the important new evidence helpful to the prosecution's case that arose during the cross-examination.

United States v. McLaughlin, 957 F.2d 12 (1st Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed bank fraud convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion or Confrontation Clause violation where one defendant was precluded from cross-examining government agents about another fraud scheme, as the evidence went beyond the scope of the direct examination. Had the defendant wished to adduce new evidence in support of his defense, he could have called the agents as defense witnesses. In a prosecution for attempted income tax evasion, United States v. Sorrentino, n24 the Court upheld the exclusion of questions relating to a witness' credibility asked on re-recross examination following re-redirect examination in which credibility was not bolstered by the government.

United States v. Reindeau, 947 F.2d 32 (2d Cir. 1991) : The Court reversed convictions for possessing unregistered firearms, holding it was an abuse of discretion to curtail cross-examination of the government's expert witness concerning whether the explosive device involved was intentionally designed for use as a weapon. In United States v. Edwardo-Franco, n25 convictions of cocaine possession offenses were reversed in part because of an abuse of discretion when the defendants were not permitted to show on cross-examination of government expert witnesses the fees the witnesses received for testifying, or that two handwriting experts could differ in their opinions. The Court indicated that the rulings may have given the appearance the Judge was biased or vouching for the witness' credibility or expertise.

United States v. Riggi, 951 F.2d 1368 (3d Cir. 1991) : The Court reversed Hobbs Act and RICO convictions, holding that a blanket rule barring recross-examination violated the defendants' confrontation rights. When material new matters were brought out by the government on redirect, the defendants were entitled to recross. In a medical malpractice case, Lis v. Robert Packer Hosp., n26 the Court found it was error (but harmless) to allow cross-examination beyond the scope of the direct. It concluded that "notwithstanding the trial court's laudable motives, its ruling effectuated neither the letter or the spirit of Rule 611(b)." In United States v. Segal, n27 the Court reversed convictions for conspiracy and bribery of a public official, observing that:

> [w]hile the Trial Court has wide discretion to prevent repetition, harassment of the witness or production of irrelevant material, the right of cross-examination is of constitutional dimension and may > not be denied ... . Therefore, if a matter has been raised on direct examination, generally cross-examination must be permitted. Moreover, questioning of the witness which tests his perception, memory or otherwise tends to discredit him is proper ... .

Francis v. Clark Equip. Co., 993 F.2d 545 (6th Cir. 1993) : In a suit by a forklift operator against a manufacturer, the Court held that "[i]t was prejudicial to defendant for the magistrate to allow plaintiff's expert to testify from documents discussing the developing feasibility of operator restraint technology and then to forbid cross-examination on the same subject matter."

[b] Rule 611(b) -- Examination of Accused

United States v. Bartelho, 129 F.3d 663 (1st Cir. 1997) : The defendant, charged with armed bank robbery, testified that he had been supporting himself at the time by selling drugs, but he refused on cross-examination to name his supplier. The Judge granted a motion to strike his direct testimony and the Court affirmed. On plain error review, the Court observed that the sanction may have been broader than necessary to cure the defendant's refusal to answer, but concluded that the question was not collateral, since it directly targeted the credibility of the absence-of-motive defense interposed.

Hankins v. Civiletti, 614 F.2d 953 (5th Cir. 1980) : Upholding a judgment of contempt for failing to produce or explain certain business records, the Court found that when the defendant took the stand to testify at a hearing he opened himself to cross-examination "with regard to matters relevant to his direct testimony."

United States v. Brantley, 786 F.2d 1322 (7th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to commit fraud against a federally-funded youth program. It found no plain error when the government examined the defendant concerning a codefendant's business, since his direct examination attempted to suggest that the business was legitimate and that his receipt of money from it also was legitimate.

United States v. Jones, 913 F.2d 1552 (11th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed convictions for a cocaine conspiracy, holding there was no error in cross-examining a defendant about his employment history when, by gratuitously informing the jury on direct examination about a promotion, he was attempting to create a certain impression, the truth or falsity of which the government was entitled to explore on cross-examination.

[c] Rule 611(b) -- Failure To Answer on Direct

United States v. Papajohn, 212 F.3d 1112 (8th Cir. 2000) : Affirming the defendant's convictions for joining with her husband to burn down their store to collect insurance, the Court held that the Trial Judge did not err in declining to permit cross-examination of a witness who refused to answer questions when called by the prosecution. It reasoned that "there was no subject matter to be cross-examined and no direct testimony to be impeached."

[d] Rule 611(b) -- Invocation of Privilege Against Self-Incrimination

United States v. Gary, 74 F.3d 304 (1st Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed a felon firearm possession conviction, holding that the defendant was properly precluded from calling a witness who had testified at a first trial and who indicated that he would testify for the defense on direct examination but would invoke his privilege against self-incrimination on cross-examination. The witness was testifying about the merits of the case, not about a collateral matter, so he could not properly testify for one side and avoid examination by the other. Because the witness was unavailable, his former testimony was admissible.

United States v. Gullett, 713 F.2d 1203 (6th Cir. 1983) : Although a government witness had been granted informal immunity, the Court held that he had the right to invoke the privilege against self-incrimination on cross-examination, and found that the witness' refusal to answer questions did not impair the defendants' cross-examination, since his refusal did not relate to matters to which he testified on direct examination.

United States v. Nunez, 668 F.2d 1116 (10th Cir. 1981) : Affirming a conviction for possession of counterfeit funds, the Court held there was no obligation to strike the testimony of the key prosecution witness who refused to answer a self-incriminating question, and that even without an answer the defendant had a full opportunity to explore the witness' motive in testifying.

United States v. Pilcher, 672 F.2d 875 (11th Cir. 1982) : In a prosecution for willful failure to file income tax returns, the defendant testified that he believed he had a right to file returns containing no financial information, but he refused to answer questions on cross-examination that inquired into his good faith. The Trial Judge held the defendant in civil contempt and suspended the trial. The Court affirmed, holding that a defendant witness cannot "refuse to answer questions properly within the scope of cross-examination under Rule 611(b)."

[e] Rule 611(b) -- Questions Bearing on Credibility

United States v. Lara, 181 F.3d 183 (1st Cir. 1999) : Appealing convictions arising out of his involvement with the Latin Kings street gang, a defendant complained that his cross-examination exceeded the scope of his direct. The defendant had testified concerning a carjacking, and was cross-examined about other crimes of which he and his codefendants were accused, including a murder and two attempted murders charged as predicate acts in the RICO conspiracy. The Court found that the questions were permissible because they were relevant to the defendant's credibility, and were also related to the carjacking testimony. The defendant had testified that the carjacking was unrelated to street gang activity, and it was therefore permissible to ask him about other crimes that he had committed "under the organization's auspices." The Court also held that even if the questions were beyond the scope of direct, the Trial Judge had discretion under the terms of Rule 611(b) to permit such questioning. In this case, the challenged questions "occupied only a fraction of the cross-examination and bore a close relationship to major trial issues," so there was no abuse of discretion.

[f] Rule 611(b) -- Scope of Cross-Examination

United States v. Mikutowicz, 365 F.3d 65 (1st Cir. 2004) : Affirming convictions for tax offenses, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly limited the cross-examination of an IRS agent who testified as to why the IRS concluded that the defendant and his companies took unwarranted deductions. The defendant tried to cross-examine the agent regarding various judicial opinions, even though the agent was not qualified as an expert on tax law and did not mention the opinions on direct examination. The proposed cross-examination "would have involved defense counsel reading excerpts of cases to the jury, without the jury having a context for evaluating the import of the information that it was receiving," which would have been beyond the scope of the direct examination and possibly confusing to the jury. In Macaulay v. Anas, 321 F.3d 45 (1st Cir. 2003) , a medical malpractice action arising from unsuccessful back surgery, the plaintiff's expert testified on direct examination (in a videotaped deposition offered at trial) that screws used in the surgery are supposed to be placed inside the pedicles of the patient's spine and that several of the screws in the plaintiff were not so placed, characterizing them as "malpositioned" or "misplaced." When on cross-examination the expert acknowledged that their placement did not necessarily signify a deviation from the applicable standard of care, the plaintiff objected on the ground that the witness was not offered as an expert on the standard of care. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admission of the testimony, since regardless of the plaintiff's plan for the witness, his direct testimony supported an inference that the defendant had committed malpractice, which the defense was entitled to probe on cross-examination.

Tramonte v. Fibreboard Corp., 947 F.2d 762 (5th Cir. 1991) : Having failed to give the notice required under a local rule, the plaintiffs in an asbestosis wrongful death action were not permitted to introduce a treating physician's deposition during their case-in-chief, but they attempted to introduce its contents in cross-examining a defense expert. The Court held there was no error in sustaining defense objections, since the deposition was not introduced on direct and had no bearing on the expert's credibility because he had never read or relied on it. In United States v. Walker, n28 the Court approved the government's redirect examination of a witness, saying that "[c]ross-examination with respect to a part of a transaction enables the opposing party to elicit evidence on redirect examination of the whole transaction at least to the extent that it relates to the same subject."

United States v. Chance, 306 F.3d 356 (6th Cir. 2002) : During direct examination of a sheriff charged with racketeering offenses, counsel asked about four employees that he had hired or promoted and then asked whether the defendant knew them to be "competent hard-working folks." The Court held that the answer, "They were all very competent, except for [one of the four who was a cooperating witness]" expanded upon the question and implied that everyone in the department, with that one exception, was a competent employee, thereby opening the door to cross-examination about other employees who had planted evidence and sworn out false affidavits in support of search and arrest warrants.

United States v. Carter, 910 F.2d 1524 (7th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed robbery convictions, holding there was no error when the prosecution was permitted to exceed the scope of the direct in cross-examining a defense witness about matters it chose not to offer in its case-in-chief and that would not have been proper rebuttal, as the elicited testimony challenged some of the alibis that the defendant was presenting.

United States v. Gurolla, 333 F.3d 944 (9th Cir. 2003) : The Court held that the defendants' fair trial rights were not violated when the Trial Judge strictly limited cross-examination to rebuttal of matters raised on direct examination, since it was made clear that the defendants could recall the prosecution's witnesses as part of their cases-in-chief if they wished to question them on matters not covered by direct examination. In United States v. Castellanos-Garcia, 270 F.3d 773 (9th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed a conviction for entering the United States after being deported, holding there was no abuse of discretion in precluding cross-examination of the arresting agent concerning the location of sensors along the border. Since the agent had testified that he had not received any information from any possible sensors, their location was beyond the scope of his testimony on direct. In a complex narcotics manufacturing prosecution, United States v. Baker, n29 the Court held that the defendants' confrontation rights had been violated when the Trial Judge denied recross if the questions fell within an "area" or "subject matter" for which cross-examination had previously been available. The error in applying this overly narrow definition of "new matter" was harmless, however. In United States v. Vasquez, n30 the Court affirmed drug convictions, holding that questions concerning items in the defendants' apartment -- i.e., drugs and cash -- were within the scope of direct where a defendant claimed that he had left an apartment and was alone. In United States v. Green, n31 a husband and wife were convicted of conspiring to obstruct justice and of related offenses. The Court observed that witnesses may be cross-examined about matters raised on their direct examination, but said that "[a]n opening statement, however, having no evidentiary value, cannot operate to place an issue in controversy."

[3] Rule 611(c) -- Leading QuestionS

[a] Rule 611(c) -- Appellate Review

United States v. Ranney, 719 F.2d 1183 (1st Cir. 1983) : The Court sustained convictions for fraud and conspiracy arising out of a scheme to sell investment contracts in home heating oil. It found that the Trial Judge properly permitted investors to answer a series of hypothetical questions that established they would not have invested but for the representations that were made. In a footnote, the Court rejected the defendants' claim that the questions were impermissibly leading and stated that "[r]arely, if ever, will an appellate court interfere with the trial judge's broad discretion to control the mode and order of interrogation."

Sanders v. New York City Human Resources Admin., 361 F.3d 749 (2d Cir. 2004) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in a Title VII action, the Court held that the fact the Judge had allowed defense counsel to lead non-hostile witnesses on different occasions did not entitle the plaintiff to a new trial. The language of Rule 611(c), which expresses a preference for non-leading questions, is only precatory, and Trial Judges are afforded a large of discretion in overseeing the examination of witnesses. That discretion was not abused in this case. In a tax fraud prosecution, United States v. DeFiore, n32 the Court held there was no error in permitting the prosecutor to lead government witnesses. The Court noted that the Rule contains "words of suggestion, not command," and indicated that reversals for improper use of leading questions will be extremely rare.

Winant v. Bostic, 5 F.3d 767 (4th Cir. 1993) : In a suit for fraud in connection with a resort development project, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the plaintiffs to examine the defendants' former sales agent with leading questions. Although the witness had been discharged by the defendants, the Judge determined he was still associated with them, based on his behavior in the first trial. The Court stated that this is precisely the sort of ruling that a Trial Judge is in the best position to make, and reversal is warranted only if leading questions cause denial of a fair trial.

Stine v. Marathon Oil Co., 976 F.2d 254 (5th Cir. 1992) : The Court, partially reversing the judgment in an action on an oil lease, noted its almost total unwillingness to reverse for infractions of the leading question rule and concluded there had been no abuse of discretion amounting to plain error, but urged the Trial Judge on remand to restrict the use of leading questions on direct to noncontroversial or background areas.

United States v. Meza-Urtado, 351 F.3d 301 (7th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a drug conviction, the Court held that there was no plain error in the government's use of leading questions in the direct examination of two witnesses. The leading questions clarified one witness' testimony and were used to deal with a second witness who was "conveniently 'forgetful.' " The Court further noted that an error in permitting leading questions is critically dependent on the opponent making a proper objection at trial: "[A]n objection to a question as 'leading' is only an objection to the 'form' of the question. If an objection is offered and sustained, the examiner simply rephrases the question and draws the desired information from the witness. Any reasonably good lawyer worth his salt can accomplish this little trick. Without a sustained objection, an examiner would never have a chance to rephrase his question. For this reason, we think error, plain or otherwise, could never be identified in a case where only the form of a question to which no objection is made is challenged on appeal."

United States v. Templeman, 965 F.2d 617 (8th Cir. 1992) : Rejecting an argument that the prosecutor's use of leading questions warranted a new trial in a drug case, the Court noted that rulings on such objections are entrusted to the Trial Judge's discretion and held there was no error in the numerous objections overruled. As for the questions to which objections had been sustained, they were neither so numerous nor so suggestive that they crossed the fine line between stimulating an accurate memory and implanting a false one, and they did not interfere with the jury's ability to weigh testimony and credibility.

United States v. Pearson, 274 F.3d 1225 (9th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a conviction for violating the Clean Air Act, the Court held that the Trial Judge did not err in sustaining numerous objections to leading questions put to the defendant on direct examination. The Court reviewed the rulings "for abuse of discretion" and indicated that it would reverse only if the sustained objections amounted to or contributed to the denial of a fair trial, which it did not find in this case. In Miller v. Fairchild Indus., n33 although it was not entirely clear to the Court that leading questions were needed to develop the direct testimony of a defense witness in this Title VII case, the Trial Judge's action in overruling the plaintiffs' objections did not amount to or contribute to denial of a fair trial, because the testimony elicited did not substantially expand or alter earlier testimony responding to proper, nonleading questions, so reversal was not warranted.

United States v. Hewes, 729 F.2d 1302 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that the Trial Judge's toleration of leading questions in direct examination of government and defense witnesses was within permissible limits of discretion.

[b] Rule 611(c) -- Cross-Examination Beyond Scope of Direct

MDU Resources Group v. W.R. Grace & Co., 14 F.3d 1274 (8th Cir. 1994) : Reversing a judgment for the defendant in an action by a building owner for expenses in removing asbestos fireproofing, the Court noted that when cross-examination goes beyond the scope of direct, as it did here to establish a statute of limitations affirmative defense, the examiner must be required to ask questions of nonhostile witnesses as if on direct, i.e., without leading.

[c] Rule 611(c) -- Depositions

Oberlin v. Marlin Am. Corp., 596 F.2d 1322 (7th Cir. 1979) : In a case arising out of a franchise agreement, the defendant had taken a deposition of the plaintiff during which the plaintiff's counsel asked leading questions. The failure to object to leading questions during a deposition generally waives any objection at trial, since any error might be cured during the deposition if a timely objection is made, but the Court sustained a ruling under Rule 611(a) that some of the leading questions and answers from the deposition would not be admitted in evidence, since they might well have carried undue weight before the jury. In our view, Rule 403 was the proper authority for exclusion.

[d] Rule 611(c) -- Examination of Adverse Party

Rodriguez v. Banco Cent. Corp., 990 F.2d 7 (1st Cir. 1993) : In a civil racketeering suit, the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants, holding there was no error when the plaintiffs were precluded from using leading questions to examine certain defendants. The Court observed that the Rules generally permit leading questions to be used against an adverse party, but such questions might properly be disallowed, for example, if they would tend to distort the testimony of a witness. In any event, the plaintiffs in this case made no showing of specific information that might have been elicited with leading questions.

[e] Rule 611(c) -- Expert Witness

Suarez Matos v. Ashford Presbyterian Community Hosp., 4 F.3d 47 (1st Cir. 1993) : In a medical malpractice action, the plaintiff called, and cross-examined as a hostile witness, a physician whom the defendants had named before trial as their proposed expert witness. The Court vacated a judgment for the plaintiff, holding that the obligation to name witnesses is intended to give an opportunity to prepare, not to afford procedural advantages, and that allowing the practice followed in this trial would make expert witnesses who are reluctant to appear in the first place even more reluctant if they are to start with rigorous cross-examination before they have even made their statement.

[f] Rule 611(c) -- Following Non-Leading Questions

United States v. Carboni, 204 F.3d 39 (2d Cir. 2000) : The prosecutor asked a number of leading questions during the direct examination of a government witness. The Court found no error because the leading questions were asked only after the prosecutor had "repeatedly attempted to elicit the same information through non-leading questions."

[g] Rule 611(c) -- Foundation Matters and Developing the Witness' Testimony

United States v. Mulinelli-Navas, 111 F.3d 983 (1st Cir. 1997) : The Court held in a bank fraud prosecution that there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the prosecutor to use leading questions to lay a foundation for a line of questioning or to assist in developing coherent testimony from a witness who was at times unresponsive or showed a lack of understanding.

[h] Rule 611(c) -- Friendly Witnesses

United States v. Clinical Leasing Serv., 982 F.2d 900 (5th Cir. 1992) : In an action to hold corporate officers personally liable for fines imposed against their corporation, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in terminating one officer's direct testimony. His attorney had been specifically warned not to lead the witness, after having been warned about leading questions at least seven times previously. Affirming a Jones Act judgment for an employer in Adroin v. J. Ray McDermott & Co., n34 the Court found no abuse of discretion when the employer was permitted to ask leading questions during cross-examination of witnesses who were its employees and who might have been considered friendly witnesses.

Morvant v. Construction Aggregates Corp., 570 F.2d 626, 635 (6th Cir. 1978) : The Court noted that the use of leading questions on cross-examination of a friendly witness who was called as an adverse witness is within the Trial Judge's discretion: "If the witness is friendly to the examiner, there is the same danger of suggestiveness as on direct; and consequently the court may, in its discretion, forbid the use of leading questions."

United States v. Hansen, 583 F.2d 325 (7th Cir. 1978) : The Court affirmed a ruling that one codefendant (a father) could examine another codefendant (his son) only with nonleading questions.

[i] Rule 611(c) -- Hostile or Adverse Witnesses

United States v. Hicks, 748 F.2d 854 (4th Cir. 1984) : The Court found that a bank robbery defendant's girlfriend was identified with the defendant and could be asked leading questions by the government on direct examination.

Perkins v. Volkswagen of Am., 596 F.2d 681 (5th Cir. 1979) : In this product liability case, the Court found that it was error (but harmless) to rule that the plaintiff could not call an employee of the defendant and ask leading questions.

Ellis v. City of Chicago, 667 F.2d 606 (7th Cir. 1981) : In a dog owner's unsuccessful suit against the City and a police officer who killed his dog, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to deny the plaintiff an opportunity to ask leading questions of police officers whom he called to testify, when those officers were employees of the City and were present at part of the incident giving rise to the litigation.

United States v. Mora-Higuera, 269 F.3d 905 (8th Cir. 2001) : In a methamphetamine distribution case, the prosecution was permitted to use leading questions on direct after a witness became evasive and unclear about the types of drugs involved in the conspiracy. The Court found no plain error, since the witness was a relative of the defendant, testifying as part of a plea agreement, and the government asked at most 11 leading questions, most of them foundational.

United States v. Olivo, 69 F.3d 1057 (10th Cir. 1995) , supplemented, 80 F.3d 1466 (10th Cir. 1996) : Affirming drug-related convictions, the Court held it was not an abuse of discretion to permit the government to treat its key witness as hostile. The Court observed that "[i]t is unclear from the record whether he was recalcitrant or merely forgetful; however, he did state he was uncomfortable in the courtroom and hesitant to testify." In the circumstance, the witness could have been found hostile, reluctant, or unwilling to testify, or having difficulty understanding English; any of these grounds would justify permitting a direct examiner to ask leading questions.

Haney v. Mizell Mem. Hosp., 744 F.2d 1467 (11th Cir. 1984) : Although the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in a medical malpractice case, it found error when the plaintiff was not permitted to ask leading questions to a nurse employed by the hospital. The Court pointed out that "Rule 611(c) ... significantly enlarged the class of witnesses presumed hostile," and concluded that "an employee of one of the defendants present when the alleged malpractice may have occurred certainly was identified with a party adverse to Haney."

[j] Rule 611(c) -- Sexual Assault Victim Witness

United States v. Grassrope, 342 F.3d 866 (8th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a conviction for aggravated sexual assault upon a 17-year-old babysitter, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the prosecutor was permitted to elicit by leading questions that the defendant had vaginally and anally penetrated the victim. The Court noted that "[i]t is not uncommon that the precise physiological details of sexual assault must be elicited by focused questioning. We have repeatedly upheld the use of leading questions to develop the testimony of sexual assault victims, particularly children." In this case, the victim had already testified to the penetration at the defendant's first trial (which ended in a mistrial), and the defendant contested only consent, not penetration.

[k] Rule 611(c) -- Witnesses with Communication Problems

United States v. Ajmal, 67 F.3d 12 (2d Cir. 1995) : Affirming a conviction for possession of heroin with intent to distribute, the Court held there was neither a Confrontation Clause violation nor a clear abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge permitted the principal prosecution witness, who spoke little English and testified primarily in Urdu through a translator, to be examined largely by leading questions.

United States v. Rodriguez-Garcia, 983 F.2d 1563 (10th Cir. 1993) : The Court held in a drug trafficking prosecution that there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the prosecutor to ask leading questions of a witness who testified through an interpreter because he did not speak English.

[l] Rule 611(c) -- Young or Disabled Witnesses

Jordan v. Hurley, 397 F.3d 360 (6th Cir. 2005) : Affirming denial of habeas corpus relief to a state prisoner convicted of rape, the Court found no Confrontation Clause violation when the victim, who had Down syndrome and had difficulty responding to the prosecutor's questions, was examined by leading questions.

United States v. Wright, 119 F.3d 630 (8th Cir. 1997) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in a prosecution for sexual abuse of a four-year-old girl to permit use of leading questions in the direct examination of the victim, even absent a specific showing of necessity or reluctance to testify. In United States v. Butler, 56 F.3d 941 (8th Cir. 1995) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the prosecutor to ask the nine-year-old complaining witness after he described a sexual assault, "Do you remember any lotion or anything like that around this time period?" The government was eliciting very sensitive testimony from a child witness, and there was no indication it was attempting to shape the witness' evidence. See also United States v. Rossbach n35(finding no error in the use of leading questions in examining 15 and 17-year-old victims of sexual assaults who were hesitant to answer questions regarding the assaults); United States v. Littlewind n36(use of leading questions was necessary under the circumstances and not excessive where rape victims were young girls understandably reluctant to talk about what happened). In United States v. Nabors, n37 the Court held that the prosecutor did not improperly lead a 12-year-old witness in a bank robbery trial when he sought to elicit an answer containing a "naughty" word that the witness was reluctant to use.

United States v. Archdale, 229 F.3d 861 (9th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a conviction for child sexual abuse, the Court found no error in the prosecution's use of leading questions in the direct examination of the alleged victim, since the witness was having difficulty testifying about a very personal matter. The Court also found it permissible for the prosecution to use an anatomical diagram to help the witness describe what happened to her; this helped the witness to testify fully. In United States v. Jordan, 964 F.2d 944 (9th Cir. 1992) , the Court held that the defendant, convicted of sexual abuse, was not denied his right to confrontation when the prosecutor was permitted to ask leading questions of the eight-year-old victim, who was so reluctant to testify initially that a recess was ordered during her testimony.

3-611 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 611.04

611.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

Subdivision (a). Spelling out detailed rules to govern the mode and order of interrogating witnesses and presenting evidence is neither desirable nor feasible. The ultimate responsibility for the effective working of the adversary system rests with the judge. The rule sets forth the objectives which he should seek to attain.

Item (1) restates in broad terms the power and obligation of the judge as developed under common law principles. It covers such concerns as whether testimony shall be in the form of a free narrative or responses to specific questions, McCormick § 5, the order of calling witnesses and presenting evidence, 6 Wigmore § 1867, the use of demonstrative evidence, McCormick § 179, and the many other questions arising during the course of a trial which can be solved only by the judge's common sense and fairness in view of the particular circumstances.

Item (2) is addressed to avoidance of needless consumption of time, a matter of daily concern in the disposition of cases. A companion piece is found in the discretion vested in the judge to exclude evidence as a waste of time in Rule 403(b). [Editor's Note: The reference is to Rule 403; there is no subdivision (b).]

Item (3) calls for a judgment under the particular circumstances whether interrogation tactics entail harassment or undue embarrassment. Pertinent circumstances include the importance of the testimony, the nature of the inquiry, its relevance to credibility, waste of time, and confusion. McCormick § 42. In Alford v. United States, 282 U.S. 687, 694, 51 S. Ct. 218, 75 L. Ed. 624 (1931) , the Court pointed out that, while the trial judge should protect the witness from questions which "go beyond the bounds of proper cross-examination merely to harass, annoy or humiliate," this protection by no means forecloses efforts to discredit the witness. Reference to the transcript of the prosecutor's cross-examination in Berger v. United States, 295 U.S. 78, 55 S. Ct. 629, 79 L. Ed. 1314 (1935) , serves to lay at rest any doubts as to the need for judicial control in this area.

The inquiry into specific instances of conduct of a witness allowed under Rule 608(b) is, of course, subject to this rule.

Subdivision (b). [Editor's Note: The Advisory Committee version of Rule 611(b) called for wide open cross-examination on any relevant issue. Congress rejected this proposal and adopted a rule limiting the scope of cross-examination to the subject matter of the direct, with the Trial Court having discretion to broaden the scope. The Advisory Committee Note makes the case for the Committee's proposal.]

The tradition in the federal courts and in numerous state courts has been to limit the scope of cross-examination to matters testified to on direct, plus matters bearing upon the credibility of the witness. Various reasons have been advanced to justify the rule of limited cross-examination. (1) A party vouches for his own witness but only to the extent of matters elicited on direct. Resurrection Gold Mining Co. v. Fortune Gold Mining Co., 129 F. 668, 675 (8th Cir. 1904) , quoted in Maguire, Weinstein, et al., Cases on Evidence 277, n. 38 (5th ed. 1965). But the concept of vouching is discredited, and Rule 607 rejects it. (2) A party cannot ask his own witness leading questions. This is a problem properly solved in terms of what is necessary for a proper development of the testimony rather than by a mechanistic formula similar to the vouching concept. See discussion under subdivision (c). (3) A practice of limited cross-examination promotes orderly presentation of the case. Finch v. Weiner, 109 Conn. 616, 145 A. 31 (1929) . While this latter reason has merit, the matter is essentially one of the order of presentation and not one in which involvement at the appellate level is likely to prove fruitful. See, for example, Moyer v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 126 F.2d 141 (3d Cir. 1942) ; Butler v. New York Cent. R. R., 253 F.2d 281 (7th Cir. 1958) ; United States v. Johnson, 285 F.2d 35 (9th Cir. 1960) ; Union Automobile Indem. Ass'n v. Capitol Indem. Ins. Co., 310 F.2d 318 (7th Cir. 1962) . In evaluating these considerations, McCormick says:

> The foregoing considerations favoring the wide-open or restrictive rules may well be thought to be fairly evenly balanced. There is another factor, however, which seems to swing the balance overwhelmingly in favor of the wide-open rule. This is the consideration of economy of time and energy. Obviously, the wide-open rule presents little or no opportunity for dispute in its application. The restrictive practice in all its forms, on the other hand, is productive in many courtrooms, of continual bickering over the choice of the numerous variations of the "scope of the direct" criterion, and of their application to particular cross-questions. These controversies are often reventilated on appeal, and reversals for error in their determination are frequent. Observance of these vague and ambiguous restrictions is a matter of constant and hampering concern to the cross-examiner. If these efforts, delays and misprisons were the necessary incidents to the guarding of substantive rights or the fundamentals of fair trial, they might be worth the cost. As the price of the choice of an obviously debatable regulation of the order of evidence, the sacrifice seems misguided. The American Bar Association's Committee for the Improvement of the Law of Evidence for the year 1937-38 said this:
> "The rule limiting cross-examination to the precise subject of the direct examination is probably the most frequent rule (except the Opinion rule) leading in the trial practice today to refined and technical quibbles which obstruct the progress of the trial, confuse the jury, and give rise to appeal on technical grounds only. Some of the instances in which Supreme Courts have ordered new trials for the mere transgression of this rule about the order of evidence have been astounding.
>
> "We recommend that the rule allowing questions upon any part of the issue known to the witness ... be adopted... ."
> McCormick, § 27, p. 51. See also 5 Moore's Federal Practice P 43.10 (2nd ed. 1964).

The provision of the second sentence, that the judge may in the interests of justice limit inquiry into new matters on cross-examination, is designed for those situations in which the result otherwise would be confusion, complication, or protraction of the case, not as a matter of rule but as demonstrable in the actual development of the particular case.

The rule does not purport to determine the extent to which an accused who elects to testify thereby waives his privilege against self-incrimination. The question is a constitutional one, rather than a mere matter of administering the trial. Under Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377, 88 S. Ct. 967, 19 L. Ed. 2d 1247 (1968), no general waiver occurs when the accused testifies on such preliminary matters as the validity of a search and seizure or the admissibility of a confession. Rule 104(d) supra. When he testifies on the merits, however, can he foreclose inquiry into an aspect or element of the crime by avoiding it on direct? The affirmative answer given in Tucker v. United States, 5 F.2d 818 (8th Cir. 1925), is inconsistent with the description of the waiver as extending to "all other relevant facts" in Johnson v. United States, 318 U.S. 189, 195, 63 S. Ct. 549, 87 L. Ed. 704 (1943). See also Brown v. United States, 356 U.S. 148, 78 S. Ct. 622, 2 L. Ed. 2d 589 (1958). The situation of an accused who desires to testify on some but not all counts of a multiple-count indictment is one to be approached, in the first instance at least, as a problem of severance under Rule 14 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Cross v. United States, 335 F.2d 987, 118 U.S. App. D.C. 324 (1964). Cf. United States v. Baker, 262 F. Supp. 657, 686 (D.D.C. 1966). In all events, the extent of the waiver of the privilege against self-incrimination ought not to be determined as a by-product of a rule on scope of cross-examination.

Subdivision (c). The rule continues the traditional view that the suggestive powers of the leading question are as a general proposition undesirable. Within this tradition, however, numerous exceptions have achieved recognition: The witness who is hostile, unwilling, or biased; the child witness or the adult with communication problems; the witness whose recollection is exhausted; and undisputed preliminary matters. 3 Wigmore §§ 774-778. An almost total unwillingness to reverse for infractions has been manifested by appellate courts. See cases cited in 3 Wigmore § 770. The matter clearly falls within the area of control by the judge over the mode and order of interrogation and presentation and accordingly is phrased in words of suggestion rather than command.

The rule also conforms to tradition in making the use of leading questions on cross-examination a matter of right. The purpose of the qualification "ordinarily" is to furnish a basis for denying the use of leading questions when the cross-examination is cross-examination in form only and not in fact, as for example the "cross-examination" of a party by his own counsel after being called by the opponent (savoring more of redirect) or of an insured defendant who proves to be friendly to the plaintiff.

The final sentence deals with categories of witnesses automatically regarded and treated as hostile. Rule 43(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure has included only "an adverse party or an officer, director, or managing agent of a public or private corporation or of a partnership or association which is an adverse party." This limitation virtually to persons whose statements would stand as admissions is believed to be an unduly narrow concept of those who may safely be regarded as hostile without further demonstration. See, for example, Maryland Cas. Co. v. Kador, 225 F.2d 120 (5th Cir. 1955), and Degelos v. Fidelity & Cas. Co., 313 F.2d 809 (5th Cir. 1963), holding despite the language of Rule 43(b) that an insured fell within it, though not a party in an action under the Louisiana direct action statute. The phrase of the rule, "witness identified with" an adverse party, is designed to enlarge the category of persons thus callable. [Editor's Note: Congress revised the last sentence of Rule 611(c) by expanding it to criminal cases (allowing the defendant, for example, to use leading questions on the direct examination of a witness associated with the government), and by permitting the use of leading questions in the direct examination of any hostile witness.]

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendment is technical. No substantive change is intended."]

Rule 611(b) -- Scope of Cross-Examination

There are basically two views concerning the proper scope of cross-examination of a witness. The "English Rule" states that the cross-examiner should be free to inquire about any information relevant to the case; in contrast, the traditional "American Rule" is that the cross-examiner may only ask questions that concern the subject matter of the direct examination (with the exception, of course, of questions pertaining to the witness's credibility). An illustration of the difference is instructive. Assume a wrongful death case in which the plaintiff is suing for the death of his wife. The plaintiff calls the next door neighbor who testifies that he saw the decedent walking across the street in front of her house when she was run down by the defendant's bakery truck. On cross-examination, defense counsel wants to inquire into the neighbor's knowledge of any extramarital affairs that the plaintiff had during the course of the plaintiff's marriage to the decedent. Under the English Rule, this would be perfectly permissible; the information is relevant to the damages that the plaintiff has suffered from the loss of his wife. Under the American Rule, the information is, of course, equally relevant, but it cannot be brought up on cross-examination. The subject matter of direct dealt with the accident, which is a question of liability. The subject matter of the proposed cross-examination goes to damages.

The rationale for the American Rule is that a party generally should be free to follow its own order of proof without distraction from the adversary. The American Rule does not, of course, prevent the adversary from ever inquiring into a subject matter beyond the scope of a witness's direct examination. It operates simply as a timing device. The solution for the adversary is to call the witness to testify again during its own case.

The Advisory Committee opted for the wide-open cross-examination model in its proposed Rule 611(b), with the proviso that the trial judge would have discretion, in the interests of justice, to "limit cross-examination with respect to matters not testified to on direct examination." Quoting McCormick, the note states: "The rule limiting cross-examination to the precise subject of the direct examination is probably the most frequent rule (except the opinion rule) leading in the trial practice today to refined and technical quibbles which obstruct the progress of the trial, confuse the jury, and give rise to appeal on technical grounds only."

Despite this cogent argument, Congress rejected the Advisory Committee's proposal. In essence, Congress reversed the presumption in the Advisory Committee's proposed rule. As promulgated, Rule 611(b) limits cross-examination to the subject matter of direct and to questions of credibility, but grants the trial judge discretion to expand the scope of cross-examination in a particular case. Congress' position, as expressed by the House Committee on the Judiciary, was that the traditional American Rule "facilitates orderly presentation by each party at trial." The safety valve of judicial discretion was included to limit the hair-splitting arguments as to the proper "scope of direct" at trial and on appeal that would otherwise surely occur under the American Rule. The result is that a lawyer seeking to determine the proper scope of cross-examination should not refer to the Advisory Committee Note.

Rule 611(c) -- Leading Questions

Federal Rule 611(c) provides that leading questions are generally impermissible on direct examination, and generally permissible on cross-examination. The proviso is that when a party calls "a hostile witness, an adverse party, or a witness identified with an adverse party," the party may use leading questions on direct. The reason for restricting leading questions is that testimony of the witness is preferred over testimony of the lawyer. If the witness is sympathetic to the lawyer's cause (as is ordinarily the case when the witness is called on direct) the risk is that he will be too easily led to simply affirm the closed-ended statements of the lawyer. On the other hand, if the witness is unsympathetic to the lawyer's cause (as is ordinarily the case on cross-examination), there is a possibility that open-ended, nonleading questions could be evaded or exploited by the witness; therefore leading questions should generally be permitted on cross-examination.

The Advisory Committee's proposal for Rule 611(c) was somewhat more restrictive in permitting leading questions than the rule ultimately adopted by Congress. The Advisory Committee would have permitted leading questions on cross-examination in civil cases only. The Advisory Committee gave no explanation for this limitation. The proviso for leading questions on direct was limited to situations in which the witness was either an adverse party or a person identified with an adverse party.

Congress believed that the permission for leading questions on cross-examination should be applicable to criminal as well as civil cases, "to reflect the possibility that in criminal cases a defendant may be entitled to call witnesses identified with the government, in which event the ... defendant should be permitted to inquire with leading questions." (Statement of House Committee on the Judiciary). Moreover, Congress was of the view that leading questions should be permissible with respect to all hostile witnesses, not merely those witnesses who were adverse parties or identified with them. Consequently, the Advisory Committee Note to the rule gives an inaccurate impression-it describes the rule as more narrow in permitting leading questions than it actually is.

[3] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

The Subcommittee amended subdivision (b) to return to the rule which prevails in the Federal courts and 39 State jurisdictions. As amended, the Rule is in the text of the 1969 draft; it limits cross-examination to credibility and to matters testified to on direct examination, unless the judge permits more. This more traditional rule facilitates orderly presentations and progress at trial. Further, in the light of existing discovery procedures, there appears to be no need to abandon the traditional rule.

The change in subdivision (c) from "In civil cases" to "When" is designed to reflect the possibility that in criminal cases the defendant may be entitled to call a witness identified with the government, in which event the Subcommittee felt the defendant should be permitted to inquire using leading questions.

[Not included in June 28, 1973 draft. Ed.]

[4] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

As submitted by the Court, Rule 611(b) provided: "A witness may be cross-examined on any matter relevant to any issue in the case, including credibility. In the interests of justice, the judge may limit cross-examination with respect to matters not testified to on direct examination."

The Committee amended this provision to return to the rule which prevails in the federal courts and thirty-nine State jurisdictions. As amended, the Rule is in the text of the 1969 Advisory Committee draft. It limits cross-examination to credibility and to matters testified to on direct examination, unless the judge permits more, in which event the cross-examiner must proceed as if on direct examination. This traditional rule facilitates orderly presentation by each party at trial. Further, in light of existing discovery procedures, there appears to be no need to abandon the traditional rule.

The third sentence of Rule 611(c) as submitted by the Court provided that: "In civil cases, a party is entitled to call an adverse party or witness identified with him and interrogate by leading questions."

The Committee amended this Rule to permit leading questions to be used with respect to any hostile witness, not only an adverse party or person identified with such adverse party. The Committee also substituted the word "When" for the phrase "In civil cases" to reflect the possibility that in criminal cases a defendant may be entitled to call witnesses identified with the government, in which event the Committee believed the defendant should be permitted to inquire with leading questions.

[5] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

Rule 611(b) as submitted by the Supreme Court permitted a broad scope of cross-examination: "cross-examination on any matter relevant to any issue in the case" unless the judge, in the interests of justice, limited the scope of cross-examination.

The House narrowed the Rule to the more traditional practice of limiting cross-examination to the subject matter of direct examination (and credibility), but with discretion in the judge to permit inquiry into additional matters in situations where that would aid in the development of the evidence or otherwise facilitate the conduct of the trial.

The committee agrees with the House amendment. Although there are good arguments in support of broad cross-examination from prospectives of developing all relevant evidence, we believe the factors of insuring an orderly and predictable development of the evidence weigh in favor of the narrower rule, especially when discreation [sic] is given to the trial judge to permit inquiry into additional matters. The committee expressly approves this discretion and believes it will permit sufficient flexibility allowing a broader scope of cross-examination whenever appropriate.

The House amendment providing broader discretionary cross-examination permitted inquiry into additional matters only as if on direct examination. As a general rule, we concur with this limitation, however, we would understand that this limitation would not preclude the utilization of leading questions if the conditions of subsection (c) of this rule were met, bearing in mind the judge's discretion in any case to limit the scope of cross-examination.

Further, the committee has received correspondence from Federal judges commenting on the applicability of this rule to section 1407 of title 28. It is the committee's judgment that this rule as reported by the House is flexible enough to provide sufficiently broad cross-examination in appropriate situations in multidistrict litigation.

As submitted by the Supreme Court, the rule [611(c)] provided: "In civil cases, a party is entitled to call an adverse party or witness identified with him and interrogate by leading questions."

The final sentence of subsection (c) was amended by the House for the purpose of clarifying the fact that a "hostile witness" -- that is a witness who is hostile in fact -- could be subject to interrogation by leading questions. The rule as submitted by the Supreme Court declared certain witnesses hostile as a matter of law and thus subject to interrogation by leading questions without any showing of hostility in fact. These were adverse parties or witnesses identified with adverse parties. However, the wording of the first sentence of subsection (c) while generally prohibiting the use of leading questions on direct examination, also provides "except as may be necessary to develop his testimony." Further, the first paragraph of the Advisory Committee note explaining the subsection makes clear that they intended that leading questions could be asked of a hostile witness or a witness who was unwilling or biased and even though that witness was not associated with an adverse party. Thus, we question whether the House amendment was necessary.

However, concluding that it was not intended to affect the meaning of the first sentence of the subsection and was intended solely to clarify the fact that leading questions are permissible in the interrogation of a witness, who is hostile in fact, the committee accepts that House amendment.

The final sentence of this subsection was also amended by the House to cover criminal as well as civil cases. The committee accepts this amendment, but notes that it may be difficult in criminal cases to determine when a witness is "identified with an adverse party," and thus the rule should be applied with caution.

Supp. to § 611.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Rule 611(a) -- Control by Court [Go To Main]

[a.1] Rule 611(a) -- Closed Circuit Testimony

Parkhurst v. Belt, 567 F.3d 995 (8th Cir. 2009) : In a civil case for damages resulting from the alleged sexual abuse of a child, the Court found no error when the child was permitted to testify by closed circuit television. The Trial Judge has significant discretion over the mode of interrogating witnesses, and here the Judge interviewed the child and, having watched her break down over the prospect of testifying against the defendant, found that it would be too traumatic to have her testify in the courtroom. The Court concluded that "[t]he need to protect the welfare of an abused child qualifies as a compelling circumstance" under Fed. R. Civ. P. 43(a), which requires testimony to be taken in open court except in compelling circumstances.

[f.1] Excluding Admitted Evidence During Deliberations

In re Hanford Nuclear Reservation Litig., 534 F.3d 986 (9th Cir. 2008) , amending 497 F.3d 1005 (9th Cir. 2007) : Reversing in part judgments from a trial in which bellwether plaintiffs representing a class of residents near a nuclear facility that helped make an atomic bomb during World War II claimed that radioiodine (I-131) emissions caused cancers and life threatening diseases, the Court found it was an abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge told the jury, in response to its inquiry, that it could not consider expert testimony pertaining to subject matter that was not contained in the expert's report. The defendants had not objected to the testimony during the trial. The Court stated that "[i]t is a rare circumstance when the court may exclude evidence after the close of the parties' cases," and explained that "[i]f the parties have already rested, they no longer have a chance to provide a curative response to the excluded evidence."

[j] Rule 611(a) -- Jurors' Questioning of Witnesses

SEC v. Koenig, 557 F.3d 736 (7th Cir. 2009) : In a civil enforcement action for violation of securities laws, the Court found no abuse of discretion when questions from jurors were asked of witnesses. The jurors submitted the questions to the Judge, who asked some, reformulated and asked others, and did not ask others thought to be inappropriate or repetitive. Although prior decisions had expressed skepticism about juror questioning, the Court concluded that "[n]ow that several studies have concluded that the benefits exceed the costs, there is no reason to disfavor the practice."

United States v. Smith, 569 F.3d 1209 (10th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for tax evasion, finding no abuse of discretion when the Judge twice asked witnesses questions submitted by jurors. Although juror questioning has risks, the questions here were clarifying and factual, not one-sided, hostile, or frivolous, and they pointed to areas where the attorneys might need to explain concepts further to jurors. Further, the Judge did not allow or invite a steady stream of juror participation.

[k] Rule 611(a) -- Limitations on Examination

[i] Abuse of Discretion

United States v. Ofray-Campos, 534 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2008) : Reviewing a multi-drug trafficking case, the Court held that it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to bar one defendant from cross-examining an agent about alleged family ties and hostile relations that existed between the officer and the defendant. Although the officer's testimony was partially corroborated by the testimony of another officer, that "did not provide an adequate basis for the court's preclusion of the cross-examination sought by [the defendant]." The Trial Judge excluded the cross-examination primarily on the ground that it was a collateral matter, but the Court found that it clearly was designed to elicit evidence of the officer's motive and bias for providing inculpatory testimony.

[ii] Rule 611(a) -- Limitations on Examination -- No Abuse of Discretion

United States v. Hatch, 514 F.3d 145 (1st Cir. 2008) : The defendant was convicted for filing false tax returns, having not reported income received as the first winner of the "reality-TV" show "Survivor." On appeal, he complained of not being permitted to introduce evidence that the producers had changed the rules of the show, leading him to think that they would pay the taxes on any winnings, thus negating the willfulness element of the charges that he had not reported the income. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, as the Trial Judge had repeatedly ruled that evidence of anything the producers did or said to induce the defendant's belief they were assuming the tax liability would be admissible, but that evidence simply of changing the rules of the show was irrelevant to the charges and would be inadmissible. The Court also found no abuse of discretion in limitations imposed on cross-examination of prosecution witnesses, as "[t]he relatively few exclusions were largely of questions that could reasonably be thought to be repetitive, improper, incoherent, or confusing to the jury, or else dealt with matters of seemingly scant relevance to the charges upon which Hatch was being tried."

United States v. Jimenez, 513 F.3d 62 (3d Cir. 2008) : The defendants were convicted of fraud in a scheme that involved check-kiting with the cooperation of a bank officer. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge limited cross-examination of a bank compliance officer called by the government as a records custodian. The defendants argued that the bank had a motive to cooperate in the instant case because it was being investigated in a totally unrelated matter. However, the unrelated investigation occurred years after the investigation of the actions at issue here with which the bank had cooperated, and the witness had little knowledge of the other investigation, so the "marginal relevance and the risk of delay and confusion created by a mini-trial to explain the evidence support the district court's decision to limit the cross-examination."

United States v. Hitt, 473 F.3d 146 (5th Cir. 2006) : In a Mann Act prosecution arising from sexual abuse of a teenage boy, one defendant (Hitt) recalled a doctor who had testified for the government and conducted cross-examination. The codefendant (Causey) declined to examine the doctor on direct, the government cross-examined, and Hitt engaged in a short re-direct. Causey then sought to conduct a "re-direct" but was not permitted to do so. Affirming, the Court found no Confrontation Clause violation -- because the doctor was not called to testify against Causey at this stage of the trial -- or abuse of discretion.

United States v. Payne, 437 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for passing counterfeit obligations, finding no abuse of discretion when the re-cross examination of an important government witness was limited. The Court noted that "[w]e have permitted district courts to curtail or even to deny recross-examination if the government elicits no new matters on redirect examination." Here, the government had elicited no new information on redirect examination.

United States v. Oaks, 606 F.3d 530 (8th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in denying the defendant's request for additional cross-examination of a police officer. The officer testified on direct examination that he could not see what the defendant threw in a lake because shadows from tall shrubs or trees prevented him from seeing clearly; he was cross-examined about not mentioning shrubbery in an earlier description of the event; and on redirect he reviewed a written statement made near the incident that indicated that the defendant threw an item in the direction of "weeds" and "vegetation." The Court observed that the defendant failed to explain what additional questions on re-cross would have significantly impacted the officer's credibility. In United States v. Parish, 606 F.3d 480 (8th Cir. 2010) , a prosecution for drug offenses, the defense indicated before trial that it would ask police about an alleged beating when the defendant was arrested, and the government moved in limine to preclude such questions before the defendant had testified to his having been beaten and raised those allegations as part of his defense. To forestall an argument to the jury based on the content of cross-examination questions, the Judge ruled that there should be some foundation established before the officers were cross-examined on the alleged beating. The Judge further stated that "as things go along, and if foundation can be established for the admission of this stuff, that's a whole other issue. For right now, I'm not going to get into it, especially during voir dire or opening statements." The alleged beating was never raised during the government's case-in-chief, although officers testified about the circumstances of the arrest. On appeal, the defendant claimed that he had been erroneously limited in questioning the police during the government's case-in-chief. Affirming, the Court held that the in limine ruling had been "'definitive' only in the sense that it applied to voir dire and opening statements and not to the offer of testimony or evidence during the trial." Because the question of later admission of the evidence as the trial record developed was left open, there was no abuse of discretion in the ruling, and the defendant had been provided the opportunity to present to the jury all the evidence supporting his story. In United States v. Bentley, 561 F.3d 803 (8th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed convictions for sexual exploitation of children and possession of child pornography, finding no confrontation violation when the defense was precluded from asking witnesses testifying about certain photographs whether they had heard that the defendant might not have taken the pictures. The proposed examination was not designed to illuminate flaws in memory and it would have introduced speculative hearsay.

[iii] Rule 611(a) -- Limitations on Examination -- Time Limits

United States v. Midgett, 488 F.3d 288 (4th Cir. 2007) : Affirming convictions for several offenses, including damaging a vehicle by fire and bank robbery, the Court found no abuse of discretion when time limits were imposed on the cross-examination of the defendant's former girlfriend/coconspirator and on the direct examination of the defendant, after defense counsel had engaged in lengthy interrogation that elicited each witness's central evidence. The cross-examination of the girlfriend was allowed to continue long after the Judge instructed defense counsel to conclude it within five minutes, defense counsel was permitted to ask all his questions on re-cross, and defense counsel concluded his direct examination of the defendant before the time limit imposed by the Judge had expired.

Cedar Hill Hardware & Constr. Supply v. Ins. Corp. of Hannover, 563 F.3d 329 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the insurer in an insurance coverage dispute. The Judge had set the trial for two stages, the first of which lasted 29 trial days. Frustrated with the attorneys' conduct and concerned about losing jurors, the Judge imposed time limits of eight hours for each side in the second stage of the case. The Court found no abuse of discretion, writing that "we cannot view the time limits and the proposed witnesses in isolation," and "we must assess the district court's trial management decisions in context, against the backdrop of a twenty-nine day, first-phase trial and against the pattern of cumulative witnesses already called by the parties." After noting that the appellant's offer of proof did not "describe with specificity how additional testimony would have been more than cumulative," the Court added that "[w]hile we have looked with suspicion upon, and recommended caution regarding, strict time limits, we have not addressed a situation similar to the present case." In Harris v. Chand, 506 F.3d 1135 (8th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the employer in a Title VII race discrimination action, finding no abuse of discretion in the Trial Judge's placing time limits on the presentation of the plaintiff's case and no plain error when the plaintiff was not able to call witnesses due to the time limit. The plaintiff made neither an objection when the Judge said her time was up nor an offer of proof as to the testimony that she was unable to present. The Court observed that time limits imposed before trial must be sufficiently flexible to accommodate adjustments if it appears during trial that the limits were too restrictive, and when there is an objection to the exclusion of evidence as a result of time limits the Judge must explain the exclusion. A dissenting Judge argued that the Trial Judge "placed an impermissibly rigid time constraint on the plaintiff's case" and that the plaintiff had attempted to make offers of proof but was not permitted to do so.

United States v. Ingram, 501 F.3d 963 (8th Cir. 2007) , vacated for reconsideration of sentencing, 173 L. Ed. 2d 284 : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court found no abuse of discretion when video clips of witnesses interviewed by the government the day after the defendant's arrest were excluded. Although the defendant claimed that the clips should have been admitted to impeach the witnesses, the Court observed that the defendant had been given wide latitude to examine the investigator about the videotaped interviews and the defendant could not identify any evidence on the clips that he was not able to put before the jury through his examination of the investigator or cross-examination of the witnesses who were interviewed.

[m] Rule 611(a) -- Order of Proof

Santos v. Posadas de Puerto Rico Assoc., Inc., 452 F.3d 59 (1st Cir. 2006) : In a slip and fall case, the plaintiff's damages expert was not available to testify during the plaintiff's case-in-chief. The Trial Judge altered the order of proof so that the defendant's case would start after the plaintiff's case on liability. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found no abuse of discretion in this reordering. Although the defense contended that it had only one hour from the Judge's order to gather and prepare its witnesses, the Court found no substantial prejudice. It noted that "[m]inor scheduling changes of this sort occur on a daily basis in the course of trial practice, and counsel must be ready to deal with them. In the absence of special circumstances -- and none are present here -- such tweakings in the order of proof do not work unfair prejudice."

United States v. Guthrie, 557 F.3d 243 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for carjacking and firearms offenses, holding it was no abuse of discretion to call a recess before defense counsel finished cross-examining a witness and to permit the prosecution to call two witnesses to give brief testimony before the day ended. The Judge had made sure that the defense was at an appropriate transition point before calling the recess, and there were valid reasons why the two witnesses had to testify immediately (e.g., one witness was about to give birth).

[q.1] Rule 611(a) -- Readback of Trial Testimony

United States v. Richard, 504 F.3d 1109 (9th Cir. 2007) : The Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession, because the jury was permitted to hear a readback of only a portion of the testimony of the prosecution's star witness (who was the only witness directly connecting the defendant with the gun). The Court noted that readbacks present "an inherent risk of undue emphasis" of the testimony that is read or played to the jury, and therefore that "certain precautions must generally be taken to avoid that risk." These safeguards include: (1) the replay should be conducted in open court with all parties present; (2) "the jury should ordinarily be provided with the witness's entire testimony -- i.e., direct and cross-examination;" and (3) the jury "should be admonished to weigh all the evidence and not focus on any portion of the trial." The Court found that a cautionary instruction was especially important where, as here, "the jury has exhibited an obvious intent to emphasize a specific portion of the testimony." Finally, in deciding whether to allow testimony to be replayed, a Judge "should consider the quantum of evidence against the defendant and the importance of the testimony to be replayed in relation to other evidence." In this case, the Judge replayed only the portion of the witness' testimony that was most directly inculpatory of the defendant (although the jury had initially requested all the witness' testimony) and took none of the precautions necessary to ensure that the jury did not unduly emphasize the testimony. See United States v. Medina Casteneda, 511 F.3d 1246 (9th Cir. 2008) (no abuse of discretion to deny jury's request to read back a witness' testimony, particularly given "the tendency of the jury to focus on one particular piece of evidence at the expense of other evidence").

[s] Rule 611(a) -- Rebuttal and Surrebuttal

United States v. Groves, 470 F.3d 311 (7th Cir. 2006) : In a trial for felon firearm possession, defense counsel's cross-examination of a government witness (Foster) went beyond the scope of the direct. When the prosecutor objected, defense counsel offered to bring Foster back to the stand during the defendant's case-in-chief. However, the Judge allowed the defendant to continue to question Foster beyond the scope of direct, and then allowed the government to offer rebuttal witnesses to Foster's testimony. On appeal, the defendant argued that the rebuttal evidence should not have been allowed because Foster was not the defendant's witness. The Court held that because defense counsel was allowed to question Foster out of order rather than call her back to the stand later, "this part of her testimony was part of the defendant's case-in-chief." Therefore the government was properly allowed to rebut matters raised on Foster's cross-examination. The Court noted, however, that one rebuttal witness testified on matters within the scope of Foster's direct examination; while this was error, it was harmless.

Marmo v. Tyson Fresh Meats, Inc., 457 F.3d 748 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming judgments for a packing plant owner sued by a residential property owner who claimed she was injured by hydrogen sulfide gas emitted from the plant's wastewater treatment lagoons, the Court found no error when an expert the plaintiff listed as a rebuttal witness was not permitted to testify during the plaintiff's case-in-chief. "The district court reasonably construed the progression order as dictating both the timing and substantive nature of expert witness testimony, and it was well within its discretion to rule that witnesses disclosed as rebuttal witnesses under the progression order would testify as rebuttal witnesses at trial." The Court found that the defendant would have suffered significant prejudice if the expert who was listed as a rebuttal witness was allowed to testify as a primary expert witness, as the defendant selected its experts and developed motion and trial strategies in reliance on the plaintiff's designation of primary experts.

[u] Rule 611(a) -- Reopening the Evidence

United States v. Crawford, 533 F.3d 133 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed a firearms conviction because the Trial Judge reopened the case during jury deliberations so that the government could admit evidence of a trace report. The Judge reopened the case sua sponte after the jury inquired why the gun was never traced to the original owner. The Court set forth the following standards for determining whether a Judge can reopen a case once a jury has retired for deliberations:

> The court must consider the timeliness of the motion, the character of the testimony, and the effect of granting the motion. The party moving to reopen should provide a reasonable explanation for failure to present the evidence in its case-in-chief. The evidence proffered should be relevant, admissible, technically adequate, and helpful to the jury in ascertaining the guilt or innocence of the accused. The belated receipt of such testimony should not imbue the evidence with distorted importance, prejudice the opposing party's case, or preclude an adversary from having an adequate opportunity to meet the additional evidence offered.

(Emphasis in original.) In this case the Court found that the government had no excuse for failing to enter the trace report during its case-in-chief; "the belated introduction of the trace report probably imbued the evidence with distorted importance" especially because the reopening was in response to a question from the jury; the defense was prejudiced because its strategy -- may have been different if the government had introduced the trace report in its case-in-chief; and even more prejudice was suffered because the testimony on reopening indicated that the defense counsel was aware of the existence of the trace report -- thus undermining the defense's credibility after the defense had already presented its case.

[v] Rule 611(a) -- Summary Charts and Testimony

United States v. McElroy, 587 F.3d 73 (1st Cir. 2009) : Affirming tax fraud convictions, the Court found no error in admitting testimony and exhibits that summarized the government's case. The summary witnesses "did no more than analyze facts already introduced into evidence and spell out the tax consequences that necessarily flow from those facts." In United States v. Milkiewicz, 470 F.3d 390 (1st Cir. 2006) , toward the end of a fraud and tax fraud case in which several thousand pages of financial records were offered by the government to prove transactions in the scheme, the prosecutor called an IRS agent to testify about a series of charts that summarized the information contained in those financial records. The defense initially objected only to admission of the charts as independent evidence, but later argued that they should not have been given to the jury because one set contained errors and significant omissions rendering it unreliable and the other was improperly admitted through the agent, who was not qualified as a witness. Affirming, the Court took the occasion to clarify its approach to the treatment of summaries under the Rules, noting that "[i] a case where voluminous underlying records are involved, the key difference between [the] various approaches appears to be the purpose for which the summaries are offered":

> Charts admitted under Rule 1006 are explicitly intended to reflect the contents of the documents they summarize and typically are substitutes in evidence for the voluminous originals. Consequently they must fairly represent the underlying documents and be " 'accurate and non-prejudicial.' " [citations omitted]
> By contrast, a pedagogical aid that is allowed under Rule 611(a) to illustrate or clarify a party's position, or allowed under Rule 703 to assist expert testimony, may be less neutral in its presentation. Record support is necessary because such devices tend to be "more akin to argument than to evidence," and "may reflect to some extent, through captions or other organizational devices or descriptions, the inferences and conclusions drawn from the underlying evidence by the summary's proponent." In some cases, however, such pedagogical devices may be sufficiently accurate and reliable that they, too, are admissible in evidence, even though they do not meet the specific requirements of Rule 1006.

The Court held that although most, if not all, of the charts would have been admissible into evidence under Rule 1006, there certainly was no abuse of discretion in allowing the jury to consider them under Rules 611(a) and 703. Deficiencies in the underlying records were explored on examination of the witnesses, "and gaps or other imperfections in the underlying data do not necessarily undermine the value of the summary charts as pedagogical aids under Rule 611(a)." As for the tax charts, the summarization of documents "took patience but not expertise," and an IRS agent was well qualified to make the computations, "particularly where, as here, the computation required no subjective judgment."

United States v. Ollison, 555 F.3d 152 (5th Cir. 2009) : The defendant was convicted for theft from an agency receiving federal funds, after she charged personal expenses on a card issued by her employer. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when an FBI agent was permitted to use charts categorizing the defendant's expenses to illustrate testimony regarding his review of the charges. The charts reflected evidence presented to the jury, and the jury was instructed that they were to be used as demonstrative aids only. The evidence presented in the case was voluminous and presented an appreciable degree of complexity, and the Court concluded that the agent's summary testimony was supported by the evidence and did not "implicate[] the concerns we have previously expressed about the improper use of summary testimony." In United States v. Ogba, 526 F.3d 214 (5th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed in part convictions for Medicare fraud, finding no abuse of discretion when the government was permitted to use a summary chart showing a conspiracy between a prosecution witness and a defendant. The chart reflected admitted evidence and both cross-examination of the introducing agent's summary testimony and the jury instructions tested the chart's accuracy and made it clear that the chart was a summary, not evidence. In United States v. Nguyen, 504 F.3d 561 (5th Cir. 2007) , the court affirmed convictions arising from a fraudulent home buying scheme, finding that some of the testimony given by an FBI financial analyst "was inappropriate," but the error was harmless. The Court observed that it has allowed the use of summary witnesses in limited situations, but that it "has repeatedly warned of its dangers" and that "[s]ummary witnesses may not be used as a substitute for, or a supplement to, closing argument," or for "inappropriate means." Here, the analyst referred to one defendant as a coconspirator and thereby offered an opinion on mental state that is prohibited by Rule 704(b). Moreover, the analyst provided a summary of her investigation and authenticated a summary chart that relied in part on out-of-court statements that unspecified witnesses made to FBI agents during their investigation, which was "error because the supporting evidence must have been presented previously to the jury to establish any assumptions reflected in the summary." In United States v. Harms, 442 F.3d 367 (5th Cir. 2006) , the court affirmed convictions for mail fraud and perjury in connection with the receipt of worker's compensation benefits, finding no error when the government was permitted to use a time-line chart comparing the dates of payments the defendant received to the dates of the forms he filed and his activities while receiving benefits. The chart was used only as a pedagogical device; it was not admitted into evidence or allowed into the jury room. As such, its use was governed by Rule 611(a), not Rule 1006. The Court held that charts used as pedagogical devices are permissible, within the Trial Court's discretion, so long as they assist the jury and are consistent with the evidence presented. In this case, the evidence "presented an appreciable risk of complexity" and the chart was "not inconsistent with the other evidence presented."

United States v. Sanchez, 586 F.3d 918 (11th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to possess marijuana with the intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting call records for cell phones used by the conspirators, a summary of those records prepared by the prosecution, and a map showing the general location of the subject cell phones in relation to specific cell phone call towers at the times the phones were used. The Court concluded that the information that was stored was recorded contemporaneously with the transaction it depicted and constituted business records, and that given the fact that the records were admissible, it was not an abuse of discretion to permit the government to offer summaries and maps based upon the records.

[2] Rule 611(b) -- Scope of Cross-Examination [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 611(b) -- Discretion of Trial Judge

United States v. Whitten, 610 F.3d 168 (2d Cir. 2010) : In a trial arising from the murder of undercover police detectives, a prosecution witness testified on direct that the defendant had told fellow gang members shortly after the incident that he had "popped" the victims. On cross-examination he was asked whether he had a clear memory of that declaration, and on redirect he was rehabilitated by inquiry into what he understood the statement to mean and whether he had any doubt whether that was what was said. Affirming the conviction, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the defense was precluded from conducting recross-examination about other statements the defendant had made at the time, since none of the prior examination had addressed any except the "popped" statement. Although the Judge had discretion to permit questioning beyond the scope of the direct and redirect, the defense did not provide any indication of its good faith basis for the precluded question or any explanation of the significance of the potential answers.

United States v. Groves, 470 F.3d 311 (7th Cir. 2006) : In a trial for felon firearm possession, defense counsel's cross-examination of a government witness (Foster) went beyond the scope of the direct. When the prosecutor objected, defense counsel offered to bring Foster back to the stand during the defendant's case-in-chief. However, the Judge allowed the defendant to continue to question Foster beyond the scope of direct, and then allowed the government to offer rebuttal witnesses to Foster's testimony. On appeal, the defendant argued that the rebuttal evidence should not have been allowed because Foster was not the defendant's witness. The Court held that because defense counsel was allowed to question Foster out of order rather than call her back to the stand later, "this part of her testimony was part of the defendant's case-in-chief." Therefore the government was properly allowed to rebut matters raised on Foster's cross-examination. The Court noted, however, that one rebuttal witness testified on matters within the scope of Foster's direct examination; while this was error, it was harmless.

[f] Rule 611(b) -- Scope of Cross-Examination

United States v. Brockenborrugh, 575 F.3d 726 (D.C. Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for wire fraud arising from a scheme to file a fraudulent deed to obtain a property, the defendant explained on direct examination that his relationship with the other conspirator was that she did taxes for half of the court security officers (of which he was one) and was his property manager. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the government was permitted to cross-examine the defendant about his extramarital sexual relationship with the conspirator. The cross-examination was reasonable given the suggestion on direct examination that the conspirators had only a business relationship. Thus, the cross-examination went to matters of credibility and was on a subject matter related to the direct. The Court identified the only possible prejudicial effect as the possible inference that a person who "cheats" on his wife cannot be trusted, and concluded that "[a]ny such effect was mitigated by the district court's instruction to the jury to disregard the relationship as evidence of bad character."

United States v. Maxwell, 579 F.3d 1282 (11th Cir. 2009) : Affirming convictions arising from a fraudulent scheme to obtain construction contracts set aside for socially and economically disadvantaged companies, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the Judge restricted the defendant's cross-examination of a witness to the six contracts discussed in the witness's direct examination and told the defendant that if he wanted to discuss other contracts he had to recall the witness in the defense case.

[g] Rule 611(b) -- Scope of Recross-Examination

United States v. Whitten, 610 F.3d 168 (2d Cir. 2010) : In a trial arising from the murder of undercover police detectives, a prosecution witness testified on direct that the defendant had told fellow gang members shortly after the incident that he had "popped" the victims. On cross-examination he was asked whether he had a clear memory of that declaration, and on redirect his was rehabilitated by inquiry into what he understood the statement to mean and whether he had any doubt whether that was what was said. Affirming the conviction, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the defense was precluded from conducting recross-examination about other statements the defendant had made at the time, since none of the prior examination had addressed any except the "popped" statement. Although the Judge had discretion to permit questioning beyond the scope of the direct and redirect, the defense did not provide any indication of its good faith basis for the precluded question or any explanation of the significance of the potential answers.

United States v. Ball, 499 F.3d 890 (8th Cir. 2007) , vacated on other grounds, 129 S. Ct. 2049 (2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for offenses arising from a methamphetamine distribution conspiracy, finding no abuse of discretion when the Judge barred recross-examination on a matter that had been covered in the witness' direct and cross-examination but not in the government's redirect.

[h] Rule 611(b) -- Witness Demonstration

United States v. Williams, 461 F.3d 441 (4th Cir. 2006) : The defendant was charged with felon firearm possession after officers became suspicious about a fanny pack he was wearing and found a handgun. At trial, the defendant, without taking the stand to testify, offered to demonstrate to the jury that he could not have been wearing the fanny pack because its belt was too short to close around his waist. The Judge accepted the government's argument that the demonstration would amount to testimony and would require the defendant to undergo cross-examination. The defendant proceeded to try on the fanny pack and was then subjected to cross-examination. The Court held the Judge's ruling error (but harmless). Analogizing from Fifth Amendment doctrine that demonstrations of clothing and the like are not considered "testimonial," the Court concluded that a demonstration such as that proposed by the defendant is not testimonial, and so "does not subject its proponent to cross-examination under Rule 611(b)."

[3] Rule 611(c) -- Leading Questions [Go To Main]

[g] Rule 611(c) -- Foundation Matters and Developing the Witness' Testimony

United States v. Kuehne, 547 F.3d 667 (6th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for firearm offenses, finding that the prosecutor did not improperly use leading questions when they were used to direct a witness' testimony to a particular date or individual, or to clarify testimony.

[h] Rule 611(c) -- Friendly Witnesses

United States v. Hansen, 434 F.3d 92 (1st Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for crimes arising from a robbery and murder, finding no plain error in the prosecution's use of leading questions in the direct examination of a cooperating coconspirator. The Court noted that the Trial Judge is best situated to strike a practical and fair balance as to the use of leading questions and has extensive discretion as to the phrasing of questions. Here, the prosecutor's questions did not "cross the fine line between stimulating an accurate memory and implanting a false one"; they were used "primarily to develop coherent testimony" from the witness and to avoid eliciting from the witness prejudicial information concerning his previous criminal history with the defendant.

[i] Rule 611(c) -- Hostile or Adverse Witness

McCabe v. Parker, 608 F.3d 1068 (8th Cir. 2010) : In a civil rights action arising from arrests and searches following a political demonstration, the Court held that the Judge's sua sponte instructions to avoid leading adverse witnesses on direct examination had a minuscule impact and did not affect the plaintiffs' substantial rights.

[j] Rule 611(c) -- Sexual Assault Victim Witness

United States v. Wright, 540 F.3d 833 (8th Cir. 2008) : In an aggravated child sexual abuse case, the prosecutor asked leading questions of a victim regarding the details of the abuse. Although the witness was an adult at the time of trial and had not indicated a reluctance to testify, the Court found no abuse of discretion in overruling defense objections to the questions, as they were necessary to clarify the testimony and establish the requisite "precise physiological details of sexual assault."

[l] Rule 611(c) -- Young or Disabled Witness

United States v. Carey, 589 F.3d 187 (5th Cir. 2009) : Affirming convictions for aggravated sexual abuse of a minor under the age of 12, the Court rejected the defendant's contention that the prosecutor improperly led the victim during direct examination, observing that "a victim-witness's youth and nervousness can satisfy Rule 611's necessity requirement." It concluded that in this case "the indictment concerned a sex crime, the witness was twelve, and the record reveals several times where DJ appeared nervous."

United States v. Johnson, 519 F.3d 816 (8th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse of a child, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting the prosecution to use leading questions in examining the child victim. The child was young and reluctant to testify, and the subject matter was traumatic. In United States v. Rojas, 520 F.3d 876 (8th Cir. 2008) , a prosecution for aggravated sexual abuse of a child, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the AUSA asked several leading questions (some of which demanded yes or no answers and some of which required or elicited further response or explanation) of the ten-year-old alleged victim, who was distraught during her testimony.

Rule 612. Writing Used to Refresh Memory

Except as otherwise provided in criminal proceedings by section 3500 of title 18, United States Code, if a witness uses a writing to refresh memory for the purpose of testifying, either--

(1) while testifying, or

(2) before testifying, if the court in its discretion determines it is necessary in the interests of justice, an adverse party is entitled to have the writing produced at the hearing, to inspect it, to cross-examine the witness thereon, and to introduce in evidence those portions which relate to the testimony of the witness. If it is claimed that the writing contains matters not related to the subject matter of the testimony the court shall examine the writing in camera, excise any portions not so related, and order delivery of the remainder to the party entitled thereto. Any portion withheld over objections shall be preserved and made available to the appellate court in the event of an appeal. If a writing is not produced or delivered pursuant to order under this rule, the court shall make any order justice requires, except that in criminal cases when the prosecution elects not to comply, the order shall be one striking the testimony or, if the court in its discretion determines that the interests of justice so require, declaring a mistrial.

3-612 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 612.02

612.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Refreshing Recollection While Testifying

When a witness has difficulty recalling some of the facts within personal knowledge, it is standard practice to refresh the witness' recollection. This is often done by showing the witness a prior statement or other writing that stimulates memory. Rule 612 provides that if a witness is shown a writing to refresh memory while testifying, the adverse party is entitled to have the writing produced for inspection and to cross-examine the witness with respect to it. Moreover, an adverse party may introduce into evidence those portions of the writing that relate to the testimony of the witness. The right to inspect and use a writing is unqualified if the witness uses it to refresh recollection while testifying. But if the witness uses a writing to refresh recollection before taking the stand, the opportunity to inspect and use the writing is dependent upon the Court's finding that disclosure is necessary in the interests of justice. n1

Of course a document cannot be used to refresh recollection if the witness' recollection needs no refreshment. So for example in United States v. Balthazard, 360 F.3d 309 (1st Cir. 2004) , the Court found no error when the Trial Court prohibited the defendant from using a document to refresh the recollection of a government witness. The witness did not claim his memory was impaired, and the Court declared that it is "hornbook law that a party may not use a document to refresh a witness's recollection unless the witness exhibits a failure of memory."

[2] Documents That May Be Used

The Judge need not limit documents used to refresh recollection to those resembling past recollection recorded. Almost anything should be usable for the purpose of refreshing the memory of the witness; it does not have to be admissible because it is not being admitted as evidence. n2 As long as a document does refresh memory, its origin is not important. In fact, the Rule has been read to apply to any material used to refresh recollection, whether or not in the form of a writing. n3

[3] Risk of the Document Being Used as Testimony

It is important to recognize that there is a difference between refreshing memory with a document and introducing a document as substantive proof, most commonly under the past recollection recorded exception to the hearsay rule:

> The primary difference between the two classifications is the ability of the witness to testify from present knowledge: where the witness' memory is revived, and he presently recollects the facts and swears to them, he is obviously in a different position from the witness who cannot directly state the facts from present memory and who must ask the court to accept a writing for the truth of its contents because he is willing to swear, for one reason or another, that its contents are true. n4

A document used to refresh recollection is not admitted on behalf of the proponent of the evidence, whereas a document satisfying the hearsay exception is admitted for its truth. This distinction could give rise to possible abuse when a party either fails or refuses to qualify a record as past recollection recorded and chooses instead to "refresh" the witness' recollection. n5 There is a possibility that the witness' recollection might not actually be refreshed (and maybe does not even need to be refreshed), and the document is essentially being used as hearsay evidence of an event. Trial Judges have the discretion and the obligation to prevent a witness from relying on inadmissible evidence to "refresh" recollection when this is simply a ruse for getting the otherwise inadmissible evidence before the jury. n6

[4] Excision of Irrelevant Material

To the extent that the writing contains matters not related to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness, or that were not used to refresh the recollection of the witness, the Court may excise any such portions and then deliver the writing to the opposing party for inspection. n7 Similarly, the writing may be redacted before it is introduced into evidence.

[5] Refreshing Recollection Before Trial

This Rule provides that the Court may in its discretion order a writing produced if a witness utilized the writing to refresh memory for the purpose of testifying prior to taking the stand at trial. There is an exception, however, for statements covered by the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3500, which provides in essence that pretrial statements of government witnesses in a criminal trial need not be disclosed to the defense until after the witness' direct examination at trial. Thus, even though prosecution witnesses use their prior statements to refresh recollection prior to testifying, the Judge has no discretion to order production of the statement until after the witness finishes testifying on direct, at which time the Jencks Act governs. n8 Once the witness testifies, statements covered by the statute must be revealed to the defense upon request.

While the Jencks Act postpones required disclosure until after direct examination, in practice a prosecutor will often voluntarily disclose Jencks Act material before that point. The reason is that disclosure after direct examination will often result in a delay of the trial to allow the defense some time to review the material. n9 It must also be remembered that the Jencks Act covers only statements previously made by the government witness. It does not apply to some other document or statement that the witness might have used before or at trial to refresh recollection. n10 Disclosure of material other than statements of testifying witnesses is governed by Rule 612 (and judicial discretion thereunder) whenever it is used to refresh a witness' recollection. n11

The expansion in the Rule of the right to review documents used to refresh recollection prior to trial, if the Judge so orders, goes beyond traditional common-law doctrine, yet it does not go as far as the Advisory Committee wished. The Advisory Committee wanted to provide that statements used to refresh recollection before trial would be treated in the same manner as statements used to refresh recollection at trial. But Congress thought that this would be an invitation to a fishing expedition by counsel.

In light of the concerns expressed by Congress, it is likely that the Judge will ordinarily exercise discretion to prevent discovery of statements used before trial to refresh recollection in order to ensure that lawyers are not inhibited in carefully preparing clients and other witnesses for their appearance on the witness stand. n12

[6] Effect of Privilege and Work Product Doctrine Where Recollection Is Refreshed Before Trial

Must a privilege or a work product claim give way when, prior to trial, a witness has reviewed documents to refresh recollection in preparation for testifying? Courts have usually ruled in favor of disclosure in these circumstances, on grounds of waiver. But we would not hold that every time a witness looks at any privileged or work product material in preparation for trial, that document should be disclosed to the other side. n13 To determine under Rule 612 whether disclosure of material consulted by a witness before trial would be "necessary in the interests of justice," the Trial Judge may have to determine, among other things: (1) the extent to which the witness actually relied upon documents to refresh recollection; n14(2) the extent to which those documents related facts similar to those testified to by the witness; and (3) the extent to which the privileged or work product material would be revealed by disclosure of the document. n15 By using Rule 403, and to some extent Rule 611, the Trial Judge should be able to make an appropriate ruling on a case-by-case basis. n16

Counsel for a client who actually uses a privileged document on the stand to refresh a witness' memory will generally be held to have waived (or, more precisely, forfeited) the privilege. n17 This situation is distinguishable from preparation of a witness before trial, discussed in the immediately preceding section. A finding of waiver is much less obvious when the privileged material has simply been used before trial, perhaps as one of many means attempted to refresh a witness' recollection. For one thing, it is not as apparent, as it would be on the stand, that the witness actually relied on the specific privileged material to prepare his testimony.

As discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 501, § 501.02[5][k][i], the privilege is forfeited when the client or counsel engages in conduct that would make it unfair to continue to shield the information. And it would indeed be unfair to allow the witness to use privileged material on the witness stand, and yet to deny access to the adversary on cross-examination. The distinction between the use of privileged materials before and during trial is borne out by the distinction in Rule 612 itself, which requires production if the material is used while the witness is testifying, but leaves it to the Trial Judge to determine whether disclosure is necessary when the witness used the material before testifying.

Similarly, where a witness uses work product to refresh recollection during in-court testimony or during a deposition, such conduct should operate as a waiver of the immunity. Any other rule would be unfair to the adversary. n18 Again, this is distinguishable from the use of work product before the witness testifies; disclosure of work product used by the witness in preparing for testimony should be subject to the case-by-case approach discussed in the preceding section.

[8] "Adverse Party" Under the Rule

Rule 612 provides a right to cross-examine a witness who uses a writing to refresh recollection. The Rule uses the term "adverse party" in connection with the right to cross-examine. What the Rule intends, we think, is that any time a witness is shown a writing to refresh recollection while testifying, and in limited circumstances before testifying, the party opposing whoever showed the memorandum to the witness should be able to see it and to examine the witness concerning it. If the witness produces a writing sua sponte, either side should be able to see it, although the direct examiner should not be permitted to offer the writing as a substitute for evidence. If the witness is not assisted by the writing or repudiates it, obviously the need to protect the party opposing whoever showed the writing to the witness is minimized. In fact, no protection may be needed.

[9] Use of Document and Jury Instructions

When a document is subject to Rule 612 because it has been used to refresh recollection, the jury should be told that the document is introduced only on the issue of credibility. n19 Of course, if the document is otherwise admissible, no limiting instruction is necessary.

[10] Additional Problem Areas

Three further problems can be found with this Rule.

First, there is some difficulty in ascertaining why the words "at the hearing" were used rather than the words "at the trial." To us, "at the hearing" signifies any proceeding in which the Rules apply under Rule 1101. Most of the decisions equate depositions with hearings and trials for purposes of the Rule. Thus, "at the hearing" means the occasion on which the witness with refreshed recollection will testify, whether that is a deposition, a hearing on a motion, or the trial.

Second, there is a question whether, if the government intentionally refuses to turn over evidence used to refresh the recollection of its witnesses and forces a mistrial, the Double Jeopardy Clause would bar reprosecution. Since Rule 612 would appear to place the government on notice concerning a possible responsibility to turn over such evidence, the Supreme Court's double jeopardy jurisprudence suggests that retrial might be barred. n20 This is one reason why a mistrial is unlikely to be declared except as a last resort.

Third, nothing in Rule 612 appears to bar the use of contempt procedures to punish noncompliance or to coerce compliance with Court orders. Of course, a valid claim of privilege would amount to a defense in such proceedings.

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., United States v. Sai Keung Wong, 886 F.2d 252 (9th Cir. 1989) (after government witness reviewed a foreign police report, it was returned to the foreign consulate, making it unavailable to the defense; it was not error to allow the witness to testify on the basis of refreshed recollection; the report had been reviewed by the witness before trial and there is no absolute right to disclosure under these circumstances; the Trial Court did not abuse its discretion in finding that disclosure was not required in the interests of justice).

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Scott, 701 F.2d 1340 (11th Cir. 1983) (upholding the use of documents to refresh the recollection of government witnesses, although these documents had been ruled inadmissible: "When there is careful supervision by the court, the testimony elicited through refreshing recollection may be proper, even though the document used to refresh the witness' memory is inadmissible.").

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., 20th Century Wear, Inc. v. Sanmark-Stardust, Inc., 747 F.2d 81 (2d Cir. 1984) (the Court stated that "in fairness and under the spirit of the Rules the better practice is to permit opposing counsel to examine a tape," where the tape was used to refresh the recollection of a witness).

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Riccardi, 174 F.2d 883, 886 (3d Cir. 1949) .

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., Rush v. Illinois Cent. R.R. Co., 399 F.3d 705 (6th Cir. 2005) (it was error to allow counsel to ask whether certain transcript statements were correct rather than asking whether the transcript refreshed recollection; the Court "reach[ed] the inescapable conclusion that defense counsel impermissibly utilized the 'guise of refreshing recollect,' ...to place before the jury [the witness'] prior, out-of-court statements regarding the manner in which Rush fell from the CN-IC train").

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., United States v. Weller, 238 F.3d 1215 (10th Cir. 2001) ("the court has the discretion to withhold any writing from a witness where the judge believes that the document will be a source of direct testimony rather than the key to refreshing the witness' independent recollection"; no error to prevent the defendant from relying on a detailed document during testimony; the defendant's recollection did not seem impaired); 20th Century Wear, Inc. v. Sanmark-Stardust, Inc., 747 F.2d 81 (2d Cir. 1984) (Trial Court must ensure "that the witness actually has a present recollection and that otherwise inadmissible evidence does not slip in inadvertently for its truth"); Hall v. American Bakeries Co., 873 F.2d 1133, 1136 (8th Cir. 1989) (error to allow the witness to testify "from prepared notes under the guise of refreshing recollection"). Compare United States v. Rinke, 778 F.2d 581 (10th Cir. 1985) (government witness was properly allowed to consult a memorandum while he was giving testimony, since the memorandum was not a substitute for testimony but was merely used to refresh recollection; such a practice was not abusive given the defendant's right under Rule 612 to inspect and use the memorandum for cross-examination).

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., United States v. Larranaga, 787 F.2d 489 (10th Cir. 1986) (no error for the Trial Judge to require the government to turn over only those portions of grand jury testimony actually used by the witness to prepare for trial); United States v. Howton, 688 F.2d 272 (5th Cir. 1982) (where the Trial Judge reviewed a report inspected by a witness before he testified, and found that the report was not germane to the witness' direct examination, disclosure to the defense was unnecessary); United States v. Darden, 70 F.3d 1507 (8th Cir. 1995) (after a government witness refreshed his recollection by referring to DEA reports summarizing debriefing sessions with the witness, the Trial Judge properly limited cross-examination to those portions of the reports that the witness was able to recall).

(n8)Footnote 8. Under Fed. R. Crim. P. 26.2, both the government and the defense have an obligation to turn over witness statements. But the reference to the Jencks Act is still significant because it postpones the timing of prosecutorial production until after government witnesses actually testify.

(n9)Footnote 9. See, e.g., United States v. Algie, 667 F.2d 569 (6th Cir. 1982) (noting the U.S. Attorney's "policy in many cases of advanced disclosure of Jencks Act materials to defendants," and also noting that the timing provisions of the Jencks Act needlessly slow down the trial process).

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., United States v. Nathan, 816 F.2d 230 (6th Cir. 1987) (informal notes are not "statements" within the meaning of the Jencks Act).

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Blas, 947 F.2d 1320 (7th Cir. 1991) (no abuse of discretion in denying production of reports made by other officers and investigators that a DEA agent said he had reviewed prior to testifying at a sentencing hearing; the reports were not statements "made by said witness" discoverable under the Jencks Act; and where recollection is refreshed prior to the hearing, disclosure under Rule 612 is within the discretion of the Trial Judge; this discretion was not abused here, where the defendant had "other avenues" with which to test the witness' testimony).

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., Cosden Oil v. Karl O. Helm A.G., 736 F.2d 1064 (5th Cir. 1984) (no abuse of discretion in refusing to require production of a document used by a witness to refresh his recollection prior to testifying).

(n13)Footnote 13. See, e.g., Leucadia, Inc. v. Reliance Ins. Co., 101 F.R.D. 674 (S.D.N.Y. 1983) (Rule 612 permits, but does not require, disclosure of material used to refresh recollection before testifying; the Court declined to order disclosure where the witness did not in fact rely upon the document, stating that "[t]he mere fact that a witness looked at a document protected by the attorney-client privilege in preparation for a deposition is an inadequate reason to conclude that the privilege was destroyed.").

(n14)Footnote 14. See, e.g., Sporck v. Peil, 759 F.2d 312 (3d Cir. 1985) (turnover of work product was not required where "the trial court did not properly condition its application of Rule 612 on a showing that petitioner relied upon the requested documents for his testimony and that those documents impacted on his testimony"; the Court expressed concern that Rule 612 might become a pretext for wholesale exploration of an opposing party's files).

striking a balance between the competing interests of full disclosure and the maintenance of confidentiality for case by case determination"; the Court concluded that the contents of the binder should be disclosed in connection with the depositions, even though work product would be revealed).

(n17)Footnote 17. See, e.g., Marshall v. Postal Serv., 88 F.R.D. 348 (D.D.C. 1980) (use of a document to refresh memory during testimony operates as a waiver of the attorney-client privilege as to that document).

(n18)Footnote 18. See generally Westinghouse v. Republic of Philippines, 951 F.2d 1414, 1428 (3d Cir. 1991) (selective disclosure to the adversary constitutes waiver of work product).

(n20)Footnote 20. See, e.g., Oregon v. Kennedy, 456 U.S. 667 (1982) (where mistrial is declared due to conduct of the prosecutor that is intended to create a mistrial, then Double Jeopardy Clause bars a subsequent prosecution).

[1] Depositions

James Julian, Inc. v. Raytheon Co., 93 F.R.D. 138, 1982-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P64599 (D. Del. 1982) : In an action alleging antitrust and labor violations in which the plaintiff's counsel assembled a binder that was reviewed by witnesses before their depositions were taken, the Court discussed Rule 612 and its impact on privilege rules and concluded "that Congress left the task of striking a balance between the competing interests of full disclosure and the maintenance of confidentiality for case by case determination." Although it recognized that revealing the choice of documents for the binder would reveal work product, the Court concluded that the contents of the binders should be disclosed in connection with the depositions.

[2] Failure of Memory Required

United States v. Balthazard, 360 F.3d 309 (1st Cir. 2004) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy to grow marijuana plants, the Court found no error when the defense was precluded from using a downward departure motion to "refresh" an agent's memory on cross-examination, since "[i]t is hornbook law that a party may not use a document to refresh a witness's recollection unless the witness exhibits a failure of memory," and the agent did not claim that his memory on the point was impaired.

[3] Government Witnesses -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Smith, 521 F.2d 957 (D.C. Cir. 1975) : In a prosecution for a taxicab robbery, a police officer's report containing the cab driver's complaint and a transcript of that report as broadcast to the police department were inconsistent with the driver's testimony. When the defense sought to introduce the report and transcript, the Trial Judge ruled that they were inadmissible as hearsay, but the Court held that because the officer used them to refresh his recollection before testifying as a prosecution witness, the defendant, as opposing party, should have been permitted to introduce the writings.

United States v. Jimenez, 613 F.2d 1373 (5th Cir. 1980) : The Court warned a prosecutor to establish that a witness needed to refresh recollection before showing him a statement.

United States v. Muhammad, 120 F.3d 688 (7th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a conviction for bribery and obstruction of justice, the Court held there was no error in permitting an FBI agent who had interviewed the defendant to testify and in refusing to order disclosure of the agent's interview notes. Before trial the agent had used a written "summary" of the interview, which was prepared by the other interviewing agent, to refresh her recollection, as is permitted by Rule 612. The Court found that her testimony stemmed from her personal knowledge and not from the summary. The defendant had access to the summary and used it extensively in cross-examining the agent regarding preparation of her testimony. The Trial Judge reviewed the interview notes in camera and found no inconsistencies between them and the summary, so the Court found no error in denying the defendant disclosure of the notes. In United States v. Blas, 947 F.2d 1320 (7th Cir. 1991) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in denying production of reports made by other officers and investigators that a DEA agent said he had reviewed prior to testifying at a sentencing hearing. The reports were not statements "made by said witness" discoverable under the Jencks Act, and, even if Rule 612 were applicable in sentencing hearings, the defendant had made no showing why production was necessary in the interest of justice or that the Trial Judge was mistaken in assessing the burden involved in reviewing the documents in camera.

United States v. Darden, 70 F.3d 1507 (8th Cir. 1995) : After a government witness refreshed his recollection by referring to DEA reports summarizing debriefing sessions with the witness, the Trial Judge limited cross-examination to those portions of the reports that the witness was able to recall. The Court found no error, and affirmed racketeering convictions for drug trafficking. United States v. Cheyenne n1 involved an FBI agent who, three days after eliciting a confession in a murder case, had dictated his notes to a secretary who incorporated them into a "302" report; the agent compared the report with the notes and then destroyed them. At a suppression hearing the agent indicated that he had no recollection of the confession and needed to refresh his memory by looking at the report. At trial the report was not used, but the Court noted that "it is clear that Agent Hafner's testimony relating to Cheyenne's confession was striking [sic] similar, in both content and sequence, to the '302' report." The government argued that the "302" report was admissible under Rule 803(5) and that any reference to it would have been proper, but the Court refused to reach the argument because the report was never offered in evidence. In rejecting the defendant's argument that the agent's testimony should have been stricken because he had no present recollection of the confession, the Court cited Rule 612 for the proposition that refreshing the recollection of a witness is entirely proper and that the credibility of the agent was a question for the jury. Of course, any time that an officer's memory is refreshed with a document, the defense can have the document admitted under the Rule.

United States v. Larranaga, 787 F.2d 489 (10th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a perjury conviction, finding no error in the Trial Judge's ruling requiring the government to turn over only the portions of grand jury testimony used by a witness to prepare for trial.

United States v. Williams, 875 F.2d 846 (11th Cir. 1989) : The Court declined to find that a Trial Judge had abused his discretion in refusing to order an agent to turn over a record that he had examined in preparing to testify.

[4] Habeas Corpus Cases

Spivey v. Zant, 683 F.2d 881 (5th Cir. 1982) : In a habeas corpus case, the Court said that a petitioner was entitled to inspect and use during cross-examination of his former counsel any portion of the file that counsel used while testifying.

[5] Inadmissible Documents

Rush v. Illinois Cent. R.R., 399 F.3d 705 (6th Cir. 2005) : The plaintiff child fell from a railcar on which he and other children had been playing. Within several hours of the accident, a risk manager/railroad police officer interviewed three of the children. The plaintiff called two of the interviewed children as witnesses. The defense used a transcript of one child's interview to refresh recollection when the child could not recall the interview; the Court held that this was proper. With respect to another child, the defense asked leading questions ostensibly to refresh recollection. Because defense counsel asked the child whether certain transcript statements were correct rather than asking whether the transcript refreshed recollection, the Court held that the out-of-court statements were impermissibly placed before the jury to prove how the plaintiff fell. The statements were admissible as prior inconsistent statements under Rule 613, however.

United States v. Scott, 701 F.2d 1340 (11th Cir. 1983) : Affirming convictions for making false statements to banks and misuse of the mails, the Court upheld the use of documents to refresh the recollection of government witnesses, although these documents had been ruled inadmissible because the government had failed to supply them to the defense in discovery. The Court noted that "[w]hen there is careful supervision by the court, the testimony elicited through refreshing recollection may be proper, even though the document used to refresh the witness' memory is inadmissible."

[6] In Camera Review

United States v. Howton, 688 F.2d 272 (5th Cir. 1982) : The Court affirmed convictions arising out of an interstate confidence scheme and approved the Trial Judge's granting a defense request for in camera review under Rule 612 of a report reviewed by a witness. Since the Trial Judge found that the report was not germane to the witness' direct examination, disclosure to the defense was unnecessary.

[7] Pretrial Refreshing of Recollection

Cosden Oil & Chem. Co. v. Karl O. Helm A.G., 736 F.2d 1064 (5th Cir. 1984) : In a contract dispute, the Court found that the Trial Judge did not err in declining to order a witness to turn over to counsel for an opposing party the notes that he admitted using to refresh his recollection prior to trial. Although the Trial Judge had authority to order the notes turned over, the Judge determined that such an order was not required, especially where the witness never referred to the notes while testifying.

[8] Privileged Documents

Leybold-Heraeus Tech., Inc. v. Midwest Instrument Co., 118 F.R.D. 609 (E.D. Wis. 1987) : The District Court ruled that a company "cannot allow their witnesses to review such [privileged] documents to refresh their recollections for the purpose of testifying, without allowing Minco [an adversary] to inspect the documents prior to trial."

United States v. Sai Keung Wong, 886 F.2d 252 (9th Cir. 1989) : The Court affirmed convictions for heroin importation offenses, rejecting the defendants' claim that they were entitled to examine Malaysian police reports used by a government witness before testifying. The reports included much information about a confidential informant, whose identity the Court held the defendants were not entitled to discover, and turning over the reports would have violated Malaysian law, so disclosure was not "necessary in the interests of justice."

[9] Proper Manner of Refreshing Recollection

United States v. McGee, 408 F.3d 966 (7th Cir. 2005) : In the trial of a drug trafficking conspiracy, the prosecutor, trying on cross-examination to get one defendant to admit that he often made things up and told stories, asked him whether he had phoned his employer and told him a story. When the defendant stated that he was not sure what the prosecutor was talking about, the prosecutor played a tape-recording of a phone conversation the defendant had with his employer after he was placed in custody in which he offered a false explanation of why he was absent from work. The government argued that the tape was offered to "refresh recollection," but the Court observed that if the prosecutor wanted to refresh recollection, the proper way would have been to play the tape outside the presence of the jury.

[10] Relationship to Other Rules

[a] Discovery Rules

G.J.B. & Assoc. v. Singleton, 913 F.2d 824 (10th Cir. 1990) : On appeal of sanctions imposed against an attorney for failing to make available before trial written notes that a witness proposed to use to refresh recollection during testimony, the Court held that a standing pretrial order requiring exchange of exhibits to be used during direct examination applied to the notes and that the Rule did not excuse the failure to comply with the order.

[b] Relationship to Other Rules -- Jencks Act

United States v. Blas, 947 F.2d 1320 (7th Cir. 1991) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in denying production of reports made by other officers and investigators that a DEA agent said he had reviewed prior to testifying at a sentencing hearing. The reports were not statements "made by said witness" discoverable under the Jencks Act, and, even if Rule 612 were applicable in sentencing hearings, the defendant had made no showing why production was necessary in the interest of justice or that the Trial Judge was mistaken in assessing the burden involved in reviewing the documents in camera.

United States v. Soto, 711 F.2d 1558 (11th Cir. 1983) : The Court reversed a decision to strike the testimony of two government agents who had destroyed handwritten drafts and notes after their reports were reduced to typed copies. The Court cited Rule 612 as authority for the view that a witness' memoranda or notes do not become statements for purposes of the Jencks Act simply because the witness uses them for purposes of refreshing recollection prior to taking the stand. The Rule does not automatically require production of material viewed by a witness prior to trial, and the Court reasoned that the Jencks Act was not intended to require production of everything a witness might consult prior to trial.

[c] Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 803(5)

United States v. Massachusetts Maritime Academy, 762 F.2d 142 (1st Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed an order for injunctive relief prohibiting further sex discrimination by the defendant, finding no error in the admission of testimony of a witness who had no present recollection of facts, but whose memory was refreshed with an affidavit she had given four years earlier. The Court cited Rule 612(2) as authority for refreshing the recollection of a witness prior to trial. In our view, the correctness of the decision depends on whether the affidavit truly refreshed memory, or whether the witness simply intended to say that the affidavit was accurate when made. If memory was refreshed, the procedure was proper and the decision was correct. If, however, the witness merely affirmed that the affidavit was truthful, it should have been tested under the past recollection recorded exception to the hearsay rule, which is provided in Rule 803(5).

[11] Unethically Obtained Evidence

20th Century Wear, Inc. v. Sanmark-Stardust, Inc., 747 F.2d 81 (2d Cir. 1984) : In an opinion remanding for further proceedings a trademark-unfair competition case, the Court stated that "the use of unethically obtained evidence merely to refresh recollection is not prohibited by the Federal Rules of Evidence." It added that "[t]he court must ensure, however, that the witness actually has a present recollection and that otherwise inadmissible evidence does not slip in inadvertently for its truth." The Court also stated that where a tape recording has been unethically obtained and it is used to refresh recollection, opposing counsel should be permitted to examine all parts of the tape, even those not used to refresh recollection.

[12] Use of Notes While Testifying

Hall v. American Bakeries Co., 873 F.2d 1133 (8th Cir. 1989) : The Court found that the Trial Judge erred in permitting a witness to use notes while testifying where no foundation was laid as to the witness' need to refresh his memory and as to the usefulness of the notes. The error was harmless, however.

United States v. Weller, 238 F.3d 1215 (10th Cir. 2001) : After the government showed that the financial situation of a bank manager, charged with embezzlement, suddenly and substantially improved following the disappearance of funds from the vault, the defendant sought to show that she had sold a large number of personal and household goods. She first tried to introduce an appraisal of the items she claimed to have sold, and after that was rejected as hearsay, she testified about the items on direct examination. When her counsel sought to use the appraisal to refresh her recollection about details, a government objection was sustained. The Court affirmed, holding that the Trial Judge has discretion to withhold any writing from a witness when the Judge believes that the document will be used as a source of direct testimony rather than to refresh the witness' independent recollection. In Strickland Tower Maintenance v. AT&T Commun., Inc., 128 F.3d 1422 (10th Cir. 1997) , a breach of contract action, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding an expert witness from using a particular document to refresh his memory. Because the witness was only vaguely familiar with the document, there was a risk he would simply read its contents into evidence. In United States v. Rinke, n2 a prosecution for marijuana-related offenses, the Court held that it was permissible for a government witness to use notes while testifying in order to refresh his memory. It observed that the defendants had the right to cross-examine the witness about the notes and to introduce them into evidence.

[13] Work Product Protection

Berkey Photo, Inc. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 74 F.R.D. 613 (S.D.N.Y. 1977) , rev'd on other grounds, 603 F.2d 263 (2d Cir. 1979) : The Magistrate supervising discovery had ordered that, in connection with depositions of expert witnesses, all material given to the expert during his preparation be produced for opposing counsel pursuant to Rule 612. Kodak refused to turn over notebooks that had been shown to its economic experts as "background" during their preparation for the case. The Judge examined the materials and found that they involved "work product" in an essential sense of the term. Although he recognized the possibility of a waiver of the work product privilege by using documents to prepare the witnesses for trial, the Judge found that there was no indication of a calculated plan to exploit the work product in the instant case and that the materials actually made available for cross-examination covered all the concrete and specifically identifiable points on which the experts were instructed or advised for their testimony. See also Carter-Wallace, Inc. v. Hartz Mountain Indus., n3 where the District Court said that

> [w]hile the use of writings to refresh deponents' recollection may create dangers of selective memory, under the circumstances of this case, where many of the documents C-W's attorneys have shown deponents to refresh their recollection fall within the work product doctrine, it would not be appropriate to order C-W to turn over the documents it has used to refresh their witness' recollection.

Sporck v. Peil, 759 F.2d 312 (3d Cir. 1985) : The Court granted a writ of mandamus overturning discovery rulings by a Trial Judge in a securities fraud class action suit. One ruling had required the defendants to turn over documents used to prepare a witness for a deposition. The Court reasoned that "the trial court did not properly condition its application of Rule 612 on a showing that petitioner relied upon the requested documents for his testimony and that those documents impacted on his testimony." The Court was concerned that Rule 612 might become a pretext for wholesale exploration of an opposing party's files and that an attorney's theories that inform the way documents are assembled, which ought to be considered work product, would be disclosed.

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

The treatment of writings used to refresh recollection while on the stand is in accord with settled doctrine. McCormick § 9, p. 15. The bulk of the case law has, however, denied the existence of any right to access by the opponent when the writing is used prior to taking the stand, though the judge may have discretion in the matter. Goldman v. United States, 316 U.S. 129, 62 S. Ct. 993, 86 L. Ed. 1322 (1942) ; Needelman v. United States, 261 F.2d 802 (5th Cir. 1958) , cert. dismissed, 362 U.S. 600, 80 S. Ct. 960, 4 L. Ed. 2d 980 , reh. denied, 363 U.S. 858, 80 S. Ct. 1606, 4 L. Ed. 2d 1739 , Annot., 82 A.L.R.2d 473, 562 and 7 A.L.R.3d 181, 247. An increasing group of cases has repudiated the distinction, People v. Scott, 29 Ill. 2d 97, 193 N.E.2d 814 (1963) ; State v. Mucci, 25 N.J. 423, 136 A.2d 761 (1957) ; State v. Hunt, 25 N.J. 514, 138 A.2d 1 (1958) ; State v. Deslovers, 40 R.I. 89, 100 A. 64 (1917) , and this position is believed to be correct. As Wigmore put it, "the risk of imposition and the need of safeguard is just as great" in both situations. 3 Wigmore § 762, p. 111. To the same effect is McCormick § 9, p. 17. [Editor's Note: The Advisory Committee proposal to require disclosure of documents relied on by witnesses before trial was rejected, in favor of a provision allowing disclosure only if the court, in its discretion, finds that it is necessary in the interests of justice.]

The purpose of the phrase "for the purpose of testifying" is to safeguard against using the rule as a pretext for wholesale exploration of an opposing party's files and to insure that access is limited only to those writings which may fairly be said in fact to have an impact upon the testimony of the witness.

The purpose of the rule is the same as that of the Jencks statute, 18 U.S.C. § 3500: to promote the search of credibility and memory. The same sensitivity to disclosure of government files may be involved; hence the rule is expressly made subject to the statute, subdivision (a) of which provides: "In any criminal prosecution brought by the United States, no statement or report in the possession of the United States which was made by a Government witness or prospective Government witness (other than the defendant) shall be the subject of subpoena, discovery, or inspection until said witness has testified on direct examination in the trial of the case." Items falling within the purview of the statute are producible only as provided by its terms, Palermo v. United States, 360 U.S. 343, 351 (1959) , and disclosure under the rule is limited similarly by the statutory conditions. With this limitation in mind, some differences of application may be noted. The Jencks statute applies only to statements of witnesses; the rule is not so limited. The statute applies only to criminal cases; the rule applies to all cases. The statute applies only to government witnesses; the rule applies to all witnesses. The statute contains no requirement that the statement be consulted for purposes of refreshment before or while testifying; the rule so requires. Since many writings would qualify under either statute or rule, a substantial overlap exists, but the identity of procedures makes this of no importance.

The consequences of nonproduction by the government in a criminal case are those of the Jencks statute, striking the testimony or in exceptional cases a mistrial. 18 U.S.C. § 3500(d). In other cases these alternatives are unduly limited, and such possibilities as contempt, dismissal, finding issues against the offender, and the like are available. See Rule 16 (g) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and Rule 37(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure for appropriate sanctions.

[2] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 280 (1999)

Federal Rule 612 addresses the problem of a witness using a writing to refresh memory. The rule provides that in certain circumstances the adversary has the right to have the writing produced, to cross-examine the witness thereon, and to introduce into evidence the portions of the writing that relate to the testimony. This right is granted whenever the witness uses a document to refresh recollection while testifying. If the writing was used to refresh recollection before trial, inspection and use by the adversary is only granted if the trial court finds it necessary in the interests of justice.

The Advisory Committee's proposed Rule 612 was significantly broader in dealing with recollection refreshed before trial. The Advisory Committee noted that the bulk of the case law to that point had "denied the existence of any right to access by the opponent when the writing is used prior to taking the stand, though the judge may have discretion in the matter." The Advisory Committee Note criticizes this position, stating that the "risk of imposition and the need of safeguard" is just as great when the witness refreshes recollection pre-trial as it is when recollection is refreshed at trial. The risk in either case is that it is the writing, and not the witness, that is really testifying.

But Congress thought that the Advisory Committee's position would create a risk of abuse on the other side, i.e., by the party demanding disclosure. As the House Committee on the Judiciary put it, "permitting an adverse party to require the production of writings used before testifying could result in fishing expeditions among a multitude of papers which a witness may have used in preparing for trial." In light of the concerns expressed by Congress, it appears that most trial judges have exercised discretion to prevent discovery of statements used before trial to refresh recollection, in order to prevent harassment and to ensure that lawyers are not inhibited in carefully preparing witnesses for their trial testimony. See, e.g., Cosden Oil v. Karl 0.Helm A.G., 736 F.2d 1064 (5th Cir. 1984) (no abuse of discretion in refusing to require production of document used by witness to refresh his recollection prior to testifying). Yet a lawyer looking at the Advisory Committee Note to the rule would think that there is an absolute right to demand production of a document if it was used to refresh recollection before trial.

[3] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

Permitting an adverse party to require the production of writings used before testifying could result in fishing expeditions among a multitude of papers which a witness may have used in preparing for trial. The Subcommittee recast the first sentence of the Rule to permit access to any such writings only if the court determines access is in the interests of justice.

[4] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

As submitted to Congress, Rule 612 provided that except as set forth in 18 U.S.C. 3500, if a witness uses a writing to refresh his memory for the purpose of testifying, "either before or while testifying," an adverse party is entitled to have the writing produced at the hearing, to inspect it, to cross-examine the witness on it, and to introduce in evidence those portions relating to the witness' testimony. The Committee amended the Rule so as still to require the production of writings used by a witness while testifying, but to render the production of writings used by a witness to refresh his memory before testifying discretionary with the court in the interests of justice, as is the case under existing federal law. See Goldman v. United States, 316 U.S. 129 (1942) . The Committee considered that permitting an adverse party to require the production of writings used before testifying could result in fishing expeditions among a multitude of papers which a witness may have used in preparing for trial.

The Committee intends that nothing in the Rule be construed as barring the assertion of a privilege with respect to writings used by a witness to refresh his memory.

United States v. Carey, 589 F.3d 187 (5th Cir. 2009) : Affirming convictions for aggravated sexual abuse of a minor under the age of 12, the Court rejected the defendant's contention that the prosecutor misused a police report during the victim's testimony. The Court observed that any writing may be used to refresh recollection regardless of whether the witness being refreshed authored the writing; the Circuit has rejected the requirement that a witness must explicitly declare that a writing actually refreshed recollection; and the record failed to demonstrate that the victim read from the police report rather than used it to refresh recollection. The Judge must ensure that a witness uses a document to refresh recollection and that the document does not simply put words in the witness's mouth; the Court would defer to the Judge's decision that no impropriety occurred in this case. The Court noted that the defendant exercised his right to question the victim about her reliance on the report and to argue to the jury that the reliance rendered her testimony not credible.

Rule 613. Prior Statements of Witnesses

(a) Examining witness concerning prior statement. -- In examining a witness concerning a prior statement made by the witness, whether written or not, the statement need not be shown nor its contents disclosed to the witness at that time, but on request the same shall be shown or disclosed to opposing counsel.

(b) Extrinsic evidence of prior inconsistent statement of witness. -- Extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement by a witness is not admissible unless the witness is afforded an opportunity to explain or deny the same and the opposite party is afforded an opportunity to interrogate the witness thereon, or the interests of justice otherwise require. Article VI. Witnesses

3-613 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 613.02

613.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Showing a Statement to the Witness

One of the traditional ways of impeaching a witness is by introducing evidence of a prior inconsistent statement. Under common law, the examining party was required to lay an adequate foundation for the statement at the time the witness testified. This was referred to as "the rule in Queen Caroline's case." n1 That rule required the cross-examining party to confront the witness directly on cross-examination with the inconsistent statement. At that point, the witness would have an opportunity to admit, explain, repudiate, or deny the statement. If the witness denied making the statement, then the Trial Court could in its discretion permit the cross-examining party to prove through extrinsic evidence that the statement was made.

Rule 613, on its face, changes the common-law foundation requirements. The Rule provides that when a witness is examined concerning a prior statement, this statement need not be shown to the witness at the time of the examination. However, extrinsic evidence of the statement may not be introduced unless the witness is given some opportunity, at some point in the trial, to explain, repudiate, or deny the statement. n2 If the witness denies the statement, extrinsic evidence of the statement is admissible subject to Rule 403.

[2] Disclosing the Contents to Opposing Counsel

Under Rule 613, witnesses need not be shown the statement or told of its contents at the time they are asked about it. Nevertheless, on request opposing counsel must be shown the statement, or its contents must be disclosed to counsel. This provision protects the opposing party against unwarranted insinuations that a statement has been made. n3 The language of Rule 613(a) providing that "on request the same [prior statement] shall be shown or disclosed to opposing counsel" has the potential to cause confusion. Apparently, a written statement is to be shown to counsel and an oral one is to be disclosed. Although the Rule is not crystal clear, it appears that a statement is to be turned over or disclosed in the form in which the questioner has secured the statement. The time for the showing or disclosure is when the witness is examined about the prior statement, assuming that a proper request is made. In some Courts, the Rule may advance the timing of disclosure, which otherwise might not come until the end of cross-examination.

[3] Opportunity for Witness to Explain or Deny the Statement

Rule 613(b) provides that the witness must be afforded an opportunity to explain or to deny the statement but removes the common-law requirement that the foundation be made prior to the introduction of the prior inconsistent statement.

One rationale for this important change in Rule 613 is that it permits several collusive witnesses to be examined before disclosure of a joint prior inconsistent statement. A second reason for the change is that the old common-law rule was sometimes applied inflexibly; a party who inadvertently neglected to lay a foundation was barred from introducing relevant prior inconsistent statements.

In most cases involving the application of Rule 613 the foundation will be developed in the same manner as it is in the traditional common-law jurisdiction. Laying the foundation while the witness is on the stand testifying will usually prove to be the most efficient way of proceeding. For one thing, a presentation of the statement to the witness may be needed to satisfy authentication or best evidence concerns. And, if no other reason applies, it may be risky to dispense with a prior foundation, because the witness may become unavailable before the statement is proffered. If that occurs, the admissibility of the extrinsic evidence is subject to the discretion of the Court; and that discretion is rarely exercised in favor of a party who had a chance to confront the witness with the statement and did not do so. n4

The Eleventh Circuit noted the prudence of adhering to the common-law procedure as a practical matter in Wammock v. Celotex Corp., 793 F.2d 1518, 1522 (11th Cir. 1986) :

> Rule 613(b) does not supplant the traditional method of confronting a witness with his inconsistent statement prior to its introduction as the preferred method of proceeding. In fact, where the proponent of the testimony fails to do so, and the witness subsequently becomes unavailable, the proponent runs the risk that the court will properly exercise its discretion to not allow the admission of the prior statement. For this reason, most courts consider the touchstone of admissibility under rule 613(b) to be the continued availability of the witness for recall to explain the inconsistent statements.

[4] Reasons for Relaxing the Foundation Requirement

Professor Edward Cleary, the Reporter for the original Advisory Committee, explained the modification of the common-law foundation requirement as follows: n5

> The objectives of the [common-law] procedure are: (1) to save time, since the witness may admit having made the statement and thus make the extrinsic proof unnecessary; (2) to avoid unfair surprise to the opposite party by affording him an opportunity to draw a denial or explanation from the witness; and (3) to give the witness himself, in fairness, a chance to deny or to explain the apparent discrepancy. These are desirable objectives. The second and third can, however, be achieved by affording an opportunity to explain at any time during the trial, and no particular time sequence is required. Only the first of the objectives named above, saving time, points in the direction of the traditional foundation requirement on cross-examination, and even here countervailing factors are present: the time saved is not great; the laying of the foundation may inadvertently have been overlooked; the impeaching statement may not have been discovered until later; and premature disclosure may on occasion frustrate the effective impeachment of collusive witnesses. The argument may be made that the recalling of a witness for further cross-examination will afford an adequate solution for these difficulties and hence the traditional procedure should be retained. The argument is not a sound one. In the first place, recall for cross-examination has traditionally been very much within the discretion of the judge and seems likely to continue so. And secondly, the admissibility of prior inconsistent statements ought not to be enmeshed in the technicalities of cross-examination when all that is being sought is the presentation of an opportunity to deny or explain.
> In view of these considerations, the Advisory Committee concluded that the objectives could better > be achieved by allowing the opportunity to deny or explain to occur at any time during the trial, rather than limiting it to cross-examination.

>
> Moreover, occasionally situations may arise where the interests of justice will warrant dispensing entirely with the opportunity to explain or deny. Thus if a witness becomes unavailable through absence or death, the judge ought to have discretion to allow the impeaching statement.
>
> In my view, the existing practice would continue in general to be followed under the rule. It is convenient and effective to raise the matter on cross-examination, and doing so would avoid problems that might ultimately arise if witnesses become unavailable before the end of trial. The rule ought, however, to remain as drawn, leaving the practical approach to the good sense of the practitioner.

[5] Criticism of Relaxing the Foundation Requirement

We believe that the common-law rule has much to recommend it, at least if not applied in a draconian fashion. We wonder about the wisdom of the modification. Even Professor Cleary recognized that time is wasted in introducing extrinsic evidence where the witness if confronted would have readily admitted making the statement. This is not a de minimis consideration. We also fear that prior statements that a witness would readily acknowledge will be given more impact than they might warrant, because the statements will not be followed immediately by an explanation. The jury may, understandably but inappropriately, think the explanation to have been concocted after the fact.

We recognize that the change wrought by Rule 613 is directed to legitimate problems. The common-law rule was in some cases a trap for the unwary: (1) statements were sometimes lost due to an inadvertent failure to lay a foundation; (2) problems were presented when inconsistent statements were discovered after the witness testified; and (3) most importantly, there was the danger under the common-law rule of prematurely alerting collusive witnesses to the evidence available for impeachment.

However, these problems could be better handled by adding to the standard common-law foundation requirement a sentence allowing the Trial Court the discretion to dispense with the foundation requirement when that is necessary in the interests of justice. This would be a solution similar to that provided in Rule 611(b), which recognizes the merits of the common-law rule of scope limitations on cross-examination, but which nonetheless permits the Trial Court in its discretion to dispense with the rule in appropriate circumstances. A sound proposal would also include specific language authorizing the Trial Judge to dispense with a prior foundation requirement where the party's failure to lay the foundation was inadvertent, or was otherwise the result of good cause.

Judge Selya, concurring in United States v. Hudson, 970 F.2d 948, 959 (1st Cir. 1992) , has expressed a view similar to our own:

> [The common-law rule] works to avoid unfair surprise, gives the target of the impeaching evidence a timely opportunity to explain or deny the alleged inconsistency, facilitates judges' efforts to conduct trials in an orderly manner, and conserves scarce judicial resources. At the same time, insistence upon a prior foundational requirement, subject, of course, to relaxation in the presider's discretion if the interests of justice otherwise require, does not impose an undue burden on the proponent of the evidence.

[6] Federal Courts' Reversion to Common-Law Rule

Despite the language of the Rule and the apparent intent of the drafters, many Federal Courts have held that Rule 613(b) does not abolish the traditional common-law requirement of laying a foundation with the witness prior to the introduction of a prior inconsistent statement. n6 Even those Courts that read the Rule to dispense with a prior foundation requirement nonetheless recognize that a Trial Court has the power to control the order of proof under Rule 611(a), and that this power can be exercised on a case-by-case basis to require a prior foundation before admitting extrinsic evidence of an inconsistent statement. As the First Circuit stated in United States v. Hudson, 970 F.2d 948, 956 n.2 (1st Cir. 1992) : "Rule 611(a) allows the trial judge to control the mode and order of interrogation and presentation of evidence, giving him or her the discretion to impose the common-law prior foundation requirement when such an approach seems fit." The Hudson Court concluded that Rule 613 "was not intended to eliminate trial judge discretion to manage the trial in a way designed to promote accuracy and fairness." n7

We suggest that the judicial reluctance to apply the Rule is a good indication that the Rule itself is unsound.

[7] The Need to Confront the Witness with Minor Inconsistencies

Even if the Rule is read to change the common-law prior foundation requirement, it seems clear that there are still situations in which the cross-examiner must confront the witness with her inconsistent statement or lose all chance of bringing it up. One example is when the inconsistent statement involves only a minor inconsistency, unrelated to the facts in dispute. Extrinsic evidence of a minor inconsistency ordinarily would not be permitted under Rule 403; therefore the witness must be asked about it or the inconsistency will never be brought before the jury. n8 As one Court has put it: "Even if a proponent is not always required to lay a prior foundation under Rule 613(b), a trial court is free to use its informed discretion to exclude extrinsic evidence of prior inconsistent statements on grounds of unwarranted prejudice, confusion, waste of time, or the like." n9

Thus, if a witness states she had just come from the movie "Paycheck" when she saw the defendant kill the plaintiff, her prior statement that she had just come from the movie "Reindeer Games" when she witnessed the event would have some bearing on her credibility; the fact that she got her Ben Affleck movies mixed up may say something about whether her account is credible, so the inconsistency is a proper subject of limited inquiry. But unless the examiner confronts the witness with her earlier inconsistent statement, the jury will never learn of it. The inconsistency goes to a minor matter because it is not central to her account of the facts in dispute. If the examiner offered extrinsic evidence of the inconsistent statement, it would be rejected under Rule 403. n10 Thus, the only way for the jury to hear about the inconsistency is to confront the witness with it. If the witness denies making the statement, it could not be proved through extrinsic evidence, however. n11 But at least the jury would have heard about the prior statement.

[8] Extrinsic Proof Not Required

The Rule permits extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement under certain circumstances, though it does not require a party to prove through extrinsic evidence that the statement was made. n12 But the lack of an extrinsic proof requirement could lead to abuse. Counsel might ask about a prior inconsistent statement without any basis to believe that such a statement ever was made. In order to protect against this possibility, Trial Courts have imposed safeguards by using their authority under Rules 611 and 403. The Court may, upon request, demand that examiners articulate a basis for concluding in good faith that the prior inconsistent statement was in fact made. n13 In this regard, the review by the Court is similar to that exercised when a party seeks to cross-examine a character witness by asking the witness about the defendant's prior bad acts, or cross-examines a witness about prior bad acts under Rule 608. See the discussion in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rules 405 (§ 405.02[5]) and 608 (§ 608.02[9]). Also, the Trial Court should instruct the jury that "statements by counsel, including assertions of fact, are not to be considered as evidence." n14

[9] Statement Must Have Been Made By the Witness

Under Rule 613 the examiner must show not only that the statement proffered was made, but also that it was made by the witness who is being impeached. For example, in United States v. Chavez, 979 F.2d 1350 (9th Cir. 1992) , Officer Benedetti testified that he saw Chavez hand a coconspirator a small yellow packet containing heroin. Chavez sought to offer into evidence a diagram that he contended was drawn by another officer, Ramirez, during a meeting with defense counsel prior to trial. The diagram drawn by Ramirez indicated a different place for the heroin transaction from that testified to by Benedetti. Ramirez drew the diagram based on the description given to him by Benedetti prior to trial.

However, at trial, Officer Benedetti testified that he had never seen the diagram before it was shown to him during cross-examination. Chavez presented no evidence to contradict Benedetti's denial of authorship. Under these circumstances, the Court found no error in the exclusion of the diagram. The Court concluded that Rule 613 was not violated "because the diagram did not contain admissible evidence that tended to prove that Officer Benedetti had made a prior inconsistent statement." n15

[10] Relationship to Other Rules

See the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 608, § 608.02[15], for a discussion of the distinction between impeachment with a prior inconsistent statement and impeachment of a witness whose statement is offered to show a bad character for veracity. The distinction is important because if the impeachment is under Rule 608(b), extrinsic evidence of the statement is not permitted -- the party must accept the witness' denial. In contrast, if the impeachment is under Rule 613, and that Rule's foundation requirements are met, extrinsic evidence of the statement can be introduced -- subject to a balance of probative value against the risk of prejudice, confusion, and delay under Rule 403.

Rule 801(d)(1)(A) provides for substantive use of prior inconsistent statements only if made under oath at a formal proceeding; inconsistent statements not falling under that Rule (or any other exception to or exemption from the hearsay rule), can be used for a limited purpose only. The Courts have expressed concern that lawyers may attempt to call witnesses and impeach them with inconsistent statements in the hope that the jury will consider the inconsistent statements as substantive evidence. This matter is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 607, § 607.02[2].

Impeachment of a hearsay declarant by means of a prior inconsistent statement is covered in Rule 806. Rule 806 provides that a hearsay declarant may be impeached with an inconsistent statement even though the declarant never had an opportunity to explain or deny the statement. It obviously makes no sense to impose a prior foundation requirement for statements of hearsay declarants. Thus, Rule 613 is inapplicable to the use of inconsistent statements to impeach a hearsay declarant.

Rule 613 expressly states that a party may offer an admission by a party-opponent without ever giving the opponent an opportunity to explain or deny the admission. n16 This is because party-opponents will have plenty of opportunity to explain or deny their statements, either in their own cases or on rebuttal.

[11] Prior Inconsistent Conduct, Silence, and Omissions

The final paragraph of the Advisory Committee's Note indicates that the Rule is not intended to apply to impeachment by evidence of prior inconsistent conduct. While extrinsic proof of inconsistent conduct may be admissible under some other Rule, there is no authority for admission under Rule 613. n17 However, Rule 613 is a double-edged sword in that it authorizes the use of extrinsic evidence, but it also imposes a foundational requirement that the witness have some opportunity to explain the inconsistency at some point in the trial. So, if evidence of inconsistent conduct is otherwise admissible, Rule 613 is inapplicable, and it would seem that the conduct could be admitted without any opportunity given for the witness to explain it.

A witness's prior silence may be inconsistent with his testimony at trial. Suppose a witness testifies at trial and identifies Larry, Moe, and Curly as the bank robbers, while his previous statement to police officers implicated only Larry and Moe. His prior omission as to Curly is inconsistent with his later testimony; it would have been natural to mention Curly in the original statement, and the failure to mention Curly is, in these circumstances, equivalent to saying that "Curly was not there." Courts have treated this type of omission as a "statement" covered by Rule 613, rather than as conduct outside the scope of the Rule. We believe this is the correct approach, because the failure to mention a matter when it would be natural to do so, as in the above hypothetical, is really a "statement" that the matter never happened. n18

In the above hypothetical, the witness made a statement that did not include a material fact later mentioned at trial. But the principle -- of inconsistency and of applicability of Rule 613 -- can apply even where the witness made no affirmative statement at all. That is, complete silence can be treated as a "statement" inconsistent with trial testimony, if at the time of the silence a reasonable person would have then made a statement similar to that later made at trial. n19

Hudson, 970 F.2d 948 (1st Cir. 1992)* (foundation for admitting extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement does not require that the witness have an opportunity to explain or deny the statement before it is introduced; all that is required is that the witness at least be available for recall during the course of the trial; a Trial Court can exercise its discretion to require a prior confrontation, but here the Court labored under a misapprehension of law that a prior confrontation was required by law; therefore it was reversible error to exclude a prior inconsistent statement of a government witness on the ground that the witness was not confronted with the statement before it was proffered).

Sheffield, 992 F.2d 1164 (11th Cir. 1993)* (failure to assert a fact when it would have been natural to do so is tantamount to assertion of the nonexistence of that fact; this is admissible for impeachment purposes as a prior inconsistent statement).

613.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Rule 613(a) -- Examining Witness Concerning Prior Statement

[a] Rule 613(a) -- Agent's Statement To Impeach

Williams v. Union Carbide Corp., 790 F.2d 552 (6th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a judgment for a plaintiff who claimed that he was injured when exposed to chemicals while working for a contractor at the defendant's plant. It found error in the Trial Judge's ruling prohibiting the defendant from cross-examining the plaintiff about a prior suit in which he attributed the same injuries to an explosion. The Court stated that "[a]n opening statement made by an attorney is admissible in a later lawsuit against his client," and that statements made in a pleading in a prior case are admissible for impeachment under Rule 613 and as substantive evidence under Rule 801(d)(2).

[b] Rule 613(a) -- Counsel's Right To Inspect

United States v. Lawson, 683 F.2d 688 (2d Cir. 1982) : After reversing a bank robbery conviction on another ground, the Court observed that Rule 613(a) gives opposing counsel a right to see written statements used to impeach a witness, and that there was no judicial discretion to deny inspection.

[c] Rule 613(a) -- Good-Faith Basis for Questions

United States v. Harris, 542 F.2d 1283 (7th Cir. 1976) : Affirming drug conspiracy convictions, the Court stated that it is reversible error to fail to produce the person to whom a prior statement was made if the statement was used to impeach a witness who denied making it.

United States v. Silverstein, 737 F.2d 864 (10th Cir. 1984) : The Court reversed an inmate's conviction for killing a fellow inmate. It found that the prosecutor erred in cross-examining the defendant about a statement he allegedly made to another inmate that was used as circumstantial evidence of his guilt. Since the prosecutor knew that the inmate to whom the statement allegedly was made was unavailable and he had no proof of the statement, the Court found that he improperly had tried to "use impeachment as a guise for submitting to the jury substantive evidence that is otherwise unavailable."

[d] Rule 613(a) -- Showing Statement to Witness

United States v. Marks, 816 F.2d 1207 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiring to distribute marijuana, holding there was no error in requiring defense counsel to show an FBI report to a witness while cross-examining the witness concerning statements it contained. Although the Court recognized that Rule 613(a) abolished the requirement that a witness must be shown a written statement before being asked about it, the Court concluded that a Trial Judge "is entitled to conclude that in particular circumstances the older approach should be used in order to avoid confusing witnesses and jurors."

Sloman v. Tadlock, 21 F.3d 1462 (9th Cir. 1994) : In a civil rights case, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when counsel was required to impeach a witness with prior inconsistent statements "in an appropriate manner," by first letting her read the statements to herself and then to ask questions about the seeming inconsistency with her statements at trial. In NLRB v. Bakers of Paris, Inc., 929 F.2d 1427 (9th Cir. 1991) , the Court enforced a bargaining order issued to an employer, holding that it was error (but harmless) for the Administrative Law Judge to exclude evidence of employees' prior statements because the non-English-speaking-and-reading witnesses were unable to authenticate the statements before they were used as a topic of cross-examination. The Rule was drafted expressly to abolish the requirement that a prior inconsistent statement be presented to a witness, let alone be authenticated, before it was so used.

[e] Rule 613(a) -- Unofficial Transcript

United States v. Cody, 114 F.3d 772 (8th Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed a cocaine conviction, finding no error when defense counsel was prohibited from using an unofficial transcript to cross-examine a police officer. The Trial Judge was reasonably concerned that the unofficial transcript of suppression hearing testimony "could contain inaccurate or incomplete information and that the witness's refusal to acknowledge the accuracy of statements read from that transcript would mislead the jury." The Judge had indicated that he would permit defense counsel to impeach the witness by playing portions of the tape-recorded testimony provided that it was cued to the proper spot.

[f] Rule 613(a) -- Unsigned or Unadopted Prior Statement

Jenkins v. TDC Mgt. Corp., 21 F.3d 436 (D.C. Cir. 1994) : In an action for breach of an employment contract, the defendant attempted to cross-examine the plaintiff's accountant about a statement allegedly made to an investigator, but was precluded because the memorandum being used by defense counsel was the investigator's summary, "not something [the accountant] acknowledged and accepted." Reversing, the Court noted that the Rule clearly contemplates the use of oral statements and gives no indication that an oral statement that happens to have been recorded in writing be adopted before being used for impeachment. If the problem was that the jury might have been deceived into believing the accountant had written the words on the notes being read by counsel, there was no obstacle to simply instructing the jury regarding the source of the memorandum.

[2] Rule 613(b) -- Extrinsic Evidence of Prior Inconsistent Statement of Witness

[a] Rule 613(b) -- Bias

United States v. Betts, 16 F.3d 748 (7th Cir. 1994) : The Trial Judge in a drug prosecution excluded testimony that a prosecution witness had said he would testify against the defendants in exchange for a government promise to have his sentence reduced, because the principal witness had not been given an adequate opportunity to explain or deny the statement on cross-examination before the extrinsic evidence was offered. The Court held there was no error, finding the weight of authority to require that a party seeking to prove bias through extrinsic evidence of a witness' prior statement must first give the witness an opportunity to explain or deny the statement, "even though Rule 613(b) is not strictly applicable." We would observe that even if the Rule were applicable, it does not require that the opportunity to explain or deny must be given before the extrinsic evidence is admitted.

[b] Rule 613(b) -- Collateral Matter

Taylor v. National R.R. Passenger Corp., 920 F.2d 1372 (7th Cir. 1990) : A jury verdict for the plaintiff in a FELA case was reversed because 14-year-old military medical records indicating complaints of back pain and a job application not mentioning back injuries had been erroneously admitted. The Court held that the records were irrelevant to the plaintiff's injury claim and were collateral extrinsic evidence inadmissible to impeach his testimony.

United States v. Grooms, 978 F.2d 425 (8th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for abusive sexual contact, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding extrinsic evidence of an alleged prior inconsistent statement offered to impeach a government witness, as the disputed statement related only to a collateral matter not affecting the substantive issues of the case.

United States v. Higa, 55 F.3d 448 (9th Cir. 1995) : A principal government witness in a drug importation case had told investigators about and had testified before the grand jury regarding his and the defendant's participation in the conspiracy, but at trial he was evasive on direct and on cross-examination he testified that the investigators told him to lie and that he told the same story before the grand jury to avoid prosecution for perjury. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting witnesses to testify to the witness' prior statements and to admit grand jury testimony contradicting the trial testimony. Use of the previous testimony was not impeachment by past conduct but rather was impeachment by past statements, so the bar in Rule 608(b) on extrinsic evidence did not apply. Moreover, the evidence was not collateral, since the inconsistencies went not just to credibility but to matters at issue in the trial.

[c] Rule 613(b) -- Determination of Inconsistency

United States v. Martin, 694 F.2d 885 (1st Cir. 1982) : Affirming a conviction for mail fraud, the Court found that the exclusion of a prior statement by a victim who testified for the government was not improper, because defense counsel failed to show that the statement was inconsistent with her testimony. In United States v. Tracey, n1 the Court found no inconsistency between a witness' testimony that he was unaware that a lawsuit had been filed against him and documents evidencing the fact that a summons in the suit had been served by mail addressed to the witness' old address.

United States v. Trzaska, 111 F.3d 1019 (2d Cir. 1997) : The defendant had twice previously been convicted of firearms offenses. At this trial for firearms offenses, the defendant's son testified for the defense that in 1992 the defendant had said the son should take the guns then being stored at a friend's apartment because he "didn't want nothing to do with them anymore." To impeach the 1992 statement, the prosecution then offered the defendant's statement during the course of an illegal search leading to the instant charges that "I'm a drug addict with this [i.e., guns]. It's a sickness." Reversing, the Court held that this impeachment was erroneous. There is no necessary inconsistency between indicating a desire to dispose of specific guns and admitting an obsession with guns in general; further, the year's time lapse between the statements clouds whatever inconsistency might have existed. The argument that there was an inconsistency between the defendant's admission that he possessed the guns found at the time of his arrest and the implicit denial that he possessed the guns in the friend's apartment was likewise unavailing, since the two statements referred to different guns. In United States v. Agajanian, n2 the Court held that a transcript of a taped conversation was sufficiently inconsistent to be admitted for impeachment, and that a diametric inconsistency is not required. In United States v. Hall, n3 a prosecution of a former customs inspector for converting property, the Court held the government properly introduced a complaint letter by the victim after the defense suggested that the letter was inconsistent with the victim's testimony. Whether or not a charge of recent fabrication had been made, the Court said that the jury should have been permitted to make a judgment as to whether the letter was inconsistent as the defense claimed.

United States v. Barile, 286 F.3d 749 (4th Cir. 2002) : In his trial for making materially false statements to the Food and Drug Administration, the defendant sought to impeach a government witness with documents created by the FDA's Office of Criminal Investigation during its investigation of a submission by the defendant's company to the FDA concerning a product enhancement. The Judge precluded the examination on the ground that statements in the documents attributed to a witness were not specifically inconsistent with her testimony, but the Court sharply disagreed, noting that the inconsistency was plain. Because statements of a third party that are not adopted by a witness cannot be used for prior inconsistent statement impeachment, the Court noted that on retrial the Judge must determine whether the statements were reasonably attributable to the witness.

United States v. Misher, 99 F.3d 664 (5th Cir. 1996) : In a drug trafficking prosecution, a defendant attempted to impeach a testifying officer by introducing an affidavit the officer had given in support of a search warrant, which listed the persons the officer believed to be members of the conspiracy but did not include the defendant's name. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, since the officer had had over a year to change his opinion of the scope of the conspiracy, and nothing in the affidavit directly contradicted the officer's testimony. In United States v. Devine, n4 a prosecution witness in a drug case testified on cross-examination that he did not remember a prior conversation. The Court held there was no error in excluding extrinsic evidence of the conversation. The claim of faulty memory did not constitute an inconsistent statement, so the extrinsic evidence would be inadmissible hearsay.

Vaughn v. Willis, 853 F.2d 1372 (7th Cir. 1988) : Affirming a judgment for a prisoner who was raped by other inmates, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly excluded a letter that the defendant-guard offered to impeach an inmate, who had testified at a deposition and subsequently stated that he would not testify at trial because of fear for his family. The Trial Judge found that the letter was not plainly inconsistent and that it would be unfair to admit it without admitting evidence that the witness feared for his safety, and the defendant objected to admission of evidence of the witness' fear.

Weyers v. Lear Operations Corp., 359 F.3d 1049 (8th Cir. 2004) : The Court reversed a judgment for a terminated employee in an age discrimination action, holding it was an abuse of discretion to preclude the employer from introducing for impeachment purposes the plaintiff's prior statement to the EEOC, which indicated that the plaintiff had not been subject to age-related comments until a few months into her appointment. In contrast, at trial the plaintiff testified that she was harassed about her age from the very beginning of her employment. In a drug case, United States v. McCrady, n5 a government witness initially stated that she could not remember whether the defendant told her that the prosecution was a frame-up, but admitted that such a statement had been made when confronted with her own pretrial statement. When the defendant denied making the statement, an Assistant U.S. Attorney was permitted to testify that the government witness had said that the defendant had made the statement. The Court found that the attorney's testimony was unwarranted, since it did not impeach the defendant, and it was not inconsistent with the government witness' testimony.

United States v. Billue, 994 F.2d 1562 (11th Cir. 1993) : At his trial for felon firearm possession, the defendant asserted he had lent his identification to a person who sold a rifle at a pawnshop. After the pawnshop operator said he could not recall seeing anyone other than the defendant, nor could he recall telling an ATF agent the defendant was alone, the agent testified to the prior statement. The Court held this was proper, as "[t]he law is clear that if a witness had denied making a statement or has failed to remember it, the making of the statement may be proved by another witness," and the government had not acted in bad faith in calling the pawnshop operator.

[d] Rule 613(b) -- Inconsistency With Tax Returns

Kassim v. City of Schenectady, 415 F.3d 246 (2d Cir. 2005) : The operator of a variety store sued for violation of § 1983 after the City closed his business without notice when it foreclosed on his lessor for delinquent property taxes. To prove his losses, the plaintiff offered his business records, which indicated higher profits than his recent tax returns, but the Judge excluded the records, apparently either because the tax returns were more reliable or because of a notion that a taxpayer is estopped from inconsistently claiming higher earnings in a civil suit against a private party. The Court held that neither explanation would justify the ruling, since "[w]here a party has made a prior statement inconsistent with the one the party seeks to advance at trial, a question of credibility arises, which is for the jury, not the judge, to assess," and there is no rule of estoppel regarding earnings reported on tax returns, but "[t]he credibility of plaintiff's evidence of his business profits, in light of its inconsistency with his tax return, was for the jury to assess." The error was harmless, however, because the business records were not sufficiently authenticated.

[e] Rule 613(b) -- Need for Extrinsic Evidence

United States v. Stevens, 935 F.2d 1380 (3d Cir. 1991) : In a sexual assault and robbery prosecution, the defendant's father testified that the defendant was left-handed, contrary to the complainants' testimony. Reversing the conviction on other grounds, the Court noted that the government was properly permitted to ask the witness about prior statements to a pretrial services officer indicating almost no contact with the defendant and, when he did not recall the conversation, to call the officer as a witness.

United States v. Greer, 806 F.2d 556 (5th Cir. 1986) : Upholding convictions for racketeering, the Court held it was not error to exclude a tape-recorded statement of a government witness, since the witness admitted on cross-examination that he made the inconsistent statement.

United States v. Lashmett, 965 F.2d 179 (7th Cir. 1992) : As part of a scheme to defraud an insurer, the defendant's accomplices (and principal prosecution witnesses) filed a complaint and affidavits in a civil suit. At the fraud trial they testified that statements in the papers were false; finding no impeachment value once the lies were admitted, the Trial Judge excluded the papers. The Court held that extrinsic proof should be admitted even if the witness admits making a prior inconsistent statement because it will emphasize the contradiction to the jury and best inform them of the document's impeaching weight and significance; the error was harmless, however. See also United States v. Holt n6(the fact that a witness seeks to explain away prior inconsistent statements does not deprive the government of the right to offer the statements as impeaching evidence).

United States v. Soundingsides, 820 F.2d 1232 (10th Cir. 1987) : The Court held it was error to admit testimony by two FBI agents concerning a prior inconsistent statement of a witness who denied seeing a murder defendant beat the victim. Since the witness admitted that he had made a prior statement, the testimony was unnecessary and brought hearsay before the jury.

United States v. Jackson, 748 F.2d 1535 (11th Cir. 1984) : Affirming a defendant's Hobbs Act conviction, the Court found that "[t]he prosecution does not lose its right to introduce a contradictory statement because the defendant in direct examination attempts to explain away the contradiction by describing his uncommunicated state of mind in making one of the statements."

[f] Rule 613(b) -- No Inconsistency -- Witness Testified To Making Statement

United States v. Arena, 180 F.3d 380 (2d Cir. 1999) : In a Hobbs Act prosecution arising from butyric acid attacks on abortion providers, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the defendant was prohibited from impeaching the principal prosecution witness with statements to a probation officer indicating that the defendant was not involved in the incidents. Because the witness herself testified to making the statements to the probation officer, the excluded statements did not satisfy the requirement that statements offered for impeachment be inconsistent with trial testimony.

Rush v. Illinois Cent. R.R., 399 F.3d 705 (6th Cir. 2005) : The child plaintiff was injured in a fall from a railcar on which he and other children were playing. Within several hours of the accident, a risk manager/railroad police officer interviewed three of the children. The plaintiff called two of the interviewed children as witnesses. The Court held that it was error (but harmless) to admit an audio recording to impeach one of the children after he admitted making inconsistent statements.

[g] Rule 613(b) -- Omission As Inconsistent Statement

United States v. Meserve, 271 F.3d 314 (1st Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed convictions for robbery and firearms offenses, finding no error in the exclusion of evidence that a prosecution witness's grand jury testimony had not included certain details that she had testified to at trial. The witness had not been asked about the details during her grand jury testimony, and thus there was no inconsistency when she was asked about those details and testified to them at trial.

United States v. Strother, 49 F.3d 869 (2d Cir. 1995) : In a prosecution for obtaining funds from a financial institution by means of false pretenses, the disputed question was whether the defendant asked a bank official to honor a check for $82,000 drawn on insufficient funds, on the promise that he would wire in money to cover it, or had asked the official to hold the check rather than to pay it and she mistakenly paid it. The Court held it was error to exclude memoranda in which the bank official described the transaction but did not explicitly mention that the defendant had asked her to pay the check, because they were inconsistent with the official's testimony at trial that the defendant specifically asked her to pay the check, and it would have been "natural" for the bank official to include the defendant's request to pay the check in her memoranda.

United States v. Leach, 613 F.2d 1295 (5th Cir. 1980) : A witness may be impeached by showing that he omitted a matter when making a prior statement, although the Trial Judge has discretion to rule on whether an omission is actually inconsistent with trial testimony. In Busbee v. Sule, n7 the Court held that the District Judge did not err in admitting as impeachment evidence a copy of an investigating officer's accident report, which revealed that no charges were brought against a defendant.

Lampkins v. Thompson, 337 F.3d 1009 (8th Cir. 2003) : The plaintiff in a civil rights action alleged that federal agents had unconstitutionally detained him at an airport. When the agents testified that they had seen the plaintiff's ticket before the stop and that it had another passenger's name on it, the plaintiff sought unsuccessfully to introduce the agents' prior sworn statement, which said nothing about seeing the name on the ticket until after the stop. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the evidence, since the omission was not probative to impeach in the absence of a statement that the affidavits contained all the facts the declarant knew about the incident, and since the affidavits were likely to mislead or confuse the jury.

United States v. Sheffield, 992 F.2d 1164 (11th Cir. 1993) : The defendant's conviction for embezzling government property was reversed because he was not permitted to introduce testimony by his supervisor that his subordinate, the principal prosecution witness, had said nothing about being authorized to act by the defendant when confronted with evidence of wrongdoing. That silence was inconsistent with the subordinate's trial identification of the defendant as the architect of the scheme.

[h] Rule 613(b) -- Opportunity To Explain or Deny

[i] Rule 613(b) -- Prior to Extrinsic Evidence

United States v. Hudson, 970 F.2d 948 (1st Cir. 1992) : After witnesses, including the defendant's brother, testified under a grant of immunity about drug transactions, the defense offered evidence that the witnesses had participated in jailhouse conversations indicating that the defendant was not involved in drugs and that the brother was upset at the defendant for beating him out of gambling money and not taking care of his family. The Court held that although a witness had not been confronted with his prior inconsistent statements while on the witness stand, he was available to be recalled to explain it, so exclusion was error. One Judge, concurring, believed that the Circuit should reconsider its precedents and join most of the other Circuits in requiring that a proper foundation be laid before introduction of extrinsic impeachment evidence.

United States v. Praetorius, 622 F.2d 1054 (2d Cir. 1979) : The Court noted that error in barring the introduction of a prior inconsistent "statement" (the failure of a witness to identify a defendant at the first trial) until the witness was given a chance to explain was harmless, in part because the witness could have been recalled by the defense and had been cross-examined for two and one-half days without being asked about the nonidentification. In United States v. King, n8 the Court noted that under Rule 613 counsel is not required to confront a witness with a prior inconsistent statement before offering it, but observed that in some instances failure to elicit information from a witness about a prior inconsistent statement might lead to later exclusion of the evidence on the ground that it would take more time to present the evidence than would be warranted in the circumstances.

United States v. Bibbs, 564 F.2d 1165 (5th Cir. 1977) : The Court affirmed convictions for holding persons to involuntary servitude, and relied on Rule 613(b) as persuasive authority for the Trial Judge's treatment of an inconsistent statement made after a witness testified at trial. The Judge admitted extrinsic evidence of the statement before the witness was recalled and afforded any opportunity to explain or deny the statement.

United States v. McCall, 85 F.3d 1193 (6th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a conviction for bank robbery, the Court found no abuse of discretion where the government, in its rebuttal, introduced extrinsic evidence of a defense witness' prior inconsistent statement. While the prosecution did not confront the witness with the prior statement, the defense could have recalled the witness and did not, choosing instead to argue that the government's impeachment attempt was a failure. In a prosecution involving false entries in bank records, United States v. McGuire, n9 the government offered evidence of an inconsistent statement by a defense witness made after the witness testified and was excused. The Court expressed disapproval of the government's failure to inform the defendants of its intention to offer the statement, but it found that the defendants could have arranged for the witness to be returned as a rebuttal witness if they believed that an opportunity to examine the witness about the statement was important.

United States v. Valencia, 913 F.2d 378 (7th Cir. 1990) : The defendant in a drug conspiracy case was not permitted to ask a DEA agent about statements given him by a witness who had previously testified, because the defendant had not confronted the witness with the statements during his cross-examination. The Court held that any error in the ruling, given the possibility that the witness could have been recalled during rebuttal to explain or deny the prior statements, was harmless.

United States v. Schnapp, 322 F.3d 564 (8th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a conviction for arson, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendant was precluded from testifying to an investigator's statement, regarding the cause of the fire, that was inconsistent with testimony the investigator gave during the government's case-in-chief. The investigator had not been asked about his inconsistent statement, either on cross-examination or on being recalled by the defense before the defendant testified, and it was well within the Judge's discretion not to permit deviation from the normal course of providing a witness with the opportunity to explain or deny an inconsistent statement before admitting extrinsic evidence of it. In United States v. Sutton, 41 F.3d 1257 (8th Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed bank robbery and firearm convictions, holding that it was proper to exclude testimony as to inconsistent statements by a prosecution witness on the ground that the witness had not been given an opportunity to explain or deny the prior statement while on the witness stand. We note that under the language of Rule 613(b) a party should be able to offer inconsistent statements to impeach a witness who has already testified, provided that the witness can be recalled and given an opportunity to explain or deny the statements. However, as discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 613.02[6], many Courts have reverted to a general requirement of a prior foundation before extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement may be admitted. In a drug-possession case, United States v. Hechavarria, n10 the Court held there was no prejudicial error in refusing to admit a prior statement of a government witness because the defendant did not question the witness regarding the statement while the witness was on the stand. In United States v. Lynch, n11 the Court affirmed murder and related convictions, holding there was no error in barring extrinsic evidence of government witnesses' inconsistent statements. The defendants had not laid a foundation for the statements during cross-examination of the witnesses, and the Court observed that there were logistical difficulties in arranging for the recall of inmate witnesses. In Jones v. Collier, n12 the Court affirmed judgments for the defendants in a civil rights case, holding that the Trial Judge did not err by refusing to recall a witness who was 300 miles away or to halt the trial so that a transcript of his prior testimony could be prepared. The Court stated that the attorney for the plaintiff knew that the witness had given inconsistent testimony and that "[w]hen inconsistent testimony is presented, it is elementary to lay a foundation for rebuttal if rebuttal is to be presented."

United States v. Young, 86 F.3d 944 (9th Cir. 1996) : During the government's case, cooperating witnesses, including one John Drake, testified that the defendants used Drake as a middleman to distribute kilogram quantities of cocaine. The defendant then called a witness to testify to hearing Drake say he was "falsely accusing somebody as being [his] supplier," but the witness asserted his self-incrimination privilege. Reversing the conviction on other grounds, the Court noted that the testimony would have been admissible even though Drake had not been asked specifically about the statement, since the government would have been free to recall Drake as a witness and give him an additional opportunity to explain or deny the statement attributed to him.

Wilmington Trust Co. v. Manufacturers Life Ins. Co., 749 F.2d 694 (11th Cir. 1985) : The Court held, in affirming judgments for beneficiaries suing to recover on a life insurance policy, that the plaintiff properly impeached a defense witness by proving an inconsistent statement during rebuttal testimony, even though the witness had not been asked about the statement on cross-examination. The defendant could have requested an opportunity during surrebuttal for the witness to explain the statement; the opportunity to explain under Rule 613 need not precede the admission of extrinsic evidence.

[ii] Rule 613(b) -- Opportunity To Explain or Deny -- Requirement in General

United States v. Greer, 806 F.2d 556 (5th Cir. 1986) : Upholding convictions for racketeering, the Court held there was no error in excluding extrinsic evidence of a witness' out-of-court statement where the witness was never given a chance to explain or deny the statement. In In re Corrugated Container Antitrust Litig., n13 the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in an antitrust case, holding that the Trial Judge properly rejected the plaintiffs' attempt to introduce, as substantive or impeachment evidence, an interview conducted by government attorneys with a witness pursuant to an immunity grant. The plaintiffs deposed the witness and used his deposition as evidence, but at a second deposition the witness invoked his privilege against self-incrimination. The Court reasoned that the interview statements could not be used under Rule 613, since the opposing party had no opportunity to interrogate the witness concerning his interview in light of his privilege claim.

Gong v. Hirsch, 913 F.2d 1269 (7th Cir. 1990) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in a medical malpractice suit, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a postoccurrence letter from the patient's family physician offered to impeach cross-examination testimony by the physician at his videotaped deposition. On redirect examination at the deposition, counsel had only asked the physician whether he wrote the letter and had neglected to ask the witness any questions about the contents of the letter or to give the witness a chance to explain the circumstances in which he wrote the letter. In an airplane crash case, Nachtsheim v. Beech Aircraft Corp., n14 the Court held that the Trial Judge properly excluded a document written to the National Transportation Safety Board by one of the defendant's officers that was offered at trial to impeach the testimony of a defense witness. Analogizing the situation to Rule 613(b), the Court agreed it could be unfair to impeach a witness with a document that was not shown to him before he was excused and which he had no opportunity to explain.

United States v. Moore, 149 F.3d 773 (8th Cir. 1998) : A conspirator in a continuing criminal enterprise gave a tape-recorded statement, in which he identified the defendant as the ringleader, to federal agents after his arrest. When he named another as leader during testimony at trial, the government was permitted to introduce the entire tape-recorded statement during its rebuttal case. Affirming, the Court held that although the government during cross-examination did not confront the witness with every statement on the tape, he was given a substantial opportunity to explain his prior statements before the tape was admitted. In United States v. Wright, 119 F.3d 630 (8th Cir. 1997) , a prosecution for sexual abuse of a four-year-old girl, the Court found no error when the defense was precluded from offering statements the victim had given to a government psychologist as prior inconsistent statements. When the victim had earlier testified, she had not been given an opportunity to explain or deny the statements, and the Court found no interests of justice that called for excusing compliance with that requirement. In United States v. Miller, n15 the Court affirmed methamphetamine-related convictions, but it held that the Trial Judge erred in refusing to allow the defendant to impeach the testimony of a government witness by calling a jailer to testify about an inconsistent statement by the witness that was material to the case. The witness was cross-examined about the prior statements, and denied them. This was all the foundation necessary.

United States v. Mitchell, 113 F.3d 1528 (10th Cir. 1997) : On cross-examination in a bank robbery case, a prosecution witness denied that she had had trouble with memory and forgetfulness. The defense was not permitted to introduce a psychological record in which she had said she had some problems with forgetfulness since the robbery, because she testified that she could not remember making the statement to her psychologist. The Court held that exclusion of the record was error (but harmless), since the witness had been given an opportunity to explain or deny the statement, which was inconsistent with her trial testimony.

Wammock v. Celotex Corp., 793 F.2d 1518 (11th Cir. 1986) : In an asbestosis action, the Court upheld a judgment for the plaintiff, finding no error in the exclusion of prior deposition testimony offered by the company to impeach the plaintiff's expert, who testified that he had corresponded with the company in the 1950s. The expert had been excused and was unavailable, so he could neither explain nor deny the prior statements. Although the company claimed surprise and denied knowing of the inconsistent statements while the expert testified, the Court found that the company had a great deal of information concerning the expert and should have brought any problem in producing the inconsistent statements to the Trial Judge's attention before the expert was excused.

[i] Rule 613(b) -- Prejudicial Material in Statement

White v. Cohen, 635 F.2d 761 (9th Cir. 1981) : In a suit arising out of an accident at a motel, the plaintiff impeached the motel manager with a tape-recorded inconsistent statement obtained by the plaintiff's investigator. The Court reversed the judgment in part because the statement contained repeated references to an alleged criminal act by the defendant motel owner. The Court said that the Trial Judge should have screened the tape as the defense requested and excised the references to criminal acts.

[j] Rule 613(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules

[i] Rule 613(b) -- Hearsay Rules

Goodman v. Pennsylvania Turnpike Comm'n, 293 F.3d 655 (3d Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a public employee who alleged that his employer failed to promote him because of his political affiliation. The Court held that testimony as to statements made by two defense witnesses was properly admitted as prior inconsistent statements. It noted that the fact that the witnesses made inconsistent statements was relevant impeachment, and that there was no effort by the plaintiff to improperly use the inconsistent statements as substantive evidence.

Rush v. Illinois Cent. R.R., 399 F.3d 705 (6th Cir. 2005) : The plaintiff child fell from a railcar on which he and other children had been playing. Within several hours of the accident, a risk manager/railroad police officer interviewed three of the children. On cross-examination of one of the interviewed children, the defense asked leading questions ostensibly to refresh recollection. Because defense counsel asked the child whether certain transcript statements were correct rather than asking whether the transcript refreshed recollection, the Court held that the out-of-court statements were impermissibly placed before the jury to prove how the plaintiff fell. The statements were admissible as prior inconsistent statements under Rule 613, however.

United States v. Schoenborn, 4 F.3d 1424 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit as past recollection recorded a statement by a witness to a prison assault, where the witness had refused to sign the statement when the FBI agent who took it showed it to him and had disavowed its accuracy on the stand. The Court observed that the statement would also not have been admissible as a prior inconsistent statement because it was not the witness' statement.

United States v. Morgan, 376 F.3d 1002 (9th Cir. 2004) : In a prosecution for bank fraud, the defendant denied on cross-examination that she had been in financial difficulties and the prosecution introduced her bankruptcy petition indicating debts well over $100,000. Affirming, the Court held that the petition was admissible under Rule 613 as a prior inconsistent statement, under Rule 801(d)(1)(A) as a prior inconsistent statement given under oath subject to a penalty of perjury, and under Rule 801(d)(2) as an admission by a party opponent.

United States v. Saget, 991 F.2d 702 (11th Cir. 1993) : The Court held there was no error in precluding defense counsel from reading from an FBI agent's summary of a witness' statements during cross-examination in a narcotics trial, as "a witness may not be impeached with a third party's characterization or interpretation of a prior oral statement unless the witness has subscribed to or otherwise adopted the statement as his own." The Court noted that defense counsel was permitted to question the FBI agent about the witness' statements and to recall the witness for cross-examination about them. In our view, the problem arose because defense counsel purported, by reading the statement, to tell the jury the contents of an FBI report, which was hearsay. It would have been permissible for defense counsel to lay the typical foundation by asking the witness whether he had made certain statements to an FBI agent, and if the witness denied doing so, to call the agent to contradict the witness. In Lexington Ins. Co. v. Cooke's Seafood, n16 the Court observed that the foundation requirement for inconsistent statements does not apply when a statement is admissible under Rule 801(d)(2), even if the statement is an agent's admission rather than a personal admission of a party.

[ii] Rule 613(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 403

United States v. Young, 248 F.3d 260 (4th Cir. 2001) : In a prosecution of charges related to a kidnapping, the Court found no error in the exclusion of a prior statement made by a government witness in a conversation with the defendant that the defendant surreptitiously taped. The statement could have been construed as an admission that the witness committed the crime instead of the defendant. Although the defendant had established a foundation for admitting the statement as inconsistent under Rule 613(b), the Trial Judge still had discretion to exclude it under Rule 403. In this case, the witness did not make an unequivocal statement that was inconsistent with his trial testimony, but instead replied affirmatively to leading questions posed by the defendant, in a tape replete with the defendant's self-serving hearsay.

[iii] Rule 613(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 608(b)

United States v. Winchenbach, 197 F.3d 548 (1st Cir. 1999) : Affirming a cocaine distribution conviction, the Court held that a government agent was properly permitted to testify that Flint, the defendant's alibi witness, had told him that agents who had searched the defendant's trailer had missed some cocaine. Flint had denied on cross-examination having any knowledge that the defendant was involved in drugs. The Court recognized "the time-honored tenet that prior inconsistent statements ordinarily may be used to impeach a witness's credibility," and noted that the Trial Judge had erred in relying on Rule 608(b), rather than Rule 613(b), to admit the statement. In this case, the officer's testimony about the defense witness' repudiation of a prior statement about the location of drugs clearly presented an inconsistency, and thus was covered by Rule 613(b), so the extrinsic evidence was not absolutely prohibited. Rule 608(b) would apply only if the prior statement concerning the drugs, standing alone and without any reference to the witness' trial testimony, was pertinent to the witness' character for veracity. The Court noted that extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement, while not controlled by Rule 608(b), was still subject to the balancing test of Rule 403.

United States v. McGee, 408 F.3d 966 (7th Cir. 2005) : In the trial of a drug trafficking conspiracy, the prosecutor, trying on cross-examination to get one defendant to admit that he often made things up and told stories, asked him whether he had phoned his employer and told him a story. When the defendant stated that he was not sure what the prosecutor was talking about, the prosecutor played a tape-recording of a phone conversation the defendant had with his employer after he was placed in custody in which he offered a false explanation of why he was absent from work. In response to the argument that the tape was admissible as a prior inconsistent statement, the Court stated that, even though it sometimes is difficult to distinguish between Rule 608(b) and Rule 613 evidence, it was clear in this case that the prosecutor was seeking to prove that the defendant lied to his employer and thus the tape was extrinsic evidence and inadmissible. The error was harmless, however.

[k] Rule 613(b) -- Scope of Witness' Explanation

Wilmington v. J.I. Case Co., 793 F.2d 909 (8th Cir. 1986) : The Court upheld a judgment for the plaintiff in an employment discrimination action, finding that the plaintiff's lawyer properly elicited testimony from him concerning the circumstances of his deposition, after the plaintiff was impeached with statements made during the deposition.

[l] Rule 613(b) -- Silence As Inconsistent Statement

United States v. Mercado, 412 F.3d 243 (1st Cir. 2005) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting the prosecution to cross-examine the defendant's ex-girlfriend about why she waited nine months to come forward if her exculpatory evidence were true. In the course of the cross-examination, the prosecution established that the witness knew the defendant was facing proceedings in State Court arising from the same gun possession giving rise to the federal prosecution and failed to come forward to assist the defendant in the state case. The Court held that the Judge properly instructed the jury that the state proceedings were only relevant to "action or inaction" by the witness. In United States v. Zaccaria, 240 F.3d 75 (1st Cir. 2001) , during the investigation of a counterfeiting scheme, a principal prosecution witness at the defendant's trial had elected to remain silent after receiving Miranda warnings. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the defendant was precluded from introducing evidence of this prior silence to impeach the witness. In the Court's view: (1) "[s]ilence per se generally has little or no probative value for impeachment purposes"; (2) "evidence of the invocation of the right to remain silent is inherently prejudicial"; and (3) there were no "special trappings that might imbue [the witness'] silence with unaccustomed probative force" or other special circumstances that called for making an exception to the usual rule.

[m] Rule 613(b) -- Summary Judgment

Santos v. Murdock, 243 F.3d 681 (2d Cir. 2001) : Affirming summary judgment for an arrestee who claimed that the defendants submitted an arrest warrant containing false statements and arrested the defendant without probable cause, the Court held that a sworn statement given to the plaintiff's lawyer by a witness who had been twice deposed was not sufficient to defeat summary judgment. Since the statement, which was inconsistent with the deposition testimony, was not made in a "proceeding," it would be admissible at trial only for impeachment purposes and not as substantive evidence. There is reason to be cautious about the scope of the holding. If the sworn statement was a representation that the witness would testify at trial in contradiction of the depositions, the plaintiff may well have demonstrated that a dispute existed as to a material fact. No affidavit considered by a Court in ruling on summary judgment is admissible at trial; the issue is whether the facts set forth in an affidavit are sufficient to warrant a trial. However, in the instant case, the fact that there was no indication the affiant was prepared to testify in a manner consistent with the affidavit meant there was no substantive evidence presenting a dispute as to a material fact.

[n] Rule 613(b) -- Third Person's Notes of Prior Statement

United States v. Almonte, 956 F.2d 27 (2d Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for distributing heroin, holding that an Assistant U.S. Attorney's shorthand summary made after debriefing a witness was not shown to reflect what the witness said sufficiently to be used as a prior inconsistent statement impeaching the witness. To be admissible for impeachment, the notes must reflect the witness' own words rather than the note-taker's interpretation.

United States v. Schoenborn, 4 F.3d 1424 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit as past recollection recorded a statement by a witness to a prison assault, where the witness had refused to sign the statement when the FBI agent who took it showed it to him and had disavowed its accuracy on the stand. The Court observed that the statement would also not have been admissible as a prior inconsistent statement because it was not the witness' statement.

United States v. Chavez, 979 F.2d 1350 (9th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a conviction for heroin possession, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a diagram drawn by one officer during a meeting with defense counsel to impeach another officer's testimony about seeing the transaction at issue. The drawing was not the witness' prior statement but only a record of the officers' memory of others' hearsay declarations.

United States v. Saget, 991 F.2d 702 (11th Cir. 1993) : The Court held there was no error in precluding defense counsel from reading from an FBI agent's summary of a witness' statements during cross-examination in a narcotics trial, as "a witness may not be impeached with a third party's characterization or interpretation of a prior oral statement unless the witness has subscribed to or otherwise adopted the statement as his own." The Court noted that defense counsel was permitted to question the FBI agent about the witness' statements and to recall the witness for cross-examination about them. In our view, the problem arose because defense counsel purported, by reading the statement, to tell the jury the contents of an FBI report, which was hearsay. It would have been permissible for defense counsel to lay the typical foundation by asking the witness whether he had made certain statements to an FBI agent, and if the witness denied doing so, to call the agent to contradict the witness.

Advisory Committee's Note

Subdivision (a). The Queen's Case, 2 Br. & B. 284, 129 Eng. Rep. 976 (1820) , laid down the requirement that a cross-examiner, prior to questioning the witness about his own prior statement in writing, must first show it to the witness. Abolished by statute in the country of its origin, the requirement nevertheless gained currency in the United States. The rule abolishes this useless impediment to cross-examination. Ladd, Some Observations on Credibility: Impeachment of Witnesses, 52 Cornell L.Q. 239, 246-47 (1967); McCormick § 28; 4 Wigmore §§ 1259-1260. Both oral and written statements are included.

The provision for disclosure to counsel is designed to protect against unwarranted insinuations that a statement has been made when the fact is to the contrary.

The rule does not defeat the application of Rule 1002 relating to production of the original when the contents of a writing are sought to be proved. Nor does it defeat the application of Rule 26(b)(3) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, as revised, entitling a person on request to a copy of his own statement, though the operation of the latter may be suspended temporarily.

Subdivision (b). The familiar foundation requirement that an impeaching statement first be shown to the witness before it can be proved by extrinsic evidence is preserved but with some modifications. See Ladd, Some Observations on Credibility: Impeachment of Witnesses, 52 Cornell L.Q. 239, 247 (1967). The traditional insistence that the attention of the witness be directed to the statement on cross-examination is relaxed in favor of simply providing the witness an opportunity to explain and the opposite party an opportunity to examine on the statement, with no specification of any particular time or sequence. Under this procedure, several collusive witnesses can be examined before disclosure of a joint prior inconsistent statement. See Comment to California Evidence Code § 770. Also, dangers of oversight are reduced. See McCormick § 37, p. 68.

In order to allow for such eventualities as the witness becoming unavailable by the time the statement is discovered, a measure of discretion is conferred upon the judge. Similar provisions are found in California Evidence Code § 770 and New Jersey Evidence Rule 22(b).

Under principles of expressio unius the rule does not apply to impeachment by evidence of prior inconsistent conduct. The use of inconsistent statements to impeach a hearsay declaration is treated in Rule 806.

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendments are technical. No substantive change is intended."]

[Following the 1987 amendments to Rule 608, the Supreme Court sent to Congress a technical amendment correcting capitalization, effective November 1, 1988.]

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 613, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Supp. to § 613.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Rule 613(a) -- Examining Witness Concerning Prior Statement [Go To Main]

[c.1] Party's Statement To Impeach Witness

Jones v. National Am. Univ., 608 F.3d 1039 (8th Cir. 2010) : The defendant in an age discrimination employment case had responded to the plaintiff's EEOC charge by asserting that she was not promoted because of deficient performance. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when that response was introduced to impeach testimony by members of the hiring committee that the plaintiff had not been promoted because of lack of relevant experience.

[d.1] Rule 613(a) -- Silence As Inconsistent Statement

Rahn v. Hawkins, 464 F.3d 813 (8th Cir. 2006) : In arrestee's civil rights action, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to preclude the plaintiff from asking a defendant about statements contrary to her testimony that were recorded in a commemorative booklet she received when she was awarded a commendation for her role in his arrest. The Court observed that "[i] she knew about the booklet's contents before accepting the award, but yet said nothing, the jury may infer that she has a tendency to dissemble," and while there was no evidence that she did know beforehand, the plaintiff should have been able to question her. Furthermore, if a reasonable person would have spoken up in the circumstances, the witness' silence could be treated as an adoption of the statements, which could then be used to impeach her inconsistent trial testimony.

[2] Rule 613(b) -- Extrinsic Evidence of Prior Inconsistent Statement of Witness [Go To Main]

[b] Rule 613(b) -- Collateral Matter

United States v. Catalan-Roman, 585 F.3d 453 (1st Cir. 2009) : Affirming convictions arising from a conspiracy to rob armored vehicles that resulted in the shooting death of an armored vehicle guard, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) when prior inconsistent statements about the robberies by the government's key eyewitness were excluded on the ground that they would constitute extrinsic evidence on a collateral matter. The Court noted that "the rule restricting impeachment to non-collateral matters is analogous to Rule 403's relevancy balancing test." In this case, the prior statements should have been admitted because some of the details the defendant sought to impeach as inconsistent plainly helped the government prove the premeditation that was an element of one of the counts. Other details were relevant to the jury's consideration of the death penalty. Moreover, many of the details to be impeached were brought out on direct examination by the government, and the government's own belief that the details were important "supports the non-collateral nature of the inconsistencies identified by Catalan."

United States v. Allen, 540 F.3d 821 (8th Cir. 2008) : The defendant was convicted of felon firearm possession after a loaded handgun was found under the front passenger seat of a car he was attempting to enter on the passenger side when he was arrested. At trial he called the driver of the car, who testified to borrowing the car from his father without permission and denied any knowledge of the gun's presence, and the driver's father, who testified that he had helped the defendant's girlfriend purchase the gun, had cleaned it, and had put it in the car "a few weeks" after the purchase. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when, after the defendant denied on cross-examination telling a detective that he had cleaned and wrapped the unloaded gun under the car seat four or five days after the purchase, the detective was permitted to testify regarding the defendant's statement to him. "[T]he evidence was material as it bore directly on the question of how the gun came to be in the car when Allen was arrested," the witness was provided an opportunity to explain or deny the earlier statement, and the defendant had an opportunity (which he did not take) to examine the witness thereon.

[c] Rule 613(b) -- Determination of Inconsistency

United States v. Richardson, 515 F.3d 74 (1st Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed cocaine and firearm convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a suppressed tape recording and a transcript of a telephone conversation with a paid government informant. The Court noted that "[t]he government generally may use otherwise inadmissible evidence in order to impeach a testifying criminal defendant," "[s]tatements ... need not be directly inconsistent in order to be deemed inconsistent," and "[i]t lies within the sound discretion of the district court to determine whether an inconsistency exists." Here, the Court found that the statements at issue were sufficiently at odds with trial testimony to be deemed inconsistent. In United States v. DeSimone, 488 F.3d 561 (1st Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed a tax fraud conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of hearsay statements about an alleged conversation offered to impeach a witness' testimony. The witness never denied that the conversation took place, but rather stated that he did not recall it, which was not implausible given the five-year lapse between the conversation and the trial testimony.

[c.1] Extrinsic Evidence of Inconsistent Statement

United States v. Watkins, 591 F.3d 780 (5th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, holding that a rental application in which the defendant listed a present member of the conspiracy as his landlord was properly admitted to impeach his trial testimony denying that an alleged member of the conspiracy was his landlord. "It is well established that after a witness denies making a statement during cross-examination, evidence may be introduced to prove the statement was made."

[e] Rule 613(b) -- Need for Extrinsic Evidence

United States v. La Vallee, 439 F.3d 670 (10th Cir. 2006) : Affirming convictions of former prison guards for deprivation of inmates' rights, the Court held that when a witness admitted during her testimony that she had made an inconsistent statement, it was no abuse of discretion to preclude a third party from testifying to the same inconsistent statement.

[g] Rule 613(b) -- Omission As Inconsistent Statement

United States v. Catalan-Roman, 585 F.3d 453 (1st Cir. 2009) : Affirming convictions arising from a conspiracy to rob armored vehicles that resulted in the shooting death of an armored vehicle guard, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion when the defendant was prevented from impeaching the key government eyewitness with the fact that when he was interviewed by the FBI he failed to mention details about the shooting of the guard about which he testified at trial. The Judge had reasoned that the failure to mention the details could be explained by the facts that the eyewitness was injured and in the hospital when interviewed, he had taken pain medication, the interview was short, and it was unclear what type of questions the FBI asked. The Court held that the details of the trial testimony were important. For example, although the witness testified that the victim had cried out for his life, he had not mentioned that in the initial interview. The Court concluded that the jury rather than the Judge should have determined whether omissions in the FBI interview were inconsistent with the trial testimony.

[h] Rule 613(b) -- Opportunity To Explain or Deny

[ii] Rule 613(b) -- Opportunity To Explain or Deny -- Requirement in General

United States v. Allen, 540 F.3d 821 (8th Cir. 2008) : The defendant was convicted of felon firearm possession after a loaded handgun was found under the front passenger seat of a car he was attempting to enter on the passenger side when he was arrested. At trial he called the driver of the car, who testified to borrowing the car from his father without permission and denied any knowledge of the gun's presence, and the driver's father, who testified that he had helped the defendant's girlfriend purchase the gun, had cleaned it, and had put it in the car "a few weeks" after the purchase. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when, after the defendant denied on cross-examination telling a detective that he had cleaned and wrapped the unloaded gun under the car seat four or five days after the purchase, the detective was permitted to testify regarding the defendant's statement to him. "[T]he evidence was material as it bore directly on the question of how the gun came to be in the car when Allen was arrested," the witness was provided an opportunity to explain or deny the earlier statement, and the defendant had an opportunity (which he did not take) to examine the witness thereon. In United States v. Hyles, 479 F.3d 958 (8th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed a murder-for-hire conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when the defense was not permitted to introduce prior statements to impeach a witness. The witness was no longer in the courtroom when the prior statements were offered; while she was still under subpoena, the Trial Court stated that it would deny a request to bring her back because the evidence would be cumulative, given that she "had already proven herself untrustworthy."

[j] Rule 613(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules

[i] Rule 613(b) -- Hearsay Rules

United States v. Eagle, 498 F.3d 885 (8th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for involuntary manslaughter in Indian country, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude as hearsay extrinsic evidence of prior inconsistent statements that two government witnesses denied making. The evidence was not hearsay because it was offered only to show an inconsistency, not to establish the truth of the statements.

[ii] Rule 613(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 403

United States v. Eagle, 498 F.3d 885 (8th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for involuntary manslaughter in Indian country, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude as hearsay extrinsic evidence of prior inconsistent statements that two government witnesses denied making. The Court found that a proper foundation had been laid, and there was no basis for concluding that the probative value of the impeachment evidence was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice.

[iii] Rule 613(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 608(b)

United States v. Neighbors, 590 F.3d 485 (7th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for cocaine offenses, the defense asked a cooperating witness if he "ever told anyone that you have either lied in this particular case or intended to lie in this particular case?" When the witness responded negatively, the defense sought unsuccessfully to introduce letters in which the witness said, "I did lie on that Haitian N." Affirming, the Court held that the letters were governed by Rule 608(b), not Rule 613, because their probative value came from the underlying lie, not the contradiction between testimony at trial and the content of the letters. As such, the letters were extrinsic evidence inadmissible under Rule 608(b).

[l] Rule 613(b) -- Silence as Inconsistent Statement

United States v. Useni, 516 F.3d 634 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for gambling and racketeering offenses, the Court found somewhat "problematic" the exclusion of testimony by an FBI agent called to contradict a government witness who claimed that he mentioned to the agent during an interview the defendant's demand for a cash payment. The exclusion of the agent left the witness's testimony "unrebutted on the record," but any error was harmless. The Court also found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by another FBI agent called to testify that a government witness did not mention a demand for cash payment by the defendant when interviewed by the agent. The Court found that the witness admitted that the demand was not mentioned in the interview, so that the agent would not contradict the witness, and that the agent's proposed testimony actually tended to explain why it would not have been natural for the subject of the demand to have come up during the interview. In short, the agent would not have contributed to the defendant's attempt to impeach the witness by showing an omission in the FBI interview.

[n] Rule 613(b) -- Third Person's Notes of Prior Statement

United States v. De La Cruz Suarez, 601 F.3d 1202 (11th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to commit alien smuggling, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a statement offered by a defendant as a prior inconsistent statement of a government witness. An FBI agent recorded in a summary of her interview with the witness that he said the captains of the boat he was on noticed the boat was sitting low in the water and were concerned but no one wanted to exit the boat. The witness on cross-examination testified that he did not know anything about overcrowding on the boat. The Court observed that the report was a summary of the agent's version of the interview and was not an inconsistent statement of the witness.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 614 RULE 614

1-614 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 614.02

614.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Basic Rule

This Rule concerns the Trial Court's authority to call and examine witnesses. It provides that the Judge may call witnesses sua sponte or at the suggestion of any party. It also provides that if the Judge does call a witness, all parties are entitled to cross-examine the witness. Subdivision (b) makes clear that the Judge is authorized to interrogate any witness, regardless of whether the witness is called by the Judge or by a party. n1

It may be wondered why a Judge would ever have to call a witness. We think that there are some limited situations in which such a practice could be appropriate. For example, a witness may have relevant information, and yet neither side might want to be viewed as having sponsored the witness. n2 This could be true even though there is no longer a voucher rule, because despite Rule 607 a party may be concerned that the jury will associate witnesses with the calling party. A party may need testimony from a certain witness and yet may want to keep some distance from that witness. We think that judicial intervention might be appropriate in these limited circumstances because it would further the search for truth and protect the parties from prejudice. Ordinarily, however, the Judge would not act sua sponte in this situation, but only at the request of one of the parties. n3

Another possibility, though remote, is that the Trial Judge might determine that the parties have not fashioned the case in a way that reaches the truth and avoids jury confusion. Rule 614 can be used by the Judge sua sponte to avoid being confined within the case as made by the parties. n4 Of course, respect to counsel and the adversary system counsels that the Judge almost always defer to the parties' presentation of the case. The Rule 614 power to call witnesses sua sponte should therefore be rarely invoked and, we would add, only after consulting with counsel and providing them an opportunity to call the witness and to prepare for the witness' testimony.

The Trial Judge has a separate authority under Rule 706 to call expert witnesses. See § 706.02 for further discussion of that Rule.

[2] Objections

Subdivision (c) of Rule 614 provides an exception to the normal requirement that objections must be made at the earliest possible time. An objecting party is given an option. Counsel either may object immediately to the calling of witnesses by the Court or to the manner in which the Judge interrogates any witness, or counsel may object at the next available opportunity when the jury is not present. n5 This option exists so that counsel will not refrain from objecting for fear that the jury will interpret an objection to the Judge's action as posing a conflict between the attorney and the Judge. This is similar to the policy discussed with respect to testimony by jurors in the Editorial Explanatory Comment accompanying Rule 606, § 606.02[1].

However, it is clear that a timely objection, as defined in the Rule, is required to preserve any claim of error for appeal. n6 The failure to object in the time prescribed by the Rule deprives the Judge of an opportunity to attempt to rectify any error through an appropriate limiting instruction. n7

[3] Jury Instructions

Just as the Judge is not permitted to become an advocate in summing up the evidence and commenting to the jury, the Judge is not permitted to become an advocate with respect to calling and interrogating witnesses. This line between developing the truth and advocacy is a fine one indeed.

To avoid the possibility that a witness will be considered by the jury to be the Judge's witness and that the weight of the witnesses' testimony will be unduly enhanced, the Trial Judge should instruct the jury that by calling a witness the Court suggests nothing about credibility, and that the Court's witness is to be assessed by the jury like all other witnesses. The Advisory Committee commented upon "[t]he tendency of juries to associate a witness with the party calling him, regardless of technical aspects of vouching... ." An identical tendency may exist when the Court calls a witness. The suggested instruction is mildly burdensome, but provides at least some insurance against prejudice. n8

It is also necessary to instruct the jury properly when the Judge questions witnesses called by one of the parties. The risk here is not that the witness will be associated with the Judge, but rather that the questions asked may indicate that the Judge favors one side over the other. n9 A "model charge" to the jury after judicial intervention with witnesses was crafted by the Court in Moore v. United States, 598 F.2d 439, 443 n.2 (5th Cir. 1979) :

> You are the sole judges of the facts in the case, the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses. If the Court should express or you even think has intimated any opinion with respect to the facts in this case, you are not bound by it. I particularly point out to you that by questioning witnesses to bring out facts not brought out by the lawyers, the Court is endeavoring only to see that all of the facts are brought out for your consideration so that you can perform what is your sole task of deciding the facts. By asking questions the Court does not in any way intimate any opinion with respect to the facts in the case. n10

[4] Dangers of Judicial Involvement With Witnesses

The power to interrogate witnesses is widely recognized and plainly provided for in Rule 614. The exercise of this power is sometimes appropriate, especially in complex cases where judicial intervention may be necessary to protect against jury confusion. n11 Also, a question from the Trial Judge may be necessary to clarify the witness's testimony. n12 Finally, the Trial Judge understandably should have somewhat more latitude to question witnesses in a bench trial--so long as there is no indication from this questioning that the Judge has predetermined the case. n13

We would caution, however, that the Trial Judge who becomes too active at a jury trial may threaten the impartiality of the jury and undermine the legitimate efforts of counsel working in an adversary system. n14 At a minimum, the Trial Judge must avoid bolstering or attacking the credibility of witnesses, n15 and must refrain from interjecting information without support in the evidence. n16 As the Court stated in United States v. Bland, 697 F.2d 262 (8th Cir. 1983) , a case in which the Court reversed convictions because the Trial Judge's questioning was not neutral:

> A judge's slightest indication that he favors the government's case can have an immeasurable effect upon a jury. A trial judge should seldom intervene in the questioning of a witness and then only to clarify isolated testimony. n17

There are alternatives to the Court's calling witnesses and interrogating them. One obvious alternative is to confer with counsel in advance and to suggest some questions that could be asked and some witnesses that could be called. These and other solutions are explored at length in Saltzburg, The Unnecessarily Expanding Role of the American Trial Judge, 64 Va. L. Rev. 1 (1978).

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., United States v. Gonzalez-Torres, 980 F.2d 788 (1st Cir. 1992) (no plain error in direct, specific questions by the Trial Judge to clarify the defendant's testimony, where the Judge's impartiality remained intact throughout); United States v. Seeright, 978 F.2d 842 (4th Cir. 1992) (no abuse of discretion where the Trial Judge questioned the defendant; the questioning was neither hostile nor disbelieving and was consistent with the questioning of other witnesses; the defendant was not interrupted nor badgered; and the jury was properly advised to draw no inferences therefrom and that only it could determine credibility).

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Leslie, 542 F.2d 285 (5th Cir. 1976) ("Given the asserted likelihood that [the witnesses] would testify adversely to the government, leading to the inevitable government attempt to impeach, the court could properly protect the prosecution from whatever tendency the jury might have had to associate the witnesses with the calling party.").

(n3)Footnote 3. Moreover, the Judge must remain aware of the possibility that the witness's testimony may be given unwarranted weight by the jury because the witness was called by the Court rather than by the parties. A jury instruction should be given to prevent this possibility. See the discussion in § 614.02[3].

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., Cunningham v. Housing Auth., 764 F.2d 1097 (5th Cir. 1985) (no error to order parties to depose a witness, where the Trial Judge justifiably determined that the parties had not properly fashioned the case).

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., United States v. Evans, 994 F.2d 317 (7th Cir. 1993) (the defendant properly preserved error as to the Trial Judge's prejudicially interrogating the defendant in a skeptical tone, by making the objection the next day as the first order of business after completion of the defendant's testimony).

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., United States v. Kwiat, 817 F.2d 440 (7th Cir. 1987) (Rule 614 allows objections to be postponed until the jury is not present, but it does not excuse the failure to object at all). See also United States v. Billups, 692 F.2d 320 (4th Cir. 1982) (a claim of error was not preserved where counsel waited until the end of several days of the witness' testimony before objecting to the Trial Judge's questions).

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., United States v. Vega, 589 F.2d 1147 (2d Cir. 1978) (the right to complain on appeal about the Trial Judge's questions was waived by counsel's failure to object either immediately or at the first opportunity outside the jury's presence; the Court rejected the argument that counsel should be entirely excused from objecting because of "timidity or fear of antagonizing the judge" and relied upon the explicit language of Rule 614(c)).

(n8)Footnote 8. See, e.g., United States v. Karnes, 531 F.2d 214 (4th Cir. 1976) (impartiality was destroyed when the Judge called witnesses essential to the prosecution's case without explanation or instruction to the jury).

(n9)Footnote 9. See, e.g., United States v. Tilghman, 134 F.3d 414 (D.C. Cir. 1998) (conviction reversed because the Judge's repeated questions to the defendant-witness could have indicated to the jury that he disbelieved the defendant); United States v. Saenz, 134 F.3d 697 (5th Cir. 1998) (conviction reversed because the Judge's questioning of the chief prosecution witness and of the defendant could have led the jury to believe that the Judge favored the government's case).

(n10)Footnote 10. See also United States v. Green, 293 F.3d 886 (5th Cir. 2002) (judicial questioning was not error where the Trial Court properly instructed the jury to give no special weight to questioning by the Court); Van Leirsburg v. Sioux Valley Hospital, 831 F.2d 169 (8th Cir. 1987) (Trial Judge properly instructed the jury not to consider the Court's comments as evidence or as any indication of the Court's view of the facts).

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Green, 544 F.2d 138 (3d Cir. 1976) (in a complex case the Judge may question witnesses to a greater extent than in a simple case); United States v. Parodi, 703 F.2d 768 (4th Cir. 1983) (the Court rejected complaints that the Trial Judge had impermissibly interjected himself into the examination of witnesses; the Court reasoned that in complicated cases with many defendants the Judge may make a special effort to see that evidence is understood by the jury, but also cautioned that Trial Judges should take care never to indicate to the jury an opinion that the defendant is guilty). See also United States v. Castner, 50 F.3d 1267 (4th Cir. 1995) (it was permissible for the Court to question witnesses where the evidence was "highly complex, involving the intricacies of accounting principles, business management, and government contracting"; the Trial Court's intervention "clarified the testimony and focused the jury's attention on the critical issues in a highly complicated case").

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., United States v. Henry, 136 F.3d 12 (1st Cir. 1998) (Trial Judge's limited questioning was a proper effort to clarify the testimony in a complex case); United States v. Dreamer, 88 F.3d 655 (8th Cir. 1996) (in an arson case, there was no error in the Trial Court's questioning of a witness, where the witness had made several conflicting statements about whether she had seen the defendant outside the house on the night of the fire; a Trial Judge is permitted to clarify the testimony of a witness in order to avoid any misunderstanding of the testimony by the jury; in this case, the Trial Judge simply attempted to determine which of the witness' contradictory statements was the truth); United States v. Orr, 68 F.3d 1247 (10th Cir. 1995) (in a trial for bank fraud arising out of a check kiting scheme, there was no plain error in the Trial Court's brief questioning of three prosecution witnesses; the questions were permissible attempts "to clarify the somewhat complicated testimony about how the bank transactions were structured"); United States v. Seeright, 978 F.2d 842 (4th Cir. 1992) (questions were permissible where they "helped the jury focus" and where the Judge did not assume the role of an advocate); Ross v. Black & Decker, Inc., 977 F.2d 1178 (7th Cir. 1992) (the Trial Judge "need not sit on the bench like a mummy when his intervention would serve to clarify an issue").

(n13)Footnote 13. See, e.g., Cranberg v. Consumers Union of U.S., Inc., 756 F.2d 382 (5th Cir. 1985) (noting that the Judge has greater latitude to participate in a bench trial than a jury trial, and also noting that "[w]hen a pro se litigant ... goes to trial against a party represented by a member of the bar, the responsibility of the trial judge may warrant participation which differs markedly from what would be appropriate to a trial between adversaries represented by counsel").

(n14)Footnote 14. See United States v. Morgan, 376 F.3d 1002 (9th Cir. 2004) (Trial Court erred in questioning witnesses where the question went beyond clarifying the evidence and was "inappropriately extensive and suggestive of the court's own conclusion about [the defendant's] credibility."

(n15)Footnote 15. See, e.g., Rivas v. Brattesani, 94 F.3d 802 (2d Cir. 1996) (a judgment for the plaintiff in an excessive force case was reversed, where questions by the Trial Judge to two defense witnesses "conveyed to the jury the impression that [the Judge] held a fixed and unfavorable opinion of defendants, their counsel, and their position"; one question implied that the defendants' expert witness, a medical examiner, conducted autopsies without ever examining the body; another question implied that the memo book of one of the defendant police officers was a fraud that he made up at the end of every day; the cumulative impact of these prejudicial comments could not be cured by a limiting instruction, especially as the case rested largely on a credibility determination between the plaintiff's account and that of the defendants). See also United States v. Victoria, 837 F.2d 50 (2d Cir. 1988) (finding reversible error where the Trial Judge asked questions of the defendants "in the nature of cross-examination" that challenged their credibility: "it seems to be clear error for a trial judge to ask questions bearing on the credibility of a defendant-witness prior to the completion of the direct examination").

(n16)Footnote 16. See, e.g., United States v. Gastiaburo, 16 F.3d 582 (4th Cir. 1994) (the Trial Judge probably overstepped the bounds of proper judicial interrogation when he asked the defendant's witness whether he had ever been convicted of a felony, without any evidence in the record to support a good faith belief that this was so; but the defendant made no objection at any point and this did not rise to the level of plain error). When a Judge in questioning witnesses refers to inadmissible evidence, there is a strong argument that Rule 605 is violated as well as Rule 614.

(n17)Footnote 17. See also United States v. Beaty, 722 F.2d 1090 (3d Cir. 1983) (finding reversible error where the Trial Judge's "vigorous participation" conveyed his skepticism about the defendant's alibi and where his questioning of the defendant's key witness was not an attempt to clarify her testimony but was rather "a frontal attack on her credibility").

1-614 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 614.03

614.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Rule 614(a) -- Calling by Court

[a] Rule 614(a) -- Duty To Call Witnesses

McNeil v. Lowney, 831 F.2d 1368 (7th Cir. 1987) : In an action by an inmate who claimed that he was denied adequate medical care, the Court held that the Trial Judge did not err in failing to call witnesses on his own motion, since the plaintiff had adequate access to information from various sources.

[b] Rule 614(a) -- Error To Call Witnesses

United States v. Karnes, 531 F.2d 214 (4th Cir. 1976) : Reversing a conviction for knowingly concealing a stolen motor vehicle, the Court cited Rule 614 (which was not in effect at the time of trial) for the general proposition that the Trial Judge may call and question witnesses, but held that the required impartiality was destroyed when the Judge called witnesses essential to the prosecution's case without explanation or instruction to the jury. One Judge labeled the error a violation of due process, another called it an error of federal criminal procedure, and the third dissented, emphasizing the Judge's responsibility to society and the public to reach the truth.

[c] Rule 614(a) -- Judicially Ordered Depositions

Cunningham v. Housing Authority, 764 F.2d 1097 (5th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the housing authority in a suit alleging sex discrimination in employment. It found that Rule 614 authorized the Trial Judge to order the parties to take the deposition of a witness after the case had been taken under submission.

[d] Rule 614(a) -- Permissible To Call Witnesses

United States v. Agajanian, 852 F.2d 56 (2d Cir. 1988) : The Court held that a Trial Judge may call a witness and permit the parties to cross-examine without the Judge's first having conducted a direct examination.

United States v. Leslie, 542 F.2d 285 (5th Cir. 1976) : When the defendant and three accomplices were arrested for transporting and dealing in stolen cars, the statements of the others implicated the defendant as the "ring leader." Believing that at least one of the three would change his version of the events at trial, the government asked the Trial Judge to call the witnesses. The Court upheld the procedure, stating that "given the asserted likelihood that [the three] would testify adversely to the government, leading to the inevitable government attempt to impeach, the court could properly protect the prosecution from whatever tendency the jury might have had to associate the witnesses with the calling party."

[e] Rule 614(a) -- Relationship to Rule 706

Holland v. Commissioner, 835 F.2d 675 (6th Cir. 1987) : The Court found no error in a Tax Court Judge's suggesting at trial that the government produce an expert to testify to the authenticity of signatures on documents. Although the taxpayer complained that the Judge had not complied with Rule 706, the Court held that there was substantial compliance with Rule 614.

[2] Rule 614(b) -- Interrogation by Court

[a] Rule 614(b) -- Bench Trials

Crandell v. United States, 703 F.2d 74 (4th Cir. 1983) : The Court reversed a judgment for the United States in a medical malpractice action tried to the bench. It found that the Trial Judge erred in preventing effective cross-examination of government witnesses, made comments concerning the plaintiffs' failure to settle the case that were not in the tradition of a fair, impartial presiding Judge, and even more clearly erred by interfering with the plaintiffs' expert witness.

[b] Rule 614(b) -- Clarifying Questions

Stevenson v. District of Columbia Metro. Police Dep't, 248 F.3d 1187 (D.C. Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in an arrestee's § 1983 action, the Court found no error when the Trial Judge asked a hypothetical question of a defense expert witness. The Judge gave the plaintiff's requested instruction that the jury was not to treat the Judge's assumed facts either as the Judge's opinion of the facts or as the facts of the case, and also provided the plaintiff with the opportunity (which he did not use) to ask the expert a hypothetical using his version of the facts.

United States v. Rosario-Peralta, 199 F.3d 552 (1st Cir. 1999) : In a narcotics case involving interdiction of a vessel on the high seas, the Court found no error in the Trial Judge's interruptive questioning of a defense expert. The expert's testimony was confusing in that it included numerous maritime calculations, and the Judge's questions helped to clarify this testimony. The Court noted that the Judge asked "short, even-handed clarifying questions, albeit frequent ones," and also asked questions of government witnesses who testified on the same subject matter. In United States v. Henry, 136 F.3d 12 (1st Cir. 1998) , the Court affirmed convictions for dumping hazardous waste, mail fraud, and wire fraud, finding no error in the Trial Judge's questioning of a regulatory inspector who testified as a government witness. The case involved complex questions concerning toxicity and reporting requirements, and the Trial Judge's limited questioning was a proper effort to clarify the testimony that fell "squarely within the scope of the district judge's right and responsibility to manage the progress of the trial."

United States v. Messina, 131 F.3d 36 (2d Cir. 1997) : Affirming a conviction for extortion, the Court found no plain error in the Trial Judge's questioning of the defendant on three separate occasions at trial. The first set of questions amounted to nothing more than a clarification of an apparent inconsistency in the defendant's testimony. The second set of questions challenged one of the defendant's assertions of fact, but the Judge subsequently explained to the jury that he and not the defendant had been incorrect on the facts. The third set of questions was more troubling, since the Judge questioned the motivation of the defendant in destroying documents. However, the Court found no plain error, given the fact that the questioning lasted only a few minutes in a five-week trial; moreover, there was nothing in the record to indicate that the Trial Judge "displayed any antipathy toward Messina's testimony that went beyond judicial skepticism."

United States v. Reyes, 227 F.3d 263 (5th Cir. 2000) : Affirming convictions for possession of marijuana with intent to distribute, the Court noted that the Trial Judge's questioning had gone beyond mere clarification into the realm of advancing a theory of the case compatible with the prosecution, but held that the prejudicial effect was not so pervasive as to deprive the defendants, who had not made timely objections, of their constitutional rights. In United States v. Mizell, 88 F.3d 288 (5th Cir. 1996) , the defendant contended that the Trial Judge's interrogation of her expert witness in a robbery trial amounted to a comment on the weight of the evidence and violated her due process rights. The defendant did not object at trial, however -- either at the time or at the next available opportunity when the jury was not present, as provided by Rule 614 -- so the Court reviewed for plain error. There was no plain error, because the Judge's questions were in the nature of clarification -- for example, clarifying that the expert had no personal knowledge about certain matters but was relying exclusively on what the defendant had told him.

United States v. Dreamer, 88 F.3d 655 (8th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a conviction for setting fire to a house, the Court found no error in the Trial Judge's questioning of a witness. The witness had made several conflicting statements about whether she had seen the defendant outside the house on the night of the fire. The Court concluded that a Trial Judge is permitted to clarify the testimony of a witness, in order to avoid any misunderstanding of the testimony by the jury. In this case, the Judge simply attempted to determine which of the witness' contradictory statements was the truth.

[c] Rule 614(b) -- Complex Cases

United States v. Green, 544 F.2d 138 (3d Cir. 1976) : Affirming a conviction for air piracy, the Court upheld the Trial Judge's conduct in interrogating witnesses. It stated that in a complex case the Judge may question to a greater extent than in a simple case.

United States v. Castner, 50 F.3d 1267 (4th Cir. 1995) : Affirming convictions for defrauding the government, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the Trial Judge's questioning of a defendant and defense witnesses. The Court noted that the evidence was "highly complex, involving the intricacies of accounting principles, business management, and government contracting." The Court also observed that the Judge interrupted and interrogated both government and defense witnesses. It concluded that the Judge's intervention "clarified the testimony and focused the jury's attention on the critical issues in a highly complicated case." In United States v. Parodi, n1 a narcotics conspiracy case, the Court rejected complaints that the Trial Judge had impermissibly interjected himself into the examination of witnesses. The Court reasoned that in complicated cases with many defendants the Judge may make a special effort to see that evidence is understood by the jury, but also cautioned that Trial Judges should take care never to indicate to the jury an opinion that the defendant is guilty. The Court concluded that two questions by the Trial Judge to a witness concerning an immunity grant and the impact on State Court proceedings of the witness' testimony in the instant case would have been better asked by the government, but it also concluded that the questioning by the Judge did not deny a fair trial.

United States v. Orr, 68 F.3d 1247 (10th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a conviction for bank fraud arising out of a check kiting scheme, the Court found no plain error in the Trial Judge's brief questioning of three prosecution witnesses. While the responses to the questions may have negatively affected the defense, the questions were permissible attempts "to clarify the somewhat complicated testimony about how the bank transactions were structured."

[d] Rule 614(b) -- Discretion of Trial Judge

[i] Rule 614(b) -- Civil Cases

Rivera-Torres v. Ortiz Velez, 341 F.3d 86 (1st Cir. 2003) : In an action alleging employment discrimination motivated by political animus, the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, finding no reversible error in the Judge's questioning of a witness, which "[o]n the cold record before us," suggested some skepticism about the witness' testimony. Although ideally the Judge should have avoided this suggestion, the Court concluded that, given the brevity of the exchange and the mild nature of the questioning, the Judge's interjections did not result in "serious prejudice," especially because a careful cautionary instruction was given.

Johnson v. Celotex Corp., 899 F.2d 1281 (2d Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a product liability action, noting that the Judge properly asked questions of the plaintiff, described as a man of few words, to aid the understanding of the jury.

Mosco v. Baltimore & Ohio R.R., 817 F.2d 1088 (4th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the railroad in a FELA case, finding that the Trial Judge did not err in asking questions to clarify testimony.

Van Leirsburg v. Sioux Valley Hosp., 831 F.2d 169 (8th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that a Trial Judge's questioning of a witness in a medical malpractice case was permissible to clarify testimony and was not excessive judicial intervention. See also Hale v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. n2(questioning of an expert witness to clarify testimony was permissible).

Shad v. Dean Witter Reynolds, Inc., 799 F.2d 525 (9th Cir. 1986) : In an opinion reversing convictions for "churning" stock accounts on another ground, the Court held that the Trial Judge did not improperly question witnesses or criticize counsel. It observed that many of the Judge's questions clarified either questions or answers and that criticism of counsel's preparedness did not impugn his integrity or the merit of the case.

Rasmussen Drilling, Inc. v. Kerr-McGee Nuclear Corp., 571 F.2d 1144 (10th Cir. 1978) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in a quiet title and ejectment action involving lode-mining claims, the Court stated: "A trial judge is allowed to participate in a trial and ask questions, including leading questions, of a witness in order to ascertain the facts in the search for the truth." However, in Lane v. Wallace, n3 a physician malpractice action, the Court cautioned that "[e]ver increasing litigation places intolerable burdens on federal judges with resulting irritation and impatience. Heavy as they are the judiciary must bear these burdens... . [A] judge should not talk too much."

[ii] Rule 614(b) -- Discretion of Trial Judge -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Gonzalez-Torres, 980 F.2d 788 (1st Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed cocaine importation convictions, holding there was no plain error in direct, specific questions by the Trial Judge to clarify the defendant's testimony, where the Judge's impartiality remained intact throughout.

United States v. DiTommaso, 817 F.2d 201 (2d Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed drug trafficking and money laundering convictions, holding that the Trial Judge did not err in asking questions in order to clarify testimony.

United States v. Seeright, 978 F.2d 842 (4th Cir. 1992) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in the Trial Judge's questioning of the defendant, where it was neither hostile nor disbelieving and was consistent with the questioning of other witnesses, the defendant was not interrupted nor badgered, and the jury was properly advised to draw no inferences therefrom and that only it could determine credibility. In United States v. Norris, n4 the Court indicated that it is permissible for the Trial Judge to clarify testimony by asking questions.

United States v. Sanchez, 325 F.3d 600 (5th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a conviction for making false statements in connection with a Small Business Administration loan, the Court found no plain error in the Trial Judge's comments and questions to witnesses. While the Judge's comments and questions during cross-examination of government witnesses might on occasion "have been inadvisable," they did not impair cross-examination by the defense. Although the information elicited "clearly helped the government," "[w]hen viewed in totality, the court's questioning of witnesses, comments on the evidence, and evidentiary rulings do not amount to a quantitatively and qualitatively substantial intervention that could have led the jury to a predisposition of guilt by improperly confusing the functions of judge and prosecutor." In United States v. Green, 293 F.3d 886 (5th Cir. 2002) , a cocaine trafficking prosecution, one defense witness testified that he was the manager of a band in which the defendant played, and given his closeness to the defendant, it was impossible for the defendant to have traded drugs without the witness knowing. Before the witness left the stand, the Judge asked him a series of questions which elicited the fact that he did not report cash payments to the band as income. Although the Court noted that a Trial Judge "must be careful not to express a bias or to confuse the roles of the judge and prosecutor," it found no plain error, since the Judge properly instructed the jury regarding judicial questions and the questioning "was negligible, with no cumulative effect." In Moore v. United States, n5 the Court upheld a conviction for possession of nontax-paid whiskey, rejecting the defendant's argument that the Trial Judge acted improperly in putting 105 questions to him, after he answered 41 questions on direct examination and 66 questions on cross-examination. The Court indicated that the Trial Judge's questions were fair and were within his common-law prerogatives. In United States v. Adkins, n6 the Court concluded that a Trial Judge's questioning of witnesses and interruption of counsel did not evince bias, although it found some comments by the Trial Judge to have been improper.

United States v. Smith, 831 F.2d 657 (6th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that a Trial Judge may question witnesses in order to clarify their testimony. In United States v. Slone, n7 the Court affirmed marijuana-related convictions, finding that the Trial Judge's questions were attempts to clarify testimony and did not cast the Judge in an improper role. In United States v. Tilton, n8 the Court affirmed an armed robbery conviction, although it expressed concern that the Trial Judge's "questioning of the witnesses went beyond that generally expected of one who is to take on the role of a neutral arbitrator." It declined to reverse the conviction, however, as the conduct appeared to affect both the government and the defendant.

United States v. Simpson, 337 F.3d 905 (7th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed drug distribution conspiracy convictions, finding an abuse of discretion, but harmless error, in the Trial Judge's interrupting defense counsel 12 times during the trial. None of the Judge's remarks when interrupting a witness' testimony, admonishing counsel not to ask questions that had already been asked and answered, and requesting a sidebar "[gave] rise to any suggestion of bias but rather were clearly designed to 'make the interrogation and presentation effective for the ascertainment of truth [and to] avoid a needless consumption of time.' Rule 611(a)." In a bank robbery case, United States v. Martin, 189 F.3d 547 (7th Cir. 1999) , the defendant asserted that he was financially secure and had no motive to rob. On cross-examination about the apparent contradiction between that assertion and his claim of indigence when applying for a CJA attorney, the defendant's answers were somewhat ambiguous and contradictory. The Trial Judge questioned him further on some of the points raised in the cross-examination, and the defendant moved for a mistrial. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in denying the mistrial motion. Although the Judge's stated purpose for questioning the defendant--to assure that he was truly indigent and the CJA program was being run efficiently--was not a concern of the jury, so that part of the questioning should have been out of their presence, the interrogation also helped to clarify the defendant's financial condition for the jury. The Judge's questioning did not convey his thoughts about the defendant's honesty or dishonesty. In United States v. Evans, n9 the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, holding that the defendant properly preserved a claim of error as to the Trial Judge's prejudicially interrogating the defendant in a skeptical tone, by making the objection the next day as the first order of business after completion of the defendant's testimony. There was no error in denying the defendant's motion for a mistrial, as the Judge limited his intrusion by asking questions only after both parties had completed their examinations, and had instructed the jury not to assume from his questions that he held any opinion and to disregard all his comments in making their findings of fact. In United States v. Gill, n10 the Court held that the Trial Judge's questioning of witnesses in a wire fraud case was not improper where the questions were quite limited and were aimed solely at prosecution witnesses, and neither the questions nor the Judge's limited intervention implied a bias against the defendant. In United States v. Kwiat, n11 a bank fraud prosecution, the Court held that the Trial Judge did not deny a fair trial in asking 60 questions during eight days of trial or in showing asperity in front of the jury no more than five times. The Court suggested that counsel who believe that the Trial Judge is acting unfairly should so indicate during the trial, stating that it "will not presume that district judges are so thin-skinned and vindictive that counsel should be allowed to bypass the most immediate way of dealing with their grievances about the conduct of the trial--requests to the presiding officer."

United States v. Jerde, 841 F.2d 818 (8th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that a Trial Judge's questioning of a witness in a tax prosecution was permissible to clarify testimony and was not excessive judicial intervention. In United States v. Cooper, n12 the Court held that the Trial Judge acted properly in asking questions at trial to clarify the testimony of the defendant, saying that it is the Trial Judge's duty to clarify the testimony of a witness in order to avoid any misunderstanding of the testimony by the jury.

United States v. Parker, 241 F.3d 1114 (9th Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions arising from an armed bank robbery conspiracy, the Court held that despite the Trial Judge's substantial participation in the proceedings, the defendant was not deprived of a fair trial. There was no indication that the Judge was actually biased or projected the appearance of advocacy or partiality, and the jury members were instructed that they were the judges of the facts and should not infer any opinion from the Judge's questioning. "The mere fact that a judge's participation in a trial is substantial or even 'extreme' does not ipso facto deprive a defendant of a fair trial." In United States v. Bradshaw, n13 the Court found, in the course of affirming a kidnapping conviction, that the Trial Judge had not acted improperly in questioning a government witness. "Although a trial judge may question witnesses to clarify and develop facts, he must never prejudice the defendant by assuming a partisan stance." The Judge's questions had been fair and he properly instructed the jury that nothing he said was meant to suggest what verdict it should return.

United States v. Block, 755 F.2d 770 (11th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed convictions arising out of a fraudulent loan scheme, finding that the Trial Judge had not improperly interjected himself into the case. The Court observed, however, that "a trial judge improperly interjects himself into the trial by questioning witnesses when the attorneys are competently conducting their cases."

[e] Rule 614(b) -- Improper Questioning

United States v. Tilghman, 134 F.3d 414 (D.C. Cir. 1998) : The Court reversed a conviction for making false statements on a government form because the Judge's repeated questions to the defendant could have telegraphed to the jury that he disbelieved the defendant, in a case where the defense rested heavily on the defendant's personal credibility.

Rivas v. Brattesani, 94 F.3d 802 (2d Cir. 1996) : The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in an excessive force case, finding that questions by the Trial Judge to two defense witnesses "conveyed to the jury the impression that [the Judge] held a fixed and unfavorable opinion of defendants, their counsel, and their position." One question implied that the defendants' expert witness, a medical examiner, conducted autopsies without ever examining the body. Another question implied that the memo book of one of the defendant police officers was a fraud that he made up at the end of every day. The Court found that the cumulative impact of these prejudicial comments could not be cured by a limiting instruction, especially since the case rested largely on a credibility determination between the plaintiff's account and that of the defendants. In United States v. Filani, 74 F.3d 378 (2d Cir. 1996) , the Court reversed a conviction for importing heroin because numerous instances of the Trial Judge's intrusive questioning unfairly prejudiced the defendant. In United States v. Manko, n14 the Court expressed great concern that questioning by the Trial Judge explicitly and repeatedly endorsing the government's view of a witness' role in a tax fraud scheme was a breach of impartiality, but held that the Judge's conduct did not deprive the defendants of a fair trial. In United States v. Victoria, n15 the Court reversed convictions on cocaine charges, finding that the Trial Judge asked questions of the defendants "in the nature of cross-examination" that challenged their credibility. The Court wrote that "it seems to be clear error for a trial judge to ask questions bearing on the credibility of a defendant-witness prior to the completion of the direct examination." It added that when the Judge interrogates a defendant for the purpose of challenging credibility and conveys the Judge's opinion that the witness is not worthy of belief, the defendant is deprived of a fair trial if credibility is a key issue.

United States v. Wilensky, 757 F.2d 594 (3d Cir. 1985) : When the defendant, charged with obstruction of justice, presented a psychiatrist in support of his insanity defense, the Judge "interrupted both the direct and cross examination ... with his questions delving deeply into the basis for the opinion and the extent of Wilensky's involvement with the usage of drugs, and '[a]t various points the trial judge assumed the entire examination of the witness, posing numerous questions ... in succession'." The Court concluded that the Judge "did overstep the bounds of prudent judicial conduct," and erred in so doing, but it found that the error was "not so egregious as to justify reversal of the convictions." In United States v. Beaty, n16 the Court reversed a defendant's drug convictions on the ground that the Trial Judge denied him a fair trial by "cross-examining" three of his four witnesses in a way that must certainly have communicated to the jury skepticism about the defendant's alibi. The Court found that the Judge's overzealous examination was reversible error despite his instructions to the jury that it was the sole trier of fact and that he was not a partisan.

Rodriguez v. Riddell Sports, Inc., 242 F.3d 567 (5th Cir. 2001) : Reversing judgments for the plaintiffs in an action for injuries from an allegedly defective football helmet, the Court noted that it was troubled by the Trial Judge's questioning of a defense expert who testified that the speed at which the football player hit the ground was half the speed estimated by the plaintiffs' expert. The Judge suggested that he thought defendants should be arguing that the speed was higher," which "at best ... violated the stricture that a court should not comment on trial strategy." In a prosecution for marijuana offenses where the outcome depended largely on the credibility of the defendant and of the chief prosecution witness, United States v. Saenz, 134 F.3d 697 (5th Cir. 1998) (per curiam), the Court reversed a conviction because the Judge's questioning of the chief prosecution witness and of the defendant could have led the jury to believe that the Judge favored the prosecutor's case, despite instructions to disregard any opinion that might be revealed. In United States v. Candelaria-Gonzalez, n17 the Court reversed narcotics convictions partly because the Trial Judge erred in interrupting counsel and criticizing counsel in the presence of the jury. "In a case of this nature, where determination of guilt or innocence rests largely on whether the jury credits the testimony of the chief government witness or that of the defendants, avoidance of the appearance of bias by the trial judge takes on added importance."

United States v. Van Dyke, 14 F.3d 415 (8th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a conviction for bank fraud because, inter alia, the Trial Judge excessively involved himself in trying the case, perceptibly as an advocate for the prosecution. In United States v. Singer, n18 a panel of the Court held that it was not unfair to the defense when the Trial Judge questioned a number of prosecution witnesses himself, suggested objections to government counsel, and made comments that could have created jury sympathy for government counsel. The panel opined that "experience in this circuit teaches that jurors are not always reluctant to disregard even very strong comments." The en banc Court reversed, finding that the jury could well have inferred that "the judge was siding with the government." In United States v. Bland, n19 the Court reversed convictions for firearms offenses because the Trial Judge's questioning was not neutral. The Court observed: "A judge's slightest indication that he favors the government's case can have an immeasurable effect upon a jury. A trial judge should seldom intervene in the questioning of a witness and then only to clarify isolated testimony."

United States v. Morgan, 376 F.3d 1002 (9th Cir. 2004) : After the government concluded its cross-examination of the defendant in a bank fraud trial, the Judge questioned the defendant at some length (without objection) concerning a transaction involved in the case. The Court concluded that the questioning went beyond clarifying the evidence and was "inappropriately extensive and suggestive of the court's own conclusion about [the defendant]'s credibility." However, it did not warrant reversal for plain error, particularly because appropriate curative instructions were given. In United States v. Moorehead, 57 F.3d 875 (9th Cir. 1995) , the Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession because the Trial Judge questioned a defense witness, one of the defendant's closest friends, in an effort to establish that both the witness and the defendant were drug dealers who spent most of their time selling narcotics in the park. Noting that there was no evidence that the defendant used any gun while dealing drugs, the Court concluded that the questioning violated Rule 404(b), the evidence was substantially more prejudicial than probative, and "[t]he fact that it was the judge--and not the prosecution--that asked the questions could only exacerbate the damage done Mr. Moorehead's cause."

[f] Rule 614(b) -- Neutral Questions

Gaydar v. Sociedad Instituto Gineco-Quirurgico y Planificacion Familiar, 345 F.3d 15 (1st Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an abortion clinic patient in a malpractice action against a doctor and the clinic. It found no error in the Trial Judge's questions to witnesses, noting that the questions "were phrased in a neutral manner."

[g] Rule 614(b) -- Pro Se Litigants

Cranberg v. Consumers Union of U.S., Inc., 756 F.2d 382 (5th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in a libel action brought pro se by a plaintiff who claimed that his product had been disparaged. Although the plaintiff complained that the Judge's participation in the trial was excessive, comprising 23 percent of the transcript, the Court observed that the Judge has greater latitude to participate in a bench trial than a jury trial. It also observed that > [w]hen a pro se litigant, even one as skillful as Cranberg, goes to trial against a party represented by a member of the bar, the responsibility of the trial judge may warrant participation which differs markedly from what would be appropriate to a trial between adversaries represented by counsel.

[3] Rule 614(c) -- Objections

United States v. Vega, 589 F.2d 1147 (2d Cir. 1978) : The Court held that a client's right to complain on appeal about the Trial Judge's questions was waived by his lawyer's failure to object either immediately or at the first opportunity outside the jury's presence. It rejected the argument that counsel should be excused from objecting because of "timidity or fear of antagonizing the judge," and relied upon the explicit language of Rule 614(c).

United States v. Gastiaburo, 16 F.3d 582 (4th Cir. 1994) : The Court held that the defendant's failure to object at trial to the Trial Judge's questioning of a defense witness precluded review on appeal. Although the Judge's asking whether the witness had ever been convicted of a felony was inappropriate and improvident in the absence of any particularized good-faith basis, it was not so prejudicial as to deny the defendant a fair and impartial trial. In United States v. Billups, n20 the Court affirmed several convictions of a labor official, rejecting a claim that the Trial Judge's questions and comments were so improper as to require a new trial. Defense counsel waited too long to object and thus the objection was waived under the terms of Rule 614(c).

United States v. Evans, 994 F.2d 317 (7th Cir. 1993) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held that the defendant properly preserved a claim of error as to the Trial Judge's prejudicially interrogating the defendant in a skeptical tone, by making the objection the next day as the first order of business after completion of the defendant's testimony.

Advisory Committee's Note

Subdivision (a). While exercised more frequently in criminal than in civil cases, the authority of the judge to call witnesses is well established. McCormick § 8, p. 14; Maguire, Weinstein, et al., Cases on Evidence 303-304 (5th ed. 1965); 9 Wigmore § 2484. One reason for the practice, the old rule against impeaching one's own witness, no longer exists by virtue of Rule 607 supra . Other reasons remain, however, to justify the continuation of the practice of calling court's witnesses. The right to cross-examine, with all it implies, is assured. The tendency of juries to associate a witness with the party calling him, regardless of technical aspects of vouching, is avoided. And the judge is not imprisoned within the case as made by the parties.

Subdivision (b). The authority of the judge to question witnesses is also well established. McCormick § 8, pp. 12-13; Maguire, Weinstein, et al., Cases on Evidence 737-39 (5th ed. 1965); 3 Wigmore § 784. The authority is, of course, abused when the judge abandons his proper role and assumes that of advocate, but the manner in which interrogation should be conducted and the proper extent of its exercise are not susceptible of formulation in a rule. The omission in no sense precludes courts of review from continuing to reverse for abuse.

Subdivision (c). The provision relating to objections is designed to relieve counsel of the embarrassment attendant upon objecting to questions by the judge in the presence of the jury, while at the same time assuring that objections are made in apt time to afford the opportunity to take possible corrective measures. Compare the "automatic" objection feature of Rule 605 when the judge is called as a witness.

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 614, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Supp. To CHAPTER 614 RULE 614

3-614 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 614.03

Supp. to § 614.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[2] Rule 614(b) -- Interrogation by Court [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 614(b) -- Bench Trials

United States v. Almeida-Perez, 549 F.3d 1162 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for aliens in possession of firearms, finding no plain error in the Magistrate Judge's questioning of witnesses at a suppression hearing. It noted that "the fact that the suppression motion was tried to a Magistrate Judge, rather than to a jury, decreases the danger or prejudice to the defendants from the Magistrate Judge's questioning."

[b] Rule 614(b) -- Clarifying Questions

United States v. Angulo-Hernandez, 565 F.3d 2 (1st Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, finding no unfair prejudice to the defendants in the Trial Judge's questioning of witnesses. The questions "were, on the whole, efforts by the district court to clarify testimony, respond to defense counsels' objections, determine the qualifications of expert witnesses, and expedite the trial, all legitimate purposes."

United States v. Roach, 502 F.3d 425 (6th Cir. 2007) : Affirming convictions of police officers for depriving two Hispanic men of their civil rights, the Court held that the Trial Judge did not render the trial unfair by asking questions of witnesses. The Judge asked questions of the police chief after he testified about the shift-log for the day on which the men were deprived of their rights, and the Court found that the questions were brief and direct, revealed no bias for either side, and addressed a matter that might have confused the jury.

[c] Rule 614(b) -- Complex Cases

United States v. Smith, 452 F.3d 323 (4th Cir. 2006) : Affirming convictions for drug conspiracy and murder, the Court found no plain error in the Trial Judge's extensive questioning of several witnesses. The Judge's conduct "revealed no bias and crossed no line. It represented the judge's permissible attempt to cabin and control a two-week trial that featured numerous witnesses, extensive amounts of evidence, and, even on appeal, an eight-volume joint appendix totaling over 2600 pages." The Court noted that the Judge spoke up when defense counsel posed questions "that were difficult to understand, that had already been asked and answered, or that were otherwise irrelevant." Moreover, the Judge properly instructed the jury that the judicial participation during testimony was not to be interpreted as commentary on the evidence. The Court noted that "[t]he inability of cold transcripts to replicate the human dynamics of a trial suggests caution in the review of judicial interference claims. It should thus come as no surprise that we apply a measure of deference to the judgments of those to whom, after all, the conduct of trial has been textually entrusted. See Fed.R.Evid. 611(a); 614(a)-(b)."

[d] Rule 614(b) -- Discretion of Trial Judge

[i] Rule 614(b) -- Civil Cases

Chainey v. Street, 523 F.3d 200 (3d Cir. 2008) : In an action arising from a city's decision to halt repairs on houses rebuilt after a police bombing, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge questioned the mayor, "expressing surprise" that the mayor could not recall key occurrences and suggesting that he should have "been more solicitous of the welfare of his citizens." The Court noted that interrogating witnesses "has been an important and longstanding practice on the part of trial judges and should not be discouraged," and that "the abuse of discretion standard is a deferential one and in order to meet the standard the conduct of a trial judge must be 'inimical and partisan, clearly evident and prejudicial.' "

[e] Rule 614(b) -- Improper Questioning

United States v. Melendez-Rivas, 566 F.3d 41 (1st Cir. 2009) : The Court vacated a conviction for carjacking because the Trial Judge's questioning in a case involving several credibility contests not only elicited hearsay but also brought out that an FBI agent thought that the defendant (who claimed he had no criminal record or associations) was involved in crimes that could lead to the death penalty. A follow-up question whether the witness believed the FBI and the instructions given were inadequate to offset the prejudice.

United States v. Barnhart, 599 F.3d 737 (7th Cir. 2010) : Affirming a wire fraud conviction, the Court found that the Trial Judge's "questioning of the witnesses during this trial went too far," but the defendant had failed to object and could not demonstrate plain error. The Judge's leading questions of one witness "read like a cross-examination"; his questioning of the defendant gave the impression that he was skeptical of the testimony; and his "questioning of the witnesses went beyond mere clarification and instead gave the impression that the judge disbelieved Barnhart's defense." In sum, "the quantity and quality of the judge's questions in this case conveyed an improper skepticism about Barnhart's defense." In United States v. McCray, 437 F.3d 639 (7th Cir. 2006) , in a drug prosecution, the Court found no prejudice in the Trial Judge's interruption of defense counsel's cross-examination with extensive questioning of a prosecution witness, as well as extensive questioning of a police officer during the government's direct examination. This questioning was coupled with the Trial Judge's standing practice of not permitting sidebar discussion. While affirming the conviction, the Court expressed > some concern over the judge's decision to proceed with extensive questioning. When coupled with the trial court's practice of not permitting sidebars, the judge's questions in this case arguably placed the defendant's lawyer in an awkward position. Defense counsel was faced with either passively accepting what he perceived to be an unwarranted examination or potentially exacerbating the situation by challenging the judge's impartiality in front of the jury. To avoid the risk of unforeseen prejudice, we encourage district judges to remain vigilant to the potential impact of their questions during a jury trial.

[3] Rule 614(c) -- Objections [Go To Main]

United States v. Smith, 452 F.3d 323 (4th Cir. 2006) : The Court held that defense motions in limine and post-trial objection to judicial intervention in the questioning of witnesses were not sufficient to preserve claims of error arising from judicial questioning of witnesses at trial, as "the former was premature and the latter dilatory." The motion in limine was a general request that the Judge "refrain from any actions which may be interpreted by the jury as favoring the government over the defense especially regarding the court questioning or rehabilitating witnesses." This motion necessarily was too general, as it "failed to alert the trial judge to any improper questioning with the required specificity," and it "sought in effect to charge the district judge with bias before the trial had even so much as started." On the other hand, the post-trial motion gave the Judge no opportunity to address the defendants' concerns. Litigants "may not attempt to blindside district courts by pointing out errors long after the opportunity to take immediate curative action has passed."

Rule 615. Exclusion of Witnesses

At the request of a party the court shall order witnesses excluded so that they cannot hear the testimony of other witnesses, and it may make the order of its own motion. This rule does not authorize exclusion of (1) a party who is a natural person, or (2) an officer or employee of a party which is not a natural person designated as its representative by its attorney, or (3) a person whose presence is shown by a party to be essential to the presentation of the party's cause, or (4) a person authorized by statute to be present.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VI. Witnesses
CHAPTER 615 RULE 615

3-615 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 615.02

615.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Right to Sequestration

Sequestration of prospective witnesses is a common method of discouraging or preventing collusion and exposing inaccuracies in testimony. n1 This Rule provides that at the request of a party, or on its own motion, the Court shall order witnesses excluded so they cannot hear the testimony of other witnesses. A party who requests sequestration of witnesses has a right to it under this Rule, subject to the exceptions contained in the Rule. n2

When a victim of a crime is a witness in the criminal case, the sequestration power set forth in Rule 615 has been substantially circumscribed by statute. See the discussion in § 615.02[9].

[2] Exceptions

The exceptions set forth in the Rule will be discussed in turn, with the complex treatment of crime victims left for the end of this Editorial Explanatory Comment (see § 615.02[9]).

(1) Parties. A party to the action cannot be sequestered. It is generally viewed as improper to prohibit a party from being present during the trial of his or her own cause. In a criminal case the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments entitle a defendant to be present, although the defendant may "waive" that right in several ways. n3 In civil cases it would appear to be inconsistent with due process to deny parties the opportunity to fully participate in their case, simply on the ground that they may tailor their testimony to what witnesses have already said. n4

(2) Designated representative. If an individual party has the right to be present, an organizational party should have the same right to be present at all times to ensure that the organization's interests are adequately protected. The Rule therefore provides an exception for a designated representative of a party who is not a natural person. n5

In a criminal case, it is generally held that the police officer in charge of the investigation is within the "officer or employee" exception provided in Rule 615. n6

There is some dispute about whether the "officer or employee" exception authorizes more than one person to remain in the courtroom during the entire trial. Some Courts have held that a party may designate only one representative for this Rule 615 exception. n7 Others have left it to the discretion of the Trial Judge, recognizing, of course, that at some point there must be a limit, or else corporate and government representatives would be flooding the courtroom. n8

(3) Person whose presence is essential to the party's presentation. There are cases in which a party needs a prospective witness to be in the courtroom, in order to properly prepare and present the case. In such instances, the Trial Judge must balance the need of the party for the assistance of the prospective witness against the wisdom of sequestration. Although no such balance is explicitly provided for in Rule 615, it is probably inherent in the use of the word "essential" in subdivision (c). n9 Thus, it has been held that a Trial Court can exercise discretion to permit experts to remain in the courtroom, especially during the testimony of an expert for the opposing party, where that presence is essential to the expert's own testimony. n10 Discretion is necessary given the fine lines between experts who are necessary to manage a case and those who are not, and between those who are experts and those who are combination expert and fact witness. n11 Generally speaking, where a witness is both a fact and expert witness, sequestration should be ordered, or at the very least the witness' access should be limited to that testimony crucial to the witness' own expert opinion. n12

The Second Circuit in United States v. Jackson, 60 F.3d 128, 134 (2d Cir. 1995) , set forth a helpful list of considerations for Trial Courts to employ in determining whether a witness should be exempted from a sequestration under the exception for witnesses essential to preparation of the case:

> In making a Rule 615 ruling, a district court must exercise discretion, and among the factors that might usefully inform the exercise of such discretion are: 1) how critical the testimony in question is, that is, whether it will involve controverted and material facts; 2) whether the information is ordinarily subject to tailoring, such that cross-examination or other evidence could bring to light any deficiencies; 3) to what extent the testimony of the witness in question is likely to encompass the same issues as that of other witnesses; 4) the order in which the witnesses will testify; 5) any potential for bias that might motivate the witness to tailor his testimony; and 6) ... whether the witness's presence is "essential" rather than simply desirable.

[3] Alternatives Short of Complete Sequestration

When a witness falls into one of the exceptions to Rule 615, it does not mean that the policy that drives the Rule is inapplicable. Therefore, the Trial Judge may want to consider alternatives other than sequestration for witnesses who fall into the exceptions. For example, the Trial Court could use its authority under Rule 611(a) to require the nonsequestered witness to testify early, if not first, in the case. n13 Also, if the witness' presence is "essential" only with respect to the testimony of certain other witnesses -- as is most typically the case with experts, who might need to hear the testimony of an adverse expert -- the witness should be permitted to be present only for the testimony of those witnesses.

[4] Scope of Sequestration

Rule 615 provides only for exclusion of witnesses from the courtroom. The Rule says nothing about witnesses talking with each other outside the courtroom, nor does it concern itself with witnesses who obtain access to information about the trial through means other than presence in the courtroom. However, the Rule does not affect the Trial Court's inherent power to fashion a more far-reaching sequestration order appropriate to the circumstances of the case. The relationship between Rule 615 and the Trial Court's broader inherent sequestration authority was analyzed by Judge Selya in United States v. Sepulveda, 15 F.3d 1161, 1175-77 (1st Cir. 1993) , a case in which the defendant objected to the fact that three prosecution witnesses were placed in the same jail cell throughout the trial. Judge Selya analyzed Rule 615 and the broader sequestration power as follows:

> [Rule 615] more or less codifies common-law sequestration powers, but it is at once less discretionary and less stringent than its forebears. On one hand, the rule cabins the judge's discretion by > affording all parties a right to close the courtroom to prospective witnesses. On the other hand, while the common law supported sequestration beyond the courtroom, Rule 615 contemplates a smaller reserve; by its terms, courts must "order witnesses excluded" only from the courtroom proper. In sum, the rule demarcates a compact procedural heartland, but leaves appreciable room for judicial innovation beyond the perimeters of that which the rule explicitly requires.

>
> Outside of the heartland, the district court may make whatever provisions it deems necessary to manage trials in the interests of justice, including the sequestration of witnesses before, during, and after their testimony, and compelling the parties to present witnesses in a prescribed sequence. Rule 615 neither dictates when and how this case-management power ought to be used nor mandates any specific extra-courtroom prophylaxis, instead leaving the regulation of witness conduct outside the courtroom to the district judge's discretion. See United States v. Arias-Santana, 964 F.2d 1262, 1266 (1st Cir. 1992) (explaining that a federal trial court may enter non-discussion orders at its discretion).
> This is not to say, however, that sequestration orders which affect witnesses outside the courtroom are a rarity. As a practical matter, district courts routinely exercise their discretion to augment Rule 615 by instructing witnesses, without making fine spatial distinctions, that they are not to discuss their testimony. Indeed, such non-discussion orders are generally thought to be a standard concomitant of basic sequestration fare, serving to fortify the protections offered by Rule 615.

Judge Selya, in Sepulveda, made clear that if a party wants a sequestration order that goes further than that mandated by Rule 615, then it is up to the party to ask for it with specificity:

> Here, appellants moved in advance of trial for sequestration without indicating to the court what level of restraint they thought appropriate. The court granted the motion in its simplest aspect, directing counsel "to monitor sequestration" and ordering "that witnesses who are subject to [the court's] order are not to be present in the courtroom at any time prior to their appearance to render testimony." At trial, the district court expanded its earlier order beyond the Rule 615 minimum, instructing each witness at the close of his or her testimony not to discuss that testimony with any other witness. Appellants accepted the conditions of sequestration described by the court without demurrer. What is more, they did not request any further instructions, say, that witnesses be directed at the end of each day, or before each recess, not to discuss their testimony. Thus, every witness was placed under an order prohibiting discussion of the case with other witnesses only upon the completion of his or her testimony. On these facts, the district court's denial of relief must be upheld. The court's basic sequestration order, which ploughed a straight furrow in line with Rule 615 itself, did not extend beyond the courtroom. There has been no intimation that the witnesses transgressed this order. Moreover, because the district court did not promulgate a non-discussion order applicable to any witness until the conclusion of that witness's testimony, [the cohabiting witnesses] were under no obligation, prior to that moment, to refrain from discussing their recollections with each other.

Counsel who believe that sequestration of witnesses will work to the advantage of their clients should make all reasonable efforts to ensure that a sequestration order is fully protective. For example, it is not sufficient for counsel simply to ask the Trial Judge to have the witnesses removed from the courtroom when they are not testifying. Counsel should also ask that the Trial Judge instruct the witnesses that they are not to discuss the case with one another.

As seen in Sepulveda, it is the Court's order that determines the scope of sequestration and whether there will be a remedy when a witness obtains access to trial evidence in advance of testifying. Reliance on agreement between the parties will not be enough. Illustrative is United States v. Williams, 136 F.3d 1166 (7th Cir. 1998) , where the Court found no violation of Rule 615 when one prosecution witness spoke to another. The defendant moved for a mistrial on the ground that the sequestration order had been violated. The Court noted, however, that there was "one teensy, weensy problem with this argument -- no sequestration order was ever entered." Before opening statements, the prosecutor informed the Judge that counsel had "talked about it, and both our sets of witnesses will be sequestered." The Judge replied "very good." There was no formal request for a sequestration order under Rule 615, nor did the Judge enter such an order sua sponte. The Court declared that "[i]t is not at all uncommon for trial attorneys to treat sequestration orders under Rule 615 in a nonchalant manner, but a cavalier approach is not advisable." It held that "attorneys should specifically note the rule and ask the trial judge to formally invoke it. Without taking these minimal steps, it will be the rare case indeed where we could conclude that a 'sequestration order' has been violated."

[5] Application to Defense Counsel

Does a criminal defense counsel violate Rule 615 by disclosing trial testimony to prospective witnesses? In United States v. Rhynes, 218 F.3d 310 (4th Cir. 2000) (en banc), a defense witness was excluded because defense counsel in preparing that witness for trial disclosed to him the trial testimony of a prosecution witness. The Trial Court found the exclusion of the witness an appropriate sanction for a violation of the sequestration order it had entered under Rule 615, and for a later extension of that order stating that "the witnesses shall not discuss one with the other their testimony." But the Court of Appeals reversed the conviction.

The Court relied on the following arguments: (1) "[i]t is clear from the unambiguous language of Rule 615 that lawyers are simply not subject to the Rule" because the Rule relates only to witnesses and "serves only to exclude witnesses from the courtroom"; (2) the Trial Judge's extension precluding witnesses from discussing their testimony with other witnesses did not address the conduct of lawyers in any way; and (3) most importantly, any attempt to prevent defense counsel from disclosing trial testimony in preparing witnesses would probably violate the defendant's constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel. On this last point, the Court concluded that "where an attorney seeks to perform his constitutionally mandated duty to effectively represent a criminal defendant, he must be free to interview defense witnesses and to discuss with them all appropriate matters, without being subject to an overbroad sequestration order."

[6] Remedies for Violations

Great care should be taken in formulating a sequestration order. Once an order has been violated, appropriate remedies are difficult to develop. Although the Trial Judge has discretion to exclude the testimony of a witness who has violated a sequestration order, n14 this drastic remedy appears to be disfavored for understandable reasons. n15 Holding the witness in contempt for violating an order serves a punishment purpose and may have an impact on future witnesses, but cannot remedy the harm done by improper witness contact with other witnesses. And allowing a comment by opposing counsel on a witness' noncompliance with a sequestration order, although certainly a proper remedy, is of dubious value. n16 While a mistrial is a possibility, it can hardly be considered a preferred remedy. n17

Even the most careful sequestration instruction will be to no avail if a witness refuses to follow judicial instructions. But if it can be assumed, and we think it can, that many witnesses would not knowingly violate an explicit command of the Court, the more explicit the Court can be the better the trial system will work. n18

[7] Depositions

The risk that a prospective witness will tailor his or her testimony if allowed to hear another witness testify can be as much a problem at depositions as at trial. Rule 615 does not explicitly apply to deposition testimony, and until 1993 Courts divided on whether the Judge had the power to bar witnesses not yet deposed from hearing someone else's deposition.

The question was decided by an amendment to Fed. R. Civ. P. 30(c), effective December 1, 1993, which provides that Evidence Rule 615 does not apply to the examination of witnesses at depositions. Thus, other deponents are not automatically excluded simply by the request of a party; however, they may be excluded, when appropriate, pursuant to a protective order under Civil Rule 26(c)(5).

[8] Suppression Hearings

The Federal Rules of Evidence are generally held inapplicable to suppression hearings. For example, in proving that probable cause existed to support a challenged search, the government can rely on hearsay. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 1101, § 1101.02[4]. Yet despite the general inapplicability of the Rules, there is a good argument for requiring sequestration of witnesses at suppression hearings. The importance of the sequestration power at suppression hearings is emphasized by the Court in United States v. Brewer, 947 F.2d 404 (9th Cir. 1991) , where the defendant moved to sequester a police officer who was scheduled to testify after another police officer at a suppression hearing. The Trial Court denied the motion on the ground that Rule 615 was not applicable to suppression hearings. The two police officers testified virtually identically. The Court of Appeals reversed and remanded the order denying suppression. The Court addressed the government's argument that Rule 1101(d)(1) (exempting preliminary determinations from the Evidence Rules) covered suppression hearings. The Court noted that Rule 1101(d)(1) essentially restates Rule 104, and elaborated as follows:

> The commentary that follows Rule 104 makes it clear that this section is limited to the preliminary requirements or conditions that must be proved before a particular rule of evidence may be applied. The examples of foundational facts that may be proved without complying with the exclusionary Rules of Evidence include the qualifications of an expert, the unavailability of a witness whose former testimony is being offered, the presence of a third person during a conversation between an attorney and client, proof of the interest of the declarant in determining whether the out-of-court statement threatens that interest, the competency of a child to testify as a witness.

The Brewer Court found that Rule 615 was a procedural rule designed to guarantee a fair proceeding, as opposed to a rule dealing with the admissibility of evidence. Therefore it applied to suppression hearings. The Court held that Rule 1101 "does not support the notion that procedural rules designed to protect the integrity of the fact finding process are inapplicable in a suppression hearing."

The Brewer Court's reading of Rule 1101 makes a good deal of sense. But even if the Court is wrong about the applicability of Rule 615, the Judge at a suppression hearing surely has common-law authority to sequester witnesses to protect the integrity of any judicial proceeding. The need for the exercise of this power is apparent in the context of a suppression hearing, where all too often police officers testify identically about a contested set of facts. The advantage of a holding that Rule 615 is applicable is that the defendant has a right under the Rule to exclude police officers from the courtroom. But even if the Rule does not apply, it is hoped that the Trial Court will freely exercise its common-law sequestration power to protect against collusion of witnesses.

[9] Victims of Crime

Federal Rule 615 could obviously have an impact on a victim of a crime in the context of a criminal trial. The victim will often be a witness, and will often have an emotional and psychological interest in attending all trial proceedings. Victims would seem, however, to be subject to sequestration under the terms of Rule 615 and would not seem to fall within the first three exceptions to that Rule. A victim is not a party to a criminal action, and it would be difficult to make the case that a victim's presence is essential to the presentation of the case.

In 1990, Congress enacted the "Victim of Crime Bill of Rights," 42 U.S.C. § 10606, which provides several protections for victims of crime, among them the right "to be present at all public court proceedings related to the offense, unless the court determines that testimony by the victim would be materially affected if the victim heard other testimony at trial." This legislation was supplemented by enactment of another Crime Victims Act codified at 18 U.S.C. § 3771. The new Crime Victim's Act gives victims the right "not to be excluded from any ... public court proceeding, unless the court, after receiving clear and convincing evidence, determines that testimony by the victim would be materially altered if the victim heard other testimony at that proceeding." Thus the new Act extends the right to attend to all public court proceedings, not just trials, and requires the Court to find by "clear and convincing evidence" that exclusion of the victim is necessary.

It is clear that Congress intended in these two pieces of victims' rights legislation to create an exception to Rule 615 for crime victims. The exception permitting exclusion, which is narrowly tailored to take account of the interests of crime victims and is more recently enacted than the Rule, takes precedence over Rule 615. Accordingly, in 1998 Rule 615 was amended to provide that witnesses could not be excluded if their presence is "authorized by statute." The Advisory Committee Note to the Rule makes specific reference to victims' rights legislation.

Under the legislation, a Trial Judge must determine whether the testimony of the victim will be "materially affected" by hearing other testimony. The use of the word "materially" imposes a difficult task on a Trial Judge, especially in light of the ordinary discovery that is mandated in criminal cases. Fed. R. Crim. P. 16 does not require the government to reveal names of witnesses or to disclose the expected nature of their testimony. Nor does it require the government to produce statements of witnesses. The Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3500, does not require the government to turn over statements of testifying witnesses until they have given direct examination. Thus, a Trial Judge called upon to determine the effect of other testimony on a victim often will be largely in the dark. As the evidentiary standard for exclusion is clear and convincing evidence that the victim's testimony will be tainted, it is unlikely, given the difficulties of proof, that this standard will be met in the ordinary course. That is particularly true in high profile cases, where sequestration will do little to shield the victim, or anyone else, from the substance of trial court testimony.

Even if a crime victim is subject to sequestration, this does not mean that the victim should be sequestered for any substantial part of a criminal trial. Any conscientious prosecutor dealing with a victim who wishes to be present at public Court proceedings related to that victim's harm should make his or her best effort to call the victim first and then argue that the victim has a right to remain in the courtroom during the rest of the trial. The argument is that, once the victim's testimony is completed, there no longer is a reason for exclusion.

Should a prosecutor fail to seek to have the victim testify first, the Judge should exercise the power conferred by Rule 611(a) to control the order of proof, and require the victim to be the first witness if the victim has expressed a desire to attend the trial. The result is that in all but the most unusual cases the victim should be able to be present during virtually the entire trial, if not the entire trial. This result is consistent with Congress' goals in enacting the victims' rights legislation.

In the Oklahoma City bombing trial, United States v. McVeigh, the defendant sought to exclude victims on the ground that they planned to testify at the sentencing hearing. The defense argued that the victims' presence at the trial would materially affect their testimony at the later proceeding. The Trial Judge agreed with the defendant and entered an order excluding from the trial any victims who planned to give victim impact statements at the sentencing hearing. This left the victims in a quandary: to attend the trial, they would essentially have to waive their right to give a victim impact statement at the sentencing hearing.

Congress responded with legislation entitled "The Victim Rights Clarification Act of 1997." The law adds section 3510 to Title 18, and provides that notwithstanding any other law or Rule (including of course Rule 615), a Court "shall not order any victim of an offense excluded from the trial of a defendant accused of that offense because such victim may, during the sentencing hearing, make a statement or present any information in relation to the sentence." The Advisory Committee Note to the 1998 amendment to Rule 615 specifically refers to the Victim Rights Clarification Act as a statutory exception to the sequestration power set forth in the Rule. After the Victim Rights Clarification Act, the Trial Court has no authority to exclude victims from trial on the ground that their presence at trial might taint their testimony at a sentencing proceeding.

Edinborough, 625 F.2d 472, 474 (3d Cir. 1980)* ("The mandatory language of the rule shows that it was intended to change the prior practice under which the trial court had discretion to determine whether a witness should be excluded."); Hollman v. Dale Electronic, Inc., 752 F.2d 311 (8th Cir. 1985) (it was error for the Trial Judge to refuse to honor the plaintiff's demand for sequestration of witnesses; sequestration is required when requested by a party).

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., *Illinois v. For a further discussion of the criminal defendant's constitutional right to be present at trial, see S. Saltzburg & D. Capra, American Criminal Procedure 1290-1300 (7th ed. 2004).

Note that the Supreme Court has held that when the accused testifies, it is permissible for the prosecutor to argue to the jury that it can draw a negative inference from the fact that the accused, unlike other witnesses, could not be sequestered. Portuondo v. Agard, 529 U.S. 61 (2000) . The Court in Agard declared as follows:

> In sum, we see no reason to depart from the practice of treating testifying defendants the same as other witnesses. A witness's ability to hear prior testimony and to tailor his account accordingly, and the threat that ability presents to the integrity of the trial, are no different when it is the defendant doing the listening. Allowing comment upon the fact that a defendant's presence in the courtroom provides him a unique opportunity to tailor his testimony is appropriate -- and indeed, given the inability to sequester the defendant, sometimes essential -- to the central function of the trial, which is to discover the truth.

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., Helminski v. Ayerst Labs., 766 F.2d 208, 216 (6th Cir. 1985) ("Consistent with due process, a plaintiff who can comprehend the proceedings and aid counsel may not be excluded from any portion of the proceedings absent disruptive behavior or a knowing and voluntary waiver.").

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., Queen v. Washington Metro. Area Transit Auth., 842 F.2d 476 (D.C. Johnson v. Galen of Va.., Inc., 325 F.3d 776 (6th Cir. 2003) (former corporate official of now-defunct corporation could be designated as a representative not subject to sequestration).

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., United States v. Payan, 992 F.2d 1387 (5th Cir. 1993) (the defendant had no right to have the officer in charge of the investigation excluded from the courtroom).

Pulley, 922 F.2d 1283 (6th Cir. 1991)* (the officer or employee exception does not permit two investigating officers to sit through the trial); United States v. Farnham, 791 F.2d 331 (4th Cir. 1986) (reversible error where two agents were permitted to remain in the courtroom; because the Rule favors sequestration, exceptions should be narrowly construed, and requiring a party to show prejudice from violation of the Rule would be unduly harsh and self-defeating).

(n8)Footnote 8. See, e.g., United States v. Green, 293 F.3d 886 (5th Cir. 2002) (no abuse of discretion in allowing three police officials to be present throughout the trial; the case was complex and each official oversaw a different part of the investigation).

(n9)Footnote 9. See, e.g., United States v. Phibbs, 999 F.2d 1053 (6th Cir. 1993) (there was no error in permitting a DEA agent to sit in the courtroom as an "essential" witness in addition to an FBI special agent who served as the government's representative; the Court noted that each agent was excluded from the courtroom when the other was testifying).

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., United States v. Seschillie, 310 F.3d 1208 (9th Cir. 2002) (error to sequester defense expert because expert was necessary to evaluate the prosecution's evidence); Hill v. Porter Memorial Hosp., 90 F.3d 220 (7th Cir. 1996) (finding no error in permitting experts to have access to the testimony of other experts; each side's expert witnesses were permitted to consult the other's trial testimony, and the jury was instructed that it could consider that a witness had reviewed trial testimony in evaluating that witness' testimony); Malek v. Federal Ins. Co., 994 F.2d 49 (2d Cir. 1993) (it was an abuse of discretion to sequester the plaintiff's expert, where the defendant's expert's testimony differed from his prior reports, and therefore the plaintiff's expert's "presence in the courtroom was important to the presentation of the Maleks' case").

(n11)Footnote 11. Malek v. Federal Ins. Co., 994 F.2d 49 (2d Cir. 1993) (McLaughlin, J., dissenting) (arguing that the Trial Court did not abuse its discretion in sequestering the plaintiff's expert, because the expert "testified extensively to facts arising from his personal examination"); United States v. Agnes, 581 F. Supp. 462 (E.D. Pa. 1984) (the defendant had not demonstrated that his girlfriend had such special expertise or knowledge as warranted exempting her from a sequestration order).

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., Opus 3 Ltd. v. Heritage Park, Inc., 91 F.3d 625 (4th Cir. 1996) (a general contractor hired by the defendant was properly excluded from the courtroom while evidence was presented; the contractor was both a fact witness and an expert witness, and the defendant claimed he was "a critical witness"; because the contractor was a fact witness in part, "[i]t is in precisely this circumstance that adherence to the sequestration rule is most important"; moreover, the Court found that the defendant failed to establish that the contractor needed to hear other witnesses in order to render an expert opinion).

(n13)Footnote 13. See, e.g., United States v. Mitchell, 733 F.2d 327 (4th Cir. 1984) (reiterating that "better practice suggests that if the agent [exempted from sequestration] is to testify, he should testify as the Government's first witness, unless ... there were good reasons otherwise"); In re United States, 584 F.2d 666 (5th Cir. 1978) (concluding that a government agent could be the government's "representative under (2) of the Rule," and adding that under Rule 611(a) the Judge might order the government to use the agent as a witness early in its case -- or not at all -- to avoid any unfairness in having the agent present to hear other witnesses).

(n14)Footnote 14. See, e.g., Miller v. Universal City Studios, Inc., 650 F.2d 1365 (5th Cir. 1981) (exclusion was an appropriate sanction where counsel instigated the violation of a sequestration order). Compare United States v. Rhynes, 218 F.3d 310 (4th Cir. 2000) (reversible error for excluding a witness for violation of a sequestration order; this severe sanction was disproportionate to the violation; the witness' testimony was critical, and the violation if any was inadvertent because it was unclear whether the sequestration order applied to these circumstances).

(n15)Footnote 15. See, e.g., Jerry Parks Equip. Co. v. Southeast Equip. Co., 817 F.2d 340 (5th Cir. 1987) (holding that the Trial Judge did not abuse his discretion in striking the testimony of a witness who violated a sequestration order, but stating that "lesser sanctions would appear more in order"). See also United States v. Hobbs, 31 F.3d 918 (9th Cir. 1994) (it was plain error to exclude the testimony of a defense witness who violated a sequestration order, where there was no showing that the defense knew about the violation).

(n16)Footnote 16. See, e.g., United States v. Friedman, 854 F.2d 535 (2d Cir. 1988) (defense counsel was permitted to tell the jury that prosecution witnesses read trial transcripts in violation of a sequestration order).

to the evidence is likely to prove beyond realistic hope of repair"); United States v. Phibbs, 999 F.2d 1053 (6th Cir. 1993) (discussing the possibility of a mistrial as a last resort).

[1] Designated Representative

[a] Civil Cases

Queen v. Washington Metro. Area Transit Auth., 842 F.2d 476 (D.C. Cir. 1988) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in an action by a pedestrian who was struck by a bus, the Court held that the bus company had the right to designate the bus driver, rather than an officer or other company official, as its designated representative.

Marathon Pipe Line Co. v. Drilling Rig Rowan/Odessa, 699 F.2d 240 (5th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the owner of a pipeline damaged when it was struck by a drilling rig, finding it was proper to exclude a witness whom one party wanted in the courtroom, as the party did not claim that the witness was an employee entitled to be a designated representative.

Breneman v. Kennecott Corp., 799 F.2d 470 (9th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a judgment for an employer in a sex discrimination case, the Court declined to decide whether a corporation may designate more than one representative. Instead, it found that any error in permitting one person to be so designated during pretrial depositions and another at trial was not prejudicial.

[b] Designated Representative -- Criminal Cases

[i] Designated Case Agent

United States v. Hensel, 699 F.2d 18 (1st Cir. 1983) : A government agent, who sat at counsel table throughout a marijuana conspiracy prosecution, testified that certain behavior "such as making lists and buying boats" was typical of drug smugglers. Although it recognized the risk of prejudice, the Court held it was not an abuse of discretion to admit the testimony. See also United States v. Machor n1(finding no abuse of discretion in permitting a federal agent who posed as a prospective buyer during a drug transaction, and who was designated by the government as its representative, to remain in the courtroom while an informant testified, nor in denying the defendants' request that the agent testify before the informant).

United States v. Gonzalez, 918 F.2d 1129 (3d Cir. 1990) : Affirming convictions for drug offenses, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in denying a motion to sequester the government's case agent even though the agent later testified against the defendants. The Court noted that the possibility agents could coordinate their testimony did not pose a likelihood of prejudice since they had ample time before trial to do that were they so inclined.

United States v. Parodi, 703 F.2d 768 (4th Cir. 1983) : In a narcotics conspiracy case, the Court found no error in a ruling permitting a DEA agent to remain in the courtroom as the government's designated agent during testimony and subsequently to testify. The Court observed that the Judge could have compelled the agent to testify first, but that it was not an abuse of discretion to decline to do so. See also United States v. Mitchell n2(reiterating that "better practice suggests that if the agent [exempted from sequestration] is to testify, he should testify as the Government's first witness, unless ... there were good reasons otherwise," and finding that deferring the testimony made sense in order to avoid confusion).

In re United States, 584 F.2d 666 (5th Cir. 1978) : The Court granted mandamus, holding it was error to refuse to except a government agent from a sequestration order. The Court concluded that a government agent could be the government's "representative under (2) of the Rule," and added that under Rule 611(a) the Judge might order the government to use the agent as a witness early in its case (or not at all) to avoid any unfairness in having the agent present to hear other witnesses.

United States v. Martin, 920 F.2d 393 (6th Cir. 1990) : Affirming a conviction for distributing cocaine, the Court held there was no error in refusing to order that the case agent be sequestered or testify first for the government.

United States v. Crabtree, 979 F.2d 1261 (7th Cir. 1992) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in allowing an FBI agent, who had observed most of a bank fraud trial ostensibly as an expert witness on a check kiting charge, to testify regarding other charges as well. The agent could have qualified as a designated representative of the government and under Rule 703 it was proper for him to base his expert testimony on facts learned at trial. In United States v. Adamo, n3 the Court rejected the defendant's argument that allowing an undercover agent to sit at the prosecutor's table during the trial was an improper tacit endorsement of the agent, holding that the Rule's legislative history and decisions in other Circuits make it clear that an agent may be designated to sit at the government counsel table even though he is also a witness.

United States v. Sykes, 977 F.2d 1242 (8th Cir. 1992) : Affirming a conviction for drug trafficking offenses, the Court noted that the decision whether to allow the government's designated case agent to testify even though he sits at the counsel table during the trial is left to the Trial Judge's discretion and the Rule does not differentiate between expert and nonexpert witnesses. There was no abuse of discretion in this case, as the agent's expert testimony was distinct from the other witness' occurrence testimony. In United States v. Jones, n4 the Court upheld the government's designation of a local police officer as the case agent so that he was immune from sequestration under the Rule.

United States v. Butera, 677 F.2d 1376 (11th Cir. 1982) : The Court found no error in the Trial Judge's exempting from sequestration the principal investigating officer in the case.

[ii] Designated Representative -- Criminal Cases -- Multiple Representatives

United States v. Jackson, 60 F.3d 128 (2d Cir. 1995) : The Court held that in rare cases more than one witness might be exempted under a subdivision of Rule 615. In United States v. Rivera, 971 F.2d 876 (2d Cir. 1992) , the Court, affirming convictions for a heroin distribution conspiracy, held that there was no error in permitting two testifying case agents to be present in the courtroom, as one was designated as a representative of the government and no objection was made to the presence of the other.

United States v. Farnham, 791 F.2d 331 (4th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a conviction for making false statements to a grand jury because two agents were erroneously permitted to remain in the courtroom; the Court interpreted Rule 615(2) to permit only one designated agent to remain in the courtroom. Because the Rule reflects an a priori judgment in favor of sequestration, exceptions should be narrowly construed, and requiring a party to show prejudice from violation of the Rule would be unduly harsh and self-defeating.

United States v. Green, 293 F.3d 886 (5th Cir. 2002) : Affirming drug trafficking convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion when three officers, representing the FBI, State Police, and parish sheriff's office, were permitted to sit at counsel table throughout the trial. The case was complex; the investigation was lengthy and broad geographically, and involved numerous witnesses; each agency performed independent investigations; and the defendants failed to show that the investigators' presence prejudiced their testimony. In a prosecution for a series of bank robberies, United States v. Hickman, 151 F.3d 446 (5th Cir. 1998) , aff'd by equally divided en banc court, 179 F.3d 230 (5th Cir. 1999) , a local police officer was permitted to sit at counsel's table along with the FBI case agent. Affirming the convictions, the Court noted that it had never directly decided whether the government can designate more than one individual as its representative under Rule 615(2), although it had approved the use of two agents under the essential-presence exception of Rule 615(3). The string of simple armed robberies in this case did not fall within the ambit of Rule 615(3)'s complexity exception and no other reason was provided for overruling the Rule 615 objection, so it was an abuse of discretion to permit the presence of both agents during the trial. The error was harmless, however, since the witnesses generally testified about different subject matter and in two instances one directly contradicted on cross-examination testimony given by the other. At the trial of a marijuana distribution conspiracy, in United States v. Ramirez, n5 two government agents were permitted to remain in the courtroom as representatives of the government while other witnesses were testifying. Assuming arguendo that it was error to allow designation of more than one witness as a "representative," the Court held there was no prejudice to the defendant because one agent was sequestered whenever the other was testifying, thus minimizing their opportunities to tailor their testimony, and there was no showing of prejudice from having an extra agent in the room when others testified. In United States v. Alvarado, n6 the Court affirmed a marijuana conviction, holding there was no error in permitting two DEA agents to be present during trial. The Court said that "the decision as to how many will be excused from sequestration is just as discretionary with the trial judge as who will be excused."

United States v. Pulley, 922 F.2d 1283 (6th Cir. 1991) : The Court held the error in permitting two government agents to remain in the courtroom was harmless, as one was the first prosecution witness and therefore could not have tailored his testimony and the second could well have been designated the government's sole representative. In any event, their testimony did not overlap significantly, so their joint presence during the trial could not have undermined the integrity of the factfinding process.

United States v. Faul, 748 F.2d 1204 (8th Cir. 1984) : In a prosecution for the murder of U.S. Marshals, the Trial

Judge apparently recognized two government representatives under Rule 615(2). The Court found any error to be harmless and declined to decide whether an exception for two designated representatives is permissible under the Rule.

United States v. Spina, 654 F. Supp. 94 (S.D. Fla. 1987) , aff'd, 881 F.2d 1086 (11th Cir. 1989) : The District Court denied an appeal from a Magistrate's ruling that permitted two United States attorneys and an FBI agent to remain in the courtroom during a hearing on motions alleging prosecutorial misconduct. The Court stated: "The Government has an absolute right to name a representative under Rule 615(2) and the Court must permit this even though the moving party (defendant) objects to the Government's designation." It added that "[t]he Court has the discretion to permit the Government to name more than one exempted representative."

[2] Expert Witnesses

United States v. Lussier, 929 F.2d 25 (1st Cir. 1991) (per curiam): The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in a tax evasion case in permitting an IRS agent, who testified at the end of the government's case to his calculation of the taxes due, to remain in the courtroom during the giving of testimony. As his testimony was based on, summarized, and was consistent with the evidence presented at trial, there would have been little if any reason to sequester him and the defendant was not prejudiced by allowing him to remain.

Malek v. Federal Ins. Co., 994 F.2d 49 (2d Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed a judgment against insureds who sued to recover the proceeds of a fire policy, holding it was error to exclude the plaintiffs' expert witness from the courtroom during the time when the insurer's expert testified. The insurer's expert testified that the fire was "intense," but he did not so find in his report, and the insured's expert could have assisted the insureds in cross-examining the insurer's expert. Moreover, the insureds' rebuttal testimony was important to the case, and the insureds had only a ten-minute recess between the testimony of the experts to confer with counsel. The dissenting Judge argued that the excluded expert was a "fact witness" who testified to his examination of the fire scene and was not the kind of witness whose testimony would be unaffected by being present during the other witness' testimony.

United States v. Burgess, 691 F.2d 1146 (4th Cir. 1982) : The Court found no error in permitting psychiatric experts for both sides on the defense of posttraumatic stress disorder to remain in Court throughout the proceedings, where written reports from the experts were delayed to the point that they were forthcoming from the defense only two days before trial and from the government on the second (and last) day of trial.

Polythane Sys. v. Marina Ventures Int'l, Ltd., 993 F.2d 1201 (5th Cir. 1993) : Affirming a judgment for the manufacturer of a flotation foam in an action seeking a declaration of nonliability for problems with a dock, the Court observed that an engineer had properly been excluded from the courtroom. Recognizing that "[e]xpert witnesses clearly fall within Rule 615(3)'s exception," the Court noted that the engineer was not listed as a Rule 702 expert and was tendered as a Rule 701 lay witness, and held there was no abuse of discretion in finding that the witness was not a person whose presence was essential. In Mayo v. Tri-Bell Indus., n7 the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a wrongful death case, finding that the Trial Judge properly exempted experts from sequestration, since they are permitted to testify on the basis of facts or data obtained at or before the hearing and may testify on the basis of facts or data provided by other witnesses in the case. In Miller v. Universal City Studios, Inc., n8 the Court approved a ruling excluding an expert witness who was provided with daily copy of testimony in violation of a sequestration order. The Court observed that "[w]hether or not it would be reasonable for a trial court to exempt an expert witness from a sequestration order, there is no required exemption under Rule 615."

United States v. Mohney, 949 F.2d 1397 (6th Cir. 1991) : In a tax evasion prosecution involving individual and corporate returns, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to sequester an IRS agent who would testify about the individual returns during summary testimony addressed to the corporate returns, as the calculations on the individual returns depended on those on the corporate returns. In Morvant v. Construction Aggregates Corp., n9 the Court said:

> We ... hold that where a party seeks to except an expert witness from exclusion under Rule 615 on the basis that he needs to hear firsthand the testimony of the witnesses, the decision whether to permit him to remain is within the discretion of the trial judge and should not normally be disturbed on appeal ... . On the other hand, where a fair showing has been made that the expert witness is in fact required for the management of the case, and this is made clear to the trial court, we believe that the trial court is bound to accept any reasonable, substantiated representation to this effect by counsel.

Hill v. Porter Memorial Hosp., 90 F.3d 220 (7th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a judgment for a hospital in a medical malpractice action, the Court concluded that a Magistrate Judge did not err in permitting two experts to testify, even though they had been provided with a transcript of one of the plaintiff's expert's testimony notwithstanding that a sequestration order was in place. The Magistrate Judge carefully examined the defense experts' testimony and found that it was not tailored to the testimony that had been transcribed. The Magistrate Judge took the extra steps of allowing each side's expert witnesses to consult the other's trial testimony, and instructing the jury that it could consider that a witness had reviewed trial testimony in evaluating that witness' testimony. In United States v. Crabtree, 979 F.2d 1261 (7th Cir. 1992) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in allowing an FBI agent, who had observed most of a bank fraud trial ostensibly as an expert witness on a check kiting charge, to testify regarding other charges as well. The agent could have qualified as a designated representative of the government and under Rule 703 it was proper for him to base his expert testimony on facts learned at trial.

United States v. Conners, 894 F.2d 987 (8th Cir. 1990) : The Court held, in affirming the defendant's bank fraud convictions, that there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an FDIC examiner, who was to be an expert witness for the government, to sit at counsel's table during the trial, as his presence was essential to his ability to testify effectively regarding exhibits before the jury and the nature of his testimony was not susceptible of being tainted by what he heard in the courtroom.

United States v. Seschillie, 310 F.3d 1208 (9th Cir. 2002) : The defendant, charged in connection with an incident involving four shootings, called an expert criminologist to testify about scenarios leading to accidental discharges. Although the government had no objection to the expert's presence in the courtroom during the victims' testimony, the Trial Judge ordered him excluded shortly after the trial commenced. The Court found the sequestration was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error), since the defense made a "fair showing" that the expert's presence was "essential," especially because at the time of the order the Judge had not yet precluded the witness from applying his opinions to the facts of the case. The Judge's concern that the expert's presence would create a false impression that his testimony had "some added substance" is not a reason for which Rule 615 authorizes exclusion.

[3] Expert and Fact Witness

Opus 3 Ltd. v. Heritage Park, Inc., 91 F.3d 625 (4th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a renovator against an apartment complex, holding that a general contractor hired by the defendant was properly excluded from the courtroom while evidence was presented. The contractor was both a fact witness and an expert witness, and the defendant claimed he was "a critical witness." The defendant failed to establish that the contractor needed to hear other witnesses in order to render an expert opinion, and because the contractor was a fact witness in part, the Court concluded that "[i]t is in precisely this circumstance that adherence to the sequestration rule is most important."

[4] Natural Persons

Varlack v. SWC Caribbean, Inc., 550 F.2d 171 (3d Cir. 1977) : Appealing a judgment for the plaintiff in a personal injury action against a corporation and its employee, the defendants complained that the principal officer of the corporation had been improperly sequestered. The Court held there was no error as to the principal officer and owner, because this person was described at trial as "a former owner," a description that did not identify with sufficient clarity his position with the corporation. Moreover, there was no showing that his presence was essential to the corporation's defense.

[5] Parties

Varlack v. SWC Caribbean, Inc., 550 F.2d 171 (3d Cir. 1977) : Appealing a judgment for the plaintiff in a personal injury action against a corporation and its employee, the defendants complained that the employee had been improperly sequestered. The Court held it was error to exclude the employee, who had been named only as a "John Doe" defendant until the complaint was formally amended after the trial started.

Roberts ex rel. Johnson v. Galen of Va., Inc., 325 F.3d 776 (6th Cir. 2003) : In an action alleging injuries resulting from a transfer of a patient from a hospital to a nursing facility, the Court affirmed a judgment for the hospital, finding no error in the refusal to sequester a defense witness before her testimony. The witness had been an official of the defendant at the time of the plaintiff's transfer, but by the time of trial the defendant no longer operated the hospital and in fact had no employees and had ceased operations entirely. The Court held that, even as a former employee, the witness was within the exception of Rule 615(2). The purpose of that exception is "to give corporations the right to have a representative present throughout a trial." If corporations without any employees were not entitled to any representative at trial at all, it "would be unfair given that natural parties," such as the plaintiff in this case, have the right to avoid sequestration.

Medite of N.M., Inc. v. NLRB, 72 F.3d 780 (10th Cir. 1995) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) for the Administrative Law Judge in an unfair labor practices case brought on behalf of dismissed strikers to refuse to exclude charging parties when each testified about common events.

Hull v. Merck & Co., 758 F.2d 1474 (11th Cir. 1985) : The Court held that a plaintiff, who was improperly sequestered, waived any error when he stated at the time the issue was first raised that he was willing to proceed.

[6] Party's Attorney

United States v. Reeder, 614 F.2d 1179 (8th Cir. 1980) : Affirming gambling convictions, the Court said that if this really were the odd case in which the defendant needed to call a codefendant's lawyer as a witness, he could have done so, and the lawyer would have been allowed to remain present in the courtroom.

Milicevic v. Fletcher Jones Imports, Ltd., 402 F.3d 912, 2005-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P74736 (9th Cir. 2005) : At trial in a case brought under the Magnuson-Morrison Warranty Act, the defendant moved to sequester the plaintiff's counsel, on the ground that counsel had first-hand knowledge of the underlying facts and was likely to be a witness in the case. The Judge denied the motion, but prohibited the attorney from examining witnesses on issues about which he had first-hand knowledge. Finding no error in the refusal to sequester counsel, the Court stated that counsel fell under the exception in Rule 615 for a person whose presence was essential to the presentation of the case.

[7] Person Whose Presence Is Essential

Bruneau ex rel. Schofield v. South Kortright Cent. School Dist., 163 F.3d 749 (2d Cir. 1998) : The Court held, in a sixth-grader's Title IX and § 1983 action for sexual harassment by fellow students, that there was no abuse of discretion in exempting two defense witnesses from a sequestration order. The Court observed that "[s]ix factors serve as guides to inform a district court's exercise of its discretion: (1) how critical is the sought-to-be-excluded witness's testimony; (2) whether that testimony is ordinarily subject to tailoring; (3) whether the testimony is likely to cover the same issues as other witnesses; (4) in what order will the witnesses be called; (5) whether any potential for bias exists that could incline a person to tailor his testimony; and (6) whether the witness's presence is essential or simply desirable." In this case, the Court concluded that the witnesses were most knowledgeable about school policy and underlying events and that their testimony was "not subject to tailoring" because they had been previously examined at length before trial and were present during the pretrial depositions of the plaintiff and most of her witnesses.

United States v. Agnes, 753 F.2d 293 (3d Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed a Hobbs Act conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in the Trial Judge's refusal to exempt the defendant's girl friend from a sequestration order. There was no showing that the witness had "such specialized expertise or intimate knowledge of the facts of the case that a party's attorney could not effectively function without the presence and aid of the witness or the witness would be unable to present essential testimony without hearing the trial testimony of other witnesses." In Government of Virgin Islands v. Edinborough, n10 during the defendant's trial for raping the 13-year-old daughter of his former wife, the mother was permitted to be present while her daughter testified. The Court recognized that Rule 615 provides parties with a right to sequestration of witnesses, but it found no prejudice arising from the ruling, as the statements made by the mother and daughter at the time of the offense did not differ from their trial testimony and the mother's presence might have been viewed as essential to the presentation of the government's case.

United States v. Green, 324 F.3d 375 (5th Cir. 2003) : Affirming drug, firearm, and money laundering convictions, the Court noted that it has never decided whether the government can designate more than one individual as its case agent, but that it had permitted exemption of more than one case agent when the presence of multiple agents was shown to be essential to the presentation of the case. The Court was not persuaded that the two agents were essential in this case, but there was no reversible error, because the defendant could identify no prejudice from the dual exemption.

United States v. Phibbs, 999 F.2d 1053 (6th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, holding there was no error in permitting a DEA agent to sit in the courtroom as an "essential" witness in addition to an FBI special agent who served as the government's representative. The Court noted that each agent was excluded from the courtroom when the other was testifying.

[8] Rebuttal Witnesses

United States v. Hargrove, 929 F.2d 316 (7th Cir. 1991) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, the Court held that there was no violation of a sequestration order when a witness was permitted to give testimony rebutting another witness whose testimony she had heard. The government did not intend to call her until the other witness testified, her testimony did not contravene the purpose of the sequestration order because it rebutted rather than confirmed the other witness', and it was limited to a narrow issue of police coercion in identification and did not reach the substance of the other witness' account regarding the defendant. In United States v. Bramlet, n11 the Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding it was not error to strike the testimony of an expert witness who violated a sequestration order by reading transcripts of the defense witnesses' testimony in preparing to rebut an insanity defense. The defendant had opposed a mistrial, and had only asked that the testimony be stricken. Moreover, the Court concluded that "application of the court's general exclusionary order to the government's rebuttal witnesses was unnecessary" since "the very function of a rebuttal witness is directed toward challenging the prior testimony of opposing witnesses."

United States v. Shurn, 849 F.2d 1090 (8th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that, after a government witness surprised the prosecution with his testimony, a police officer who had been present during the witness' testimony was properly permitted to relate a prior statement by the witness. The Court reasoned that the Trial Judge has broad discretion in implementing Rule 615, and that the purpose of a sequestration order is to prevent witnesses "from tailoring their testimony to that which has already been presented, not to prevent impeachment of witnesses."

United States v. Ell, 718 F.2d 291 (9th Cir. 1983) : The Court reversed a conviction for uttering an altered government check. It held that rebuttal witnesses who have testified during the government's case-in-chief are covered by a sequestration order and that when the Judge erroneously fails to enforce the sequestration rule against a witness, prejudice is presumed, and the burden is on the party who relied on the witness to demonstrate that the violation was harmless.

[9] Remedies for Violations

United States v. Magana, 127 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1997) : Affirming a conviction for entering into a sham marriage in violation of the immigration laws, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in denying a motion for mistrial after it was learned that the prosecution had prepared a witness in violation of the Trial Judge's sequestration order. The Court stated that upon discovery of a violation of a sequestration order, the "recommended" remedy is to "strike the offending evidence and promptly instruct the jury to disregard it." The Judge took "exactly these steps" and "the circumstances did not call for more extreme action." The Court noted that declaring a mistrial for a violation of a sequestration order "is a last resort, only to be implemented if the taint is ineradicable, that is, only if the trial judge believes that the jury's exposure to the evidence is likely to prove beyond realistic hope of repair." In United States v. Cox, n12 the Court stated that remedies for sequestration violations generally are left to the discretion of the Trial Judge.

Pickel v. United States, 746 F.2d 176 (3d Cir. 1984) : The Court reversed an order quashing summonses issued by the Internal Revenue Service. Although there was a violation by government witnesses of a sequestration order that governed a hearing on enforcement of the summonses, the Court found an abuse of discretion in the decision to quash the subpoenas rather than to utilize a lesser sanction, especially in the absence of a showing of prejudice.

United States v. Rhynes, 218 F.3d 310 (4th Cir. 2000) (en banc): The Judge in a six-defendant narcotics trial granted "the usual sequestration rule ... that the witnesses shall not discuss one with the other their testimony." The Court reversed an order to strike the testimony of the sole witness for one defendant, who had indicated that defense counsel had disclosed to him the testimony of a prosecution witness. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 615.02[5]. In United States v. Cropp, 127 F.3d 354 (4th Cir. 1997) , a crack distribution conspiracy prosecution, the Trial Judge struck the testimony of a witness after it became apparent that he had spoken with a defendant in plain violation of a sequestration order. The Court found no abuse of discretion, although it thought the Judge would have been well advised to employ a lesser sanction, in order to preserve both the purpose of the sequestration rule and the defendant's right to present a defense. It also concluded that the witness should have been more closely examined in voir dire before excluding him, to determine the extent of the taint of his testimony and the causes of that taint. In United States v. McMahon, n13 the Court affirmed (2-1) the conviction for criminal contempt of a defense witness subject to a sequestration order who paid his secretary to take extensive notes of the trial and who reviewed the daily transcript before testifying.

United States v. Posada-Rios, 158 F.3d 832 (5th Cir. 1998) : The Court held that there was no error in refusing to strike the testimony of witnesses who violated a sequestration order in a massive drug trafficking trial. The defendants were allowed a full opportunity to cross-examine the second witness, and the testimony elicited did not indicate that the witness' testimony was influenced by his improper conversations. The Trial Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing defense counsel permission to question the witnesses outside the jury's presence about the nature and extent of their conversations. In Jerry Parks Equip. Co. v. Southeast Equip. Co., n14 the Court found no abuse of discretion in striking the testimony of a witness who violated a sequestration order, although it observed that "lesser sanctions would appear more in order." In United States v. Ortega-Chavez, n15 where government rebuttal witnesses in a prosecution involving smuggling illegal aliens into the country violated a sequestration order, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the Trial Judge's decision to let them testify. In United States v. Warren, n16 the Court said that a party must show prejudice before a Court will reverse a case in which witnesses, who should have been sequestered, have been permitted to testify.

United States v. Gibson, 675 F.2d 825 (6th Cir. 1982) : The Court noted that violation of a sequestration order does not automatically require that a witness' testimony be rejected, but it approved the Trial Judge's decision to exclude a defense witness who remained in Court with the defendant's knowledge and consent after a sequestration request by the government was granted.

United States v. Tedder, 403 F.3d 836 (7th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to defraud the United States and money laundering, finding no abuse of discretion when a defense reputation witness was barred from testifying on rebuttal. The witness was in the courtroom during other testimony, after the Judge had entered an order forbidding testimony by anyone who had listened to other witnesses. The Court concluded that the defendant should have kept the witness out of the courtroom if he wanted the witness to testify or should have called another witness.

United States v. Covington, 133 F.3d 639 (8th Cir. 1998) : Affirming convictions for crack distribution, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the refusal to grant a mistrial after two of the witnesses spoke with each other when being transported from the courthouse to the jailhouse before one gave testimony. The two conversations were brief, a Marshal promptly instructed the witnesses not to talk about the case, and there was no showing that the contact resulted in less than candid testimony. In United States v. Wilson, 103 F.3d 1402 (8th Cir. 1997) , the Court, affirming drug and assault convictions, found no abuse of discretion when a defense witness was not permitted to testify after he had been present in the courtroom during several days of testimony despite a sequestration order.

United States v. Hobbs, 31 F.3d 918 (9th Cir. 1994) : At a hearing to suppress evidence in a drug possession case, the Trial Judge precluded two defense witnesses from testifying, after they entered the courtroom and observed the proceedings in violation of a sequestration order. The Court noted that exclusion of a witness is a strongly disfavored sanction and held the ruling below plain error in the absence of any evidence that the defendant or his counsel knew or consented to the witnesses' presence in the courtroom or that the witnesses were aware of the sequestration order. In United States v. Avila-Macias, n17 the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a surrebuttal witness who violated a sequestration order. The Court indicated, however, that disqualification of a witness is not a preferred remedy and emphasized the limited importance of the witness and the fault of defense counsel with respect to the sequestration violation.

United States v. Benally, 756 F.2d 773 (10th Cir. 1985) : Although the Court reversed a conviction for vehicular homicide, it held there was no error in refusing to permit a defense investigator to testify when he had sat at counsel table throughout the trial despite the Trial Judge's order sequestering witnesses.

United States v. Eyster, 948 F.2d 1196 (11th Cir. 1991) : During the trial of a drug smuggling conspiracy, several government witnesses allegedly discussed their testimony in violation of a sequestration order. Noting that such a violation may be treated by citing the guilty party for contempt, allowing cross-examination as to the nature of the violation, or striking testimony already given or disallowing further testimony, the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in denying a mistrial, given the curative cross-examination of the witnesses. In United States v. Monaco, n18 a government witness refused in the second trial of a drug conspiracy case to testify to matters about which he did not testify in the first trial. The Trial Judge held the witness in contempt and admitted the testimony from the first trial, despite the defendants' claim that they were denied an adequate opportunity to cross-examine the witness at the first trial. They claimed that the witness had violated a sequestration order and that the violation had been discovered after the first trial ended. The Court examined the order in which the witnesses testified at the first trial, the timing of the alleged violation, and the nature of the cross-examination by five different attorneys for the defense before concluding that the sequestration violation was collateral and did not affect the testimony at the first trial.

[10] Right To Sequestration

Hollman v. Dale Electronic, Inc., 752 F.2d 311 (8th Cir. 1985) : Although the Court affirmed a judgment for an employer and compensation carrier in a suit by a former employee, it found error in the Trial Judge's refusal to honor the plaintiff's request for sequestration of witnesses. The Court observed that sequestration is required when requested by a party unless one of the exceptions to the Rule applies.

[11] Scope of Sequestration

United States v. Sepulveda, 15 F.3d 1161 (1st Cir. 1993) : The Court noted, in reviewing drug trafficking conspiracy convictions, that the Rule's mandatory provisions extend only to preventing witnesses from hearing other witnesses testify and that limitations on witnesses discussing testimony with each other are subject to the Trial Judge's discretion. The Court held that housing three prosecution witnesses in the same cell block during the trial was not a violation of the Judge's order prohibiting witnesses from discussing the case after giving testimony and there was no other reason to suspect transgression of the sequestration order. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 615.02[4]. In United States v. Arruda, n19 the Court found that where two witnesses who had been sequestered met together during trial to discuss their testimony, the conduct "had the same potential effect as a violation of a sequestration order." It found, however, that the Trial Judge did not err in permitting them to testify and allowing evidence of the meetings to be revealed to the jury.

United States v. Friedman, 854 F.2d 535 (2d Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed racketeering convictions, holding that the Trial Judge did not err in permitting witnesses who had read portions of the trial transcript to testify. Although it recognized that the witnesses might have violated the Rule, the Court observed that the government did not cause them to do so and their exposure to the transcript was fully explored during their testimony.

United States v. Rhynes, 218 F.3d 310 (4th Cir. 2000) (en banc): The Judge in a six-defendant narcotics trial granted "the usual sequestration rule ... that the witnesses shall not discuss one with the other their testimony." When the sole witness for one defendant indicated that defense counsel had disclosed to him the testimony of a prosecution witness, the Judge granted the government's motion to strike the testimony and to exclude the witness from further testimony. Reversing, a plurality of the Court held that the Judge's reference to "the usual sequestration rule" was to Rule 615; Rule 615 serves only to exclude witnesses from the courtroom and did not prohibit defense counsel from discussing a prior witness' testimony; and the supplemental admonition that "the witnesses shall not discuss one with the other their testimony" was likewise no restraint on counsel. The plurality also held that the purpose and spirit of Rule 615 are not implicated by counsel's preparing a witness, and in any event must yield to counsel's constitutional and ethical duties. The Court held that even if there were a violation of the order in this case, exclusion of the witness' testimony in its entirety was unduly severe, since the proffered testimony covered other witnesses than the one counsel had discussed in the preparation and other topics that were crucial to the defendant's defense, and the fault, if any, was the lawyer's, not the defendant's. Three Judges, concurring in the judgment, believed it was an abuse of discretion not to determine exactly what counsel told the witness before imposing the sanction and it was therefore unnecessary for the Court to determine whether the counsel actually violated the sequestration order. One Judge, concurring in the judgment, believed that the counsel plainly did not violate the order, and thus it was unnecessary to decide the proper interpretation of Rule 615. Two Judges dissented on the grounds that Trial Judge had not abused his discretion in applying Rule 615, finding that counsel had violated the order, and imposing the sanction.

United States v. Rugiero, 20 F.3d 1387 (6th Cir. 1994) : The Court stated that it was not satisfied with the government's explanation that it had brought together two witnesses, after one had testified, in order to demonstrate to one reluctant witness that the other could implicate him. The Court concluded that "[b]ringing witnesses together in this fashion, especially without the court's consent, comes very close to a per se violation of this ancient and important rule of sequestration," but found no prejudicial error. The dissenting Judge would have reversed the defendant's conviction for "such an obvious and notorious violation."

United States v. Vallie, 284 F.3d 917 (8th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for sexual abuse offenses, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting courtroom spectators to communicate with sequestered witnesses, since "[t]here is no evidence that any conversations between trial observers and sequestered witnesses resulted in tailored testimony or otherwise prejudiced Vallie in any way." The Court added that it did not endorse the Judge's use of the term "asinine" in referring to sequestration, but noted that the remark was made outside the jury's hearing. In United States v. Calderin-Rodriguez, 244 F.3d 977 (8th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed drug convictions, finding no error in the refusal to strike the testimony of a government witness after the witness discussed his testimony with the prosecutor during a recess midway through his direct testimony. Noting that Rule 615 "does not by its terms forbid an attorney from conferring with witnesses," the Court held that the prosecutor violated neither Rule 615 nor the sequestration order in the case. The Trial Judge has the inherent authority to go beyond Rule 615 and prohibit such contacts in order to preserve the status quo between breaks and to prevent the coaching of witnesses, but in this case the Judge's order explicitly assumed that the attorneys would talk to witnesses.

United States v. Buchanan, 787 F.2d 477 (10th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed convictions for possessing an unregistered firearm and conspiracy, although it found that the Trial Judge erred in ruling that a witness did not violate a sequestration order when she talked to other witnesses about their testimony. In United States v. Greschner, n20 the Court stated that Rule 615 requires not only that prospective witnesses be excluded from the courtroom, but also that they be prohibited from discussing the case with other witnesses. In our view, Rule 615 by its terms applies only to the exclusion of witnesses from the courtroom. However, Trial Courts can and should go further, and exercise their inherent power to ensure that witnesses do not discuss the case with other witnesses.

United States v. Jimenez, 780 F.2d 975 (11th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed marijuana convictions, although it rejected the government's argument that an agent did not violate a sequestration order when he read another agent's testimony at a prior trial that ended in a mistrial. The Court stated that "there is no difference between reading and hearing testimony for purposes of Rule 615," but it upheld the Trial Judge's decision not to grant a mistrial and to permit instead full cross-examination of the agent concerning the violation. In United States v. Alvarez, n21 the Court held that there was no error in a prosecution for drug offenses and the murder of a federal agent where the Trial Judge permitted government agents who testified to remain in the courtroom to hear the case after they were excused as witnesses.

[12] Sequestration Order Never Entered

United States v. Williams, 136 F.3d 1166 (7th Cir. 1998) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no violation of Rule 615 when one prosecution witness spoke to another. The defendant had never requested a sequestration order, so such an order was never entered. While the parties had stipulated that the witnesses would be sequestered, a violation of this stipulation did not implicate Rule 615. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 615.02[4].

[13] Suppression Hearing

United States v. Brewer, 947 F.2d 404 (9th Cir. 1991) : The Court reversed a conviction for possession of cocaine, holding that a witness should have been excluded from a suppression hearing on the defendant's motion. Under Rule 1101(d)(1) the traditional exclusionary rules do not apply, but the procedural rules regulating the process of admission and exclusion remain applicable. Because Rule 615 is a procedural rule directed at the fairness of the proceedings, and not a rule affecting the type of evidence that can be considered, it applies in suppression hearings. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 615.02[8].

[14] Unexpected Need for Testimony

United States v. Green, 305 F.3d 422 (6th Cir. 2002) : In a trial for narcotics trafficking and failure to appear at sentencing, the key prosecution witness identified the defendant (Willie Green) as the "Kenny Green" who was his supplier. On cross-examination, defense counsel produced a letter from the witness to his wife stating that a "Willie Green" got picked up in Florida and asking who he was. The government then called the witness' attorney to testify about how the witness learned the defendant's identity. The attorney testified over objection, since the attorney had been present in court for some of his client's testimony. The Court found no violation of the Trial Judge's sequestration order, since the government had no way to know that the attorney might have to testify and thus should be excluded while his client testified.

Advisory Committee's Note

The efficacy of excluding or sequestering witnesses has long been recognized as a means of discouraging and exposing fabrication, inaccuracy and collusion. 6 Wigmore §§ 1837-1838. The authority of the judge is admitted, the only question being whether the matter is committed to his discretion or one of right. The rule takes the latter position. No time is specified for making the request.

Several categories of persons are excepted. (1) Exclusion of persons who are parties would raise serious problems of confrontation and due process. Under accepted practice they are not subject to exclusion. 6 Wigmore § 1841. (2) As the equivalent of the right of a natural-person party to be present, a party which is not a natural person is entitled to have a representative present. Most of the cases have involved allowing a police officer who has been in charge of an investigation to remain in court despite the fact that he will be a witness. United States v. Infanzon, 235 F.2d 318 (2d Cir. 1956) ; Portomene v. United States, 221 F.2d 582 (5th Cir. 1955) ; Powell v. United States, 208 F.2d 618 (6th Cir. 1953) ; Jones v. United States, 252 F. Supp. 781 (W.D. Okla. 1966) . Designation of the representative by the attorney rather than by the client may at first glance appear to be an inversion of the attorney-client relationship, but it may be assumed that the attorney will follow the wishes of the client, and the solution is simple and workable. See California Evidence Code § 777. (3) The category contemplates such persons as an agent who handled the transaction being litigated or an expert needed to advise counsel in the management of the litigation. See 6 Wigmore § 1841 n.4.

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendment is technical. No substantive change is intended."]

[Following the 1987 amendments to Rule 615, Congress adopted a technical amendment inserting a missing word, effective November 18, 1988. Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, Pub. L. 100-690, § 7075(a), 102 Stat. 4181 (1988).]

[2] 1998 Amendment Committee Note

1998 Amendment Committee Note

The amendment is in response to: (1) the Victim's Rights and Restitution Act of 1990, 42 U.S.C. § 10606, which guarantees, within certain limits, the right of a crime victim to attend the trial; and (2) the Victim Rights Clarification Act of 1997 (18 U.S.C. § 3510).

[3] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

Many district courts permit government counsel to have an investigative agent at counsel table throughout the trial although the agent is or may be a witness. The practice is permitted as an exception to the rule of exclusion and compares with the situation defense counsel finds himself in -- he always has the client with him to consult during the trial. The investigative agent's presence may be extremely important to government counsel, especially when the case is complex or involves some specialized subject matter. The agent, too, having lived with the case for a long time, may be able to assist in meeting trial surprises where the best-prepared counsel would otherwise have difficulty. Yet, it would not seem the Government could often meet the burden under Rule 615 of showing that the agent's presence is essential. Furthermore, it could be dangerous to use the agent as a witness as early in the case as possible, so that he might then help counsel as a nonwitness, since the agent's testimony could be needed in rebuttal. Using another, nonwitness agent from the same investigative agency would not generally meet government counsel's needs.

This problem is solved if it is clear the investigative agents are within the group specified under the second exception made in the Rule, for "an officer or employee of a party which is not a natural person designated as its representative by its attorney." It is our understanding that this was the intention of the House committee. It is certainly this committee's construction of the Rule.

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 615, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

(d) a person authorized by statute to be present.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 615 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

[1] Designated Representative [Go To Main]

[b] Designated Representative -- Criminal Cases

[i] Designated Case Agent

United States v. Charles, 456 F.3d 249 (1st Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for assault upon a federal officer, finding no abuse of discretion when a case agent was permitted to sit at the counsel table. There is no requirement under Rule 615(2) that the designated representative be essential to the party's case, and the concerns addressed by Rule 615 were sufficiently accommodated by having the agent testify first before joining the prosecutor at the counsel table.

United States v. Avalos, 506 F.3d 972 (10th Cir. 2007) , vacated for reconsideration of sentencing, 129 S. Ct. 993 (2009) : Appealing a conviction for distribution of methamphetamine, the defendant argued that it was error to allow the government's case agent to be present during witness testimony, as he was later called by the defendant as a rebuttal witness. The Court noted that "the government may designate a case agent responsible for an investigation as its representative under Rule 615(2)," but it found error in the fact that the government had not formally designated the witness as its Rule 615(2) representative on the record at the time the defendant moved for sequestration. The error was harmless, however.

[2] Expert Witnesses

United States v. Olofson, 563 F.3d 652 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for illegally transferring a machine gun, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant's firearm expert was excluded from the courtroom during the testimony of the government's expert. The Court rejected the argument that merely because Rule 703 contemplates that an expert may render an opinion based on facts or data made known at trial necessarily means that an expert is exempt from a Rule 615 sequestration order.

[9] Remedies for Violations [Go To Main]

United States v. Smith, 441 F.3d 254 (4th Cir. 2006) : In the prosecution of a cocaine distribution conspiracy, a defendant's daughter was called by the defense to testify regarding the defendant's relationship with his son, the son's various periods of incarceration, and the defendant's employment. On motion of the government, the Trial Judge limited the witness' testimony to the defendant's character, and excluded testimony about any substantive issues, because the witness had violated an order sequestering witnesses by being present during testimony on two different days. Noting that exclusion of a witness' testimony is "an extreme remedy" to be employed sparingly, the Court held that the order was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) because the primary purpose of the witness' testimony was to impeach the son's testimony, and she was not present even in the courthouse when he testified, so it was not possible that she could have tailored her testimony to his in any way.

United States v. Franklin, 561 F.3d 398 (5th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for drug and firearms offenses, the government had intended to call three coconspirators who had pleaded guilty to testify. The first testified for a morning and gave damaging testimony before a lunch recess, during which he discussed the case with the other two. The prosecution had failed to inform the testifying witness of the sequestration rule. The Trial Judge limited the testifying witness' further testimony to a brief cross-examination and precluded the other two coconspirators from testifying at all. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the remedy chosen for the sequestration violation. The Court rejected the defendants' argument that the Judge should have stricken the direct testimony in its entirety and permitted the witness to be examined regarding his violation of the rule, observing that any examination about the rule violation might have led to the jury hearing hearsay concerning some of the defendants' guilt.

[11] Scope of Sequestration [Go To Main]

United States v. Guthrie, 557 F.3d 243 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court held that Rule 615 was not violated when the prosecutor spoke with the victim-witness during a recess in the middle of the witness' cross-examination. Rule 615 orders prevent witnesses from speaking with other witnesses, not with counsel. Here the Judge, while permitting the prosecutor to talk with the witness, also stated that the prosecutor could not coach the witness.

United States v. Camacho, 555 F.3d 695 (8th Cir. 2009) : Affirming convictions in a drug conspiracy case, the Court found no abuse of discretion in a ruling that a husband and wife did not violate a sequestration order by discussing their testimony with each other. The Judge had informed the parties and their counsel that it had taken the defense request for sequestration to be simply a motion for exclusion of witnesses so that they could not hear one another while testifying.

Rule 701. Opinion Testimony by Lay Witnesses

If the witness is not testifying as an expert, the witness' testimony in the form of opinions or inferences is limited to those opinions or inferences which are (a) rationally based on the perception of the witness, (b) helpful to a clear understanding of the witness' testimony or the determination of a fact in issue, and (c) not based on scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge within the scope of Rule 702.

CHAPTER 701 RULE 701

3-701 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 701.02

701.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] The Vague Distinction Between Opinion and Fact

Rule 701 marks a departure from the common law. The Rule provides that a witness may testify in the form of opinion if the opinion is rationally based on the perception of the witness and helpful in understanding the testimony or in determining a fact in issue. Judge Learned Hand succinctly criticized the common-law rule, which generally prohibited lay witnesses from testifying in the form of an opinion: n1

> The truth is ... that the exclusion of opinion evidence has been carried beyond reason in this country, and that it would be a large advance if courts were to admit it with freedom. The line between opinion and fact is at best only one of degree, and also depends solely upon practical considerations, as, for example, the saving of time and the mentality of the witness. ... It is a good rule as nearly as one can, to reproduce the scene as it was, and so to correct the personal equations of the witnesses. But one must be careful not to miss the forest for the trees, as generally happens, unless much latitude is allowed.

Judge Hand's view carries the day in Rule 701. Lay witness opinion is admissible so long as it would be helpful to the factfinder and it is rationally based on personal perception. n2 If, on the other hand, the opinion is too abstract and it would be more helpful for the witness to testify to raw data, then the Trial Court can exercise its discretion to exclude the opinion. n3 And if the witness' opinion is speculative or is not based on personal knowledge, it must be excluded. n4

[2] Helpfulness to the Factfinder

Rule 701 properly recognizes that a lay witness' opinion can be helpful to the factfinder, indeed more helpful at times than the raw data on which the opinion is based. An opinion is often a convenient shorthand device. For example, testimony that a person was "excited" or "angry" is more evocative and understandable than a long, physical description of the person's outward manifestations. n5 There is little danger that Rule 701 will open the door to unfounded and conclusory lay opinions. If the opinion is unfounded, or if the opinion is in the form of a legal conclusion (e.g., "he is guilty"), it will be readily excluded as unhelpful. n6

The Ninth Circuit case of United States v. Yazzie, 976 F.2d 1252, 1254-56 (9th Cir. 1992) , provides an extensive discussion and valuable application of Rule 701. Yazzie was charged with statutory rape. The federal statute, unlike that of many states, permits a defense of reasonable mistake as to the age of the minor. Yazzie claimed that he reasonably believed that the minor was over 16 years old at the time of the incident; in fact, she was fifteen-and-a-half. To establish the reasonableness of his belief, Yazzie called several witnesses who offered to testify that as of the date of the alleged sexual abuse, their observations caused them to believe the minor to be between 16 and 20 years old. The Trial Judge excluded this testimony as impermissible opinion. The witnesses were permitted to testify to "facts," such as that the minor smoked cigarettes, wore make-up, and drove a car. But they were not permitted to give their opinion as to how old they thought she was.

The Court of Appeals found the Trial Judge's limitation on opinion testimony to be reversible error. It analyzed the question as follows:

> We understand Rule 701 to mean that opinions of non-experts may be admitted where the facts could not otherwise be adequately presented or described to the jury in such a way as to enable the jury to form an opinion or reach an intelligent conclusion. If it is impossible or difficult to reproduce the data observed by the witnesses, or the facts are difficult of explanation, or complex, or are of a combination of circumstances and appearances which cannot be adequately described and presented with the force and clearness as they appeared to the witness, the witness may state his impressions and opinions based upon what he observed. It is a means of conveying to the jury what the witness has seen or heard.

The Yazzie Court explained how the witnesses' opinions as to the minor's age would be helpful to the jury:

> The testimony helps in the understanding of the witnesses' descriptive testimony and in determining a critical fact at issue -- whether it was reasonable for Yazzie to believe that the minor was 16 or older. In the case before us, the jurors could not themselves assess how old the minor looked at the time of the incident: by the time of the trial, the minor was almost 17 years old, and her appearance was undoubtedly substantially different than it had been on the night in question, a year and a half earlier. Thus, the jurors were wholly dependent on the testimony of witnesses. Yet the witnesses were permitted to testify only to the minor's describable features and behavior. Their testimony was no substitute for a clear and unequivocal statement of their opinions. It did not tell the jury that these witnesses believed the minor to be at least 16 years old at the time of the incident.

The Court also noted that Rule 701 is particularly helpful when the so-called "facts" to which the witness would otherwise have to testify are essentially indescribable:

> Our finding that the trial judge erred in not admitting the opinions of Yazzie's witnesses as to the minor's age is supported by all of the considerations that underlie Rule 701's authorization of the use of lay opinion testimony. First, it is difficult to distinguish a fifteen-and-a-half-year-old from a 16-year-old, and it is still more difficult to put into words why one believes that a person is one age and not the other. There is a certain intangible element involved in one's conclusions on such a question. We form an opinion of a person's age from a combination of circumstances and appearances which cannot be adequately described and presented with the force and clearness as they appear to us. Mannerisms and facial features are notoriously difficult to describe accurately, and one's reasons for concluding that a person is a particular age are both too complex and too indefinable to set out fully. In addition, a witness may not know, let alone be able to report precisely, what factors induced his or her conclusion. In such a case, the fact that the witness reached the conclusion is the important part of the testimony, not the largely undeterminable or inexplicable reasons that prompted the conclusion.
> Furthermore, age is a matter on which everyone has an opinion. Knowingly or unknowingly, we all form conclusions about people's ages every day. It is therefore particularly appropriate for a lay witness to express an opinion on the subject.

The Yazzie Court concluded that the limitation on opinion testimony "deprived the jury of the most direct evidence available as to the age that the minor reasonably appeared to be on the night of the incident. Thus, the Judge's ruling constituted a clear abuse of discretion." n7

The age of a person is thus a proper subject of lay testimony because the conclusion is more helpful to the jury than the indescribable raw data on which the conclusion is based. Similar reasoning applies to lay testimony as to the speed of an object, such as a car. Testimony by eyewitnesses as to the approximate speed of a vehicle is routinely admitted as helpful to the jury under Rule 701. n8

[3] Personal Knowledge Required

Rule 701 requires that the lay opinion must be based on personal knowledge; the Rule does not permit lay witnesses to speculate about events that they have not perceived. n9 Nor is the Rule designed to permit completely hypothetical testimony. The Rule implies that the Judge may exclude opinion evidence if it is confusing; or if it is not helpful in clarifying the testimony of the witness and in understanding the facts of the case; or if it goes well beyond the facts presented. n10

It is to be expected that most direct examinations will elicit the underlying facts giving rise to an opinion or inference as well as the opinion or inference itself. If the jury is aware of the basis of the opinion, it is likely to give it more weight than an opinion unsupported by facts. n11 Should the direct-examiner fail to elicit the basic facts, the cross-examiner must weigh the potential advantages of proving the basic facts on cross-examination in an attempt to discredit or weaken the opinion against the potential disadvantage of making a witness look highly credible by permitting him to provide detailed facts or answers to the cross-examiner's questions. The risk may be worth it where there is an indication that the witness' basis is shaky, or where cross-examination as to basis would uncover other negative information about the witness. n12

[4] Inferences Drawn By Lay Witnesses

Lay witnesses are permitted to draw reasonable inferences from their personal perceptions. Indeed, it can hardly be otherwise. A witness who sees a driver with an unruly look on his face shaking a middle finger and yelling out the window at another driver is permitted to draw the inference that the driver was angry. Yazzie is obviously a case where the witnesses should have been permitted to draw an inference about the complainant's age on the basis of their personal knowledge. However, where the lay witness draws a conclusion that is simply not reasonably supported by what they know, their opinion is unhelpful to the factfinder and should be excluded under Rule 701. Illustrative is United States v. Santos, 201 F.3d 953 (7th Cir. 2000) . The defendant was a public official, the Treasurer for the City of Chicago, charged with extorting campaign contributions. Crucial to the case was evidence that certain contractors with the defendant's office were terminated for refusing to pay up. The actual terminations were ordered by an assistant in the office, John Henry, but employees in the office were permitted to testify that they had "no doubt" or a "personal feeling" that Santos, the head of the office, ordered Henry to order the terminations. These witnesses drew an inference from their knowledge of Santos' management style, which they described as dictatorial and intrusive. Judge Posner declared that the witnesses were properly permitted to testify to Santos' management style, but they should not have been permitted to draw the inference that Santos ordered Henry to terminate the contractors. He explained as follows:

> The way in which Santos managed the Treasurer's office, a small office, was a matter within the range of these witnesses' personal observation. Had they stopped with their testimony about Santos' management style, the prosecutor could have asked the jury to infer that it was likely that Henry would not have ordered the cutoffs himself, that he was just her messenger boy. But instead the witnesses were permitted to draw the inference themselves, and in doing so they stepped outside the boundaries of their personal knowledge and invaded the province of the jury.

> It is true that Rule 701 does not interdict all inference drawing by lay witnesses. That would be absurd, since almost all testimony, even testimony as to what one has seen, is inferential in the sense that a reasoning process, however rudimentary, is being applied to the raw sense data. But the inferences must be tethered to perception, to what the witness saw or heard. What the witnesses here saw and heard was how Santos managed the office, but it was an impermissible leap to infer the existence of an express order by Santos on a particular matter. Not because the witnesses were not expert witnesses, who are permitted to testify to matters of which they lack personal knowledge, but because the inferences that they tried to draw were too speculative to count as evidence. n13

The Trial Judge must make a judgment call in assessing whether the lay witness' inference is reasonably based on personal knowledge or a speculative leap of faith. This will not be easy, but obviously the inference will be more sustainable if it is based on substantial personal knowledge and results from an unremarkable application of logic and experience to a certain set of facts -- such as the question of age in Yazzie. n14 We believe that Santos is a closer case than Judge Posner would have it. If the witnesses knew that Santos was a dictator and a control freak, it would seem reasonable to for them to infer that a major matter such as a public contract would be within her control. It would be another thing if the witnesses were to infer that the Mayor of Chicago must have ordered the terminations because, after all, the Mayor is the top public official. That inference would be unreasonable and speculative; the inference that the witnesses drew in Santos is significantly more reasonable.

[5] Order of Presentation

In the course of carrying out its responsibilities under Rule 611 to control the flow of evidence at trial, the Trial Court at times may find it desirable to require a witness to begin with a statement of the data, observations, or material relied upon to support an opinion before the witness is allowed to actually state the opinion. One advantage of such a procedure is that, if an objection to the opinion is likely, the Trial Judge is on notice as to the witness' basis before the jury is made aware of the opinion. If the Trial Judge ultimately concludes that the opinion either is not rationally based on the perceptions of the witness or is not helpful to the jury, the Judge can strike testimony concerning the material used to formulate the opinion and need not fear that the jury will be influenced by the opinion itself, which the jury will not have heard.

[6] Legal Conclusions of Lay Witnesses

Because the opinion of a lay witness must be helpful to be admissible, it follows that a lay witness cannot be permitted to draw conclusions of law on the stand. A witness who testifies that he or she thought the defendant was "guilty" or had acted "with malice aforethought" is not helping the jury. Rather, the witness is usurping the role of the jury. n15

It does not follow, however, that every opinion that uses law-related terms is automatically inadmissible. Many law-based terms have an accepted lay meaning, and testimony employing such terms could be helpful to a jury in a particular case. Thus, if a witness testifies that two people had "a contract," this is not necessarily inadmissible, unless the very question in the case is whether the two people had a legally enforceable contract. n16 Testimony that two people had a contract may well operate as a convenient shorthand device that will assist the jury and expedite the trial, though the jury should be instructed as to the difference between lay and legal definitions.

United States v. Koon, 34 F.3d 1416 (9th Cir. 1994) , provides a good example of lay opinion that is helpful, rather than a legal conclusion. Two police officers appealed their convictions for the deprivation of the rights of an arrestee, Rodney King, who was severely beaten after a high speed chase. The federal convictions were obtained after a state trial on the same matter resulted in a mistrial on one state count and an acquittal on all other state counts. The Court held that testimony in the state trial, by an officer who was at the scene of the beating (and who was actually acquitted as a defendant in both trials), was properly admitted against the two convicted defendants in the federal trial. The defendants objected to the officer's testimony that one of the defendants was "out of control" during the beating. In their view, this was just another way of saying that excessive force was employed -- and the use of excessive force was the very question that the jury would have to decide. The Court responded that "the ultimate issue was not whether the defendants were out of control, but whether they willfully used unreasonable force." The Court concluded that the officer's observation was helpful to the jury (it was a meaningful shorthand device to describe a person's conduct) and was rationally based on the officer's personal perception of the beating. If the witness had used the legal buzzwords, "excessive force," it might well have been excluded -- but colloquial terminology short of that conclusion can be helpful to the jury.

[7] The Distinction Between Lay and Expert Witnesses and the 2000 Amendment to Rule 701

What is the difference between an expert and a lay witness? The Ninth Circuit addressed this question in United States v. Figueroa-Lopez, 125 F.3d 1241 (9th Cir. 1997) , and many other Courts have struggled with that same question. Decisions such as Figueroa-Lopez spurred the Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules to propose an amendment to Rule 701 that would provide a more bright-line delineation between expert and lay witnesses. That amendment became effective December 1, 2000. The result in Figueroa-Lopez is essentially codified by the amendment, and relied upon in the Committee Note, so it is useful to consider the facts and background of that case. Lopez was charged and convicted of possession of cocaine with intent to distribute. He asserted error in the Trial Court's permission of testimony from law enforcement agents. In his view, the law enforcement agents were presented as expert witnesses, and yet they were neither disclosed as such before trial, nor qualified as such at trial. The government argued that the officers' testimony was permissible lay witness testimony under Rule 701. Lopez argued that the testimony from the agents could only be admitted under Rule 702.

An overview of the facts in Figueroa-Lopez illustrates the difficulty that the Court had before it. An undercover agent named Storm approached Lopez about a drug transaction. For about a month, Lopez spoke by telephone several times with Storm about the impending cocaine deal. These conversations were recorded. On May 25, 1995, Storm called Lopez and arranged to meet later that day in a parking lot to complete the cocaine transaction. Before meeting with Storm, Lopez drove in circles around the parking lot in a Monte Carlo. Storm and Lopez then met in the parking lot. Lopez drove away from Storm and parked next to a silver Nissan Sentra. Lopez entered the Nissan, bent down for several minutes, and then returned to the Monte Carlo. Lopez returned to Storm's location and showed Storm a kilogram package of cocaine. Storm gave the arrest signal, and agents arrested Lopez. In the Monte Carlo, the agents found the keys to the Nissan and one kilogram of cocaine on the floor below the front seat. In the Nissan, the agents found nine kilograms of cocaine concealed in the car's door panels.

Lopez interposed an entrapment defense, claiming that Storm had pressured him into selling drugs in order to pay off a debt, and that he had no prior experience with drug dealing. Throughout the trial, the Government presented opinion testimony by law enforcement witnesses as to how Lopez's conduct, as observed by the agents, conformed to the methods and techniques of experienced drug dealers. Lopez objected to this testimony, claiming that it was improper expert testimony because the Government had not qualified the witnesses as experts, and had not given prior notice of expert witness testimony as required by Fed. R. Crim. P. 16(a)(1)(E). That Rule states that "the government shall disclose to the defendant a written summary of testimony the government intends to use under" Rule 702, and that the summary "must describe the witnesses' opinions, the bases and the reasons therefor, and the witnesses' qualifications." (A similar disclosure requirement applies in civil cases under Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(a)(2), though it is limited to experts who are specially retained to give testimony).

The Trial Judge overruled all of Lopez's objections and admitted the testimony as proper lay opinion. The testimony regarding the way Lopez was driving, from which the agent inferred that Lopez was behaving as an "experienced narcotics trafficker," was found admissible because the officer was a "percipient witness." The Trial Judge also permitted the agents to testify that: (1) Lopez's actions were "countersurveillance" and "a common practice for narcotics dealers"; (2) Lopez's use of a rental car during the transaction was "indicative of an experienced narcotics trafficker"; (3) certain terms used by Lopez and Storm were code words for a drug deal, a common practice of narcotics dealers; (4) the manner of hiding the cocaine was consistent with the practices of experienced drug traffickers; and (5) the large quantity and high purity of the cocaine indicated that Lopez was close to the source of the cocaine. Agents repeatedly referred to Lopez's actions as consistent with an "experienced narcotics trafficker." The prosecution, during examination of the agents and in closing argument, continually emphasized the experience of the officers as supporting their ability to make such assessments.

The Court of Appeals found that it was error to permit all this testimony in the guise of lay witness testimony. The testimony would have been admitted as expert testimony, because it clearly assisted the trier of fact in understanding matters beyond the understanding of ordinary jurors, i.e., the modus operandi of drug dealers. The Court noted, as an example, that one of the agents "began his testimony with a recitation of his extensive training and experience with the DEA" and that "had the Government opted to do so, Larsen could have been formally qualified as an expert witness on the dispositive issue of whether Lopez's behavior suggested that he was an 'experienced' -- as contrasted with a fledgling -- drug trafficker." However, this routine process did not occur in Figueroa-Lopez. The Government conceded that it made no effort properly to qualify the witnesses as having the knowledge, experience, training, or education to render their testimony admissible under Rule 702.

The government argued that it was unnecessary to qualify the witnesses as experts, contending that Rules 701 and 702 are not mutually exclusive. In the government's view, where the expert's testimony is on a specialized (as opposed to a scientific) subject, a witness with the requisite experience in the subject matter can testify either as an expert or as a lay witness.

The Figueroa-Lopez Court rejected the government's position, stating that the overlap between Rules 702 and 701 is not nearly as broad as the government would have it. Where testimony requires extensive experience beyond matters of common knowledge, it must be treated as, and regulated as, expert testimony. The Court emphasized the fact that the government treated its law enforcement witnesses as experts, continually emphasizing their "specialized" training and experience. It would not do for the government to trumpet its witnesses as experts and yet avoid the obligations of disclosure and qualification that are applicable to expert witnesses.

The Figueroa-Lopez Court noted the dangers of the government's blurring the line between expert and lay witnesses:

> The Government's argument simply blurs the distinction between Federal Rules of Evidence 701 and 702. Lay witness testimony is governed by Rule 701, which limits opinions to those "rationally based on the perception of the witness." Rule 702, on the other hand, governs admission of expert opinion testimony concerning "specialized knowledge." The testimony in this case is precisely the type of "specialized knowledge" governed by Rule 702. A holding to the contrary would encourage the Government to offer all kinds of specialized opinions without pausing first properly to establish the required qualifications of their witnesses. The mere percipience of a witness to the facts on which he wishes to tender an opinion does not trump Rule 702. Otherwise, a layperson witnessing the removal of a bullet from a heart during an autopsy could opine as to the cause of the decedent's death. Surely a civilian bystander, or for that matter a raw DEA recruit would not be allowed to interpret for the jury Lopez's behavior in the parking lot on May 25, 1995 as that of an "experienced" trafficker merely because that person was an eyewitness to the same.
> In addition, the Government's argument subverts the requirements of Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 16(a)(1)(E). Rule 16 requires the Government to "disclose to the defendant a written summary of [expert] testimony the government intends to use ... during its case in chief." The Rule "is intended to minimize surprise that often results from unexpected testimony, reduce the need for continuances, and to provide the opponent with a fair opportunity to test the merit of the expert's testimony through focused cross-examination." Rule [Crim. P.] 16(a)(1)(E) (advisory committee's note).

So, what is the exact delineation between testimony of a lay witness and that of an expert? The Figueroa-Lopez Court offered this distinction. When one officer testified that Lopez's driving the car several times around the parking lot before the transaction was "suspicious," this was permissible lay witness testimony because it related to matters "common enough" to be within the purview of any witness with any kind of life experience. It is common knowledge that a person is acting out of the ordinary when he makes a point of driving a car multiple times around a parking lot for no apparent purpose. However, where the officers testified that the defendant's activity was consistent with that of an experienced narcotics trafficker, some specialized experience was required. People don't get that kind of experience in the ordinary walks of life.

Admittedly, the distinction put forth in Figueroa-Lopez -- between an opinion that movement of a car was suspicious (within the province of a lay witness), and an opinion that a driver was engaged in "countersurveillance activity" (within the exclusive province of an expert) -- is a fine one. However, some line must be drawn, or else the disclosure requirements of the Civil and Criminal Rules, and the qualification requirements of Evidence Rule 702, would be too easily evaded.

Courts have struggled with the distinctions between lay and expert opinion in civil cases as well. Sometimes the reason for the dispute between the parties on this matter is because the proponent hopes to evade the requirements for expert testimony laid down by Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, 509 U.S. 579 (1993) . The Court in Daubert anointed Trial Judges as "gatekeepers," and required Trial Courts to independently assess the reliability of expert testimony. Under Daubert, the Trial Court must assure itself that the expert testimony proceeds from sufficient "scientific, technical or specialized knowledge" as required by Rule 702. The Daubert Court held that a Trial Judge must independently evaluate proffered expert testimony to assure that it is at least minimally reliable.

In the leading case of Asplundh Mfg. Div. v. Benton Harbor Engineering, 57 F.3d 1190 (3rd Cir. 1995) , Judge Becker reviewed the testimony of a purported lay witness who testified that an accident was caused because a mechanical lift had been defectively designed. The witness based his testimony on his extensive experience with maintaining and operating machinery such as that used in the accident. Judge Becker relied on the "spirit" of Daubert, and declared that "under Rule 701 the trial judge must play some gatekeeping role so as to ensure that the rationally derived and helpfulness requirements of the rule are met." In other words, if the witness is testifying to technical or highly specialized subject matter, the gatekeeping requirements of Daubert cannot be evaded simply by labeling the witness as a lay rather than expert witness.

One reading the Asplundh opinion is struck by Judge Becker's own dissatisfaction with the method he had to employ to prevent a party from avoiding the reliability requirements of Rule 702. He would clearly have liked to hold, as the Court did in Figueroa-Lopez, that testimony on specialized subject matter must be admissible under Rule 702 or not at all. However, he could not find such a result in the broad wording of Rule 701 as it was written at the time. Judge Becker's view was that if the witness' testimony is "rationally based on personal perception" and would assist the trier of fact, then it is admissible under the terms of Rule 701 regardless of whether it deals with technical or specialized subject matter.

Judge Becker did not seem too happy with the absence of subject matter delineation in Rule 701. In his view, the Rule as then written provided an unhealthy overlap with Rule 702. Judge Becker suggested that subject matter distinctions in Rule 701 "can and might well be made by the drafters of the Federal Rules," and that "a better formulation of the lay opinion rule would perhaps eliminate these matters [i.e., testimony on scientific, technical or specialized subject matter] from the ambit of Rule 701." Judge Becker took "the liberty of commending this issue to the attention of the Judicial Conference Advisory Committee on Rules of Evidence, which monitors developments in evidence jurisprudence."

The Advisory Committee on the Federal Rules of Evidence, which one of the authors of this Treatise serves as Reporter, took Judge Becker up on his invitation. The Rule now provides that testimony cannot be admitted under Rule 701 if it is based on scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge within the scope of Rule 702. The Committee

Note to the Rule 701 amendment states that the intent is "to eliminate the risk that the reliability requirements set forth in Rule 702 will be evaded through the simple expedient of proffering an expert in lay witness clothing" and also to ensure "that a party will not evade the expert witness disclosure requirements set forth in Fed.R.Civ.P. 26 and Fed.R.Crim.P. 16 by simply calling an expert witness in the guise of a layperson." The Advisory Committee's position was that the amendment was not a sea change in existing law, because Courts such as Figueroa-Lopez and Asplundh had already barred attempts to evade Rule 702 by calling an expert in the guise of a lay witness.

The Department of Justice [DOJ] adamantly opposed the amendment to Rule 701. DOJ officials argued that the amendment would require the government to qualify many witnesses as experts who have traditionally been considered lay witnesses. As an example, DOJ postulated a case where a senior citizen who lived in a neighborhood for a long time would be called to testify that she saw the defendant engaged in drug activity on the street corner. DOJ argued that this would be testimony based on "specialized knowledge" and therefore the witness would have to be qualified as an expert under the amendment. Moreover, she would have to be disclosed as an expert in advance of trial under Fed. R. Crim. P. 16. And this could mean that her safety would be put in jeopardy.

The Advisory Committee took the position that DOJ's concerns were overstated. As to the senior citizen hypothetical, whether the testimony would be treated under amended Rule 701 or under Rule 702 would depend on the exact nature of the testimony. If the witness were to testify that the defendant was acting as a steerer in a drug transaction, or that the defendant was engaged in a coded conversation, this would indeed be expert testimony. Moreover, the Advisory Committee had no problem with requiring such a witness to be qualified as an expert, disclosed in advance, and subject to a Daubert/Kumho inquiry. If advance disclosure could risk the safety of the witness, then nothing would prevent the government from getting a protective order that would limit or excuse such disclosure. In contrast, if the witness were to testify that she saw the defendant drop a packet of drugs on the street, this would not be expert testimony. You don't need specialized knowledge to know that white powder in certain circumstances is drugs. That is common knowledge, not specialized knowledge.

Another example given by DOJ was a game warden who would testify that an eagle flew over his head at a certain location. Is that expert testimony? The Advisory Committee took the position that drawing an inference that a bird is an eagle is within the common experience of most people, so the testimony would be that of a lay witness. However, if the witness were to testify that based on the eagle's height it must have come from a nesting grounds, or it had an irregular heartbeat, or it was a particular type of eagle outside its normal environment, then this would be testimony on the basis of specialized knowledge, and would have to be qualified under Rule 702. The Advisory Committee noted that if the witness were called to give such specialized testimony, counsel would clearly have to establish a foundation that the witness had substantial experience in the field of eagles. That kind of foundation looks a lot like -- indeed it is exactly like -- what counsel would have to do to qualify the witness as an expert. The Advisory Committee's position was essentially that if it looks like an expert and talks like an expert and a foundation is established in the manner required for an expert, then it's an expert and should be subject to the reliability requirements of Rule 702 and the disclosure requirements of the Civil and Criminal Rules.

The Advisory Committee recognized that the line between specialized knowledge and common knowledge would not always be easy to draw. But the Committee believed that the cost of such a delineation was worth it. Otherwise, parties could routinely evade the strictures of Daubert, and the disclosure requirements of the Civil and Criminal Rules, by presenting expert testimony and yet calling it lay testimony. The last paragraph of the Committee Note is an attempt to provide some guidance to Judges and practitioners in distinguishing specialized knowledge testimony from common knowledge testimony. The Note observes that the distinction between lay and expert witness testimony is that lay testimony "results from a process of reasoning familiar in everyday life," while expert testimony "results from a process of reasoning which can be mastered only by specialists in the field." The example given is that a lay witness with experience could testify that a substance appeared to be blood, but a witness would have to qualify as an expert before he could testify that bruising around the eyes is indicative of skull trauma. The former opinion is based on fairly common if not necessarily universal experience, while the latter is based on fairly narrow experience that is not part of the everyday life of most persons.

It must be remembered that a single witness can be both an expert and a lay witness. As the Committee Note states, the Rule focuses on testimony, not witnesses. A typical example is a treating physician. When the physician testifies that the plaintiff was coughing and running a fever, this is lay witness testimony governed by Rule 701. However, if the physician also testifies that he diagnosed the patient as having Reactive Airways Dysfunction Syndrome caused by exposure to a toxic chemical, then this is testimony based on scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge and must be qualified under Rule 702.

Even as amended, Rule 701 permits a witness with personal knowledge to testify to issues such as the amount of lost profits or the value of property. See the Committee Note to the 2000 amendment. This is because the assessment of value can be derived from ordinary experience and does not require specialized training or knowledge. For example, the owner of a business knows what it is worth simply by knowing the business. On the other hand, if the assessment of value or estimate of lost profit is not based on personal knowledge, it cannot be admitted under the terms of Rule 701. n17

The Rule as amended also permits law enforcement agents to provide, as lay witnesses, identification testimony of such matters as handwriting and that it is the defendant in a photograph. These processes of identification are not necessarily based on special expertise within the meaning of Rule 702. But in order to qualify as helpful lay testimony, the witness must be testifying on the basis of personal knowledge-- not, for example, generalized knowledge of "how criminals write" or "how facial characteristics change." n18 Moreover, the testimony must be helpful to the jury. If the jury is in the same position as a lay witness to evaluate a photograph or handwriting, the lay witness' identification testimony will not be helpful. n19 The Court in United States v. Beck, 418 F.3d 1008 (9th Cir. 2005) , provided a good summary of the foundation requirements for admissible identification testimony by a lay witness under the amended Rule 701. The defendant was convicted of bank robbery. He challenged the testimony of his probation officer, who identified the defendant as the person in the bank surveillance photograph. The Court found no error, concluding that the witness had "sufficient contact with the defendant to achieve a level of familiarity" that rendered his lay opinion helpful. The officer met with the defendant four times in a two-month period, for a total of more than seventy minutes. Reviewing the case law of other Circuits, the Court set forth the following standards for determining the admissibility of lay witness identification testimony:

> In accord with the decisions of our sister circuits, we hold that whether a lay opinion is helpful depends on a totality of circumstances including the witness's familiarity with the defendant's appearance at the time the crime was committed, the witness's familiarity with the witness's customary manner of dress, insofar as such information related to the clothing of the person depicted in the surveillance photograph, whether the defendant disguised his or her appearance during the offense or altered his or her appearance before trial, and whether the witness knew the defendant over time and in a variety of circumstances, such that the witness's lay identification testimony offered to the jury a perspective it could not acquire in its limited exposure to the defendant. The absence of any single factor will not render testimony inadmissible because cross-examination exists to highlight potential weaknesses in lay opinion testimony.

(n8)Footnote 8. See, e.g., Gust v. Jones, 162 F.3d 587 (10th Cir. 1998) ("persons of reasonable intelligence and ordinary experience are uniformly permitted to express opinions as to matters such as the speed of an automobile under their observation").

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., Washington v. Department of Transp., 8 F.3d 296 (5th Cir. 1993) ("speculative opinion testimony by lay witnesses -- i.e., testimony not based upon the witness' perception -- is generally considered inadmissible"). See also United States v. Sanchez-Sotelo, 8 F.3d 202 (5th Cir. 1993) (error, though harmless, to permit an officer to "translate" taped conversations between the defendants, where the officer's opinion as to what was meant went well beyond the plain meaning of the tape; "Rule 701 should be applied in a manner that allows the jury to draw its own conclusions.").

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., Winant v. Bostic, 5 F.3d 767 (4th Cir. 1993) (it was proper to allow witnesses to testify about what one of the defendants knew and about what he intended to do, where the testimony was simply "inferences that could have been rationally drawn from facts of which the witnesses had personal knowledge"; the Court notes that the jury "had before it ample contextual evidence from which to evaluate the opinion").

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., United States v. Stevens, 935 F.2d 1380 (3d Cir. 1991) (where a witness testified that the defendant was left-handed -- contrary to the complainants' testimony -- the government was properly permitted to probe the basis for that opinion by cross-examining the witness about his relationship with and knowledge of the defendant; cross-examination led to effective impeachment of the witness).

(n13)Footnote 13. See also Hester v. BIC Corp., 225 F.3d 178 (2d Cir. 2000) (reversible error to permit lay witnesses to testify that supervisor's coldness and hostility was due to racial bias; this was "speculative lay opinion" that "merely tells the jury what result to reach").

(n14)Footnote 14. For a case in which an inference was found permissible, see United States v. Vega-Figueroa, 234 F.3d 744 (1st Cir. 2000) (no error when the sister of a woman killed by a conspiracy was permitted to give her opinion that her sister was killed because she was selling more drugs at a certain location than the conspirators; the witness was heavily involved with drug activity at that location, she was present at a meeting when conspirators mentioned the drug competition, she had first-hand knowledge of how drug organizations work, and she witnessed her sister's murder).

(n15)Footnote 15. See e.g., United States v. Griffin, 324 F.3d 330 (5th Cir. 2003) (error in permitting lay witness to testify to her understanding of the law in a mail fraud prosecution); Torres v. City of Oakland, 758 F.2d 147 (6th Cir. 1985) (it was error, but harmless, for a witness who had taken part in the selection of a person for a new supervisory position to give an opinion as to whether the plaintiff had been discriminated against because of national origin; such testimony called for a legal conclusion and would not be helpful to the jury; the Court suggested that "a more carefully phrased question could have elicited similar information and avoided the problem of testimony containing a legal conclusion").

(n16)Footnote 16. See, e.g., United States v. Misle Bus & Equip. Co., 967 F.2d 1227, 1992-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P69879 (8th Cir. 1992) (in a Sherman Act case, it was not error to permit lay witnesses to give testimony that "agreements" to fix prices and allocate the market had been reached; the word has a well-established lay meaning and does not demand a conclusion as to the legal implications of conduct).

(n17)Footnote 17. See, e.g., Dijo, Inc. v. Hilton Hotels Corp., 351 F.3d 679 (5th Cir. 2003) : Finding that it was error to admit testimony on lost profits from a lay witness who had no personal knowledge of the business:

> We have previously recognized that the [2000] amendment did not place any restrictions on the preamendment practice of allowing business owners or officers to testify based on particularized knowledge derived from their position. Nevertheless, it has always been the rule that lay opinion testimony may be elicited only if it is based on the witness's first-hand knowledge or observations. This foundational requirement helps to eliminate the risk that a party will circumvent the reliability requirements set forth in Federal Rule of Evidence 702 by adducing expert testimony in lay clothing.

(n18)Footnote 18. See Hall v. United Ins. Co. of America, 367 F.3d 1255 (11th Cir. 2004) (in order to give helpful testimony identifying handwriting, a lay witness must provide "detailed information regarding any correspondence, documents or the like, relied upon to establish familiarity"; moreover, the lay witness "must provide detailed information regarding his or her relationship with the signatory-- whether it be familial, professional, or otherwise personal").

(n19)Footnote 19. See United States v. Dixon, 413 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 2005) (photographic identification by lay witnesses was not helpful where the defendant had not altered his appearance and "our review of the surveillance photograph indicates that it is not of particularly poor or grainy quality, and it fully depicts the suspect's body from the waist up.").

[1] Accident Conditions

Lauria v. AMTRAK, 145 F.3d 593 (3d Cir. 1998) : The Court reversed judgment as a matter of law entered for the defendant in a railroad worker's FELA action because the plaintiff had not been permitted to introduce testimony from a coworker regarding the condition the following morning of the tracks on which the plaintiff slipped. His testimony would have been helpful because it would have shown a piece of wood in the exact location where the plaintiff fell, which could have helped in determining whether the wood posed an unreasonable danger to employees crossing the tracks in poor lighting conditions.

Mattison v. Dallas Carrier Corp., 947 F.2d 95 (4th Cir. 1991) : In an action arising out of a collision between a car and a parked tractor-trailer during rainy weather, the Court noted there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an eyewitness to testify that the emergency flashers on the tractor-trailer did not provide "an adequate warning under the conditions of the weather at that time."

Robinson v. Bump, 894 F.2d 758 (5th Cir. 1990) : Affirming a judgment for the driver of a truck involved in a fatal multivehicle collision, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an eyewitness to testify that the driver was "in total control" of the truck until it was struck by one of the vehicles, since the witness was able to observe the truck's movement, the movement is rationally related to the driver's control, and the testimony was helpful in assessing whether the driver was negligent. The Court reversed a judgment for the defendants in a wrongful death action, Young v. Illinois Cent. G. R.R., 618 F.2d 332 (5th Cir. 1980) , in part because lay testimony concerning the condition of a railroad crossing at the time of an accident was erroneously excluded.

Scheerer v. Hardee's Food Sys., 148 F.3d 1036 (8th Cir. 1998) : In a slip-and-fall case, the Court found no error when defense counsel was permitted to elicit from the plaintiff's friend that the friend had said, at the time of the accident, that the accident had been caused by the plaintiff's wearing slippery shoes. Because the friend's contemporaneous statement was rationally based on her own first-hand perceptions and reasonably would have aided the jury's understanding of a fact in issue, it was not inadmissible under Rule 701. In Meder v. Everest & Jennings, Inc., n1 a suit arising out of the plaintiff's falling from a wheelchair manufactured by the defendant, the Court held that an opinion of a police officer who investigated the accident could not be admitted, since the opinion was not based on anything he observed and he was not an expert on wheelchairs.

[2] Age

United States v. Yazzie, 976 F.2d 1252 (9th Cir. 1992) : The defendant's conviction for statutory rape was reversed because he was not permitted to ask lay witnesses what age they believed the victim was, although they were permitted to testify that they had seen her smoke cigarettes, drive a car, use makeup, and drink beer. The witnesses' opinions on the matter, which were extremely difficult to break down into factual components, were relevant to the reasonableness of the defendant's claim that he thought she was at least 16.

United States v. Stanley, 896 F.2d 450 (10th Cir. 1990) : In a prosecution for receiving child pornography through the mails, there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a postal inspector to testify that children depicted engaging in sexual conduct in photographs shown to him while testifying were under age 18, as the testimony was helpful in determining the subjects' ages and as an explanation of why he had seized the package.

[3] Causation

Asplundh Mfg. Div. v. Benton Harbor Eng'g, 57 F.3d 1190 (3d Cir. 1995) : In an action for contribution arising from a fatal accident involving an aerial lift, the plaintiffs offered deposition testimony by the fleet maintenance supervisor responsible for the lift that he had inspected the disassembled lift shortly after the accident, that he had observed a metal fracture where a hole had been drilled through a metal rod, that the accident was attributable to the way the rod was drilled through, and that he questioned the appropriateness of the design. The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiffs because the Trial Judge failed to examine with sufficient rigor whether the supervisor's testimony admitted under Rule 701 was informed by sufficient experience or specialized knowledge. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 701.02[7].

Wactor v. Spartan Transp. Corp., 27 F.3d 347 (8th Cir. 1994) : In a Jones Act action for personal injuries suffered by a deckhand when a line on a river tow broke during locking maneuvers, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the lockmen who had been assisting in the maneuvers to testify that the plaintiff had not followed the correct procedure in securing the line, which caused the line to break. Their opinion was based on their observations as well as their years of experience assisting tows through the locks.

Agro Air Assocs. v. Houston Cas. Co., 128 F.3d 1452 (11th Cir. 1997) : The plaintiff sued its insurer for fraud after the insurer canceled certain insurance policies. At trial the plaintiff's president and insurance brokers gave lay testimony regarding their opinions why the insurer had terminated its relationship and why the plaintiff's insurance rates and premiums increased after the termination. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the testimony, since it was based on facts they had observed personally and through substantial experience in their respective businesses.

[4] Credibility

United States v. Gaines, 170 F.3d 72 (1st Cir. 1999) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no error when the prosecutor asked the defendant to comment on the credibility of other witnesses whose testimony contradicted his own. While "it is improper for an attorney to ask a witness whether another witness lied on the stand" because "credibility judgments are for the jury, not witnesses, to make," in this case the prosecutor did not ask the defendant whether he believed the other witnesses had lied, but only asked whether the other witnesses were "wrong." Thus, the defendant was "not required to choose between conceding the point or branding another witness as a liar."

United States v. Forrester, 60 F.3d 52 (2d Cir. 1995) : In a cocaine prosecution, a government witness testified that she had told the DEA agent about two men involved in the drug scheme, including the defendant, and that she had identified the defendant's photograph for the agent. The agent's reports made no mention of these matters, and the agent recalled no identification. Nonetheless, the agent testified in response to the prosecutor's questions that he found nothing inconsistent between the witness' testimony and what she had told him. Reversing, the Court stated that the agent's testimony, which was simply an opinion of the witness' credibility, could not assist the jury.

United States v. Bear, 357 F.3d 730 (8th Cir. 2004) : The Court reversed a conviction for aggravated sexual assault because the defense was erroneously prevented from introducing a lay witness' opinion that one of the alleged victims (who testified) "was untruthful" and "didn't always tell the truth." The witness was the foster care parent with whom the child had lived following the initial report and investigation of abuse. She saw him on a daily basis during the four to six months that he resided with her, so her opinion about his credibility was more than a "bare assertion" or "conclusory observation." In United States v. Cournoyer, 118 F.3d 1279 (8th Cir. 1997) , the Court affirmed a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding defense testimony, after evidence that the complainant had several times attempted suicide was introduced, that the complainant's rape charge was "another attempt to get attention." In the Court's view, the history of suicide attempts did not provide a rational basis for inferring that the rape accusation was false, so the testimony would not have helped the jury determine facts at issue.

United States v. Sanchez-Lima, 161 F.3d 545 (9th Cir. 1998) : The defendant, an illegal alien, was charged with assault on a Border Patrol officer after being apprehended in an attempt to cross into the United States. The defendant claimed self-defense. The Court found reversible error when a Border Patrol agent was permitted to testify that he believed that the agent who had allegedly been assaulted was telling the truth. While a witness' character for truthfulness may be bolstered once it has been impeached, it may not be bolstered by inadmissible evidence; opinion testimony as to the credibility of a witness' account is inadmissible because it does not assist the jury.

[5] Custom or Practice

Samples v. City of Atlanta, 846 F.2d 1328 (11th Cir. 1988) : Reversing a summary judgment for the defendants in a civil rights action, the Court held that the opinion of a witness, who had worked in a police department for a long time, that the department had the policy or practice of encouraging brutality was admissible to prove the City's responsibility for damages to which the plaintiff might be entitled.

[6] Damages

Walton v. Nalco Chem. Co., 272 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2001) : An employer, sued by a former salesman for age discrimination, counterclaimed for breach of a noncompete agreement; to prove its damages it offered testimony by its district sales manager. The Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the testimony, since the witness' opinion was based solely on his lay review of corporate reports reflecting gross profits and he had no personal knowledge how those data were compiled. Furthermore, the corporate reports did not contain any data relating to the period at issue.

Securitron Magnalock Corp. v. Schnabolk, 65 F.3d 256 (2d Cir. 1995) : Affirming a judgment for a manufacturer of locks who alleged that a competitor engaged in racketeering and deceptive trade practices, the Court held that the president of the plaintiff company properly testified as to lost profits and that he "was fully capable of examining the company's sales over a period of years, noting a slow-down, and testifying to the estimated losses attributable to the defamatory and fraudulent activities of appellants."

Lightning Lube, Inc. v. Witco Corp., 4 F.3d 1153 (3d Cir. 1993) : In a fraud, tortious interference, and RICO action by a quick lube franchiser against its oil supplier, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the plaintiff's owner to give lay opinion testimony as to damages, as it was based on his knowledge and participation in the day-to-day affairs of his business and generally based on valid assumptions. In Sowell v. Butcher & Singer, Inc., 926 F.2d 289 (3d Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed a directed verdict granted for the defendants in a securities fraud class action, holding there was no error in excluding damages testimony by the plaintiff regarding securities transactions, as the opinions and inferences he drew from transfer records were based on not only his own perceptions but also on assistance from his attorneys and other experts. In an action by the buyer for a defective supermarket refrigeration system, In re Merritt Logan, Inc., n2 the Court held that the buyer's principal shareholder and a witness who had prepared a survey of the supermarket site as a store location were both sufficiently qualified by their personal knowledge to give opinions regarding the store's lost profits. In Joy Mfg. Co. v. Sola Basic Indus., n3 the Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff on a claim that two heat-treating furnaces failed to work, but held it was error to exclude testimony in which the plaintiff's production supervisor estimated the losses suffered because of furnace failures. Where the witness had personal knowledge of the problems of his company, testified in detail about the work done at the company's plant, participated in the purchase of the furnaces, and witnessed their operation on a day-to-day basis, his inability to say precisely why a furnace was inoperable at a particular time was a subject for cross-examination, not a reason to strike the testimony.

DIJO, Inc. v. Hilton Hotels Corp., 351 F.3d 679 (5th Cir. 2003) : In an action for breach of a lease and tortious interference, the Court vacated the damages award for the plaintiff because the plaintiff's witness "had little significant actual knowledge about [the plaintiff] and its operations," so he could not offer lay opinion testimony, and the plaintiff made no attempt to qualify him as an expert. In Mississippi Chem. Corp. v. Dresser-Rand Co., 287 F.3d 359 (5th Cir. 2002) , a breach of warranty action by the purchaser of a gas compressor train for use in ammonia production, the Court upheld the admission of testimony by the plaintiff's director of risk management and property taxation concerning the amount of lost profits caused by the defective train. The Court noted that "[o]ther circuits that have addressed this question have allowed lost profit testimony by a layperson witness if the witness has direct knowledge of the business accounts underlying the profit calculation." The Court found that the witness had personal knowledge of the plaintiff's books and had done lost profit calculations for insurance purposes. In Morel v. Sabine Towing & Transp. Co., n4 the Court affirmed a seaman's judgment in a personal injury action, holding that it was permissible for the plaintiff to testify as a lay person to the amount needed to sustain a mending seaman in the locality where he resided.

Reeder-Simco GMC, Inc. v. Volvo GM Heavy Truck Corp., 374 F.3d 701, 2004-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P74476 (8th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a price discrimination case, finding no abuse of discretion when one of the plaintiff's co-owners was permitted to testify about the plaintiff's lost profits and business value. A proper foundation was laid to show the witness' knowledge as a business owner of the business' value and its lost profits. His use of a multiplier in calculating the value of the franchise was supported by his knowledge that they were often used, and he selected one based on his knowledge of current practices; differences between the multiplier he used and those suggested by the defendant were for the jury to resolve. In Allied Sys., Ltd. v. Teamsters Local 604, 304 F.3d 785 (8th Cir. 2002) , an action alleging that the union breached a collective bargaining agreement, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the plaintiff's vice president of internal audit was permitted to testify as to damages, despite not having been disclosed as an expert before trial. Although the witness may have used accounting principles and methods, his testimony was limited to his firsthand knowledge, obtained as bookkeeper and record-keeper and from a field audit he conducted during the dispute. In In re Air Crash at Little Rock, Ark., on June 1, 1999, 291 F.3d 503 (8th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed in part an airline passenger's personal injury action, holding that one of the plaintiff's college professors was qualified to give either expert or lay opinion regarding the plaintiff's chances of having a successful student teaching experience and becoming a music teacher following the accident, which was likely to be useful to the trier of fact in assessing the plaintiff's damages.

Lifewise Master Funding v. Telebank, 374 F.3d 917 (10th Cir. 2004) : In an action by a lending company against its loan financer for breach of contract, the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the plaintiff's CEO as to its lost profits. The proposed testimony was based on a financial model for which the witness lacked qualifications to testify. The plaintiff passed up an opportunity to have the witness testify solely as a businessperson based on his personal knowledge and his experience as president of the company, giving a straightforward opinion as to lost profits using conventional methods based on the plaintiff's actual operating history. In a civil rights action, Malloy v. Monahan, 73 F.3d 1012 (10th Cir. 1996) , the plaintiff alleged that injuries from the defendant's use of excessive force caused him to lose profits from his business of purchasing, rehabilitating, and selling houses. The Court held that the plaintiff had sufficient expertise and personal knowledge to render an opinion as to the value of his properties and lost future profits of his own real estate ventures.

[7] Defective Product

Asplundh Mfg. Div. v. Benton Harbor Eng'g, 57 F.3d 1190 (3d Cir. 1995) : In an action for contribution arising from a fatal accident involving an aerial lift, the plaintiffs offered deposition testimony by the fleet maintenance supervisor responsible for the lift that he had inspected the disassembled lift shortly after the accident, that he had observed a metal fracture where a hole had been drilled through a metal rod, that the accident was attributable to the way the rod was drilled through, and that he questioned the appropriateness of the design. The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiffs because the Trial Judge failed to examine with sufficient rigor whether the supervisor's testimony admitted under Rule 701 was informed by sufficient experience or specialized knowledge. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 701.02[7].

Gardner v. Chrysler Corp., 89 F.3d 729 (10th Cir. 1996) : In a product liability action for injuries suffered when the seat occupied by the plaintiff gave way when a minivan was rear-ended, the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a witness offered by the plaintiff. Although a member of the defendant's Minivan Safety Leadership Team subsequent to the plaintiff's accident, the witness had no previous involvement with minivans or seat design, he had no knowledge of the recliner mechanism at issue or of seat designing and testing, and in a deposition he specifically handed off seat design questions to the engineering department because the MSLT was concerned with marketing.

[8] Discriminatory Motivation

Hester v. BIC Corp., 225 F.3d 178 (2d Cir. 2000) : The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff, who sued for racial discrimination in employment, because co-workers had been improperly permitted to testify that a supervisor's hostile treatment of the plaintiff had been based on race. The testimony was not helpful because none of the witnesses was involved in the employer's decision-making processes or had personal knowledge of it, and none had any basis for knowing whether the employee was adequately performing her duties; the testimony was not focused on objective facts but instead consisted of subjective impressions.

[9] Drugs and Controlled Substances

United States v. Santana, 342 F.3d 60 (1st Cir. 2003) : Affirming cocaine convictions, the Court found no error in the admission of testimony by a DEA agent that he smelled marijuana during the search of a witness' home. The Court found that the agent had personal knowledge of what he smelled and had sufficient experience to be able to identify the smell of marijuana. In United States v. Paiva, 892 F.2d 148 (1st Cir. 1989) , the Court affirmed cocaine distribution convictions, holding that it was not an abuse of discretion to permit a lay witness, having past experience with cocaine, to testify on the basis of her observation and tasting of it that a substance found in the defendant's shoe was cocaine.

United States v. Garcia, 291 F.3d 127 (2d Cir. 2002) : The Court reversed convictions for cocaine distribution offenses because a witness was permitted to testify that the defendant understood a conversation to be a coded discussion of a drug transaction. The principal prosecution witness was an informant who had been arrested for heroin offenses and, while cooperating with the government, had begun working in the asbestos industry, where he sought to involve a coworker in drugs. The informant testified that the coworker connected him with the defendant, and that a transcript of a conversation between the accomplice and the defendant in which they discussed a potential asbestos project involved the use of code words to arrange a drug trade. The Court held that the government did not lay a proper foundation for the informant's opinion of the defendant's knowledge. The witness explained his own participation, why he spoke in code, and what he meant by the code he used, but he did not offer any explanation for how the defendant could know they were speaking in code.

United States v. Sweeney, 688 F.2d 1131 (7th Cir. 1982) : The Court said that even if lay witnesses were improperly permitted to identify substances as drugs, any error was harmless where the essence of the charges was a conspiracy and it was not necessary to prove what the substances actually were. The Court also held that a witness is qualified to testify to the identity of a drug based on prior use and knowledge of the drug and a sampling of the substance identified.

United States v. Espino, 317 F.3d 788 (8th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a conviction for methamphetamine offenses, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting lay witnesses with extensive experience in the drug trade to testify to the amounts and weights of drugs they had handled or observed. In a prosecution for offenses involving amphetamine, United States v. Westbrook, 896 F.2d 330 (8th Cir. 1990) , the Court held that witnesses having other experience with the drug could identify the substance sold or manufactured on the charged occasions as being amphetamine; any error in allowing one witness without such experience to express her opinion as to the drug's identity was harmless in light of substantial other evidence of the identity of the substance.

[10] Emotions

United States v. Meling, 47 F.3d 1546 (9th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a conviction for product tampering that arose from the defendant's scheme to murder his wife for insurance benefits, the Court held there was no error in permitting a 911 operator and a paramedic to testify that the defendant had feigned agitation and grief. They had ample time to assess his behavior and were better able than the jury to assess whether it was abnormal for the circumstances.

[11] Expert Witness Distinguished

[a] Civil Cases

Gomez v. Rivera Rodriguez, 344 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 2003) : The Court reversed a judgment for municipal employees who claimed that their discharges had been politically motivated, holding that it was an abuse of discretion to preclude testimony by a Commonwealth labor department deputy secretary for legal affairs with whom the defendant mayor had consulted before discharging the plaintiffs. The Judge had excluded the witness on the grounds that he was an expert for whom the requirements of Fed. R. Civ. P. 26 had not been met and that any factual testimony he would give would be "inextricably conjoined to expert opinion and testimony" regarding the applicable law. The Court held that because the mayor claimed qualified immunity based on reliance on advice of counsel, the witness was a percipient fact witness not subject to the provisions for expert witnesses. Furthermore, legal opinions referred to in his testimony did not justify its wholesale exclusion, because they were relevant to his state of mind.

Bank of China, N.Y. Branch v. NBM LLC, 359 F.3d 171 (2d Cir. 2004) : Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff in a civil RICO action, the Court held it was error to permit a witness for the plaintiff to testify that certain transactions did not comport with the business community's understanding of normal trade transactions and that it is fraud when an importer presents a trust receipt to a bank to obtain a loan knowing there are no real goods involved. To the extent that the witness' testimony was not a product of his investigation but rather reflected specialized knowledge he had because of his extensive experience in international banking, he was testifying as an expert rather than a lay witness. Because he was not disclosed as an expert witness and the reliability requirements set forth in Rule 702 had not been satisfied, it was error to admit his testimony. In Medforms, Inc. v. Healthcare Mgmt. Solutions, Inc., 290 F.3d 98 (2d Cir. 2002) , an action for infringement of copyrights in computer programs, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a supervisor was permitted to give testimony about the significance of a programmer's involvement in work on the programs at issue and on the meaning of the term "program." The witness' opinions were rationally based on his perceptions as supervisor and as a person who worked on the program; they were helpful to the jury's understanding of a central issue of fact, authorship, and of the meaning of the term "program" as used in the copyright registrations; and it was not based on scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge, but on the witness' everyday experience as a programmer.

Asplundh Mfg. Div. v. Benton Harbor Eng'g, 57 F.3d 1190 (3d Cir. 1995) : In an action for contribution arising from a fatal accident involving an aerial lift, the plaintiffs offered deposition testimony by the fleet maintenance supervisor responsible for the lift that he had inspected the disassembled lift shortly after the accident, that he had observed a metal fracture where a hole had been drilled through a metal rod, that the accident was attributable to the way the rod was drilled through, and that he questioned the appropriateness of the design. The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiffs because the Trial Judge failed to examine with sufficient rigor whether the supervisor's testimony admitted under Rule 701 was informed by sufficient experience or specialized knowledge. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 701.02[7].

Certain Underwriters at Lloyd's, London v. Sinkovich, 232 F.3d 200 (4th Cir. 2000) : In an action by an insured yacht owner for a declaratory judgment seeking insurance coverage under a hull policy, the Court reversed a judgment rendered for the insurer after a bench trial because the Trial Judge erroneously admitted expert testimony, along with the witness' investigative report, from a marine surveyor/investigator who was not listed as an expert witness and who had not provided a report during discovery. Although the Judge indicated that he would limit the witness to lay testimony, the Court held that the Judge actually permitted the witness to offer testimony that only an expert could give, such as the effectiveness of dropping anchor, the location of the vessel, and the time interval between the thump and the grounding.

Stahl v. Novartis Pharms. Corp., 283 F.3d 254 (5th Cir. 2002) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendant in an action alleging inadequate warnings on a prescription drug, the Court held there was no error in accepting testimony from a dermatologist concerning whether the package insert made him aware of risks of liver disease. The testimony involved the physician's own understanding and perception of the warning label as the plaintiff's treating physician and did not constitute an expert assessment, so no Daubert hearing was required. In an action alleging personal injuries from toxic chemicals emanating from a well, Doddy v. Oxy USA, Inc., 101 F.3d 448 (5th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant, finding no error in the exclusion of testimony from a witness the plaintiffs characterized as both a lay and expert witness. The Trial Judge found the witness qualified to testify about corrosion in oil and gas wells, but excluded testimony, allegedly based on the witness' personal knowledge, about toxic chemicals being used at the well. The Court agreed that, as the witness lacked any expertise in chemistry or toxicology, it was doubtful he had personal knowledge about the toxicity of the chemicals (such as benzene) at the well.

TY Inc. v. Softbelly's Inc., 353 F.3d 528 (7th Cir. 2003) : In a trademark infringement action against the manufacturer of a computer-screen cleaner, the Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff because a defense witness who was a competitor of the plaintiff was erroneously precluded from testifying. The witness would have testified that as early as 1988, before the plaintiff began selling "Beanie Babies," the word "beanie" was being used in the trade names of other manufacturers of "plush beanbag animals" and the word "beanie" was generic. The Court reasoned that "experienced businessmen know a great deal about what consumers think; that is personal knowledge" and not hearsay, so that the witness need not be designated or qualified as an expert. In Research Sys. Corp. v. IPSOS Publicite, 276 F.3d 914 (7th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed a judgment for a French research services business and several of its subsidiaries in a suit by an American company in a dispute in which the plaintiff alleged misappropriation of trade secrets, fraud, and breach of contract. The Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting an executive at one of the defendant subsidiaries to testify that the plaintiff's product was not unique, although he was not included on a pretrial expert witness list. The witness testified on the basis of seeing similar products during his 20 years in the business, so he could be properly considered a lay witness.

In re Air Crash at Little Rock, Ark., on June 1, 1999, 291 F.3d 503 (8th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed in part an airline passenger's personal injury action, holding that one of the plaintiff's college professors was qualified to give either expert or lay opinion regarding the plaintiff's chances of having a successful student teaching experience and becoming a music teacher following the accident. The Court reasoned that "[t]his is more in the nature of lay opinion testimony than expert testimony," and that "[b]ecause of [the professor's] personal knowledge of Lloyd and his experience as the supervising instructor of music student teachers at a smaller university in Oklahoma, he was qualified to give an opinion about Lloyd's chances of successfully completing her student teaching requirements." The Court added that "his perceptions and analysis of Lloyd's school experiences following the accident were likely useful to the trier of fact in determining Lloyd's damages."

Lifewise Master Funding v. Telebank, 374 F.3d 917 (10th Cir. 2004) : In an action by a lending company against its loan financer for breach of contract, the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the plaintiff's CEO as to its lost profits. The proposed testimony was based on a financial model for which the witness lacked qualifications to testify. The plaintiff passed up an opportunity to have the witness testify solely as a businessperson based on his personal knowledge and his experience as president of the company, giving a straightforward opinion as to lost profits using conventional methods based on the plaintiff's actual operating history.

Tampa Bay Shipbuilding & Repair Co. v. Cedar Shipping Co., 320 F.3d 1213 (11th Cir. 2003) : In an action by a ship repairer to recover payment for repairs made to an ocean-going bulk carrier, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting officers and employees of the plaintiff to testify as lay witnesses that the charges for the work by it and its subcontractors were reasonable and in line with those of similar operations providing similar services. The witnesses were not testifying to specialized knowledge within the realm of an expert, but to particularized knowledge that they had by virtue of their position in the business.

[b] Expert Witness Distinguished -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Soto-Beniquez, 356 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions in a complex drug conspiracy prosecution, the Court held that eight forensic examiners were not used as "experts" (which would have entitled the defense to notice of their testimony), since each testified to personal observations at a crime scene. Although the witnesses may have had some expertise, each testified as a lay witness.

United States v. Garcia, 413 F.3d 201 (2d Cir. 2005) : During the defendant's trial for a cocaine distribution conspiracy, a case agent was permitted to testify, "based on your investigation" or "[a]s far as our investigation determined," regarding the roles of certain participants, including the defendant. The Court held that admission of the testimony was error, but harmless. It was not admissible lay opinion testimony because it was not based on the agent's personal perceptions, but rather drew on the total information developed by all the officials who participated in the investigation, and it was not helpful to the jury within the meaning of Rule 701 in that it went beyond telling the jurors what was in the evidence to telling them what inferences to draw from it. Further, the witness' opinion was based on specialized knowledge, so it was inadmissible under Rule 701(c), and the government had made no effort to satisfy the expert testimony requirements of reliability under Rule 702 and pretrial disclosure under Fed. R. Crim. P. 16. In United States v. Grinage, 390 F.3d 746 (2d Cir. 2004) , the Court reversed convictions for PCP distribution because testimony by a DEA agent who had supervised the wiretap of the defendant's cellular telephone was erroneously admitted. The agent, testifying as a lay witness, stated that he had listened to all 2000 calls, described his understanding of the calls based upon his investigation, and also interpreted calls played to the jury. The Court found that the agent's testimony was an improper substitute for the calls themselves. Whether or not the agent might have been able to testify as an expert, the Court concluded that "the risk that he was testifying based upon information not before the jury, including hearsay, or at the least, that the jury would think he had knowledge beyond what was before them, is clear." In United States v. Glenn, 312 F.3d 58 (2d Cir. 2002) , the Court reversed a murder conviction partly because a cooperating witness, a drug dealer like the defendant, was improperly permitted to testify about the manner in which drug dealers carry handguns and then to opine that, based on his experience, the bulge he observed, from a distance of five or six house-widths, at the defendant's waist was caused by a gun and could not have been caused by a pager or any other item. The Court held that the witness "clearly lacked sufficient 'first-hand knowledge or observation' to enable him to reach this conclusion," and that to the extent the opinion was based on specialized knowledge, the witness was not qualified as an expert using reliable principles and methods.

United States v. Miranda, 248 F.3d 434 (5th Cir. 2001) : An FBI agent in a drug case testified that he had been involved in the investigation of the conspiracy and in translating intercepted phone calls from Spanish to English, and he identified various code words that callers had used and the English drug terms to which the words referred. The Court found no error in the admission of the testimony under Rule 701, stating that the agent's "extensive participation in the investigation of this conspiracy, including surveillance, undercover purchases of drugs, debriefings of cooperating witnesses familiar with the drug negotiations of the defendants, and the monitoring and translating of intercepted telephone conversations, allowed him to form opinions concerning the meaning of certain code words used in this drug ring based on his personal perceptions." We note that the Court was not referring to Rule 701 as it was amended after the trial. Under the amended Rule 701, it would appear that the agent was testifying on the basis of specialized knowledge within the scope of Rule 702, and therefore his testimony would have to be admitted under Rule 702 or not at all. In United States v. Riddle, 103 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 1997) , the Court reversed a conviction for bank fraud because a bank examiner, who the prosecution had agreed would not be offering expert testimony, did not merely draw straightforward conclusions from observations informed by his own experience in examining the bank, but also provided an overview of banking regulations and practices and authoritatively condemned the defendant's actions.

United States v. Conn, 297 F.3d 548 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a conviction for willfully dealing in firearms without a license, the Court upheld the admission of testimony by a BATF agent that, based on his training and experience, the defendant's firearms were not collector's items. The Court noted that the Trial Judge did not indicate whether the testimony was admitted under Rule 701 or 702, but concluded that the 2000 amendment to Rule 701 required a conclusion that the testimony was expert testimony because it was not based only on the agent's observations, but on his accumulated expertise obtained through experience and training.

United States v. Martinez-Figueroa, 363 F.3d 679 (8th Cir. 2004) : The defendant was convicted of conspiracy to distribute marijuana. after he was found with a commercial truck full of marijuana and claimed that he was a trucker who thought he was carrying cheese from California to Indiana. The arresting officer testified that he seized the logbook, which indicated that the defendant had been traveling erratically, rather than directly to Indiana. The officer was allowed to testify about how logbooks are used by truckers and the purpose of a logbook. The Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting the officer to testify as a lay witness about the use and purpose of logbooks in the trucking industry, since he was using his knowledge of that "not particularly technical" subject to explain to the jury how he was able to use the logbook in interrogating the defendant and verifying or refuting his description of his travels. In United States v. Peoples, 250 F.3d 630 (8th Cir. 2001) , the agent in charge of investigating a government witness' murder testified to her interpretation of surreptitiously recorded conversations between the defendants, including not only coded language but also plain English words and phrases. She included her opinions about what the defendants were thinking during their conversation, and repeated throughout her testimony that the defendants were responsible for the murder of the government witness. Reversing, the Court held that the agent was improperly "allowed to offer a narrative gloss that consisted almost entirely of her personal opinions of what the conversations meant." The testimony was neither permissible lay opinion testimony nor qualified expert testimony.

United States v. Figueroa-Lopez, 125 F.3d 1241 (9th Cir. 1997) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit, as lay opinion, testimony by law enforcement officers that the defendant's conduct conformed to the methods and techniques of experienced drug dealers. Such testimony requires that the witness be qualified as having the knowledge, experience, training, or education to render the testimony admissible under Rule 702. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 701.02[7].

United States v. Caballero, 277 F.3d 1235 (10th Cir. 2002) : The defendants were convicted of defrauding immigrants seeking permanent legal residence by falsely promising that they would assist them in obtaining papers from the Immigration and Naturalization Service. At trial, several INS officials testified as lay witnesses to INS procedures and operations pertinent to obtaining visas and similar documents. Rejecting the argument that the witnesses were experts whose opinions could not be admitted under Rule 701 as amended in 2000, the Court found that they were not testifying to any opinions at all; rather they were testifying to "readily-understandable INS procedures or operations." Because their testimony was fact and not opinion, it could not violate Rule 701. In United States v. Gauvin, 173 F.3d 798 (10th Cir. 1999) , the defendant was convicted of assault, after he collided with a police officer during a high-speed car chase. In support of his defense was that he did not cause the collision, his accident reconstruction experts testified that the police officer ran into the defendant's car. To challenge the veracity of police reports contradicting his experts, the defendant proffered the testimony of an instructor at the New Mexico police academy, who would have testified that police officers are trained that they should never change their reports. The Court held that the instructor's testimony was properly excluded for failure to satisfy the notice requirement of Fed. R. Crim. P. 16(b)(1)(C). The Court rejected the argument that the disclosure provision did not apply because the instructor was a lay witness rather than an expert, since the instructor would have been testifying on the basis of "specialized knowledge" within the meaning of Rule 702.

United States v. Henderson, 409 F.3d 1293 (11th Cir. 2005) : The Court upheld the convictions of a former police officer for pistol whipping an arrestee, submitting a misleading report about the incident, and making a false statement to an FBI agent. It found no abuse of discretion in permitting the arrestee's treating physician (who could not testify as an expert because the government failed to provide proper notice) to testify as to what she observed when she examined the arrestee after the arrest. However, it was error (but harmless) to admit the doctor's opinion on the cause of the injuries under Rule 701, since that testimony was a "hypothesis," and answering hypothetical questions is typically the domain of an expert. In United States v. Cano, 289 F.3d 1354 (11th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed drug trafficking convictions, and found no abuse of discretion in permitting an investigating officer to testify how he deciphered a hieroglyphic code for numbers in a book seized from a coconspirator. The officer was not testifying as an expert, but was simply matching the hieroglyphs next to names in the book to phone numbers he had for the people named, which decrypted the code. In United States v. Trujillo, n5 the Court found no error in the admission of testimony by an agent who had returned to the warehouse where he had arrested the defendant Fuentes. The agent testified that he had inspected the warehouse door, and was unable to see anything through the door when it was closed. This testimony contradicted that of Fuentes, who had testified that he had looked through cracks in the door on the date of his arrest to determine that he was in danger. Although the agent had never been qualified as an expert to conduct the "experiment" at the warehouse, the agent's observation of the door "did not require the skill of an expert, as it was not beyond the understanding and experience of an average citizen."

[12] Handwriting

Hall v. United Ins. Co. of Am., 367 F.3d 1255 (11th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the insurer in an action to obtain benefits under a policy that the insurer had terminated. The plaintiff had filed an affidavit stating that based on her familiarity with the insured's handwriting, he had not signed the letter of termination. The Court held that such an opinion requires detailed information regarding documents relied upon to establish familiarity, including identification of the documents with particularity, and detailed information regarding the witness' relationship with the signatory -- whether it be familial, professional, or otherwise personal. In United States v. Barker, n6 the Court affirmed a bank employee's conviction for misapplying and converting traveler's checks, holding that testimony of two fellow employees, who identified the defendant's handwriting on checks, was properly admitted.

[13] Hearsay Declarants

United States v. LeRoy, 944 F.2d 787 (10th Cir. 1991) : A defendant charged with conspiring to distribute cocaine base attempted to impeach a prosecution witness by evidence that the witness' probation file included a handwritten notation, "mentally unbalanced." The Court held the record was properly excluded because there was no showing of the basis for the opinion, which would be required if the declarant had testified.

[14] Helpfulness

Lynch v. City of Boston, 180 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1999) : The plaintiff claimed that her contract to manage a City welfare program was not renewed because of her activities as a whistleblower. To prove that she was qualified for renewal, she called a person who worked extensively with her in the City program, who testified concerning his personal observation of the plaintiff's excellent organizational skills, her proficiency at long-term planning, her ability to recruit participants, and her motivational and communications skills. Under these circumstances, the Court found no error in the exclusion of the witness' opinion that the plaintiff was responsible for the success of the program. That conclusion was not helpful to the jury given all the personal observations that the witness had already provided.

Head v. Glacier N.W., Inc., 413 F.3d 1053 (9th Cir. 2005) : An employee was terminated after he got a loader he was operating stuck in the mud, which the employer claimed was violation of its equipment abuse policy. The employee claimed the termination was disability discrimination. In his ADA suit, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when a lay witness with personal knowledge was not permitted to answer whether the situation "caused you to believe that he violated the equipment abuse policy." It was not apparent how the opinion would have been helpful, since "[t]he jury was fully capable of comparing the incident involving the loader with the standards in the equipment abuse policy and drawing its own conclusions."

[15] Hypothetical Questions

United States v. Ranney, 719 F.2d 1183 (1st Cir. 1983) : The Court sustained convictions for fraud and conspiracy arising out of a scheme to sell investment contracts in home heating oil, finding that investors were properly permitted to answer hypothetical questions establishing that they would not have invested but for the representations made. The Court observed that the investors were essentially being asked for information within their personal knowledge and were not being asked to render "expert" opinions.

[16] Identifications

[a] Generally

United States v. Jackman, 48 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1995) : The Court held in a bank robbery case that there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the defendant's ex-wife and two people who knew him relatively well to testify that he was the man pictured in blurred and grainy surveillance camera photographs of the robbery. Each had seen him numerous times wearing a baseball cap, as the robber was, and each was familiar with his carriage and posture.

United States v. Stevens, 935 F.2d 1380 (3d Cir. 1991) : Reversing a sexual assault and robbery conviction on other grounds, the Court noted that the defendant's father testified that the defendant was left-handed (contrary to the complainants' testimony) and that the government was properly permitted to probe the basis for that opinion by cross-examining the witness about his relationship with and knowledge of the defendant.

United States v. Ellis, 121 F.3d 908 (4th Cir. 1997) : Affirming convictions arising out of a bank robbery, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an accomplice to identify the defendant in a bank surveillance photograph "by the shape of his body." A lay witness is permitted to give an opinion concerning the identity of a person pictured in a surveillance photograph if there is a basis for concluding that the witness is more likely to correctly identify the person than the jury is. In a bank robbery case, United States v. Robinson, 804 F.2d 280 (4th Cir. 1986) , the Court upheld the admission of testimony by the defendant's brother identifying the defendant in surveillance photos, noting that lay identification witnesses may testify if there is a basis for concluding that they are more likely than a jury to correctly make an identification from a photograph.

United States v. Dixon, 413 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 2005) : On interlocutory appeal in a prosecution for attempted bank extortion, the Court found no abuse of discretion in an in limine order excluding testimony by the defendant's son and former wives that, in their respective opinions, the person depicted in a bank surveillance photograph was the defendant. Although two of the witnesses were indisputably familiar with the defendant's general appearance, the evidence failed to establish that either was familiar with his appearance at the specific time of the offense. Furthermore, it was not clear that the testimony would be helpful, since the evidence indicated the defendant had not altered his appearance prior to trial, and the photograph fully depicted the suspect from the waist up and was not of particularly poor or grainy quality. One Judge concurred, noting the deference accorded evidentiary rulings and observing that someone who has lived with a person and seen him in myriad contexts is presumptively better able to identify him in a photo than a juror comparing the photo with a one-time live view.

United States v. Towns, 913 F.2d 434 (7th Cir. 1990) : In a bank robbery case, the Court upheld permitting a defendant's former girlfriend to identify him as one of the men pictured in surveillance camera photographs, as his appearance had changed at the time of trial and her close association with him, including observing his appearance on the day of the robbery, would be helpful to the jury's determination of whether he was in the photographs. In another bank robbery case, United States v. Jackson, n7 the government called two tellers and a third witness to identify the defendant in a bank surveillance film. The third witness had only met the defendant once, a few months before the robbery. Noting that the defendant's appearance may have changed between the robbery and trial, a majority of the Court upheld the use of this witness, saying that "[t]he amount of time that the witness had to observe the defendant goes to the weight to be accorded to the testimony by the jury rather than to its admissibility." A dissenting Judge argued that the jury was as well equipped as this witness to compare the bank film with the defendant.

United States v. Lucas, 898 F.2d 606 (8th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding that there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the defendant's girlfriend to identify him from surveillance photographs, as she was more familiar with his appearance at the time of the robbery and he had facial hair in the photographs but not at the time of trial, so her testimony could be helpful to the jury.

United States v. Holmes, 229 F.3d 782 (9th Cir. 2000) : The Court found no abuse of discretion when a lay witness was permitted to identify him as the robber depicted in the bank surveillance photographs. The witness had a sufficient foundation for her opinion because she had met the defendant on at least six occasions, lasting more than 30 minutes each. Moreover, the opinion testimony assisted the jury, since the surveillance photographs were fuzzy and none of the photographs showed a full frontal view of the defendant's face. In a bank robbery case, United States v. Barrett, n8 the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by the defendant's girlfriend identifying him in a surveillance photograph. The defendant had changed his appearance before the trial and the testimony of someone who knew him well when he had a beard and mustache was helpful to the jury. In United States v. Goodheim, n9 the Court affirmed a conviction for firearms violations, holding that redirect examination of a government witness, which established that he previously had identified the defendant's photo as a picture of the person who had purchased three weapons, was permissible as long as proper safeguards and procedures were followed when the photos were shown to the witness.

United States v. Ingram, 600 F.2d 260 (10th Cir. 1979) : The Court upheld the use of lay opinion identification by friends of a defendant. See also United States v. Borrelli n10(the defendant's stepfather was properly allowed to identify him in bank surveillance film).

United States v. Pierce, 136 F.3d 770 (11th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the defendant's supervisor in the six months before his arrest to give his opinion that the defendant was the person depicted in surveillance photographs. Although the defendant's appearance had not changed between the robbery and trial, and the subject was not obscured from view in the photograph, the witness' greater familiarity with the defendant's appearance meant that his testimony could be of assistance to the jury.

[b] Identifications -- By Law Enforcement Agents

United States v. Kornegay, 410 F.3d 89 (1st Cir. 2005) : To rebut the defendant's claim that the charged drug sale had been committed by his identical twin brother, the government called as an identification witness a police officer, who testified that over a six-month period near the charged sale he had on several occasions encountered the brothers and had learned to distinguish them. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence, since the officer's opinion was based on sufficient experience and would be helpful to the jury. Although the officer's knowledge was derived from a criminal investigation, the probative value of his testimony was not substantially outweighed by any prejudicial effect.

United States v. Robinson, 544 F.2d 110 (2d Cir. 1976) : Reversing a bank robbery conviction, the Court held it was error to preclude a correctional officer from testifying that the film of the bank robbery showed that the participant was one Turner, not the defendant. Although it is generally not improper to exclude lay witness testimony as to whether the individual in a bank photograph is the defendant, in this case the testimony would have been helpful (because Turner was unavailable) in determining the identity of the participant.

United States v. Allen, 787 F.2d 933 (4th Cir. 1986) , vacated on other grounds, 479 U.S. 1077 (1987) : Affirming bank robbery convictions, the Court upheld the admission of testimony by a police officer and a parole officer identifying two defendants from bank surveillance films. It concluded that "testimony by those who knew defendants over a period of time and in a variety of circumstances offers to the jury a perspective it could not acquire in its limited exposure to the defendants." The jury was not informed that the witnesses were law enforcement officers, but the defendants complained that they could not realistically cross-examine the witnesses concerning occupation and bias without eliciting testimony concerning the defendants' criminal activities. The Court found that "[n]othing in the Rules of Evidence or any other source is intended to relieve criminal defendants from difficult strategic choices," and praised the Trial Judge for carefully considering how the two witnesses should be examined.

United States v. Calhoun, 544 F.2d 291 (6th Cir. 1976) : The Court reversed a conviction for armed bank robbery after the government offered testimony by the defendant's parole officer to prove that he was the person shown in photographs of the robbery. Although the government contended that the defendant's appearance had changed between the robbery and the trial, the Court held that the probation officer should not have been permitted to testify, even without revealing his relationship to the defendant, because the defendant could not effectively examine his relationship with the witness without risking undue prejudice.

United States v. Stormer, 938 F.2d 759 (7th Cir. 1991) : In the prosecution of a former police officer for bank robbery, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting other police officers to give opinion testimony as to the identity of the robber in the bank surveillance photographs. The testimony was helpful because the person pictured had made efforts to alter his appearance; this probative value was not outweighed by the risk that rumors of the defendant's alleged impropriety while he was on the force would be exposed in the course of examining the witnesses as to their possible bias and prejudice.

United States v. Cruz, 285 F.3d 692 (8th Cir. 2002) : Reversing convictions for drug and firearms offenses, the Court noted that it was error when a police officer identified the defendant as the subject of a black and white photocopy of an expired photo identification card issued in Mexico. The Court observed such testimony is admissible only if there is some basis to believe that the witness is more likely to correctly identify the defendant from the photograph than is the jury, and that "[d]ue to the constraints placed on cross-examination, we have discouraged the use of lay opinion identification by police officers to identify defendants." In this case the officer had no dealings with the defendant prior to his arrest. In United States v. Wright, 904 F.2d 403 (8th Cir. 1990) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony from witnesses familiar with the defendant from his previous involvement in the criminal justice system, where that connection was not disclosed and the witnesses' contacts were extensive enough to be helpful in identifying the person depicted in surveillance films of bank robbery. In United States v. Farnsworth, n11 the Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding it was no abuse of discretion to admit testimony by parole officers who identified the defendant in surveillance films. The parole officers' status was not revealed nor was the defendant's prior record.

United States v. Beck, 418 F.3d 1008 (9th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when a probation officer was permitted to testify that the defendant was the person depicted in a bank surveillance photo. The Judge limited the witness to disclosing that he had a "professional relationship" with the defendant so that no mention was made that the witness was a law enforcement officer. The Court held that "a lay witness may give an opinion regarding the identity of a person depicted in a photograph if that witness has had sufficient contact with the defendant to achieve a familiarity that renders the lay opinion helpful." That standard was satisfied by the fact that the witness had met with the defendant four times in a two-month period for a total of more than 70 minutes. In United States v. Henderson, 241 F.3d 638 (9th Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed convictions for bank robbery, finding no error in the admission of testimony from a detective that the defendant was the robber pictured in surveillance photographs. The detective had known the defendant for more than four years and had seen him more than 100 times. The identification was particularly helpful because none of the eyewitnesses to the robbery could identify the defendant. See also United States v. Henderson n12(police officer could identify the defendant in surveillance photographs from having seen the defendant on a daily, weekly, or biweekly basis throughout a 15-year period and having seen him wear a heavy overcoat like that worn by the robber in the surveillance photos). In United States v. LaPierre, n13 the Court vacated a conviction for bank robbery and firearms offenses, holding that it was an abuse of discretion to permit an investigating officer to give an opinion that the individual pictured in the bank surveillance photographs was the defendant. The testimony was unnecessary because the defendant's appearance had not changed, and it ran the risk of invading the province of the jury and prejudicing the defendant, especially because the officer had never seen the defendant in person.

United States v. Pierce, 136 F.3d 770 (11th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the defendant's probation officer to give her opinion that the defendant was the person depicted in surveillance photographs. Although the defendant's appearance had not changed between the robbery and trial, and the subject was not obscured from view in the photograph, the witness' greater familiarity with the defendant's appearance meant that her testimony could be of assistance to the jury. The probation officer testified that she knew the defendant in that capacity, but her testimony was neither the sole nor even the primary source of evidence about the defendant's criminal history.

[17] Improper Speculation

Bandera v. City of Quincy, 344 F.3d 47 (1st Cir. 2003) : In a sexual harassment lawsuit, the Court ruled that there was no plain error in the admission of testimony by a female police officer, who also experienced harassment, as to her opinion about the plaintiff's claims. Although the Court noted in passing that the witness was relying on hearsay, its main criticism of the testimony was that the witness had no personal knowledge of what happened to the plaintiff and had no qualifications as an expert to offer helpful opinion. The witness essentially presented "jury argument offered from the witness stand." In Alexis v. McDonald's Restaurants of Mass., Inc., 67 F.3d 341 (1st Cir. 1995) , the plaintiff was ejected from a McDonald's restaurant and arrested, after complaining that she did not receive the food that she ordered. She sued under 42 U.S.C. § 1981, asserting that her ejection was the result of race-based animus on the part of the restaurant manager. Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, the Court upheld exclusion of affidavits by several of the plaintiff's companions, who had opined that the plaintiff would not have been ejected had she been white, based on the fact that the manager was hostile and uncooperative. The Court agreed, on the ground that there was "no foundation" for the conclusions of racial animus, because there was no probative evidence that the manager's hostility was "something other than a race-neutral reaction to the stressful encounter" with the plaintiff. In a product liability action, Swajian v. General Motors Corp., n14 the plaintiff alleged that his decedent was killed in a rollover accident caused by a defective axle in the vehicle she was driving. The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff, holding it was error to permit a nonexpert eyewitness to give an opinion on the crucial issue of whether the wheel separated before the rollover began or after it was already in progress, since the witness admitted he never saw the wheel leave the vehicle and could not recall whether it was still on the vehicle when he saw the car flipping over.

United States v. Glenn, 312 F.3d 58 (2d Cir. 2002) : The Court reversed a murder conviction partly because a cooperating witness, a drug dealer like the defendant, was improperly permitted to testify about the manner in which drug dealers carry handguns and then to opine that, based on his experience, the bulge he observed, from a distance of five or six house-widths, at the defendant's waist was caused by a gun and could not have been caused by a pager or any other item. The Court held that the witness "clearly lacked sufficient 'first-hand knowledge or observation' to enable him to reach this conclusion," and that to the extent the opinion was based on specialized knowledge, the witness was not qualified as an expert using reliable principles and methods.

Washington v. Department of Transp., 8 F.3d 296 (5th Cir. 1993) : A worker injured when a spark from a vacuum cleaner ignited acetone vapors was not permitted to testify as to what he would have done had the warning label on the vacuum been more conspicuous. The Court held the ruling was no abuse of discretion, as the testimony would not have been based on the plaintiff's perception but upon his self-serving speculation. In United States v. Carlock, n15 the Court affirmed a union business agent's racketeering, extortion, and other convictions, holding that secretaries in the defendant's office could testify that union referrals were not given out fairly. However, it was error (albeit harmless) to admit one secretary's testimony, based on an invoice and her inferences from other information, that a defendant owned heavy equipment, since it could have been no more than an educated guess.

United States v. Santos, 201 F.3d 953 (7th Cir. 2000) : The Chicago City Treasurer was charged with illegally soliciting political contributions from banks and securities firms; those who refused to contribute were allegedly denied contracts with the Treasurer's office. The actual cutoffs of recalcitrant contractors were ordered by the Treasurer's deputy, but employees of the office were permitted to testify that they had "no doubt" or a "personal feeling" that the Treasurer had ordered the deputy to order the cutoffs. Reversing for this and other evidentiary errors, the Court found that the witnesses had gone beyond their personal knowledge -- of the way in which the defendant managed her office -- to draw an impermissible speculative inference that the Treasurer had given an express order. In Stagman v. Ryan, 176 F.3d 986 (7th Cir. 1999) , an accountant who was employed by the Illinois Attorney General's office brought a § 1983 action, alleging that his First Amendment rights had been violated by terminating his employment for engaging in union-related activities. The plaintiff's principal evidence in opposing motions for summary judgment was an affidavit by a personnel officer in the AG's office stating that the plaintiff's supervisor would not have dismissed him without the Attorney General's "express approval" because he was a "close relative of an influential member of the General Assembly." The Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of this statement; it was not admissible lay witness opinion because there was no showing that the affiant had personal knowledge of the facts asserted in his statement. In Visser v. Packer Eng'g Assoc., n16 the Court affirmed a summary judgment for the defendant in an age discrimination case, holding that affidavits by co-employees had been properly excluded, as they stated no facts but only conclusory inferences of impermissible motivation for the plaintiff's discharge.

[18] Interpretation of Contracts

Hollywood Fantasy Corp. v. Gabor, 151 F.3d 203 (5th Cir. 1998) : When the defendant, a noted actress, was sued for breach of an appearance contract, she defended on the ground that she had exercised a provision in the contract that permitted her to cancel if a "significant acting opportunity in a film comes up." Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the plaintiff's president to testify that the film on which the defendant worked was not a "significant acting opportunity." The witness had extensive experience in public relations and in television production, as well as in negotiating with actors, and he had himself drafted the language at issue, so his testimony was helpful to a clear understanding of the situation.

[19] Interpretation of Statement or Tape Recording

United States v. Grinage, 390 F.3d 746 (2d Cir. 2004) : The Court reversed convictions for PCP distribution because testimony by a DEA agent who had supervised the wiretap of the defendant's cellular telephone was erroneously admitted. The agent, testifying as a lay witness, stated that he had listened to all 2000 calls, described his understanding of the calls based upon his investigation, and agent also interpreted calls played to the jury. The Court found that the agent's testimony was an improper substitute for the calls themselves. Whether or not the agent might have been able to testify as an expert, the Court concluded that "the risk that he was testifying based upon information not before the jury, including hearsay, or at the least, that the jury would think he had knowledge beyond what was before them, is clear." In United States v. Garcia, 291 F.3d 127 (2d Cir. 2002) , the Court reversed convictions for cocaine distribution offenses because a witness was permitted to testify that the defendant understood a conversation to be a coded discussion of a drug transaction. The principal prosecution witness was an informant who had been arrested for heroin offenses and, while cooperating with the government, had begun working in the asbestos industry, where he sought to involve a coworker in drugs. The informant testified that the coworker connected him with the defendant, and that a transcript of a conversation between the accomplice and the defendant in which they discussed a potential asbestos project involved the use of code words to arrange a drug trade. The Court held that the government did not lay a proper foundation for the informant's opinion of the defendant's knowledge. The witness explained his own participation, why he spoke in code, and what he meant by the code he used, but he did not offer any explanation for how the defendant could know they were speaking in code. In a narcotics prosecution, United States v. Rivera, n17 a former member of the conspiracy testified to the meaning of certain narcotics records. Affirming, the Court distinguished its prior cases, such as United States v. Boissoneault, n18 which had held that a law enforcement agent cannot give expert testimony as to how jargon is commonly used in the drug trade unless the agent has first-hand knowledge of the actual usage by the defendants in the case. Those decisions were inapplicable here because the witness testified not as an expert but rather as a lay witness, with "first hand knowledge of the organization's record-keeping methods and of the terminology it used in making those records," so the testimony was "helpful to the jury's understanding of the operations of the organization." Affirming a conviction for embezzlement in United States v. Urlacher, n19 the Court held there was no error in permitting a coconspirator who participated in recorded conversations to explain statements or words that would be ambiguous or unclear to someone who had not been a participant, as the testimony was helpful to the jury's understanding of the often confusing and disjointed discussions on the tapes.

United States v. De Peri, 778 F.2d 963 (3d Cir. 1985) : In a prosecution of police officers for extortion, the Court upheld the admission of a witness' testimony as to his understanding of a tape-recorded conversation. It found that to the uninitiated listener the statements sounded like code, and that the testimony was based on the witness' perceptions at the time of the conversation. In United States v. Dicker, n20 the Court reversed a conviction for conspiracy to violate export restrictions. Distinguishing De Peri, the Court concluded that the statements in the instant case were clear, so it would not be helpful to the jury for a lay witness to testify to what he meant by his words in a transcribed conversation and what he understood the defendant to be saying.

United States v. Parsee, 178 F.3d 374 (5th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed narcotics convictions, finding no abuse of discretion when a participant in the conspiracy was permitted to testify that a reference to "pants" in a telephone conversation was a coded reference to the drugs. The witness was a participant in the conversations and her testimony was rationally based on her perceptions.

United States v. Graham, 856 F.2d 756 (6th Cir. 1988) : In a bribery case, the Court held that "[a] government agent may, like any other witness, testify in the form of an opinion as to his understanding of a defendant's statement."

United States v. Estrada, 39 F.3d 772 (7th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed convictions for cocaine distribution, finding no error when an undercover informant, who negotiated a drug transaction with one of the defendants, testified as to his understanding of tape recorded conversations he had with the defendant and interpreted the coded language in the conversations for the jury. The informant had sufficient personal knowledge because he was a participant in the conversations, and his translation of code words was helpful to the jury.

United States v. Simas, 937 F.2d 459 (9th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed convictions for bribery and mail fraud, holding there was no error in permitting FBI agents to give lay opinion testimony concerning their understanding of what the defendant meant to convey by vague and ambiguous statements during the course of the alleged crimes. The agents' opinions were based on their perceptions, and their understanding of the words and innuendo was helpful to the jury in understanding the defendant's meaning.

United States v. Awan, 966 F.2d 1415 (11th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed convictions for money laundering, holding there was no error in permitting an undercover agent to state his understanding of conversations with the defendants, where the conversations were abbreviated, composed with unfinished sentences, and included numerous references to complicated international finance and money laundering transactions with which the jury would likely to have been unfamiliar. In United States v. Davis, n21 the Court affirmed drug conspiracy convictions, holding there was no error in permitting a witness to tell the jury what he thought a defendant meant by a certain statement.

[20] Investigative Results

Brady v. Chemical Constr. Corp., 740 F.2d 195 (2d Cir. 1984) : Affirming a judgment holding insurance companies liable to a corporation on fidelity bonds covering employee dishonesty, the Court held that an investigator could testify about the results of his investigation into the employee's dishonesty. His opinion testimony was based on his personal investigation and was helpful to the jury.

Rabon v. Great Southwest Fire Ins. Co., 818 F.2d 306 (4th Cir. 1987) : The Court reversed a judgment for an insured who sued his insurer to recover on a fire insurance policy, holding it was error to admit evidence that an arson charge that had been brought against the insured was dismissed. The Court stated that "such evidence goes directly to the principal issue before the jury and is highly prejudicial," and evidence of nonprosecution or acquittal is inadmissible for several reasons, including the difference in burdens of persuasion in civil and criminal cases. The Court observed that a prosecutor's opinion whether the insured started a fire is inadmissible opinion, not based on personal knowledge.

[21] Knowledge or Intent

[a] Civil Cases

Winant v. Bostic, 5 F.3d 767 (4th Cir. 1993) : In a suit for fraud in connection with a resort development project, the Court held there was no error when an environmental agency officer was permitted to testify that a defendant knew or should have known that a particular development permit was required. The inference was properly based on previous dealings between them in which the defendant had been issued nine notices of violations of land development laws and the office had informed him of the permits required. The Court also upheld testimony by the defendant's sales agent that the defendant never intended to do what he promised, as the agent had had numerous conversations with the defendant that permitted him rationally to draw this conclusion.

Hansard v. Pepsi-Cola Metro. Bottling Co., 865 F.2d 1461 (5th Cir. 1989) : Finding sufficient evidence to support a jury verdict of age discrimination, the Court held that a co-worker's experience in the corporation was a sufficient basis to allow him to testify that the plaintiff was discharged and not rehired because of his age, although the witness had no first-hand knowledge of the events surrounding the termination.

Torres v. County of Oakland, 758 F.2d 147 (6th Cir. 1985) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) for a witness, who had taken part in the selection of a person for a new supervisory position, to give an opinion as to whether the plaintiff had been discriminated against because of national origin, since this called for a legal conclusion. It rejected an argument that an opinion concerning the intention of the person who ultimately made the decision not to promote the plaintiff was inadmissible under Rule 701 and concluded that it is not "beyond the ken of an ordinary person to infer from another's outward actions what his inward feelings are regarding a third person's national origin."

Bohannon v. Pegelow, 652 F.2d 729 (7th Cir. 1981) : In a civil rights action alleging wrongful arrest by a police officer, the Court held that a witness who observed the arrest could testify that it was racially motivated.

Cassino v. Reichhold Chem., 817 F.2d 1338 (9th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a finding that an employer engaged in age discrimination in terminating an employee, although it indicated that even the plaintiff agreed that it was error to permit two lay witnesses to testify that the employer had terminated the plaintiff and other employees because of age.

[b] Knowledge or Intent -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Vega-Figueroa, 234 F.3d 744 (1st Cir. 2000) : Affirming drug trafficking convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the sister of a woman allegedly killed by the conspiracy was permitted to give her opinion that her sister was killed because she was selling more drugs at a particular location than the defendant and his coconspirators. The witness was heavily involved with the competing drug point, she had participated in a meeting in which the defendant mentioned the benefits of joining his organization, she had first-hand knowledge of how drug-trafficking organizations worked, she witnessed her sister's murder, and her testimony was helpful in understanding the motive behind the murder and how the act furthered the conspiracy.

United States v. Rea, 958 F.2d 1206 (2d Cir. 1992) : The Court held, in a prosecution for willful evasion of gasoline excise taxes, that it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony by a lay witness who perceived transactions at issue that a defendant "had to" know that the purpose of the scheme for invoicing sales was to permit tax evasion. The opinion was not helpful to the jury, who not only knew what the witness had described but also knew more of the defendant's industry experience and of the contents of the defendant's records than the witness.

United States v. Polishan, 336 F.3d 234 (3d Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed the securities fraud convictions of an executive, finding no plain error in the admission of testimony by co-workers of the defendant that described his role in the company and the type of information to which he had access. Although it acknowledged that "[t]here is a fine line between statements that permissibly offer a witness's testimony about his or her own perceptions while supporting inferences about knowledge, and statements that constitute opinions on a witness's knowledge," it found that the testimony in this case left to the jury the ultimate conclusion as to whether the defendant knew about accounting irregularities. Affirming convictions for conspiracy and wire fraud in United States v. Anderskow, 88 F.3d 245 (3d Cir. 1996) , the Court held it was proper to admit testimony by a cooperating coconspirator that implied that one defendant knew that information in letters signed by this defendant was false. The witness properly provided reasons supporting an unstated conclusion that the defendant had guilty knowledge. However, the Court also held that the witness impermissibly testified that he had a subjective belief that a second defendant "must have known" that fraud was occurring. This opinion essentially turned the witness "into a thirteenth juror" and was not helpful to a trier of fact called upon to evaluate the same evidence that the witness had available. The error was harmless, however. In Government of Virgin Islands v. Knight, n22 the Court affirmed convictions for manslaughter and firearms offenses, holding it was error (but harmless) to exclude testimony of an eyewitness whose opinion was that the defendant's firing of his gun was an accident. Under Rule 701, "*[i]*f circumstances can be presented with greater clarity by stating an opinion, then that opinion is helpful to the trier of fact," which is the case with an eyewitness to a shooting.

United States v. Fowler, 932 F.2d 306 (4th Cir. 1991) : In a prosecution of a government contractor's employee for conversion of classified information, the Court held that Defense Department officials were properly permitted to opine that a person with the defendant's experience in the Department would know the rules about classified budget documents and that they were unavailable to contractors. Although only one witness knew the defendant, each was familiar with the documents, the reasons for their secret classification, the nature of the defendant's work in the Department, and the knowledge of people with his experience regarding the rules; the opinions were helpful in determining the defendant's knowledge and the state of mind with which he acted.

United States v. Ruppel, 666 F.2d 261 (5th Cir. 1982) : The Court said in a drug conspiracy case that "[t]he admission of opinion testimony about a defendant's state of mind is highly prejudicial and should be avoided." However, it found in this case that the prosecutor was clarifying a witness' answer, not asking the witness to state that the defendant had a criminal intent.

United States v. Bogan, 267 F.3d 614 (7th Cir. 2001) : At the defendant's trial for assaulting a federal officer in a prison, the government introduced the tape recording of a telephone conversation in which a fellow inmate who was observing the events exclaimed that the defendant was "trying to kill" the officer. The Court found no abuse of discretion, since the statement was rationally based on the witness' observation of the incident and was helpful to the jury. Affirming convictions for tax evasion in United States v. Hauert, 40 F.3d 197 (7th Cir. 1994) , the Court held that it was proper to exclude lay witness testimony concerning the defendant's sincerely held beliefs that he was exempt from taxation. The defendant's beliefs "are ordinarily not a proper subject for lay witness opinion testimony absent careful groundwork and special circumstances not present here"; in a footnote the Court suggested that a Trial Judge may consider excluding even helpful and relevant lay opinion under Rule 403. In United States v. Giovannetti, n23 a prosecution for knowing participation in gambling offenses, one witness testified that a defendant had told him he had rented a house to an acquaintance of a man known to the witness as a gambler, and that shortly thereafter the witness had been told by the gambler's organization that the phone number for calling in bets was changed to one for the area in which the house was located. On the basis of the conversation and the phone number, the witness testified that it was possible bets were being taken out of the defendant's house. The Court held there was no error in admitting the testimony, as the witness was not being asked to draw an inference for the jury's benefit, but to show that, when the facts were known equally or better by the defendant, it could be assumed the defendant probably had drawn the same inference and thus had the requisite knowledge.

United States v. Oliver, 908 F.2d 260 (8th Cir. 1990) : The defendant, charged with aiding and abetting the forgery of a check, denied that she knew the true last name of the forger when she endorsed the check. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by a detective that he had seen the two together more than once and he had no doubt that she knew the forger's name.

United States v. Henke, 222 F.3d 633 (9th Cir. 2000) : Two corporate officials were charged with securities fraud and related offenses, the government alleging that the defendants "cooked the books" to present the corporation as a more favorable investment opportunity than it actually was. At trial, the person who took over the job of one of the defendants testified that the defendants "must have known" about the revenue reporting scheme. Reversing on other grounds, the Court found that admitting this testimony was error, because "the jury was in the best position to determine whether the defendants knew about the revenue scheme," so the witness' lay testimony did not assist the jury. In United States v. Koon, 34 F.3d 1416 (9th Cir. 1994) , aff'd in part on other grounds, 518 U.S. 81 (1996) , the Court affirmed the convictions of two police officers for the deprivation of the rights of an arrestee, Rodney King, who was severely beaten after a high-speed chase. This federal conviction was obtained after a state trial on the same matter resulted in a mistrial on one count and an acquittal on all other counts. The Court found no error in the admission of testimony given in the state trial by an officer who was at the scene of the beating (and who was actually acquitted as a defendant in both trials) that one of the defendants was "out of control," as it was helpful to the jury and was rationally based on the officer's personal perception of the beating. In United States v. Skeet, n24 the Court held there was no error in rejecting the opinion testimony of two witnesses in an assault case that a shooting was accidental.

United States v. Hoffner, 777 F.2d 1423 (10th Cir. 1985) : In a prosecution of a doctor for illegally dispensing drugs, the Court held that lay witnesses were properly barred from testifying that in their opinion the drugs were dispensed for a proper purpose. Because none of the witnesses was present in the examining room when the patients who received prescriptions were examined, the opinions could not be based on facts perceived by the witnesses.

[22] Law Enforcement Agents

[a] Drug Cases

United States v. Pinillos-Prieto, 419 F.3d 61 (1st Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed cocaine convictions, holding that a law enforcement officer was properly permitted to testify as a lay witness that drug organizations were dangerous and that they protected their drugs with firearms, and that the moment when drugs and money were handed over was the most dangerous part of the work of an undercover agent. Those matters were well founded on the officer's personal knowledge and were susceptible to cross-examination. In United States v. Ayala-Pizarro, 407 F.3d 25 (1st Cir. 2005) , the Court affirmed drug and firearms convictions, finding no error in the admission of a police officer's testimony concerning the nature of drug distribution points and their operation, and no plain error in the admission of the officer's testimony as to how heroin is normally packaged for distribution. The Court reasoned that neither type of testimony was expert testimony, since the officer based his testimony on his personal experience in the neighborhood about which he testified. In United States v. Santana, 342 F.3d 60 (1st Cir. 2003) , the Court affirmed cocaine convictions, finding no error in the admission of testimony by a DEA agent that he smelled marijuana during the search of a witness' home. The Court found that the agent had personal knowledge of what he smelled and had sufficient experience to be able to identify the smell of marijuana. In United States v. DiMarzo, n25 the Court affirmed convictions for a cocaine distribution conspiracy in which two defendants asserted they had not known a third was planning to conduct a drug deal, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an undercover agent in the case to testify on redirect that in his experience innocent observers were not invited to accompany criminals engaged in completing a drug deal. The testimony did not implicate the opinion rules, since it was simply the witness' personal experience relating to a subject bearing directly upon the appropriateness of a jury inference, nor did it encroach on the jury's factfinding function regarding the ultimate issue of guilt.

United States v. Garcia, 413 F.3d 201 (2d Cir. 2005) : During the defendant's trial for a cocaine distribution conspiracy, a case agent was permitted to testify, "based on your investigation" or "[a]s far as our investigation determined," regarding the roles of certain participants, including the defendant. The Court held that admission of the testimony was error, but harmless. Although opinion testimony is not inadmissible simply because it embraces an ultimate issue, the agent's opinion that the defendant was a partner with another in receiving cocaine "was essentially telling the jury that he had concluded that Garcia was guilty of the crimes charged," and opinion testimony merely telling the jury what result to reach is inadmissible. The testimony was not admissible lay opinion because it was not based on the agent's personal perceptions, but rather drew on the total information developed by all the officials who participated in the investigation, and it was not helpful to the jury within the meaning of Rule 701 in that it went beyond telling the jurors what was in the evidence to telling them what inferences to draw from it. To the extent the witness' opinion was based on specialized knowledge, it was inadmissible under Rule 701(c), and the government had made no effort to satisfy the expert testimony requirements of reliability under Rule 702 and pretrial disclosure under Fed. R. Crim. P. 16. In a cocaine prosecution, United States v. Forrester, 60 F.3d 52 (2d Cir. 1995) , a government witness testified that she had told the DEA agent about two men involved in the drug scheme, including the defendant, and that she had identified the defendant's photograph for the agent. The agent's reports made no mention of these matters, and the agent recalled no identification. Nonetheless, the agent testified in response to the prosecutor's questions that he found nothing inconsistent between the witness' testimony and what she had told him. Reversing, the Court stated that the agent's testimony, which was simply an opinion of the witness' credibility, could not assist the jury.

United States v. Figueroa-Lopez, 125 F.3d 1241 (9th Cir. 1997) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit, as lay opinion, testimony by law enforcement officers that the defendant's conduct conformed to the methods and techniques of experienced drug dealers. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 701.02[7].

United States v. Marshall, 173 F.3d 1312 (11th Cir. 1999) : An informant allegedly received crack cocaine from the defendants and turned it over to the police later that day or the next day. At trial the DEA agent supervising the operation was permitted to testify that he did not believe the crack received by the police had come from a source other than the defendants. Vacating the defendants' convictions, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit the testimony, since the agent was a lay witness and he had no personal knowledge regarding the origin of the cocaine provided by the informant. In United States v. Valdez, n26 a marijuana possession conspiracy prosecution, a Customs investigator was properly permitted to opine that the defendant and another had entered a semi-trailer under surveillance, after testifying that he saw the men's legs and feet through the underside of the trailer and then saw the legs and feet disappear without subsequently reappearing around either side of the trailer.

[b] Law Enforcement Agents -- Other Cases

United States v. Palmieri, 21 F.3d 1265 (3d Cir. 1994) , vacated on other grounds, 513 U.S. 957 (1994) : The Court affirmed a conviction for unlicensed dealing in firearms, holding there was no error in admitting testimony by experienced FBI agents that weapons were machine guns, even though the witnesses were not qualified as experts. In United States v. Allen, 10 F.3d 405 (7th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed a conviction for aiding and abetting the conduct of an illegal gambling business, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a statement by an undercover officer who operated the sting that she "assumed" the defendant would continue to do favors because he was anticipating they could do him a favor. The "assumption" was an inference based on the witness' own perceptions, nothing in the defendant's trial objection specifically referenced the Rule's helpfulness requirement, and the defense had ample opportunity to clarify and pick apart the witness' testimony on cross-examination.

United States v. Begay, 42 F.3d 486 (9th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed convictions for various offenses arising out of a civil disturbance on a Navajo reservation, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an officer to narrate a videotape that was a half-speed version, with color-coded circles and arrows added, of an original videotape of the incident. Although the officer had not been present at the disturbance, he had reviewed the original over 100 times, aided by a magnifying glass, so his testimony was based on his own perceptions, and it and the enhanced tape were helpful to the jury in evaluating the original. In United States v. Simas, 937 F.2d 459 (9th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed convictions for bribery and mail fraud, holding there was no error in permitting FBI agents to give lay opinion testimony concerning their understanding of what the defendant meant to convey by vague and ambiguous statements during the course of the alleged crimes. The agents' opinions were based on their perceptions, and their understanding of the words and innuendo was helpful to the jury in understanding the defendant's meaning. In a bank robbery prosecution, United States v. Burnette, n27 the Court found no error in permitting a police officer to state his opinion that one of the defendants was "removing" a license plate from a car, as the testimony was based on his observations and was helpful to the jury. The Court did observe, however, that "it would have been better had the District Court limited [the officer] to statement of the underlying facts."

United States v. Stanley, 896 F.2d 450 (10th Cir. 1990) : In a prosecution for receiving child pornography through the mails, there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a postal inspector to testify that the children depicted engaging in sexual conduct in photographs he observed while testifying were under age 18, as the testimony was helpful in determining the subjects' ages and as an explanation of why he had seized the package.

United States v. Awan, 966 F.2d 1415 (11th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed convictions for money laundering, holding there was no error in permitting an undercover agent to state his understanding of conversations with defendants, where the conversations were abbreviated, composed with unfinished sentences, and included numerous references to complicated international finance and money laundering transactions with which the jury would likely be unfamiliar.

[23] Legal Conclusions

United States v. Griffin, 324 F.3d 330 (5th Cir. 2003) : In a prosecution for mail fraud, the Court found that the former director of the Texas Department of Housing and Community Affairs was properly permitted to testify as to her understanding of state ethics rules and what the Department's employees were instructed about those rules. The Court also found that the witness, who testified as a lay witness, was improperly permitted to testify as to her interpretation of the law. The error was harmless, however.

United States v. Sheffey, 57 F.3d 1419 (6th Cir. 1995) : The defendant was charged with murder and assault after an automobile collision in which he was driving impaired with prescription drugs and alcohol. At trial eyewitnesses were asked whether the defendant had driven "recklessly, in extreme disregard of human life." The Court held that although the question embraced the terms of the jury instruction on malice aforethought, the terms have a separate, distinct, and specialized meaning in the law different from that in the vernacular, so the witnesses were not being called on to provide unhelpful legal conclusions. One Judge dissented on the ground that "extreme disregard for human life" is a form of words that, while used in ordinary speech, also has a specialized legal meaning. In Torres v. County of Oakland, n28 the Court held it was error (but harmless) for a witness, who had taken part in the selection of a person for a new supervisory position, to give an opinion as to whether the plaintiff had been discriminated against because of national origin, since this called for a legal conclusion. The Court suggested that "a more carefully phrased question could have elicited similar information and avoided the problem of testimony containing a legal conclusion."

United States v. Misle Bus & Equip. Co., 967 F.2d 1227, 1992-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P69879 (8th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to suppress competition in violation of the Sherman Act, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting lay witnesses to give testimony that "agreements" to fix prices and allocate the market had been reached. The word has a well-established lay meaning and does not demand a conclusion as to the legal implications of conduct.

United States v. Crawford, 239 F.3d 1086 (9th Cir. 2001) : The defendant was a professor at UCLA who was charged with fraudulently having arranged for the sale of a valuable painting that hung on the wall of her office at UCLA. To rebut the defense that UCLA had abandoned the painting, the government called a University official who testified that UCLA is a public institution that is not permitted to abandon property. The Court held that admitting this testimony was error (though harmless) because the lay witness was essentially giving a legal conclusion: " 'Abandon' is a legal term, and the jury could have read [the official's] statement to mean that UCLA cannot, as a matter of law, be found to have 'abandoned' property." In United States v. Koon, 34 F.3d 1416 (9th Cir. 1994) , aff'd in part on other grounds, 518 U. S. 81 (1996) , the Court affirmed the convictions of two police officers for the deprivation of the rights of an arrestee, Rodney King, who was severely beaten after a high-speed chase. This federal conviction was obtained after a state trial on the same matter resulted in a mistrial on one count and an acquittal on all other counts. The Court found no error in the admission of testimony given in the state trial by an officer who was at the scene of the beating (and who was actually acquitted as a defendant in both trials) to the effect that after the beating he went to the police station intending to report a use of excessive force. Declining "to adopt a rule barring testimony about actions which are motivated by opinions," the Court rejected the argument that the officer's testimony was an impermissible lay opinion that excessive force had been used.

[24] Mental or Physical Condition

Singletary v. Secretary of HEW, 623 F.2d 217 (2d Cir. 1980) : In the course of reversing a denial of disability benefits, the Court said that the claimant's son should have been permitted to testify about the claimant's alcoholism and inability to work, even though he was not a doctor.

Bushman v. Halm, 798 F.2d 651 (3d Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a summary judgment for a defendant in a Federal Tort Claims Act case arising out of an automobile accident. The plaintiff's affidavit stated that his legs were pain-free prior to the accident, but that he experienced recurrent pain in his knees and surrounding soft tissues after they contacted the dashboard in the accident. The Court found that the affidavit was based upon first-hand knowledge, and set forth facts relevant to the material issue of causation.

Pedraza v. Jones, 71 F.3d 194 (5th Cir. 1995) : One issue in a suit by a prisoner who claimed that he was denied medical treatment for heroin withdrawal was whether the statute of limitations was tolled because of the plaintiff's mental condition. Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, the Court held that an affidavit by a 30-year heroin addict was inadmissible as lay opinion concerning the plaintiff's mental condition, because the affiant had no personal knowledge about the plaintiff.

United States v. Lawson, 653 F.2d 299 (7th Cir. 1981) : Lay testimony that the defendant was sane at time of offenses was permitted. In United States v. Jackson, n29 the Court held that an inmate's wife, who observed the incident, could not properly testify as to why her husband was depressed at the time he assaulted a correctional officer, because she could not perceive the cause of his depression.

United States v. LeRoy, 944 F.2d 787 (10th Cir. 1991) : A defendant charged with conspiring to distribute cocaine base attempted to impeach a prosecution witness by evidence that the witness' probation file included a handwritten notation, "mentally unbalanced." The Court held the record was properly excluded because there was no showing of the basis for the opinion, which would be required if the declarant had testified.

Dallis v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 768 F.2d 1303 (11th Cir. 1985) : Affirming a widower's judgment in an action to recover the costs of his wife's cancer treatment at a Bahamian clinic, the Court held that lay witnesses who had been treated at the clinic were properly permitted to testify that they were feeling in good health, as the evidence related to the question whether the wife's treatment was necessary.

[25] Noise

Rushing v. Kansas City S. Ry., 185 F.3d 496 (5th Cir. 1999) : The Court reversed a partial summary judgment for the defendant in a nuisance action by homeowners complaining of noise and vibrations from the defendant's property, finding that the plaintiffs' affidavits, which claimed that the noise measurement obtained by the defendant's expert did not reflect the typical noise that they heard, raised a genuine issue of material fact. The Court indicated that it was unsure whether the Trial Judge excluded the affidavits, but concluded that exclusion would have been an abuse of discretion, since the plaintiffs satisfied Rule 701. There was no way to state that the sound was quieter than usual on the night of measurement "except by the conclusory inference" and that the plaintiffs' conclusions "would be helpful to the jury in assessing KCS's compliance" with noise regulations.

[26] Participation in Crime

United States v. Santos, 201 F.3d 953 (7th Cir. 2000) : The Chicago City Treasurer was charged with illegally soliciting political contributions from banks and securities firms; those who refused to contribute were allegedly denied contracts with the Treasurer's office. The actual cutoffs of recalcitrant contractors were ordered by the Treasurer's deputy, but employees of the office were permitted to testify that they had "no doubt" or a "personal feeling" that the Treasurer had ordered the deputy to order the cutoffs. Reversing for this and other evidentiary errors, the Court found that the witnesses had gone beyond their personal knowledge -- of the way in which the defendant managed her office -- to draw an impermissible speculative inference that the Treasurer had given an express order.

United States v. Thompson, 708 F.2d 1294 (8th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed convictions for interstate transportation of stolen equipment, finding no error in the admission of opinion testimony by three government witnesses that the defendant was involved in the criminal activity. A majority found that the witnesses each described specific facts known to him and that the opinion of each was a "shorthand rendition" of the facts. A dissenting Judge found that the opinions impermissibly went beyond the facts that the witnesses had observed and that they were not the kind of opinions that would have been helpful to a jury.

[27] Personal Knowledge

United States v. Olender, 338 F.3d 629 (6th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a conviction for being a felon in possession of ammunition, the Court found no error in the exclusion of a defense witness who would have criticized the police investigation in the case. The witness was basing his opinion on a review of documents and taped interviews with people who knew about the investigation. The Court noted that firsthand knowledge was an essential requirement for lay witnesses, and this witness did not meet that requirement.

[28] Reasonableness of Charges

Tampa Bay Shipbuilding & Repair Co. v. Cedar Shipping Co., 320 F.3d 1213 (11th Cir. 2003) : In an action by a ship repairer to recover payment for repairs made to an ocean-going bulk carrier, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting officers and employees of the plaintiff to testify as lay witnesses that the charges for the work by it and its subcontractors were reasonable and in line with those of similar operations providing similar services. The witnesses were not testifying to specialized knowledge within the realm of an expert, but to particularized knowledge that they had by virtue of their position in the business.

[29] Speed of Vehicle

Gust v. Jones, 162 F.3d 587 (10th Cir. 1998) : Appealing verdicts for plaintiffs in an action arising out of a highway accident, the defendants claimed it was a violation of Rule 701 to permit an eyewitness to provide an opinion on the speed of one of the vehicles at the time of the accident. The Court held that this testimony was properly admitted because "persons of reasonable intelligence and ordinary experience are uniformly permitted to express opinions as to matters such as the speed of an automobile under their observation." The Court noted that the witness had followed the vehicle for a number of miles prior to the accident.

[30] Technical Matters

Asplundh Mfg. Div. v. Benton Harbor Eng'g, 57 F.3d 1190 (3d Cir. 1995) : In an action for contribution arising from a fatal accident involving an aerial lift, the plaintiffs offered deposition testimony by the fleet maintenance supervisor responsible for the lift that he had inspected the disassembled lift shortly after the accident, that he had observed a metal fracture where a hole had been drilled through a metal rod, that the accident was attributable to the way the rod was drilled through, and that he questioned the appropriateness of the design. The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiffs because the Trial Judge failed to examine with sufficient rigor whether the supervisor's testimony admitted under Rule 701 was informed by sufficient experience or specialized knowledge. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 701.02[7]

Doddy v. Oxy USA, Inc., 101 F.3d 448 (5th Cir. 1996) : In an action alleging personal injuries from toxic chemicals emanating from a well, the Trial Judge had determined that a witness, who was characterized by the plaintiffs as both lay and expert, was qualified to testify about corrosion in oil and gas wells, but had excluded testimony, allegedly based on the witness' personal knowledge, about toxic chemicals being used at the well. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court found no error, reasoning that the witness lacked any expertise in chemistry or toxicology, and declared: "It is rather doubtful that, in the absence of any specialized training or experience in these areas, he -- or any other ordinary person -- could have personal knowledge about the toxicity of chemicals (such as benzene) at the well or elsewhere."

[31] Trademarks

Coca-Cola Co. v. Overland, Inc., 692 F.2d 1250, 1982-83 Trade Cas. (CCH) P65051 (9th Cir. 1982) : Affirming judgments in favor of Coca-Cola against a defendant charged with trademark infringement and unfair competition, the Court said that employees of the defendant's bar and restaurant were not qualified to testify as to what their customers were thinking when they ordered "Coke."

[32] Value of Property

Robinson v. Watts Detective Agency, 685 F.2d 729 (1st Cir. 1982) : In a suit by the trustee in bankruptcy of a security corporation alleging misappropriation of assets, the Court held that the owner of a business is competent to give an opinion as to the value of corporate employees, customers, and goodwill.

United States v. 68. 94 Acres of Land, 918 F.2d 389 (3d Cir. 1990) : The Court vacated and remanded a judgment for landowners in an eminent domain case because expert testimony by the landowners' expert was improperly excluded. The Court held, however, that it was no abuse of discretion to strike testimony by a landowner regarding the property's value, which was based only on the opinion of another expert whose testimony was excluded pursuant to a proper discovery sanction.

King v. Ames, 179 F.3d 370 (5th Cir. 1999) : The plaintiff brought an action on behalf of her father, a deceased musician, against a record producer for, inter alia, misappropriation of the father's name and likeness. She testified that she had ten years' experience informally conducting business for the estate and that she was familiar with the commercial value of his name and likeness because of involvement in negotiations to market T-shirts; based on that experience she determined the defendant's misappropriation amounted to $25,000 in damages. The Trial Judge granted the defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law after the jury awarded $27,000 damages on the claim, but the Court reversed, holding that the plaintiff's testimony was sufficient evidence of the value of the intangible property interest. In South Cent. Livestock Dealers, Inc. v. Security State Bank, n30 a corporation's financial officer was treated as so clearly akin to the owner of a business that he was qualified to give an opinion regarding the value of the business.

United States v. Johnson, 805 F.2d 753 (7th Cir. 1986) : Affirming bank fraud convictions, the Court held that a lay person could testify to the value of collateral where his opinion was based on his own perceptions.

Eckelkamp v. Beste, 315 F.3d 863 (8th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed judgments for the defendants in an action alleging breach of ERISA fiduciary duties, and found no abuse of discretion in the admission of affidavits by the company's accountant and another who conducted the company's annual appraisals that included statements about executive compensation at other companies and an explanation of why a particular valuation method was used. The statements were offered to show the basis of advice given the fiduciaries and contained particularized knowledge that the witnesses had by virtue of their positions, so they were not excludable as expert opinion.

Malloy v. Monahan, 73 F.3d 1012 (10th Cir. 1996) : The plaintiff in a civil rights action alleged that injuries from the defendants' use of excessive force caused him to lose profits from his business of purchasing, rehabilitating, and selling houses. The Court held that the plaintiff had sufficient expertise and personal knowledge to render an opinion as to the value of his properties and lost future profits of his own real estate ventures.

J & H Auto Trim Co. v. Bellefonte Ins. Co., 677 F.2d 1365 (11th Cir. 1982) : In a fire insurance dispute, the Court held that the Trial Judge unduly restricted evidence of the destroyed property's value, saying that "an owner of property is competent to testify regarding its value," and that the weight of the testimony is for the jury to decide. Accord La Combe v. A-T-O, Inc., 679 F.2d 431 (5th Cir. 1982) .

[33] Voice Identification

United States v. Bush, 405 F.3d 909 (10th Cir. 2005) : The defendant, convicted of cocaine distribution, argued that it was error to allow the undercover officer to testify as a lay witness that it was the defendant's voice in an incriminating conversation that was surreptitiously recorded and played at trial. The Court affirmed, finding no error in admitting the voice identification testimony under Rule 701. The witness had sufficient familiarity with the defendant's voice from speaking to him in person and numerous times over the phone. Moreover, the testimony was helpful to the jury, since the defendant exercised his right not to testify and the jury never heard his voice.

[34] Wealth or Income

United States v. Flaharty, 295 F.3d 182 (2d Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for drug conspiracy offenses, the Court found no plain error when a key government witness, a former leader of the conspiracy, testified to estimates of the income received by participants. The witness had personal knowledge of the drugs sold and the money grossed from the sales, and thus was in a position to offer an estimate.

3-701 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 701.04

701.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

The rule retains the traditional objective of putting the trier of fact in possession of an accurate reproduction of the event.

Limitation (a) is the familiar requirement of first-hand knowledge or observation.

Limitation (b) is phrased in terms of requiring testimony to be helpful in resolving issues. Witnesses often find difficulty in expressing themselves in language which is not that of an opinion or conclusion. While the courts have made concessions in certain recurring situations, necessity as a standard for permitting opinions and conclusions has proved too elusive and too unadaptable to particular situations for purposes of satisfactory judicial administration. McCormick § 11. Moreover, the practical impossibility of determining by rule what is a "fact," demonstrated by a century of litigation of the question of what is a fact for purposes of pleading under the Field Code extends into evidence also. 7 Wigmore § 1919. The rule assumes that the natural characteristics of the adversary system will generally lead to an acceptable result, since the detailed account carries more conviction than the broad assertion, and a lawyer can be expected to display his witness to the best advantage. If he fails to do so, cross-examination and argument will point up the weakness. See Ladd, Expert Testimony, 5 Vand. L. Rev. 414, 415-17 (1952). If, despite these considerations, attempts are made to introduce meaningless assertions which amount to little more than choosing up sides, exclusion for lack of helpfulness is called for by the rule.

The language of the rule is substantially that of Uniform Rule 56(1). Similar provisions are California Evidence Code § 800; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-456(a); New Jersey Evidence Rule 56(1).

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendments are technical. No substantive change is intended."]

[2] 2000 Amendment Committee Note

2000 Amendment Committee Note

Committee Note

Rule 701 has been amended to eliminate the risk that the reliability requirements set forth in Rule 702 will be evaded through the simple expedient of proffering an expert in lay witness clothing. Under the amendment, a witness' testimony must be scrutinized under the rules regulating expert opinion to the extent that the witness is providing testimony based on scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge within the scope of Rule 702. See generally Asplundh Mfg. Div. v. Benton Harbor Eng'g, 57 F.3d 1190 (3d Cir. 1995) . By channeling testimony that is actually expert testimony to Rule 702, the amendment also ensures that a party will not evade the expert witness disclosure requirements set forth in Fed.R.Civ.P. 26 and Fed.R.Crim.P.16 by simply calling an expert witness in the guise of a layperson. See Joseph, Emerging Expert Issues under the 1993 Disclosure Amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 164 F.R.D. 97, 108 (1996) (noting that "there is no good reason to allow what is essentially surprise expert testimony," and that "the court should be vigilant to preclude manipulative conduct designed to thwart the expert disclosure and discovery process"). See also United States v. Figueroa-Lopez, 125 F.3d 1241, 1246 (9th Cir. 1997) (law enforcement agents testifying that the defendant's conduct was consistent with that of a drug trafficker could not testify as lay witnesses; to permit such testimony under Rule 701 "subverts the requirements of Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 16(a)(1)(E)").

The amendment does not distinguish between expert and lay witnesses, but rather between expert and lay testimony. Certainly it is possible for the same witness to provide both lay and expert testimony in a single case. See, e.g., United States v. Figueroa-Lopez, 125 F.3d 1241, 1246 (9th Cir. 1997) (law enforcement agents could testify that the defendant was acting suspiciously, without being qualified as experts; however, the rules on experts were applicable where the agents testified on the basis of extensive experience that the defendant was using code words to refer to drug quantities and prices). The amendment makes clear that any part of a witness' testimony that is based upon scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge within the scope of Rule 702 is governed by the standards of Rule 702 and the corresponding disclosure requirements of the Civil and Criminal Rules.

The amendment is not intended to affect the "prototypical example[s] of the type of evidence contemplated by the adoption of Rule 701 relat[ing] to the appearance of persons or things, identity, the manner of conduct, competency of a person, degrees of light or darkness, sound, size, weight, distance, and an endless number of items that cannot be described factually in words apart from inferences." Asplundh Mfg. Div. v. Benton Harbor Eng'g, 57 F.3d 1190, 1196 (3d Cir. 1995) .

For example, most courts have permitted the owner or officer of a business to testify to the value or projected profits of the business, without the necessity of qualifying the witness as an accountant, appraiser, or similar expert. See, e.g., Lightning Lube, Inc. v. Witco Corp., 4 F.3d 1153 (3d Cir. 1993) (no abuse of discretion in permitting the plaintiff's owner to give lay opinion testimony as to damages, as it was based on his knowledge and participation in the day-to-day affairs of the business). Such opinion testimony is admitted not because of experience, training or specialized knowledge within the realm of an expert, but because of the particularized knowledge that the witness has by virtue of his or her position in the business. The amendment does not purport to change this analysis. Similarly, courts have permitted lay witnesses to testify that a substance appeared to be a narcotic, so long as a foundation of familiarity with the substance is established. See, e.g., United States v. Westbrook, 896 F.2d 330 (8th Cir. 1990) (two lay witnesses who were heavy amphetamine users were properly permitted to testify that a substance was amphetamine; but it was error to permit another witness to make such an identification where she had no experience with amphetamines). Such testimony is not based on specialized knowledge within the scope of Rule 702, but rather is based upon a layperson's personal knowledge. If, however, that witness were to describe how a narcotic was manufactured, or to describe the intricate workings of a narcotic distribution network, then the witness would have to qualify as an expert under Rule 702. United States v. Figueroa-Lopez, supra.

The amendment incorporates the distinctions set forth in State v. Brown, 836 S.W.2d 530, 549 (1992) , a case involving former Tennessee Rule of Evidence 701, a rule that precluded lay witness testimony based on "special knowledge." In Brown, the court declared that the distinction between lay and expert witness testimony is that lay testimony "results from a process of reasoning familiar in everyday life," while expert testimony "results from a process of reasoning which can be mastered only by specialists in the field." The court in Brown noted that a lay witness with experience could testify that a substance appeared to be blood, but that a witness would have to qualify as an expert before he could testify that bruising around the eyes is indicative of skull trauma. That is the kind of distinction made by the amendment to this Rule.

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 701, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 701 has been amended as part of the general restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

The Committee deleted all reference to an "inference" on the grounds that the deletion made the Rule flow better and easier to read, and because any "inference" is covered by the broader term "opinion." Courts have not made substantive decisions on the basis of any distinction between an opinion and an inference. No change in current practice is intended.

[Go To Main]

[2] Age [Go To Main]

United States v. Kain, 589 F.3d 945 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed drug and child pornography convictions, finding no plain error in the admission of a Texas Ranger's testimony that he met the girl depicted in one of the images on the defendant's computer and she was approximately five years old.

[4] Credibility [Go To Main]

Cameron v. City of New York, 598 F.3d 50 (2d Cir. 2010) : In a false arrest and malicious prosecution action against police officers who arrested the plaintiffs, the defendants introduced evidence that the prosecutors who prepared the charging documents following the arrests considered the police officers' complaints credible. Vacating a judgment for the defendants, the Court held that the evidence was inadmissible because the prosecutors' belief in the officers' credibility was irrelevant to whether they had probable cause to make the arrests and because it is improper for one witness to vouch for the credibility of another.

[5] Custom or Practice [Go To Main]

United States v. Munoz, 487 F.3d 25 (1st Cir. 2007) : Affirming convictions of former bank executives for bank fraud, the Court found no abuse of discretion when an officer of the affected bank testified to his opinion that certain loan transactions were improperly classified. The officer's testimony was based on his knowledge of the bank's loan classification system and the practice applying it.

Craig Outdoor Advertising, Inc. v. Viacom Outdoor, Inc., 528 F.3d 1001 (8th Cir. 2008) : Small billboard companies alleged that the defendant, a billboard operator acting as leasing agent for railroads, had wrongfully appropriated for itself billboard sites for which the plaintiffs had applied. Affirming in part a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting two railroad employees to testify that the defendant's process of reviewing site applications internally was outside the industry norm and contrary to their expectations as representatives of the railroads and that it was not fair for the defendant to surreptitiously review applications and appropriate sites. The witnesses spoke from their experience in railroad real estate management and billboard site review and approval, and their testimony was helpful to the jury in refuting testimony by the defendant's witnesses that its process was permissible under the terms of its contracts with the railroads.

[6] Damages [Go To Main]

Donlin v. Philips Lighting N. Am. Corp., 581 F.3d 73 (3d Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed the finding of liability for the plaintiff in an employment discrimination suit but vacated the damages determination. Finding an abuse of discretion in permitting the plaintiff to testify about her estimated lost earnings and pension benefits, the Court noted that "we have consistently required that lay testimony requiring future projections of a business or operation come from someone who has intimate and thorough knowledge of the business gathered from either a lengthy tenure or a position of authority." In this case, the plaintiff was only a temporary employee for less than a year "and did not develop in-depth knowledge of the company's salary structure, advancement opportunities, pay raises, or employment patterns." Much of her testimony "required forward-looking speculation for which she lacked training," so it "crossed the line into subject areas that demand expert testimony."

Meaux Surface Protection, Inc. v. Fogleman, 607 F.3d 161 (5th Cir. 2010) : In a suit involving damages to a business, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the chief financial officer of the plaintiff was permitted to testify concerning lost profits. The Court observed that a corporate officer who provides projections or opinions about changes in profits is not an expert but a lay witness, so that the heightened disclosure requirements for an expert witness were not implicated. Because the CFO was intimately familiar with the plaintiff's financial performance, "[i]t would defy reason to say that the district court abused its discretion in allowing him to testify about such matters" as lost profits and financial damages.

Von der Ruhr v. Immtech Int'l, Inc., 570 F.3d 858 (7th Cir. 2009) : In an action by the assignee of a patent license and its president for breach of contract and tortious interference with contract, the Court affirmed judgment for the plaintiffs. However, it found no abuse of discretion in excluding the president's lay opinion testimony as to millions of dollars of lost profits. The patent licence related to a brand new drug that was not approved by the FDA and that still needed a corporate partner, and as to which no competitive market analysis had been done. The president "had no personal experience with obtaining a corporate licensing agreement for a pharmaceutical or treatment of any kind, had never brought a pharmaceutical to market, and had never made a profit from a pharmaceutical." In addition, he had no experience in finding a corporate partner for a new pharmaceutical, so he "did not have any personal knowledge or experience to contribute." In Emerald Invs. L.P. v. Allmerica Fin. Life Ins. & Ann. Co., 516 F.3d 612 (7th Cir. 2008) , in a breach of contract action by an investor whose "market timing" arbitrage scheme had been terminated when the defendant unilaterally amended account transfer rules, the Court held it was error to admit damages testimony by the plaintiff's principal. "With the benefit of hindsight, he picked days on which he said he would have traded during the damages period ... had it not been for the breach of contract, which prevented him from doing so. His testimony was as worthless as [if a bettor] had picked the horse to bet on after the race had been run."

US Salt, Inc. v. Broken Arrow, Inc., 563 F.3d 687 (8th Cir. 2009) : In a breach of contract action involving supplies of salt, the Court held there was no error when testimony on lost profits by the president of the plaintiff corporation was excluded. The opinion amounted to "speculation and conjecture" because the president "failed to perform any analysis of a viable market for the solar salt he expected to receive from Broken Arrow and he lacked relevant and recent activity in the solar salt market." Further, he "could not identify any customer interested in buying from U.S. Salt a specific amount of solar salt at a specific price" and the company had not been active in the solar salt market since the late 1980s.

[9] Drugs and Controlled Substances [Go To Main]

In United States v. Durham, 464 F.3d 976 (9th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for allowing her 18-month-old daughter to inhale from a lit marijuana pipe, finding no abuse of discretion in allowing a witness with a lengthy history of smoking marijuana to testify that the substance in the pipe contained marijuana. The witness was present at the time and smoked from the same pipe, so her opinion was based on her personal knowledge obtained by seeing, smelling, tasting, and experiencing the effects of the pipe's contents. Since the opinion was based upon personal knowledge of the characteristics of marijuana and of the substance at issue, it was not based on specialized knowledge within the scope of Rule 702.

[11] Expert Witness Distinguished [Go To Main]

[a] Civil Cases

Donlin v. Philips Lighting N. Am. Corp., 581 F.3d 73 (3d Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in an employment discrimination suit but remanded for a re-trial on damages, finding an abuse of discretion in permitting the plaintiff to testify about her estimated lost earnings and pension benefits. It noted that "we have consistently required that lay testimony requiring future projections of a business or operation come from someone who has intimate and thorough knowledge of the business gathered from either a lengthy tenure or a position of authority." In this case, the plaintiff was only a temporary employee for less than a year "and did not develop in-depth knowledge of the company's salary structure, advancement opportunities, pay raises, or employment patterns." Much of her testimony "required forward-looking speculation for which she lacked training," so it "crossed the line into subject areas that demand expert testimony." In Eichorn v. AT&T Corp., 484 F.3d 644 (3d Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed summary judgment for the plaintiffs in an action alleging improper termination of pension benefits under ERISA. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of spreadsheets prepared by the son of the plaintiffs. The son, who was not an expert, made various assumptions about future events, such as when the plaintiffs would have retired, how their salaries would have increased, what choices the plaintiffs would have made with respect to pension benefits, and life expectancy of the plaintiffs. Although the plaintiffs claimed that the spreadsheets were admissible under Rule 1006, the Court concluded that "[t]he calculations went beyond the data they summarized and included several assumptions, inferences, and projections about future events, which represent Mr. Crowley's opinion, rather than the underlying information." The evidence was thus subject to the rules governing opinion testimony, and was properly held inadmissible, given there was no abuse of discretion in finding that the son was not qualified to render an opinion as a lay witness.

Compania Administradora de Recuperacion v. Titan Int'l Inc., 533 F.3d 555 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming summary judgment granted to a creditor who sued for breach of a guaranty contract, the Court held that a witness's testimony as to the value of collateral was properly characterized as expert, not lay, testimony. The witness's only connection with the items in question was the fact that he had been an officer of a company that held a controlling interest in another company that at one time owned the collateral; his valuations were based on his extensive experience purchasing and selling the type of items being valued, rather than on personal knowledge. The Court relied on the Advisory Committee Note to the 2000 amendment to Rule 701 for the proposition that "a business owner or officer is allowed to testify [to the value of business property] without being qualified as an expert only because that testimony is tied to his or her personal knowledge." Because the witness was not timely designated as an expert, the Trial Court was within its discretion to exclude the witness' testimony due to the discovery violation. In Farfaras v. Citizens Bank & Trust, 433 F.3d 558 (7th Cir. 2006) , in an action for sexual harassment, the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, finding no abuse of discretion when a lay witness was permitted to describe the plaintiff's mental condition as "depressed." Although the term has a medical definition, "a reasonable jury can be expected to understand the difference between lay use of an adjective and an expert's use of the same word to describe a specific psychological condition."

Jerden v. Amstutz, 430 F.3d 1231 (9th Cir. 2005) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a medical malpractice action, finding it was an abuse of discretion to permit the neurosurgical nurse practitioner who assisted the defendant during an operation on the plaintiff to testify that an MRI report used in connection with the operation indicated a brain tumor. It was error to admit the testimony as that of a fact witness who did not state any opinions, since the witness made detailed and scientific observations about the report and rendered opinions and inferences that he drew from his observations and that, as he admitted, he was not competent to provide.

[b] Expert Witness Distinguished -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Wilson, 605 F.3d 985 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding a former drug dealer who was called as a lay witness to interpret various taped phone calls. The Court reasoned that "[a] witness with firsthand experience of a particular drug operation may testify under Rule 701," but in the absence of firsthand experience, a witness must be qualified as an expert.

United States v. Hatch, 514 F.3d 145 (1st Cir. 2008) : The defendant was convicted for filing false tax returns, having not reported income received as the first winner of the "reality-TV" show "Survivor." On appeal, he complained that two accountants, who were never formally designated as experts by the government, were improperly permitted to give expert testimony. Affirming, the Court held that the accountants, who had prepared tax returns for the defendant, were called as and gave testimony as fact witnesses, and to the extent their unobjected-to testimony might be said to have included expert opinion, it "could in no way be considered to be plain error."

United States v. Yannotti, 541 F.3d 112 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for racketeering conspiracy, finding no abuse of discretion when a government witness who was a member of the same crime family as the defendant was permitted to give his opinion as to the meaning of intercepted phone conversations. It concluded "where a witness derives his opinion solely from insider perceptions of a conspiracy of which he was a member, he may share his perspective as to aspects of the scheme about which he has gained knowledge as a lay witness subject to Rule 701, not as an expert subject to Rule 702." In a prosecution for marijuana distribution, United States v. Hamilton, 538 F.3d 162 (2d Cir. 2008) , a police officer was permitted to give testimony regarding narcotics trafficking. Affirming, the Court held that any error in admitting the testimony as lay opinion was harmless, since the government firmly established the officer's relevant experience, his qualifications, and the reliability of his evidence. In United States v. Rigas, 490 F.3d 208 (2d Cir. 2007) , the court affirmed convictions for securities fraud involving Adelphia Communications Company. It found no abuse of discretion in permitting a company employee to testify as a lay witness to the effects of the company's reclassifying debt, when the testimony was based upon his 20 months' employment with the company and his familiarity with company records. The witness testified not on the basis of general knowledge about recordkeeping but rather upon his observations made during employment at Adelphia. Moreover, the witness did not testify to whether the reclassifications were proper (which would have been the province of an expert) but rather to the effect of the reclassifications.

United States v. Roe, 606 F.3d 180 (4th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for impersonating a federal police officer, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting a police officer to give lay testimony as to the qualifications and authority related to the handgun carry permit and security guard and private detective certifications found in the defendant's wallet. The officer was in charge of the unit that issues the permits and certifications, so his testimony was rationally based on his perceptions regarding a matter that the Court said "was not 'specialized knowledge' in the Rule 702 sense." In United States v. Perkins, 470 F.3d 150 (4th Cir. 2006) , in the trial of a police officer for using excessive force in making an arrest, officers who were at the scene were permitted to testify that unnecessary blows were struck, as were three officers without personal knowledge of the event. None of these witnesses were designated as experts, and the defendant argued that it was error to permit them to testify as lay witnesses. Affirming, the Court found that the testimony of officers at the scene "was framed in terms of their eyewitness observations and particularized experience as police officers" and thus was admissible under Rule 701. It held, however, that the opinion testimony of the three other officers "crossed the line between Rules 701 and 702." Their opinions "were elicited in response to hypothetical questions based on second-hand accounts, making their testimony similar, if not indistinguishable from" expert testimony. The error in admitting that testimony as lay opinion was harmless, however.

United States v. McMillan, 600 F.3d 434 (5th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a fraud conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when a CPA and a former insurance regulator, who had been employed by the defendant, were permitted to testify regarding the booking of assets on the books of the defendant's company. Both "properly testified as fact witnesses about their observations and perceptions in the case in response to specific solicitations from [the defendant]." The Court also found that testimony by an auditor for the state department of insurance who conducted a targeted review of the company's financial statements was largely factual, and that to the extent it may have implicated specialized accounting knowledge, any error would be harmless. In United States v. Valencia, 600 F.3d 389 (5th Cir. 2010) , the Court affirmed fraud convictions arising from a scheme to give false information regarding natural gas trades to industry publications in order to manipulate natural gas markets. It found no abuse of discretion when a former risk manager at one of the involved companies was permitted to testify as a lay witness to the effects of the false reporting. The testimony related to his former job duties, and he recreated much of the analysis he regularly performed when evaluating risk tolerances. Although much of the data had been provided to him after he left the company, his knowledge and analysis were derived from duties he held there, so his testimony was based on personal knowledge and experience gained whiled employed by the company. In United States v. York, 600 F.3d 347 (5th Cir. 2010) , a prosecution for arson offenses, the Court found no abuse of discretion in precluding testimony from the defendant's father regarding the circumstances of the defendant's birth, which led the witness to suspect organic brain damage, as the testimony went to a matter requiring specialized knowledge and an expert witness. In United States v. Caldwell, 586 F.3d 338 (5th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed a conviction for possession and receipt of child pornography, finding no plain error in permitting a government witness to testify about how an individual downloads, installs, and uses a program found on the defendant's computer. The witness testified that it is not possible for someone to send a video file that the user has not searched for, and on cross-examination was unable to answer whether there was "a warning system to tell the user that LimeWire [the program] was being overtaken by a trojan." The Court observed that "[t]he case law is not completely clear on where to draw the line between expert and lay testimony," found that "[t]he testimony elicited by the defense is closer to expert testimony than is the testimony of which it complains," and concluded that "[w]ith the prevalence of computer technology, it is not unreasonable to argue this type of information would fall within knowledge of the average lay person." In United States v. Jackson, 549 F.3d 963 (5th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed the conviction and death sentence of a federal prisoner charged with killing a fellow inmate, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by a special investigator at the prison that inmates typically remove their shirts before fist fights, but typically pad their clothes in knife fights. The Court concluded that the testimony was background information about prison fights that could assist the jury in determining the defendant's and the victim's states of mind, given evidence showing that the victim had taken his shirt off before the fight while the defendant had not. The Court also found no plain error in the admission of the testimony as lay opinion. The witness testified on the basis of his "past experiences based on personal observation as an investigative agent," while expert testimony involves "more than common sense or the officer's past experiences formed from first hand observation." In United States v. Yanez Sosa, 513 F.3d 194 (5th Cir. 2008) , a prosecution for possession of firearms in furtherance of drug trafficking, the Trial Judge permitted law enforcement officers to provide lay testimony on the use of chemicals in drug manufacturing, modifications to firearms, and the reason why drug dealers carry guns. Affirming, the Court noted that "[f]or much of the disputed testimony, we doubt that the district court abused its discretion in determining that the particular testimony at issue fell within the bounds of permissible lay opinion testimony and thus did not impinge the territory of specialized knowledge," since "[i]t is not clear that the testimony that went beyond description, into the realm of opinion, was based on 'specialized knowledge' as opposed simply to common sense or the officer's past experience formed from first-hand observation." Some of the testimony, specifically testimony regarding the use of chemicals found in the defendant's apartment, may have crossed the line, but the Court concluded, without deciding that there was error, that any error was harmless.

United States v. White, 492 F.3d 380 (6th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed convictions arising from a scheme to defraud Medicare, but held it was an abuse of discretion to permit four Medicare auditors (fiscal intermediary witnesses) to testify as lay witnesses. The line separating lay and expert testimony "is far from clear in cases where, as here, a witness with specialized or technical knowledge was also personally involved in the factual underpinnings of the case." Because the Rules "distinguish between lay and expert testimony, not witnesses," "[o]ne witness may properly offer lay testimony and, at the same time, may be precluded from putting forth expert testimony." The Court found that "[t]he Medicare program operates within a complex and intricate regulatory scheme," so that it could not "say that the average lay person, including any Medicare beneficiary, commands a working knowledge of Medicate reimbursement procedures." The error was harmless, since the bulk of the witnesses' testimony constituted lay testimony as to their personal observation of facts while auditing Medicare cost reports. In United States v. Ganier, 468 F.3d 920 (6th Cir. 2006) , a prosecution for obstruction of justice arising from deletion of computer files subpoenaed by a grand jury, testimony from Drueck, a forensic computer specialist who would have testified regarding manipulation of the defendant's computer files, was excluded as a discovery sanction on the ground that the defense had not been provided with a written summary of the testimony as required by Fed. R. Crim. P. 16(a)(1)(G). On interlocutory appeal the government argued that Drueck's testimony was not expert testimony, because it was not scientific or technical, and therefore no advance disclosure was required. However, the Court held that the proposed testimony was based on specialized knowledge and therefore was admissible if at all under Rule 702. It explained that "[t]he average layperson today may be able to interpret the outputs of popular software programs as easily as he or she interprets everyday vernacular, but the interpretation Drueck needed to apply to make sense of the software reports is more similar to the specialized knowledge police officers use to interpret slang and code words used by drug dealers." Although in the past witnesses had been permitted to apply specialized knowledge while giving lay testimony, "the 2000 amendment to Federal Rule of Evidence 701 clarified that lay opinions or inferences cannot be based on scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge within the scope of Rule 702." Thus, the government had violated its discovery obligations under Rule 16, but the Court held that the order precluding the witness was excessive under the circumstances, so it vacated the decision below and remanded for reconsideration.

United States v. Rollins, 544 F.3d 820 (7th Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution of a drug conspiracy, a law enforcement agent was permitted to testify to his interpretation of what were apparently coded conversations between the conspirators. The Court found that the agent was properly permitted to testify as a lay witness, since he was not testifying to terms commonly used by drug conspiracies, but rather to unusual and idiosyncratic code used by this particular conspiracy. The agent's understanding "came only as a result of the particular things he perceived from monitoring intercepted calls, observing drug transactions of these conspirators, and talking with the cooperating conspirators about this drug operation." In United States v. Oriedo, 498 F.3d 593 (7th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed a conviction involving crack cocaine, but held it was error (albeit harmless) to admit as lay opinion an agent's testimony as to the way in which drug dealers package crack cocaine for resale. Although the testimony was couched as a matter of the agent's observation, he "brought the wealth of his experience as a narcotics officer to bear on those observations and made connections for the jury based on that specialized knowledge."

United States v. Garrido, 596 F.3d 613 (9th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for Hobbs Act robbery, finding there was no abuse of discretion when lay witnesses testified that the defendant use a gun during the robbery, where the testimony was predicated on concrete facts within their own observation. "They did not have to be experts or have training in weapons identification to testify about what they saw." United States v. Durham, 464 F.3d 976 (9th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for allowing her 18-month-old daughter to inhale from a lit marijuana pipe, finding no abuse of discretion in allowing a witness with a lengthy history of smoking marijuana to testify that the substance in the pipe contained marijuana. The witness was present at the time and smoked from the same pipe, so her opinion was based on her personal knowledge obtained by seeing, smelling, tasting, and experiencing the effects of the pipe's contents. Since the opinion was based upon personal knowledge of the characteristics of marijuana and of the substance at issue, it was not based on specialized knowledge within the scope of Rule 702.

United States v. Sarras, 575 F.3d 1191 (11th Cir. 2009) : In the defendant's trial for persuading his minor step-daughter to engage in sexually explicit conduct for the purpose of producing photos of the conduct, an officer was permitted to testify that it is not unusual for a 13-year-old child to fail to remember the exact times and dates of an offense. Affirming, the Court "agree[d] with Sarras that the government did not seek to qualify Officer Ortiz as an expert but offered her opinion testimony on this issue as a lay witness" and "her opinion testimony does seem more like that of an expert with specialized knowledge," but it found any error in admitting her testimony to be harmless. In United States v. Hamaker, 455 F.3d 1316 (11th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed bank fraud convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting the government's principal trial witness, a trained financial analyst with 23 years' experience, to testify as a lay witness. The witness did not testify to an expert opinion; rather, he reviewed and summarized voluminous financial documents and matched certain records against other records. This enabled the witness to testify to the results of the comparisons -- i.e., that the records showed that the company sent invoices to a bank for work done by employees whose time sheets showed that the work was not done for the bank. Although the witness conceded that his use of computer software might have made him more efficient at reviewing the records, the Court held that "his review itself was within the capacity of any reasonable lay person." In United States v. Dulcio, 441 F.3d 1269 (11th Cir. 2006) , a drug distribution case, a law enforcement agent testified to the modus operandi of people involved in the drug business and tied each codefendant's role to that typically seen in a narcotics importing business. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to permit such testimony as lay witness testimony, because it was based on "specialized knowledge" within the meaning of Rule 702. In United States v. LeCroy, 441 F.3d 914 (11th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a conviction for aggravated carjacking, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by a state bureau of investigation crime scene specialist that a blood stain the back of a shirt found in the car driven by the defendant appeared to have been made by someone wiping a bloody knife on the shirt. Although the witness could have qualified for expert witness status, his testimony was properly admitted as lay opinion because it reflected personal observations about the shirt and knife.

[12] Handwriting [Go To Main]

United States v. Samet, 466 F.3d 251 (2d Cir. 2006) : In a racketeering trial, a postal inspector, who had been working on the investigation for three years and spent 80% of her time on the investigation, was permitted to identify the handwriting of one of the defendants. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the handwriting opinion. Lay opinion testimony offered to authenticate handwriting must comport with both Rules 701 and 901(b)(2). Here, the witness did not acquire her handwriting knowledge for purposes of litigation, and her opinion was admissible under both Rules. The Court reasoned that during the investigation -- before there was litigation -- the inspector's opportunity to observe the defendant's handwriting "was no less (and little different) than if she had been his accountant, employee or family member."

United States v. Garth, 540 F.3d 766 (8th Cir. 2008) , overruled in part on other grounds, 562 F.3d 892 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a tax preparer's convictions for fraud and aiding and abetting the making of false claims, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of an investigator's testimony that certain signatures on tax returns appeared to be in similar handwriting. Although the witness was not qualified as an expert, the opinion of similarity did not involve application of specialized knowledge, was based on the witness' observation of the signatures, and was helpful to the trier. Furthermore, each document was admitted into evidence and available for the jury to consider in conjunction with the testimony.

[14] Helpfulness [Go To Main]

Hirst v. Inverness Hotel Corp., 544 F.3d 221 (3d Cir. 2008) : The Court vacated a judgment for the defendant in a negligence action by a hotel guest who was raped by an intruder, holding that error was committed when the president of the company providing security services at the hotel testified that "there was no way that this alleged incident would have been prevented by us or by anyone." The witness' opinion was not based on his own perception, as he had never been to the hotel and everything he knew about the incident had been told him by an attorney or employee; his opinion was not helpful because it was "little more than a self-serving, conclusory opinion as to what result [the jury] should ultimately reach" on the causation issue; and a proper opinion on the issue would have required specialized knowledge and qualification as an expert witness.

La Resolana Architects, PA v. Reno, Inc., 555 F.3d 1171 (10th Cir. 2009) : In an action for copyright infringement of an architect's plans, the plaintiff offered a witness to testify, as an "ordinary observer," that the defendant's plans were substantially similar to the copyrighted plans. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the witness' testimony. She was a lay witness with no personal knowledge of the facts of the case, and her testimony was not helpful, since the "ordinary observer" is a legal fiction providing the measure by which the trier of fact judges the similarity of two works.

[16] Identifications [Go To Main]

[a] Generally

United States v. Shabazz, 564 F.3d 280 (3d Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed Hobbs Act and firearm convictions, finding no abuse of discretion when an accomplice was permitted to identify the defendant as the man depicted in a surveillance video of a robbery and a still photo taken from the video. The witness' narration of the video was limited to those incidents in which he was an actual eyewitness and he was excluded from discussing what was happening on the film when his back was turned.

[b] Identifications -- By Law Enforcement Agents

United States v. Garcia-Ortiz, 528 F.3d 74 (1st Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for robbery and murder, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to permit a police officer to testify that the defendant resembled a photograph of another person whom the robbery victim identified as the perpetrator. The officer testified to a subject on which he could not provide assistance to the jury; he was simply a lay witness and so was in the same position as the jury in identifying the person in the photo.

United States v. Avila, 557 F.3d 809 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute numerous controlled substances, finding no plain error when several government witnesses were asked to identify the defendant and state whether he was the one who participated in the "drug trafficking conspiracy," "enterprise," or "organization." Although the form of the question "[left] much to be desired," the prosecutor's purpose was simply to get to the ultimate issue of the defendant's identity and rebut defense suggestions that another person of the same name had been involved in the conspiracy.

United States v. Contreras, 536 F.3d 1167 (10th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for bank robbery, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by a probation officer familiar with the defendant, who identified the defendant as the perpetrator of the robbery from surveillance video footage. Although there was no indication that the defendant had changed his appearance in the time between the robbery and the trial, the officer's prior familiarity with the defendant made her testimony helpful. She had met with the defendant on multiple occasions, which gave her "the opportunity to develop a more sophisticated mental picture of Contreras's appearance outside the sterile, one-dimensional atmosphere of the courtroom." In United States v. Zepeda-Lopez, 478 F.3d 1213 (10th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed a drug distribution conspiracy conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when a surveillance videotape was admitted based on an agent's opinion that it was the defendant's image on the tape. Although the jury was able to see the defendant throughout the trial, the agent's testimony was helpful because he had looked at the video "many times" and the jury had not.

[17] Improper Speculation [Go To Main]

Hirst v. Inverness Hotel Corp., 544 F.3d 221 (3d Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a negligence action by a hotel guest who was raped by an intruder, holding that error was committed when the president of the company providing security services at the hotel testified that "there was no way that this alleged incident would have been prevented by us or by anyone." The witness' opinion was not based on his own perception, as he had never been to the hotel and everything he knew about the incident had been told him by an attorney or employee; his opinion was not helpful because it was "little more than a self-serving, conclusory opinion as to what result [the jury] should ultimately reach" on the causation issue; and a proper opinion on the issue would have required specialized knowledge and qualification as an expert witness.

Keri v. Board of Trustees of Purdue Univ., 458 F.3d 620 (7th Cir. 2006) : A black assistant professor who was not reappointed sued under Title VII. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court upheld exclusion of statements about the racial climate at the university made by other professors. The Court concluded that the statements were "not proper Rule 701 opinion" because the witnesses were "offering not their sensory but mental observations, dispersed with hearsay."

[21] Knowledge or Intent [Go To Main]

[b] Knowledge or Intent -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Jackson, 549 F.3d 963 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed the conviction and death sentence of a federal prisoner charged with killing a fellow inmate, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by a special investigator at the prison that inmates typically remove their shirts before fist fights, but typically pad their clothes in knife fights. The Court concluded that the testimony was background information about prison fights that could assist the jury in determining the defendant's and the victim's states of mind, given evidence showing that the victim had taken his shirt off before the fight while the defendant had not. The Court also found no plain error in the admission of the testimony as lay opinion. The witness testified on the basis of his "past experiences based on personal observation as an investigative agent," while expert testimony involves "more than common sense or the officer's past experiences formed from first hand observation."

United States v. Wantuch, 525 F.3d 505 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for fraud and related offenses, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to permit a lay witness involved in the defendant's scheme to opine that the defendant "knew all the time that everything he was doing was illegal." The Court noted that "[w]e have held that lay opinion testimony regarding mental states is admissible under Rule 701," but added that "there are limits to its admissibility." Although the lay witness had a sufficient foundation based on his involvement in the defendant's scheme, the Court noted that the "jury was just as capable as [the witness] of inferring that Wantuch knew he was committing a crime."

[22] Law Enforcement Agents [Go To Main]

[a] Drug Cases

United States v. Flores-de-Jesus, 569 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 2009) : Although the Court affirmed drug convictions, it reiterated concerns about the "use of a law enforcement officer as the first witness in a multi-defendant drug prosecution to provide an 'overview' of the prosecution's case" that it expressed in United States v. Casas, 356 F.3d 104 (1st Cir. 2004) (Manual § 702.03[54][j]). The Court recognized that "[t]here may be value in having a case agent describe the course of his investigation in order to set the stage for the testimony to come about the nature of the conspiracy and the defendants involved." However, absent a basis of personal knowledge, "the overview witness may not offer substantive testimony about the nature of the conspiracy or the involvement of particular defendants"; such overview testimony may raise Confrontation Clause questions. In this case, the prosecution improperly used an overview witness who was "essentially endorsing the testimony of other witnesses in what can only be viewed as an attempt by the government to bolster the credibility of those later witnesses." The Court warned that "[h]enceforth, there can be no justification in this circuit for the government's repetition of the errors that we have identified here in the use of overview testimony in criminal cases." In United States v. Santiago, 560 F.3d 62 (1st Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed drug distribution convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting an undercover agent to testify to the meaning of code words or phrases used by the defendants even though he had not been qualified as an expert. The agent had been involved in the investigation, listened to over 90 percent of the intercepts, learned voices and patterns, and heard and used the coded language in his undercover buys relating to the investigation; so his testimony qualified as lay testimony because it was rationally based on his perception and helpful to the determination of facts in issue, and was not based on specialized knowledge within the scope of Rule 702. In United States v. Page, 521 F.3d 101 (1st Cir. 2008) , the court affirmed cocaine distribution convictions, finding no error in permitting a government agent to testify as a lay witness that, based on his experience as a drug enforcement officer, dealers typically have burly individuals like the defendants accompany them during drug transactions to provide protective counter-surveillance against police drug stings.

United States v. Yanez Sosa, 513 F.3d 194 (5th Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for possession of firearms in furtherance of drug trafficking, the Trial Judge permitted law enforcement officers to provide lay testimony on the use of chemicals in drug manufacturing, modifications to firearms, and the reason why drug dealers carry guns. Affirming, the Court noted that "[f]or much of the disputed testimony, we doubt that the district court abused its discretion in determining that the particular testimony at issue fell within the bounds of permissible lay opinion testimony and thus did not impinge the territory of specialized knowledge," since "[i]t is not clear that the testimony that went beyond description, into the realm of opinion, was based on 'specialized knowledge' as opposed simply to common sense or the officer's past experience formed from first-hand observation." Some of the testimony, specifically testimony regarding the use of chemicals found in the defendant's apartment, may have crossed the line, but the Court concluded, without deciding that there was error, that any error was harmless.

United States v. Farmer, 543 F.3d 363 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed drug-related convictions, finding no abuse of discretion when a DEA agent was permitted to testify as to the meaning of coded language contained in tape-recorded conversations. The Court noted that the potential for prejudice when a witness testifies as both a lay witness and an expert may be addressed by appropriate cautionary instructions and by examination of the witness in such a way as to make clear when the witness is testifying to fact and when the witness is offering an expert opinion.

United States v. Freeman, 498 F.3d 893 (9th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a cocaine conviction, the Court held that a police detective's lay opinion testimony interpreting ambiguous recorded telephone conversations was properly admitted based upon his personal knowledge of the investigation and testimony as to other terms of which the witness had no personal knowledge was properly admitted because the agent had attained specialized knowledge of drug trafficking and had been qualified as an expert. The Court rejected a claim that it was error for the detective to testify as both lay and expert witness, although it agreed with United States v. Dukagjini, 326 F.3d 45 (2d Cir. 2003) (see Main Volume § 702.03[54][d]), that there are dangers when a law enforcement agent gives testimony in dual roles. The Court concluded that it was error (but harmless) to admit some portions of the detective's testimony, particularly opinions that relied on or conveyed hearsay evidence, and interpretation of clear statements that the jury would understand on its own.

[b] Law Enforcement Agents -- Other Cases

United States v. LeCroy, 441 F.3d 914 (11th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for aggravated carjacking, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by a state bureau of investigation crime scene specialist that a blood stain the back of a shirt found in the car driven by the defendant appeared to have been made by someone wiping a bloody knife on the shirt. Although the witness could have qualified for expert witness status, his testimony was properly admitted as lay opinion because it reflected personal observations about the shirt and knife.

[23] Legal Conclusions [Go To Main]

United States v. Hoffecker, 530 F.3d 137 (3d Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed mail and wire fraud convictions, finding no abuse of discretion when a cooperating witness was allowed to testify that the scheme being promoted by the defendant was a "scam." The conclusion was based on the witness' interactions with the defendant; it was helpful to the jury because the witness' perception that the program was a scam "explained why he was a Government cooperator"; use of the term was not based on the language of the statute; and the witness' testimony involved what he thought at the time, not at the time of trial.

United States v. Ahmed, 472 F.3d 427 (6th Cir. 2006) : Affirming the defendant's conviction for making false statements concerning his employment history when he was interviewed for a position as a baggage screener, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting an assistant director in the personnel security division at the Transportation Security Administration to testify as a lay witness that information the defendant provided in a particular section of a questionnaire had not been honest and that this influenced TSA's decision concerning employment suitability. The Court found that the testimony was based on personal knowledge and was relevant to establishing the materiality of the false statements. Although the defendant complained that the testimony amounted to a legal conclusion, the Court concluded that the testimony that the answers were "false" was nothing more than a non-technical expression of the witness's opinion. As such, the terms used by the witness did not carry a "separate, distinct and specialized meaning in the law different from that present in the vernacular."

United States v. Noel, 581 F.3d 490 (7th Cir. 2009) : Although it affirmed convictions for producing and possessing child pornography, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to permit an Indiana detective who conducted the forensic examination of the computer media seized from the defendant's residence to testify that photos on the computer met the federal definition of child pornography. The Court noted that the witness gave no explanation for her opinion, so it amounted to "nothing more than a statement that the photos were illegal." "Given proper instructions, the jury was capable of making this determination on its own." The Court reiterated that "lay testimony offering a legal conclusion is inadmissible because it is not helpful to the jury, as required by Rule 701(b)." In United States v. Avila, 557 F.3d 809 (7th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute numerous controlled substances, finding no plain error when several government witnesses were asked to identify the defendant and state whether he was the one who participated in the "drug trafficking conspiracy," "enterprise," or "organization." Although the form of the question "[left] much to be desired," the prosecutor's purpose was simply to get to the ultimate issue of the defendant's identity and rebut defense suggestions that another person of the same name had been involved in the conspiracy.

United States v. Graf, 610 F.3d 1148 (9th Cir. 2010) : Affirming a fraud conviction, the Court held that testimony by an attorney for a health insurance company that he told the defendant, a consultant to the company, that marketing certain health insurance plans would be a criminal offense because the plans did not comply with federal and state laws was not improper lay opinion testimony. The witness not offered as a legal expert but was instead offered to prove that the defendant was on notice that his conduct was illegal.

Grace United Methodist Church v. City of Cheyenne, 451 F.3d 643 (10th Cir. 2006) : In an action challenging a city's refusal to grant a permit to a church to operate a day care facility, the Court found that a bishop of the church was high enough in the church structure to qualify as a speaking agent so that a letter undercutting the church's position was admissible as an admission of a party-opponent. However, it was error (albeit harmless) to admit the bishop's opinions in the letter regarding what constitutes a compelling state interest under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, as he had no legal training or expertise and was "entirely unqualified to pontificate on legal questions."

[24] Mental or Physical Condition [Go To Main]

United States v. York, 600 F.3d 347 (5th Cir. 2010) : In a prosecution for arson offenses, the Court found no abuse of discretion in precluding testimony from the defendant's father regarding the circumstances of the defendant's birth, which led the witness to suspect organic brain damage, as the testimony went to a matter requiring specialized knowledge and an expert witness.

Farfaras v. Citizens Bank & Trust, 433 F.3d 558 (7th Cir. 2006) : In an action for sexual harassment, the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, finding no abuse of discretion when a lay witness was permitted to describe the plaintiff's mental condition as "depressed." Although the term has a medical definition, "a reasonable jury can be expected to understand the difference between lay use of an adjective and an expert's use of the same word to describe a specific psychological condition."

In re Mosley, 494 F.3d 1320 (11th Cir. 2007) : Mosley sought termination of his student loan obligations on grounds of undue hardship. The Bankruptcy Court granted him relief, finding that Mosley was in a cycle of illness and homelessness that prevented him from working. Affirming, the Court found no error in allowing Mosley to testify to his own physical condition, even though he was not a medical expert, since he "did not purport to give an opinion on his medical prognosis, but rather testified from personal knowledge about how his struggles with depression, back pain, and the side effects of his medication have made it difficult for him to obtain work."

[25] Noise [Go To Main]

Tufariello v. Long Island R.R., 458 F.3d 80 (2d Cir. 2006) : In an action by a railroad employee who alleged that he suffered hearing damage from loud horns, the Court vacated summary judgment for the defendant. Rather than offering objective evidence of the horns' loudness, the plaintiff offered his own testimony that the horns caused him physical pain. The Court noted that a lay witness may testify to pain he has experienced, and held that the testimony, together with expert testimony relating pain-inducing noise to hearing loss, was sufficient to make a showing on the issue of causation.

[27] Personal Knowledge [Go To Main]

United States v. Tsekhanovich, 507 F.3d 127 (2d Cir. 2007) : Affirming health care fraud convictions arising from submission of false or inflated insurance claims on behalf of auto accident victims, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting a cooperating witness, who had known the defendant for a few years before the conversations in question, to testify concerning his understanding of why the defendant would send him cars for repair and of the meaning of certain words. In United States v. Kaplan, 490 F.3d 110 (2d Cir. 2007) , the court reversed a conviction arising from participation in an insurance fraud scheme, finding an abuse of discretion in permitting a cooperating witness to testify as to the defendant's knowledge of the fraud. When the witness was asked to articulate the basis for his opinion, he testified, "I based it on the only thing I could base it on which is my experience there, what people said about [Kaplan], my conversation with [Kaplan], everything that I [had] been involved in. That's what my opinion could be based on." The Court described this as "extremely vague" and concluded that the "testimony failed to show that his opinion as to Kaplan's knowledge was rationally based on facts he had observed."

United States v. Mock, 523 F.3d 1299 (11th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for arson, holding that a defense witness was properly precluded from testifying that she "believed" that someone else committed two of the fires, because the lay witness's testimony was not based on first-hand knowledge.

[32] Value of Property [Go To Main]

Christopher Phelps & Assoc., LLC v. Galloway, 492 F.3d 532 (4th Cir. 2007) : In an architectural firm's action for copyright infringement against a homeowner who used its plans to construct his house, the Court held that the defendant's testimony was properly admitted as evidence of the value of his property.

Versai Mgmt. Corp. v. Clarendon Am. Ins. Co., 597 F.3d 729 (5th Cir. 2010) : The Court held that "the owner of a business may properly testify to the value of that business" without being qualified as an expert on valuation.

Compania Administradora de Recuperacion v. Titan Int'l Inc., 533 F.3d 555 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming summary judgment granted to a creditor who sued for breach of a guaranty contract, the Court held that a witness' testimony as to the value of collateral was properly characterized as expert, not lay, testimony. The witness' only connection with the items in question was the fact that he had been an officer of a company that held a controlling interest in another company that at one time owned the collateral; his valuations were based on his extensive experience purchasing and selling the type of items being valued, rather than on personal knowledge. The Court relied on the Advisory Committee Note to the 2000 amendment to Rule 701 for the proposition that "a business owner or officer is allowed to testify [to the value of business property] without being qualified as an expert only because that testimony is tied to his or her personal knowledge." Because the witness was not timely designated as an expert, the Trial Court was within its discretion to exclude the witness' testimony due to the discovery violation.

[33] Voice Identification [Go To Main]

United States v. Zepeda-Lopez, 478 F.3d 1213 (10th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a drug distribution conspiracy conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when audiotapes of six recorded telephone calls were admitted based on an agent's opinion that it was the defendant's voice on the tapes. The bases for the agent's opinion were a comparison between the defendant's voice on one call in which he self-identified with the voices on the other calls and the agent's having heard the defendant speak in court a few days before the trial began. Although the jury could make its own comparison from the audio recordings, the officer's testimony was helpful because at the time it was given the jury had not heard the defendant's voice.

Rule 702. Testimony by Experts

If scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education, may testify thereto in the form of an opinion or otherwise, if (1) the testimony is based upon sufficient facts or data, (2) the testimony is the product of reliable principles and methods, and (3) the witness has applied the principles and methods reliably to the facts of the case.

Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 702 RULE 702

3-702 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 702.02

702.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Basic Rule

This is the basic rule governing the testimony of expert witnesses. In essence, an expert witness may testify if the expert has scientific, technical, or some other kind of specialized knowledge that would be helpful in deciding the case correctly, and if the expert's testimony is sufficiently reliable to assist the factfinder. The intent of the Rule is to liberalize the admissibility standards for expert testimony. n1

Rule 702 does require, however, that the expert possess some specialized knowledge, skill, or education that is not in the possession of the jurors. If the witness is testifying on the basis of knowledge that is commonly held by most people -- e.g., that red liquid coming from a body is blood -- then the opinion of the witness must be evaluated under Rule 701. The specialized knowledge necessary for expert testimony may be derived from experience as well as from education or training. n2

[2] Proper Subject Matter for Expert Testimony

The Rule is clearly not limited to scientific expert testimony. It refers as well to technical or other specialized knowledge; all that is required is that expert testimony on the subject matter will assist the factfinder. Consequently, any information that is not common knowledge can be an appropriate subject of expert testimony. n3 On the other hand, if jurors without assistance are as capable of answering a question as an expert, then the expert's testimony on that point would not be helpful and should be excluded under Rule 702. In such a case, the expert is adding nothing that could not be supplied by attorneys in the way of argument. n4

The opinion in Scott v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 789 F.2d 1052 (4th Cir. 1986) , provides a valuable application of the subject matter to which an expert can permissibly testify. Scott was a slip-and-fall case. The plaintiff was walking on the sidewalk outside the defendant's store. She was wearing high heels. In her path was a sidewalk grate, and to the side of the grate was the curb, freshly painted yellow. She avoided the grate and placed her foot on the curb. But a small chunk of concrete was missing from the curb, and the plaintiff stepped into the hole. She contended that the defendant was negligent for painting over the curb and thus concealing the danger. At trial, the plaintiff called a human factors expert, who testified to two matters: (1) that women wearing high heels tend to avoid sidewalk grates; and (2) that the color yellow prompts the human eye to fill in discontinuities, i.e., to turn three-dimensional things into two-dimensional things.

The Court of Appeals in Scott held that the Trial Court erred in permitting the expert to testify about the reaction of women in high heels to sidewalk grates. This was not helpful because "the witness was merely repeating what is common knowledge and common sense." The Court did, however, find that the human factors expert properly testified that the yellow color of the curb might prompt the human eye to fill in discontinuities. According to the Court, that subject "was not a matter within the common knowledge of jurors." n5

The question remaining in Scott was whether the error was prejudicial. The Court held that "the admission of such testimony, though technical error, will almost invariably be harmless." This was because the basis of the error was that the expert told the jury something that it already knew.

There will be some rare instances, however, where expert testimony about obvious matters could constitute prejudicial error. For example, where the expert does nothing more than bolster the credibility of a fact witness by merely restating that testimony in expert garb, the error may well be prejudicial in a case that hinges on credibility. In such a case, the witness is simply acting as a "credibility expert" and this is, for obvious reasons, not a proper subject matter for expert testimony; and yet the testimony can be harmful because the jury may defer to the expert on credibility even though the determination of credibility is their sole province. Thus, in United States v. Cruz, 981 F.2d 659 (2d Cir. 1992) , an undercover narcotics agent testified to the function of a "broker" in a drug transaction. This general testimony corroborated the testimony of the prosecution's principal fact witness, who had testified that the defendant had acted as an intermediary in the sale of drugs purchased by the witness. The defendant, in direct contradiction, testified that he was not present at the drug transactions, and that his meetings with the prosecution's witness concerned car repairs. The Court found that the expert's modus operandi testimony was improperly admitted because it was not helpful to the jury. It reasoned: "That drug traffickers may seek to conceal their identities by using intermediaries would seem evident to the average juror from movies, television crime dramas, and news stories." n6 More importantly, the Court in Cruz found that the improper admission of the expert testimony was reversible error, because it was used to bolster the testimony of the prosecution's central fact-witness. This was prejudicial because "it strongly suggests to the jury that a law enforcement specialist ... believes the government's witness to be credible and the defendant to be guilty." n7

The Annotated Cases, § 702.03, contain a large sampling of cases concerning the appropriate subject matter of expert testimony.

[3] Qualification Standards

A witness may qualify as an expert on the basis of knowledge, skill, training, education, or experience. These bases for qualification are disjunctive. n8 Whether a witness is qualified as an expert can only be determined by the nature of the opinion offered. Thus, experience may be a crucial component for one type of expert opinion, whereas academic training may be essential for another. n9 For yet other types, no particular basis is required, so long as one of the bases in the Rule is established.

Generally speaking, the Courts have been reluctant to exclude an expert on the ground that he or she is unqualified. This is understandable given the generally permissive tone of Rule 702, and the possibility in some situations that exclusion of an expert could be tantamount to dismissal of the case. Consequently, Courts have not required a party to show that the witness is an outstanding expert, or to show that the witness is well-known or respected in the field; these are generally questions of weight. n10 Also, the expert need not have encyclopedic knowledge about the field in question. n11 Nor is it necessary, at least on the question of qualifications, for an expert to have published or researched on the matter to which she testifies. n12

Of course, an expert cannot be considered unqualified merely because he or she is being compensated. n13 Indeed, it has been held that a party to the litigation can be qualified to serve as his own expert witness. n14 Any question of bias that arises from a financial arrangement can be tested on cross-examination and assessed by the factfinder. n15

All this is not to say that any self-described "expert" will automatically be allowed to testify. The requirements of Rule 702, though minimal, have occasionally been breached, and Courts are not hesitant to exclude the "expert" who is utterly lacking in qualifications. n16 An egregious example was presented in Thomas J. Kline, Inc. v. Lorillard, Inc., 878 F.2d 791, 1989-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68650 (4th Cir. 1989) . The plaintiff called an "expert" who would testify that a certain credit practice was tantamount to price discrimination. But the witness was not an economist, she had no experience in making credit decisions, and she had done no research or writing in the subject matter of her testimony. Indeed, her only stated qualification was that she was employed by a company who hired out experts to testify in sophisticated financial litigation. The Court of Appeals understandably concluded that this was not enough. It declared that "[a]lthough the spirit of the Rules of Evidence is to eschew excessive restrictions on the admissibility of testimony, the plain language of the Rules maintains some limitations on expressions of opinion." It further stated that while it could not conclude that the witness' status as a professional expert alone required exclusion of her testimony, "it would be absurd to conclude that one can become an expert simply by accumulating experience in testifying." n17

Similarly, even minimal standards for qualification will not be met if the expert's training or experience is obviously deficient and the expert demonstrates little or no familiarity with the subject matter. For example, in United States v. Bahena, 223 F.3d 797 (8th Cir. 2000) , the defendant's expert witness on voice spectrography was excluded as unqualified. The Court found no error, because the witness had no formal training whatsoever in the field; he could not say for certain when he first began in the field; he was not a member of any professional organization in the field; he was not familiar with any industry standards; and he could not answer several fundamental questions about the technology of voice spectrography. Essentially, the witness was a lay witness masquerading as an expert in a field requiring technical or specialized knowledge. n18

Courts are also concerned about experts who testify in specialized areas outside their ordinary expertise. Designation as an "expert" is not a license to unconstrained testimony on all scientific, technical, and other specialized matters. n19 Courts have shown an increasing interest in keeping an expert's testimony within the witness' designated area of expertise. n20 An example is Ancho v. Pentek Corp., 157 F.3d 512 (7th Cir. 1998) , where the plaintiff proffered a mechanical engineer to testify that an injury at a factory could have been avoided if the plant had been redesigned. The Court found no error in excluding the expert, reasoning as follows:

> Just as a qualified and board certified heart surgeon does not possess sufficient knowledge of orthopaedic medicine to render an expert opinion on spine surgery, likewise we agree with the trial court's ruling that a mechanical engineer ... lacks qualifications to give expert testimony about plant configuration. Ancho should have retained a qualified plant engineer to testify at trial and his failure to do so was a mistake in judgment for which he has no one to blame but himself.

While a Court must be attuned to a qualifications problem when an expert appears to be opining outside a "specialty," a Court should also be concerned about requiring "superspecialized" experts in all cases. There is a danger that a requirement of specialization can be applied so stringently as to exclude most objective experts. Such a danger is discussed in Stagl v. Delta Air Lines, Inc., 117 F.3d 76 (2d Cir. 1997) . Stagl was a senior citizen who was injured near a baggage carousel, during a typical mob scene in which passengers were retrieving their baggage. Stagl proffered a mechanical engineer to testify that the baggage delivery system was unsafe for older people, given the crowds around the baggage carousel and the heavy luggage flying about. The Trial Judge ruled that the witness was not qualified because he had no specialized expertise in airline terminal or baggage claim area design. But the Court of Appeals found this to be error. The Court observed:

> In determining whether an expert is sufficiently knowledgeable to be admitted to testify, one of the factors that the district court ought to consider is whether other experts exist who are more specifically > qualified and who are nonetheless not in the employ of the company or industry whose practices are being challenged. If the only experts permitted to testify inevitably represent the same side of a civil case, those who possess these experts can, for all practical purposes, set their own standards. And allowing an industry to do this is improper because it is very similar to what has been long since held inappropriate, namely, letting the custom of an industry or trade define what is reasonable in that trade.

Addressing the Trial Judge's concern over the witness's lack of expertise with respect to airports, the Court noted that "[i]t is hard to imagine an expert in airport terminal design or baggage claim systems who developed that expertise in any way other than by working for the airline industry," and that "to require the degree of specificity the court imposed came close to letting that industry indirectly set its own standards." The Court observed that the plaintiff's expert had a master's degree in mechanical engineering from Columbia University and had worked as a licensed engineer for twenty years. It concluded, therefore, that the witness was qualified to testify about the interaction of machines and people based on his education and experience even though he had no expertise in airline terminal or baggage claim design. Stagl provides the valuable insight that while a Court should not lightly permit testimony from an expert outside his or her "specialty," a Court must also guard against requiring an expertise so specialized as to disqualify anyone who is not a captive of the specialized industry.

[4] Hypothetical Questions

The Rule provides that an expert may testify in the form of an opinion or otherwise. Much of the criticism concerning expert testimony under common law was directed at the use of the hypothetical question. The language in this last sentence about the form of the expert's testimony means that the expert need not answer in the form of an opinion responding to a hypothetical question. In fact, the Advisory Committee suggests that the expert may be called to the stand to give a dissertation or exposition of scientific or other principles relative to the case. This point is accentuated in the Committee Note to the 2000 amendment (§ 702.04[2]), which states that it will often be important for an expert "to educate the factfinder about general principles, without ever attempting to apply these principles to the specific facts of the case." This would leave the trier of fact to apply the principles to the facts as they develop.

Rule 702, when read in conjunction with Rules 703 and 705, might make the hypothetical question a more useful and less technical tool than it has been in the past. Before the adoption of the Federal Rules, most Courts insisted upon a formulation of a hypothetical question that included all relevant facts and that did not include any facts that were not supported by evidence before the trier of fact. This led lawyers to frame questions that were so long that jurors had difficulty recalling the contents of the question. It also led opposing counsel to object that facts in the question had not been proved, in an effort to strike the answer.

Now that experts may rely on facts or data not actually introduced, as long as reasonable experts in the field rely on such facts or data (Rule 703), and experts are not required on direct examination to reveal all of their facts or data (Rule 705), hypothetical questions may be asked that do not include every fact arguably relevant to a case and that include facts or data not actually in evidence. The combination of Rules 702, 703, and 705 enables counsel to use the hypothetical question to assist in the presentation of understandable testimony and to emphasize and highlight such testimony. As a result, the hypothetical question becomes a more useful lawyering device, as an optional tool, than it ever was when Courts mandated its use and imposed strict requirements on the manner in which it was used. Of course, the hypothetical question, to be proper, must still have some basis in the evidence; if the hypothetical is based on a distortion of the facts, then the Trial Judge certainly has the discretion to exclude the testimony as unhelpful and confusing. n21

[5] The Gatekeeper Function -- Daubert

In the well-known case of Frye v. United States, 293 F. 1013 (D.C. Cir. 1923) , the Court indicated that before scientific evidence could be admitted it had to gain general acceptance in the particular field to which it belonged. Until 1993, there was considerable controversy as to whether Rule 702 incorporated or rejected the Frye "general acceptance" test. Then, in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993) , the Supreme Court unanimously rejected the Frye test as a basis for assessing the admissibility of scientific expert testimony under Rule 702.

Beyond rejecting Frye as a controlling principle, seven members of the Court, in an opinion written by Justice Blackmun, went further and established general, flexible guidelines, for determining the admissibility of scientific expert testimony. According to Justice Blackmun, Rule 702 of the Federal Rules requires the Trial Judge to act as a "gatekeeper" for such testimony, to assure that it truly proceeds from "scientific ... knowledge" as required by the Rule. Essentially, this means that a Trial Judge must evaluate the proffered testimony to assure that it is at least minimally reliable; concerns about expert testimony cannot be simply referred to the jury as a question of weight.

The majority in Daubert set forth a five-factor, nondispositive, nonexclusive, "flexible" test to be employed by the Trial Court under Rule 702 in determining the "validity" of scientific evidence. These factors are:

(1) whether the technique or theory can be or has been tested;

(2) whether the theory or technique has been subject to peer review and publication;

(3) the known or potential rate of error;

(4) the existence and maintenance of standards and controls; and

(5) the degree to which the theory or technique has been generally accepted in the scientific community.

While the Daubert Court set forth a few factors for judicial gatekeepers to take into account, it did not purport to provide a comprehensive analysis. It did, however, make the important point that the admissibility of expert testimony is governed by Rule 104(a), not Rule 104(b). Thus, the Judge must find it more likely than not that the expert's methods are reliable and that they are reliably applied to the facts at hand.

The Daubert Court remanded the case because the Lower Courts had excluded the testimony of the plaintiffs' scientific experts solely on the basis that their methodology was not generally accepted in the scientific community and was not peer-reviewed. Under the new, flexible standards set by the Court, the general acceptance test relied upon by the Lower Courts in Daubert is relevant to but not dispositive of admissibility. That is to say, expert testimony can be admitted as reliable even though the expert's methodology is not generally accepted in her field.

The Daubert Court's rejection of the Frye test certainly makes sense as a matter of statutory construction. Rule 702 does not mention Frye, and the plain meaning of the Rule, which refers to assisting the jury through scientific and other knowledge, does not readily lend itself to a relatively exclusive "general acceptance" test. As the Court in Daubert pointed out, the Frye test is conservative, because it excludes otherwise reliable scientific testimony merely because it has not undergone the time-consuming process of general acceptance in the scientific community. n22 In contrast, Federal Rules 702 and 403 are written in terms of a presumption of admissibility.

As a matter of policy, however, the Court's rejection of Frye is far less compelling. It is true that the majority of commentators have criticized Frye as being unduly restrictive and unduly vague at the same time. n23 There is much to be said, though, for a conservative approach when faced with new "scientific" technology and theories that have not been generally accepted by the relevant scientific community -- especially where the so-called expert is testifying against the defendant in a criminal case. Frye leaves the question of reliability to the community of scientists; Daubert leaves that question to Trial Judges who are often ill-equipped to determine the validity of challenged scientific testimony.

Daubert rejects "general acceptance" as an exclusive test for assessing scientific expert evidence, and clearly states that Trial Courts have a front-line role in screening out questionable or unreliable expert testimony. n24 But the impact of Daubert is open to question, because the Court specifically relied upon general acceptance and peer review (which is just a variant of general acceptance) as important factors in determining admissibility. As Judge Becker stated in United States v. Downing, 753 F.2d 1224 (3d Cir. 1985) , a case relied upon heavily by the Daubert Court:

> In many cases ... the acceptance factor may well be decisive, or nearly so. Thus, we expect that a technique that satisfies the Frye test usually will be found to be reliable as well. On the other hand, a known technique which has been able to attract only minimal support within the community is likely to be found unreliable.

What Frye recognized and what Courts using the Daubert reliability analysis should recognize is that a trier of fact must be in a position to evaluate the weight of evidence. A novel scientific test, especially one devised by one or two people, poses problems because there may be few experts available to examine the test from the opposite viewpoint of the party relying upon it. Such testimony cannot really be weighed if the expert is simply making a conclusion on a "take it or leave it" basis that is not susceptible to attack by objective standards. n25 Results that would not stand rigorous analysis might be accepted because such analysis is not possible at the time of trial. The ultimate question for the Trial Judge under any test is whether both sides will have a fair opportunity to test the validity of scientific results; if not, those results should not be admissible. In deciding the ultimate questions, Trial Judges must consider the degree to which the accuracy of scientific information has been established. The less certain the scientific community is about information, the less willing Courts should be to receive it. Whether a Trial Judge excludes evidence as likely to confuse the jury or as being more prejudicial (meaning more likely to be misused than used correctly) than probative, on the one hand, or as lacking sufficient acceptance in the scientific community, on the other hand, is not likely to be crucial in the long run. n26 Under any approach, Trial Judges and Appellate Courts have reason to be concerned about scientific evidence manufactured for litigation.

[6] Major Post-Daubert Cases on Scientific Expert Testimony

The Daubert opinion was open-ended and vague. The Court clearly switched the focus from the scientific community -- which determined reliability under Frye -- to the Trial Judge, who now must determine reliability by taking into account not only the views of the scientific community, but also other factors, to determine whether proffered expert testimony is in fact reliable.

In the later case of General Electric Co. v. Joiner, 522 U.S. 136 (1997) , the Court did provide some indication of how the gatekeeper function might work in evaluating scientific evidence. In Joiner, the plaintiff proffered experts to testify that his exposure to PCBs caused him to contract cancer. The Supreme Court found no error in the Trial Court's exclusion of these experts as unreliable. The experts relied on several studies, but the Court found this reliance to be flawed and unscientific. One study relied upon was a study in which infant mice were exposed to PCBs and contracted cancer. The problem was that the mice contracted a different kind of cancer than that suffered by the plaintiff; moreover, the studies could not be replicated in adult mice nor in any other species. The experts' reliance on four epidemiological studies was likewise flawed. Two of the studies found no statistically significant connection between PCBs and cancer; one study did not mention PCBs; and the fourth study, which found a statistically significant connection, involved subjects who were exposed to a variety of other carcinogens. The Court concluded that there was an "analytical gap" between the experts' conclusion on causation and the studies on which they relied for their conclusion. The experts made no attempt to bridge this analytical gap by relying on any other objective or verifiable standards. The Joiner Court concluded that "nothing in either Daubert or the Federal Rules of Evidence requires a district court to admit opinion evidence that is connected to existing data only by the ipse dixit of the expert." Importantly, the Joiner Court held that a District Court's Daubert rulings are reviewable only for abuse of discretion. Joiner establishes that an expert's testimony must have a sufficient basis and that the expert must not leap to an unfounded conclusion. It also establishes that a Trial Judge's Daubert rulings will rarely be reversed.

There are several Lower Court opinions that try to put some more meat on the Daubert bones. Two of the most important are Judge Kozinski's opinion in Daubert on remand, and Judge Becker's opinion in the Paoli case.

On remand of the Daubert case from the Supreme Court, the Ninth Circuit held that summary judgment was properly granted against the plaintiffs because the testimony of their experts, which was offered to prove that Bendectin caused the plaintiffs' limb reduction, was inadmissible under Rule 702. Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 43 F.3d 1311 (9th Cir. 1995) . The Ninth Circuit thoroughly analyzed and applied the Supreme Court's opinion, making the following important points:

(1) Daubert requires a two-part analysis as applied to scientific expert testimony. First, the Court must determine whether the expert testimony is based upon the scientific method. Second, the Court must determine whether there is a "fit" between the expert's testimony and a disputed issue in the case.

(2) The first, "reliability" prong of Daubert is not satisfied by "an expert's self-serving assertion that his conclusions were derived by the scientific method." Rather, "the party presenting the expert must show that the expert's findings are based on sound science, and this will require some objective, independent validation of the expert's methodology."

(3) An important determinant of reliability "is whether the experts are proposing to testify about matters growing naturally and directly out of research they have conducted independent of the litigation, or whether they have developed their opinions expressly for purposes of testifying." This is because -- with the important exception of scientific forensic testimony in a criminal case -- "a scientist's normal workplace is the lab or the field, not the courtroom or the lawyer's office." Thus, if an expert testifies on the basis of research he has conducted independent of the litigation, this "provides important, objective proof that the research comports with the dictates of good science." The Court reasoned that "independent research carries its own indicia of reliability, as it is conducted, so to speak, in the usual course of business and must normally satisfy a variety of standards to attract funding and institutional support." n27

(4) If the expert's testimony is not based on independent research, "the party proffering it must come forward with other objective, verifiable evidence that the testimony is based on scientifically valid principles."

(5) One means of showing scientific validity, even if the research was prepared in anticipation of litigation, is that "the research and analysis supporting the proffered conclusions have been subjected to normal scientific scrutiny through peer review and publication." The Court reasoned that publication and peer review provide "a significant indication that [the research] is taken seriously by other scientists, i.e., that it meets at least the minimal criteria of good science."

(6) Where the expert's testimony does not grow out of pre-litigation research and has not been subject to peer review, "the experts must explain precisely how they went about reaching their conclusions and point to some objective source -- a learned treatise, the policy statement of a professional association, a published article in a reputable scientific journal or the like -- to show that they have followed the scientific method, as it is practiced by (at least) a recognized minority of scientists in their field."

Applying these principles to the testimony of the plaintiffs' experts, the Daubert on remand Court found that the Daubert standards had not been met. The experts' research was prepared solely for purposes of Bendectin litigation. It had not been peer reviewed, nor had it even been deemed worthy of comment by the scientific community. Finally, the experts had not explained their methodology or verified it by reference to objective sources. The Court concluded that it had been presented "with only the experts' qualifications, their conclusions and their assurances of reliability. Under Daubert, that's not enough."

The Court also found that the testimony of most of the plaintiffs' experts failed the "fit" requirement of Daubert. This was because the substantive law required proof that Bendectin more likely than not caused the plaintiffs' limb reduction.

Yet most of the plaintiffs' experts testified only that Bendectin increased the risk of limb reduction. This testimony actually tended to disprove the plaintiffs' contention that Bendectin was more likely than not the cause of their limb reduction.

In In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litig., 35 F.3d 717 (3d Cir. 1994) , Judge Becker reviewed, in light of Daubert, a grant of summary judgment in a case alleging damages from exposure to PCB's. The Court engaged in an extensive and incisive analysis of Daubert's effect on scientific expert testimony. The Court made the following important points about the gatekeeping function after Daubert:

(1) Because a Judge at an in limine hearing must make findings of fact on complex scientific issues, and because the in limine ruling will often decide the case, "it is important that each side have an opportunity to depose the other side's experts in order to develop strong critiques and defenses of their expert's methodologies."

(2) Because the question of reliability is an admissibility requirement governed by Rule 104(a), a proponent must do more than simply make a prima facie case on reliability. While the proponent does not have to prove to the Judge that the proffered expert testimony is correct, he or she must prove to the Judge by a preponderance of the evidence that the testimony is reliable. The Paoli Court stated that the "evidentiary requirement of reliability is lower than the merits standard of correctness."

(3) After Daubert any distinction between an expert's methods and the application is no longer viable. It is no longer the case that if the methodology is sound, the possible misapplication in a specific case becomes a question for the jury. Daubert provides that "any step that renders the analysis unreliable ... renders the expert's testimony inadmissible. This is true whether the step completely changes a reliable methodology or merely misapplies that methodology." n28 The Daubert Court stated that the Trial Judge must review the reliability of an expert's methodology, as distinct from the expert's conclusion. But Judge Becker pointed out that this passage in Daubert does not generally hold water. When a Judge disagrees with an expert's conclusion, "it will generally be because he or she thinks that there is a mistake at some step in the investigative or reasoning process of that expert." The only situation in which the methodology/conclusion distinction might make a difference is where expert testimony is challenged on the sole ground that the conclusion is different from that of other experts. In that case, the Trial Judge must inquire beyond the conclusion before excluding the testimony. But in the ordinary case, if the conclusion is controversial, it is ordinarily excluded under Daubert, because there is either something wrong with the methodology that was used, or the methodology was improperly applied, so as to reach such an odd conclusion. n29

(4) The qualifications of the expert are relevant not only to the qualifications prong of Rule 702, but also to the reliability prong. Thus, the Trial Judge should be especially reluctant to exclude a disputed methodology where the expert is eminently qualified. Despite Daubert putting the spotlight on Trial Judges, it stands to reason that there should be some judicial deference to an outstanding expert. As one post-Daubert Court put it, an expert's outstanding qualifications provide "circumstantial evidence" that the expert has employed a sound methodology. n30 In contrast, an expert's marginal qualifications should cut in favor of excluding testimony as unreliable. n31

(5) Because the Daubert Court held that Rule 702 was the "primary locus of a court's gatekeeping role," the use of Rule 403 to exclude expert testimony should be left for the rare case. Thus, "there must be something particularly confusing about the scientific evidence at issue -- something other than the general complexity of scientific evidence."

Applying these factors to the case at hand, the Paoli Court held that the District Court abused its discretion when it excluded expert testimony that PCBs are harmful to humans. The testimony was based on animal studies, and such studies are sufficiently reliable when they are not contradicted by epidemiological studies. n32 The Court also held, contrary to the District Court's ruling, that it was not necessary for a doctor to examine patients before he could reliably testify that they faced a future risk of illness from prior exposure to PCB's. The doctor's opinion was reliable because he based it on a residential history of each plaintiff, and on fat and blood tests performed on the plaintiffs.

[7] Other Factors Relevant to the Reliability of Scientific Expert Testimony Under Daubert

After Daubert, the Courts have focused on several factors in addition to those listed in the Daubert opinion that have been found to bear on the reliability of a scientific expert's testimony. None of these factors is dispositive, but each has been considered in the cases. A short discussion of these factors follows.

Extrapolation and the "analytical gap." Some experts have fallen into the trap of leaping from an accepted scientific fact or premise to an unsupported conclusion. These experts have sometimes relied on logical analysis to go from premise to conclusion. Some have simply made a leap of faith. If the process from premise to conclusion is not itself consistent with the scientific method or other well-accepted principles, then Courts have a tendency to exclude the testimony as based on unreliable and improper extrapolation.

One example of improper extrapolation is an expert's use of structure analysis. This problem arose in Daubert on remand, as well as in other toxic tort cases. Structure analysis is sometimes proffered by an expert where there is no demonstrated connection between a certain chemical substance and a certain injury, but there is a demonstrated connection between a similar chemical substance and that injury. For example, there is no scientifically demonstrable connection between Bendectin and birth defects; but there is scientific evidence that substances with a chemical structure similar to that of Bendectin cause birth defects. Thus, the expert employing structure analysis reasons that substances with similar chemical structures cause similar injuries. But this reasoning is not consistent with the scientific method; it is improper extrapolation. As scholars have noted, "Even minor changes in molecular structure can alter a substance's effect. The metabolic process stands as an unknown intervening variable between the original chemical structure and the adverse effect." n33 Thus, it is improper, after Daubert, to leap to a conclusion about one chemical substance on the basis of the effects caused by another, in the absence of other scientific support. n34

It is also improper extrapolation to conclude, without any supporting research, that a substance that causes one harm also causes a different harm. For example, in Lust v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 89 F.3d 594 (9th Cir. 1996), the question was whether the plaintiff's birth defect, hemifacial microsomia, was caused by his mother's use of Clomid. The expert based his conclusion to that effect on epidemiological studies that showed a link between Clomid and other types of birth defects. He concluded that since Clomid is capable of causing other birth defects, it also caused hemifacial microsomia. The Court held that this reasoning was not scientific. The doctor's testimony "was influenced by litigation-driven financial incentive," and the doctor's premise -- that a positive association between a drug and some birth defects indicates an association with other birth defects -- was not recognized by even a minority of scientists. n35

Similarly, in Joiner, supra, the Supreme Court pointed out that the experts' conclusion that PCB's caused the plaintiff's cancer was the product of improper extrapolation. The experts relied on epidemiological studies, but those studies did not support the conclusions reached. n36

Red flags are also raised when a scientific expert purports to testify on the basis of a methodology that is transposed from one area to a completely different area of inquiry -- at least if there is no independent research supporting the transposition. Thus, in Braun v. Lorillard Inc., 84 F.3d 230 (7th Cir. 1996), the plaintiff sought to prove that the decedent's mesothelioma was caused by smoking cigarettes with a filter made with crocidolite asbestos. The decedent's lung tissue was tested for asbestos fibers, using the standard methodologies of "bleach digestion" and "low temperature plasma ashing." No crocidolite fibers were found. The plaintiffs then retained an expert who tested for asbestos in building materials to conduct tests on the decedent's lung tissue. This expert was unaware of the methodologies ordinarily employed in testing human tissue. He used the same test that he used on building materials, known as high temperature ashing, and found crocidolite fibers in the tissue. The expert stated that high temperature ashing was as usable on tissue as on bricks, though he had never conducted such a test on tissue before this litigation. He also admitted that the high temperature could alter the chemistry of the sample, in which case it would be impossible to tell whether asbestos fibers were crocidolite or some other kind. But he asserted that his method was far more likely to produce a false negative than a false positive.

The Court held that the expert's testimony was properly excluded as unscientific under Daubert. It made the following points:

> Nowhere in Daubert did the Court suggest that failure to adhere to the customary methods for conducting a particular kind of scientific inquiry is irrelevant to the admissibility of a scientist's testimony. On the contrary, the Court made clear that it is relevant. A judge or jury is not equipped to evaluate scientific innovations. If, therefore, an expert proposes to depart from the generally accepted methodology of his field and embark upon a sea of scientific uncertainty, the court may appropriately insist that he ground his departure in demonstrable and scrupulous adherence to the scientist's creed of meticulous and objective inquiry. To forsake the accepted methods without even inquiring why they are the accepted methods -- in this case, why specialists in testing human tissues for asbestos fibers have never used the familiar high temperature ashing method -- and without even knowing what the accepted methods are, strikes us ... as irresponsible.
> Modern science is highly specialized. An expert in the detection of asbestos in building materials cannot be assumed to be an expert in the detection of asbestos in human tissues even though, as the plaintiff reminds us, many building materials, most obviously wood, are, like human and animal tissues, organic rather than inorganic substances. The fact that the plaintiffs' lawyer turned to this nonexpert, having already consulted experts without obtaining any useful evidence, is suggestive of the abuse, or one of the abuses, at which Daubert and its sequelae are aimed. That abuse is the hiring of reputable scientists, impressively credentialed, to testify for a fee to propositions that they have not arrived at through the methods that they use when they are doing their regular professional work rather than being paid to give an opinion helpful to one side in a lawsuit.

All this is not to say that learning from one subject matter can never be used to form a conclusion as to a different subject matter, or that premises established in one context are completely irrelevant in another. The question is how big a leap the expert is taking. In Braun, the Court reasoned, correctly we think, that the leap from testing bricks to testing human tissue was too great in the absence of some objective support. In contrast, in Newport Ltd. v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7652, 1995 WL 328158 (E.D. La. 1995) , an economist was permitted to testify to the amount of lost profits suffered by the plaintiff as a result of a breach of a real estate contract concerning industrial park property. The economist used a methodology known as multiple regression analysis. The defendant complained that this methodology had never been used to determine the value of industrial park real estate, but admitted that the methodology was widely accepted as a reliable way to determine the value of commercial real estate. The Court found that the difference between commercial real estate and industrial park property was not so profound as to render the economist's testimony unreliable. It was not like the leap from bricks to lung tissue in Braun.

Thus, some analytical leaps are permissible when justified by scientific support or reasoning. Another example of a permissible analytical leap by a scientific expert arose in Kennedy v. Collagen Corporation, 161 F.3d 1226 (9th Cir. 1998) . The plaintiff claimed that her use of the facial product Zyderm caused her to contract lupus, an autoimmune disorder. The plaintiff's expert rheumatologist testified to causation on the basis of peer-reviewed articles, clinical trials and product studies, an investigation conducted by the Texas Department of Health, a physical examination of the plaintiff, laboratory tests, and the temporal proximity between the plaintiff's use of Zyderm and the existence of her autoimmune disorder. None of the studies indicated that Zyderm caused lupus; rather, the studies established a connection between Zyderm and autoimmune disorders that were similar to lupus. Ordinarily an analytical gap would arise if the expert were to conclude that Zyderm causes lupus simply because it causes disorders that are similar to lupus. However, the expert filled that analytical gap by relying on the finding, established in both peer-reviewed publications and clinical studies, that Zyderm induces the body to produce the same autoimmune antibodies that are the hallmark of lupus. So the expert was not relying solely on causation of similar diseases, but also on the fact that the manner of causation, the operation of the substance, was the same. The Court concluded that "Dr. Spindler set forth the steps he took in arriving at his conclusion in his deposition. Dr. Spindler's analogical reasoning was based on objective, verifiable evidence and scientific methodology of the kind traditionally used by rheumatologists. That is precisely what Daubert requires."

Reliance on anecdotal evidence. An expert who bases a scientific opinion solely on one or a few case studies is generally held to have an insufficient basis for reliable testimony after Daubert. There are two problems with relying on such anecdotal data, at least exclusively. First, anecdotal evidence is usually derived from insufficient sampling. Second, there is a strong possibility that anecdotal cases are not comparable to the facts of the case at bar -- for example, if a number of people contract lung cancer through an alleged exposure to a toxic substance, a proper statistical study will exclude the possibility of other sources for the injury (referred to as confounding factors), such as cigarette smoking. But a single case study, or other anecdotal evidence, is unlikely to be screened for confounding factors.

For example, in Cavallo v. Star Enter., 892 F. Supp. 756 (E.D. Va. 1995) , aff'd in pertinent part, 100 F.3d 1150 (4th Cir. 1996) , the plaintiff alleged that she suffered respiratory illness as a result of exposure to aviation jet fuel vapors that were released from an overflow at the defendant's storage terminal. The plaintiff's expert toxicologist was prohibited from testifying at trial after a Daubert hearing, and the Court consequently granted summary judgment for the defendant. The toxicologist relied on case studies in which people who were exposed to the organic compounds in jet fuel suffered respiratory illnesses (though most illnesses were temporary). The Court held that reliance on these studies to form a conclusion was inconsistent with the scientific method. The Court reasoned that "case reports are not reliable scientific evidence of causation, because they simply describe reported phenomena without comparison to the rate at which the phenomena occur in the general population or in a defined control group; do not isolate and exclude potentially alternative causes; and do not investigate or explain the mechanism of causation." n37 Importantly, the Court noted that the toxicologist did not purport to follow the methodology ordinarily followed by toxicologists. Rather, he formed his opinion "and then tried to conform it to the methodology."

This is not to say that case studies are completely irrelevant to an analysis consistent with the scientific method. The problem in Cavallo was that the case studies were, essentially, the only source upon which the expert based his opinion. In contrast, scientists often use case studies to spur further research, or to confirm conclusions already arrived at in more methodical studies. Thus, in Cantrell v. GAF Corp., 999 F.2d 1007 (6th Cir. 1993) , the plaintiffs claimed that their exposure to asbestos in the workplace created a legitimate fear that they would develop laryngeal cancer in the future. The plaintiffs' expert testified that asbestos created a risk of laryngeal cancer, basing his conclusion on epidemiological evidence reported in the medical literature, and on the inordinately high incidence of persons at the plaintiffs' workplace whom the expert had personally diagnosed as having laryngeal cancer. The defendants objected to the expert's testimony under Daubert insofar as it was based on anecdotal evidence, because the expert had personally evaluated only 150 patients, and found four to have laryngeal cancer. They argued that this was not a sufficient number of cases from which to draw a proper statistical conclusion of cause and effect. Moreover, the expert made no analysis of possible confounding factors. The Court nonetheless held that the expert testimony was properly admitted, stating: "Nothing in Rules 702 and 703 or in Daubert prohibits an expert from testifying to confirmatory data, gained through his own clinical experience, on the origin of a disease or the consequences of exposure to certain conditions." The Court noted that the expert was cross-examined and freely acknowledged that his anecdotal evidence was not dispositive; rather, it was relevant information which, taken together with the epidemiological studies, justified a conclusion on causation. Undoubtedly the result in Cantrell would have been different if the expert had relied solely on personal anecdotal evidence for his conclusion.

Reliance on temporal proximity. There are a number of cases after Daubert in which a healthy plaintiff has been exposed to a product and becomes ill shortly thereafter. For example, in Porter v. Whitehall Lab., 9 F.3d 607 (7th Cir. 1993) , Porter came to the hospital to be treated for a fractured toe. He had no other health problems. He was given ibuprofen, took about thirty tablets over a month-long period, and at the end of that month he was diagnosed with renal failure from which he would not recover. Porter's experts testified that ibuprofen caused his renal failure, even though no published data or study supported this conclusion. The experts essentially based their opinions on Porter's prior good health and the temporal proximity between the ingestion of ibuprofen and renal failure. The Court concluded, however, that forming a conclusion on the basis of temporal proximity, in the absence of some established scientific connection between substance and illness, is inconsistent with the scientific method. By relying solely on temporal proximity, the expert fails to consider other possible explanations -- not to mention the unexplainable -- that a scientist would want to look into before drawing a conclusion. n38

Again, this is not to say that the temporal proximity between exposure and injury is completely irrelevant to the scientific method. The result in Porter might well have been different if published controlled studies and/or epidemiological evidence established some connection between ibuprofen and renal failure. Then the temporal proximity between exposure and injury can be used as confirmatory data. This was the case in Kennedy v. Collagen Corp., supra, where the expert's opinion on causation was based in part on the plaintiff's having contracted lupus shortly after receiving collagen injections. The expert could properly rely on this factor in light of the studies indicating a substantial connection between collagen and autoimmune disorders. As one Court put it, "[A] temporal connection is entitled to greater weight when there is an established scientific connection between exposure and illness or other circumstantial evidence supporting the causal link." n39

Moreover, in certain unusual circumstances, the short time between exposure and injury may itself be enough for a scientist to draw a conclusion about causation. As the Court put it in Cavallo, supra: "There may be instances where the temporal connection between exposure to a given chemical and subsequent injury is so compelling as to dispense with the need for reliance on standard methods of toxicology." In Cavallo, the plaintiff was exposed to a fairly small amount of jet fuel vapor, and developed a respiratory disease immediately thereafter. While the Court excluded expert testimony based solely on that temporal connection, it recognized that the case would be different if a previously healthy plaintiff were exposed to jet fuel in an extremely large dose (e.g., a barrel of it was poured on the plaintiff's head), and developed a respiratory disease shortly thereafter. Also, the Court recognized that a scientifically-based conclusion of causation can be drawn where a large number of people are all exposed to a substance and all develop similar symptoms right away. For example, if everyone in Cavallo's neighborhood developed the same respiratory disease right after a jet fuel spill, a scientist might properly conclude that the jet fuel caused the injuries. n40

The weight that a temporal connection can be given in a reliable scientific enquiry will depend on the circumstances. For example, a temporal connection between exposure and injury will be stronger and entitled to more weight if the symptoms abate after exposure is terminated. Thus, in Westberry v. Gislaved Gummi AB, 178 F.3d 257 (4th Cir. 1999), the plaintiff alleged that his sinus condition was severely aggravated by his exposure to talc at his workplace. He relied on the testimony of his treating doctor to prove his case. The doctor conducted a differential diagnosis, ruling out causes other than talc, and he also relied on the temporal connection between exposure and injury. The Court found that the Trial Court did not abuse its discretion in finding the treating physician's testimony reliable under Daubert. The Court noted that while a temporal connection between exposure and injury is not enough in itself to support a reliable conclusion of cause and effect, "depending on the circumstances, a temporal connection between exposure to a substance and the onset of a disease or a worsening of symptoms can provide compelling evidence of causation." This was particularly true in this case where the plaintiff's sinus condition improved when he was out of work, and worsened when he went back to work. In contrast, temporal connection will be of little relevance if the plaintiff's condition pre-existed exposure.

Insufficient connection between the expert's opinion and the facts of the case. Some experts after Daubert have fallen into the trap of relying on a proper methodology, but failing to connect it with the facts of the case. Thus, in Chikovsky v. Ortho Pharmaceutical Corp., 832 F. Supp. 341 (S.D. Fla. 1993), the Court granted summary judgment after holding inadmissible the plaintiff's expert's testimony that Retin-A caused the plaintiff's birth defects. The plaintiff's mother had used Retin-A topically for skin blemishes during her pregnancy. Some studies tended to show a connection between a product similar to Retin-A and birth defects, but only when the product was taken orally and in large doses. But the plaintiff's expert did not know how much Retin-A the plaintiff's mother had applied to her skin during pregnancy, and it was clear that the amount could not have approached the dosages in the studies relied upon by the expert.

Another example of a failure to connect reliable expert testimony with the facts arose in Bogosian v. Mercedes-Benz of North America, Inc., 104 F.3d 472 (1st Cir. 1997) . The plaintiff was run over by her car after putting it in park and exiting the vehicle. She sought to have an engineer testify about the phenomenon of "false park detent" -- where the driver feels as if he or she has put the car in park, without looking at the gear shift, but the car is not actually in park. The Court held that this testimony was properly excluded under Daubert, because it rested on a factual premise -- that the plaintiff did not look at the console shift before turning off the car -- that was at odds with the plaintiff's own testimony: "The district court appropriately found it very odd that Bogosian would present an expert witness who would testify that her own unwavering testimony was incorrect."

An expert's lack of knowledge about the case has also been regulated through the Daubert "fit" requirement. n41 The Court in Daubert stated that a scientific principle may be valid for one purpose but not for another. The principle relied upon by the expert, though valid, might not "fit" the facts of the case at bar. A valid study finding a connection between a substance and an injury will fail the "fit" requirement if the plaintiff's exposure to the substance is materially different from the exposures considered in the study. Thus, in Sorenson v. Shaklee Corp., 31 F.3d 638 (8th Cir. 1994) , the plaintiffs alleged that their mental retardation was caused by their parents' use, before childbirth, of alfalfa tablets that had been coated with ethylene oxide (EtO). The Court held that the Trial Judge properly rejected the plaintiffs' experts' conclusion that EtO could cause mental retardation in children if taken by parents before childbirth. The testimony failed the Daubert "fit" requirement because the experts did not know whether, and the plaintiffs produced no evidence that, the alfalfa tablets taken by their parents contained any EtO residue.

Ruling out other possible causes. Before a conclusion on causation can be reliably drawn, the expert must make some reasonable attempt to eliminate some of the most obvious causes other than the one chosen. In medical terms, this is called conducting a differential diagnosis -- e.g., excluding other causes, such as genetics or other toxins, for a certain disease. In epidemiological terms, this is called controlling for confounding factors. n42

Unfortunately, some experts have sought to testify to the specific cause of an injury without having attempted to screen out other obvious causes. Thus, in Claar v. Burlington N. R.R., 29 F.3d 499 (9th Cir. 1994) , the plaintiffs brought an action under FELA alleging that they were injured by exposure to toxic chemicals. Affirming an order of summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the proffered testimony of the plaintiffs' experts was inadmissible. The experts concluded that the plaintiffs' injuries were caused by exposure to toxic chemicals, but they neglected to investigate any other possible causes of the plaintiffs' injuries. For example, an expert concluded that the chemicals caused one plaintiff to suffer from "dyscalculia" (bad at arithmetic) and "spelling dispraxia" (bad at spelling). But the expert never reviewed the plaintiff's school records. These records indicated that the plaintiff had these problems when he was a child. Basically, the experts appeared to have first concluded that the plaintiffs were injured due to exposure to chemicals, and then consulted the relevant literature in the field to support their opinions. The Claar Court concluded:

> Coming to a firm conclusion first and then doing research to support it is the antithesis of [the scientific] method. Certainly, scientists may form initial tentative hypotheses. However, scientists whose conviction about the ultimate conclusion of their research is so firm that they are willing to aver under oath that it is correct prior to performing the necessary validating tests could properly be viewed by the district court as lacking the objectivity that is the hallmark of the scientific method. n43

Similarly, statisticians who fail to root out the most obvious alternative causes for a statistical disparity are likely to be excluded after Daubert. n44

This is not to say that an expert, in order to testify on causation, must be able to categorically exclude each and every possible alternative cause. As the Federal Judicial Center Reference Manual on Scientific Evidence cogently points out, it is "never possible to rule out every alternative explanation." n45 For example, in Ambrosini v. Labarraque, 101 F.3d 129 (D.C. Cir. 1996) , the plaintiff proffered experts who testified that the drug Depo-Provera caused the plaintiff's birth defects. The experts could not categorically rule out all possible sources of the plaintiff's birth defects. For example, they had not conducted state-of-the-art chromosomal studies, though they did look at the relevant medical records of mother, grandmother, etc. But to require the experts to categorically rule out all other possible causes for an injury would mean that few experts would ever be able to testify -- or that the cost of litigation for plaintiffs would be prohibitively expensive. The Court held that the possibility of some uneliminated causes presented a question of weight, so long as the most obvious causes have been considered and reasonably ruled out by the expert. n46

On the other hand, a proper differential diagnosis -- i.e., considering the basic causes for a symptom and excluding all but one -- has been held a reliable basis for an expert's conclusion on causation under Daubert. A description of the process and its scientific validity is found in Westberry v. Gislaved Gummi AB, 178 F.3d 257, 262 (4th Cir. 1999) :

> Differential diagnosis, or differential etiology, is a standard scientific technique of identifying the cause of a medical problem by eliminating the likely causes until the most probable one is isolated. See Baker v. Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, 156 F.3d 248, 252-53 (1st Cir. 1998) . A reliable differential diagnosis typically, though not invariably, is performed after "physical examinations, the taking of medical histories, and the review of clinical tests, including laboratory tests," and generally is accomplished by determining the possible causes for the patient's symptoms and then eliminating each of these potential causes until reaching one that cannot be ruled out or determining which of those that cannot be excluded is the most likely. Kannankeril v. Terminix Int'l, Inc., 128 F.3d 802, 807 (3d Cir. 1997) (explaining that "[d]ifferential diagnosis is defined for physicians as 'the determination of which of two or more diseases with similar symptoms is the one from which the patient is suffering, by a systematic comparison and contrasting of the clinical findings' ") (quoting Stedman's Medical Dictionary 428 (25th ed.1990)); see McCullock v. H.B. Fuller Co., 61 F.3d 1038, 1044 (2d Cir. 1995) (describing differential etiology as an analysis "which requires listing possible causes, then eliminating all causes but one"); Glaser v. Thompson Med. Co., 32 F.3d 969, 978 (6th Cir. 1994) (recognizing that differential diagnosis is "a standard diagnostic tool used by medical professionals to diagnose the most likely cause or causes of illness, injury and disease"). This technique "has widespread acceptance in the medical community, has been subject to peer review, and does not frequently lead to incorrect results." Brown v. Southeastern Penn. Transp. Auth. (In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litig.), 35 F.3d 717, 758 (3d Cir. 1994) ; see Heller v. Shaw Indus., Inc., 167 F.3d 146, 154-55 (3d Cir. 1999) (noting "that differential diagnosis consists of a testable hypothesis, has been peer reviewed, contains standards for controlling its operation, is generally accepted, and is used outside of the judicial context"). We previously have upheld the admission of an expert opinion on causation based upon a differential diagnosis. See Benedi v. McNeil-P.P.C., Inc., 66 F.3d 1378, 1383-85 (4th Cir. 1995) (holding that expert testimony by treating physician concerning cause of plaintiff's liver failure -- acetaminophen combined with alcohol -- was admissible despite the lack of epidemiological data). And, the overwhelming majority of the courts of appeals that have addressed the issue have held that a medical opinion on causation based upon a reliable differential diagnosis is sufficiently valid to satisfy the first prong of the Rule 702 inquiry. Compare Heller, 167 F.3d at 154 , 156-57 (concluding that a proper differential diagnosis is adequate to support expert medical opinion on causation), Kennedy v. Collagen Corp., 161 F.3d 1226, 1228-30 (9th Cir. 1998) (holding district court abused its discretion in excluding an expert opinion on causation based upon a reliable differential diagnosis), Baker, 156 F.3d at 252-53 (determining that a differential diagnosis rendered expert opinion on causation sufficiently reliable for admission), Zuchowicz v. United States, 140 F.3d 381, 385-87 (2d Cir. 1998) (upholding determination that expert opinion was reliable in part based on differential diagnosis), and Ambrosini v. Labarraque, 101 F.3d 129, 140-41 (D.C. Cir. 1996) (holding that because expert opinion was based on differential diagnosis, district court abused its discretion in refusing to admit it), with Moore v. Ashland Chem., Inc., 151 F.3d 269, 277-79 (5th Cir. 1998) (en banc) (concluding that district court did not abuse its discretion in rejecting expert opinion on > causation without discussing why differential diagnosis was insufficient to support admission of opinion into evidence). Thus, we hold that a reliable differential diagnosis provides a valid foundation for an expert opinion. n47

The underlying premise of differential diagnosis is that there is an established connection between certain possible causes and a condition or symptom -- then all of the established causes are ruled out but one. That is to say, a substance or condition must be "ruled in" as a potential cause before it can be part of a differential diagnosis. An example of a flawed differential diagnosis is found in Black v. Food Lion, 171 F.3d 308 (5th Cir. 1999) . The Trial Court permitted a treating physician to testify that the plaintiff suffered from fibromyalgia syndrome that was caused by the trauma from a slip-and-fall at the defendant's store. The Court found reversible error, concluding that this testimony was unreliable under Daubert. The Trial Court had permitted the testimony on the ground that the expert had followed a proper protocol by eliminating other possible causes of fibromyalgia. But the Court rejected this analysis, because the causes of fibromyalgia have not been established:

> This analysis amounts to saying that because Dr. Reyna thought she had eliminated other possible causes of fibromyalgia, even though she does not know the real "cause," it had to be the fall at Food Lion. This is not an exercise in scientific logic but in the fallacy of post-hoc propter-hoc reasoning, which is as unacceptable in science as in law. By the same "logic," Dr. Reyna could have concluded that if Black had gone on a trip to Disney World and been jostled in a ride, that event could have contributed to the onset of fibromyalgia. The court's task was to determine whether Dr. Reyna's methodology tied the fall at Food Lion by some specific train of medical evidence to Black's development of fibromyalgia. No one doubts the utility of medical histories in general or the process by which doctors rule out some known causes of disease in order to finalize a diagnosis. But such general rules must, under Daubert ... be applied fact-specifically in each case. The underlying predicates of any cause-and-effect medical testimony are that medical science understands the physiological process by which a particular disease or syndrome develops and knows what factors cause the process to occur. Based on such predicate knowledge, it may then be possible to fasten legal liability for a person's disease or injury. n48

Insufficient foundation for the expert's opinion. Under Daubert, the District Court as gatekeeper must reject expert testimony that is seriously under-researched. The expert's research need not be absolutely exhaustive. But if the expert has failed even to consult obviously pertinent studies, or has failed even to test the thesis, then the testimony should be excluded under Daubert. n49 As discussed below, this principle of sufficient basis/adequate foundation has been codified in the 2000 amendment to Rule 701. See Rule 702(1).

The problem of lack of testing often arises in product liability cases, where the plaintiff calls an expert who would testify that the defendant should have designed the product differently. If the alternative design has never been made and tested, either by the expert or anyone else, Courts are likely to prohibit the expert from testifying after Daubert. As the Seventh Circuit noted in Cummins v. Lyle Indus., 93 F.3d 362 (7th Cir. 1996) , a number of factors must go into a reliable conclusion that an alternative design should have been employed, e.g., the compatibility of the design with existing systems, relative efficiency, maintenance costs, ease of servicing, and the effects of price. As the Cummins Court put it: "Many of these considerations are product-and-manufacturer-specific, and most cannot be determined reliably without testing."

We believe, however, that testing should not be an absolute requirement to the admissibility of expert testimony on design safety. The expense of litigation must be taken into account. If a design engineer testifies that a car could have been designed more safely, the Court should not exclude the testimony simply because the expert has not himself built a car employing the alternative design.

A fine example of the proper approach to testing after Daubert is found in Judge Vance's opinion in Tassin v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 946 F. Supp. 1241 (M.D. La. 1996) . Tassin was injured while operating a power saw, and proffered an engineer who concluded that alternative designs were safer, and that the defendant failed to provide adequate warnings. Judge Vance analyzed the admissibility of this testimony in light of Daubert as follows:

> It may well be that an engineer is able to demonstrate the reliability of an alternative design without conducting scientific tests, for example, if he can point to another type of investigation or analysis that substantiates his conclusions. For example, an expert might rely upon a review of experimental, statistical, or other technical industry data, or on relevant safety studies, products, surveys, or applicable industry standards. He could also combine any one or more of these methods with his own evaluation and inspection of the product based on experience and training in working with the type of product at issue. The expert's opinion must, however, rest on more than speculation, he must use the types of information, analyses and methods relied on by experts in his field, and the information that he gathers and the methodology that he uses must reasonably support his conclusions. If the expert's opinions are based on facts, a reasonable investigation, and traditional technical/mechanical expertise, and he provides a reasonable link between the information and procedures he uses and the conclusions he reaches, then [testing of an alternative design is not absolutely required].

Applying these standards to the facts, the Tassin Court excluded the expert's testimony on certain alternative designs based on parts that he had never tested or even seen, and the safety of which was not supported by the tests of others nor by any relevant literature. However, the Court held testimony as to another alternative design admissible, where the expert had actually conducted some testing, and where the safety of the product received support from the relevant literature. The expert could have tested more systematically and extensively, but this presented a question of weight. Finally, the Court held the expert's conclusion as to inadequate warnings to be admissible. The alternative warnings suggested by the expert had not been scientifically tested. But the Court found that testing as to warnings (as opposed to testing alternative designs) was not critical where the expert had substantial experience in both product design and in preparing product manuals and warnings. n50

Subjectivity. The Court in Daubert emphasized that the scientific method is an objective one. It instructed a Trial Court to assure itself that the expert's hypothesis could be tested by objective standards. This is the essence of what the Court referred to as scientific validity, also known as "falsifiability." It follows that if an expert's methodology cannot be explained in objective terms, and is not subject to be proven incorrect by objective standards, then the methodology is presumptively unreliable.

An example of this proposition arose in O'Conner v. Commonwealth Edison Co., 13 F.3d 1090 (7th Cir. 1994) . The plaintiff claimed that her cataracts were caused by exposure to nuclear radiation. She called an ophthalmologist who testified to that effect. He based his conclusion on a visual inspection of the plaintiff's eyes. The expert testified that he could identify radiation-induced cataracts by simple visual observation; however, there was no scientific support for this premise. The Court noted that the defendant's experts had shown that a proper methodology for detecting radiation-induced cataracts included a medical work-up, a work-up of the patient's history, and an examination of occupation dosimetry charts. The testimony failed under Daubert because the expert employed a completely subjective approach that was rejected by other scientists, and which could not be proved false. The testimony was basically an ipse dixit from the expert, and after Daubert, that is not enough. n51

[8] Good Scientific Testimony After Daubert

There are a growing number of cases in which a scientific expert has been found to pass the "good science" threshold established by Daubert. n52 A good example of testimony satisfying Daubert is found in Benedi v. McNeil-P.P.C., Inc., 66 F.3d 1378 (4th Cir. 1995) . The plaintiff claimed that he suffered severe liver damage as a result of combining Extra-Strength Tylenol and alcohol. Eventually the plaintiff had to have a liver transplant. To prove general causation (i.e., that there is a link between substance and injury), the plaintiff called two liver disease specialists, who both testified that a warning of the possible danger of combining alcohol and acetaminophen should have been placed on the Tylenol label. These experts described how the alcohol-acetaminophen mixture can become a toxin in the liver. They cited numerous treatises and articles published in medical journals that described the increased risk of liver injury when acetaminophen is combined with alcohol. To prove specific causation (i.e., that the substance actually caused the plaintiff's injury), the plaintiff called two treating physicians, who had examined his liver and found evidence of acetaminophen toxicity. The treating physicians investigated the possibility of other causes, such as viral failure, by comparing the plaintiff's liver to liver samples damaged by viruses. They concluded that the plaintiff's liver showed negative for viral damage.

What makes for sound methodology? The Benedi Court stressed the following:

> Benedi's treating physicians based their conclusions on the microscopic appearance of his liver, the Tylenol found in his blood upon his admission to the hospital, the history of several days of Tylenol use after regular alcohol consumption, and the lack of evidence of a viral or any other cause of the liver failure. Benedi's [liver disease experts] relied upon a similar methodology: history, examination, lab and pathology data, and study of the peer-reviewed literature.

The Court concluded that it would "not declare such methodologies invalid and unreliable in light of the medical community's daily use of the same methodologies in diagnosing patients."

Evaluating the result in Benedi and similar cases after Daubert leads to the following conclusion: a scientific expert's testimony will be admissible if the expert employs the same methodology in reaching the conclusion as he or she would employ if working as a scientist in the real world. If the methodology is good enough for the real world, it is good enough for a trial. On the other hand, if the methodology is altered for the purposes of litigation, there is every reason to exclude it after Daubert. As Judge Posner has put it, the object of Daubert is to assure that "experts adhere to the same standards of intellectual rigor that are demanded in their professional work." n53

It must be stressed that while Daubert assigns Trial Judges the role of gatekeepers, it does not authorize Trial Judges to act as "super-experts," or to scrutinize experts in such a way as to exclude all but the perfect expert testimony. This lesson was learned by the Trial Judge who was reversed in United States v. 14. 38 Acres of Land Situated in Leflore County, Miss., 80 F.3d 1074 (5th Cir. 1996) . This was an eminent domain action, in which the landowner proffered an engineering expert and a real estate appraisal expert. The engineering expert stated that a new levee left the subject property unprotected from flooding, and in a worse position than before the levee was built. The real estate appraisal expert stated that any prospective buyer would determine that the property was subject to flooding, and that the fair market value of the property had been reduced. The Trial Court excluded the experts' testimony as speculative and without foundation, relying specifically on the experts' apparent uncertainty about the extent of flooding on the property in the event of heavy rainfall. But the Court of Appeals found an abuse of discretion, because the Trial Judge "applied too stringent a reliability test." The Court stated that Daubert had not worked a "seachange over federal evidence law" and that "the trial court's role as gatekeeper is not intended to serve as a replacement for the adversary system." The engineer's opinion was properly based on his review of maps, photographs, and other relevant data, as well as his experience as an engineer. The appraisal expert's opinion was based on his experience, his personal inspection of the property, comparable sales, and discussions with local brokers. Under these circumstances, any vagueness or tentativeness in the testimony were "matters properly to be tested in the crucible of adversary proceedings; they are not the basis for truncating that process." n54

Thus, it is not up to Trial Judges to pick apart an expert's testimony and exclude it if there is any flaw, no matter how minute. The task of the gatekeeper after Daubert is to ensure that the expert reached the opinion by the same avenues that the expert uses in his or her day-to-day work. Perhaps Judge McLaughlin put it best in McCullock v. H.B. Fuller Co., 61 F.3d 1038 (2d Cir. 1995) . The plaintiff in McCullock alleged that she contracted a respiratory ailment, including throat polyps, from exposure to an unventilated glue pot at her place of employment. Fuller aggressively challenged two experts under Daubert -- a consulting engineer, who testified that the plaintiff was in the "breathing zone" of the glue fumes, and an ear, nose, and throat doctor, who testified that the glue fumes caused the plaintiff's ailments. The engineer based his opinion on his extensive practical experience, examination of safety literature and the warnings provided by the defendant, interviews with the plaintiff concerning her exposure, and background industrial experience with ventilation. The doctor based his testimony on his treatment of the plaintiff, her medical history, pathological studies, use of a differential diagnosis, and scientific and medical treatises. Under these circumstances, the Court found that any dispute as to the experts' lack of specialization, flaws in methodology, or lack of textual authority went to weight and not admissibility. The Court concluded that the defendant's point-by-point, strict scrutiny attack on the experts' qualifications and methodology constituted an unwarranted extension of Daubert:

> Trial judges must exercise sound discretion as gatekeepers of expert testimony under Daubert. Fuller, however, would elevate them to the role of St. Peter at the gates of heaven, performing a searching inquiry into the depth of an expert witness's soul -- separating the saved from the damned. Such an inquiry would inexorably lead to evaluating witness credibility and weight of the evidence, the ageless role of the jury.

Similarly, Daubert does not authorize a Trial Court to exclude an expert's testimony simply because the expert relies upon methods that are disputed by others in the field. It will often be the case that experts in a particular field employ different methods -- psychiatry and medicine are obvious examples. Daubert does not give the Trial Judge the right simply to choose one competing methodology over another. The question is whether the methodology employed by the expert is reliable; dispute in the field is a relevant consideration, but it is not dispositive. For example, in Ruiz-Troche v. Pepsi Cola of P.R. Bottling Co., 161 F.3d 77 (1st Cir. 1998) , a wrongful death accident arising from a traffic accident, the defendant proffered an expert pharmacologist who concluded that the decedent had "snorted" at least 200 mg of cocaine thirty to sixty minutes prior to the accident. To reach this conclusion on dosage, the expert relied on a mathematical formula said to be supported by several published studies supporting a "half-life technique" of assessing dosages. The Trial Court excluded this testimony on the ground that other pharmacologists used a different technique for determining dosage. But the Court found an abuse of discretion. The Court recognized that the scientific literature relied upon by the expert "does not make an open-and-shut case" because the studies indicate that the half-life of cocaine varies among individuals due to many factors. But the Court stated that the Trial Judge "set the bar too high" in excluding the expert's testimony on the basis of these possible variables. The Court noted that "no single factor disposes of a reliability inquiry" and that "Daubert neither requires nor empowers trial courts to determine which of several competing scientific theories has the best provenance. It demands only that the expert's conclusion has been arrived at in a scientifically sound and methodologically reliable fashion." In this case, the expert's opinion was "premised on an accepted technique, embodied a methodology that has significant support in the relevant universe of scientific literature, and was expressed to a reasonable degree of scientific certainty."

[9] Applying the Daubert Gatekeeping Standards to "Non-scientific" Expert Testimony

One of the questions left open by Daubert was whether its standards apply to expert testimony that does not purport to be scientifically-based. The starting point in analyzing this question is that Rule 702 does not limit expert testimony to that which is scientifically grounded. It refers as well to technical or other specialized knowledge. Because the Rule permits admission of expert testimony whenever it will assist the factfinder, any information that is not common knowledge may be an appropriate subject of expert testimony, whether scientifically grounded or not. Given the breadth of permissible topics for expert testimony, then, can the Daubert Court's focus on the Trial Judge's gatekeeper role be applicable to experts other than the epidemiologist- and toxicologist-types considered in Daubert?

The Supreme Court answered this question in Kumho Tire Co. v. Carmichael, 526 U.S. 137 (1999) . The Court in Kumho held that the Daubert gatekeeper function applies to the testimony of experts who do not purport to testify on the basis of scientific principles -- the Trial Judge has an obligation to assure that such testimony is reliable. Kumho involved a tire failure expert who would have testified that a tire exploded because it was defective. His mode of analysis was to investigate whether the failure might have been caused for any reason other than defect. He employed his own four-factor test to rule out other causes such as overinflation or underinflation. He found that some of his self-selected factors indicating improper inflation of the tire were indicated, but not sufficiently so to identify improper inflation as the cause of the tire exploding. The Trial Judge excluded the expert's testimony for, among other reasons, failure to satisfy the Daubert standards. The Judge found that the expert's methodology was subjective; it had not been peer reviewed; there was no indication of the rate of error; and there was no general acceptance of the expert's four-factor test for determining alternative causation.

The Supreme Court, in a decision written by Justice Breyer, declared that Rule 702 requires all experts to testify on the basis of "knowledge," and that in Daubert, "the Court specified that it is the Rule's word 'knowledge,' not the words (like 'scientific') that modify that word, that 'establishes a standard of evidentiary reliability.' " The Court also noted that "it would prove difficult, if not impossible, for judges to administer evidentiary rules under which a gatekeeping obligation depended upon a distinction between 'scientific' knowledge and 'technical' or 'other specialized' knowledge. There is no clear line that divides the one from the others." The Court therefore saw no reason under the Rule to apply the gatekeeping function to scientific experts only.

The Court then moved to whether a Trial Judge could properly assess non-scientific expert testimony by means of the specific factors that Daubert had listed as relevant to assessing the reliability of scientific expert testimony -- specifically, objective standards, peer review, rate of error, standards and controls, and general acceptance. The Court held that any or all of these factors might permissibly be used to evaluate non-scientific expert testimony, but that ultimately the factors that a Trial Judge relies upon to determine reliability must be dependent upon the particular area of expertise that is being evaluated. The Court explained as follows:

> We agree with the Solicitor General that "[t]he factors identified in Daubert may or may not be pertinent in assessing reliability, depending on the nature of the issue, the expert's particular expertise, and the subject of his testimony." The conclusion, in our view, is that we can neither rule out, nor rule in, for all cases and for all time the applicability of the factors mentioned in Daubert, nor can we now do so for subsets of cases categorized by category of expert or by kind of evidence. Too much depends upon the particular circumstances of the particular case at issue.
> Daubert itself is not to the contrary. It made clear that its list of factors was meant to be helpful, not definitive. Indeed, those factors do not all necessarily apply even in every instance in which the reliability of scientific testimony is challenged. It might not be surprising in a particular case, for example, that a claim made by a scientific witness has never been the subject of peer review, for the particular application at issue may never previously have interested any scientist. Nor, on the other hand, does the presence of Daubert's general acceptance factor help show that an expert's testimony is reliable where the discipline itself lacks reliability, as, for example, do theories grounded in any so-called generally accepted principles of astrology or necromancy.
>
> At the same time, and contrary to the Court of Appeals' view, some of Daubert's questions can help to evaluate the reliability even of experience-based testimony. In certain cases, it will be appropriate for the trial judge to ask, for example, how often an engineering expert's experience-based methodology has produced erroneous results, or whether such a method is generally accepted in the relevant engineering community. Likewise, it will at times be useful to ask even of a witness whose expertise is based purely on experience, say, a perfume tester able to distinguish among 140 odors at a sniff, whether his preparation is of a kind that others in the field would recognize as acceptable.

Justice Breyer gave the bottom line standard for employing the gatekeeping requirement in evaluating non-scientific expert testimony:

> The objective of that requirement is to ensure the reliability and relevancy of expert testimony. It is to make certain that an expert, whether basing testimony upon professional studies or personal > experience, employs in the courtroom the same level of intellectual rigor that characterizes the practice of an expert in the relevant field.

Not surprisingly, this "same intellectual rigor" standard is the same as that being employed by the Courts to evaluate scientific testimony. Whether the specific Daubert factors are appropriate in determining whether this standard has been met will depend on the circumstances. The Kumho Court declared that "a trial court should consider the specific factors identified in Daubert where they are reasonable measures of the reliability of expert testimony."

Importantly, the Kumho Court held that the Trial Judge's decision on the factors to be employed in assessing an expert's reliability is reviewable only for abuse of discretion. Otherwise, the Judge "would lack the discretionary authority needed both to avoid unnecessary 'reliability' proceedings in ordinary cases where the reliability of an expert's methods is properly taken for granted, and to require appropriate proceedings in the less usual or more complex cases where cause for questioning the expert's reliability arises." This language contemplates that a challenge to expert testimony should not be routine, but should be saved for the unusual case where it is apparent that the expert has under-researched the issues, seriously misapplied a methodology, or has acted clearly inconsistently with professional standards. It should not be the case that every accountant, every electrician, and every plumber becomes the subject of a Daubert hearing.

Turning to the expert's proffered testimony in Kumho, the Court found no abuse of discretion in either the Trial Judge's use of the specific Daubert factors or in the ultimate decision that the testimony was not reliable enough to be admissible. The expert's assumption -- that alternative causes could be ruled out by looking at a number of specific factors identified solely by the expert -- was essentially subjective and unsupported by any other tire failure expert. Moreover, the expert discounted evidence that under his own test indicated that the tire had been improperly inflated. Justice Breyer concluded as follows:

> Indeed, no one has argued that Carlson himself, were he still working for Michelin, would have concluded in a report to his employer that a similar tire was similarly defective on grounds identical to those upon which he rested his conclusion here. Of course, Carlson himself claimed that his method was accurate, but, as we pointed out in Joiner, "nothing in either Daubert or the Federal Rules of Evidence requires a district court to admit opinion evidence that is connected to existing data only by the ipse dixit of the expert."

Thus, the expert was properly rejected because he could not show that he used the same intellectual rigor in reaching his conclusion as would be expected of him in his professional life outside the courtroom.

Even though the gatekeeper function applies to non-scientific expert testimony, it stands to reason (as the Court in Kumho recognized) that the specific Daubert factors will often have to be rejected or modified when reviewing soft science or non-scientific expert testimony. A Court should not exclude an expert on automobile repair on the ground that he has not published his research in a peer-reviewed journal. A Court should not reject the testimony of a sociologist who cannot be definitive about a possible rate of error in his findings. An example of this necessary flexibility is found in Tyus v. Urban Search Mgt., 102 F.3d 256 (7th Cir. 1996) . The plaintiffs in Tyus appealed a judgment rendered for the defendants in a suit alleging that advertising for a rental building targeted only whites, in violation of the Fair Housing Act. The plaintiffs proffered a social science expert who would have testified to how an all-white advertising campaign affects African-Americans. The Trial Court, without conducting a Daubert analysis, excluded the expert on the ground that his testimony was too general to be helpful. The Court found that the Trial Court erred in failing to scrutinize the expert's testimony under the Daubert "framework," and reversed the judgment. The Court declared that the central teaching of Daubert -- that expert testimony "must be tested to be sure that the person possesses genuine expertise in a field and that her court testimony adheres to the same standards of intellectual rigor that are demanded in her professional work" -- was fully applicable to the testimony of experts in the social sciences. However, recognizing the need for a flexible application of Daubert, the Court noted the following caveat:

> It is true, of course, that the measure of intellectual rigor will vary by the field of expertise and the way of demonstrating expertise will also vary. Furthermore, we agree ... that genuine expertise may be based on experience or training. In all cases, however, the district court must ensure that it is dealing with an expert, not just a hired gun.

The Tyus Court found that the Trial Court erred in excluding the expert, because his testimony "would have given the jury a view of the evidence well beyond their everyday experience." Moreover, the expert's research was based on peer-reviewed articles, and his "focus group" method was a well-accepted methodology in the field of social science. In other words, the expert brought basically the same intellectual rigor to his courtroom testimony as he employed in his life as a social scientist. n55

Where expert testimony is not adaptable to being put through the wringer of falsifiability, publication, and peer review, the Trial Judge still has the obligation to determine whether the testimony is properly grounded, well-reasoned, and not speculative. If there is a well-accepted body of learning and experience in the field, then the expert's testimony must be grounded in that learning and experience to be reliable. The more subjective and controversial the expert's inquiry, the more likely the testimony is to be excluded as unreliable. So, for example, in Gier v. Educational Serv. Unit No. 16, 845 F. Supp. 1342 (D. Neb. 1994), aff'd, 66 F.3d 940 (8th Cir. 1995), an action brought against a school on behalf of mentally retarded students for alleged sexual, physical, and emotional abuse, the Magistrate Judge held a Daubert hearing with respect to experts who had interviewed the children who were allegedly abused. The Magistrate Judge ruled in limine that the experts would not be permitted to testify that any of the plaintiffs were abused in any manner, nor to any opinion based on such a conclusion. The Court expressed concern about the subjective nature of the investigation of specific instances of child abuse, and about the vagueness of the standard protocol, which "leaves a gaping hole in the direction it provides the master's level clinician to conduct the interview." In other words, the experts had not relied on any well-accepted, objective methodology in reaching their conclusions. n56

A particular problem after Kumho involves the non-scientific expert who testifies on the basis of experience. The example from Kumho is the perfume-tester who sniffs a substance and identifies its brand and provenance. When asked how he knows that, he just says, "I know it when I smell it and I smell it a lot." Can he be permitted to testify solely on this conclusory experience-based analysis? Put another way, must the Trial Court take the expert's word for it? The Court in Kumho implies that it is inconsistent with the gatekeeper function to simply let an experience-based expert testify without any explication of how they come to their conclusion and why they believe they are correct. This implication -- that experience-based experts must justify their conclusions as reliable -- has been codified in the 2000 amendment to Rule 702, discussed immediately below.

[10] The 2000 Amendment to Rule 702

On December 1, 2000, Rule 702 was amended in an attempt to codify and structure the Supreme Court trilogy of Daubert, Joiner and Kumho. The amendment sets forth three standards that must be met before a challenged expert's testimony can be admitted. The Trial Court must find that:

(1) the expert is basing the opinion on sufficient facts or data. If an expert has engaged in insufficient research, or has ignored obvious factors, the opinion must be excluded under this prong of the test. In other words, the expert must have a sufficient foundation for the testimony. Judge Becker has stated that the foundation requirement, while "well developed in the case law and in the experience of trial lawyers and judges" has not been expressly grounded in one of the Federal Rules. n57 The Advisory Committee realized that there was a gap in the Rules, and also that the Court in Daubert implicitly required a foundation requirement for expert testimony. The Advisory Committee decided to avoid any ambiguity and to make the foundation requirement a specific part of Rule 702. The Courts appear to be applying the "sufficient basis" requirement without controversy. n58 A good example is United States v. Tin Yat Chin, 371 F.3d 31 (2d Cir. 2004), in which the defendant was charged with impersonation and tax evasion. The evidence indicated that the impersonator spoke Cantonese with a Mandarin accent. The defendant proffered a linguistics expert who would have testified that the defendant, whose native dialect was Cantonese, could not have faked a Mandarin accent when speaking Cantonese. The Court held that this testimony was properly excluded because the expert lacked a sufficient basis for his conclusion. The expert relied on a conversation in which the defendant spoke for only 15 seconds, in preparation for a trial in which the defendant had a strong incentive to minimize his linguistic abilities.

(2) the testimony is the product of reliable principles and methods. This is the heart of Daubert -- a requirement that the expert's methods are reliable.

(3) the witness has applied the principles and methods reliably to the facts of the case. This is a recognition, implicit in Daubert and Joiner, that the use of a reliable method is not enough to guarantee reliable testimony. The proponent must also show that the methods have been applied reliably in the specific case.

At the time this amendment was first considered, the Lower Courts were in disagreement about whether the Daubert gatekeeping function applied to nonscientific expert testimony. The Advisory Committee believed that Daubert should apply to nonscientific experts, and the amendment clearly extends the Daubert gatekeeping function to all expert testimony. Toward the end of the rulemaking process, after the public comment period had ended, the Supreme Court decided Kumho. As discussed above, the Court in Kumho extended the Daubert gatekeeping function to nonscientific experts. The question for the Committee at that point was whether to continue with the amendment. The Committee decided, after much deliberation, that an amendment to Rule 702 would be extremely valuable to the bench and bar even after Kumho.

The Reporter's memorandum to the Committee set forth the following arguments for continuing with the amendment even after the Court's decision in Kumho:

> 1. In its "expert trilogy" (Daubert/Joiner/Kumho) the Court has a lot to say about the reliability requirements for expert testimony, but nowhere in any of those opinions does the Court lay out the specific steps and criteria that a Trial Court must undertake in assessing the reliability of all kinds of expert testimony. The amendment synthesizes the Supreme Court cases and lays out three requirements that all expert testimony must meet. This clarification and synthesis will be of great assistance to the bench and bar.
>
> 2. The courts before the amendment remained in dispute about some important matters of gatekeeping. For example, some courts were focusing only on whether the expert has employed a reliable method, and were not considering whether the expert actually applied that method reliably to the facts of the case. Other courts were focusing on both methods and application. The amendment makes clear that reliable application of a method is every bit as important as whether the method itself is reliable.
>
> 3. The courts before the amendment remained in dispute about the applicable standard of proof for Daubert determinations. The Committee Note to the amendment makes clear that the proponent has the burden of showing, by a preponderance of the evidence, that expert testimony is reliable.
>
> 4. The Supreme Court cited the Committee Note to the proposed amendment with approval in Kumho, providing at least some indication that the Committee was on the right track. And indeed, the Note itself, independent of the text, will provide helpful guidance to courts and litigants on how to approach Daubert problems. The Note provides an extensive survey of the factors that the Courts have found relevant to assessing the reliability of expert testimony under Daubert, and this survey can help Courts and litigants in this difficult area.
> 5. Before the amendment, even without any obvious conflicts on the specifics, the Courts divided over how to even approach a Daubert question. Some Courts seemed to approach Daubert as a rigorous exercise requiring the Trial Court to scrutinize, in detail, the expert's basis, methods, and application. Other Courts seemed to think that all Daubert requires is that the Trial Court assure itself that the expert's opinion is something more than mere unfounded speculation -- all other possible defects go to the jury. Adoption of the amendment, and the Committee Note, was considered likely to provide uniformity in the approach to Daubert questions. The proposed amendment and the Committee Note clearly envision a more rigorous and structured approach than some Courts had been employing.

6. Finally, if the Rule were not amended, there was a legitimate cause for concern that Congress would act to amend Rule 702. Senator Hatch and Congressman Coble each proposed legislation that purported to codify Daubert. These codification efforts were shelved, in part, because of assurances that the Rules Committee was already considering a change to Rule 702. If the Committee would not act, there is a possibility that these congressional efforts will be renewed. And congressional tinkering with the Evidence Rules has in the past resulted in significant problems of interpretation (e.g., Rules 413-415 and Rule 704(b)).

The public comment on the proposed amendment to Rule 702 was quite polarized. Generally speaking, plaintiffs' groups opposed the amendment and defendants' groups favored it. What follows is a discussion of the major concerns brought up by plaintiffs' groups and other members of the public, and the response to these concerns by the Advisory Committee:

1. The amendment will result in a proliferation of Daubert motions: The argument was that the amendment virtually invites defendants to challenge every expert proffered by a plaintiff. But the Committee's position was that an increase in challenges to experts, if any, would not be caused by the amendment, but rather by the Supreme Court's opinions in Daubert and Kumho. The amendment simply seeks to codify those cases. Moreover, the admittedly limited empirical research indicates that challenges to experts have not gone up dramatically after Daubert. The Committee nonetheless added a paragraph to the Committee Note indicating that the amendment is not intended to provide an excuse for an automatic challenge to the testimony of every expert, and provided a citation to the passage in Kumho indicating that expert testimony in the ordinary case will not be subject to a Daubert challenge.

2. Limitation on the right to jury trial. The oft-expressed concern of plaintiffs' groups was that the amendment will give the Trial Judge authority to simply exclude expert testimony that the judge disagrees with or does not believe -- thus infringing on the jury's role. The Committee's view was, again, that the amendment was simply codifying the Supreme Court's cases. Nonetheless, the Committee added a paragraph to the Note, indicating that Daubert was not intended to take credibility issues away from the jury, and that cross-examination is the remedy for shaky but not completely unreliable expert testimony.

3. Allowing the Judge to pick among competing methodologies. Some public comments expressed the concern that the amendment fails to recognize that there might be two or more competing methodologies in the same field. The implication of these comments is that the amendment would require a Trial Judge to choose the more established or more accepted methodology in the field -- which could lead to a kind of rigid orthodoxy. The Committee's response was that this concern was not justified by the text of the amendment. The amendment simply provides that the expert must be using reliable principles and methods. It does not say that the methods must be those used by a majority of professionals in the particular field. Nor does it say that competing methodologies in a single field cannot all be reliable. Nor does it say that a method is unreliable until it is embraced by a majority of professionals in the field. To take an example, nothing in the text of the amendment would prevent two psychiatrists from different "schools" from testifying as to the mental condition of a patient -- a Freudian and a Skinnerian could both testify, and come to different conclusions, so long as they were acting as they would in their respective professional lives. Nor would the Court be forced to exclude one of two economists where the witnesses are from different schools of economic thought. Nor would an expert necessarily be excluded if he relied on one method of DNA identification (e.g., PCS) rather than another more commonly used method (e.g., RFLP). Nonetheless, the Committee decided to allay any concerns by adding a paragraph to the Committee Note. The paragraph provides that when a Trial Court applying the amendment rules that an expert's testimony is reliable, this would not necessarily mean that contradictory expert testimony is automatically unreliable. The Note now emphasizes that the amendment is broad enough to permit testimony that is the product of competing principles or methods in the same field of expertise, so long as the chosen principles and methods are reliable.

4. The problem of experience-based experts: Some public commentators took the rather extreme position that the amendment would exclude the testimony of any expert relying on experience as opposed to scientific or technical knowledge. These comments were generally conclusory, but they appeared to be based on an assumption that the amendment's emphasis on "reliable principles and methods" is somehow inconsistent with an expert's reliance on experience. How can experience be a method? The Committee had three responses to this critique. First, the term "reliable principles and methods" does not in any way prevent reliance on experience. Use of experience can certainly be a reliable "method" for coming to certain conclusions; Kumho makes this clear. Second, the text of Rule 702 has always referred to experts qualified by experience, and that is not changed by the amendment. Third, the Committee Note emphasizes that the testimony of experience-based experts can be admissible if it is reliable. Nonetheless, to allay any concerns, the Committee added even more language to the Committee Note, emphasizing that nothing in the amendment is intended to suggest that experience alone -- or experience in conjunction with other knowledge, skill, training or education -- may not provide a reliable foundation for expert testimony.

Cases under the amendment to Rule 702: Some commentators have contended that the amendment to Rule 702 does much more than codify Daubert and its progeny. They assert that the intent of the amendment is to cast the Trial Judge in the role of a super-expert, excluding all expert testimony that he or she does not personally find credible. They contend that the amendment instructs trial judges to exclude all proffered expert testimony unless they find it so sound as to be immune from attack. In the elegant words of one critical lawyer, Bert Black, anyone who thinks that the amendment merely codifies Daubert "is smoking something funny."

However, the amendment does nothing more than apply the Daubert gatekeeping function to all expert testimony, as the Supreme Court emphasized in Kumho. The three general standards set forth in the amended Rule can clearly be found in Daubert and its progeny, though those cases do not set forth these standards as clearly or as helpfully as does the amendment. The amended Rule crystallizes the central tenets of Daubert and provides the courts with a straightforward checklist that can be applied, with considerable flexibility, to all kinds of expert testimony. n59

The cases decided under the amended Rule 702 belie the paranoid contention that the amendment works a seachange in the regulation of expert testimony. The Courts have so far held that the amendment simply codifies Daubert by extracting the three general requirements from the Supreme Court's basic premises about the Trial Court's gatekeeping function. n60

Three exemplary cases illustrate the proper approach to expert testimony under Daubert and the amendment to Rule 702. In Blevins v. New Holland North America, 128 F. Supp. 2d 952 (W.D. Va. 2001) , the plaintiff was injured by a hay baler. The plaintiff disembarked from the hay baler to lift up the tail gate and dislodge some hay that was stuck in the baler. He did not turn the baler off. His arm got caught in the machinery. The plaintiff proffered an expert to testify that the baler could have been designed with an emergency stop system that would enable somebody caught in the machinery to turn it off and avoid further injury. The defendant argued that this testimony should be excluded under Rule 702 for three reasons: (1) the expert failed to perform any "scientific testing"; (2) his views had not been "peer reviewed"; and (3) an emergency stop system has not been installed on any hay balers manufactured in the United States.

The Blevins Court turned to the amended Rule 702. It stated that the Rule as amended "has adopted the Daubert principles." It referred to the Advisory Committee Note to the amendment, which sets forth the specific Daubert standards (testing, peer review, general acceptance, etc.) and noted that the amendment does not codify these specific standards, because Daubert itself says that these specific requirements are not exclusive or dispositive. The Court then applied the flexible three-step test of the amendment and determined that the expert's testimony was sufficiently reliable to be admissible. The Court concluded as follows:

> Sevart [the expert] is an experienced professional engineer, with academic as well as practical credentials. He has carefully studied the issue and written about it under the official auspices of a recognized professional organization. He himself has designed and built at least ten emergency stop systems for various types of hay balers and corn pickers and after examining the hay baler in question is of the opinion that it would be feasible to install such a system on that model. While he may be wrong, the value and weight of this opinion are proper matters for the jury to determine.

The Court's analysis of the expert testimony in Blevins is an excellent application of the amended Rule and of Daubert itself. The expert had a sufficient basis -- designing emergency stop systems on other hay balers and personally investigating the model in question. The expert used a reliable method -- extensive experience, training, and reasoning consistent with other professionals in his field. And he properly applied this experience to the facts of the case by determining whether there was any material difference between the machine at issue and those machines on which the expert had successfully installed emergency stop systems. The Court properly noted that an expert's testimony need not be perfect to be admissible; minimal inconsistencies and gaps in the expert's analysis can be addressed on cross-examination.

The second exemplary case under the amended Rule 702 is Lennon v. Norfolk and Western Ry. Co., 123 F. Supp. 2d 1143 (N.D. Ind. 2000) . The plaintiff proffered an expert to testify that his multiple sclerosis resulted from having taken a nasty fall while on the job. The Court observed that Rule 702 had been amended "in response to Daubert" and held that under the amended Rule, as under Daubert, the expert's testimony was not reliable enough to be admissible. The expert's proposition, that MS could be caused by a fall, was unsupported by most of the medical literature. The expert's reliance on a few case studies was an insufficient basis for his conclusion. The expert responded that he had performed a differential diagnosis on the plaintiff -- ruling out all causes for his MS other than trauma, and therefore concluding that trauma must have caused the MS. But the Court noted that a differential diagnosis is only reliable if it rules out all known causes of an injury but one, and only if the one cause left is in fact a known cause of the injury. In this case, the expert's assumption that trauma causes MS was just that -- an unsupported assumption. The analysis under Lennon is perfectly correct under Daubert and the amended Rule 702. It is also consistent with the pre-amendment cases decided under Daubert. n61

The gatekeeper function means that the Trial Court must exclude expert testimony that is nothing but hypothesis and speculation. If the expert in Lennon had been the plaintiff's doctor, it is extremely unlikely that he would have relied on a theory of "trauma causes MS" if that theory were material to treating the patient. And yet he was willing to testify to that theory at trial. As the Committee Note to the amended Rule 702 states, the Court's gatekeeping duty under the amendment, as under Daubert, is to make certain that an expert "employs in the courtroom the same level of intellectual rigor that characterizes the practice of an expert in the relevant field." If the method is good enough for an expert in his professional life, it is good enough for a courtroom; but if an expert is willing to testify in court to a theory he would not use in his professional life, then that testimony should be excluded. It is to be hoped that the Courts will continue to apply the amended Rule 702 with this helpful rule of thumb in mind. Daubert and Kumho are very much alive in the amended Rule 702.

The final exemplary case illustrates the proper treatment of experience-based experts under Daubert and the amended Rule 702. The defendant in United States v. Frazier, 387 F.3d 1244 (11th Cir. 2004) (en banc), was charged with kidnaping. The victim was sexually assaulted. Forensic evidence failed to show any traces of the defendant's hair or bodily fluids on the victim. The defendant proffered a forensic expert who would have testified, on the basis of his experience in the field, that he would have expected to find some transfer of hairs or seminal fluid if a sexual assault had occurred. The Trial Court excluded the expert on the ground that he gave no explanation for his expectation, other than a reference to his extensive experience in the field of forensic testing. The Court found no error in excluding the expert. It relied heavily on the Committee Note to the 2000 amendment to Rule 702, which indicates that the gatekeeping function requires scrutiny of experience-based experts. The Court noted first that experts can give helpful testimony on the basis of their experience -- a point recognized in the Committee Note to the 2000 amendment. The Court then proceeded as follows:

> Of course, the unremarkable observation that an expert may be qualified by experience does not mean that experience, standing alone, is a sufficient foundation rendering reliable any conceivable opinion the expert may express. ... Indeed, the Committee Note to the 2000 Amendments of Rule 702 expressly says that, "[i]f the witness is relying solely or primarily on experience, then the witness must explain how that experience leads to the conclusion reached, why that experience is a sufficient basis for the opinion, and how that experience is reliably applied to the facts. The trial court's gatekeeping function requires more than simply 'taking the expert's word for it.' " If admissibility could be established merely by the ipse dixit of an admittedly qualified expert, the reliability prong would be, for all practical purposes, subsumed by the qualification prong. ... Exactly how reliability is evaluated may vary from case to case, but what remains constant is the requirement that the trial judge evaluate the reliability of the testimony before allowing its admission at trial. See Fed.R.Evid. 702 advisory committee's note (2000 amends.) ("The trial judge in all cases of proffered expert testimony must find that it is properly grounded, well-reasoned, and not speculative before it can be admitted.").

In this case, the expert provided nothing other than an assertion based on his experience. Thus the testimony could not be admitted under Daubert and the amended Rule 702. The Frazier Court explained as follows:

> Tressel offered precious little in the way of a reliable foundation or basis for his opinion. After the government moved to exclude Tressel's expert testimony, the district court was obliged to exercise its gatekeeping role by determining whether Tressel provided a reliable foundation or basis for his opinion. When questioned specifically about the basis for his opinion, Tressel said his opinion was based on his experience, and on various texts in forensic investigation. However, even after repeated prompting, Tressel never explained just how his own experience, or the texts he mentioned, supported his "expectancy" opinion. Indeed, Tressel identified only a single investigation he had worked on in which hair evidence was recovered during the investigation of a serial rapist, and could suggest no study that had ever examined the rate of transfer of hair in sexual assault cases.
>
> ... Without knowing how frequently hair or seminal fluid is transferred during sexual conduct in similar cases -- whether derived from reliable studies or based on some quantification derived from his own experience -- it would be very difficult indeed for the district court (or for that matter the jury) to make even an informed assessment, let alone to verify that the recovery of hair or fluid evidence in this case "would be expected." Nor could the district court tell from Tressel's testimony whether his opinions had been subjected to peer review or, even, the percentage of cases in which his opinion had been erroneous. Simply put, Tressel did not offer any hard information concerning the rates of transfer of hair or fluids during sexual conduct.
>
> Since Tressel was relying solely or primarily on his experience, it remained the burden of the proponent of this testimony to explain how that experience led to the conclusion he reached, why that experience was a sufficient basis for the opinion, and just how that experience was reliably applied to the facts of the case. Again, "[t]he court's gatekeeping function requires more than simply 'taking the expert's word for it.' " Fed.R.Evid. 702 advisory committee's note (2000 amends.).
> Our review of this record leads us to the conclusion that the district court did not abuse its discretion in finding the absence of a sufficiently verifiable, quantitative basis for Tressel's opinion. As we have noted, the application of an abuse-of-discretion standard recognizes a range of possible conclusions that > the trial judge may reach. In this case, we are satisfied that the district judge acted well within that range in finding an insufficient nexus between the experience proffered by the expert and the essential opinion propounded.

The three illustrative cases above can be used as a blueprint for assessing most if not all of the challenged expert testimony under the amended Rule 702.

[11] Expert Credibility and the Gatekeeper Function

Can a Trial Judge applying Daubert and the amended Rule 702 exclude an expert on the ground that the judge finds the expert not credible? At first glance, it would seem impermissible for a Trial Judge to make a credibility assessment because it would encroach on the jury's role. An argument can be made that the Trial Judge should admit expert testimony whenever the expert's submission, if believed by the jury, proves by a preponderance that the expert had a sufficient foundation and reliably employed reliable methods. But the question is somewhat complicated because if the expert is untrustworthy, it may be that the expert did not in fact employ reliable methods, even though he or she says the method is reliable. This would mean that the jury would hear unreliable expert testimony, contrary to the principle of Daubert.

Judge Becker considered the complex relationship between expert credibility and reliability in Elcock v. Kmart Corp., 233 F.3d 734 (3d Cir. 2000) . The Trial Judge in Elcock held a Daubert hearing and determined that one of the plaintiff's experts did not pass the reliability threshold. The Judge relied in part on the fact that the expert had engaged in criminal acts involving fraud; this fraudulent activity was not in any way related to the expert's professional life. Judge Becker found the Trial Court's reliance on these bad acts to be error, and stated that on remand "the District Court should not consider Copemann's likely credibility as a witness when assessing the reliability of his methods." Judge Becker added, however, the following important elaboration:

> We do not hold ... that a district court can never consider an expert witness's credibility in assessing the reliability of that expert's methodology under Rule 702. Such a general prohibition would be foreclosed by the language of Rule 104(a), which delineates the district court's fact-finding responsibilities in the context of an in limine hearing on the Daubert reliability issue. Indeed, consider a case in which an expert witness, during a Daubert hearing, claims to have looked at the key data that informed his proffered methodology, while the opponent offers testimony suggesting that the expert had not in fact conducted such an examination. Under such a scenario, a district court would necessarily have to address and resolve the credibility issue raised by the conflicting testimony in order to arrive at a conclusion regarding the reliability of the methodology at issue. We therefore recognize that, under certain circumstances, a district court, in order to discharge its fact-finding responsibility under Rule 104(a), may need to evaluate an expert's general credibility as part of the Rule 702 reliability inquiry.
> On the other hand, we believe that a district court's fact-finding role under Rule 104(a) is circumscribed in the Daubert reliability context. Although Daubert assigns to the district court a preliminary gatekeeping function -- requiring the court to act as a specialized fact-finder in determining whether the methodology relied upon by an expert witness is reliable -- it does not necessarily follow that the court should be given free rein to employ its assessment of an expert witness's general credibility in making the Rule 702 reliability determination. To conclude otherwise would be to permit the district court, acting in its capacity as a Daubert gatekeeper, to improperly impinge on the province of the ultimate fact-finder, to whom issues concerning the general credibility of witnesses are ordinarily reserved.

Judge Becker noted that the relationship between evidence bearing on an expert witness's credibility and a court's reliability analysis under Daubert "is subtle and nuanced, and does not readily admit to the drawing of bright lines."

However, as Judge Becker notes in Elcock, a distinction can be drawn between credibility evidence that bears directly on the expert's methods, and evidence of credibility that is more general. Judge Becker posited the following example:

> For instance, in situations involving an attempt to attack an expert witness's credibility on the basis of prior bad acts or convictions, at least one prominent evidence commentator has noted that an expert's prior dishonesty or misconduct should not qualify as an appropriate factor in assessing methodological reliability when the acts are wholly unrelated to the expert's use of a particular methodology, but that a court should take such dishonesty or misconduct into account when the nexus between the acts and the expert's methodology is more direct, e.g., when the prior dishonest acts involve fraud committed in connection with the earlier phases of a research project that serves as the foundation for the expert's proffered opinion. See Edward J. Imwinkelreid, Trial Judges -- Gatekeepers or Usurpers? Can the Trial Judge Critically Assess the Admissibility of Expert Testimony Without Invading the Jury's Province to Evaluate the Credibility and Weight of the Testimony, 84 Marq. L. Rev. 1, 39 (2000). Under this approach, for instance, the fact that an expert witness falsely reported his salary on an income tax return has little if any bearing on the reliability of a diagnostic test he frequently employs, but the fact that the expert lied about whether his methodology had been subjected to peer review, or intentionally understated the test's known rates of error, is a different matter entirely.

Thus, if the attack on credibility has nothing to do with the expert's methods, the issue of credibility should be left to the jury -- the opponent can bring impeachment evidence before the jury by way of cross-examination as with any witness, but it has no part in the Daubert hearing. As applied to the facts of Elcock, the credibility evidence should not have been used by the Trial Court, because it related to acts of dishonesty and fraud completely outside the expert's professional life. On the other hand, if the expert in Elcock had previously falsified results in his professional life, this would have been proper information for the Trial Court to consider at the Daubert hearing.

[12] Daubert Analysis and Summary Judgment

Should the gatekeeper standards of Daubert apply in the same way on summary judgment as they apply at trial? The best discussion of this question is found in Cortes-Irizarry v. Corporacion Insular, 111 F.3d 184 (1st Cir. 1997) , in which the Court addressed the plaintiff's argument that a Daubert analysis is improper in the context of summary judgment:

> The plaintiff posits that Daubert is strictly a time-of-trial phenomenon. She is wrong. The Daubert regime can play a role during the summary judgment phase of civil litigation. If proffered expert testimony fails to cross Daubert's threshold for admissibility, a district court may exclude that evidence from consideration when passing upon a motion for summary judgment. See Cavallo v. Star Enter., 100 F.3d 1150, 1159 (4th Cir. 1996) ; Peitzmeier v. Hennessy Indus., Inc., 97 F.3d 293, 297-99 (8th Cir. 1996) ; Claar v. Burlington N. R.R., 29 F.3d 499, 502-05 (9th Cir. 1994) ; Porter v. Whitehall Lab., Inc., 9 F.3d 607, 612, 616-17 (7th Cir. 1993) .

However, the Court cautioned against applying the gatekeeper function too rigorously when deciding a summary judgment motion. The Court explained as follows:

> The fact that Daubert can be used in connection with summary judgment motions does not mean that it should be used profligately. A trial setting normally will provide the best operating environment for the triage which Daubert demands. Voir dire is an extremely helpful device in evaluating proffered expert testimony, and this device is not readily available in the course of summary judgment proceedings. Moreover, given the complex factual inquiry required by Daubert, courts will be hard-pressed in all but the most clearcut cases to gauge the reliability of expert proof on a truncated record. Because the summary judgment process does not conform well to the discipline that Daubert imposes, the Daubert regime should be employed only with great care and circumspection at the summary judgment stage.

> We conclude, therefore, that at the junction where Daubert intersects with summary judgment practice, Daubert is accessible, but courts must be cautious -- except when defects are obvious on the face of a proffer -- not to exclude debatable scientific evidence without affording the proponent of the evidence adequate opportunity to defend its admissibility.

As the Cortes-Irizarry Court notes, the record on summary judgment is ordinarily insufficient for a conscientious Daubert determination. It is only where the expert's affidavit is purely conclusory and speculative that the Trial Court would have enough confidence to reject the expert testimony as insufficiently reliable at such an early stage of the proceedings.

Of course it is possible for the Trial Court to speed up the Daubert determination by essentially requiring a full presentation of the expert testimony, and rebuttal, at the summary judgment stage. Courts have displayed considerable ingenuity in devising ways in which an adequate record can be developed so as to permit Daubert rulings to be made in conjunction with motions for summary judgment. See, e.g., In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litig., 35 F.3d 717, 736, 739 (3d Cir. 1994) (discussing the use of in limine hearings); Claar v. Burlington N. R.R., 29 F.3d 499, 502-05 (9th Cir. 1994) (discussing the District Court's technique of ordering experts to submit serial affidavits explaining the reasoning and methodology underlying their conclusions). The problem with these methods is that they may result in a trial before the trial. As the Cortes-Irizarry Court put it: "We do not in any way disparage such practices; we merely warn that the game sometimes will not be worth the candle."

[13] Pre-Daubert Cases

Before the Supreme Court in Daubert established its flexible test for determining the reliability of expert testimony, several federal circuits had already rejected Frye in favor of a more permissive and flexible approach to admissibility. The Daubert Court relied on many of these cases, especially from the Third Circuit. Thus, the cases that had rejected the Frye test before Daubert are still good authority after Daubert; indeed, they represent helpful, concrete applications of the flexible reliability-based approach to scientific expert testimony. n62 Of course they remain good law under the amended Rule 702, because that amendment simply clarifies and codifies the Daubert standard.

The Annotations to this Rule continue to include pre-Daubert cases that applied a flexible, reliability-based approach to scientific expert testimony. However, we have deleted the cases that relied solely on "general acceptance," as they have now been repudiated by Daubert. We have also deleted the cases that held that the Daubert gatekeeping function is inapplicable to non-scientific expert testimony. Those cases have been repudiated by the Supreme Court in Kumho, supra , and by the amendment to Rule 702.

[14] Peer Review

It is interesting to note that several of the amici in Daubert argued that peer review was not a very effective means of determining the reliability of scientific expert testimony. The amici reasoned that peer review is only as good as the reviewer, and that professional experts are now creating their own peer-reviewed journals to benefit from the deference given by Courts to peer review and publication. n63 The Daubert Court, however, rejected these concerns. It stated that "submission to the scrutiny of the scientific community is a component of 'good science' " and is highly relevant, though not dispositive to reliability. Of course, even the amici who criticized peer review did not reject it entirely as a legal standard -- to do so would remove an incentive for an expert to publish his or her opinions before trial.

However, it must be remembered that peer review is not an absolute requirement for admissibility after Daubert. For one thing, the expert's research may be too particularized to be publishable. If an expert researches the water flow in a particular aquifer in Kansas, it is unlikely that there is much of a market for publication. n64 Also, the expert's research may concern a historical event that is no longer of much interest to the publication world. Thus, in Ambrosini v. Labarraque, 101 F.3d 129 (D.C. Cir. 1996) , an expert testified on the basis of his research that the drug Depo-Provera caused birth defects. The research had not been peer reviewed, but the Court found that this was of no moment, because Depo-Provera had been taken off the market several years earlier, and thus there would be "no reason in the world" to publish those findings.

One thing is clear -- peer review means review by fellow experts. In Peitzmeier v. Hennessy Indus., Inc., 97 F.3d 293 (8th Cir. 1996) , the expert made the novel argument that his research had been peer reviewed because he had already testified about it in several Court actions. The Court understandably rejected the argument that review of an expert's methodology by other Courts could constitute "peer review" within the meaning of Daubert.

[15] Judge and Jury Functions

In the past, cries have been heard that experts usurp the function of the jury. Under Rule 702 the expert may be used as an advisor to the jury, much like a consultant might advise a business so that the jury can benefit far more from the special knowledge or training of the expert than it has in the past where the expert was simply asked to give one conclusory opinion to one extended hypothetical question. Of course, if the expert does intrude on areas left for the jury -- such as the credibility of a witness -- the Trial Judge should exclude the testimony as unhelpful. n65 Conversely, if the expert is called simply to give an opinion on the applicable law, he should be excluded as intruding on the Judge's role. n66

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., United States v. Romero, 57 F.3d 565 (7th Cir. 1995) (expert testimony of a narcotics agent concerning the amount and value of cocaine, the significance of its packaging, and the use of code words, was properly permitted: "our society has not progressed (or rather, descended) to the point where the tools of the drug trade are familiar to all"); United States v. Saulter, 60 F.3d 270 (7th Cir. 1995) (it was proper for a law enforcement agent to testify to the process of manufacturing crack; this subject matter was "likely beyond the ken of the average juror"); United States v. Onumonu, 967 F.2d 782 (2d Cir. 1992) (expert testimony about the profits that could be made by diamond smuggling through the use of internal carriers was erroneously excluded as unhelpful, because the topic was certainly esoteric and counterintuitive enough to be beyond the ordinary understanding of some jurors; therefore, it met the minimal standards of helpfulness set forth in Rule 702).

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., United States v. Fuentes-Cariaga, 209 F.3d 1140 (9th Cir. 2000) (no error to preclude expert testimony from a law enforcement officer that a driver's nervousness at a border crossing is not indicative of guilt; the nervousness of drivers stopped at the border is within the ordinary understanding of jurors); Sherbert v. Alcan Aluminum Corp., 66 F.3d 965 (8th Cir. 1995) (expert testimony was not necessary to establish a standard of care for forklift operation: "[t]he operation of a forklift involves simple principles of balance well within the common knowledge of lay jurors"); Green v. Kinney Shoe Corp., 715 F. Supp. 1122 (D.D.C. 1989) (it should be clear to any person that a subjective promoting process could be used to hide discriminatory intent; accordingly, expert testimony to that effect would not be helpful: "Indeed, this kind of argument may be made, based on the evidence, by lawyers in closing argument.").

(n5)Footnote 5. Judge Becker, in United States v. Gibbs, 190 F.3d 188 (3d Cir. 1999) , draws a similar line between helpful expert testimony and testimony that tells the jurors something they can figure out for themselves. In Gibbs, a law enforcement expert testified to the meaning of conversations between members of a drug conspiracy. The expert testified that "jawn" meant cocaine, that to "hit" someone meant to page them on their beeper, and that a "quarter" meant $2500. Judge Becker found this testimony permissible because these terms were not within the ordinary understanding of jurors, and the expert's translation was therefore helpful. However, the expert also testified that "tonight is the night" was a reference to the fact that two coconspirators were going to take part in a particular mission that night. Judge Becker found that this testimony was erroneously (though harmlessly) admitted, because " 'tonight is the night' contains no intrinsic code that a jury would be unable to understand." See also Peters v. Five Star Marine Serv., 898 F.2d 448 (5th Cir. 1990) (a maritime expert was properly prohibited from testifying that it was unreasonable for an employer to instruct his employee to manually move heavy equipment on the deck of a boat during rough seas, and that spilled diesel fuel had made the deck slippery: "The trial judge correctly decided that the jury could adeptly assess this situation using only their common experience and knowledge. Expert testimony was unnecessary, and thus the decision to exclude the testimony was within the discretion of the trial judge."). Compare Carroll v. Otis Elev. Co., 896 F.2d 210 (7th Cir. 1990) , where expert testimony that the color red attracts children, that a covered stop button is less accessible to children than an uncovered one, and that the more difficult a button is to push, the less readily it is activated by a small child, was held properly admitted by the Trial Court:

> While it is true that one needn't be B.F. Skinner to know that brightly colored objects are attractive to small children and that covered buttons or those with significant resistance are more difficult to actuate by little hands, given our liberal federal standard, the trial court was not manifestly erroneous in admitting this testimony.

(n7)Footnote 7. See also Nimely v. City of New York, 414 F.3d 381 (2d Cir. 2005) (expert testimony that police officer must have been telling the truth about the incident in which he shot an arrestee was erroneously admitted; the Court noted that it had "consistently held that expert opinions that constitute evaluations of witness credibility, even when such evaluations are rooted in scientific or technical expertise, are inadmissible under Rule 702"; the expert's statements "essentially instructed the jury as to an ultimate determination that was exclusively within its province."). Compare United States v. Saulter, 60 F.3d 270 (7th Cir. 1995) (finding no error when a law enforcement agent testified to the process of manufacturing crack; however, the government was warned not to call law enforcement agents as experts simply to bolster the credibility of a government fact-witness; in this case the expert was not called "solely to corroborate" the testimony of the star government witness).

Vlastimil Koubek, 785 F.2d 1154 (4th Cir. 1986)* (an expert was not unqualified to render an opinion on the cause of paint delamination merely because she lacked practical experience, where she was a materials scientist and thus qualified on the basis of her education).

Otis Elev., 596 F.2d 84 (3d Cir. 1979)* (consulting chemist and engineer was qualified to render an opinion concerning the design and manufacture of elevators; inexperience in these areas goes to weight, not admissibility).

Robertson, 387 F.3d 702 (8th Cir. 2004)* (law enforcement agent was sufficiently qualified to testify that the amount of drugs possessed by the defendant was a "distribution amount"; the officer was a ten-year veteran, he had attended a course sponsored by the DEA, and he gathered intelligence on the local narcotics trade as part of his daily routine).

(n19)Footnote 19. See, e.g., Seatrax, Inc. v. Sonbeck Int'l, Inc., 200 F.3d 358 (5th Cir. 2000) (in an action for infringement and misappropriation of trade secrets regarding offshore marine cranes, there was no error in excluding expert testimony regarding the defendant's profits from infringing activity; the expert had substantial experience in the marine crane industry, but he had no experience or training as an accountant, and he did not conduct any independent examination into the defendant's sales figures); Robertson v. Norton Co., 148 F.3d 905 (8th Cir. 1998) (ceramics expert testified that a grinding wheel was defectively manufactured and also that the product warnings were inadequate; while the expert was qualified to testify about a manufacturing defect, this did not qualify him to testify about the adequacy of warnings).

(n20)Footnote 20. See, e.g., Surace v. Caterpillar, Inc., 111 F.3d 1039 (3d Cir. 1997) (an electromechanical engineer was not qualified to testify that a pavement profiler was defective because its back-up alarm was not loud enough to alert crew workers, due to the human factors phenomenon of "habituation" to repetitive sounds in the workplace); Hardin v. Ski Venture, Inc., 50 F.3d 1291 (4th Cir. 1995) (expert on ski accidents was not qualified to testify about the principles of snowmaking). See also Eagleston v. Guido, 41 F.3d 865 (2d Cir. 1994) (testimony that a police department failed to provide sufficient training to officers concerning domestic violence cases was properly excluded; the witness's doctorate in sociology was "a credential that does not in itself describe any specific body of scientific or technical expertise pertinent to this case").

(n21)Footnote 21. See, e.g., United States v. Wilson, 798 F.2d 509 (1st Cir. 1986) (the Trial Court properly prohibited an expert from testifying, where the expert was expected to answer hypothetical questions unsupported by facts); Theriot v. Bay Drilling Corp., 783 F.2d 527 (5th Cir. 1986) (hypothetical questions posed to an expert without personal knowledge must assume a fair, undistorted collection of facts).

(n23)Footnote 23. See generally United States v. Downing, 753 F.2d 1224 (3d Cir. 1985) (rejecting Frye on policy grounds and collecting authorities).

(n24)Footnote 24. See, e.g., Frymire-Brinati v. KPMG Peat Marwick, 2 F.3d 183 (7th Cir. 1993) (an expert testified to the value of properties by using a "discounted cash flow analysis"; he relied solely on historical cash flows, rather than potential cash flows; after Daubert, this testimony was improperly admitted, because the expert "conceded that he did not employ the methodology that experts in valuation find essential"; the Trial Judge erred in failing to conduct a "preliminary assessment" of methodology before allowing the expert to testify).

(n25)Footnote 25. See, e.g., Cabrera v. Cordis Corp., 134 F.3d 1418 (9th Cir. 1998) (expert testimony properly excluded where expert relied on a testing procedure that could not be replicated, even by the expert, and where the expert could not document how his testing procedure was developed).

(n26)Footnote 26. The Court in Daubert specifically stated that expert testimony should be more strictly scrutinized under Rule 403 than other forms of testimony. See the discussion on this point in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 403, § 403.02[13].

(n27)Footnote 27. In casting doubt on research conducted in anticipation of litigation, the Daubert on remand Court is referring to research on issues of general, as opposed to specific, causation. In a toxic tort case, the plaintiff must show both that the toxic substance causes the harm suffered by the plaintiff (the issue of general causation), and that the toxic substance actually did cause the plaintiff's harm (the issue of specific causation). Thus, even if it can be proved that Bendectin causes limb reduction, a plaintiff loses if his mother did not take Bendectin, or took some other substance that caused the limb reduction, or if a genetic defect caused the limb reduction. Daubert on remand puts a red flag on research into general causation that is conducted in anticipation of litigation. But an expert cannot be expected to conduct research on the cause of a particular plaintiff's injury outside the realm of litigation. It is only when the plaintiff discovers the injury that research into causation would begin, and it is also at that very point that litigation is anticipated. Indeed, every treating doctor who testifies to the plaintiff's injuries can be said to conduct her research in anticipation of litigation.

(n28)Footnote 28. The Court in Daubert did state that the "focus, of course, must be solely on principles and methodology, not on the conclusions they generate." 509 U.S. at 595 . Yet as the Court later recognized, "conclusions and methodology are not entirely distinct from one another." General Elec. Co. v. Joiner, 522 U.S. 136, 146 (1997) . If an expert relies on trusted methods and yet comes to a conclusion clearly at odds with logic or reality, the Trial Judge can exclude the testimony under the assumption that the conclusion was reached by a faulty application of the methods. See, e.g., In re TMI Litig., 193 F.3d 613 (3d Cir. 1999) , amended 199 F.3d 158 (3d Cir. 2000) (an expert who estimated radiation exposure at Three Mile Island employed reliable methods; however, the expert's testimony was properly excluded because his conclusion was that the level of radiation was substantial enough to kill a large number of people, when in fact no fatalities occurred; while the Daubert focus is on methodology, not conclusions, expert testimony can be excluded if the conclusion is so out of line with reality that the methodology must have been improperly applied).

Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 89 F.3d 594 (9th Cir. 1996)* ("When a scientist claims to rely on a method practiced by most scientists, yet presents conclusions that are shared by no other scientist, the district court should be wary that the method has not been faithfully applied.").

Kmart Corp., 233 F.3d 734 (3d Cir. 2000)* (Trial Court erred in not holding a Daubert hearing, where damages expert relied on dubious methodology, and expert's qualifications were minimal: where qualifications are a "close call," this factor weighs in favor of excluding the testimony as unreliable).

Wornick, 264 F.3d 832 (9th Cir. 2001)* ("animal studies are not per se inadmissible and should be subjected to substantive analysis, just like other scientific evidence"; however, "bridging the species gap may require sophisticated scientific technique and analysis (i.e., more than 'straight extrapolation') to produce reliable and relevant results").

(n42)Footnote 42. See, e.g., Hemmings v. Tidyman's Inc., 285 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 2002) (in an employment discrimination case, the plaintiff's statistician sufficiently controlled for confounding factors for expert testimony to be admissible; the expert's regression analysis "accounted for experience and seniority within the company" and "by tracking the employees over time, [the expert] "was able to control outside factors that may have contributed to women originally being placed in lower management positions).

systematically rule out all other possible causes"; the doctor was "clearly more concerned with identifying and treating Delores' condition than he was with identifying the specific substances that caused her condition"; his conclusion on causation was simply an "afterthought" rather than the result of a proper differential diagnosis); In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litig., 35 F.3d 717 (3d Cir. 1994) (District Court erred in excluding the testimony of one doctor insofar as that testimony was based on the doctor's personal examination and review of the medical history of certain plaintiffs, knowledge of PCB exposure in the area at issue, and some consideration of possible alternative causes; however, where the doctor was unable to explain away any alternative causes, the District Court properly excluded the doctor's testimony).

However, "[a] medical expert's causation conclusion should not be excluded because he or she has failed to rule out every possible alternative cause of a plaintiff's illness." Heller, 167 F.3d at 156 . The alternative causes suggested by a defendant "affect the weight that the jury should give the expert's testimony and not the admissibility of that testimony," id. at 157 , unless the expert can offer "no explanation for why she has concluded [an alternative cause offered by the opposing party] was not the sole cause," id. at 156 . See also Kannankeril, 128 F.3d at 808 (explaining that "[i]n attacking the differential diagnosis performed by the plaintiff's expert, the defendant may point to a plausible cause of the plaintiff's illness other than the defendant's actions" and "[i]t then becomes necessary for the plaintiff's experts to offer a good explanation as to why his or her conclusion remains reliable"); In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litig., 35 F.3d at 764-65 (recognizing that failure to account for all possible causes does not render expert opinion based on differential diagnosis inadmissible; only if expert utterly fails to consider alternative causes or fails to explain why the opinion remains sound in light of alternative causes suggested by the opposing party is expert's opinion unreliable for failure to account for all potential causes).

(n49)Footnote 49. See, e.g., Brooks v. Outboard Marine Corp., 234 F.3d 89 (2d Cir. 2000) (the plaintiff's hand was amputated when it was caught in the propeller of an outboard motor; there was no error in the exclusion of the expert's testimony on product design; the expert had never seen the actual boat or motor, had never spoken to the people involved in the accident, was unaware of the dimensions of the boat or the placement of the seats near the motor, and had never attempted to reconstruct the accident or test his theory); Clark v. Takata Corp., 192 F.3d 750 (7th Cir. 1999) (expert's testimony that the plaintiff's injuries were caused by a seat belt failure was properly excluded; the expert's testimony was based only on a visual inspection of the vehicle and the expert's experience; the expert conducted no tests, relied on no studies, and proffered no explanation of his methodology or of how his experienced led to his conclusion: "Where the expert offers nothing more than a 'bottom line' conclusion, he does not assist the trier of fact."); Kirstein v. Parks Corp., 159 F.3d 1065 (7th Cir. 1998) (the plaintiff claimed that a combination of two household products caused him to suffer severe burns when he used them to remove linoleum; the Trial Court properly excluded the plaintiff's expert in industrial and product safety, because the expert "did no testing on these products, either alone or in combination. Neither did he provide studies which employed such testing. In short, Dr. Nelson offered only speculation.").

(n50)Footnote 50. See also Bitler v. A.O. Smith Corp., 400 F.3d 1227 (10th Cir. 2004) (expert opinion as to cause of explosion was properly permitted; the fact that the expert did not test his theory was not dispositive because the reliability of the expert's methods were not in dispute; the Court distinguished this case from one in which "an expert proposes a theory that modifies otherwise well-established knowledge about regularly occurring phenomena, such as the normal ignition temperature of wood," and found in such a case "the importance of testing as a factor in determining reliability to be at its highest."). Compare United States v. Gabaldon, 389 F.3d 1090 (10th Cir. 2004) (in a murder case, it was no error to exclude the testimony of an accident reconstructionist, who concluded that the internal geometry of a car would have made it difficult for the defendant to reach the victim with enough power to inflict the blows that contributed to her death: the expert conceded that his theory could have been tested by placing defendant in the car and taking measurements, but no such testing was done).

See also In re TMI Litig., 199 F.3d 158 (3d Cir. 1999) (no abuse of discretion in excluding an expert who based his opinion on radiation exposure on his own model; the expert's hydraulic model was unreliable because the expert rejected, without explanation, generally accepted computer models that track radiation dispersion, and the expert's own model was untested and subjective).

(n52)Footnote 52. See, e.g., Holbrook v. Lykes Bros. S.S. Co., 80 F.3d 777 (3d Cir. 1996) (testimony from defense experts that radiation caused the plaintiff's mesothelioma was properly admitted; one expert was a pathologist and the other was a specialist in occupational lung disease; both relied on medical literature, their knowledge of mesothelioma and its causes, animal studies, and the plaintiff's medical history: "As required by Daubert, their procedures for examining the facts presented to them and their own research methodologies were based on the methods of science and did not reveal opinion based merely on their own subjective beliefs."); Hose v. Chicago Northwestern Transp. Co., 70 F.3d 968 (8th Cir. 1995) (the plaintiff claimed that he contracted manganese encephalopathy while at the defendant's worksite; the plaintiff's doctor conducted a "PET" scan of the plaintiff's brain, and used this to exclude alternative sources of the plaintiff's condition, such as Alzheimer's disease; he concluded that the PET scan result was consistent with manganese encephalopathy; this testimony was properly admitted under Daubert: "In determining the cause of a person's injuries, it is relevant that other possible sources of his injuries, argued for by the defense counsel, have been ruled out by his treating physicians. Indeed, ruling out alternative explanations for injuries is a valid medical method."). Importantly, the Court in Hose noted that "the fact that Hose's treating physician ordered the PET scan prior to the initiation of litigation is another important indication that this technique is scientifically valid."

(n53)Footnote 53. Rosen v. Ciba-Geigy Corp., 78 F.3d 316 (7th Cir. 1996) (holding expert testimony properly excluded where the expert offered "neither a theoretical reason to believe that wearing a nicotine patch for three days ... could precipitate a heart attack, or any experimental, statistical or other scientific data from which such a causal relation might be inferred or which might be used to test a hypothesis founded on such a theory"). See also Wessmann v. Gittens, 160 F.3d 790 (1st Cir. 1998) (expert's conclusions on school segregation should have been rejected because the expert conceded that he had not brought the same scientific methodology and intellectual rigor to his analysis as he would in his out-of-court-research); McMahon v. Bunn-O-Matic, Corp., 150 F.3d 651 (7th Cir. 1998) (expert's unsupported conclusion was properly excluded: "No engineer would put such an unsupported conclusion in a scholarly article. [The expert] would not accept it in a submission to the Journal of Biomechanical Engineering, which he edits;

we doubt that he would accept it from a student in a term paper. Why, then, should courts pay it any heed?").

(n54)Footnote 54. See also Jahn v. Equine Services, PSC, 233 F.3d 382 (6th Cir. 2000) (testimony could not be excluded under Daubert simply because the expert was not absolutely certain of his results: "Daubert and Rule 702 require only that the expert testimony be derived from inferences based on a scientific method and that those inferences be derived from the facts of the case at hand, not that they know answers to all the questions a case presents -- even to the most fundamental questions.").

(n55)Footnote 55. See also Watkins v. Telsmith, Inc., 121 F.3d 984, 991 (5th Cir. 1997) ("Whether the expert would opine on economic valuation, advertising psychology, or engineering, application of the Daubert factors is germane to evaluating whether the expert is a hired gun or a person whose opinion in the courtroom will withstand the same scrutiny that it would among his professional peers.").

(n56)Footnote 56. In this regard, the opinion in Frymire-Brinati v. KPMG Peat Marwick, 2 F.3d 183 (7th Cir. 1993) , is instructive. In this action for securities fraud, the plaintiff's expert, an accountant, was allowed to testify that a Peat Marwick audit had improperly certified that property interests had a certain value when in fact they were worth much less. To reach this conclusion, the accountant used a discounted cash flow analysis, by which he assessed value solely on the basis of net, rather than potential, cash flow. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held that the Trial Court abused its discretion in admitting the expert's valuation, because the expert's methodology was faulty: by failing to consider potential cash flow, the expert's methodology would lead to the conclusion that "raw land is worthless and that a large office building in the final stages of construction also has no value even though it is fully leased out and could be sold for a hundred million dollars." The Seventh Circuit held that the expert's testimony lacked validity under Daubert. It was patently inconsistent with well-accepted accounting principles, and it was illogical to boot. The accountant would not have lasted long in his profession if he employed such a goofy methodology for clients outside the courtroom.

(n65)Footnote 65. See, e.g., Westcott v. Crinklaw, 68 F.3d 1073 (8th Cir. 1995) (in an excessive force case, the police officer called an expert witness who testified that the officer was suffering from post-traumatic stress syndrome when he made the statements, and that this syndrome may cause a person to make inaccurate and unreliable statements; admission of the expert's testimony was an abuse of discretion, because it directly addressed the credibility of the officer as a witness, and usurped the function of the jury; since the case turned on the accuracy of the officer's testimony, this improper bolstering was reversible error); United States v. Beasley, 72 F.3d 1518 (11th Cir. 1996) (finding no error in excluding a defense psychiatric expert who would have testified that a former cult member -- and prosecution witness -- was a psychopath with no conception of the truth: "[e]xpert medical testimony concerning the truthfulness or credibility of a witness is generally inadmissible because it invades the jury's province to make credibility assessments"). Compare United States v. Tsinnijinnie, 91 F.3d 1285 (9th Cir. 1996) (in a child sex prosecution, there was no error when an expert on child sex abuse was permitted to testify about the timing of reports of sexual abuse by children: "The expert did not bolster the credibility of the victim. The expert testimony was offered only to explain why children may be intimidated by physical abuse and deterred from complaining against the abuser, sometimes for long periods of time. The testimony was not offered to prove that the defendant had physically abused the child, but to explain how, if such conduct occurs, it may affect children.").

[1] Accident Reconstruction

Habecker v. Clark Equip. Co., 36 F.3d 278 (3d Cir. 1994) : The Court remanded a product liability action for wrongful death that was brought after the decedent was crushed by a forklift which fell from a ramp, but held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony from the plaintiff's expert, who had attempted to simulate the accident. The expert's testimony did not "fit" with the facts of the case, as is required by Daubert, because the conditions of the simulation were far different from those existing at the time of the accident. Specifically, there was no attempt to replicate the velocity or the rearward movement of the forklift, the height of the fork was disregarded, and there was no operator in the forklift nor cargo on the fork during the purported simulation.

Guillory v. Domtar Indus. Inc., 95 F.3d 1320 (5th Cir. 1996) : The plaintiff was severely injured when a fork fell off a forklift and hit him on the head. The Court found no error in exclusion under Daubert of the defendant's expert, a mechanical engineer and specialist in accident reconstruction, because the expert would have testified on the basis of forklift models and exhibits that were not sufficiently similar to the forklift that caused the accident. The Trial Judge's gatekeeping role is to avoid "pure speculation": "Expert evidence based on a fictitious set of facts is just as unreliable as evidence based upon no research at all." See also Barnes v. General Motors Corp., 547 F.2d 275 (5th Cir. 1977) (holding it was error to allow the plaintiff's expert to testify about an experiment he conducted on another automobile under significantly different circumstances from those admittedly existing at the time of the accident at issue).

Clay v. Ford Motor Co., 215 F.3d 663 (6th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the estates of passengers in a Ford Bronco II who were killed in a rollover accident. The plaintiffs' expert had taught for 20 years in the fields of mechanical engineering, machine design, dynamics, engineering mechanics, and stress analysis; his consulting work involved accident reconstruction. Although he had never worked in the automobile industry, never previously tested a Bronco II, and had never published an article on vehicle handling and stability, the Court held that the expert's experience in analyzing "dynamics" was sufficient to support his opinion that the accident was caused by design defects in the Bronco II. The Court noted that the expert had reviewed the police accident report, some depositions, and statements and photographs, and that the defendant's expert had reviewed similar material. Although it was not disqualifying that the plaintiff's expert did not visit the accident site until the day before he testified or that the expert had not tested his theories, this was "a close case," within the Trial Judge's discretion. The dissenting Judge disagreed that the case was even close and concluded that the Trial Judge had abdicated his gatekeeping function. In Greenwell v. Boatwright, 184 F.3d 492 (6th Cir. 1999) , a personal injury action arising from a collision between two trucks, the defendant's accident reconstruction expert testified that, on the basis of his analysis, eyewitness testimony about the accident was inaccurate. The Court held that the testimony regarding the credibility of eyewitness testimony was improper because it was beyond the scope of the witness' expertise, but its admission was harmless error. The Court found no error when the expert was permitted to express an opinion based on the physical evidence even though the factual basis was contradicted by some of the eyewitness testimony. The expert proffered a legitimate explanation for disregarding the eyewitness testimony, and because the factual underpinnings of his testimony were sound, his opinions were admissible. One Judge dissented. Although it reversed a plaintiffs' judgment in Bauman v. Volkswagenwerk A.G. n1 on another ground, the Court approved the introduction of expert testimony based on simulated reproductions of an accident and observed that in some cases expert testimony may be the only way to establish the defectiveness of a product.

Smith v. BMW No. Am., Inc., 308 F.3d 913 (8th Cir. 2002) : In an action alleging that failure of her car's air bag properly to deploy caused her severe injuries in an accident, the plaintiff proffered an accident reconstructionist to testify that the car's velocity was great enough that a properly functioning air bag would have deployed upon impact. The Trial Judge excluded the testimony on the ground that information that the witness put into a crash analysis program was fundamentally flawed, particularly his estimates of the principal direction of force and his displacement measurements, so the results were inherently unreliable. The Court found that the witness' estimate of the principal direction of force was based on all information obtainable and there was no basis for concluding that the estimate was unreliable. The Court concurred that the expert's failure to account for "free space" or "air gaps" in his frontal displacement measurements rendered his estimate unreliable, justifying exclusion of his conclusions. However, corrections provided by the defendant's accident reconstructionist meant that there was evidence before the Judge creating a genuine issue of material fact, so it was error to grant the defendant's summary judgment motion. In Miles v. General Motors Corp., 262 F.3d 720 (8th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed a judgment for a truck manufacturer sued by a motorcyclist who was injured in a collision with a truck, and upheld the admission of testimony by an engineer specializing in biomechanics and accident reconstruction. Although the plaintiff complained that, at the time of his deposition, the expert had not examined the x-rays of the plaintiff's leg, the motorcycle, the truck, or the accident scene, the Court noted that the expert had examined the police report, photographs of the scene, the plaintiff's medical records including reports that interpreted his x-rays, witness statements and depositions, and medical literature. Thus, the plaintiff's criticisms were a proper subject for cross-examination rather than a reason to exclude the testimony.

United States v. Gabaldon, 389 F.3d 1090 (10th Cir. 2004) : In the defendant's trial for murder and related offenses, the government contended that the defendant was sitting in the front passenger seat of his car, the victim was sitting behind the driver, and the defendant hit the victim with such force as to break bones in her face. The defendant proffered an accident reconstructionist, who would have testified that the internal geometry of the car would have made it difficult for the defendant to reach the victim with enough power to inflict the blows that contributed to her death. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the expert's testimony, as it lacked reliability under Daubert. The expert's opinion about the defendant's effective reach and ability to land forceful blows while holding on to the front seat back was "entirely conclusory and unsupported by any scientific evidence or reasoning." In Robinson v. Missouri Pac. R.R., 16 F.3d 1083 (10th Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs in a wrongful death action arising out of a train's collision with a car, holding it was a close question, but no abuse of discretion, to admit a video animation illustrating the plaintiff's expert's theory about how the collision had occurred. The Court was bothered that the video showed the car angling toward the approach of the train and rotating at impact and spinning off the tracks, since it was also possible that the train impaled the car on its front. The Court noted that although the physical phenomena of crash movements may be explained on scientific principles, "an argument can be made that it is outside scientific knowledge to opine in cases such as this one that a car struck at an angle will necessarily leave the railroad tracks on impact." In Jackson v. Fletcher, n2 the Court reversed a defendant's judgment in a case arising out of an auto-truck collision on the ground it was error to admit testimony based upon experiments conducted by the defendants' experts when the circumstances of the experiments were different from those of the accident.

[2] Accountants

Fund of Funds, Ltd. v. Arthur Andersen & Co., 545 F. Supp. 1314 (S.D.N.Y. 1982) : Ruling on posttrial motions in a securities fraud case brought by mutual funds against an accounting firm, the Court upheld the admission of expert testimony concerning standard accounting practices. The experts were experienced senior accounting partners who were able to tell the jury about industry-wide procedural guidelines.

Frymire-Brinati v. KPMG Peat Marwick, 2 F.3d 183 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed a judgment for investors who sued an accounting firm, holding, inter alia, that it was error to permit an accountant, who admitted that he did not employ the methodology that experts in the field find essential, to testify that the defendant violated various accounting standards.

Club Car, Inc. v. Club Car (Quebec) Import, Inc., 362 F.3d 775 (11th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a judgment for a manufacturer who sued a distributor for payments owed for goods delivered prior to the manufacturer's terminating the distribution arrangement, the Court upheld a ruling striking the testimony of the defendant's accounting expert who testified in support of counterclaims as to the defendant's damages. The expert relied upon gross sales and profit figures and failed to consider expenses normally incurred in generating income and profits. The Court found that the Judge reasonably concluded that the lost profit calculation was based on flawed methodology that was not accepted in the accounting community. In an antitrust action against five chemical companies alleging that the defendants engaged in a conspiracy to fix prices for repackaged chlorine, City of Tuscaloosa v. Harcros Chems., Inc., 158 F.3d 548, 1998-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72307 (11th Cir. 1998) , the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude testimony of an accountant proffered by the plaintiffs. The accountant properly calculated, compiled, and explained the costs borne and profits obtained by the defendants during the period of the alleged conspiracy; this information would assist the trier of fact to determine whether the defendants acted in a consciously parallel fashion. The accountant properly considered all pertinent costs, including material costs, labor costs, and insurance costs. While the accountant was not qualified to render opinions based on economic theory, the witness never did so in this case.

[3] Age

United States v. Katz, 178 F.3d 368 (5th Cir. 1999) : The defendant, charged with receiving child pornography, filed a motion to exclude all expert witness testimony purporting to determine the age of persons portrayed in the videotapes and computer files at issue on the basis of applying the "Tanner Scale" (which is a recognized scientific test for determining the age of postpubescent Caucasian females according to pubic hair and breast development). On interlocutory appeal, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding several of the computer images at issue, where the government witness' expertise was linked to the Tanner Scale method and he testified that the method was not scientifically useful in determining the age of the models depicted because the range of ages for each stage was too broad and extended beyond the critical age of 18.

[4] Animal Studies

Metabolife Int'l, Inc. v. Wornick, 264 F.3d 832 (9th Cir. 2001) : Metabolife, a manufacturer of herbal diet pills, brought a defamation action against a television station and a news reporter in response to the defendants' broadcast report that Metabolife was unsafe. The Trial Judge excluded opinions, which relied on animal studies conducted in Asia, by a Metabolife expert that the product was safe, on the grounds that animal studies are always inadmissible "due to the uncertainties in extrapolating from effects on mice and rats to humans," and the studies "took place outside the United States government's regulatory supervision." The Court reversed dismissal of the plaintiff's claims, holding that the Judge's reasons for rejecting the expert testimony were insufficient under Daubert. The Court held that "animal studies are not per se inadmissible and should be subjected to substantive analysis, just like other scientific evidence" and that in some circumstances animal studies can "provide useful data about human health." A remand was required for a more particularized gatekeeper assessment of the expert's testimony based on animal studies.

[5] Antitrust Violations

SMS Sys. Maint. Servs., Inc. v. Digital Equip. Corp., 188 F.3d 11, 1999-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72617 (1st Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in an antitrust action based on alleged monopolization of the market for computer maintenance and repair. A report by the plaintiff's expert that concluded DEC had a much greater share of the market than it should enjoy given low customer satisfaction did not provide evidence of DEC's monopoly power, since the opinions were based on highly suspect data and methodology. The expert had no customer satisfaction survey or cited sources to support his conclusions about DEC's customer satisfaction ratings, and there was no indication or consideration in his report of the validity of internal DEC documents, the interpretation of which provided the basis of his opinion.

Rossi v. Standard Roofing, Inc., 156 F.3d 452, 1998-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72274 (3d Cir. 1998) : In an antitrust action involving an alleged group boycott, the Court, reversing a summary judgment for some defendants and affirming as to others, held that an expert report was not too speculative to be admitted. Although the expert relied upon sales figures that the plaintiff achieved while working for a major national chain, the Court found that the plaintiff had a long track record and evidence that customers would patronize him regardless of his employer and that the industry had a strong "local accent." The expert made certain assumptions regarding sales and costs based upon the plaintiff's experience which the Court found were not too speculative or unreasonable to support an opinion, relying in part on the relaxed standard for proving damages of Bigelow v. RKO Radio Pictures. n3 In Petruzzi's IGA Supermarkets, Inc. v. Darling-Delaware Co., 998 F.2d 1224, 1993-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P70293 (3d Cir. 1993) , the Court reversed a summary judgment in an antitrust case brought by a supermarket against rendering companies for restraint of trade. The plaintiffs offered economic testimony by experts who examined the pricing pattern of the defendants and concluded that there was no logical reason to support the disparities found, but the testimony was excluded at trial under Rule 403. The Court reasoned that the multiple regression analysis the experts used was reliable, their qualifications were unchallenged, and "if expert testimony survives the rigors of Rules 702 and 703, then Rule 403 becomes an unlikely basis for exclusion, especially in the pretrial setting." Cross-examination would tend to ensure that jurors would not be misled by the expert testimony.

TFWS, Inc. v. Schaefer, 325 F.3d 234, 2003-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P73991 (4th Cir. 2003) : A liquor retailer, pursuing an antitrust challenge to Maryland's statutory pricing scheme, argued that expert testimony suggesting that alcohol prices in the state are generally higher than in other states should not have been admitted. Although it vacated summary judgment for the defendant, the Court concluded that the argument really did not go to the reliability of the expert's work, which involved American Chamber of Commerce pricing data for metropolitan areas, a calculation of average prices, and cost of living adjustments. Rather, the argument went to the weight to be given the evidence, and there was no abuse of discretion in its admission.

In re Brand Name Prescription Drugs Antitrust Litig., 186 F.3d 781, 1999-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72576 (7th Cir. 1999) : The Court found it was error (but harmless) to exclude testimony from an economist on the ground that he had not studied the prescription drug industry in depth and had formulated his opinion after working on the case for only 40 hours. In the Court's view, the opinion that there is price discrimination in the prescription drug industry is one that such a distinguished economist should have been able to reach in even less time. In Khan v. State Oil Co., 93 F.3d 1358, 1996-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P71546 (7th Cir. 1996) , the Court reversed summary judgment for the defendant in an antitrust case alleging vertical maximum price-fixing, holding it was error to exclude testimony from an economist for the plaintiff, where the expert's study satisfied professional norms for economists.

Craftsmen Limousine, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 363 F.3d 761 (8th Cir. 2004) : The Court reversed a damage award in a Sherman Act suit by a limousine manufacturer against competitors and a vehicle manufacturer. It held that the defendants' conduct was not per se unreasonable and that the plaintiff's expert should have considered factors other than the defendants' conduct in a rule of reason analysis, rather than assuming the plaintiff's lost growth was a result of the defendants' conspiracy. The Court noted in a footnote that it did not foreclose the possibility that the plaintiff's expert could testify in a new trial if he formulated "a new opinion using the proper standard under a rule of reason analysis." In Concord Board Corp. v. Brunswick Corp., 207 F.3d 1039, 2000-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72836 (8th Cir. 2000) , the Court reversed a judgment for boat builders who brought an antitrust action against a stern drive engine manufacturer. The plaintiffs relied primarily on a Stanford University economics professor, who testified that the defendant had monopoly power in the stern drive market that enabled it to use its market share discount program to impose a "tax" on boat builders and dealers who chose to buy their engines from other manufacturers. The Court held it was error to admit the testimony, because it did not adequately "fit" the facts of the case. The expert's economic model "was not grounded in the economic reality" of the market and it "also failed to account for market events that both sides agreed were not related to any anticompetitive conduct." In Bolt v. Halifax Hosp. Med. Center, n4 the Court, reversing a judgment against a doctor who alleged that the revocation of his medical staff privileges was a violation of the antitrust laws, found it was error to exclude expert testimony by a physician who had examined two incidents upon which the hospitals relied in revoking the privileges. The expert had concluded that no reasonable medical practitioner would have reached the conclusions reached by the investigators and that the hospitals that relied upon their findings. The Court reasoned that evidence that common grounds for revocation were pretextual and that other grounds were baseless might be probative of a conspiracy. It would also have been an abuse of discretion to exclude the expert testimony under Rule 403, since the testimony was probative and no other evidence was reasonably available to the plaintiff.

Rebel Oil Co. v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 146 F.3d 1088, 1998-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72187 (9th Cir. 1998) : Gasoline retailers alleged that the defendant oil company had engaged in predatory pricing. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held there was no inconsistency between a ruling that admitted testimony by the plaintiffs' expert witness and the summary judgment. The finding under Daubert that the expert's methodology was sound did not mean that his conclusions were correct and legally sufficient to create a question of material fact.

Lantec, Inc. v. Novell, Inc., 306 F.3d 1003, 2002-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P73807 (10th Cir. 2002) : Affirming judgment as a matter of law granted for the defendant in an antitrust action between two software companies, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when testimony by the plaintiffs' expert regarding the relevant market was excluded because he used unreliable data, did not understand computers or the computer market, did not use surveys revealing consumer preferences although he testified that the relevant market was determined by consumer purchasing patterns, did not calculate the cross-elasticity of demand to determine which products were substitutes, and did not address changes in the computer market.

Williamson Oil Co. v. Philip Morris USA, 346 F.3d 1287, 2003-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P74158 (11th Cir. 2003) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendant cigarette manufacturers in an antitrust action by wholesalers, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of opinions by the plaintiffs' expert witness that the defendants engaged in an illegal price fixing conspiracy. The expert's opinions were of no assistance because he included conscious parallelism within his definition of collusion, and thus did not differentiate between legal and illegal pricing behavior. In an antitrust action against five chemical companies alleging that the defendants engaged in a conspiracy to fix prices for repackaged chlorine, City of Tuscaloosa v. Harcros Chems., Inc., 158 F.3d 548, 1998-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72307 (11th Cir. 1998) , the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude testimony of an accountant proffered by the plaintiffs. The accountant properly calculated, compiled, and explained the costs borne and profits obtained by the defendants during the period of the alleged conspiracy, and properly considered all pertinent costs; this information would assist the trier of fact to determine whether the defendants acted in a consciously parallel fashion. While the accountant was not qualified to render opinions based on economic theory, he never did so in this case. The Court also found an abuse of discretion when the Judge excluded the entire testimony of the statistician proffered by the plaintiffs because it failed to show a successful conspiracy. That was a "conflation of admissibility issues with issues regarding the sufficiency of the plaintiffs' evidence"; the expert was not required to prove the plaintiffs' case by himself. The Court found that the expert utilized well-established and reliable methodologies in the preparation of most of his statistics. However, there was no error in excluding the statistician's testimony insofar as he characterized certain bids as "signals" to coconspirators, and insofar as he testified about applicable legal standards; testimony on these subjects was outside the witness' expertise.

[6] Appellate Review

General Elec. Co. v. Joiner, 522 U.S. 136 (1997) : In a suit alleging that the plaintiff contracted cancer from exposure to PCBs, the Trial Judge excluded the plaintiff's expert's causation testimony under Daubert, and granted summary judgment to the defendants because, in the absence of expert testimony, the plaintiff presented no triable issue of fact. The Court of Appeals reversed, n5 holding that the expert's testimony was sufficiently reliable under Daubert. That Court applied a "hard look" standard of review to the District Court's Daubert rulings -- a standard somewhere between abuse of discretion and de novo review. The Supreme Court reversed and reinstated the grant of summary judgment. It held that a Trial Judge's rulings under Daubert are to be reviewed pursuant to the abuse of discretion standard traditionally applied to evidentiary rulings. The Court rejected any distinction between rulings admitting and excluding expert evidence, and likewise rejected a more searching standard of review for evidentiary rulings that are "outcome-determinative."

United States v. Brown, 415 F.3d 1257 (11th Cir. 2005) : The principal issue in the bench trial of the defendants for distribution of a controlled substance analogue was whether the 1,4-butanediol they possessed had a chemical structure "substantially similar" to gamma hydroxybutyric acid (GHB), a controlled substance. The government offered testimony from a DEA forensic drug chemist and a biochemist with the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences; their testimony was admitted. The defense offered a freelance consultant in the field of chemistry who held a Ph.D. in plant pathology; the Judge heard this witness' testimony without ruling on his qualifications, but did not consider the testimony as reliable expert opinion in making findings of fact. Affirming, the Court first provided an extensive explanation of the extremely deferential review ("the heavy thumb -- really a thumb and a finger or two -- that is put on the district court's side of the scale") given to Daubert rulings. It then concluded there was no abuse of discretion in the finding that the opinion testimony of the prosecution experts satisfied the reliability standards. The Court also found no abuse of discretion when the Judge declined to qualify the defendants' witness as an expert, given his academic work and professional experience related more to plant pathology and botany than to chemistry. Even if the witness were qualified, the Judge's conclusion that his method was unreliable and unreliably applied was not error. In any event, the Judge considered the witness' testimony as lay opinion, but decided to give it little weight -- a decision entitled to even greater deference on appeal.

[7] Application of Principles and Methods to the Facts of the Case

Masters v. Hesston Corp., 291 F.3d 985 (7th Cir. 2002) : In a suit by a farmer injured by an allegedly defective hay baler, the Court affirmed the exclusion of the plaintiff's expert testimony and the grant of summary judgment to the manufacturer. The Court found no problem with the expert's statement of the relevant standards of care, which were found in guidelines promulgated by the American Society of Agricultural Engineers and were grounded in basic principles of engineering. However, the expert, who explained that the applicable standard was to eliminate feed rolls "where possible" and "without unduly restricting the function of the machine," stated that it was a violation of basic engineering principles not to have eliminated the feed rolls on the baler at issue. That was an improper application of the standard, since he gave no indication how eliminating the feed rolls would not have unduly restricted the baler's function.

[8] Attorneys as Witnesses

Universal Athletic Sales Co. v. American Gym, Rec. & Athletic Equip. Corp., 546 F.2d 530 (3d Cir. 1976) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion -- although it frowned on the practice and found error in giving controlling weight to the testimony -- when an associate in the law firm representing several defendants was permitted to testify as an expert witness in this patent infringement action. The Court commented that "[i]t would be appropriate to consider incorporating with the body of evidentiary rules the current disciplinary norm proscribing the testimony of a lawyer for his client."

Primrose Oper. Co. v. National Am. Ins. Co., 382 F.3d 546 (5th Cir. 2004) : In an action by oil and gas operators who sued their commercial liability insurer for breach of its duty to defend in a landowner's action for pollution, the Court upheld the admission of testimony by a Texas attorney, who had been involved in the pollution suit, as to the reasonableness of the attorneys' fees charged the plaintiffs by two law firms. The witness was certified by the Texas Board of Legal Specialization in the oil and gas industry; he reviewed complete copies of all of the bills of the firms; and he was aware of the hourly rates and the total hours. The fact that the witness did not compare the bills with that of a third law firm went to the weight, not the admissibility, of the witness' testimony.

First Union Nat'l Bank v. Benham, 423 F.3d 855 (8th Cir. 2005) : In a legal malpractice action against a mergers and acquisitions attorney and his firm for failing to assert a timely claim for valuation of stock acquired in a merger, the Judge excluded expert testimony on the standard of practice of an Arkansas attorney in such matters, on the ground that the witness' conclusions were based on his own experience and not that of other lawyers. Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court found that exclusion was an abuse of discretion, given that the witness had been licensed as an attorney in Arkansas for over 36 years and had practiced extensively in the M&A area; it noted that Rule 702 permits opinion testimony based on specialized knowledge gained by "experience."

[9] Availiability of Rebuttal Expert

United States v. Kampiles, 609 F.2d 1233 (7th Cir. 1979) : The Court upheld the government's calling a counterintelligence officer to testify on Soviet intelligence recruiting practices, even though the defendant could not obtain a rebuttal expert.

[10] Ballistics Evidence

United States v. Hicks, 389 F.3d 514 (5th Cir. 2004) : At the defendant's trial for a firearms violation, the government introduced evidence that an officer was shot to death in a high speed chase, the defendant was arrested for this crime, a search of his house turned up a.30-.30 rifle, and casings from such a rifle were found at the scene of the shooting. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a ballistics expert was permitted to testify that the casings found at the scene were fired from the rifle found at the defendant's house. The Court noted that: the matching of shell casings to the weapons that fired them has been a recognized method for decades; standards for firearms comparison testing exist and the expert followed them in this case; there is authoritative literature about firearms comparison testing that the expert relied on; and the expert testified that the error rate of firearms comparison testing is zero or near zero.

[11] Bias of Expert Witness

Marshall v. Perez Arzuaga, 828 F.2d 845 (1st Cir. 1987) : Affirming a judgment for a plaintiff who sued a rental car company and the driver of its car, the Court held that an expert was not disqualified as a "partisan witness." It reasoned that "[e]ven assuming, without deciding, that partiality might disqualify an expert witness," the fact that the expert repeatedly spoke to the plaintiff's counsel about the case and discussed various theories of causation was "part of the normal communications that must take place between a lawyer and the expert he has hired to explain the technical aspects of the case."

Gideon v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 761 F.2d 1129 (5th Cir. 1985) : In an action by a plaintiff who sued after contracting asbestosis, the Court sustained judgments against some, but not all asbestos manufacturers, finding that a medical witness was properly permitted to testify even though he had seen more than 600 asbestosis patients, almost all of whom had been referred by the plaintiff's lawyers.

United States v. Chang, 207 F.3d 1169 (9th Cir. 2000) : Affirming convictions for uttering and possessing a counterfeit foreign obligation, a Japanese certificate, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to exclude the testimony of an assistant professor of clinical marketing, who would have testified that the certificate was genuine, on the ground that he "was not picked as an initially neutral party," since he had assisted the defendant in his efforts to authenticate the certificate prior to trial. The Trial Judge had essentially reasoned that the expert was biased, but an expert's bias goes to only weight, not to admissibility.

[12] Business Custom; Industry Practice

Linkstrom v. Golden T. Farms, 883 F.2d 269 (3d Cir. 1989) : In this wrongful death action for a young migrant worker killed in a farm accident, the Trial Court abused its discretion in excluding testimony by the plaintiff's farm safety expert regarding safety practices a reasonable farmer would follow. The testimony would have helped jurors without farm experience establish the standard of reasonable care for persons in the defendant's position.

United States v. Tucker, 345 F.3d 320 (5th Cir. 2003) : In a securities and mail fraud case, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to refuse to permit defense expert testimony regarding the meaning of the term "invest in automobile loans" in private placement memoranda. The testimony would have refuted the government's contention that an investment meant only the purchase of the principal amount of the loans. The expert should have been permitted "to provide the jury with the usage of the word 'invest' within the securities industry."

First Tennessee Bank N.A. v. Barreto, 268 F.3d 319 (6th Cir. 2001) : Following a bench trial, the Trial Judge entered judgment for the Small Business Administration in a suit by a lender to compel the SBA to fulfill its alleged contractual obligation to purchase a defaulted loan. The Court found no error in the admission of a banking expert to testify as to whether the lender bank had followed prudent banking practices with respect to servicing the loans. The expert began his banking career in 1950 and had substantial experience supervising letter of credit departments. The Court noted that the testimony was both relevant and sufficiently reliable, and that "to the extent that Iorlano [the expert] may have lacked familiarity with some aspects of banking relationships, the district court correctly reasoned that such unfamiliarity merely affected the weight and credibility of his testimony, not its admissibility." Rejecting the lender's argument that the testimony should have been excluded because it did not satisfy the Daubert factors, the Court noted that "the four specific factors utilized in Daubert may be of limited utility in the context of non-scientific expert testimony." In McGowan v. Cooper Indus., n6 the Court reversed a judgment for the manufacturer of an air compressor that exploded and injured the plaintiffs, holding it was error to bar an expert witness from testifying as to industry custom with respect to a manufacturer's factory representatives.

First Union Nat'l Bank v. Benham, 423 F.3d 855 (8th Cir. 2005) : In a legal malpractice action against a mergers and acquisitions attorney and his firm for failing to assert a timely claim for valuation of stock acquired in a merger, the Judge excluded expert testimony on the standard of practice of an Arkansas attorney in such matters, on the ground that the witness' conclusions were based on his own experience and not that of other lawyers. Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court found that exclusion was an abuse of discretion, given that the witness had been licensed as an attorney in Arkansas for over 36 years and had practiced extensively in the M&A area; it noted that Rule 702 permits opinion testimony based on specialized knowledge gained by "experience." In FDIC v. First Interstate Bank of Des Moines, N.A., n7 the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff that the defendant bank aided and abetted a stockbroker in defrauding another bank. It held that the plaintiff's expert witness was properly permitted to testify as to the way in which experienced bank personnel would view the stockbroker's transactions. The defendant argued that the testimony was impermissible opinion regarding the significance of events to a party charged with knowledge, but the Court concluded it would assist the jurors' understanding of a bank's investment officers' function.

Jinro America Inc. v. Secure Investments, Inc., 266 F.3d 993 (9th Cir. 2001) : In a breach of contract and fraud action by a South Korean company, the Court reversed summary judgment granted for the defendants after a jury, in the first stage of a bifurcated trial, found for the defendants on their claim that the contract at issue was a sham contract designed to cover up a high-risk investments scheme that circumvented South Korea's currency regulations. The Court held that the trial "was prejudicially infected by ethnically biased, 'xenophobic' expert testimony." The defendants' expert was a former Air Force investigator, who was a private investigator at the time of trial. He had no formal education in business or as a cultural expert, but he claimed to have familiarized himself with Korean business practices as part of his job duties. Although he had not investigated the plaintiff company, he testified about the modus operandi of Korean businessmen to seek to circumvent laws that restrict their money-making ability and to use the United States and California as a safe haven for schemes to evade currency requirements. On cross-examination, he stated that "the prevalence of corruption and fraud in the Korean business community is very great and very extensive." The Court found that the testimony was unreliable given the qualifications and knowledge of the expert and the lack of empirical evidence to support his opinions, and that "it was so tinged with ethnic bias and stereotyping that it should have been excluded under Rule 403's balancing test."

United States v. Fredette, 315 F.3d 1235 (10th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a conviction for mail fraud arising out of a rebate scheme, and held there was no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence from the defendant's marketing expert that would have compared the "breakage rules and requirements" of the defendant's program to other programs. The expert admitted at the Daubert hearing that the defendant's program was unusual and he had never seen a similar one, so applying an industry standard did not work. Thus, the witness' expertise gave him no special insight into the operations of the defendant's program.

[13] Business Judgments

United States v. Kelley, 615 F.2d 378 (5th Cir. 1980) : The Court held that it was proper under either Rule 701 or 702 for bank officers to state that, based on their experience, a loan application could have influenced the decision to grant the loan.

[14] Cause of Accident

[a] Generally

Almonte v. National Union Fire Ins. Co., 787 F.2d 763 (1st Cir. 1986) : Affirming a judgment for an insurer that refused to pay losses from a fire that it claimed was arson, the Court found it was error (waived or harmless) not to have conducted a more extensive preliminary inquiry before admitting testimony by an investigating officer, since the officer was not only an arson expert but also the officer charged with determining who started the fire. "It was, therefore, important for the trial judge to ensure that [the officer] did not stray from explaining why he thought the fire was incendiary in origin to explaining who he thought might have caused the fire." See also Apostol v. United States n8(finding no error in excluding deposition testimony of the plaintiff's air traffic expert, since there was no testimony in the deposition qualifying the witness as an expert).

In re Air Disaster at Lockerbie Scot. on Dec. 21, 1988, 37 F.3d 804 (2d Cir. 1994) : In this action by relatives of passengers killed in an aircraft bombing, the Court affirmed the jury's finding of liability against the airline for willful disregard of safety standards respecting security checks of baggage. The Court (2-1) found no error in excluding the testimony of the airline's experts on terrorism. The experts, who would have explained alternative ways in which the bombing might have occurred, did not base their opinions on record evidence and their testimony was impermissibly speculative. The dissenting Judge argued that the airline should have been permitted to call its own experts in order to attack the plaintiffs' expert evidence. In Martell v. Boardwalk Enters., n9 a personal injury case arising out of a boating accident, the Court found no error in the admission of expert testimony concerning problems with the vessel that the plaintiff was using, despite the defendant's claim that the problems did not relate to what the plaintiff was doing at the time of the accident.

Fedorczyk v. Caribbean Cruise Lines, Ltd., 82 F.3d 69 (3d Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in a passenger's suit for injuries suffered when she slipped in a cruise ship's bath tub. The plaintiff's expert's opinion that inadequate stripping caused her fall was not based on any direct or circumstantial evidence of where in the tub she was standing when she fell, and it was also speculative to infer that she was standing between the strips at the time of the accident. Because the expert's opinion was based on speculation or conjecture, it was properly disregarded.

O'Neill v. Windshire-Copeland Assocs., 372 F.3d 281 (4th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a judgment for defendants in an action to recover for serious personal injuries suffered when the plaintiff fell from a second-story balcony at an apartment complex, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of proposed expert testimony by a biomechanics professor that it was much more likely that the plaintiff fell because of a wind gust than because she accidentally leaned over too far and lost her balance. The Court concluded that "[t]his opinion appears to be based more on supposition than science, especially since Dr. Thompson admitted that the cause of O'Neill's fall was 'not clear.' " In an FELA action, Persinger v. Norfolk & W. Ry., 920 F.2d 1185 (4th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed the grant of a new trial, agreeing there had been error in admitting testimony by a human factors analyst regarding whether the weight the plaintiff had to lift to perform his job was unreasonable, as that is a matter within the common sense and everyday knowledge of the jurors. In Scott v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., n10 the Court found error in the admission of expert testimony as to ergonomics or "human factors" in a slip and fall case, because the expert testified to matters that the jury could have understood without any help. However, the admission of testimony within the common knowledge of jurors

"will almost invariably be harmless," so judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed.

Cook v. American S.S. Co., 53 F.3d 733 (6th Cir. 1995) : In a seaman's action for injuries suffered when the line supporting him in a bosun's chair parted, the Court vacated a judgment for the plaintiff because a witness, who was qualified as an expert in materials testing, had done no testing on the line in question, and his opinion that a localized heat source had caused the line to part was not based on any scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge.

Roback v. V.I.P. Transp. Inc., 90 F.3d 1207 (7th Cir. 1996) : In an action for injuries sustained when a truck rear-ended a car, the defendants offered an engineer who had taken the truck for a 90-mile test drive after the accident and used a computerized data acquisition system that he had developed to gather data on the performance of various systems in the truck, in order to support the defendants' contention that the truck had been malfunctioning at the time of the accident. Reversing a judgment for punitive damages, the Court held it was error to exclude the witness' testimony on the ground it was not sufficiently "scientific" to satisfy Rule 702 and Daubert, since he was merely offering enhanced eyewitness observations, using a device assembled from standard components about which he could have been interrogated and which produced data subject to examination and independent verification. The Court found no error in excluding testimony from a consultant on issues of visual perception of automobile drivers, as any juror who drives would readily understand without expert assistance that a driver who is distracted may not realize until too late the need to slow down for vehicles ahead; the witness' further opinion on how long the truck driver's eyes were likely diverted bordered on speculation. In Kelsay v. Consolidated Rail Corp., n11 a judgment for a railroad in a train-car crash was sustained, as the Court held (2-1) that it was proper for a police officer, who investigated the accident, to opine that it resulted from driver inattention.

Zimmer v. Miller Trucking Co., 743 F.2d 601 (8th Cir. 1984) : The Court found no error in the exclusion of a police officer's opinion as to the cause of an auto accident, where the Trial Judge found that the jurors were as able as the officer to understand whether it was reasonable for a truck to park on the side of the road.

Guidroz-Brualt v. Missouri Pac. R.R., 254 F.3d 825 (9th Cir. 2001) : Plaintiffs injured in a train wreck alleged that the crew was negligent in not stopping the train before it reached a loosened rail that caused the derailment. Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of affidavits from three experts offered by the plaintiffs, which indicated that the track separation should have been visible in time for the crew to avoid the accident. However, there was no factual basis for any assumption that the separation was visible, and there was substantial evidence that the rail had been loosened by saboteurs who had taken significant efforts to hide their work.

Hynes v. Energy West, Inc., 211 F.3d 1193 (10th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a judgment for tenants who sued a gas company for injuries suffered in a gas explosion resulting from a leaking pipeline, the Court upheld a ruling permitting the plaintiff's expert to testify that the defendant had not properly odorified its gas so that a leak would be detectable. The Court emphasized that the expert "has extensive scientific credentials and he was able to articulate a scientific process by which neutralization and oxidation occurs," and "evidence of adherence to a practice within an industry implies a significant degree of reliability." In Robinson v. Missouri Pac. R.R., 16 F.3d 1083 (10th Cir. 1994) , the Court, affirming a judgment for the plaintiffs in a wrongful death action arising out of a train's collision with a car, held it was a close question, but no abuse of discretion, to admit a video animation illustrating the plaintiff's expert's theory about how the collision had occurred. The Court was bothered that the tape showed the car angling toward the approach of the train and rotating at impact and spinning off the tracks, since it was also possible that the train impaled the car on its front.

[b] Cause of Accident -- Product Injuries

Coleman v. Parkline Corp., 844 F.2d 863 (D.C. Cir. 1988) : The Court upheld a judgment for the plaintiff in a suit against a manufacturer whose elevator ceiling collapsed. It approved the admission of testimony of a safety engineer who testified to the dangers involved in the manner in which the defendant tied its ceilings for shipping, the need for warnings, and the feasible alternatives to secure the ceilings. It was unnecessary that the expert have particular experience in loading elevator ceilings.

Brooks v. Outboard Marine Corp., 234 F.3d 89 (2d Cir. 2000) : Affirming a summary judgment for the manufacturer of a motor used on a boat, in an action by the parent of a minor whose hand was amputated by the motor's propeller, the Court upheld the exclusion of the plaintiff's expert testimony. The expert had never seen the actual boat or motor, had never spoken to the boys involved in the accident, was unaware of the dimensions of the boat or the placement of the seats near the motor, and had never attempted to reconstruct the accident or to test his theory. The Court rejected the argument that the defendant was required to present its own expert in rebuttal in order to mount a Daubert challenge.

Stecyk v. Bell Helicopter Textron, Inc., 295 F.3d 408 (3d Cir. 2002) : The plaintiffs, suing for wrongful death in a helicopter crash, alleged that a shaft seal was installed backwards and leaked flammable fluid, which was ingested by an engine as the craft was attempting to land. To prove that the flammable fluid had another source, an expert for the defendant manufacturer testified that it was hydraulic fluid. The plaintiffs objected that the testimony lacked an adequate factual basis because there was insufficient evidence of the presence of hydraulic fluid inside the engine. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court found a sufficient factual foundation in evidence that hydraulic fluid was found in places where it should not have been, including outside the engine and near the engine. Once the defendant met the foundational requirements for admissibility, it was up to the plaintiffs to highlight the weaknesses in the expert's opinion through cross-examination. In Roe v. Deere & Co., n12 the Court held that expert testimony should have been admitted to prove that a driver's injuries would have been lessened when a tractor rolled over if it had been equipped with a safety device. In Breidor v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., n13 the Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action, holding it was an abuse of discretion to prohibit the plaintiffs' expert from giving an opinion as to the cause of a refrigerator fire. The expert had made a thorough investigation of the refrigerator and had eliminated all possible causes except for a malfunction in the thermometer.

Brown v. Parker-Hannifin Corp., 919 F.2d 308 (5th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a directed verdict for the defendant in a product liability action, holding that testimony by the plaintiff's expert was properly excluded because the theories he offered were no better to explain the accident than others equally likely. Without some basis to establish that one of his theories identified the most likely cause of the failure on this occasion, his testimony amounted only to speculation and was of no assistance to the jury. In Shipp v. General Motors Corp., n14 the Court affirmed a judgment against the defendant in an action by the owner-driver who claimed that her injuries in a rollover accident were caused by a defectively designed roof on her car. It held that the plaintiff's biomedical engineering expert was properly permitted to testify that the plaintiff's injuries were caused by the roof's intrusion into her occupant's space. It also held that another expert was properly allowed to give his opinion that the design of the roof on the car was inadequate and to suggest how it might have been improved.

Clark v. Chrysler Corp., 310 F.3d 461 (6th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a judgment against the manufacturer of the pickup that the plaintiff's decedent was driving, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the testimony of a latch expert and a B-pillar and accident reconstruction expert. The latch expert had substantial experience with how vehicles hold up in accidents and had special expertise, and had done extensive testing, on door latch failures. The Court concluded that the fact that the expert did not do testing in this case went to the weight of the testimony rather than admissibility. The Court also found that the B-pillar-accident reconstruction expert was properly permitted to testify despite the fact that he did no testing. The expert's opinion was based on his background in automobile safety testing, and on examination of the accident scene, the police report, the photographs of the accident, and the depositions, as well as an in-depth inspection of the truck at his own facility. In Pride v. BIC Corp., 218 F.3d 566 (6th Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant manufacturer of a lighter that allegedly caused the death of the plaintiff's decedent, finding no abuse of discretion in excluding expert testimony proffered to explain how the lighter exploded. The methodologies employed by the experts were too unreliable, since they failed timely to conduct replicable laboratory experiments demonstrating that the explosion and residual damage that occurred were consistent with an incident caused by a manufacturing defect, and they did not validate their hypotheses by reference to generally accepted scientific principles as applied to the facts of the case.

Goodwin v. MTD Prods., Inc., 232 F.3d 600 (7th Cir. 2000) : A plaintiff alleged that he suffered an eye injury when struck by a plastic wingnut that had vibrated loose from the lawnmower he was using. The Court affirmed a judgment against the manufacturer, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant's expert witness was not permitted to testify that the plaintiff's injury could not have been caused by a plastic wingnut discharged from a lawnmower and that he did not believe the plaintiff when he testified that the was in the operator's zone behind the mower when he was injured. The witness, a mechanical engineer with no medical training, was not qualified to give expert testimony on medical questions, including the cause of an eye injury, and the witness' opinion about the plaintiff's credibility was merely based on speculation and not the proper subject of expert testimony. In Kirstein v. Parks Corp., 159 F.3d 1065 (7th Cir. 1998) , the plaintiff, while removing linoleum in his house, had used a chemical adhesive remover, followed by lacquer thinner to remove the adhesive residue. He was severely burned when the remover and thinner exploded and caught fire. In an action against the manufacturers of the two products, the Court affirmed the grant of summary judgment for the defendants, finding no abuse of discretion in exclusion of testimony by the plaintiff's expert. Although the expert had impressive credentials as a safety engineer, he was not a chemist, whose expertise would be helpful if not essential as a basis for the suggestion in his deposition that the combination of the two substances increased the danger posed by either one alone. Furthermore, he had done no testing on the products, nor did he provide studies that employed such testing. Thus, the expert "offered only speculation." In Barron v. Ford Motor Co. of Can. Ltd., n15 a product liability action after the plaintiff had been ejected from a car in an accident, the Court held it was error (but harmless) not to permit a state trooper to testify that the plaintiff must have exited the car through the sunroof, as she claimed, because the sunroof was shattered, the plaintiff was found on the side of the road, and rescue workers had broken the front window. Although the trooper's testimony may have seemed simplistic to the sophisticated, it was based on his perceptions and expertise and would have been helpful to the trier.

Smith v. BMW No. Am., Inc., 308 F.3d 913 (8th Cir. 2002) : In a personal injury action alleging that a car's air bag failed to deploy properly, the Trial Judge excluded testimony from an accident reconstructionist, on the ground that the witness put fundamentally flawed information into a crash analysis program, particularly his estimates of the principal direction of force and his displacement measurements, so the results were inherently unreliable. The Court found that the witness' estimate of the principal direction of force was based on all information obtainable and there was no basis for concluding that the estimate was unreliable. The Court concurred that the expert's failure to account for "free space" or "air gaps" in his frontal displacement measurements rendered his estimate unreliable, justifying exclusion of his conclusions. However, corrections provided by the defendant's accident reconstructionist meant that there was evidence before the Judge creating a genuine issue of material fact, so it was error to grant the defendant's summary judgment motion.

Bitler v. A.O. Smith Corp., 400 F.3d 1227 (10th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs in an action arising from a propane explosion, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of the plaintiffs' experts' testimony as to the cause of the explosion. The fire investigator followed generally acceptable practice for fire investigators analyzing the cause of fire accidents. The expert who testified to the defective condition of a valve was not required to test his theory regarding how the gas leaked; testing is essential only for "controversial or novel explanations concerning regularly occurring natural phenomena," and the plaintiffs here needed only to establish by a preponderance of the evidence the causation of a one-time occurrence. Both experts properly used a method of "reasoning to the best inference," similar to the "differential diagnosis" method employed in the medical context. In Truck Ins. Exchange v. MagneTek, Inc., 360 F.3d 1206 (10th Cir. 2004) , an action against the manufacturer of a fluorescent light ballast, the plaintiff offered an expert's opinion that long-term, low-temperature heat from a defective ballast ignited wood, causing a building to be destroyed. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the opinion as unreliable: the testimony was not supported by scientific testing; three publications offered in support of the theory were vague and inconclusive, and they cast doubt on the general scientific acceptance, the methodology, and the adequacy of the experimentation underlying the theory at this time; and the expert's testimony underscored the scientific uncertainty about the theory. The Court also held that a fire investigator's conclusion blaming the ballast was properly excluded. Because the investigator did not have any evidence that the ballast could generate enough heat to ignite combustibles, his conclusion was based on speculation rather than on reliable principles and method. Further, his opinion did not meet the standards of fire investigation he professed to be following. In Orth v. Emerson Elec. Co., n16 the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs in a product liability action arising out of a gas heater explosion, holding that testimony by the plaintiffs' expert tended to connect up the direct evidence by providing a plausible explanation, and his knowledge of propane gas in such a scenario assisted them in understanding the evidence presented. In Werth v. Makita Elec. Works, Ltd., n17 the Court reversed a judgment for the defendant manufacturer in an action arising out of a circular-saw accident, holding it was error to exclude testimony on causation by an expert for the plaintiffs just because he had not conducted independent tests of his thesis. In Ponder v. Warren Tool Corp., n18 the Court reversed a judgment for a manufacturer who was sued by an automobile repairer who was injured when a tire that he was mounting exploded. It concluded that the plaintiff's assistant manager and sales manager at the tire shop should have been permitted to testify to the cause of the accident. He based his opinion on first-hand observation and upon his examination of the implements that were used by the plaintiff.

Jones v. Otis Elevator Co., 861 F.2d 655 (11th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that an expert with 30 years of experience as an elevator engineer could give an opinion as to the cause of an accident, even though his opinion was based on two elevator inspections that occurred more than two years after the accident.

[15] Cause of Disease or Injury

[a] Abuse Cases

United States v. Velarde, 214 F.3d 1204 (10th Cir. 2000) : The Court reversed a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse of a child because the Trial Judge did not make reliability determinations before admitting testimony from a pediatrician and a clinic psychologist. The witnesses had testified regarding the characteristics of alleged child sexual abuse victims, had opined that the child's condition was consistent with sexual abuse, and had indicated that they believed abuse had occurred because the victim had alleged that it occurred. Without itself determining whether the testimony was reliable, the Court held that the failure to make a reliability determination below was an abuse of discretion and not harmless error in this case. In United States v. Charley, 189 F.3d 1251 (10th Cir. 1999) , the Court held it was error, but harmless, when a pediatrician specializing in child sexual abuse gave an unconditional opinion that the victims in the case had in fact been sexually abused. If the opinion was based on the girls' medical history, there was no showing that the expert's opinion ruling out all other causes for the girls' physical complaints was reliable. On the other hand, if the opinion was largely based on crediting the girls' accounts, the witness was essentially vouching for their truthfulness, which is impermissible.

[c] Cause of Disease or Injury -- Medical Testimony

[i] Cause of Disease or Injury -- Medical Testimony -- Differential Diagnosis

Ruggiero v. Warner-Lambert Co., 424 F.3d 249 (2d Cir. 2005) : The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the plaintiff's expert testimony in an action claiming that the plaintiff's decedent's cirrhosis and death were caused by Rezulin. There were no studies that suggested that cirrhosis could be caused or exacerbated by the drug, and while the Court recognized that a differential diagnosis could be used to identify the most likely cause of a set of signs and symptoms, it concluded that this diagnosis does not necessarily support an opinion on general causation because it assumes that the final, suspected cause must be capable of causing the injury.

Heller v. Shaw Indus., 167 F.3d 146 (3d Cir. 1999) : The plaintiffs alleged in a product liability action against the maker of a carpet installed in their house that volatile organic compounds (VOCs) emitted by the carpet caused the wife's respiratory illnesses. The Trial Judge excluded an opinion by an allergy-immunology specialist because no research supported his contention that the level of VOCs detected could cause the illness experienced, his differential diagnosis did not rule out all alternative possible causes, and the evidence showing a temporal relationship between installation of the carpet and the plaintiff's symptoms was weak. The Court noted that an expert's opinion need not be based on published studies so long as the methodology is scientifically valid, and that a differential diagnosis need not rule out all alternative causes so long as the diagnostic techniques employed provide good grounds for the conclusion. However, the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant because the expert had heavily relied on the temporal relationship, which was unreliable in this case because the plaintiff was ill both before the carpet was installed and after it was removed.

Cooper v. Smith & Nephew, Inc., 259 F.3d 194 (4th Cir. 2001) : The Trial Judge excluded the plaintiff's medical expert and granted summary judgment for the defendants in an action alleging that a defective spinal fusion device caused the plaintiff's failed back surgeries and resulting complications. Affirming, the Court found that the expert's opinion was based upon subjective beliefs rather than upon a valid scientific method. Although the expert had conducted a differential diagnosis, it was not reliable: he assumed that if the surgery was not a success, it could only be because the device was defective, and he failed to take account of any other potential causes, even though the medical literature cited other possible causes (such as smoking) for the failure of spinal fusion surgery. Finally, by failing to conduct a physical examination of the plaintiff (even though he admitted insisting upon a physical examination of his own patients), he did not employ in the courtroom the same level of intellectual rigor that characterizes the practice of an expert in the relevant field. The Court also noted that the 2000 amendment to Rule 702 does not alter Daubert's standard for evaluating the admissibility of experts' opinions. In Westberry v. Gislaved Gummi AB, 178 F.3d 257 (4th Cir. 1999) , an employee of a window manufacturer alleged that talcum powder used as a lubricant on gaskets for the windows caused him severe sinus problems. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in a product liability action against the gasket manufacturer, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting opinion testimony from the plaintiff's treating physician that the plaintiff's sinus problems were caused by inhalation of airborne talc in the workplace. Although the expert's opinion was based only on a differential diagnosis, the Court held that a reliable differential diagnosis provides a valid foundation for an expert opinion and that the expert's diagnosis was sufficiently reliable in this case.

Hardyman v. Norfolk & W. Ry., 243 F.3d 255 (6th Cir. 2001) : In a railroad brakeman's FELA suit alleging carpal tunnel syndrome and related injuries. the Trial Judge excluded causation testimony from the plaintiff's experts, a specialist in occupational and environmental medicine and a certified ergonomist, on the ground that they had not established a "dose/response relationship" between the plaintiff's activities and CTS as a basis for their causation opinions. Reversing summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to reject the experts' opinions based on differential diagnosis, which is also a reliable and acceptable methodology for determining causation.

Mattis v. Carlon Elec. Prods., 295 F.3d 856 (8th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an electrician who claimed that vapors from polyvinyl chloride cement caused his reactive airways dysfunction syndrome. The Court found that the plaintiff's treating physician was properly permitted to give a causation opinion based on a differential diagnosis. The witness ruled out other possible causes of the plaintiff's illness, such as smoking, asthma, or ammonia; she also relied on published studies linking RADS to organic solvents like those in the defendant's cement.

Glastetter v. Novartis Pharmaceuticals Corp., 252 F.3d 986 (8th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the drug manufacturer, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the plaintiff's medical expert testimony that the drug caused the plaintiff's stroke. The major premise supporting the expert's differential diagnosis, that the drug administered to the plaintiff caused vasoconstriction, was insufficiently supported by reliable data. Although finding the opinions based on differential diagnosis inadmissible in this case, the Court noted that "a plaintiff need not introduce epidemiological evidence of causation in order to satisfy Daubert's threshold for admission of expert medical testimony." In Turner v. Iowa Fire Equip. Co., n19 the plaintiff began suffering respiratory disease after fire extinguishing equipment at her workplace accidentally discharged. In her suit against the manufacturer and maintainer of the equipment, differential diagnosis testimony from her treating physician that her condition was caused by the baking soda discharged from the equipment was excluded on the ground that it did not satisfy Daubert's standards of scientific reliability. Affirming summary judgment to the defendants, the Court held that Daubert applies to treating physicians testifying as experts just as much as to physicians hired solely for purposes of litigation.

Norris v. Baxter Healthcare Corp., 397 F.3d 878 (10th Cir. 2005) : In an action by the recipient of silicone gel breast implants alleging systemic autoimmune disease, the Court found no error in the exclusion of the plaintiff's causation experts. Their testimony did not satisfy Daubert's requirement that the underlying reasoning or methodology be scientifically valid, because they "completely ignored or discounted without explanation the many epidemiological studies which found no medically reliable link between silicone breast implants and systemic disease." Their reliance on differential diagnosis and case studies was misplaced, since under accepted scientific methodology those techniques are valid only when general causation has been proven.

[ii] Cause of Disease or Injury -- Medical Testimony -- Miscellaneous Cases

Vargas v. Lee, 317 F.3d 498 (5th Cir. 2003) : In a motorist's personal injury action, the Court vacated a judgment for the plaintiff and remanded for recalculation of damages because an expert was improperly permitted to testify that the accident caused the plaintiff to develop symptoms of fibromyalgia syndrome. The Court held that scientific understanding of the syndrome had not progressed sufficiently to change its conclusion in Black v. Food Lion, Inc., infra, that expert testimony regarding the causation of the syndrome by traumatic injury did not satisfy the Daubert factors or any other standard of reliability. In Pipitone v. Biomatrix, Inc., 288 F.3d 239 (5th Cir. 2002) , an action alleging that the defendant's Synvisc fluid caused a salmonella infection when injected into a patient's knee, the Trial Judge excluded the testimony of the plaintiffs' two experts and granted summary judgment. Reversing, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude one expert for failing to do an epidemiological study, and for relying, when concluding there was no connection between salmonella infection and injectable knee products, on a literature search that excluded Synvisc. An epidemiological study is not appropriate when only a single person is infected, and "if Pipitone's salmonella infection in this case was caused by unsterile injection technique or some other cause unrelated to Synvisc, one would reasonably expect to find other occurrences of salmonella infections arising from injections of any product into the knee." Finally, although the expert failed to eliminate "many viable alternative sources" for the infection, the Court found he not only personally examined the injured plaintiff in the hospital but had also specifically looked for and found no symptoms that a physician would expect to find if salmonella had been introduced into the body by a means other than injection. In Tanner v. Westbrook, n20 the plaintiffs alleged that their daughter suffered cerebral palsy because the defendants failed to properly treat her birth asphyxia. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held that their experts on medical causation should not have been permitted to testify because they failed to meet the Daubert standards. The experts' testimony that birth asphyxia is a cause of cerebral palsy was contrary to the medical literature indicating that "birth asphyxia is rarely a cause of cerebral palsy and that a large proportion of cases of cerebral palsy remains unexplained." Furthermore, the literature indicates that there is usually major organ damage when birth asphyxia is serious enough to cause cerebral palsy, but the plaintiff did not suffer organ damage. In a slip and fall case, Black v. Food Lion, n21 a treating physician was permitted to testify that the plaintiff suffered from fibromyalgia syndrome, and that this condition was caused by the trauma from the slip and fall. Reversing, the Court found that the expert's theory failed under the Daubert factors, and that the Trial Judge "fatally erred" by applying the Daubert criteria "at a standard of meaninglessly high generality rather than boring in on the precise state of scientific knowledge in this case." This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 702.02[7]. In Carroll v. Morgan, n22 a medical malpractice wrongful death case, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the defendant's expert to testify regarding the cause of death, despite his reluctance to accept as authoritative in their entirety certain medical textbooks and journals mentioned by the plaintiff and to accept one particular source as the exclusive authority on endocarditis. There was no showing that the witness relied on a particularly objectionable or unconventional scientific theory or methodology; his testimony was based on 30 years as a practicing, board-certified cardiologist, on his review of appropriate records, and on a broad spectrum of published materials, so it was not mere "unsupported speculation."

Jahn v. Equine Services, PSC, 233 F.3d 382 (6th Cir. 2000) : The Court reversed a summary judgment for veterinarians sued by the owner of a champion pony that died after surgery. It held that the fact that one of the owner's experts had never performed the surgery at issue did not preclude the expert's opinion as to the cause of the pony's death, since he was not criticizing the surgery and did not base his opinion on any knowledge of the procedure performed. Rather, he was relying on the medical records presented to him by the defendants and his own clinical/professional experience in giving testimony regarding pre-operative testing and post-operative monitoring. Moreover, the plaintiffs' experts were not required to specify precisely what killed the pony; it was sufficient that they identified what they believed to be the probable cause, using inferences based on a scientific method and derived from the facts at hand, which were less than optimal because of the defendants' inadequate record keeping.

Pearson v. Ramos, 237 F.3d 881 (7th Cir. 2001) : The plaintiff, a federal prisoner, was denied access to the prison yard for a year. He claimed that this sanction was cruel and unusual punishment, and sought damages. At trial, he testified that his teeth fell out as a consequence of lack of out-of-cell exercise. The Court found that this testimony violated Rule 702. "Wholly lacking in medical knowledge as he was, the plaintiff was incompetent to testify on the causal relation if any between exercise and healthy gums." In Jones v. Lincoln Elec. Co., 188 F.3d 709 (7th Cir. 1999) , the Court affirmed a judgment for manufacturers and distributors of welding rods in a suit by a welder who claimed neurological injuries from being exposed to manganese in fumes emitted from the rods. The central issue in the case was whether the plaintiff suffered from manganism or from idiopathic Parkinson's disease. The Court indicated that the Trial Judge may have erred in permitting a professor of materials science to testify for the defense concerning the ability of the body to absorb manganese, since his research experience was not sufficient to permit him to testify about medical conclusions, but any error was harmless.

In re Air Crash at Little Rock, Ark., on June 1, 1999, 291 F.3d 503 (8th Cir. 2002) : In an airline passenger's personal injury action under the Warsaw Convention, the Court held that a psychiatrist's opinion that the plaintiff had a physical injury to her brain resulting from chronic Post Traumatic Stress Disorder caused by the accident should have been excluded, as none of the available tests had been performed to show that she actually suffered from physical changes to her brain. The Court also found that the Trial Judge did not engage in a proper Daubert inquiry when the airline objected that the theory that PTSD results in physical changes to the brain is not a recognized psychiatric concept. In Penney v. Praxair, Inc., n23 the plaintiff offered testimony from a doctor who conducted a Position Emission Tomography scan of the plaintiff's brain, to prove the existence of brain injury after a car accident. The Court held that the testimony concerning the results of the PET scan was properly excluded under Daubert. A PET scan measures brain functions, and the results of the scan are compared to a control group to detect abnormalities. In this case, the control group was dissimilar from the plaintiff in terms of age and medication levels, both of which can affect the scans. In Watkins v. Schriver, n24 an arrestee's civil rights action, the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the plaintiff's expert neurologist from testifying that the plaintiff's injuries were more consistent with being thrown into a wall than a slip and fall. There was no showing how the witness' expertise enabled him to reach that conclusion, so the proffered testimony was merely an attempt to tell the jury what the witness believed the verdict should be. In United States v. Whitted, n25 the Court reversed a defendant's conviction for aggravated sexual abuse and incest, finding it was plain error for a physician to offer an opinion that the victim had suffered repeated child sexual abuse. The physical evidence was inconclusive, and the doctor examined the victim years after the alleged abuse and after the victim had become sexually active, so the conclusion had to be based simply on the doctor's belief that the victim's claims of abuse were true. In Williams v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., n26 the Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a personal injury action brought by a store customer who allegedly suffered back injuries when a shelf display collapsed on him. It was plain error to refuse to allow the plaintiff to ask his medical experts whether he experienced a trauma to his back, as the question was not tantamount to asking whether in their opinion the alleged incident actually occurred.

Sullivan v. United States Dep't of the Navy, 365 F.3d 827 (9th Cir. 2004) : In a medical malpractice case, the Trial Court excluded testimony from the plaintiff's expert, who noted that four standard medical texts stated that the length of an operation was "an influencing factor for infection" and opined that the excessive length of the plaintiff's surgery increased the risk of infection by a factor of six, because it believed that the defendant's version of the facts was correct and the plaintiff's version incorrect. Reversing summary judgment for the government, the Court concluded that because of its "resolution of the disputes over material facts, the district court did not see the relevance of the medical literature relating to the risk of infection of the surgical wound that was part of the operation," and, in any event, "it applied an inappropriately rigid Daubert standard to medical expert testimony." In Domingo v. T.K., 289 F.3d 600 (9th Cir. 2002) , the plaintiff suffered severe brain damage from fat particles released into his blood during hip surgery. This is a recognized risk of such surgery, but the plaintiff attributed the injury in his case to the extraordinarily long time it took to fit the prosthesis into his femur. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the causation testimony of the plaintiff's expert, since it did not satisfy the Daubert criteria.

Mitchell v. Gencorp., 165 F.3d 778 (10th Cir. 1999) : The plaintiff claimed that exposure to benzene in the company's "flammable room" caused him to contract chronic myelogenous leukemia. The Court found no error in the exclusion of testimony by four doctors, who relied on published works indicating a link between exposure to benzene and certain types of leukemia other than that suffered by the plaintiff, offered by the plaintiff to prove causation. There was no evidence that the plaintiff had actually been exposed to benzene, and the doctors did not have scientific data supporting their conclusion that the plaintiff's admitted exposure to chemicals similar to benzene would affect the body in the same way as benzene.

Toole v. Baxter Healthcare Corp., 235 F.3d 1307 (11th Cir. 2000) : In a silicone breast implant case, the plaintiff presented witnesses who testified that her breast implants caused her disease or who testified to the disease process when the human body reacts with silicone or silica. The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, finding no abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge determined that the experts' testimony was sufficiently reliable, since they had conducted research, published in peer-reviewed journals, and treated hundreds of patients with silicone gel implants. In Allison v. McGhan Medical Corp., 184 F.3d 1300 (11th Cir. 1999) , a product liability action alleging injuries from silicone breast implants, the plaintiff submitted proposed testimony by a board certified immunologist, a board certified pathologist, and a treating board certified rheumatologist. Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, the Court found no abuse of discretion in findings that: certain studies were not sufficiently reliable, especially when contrasted with more than 20 epidemiological studies that found no statistical correlation between silicone breast implants and systemic disease; the pathologist's theories were based more on personal opinion than scientific knowledge; the treating rheumatologist did not satisfy Georgia's standard of reasonable probability; and the rheumatologist's opinions were based upon unreliable methodology.

Terran v. Secretary of Health & Human Servs., 195 F.3d 1302 (Fed. Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a decision denying compensation under the National Child Vaccine Injury Act of 1986 to a child who began suffering seizures after receiving DPT vaccine. The Special Master had applied the factors set forth in Daubert and had determined that the plaintiff's expert's theory regarding the causal link between the pertussis toxin and the plaintiff's condition did not meet the standards for scientific reliability. The Court noted that Kumho Tire had resolved the applicability of Daubert to "general medical issues," and concluded that the Special Master had properly used the Daubert factors as a framework for analysis but not as four tests that each had to be satisfied.

[iii] Cause of Disease or Injury -- Medical Testimony -- Plaintiff's Statements As Basis for Opinion

Cooper v. Carl A. Nelson & Co., 211 F.3d 1008 (7th Cir. 2000) : A worker was injured when he fell while traversing a drainage ditch at a construction site. Reversing a judgment for the employer, the Court found it was error to exclude the testimony of the plaintiff's medical witnesses that his fall caused him to suffer chronic pain syndrome (CPS). The Trial Judge excluded the testimony because the experts relied solely upon the plaintiff's statements about his past medical history and about the fall in forming their diagnosis. Rejecting the "overly demanding gatekeeping role" suggested by the defendant, the Court noted that the experts' theory was generally recognized, and held that the contention that other conditions might have caused the plaintiff's CPS went to the weight of the medical testimony, not its admissibility.

[16] Cause of Economic Injury

Group Health Plan, Inc. v. Philip Morris USA, Inc., 344 F.3d 753, 2003-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P74152 (8th Cir. 2003) : Health maintenance organizations sued to recover for tobacco-related health care costs allegedly caused by the defendant tobacco companies conspiring to conceal the risks of smoking and to avoid developing safer tobacco products. The Judge excluded testimony by the plaintiffs' expert, a physician and economics professor, regarding the damage caused by the "disinformation effect" (how accurate disclosures would have affected smoking start and quit rates) and the "retardation-of-innovation effect" (how R&D spending equivalent to the chemical and drug industries would have reduced average tar yields). The testimony was seen as unduly speculative regarding the relations between advertising and initiation or quit rates and between spending and innovation, and as internally inconsistent because it failed to account for the relationship between innovation and information in the counterfactual situations he was positing. Affirming in part summary judgment for the defendants, the Court found that although the issue was close, there was no clear error in excluding the testimony. Several of the witness' predictions of the situation in the absence of the defendants' conspiracy were "inspired guesses at best." Moreover, the expert had taken lower tar as a measure of improvement, which was inconsistent with the plaintiffs' contention that the defendants had fraudulently marketed "low tar" and "light" cigarettes as healthier despite their knowledge that smokers would find way to compensate for the reductions, so the expert's opinions did not properly "fit" the plaintiffs' case.

[17] Certainty of Opinion

DaSilva v. American Brands, Inc., 845 F.2d 356 (1st Cir. 1988) : The Court held, in a wrongful death action against the manufacturer of an industrial mixing machine, that a doctor was properly permitted to give an opinion as to the cause of death. Even though the doctor sometimes spoke of "his belief" or what "could have" been the cause, the Court found that his testimony was based on a reasonable degree of medical certainty and that he was not required to explain with certainty every injury suffered by the victim.

United States v. Mornan, 413 F.3d 372 (3d Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed mail and wire fraud convictions arising from a telemarketing scheme, finding no plain error in the admission of testimony from a government handwriting expert despite her responding "I think they are" to the question whether her opinions were rendered to a "reasonable degree of scientific certainty." The Court noted that Rule 702 does not require "reasonable scientific certainty" and that the witness had testified that rendering "less-than-certain" opinions is an accepted practice in her field. In an action alleging that a seaman's death from mesothelioma was caused by asbestos exposure, Holbrook v. Lykes Bros. S.S. Co., 80 F.3d 777 (3d Cir. 1996) , the Court reversed a judgment for the defendants, holding it was error to preclude the plaintiff from asking a defense expert whether he could state "with reasonable medical certainty" that radiation exposure caused the decedent's mesothelioma. Although the talismanic phrase is not required, it is a useful shorthand expression that is helpful in forestalling challenges to the admissibility of expert testimony and that also assists a reviewing Court in determining whether the jury has been given the appropriate standard by which to judge the opinion. In an asbestos product liability action, Schulz v. Celotex Corp., n27 a directed verdict was granted for the defendants because the attending physician did not couch his diagnosis of causation in terms of reasonable medical certainty. The Court reversed, holding that under either federal or the governing state law the testimony carried with it the requisite degree of certainty needed for admissibility.

Rohrbough v. Wyeth Labs., 916 F.2d 970 (4th Cir. 1990) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendant manufacturer in an action for personal injuries allegedly caused by defective vaccine, the Court held that an expert's opinion as to proximate cause must be stated in terms of reasonable probability. Although declining to base its decision on the presence or absence of any particular language, the Court found that none of the plaintiff's experts fairly established that it was reasonably probable the vaccine caused the injuries.

Pipitone v. Biomatrix, Inc., 288 F.3d 239 (5th Cir. 2002) : In an action alleging that the defendant's Synvisc fluid caused a salmonella infection when injected into a patient's knee, the Trial Judge excluded the testimony of the plaintiffs' two experts and granted summary judgment. Although the Court reversed for an abuse of discretion in excluding the testimony of one expert, it found no error in the exclusion of testimony by the orthopedic surgeon who injected the fluid that it was as likely as not that the Synvisc syringe contained the salmonella bacteria that infected Pipitone's knee and that he had no "scientific evidence" to support the conclusion that it was more likely than not that the infection occurred in this way. Concluding that the testimony was not helpful to the factfinder, the Court noted that "[a] perfectly equivocal opinion does not make any fact more or less probable and is irrelevant under the Federal Rules of Evidence."

Mayhew v. Bell S.S. Co., 917 F.2d 961 (6th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed the damages awarded a seaman in a Jones Act case, holding that deposition testimony by the plaintiff's expert was properly excluded because it did not articulate more than a mere possibility of a causal relationship between the defendant's negligence and the injury for which the plaintiff sought damages.

United States v. Cyphers, 553 F.2d 1064 (7th Cir. 1977) : Affirming convictions for armed bank robbery, the Court held that it was proper to admit the testimony of a government witness that hairs recovered from articles used by the robbers were "microscopically like" hair samples taken from the defendants. The Court emphasized that there is no requirement that an expert opinion be expressed in terms of a reasonable scientific certainty, and that the lack of certainty goes to the weight of the evidence, not its admissibility.

People of Terr. of Guam v. Reyes, 879 F.2d 646 (9th Cir. 1989) : Affirming a manslaughter conviction, the Court held that it was unnecessary to decide whether the medical examiner's opinion that "it [was] safe to assume" a bruise "probably" happened at the same time or prior to the shooting was improper because it was not stated in terms of a "reasonable degree of medical certainty," as the record clearly showed he based his testimony on the substantive equivalent of such certainty.

[18] Chemists

United States v. Vitek Supply Corp., 144 F.3d 476 (7th Cir. 1998) : Affirming convictions for a conspiracy to defraud Customs and the FDA by smuggling misbranded animal drugs, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by a government expert to prove that the defendant's products contained illegal substances. Although the Trial Judge had not specifically found that the chemical tests used were generally accepted for the purpose of determining the content of the particular products, the Court held that was not necessary where the testing procedures were widely used and did not involve out-of-the-ordinary applications or abstract or novel scientific theories.

United States v. Ruiz, 412 F.3d 871 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug distribution, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony from a chemist that methamphetamine found in a garbage can at an apartment and during an arrest in a parking lot could have originated from the same process based on a comparison of their purity, a common cutting agent, and the presence of pseudoephedrine. In United States v. $141,700 in U.S. Currency, 157 F.3d 600 (8th Cir. 1998) , to prove in a forfeiture proceeding that a large sum of money found in baggies in the ceiling of a camper was the proceeds of drug transactions, the government offered testimony that a drug-detecting dog positively alerted to the presence of drugs after sniffing one of the packages of money in a controlled testing procedure. Affirming the forfeiture, the Court held that testimony by a chemist that 99% of United States currency is contaminated with drug residue was properly excluded under Daubert because the expert's methodology was unreliable and it bore none of the indicia of reliability articulated in Daubert.

United States v. Brown, 415 F.3d 1257 (11th Cir. 2005) : The principal issue in the bench trial of the defendants for distribution of a controlled substance analogue was whether the 1,4-butanediol they possessed had a chemical structure "substantially similar" to gamma hydroxybutyric acid (GHB), a controlled substance. The government offered testimony from a DEA forensic drug chemist and a biochemist with the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences; their testimony was admitted. The defense offered a freelance consultant in the field of chemistry who held a Ph.D. in plant pathology; the Judge heard this witness' testimony without ruling on his qualifications, but did not consider the testimony as reliable expert opinion in making findings of fact. Affirming, the Court concluded there was no abuse of discretion in the finding that the opinion testimony of the prosecution experts satisfied the reliability standards. Even though the method those experts used satisfied only the general acceptance factor of the four noted in Daubert, accepting credible evidence of a generally accepted method applied reliably was not clearly erroneous, particularly in the bench trial situation, where there is less need for the gatekeeper to keep the gate. The Court also found no abuse of discretion when the Judge declined to qualify the defendants' witness as an expert, given his academic work and professional experience related more to plant pathology and botany than to chemistry. Even if the witness were qualified, the Judge's conclusion that his method was unreliable and unreliably applied was not error.

[19] Chiropractors

Kudabeck v. Kroger Co., 338 F.3d 856 (8th Cir. 2003) : In a slip and fall case, the plaintiff called a chiropractor as an expert witness, who testified that the plaintiff's fall caused her to suffer from advanced degenerative disc disease and osteoarthritis in her back. Rejecting arguments that the expert's testimony should have been excluded under Daubert and Rule 702, because the expert's differential diagnosis was not "thorough" and he failed to rely on any published studies linking a fall to the damages suffered by the plaintiff, the Court found no abuse of discretion. The expert did in fact conduct a differential diagnosis, looking at such alternative causes, and the argument that the differential diagnosis was not completely thorough raised a question of weight rather than admissibility. Nor was it dispositive that the expert failed to rely on any published studies, where there was no showing that the witness exceeded the boundaries of the general practice and methodology of chiropractors.

[20] Civil Rights Cases

Kopf v. Skyrm, 993 F.2d 374 (4th Cir. 1993) : Reversing a judgment in favor of defendants sued for using excessive force in making an arrest, the Court held that it was error to deny the plaintiff an opportunity to call two expert witnesses to testify concerning the proper use of police dogs and slapjacks. Rejecting any "blanket rule" with respect to expert testimony in excessive force cases, the Court held that the proper training of a police dog is not common knowledge, and that an expert should be permitted to testify as to the prevailing standard of conduct with respect to a slapjack.

Lawson v. Trowbridge, 153 F.3d 368 (7th Cir. 1998) : The plaintiff claimed that his civil rights were violated by an officer who allegedly arrested him without probable cause for carrying a concealed knife. Affirming a judgment for the officer, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by other officers that they had trained the defendant in approaching knives in varying contexts. Although none of the testimony regarding the dangerousness of knives and how they are used by criminals was earth-shattering and much of it probably overlapped with the jurors' own experiences, it was at least helpful in putting the defendant's actions -- such as waiting after he heard that the plaintiff had a concealed knife in a bar until the plaintiff left the bar to approach him -- in context.

Dang Vang v. Vang Xiong X. Toyed, 944 F.2d 476 (9th Cir. 1991) : In a civil rights action by Hmong refugees against a state employee for allegedly raping them, the Court held there was no error in permitting an anthropologist to describe the Hmong culture and explain the behavior of the plaintiffs within that cultural context, where the expert was precluded from testifying regarding the specifics of the case, such as whether there was a rape or why these particular plaintiffs did not report the rape. The Court also held that a social psychologist and a clinical social worker who interviewed the plaintiffs were properly permitted to testify as to what each plaintiff explained had happened and the resulting problems in each plaintiff's life, the witness' opinions regarding their psychological conditions, and her general understanding of the reactions of women to various life events including rape. The expert testimony assisted the trier of fact in assessing damages, and although the plaintiffs' stories were recounted, no expert was permitted to testify that the plaintiffs were telling the truth.

[21] Computers

Roback v. V.I.P. Transp. Inc., 90 F.3d 1207 (7th Cir. 1996) : A truck driver who rammed a car claimed that he was distracted by the erratic operation of a faulty cruise control system. An engineer, who used a computerized data acquisition system called the DATAQ to gather data on the performance of various systems within an automobile or truck, took the truck on a 90-mile drive and used the DATAQ to document how the vehicle performed. The engineer concluded that the cruise control, when engaged, caused the engine to rev and the speedometer to fluctuate dramatically, even though the truck would not exceed the set speed limit. The Court held that although the DATAQ system had not been subject to peer review, the testimony was sufficiently scientific to satisfy Daubert: the methodology of gathering and compiling data during a test run was hardly novel, and although the expert was the only one who had used the DATAQ, he had "used standard components to assemble the DATAQ, and he certainly could have been interrogated about the way in which his software worked. His data were subject to examination and independent verification."

United States v. Larry Reed & Sons Partnership, 280 F.3d 1212 (8th Cir. 2002) : The defendants filed an insurance claim for loss of their cotton crop in 1993, but the government contended that no cotton was planted on that land during that season. Affirming a judgment against the defendants in a False Claims Act suit, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by an agricultural expert that a computer analysis of satellite images supported the government's contention. The expert satisfied the Daubert standards for reliable expert testimony by referring to "hundreds and hundreds" of academic journals about the computer analysis process and its use in, e.g., assessing crop hail damage. He also "clearly explained his method of analysis, presented the satellite data, and illustrated how he applied the method to the facts before him."

[22] Credibility Testimony

[a] Abuse Cases

Doe v. Johnson, 52 F.3d 1448 (7th Cir. 1995) : A child and her adoptive parents sued her foster parents, alleging they sexually abused her. Affirming a verdict for the defendants, the Court held there was no error in permitting a defense expert to testify, on the basis of a review of pertinent records, that the child made allegations of sexual abuse to receive rewards from her adoptive parents, and that her allegations were the product of suggestion. The Court concluded that the expert's testimony "did not invade the province of the jury as to the question of credibility and merely dealt with [the expert's] opinion that Doe's allegations probably were fabricated and were the product of parental and therapeutic suggestion."

United States v. Kirkie, 261 F.3d 761 (8th Cir. 2001) : Physicians who had examined the victim in a sexual abuse case six and 18 months after the alleged assaults testified that their physical examination was normal, but that she had reported herself to have been sexually abused, and that it was not uncommon for child victims not to report specific details, or to delay reporting, of sexual assaults. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the testimony, where the physicians did not opine as to whether the alleged abuse actually occurred or whether the victim was telling the truth. In United States v. Waters, 194 F.3d 926 (8th Cir. 1999) , the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting rebuttal testimony by a social worker that "children rarely tell you everything about an abuse the first time they are asked" and that they often leave out details of abuse because they are embarrassed. The witness never gave her opinion as to whether the victim was telling the truth, but only informed the jury of the characteristics of sexually abused children. See also United States v. Running Horse n28(no error in permitting clinical psychologist who examined victim to testify to characteristics of sexually abused children and characteristics that victim exhibited, since he never gave his opinion whether victim was telling the truth). In United States v. Whitted, n29 the Court reversed a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse and incest, finding plain error when a physician was permitted to offer an opinion that the victim had suffered repeated child sexual abuse. The physical evidence was inconclusive, and the doctor examined the victim years after the alleged abuse and after the victim had become sexually active, so the conclusion had to be based simply on the doctor's belief that the victim's claims of abuse were true. See also United States v. Plenty Arrows n30(no abuse of discretion when defense expert, who testified on direct that the victim denied during an interview that he had been sexually abused, testified on cross-examination that the victim's behavior was consistent with that of a sexually abused child); United States v. Johns n31(a psychologist testified about the dynamics of long-term familial sexual abuse, properly making no comment on the victim's credibility nor identifying her as a victim of sexual abuse).

United States v. Tsinnijinnie, 91 F.3d 1285 (9th Cir. 1996) : In a child sex abuse prosecution, the Court found no error when an expert on child sex abuse was permitted to testify about the timing of reports of sexual abuse by children, where the expert did not bolster the credibility of the victim but only explained why abused children may not complain. In a rape prosecution in which the defendant claimed consent, United States v. Rivera, 43 F.3d 1291 (9th Cir. 1995) , the Court found no plain error when the prosecution's expert was permitted to testify that, in her opinion, the victim did not fake the rape. The Court noted that this comment was elicited during redirect examination after the defense counsel had suggested that the victim had "fooled" the expert into making an incorrect diagnosis; the defendant had thereby opened the door to testimony as to the victim's credibility which would not otherwise have been admissible. In United States v. Antone, n32 the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting expert testimony regarding the general behavioral characteristics exhibited by victims of child sexual abuse, where the expert did not testify that the victim in this case could be believed.

Wilson v. Muckala, 303 F.3d 1207 (10th Cir. 2002) : In a nurse's action for sexual harassment, the Court found no error in the exclusion of testimony from the plaintiff's treating psychiatrist that the plaintiff was telling the truth when she said she was a victim of sexual harassment. The Court noted that "[e]xpert testimony on the psychological and emotional traits of abuse victims is typically admissible, so long as the witness makes no comment on the alleged victim's credibility, or identify the alleged victim as a victim of abuse ... . The credibility of witness testimony is a matter left to the jury and generally is not an appropriate subject for expert testimony." In United States v. Velarde, 214 F.3d 1204 (10th Cir. 2000) , the Court reversed a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse of a child because the Trial Judge did not make reliability determinations before admitting testimony from a pediatrician and a clinic psychologist, who had testified regarding the characteristics of alleged child sexual abuse victims, had opined that the child's condition was consistent with sexual abuse, and had indicated that they believed abuse had occurred because the victim had alleged that it occurred. In United States v. Charley, n33 the Court held it was error, but harmless, when a pediatrician specializing in child sexual abuse gave an unconditional opinion that the victims in the case had in fact been sexually abused. If the opinion was based on the girls' medical history, there was no showing that the expert's opinion ruling out all other causes for the girls' physical complaints was reliable. On the other hand, if the opinion was largely based on crediting the girls' accounts, the expert was essentially vouching for their truthfulness, which is impermissible.

Snowden v. Singletary, 135 F.3d 732 (11th Cir. 1998) : The Court reversed the denial of habeas corpus to a petitioner convicted for child abuse. Where the case was based almost entirely upon stories told by three young-children witnesses, the petitioner was denied a fundamentally fair trial when an expert for the prosecution testified that "99.5% of children tell the truth" and that in his own experience interviewing 1,000 children about sexual abuse he "had not personally encountered an instance where a child had invented a lie about abuse."

[b] Credibility -- Other Cases

United States v. Torres-Galindo, 206 F.3d 136 (1st Cir. 2000) : Although the Court affirmed carjacking and firearms convictions, it noted that it was troubled by the testimony of an FBI special agent whose "vouching" the Court had criticized in United States v. Rosario-Diaz (infra). The agent testified regarding custodial statements made by one defendant that "it is difficult for me to remember a time when a defendant or a suspect in a case has immediately told me the truth" and that "[m]ost of the time they always start with a lie." While the agent did not explicitly state that he believed the defendant's confessions rather than his denial, nor did he indicate that he was aware of facts not before the jury that confirmed the truth of the confession, the pattern that he purported to describe "is essentially the stuff of expert testimony and even if [he] were regarded as an expert, we doubt whether this is testimony that could properly be regarded as helpful to a jury, ... which out of its own experience may know that persons accused of wrongdoing often deny their guilt before confessing." Any error in admitting the testimony was harmless, however. In United States v. Rosario-Diaz, 202 F.3d 54 (1st Cir. 2000) , the Court held it was error (but harmless) to permit an FBI agent to bolster the testimony of a cooperating witness by opining that particular statements of the witness were "lies" and representing that the statements not singled out as lies had been "tested" and verified through interrogation techniques. Although the agent could properly have testified to facts within his personal knowledge that supported another witness' testimony and to actions he took to corroborate the testimony, it was impermissible for him to put the prestige of his professional knowledge behind the cooperating witness' testimony.

Nimely v. City of New York, 414 F.3d 381 (2d Cir. 2005) : In a civil rights case alleging excessive force, the disputed question was whether the plaintiff was shot in the back -- as indicated by the medical evidence -- or shot while turning toward the officer with a gun in hand, as testified to by the officer. The defendant's expert, a forensic pathologist, offered an innocent explanation for the inconsistency between the medical evidence and the officer's testimony, and indicated that he had ruled out the possibility that the officer was simply lying, because of the difficulties in getting away with a lie about discharging a weapon. The Court found that the pathologist gave expert testimony that the officer was telling the truth, which it had consistently held inadmissible under Rule 702. In ruling that guilt-assuming hypothetical questions of lay character witnesses are improper in United States v. Oshatz, 912 F.2d 534 (2d Cir. 1990) , the Court left open the possibility that they might be asked on cross-examination of expert character witnesses. One Judge, concurring only in the judgment, said that expert character testimony is one of those ideas whose time has not yet come, and with common sense and a modicum of luck never will. In United States v. Scop, n34 the Court reversed stock fraud convictions, concluding that the chief investigator of an SEC regional office improperly based his opinion on the "positive assessment of the trustworthiness and accuracy of the testimony of the government's witnesses." The Court reasoned that the witness' expertise "did not encompass the evaluation of testimony" and that "even expert witnesses possessed of medical knowledge and skills that relate directly to credibility may not state an opinion as to whether another witness is credible."

United States v. Thomas, 74 F.3d 676 (6th Cir. 1996) : The Court held in a drug case that there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the defendant from calling "an experienced federal criminal practitioner" to testify about the incentive a cooperating witness would have to give false testimony as a result of a plea agreement containing a promise of a reduced sentence in exchange for cooperation with the government, since the jury could understand the witness' incentive on the basis of cross-examination without expert help.

Goodwin v. MTD Prods., Inc., 232 F.3d 600 (7th Cir. 2000) : A plaintiff alleged that he suffered an eye injury when struck by a plastic wingnut that had vibrated loose from the lawnmower he was using. The Court affirmed a judgment against the manufacturer, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant's expert witness was not permitted to testify that he did not believe the plaintiff when he testified that he was in the operator's zone behind the mower when he was injured. The witness' opinion about the plaintiff's credibility was merely based on speculation and not the proper subject of expert testimony.

Westcott v. Crinklaw, 68 F.3d 1073 (8th Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed a judgment for a police officer in a civil rights action brought by the wife of a burglar shot and killed by the officer. After the shooting, the officer had made statements inconsistent with his later trial testimony. To explain these inconsistencies, the officer called an expert witness who testified that the officer was suffering from post-traumatic stress syndrome when he made the statements, and that this syndrome may cause a person to make inaccurate and unreliable statements. The Court held that the admission of the expert's testimony was an abuse of discretion, because it directly addressed the credibility of the officer as a witness, and usurped the function of the jury. In United States v. French, 12 F.3d 114 (8th Cir. 1993) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in a marijuana conspiracy case when the defendant was precluded from offering testimony by an attorney regularly representing criminal defendants that witnesses who testify after signing plea agreements containing substantial-assistance provisions are more likely to incriminate the defendant falsely in order to receive the reduction. This conclusion is within the realm of common sense and expert testimony is not necessary to draw it.

United States v. Adams, 271 F.3d 1236 (10th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a psychologist's report suggesting that the defendant might not have been telling the truth in confessing to police. The report was "little more than a professionally-trained witness testifying that, based upon his history, 'Mr. Adams is the type of person who would have lied about his involvement to the police,' " the confession was clearly voluntary, and the reason given in his recantation for lying -- to protect his girlfriend -- is the sort that a jury is capable of resolving without expert testimony. In United States v. Toledo, 985 F.2d 1462 (10th Cir. 1993) , the Court held it was a close question, but not plain error, to admit a psychiatrist's testimony as to whether the victim's story might be delusional in a prosecution for kidnapping a 14-year-old mentally retarded and mentally ill girl.

Griffin v. City of Opa-Locka, 261 F.3d 1295 (11th Cir. 2001) : A former City employee brought a civil rights action after the City manager sexually harassed and raped her. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony from an expert for the plaintiff about common responses by victims of rape or harassment. The expert did not comment on the plaintiff's credibility, veracity, or capacity for truthful testimony, nor on whether the events she described had in fact transpired. In United States v. Beasley, 72 F.3d 1518 (11th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed convictions arising from murders and other crimes committed by a religious cult, and found no error in excluding a defense psychiatric expert who would have testified that a former cult member (a prosecution witness) was a psychopath with no conception of the truth. "Expert medical testimony concerning the truthfulness or credibility of a witness is generally inadmissible because it invades the jury's province to make credibility assessments."

[23] Credibility of Expert Witness

Deputy v. Lehman Bros., Inc., 345 F.3d 494 (7th Cir. 2003) : In an action alleging securities fraud by a broker, the Court held that the Trial Judge erroneously excluded expert testimony that the plaintiff had not signed a "Client Agreement" providing for arbitration. The Judge focused on seven reasons, most of which concerned issues of credibility and persuasiveness, for excluding the testimony; e.g., the Judge found that the expert was less than candid in describing her testimony in a previous case. The Court found that "such considerations are relevant only in valuing the testimony, not in determining its admissibility."

United States v. Vesey, 338 F.3d 913 (8th Cir. 2003) : Affirming drug trafficking convictions, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to exclude a defense witness called as an expert to testify to how drug operations are normally conducted and to counter the testimony of the government's expert witness. The witness had been excluded on the ground that he gave contradictory and evasive responses, which erroneously shifted the focus to the witness' credibility rather to his qualification on the basis of experience. The Court found that he had extensive knowledge, which he used to formulate general rules of drug trafficking behavior, and that he applied the rules to explain the behavior of the actors in this case.

[24] Cultural Experts

United States v. Sebaggala, 256 F.3d 59 (1st Cir. 2001) : A Ugandan national, charged with making false declarations to Customs regarding monetary instruments he was carrying, proffered an expert to testify on the linguistic and cultural traits of the tribe to which the defendant belonged, to aid in assessing his ability to understand the forms he signed and thus his culpability. The Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the testimony, which was grounded primarily on anecdotal experience and, because it focused on customs like affability and on tribal forms of nonverbal communication, would not materially assist in assessing the defendant's ability to comprehend Customs forms.

United States v. Sayakhom, 186 F.3d 928 (9th Cir. 1999) : The defendant, a Laotian immigrant charged with mail fraud in selling insurance without a license, sought to call an expert on Laotian culture to testify to the importance of the burial rite, the history in Laos and the U.S. of pooling money to pay burial expenses, the difficulty of learning English and concepts such as insurance, and the lack of education and sophistication of Laotians in general. Even though the expert would not testify in any way about the defendant's mental state or intent, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the testimony on the ground that it would not have been helpful to the jury in determining the defendant's guilt. In Dang Vang v. Vang Xiong X. Toyed, 944 F.2d 476 (9th Cir. 1991) , a civil rights action by Hmong refugees against a state employee for allegedly raping them, the Court held there was no error in permitting an anthropologist to describe the Hmong culture and explain the behavior of the plaintiffs within that cultural context, where the expert was precluded from testifying regarding the specifics of the case, such as whether there was a rape or why these particular plaintiffs did not report the rape.

[25] Damages

[a] Antitrust

Stelwagon Mfg. Co. v. Tarmac Roofing Sys., 63 F.3d 1267, 1995-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P71103 (3d Cir. 1995) : In a Robinson-Patman Act case, the Court held there was no error in admitting the plaintiff's expert testimony, but the testimony did not provide sufficient evidence to support a finding of antitrust injury, because the expert did not sufficiently link the plaintiff's fall in sales to price discrimination. The expert failed to take into account the fact that the sales may have been lost for reasons apart from the price discrimination and failed to identify a single lost customer.

International Wood Processors v. Power Dry, Inc., 593 F. Supp. 710, 1984-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P66193 (D.S.C. 1984) , aff'd, 792 F.2d 416, 1986-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P67138 (4th Cir. 1986) : The Court found that the evidence sustained a jury's verdict in an antitrust case and that the plaintiff's economist projected damages on the basis of reasonable data and assumptions.

Olympia Equip. Leasing Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co., 797 F.2d 370, 1986-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P67189 (7th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in an antitrust case, stating that "[t]he projection of lost profits that Olympia's expert witness made to the jury bore no relation to Olympia's internal business planning or to economic reality." The Court recognized that "[s]peculation has its place in estimating damages, and doubts should be resolved against the wrongdoer," but it concluded that the assumptions made by the expert in this case were unreasonable.

[b] Damages -- Civil Rights and Employment Discrimination

Cummings v. Standard Register Co., 265 F.3d 56 (1st Cir. 2001) : In an age discrimination case, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by the plaintiff's expert regarding front pay damages. The expert had used data from the Bureau of Labor Statistics and one year's salary as a base, rather than company-specific data and a mean of salaries. However, during cross-examination he offered sufficient explanations for his methodology, and the defendant failed to show that the information he did use was incorrect or to dispute that his assumptions are ones that economists make with some frequency. A computational error that the expert had made was exposed in his testimony, but it was duly corrected while he was on the stand, so that the jury could consider the correction in assessing his conclusions.

Doran v. Eckold, 362 F.3d 1047 (8th Cir. 2004) : In a § 1983 action arising from the no-knock execution of a search warrant, the Court found no error in the admission of damages testimony from an experienced accountant. The witness had used the plaintiff's own estimation of his reduction of work capacity and the clients he lost, and had calculated the dollar amount of the loss from prior tax returns and client invoices. The Court held that the witness' calculations were derived using standard accounting procedures and based on estimations, not simply "guesses"; questions about the factual basis went to the credibility, not the admissibility, of the testimony.

Dang Vang v. Vang Xiong X. Toyed, 944 F.2d 476 (9th Cir. 1991) : In a civil rights action by Hmong refugees against a state employee for allegedly raping them, the Court held there was no error in permitting a social psychologist and a clinical social worker who interviewed the plaintiffs to testify as to what each plaintiff explained had happened and the resulting problems in each plaintiff's life. Each witness was also properly permitted to give her opinion regarding the victims' psychological conditions, and her general understanding of the reactions of women to various life events including rape. The expert testimony assisted the trier of fact in assessing damages, and although the plaintiffs' stories were recounted, no expert opinions were permitted that the plaintiffs were telling the truth. In Cassino v. Reichhold Chems., Inc., n35 the Court affirmed a finding that an employer engaged in age discrimination in terminating an employee, but reversed the damage award because of error in excluding the employer's expert testimony concerning the reasonableness of the plaintiff's mitigation efforts and the availability of jobs.

[c] Damages -- Contracts

International Adhesive Coating Co. v. Bolton Emerson Int'l, Inc., 851 F.2d 540 (1st Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed a damage award in a suit by a purchaser of a boiler who alleged that a breach of warranty resulted in business interruptions. It held that an accounting expert was properly permitted to derive damage estimates by reviewing the plaintiff's financial records, and that the somewhat abbreviated and conclusory description of the underlying documentation that he provided went to weight rather than admissibility.

Advent Systems v. Unisys Corp., 925 F.2d 670 (3d Cir. 1991) : Remanding a contract action between computer software and hardware manufacturers, the Court noted, with respect to the plaintiff's damages expert, that there had been no factual inquiry and finding as to what data experts in the field find reliable, and that it had serious reservations about the validity of expert testimony based on prior predictions of sales for a given period when actual performance data for that same time span are available.

Genmoora Corp. v. Moore Bus. Forms, Inc., 939 F.2d 1149 (5th Cir. 1991) : The Court held in a breach of contract action related to the sale of a business that the defendant had not preserved its objections to expert testimony by the plaintiff's chief financial officer regarding proposed adjustments in a disputed audit, but held that the testimony was insufficient to support the plaintiff's claimed adjustments. Although auditors frequently extrapolate from samples, a sampling from inventory like that made by the witness would not support an adjustment to receivables.

Children's Broadcasting Corp. v. Walt Disney Co., 357 F.3d 860 (8th Cir. 2004) : In an action for breach of contract and misappropriation of trade secrets arising from efforts to develop a broadcast network for children, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony from the plaintiff's expert on damages, since the defendants failed to show that the expert's opinion was so unsupported that his testimony could offer no assistance to the jury. In its earlier decision in the case, Children's Broadcasting Corp. v. Walt Disney Co., 245 F.3d 1008 (8th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed a conditional grant of a new trial on damages, finding no abuse of discretion in the Trial Court's conclusion that it should have excluded the testimony of the plaintiff's expert witness on damages. The expert had failed to consider the effect of competition on Children's, his theory of causation was questionable, and his testimony was based on a report prepared before Children's' claims were narrowed for trial. In School Dist. No. 11 v. Sverdrup & Parcel & Assocs., n36 the Court upheld a decision in favor of a school district that sued for damages resulting from the failure of reroofing on three buildings. It found that the expert testimony on damages, including testimony concerning a contingency expense, was permissible, observing that "[t]he difficulty of proving a precise amount will not preclude recovery as long as there is a reasonable basis to approximate the amount." In Cashman v. Allied Prods. Corp., n37 the Court held that an accountant and business consultant to a seller and another witness with extensive experience in the same business were properly permitted to testify as experts with respect to lost profits.

Humetrix, Inc. v. Gemplus S.C.A., 268 F.3d 910 (9th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for an entrepreneur against the manufacturer of Smart Card technology in a case alleging breach of contract and breach of fiduciary duty, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting expert testimony as to the entrepreneur's lost profits. The experts based their testimony on contracts that the entrepreneur had closed, pilot projects for which it had received commitments, contracts in negotiation, market forecasts (including the defendant's own), contacts with government officials, and the plaintiff's cooperative effort with the defendant, so there was substantial evidence to support the lost profit testimony. In In re James E. O'Connell Co., n38 the Court affirmed a judgment for a would-be purchaser of a plant against a bankruptcy trustee for breach of contract and conversion, finding that an expert could give an opinion on lost profits on the basis of the purchaser's financial statements, comparable data pertaining to similar businesses, and more general information such as forecasts and reports on markets for dried vegetable products.

Lifewise Master Funding v. Telebank, 374 F.3d 917 (10th Cir. 2004) : In an action by a lending company against its loan financer for breach of contract, the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the damages model proffered by the plaintiff, since the proposed expert was not qualified in the methodology and the methodology was "unique to this case and not based on any recognized standard"; further, the methodology was "not in regular usage for predicting future profits, was not peer reviewed, has no uniform usage in any known industry, and is capable of manipulation to achieve virtually any desired result." In Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. v. Pearson, n39 the Court held that an accountant was properly permitted to testify to damages suffered by a business as result of the breach of an agreement, where the jury was made aware of any speculation resulting from incomplete data. See also State Office Sys. v. Olivetti Corp. n40(the president and treasurer of a company was qualified to give an opinion as to lost profits based upon his knowledge of its operations, sales, and profits).

[d] Damages -- Distributorships, Franchises, and Other Business Relationships

Irvine v. Murad Skin Research Labs., Inc., 194 F.3d 313 (1st Cir. 1999) : The Court awarded a new trial on damages in a distributor's action against its supplier because the plaintiff's expert testimony was unreliable. Specifically, the accountant utilized incorrect sales data and relied on incorrect assumptions regarding the plaintiff's business in determining the losses attributable to the defendant's actions. In Newell P.R., Ltd. v. Rubbermaid Inc., 20 F.3d 15 (1st Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed a judgment against the supplier for termination of an exclusive distribution agreement, and held there was no error in admitting testimony by the plaintiff's damages expert, despite contentions of surprise, confusion, and failure to supplement discovery responses. The expert was concededly qualified and the supplier was able to cross-examine the expert and a Court-appointed expert and to present its own expert. In Knightsbridge Mktg. Servs. v. Promociones y Proyectos, n41 an action by a United States company claiming breach of its contract to act as a sales representative and registration agent for a Dominican Republic company's hotel, the Court held that the plaintiff's expert properly relied upon his knowledge and experience in the hotel-booking business, information obtained from the defendant's hotel, and authoritative sources in the Dominican Republic in offering an opinion as to lost profits. See also Computer Sys. Eng'g, Inc. v. Qantel Corp. n42(sustaining a damage award in an action arising out of a computer products distribution agreement, and finding that the plaintiff's CPA-auditor was properly permitted to forecast lost profits; damages need not be proved with mathematical certainty).

Tuf Racing Prods., Inc. v. American Suzuki Motor Corp., 223 F.3d 585 (7th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a suit for wrongful termination of a franchise agreement, holding there was no error when the plaintiff's accountant, a CPA, presented its theory of damages. Anyone with relevant expertise enabling him to offer responsible opinion testimony helpful to the trier may qualify as an expert witness, and there is no requirement that a damages witness in a case like this have a degree in economics, statistics, mathematics, or some other "academic" field that might bear on the calculation of damages. In Target Market Publishing Inc. v. ADVO, Inc., 136 F.3d 1139 (7th Cir. 1998) , a diversity action for breach of contract and fiduciary duty arising from a joint venture to market a direct mail advertising publication, the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant on the ground that the plaintiff could not recover the requisite jurisdictional amount. There was no abuse of discretion in excluding a report from an expert accountant and business appraiser who concluded that had the defendant performed its contractual obligations, the joint venture would have earned $1.4 million during the contract period, where the report was based on the speculative assumption that the joint venture would have successfully entered 49 marketing zones, when at the time of the breach it had only operated in two marketing zones and was unsuccessful in both. In Bright v. Land O'Lakes, Inc., n43 the Court upheld a damage award in favor of a distributor who sued a manufacturer for breach of contract and violation of a state law governing dealerships. It held that testimony by the distributor's damages expert, who calculated projected earnings by determining gross revenue per capita in the original distribution area and assumed the same earnings in an expanded territory, was properly admitted notwithstanding the manufacturer's claim that there was no competition in the original area and substantial competition in the expanded area, since the manufacturer had ample opportunity to cross-examine the expert and to offer its own expert.

Storage Technology Corp. v. Cisco Sys., Inc., 395 F.3d 921 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in an action alleging that the plaintiff's former employees had been tortiously induced to breach their employment contracts. The plaintiff's expert asserted that the damages were the value of the company that the employees joined, which was shortly thereafter acquired by the defendant. The Court held that the expert's opinion was fundamentally unsupported and speculative, and that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding it. In Wash Solutions, Inc. v. PDQ Mfg., Inc., 395 F.3d 888 (8th Cir. 2004) , an action for early termination of a car wash distributor franchise, the Court affirmed in part a judgment for the plaintiff and found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony from the plaintiff's damages expert. Although the witness failed to address the plaintiff's historical sales performance and lacked knowledge of the car wash industry, the plaintiff was not attempting to project future sales to unknown customers but was only claiming net profit to be made on sales projected at the time the franchise was terminated, so the witness' qualifications as an expert in accounting and financial reporting were sufficient to make those calculations. In Meterlogic, Inc. v. KLT, Inc., 368 F.3d 1017 (8th Cir. 2004) , summary judgment was granted for the defendant in an action alleging misrepresentations in negotiating an agreement to sell remote monitoring and metering technology and services for business machines. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by the plaintiff's damages expert that predicted financial results 10 years into the future despite the fact that the parties' agreement was for only two years and allowed termination at any time. Moreover, the expert made assumptions that lacked foundation regarding the contract and the parties' market share and annual growth. In Ventura v. Titan Sports, Inc., n44 the Court affirmed a quantum meruit claim brought by a professional wrestler who contended that he was entitled to some of the profits from sales of videotapes on which he served as a commentator. The Court held that the expert's methodology in arriving at the royalty percentages was reliable, since he based his opinion upon a survey of thousands of licensing agreements in the field of entertainment and sports, and it is "common practice to prove the value of an article (e.g., a videotape license) by introducing transactions involving substantially similar articles (i.e., other licenses)." Remanding for further consideration of the amount of punitive damages in Robertson Oil Co. v. Phillips Petroleum Co., n45 an action for interference with a business relationship, the Court held there had been no abuse of discretion in permitting an expert to testify as to what size punitive award against a company with the defendant's net worth would be comparable to a $2, $100, or $1000 award against a "common worker," as an explanation of what the figures in the defendant's financial statements meant.

Allapattah Servs., Inc. v. Exxon Corp., 333 F.3d 1248 (11th Cir. 2003) , aff'd, 125 S. Ct. 2611 (2005) : In a class action by gasoline dealers against their supplier for breaching a sales agreement by the manner in which the supplier set wholesale prices, the defendant argued it was error to admit testimony of the dealers' expert because he had no specialized knowledge of pricing systems in the petroleum industry and because his methodology was flawed. Affirming, the Court held that given the extensive six-day Daubert hearing to determine whether the methodology was reliable, it was not an abuse of discretion to allow the expert to testify at trial, where the defendant was able to cross-examine him fully and refute his testimony through its own expert witness. In a breach of contract suit arising from a distributor's refusal to pay a manufacturer for telephones, Novatel Communications, Inc. v. Cellular Tel. Supply, Inc., n46 the Court held that an expert witness' testimony as to damages was not unduly speculative and that a past history of profits is not absolutely required to support economic projections of lost future profits.

[e] Damages -- Civil RICO

Liquid Air Corp. v. Rogers, 834 F.2d 1297 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a judgment against the defendants in a civil racketeering case, holding that the plaintiff's comptroller was properly qualified as an expert on the fair market value of gas cylinders of which the plaintiff was deprived by a fraud scheme, even though he did not explain the procedures used to determine market value, where the comptroller was responsible for determining the value of cylinders to be acquired.

Maiz v. Virani, 253 F.3d 641 (11th Cir. 2001) : In a civil RICO action to recover funds that the defendants fraudulently diverted in connection with real estate investments, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony by the plaintiffs' damages witness, an experienced economist. The witness was qualified, his theories and methodology were sufficiently reliable, and there was an adequate foundation for his assumptions.

[f] Damages -- Personal Injuries and Property Damage

Joy v. Bell Helicopter Textron, Inc., 999 F.2d 549 (D.C. Cir. 1993) : In a suit by estates of helicopter crash victims against the manufacturer of an engine, the Court held that expert testimony as to the income and investment profits one deceased would have earned should have been excluded as totally speculative. The expert "simply made up new lines of work" for the deceased and made projections regarding appreciation of a single piece of property without ascertaining the experience of investors in the market.

Marcano Rivera v. Turabo Medical Center Partnership, 415 F.3d 162 (1st Cir. 2005) : In a medical malpractice action arising from a delivery in which the infant suffered severe neurological damage, the plaintiffs offered testimony from a life-care planner regarding the projected cost of the infant's future care. Although noting that the expert's report "might have benefitted from a review of the projections" regarding the infant's future needs, the Court found there was no abuse of discretion in the determination that the expert's methodology was sufficiently reliable. The expert based his testimony on a review of records from the agency providing skilled nursing care, a letter from the infant's physician, and an interview of her family and caregiver.

Boucher v. U.S. Suzuki Motor Corp., 73 F.3d 18 (2d Cir. 1996) : The Court vacated a damages award for a plaintiff in a personal injury action, because the plaintiff's expert's calculation of the plaintiff's lost earnings was not accompanied by a sufficient factual foundation. The expert's assumptions that the plaintiff would work 40 hours per week, 52 weeks per year, with fringe benefits and regular pay increases for the rest of his career, represented a "complete break" with the plaintiff's work history of seasonal and intermittent employment. The expert also relied on unsupported assumptions concerning fringe benefits, without any evidence that the plaintiff received benefits of any kind from his employment. In a wrongful death action, Shatkin v. McDonnell Douglas Corp., n47 the Court found no error in the refusal to permit an economist to testify as to the pecuniary damage attributable to the plaintiff's loss of her son when the economist made unsupportable assumptions concerning the amount of income the son would have given the mother, cast his testimony in a way that might have resulted in jury confusion and misunderstanding, used price rather than wage inflation in projecting the son's future earnings, ignored the impact of state taxation on the son's earnings, made unwarranted assumptions about the effect of federal taxation on the earnings, and chose a discount rate that could not be supported. In Shu-Tao Lin v. McDonnell Douglas Corp., n48 the Trial Judge granted a new trial on damages subject to remittitur in an action for the wrongful death of an airline passenger, concluding that the plaintiff's economist lacked sufficient factual bases, so the opinion that he gave was not reasonably reliable. The Court agreed that the plaintiff's economist was improperly permitted to give "lengthy, extravagant and non-probative" projections of lost future income.

Elcock v. Kmart Corp., 233 F.3d 734 (3d Cir. 2000) : Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff in a slip and fall case, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit testimony from an economist whose assumptions about the plaintiff's injuries, her earning capacity before and after the accident, and her work expectancy were wholly lacking foundation in the record. In Toombs v. Manning, n49 a suit by a passenger injured by a subway train, the Court held that lost future earnings were a proper element of damages where the passenger testified as to his prior employment history and his experts testified to his preaccident potential and his now-limited economic horizons. In Salas v. Wang, n50 a medical malpractice case brought on behalf of a child who suffered severe brain damage, the Court concluded that it was not reversible error to permit a plaintiff's expert to testify as to aggregate damages, since the expert might have been able to assist the jury in performing calculations, such as a reduction of a lump sum award to present value. Ruling on evidentiary questions to provide guidance upon retrial in Gumbs v. International Harvester, Inc., n51 the Court held that the plaintiff's economic expert should not have been permitted to speculate about lost fringe benefits or lost income absent a showing of a factual basis for his projections.

Murphy v. National R.R. Passenger Corp., 547 F.2d 816 (4th Cir. 1977) : Remanding a FELA case because the Trial Judge refused to admit testimony about the qualifications of the plaintiff's experts after the defendant conceded that they were well qualified, the Court stated that expert testimony or actuarial tables on the present value of future lost earnings may be admitted and said that on retrial the Trial Judge should, on request, "explain a method of calculating present value at a rate of interest to be determined by the jury in light of prevailing economic conditions."

In re Air Crash Disaster, 795 F.2d 1230 (5th Cir. 1986) : In a suit by three children whose parents were killed in an airplane accident, the Court found that an economist's assumptions concerning the deceased father's likely annual salary increase, likely tax rate, projected savings, and national figures on consumption by families were "so abusive of the known facts, and so removed from any area of demonstrated expertise, as to provide no reasonable basis for calculating how much of [the father's] income would have found its way into assets or savings to be inherited by his children." Thus, it found the damage award to have been based on testimony that was too speculative.

Drayton v. Jiffee Chem. Corp., 591 F.2d 352 (6th Cir. 1978) : In a personal injury action the Court noted that an expert could testify about inflation rates, the value of the dollar, worker productivity, and investment rates, and could consider the possibilities that such variables would continue into the future.

Mercado v. Ahmed, 974 F.2d 863 (7th Cir. 1992) : In an action for personal injuries arising out of a taxicab accident, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding an economist with an M.B.A. from testifying as to the plaintiff's "lost pleasures of living." Despite the expert's training, extensive research, and countless calculations, it was not an abuse of discretion to rule that his testimony would not aid the jury; this conclusion may be less a reflection of the flaws in his methodology than on the impossibility of any person achieving unique knowledge of the value of life. In Nemmers v. United States, n52 the Judge ruled that the testimony of an economic expert in a medical malpractice case concerning future movement of wages must be based upon competent evidence of future economic trends (i.e., known economic facts and accepted economic theory), not the personal experience of an actuary.

Dorn v. Burlington No. Santa Fe, 397 F.3d 1183 (9th Cir. 2005) : In a wrongful death action brought after a train crash, the Trial Judge allowed the plaintiff's expert to testify to the amount of hedonic damages suffered by the victim, but refused to allow the defendant's expert to discredit the opinions of the plaintiff's expert. The Court found that this was error, declaring that the methodology employed by the plaintiff's expert was "shaky," which made it all the more necessary to allow the defendant to proffer its own expert. In Trevino v. Gates, 99 F.3d 911 (9th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed a judgment awarding only nominal damages for the plaintiff, the daughter of a man killed by the Los Angeles police during a robbery. Because there was no evidence of W-2 forms, no pay stubs, no tax returns, no canceled checks, and no employer testimony, the Court held there was no error in excluding expert testimony projecting the amount of money the deceased would have earned and paid as child support. In a civil rights action by Hmong refugees against a state employee for allegedly raping them, Dang Vang v. Vang Xiong X. Toyed, n53 the Court held there was no error in permitting a social psychologist and a clinical social worker who interviewed the plaintiffs to testify as to what each plaintiff explained had happened and the resulting problems in each plaintiff's life. Each witness was also properly permitted to give her opinion regarding the victims' psychological conditions, and her general understanding of the reactions of women to various life events including rape. The expert testimony assisted the trier of fact in assessing damages.

Smith v. Ingersoll-Rand Co., 214 F.3d 1235 (10th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a product liability action against the manufacturer of a machine for removing road pavement, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony from a forensic economist regarding hedonic damages. There was a sufficient finding that the expert's testimony explaining the concept of hedonic damages was relevant and reliable, and the expert did not apply the facts of this case to the criteria he proffered or give his opinion of the hedonic damages appropriate in this case. In a civil rights action, Malloy v. Monahan, 73 F.3d 1012 (10th Cir. 1996) , the plaintiff alleged that injuries from the defendants' use of excessive force caused him to lose profits from his business of purchasing, rehabilitating, and selling houses. The Court held that the plaintiff had sufficient expertise and personal knowledge to render an opinion as to lost future profits of his own real estate ventures. In an automobile accident case, Quinones v. Pennsylvania Gen. Ins. Co., n54 the Court held that testimony of an economist was properly excluded, since the economist based his testimony concerning the plaintiff's lost earning capacity on Department of Labor statistics for production workers in jewelry manufacturing, and those figures were not relevant to computing the income of the plaintiff, a self-employed watch repairman.

McDermott v. Middle East Carpet Co., 811 F.2d 1422 (11th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that an expert could properly rely upon financial statements from a company's fourth year of operations, which was the first full year following the rebuilding of a plant destroyed by fire, to give an opinion concerning lost profits due to a delay in starting operations.

[g] Damages -- Property Interests and Transactions

Piney Woods Country Life School v. Shell Oil Co., 726 F.2d 225 (5th Cir. 1984) : Remanding a class action involving the interpretation of royalty clauses in oil and gas leases, the Court observed that proving market value at the well often may be difficult and that completely comparable sales are not likely to be found. It suggested that the Trial Judge not reject out of hand sales with some different characteristics and that the plaintiffs "should not be faced with the impossible task of establishing market value with absolute certainty or perfection."

Ellis v. Gallatin Steel Co., 390 F.3d 461 (6th Cir. 2004) : Affirming in part a judgment for the plaintiffs in a nuisance action arising from industrial pollution, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony from the plaintiffs' damages expert. The Trial Judge's failure to mention the Daubert factors was not error when they were not pertinent -- here, "an accurate assessment of a local real-estate market does not require peer review or extensive scholarly writing." The expert's failure to consider other possible sources of pollution did not render his testimony unreliable, and he applied the correct legal standard for damages (diminution in value of use of the property) at trial, although he initially erred in applying the diminution in market value standard.

American Nat'l Bank v. K-Mart Corp., 717 F.2d 394 (7th Cir. 1983) : In a suit by a tenant against a landlord for breach of a duty to keep premises in repair, the Court held it was error to exclude the testimony of a real estate appraiser who had estimated the difference in the rental value of the premises in and out of repair. Although the tenant had not actually tried to sublet the property, the bases for the expert opinion were not too speculative to support an opinion.

Masayesva v. Hale, 118 F.3d 1371 (9th Cir. 1997) : In an action to recover damages from the use of lands jointly by the Navajo Nation and the Hopi Tribe, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by an economist regarding the fair value of Navajo grazing. Although the witness was not a real estate appraiser, he was a professor who had taught and written about "rangeland appraisal" and "range economic analysis" for 25 years, and his testimony derived from a relatively straightforward application of range economics rather than a novel scientific theory.

Atlantic Richfield Co. v. Farm Credit Bank, 226 F.3d 1138 (10th Cir. 2000) : In an action related to oil and gas leases in which one of the issues was the value of carbon dioxide gas used to extract oil, the defendants' expert economist proposed to testify based not on actual sales prices but on a hypothetical construct because, in his view, there was neither a competitive market nor "reliable actual sales" of the gas in the area. The Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the expert's testimony, since his opinions were formed specifically for the litigation, he had not employed his theory previously, his opinions had not been published or subjected to peer review, and his analysis disregarded or failed to account for the prices actually received by certain suppliers in the market and in comparable markets. In Ramsey v. Culpepper, n55 the Court affirmed a judgment for a lessor who alleged negligence and fraud on the part of a realtor, and held that an economist-mathematician was properly permitted to testify on the question of damages where the case involved complicated mathematical principles, and that the expert could rely upon the real estate transactions to which a real estate appraiser had testified during the trial.

[h] Damages -- Other Cases

Fashion Boutique of Short Hills, Inc. v. Fendi USA, Inc., 314 F.3d 48, 2002-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P73909 (2d Cir. 2002) : The plaintiff alleged that a competitor engaged in product disparagement and other conduct that led to lost business and the eventual closing of its store. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of expert testimony regarding the plaintiff's damages. The witness assumed that a "campaign of disparagement" caused sales to decline; however, that was never proved. Furthermore, his generalized findings about the value of the business did not comply with the requirement under the governing state law that damages for named customers be itemized.

Sommers Drug Stores Co. Employee Profit Sharing Trust v. Corrigan Enters., 793 F.2d 1456 (5th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a judgment in favor of a trust that sued an employer and its principal shareholder alleging breach of fiduciary duty. It concluded that an expert's failure to consider relevant factors or to explain his reasons for disregarding them rendered his testimony unworthy of credit. Thus, it could not be used as a basis for determining the fair market value of the trust's stock for purposes of calculating damages.

Douglass v. Hustler Magazine, Inc., 769 F.2d 1128 (7th Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed an actress' judgment against a magazine for invasion of privacy, finding that an economist's calculation of lost earnings was erroneous because he failed to consider the "extreme riskiness" of the plaintiff's earnings stream. The Court reasoned that an adjustment was required "to reflect the preference of a risk-averse individual for a smaller amount, received with certainty, to a larger expected amount that is subject to great uncertainty." It also found that the expert erred in failing to consider the plaintiff's opportunities in other markets outside of Chicago where she had been making commercials.

Group Health Plan, Inc. v. Philip Morris USA, Inc., 344 F.3d 753, 2003-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P74152 (8th Cir. 2003) : Health maintenance organizations sued to recover for tobacco-related health care costs allegedly caused by the defendant tobacco companies conspiring to conceal the risks of smoking and to avoid developing safer tobacco products. The Judge excluded testimony by the plaintiffs' expert, a physician and economics professor, regarding the damage caused by the "disinformation effect" (how accurate disclosures would have affected smoking start and quit rates) and the "retardation-of-innovation effect" (how R&D spending equivalent to the chemical and drug industries would have reduced average tar yields). The testimony was seen as unduly speculative regarding the relations between advertising and initiation or quit rates and between spending and innovation, and as internally inconsistent because it failed to account for the relationship between innovation and information in the counterfactual situations he was positing. Affirming in part summary judgment for the defendants, the Court found that although the issue was close, there was no clear error in excluding the testimony. Several of the witness' predictions of the situation in the absence of the defendants' conspiracy were "inspired guesses at best." Moreover, the expert had taken lower tar as a measure of improvement, which was inconsistent with the plaintiffs' contention that the defendants had fraudulently marketed "low tar" and "light" cigarettes as healthier despite their knowledge that smokers would find way to compensate for the reductions, so the expert's opinions did not properly "fit" the plaintiffs' case. In an action for wrongful discharge, Norton v. Caremark, Inc., 20 F.3d 330 (8th Cir. 1994) , the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by the plaintiff's damages expert, as his calculations and assumptions were the subject of rigorous cross-examination and even if they were flawed, they were not so fundamentally unsupported as to be of no assistance to the jury.

Micro Chem., Inc. v. Lextron, Inc., 317 F.3d 1387 (Fed. Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for the patent holder in an infringement action, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony regarding reasonable royalties. The expert's testimony was based on a reliable methodology -- using the conceptual framework of a hypothetical negotiation between patentee and infringer -- and the fact it was based on the plaintiff's version of the contested facts did not affect admissibility, since the defendants had ample opportunity through cross-examination and their own expert to present their competing version.

[26] Daubert Hearings

United States v. Yousef, 327 F.3d 56 (2d Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions for a conspiracy to bomb United States commercial airliners in southeast Asia and for crimes relating to the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center, the Court found that the defendants were not prejudiced by a ruling barring presentation at trial of any defense expert witnesses who did not testify at a Daubert hearing, as the defendants failed to show that the ruling prevented them from calling any additional experts. Moreover, the Trial Judge was within his discretion in refusing to postpone the Daubert hearing, given the facts that jury selection was underway when the hearing occurred, and that holding the hearing thereafter would have interrupted the trial and wasted the time of the jury.

Elcock v. Kmart Corp., 233 F.3d 734 (3d Cir. 2000) : To establish the extent of her disability and lost earning capacity resulting from a slip and fall, the plaintiff offered opinion testimony from a witness that was based on her psychological condition, the extent of her physical injuries, employment factors, and tests performed on the plaintiff. The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff, holding that significant reliability questions regarding the expert's methodology made it error to deny a Daubert hearing, which would have permitted a fuller assessment of his analytical processes and was therefore a necessary predicate to a proper determination as to the reliability of his methods. In Oddi v. Ford Motor Co., 234 F.3d 136 (3d Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed a summary judgment for the manufacturer of a truck and a chassis in a suit by a truck driver who was injured when his truck struck a guardrail and a bridge abutment pierced the floor of his cab. The Court found no error in excluding evidence from the plaintiff's engineering experts without a full-fledged Daubert hearing. It distinguished its decision in Padillas v. Stork-Gamco, Inc. (infra), which had emphasized the importance of an in limine hearing on Daubert challenges even in the absence of a request for such a hearing when admissibility turns on factual issues, on the ground that in this case the Trial Judge had sufficient evidence -- a preliminary report, an amended report, an affidavit challenging the witness, and two depositions -- to make a decision without a hearing. In Padillas v. Stork-Gamco, Inc., n56 the Trial Judge granted summary judgment to the defendant manufacturer in a product liability action after excluding a report prepared by the plaintiff's expert mechanical engineer. Reversing, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the report without holding a Daubert hearing. That the plaintiff did not request a hearing was immaterial, first, because of the Judge's independent responsibility to properly manage complex litigation, and, second, because the plaintiff could not have known the direction the Judge's opinion might take and thus needed an opportunity to be heard on the critical issues before his case was dismissed. In Holbrook v. Lykes Bros. S.S. Co., n57 the Court found no error in admitting the defendant's expert testimony without having held a Daubert hearing. The Court noted that the Judge had scheduled a Daubert hearing, but that plaintiff's counsel was unprepared. At that point, it was sufficient for the Judge to entertain a motion to strike at trial.

Nelson v. Tennessee Gas Pipeline Co., 243 F.3d 244 (6th Cir. 2001) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendant in an action for injuries allegedly caused by PCB contamination from pipeline leaks, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the Magistrate Judge excluded proffered testimony from the plaintiffs' witnesses without holding a Daubert hearing. The plaintiffs had not requested such a hearing, the admissibility of the experts' testimony was fully briefed by the parties, and it was clear from the record and opinion that there was an adequate basis from which to determine the reliability and validity of the experts' opinions. In Clay v. Ford Motor Co., 215 F.3d 663 (6th Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the estates of passengers in a Ford Bronco II who were killed in a rollover accident. The defendant had requested a hearing on a motion in limine to exclude the plaintiff's accident reconstruction expert, but the Trial Judge denied the request because it was made only one week before trial. The majority concluded that, although the record did not explicitly state that the expert's testimony was relevant and reliable, it was clear that the Judge had so found from the rulings on motions made by the defendant during trial. The dissenting Judge was troubled that the Trial Judge did not make an initial assessment of the expert's testimony and never made an express assessment at any time.

Gruca v. Alpha Therapeutic Corp., 51 F.3d 638 (7th Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed judgments for the defendant blood plasma manufacturers in a wrongful death action arising from a hemophiliac's death from AIDS, holding, inter alia, that it was error for the Trial Judge to decline to determine the admissibility under Daubert of the plaintiffs' proffered expert testimony concerning antigenic stimulation.

United States v. Robertson, 387 F.3d 702 (8th Cir. 2004) : Affirming drug and firearm convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by detectives that the amount of drugs possessed by the defendant was a "distribution amount." The detectives had adequate training and experience and the Judge performed the proper gatekeeping function in screening the testimony, even though the Judge did not hold a Daubert hearing. In In re Air Crash at Little Rock, Ark., on June 1, 1999, 291 F.3d 503 (8th Cir. 2002) , an airline passenger's personal injury action under the Warsaw Convention, the Court found that the Trial Judge did not engage in a proper Daubert inquiry when the airline objected that the theory that PTSD results in physical changes to the brain is not a recognized psychiatric concept, but that the airline requested a Daubert hearing too late: "We agree with the district court that when reasonably possible, Daubert issues should be raised prior to trial and that ideally the Daubert 'hearing' should not be conducted following a fifteen-minute morning recess shortly before the expert is scheduled to testify." In United States v. Evans, 272 F.3d 1069 (8th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed convictions for violations of the Mann Act, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony from a law enforcement agent concerning the operation of a prostitution ring. The defendant complained that the Trial Judge erred in refusing to conduct a Daubert hearing, but the Court held that there is no requirement that a Daubert hearing always be held.

United States v. Mendoza-Paz, 286 F.3d 1104 (9th Cir. 2002) : In a drug smuggling prosecution, the Trial Judge conducted a Daubert hearing in the jury's presence and admitted a government expert's opinion on the value of drugs found hidden in the defendant's car. Affirming, the Court found no error in holding the Daubert hearing in the presence of the jury, and noted that although the Supreme Court, in its Daubert trilogy, had stated that "the inquiry is a 'preliminary' one, to be made 'at the outset,' this does not mean that it must be made in a separate, pretrial hearing, outside the presence of the jury." In In re Hanford Nuclear Reservation Litig., 292 F.3d 1124 (9th Cir. 2002) , the Court, although reversing summary judgment, stated that it was not necessarily an abuse of discretion to fail to hold a Daubert hearing before excluding the expert testimony of plaintiffs' radiation experts. The Trial Court had before it the experts' reports, some deposition testimony, and the experts' affidavits; it therefore could have determined that it had an adequate record before it to make a ruling on the reliability of the experts' testimony. In a prosecution for importing marijuana, United States v. Alatorre, n58 the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to hold a pretrial Daubert hearing before admitting testimony from a Customs agent regarding issues of value, distributable quantity, and structure and organization. Kumho makes clear that no particular procedure is required, and counsel's voir dire of the witness at trial in this case was sufficient for the discharge of the gatekeeping function.

Dodge v. Cotter Corp., 328 F.3d 1212 (10th Cir. 2003) : The Court reversed a judgment for plaintiffs in a pollution action by nearby residents against a uranium mill because the Trial Court "did not perform its gatekeeper function" with respect to three of the plaintiffs' experts. Even if the Judge's findings had not lacked sufficient specificity to allow review, it was an abuse of discretion to limit the length of any Daubert brief and appendix to 20 pages, to insist on the exclusive use of argument and proffers at the Daubert hearing instead of live witness testimony, to conduct a Daubert hearing that allowed for "little more than a cursory review of the contested issues," to reserve ruling on admissibility until trial, to decline proffers of experts' reports, and to place greater emphasis in the experts' voir dire on keeping it brief than on reviewing their reasoning and methodology. The Court concluded that "[a]though each of the court's decisions taken by itself might well be within its discretion, taken together, these decisions placed an unreasonable limitation on the information available to the court and in our view exceeded the bounds of permissible choice in the circumstances." In one of the prosecutions for bombing the Federal Building in Oklahoma City, United States v. Nichols, 169 F.3d 1255 (10th Cir. 1999) , the government introduced testimony by a forensic explosives expert, who gave opinions about the type and size of the bomb that was used. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the refusal to hold a Daubert hearing, where the defendant did not challenge the expert's methodology, but only whether the test results were undercut by flaws in the application, e.g., the care and maintenance of equipment used. It was within the Trial Judge's discretion to decide that questions of misapplication of a scientific procedure go to weight as well as to admissibility, and that it would therefore conserve judicial resources to have foundation evidence presented at trial rather than at a hearing outside the jury's presence, so long as a ruling on admissibility was made at some time.

[27] Designation As "Expert"

United States v. Williams, 81 F.3d 1434 (7th Cir. 1996) : The Trial Judge in a drug conspiracy trial designated a prosecution witness who translated the conspiracy's code for the jury as an "expert witness." The Court noted that one did not need to be impartial or a member of a learned profession to be an expert witness under the Rules, and held that the witness in question need not be designated an expert because he was testifying from personal knowledge about the meaning of the terms. Any risk that the unnecessary designation in this case puffed the witness up too much was waived by the defendants' failure to request an instruction that an " 'expert witness' is not necessarily a person of learning and probity."

[28] Differential Diagnosis

Clausen v. M/V New Carissa, 339 F.3d 1049 (9th Cir. 2003) : In an action by owners of an oyster farm claiming that an oil spill caused all the oysters to die, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of causation testimony from the plaintiffs' expert. The expert properly applied a differential diagnosis based on a detailed history of the oyster site, evidence of the oil spill's extent, testing of oysters for oil, and the geographical and temporal proximity of the oyster deaths to the oil spill. The fact that there was no established minimum threshold for oyster death from oil, nor published studies on the toxic effects of oil on shellfish, did not make the expert's evaluation mere guesswork. Finally, the Court found the expert had "provided specific reasons" for ruling out low salinity as the cause, including the fact that the oysters did not exhibit the characteristics of low salinity mortality.

Goebel v. Denver & R.G.W. R.R., 346 F.3d 987 (10th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for an employee claiming that he sustained acute high altitude cerebral edema (HACE) as a result of exposure to diesel fumes in a high-altitude railroad tunnel, the Court found no abuse of discretion in a determination that the plaintiff's expert's differential diagnosis was reliable. The diagnosis followed a standard and accepted methodology, the expert adequately explained why the plaintiff might not have exhibited every symptom of the diagnosed condition, and the expert adequately considered and ruled out most of the alternative explanations for HACE. The Court concluded that there were reasons why the expert did not diagnose other causes as the specific cause of the plaintiff's injuries and that "any weaknesses should have been diligently pursued and exposed on cross examination."

[29] Drug Traffickers as Expert Witnesses

United States v. Vesey, 338 F.3d 913 (8th Cir. 2003) : Affirming drug trafficking convictions, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to exclude a defense witness called as an expert to testify to how drug operations are normally conducted and to counter the testimony of the government's expert witness. The witness had been excluded on the ground that he gave contradictory and evasive responses, which erroneously shifted the focus to the witness' credibility rather to his qualification on the basis of experience. The Court found that he had extensive knowledge, which he used to formulate general rules of drug trafficking behavior, and that he applied the rules to explain the behavior of the actors in this case.

[30] Economists

Mathis v. Exxon Corp., 302 F.3d 448 (5th Cir. 2002) : In a breach of contract action by gasoline station franchisees complaining that the defendant set prices to drive them out of business, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony from an economist offered by the plaintiff to show that the defendant's gas price was higher that what could be considered "commercially reasonable." The expert was qualified and was reliable, since he drew on general business and economic principles that satisfy the Daubert factors. Given the focus of his testimony on the defendant's pricing, there was no need for him to isolate the precise impact on each station, and its reliability was not affected by any error in defining the competitive market for each station.

[31] Employment Discrimination Cases

[a] Expert Testimony Admissible or Admission Required

Hopkins v. Price Waterhouse, 825 F.2d 458 (D.C. Cir. 1987) , rev'd on other grounds, 490 U.S. 228 (1989) : The Court of Appeals affirmed a finding that stereotypical attitudes impermissibly affected partnership selection in the defendant's firm. It approved the Judge's reliance on a social psychologist's testimony that the plaintiff was the victim of stereotyping. The expert relied upon written reactions to the plaintiff and male candidates for partnership and on other factors ordinarily considered by stereotyping experts.

Freeman v. Package Machinery Co., 865 F.2d 1331 (1st Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed an employee's judgment in an age discrimination suit, finding that expert statistical evidence was properly admitted. The expert's decision to focus on all terminations, whether listed as voluntary or involuntary, was not unusual and reflected the reality that the circumstances surrounding terminations were disputed.

Tyler v. Union Oil Co., 304 F.3d 379 (5th Cir. 2002) : In an age discrimination case, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony for the plaintiffs by a statistician. Although the class protected by the ADEA is employees over 40, the Court held that statistical groupings comparing employees over 50 with those under 50 were permissible, since an ADEA plaintiff may establish a prima facie case by showing replacement by someone younger, even if the replacement was within the protected class. Objections that the expert had created his own database, to the omission of variables, and to the use of age as a continuous variable in the analysis went to weight rather than admissibility.

McMahon v. Libbey-Owens-Ford Co., 870 F.2d 1073 (6th Cir. 1989) : Affirming a judgment for employees in an age discrimination case, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony concerning a statistical comparison of new hirees and employees transferred from other divisions with those terminated. The employer had a full chance to cross-examine the expert and to present its own expert and to explore its claim that the ages in the applicant pool would control the ages of new hirees.

Bell v. Environmental Protection Agency, 232 F.3d 546 (7th Cir. 2000) : EPA employees who had been denied promotions brought Title VII claims based on race and national origin discrimination. Reversing summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held it was error not to have considered expert evidence that there were statistically significant differences between native and foreign born applicants in receiving promotions and that there were differences, although not statistically significant, regarding promotion of African-Americans. Although statistics cannot be used as the primary means of establishing discrimination in disparate treatment situations, they can be used in conjunction with other evidence of disparate treatment to show whether the alleged disparity is the result of discrimination. The Court also held that the plaintiffs' analysis of all promotions in the upper Midwest region of the EPA, rather than just the 16 eligible applicants for the position used by the Judge, encompassed the appropriate labor market. In Adams v. Ameritech Servs., Inc., 231 F.3d 414 (7th Cir. 2000) , an age discrimination action by employees terminated or demoted during a downsizing program, summary judgment was granted for the defendants after evidence from a statistician that showed correlations between the ages of employees and the companies' decisions to terminate was excluded. Reversing, the Court observed that statistical evidence can be very useful to prove discrimination when the theory is disparate treatment or discriminatory pattern and practice, although it will likely not be sufficient in itself. The Court concluded that the expert's studies were prepared in a reliable and statistically sound way, containing relevant evidence that a trier of fact would have been entitled to consider. In Bryant v. City of Chicago, n59 minorities challenged an examination for promotion to police lieutenant under Title VII). The Court held that there was no error in admitting testimony by the City's expert witness, who prepared the examination, that the skills tested were related to the testee's effectiveness as a police lieutenant. The expert based his opinion on a detailed job analysis, and on his own extensive, peer-reviewed publications on the subject of employee selection and promotion. In Webb v. City of Chester, n60 the Court affirmed a judgment for a plaintiff who claimed that she was discharged from her position as a police officer because of her sex, and upheld the admission of expert testimony concerning the appropriateness of her behavior in incidents relied upon by the defendants as the basis for the discharge.

Hartley v. Dillard's, Inc., 310 F.3d 1054 (8th Cir. 2002) : The defendant in an age discrimination case asserted that it had terminated the plaintiff as a store manager for failure to meet sales and profit goals. The plaintiff offered an economist to testify that the financial problems of the store were consistent with what was happening to department stores in malls around the country, suggesting that the defendant's explanation was pretextual. The Court, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting the testimony, rejected the defendant's contention that the testimony was not based on sufficient facts or data because some of the materials relied on did not squarely support the testimony. Unless the expert's opinion is " 'so fundamentally unsupported that it can offer no assistance to the jury,' " the strength of the factual basis goes only to weight and is a matter for cross-examination. In Wilmington v. J.I. Case Co., n61 the Court upheld a judgment for a plaintiff who sued his employer for race discrimination, finding no error in the admission of expert testimony that the relationship between the number of blacks employed by the defendant and the percentage of discharged workers who were black was statistically significant. Although there were only 27 discharges, the Court found that the statistical base was not too small to support the testimony.

Corneveaux v. CUNA Mut. Ins. Group, 76 F.3d 1498 (10th Cir. 1996) : The Court held it was an abuse of discretion to preclude an expert in educational and value testing from testifying on behalf of the plaintiff in an employment discrimination case that the employer had improperly used screening tests to confirm his preexisting notions about the plaintiff. The Court observed that "[t]his kind of value/aptitude testing is science, and it is the paradigmatic role of experts to help juries understand the application of science."

Busby v. City of Orlando, 931 F.2d 764 (11th Cir. 1991) : The Court reversed in part a judgment against a discharged black employee of a city police department, and held that the plaintiff's expert witness should have been permitted to introduce testimony and a graph summarizing and explaining raw data introduced at trial in support of the plaintiff's claim of racial discrimination; without the witness' testimony there was no way for the jury to discern the meaning of the data accurately. The witness, a psychological counselor, should also have been permitted to give testimony on the psychological impact of the termination, as it was directly relevant to the issue of damages.

[b] Employment Discrimination Cases -- Expert Testimony Excludable or Exclusion Required

Nance v. Librarian of Congress, 661 F. Supp. 794 (D.D.C. 1987) : The Trial Judge concluded that expert testimony offered by the plaintiff in a Title VII suit alleging racial discrimination had no probative value, where the expert's credentials were marginal, he made inaccurate assumptions concerning the qualities that a job entailed, he was unable to provide specific numerical ratings for job candidates, and the rating system he used was not part of the selection process of the employer.

Patterson v. McLean Credit Union, 805 F.2d 1143 (4th Cir. 1986) , vacated in part on other grounds, 491 U.S. 164 (1989) : The Court affirmed a judgment against a plaintiff who alleged racial discrimination in employment, finding no error in the exclusion of testimony by an expert in personnel administration that the plaintiff was better qualified than a person who was promoted. The Trial Judge could well have found that the testimony would not have been helpful to the jury in assessing the relative qualifications of the two people.

Mu noz v. Orr, 200 F.3d 291 (5th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants in a Title VII class action by Hispanic males challenging promotion practices at an Air Force base. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence from the plaintiffs' statistical expert, since his reports were unreliable in both particular miscalculations and their general approach to the analysis. The analysis failed to meet the standards for admission of scientific evidence, as the methods were not in accord with those of experts in the field. In Mercado v. Austin Police Dep't, n62 the Court found no error in the exclusion of an expert's opinion that discrimination was an element of a personnel decision on the ground that it would not be helpful in an employment discrimination case.

Bennett v. Roberts, 295 F.3d 687 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming summary judgment granted against an African-American applicant who alleged racial discrimination in a school district's hiring practices, the Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence from the plaintiff's statistical expert, since the expert had not properly identified the relevant labor market in his analysis. The expert had not considered the degree to which potential applicants in the metropolitan statistical area would be interested in working in the district, the effects of commuting patterns on the relevant pool, or the extent to which the district would hire applicants from within the state. In Lang v. Kohl's Food Stores, Inc., 217 F.3d 919 (7th Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed judgments for the employer on claims by women bakery and deli clerks that they were discriminated against relative to male produce clerks, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by plaintiffs' expert that the three departments' positions were "virtually identical in terms of their basic function and ... substantially equal in terms of skill, effort, responsibility and working conditions." The conclusion was unsupported except for a list of the clerks' duties without any indication of the actual tasks performed, and a supplemental report based on discussions with a "focus group" of eight bakery or deli workers "did little more than parrot" the plaintiffs' belief that their duties required as much skill as produce duties. In Huey v. United Parcel Serv., n63 the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in a race discrimination and retaliation action brought by a former employee, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony from a "forensic vocational expert" with a Ph.D. in human resource development. The expert's opinion was based only on speaking with the plaintiff and reading documents supplied by the plaintiff's counsel; there was no showing how his specialized knowledge had been employed to analyze the plaintiff's situation; and the conclusion was simply that the plaintiff was the victim of a retaliatory discharge for racially motivated reasons. In Sheehan v. Daily Racing Form, Inc., n64 the plaintiff, suing sued for age discrimination when he was terminated in a corporate downsizing, opposed the employer's motion for summary judgment with the affidavit of a statistician, who compared the age of those dismissed and those retained, and concluded that the probability that retention of office personnel was uncorrelated with age was less than five percent. Affirming the grant of summary judgment to the employer, the Court held that the affidavit failed to meet the Daubert standard: the statistician's methodology was defective, and his failure to make any adjustment for variables bearing on the decision whether to discharge or retain a person on the list other than age indicated a failure to exercise the degree of care that a statistician would use in his scientific work, outside the context of litigation.

Corneveaux v. CUNA Mut. Ins. Group, 76 F.3d 1498 (10th Cir. 1996) : In an employment discrimination case, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a psychologist was precluded from explaining what the employer's notations of age and reliance on second-hand reports indicated about his decision-making process in hiring, as the jury had other testimony about those practices.

Hill v. Seaboard Coast Line R.R., 767 F.2d 771 (11th Cir. 1985) : The Court found no abuse of discretion in the rejection of an employer's expert testimony that those promoted were more qualified than the plaintiffs in a discrimination case, since the expert used an assessment method that differed from the employer's.

[32] Engineers

[a] Expert Testimony Admissible or Admission Required

Babcock v. General Motors Corp., 299 F.3d 60 (1st Cir. 2002) : The plaintiff's decedent was thrown from a pickup truck in a collision, allegedly because of a defect in the locking mechanism of his seatbelt that permitted it to become unbuckled as soon as pressure was exerted upon it. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found no error in the admission of testimony by a mechanical engineer that, inter alia, the decedent's seatbelt had disengaged during impact and the disengagement was caused by a design defect, since the testimony rested on a reliable foundation and was relevant to the issues in the case. In Correa v. Cruisers Div., 298 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2002) , a breach of warranty action arising from the sale of a motorboat, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the testimony by the plaintiffs' mechanical engineer that the engines' fuel management system was defective. The Court noted that the expert's 20 years of experience repairing marine engines was sufficient to qualify him, and his visual inspection and removal of a spark plug was adequate to support an opinion.

Tormenia v. First Investors Realty Co., 251 F.3d 128 (3d Cir. 2001) : The Court found no abuse of discretion when the plaintiff in an action resulting from a revolving door accident offered causation testimony from a civil engineer with a master's degree who had taught engineering for 32 years. Although the expert's opinion was not based on a direct inspection of the door, his use of the plaintiff's account of the accident, the defendants' interrogatory responses concerning the maintenance schedule, and his experience with similar mechanical devices was not so unreliable that his testimony, which was based on general principles of physical science and his own experience with similar mechanisms, should have been found inadmissible.

Maryland Cas. Co. v. Therm-O-Disc., Inc., 137 F.3d 780 (4th Cir. 1998) : In a subrogation action arising from a fire, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by the plaintiff's engineering expert that the fire was caused by a malfunction in a thermostat manufactured by the defendant. The witness was an electrical engineer with extensive experience, who through his testimony "established that his opinion was based on his examination of the conditions inside the disputed switch and the application of principles of electrical engineering to those conditions." He also cited numerous works of technical literature in support of his methodology.

Smith v. Ford Motor Co., 215 F.3d 713 (7th Cir. 2000) : The Trial Judge granted the defendant's motion to exclude the plaintiff's experts and then dismissed a suit by the driver of a car injured when he fell asleep and his car ran off the road. One of the experts was a metallurgical engineer with 40 years of experience in the field; another had a degree in mechanical engineering and over ten years' experience in automobile accident reconstruction and automobile mechanical failure analysis. Although the Court agreed that the two experts were not qualified as automotive engineers, it noted that they were qualified to testify to how the relevant parts were manufactured and why they might have failed. The Court also disagreed with the Judge's exclusive reliance on the fact that neither expert had had his work published in a peer-reviewed journal in ruling that the experts' testimony was unreliable under Daubert. It was also error to conclude that the testimony would not be helpful because the experts could not conclusively determine whether a design or manufacturing defect caused the failure in the steering gear; the testimony was relevant and there is no requirement that an expert testify to the ultimate issue in the case. In an FELA action by an employee suing for injuries allegedly sustained when lightning struck a railroad tower, Walker v. Soo Line R.R., 208 F.3d 581 (7th Cir. 2000) , an electrical engineering professor gave deposition testimony about different ways that lightning could have penetrated the tower, starting from assumptions about lightning hits in different places in the railroad yard. The Judge admitted only those portions of the testimony that addressed the dangers if the tower had been struck directly, and only in rebuttal to contradict testimony from the defendant's expert. Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to limit the plaintiff's expert's testimony, since the testimony could have been helpful in determining whether lightning injured the plaintiff, even though the expert could not say with any certainty where exactly lightning hit the rail yard, if it hit the yard at all. The Court also held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony regarding the safety of the tower from an electrical engineer proffered by the defendant. The expert was qualified by experience, and inadequacies in the inspection on which his opinions were based went only to credibility. In a product liability case, DePaepe v. General Motors Corp., n65 the plaintiff's engineering expert testified that the sun visor on a car was defective because it did not comply with federal regulations. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff on other grounds, the Court found that the defendant's Daubert attack on this testimony was properly rejected. The defendant "lampooned" the tests used by the plaintiff's expert, but failed to indicate how the methodology employed by the expert was any different from that generally employed by other professionals in the field. The Court did, however, find error when the plaintiff's expert was permitted to testify that the defendant had changed the design of its sun visors "to save money." The Trial Judge had stated that "as an expert, he can speculate," but the Court responded that "the whole point of Daubert is that experts can't 'speculate.' They need adequately sound bases for their opinion." Since the expert knew nothing about how or why the defendant reached its conclusion to change the sun visors, he could not testify as to the defendant's motive.

Miles v. General Motors Corp., 262 F.3d 720 (8th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for a truck manufacturer sued by a motorcyclist who was injured in a collision with a truck, the Court upheld the admission of testimony by a mechanical engineer and an engineer specializing in biomechanics and accident reconstruction. The Court found that the mechanical engineer provided highly useful testimony regarding the general purpose of bumpers, how they are tested, and the design of the truck's bumper. Although the plaintiff complained that the accident reconstructionist had not examined the x-rays of the plaintiff's leg, the motorcycle, the truck, or the accident scene, the Court noted that the expert had examined the police report, photographs of the scene, the plaintiff's medical records including reports that interpreted his x-rays, witness statements and depositions, and medical literature. Thus, the plaintiff's criticisms were a proper subject for cross-examination rather than a reason to exclude the testimony.

Quiet Technology DC-8, Inc. v. Hurel-Dubois UK Ltd., 326 F.3d 1333 (11th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant manufacturer of a thrust reverser that the plaintiff company wanted to employ in a jet engine, the Court upheld the admission of expert testimony for the defendant based upon a "CFD study," which "is a relatively new scientific discipline that uses computer models to measure fluid dynamics, e.g., the flow of air around and through a jet engine." The plaintiff also had used CFD studies in the course of trying to improve the performance of engine parts. The expert had worked with CFD for 20 years and had performed more than 40 CFD studies and assisted in 80 additional studies. The Court noted that identifying flaws in the application of generally reliable scientific evidence, such as CFD analysis "is precisely the role of cross-examination."

[b] Engineers -- Expert Testimony Excludable or Exclusion Required

Koken v. Black & Veatch Const., Inc., 426 F.3d 39 (1st Cir. 2005) : In an action involving injury to property after a fire blanket failed to control a welding fire, the Court found no error in the exclusion of testimony from an engineer that there should have been a warning on the fire blanket "that it was inappropriate for cutting operations." The expert "completely failed to articulate any methodology for determining the appropriateness of a fire blanket for particular operations."

Zaremba v. General Motors Corp., 360 F.3d 355 (2d Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants in a product liability action arising from a rollover accident, finding no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the plaintiffs' expert's opinion that an alternative design for the car would have made it more crashworthy. The witness had not performed tests on his alternative design, had not subjected it to peer review or publication, and had not shown general acceptance of his design or his methodology. Further, he could not rely on tests conducted by the defendant, since neither those tests nor models, calculations, or drawings from the witness showed that the witness' hypothetical alternative design would have resulted in greater safety in the accident at issue. The Court noted that the witness had been given "the benefit of a substantial doubt" when he was found a qualified expert, since he had only a bachelor's degree in engineering and his only practical experience was in designing parts for automobile air bags; all his remaining employment had been consulting for purposes of litigation, primarily as an accident reconstructionist.

Oddi v. Ford Motor Co., 234 F.3d 136 (3d Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the defendants in a suit by a truck driver who was injured when his truck struck a guardrail and a bridge abutment pierced the floor of his cab. Upholding exclusion of testimony by an engineer who opined that the truck was defectively designed, the Court found that the witness failed to test either of the two hypotheses he offered to support his opinion; he claimed he had studied bread trucks but could not say if they were the same kind as the plaintiff drove or were manufactured by the same manufacturer; he failed completely to consider that the design of the guardrail might have been the cause of the accident; his opinion was inconsistent with the laws of physics; he did not attempt to calculate the force inflicted by the truck on the guardrail or the strength of the guardrail; and he had no way of knowing if his suggested modifications of design would have been an improvement.

American & Foreign Ins. Co. v. General Elec. Co., 45 F.3d 135 (6th Cir. 1995) : In an action arising from a fire in a school building, the Trial Judge excluded testimony from the plaintiff's expert, an electrical engineer, that the fire was caused by a defectively designed and manufactured circuit breaker. While the ruling was made before Daubert, the Court held that the Judge's reasoning was equally sound after Daubert. The expert's testimony had been properly excluded because: his theories about circuit breakers were not accepted by experts in the field; he did not follow protocol when conducting his tests on the circuit breaker in question; the raw data of the expert's test was not preserved; and his instruments were not calibrated.

Chapman v. Maytag Corp., 297 F.3d 682 (7th Cir. 2002) : The Court reversed a judgment for a plaintiff whose husband was electrocuted when he touched a metal surface energized by a current emanating from a kitchen range, because testimony from the plaintiff's expert, who had an undergraduate degree in mechanical engineering, did not qualify under Daubert. The expert had not tested his thesis and shown it to be reliable; he had not conducted any scientific tests or experiments in order to arrive at his conclusions; and he never produced any studies, tests or experiments to justify or verify his conclusions. Thus, he was not utilizing a scientific methodology, which is "Daubert's most significant guidepost." The witness also failed to satisfy other Daubert guideposts for reliability: there was no proof his theory was generally accepted in the field, or even that it was supported in the scientific literature, and he had not published anything concerning his theory. In Goodwin v. MTD Prods., Inc., 232 F.3d 600 (7th Cir. 2000) , a plaintiff alleged that he suffered an eye injury when struck by a plastic wingnut that had vibrated loose from the lawnmower he was using. The Court affirmed a judgment against the manufacturer, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant's expert witness was not permitted to testify that the plaintiff's injury could not have been caused by a plastic wingnut discharged from a lawnmower and that he did not believe the plaintiff when he testified that he was in the operator's zone behind the mower when he was injured. The witness, a mechanical engineer with no medical training, was not qualified to give expert testimony on medical questions, including the cause of an eye injury, and the witness' opinion about the plaintiff's credibility was merely based on speculation and not the proper subject of expert testimony. In Clark v. Takata Corp., n66 a mechanical engineer was prepared to testify for the plaintiff, who was seriously injured in a rollover accident, that the lap belt disengaged during the rollover sequence and that a properly functioning lap belt would have prevented the plaintiff from striking the roof. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the expert's testimony was properly excluded. It was apparent from the expert's deposition that he had simply assumed that the lap belt had disengaged, and had formulated no independent opinion on the matter. As to whether a properly functioning lap belt would have prevented injury, the Court noted that the expert's testimony was based only on a visual inspection of the vehicle and on his experience; he conducted no tests, relied on no studies, and proffered no explanation of his methodology or of how his experience led to his conclusion. In a product liability action, Ancho v. Pentek Corp., n67 the Court upheld summary judgment for the defendant in an action by an employee who had been injured by an automatic car that transported cardboard in a factory. A mechanical engineer would have testified for the plaintiff that the entire plant should have been redesigned to provide a safer system of transporting materials. But the expert had never seen the automatic car in operation, had never visited the accident scene, and had no experience in plant design, so his testimony was properly excluded under Daubert. In Navarro v. Fuji Heavy Indus., Ltd., n68 the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in a personal injury case, holding that an engineering expert's affidavit was properly excluded under Daubert. The expert's assertion that the defendant car manufacturer should have known about the risk of internal rusting was "nakedly conclusional." The Court rejected the argument that the gaps in the expert's testimony would have been filled in if the defendant, before moving for summary judgment, had deposed the expert, since "there is no duty to cross-examine or depose your opponent's witnesses so that they can supplement the testimony they failed to give on direct examination or in their affidavit." Affirming a judgment for the defendant in a product liability case, Cummins v. Lyle Indus., n69 the Court held that the testimony of the plaintiff's design engineer, to the effect that the defendant should have used a different design to make its product safer, was properly excluded under Daubert. The expert's testimony was unscientific, because the expert had never tested his proposed alternative design. Many of the factors that must go into the conclusion that an alternative design should have been employed "are product-and-manufacturer-specific, and most cannot be determined reliably without testing."

Peitzmeier v. Hennessy Indus., Inc., 97 F.3d 293 (8th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the manufacturer of a tire changer sued by a mechanic who was injured while using the changer when a tire exploded. It held that an engineering expert's testimony was properly excluded where the expert had not designed or tested any of the proposed safety devices he claimed were missing from the tire changer, and the expert had never designed or tested a platform for a tire changer. The Court also rejected the argument that review of an expert's methodology by other Courts could constitute "peer review" within the meaning of Daubert.

Hudgens v. Bell Helicopters/Textron, 328 F.3d 1329 (11th Cir. 2003) : Affirming summary judgment for a maintenance contractor sued by two helicopter pilots who had been injured in a crash, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding expert testimony offered by the plaintiffs that cracks on the helicopter would have been visible to the naked eye. One expert who operated an electron microscope to take pictures of cracks failed to demonstrate any expertise in determining when a crack appeared and when it was visible, and another failed to account for cracks that were discovered on other helicopters in the fleet that were not visible to the naked eye. In McCorvey v. Baxter Healthcare Corp., 298 F.3d 1253 (11th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in a product liability action arising from the eruption and fragmentation of a catheter inside the plaintiff's bladder, finding no error in the exclusion of the affidavit offered by the plaintiff's engineering expert. The expert's methodology was not scientifically reliable and his causation opinion was based wholly on speculation, because he "did not test alternative designs for the catheter; did not talk to medical personnel; was unable to cite scientific literature in support of his theories; and did not consider or test possibilities for failure that could have come from sources outside the product."

[33] Environmental Experts

St. Martin v. Mobil Exploration & Production, 224 F.3d 402 (5th Cir. 2000) : In an action to recover for damages to marshland, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the plaintiffs' expert, a marshland ecologist, was permitted to testify that the defendants' failure to maintain spoil banks caused specific damage, including erosion of the grass mats in the marsh. The Court held that the lack of peer review was not dispositive because each marsh "will have different forces acting upon it, depending upon its specific location and its surroundings" and therefore "a court could not rationally expect that a marshland expert would have published a peer-reviewed paper on each possible permutation of factors or each damaged area of marsh." It was enough that the expert relied on an understanding of the applicable principles, combined with personal observation of the marsh in question.

Nutrasweet Co. v. X-L Engineering Co., 227 F.3d 776 (7th Cir. 2000) : In an action for reimbursement for cleanup costs under CERCLA, the Court found no error when the plaintiff's expert was permitted to testify that liquid compounds from the defendant's factory had run off into the plaintiff's property. The expert relied on a sequence of aerial photos to determine the flow of the liquid, and this methodology was an accepted tool in the field of hydrology and environmental engineering. The Court rejected the defendant's arguments that the testimony was unreliable because the expert had no "direct" evidence and had visited the site only once, where his opinion was based on verifiable data gathered by others. In Burns Philp Food, Inc. v. Cavalea Continental Freight, Inc., 135 F.3d 526 (7th Cir. 1998) , an action between adjoining landowners, the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding as unreliable testimony from an environmental consultant regarding indications of diesel fuel on one party's land that had allegedly run off from the other party's. The consultant's opinion was based on sampling at a single location; the District Judge suggested that more sampling was not done because the consultant "didn't want to run the risk of getting a result that he wouldn't like and wouldn't fit the conclusion he wanted to draw."

United States v. Dico, Inc., 266 F.3d 864 (8th Cir. 2001) : In a CERCLA action brought to recover response costs for contaminated groundwater, the Court found no error in the admission of testimony by the government's hydrogeologist. The computer model used by the expert was sanctioned by the EPA and is considered a standard model that is commonly used by hydrogeologists. The Court rejected Dico's claim of insufficient factual data, declaring that "the factual basis of an expert opinion goes to the credibility of the testimony, not the admissibility, and it is up to the opposing party to examine the factual basis for the opinion in cross-examination." In our view, this latter statement is incorrect under the 2000 amendment to Rule 702, which provides that an expert's testimony is admissible only if "(1) the testimony is based on sufficient facts or data ... ."

United States v. Cunningham, 194 F.3d 1186 (11th Cir. 1999) : The defendant was convicted for knowingly transporting and disposing of hazardous waste. The Court found there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony from the defendant's expert, who had a degree in chemistry, that the material at issue was not hazardous. The witness' opinion was not "scientifically valid" because he based it on an unproven testing method, he was unfamiliar with the relevant regulations, and he disagreed with the EPA's regulatory determination that barium is a hazardous waste.

[34] Ethics Expert

Dibella v. Hopkins, 403 F.3d 102 (2d Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed judgments in a libel action, holding there was no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by a defense expert on business ethics. In the expert's report, he improperly expressed an opinion on the veracity of a lay witness' testimony and inappropriately drew a legal conclusion that the plaintiff's actions amounted to extortion. Furthermore, his opinions on whether the plaintiff had acted ethically could have confused the jury, when the real issue in the case was what had actually transpired between the parties.

United States v. Kellington, 217 F.3d 1084 (9th Cir. 2000) : The defendant, an attorney with a civil practice, was charged with obstruction of justice after he conveyed instructions to remove or destroy property from a client who had been arrested as a fugitive. Although both sides were permitted to call experts to testify regarding lawyers' ethical standards, the jury was told that the evidence was simply "background" and counsel were not permitted to make ethics arguments in closing. Affirming an order granting the defendant a new trial, the Court held that the expert should have been permitted to assist the jury in understanding the special obligations of the attorney-client relationship and the defendant's likely state of mind with respect to those obligations.

Miami Int'l Realty Co. v. Paynter, 841 F.2d 348 (10th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that testimony of a legal expert as to the Code of Professional Responsibility was admissible in a legal malpractice action, since the Code established an ethical standard rather than a legal standard of professional negligence.

[35] Exhibits

Crane v. Crest Tankers, Inc., 47 F.3d 292 (8th Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in a seaman's Jones Act case because a "Future Damage Calculator" was improperly admitted into evidence. The exhibit was a slide-rule type device with life and work expectancy and present value tables. The jury was given the device with no instruction about which damages were to be reduced to present value, how the rate of interest was to be determined, or how the device was to be used, and the defendant was given no opportunity to challenge the expertise or methods of calculation of the device's author. There was no showing that the device was generally used and relied upon, although the name of the publisher ("Lawyers and Judges Publishing Co.") suggested that the judiciary had vouched for it.

[36] Experiments, Reconstructions, and Demonstrations

Wolf v. Procter & Gamble Co., 555 F. Supp. 613 (D.N.J. 1982) : The Court ruled in limine in an action against the manufacturer and distributor of a tampon to recover for toxic shock syndrome that an in-court experiment by an expert, demonstrating how a chemical in the tampon might have broken down when exposed to an enzyme found in the vagina, was helpful and would not confuse the jury.

United States v. Norris, 217 F.3d 262 (5th Cir. 2000) : The Court upheld the convictions of a lawyer for false declarations in a bankruptcy proceeding in which he testified that he had burned almost a half million dollars in cash in order to spite his former partners; the government contended that he had in fact kept the money. The Trial Judge admitted into evidence a videotape in which an ATF agent reenacted the steps that the defendant allegedly took when he burned the cash. The reenactment showed that most of the bills would not have burned. Although the Judge held that Daubert did not apply to the videotape, the Court disagreed on the ground that the ATF agent was rendering expert testimony. However, because the Judge had actually engaged in a reliability analysis, the Court held that the gatekeeping function of Daubert had occurred under a different label. In Young v. Illinois Cent. G. R.R., n70 the Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a wrongful death action, in part because the Trial Judge erroneously excluded a motion picture experiment and expert testimony offered to show how dangerous a railroad crossing was. See also Barnes v. General Motors Corp. n71(holding it was error to allow the plaintiff's expert to testify about an experiment he conducted on another automobile under significantly different circumstances from those admittedly existing at the time of the accident at issue).

Bauman v. Volkswagenwerk A.G., 621 F.2d 230 (6th Cir. 1980) : Although it reversed a plaintiffs' judgment in a product liability action on another ground, the Court approved the introduction of expert testimony based on simulated reproductions of an accident and observed that in some cases expert testimony may be the only way to establish the defectiveness of a product.

Pullman v. Land O'Lakes, Inc., 262 F.3d 759 (8th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for dairy farmers against a dairy consultant whose employee negligently prepared feed that sickened and killed dairy cows, the Court upheld the admission of an experimental test conducted at a college which sought to recreate the situation that occurred at the plaintiffs' farms when the cows became sick and died. The Court held that it was not necessary to apply Daubert to the test evidence because the experimenters offered no conclusions or opinions. In Kehm v. Procter & Gamble Mfg. Co., n72 the Court affirmed a judgment for survivors of a consumer who died from toxic shock syndrome, and ruled that it was proper to permit one of the plaintiffs' experts to perform an in-court demonstration of how a component in the manufacturer's tampons could interact with an enzyme found in the vagina to create hospitable conditions for the growth of bacteria that produce TSS toxin. Emphasizing the Trial Judge's discretion in ruling on experiments, the Court found that the similarity between the experiment and the actual phenomena it purported to represent was sufficient to warrant allowing the experiment and relying on cross-examination to point out any deficiencies.

Robinson v. Missouri Pac. R.R., 16 F.3d 1083 (10th Cir. 1994) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiffs in a wrongful death action arising out of a train's collision with a car, the Court held it was a close question, but no abuse of discretion, to admit a video animation illustrating the plaintiff's expert's theory about how the collision had occurred. The Court was bothered that the video showed the car angling toward the approach of the train and rotating at impact and spinning off the tracks, since it was also possible that the train impaled the car on its front. It suggested that as future issues arise "the district court [should] carefully and meticulously make an early pretrial evaluation of issues of admissibility, particularly of scientific expert opinions and films or animations illustrative of such opinions." In a wrongful death action arising out of a helicopter crash, Four Corners Helicopters, Inc. v. Turbomeca, S.A., 979 F.2d 1434 (10th Cir. 1992) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding videotape evidence of an experiment conducted by the defendant's expert, as there were substantial dissimilarities from the situation at issue. An experiment used simply to demonstrate the principles used in forming expert opinion need not strictly adhere to the facts, but this experiment was also used to demonstrate what the defendant believed occurred in the helicopter's engine. In Jackson v. Fletcher, n73 the Court reversed a defendant's judgment in a case arising out of an auto-truck collision on the ground that it was error to admit testimony based upon experiments conducted by the defendants' experts when the circumstances of the experiments were different from those of the accident.

[37] Expert Witness Originally Retained by Adverse Party

Peterson v. Willie, 81 F.3d 1033 (11th Cir. 1996) : In an action brought by a pretrial detainee for deliberate indifference to his medical needs, the defendants called an expert whom the plaintiff had retained and designated as an expert witness expected to testify, but who had subsequently been discharged by the plaintiff's counsel. The expert was permitted to testify for the defendants, and also to state that he had been previously retained by the plaintiff. Various approaches have been taken when an expert originally retained by one side is called by the other: some Courts permit such experts to be called, but prohibit mentioning the fact that they were originally retained by the adversary; others do not allow such experts to testify absent a showing of need. The Court concluded that the issue of whether such experts may testify is committed to the discretion of the Trial Judge, but cautioned that leave should not ordinarily be granted if other experts are readily available. As to whether the expert may refer to the previous retention, the Court concluded that "the unfair prejudice resulting from disclosing this fact usually outweighs any probative value"; however, a reference would be warranted if the adversary were to attack the qualifications of the expert. Since the plaintiff made no such attack in this case, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to permit mention of the prior retention.

[38] Eyewitness Identification

United States v. Stokes, 388 F.3d 21 (1st Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of expert testimony regarding eyewitness identification. The defense had not provided the Trial Judge "any information regarding the reliability and helpfulness of the proposed expert testimony ... [or] any indication of the existence of a special circumstance" indicating that the testimony would "assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence." In United States v. Brien, 59 F.3d 274 (1st Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed an armed bank robbery conviction, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by a defense expert on eyewitness identification, where the Trial Judge made clear his need for some proffer of data or literature underlying the expert's assumptions and conclusions but the defense offered little, despite repeated opportunities to do so. Judicial notice of the expert literature casting doubt on eyewitness evidence would not be sufficient in this case, since the helpfulness and reliability of the expert's assertions depended on the specifics underlying them. In United States v. Fosher, n74 the Trial Judge, denying a bank robbery defendant the opportunity to call a psychologist to testify about the dangers of eyewitness identification, expressed concern about the "aura of special reliability and trustworthiness" that the evidence would have and emphasized that properly instructed jurors, aided by cross-examination and professional argument, "can make an informed evaluation of eyewitness testimony without the assistance of a psychologist." The Court found no abuse of discretion, as the defendant's offer of proof supported conclusions that the testimony would have little if any relevance and its science lacked reliability that would enable it to add to the jury's common- sense evaluation.

United States v. Lumpkin, 192 F.3d 280 (2d Cir. 1999) : Affirming a narcotics conviction, the Court found no error in the exclusion of expert testimony concerning eyewitness identification. The expert would have testified that a witness' confidence in his identification is not a good predictor of accuracy, which the Court held would have usurped the role of the jurors in assessing the credibility of the identification witnesses.

United States v. Mathis, 264 F.3d 321 (3d Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions for bank robbery and conspiracy, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to exclude some expert testimony by a clinical psychologist regarding eyewitness identification. Relying heavily on its decision in United States v. Stevens, infra, the Court found that expert testimony regarding "double identification" or "post-event information" and about the relationship between accuracy of identification and confidence of a witness fit the facts of the case and should have been admitted. Testimony about "weapons focus" was relevant and should have been admitted, even though the witness who saw the defendant was a police officer. The Court declined to affirm exclusion of the evidence under Rule 403 because the "District Court explained its ruling with little more than a series of conclusions" about an "aura of reliability that's attached to an expert witness" and a danger of usurping the jury's function. The Court upheld the exclusion of expert testimony that more accurate memories are produced by objects that are viewed for longer periods of time and that once a witness makes an identification he or she will tend to stick to it. Relying on Stevens, the Court found that these topics did not require the help of an expert. In United States v. Downing, n75 the Court, vacating a fraud conviction, provided one of the most thorough discussions of the admissibility of expert testimony concerning eyewitness identification, and established a framework for evaluating scientific expert testimony that was ultimately adopted by the Supreme Court in Daubert (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 702.02[5]). On remand, n76 the Trial Judge reinstated the conviction, based on concerns about the reliability, "fit," and undue impact of the expert testimony. In United States v. Stevens, n77 a robbery and sexual assault prosecution, the Trial Judge permitted an expert psychologist to testify to the effects on identification of cross-racial identification, weapon focus, and stress, but excluded testimony on the suggestiveness of a wanted board used in the investigation, relation back in subsequent identifications, and the lack of correlation between confidence and accuracy in eyewitness identifications. Reversing, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the testimony about suggestiveness and relation back, but that excluding the lack of correlation testimony was error, because the expert's opinion was counterintuitive. In United States v. Dowling, n78 the Court affirmed bank robbery convictions, holding there was no error in excluding expert testimony on eyewitness identification on the ground that the data upon which the expert purported to rely were not tied to the facts of the case. Moreover, the defendants gave only five days' notice of their proffered expert testimony, and many of the expert's observations were of the type that did not require special expertise.

United States v. Harris, 995 F.2d 532 (4th Cir. 1993) : Affirming an armed bank robbery conviction, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding proffered expert testimony concerning the psychological limitations on eyewitness identification. The Court noted a trend in recent years to admit such testimony in narrow circumstances, but, emphasizing the Trial Judge's discretion, found nothing in the facts of the case to suggest that jurors using common sense could not assess the eyewitness identifications.

United States v. Moore, 786 F.2d 1308 (5th Cir. 1986) : Affirming extortion convictions, the Court observed that expert testimony on eyewitness identification is admissible in the sound exercise of the Trial Judge's discretion, but it found no error in the exclusion of such evidence in this case. It emphasized that "in a case in which the sole testimony is casual eyewitness identification, expert testimony regarding the accuracy of that identification is admissible and properly may be encouraged."

United States v. Langan, 263 F.3d 613 (6th Cir. 2001) : In a bank robbery prosecution, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony from a psychologist regarding the weakness of an eyewitness identification due to "unconscious transference," even though 14 months had passed between the robbery and identification of the defendant in a photo spread and the witness had seen the defendant's capture on TV news. The expert's own article noted that the literature provided "mixed and somewhat weak support" for the transference theory and that the empirical evidence for the theory was "rather meager." While the Court was hesitant to adopt all the Trial Judge's other criticisms under the "scientific knowledge" prong, it agreed that the testimony failed the "fit" requirement because it was not based on any personal knowledge of the eyewitness but only on general knowledge of the type of circumstances, and thus would not add to the ordinary knowledge of most jurors, especially when the defense had ample opportunity to cross-examine the eyewitness at trial. In United States v. Smithers, 212 F.3d 306 (6th Cir. 2000) , the Court reversed a conviction for bank robbery because the Trial Judge excluded an experienced psychologist from testifying about weaknesses in eyewitness identifications on behalf of the defense without conducting a Daubert hearing. Even apart from the Judge's comment that he was "interested in seeing what a jury will do absent that expert testimony," he abused his discretion. The particular expert's science and methodology had already been accredited by the Court; the proffered testimony could have been applied to the facts at issue; and it would have been helpful to the trier, because jurors tend to be unduly receptive to eyewitness testimony. One Judge dissented. In an armed robbery prosecution, United States v. Smith, n79 the Trial Judge rejected the defendant's proffer of a psychologist to testify about eyewitness identification on the ground that the testimony would not assist the jury in deciding the case. The Court distinguished the First Circuit's decision in Fosher, supra , on the ground that the expert in this case established the relationship between the scientific evidence and the facts, but it declined to actually find error and concluded that any error was harmless.

United States v. Carter, 410 F.3d 942 (7th Cir. 2005) : Affirming a bank robbery conviction, the Court found no error in the denial of the defendant's motion for appointment of an expert to testify on the unreliability of identifications. The Court stated that "jurors understand that memory can be less than perfect" and that "the credibility of eyewitness testimony is generally not an appropriate subject matter for expert testimony because it influences a critical function of the jury -- determining the credibility of witnesses." The Court recognized that expert testimony on the unreliability of identifications might be helpful to the jury in certain cases, but found no abuse of discretion in the conclusion below that the case "did not present an unusual or compelling situation in which the aid of an expert witness is required." In Newsome v. McCabe, 319 F.3d 301 (7th Cir. 2003) , the plaintiff, who had served 15 years of a murder sentence and was then pardoned on the ground of innocence because evidence strongly implied that another person had committed the crime, brought a § 1983 claim alleging that police officers induced three witnesses to identify him as the killer. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by a psychology professor specializing in eyewitness identifications that experiments he conducted indicated that the probability all three of the eyewitnesses, assuming they had seen the suspected killer, would have independently picked the plaintiff out of a lineup by chance error was substantially less than one in 1,000. The witness was an expert on the subject of identification, his testimony was based on sufficient data, his methods were reliable by the standards of the field, and he applied those methods reliably to the facts of the plaintiff's case. Any problems with his testimony could be sufficiently explored at trial. In United States v. Crotteau, n80 the Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, finding no error in the exclusion of the defense expert's testimony on the unreliability of eyewitness identification. The Court reasoned that this is not a proper subject matter for experts, because of its influence on the jury's credibility determinations, and also noted that it was "not necessary" because defense counsel thoroughly cross-examined the witness and there was corroborative evidence that the defendant was the robber. The Court affirmed a conviction for kidnapping and illegally transporting a teenage girl in United States v. Hall, n81 and found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of expert testimony by a psychologist concerning the scientific bases for eyewitness identification and the factors that give rise to suggestiveness. The Trial Judge ruled that such testimony would not assist the jury, and the Court concluded that the Daubert factors were properly examined. In United States v. Curry, n82 the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding testimony by an expert on eyewitness identification. Although the testimony might not have been totally unhelpful, the identification issue was minor in the context of a four-week trial, vigorous cross-examination exposed the weakness of the identifications, and the defendants gave the government only four days' notice of their intent to call the expert. See also United States v. Larkin n83(no abuse of discretion to deny request to appoint an expert witness to testify about the undependability of eyewitness identification under stressful circumstances, as the issue is well within the ken of most lay jurors and counsel was afforded ample opportunity at trial to discuss it and cast doubt on the witness' identifications of his client).

United States v. Martin, 391 F.3d 949 (8th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a conviction for interference with interstate commerce by threats or violence, finding no abuse of discretion when expert testimony about the general reliability of eyewitness identifications was excluded, since that is a matter of common understanding. In fact, the jury was instructed to weigh the strength of the identifications in the case by considering various reliability-related factors, and the identifications were fully corroborated by an accomplice's testimony. In United States v. Kime, 99 F.3d 870 (8th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed drug conspiracy convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of expert testimony on eyewitness identification proffered by a defendant. There was an insufficient basis for finding that the proposed testimony qualified as "scientific knowledge" under Daubert; the testimony intruded into the jury's domain when it opined that the in-court identification in the case was "inherently untrustworthy"; and there was a "very real danger that the proffered expert testimony could either confuse the jury or cause it to substitute the expert's credibility assessment for its own." In United States v. Blade, n84 the Court, affirming a firearm conviction, held that there was no error in the exclusion of expert testimony concerning eyewitness identification, even though similar testimony had been admitted in a first trial that ended in a hung jury. Although such testimony should not be automatically excluded, Trial Judges have discretion to exclude it as more prejudicial than probative. The Court concluded that "we would be especially hesitant to find an abuse of discretion unless the government's case ... rested exclusively on uncorroborated eyewitness testimony."

United States v. Ginn, 87 F.3d 367 (9th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a bank robbery conviction after a bench trial, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the defendant's expert on the unreliability of eyewitness identification. The Trial Judge was in the best position to determine whether the expert's testimony would be of any assistance, and the Judge "could reasonably find that the most efficient method of attacking the credibility of the eyewitness testimony would be through cross-examination of the eyewitnesses." In United States v. Rincon, 28 F.3d 921 (9th Cir. 1994) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding expert eyewitness identification testimony, as the determination that the defendant had not shown the proposed testimony related to a scientific subject was supported by the record, and comprehensive instructions given in the case equally well assisted the jury. In United States v. Amador-Galvan, n85 the Court reversed convictions for cocaine possession, remanding for a determination whether expert testimony proffered by the defendants on the unreliability of eyewitness identifications was trustworthy and scientifically valid.

United States v. Smith, 156 F.3d 1046 (10th Cir. 1998) : In a prosecution for theft from a firearms dealer, an ATF agent interviewed witnesses to the theft, and the defendant claimed that the agent's use of photographs led to impermissibly suggestive identifications. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by a defense expert on eyewitness identification. The Trial Judge found after a lengthy hearing that testimony about lighting and the effects of stress touched upon areas of common knowledge and would not have been helpful to the jury.

United States v. Smith, 122 F.3d 1355 (11th Cir. 1997) (per curiam): The Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding expert testimony offered by the defendant regarding the reliability of eyewitness identifications. Circuit precedent disfavoring such evidence has not been disturbed by Daubert, since the testimony, although scientific knowledge, does not assist the trier of fact because the jury is able to determine the reliability of eyewitness identification with the tools of cross-examination. Furthermore, the defendant was sufficiently protected by instructions highlighting such problems as cross-racial identification, potential bias from earlier identifications, delay between the event and the identification, and stress.

[39] Fingerprint Identification

United States v. Mitchell, 365 F.3d 215 (3d Cir. 2004) : Affirming convictions for Hobbs Act robbery in an extensive opinion examining numerous sources, the Court held that fingerprint evidence was sufficiently reliable to be admitted. It also found no error in a ruling prohibiting the defendant's experts from testifying that fingerprint identification was not a science, reasoning that the Supreme Court's extension of Daubert to all expert testimony made irrelevant the question whether fingerprint identification was a science.

United States v. Crisp, 324 F.3d 261 (4th Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions for offenses arising out of an armed bank robbery, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting expert testimony regarding handwriting and fingerprints. The Court wrote that "[w]hile the principles underlying fingerprint identification have not attained the status of scientific law, they nonetheless bear the imprimatur of a strong general acceptance, not only in the expert community, but in the courts as well." There was evidence of professional standards controlling the technique's operation, which provided adequate assurance of consistency among fingerprint analyses, and it was no abuse of discretion to credit testimony that fingerprint identification has an exceedingly low rate of error.

United States v. George, 363 F.3d 666 (7th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions for counterfeiting offenses, bank fraud, and money laundering, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony by an FBI fingerprint examiner who relied upon partial prints in finding that they were the defendant's. The Court found that fingerprint identification was reliable under Daubert. In United States v. Havvard, 260 F.3d 597 (7th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding that the Trial Judge had properly considered the Daubert factors in ruling on the defendant's motion to exclude fingerprint identification evidence and concluding "that fingerprinting techniques have been tested in the adversarial system, that individual results are routinely subjected to peer review for verification, and that the probability for error is exceptionally low."

United States v. Janis, 387 F.3d 682 (8th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court found no error in the admission of expert testimony on fingerprint identification. The Court quoted the Fourth Circuit in United States v. Crisp, supra , on the general acceptance of fingerprint identification testimony.

United States v. Burdeau, 168 F.3d 352 (9th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a conviction for using a firearm in a robbery, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting an FBI agent to testify that identifiable fingerprints are almost never found on guns and only rarely found on other objects submitted for testing; he explained that this may be due to the surface, the dryness of the skin, or fingers being moved in a manner that smudges the prints. The Court held that this testimony was proper rebuttal to cross-examination of the agent that emphasized the lack of fingerprint evidence in the case. In United States v. Sherwood, 98 F.3d 402 (9th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed kidnapping convictions, finding that testimony from the prosecution's fingerprint identification expert was properly admitted despite the failure to conduct a Daubert analysis. The defendant admitted that the expert's identification technique was generally accepted and that fingerprint comparison has been subjected to peer review and publication, so the Daubert reliability requirement was satisfied. And since the testimony would assist the jury in determining the identity of the kidnappers, it also satisfied the "fit" requirement.

United States v. Lauder, 409 F.3d 1254 (10th Cir. 2005) : Affirming cocaine convictions, the Court found no error in the admission of testimony from a government expert that a fingerprint obtained from the defendant using the "live skin" method matched the print on a bag of cocaine found in a search. The Court held that Daubert was inapplicable because it did not "regulate the underlying facts or data that an expert relies on when forming her opinion," and "[a]bsent some specific objection to the technology" relied upon by an expert, a Trial Judge is not required to take testimony as to how the technology works. In our opinion, the Court's analysis is incomplete. Rule 702 specifically requires that the expert's opinion must be based on sufficient facts or data, and Rule 703 limits the facts on which the expert can rely to those that are found reasonably reliable by experts in the field. Moreover, the defendant challenged the reliability of the equipment used to record his print, and Rule 702 specifically states that the Trial Judge must assure that the expert's methodology is reliably applied. All this does not necessarily mean that the ruling below was error, but it does mean that the expert's testimony did not receive sufficient scrutiny in this case.

United States v. Abreu, 406 F.3d 1304 (11th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of marijuana with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of fingerprint identification evidence. The Court noted that it agreed with other Circuits that have held that such evidence is sufficiently reliable to satisfy Rule 702, and it added that, since Trial Judges are given broad discretion to decide how to determine reliability, there was no error in giving greater weight to the general acceptance factor than to other factors.

[40] Fire Investigations

United States v. Diaz, 300 F.3d 66 (1st Cir. 2002) : Affirming an arson conviction, the Court found no plain error in the admission of two experts' cause and origin testimony, since the experts examined first-hand the basement where the fire took place, compiled numerous details supporting their theories, and refuted alternative explanations for the fire. In Almonte v. National Union Fire Ins. Co., n86 the Court affirmed a judgment for an insurer that refused to pay losses from a fire that it claimed was arson, but found it was error (waived or harmless) not to have conducted a more extensive preliminary inquiry before admitting testimony by an investigating officer, since the officer was not only an arson expert but also the officer charged with determining who started the fire. "It was, therefore, important for the trial judge to ensure that [the officer] did not stray from explaining why he thought the fire was incendiary in origin to explaining who he thought might have caused the fire."

United States v. Gardner, 211 F.3d 1049 (7th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a defendant's convictions arising out of the arson of her business, the Court found no error when a government expert on causation of fires was permitted to testify that faulty electrical wiring was not the ignition source and that the burn pattern was consistent with the use of an accelerant. The expert had reviewed 120 photos and three reports from investigators of the fire scene and interviewed people who were at the scene. In United States v. Lundy, n87 the Court affirmed a conviction for arson and mail fraud, finding that a detective, who was a member of the Chicago police department bomb squad, was properly permitted to testify as to the cause and origin of a fire.

Weisgram v. Marley Co., 169 F.3d 514 (8th Cir. 1999) , aff'd on other grounds, 528 U.S. 440 (2000) : In a product liability action against the manufacturer of an electrical baseboard heater for fatal injuries allegedly caused by the heater igniting flooring, carpeting, and a sofa, the Court vacated a judgment for the plaintiffs because the testimony from their expert witnesses was unreliable and should have been excluded. One witness, the captain of the first fire truck on the scene, based his opinion on an assumption that the heater malfunctioned, which he was not qualified to assume, and then speculated about the course of the fire. Although his opinion was that the fire radiated from the heater through a rug and flooring to the sofa, he had no basis for his assumption about the location of the rug and he had no knowledge regarding the composition of the flooring. A second expert, a master electrician who had experience consulting on electrical fires, never visited the scene of the fire and based his conclusions on the fire captain's observations, including his assumption that the fire started from the electrical heater. He did not test the heater itself, but only speculated about how it could have failed. A third witness, a metallurgist who examined the thermostat contacts of the heater, concluded that the contacts had welded without knowing the wattage or amperage of the heater and without testing whether his theory was possible.

Michigan Millers Mut. Ins. Corp. v. Benfield, 140 F.3d 915 (11th Cir. 1998) : In a declaratory judgment action brought by an insurer who denied coverage on a homeowner's policy, the insurer's expert concluded that a fire in the home was intentionally set. After a Daubert hearing, the Trial Judge excluded the expert's testimony, and the Court found no error. The expert performed no tests and took no samples; he was unable to identify the source of ignition of the fire; and he was unable to rationally explain how he came to his conclusion.

[41] "Fit" Between Expert Testimony and the Facts

Cipollone v. Yale Indus. Prods., Inc., 202 F.3d 376 (1st Cir. 2000) : Affirming a summary judgment for defendants in a suit by a worker who injured his hand while working on a loading dock manufactured by one defendant and installed by another, the Court upheld the Trial Judge's ruling that expert testimony was inadmissible. The testimony related to the relative size of a person's hand grasping an object and a gap between a docklift and a catwalk. Since the plaintiff was not grasping anything at the time of the accident, the Court found that the testimony did not "fit" the facts of the case. In Bogosian v. Mercedes-Benz of N. Am., Inc., 104 F.3d 472 (1st Cir. 1997) , the plaintiff was run over by her car after putting it in "park" and exiting the vehicle. The Court found no error in the exclusion of testimony from an engineer about the phenomenon of "false park detent" -- where the car feels as if it is in "park" but is not. The expert's testimony rested on a factual premise -- that the plaintiff did not look at the console shift before turning off the car -- that was at odds with the plaintiff's own testimony.

Habecker v. Clark Equip. Co., 36 F.3d 278 (3d Cir. 1994) : In a product liability action for wrongful death that was brought after the decedent was crushed by a forklift that fell from a ramp, the Court vacated a judgment for the defendant, but held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony from the plaintiff's expert, who had conducted an investigation and attempted to simulate the accident. The expert's testimony did not "fit" with the facts of the case, as is required by Daubert, because the conditions of the simulation were far different from those existing at the time of the accident. Specifically, there was no attempt to replicate the velocity or the rearward movement of the forklift, the height of the fork was disregarded, and there was no operator in the forklift nor cargo on the fork during the purported simulation.

United States v. Powers, 59 F.3d 1460 (4th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a defendant's conviction for sexual abuse of his minor daughter, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly excluded the results of a "penile plethysmograph" test offered to prove that the defendant did not exhibit the characteristics of a "fixated pedophile." The expert testimony violated the "fit" requirement of Daubert, because Powers was charged with statutory rape of his daughter, not with being a "fixated pedophile," and he had offered no supporting evidence "showing that those who are not fixated pedophiles are less likely to commit incest abuse."

Leverette v. Louisville Ladder Co., 183 F.3d 339 (5th Cir. 1999) : Suing the manufacturer of a ladder from which he fell, the plaintiff proffered testimony from a professor of chemistry and polymer sciences, who opined that the ladder had a manufacturing defect because there was no adhesion between the fiberglass and the polymer matrix making up the ladder. The Court found no error when the testimony was excluded and summary judgment was entered for the defendant. The expert's testimony did not fit the facts of the case, because under the applicable state law, a defendant is not liable for a manufacturing defect unless the product deviated in a material way from the industry's manufacturing specifications, and here the expert never considered the industry standards and failed to assess whether the ladder met those standards.

United States v. Welch, 368 F.3d 970 (7th Cir. 2004) : The defendant was charged in 2002 with the robbery of a credit union in 1997. Although he was not identified in a lineup, three individuals who knew him testified that they believed he was the man depicted in bank surveillance photographs. Affirming, the Court found no error when a defense expert was precluded from testifying regarding the propensity of witnesses to identify a person based on familiarity with clothing, the tendency of witnesses to misidentify a person based upon factors of which the witness is unaware, and the deterioration of memory over time. The testimony would not assist the jury, and there was no "fit" between the expert's testimony and the circumstances of the identifications, as the witnesses knew the defendant very well prior to the crime and had as much time as they needed to view the surveillance films in a stress-free atmosphere. In Deimer v. Cincinnati Sub-Zero Prods., Inc., 58 F.3d 341 (7th Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant manufacturer in a product liability action brought after a hypo-hyperthermia machine fell over onto a nurse moving it in a hospital, holding there was no error in excluding testimony by the plaintiff's expert regarding a defect in the machine's cord wrap. The witness proffered unverified statements unsupported by any scientific method and, because he did not have the requisite experience to assess the unit's suitability for its intended purpose within its environment or its adherence to the prevailing standards for similar machines, there was no "fit" with the facts of the case. In United States v. Lilly, n88 a prosecution of a minister and his wife for income tax evasion, the defendant wife sought to call an expert witness to testify about the general duties of Baptist ministers' wives. The Court held that the testimony was properly excluded for lack of "fit," because the witness' expertise "on the general duties of ministers' wives, without specific reference to whether those duties would render a minister's wife incapable of willingly evading tax, could not have aided a jury in determining the issue of Mrs. Lilly's intent."

United States v. White Horse, 316 F.3d 769 (8th Cir. 2003) : In the prosecution of a Native American for sexual abuse of his six-year-old son, the defense was not permitted to introduce testimony by a psychologist who had conducted an "Abel Assessment" of the defendant and concluded that he did not have a sexual interest in underage boys. The Abel Assessment measures the amount of time that a subject views slides of clothed and partially clothed people, and is premised on a correlation between sexual response and the length of time spent viewing sexual stimuli; it also includes consideration of a questionnaire regarding the subject's sexual behavior and willingness to admit to experiencing common social problems (as a kind of "lie scale"). The Court found no error in a finding of lack of "fit" between the facts of the case and the Abel Assessment, since there was no indication that it had been tested with a statistically significant sample of Native Americans, and none of the slides contained pictures of Native American children. Moreover, incest cases like this had been excluded from testing in the Abel Assessment because incest offenders often act for reasons other than sexual interest. In Concord Board Corp. v. Brunswick Corp., 207 F.3d 1039, 2000-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72836 (8th Cir. 2000) , an antitrust action by boat builders against a stern drive engine manufacturer, the Court held it was error to admit expert testimony by an economics professor because it did not adequately "fit" the facts of the case. The expert used an economic model "to construct a hypothetical market which was not grounded in the economic reality of the stern drive engine market, for it ignored inconvenient evidence"; "[t]he model also failed to account for market events that both sides agreed were not related to any anticompetitive conduct." In United States v. J.H.H., n89 a prosecution arising from racially-based crimes, the Court found it was error (but harmless) when a government expert testified regarding the skinhead movement and skinhead activities, as well as the activities of other white supremacist groups. Because the government had introduced no evidence demonstrating that the defendants were in fact members of a skinhead group or were skinhead sympathizers, the expert testimony did not properly "fit" with the facts of the case.

United States v. Scholl, 166 F.3d 964 (9th Cir. 1999) : Affirming the defendant's conviction for filing false tax returns and structuring currency transactions in connection with his extensive gambling activities, the Court found no error in excluding expert testimony that pathological gamblers have distortion in their thinking, and denial, which impact their ability and wherewithal to keep records of their wins and losses. The testimony failed the Daubert "fit" requirement, since it would not tend to show that the defendant actually believed his tax return to be correct in reporting winnings and losses, nor would it show that he did not intend to falsely report his wins and losses. On remand from the Supreme Court, the Court of Appeals held in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 43 F.3d 1311 (9th Cir. 1995) , that summary judgment was properly granted against the plaintiffs because the testimony of their experts, which was offered to prove that Bendectin caused the plaintiffs' limb reduction, was inadmissible under Rule 702. The Court found that the testimony of most of the plaintiffs' experts failed the Daubert "fit" requirement, because state tort law required the plaintiffs to prove that Bendectin was more likely than not the cause of their injuries, and these experts did not make such a conclusion. Rather, they could only testify that Bendectin increased the risk of limb reduction, which in fact tended to disprove the plaintiffs' argument as to legal causation, because "it shows that Bendectin does not double the likelihood of birth defects."

McDowell v. Brown, 391 F.3d 1283 (11th Cir. 2004) : In a § 1983 action by a former inmate alleging medical malpractice, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the plaintiff's experts. Although the Trial Judge erred in ruling that the physicians were unqualified to testify to the standard of care for nurses in a jail, the only scientifically reliable parts of their theories dealt with treatment delays 2-12 times as long as involved in this case.

[42] Forensic Experts

United States v. Maravilla, 907 F.2d 216 (1st Cir. 1990) : Affirming convictions of former Customs officers for robbery-related offenses in connection with the murder of a money courier, the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in allowing a forensic pathologist called to give an opinion on the date and time of death to take into account not only the condition of the body but also ordinary nonexpert circumstantial evidence pointing to a particular time of death, as the evidence was helpful and would not have misled the jury.

United States v. Dorsey, 45 F.3d 809 (4th Cir. 1995) : The Court held in a bank robbery prosecution that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony about bank surveillance photographs from forensic anthropologists, as there was no showing the method had been tested, subjected to peer review, or widely accepted in the relevant scientific community, and the known rate of error was very high. Furthermore, there was no indication that the witnesses were better able than the jury to compare photographs.

United States v. Allen, 390 F.3d 944 (7th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for aiding and abetting a bank burglary, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when a police forensic examiner was permitted to testify that, although there was no definitive match, the tennis shoes the defendant was wearing at the time of his arrest could have made the impression the police found in the cement dust in the bank. The government had established that the methodology was peer reviewed and generally accepted in the forensic community, and there is no requirement that an expert have an opinion on the ultimate issue for testimony to be relevant and helpful.

United States v. Conroy, 424 F.3d 833 (8th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for sexual assault, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony to explain why the laboratory results found no semen on a rug allegedly used by the defendant to wipe semen from himself after a rape of one of the victims. The Court saw "little difference between a forensic expert testifying as to the reasons for not finding bodily fluid evidence on a rug, and the common situation of a fingerprint expert testifying as to the reasons for not finding a defendant's fingerprints on an object in question." In United States v. Rushing, 388 F.3d 1153 (8th Cir. 2004) (per curiam), a prosecution for illegally bringing two Chinese women into the United States so that one defendant could engage in sexual relations with them, one of the women testified that she had sexual intercourse with the defendant approximately once a week for a year, and the defense sought to discredit the testimony through an expert witness who would have testified that the defendant more likely than not would have contracted Hepatitis B from the witness had the relationship been as described. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the expert testimony, since it was not based upon sufficient facts or data, it was not the product of reliable methods, and the expert applied his criteria using assumptions contrary to the established facts of the case. In particular, the expert in forming his opinion failed to take into account the witness' level of infectiousness, that the disease progresses differently in women than in men, and that it is less likely for a man to contract the disease from a woman than vice versa, and he assumed that they had sex two to three times a week rather than once a week as the witness testified.

United States v. Cavely, 318 F.3d 987 (10th Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions for manufacturing methamphetamine, the Court found no error in admitting the testimony of a forensic scientist who provided an estimate of the amount of methamphetamine that was or could have been produced by the four meth labs found by the police in this case. The expert made the estimate by examining police records showing the amount of precursor ingredients found at each lab, and then applying a "conversion percentage" applicable to the form of production that was used. The Court noted that the expert's method was commonly used by forensic chemists and "was based on published articles, seminars and courses on clandestine laboratories, DEA literature, and [the expert's] own experience as a forensic scientist." While the expert's estimates were based on certain factual assumptions about the quantity of precursor chemicals, the defendant was able to cross-examine the expert about these assumptions.

United States v. Frazier, 387 F.3d 1244 (11th Cir. 2004) (en banc): In a prosecution for kidnapping and sexual assault, the defendant proffered testimony from a former chief investigator in a medical examiner's office that the absence of either the defendant's hair or bodily fluids on the victim's person or in the car where the assaults took place cast doubt on the assault claim. Affirming, the en banc Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, since the witness never explained how his experience or the texts he referred to supported his opinion that the recovery of inculpatory hair or seminal fluid "would be expected" if a rape had in fact occurred. Furthermore, the opinion would not assist the jury, since they had no way of knowing whether finding hair or seminal fluid was a virtual certainty, a strong probability, barely more likely than not, or just a possibility. In Maiz v. Virani, 253 F.3d 641 (11th Cir. 2001) , a civil RICO action to recover funds that the defendants fraudulently diverted in connection with real estate investments, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by the plaintiffs' liability expert, a forensic accounting expert with experience in detecting and tracing the misappropriation of funds in complex financial transactions. The witness did not exceed the scope of his expertise when stating reasonable assumptions regarding the requirements of the applicable contracts in order to put his opinions in context.

[43] "Gatekeeping"

[a] Bench Trials

Gibbs v. Gibbs, 210 F.3d 491 (5th Cir. 2000) : An insurance company refused to pay life insurance proceeds to the spouse of a deceased murder victim, contending that she was involved in the murder. The spouse took a polygraph test, which showed that she made deceptive answers about her involvement. In an interpleader action over the insurance proceeds, the Trial Judge held that there was not enough evidence to indicate that the spouse was involved in the murder, but relied in part on the polygraph results in holding that the insurance company was entitled to attorney fees from the insurance proceeds, because its actions were in good faith. Noting that "[m]ost of the safeguards provided for in Daubert are not as essential in a case such as this where a district judge sits as a trier of fact," the Court held it was sufficient that an expert testified in detail regarding the factors and analysis involved in the polygraph examination process, and the Judge found the process scientifically valid.

Deal v. Hamilton County Board of Educ., 392 F.3d 840 (6th Cir. 2004) : The parents of an autistic child were successful in an administrative proceeding seeking reimbursement for various educational costs, but the Trial Judge rejected the determination after a bench trial at which additional evidence was presented. On appeal, the Court noted that the "gatekeeper" doctrine of Daubert "was designed to protect juries and is largely irrelevant in the context of a bench trial."

United States v. Brown, 415 F.3d 1257 (11th Cir. 2005) : The principal issue in the bench trial of the defendants for distribution of a controlled substance analogue was whether the 1,4-butanediol they possessed had a chemical structure "substantially similar" to gamma hydroxybutyric acid (GHB), a controlled substance. The government offered testimony from a DEA forensic drug chemist and a biochemist with the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences; their testimony was admitted. The defense offered a freelance consultant in the field of chemistry who held a Ph.D. in plant pathology; the Judge heard this witness' testimony without ruling on his qualifications, but did not consider the testimony as reliable expert opinion in making findings of fact. Affirming, the Court first provided an extensive explanation of the extremely deferential review ("the heavy thumb -- really a thumb and a finger or two -- that is put on the district court's side of the scale") given to Daubert rulings. It then concluded there was no abuse of discretion in the finding that the opinion testimony of the prosecution experts satisfied the reliability standards. Even though the method those experts used satisfied only the general acceptance factor of the four noted in Daubert, accepting credible evidence of a generally accepted method applied reliably was not clearly erroneous, particularly in the bench trial situation, where there is less need for the gatekeeper to keep the gate. The Court also found no abuse of discretion when the Judge declined to qualify the defendants' witness as an expert and concluded that, even if he were qualified, his method was unreliable and unreliably applied.

Seaboard Lumber Co. v. United States, 308 F.3d 1283 (Fed. Cir. 2002) : Timber contractors who had not performed on harvesting contracts sued for declarations of nonliability, but the government successfully counterclaimed for damages. Finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert damages testimony and affirming a judgment rendered after a bench trial, the Court noted that "[w]hile these concerns are of less import in a bench trial, where no screening of the factfinder can take place, the Daubert standards of relevance and reliability must nevertheless be met."

[b] "Gatekeeping" -- Findings Required

Proctor & Gamble Co. v. Haugen, 427 F.3d 727, 2005-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P74976 (10th Cir. 2005) : Reversing dismissal of a Lanham Act case, the Court found that the Trial Judge had failed to comply with the Daubert "gatekeeping" function in excluding testimony from an expert for the plaintiff. The Judge had given no warning before dismissing the case that there would be a ruling on the expert's testimony, and had failed to create a sufficiently developed record to allow a determination of whether the relevant law was properly applied, which suggested that the ruling was simply "an off-the-cuff decision to exclude the expert testimony." In Goebel v. Denver & R.G.W. R.R., 215 F.3d 1083 (10th Cir. 2000) , the Court reversed a judgment for a locomotive engineer in an FELA action alleging that he sustained brain damage when exposed to diesel exhaust in a high altitude train tunnel. Although the Trial Judge admitted testimony of a doctor who concluded that the plaintiff's exposure in the tunnel caused injury to the brain, the Court found that "[t]here is not a single explicit statement on the record to indicate that the district court ever conducted any form of Daubert analysis whatsoever," and opined that "[a] review of this case convinces us of the absolute necessity of district court findings on the record." The Daubert gatekeeping inquiry is a "flexible determination," but "a district court, when faced with a party's objection, must adequately demonstrate by specific findings in the record that it has performed its duty as a gatekeeper." In United States v. Velarde, n90 the Court reversed a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse of a child, finding an abuse of discretion in the Trial Judge's admission of expert testimony, over the defendant's objection, without conducting a Daubert analysis.

[c] "Gatekeeping" -- Product Liability Cases

Ambrosini v. Labarraque, 101 F.3d 129 (D.C. Cir. 1996) : The Court (2-1) reversed summary judgment for the defendants in an action alleging that birth defects were caused by the drug Depo-Provera. The Court held that in rejecting the testimony of an epidemiologist and a teratologist, the Trial Judge had misconceived "the limited gatekeeper role envisioned in Daubert." Both of the plaintiff's experts had relied on standard methodologies and published studies; they were highly qualified; one had testified about his conclusions before the FDA before the instant litigation arose; and they had sufficiently ruled out other possible causes.

Pestel v. Vermeer Mfg. Co., 64 F.3d 382 (8th Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed a directed verdict for a manufacturer, and held that the Trial Court properly performed its gatekeeping function under Daubert when it excluded the testimony of an expert who claimed to have designed a protective guard for the "stump cutter" that injured the plaintiff. The Judge found that the proposed guard had not been tested, the design was not reliable, there was no peer review of the guard, and the expert made no showing that such guards were generally used on stump cutters.

McClain v. Metabolife Int'l, Inc., 401 F.3d 1233 (11th Cir. 2005) : In an action by plaintiffs claiming that a herbal weight-loss supplement containing ephedrine and caffeine caused them strokes and heart attacks, the defendant manufacturer moved to exclude causation testimony from a pharmacologist and a neurologist, but after a Daubert hearing the Judge ruled that he "lacked sufficient knowledge on the scientific subject matter to exclude the testimony presented and that Defendant had not presented competing testimony for [him] to determine that, as a matter of law, testimony from Plaintiffs' experts was inadmissible." Reversing a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held that it was an abuse of discretion when the Judge abdicated his gatekeeping role by disavowing ability to handle the Daubert issues.

[d] "Gatekeeping" -- Requirement of Gatekeeping Analysis

Elsayed Mukhtar v. California State Univ., Hayward, 299 F.3d 1053 (9th Cir. 2002) : Vacating a judgment in favor of a professor who sued his university alleging racial discrimination in the decision to deny him tenure, the Court held that the Trial Judge failed to perform the required gatekeeping function under Daubert. In rejecting an in limine challenge to the plaintiff's expert and deciding to admit the expert's testimony, the Judge did not discuss its reliability but instead seemed focused on assuring that the expert not offer an opinion on an "ultimate issue" that was for the jury.

[44] General Acceptance

United States v. Fullwood, 342 F.3d 409 (5th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed convictions arising from a scheme to submit false crop insurance claims, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a government expert's testimony, based on analysis of satellite imagery, that the defendant did not plant crops for which he submitted insurance claims. The government submitted a list of 16 articles published in peer-reviewed journals that demonstrated the general acceptance of the expert's techniques in the scientific community.

[45] Handwriting Experts

United States v. Mooney, 315 F.3d 54 (1st Cir. 2002) : Affirming conspiracy and firearm convictions, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting expert handwriting testimony that the defendant was the author of incriminating letters. The Trial Judge held a Daubert hearing and found that all the Daubert factors were satisfied. The fact that another Judge, in United States v. Hines, 55 F. Supp. 2d 62 (D. Mass. 1999) , excluded the handwriting testimony of a different expert did not require the Judge in this case to exclude evidence. Under the abuse of discretion standard applicable to Daubert rulings, different Trial Judges may permissibly reach different conclusions on similar expert testimony.

United States v. Mornan, 413 F.3d 372 (3d Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed mail and wire fraud convictions arising from a telemarketing scheme, finding no plain error in the admission of testimony from a government handwriting expert despite her responding "I think they are" to the question whether her opinions were rendered to a "reasonable degree of scientific certainty." The Court noted that Rule 702 does not require "reasonable scientific certainty" and that the witness had testified that rendering "less-than-certain" opinions is an accepted practice in her field. In United States v. Velasquez, 64 F.3d 844 (3d Cir. 1995) , the prosecution offered an expert to opine that the defendant's girlfriend and one of his accomplices had written a mailing label that had been used to ship drugs. The Trial Judge rejected defense arguments that handwriting analysis did not constitute a valid field of expertise and, after the government expert testified, refused to permit a professor called by the defense to testify as a critic of the field of handwriting analysis. Vacating the conviction, the Court held that the defense evidence properly went to the weight of the government testimony, and that under Daubert the professor had sufficient specialized knowledge to be considered an expert, his proposed testimony was sufficiently reliable (having been subjected to peer review), and it fit the facts of the case.

United States v. Crisp, 324 F.3d 261 (4th Cir. 2003) : Affirming armed bank robbery convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting expert testimony regarding handwriting and fingerprints. The Court noted that "handwriting comparison testimony has a long history of admissibility in the courts of this country," which "gives us the assurance of reliability that Daubert requires." It observed that the handwriting expert's principal role is "to draw the jury's attention to similarities between a known exemplar and a contested sample," leaving it to the jury to examine the evidence and "decide for itself whether it agreed with the expert. To the extent that a given handwriting analysis is flawed or flimsy, an able defense lawyer will bring that fact to the jury's attention, both through skillful cross-examination and by presenting expert testimony of his own." In United States v. Herrera, n91 the Court held that expert opinion regarding handwriting need not be based on absolute certainty and upheld the introduction of testimony based on a "high degree of belief."

Deputy v. Lehman Bros., Inc., 345 F.3d 494 (7th Cir. 2003) : In an action alleging securities fraud by a broker, the Court held it was error to exclude expert testimony that the plaintiff had not signed a "Client Agreement" providing for arbitration. The Judge had focused on seven reasons, most of which concerned issues of credibility and persuasiveness, but the Court found that "such considerations are relevant only in valuing the testimony, not in determining its admissibility." Remanding for a Daubert hearing on "whether testimony concerning the genuineness of a signature is properly the subject of expert opinion," the Court noted that every Circuit that has considered the issue has permitted expert testimony, but several District Courts have rejected handwriting analysis as unreliable.

United States v. Kehoe, 310 F.3d 579 (8th Cir. 2002) : Affirming racketeering convictions, the Court found no error in the admission of expert testimony on handwriting, as the expert had been examining documents for ten years, belonged to a professional organization in his field, and lectured on the topic of questioned documents. The Court also emphasized that the expert adequately explained his methods and process of analysis. In a prosecution for uttering forged government checks, United States v. Hardrich, n92 the Court found no error in the admission of a government handwriting expert's testimony that the defendant did sign, might have signed, did not sign, and "probably signed" certain endorsements and signatures.

United States v. Prime, 363 F.3d 1028 (9th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions related to selling non-existent items on eBay, purchasing items using counterfeit money orders, pirating computer software, and stealing credit card numbers to assist in laundering money. It found no error in the denial of a motion in limine to exclude the testimony of a handwriting expert who opined that the defendant's handwriting appeared on the counterfeit money orders and other incriminating documents, as the Judge carefully considered all the Daubert factors in finding the testimony sufficiently reliable, and the Judge's conclusion was consistent with the Circuit decisions holding that handwriting testimony can satisfy the Daubert reliability threshold. In a drug-related case, United States v. Fleishman, n93 the Court found no error in the admission of testimony by a handwriting expert offered to prove that a defendant made certain notations, even though the expert indicated that he could not be certain as to his conclusion. The Court said that "[a]bsolute certainty of result is not required for admissibility," and that any uncertainty went only to weight.

United States v. Paul, 175 F.3d 906 (11th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a conviction for extortion, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting an expert document examiner to present handwriting analysis evidence that identified the defendant as the author of a note. The defendant's argument that handwriting analysis does not qualify as "reliable scientific evidence" was found "without merit" because "[c]ourts have long received handwriting analysis testimony as admissible evidence." The Court also held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding rebuttal testimony for the defendant from a law professor who had coauthored a 1989 law review article, based on a review of the literature, that was critical of forensic document examiners' ability to reach the correct conclusion in questioned document examinations: "His skill, experience, training and education as a lawyer did not make him any more qualified to testify as an expert on handwriting analysis than a lay person who read the same articles."

[46] HLA Blood Grouping

United States v. Kandiel, 865 F.2d 967 (8th Cir. 1989) : The Court affirmed convictions for firearms and other violations, holding it was proper to admit a physician's testimony that, based upon a comparison of HLA genetic markers when applied to population frequencies of blood group typings, a defendant was 17 times more likely than a person selected at random to be the brother of a particular person.

[47] Human Factors Analysis

Surace v. Caterpillar, Inc., 111 F.3d 1039 (3d Cir. 1997) : A construction worker whose foot was run over by a pavement profiler sought in his product liability action against the manufacturer to introduce testimony from a "human factors" expert that it was necessary in designing construction machinery to take account of the phenomenon of "habituation," where workers tend to "tune out" constantly repeated warning signals. The Court held there was no error in excluding the testimony, as the witness' training was in electrical engineering, not psychology, and his experience was in making machines "user friendly" rather than in considering the safety implications of a device.

Persinger v. Norfolk & W. Ry., 920 F.2d 1185 (4th Cir. 1990) : In an FELA action, the Court affirmed the grant of a new trial, agreeing there had been error in admitting testimony by a human factors analyst regarding whether the weight the plaintiff had to lift to perform his job was unreasonable, as that is a matter within the common sense and everyday knowledge of the jurors. In Scott v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., n94 the Court found error in the admission of expert testimony as to ergonomics or "human factors" in a slip and fall case, because the expert testified to matters that the jury could have understood without any help. However, the admission of testimony within the common knowledge of jurors "will almost invariably be harmless," so judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed.

Mihailovich v. Laatsch, 359 F.3d 892 (7th Cir. 2004) : In a legal malpractice case in which the former client claimed that, but for the attorney's failure to adequately investigate a negligence case, the former client would have prevailed, the Trial Judge excluded expert testimony offered by the plaintiff without giving reasons for finding it insufficiently reliable. Vacating a judgment for the attorney, the Court indicated that the admissibility of expert testimony should be addressed on remand. Although the Court expressed no opinion as to the correct result on remand, it noted that the expert's human factors analysis was not novel but a recognized approach that may yield legitimate insights as to the hazards that particular situations (including roadways) may pose, and that the expert's hypothesis appeared to be consistent with the facts.

Jaurequi v. Carter Mfg. Co., 173 F.3d 1076 (8th Cir. 1999) : The Court held in a product liability case that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony for the plaintiff by a mechanical engineer and a human factors engineer that the farm machinery at issue was unreasonably dangerous because the warnings on it were deficient in placement, design, orientation, and content. The evidence failed the reliability prong of Daubert because the witnesses had not created or designed, much less tested, warnings they would have considered more appropriate, and they had not pointed to such warnings being used in practice by any other manufacturer.

[48] Impeachment of Experts

Elcock v. Kmart Corp., 233 F.3d 734 (3d Cir. 2000) : Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff in a slip and fall case because the Trial Judge had not conducted a Daubert hearing into the reliability of the methodology used by the plaintiff's vocational rehabilitationist, the Court noted that the fact the witness had pleaded guilty to embezzlement and knowing conversion of federal property was not an appropriate Daubert factor to weigh in assessing the reliability of his methods. The evidence could only be used by the jury to assess the witness' credibility.

Collins v. Wayne Corp., 621 F.2d 777 (5th Cir. 1980) : In a product liability case, the Court said that "cross-examination of an expert about fees earned in prior cases is not improper," since such evidence might tend to establish a bias.

Nemir v. Mitsubishi Motors Corp., 381 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 2004) : The plaintiff was seriously injured when his seatbelt latch allegedly gave way in an automobile accident. When the plaintiff attempted to impeach a defense causation expert with an excerpt from a book co-authored by another expert, Spitz, retained by the defendant, the Judge instructed the plaintiff to save such questioning for Sptiz's testimony. Then, when the plaintiff attempted to cross-examine Spitz about the excerpt, the Judge prohibited the questioning as beyond the scope of his direct testimony. Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the plaintiff was erroneously prevented by the Judge's rulings from introducing relevant impeachment evidence.

United States v. York, 933 F.2d 1343 (7th Cir. 1991) : Affirming convictions for mail fraud and arson, the Court held there was no error in permitting the government to conduct a voir dire in the jury's presence focusing on prior unprofessional conduct of an expert pathologist. The defendant had qualified the witness before the jury, the questions were relevant to the weight to be accorded the expert's testimony, the prosecutor had a good faith basis for the questions, and qualification is a preliminary question to which Rule 608(b) does not apply.

United States v. 10.48 Acres of Land, 621 F.2d 338 (9th Cir. 1980) : In a condemnation action, the Court upheld a ruling disallowing cross-examination of a government expert concerning the price paid by the government for a similar easement. It noted that such sales generally are treated as payments in the nature of compromise and are not admissible to prove fair market value, and that the expert had not relied on the sale in reaching an opinion.

[49] Insanity Defense

United States v. McRary, 616 F.2d 181 (5th Cir. 1980) : The Court held that a defense expert should have been permitted to testify about a "folie a deux," a condition in which two people share the same fantasy, since "all evidence relevant or pertinent to the issue of insanity should be admitted." In United States v. Lopez, n95 the Court affirmed convictions for assault of a federal penitentiary employee and held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the testimony of a professor who claimed to be an expert on sensory deprivation.

[50] Intellectual Property Cases

Citizens Fin. Group, Inc. v. Citizens Nat'l Bank of Evans City, 383 F.3d 110 (3d Cir. 2004) : In a bank's action for a declaratory judgment that it was not infringing a competitor's trademarks, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a customer-confusion survey conducted for the defendant. Because in a "reverse confusion" case the relevant base is the senior user's customers, the defendant's survey of customers in the junior user's market meant the methodology of the survey was fundamentally flawed. Because the flaw went beyond mere technical unreliability, it went to the admissibility, not merely the weight of the evidence. In a copyright infringement case involving a computer program, Whelan Assocs. v. Jaslow Dental Lab., n96 the Court held that the ordinary approach in an infringement case -- receiving expert testimony with respect to the similarity of two works and having a lay judgment as to whether any copying was an unlawful appropriation -- was not useful. Rather, when the subjects of the copyright are particularly complex, "a single substantial similarity inquiry according to which both lay and expert testimony would be admissible" is preferred.

Pioneer Hi-Bred Int'l v. Holden Found. Seeds, Inc., 35 F.3d 1226 (8th Cir. 1994) : In an action for alleged trade secret misappropriation of the genetic makeup of certain seed corn, the Court held that scientific evidence from electrophoresis, liquid chromatography, and growout testing was properly admitted, as the techniques were widely used in the industry, conducted by qualified experts, and considered helpful enough to be relied upon by both parties in the suit.

Swirsky v. Carey, 376 F.3d 841 (9th Cir. 2004) : In an action for alleged infringement of a copyrighted song, the Court held that testimony from the plaintiff's expert musicologist had been improperly rejected on the ground that the methodology was flawed. Although the methodology was "selective," in that it discounted notes that the expert characterized as "ornamental," the expert sufficiently explained that notes falling on the beat will be more prominent to the ear than notes falling off the beat and some artists will ornament their notes in ways that other do not. This methodology of removing notes perceived as performance-related was consistent with infringement law, which permits consideration of only the appropriation of a song's compositional elements and not of elements unique to the plaintiff's performance.

Autoskill, Inc. v. National Educational Support Sys., 994 F.2d 1476 (10th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed an injunction for a copyright holder against a competitor, and held that the Trial Judge had discretion to consider an expert's views as to the protectable and unprotectable portions of a computer program. "As the judge noted, the experts' opinions may be helpful, but their legal conclusions on these points are not binding."

Cytologix Corp. v. Ventana Medical Sys., Inc., 424 F.3d 1168 (Fed. Cir. 2005) : In a patent infringement action, the Court noted that it was improper to have expert witnesses testify before the jury regarding claim construction. The risk of confusing the jury is high even when, as here, the jury is instructed that the Judge's claim constructions control. In Data Line Corp. v. Micro Technologies, Inc., n97 the Court affirmed a permanent injunction against patent infringement by the defendant, holding that expert testimony was admissible to establish infringement, despite the fact that the plaintiff's expert witnesses did not physically inspect the infringing device and were unable to identify certain of its schematic drawings, read its source code, and describe details of its test phase. The plaintiff presented evidence that physical inspection would have been useless and that the drawings and source code were not the best evidence of the operation of the device. In McGill, Inc. v. John Zink Co., n98 the Court noted that expert testimony may be used in a patent infringement case to construe claims -- i.e., as evidence of how the claims would be construed by those skilled in the art.

[51] Interpretation of Contracts or Written Instruments

Buford v. Wilmington Trust Co., 841 F.2d 51 (3d Cir. 1988) : In a breach of contract action by a former owner of a business against a bank that acquired the business, the Court held that an expert witness was properly permitted to testify that in his opinion certain expenditures by the bank were not what could commonly be understood to be "advertising expenditures to promote the discount brokerage business acquired." In First Nat'l State Bank v. Reliance Elec. Co., 668 F.2d 725 (3d Cir. 1981) , the Court said that the Trial Judge ruled properly in permitting "an outstanding scholar and a foremost expert on the Uniform Commercial Code" to testify as to trade usage in a dispute over a lease.

United States v. Barsanti, 943 F.2d 428 (4th Cir. 1991) : Affirming convictions for making false statements to defraud in connection with government insured mortgages, the Court held that the defendants' expert was properly precluded from testifying as to the meaning of government regulations affecting certifications signed by the defendants, but should have been permitted to testify to ambiguities in the language of the certifications. The error was harmless, however. In Forrest Creek Assocs. v. McLean Sav. & Loan Ass'n, n99 the Court affirmed the dismissal of claims and counterclaims in a contract action, finding that expert testimony proffered by a borrower was inadmissible. The testimony concerning the interpretation of a loan contract involved a question of law that was reserved to the Court.

Phillips Oil Co. v. OKC Corp., 812 F.2d 265 (5th Cir. 1987) : In a diversity action, the Court held that expert testimony was properly admitted to interpret the term "cost" as used in a "farmout" agreement between oil companies. The net profits accounting provisions in the agreement had a specialized usage and meaning within the oil and gas accounting field so that the expert testimony was helpful in understanding the provisions.

North Am. Specialty Ins. Co. v. Myers, 111 F.3d 1273 (6th Cir. 1997) : Affirming summary judgment against the insureds in a declaratory judgment action over insurance coverage, the Court held there was no error in refusing to consider the report of an asserted expert in the interpretation of insurance contracts, since the issues in the case were simply legal questions and did not require interpreting any ambiguous provisions or confusing technical terms. In an action on a promissory note, CMI-Trading, Inc. v. Quantum Air, Inc., 98 F.3d 887 (6th Cir. 1996) , the defendants asserted that the contracts involved constituted a joint venture agreement rather than a loan agreement. The Court held there was no error in prohibiting the defendant's expert, a financial consultant specializing in private equity transactions, from expressing an opinion based on the documents as to the sort of relationship the parties intended. The legal concepts of "loan" and "joint venture" are issues of law beyond the competence of an expert. In Apponi v. Sunshine Biscuits, Inc., n100 an action by former employees of a company to recover early retirement benefits, the Court held there was no error in excluding the testimony of a labor relations expert that the pension plan provided early retirement benefits under one condition only, so it was unlikely that the company would have entered into an oral agreement with a labor union that would not have been integrated into the written agreement. The expert opinion would not have helped the jury decide whether certain representations had been made by the company to the union. The Court indicated, however, that on remand the excluded testimony might be relevant in determining whether any representations were made by persons with authority to bind the company and whether they were intended to be acted upon by the plaintiffs.

Harbor Ins. Co. v. Continental Bank Corp., 922 F.2d 357 (7th Cir. 1990) : In an action by an insurer for a declaration of nonliability on a policy of directors' and officers' liability insurance, the Court held there had been reversible error in permitting the plaintiff's lawyer to testify to the meaning of a crucial term in the defendant's charter. Because the charter was ambiguous, expert testimony was a permissible aid to interpretation; however, the lawyer who testified based his opinion on use of the word in judicial opinions rather than in charters, which allowed the jury to infer that it could look to the witness for legal guidance, and thus impermissibly tilted the balance between the parties toward the insurers.

Nucor Corp. v. Nebraska Pub. Power Dist., 891 F.2d 1343 (8th Cir. 1989) : In an action for breach of a utility contract implementing a statute requiring rates to be fair, reasonable, and nondiscriminatory, the Court held that there was no error in admitting expert evidence construing those terms. Expert testimony defining terms of a technical nature and indicating whether they have acquired a well-recognized meaning in the industry has frequently been recognized as valuable. In United States v. Garvin, n101 the defendant's mail fraud convictions, based on false answers on insurance policy applications, were reversed in part because expert testimony concerning the meaning of the language of insurance contracts was improperly excluded. The Court concluded that the jury could have been aided by the evidence.

United States v. Ortland, 109 F.3d 539 (9th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a conviction for a fraud involving a partnership agreement drafted by an attorney for the defendant and his wife, the Court upheld the exclusion of expert testimony concerning the terms and effect of the partnership agreement, since the issue was not what the expert thought but what the defendant thought and said about the agreement. In Maffei v. Northern Ins. Co., 12 F.3d 892 (9th Cir. 1993) , the plaintiff sued its insurers for refusing to pay on policies covering "hostile fires" after an incident in which substantial heat and whitish-yellow smoke was released from chemical drums. The Trial Judge granted summary judgment for the defendants, rejecting declarations from the plaintiff's experts that there had been a "fire" because heat, light, and a flame were released and that release of the vapor cloud constituted a "hostile fire" as defined in the policy. The Court reversed, holding that common sense was not sufficient to determine whether a fire had occurred in these circumstances, but that there was no error in excluding the declaration regarding "hostile fire" because the term is not ambiguous and the witness did not specifically testify as to custom and usage regarding use of the term. In an action by workers asserting a contract based on promissory estoppel, Aguilar v. International Longshoremen's Union, 966 F.2d 443 (9th Cir. 1992) , the Court held that an avowed expert in employment application interpretation was properly precluded from testifying that a promise had been made and the workers were reasonable in relying on it, as the reasonableness and foreseeability of the workers' reliance were matters of law for the Court's determination. In Energy Oils, Inc. v. Montana Power Co., n102 the Court concluded that an expert witness should not have been permitted to testify as to the legal effect of written agreements. The construction of agreements belongs to the Courts.

[52] Jones Act Cases

Wills v. Amerada Hess Corp., 379 F.3d 32 (2d Cir. 2004) : A deceased seaman's wife brought a Jones Act action alleging that her decedent contracted squamous cell carcinoma from his exposure to benzene on the defendant's ships. The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant, finding no abuse of discretion in excluding the plaintiff's proffered expert's testimony as unreliable under Daubert. The Court rejected the argument that because Jones Act claimants carry a lighter burden of proof as to causation than their counterparts on land, the strict standards of Daubert are inapplicable: even where the plaintiff faces a relaxed burden of proof, "the district court's admission of expert testimony is nonetheless governed by the strictures of Daubert and Rule 702."

[53] Knowledge, Intent, Good Faith, Motivation, etc.

United States v. Rahman, 189 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 1999) : Upholding convictions related to the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, the Court found no error in the exclusion of expert testimony concerning the intentions of the lead defendant, a Muslim cleric, with respect to "jihad" (i.e., combating of oppression, or holy war). The expert was not competent to tell the jury of the defendant's intentions without having the defendant speak. The Court also held that testimony of an international security expert that terrorist activity against the United States was against the cleric's interest similarly was speculation by someone who was not competent to testify to a defendant's intentions. In United States v. DiDomenico, 985 F.2d 1159 (2d Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed convictions for wire fraud and interstate transportation of stolen computer equipment, and held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the defendant had a "dependent personality disorder." The imprimatur of a clinical label was neither necessary nor helpful for the jury in assessing the defendant's state of mind and would complicate the jury's task. One Judge dissented on the ground that the diagnosis, being neither commonplace nor beyond the boundaries of current psychiatric knowledge, could be helpful, and the jury could be relied on to evaluate the evidence with a critical eye and look beyond the clinical label in deciding whether the defendant's mental state included guilty knowledge.

Dunn v. HOVIC, 1 F.3d 1362 (3d Cir. 1993) , modified on other grounds, 13 F.3d 58 (3d Cir. 1993) : Affirming a judgment for a plaintiff claiming an asbestos-related injury, the Court held that there was no error in allowing the plaintiff's expert to testify, on the basis of his review of the asbestos manufacturer's corporate records, that the manufacturer knew of the risks of asbestos.

Singer v. City of Waco, 324 F.3d 813 (5th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for firefighters in a Fair Labor Standards Act case, the Court upheld the exclusion of expert testimony by a former Department of Labor official that the City "likely did not know that its pay practices violated the FLSA." Since the expert was not an employee of the City and was not a party to any of the events leading up to the litigation, there was no showing of a reasonable basis for expert testimony as to willfulness. In United States v. Chavis, n103 the Court affirmed mail fraud convictions, finding that the defendant's cross-examination of a government expert opened the door to redirect examination in which the expert opined that, if certain facts were assumed, a person who made representations would not have acted in good faith. The Court observed, however, that "in the ordinary circumstance testimony concerning a defendant's state of mind must be avoided."

United States v. Gaskell, 985 F.2d 1056 (11th Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed the defendant's conviction for involuntary manslaughter of his infant daughter, holding that it was an abuse of discretion to exclude expert testimony on the general lack of public awareness of the dangers of shaking an infant. Where the dispositive issue in the case was whether the defendant intended to revive the infant or to injure her, the evidence would be probative of his knowledge and intent, helpful to the trier, and not cumulative. In United States v. Lankford, 955 F.2d 1545 (11th Cir. 1992) , the Court reversed a conviction for extortion and filing false income tax returns, holding that it was error to exclude testimony by a defense expert on the reasonableness of the defendant's conclusion that a $1,500 check he received was a gift rather than taxable income. A subjective good-faith misunderstanding of the law or a good-faith belief that one is not violating the law can negate the statutory wilfulness requirement of criminal tax offenses, so any evidence of the reasonableness of the defendant's belief was relevant to the determination of whether his violation of the tax laws was wilful.

[54] Law Enforcement Agents

[a] Check-kiting

United States v. Yoon, 128 F.3d 515 (7th Cir. 1997) : The Court held that testimony from a law enforcement agent concerning a check-kiting scheme was properly admitted under Daubert. The agent testified on the basis of extensive experience, describing how check-kiting schemes operate and explaining how and why he reached the opinion that check-kiting occurred in this case.

United States v. Whitehead, 176 F.3d 1030 (8th Cir. 1999) : The Court held in a bank fraud prosecution that there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an FBI agent to explain check-kiting and discuss some of its common characteristics. The Trial Judge had found that the testimony was reliable and would aid the trier of fact in understanding the evidence.

[b] Law Enforcement Agents -- Child Abuse

United States v. Romero, 189 F.3d 576 (7th Cir. 1999) : The defendant was charged with kidnapping a minor with intent to engage in criminal sexual activity after developing a relationship with a 12-year-old boy over the Internet. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony regarding the characteristics of "preferential" child molesters from an FBI expert on child molesters. The testimony was helpful in dispelling the stereotype of a molester as "a dirty old man in a wrinkled raincoat" who snatches children off the street as they wait for the school bus and in understanding the sophisticated psychological techniques modern molesters use to seduce their victims.

[c] Law Enforcement Agents -- Drug Cases

[i] Defense Evidence

United States v. Montague, 958 F.2d 1094 (D.C. Cir. 1992) : In a drug prosecution, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the defense from cross-examining a government expert on narcotics distribution about the effects of crack cocaine on the user's memory and perception.

United States v. Roldan-Zapata, 916 F.2d 795 (2d Cir. 1990) : The Court held there was no error in preventing a defense expert witness in a drug case from testifying as to police and DEA agents' surveillance and recordkeeping procedures. Although he was qualified to opine whether notes and ledgers taken from the defendants were narcotics records, he had been retired from government service for eight years and there was no showing he had current knowledge of "normal" procedures.

[ii] Law Enforcement Agents -- Drug Cases -- Drug Prices, Effects, Growing, Manufacture, etc.

United States v. Montague, 958 F.2d 1094 (D.C. Cir. 1992) : In a drug prosecution, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the defense from cross-examining a government expert on narcotics distribution about the effects of crack cocaine on the user's memory and perception.

United States v. Rivera Rodriguez, 808 F.2d 886 (1st Cir. 1986) : In a prosecution for importing and possessing cocaine with intent to distribute, the Court held that an expert was properly permitted to testify that a certain instrument found in the defendant's car could be used to adulterate cocaine, as the testimony would have helped the jury.

United States v. Saulter, 60 F.3d 270 (7th Cir. 1995) : The Court found no error when a law enforcement agent testified to the process of manufacturing crack. This subject matter was "likely beyond the ken of the average juror." The Court noted that in this case the government's main fact-witness had been heavily impeached, but that the expert was not called "solely to corroborate" the testimony of that witness.

United States v. Hughes, 15 F.3d 798 (8th Cir. 1994) : An expert testified that the purity level of crack cocaine found in the defendant's pocket was the same as the purity level of crack found in his trunk and that it is unusual to find two batches with the same purity level. Distinguishing United States v. Arenal, n104 the Court held that here the jury was allowed to draw its own conclusion whether the two exhibits of crack were from the same source or batch. In United States v. Agyen, n105 the Court held that a DEA agent could testify as to the street value of pure heroin contained in a mixture, even though the agent had never analyzed the value of heroin prior to this case.

United States v. Mendoza-Paz, 286 F.3d 1104 (9th Cir. 2002) : The defendant, caught crossing a port of entry with drugs hidden in her car, challenged the testimony of the government's drug valuation expert, arguing that it was not subject to empirical testing, could not be reviewed for error rates, and contained estimates that had not been accepted in any expert community. Finding no error in admission of the testimony, the Court noted that the Daubert inquiry for non-scientific experts was a flexible one, and that factors such as peer review and potential error rate "simply are not applicable to this kind of testimony, whose reliability depends heavily on the knowledge and experience of the expert, rather than the methodology or theory behind it." In United States v. Lennick, 18 F.3d 814 (9th Cir. 1994) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an officer to testify about the length of time it takes to grow a marijuana plant, the amount of marijuana it takes to make a cigarette, and the amount of marijuana one could obtain from a single plant, as such matters may be outside the common knowledge of a jury determining whether the defendant, who allegedly grew almost 50 plants, was growing more than he could consume himself.

[iii] Law Enforcement Agents -- Drug Cases -- Interpreting Statements, Code, etc.

United States v. Rivera-Rosario, 300 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2002) : Reviewing drug trafficking convictions, the Court found no plain error in the admission of testimony by a federal agent as to the meaning of coded conversations. The FBI had trained the agent on how to conduct drug investigations and to decipher coded references, and the agent's experience in 25 drug investigations, many of which intercepted conversations in English and Spanish and involved heavily coded references to drugs and narcotics dealing, provided a sufficient basis for the testimony. In a cocaine-related money laundering case, United States v. Gonzalez-Maldonado, 115 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 1997) , the Court held that it was error to permit an FBI agent to interpret words in recorded conversations that were not code words and that were clear statements that the jury could interpret for itself. See also United States v. Hoffman n106(government agent was properly permitted to interpret coded drug negotiations).

United States v. Cruz, 363 F.3d 187 (2d Cir. 2004) : Reversing a conviction for aiding and abetting narcotics trafficking, the Court held that while government agents could assist in deciphering drug jargon, it was improper to permit them to testify about the meaning of a phrase like "to watch someone's back" that is neither "coded nor esoteric," and that the dangers of admitting such testimony are particularly acute when, as in this case, the law enforcement agent is also testifying as a fact witness.

United States v. Gibbs, 190 F.3d 188 (3d Cir. 1999) : In a cocaine distribution conspiracy case the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to permit an agent to interpret phrases such as "tonight's the night," "we're going to be on that tonight," and "got to do it tonight." In contrast to terms like "jawn," "on post," and "quarter," which the agent properly translated from the drug trade argot, the former phrases were ones for which the jury needed no aid or illumination. Thus, the agent's testimony was not helpful and served only to bolster allegations that the defendant was an enforcer.

United States v. Phillips, 593 F.2d 553 (4th Cir. 1978) : The Court found no error in admitting testimony by a government agent in a narcotics case interpreting code language in intercepted telephone conversations.

United States v. Krout, 66 F.3d 1420 (5th Cir. 1995) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) for a detective to testify that references in recorded conversations to "the people" and the "driver of the truck" indicated that a defendant was acting with others to bring heroin into the area. There was no assertion by the government that the conversations were in code, and the jury was in as good a position as the "expert" to interpret ordinary words.

United States v. Lawson, 780 F.2d 535 (6th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed convictions involving transportation of stolen property. It upheld the admission of police officers' testimony concerning the meaning of certain terms used in drug trafficking, finding that the officers were experts and that there was evidence that stolen property would be exchanged for drugs.

United States v. Ceballos, 302 F.3d 679 (7th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed drug conspiracy and money laundering convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting two experienced DEA agents to interpret code language used in recorded phone conversations. Although the conversations were in Spanish and neither agent spoke fluent Spanish, the Court found no authority prohibiting experts from interpreting drug code language in English translations of Spanish conversations. The Court also held that the agents could offer opinions on the meaning of pronouns such as "it" and "them" because the pronouns were used in an ambiguous manner. In United States v. Ramirez, n107 the Court affirmed cocaine convictions, finding no error in the admission of testimony by a government agent who interpreted tape-recorded conversations based upon his experience in narcotics cases. Interestingly, the Trial Judge did not use the word "expert" in instructing the jury, since its use might have unduly emphasized the testimony.

United States v. Sparks, 949 F.2d 1023 (8th Cir. 1991) : The Court held that an experienced detective's testimony could be helpful in a drug conspiracy case to understand the meaning of graffiti and hand signs depicted in pictures as well as the potential significance of an admitted gang member moving from Los Angeles to a city in the Midwest.

[iv] Law Enforcement Agents -- Drug Cases -- Opinions About Conduct or Other Circumstances in Case

United States v. Hall, 969 F.2d 1102 (D.C. Cir. 1992) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in allowing an expert on use and distribution of narcotics to testify on the question of whether the defendant had the requisite intent in a prosecution for possession with intent to distribute. Even though the Judge conducting the bench trial was experienced with narcotics trafficking cases, the expert testimony could be helpful; furthermore, the Judge's expertise made it highly unlikely the Judge would be swayed by the "aura" of the expert's testimony.

United States v. Agudelo, 988 F.2d 285 (1st Cir. 1993) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit a drug enforcement agent's testimony that cash in the defendant's possession was the proceeds of a drug transaction when the agent had no special grounds for his opinion.

United States v. Young, 745 F.2d 733 (2d Cir. 1984) : In a prosecution involving heroin trafficking, the Court found that government agents were properly permitted to testify that in their opinion an incident involving a defendant was a narcotics transaction, since the agents were experts whose testimony might have aided the jury in understanding unusual events. The Court approved the use of another expert to narrate a videotape in order to opine for the jury what the tape revealed, and it also upheld the admission of testimony concerning the general background of heroin distribution, which was used to explain to the jury the paraphernalia that was found in a search. One Judge concurred, but questioned "whether an expert's opinion that the events he observes constitute a drug transaction provides very much, if any, assistance to a jury, beyond whatever inference is available to be drawn by the jury from all the evidence." He suggested that Trial Judges should carefully screen this kind of expert opinion under Rules 403 and 702 and "should not routinely admit opinions of the sort at issue here."

United States v. Davis, 397 F.3d 173 (3d Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed drug trafficking and firearms convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting expert testimony from an experienced police officer. When asked a hypothetical question based on the evidence whether the facts were consistent with drug trafficking or with simple possession, he answered that it "would be possession with intent to deliver the narcotics." His testimony concerning the methods of operation for drug traffickers in the South Philadelphia area would assist the jury because the topic was not within the common knowledge of the average juror. Affirming marijuana convictions in United States v. Wright-Barker, n108 the Court sustained the admission of testimony by a Coast Guard expert that a ship's course and condition were consistent with drug smuggling.

United States v. Hopkins, 310 F.3d 145 (4th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a conviction for possessing cocaine with intent to distribute, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when an experienced police officer was permitted to testify how the materials found in the defendant's car at the time of arrest led him to believe, based on his experience and training, that the defendant was involved in drug distribution. The testimony was properly based on the witness' observations of the evidence in the case and assisted the jury in determining the defendant's guilt. In United States v. Cooper, n109 the Court upheld the admission of testimony by a drug agent as to the defendant's place of residence, since the agent's opinion was based upon seeing the defendant at the residence many times.

United States v. Mendoza-Medina, 346 F.3d 121 (5th Cir. 2003) : In a truck driver's trial for marijuana possession, a DEA agent testified about how drug traffickers recruit smugglers. He suggested that the recruits knew they were transporting drugs, and he mentioned specifically facts closely paralleling the case. Affirming, the Court found that admission of the agent's testimony was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error). The testimony was closely akin to drug courier profile evidence, which is inadmissible because it is inherently prejudicial and violates Rule 704(b)'s bar on expert testimony to prove a mental element: in these cases, the courier's knowledge that he was transporting drugs. Further, it was questionable whether the agent's testimony about what the driver would have known involved any expertise. In a drug conspiracy case, United States v. Buchanan, 70 F.3d 818 (5th Cir. 1995) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by experienced officers that a defendant's actions indicated he was guarding a car that was later found to contain weapons and crack cocaine. The officer's specialized knowledge could be helpful to aid the jury in determining whether the defendant's presence with the drugs was innocent or not.

United States v. Swafford, 385 F.3d 1026 (6th Cir. 2004) : Affirming methamphetamine and firearms convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a police officer was permitted to testify that methamphetamine found in a garage outside the defendant's house was possessed with intent to distribute and that firearms play a role in drug trafficking activity. The Court stated that "[p]olice officers are routinely allowed to testify that circumstances are consistent with distribution of drugs rather than personal use," and opined that courts have taken a very tolerant view of testimony tying firearms to drug trafficking.

United States v. Brown, 7 F.3d 648 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possessing cocaine base with intent to distribute, holding there was no error in permitting a DEA agent to testify, based on the circumstances, that the crack seized "was intended for distribution." Viewed as a whole, the testimony merely suggested that this crack probably would be distributed rather than used by the defendant; it was not an opinion on guilt or innocence nor on the defendant's mental state. In United States v. Lewis, 954 F.2d 1386 (7th Cir. 1992) , the Court held that it was error (but harmless) for a correctional officer to give an opinion that balloons smuggled into the prison contained drugs, as there was no foundation offered that he had training or personal knowledge regarding how drugs were smuggled into prisons. In United States v. Foster, n110 the Court affirmed a conviction for possession of cocaine and PCP with intent to distribute, holding that a DEA agent involved in the arrest could be helpful to the jury in pointing out, based on his long experience in narcotics investigations, the criminal modus operandi involved in apparently innocent behavior.

United States v. Brown, 110 F.3d 605 (8th Cir. 1997) : A law enforcement agent testified as an expert in this narcotics case, expressing the opinion that a certain house was used as a stash house and that the defendant's activity was consistent with one engaging in a drug delivery and countersurveillance activity. Affirming the conviction, the Court held that the agent's testimony assisted the jury in determining the significance of the defendant's activity. In United States v. Cotton, 22 F.3d 182 (8th Cir. 1994) , the Court held that an experienced detective could testify that the amount of crack cocaine seized was indicative of distribution.

United States v. Espinosa, 827 F.2d 604 (9th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that a narcotics detective was properly permitted to testify that an apartment was being used as a "stash pad" for narcotics and money. See also United States v. Andersson n111(upholding the admission of testimony by a paid government informant concerning techniques used by drug peddlers and testimony by an officer that the defendants engaged in "counter-surveillance techniques" to ascertain whether they were being followed).

[v] Law Enforcement Agents -- Drug Cases -- Practices of Drug Trade

United States v. Moore, 104 F.3d 377 (D.C. Cir. 1997) : Hidden in the car in which the defendant was arrested were drugs, weapons, and a roll of duct tape. Affirming a conviction for drug trafficking offenses, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a detective knowledgeable about narcotics to testify that duct tape was often used in the drug trade to bind people being robbed or who were otherwise restrained. The evidence was helpful to the jury in determining the defendant's intent to distribute the drugs found in his possession, and its probative value was not substantially outweighed by its tendency to suggest he was a violent person who binds people with duct tape. In United States v. Doe, 903 F.2d 16 (D.C. Cir. 1990) , an African-American and two Jamaicans were jointly charged with drug offenses. The Court reversed their convictions, in part because a detective was permitted to testify to the modus operandi of Jamaican drug dealers and how the market "has been taken over basically by Jamaicans." The Court cautioned that although jurors may not be familiar with the methods of drug dealers, expert testimony may create undue prejudice because of its aura of special reliability and trustworthiness.

United States v. Lopez-Lopez, 282 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2002) : Affirming cocaine-related convictions, the Court held that a Customs Service expert was properly allowed to testify as to the modus operandi of individuals importing drugs into Puerto Rico. The expert's explanations of how drug importation schemes use global positioning satellites to facilitate air drops and boat transfers and how cellular phones are used to enable boat-to-ground communications could have helped the jury understand matters outside its ordinary knowledge and experience. The Court held that the government made a sufficient showing to satisfy the "flexible" test for reliability of non-scientific expert testimony established in Kumho Tire. In United States v. DiMarzo, 80 F.3d 656 (1st Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed convictions for a cocaine distribution conspiracy in which two defendants asserted they had not known a third was planning to conduct a drug deal, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an undercover agent in the case to testify on redirect that in his experience innocent observers were not invited to accompany criminals engaged in completing a drug deal. The testimony did not implicate the opinion rules, since it was simply the witness' personal experience relating to a subject bearing directly upon the appropriateness of a jury inference, nor did it encroach on the jury's factfinding function regarding the ultimate issue of guilt. In United States v. Montas, n112 the Court affirmed a cocaine possession conviction, although it raised questions about the admissibility of a drug agent's testimony that drug traffickers often travel under assumed names to avoid being caught. The Court found that "this evidence was on the very margin of -- and probably beyond -- what is acceptable," but declined to find plain error.

United States v. Castillo, 924 F.2d 1227 (2d Cir. 1991) : Reversing convictions for drug offenses because a detective was improperly permitted to testify to operating methods of drug dealers, the Court said that a New York jury hardly needs expert assistance to inform them of the functions of a scale or index card in a drug deal or that dealers, in order to flush out undercover police officers, threaten customers with guns to make them snort cocaine. In United States v. Cruz, 981 F.2d 659 (2d Cir. 1992) , the Court reversed a drug conviction for the erroneous admission of expert testimony concerning the behavior of drug dealers from a certain area and the modus operandi of dealers in the area. The government's key witness asserted that the defendant had acted as a "broker" between one drug dealer and suppliers, but the defendant denied he was present at the transactions. The Trial Judge admitted testimony of a special agent to bolster the key witness' testimony by showing that the events described by the witness were typical of drug deals in the area. The Court cited Castillo and reasoned that the government may not bolster a witness' testimony in this way and that "guilt may not be inferred from the conduct of unrelated persons." See also United States v. Cruz n113(a government agent was properly permitted to testify regarding the food stamp program and the use of food stamps in narcotics sales, where food stamps had been found on one defendant following surveillance of a suspected narcotics exchange area).

United States v. Perez, 280 F.3d 318 (3d Cir. 2002) : The Court found no abuse of discretion in a methamphetamine prosecution when a detective lieutenant was permitted to testify how drug traffickers use cellular telephones to frustrate police investigations. The Court observed that "[i]t is not common knowledge among lay persons serving as jurors that police are unable simultaneously to wire-tap cellular phone calls and keep under surveillance those who make them, or that numeric pagers are used by drug traffickers to transmit coded messages."

United States v. Gastiaburo, 16 F.3d 582 (4th Cir. 1994) : In a drug trafficking case, the Court held there was no error in admitting testimony from a police officer about the methods of drug dealers. In United States v. Monu, n114 the Court upheld the admission of expert testimony by investigative agents concerning the purity of heroin generally distributed and the identification of a scale as a tool of heroin trade. The agents had many years of experience in investigating heroin distribution.

United States v. Garcia, 86 F.3d 394 (5th Cir. 1996) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a DEA agent to testify about the methods of large cocaine trafficking organizations and that such an organization controlled the cocaine seized in the case, since the average juror might not be aware that the presence of 166.9 kilos of cocaine is indicative of such an organization or that they commonly use "car swaps," "stash houses," and "heat runs" as testified to in this case.

United States v. Harris, 192 F.3d 580 (6th Cir. 1999) : In a prosecution for drug distribution, the defendant claimed that the six grams of crack found on his person was for personal use. The Court found that the Daubert and Kumho standards of relevance and reliability were met when a law enforcement agent was permitted to testify as an expert on the methods and operations of street level drug dealers.

United States v. Brumley, 217 F.3d 905 (7th Cir. 2000) : In a prosecution for possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a DEA agent was permitted to testify that amounts of methamphetamine in excess of one ounce were distribution as opposed to personal use amounts. The testimony was not subjective or speculative, but based on the agent's experience in approximately 100 methamphetamine investigations, and did not purport to be based on some special knowledge of the defendant's mental state. In United States v. Sanchez-Galvez, 33 F.3d 829 (7th Cir. 1994) , the Trial Judge permitted an experienced DEA agent to testify that the presence of several persons, in addition to the buyer and seller, is common in drug transactions; that the presence of children at drug deals is increasing in frequency; and that parking lots are common venues for drug transactions. The Court held that this testimony was properly admitted because it helped the jury "to apply to the evidence alternative theories of which they ordinarily would not have been aware." See also United States v. Gonzalez n115(a DEA agent was permitted to testify that narcotic-related phone calls "are short").

United States v. Battle, 859 F.2d 56 (8th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that an agent was properly permitted to testify that two scales were common to drug operations.

United States v. Pineda-Torres, 287 F.3d 860 (9th Cir. 2002) : The Court reversed convictions for importation and possession of marijuana, finding that it was an abuse of discretion to admit expert testimony regarding the structure of drug trafficking organizations (including the futility of collecting fingerprints because of the organizations' compartmentalized nature) in a simple, non-conspiracy importation case. Citing United States v. Vallejo (see § 403.03[29][c][ii]), the Court concluded that it had rejected the notion that evidence of the structure of drug organizations could prove that a particular defendant had knowledge that drugs were in his car. The Court also held that the defendant had not opened the door to the evidence by cross-examining a Customs agent about the failure to lift fingerprints. In United States v. Varela-Rivera, 279 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 2002) , a prosecution for drug importation and possession with intent to distribute, the defendant denied knowing that he was carrying the drugs and a Customs agent was permitted to testify about the methods and techniques used by narcotics smugglers, including that a smuggler would not risk using an unknowing courier to transport drugs. The Court held that admission of the expert's testimony was reversible error, since it prejudicially portrayed the defendant as a member of an international drug trafficking organization even though he was indicted only as an individual and there was no charge that he was acting in a conspiracy. In United States v. Murillo, n116 the defendant was arrested driving a rental car in which over one million dollars worth of drugs were found hidden. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony from a DEA agent about the modus operandi of drug traffickers, including the typical travel itineraries of drug couriers, why couriers use rental cars, and how traffickers do not entrust large quantities of drugs to people who are unaware that they are transporting them. The testimony was helpful to determining whether the defendant was simply an unknowing courier. At the same time, the agent did not go beyond his experience with drug traffickers and impermissibly provide an explicit opinion as to the defendant's knowledge or state of mind. In United States v. Figueroa-Lopez, n117 the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit, as lay opinion, testimony by law enforcement officers that the defendant's conduct conformed to the methods and techniques of experienced drug dealers. Such testimony requires that the witness be qualified as having the knowledge, experience, training, or education to render the testimony admissible under Rule 702. In United States v. Cordoba, n118 the Court remanded a drug conviction on other grounds, but found no error in the admission of a law enforcement agent's expert testimony that sophisticated narcotics traffickers do not entrust 300 kilograms of cocaine to someone who is unaware of what he is transporting. The testimony was helpful in a complex criminal case to explain the modus operandi of drug dealers. In United States v. Taren-Palma, n119 the Court affirmed convictions for cocaine distribution and weapons offenses, holding there was no error in permitting one of the undercover agents to testify that guns are often used in drug transactions to protect either the drugs or the money at the time of the exchange. One Judge dissented in part, on the ground that the testimony was unnecessary and prejudicial in this close case. In United States v. Jaramillo-Suarez, n120 the Court affirmed convictions for a cocaine distribution conspiracy, holding that an expert agent properly testified about the nature of pay/owe sheets, as that is specialized information not readily known to jurors.

United States v. Chastain, 198 F.3d 1338 (11th Cir. 1999) : The Court found no abuse of discretion when a Customs agent was permitted to testify regarding the general techniques of drug smugglers and about certain modifications made in a defendant's plane to make it more suitable for drug smuggling, as the evidence was relevant to establishing the existence of the charged conspiracy to smuggle marijuana from Jamaica by using an airplane.

[vi] Law Enforcement Agents -- Drug Cases -- Role in Enterprise

United States v. Boney, 977 F.2d 624 (D.C. Cir. 1992) : In a thorough opinion affirming convictions for cocaine distribution, the Court held that an officer's testimony, which at most matched particular defendants with paradigm roles in an illegal enterprise, did not amount to an impermissible direct opinion on the defendants' guilt. The inherent danger of such expert opinion is a factor to be considered under Rule 403, which the defendant in this case did not raise; on the facts, there was clearly no plain error and there probably would have been no abuse of discretion in finding the balance favored admissibility.

United States v. Garcia-Morales, 382 F.3d 12 (1st Cir. 2004) : Affirming a drug conspiracy conviction, the Court held that testimony by the Customs Service agent in charge of the investigation was admissible to explain the structure and operation of a typical drug conspiracy. It reasoned that most jurors are likely unfamiliar with the drug trade, so the testimony provided helpful context for explaining the defendant's participation.

United States v. Garcia, 413 F.3d 201 (2d Cir. 2005) : During the defendant's trial for a cocaine distribution conspiracy, a case agent was permitted to testify, "based on your investigation" or "[a]s far as our investigation determined," regarding the roles of certain participants, including the defendant. The Court held that admission of the testimony was error, but harmless. Although opinion testimony is not inadmissible simply because it embraces an ultimate issue, the agent's opinion that the defendant was a partner with another in receiving cocaine "was essentially telling the jury that he had concluded that Garcia was guilty of the crimes charged," and opinion testimony merely telling the jury what result to reach is inadmissible. Furthermore, the testimony did not satisfy the requirements for either lay or expert opinions.

United States v. Galvan, 407 F.3d 954 (8th Cir. 2005) : In a prosecution for possessing pseudophedrine knowing it would be sued to manufacture methamphetamine, the Court held it was not an abuse of discretion to allow the government to call an expert even though an arresting officer, who testified only as a lay witness, possessed enough narcotics expertise to testify to the roles of pseudophedrine and purchasers of the drug in the production of methamphetamine.

[vii] Law Enforcement Agents -- Drug Cases -- Use of Cash

United States v. Gaines, 170 F.3d 72 (1st Cir. 1999) : At a trial on drug charges, an IRS investigator was permitted to describe some of the defendant's cash purchases, and then to conclude that the defendant's use of cash was "consistent with drug dealing" and "very difficult to trace." The Court considered that whether cash is used in drug dealing is a dubious subject for expert opinion testimony, but found no plain error.

[d] Law Enforcement Agents -- Dual Roles

United States v. Barrow, 400 F.3d 109 (2d Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction for distribution of cocaine, finding no abuse of discretion when a detective was permitted to give both fact and expert testimony. The Court reasoned that the witness' expert testimony was brief and related only to undisputed general practices of street-level drug dealers, and her fact testimony was likewise brief and easily separable from the expert testimony. In United States v. Dukagjini, 326 F.3d 45 (2d Cir. 2003) , the Court affirmed convictions arising from a drug conspiracy, but it expressed concerns about using a case agent as an expert to testify about the meaning of code words in wiretapped conversations. First, a fact witness may benefit from an "aura of special reliability and trustworthiness" when testifying as an expert. Second, a defendant may decline to cross-examine the dual-role case agent because "a failed effort to impeach the witness as expert may effectively enhance his credibility as a fact witness." Third, there is a risk that the expert testimony will stray into making sweeping conclusion about the defendant's activities, as here, where the agent testified about the meaning of conversations in general, beyond the interpretation of code words, and interpreted ambiguous slang terms, with no evidence that they were drug code with fixed meaning either within the narcotics world or within this particular conspiracy. The error in exceeding the bounds of Rule 702 was harmless, however. In United States v. Rivera, 971 F.2d 876 (2d Cir. 1992) , the Court held that an undercover agent was properly permitted to testify as both fact witness and expert witness on heroin production, distribution, and use.

United States v. Johnson, 54 F.3d 1150 (4th Cir. 1995) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when a detective, at the end of the government's case-in-chief, offered summary testimony and an organizational chart based on prior witnesses' testimony that diagrammed drug transactions among members of the charged conspiracy. Although the detective's summary testimony did not relate to his specialized knowledge, the Court concluded that the summary chart would be helpful because of the complexity of the case. The Court cautioned that the dangers inherent in the dual roles of expert and summary witness make the practice inappropriate in the ordinary drug prosecution lacking the complexity of this case.

United States v. Tocco, 200 F.3d 401 (6th Cir. 2000) : In the RICO prosecution of a Mafia leader, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting an FBI agent to testify both as a fact witness and as an expert on the Mafia's organization, rules, and structure. The agent's dual roles were emphasized to the jury by the fact that he testified early in the trial as a fact witness and at its conclusion as an expert, and the jury was instructed to consider his dual roles in determining the weight to be given his testimony. In United States v. Thomas, 74 F.3d 676 (6th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed a crack cocaine conviction, holding that a detective was properly permitted to testify as a fact witness and as an expert witness assisting the jury in understanding the drug trade. The Court declined to adopt a per se prohibition on the use of a witness as both a fact witness and an expert, but did "note that both the district court and the prosecutor should take care to assure that the jury is informed of the dual roles of a law enforcement officer as a fact witness and an expert witness, so that the jury can give proper weight to each type of testimony."

United States v. Parra, 402 F.3d 752 (7th Cir. 2005) : In a drug prosecution, a law enforcement agent testified as an expert on counter-surveillance tactics used in narcotics transaction, and he also testified as an eyewitness to the transaction at issue. Affirming, the Court found that the Judge had been careful to avoid the pitfalls of dual-role witnesses, i.e., that the jury will be confused and that the jury will misunderstand its function in evaluating the evidence. In United States v. Mansoori, 304 F.3d 635 (7th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed drug trafficking convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion when a police officer involved in the investigation was also permitted to give expert testimony concerning the history, leadership, and drug-selling operations of a street gang with which various defendants were associated. While providing the jury with useful background concerning the gang and its narcotics activities, the expert's testimony did not invite the jury to conclude that membership in the gang equated with participation in the charged conspiracy. Furthermore, the potential for prejudice from the officer's dual role as expert and fact witness was avoided by structuring his direct examination so as to separate his opinions as an expert from his factual observations as an occurrence witness. In United States v. Foster, n121 the Court affirmed a conviction for possession of cocaine and PCP with intent to distribute, holding that a DEA agent involved in the arrest could be helpful to the jury in pointing out, based on his long experience in narcotics investigations, the criminal modus operandi involved in apparently innocent behavior. The Trial Judge and the prosecutor were sensitive to the need to prevent any jury confusion that might be engendered by the witness' dual role.

[e] Law Enforcement Agents -- Firearms

United States v. Corey, 207 F.3d 84 (1st Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting an ATF agent to testify that the shotgun at issue had traveled across state lines. The agent had experience in providing technical information about firearms identification, testing and evaluating firearms submitted as evidence, and maintaining the ATF reference collection of firearms. One Judge dissented on the ground that people of common understanding can easily comprehend from corporate records and without expert assistance where a weapon was manufactured.

United States v. Wallace, 889 F.2d 580 (5th Cir. 1989) : The Court affirmed a felon firearm possession conviction, holding that an ATF agent with lengthy research, training, and experience was properly permitted to opine that markings on a gun established it had been manufactured by an out-of-state company.

United States v. Conn, 297 F.3d 548 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a conviction for willfully dealing in firearms without a license, the Court upheld the admission of testimony by a BATF agent that, based on his training and experience, the defendant's firearms were not collector's items. The Court concluded that the record showed that the testimony was based on sufficient facts and was the product of reliable principles and methods, and that the witness had applied the principles and methods reliably to the facts of the case. In United States v. Ware, 914 F.2d 997 (7th Cir. 1990) , the Court held an expert ATF agent's testimony was helpful in determining whether a shotgun had traveled interstate.

United States v. Strobehn, 421 F.3d 1017 (9th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed an armed bank robbery conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when an FBI agent was permitted to testify that the gun carried by the robber pictured in bank photographs was the same type of gun that the defendant owned. Unlike situations in which the jury is able without expert assistance to look at surveillance photographs of the robber and determine whether the defendant is the same person, the Court concluded that "[i]t is unlikely that anyone not experienced in handling and using firearms would know what features to look at, or how to compare them," in identifying firearms. In United States v. Webb, 115 F.3d 711 (9th Cir. 1997) , the Court affirmed a conviction for possession of ammunition by a felon, finding no error in the admission of police expert testimony regarding the reasons criminals conceal weapons in the engine compartments of their cars. In United States v. Gutierrez, n122 the Court affirmed a firearms conviction, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an officer to testify that the defendant's behavior was "furtive."

[f] Law Enforcement Agents -- Fraud

Pelster v. Ray, 987 F.2d 514 (8th Cir. 1993) : In an action by purchasers of a used car with a rolled-back odometer against a dealer and an auto auction through which the car was sold, the plaintiffs offered a state revenue investigator to testify that the odometers of 300 of 350 cars sold through the auction that he checked had been rolled back and that the dealer had been responsible for 204 of those 300 cars. The Court reversed a judgment for the buyers, holding that the investigator's testimony was inadmissible hearsay, since it rested upon out-of-court statements that a particular vehicle had a certain number of miles on the odometer on a given date and another out-of-court statement or document purporting to show a smaller number of miles at a later date. No showing was made that the investigator was an expert or that experts in any field rely upon the sources of information he relied upon. Moreover, the Court found that a lay person did not need expert help to compare odometer readings on two titles or statements. The Court observed that on retrial the investigator may have helpful expert testimony to offer with respect to the form of odometer statements, how titles are prepared or altered, and how auto auctions are run, but the expert cannot bring inadmissible hearsay before the jury under the guise of an expert opinion.

United States v. Alonso, 48 F.3d 1536 (9th Cir. 1995) : Affirming convictions for a fake credit card scheme, the Court held there was no error in permitting the undercover agents conducting the sting to characterize a defendant's counter-surveillance behavior as consistent with someone being involved in a criminal activity. The agents did not express an opinion that the defendant was guilty of the crimes charged, but only helped the jury understand how otherwise innocent conduct, such as looking into parked cars, might indicate criminal behavior. In United States v. Johnson, n123 the Court affirmed mail and securities fraud convictions and upheld the admission of a government expert's testimony concerning fraudulent schemes. The Court observed that expert testimony could help the jury understand complex criminal activities and alert it "to the possibility that combinations of seemingly innocuous events may indicate criminal behavior." See also United States v. McCollum n124(upholding the admission of expert testimony regarding the typical structure of mail fraud schemes).

[g] Law Enforcement Agents -- Gambling, Loansharking, Organized Crime, Racketeering, etc.

United States v. Weiner, 3 F.3d 17 (1st Cir. 1993) : In affirming RICO convictions, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to permit an FBI agent to testify that different references next to the same telephone number in various records all referred to the same person. This opinion reflected no special expertise but was a routine inference that the jury could draw on its own. In United States v. Lamattina, n125 the Court held that an FBI agent's testimony as to the meaning of loansharking terms was helpful to the jury in determining the significance of recorded conversations.

United States v. Long, 917 F.2d 691 (2d Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed RICO convictions, holding that an FBI agent had been improperly permitted to testify about organized crime families, as the extensive descriptions had a highly prejudicial effect and only marginal relevance when the enterprise alleged was not a crime family and had only a single connection with organized crime. See also United States v. Daly n126(a law enforcement officer was properly permitted to explain the nature and structure of organized crime families).

United States v. Vastola, 899 F.2d 211 (3d Cir. 1990) , vacated on other grounds, 497 U.S. 1001 (1990) : Affirming convictions for extortion offenses, the Court held that a police officer with extensive experience investigating loansharking was properly permitted to testify regarding loansharking terms used in a taped conversation. In United States v. Riccobene, n127 the Court found no error in the admission of testimony by a government agent defining terms like "La Cosa Nostra," "capi," and "consigliere," where the jury was instructed that the testimony was offered only for its definitional value.

United States v. Scavo, 593 F.2d 837 (8th Cir. 1979) : The Court approved a ruling that admitted expert testimony by a special government agent who testified about the nature of gambling operations, gambling terminology, and his opinion of the defendant's role in a bookmaking scheme. The testimony apparently was based on an interpretation of conversations obtained through government wiretaps.

Spatafore v. United States, 752 F.2d 415 (9th Cir. 1985) : An FBI agent was permitted to testify concerning the significance of intercepted telephone conversations that related to point spreads on which wagers were based.

United States v. Pinelli, 890 F.2d 1461 (10th Cir. 1989) : Convictions for gambling offenses were affirmed, the Court holding that an FBI agent was properly permitted to state opinions regarding the roles played by various defendants in the gambling operation. The testimony would assist the jury, since the case was complex; there was a large volume of tape recordings and documentary exhibits; and the average person is unfamiliar with the professional gambling business.

[h] Law Enforcement Agents -- Gang Experts

United States v. Padilla, 387 F.3d 1087 (9th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion when a detective having extensive experience with local gangs was permitted to testify regarding gang punishment for junior members who fail to support senior members. The testimony was admitted for the limited purpose of impeaching exculpatory testimony offered by a passenger in the defendant's car, who testified that both he and the defendant were gang members and that the gun found in the car was his rather than the defendant's. The probative value of the expert's testimony on the witness' truthfulness was not substantially outweighed by any prejudicial effect. In United States v. Hankey, 203 F.3d 1160 (9th Cir. 2000) , Hankey's codefendant in a drug trial testified that Hankey was not involved. An officer who was an expert on gang activity gave testimony in rebuttal that gang members who testify against one of their own are typically beaten or killed by other members of their gang. Affirming, the Court found that the Trial Judge had conducted a searching inquiry of the expert's experience and his reasoning from that experience, and the expert had demonstrated that the information upon which he relied was of the type normally obtained in his day-to-day police activity, so the testimony was properly admitted.

[i] Law Enforcement Agents -- Miscellaneous Testimony

United States v. Rosario-Diaz, 202 F.3d 54 (1st Cir. 2000) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) to permit an FBI agent to bolster the testimony of a cooperating witness by opining that particular statements of the witness were "lies" and by representing that the statements not singled out as lies had been "tested" and verified through interrogation techniques. Although the agent could properly have testified to facts within his personal knowledge that supported another witness' testimony and to actions he took to corroborate the testimony, it was impermissible for him to put the prestige of his professional knowledge behind the cooperating witness' testimony.

United States v. Oreira, 29 F.3d 185 (5th Cir. 1994) : Reversing convictions for structuring currency transactions, the Court held that it was proper for an IRS agent to give testimony as to how giro houses in Houston operated, but that the expert provided no foundation for testimony that a giro house is engaging in illegal structuring when most of the money is wired to one country. The Court noted that the government rightly disclaimed any argument that the particular destination country, Colombia, could be the basis for an inference of illegality. Although "not recommend[ing] the present case as a model for eliciting expert testimony," the Court in United States v. Willey, 57 F.3d 1374 (5th Cir. 1995) , found no abuse of discretion when an IRS agent was permitted to give her opinion in a money laundering case that certain transactions concealed the true source, nature, ownership, or control of the funds. The agent had not testified that the transactions were designed to conceal the source of the funds, which was the ultimate issue in the case.

United States v. McCullah, 745 F.2d 350 (6th Cir. 1984) : Affirming convictions involving transportation and sale of stolen vehicles, the Court upheld admission of a government agent's testimony that a stolen tractor was "hidden" under some trees.

Lawson v. Trowbridge, 153 F.3d 368 (7th Cir. 1998) : The plaintiff claimed that his civil rights were violated by an officer who allegedly arrested him without probable cause for carrying a concealed knife. Affirming a judgment for the officer, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by other officers that they had trained the defendant in approaching persons carrying knives in varying contexts. Although none of the testimony regarding the dangerousness of knives and how they are used by criminals was earth-shattering and much of it probably overlapped with the jurors' own experiences, it was at least helpful in putting the defendant's actions -- such as waiting after he heard that the plaintiff had a concealed knife in a bar until the plaintiff left the bar to approach him -- in context. In United States v. Moore, 936 F.2d 1508 (7th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed a ruling in limine precluding the defendant in a postal armed robbery case from calling a police officer as an expert witness to testify that the police had released the defendant from custody without charging him with a crime. A law enforcement officer's opinion concerning whether a defendant should be charged with a crime at a very early stage of the investigation is relevant only to the questions of the terms of bail and of whether there was probable cause to charge at that particular early phase, but is of no relevance to the question of whether the facts fully developed during the course of a continuing investigation and presented at trial established a defendant's guilt of the crime. In United States v. Lundy, n128 the Court affirmed convictions for arson and mail fraud, finding that a detective, who was a member of the Chicago police department bomb squad, was properly permitted to testify as to the cause and origin of a fire. The Court cautioned, however, that "[d]istrict courts must ensure that expert testimony is in fact expert testimony, not merely opinion given by an expert."

Sphere Drake Ins. PLC v. Trisko, 226 F.3d 951 (8th Cir. 2000) : Insurers sought to disclaim coverage after their insured, a maker and designer of jewelry, found that jewelry he had placed in the trunk of a rental car following a show was missing when he got to the airport to drop off the car. At trial the insured offered testimony and exhibits from a detective with the local police department regarding crime in the area, to help the jury understand the jewelry's disappearance. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of the testimony, since the detective had specialized knowledge of jewel thieves and their methods of operation and his investigation of the incident at issue afforded him knowledge of the case that was outside the jury's experience. In United States v. Rose, n129 the Court upheld an armed bank robbery conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by a police officer as to the results of a shoe-print comparison. Although the expert had worked as a firearms and tool mark examiner and had attended seminars relating to these examinations, his only expertise with shoe-prints came from "on-the-job training" over a six-year period. There was no evidence discrediting the methodology used by the expert, and Court said that "[a]n expert witness need not be an outstanding practitioner in the field nor have certificates of training in the particular subject." In a prosecution for passing counterfeit bills, United States v. Thompson, n130 the Court found that a Secret Service agent was qualified to testify that bills were counterfeit.

United States v. Hanna, 293 F.3d 1080 (9th Cir. 2002) : The Court reversed a conviction for threatening the President because Secret Service and police officers were permitted to testify that they considered documents the defendant had sent to be threatening. Since the legal standard was whether a reasonable person would foresee that the statements would be interpreted as a threat "by those to whom the maker communicates," and the defendant did not send his documents to law enforcement officers, their reactions had little bearing on the issue. The jury could well decide how a reasonable person would interpret the documents, and the law enforcement officers were "particularly unqualified," since by their professional experience they would see potential dangers that others might not notice or would consider innocuous. In United States v. Abonce-Barrera, 257 F.3d 959 (9th Cir. 2001) , the Court found no abuse of discretion when a DEA agent was permitted to testify as an expert to the transcription and translation of tape recordings of Spanish-language conversations, one of which included him as a participant. The agent was qualified by virtue of being a native Spanish speaker with considerable experience translating between Spanish and English, and the defense had a sufficient opportunity to expose the agent's biases, including presenting its own expert, who testified that it was inadvisable to have a participant to a conversation transcribe and translate that conversation. In United States v. Christophe, n131 the Court held that an experienced agent was properly permitted to testify why no fingerprints were found in a bank robbery case.

United States v. Cross, 928 F.2d 1030 (11th Cir. 1991) : Affirming convictions for mailing obscene material and for conspiring to produce child pornography, the Court held that an FBI agent was properly permitted to testify that particular pictures would be of sexual interest to pedophiles and to offer his expert opinion that the pictures were obscene, as the contested materials were directed at such a bizarre deviant group that the experience of the trier of fact would be inadequate to judge whether they appealed to the prurient interest.

[j] Law Enforcement Agents -- "Overview" Testimony

United States v. Casas, 356 F.3d 104 (1st Cir. 2004) : The Court held in a drug trafficking case that it was error for the first witness called by the government, a DEA agent, to testify about his investigation and then give his conclusions about the "organization," its members, and its activities, when the basis of his conclusions went beyond his personal knowledge and even beyond the evidence presented at trial. It was likely that these conclusions were based, at least in part, on statements by the purported leader of the conspiracy, who cooperated with the government and provided information but did not testify at trial. The Court considered it a "troubling development" that both it and the Fifth Circuit have had to address the government's use of initial witness "overview testimony," which is "inherently problematic ... [because] it raises the very real specter that the jury verdict could be influenced by statements of fact or credibility assessments in the overview but not in evidence ... [and] especially problematic because juries may place greater weight on evidence perceived to have the imprimatur of the government." Although expert witnesses have leeway under Rule 703 to rely on underlying facts or data that are not themselves admissible, the DEA agent was never qualified as an expert witness and his conclusions that particular persons were members of the conspiracy were not an appropriate subject for expert testimony. See also United States v. Casas, 425 F.3d 23 (1st Cir. 2005) (finding "overview" testimony harmless error in related case).

[k] Law Enforcement Agents -- Summary Testimony

United States v. Johnson, 54 F.3d 1150 (4th Cir. 1995) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when a detective, at the end of the government's case-in-chief, offered summary testimony and an organizational chart based on prior witnesses' testimony that diagrammed drug transactions among members of the charged conspiracy. Although the detective's summary testimony did not relate to his specialized knowledge, the Court concluded, after an extended discussion of summary testimony from expert witnesses, that the summary chart would be helpful because of the complexity of the case. The Court likewise held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting summary testimony from the detective, but it cautioned that the dangers inherent in the dual roles of expert and summary witness make the practice inappropriate in the ordinary drug prosecution lacking the complexity of this case.

United States v. Castillo, 77 F.3d 1480 (5th Cir. 1996) : The Court held in a marijuana distribution prosecution that a DEA agent, who properly presented summary charts relating to numerous wiretaps, had improperly been permitted to testify to matters that had nothing to do with summarizing any documents or records, were not anything observed or personally known by him, and were not the basis of any expert opinion expressed by him. The error was harmless, however, since the agent did not misstate the testimony he repeated or paraphrased, the testimony was uncontradicted, and it was plain that he was always referring to what another witness had testified to, and not to any other source of information.

United States v. Pree, 384 F.3d 378 (7th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a conviction for filing false tax returns, finding no plain error in the admission of an IRS agent's testimony as a summary witness. The Court noted that a summary witness may testify as to his analysis of a transaction based upon the testimony of other witnesses and explain the analysis based upon his special expertise. The nature of such testimony makes "the line between summary testimony and expert testimony indistinct." The Court found no problem in the "selective summary of the Government's evidence," noting that the defendant could cross-examine the witness and offer her own evidence.

United States v. Soulard, 730 F.2d 1292 (9th Cir. 1984) : In a prosecution for subscribing false corporate income tax returns, a government agent called as a "summary witness" was properly permitted to testify, where he had experience as an auditor and had performed a substantial review of another agent's work.

[l] Law Enforcement Agents -- Taxes

United States v. Duncan, 42 F.3d 97 (2d Cir. 1994) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy, bank fraud, and corrupt payments, the Court held there was no error in admitting testimony by an IRS agent that falsified IRS filings "obstruct[] and defeat[] [the] entire process," as the expert's testimony did not repeatedly use legally specialized terms and it was based on his personal knowledge.

United States v. Moore, 997 F.2d 55 (5th Cir. 1993) : In a tax evasion prosecution, the prosecution relied upon an IRS agent to testify, inter alia, as a summary witness with respect to general income tax matters, the IRS' criminal investigation of the defendants, and the trial proceedings. The Court found that the agent had not directly addressed the question of the defendants' intent, and the Trial Judge had discretion to admit the testimony.

United States v. Tarwater, 308 F.3d 494 (6th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a conviction for filing false tax returns, holding there was no abuse of discretion when an IRS agent was permitted to testify that the defendant under-reported his income. The Court agreed that the Daubert factors were of limited value in this case, but found that the Trial Judge had carefully considered whether the testimony was reliable and relevant. The testimony was the product of "well-established principles of bookkeeping and accounting as those areas of expertise are applied to the Internal Revenue Code," and based on the defendant's bank and business records.

United States v. Benson, 941 F.2d 598 (7th Cir. 1991) , amended, 957 F.2d 301 (7th Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed tax evasion convictions, holding it was an abuse of discretion to permit an IRS agent to recapitulate the government's evidence (much of which was disputed) and opine as to the character of certain monies received by the taxpayer defendant. Much of the agent's testimony consisted of nothing more than drawing inferences from the evidence that he was no more qualified than the jury to draw and expressing impermissible opinions on the credibility of other witnesses' testimony.

United States v. Soulard, 730 F.2d 1292 (9th Cir. 1984) : In a prosecution for subscribing false corporate income tax returns, a government agent called as a "summary witness" was properly permitted to testify, where he had experience as an auditor and had performed a substantial review of another agent's work.

[55] Lay Witness Distinguished

Gomez v. Rivera Rodriguez, 344 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 2003) : Reversing a judgment for municipal employees who claimed that their discharges had been politically motivated, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to preclude testimony by a Commonwealth labor department deputy secretary for legal affairs whom the defendant mayor had consulted before discharging the plaintiffs. Because the mayor claimed qualified immunity based on reliance on advice of counsel, the legal opinions about which the witness would testify would be relevant facts from a percipient witness rather than opinions from an expert witness.

United States v. Garcia, 413 F.3d 201 (2d Cir. 2005) : During a trial of a cocaine distribution conspiracy, a case agent was permitted to testify, "based on your investigation" or "[a]s far as our investigation determined," regarding the roles of certain participants, including the defendant. The Court held that admission of the testimony was error, but harmless. The testimony was not admissible lay opinion testimony because it was not based on only the agent's personal perceptions, and it was not helpful to the jury within the meaning of Rule 701 in that it went beyond telling the jurors what was in the evidence to telling them what inferences to draw from it. Furthermore, the witness' opinion was based on specialized knowledge, so it was inadmissible under Rule 701(c), and the government had made no effort to satisfy the expert testimony requirements of reliability under Rule 702 and pretrial disclosure under Fed. R. Crim. P. 16. In a civil RICO action, Bank of China, N.Y. Branch v. NBM LLC, 359 F.3d 171 (2d Cir. 2004) , a witness for the plaintiff testified that certain transactions did not comport with the business community's understanding of normal trade transactions and that it is fraud when an importer presents a trust receipt to a bank to obtain a loan knowing that there are no real goods involved. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held that to the extent that the witness' testimony was not a product of his investigation but rather reflected specialized knowledge based on his extensive experience in international banking, he was testifying as an expert rather than a lay witness. Because he was not disclosed as an expert witness and the reliability requirements set forth in Rule 702 had not been satisfied, it was error to admit his testimony.

United States v. Riddle, 103 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 1997) : The Court reversed a conviction for bank fraud because a bank examiner, who the prosecution had agreed would not be offering expert testimony, did not merely draw straightforward conclusions from observations informed by his own experience in examining the bank, but also purported to describe sound banking practices in the abstract. His testimony went beyond what a lay person would have been able to offer after conducting the examinations, to providing an overview of banking regulations and practices and authoritatively condemning the defendant's actions. Having been presented as a fact witness at trial, he could not be certified as an expert on appeal.

TY Inc. v. Softbelly's Inc., 353 F.3d 528 (7th Cir. 2003) : Reversing a judgment for a plaintiff who sued the manufacturer of a computer screen cleaner for trademark infringement, the Court held it was error to exclude a defense witness (a competitor of the plaintiff) who would have testified that as early as 1988, before the plaintiff began selling "Beanie Babies," the word "beanie" was being used in the trade names of other manufacturers of "plush beanbag animals" and the word "beanie" was generic. The Court reasoned that "experienced businessmen know a great deal about what consumers think; that is personal knowledge" and not hearsay, so that the witness need not be designated or qualified as an expert.

United States v. Galvan, 407 F.3d 954 (8th Cir. 2005) : In a prosecution for possessing pseudophedrine knowing it would be sued to manufacture methamphetamine, the Court held it was not an abuse of discretion to allow the government to call an expert even though an arresting officer, who testified only as a lay witness, possessed enough narcotics expertise to testify to the roles of pseudophedrine and purchasers of the drug in the production of methamphetamine. The defendant cited no authority requiring a fact witness to testify also as an expert when the fact witness is so qualified, and the expert's testimony was not redundant to the officer's.

United States v. Ramirez, 348 F.3d 1175 (10th Cir. 2003) : Affirming methamphetamine and cocaine convictions, the Court found no plain error when an undercover police officer was permitted to testify as an expert regarding the contents of wiretapped phone calls, since the officer had personal knowledge of the matters discussed in the calls and of the participants in the calls. In United States v. Gauvin, 173 F.3d 798 (10th Cir. 1999) , the defendant was convicted of assault, after he collided with a police officer during a high-speed car chase. In support of his defense was that he did not cause the collision, his accident reconstruction experts testified that the police officer ran into the defendant's car. To challenge the veracity of police reports contradicting his experts, the defendant proffered the testimony of an instructor at the state police academy, to the effect that police officers are trained that they should never change their reports. The instructor's testimony was excluded for failure to comply with the disclosure requirements of Fed. R. Crim. P. 16(b)(1)(C). The defendant argued that he was proffering the instructor as a lay witness rather than an expert. The Court upheld the ruling below, because the instructor would have been testifying on the basis of "specialized knowledge" within the meaning of Rule 702.

United States v. Henderson, 409 F.3d 1293 (11th Cir. 2005) : The Court upheld the convictions of a former police officer for pistol whipping an arrestee, submitting a misleading report about the incident, and making a false statement to an FBI agent. It found no abuse of discretion in permitting the arrestee's treating physician (who could not testify as an expert because the government failed to provide proper notice) to testify as to what she observed when she examined the arrestee after the arrest. The Court assumed, however, that it was error (but harmless) to admit the doctor's opinion on the cause of the injuries under Rule 701. That testimony was a "hypothesis," and answering hypothetical questions is typically the domain of an expert.

[56] Lighting Expert

United States v. Triplett, 195 F.3d 990 (8th Cir. 1999) : In support of his misidentification defense in a drug case, the defendant offered a "lighting expert" to testify about the nighttime visibility in the area of the transaction. The Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the testimony after a Daubert hearing, where the expert conceded that his efforts could not measure what people could see, his opinions did not refer to his test but were based on what he could see by his own experience, and the lighting was similar to that encountered many places in the City of St. Louis.

[57] Linguistic Analysis

United States v. Tin Yat Chin, 371 F.3d 31 (2d Cir. 2004) : Witnesses in an immigration fraud case testified that the suspect spoke with a Mandarin Chinese accent. To support his claim of misidentification, the defendant offered testimony from an expert that it would be "extremely difficult" for him to fake a Mandarin accent. The Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the testimony, since the expert's 15-second Mandarin dialogue with the defendant in the midst of a 25-minute conversation in Cantonese provided an insufficient basis for her opinion and the linguistics literature she referred to had only an attenuated and indirect relation to her proffered testimony.

Durkin v. Equifax Check Servs., Inc., 406 F.3d 410 (7th Cir. 2005) : In support of their claim that bad check collection letters violated the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act because they were confusing to unsophisticated consumers, the plaintiffs offered expert testimony from an English professor regarding the readability of the letters. The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant, finding no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the expert's testimony on the grounds of irrelevance -- because he analyzed the readability of the entire letters rather than the specific language the plaintiffs singled out as increasing their confusion -- and of unreliability -- because he did not sufficiently articulate the manner and method by which he determined the challenged language was confusing but simply recited and endorsed the plaintiffs' claims of confusion.

United States v. DeLuna, 763 F.2d 897 (8th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed convictions arising out of a casino skimming conspiracy. It upheld the exclusion, as confusing, of testimony by a linguistics expert concerning the structure of a taped conversation.

[58] Litigation Outcome Opinion

Dairy Farmers of Am., Inc. v. Travelers Ins. Co., 391 F.3d 936 (8th Cir. 2004) : The plaintiff sued its insurer, claiming that failure to appoint separate counsel to represent it and its trucker in an underlying personal injury suit was a breach of fiduciary duty. The plaintiff offered testimony from a law professor that the "likely outcome" if separate counsel had been appointed would have been a settlement not requiring the plaintiff to pay its $250,000 deductible. Affirming a judgment for the insurer, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the expert's opinion, as "lacked foundation and was purely speculative"; besides, it had not been disclosed pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(a)(2)(B).

[59] Memory Expert

United States v. Affleck, 776 F.2d 1451 (10th Cir. 1985) : In a prosecution for securities and bankruptcy fraud, the Court found no error in the exclusion of expert testimony from a "memory expert," since "[t]he average person is able to understand that people forget."

[60] Methodology and Conclusions

Rebel Oil Co. v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 146 F.3d 1088, 1998-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72187 (9th Cir. 1998) : Gasoline retailers alleged that the defendant oil company had engaged in predatory pricing. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held there was no inconsistency between a ruling that admitted testimony by the plaintiffs' expert witness and the summary judgment. The finding under Daubert that the expert's methodology was sound did not mean that his conclusions were legally sufficient to create a question of material fact.

[61] "Non-scientific" Opinions and Daubert

Kumho Tire Co. v. Carmichael, 526 U.S. 137 (1999) : The Court held that the Trial Judge's gatekeeping function under Daubert applies to all experts, not just those providing scientific evidence. The case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 702, § 702.02[9].

[62] Nuclear Radiation

In re TMI Litig., 193 F.3d 613 (3d Cir. 1999) , amended, 199 F.3d 158 (3d Cir. 2000) : An action was brought by area residents of the Three Mile Island nuclear power plant for injuries allegedly caused by a nuclear accident that released radioactive materials. As part of a case management order, a group of "typical" plaintiffs was selected for trial on the issue of whether the release of radioactive materials was substantial enough to have caused any injury. Affirming all but one of the rulings that most of the plaintiffs' expert testimony regarding radiation exposure was inadmissible under Daubert and Rule 703, the Court held that: (1) one expert's "plume" model of radiation dispersion was unreliable because the expert rejected, without any explanation, generally accepted computer models that track plume dispersion, and the expert's own model was untested and subjective; (2) a conclusion that high levels of radiation were released from TMI on the basis of studies indicating high radiation levels in southern Maine was unreliable because the expert had nothing, other than conjecture, to support his conclusion that the radiation in Maine came from TMI; (3) testimony from experts on soil samples was properly excluded because the experts disregarded laboratory results indicating that most of the radiation found in the soil "was the result of naturally occurring background radionuclides" such as radon; (4) experts who estimated dose exposure by investigating trees at the site used proper methodology, but their testimony was properly excluded, because the conclusion was that the trees had been exposed to a level of radiation that was substantial enough to kill humans, which indicated that the methodology must have been misapplied to the facts of the case; (5) an expert who performed a cytogenic analysis on blood samples on a group of area residents was properly precluded from testifying, because the testing was conducted 15 years after the accident, and the expert admitted that the reliability of her study was dependent on an analysis within three years of exposure; (6) an expert who conducted a dendometric analysis of trees was properly excluded for failing to rule out other possible causes for the condition of the trees he examined; (7) a dose exposure report from a microbiologist was properly excluded because the expert used a complex, but completely subjective and unexplained, weighting process to determine whether area residents suffered cancer as a result of radiation exposure; (8) a cancer research expert's opinion was properly excluded because it was based on the unreliable conclusions of the other experts; (9) an epidemiologist's conclusions were properly rejected because the expert simply took the participants that were given him by consultants to the plaintiffs, so there was no assurance their selection did not bias the study; (10) a mortality study was properly excluded for lack of "fit," because the expert made no attempt to analyze any possible association between mortality and exposure to radiation; (11) an expert who essentially testified as a summary expert was properly excluded, because his opinion was like "the last domino in the line" that must fall when all the other dominoes are toppled. The Court did find that it was an abuse of discretion to exclude an expert's cancer incidence study on the ground that the expert had relied on a shorter latency period than the defendants' expert claimed was appropriate. Under Daubert a Trial Judge is not permitted to exclude an expert simply because she believes the experts on the other side. Nonetheless, the admission of the cancer incidence study would not have created a triable issue of fact, so summary judgment for the defendants was affirmed.

In re Hanford Nuclear Reservation Litig., 292 F.3d 1124 (9th Cir. 2002) : In a suit by individuals exposed to radioactive emissions against operators of the Hanford federal nuclear facility, the Court reversed summary judgments entered for defendants, because the Trial Judge had improperly excluded testimony from plaintiffs' experts who would testify only that the radiation emitted from Hanford was capable of causing the plaintiffs' injuries but not that it more likely than not caused their injuries. The Judge's own discovery orders had limited discovery at this phase of the case to questions of generic causation, so it was improper to impose the "doubling of the risk" standard of individual causation.

[63] Obscenity

United States v. Pryba, 900 F.2d 748 (4th Cir. 1990) : In affirming convictions for selling obscene materials, the Court held there was no error in rejecting the defendant's proffer of a telephone survey conducted by a social sciences and psychology professor regarding community attitudes, toleration, and standards with respect to sexually explicit materials, as the questions did not fully and accurately describe the challenged materials, which were seen by the jury.

United States v. Arvin, 900 F.2d 1385 (9th Cir. 1990) : The Court found it was not error to exclude testimony by the defendant's expert in a prosecution for mailing lascivious photographs. Because the standard is "commonsensical" and because an exhibition may be lascivious without being obscene, issues on which an expert could be helpful, such as community standards, are irrelevant.

United States v. Cross, 928 F.2d 1030 (11th Cir. 1991) : Affirming convictions for mailing obscene material and for conspiring to produce child pornography, the Court held that an FBI agent was properly permitted to testify that particular pictures would be of sexual interest to pedophiles and to offer his expert opinion that the pictures were obscene, as the contested materials were directed at such a bizarre deviant group that the experience of the trier of fact would be inadequate to judge whether they appealed to the prurient interest.

[64] Opinion on Law

[a] Generally

F.H. Krear & Co. v. Nineteen Named Trustees, 810 F.2d 1250 (2d Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a damage award in a breach of contract action by a furnisher of administrative services against a union pension fund. It held that proposed expert testimony that service contracts were unenforceable for lack of essential terms was properly excluded on the ground that it amounted to testimony on the law that governed the case, which is the province of the Trial Judge.

United States v. Williams, 343 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed the civil rights conviction of a deputy sheriff for shooting an unarmed arrestee in the back. The chief of police of a nearby town, the chief deputy sheriff, and another sheriff, all of whom were involved in the apprehension of the victim, testified that the shooting was not reasonable. The Court held that the testimony did not violate Rule 704(b) because the witnesses did not testify as to the defendant's mental state, but it violated Rule 704(a) because "[r]easonableness under the Fourth Amendment or Due Process Clause is a legal conclusion." The error was harmless, however. In Askanase v. Fatjo, 130 F.3d 657 (5th Cir. 1997) , the Court affirmed summary judgment against a bankruptcy trustee asserting claims against the debtor's directors and others, holding there was no abuse of discretion in precluding a lawyer from testifying that defendants had breached their fiduciary duties. Although a lawyer may testify as to legal matters involving questions of fact, the opinions excluded in this case went to issues for the trier of fact to decide. In a bankruptcy fraud prosecution, United States v. West, n132 the defendant argued that he relied in good faith on advice of his counsel and his accountant in structuring his transactions. The Court found no error in precluding him from calling two bankruptcy law experts to prove that it was reasonable to follow the advice given to him, reasoning that "the typical juror is qualified to determine intelligently and to the best degree possible both the reasonableness of a client relying upon the advice of an attorney and accountant retained to render such advice and whether the client did so in good faith after making full disclosure."

United States v. Montgomery, 980 F.2d 388 (6th Cir. 1992) : The Court held, in a prosecution for mail fraud and kiting checks, that there was no abuse of discretion in permitting expert witnesses to testify as to their opinions about what check kiting is and how it works, where the Trial Judge made it clear that the witnesses were not giving legal opinions and that the legal definition would be included in the jury instructions, as it was. The Court also said that the Bankruptcy Judge should not have been permitted to testify as to the meaning of an order that he had entered: "An order entered by a judge should speak for itself and not be varied by parol testimony as to what was meant by its provisions."

FTC v. Amy Travel Service, 875 F.2d 564, 1989-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68549 (7th Cir. 1989) : The Court held there was no error in excluding expert testimony as to whether the defendant's practices with respect to bargain vacation vouchers were deceptive or misleading, since the expert was being asked for a legal opinion.

Peterson v. City of Plymouth, 60 F.3d 469 (8th Cir. 1995) : In a civil rights action arising from an arrest allegedly made without probable cause, the defendants were permitted to call an expert in police practices, who testified that the officers' conduct comported with the "standards under the Fourth Amendment." Reversing a judgment for the defendants, the Court held that admission of this testimony was an abuse of discretion, because it was simply a legal conclusion that could not assist the jury in its factfinding role.

United States v. Unruh, 855 F.2d 1363 (9th Cir. 1987) : In a prosecution for misapplication of bank funds, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly permitted a bank examiner to explain a regulation to the jury, since the testimony assisted the jury in understanding other evidence presented by the prosecution.

United States v. Lewis, 240 F.3d 866 (10th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a conviction for violating the Lacey Act, which makes it illegal to sell wildlife taken in violation of State law, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the assistant chief of law enforcement for the Oklahoma Department of Wildlife to describe the requirements for acquiring a commercial area hunting license, since the expert testified only as to the general requirements and not whether the defendant's specific conduct violated those requirements. In Autoskill, Inc. v. National Educational Support Sys., 994 F.2d 1476 (10th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed an injunction for a copyright holder against a competitor, and held that the Trial Judge had discretion to consider an expert's views as to the protectable and unprotectable portions of a computer program. "As the judge noted, the experts' opinions may be helpful, but their legal conclusions on these points are not binding." In a coal miner's suit against his employer's parent company, Smith v. Atlantic Richfield Co., n133 the Court held it was proper to exclude testimony by an expert witness as to whether acts or omissions of the parent company were "prudent mine practices," since any opinion would have called for a legal conclusion based upon an assumption that the parent was the mine operator. In Miami Int'l Realty Co. v. Paynter, n134 the Court held that testimony of a legal expert as to the Code of Professional Responsibility was admissible in a legal malpractice action, since the Code established an ethical standard rather than a legal standard of professional negligence.

United States v. Paradies, 98 F.3d 1266 (11th Cir. 1996) : In a mail fraud prosecution, the defendants argued that it was error to exclude their expert, a former Judge, who would have testified about the enactment of the mail fraud statute and how it changed the law, because the expert would have helped to explain their ignorance of the law. Affirming the convictions, the Court recognized that experts on the law have been permitted to testify in tax cases, but noted that "ignorance of the law is not a defense in this mail fraud case," so the expert's testimony would have been confusing and irrelevant.

[b] Opinion on Law -- Employment and Labor

Burkhart v. Washington Metro. Area Transit Auth., 112 F.3d 1207 (D.C. Cir. 1997) : A deaf person alleged that a transit police officer, who investigated an altercation the plaintiff had with a bus driver, had violated the Americans with Disabilities Act. The Court held it was error to accept from the plaintiff's expert testimony that the officer's means of communications with the plaintiff were not "as effective" as the officer's means of communication with others. The expert grossly misstated the law as to what constitutes "as effective" communication, and the quoted phrase (from the regulations) is a term of art with a meaning separate and distinct from the vernacular. For the same reason, the expert's testimony that the officer was not "trained to proficiency" was impermissible.

Gomez v. Rivera Rodriguez, 344 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 2003) : Reversing a judgment for municipal employees who claimed that their discharges had been politically motivated, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to preclude testimony by a Commonwealth labor department deputy secretary for legal affairs whom the defendant mayor had consulted before discharging the plaintiffs. Because the mayor claimed qualified immunity based on reliance on advice of counsel, the legal opinions about which the witness would testify would be relevant facts from a percipient witness rather than opinions from an expert witness. In a civil rights action by municipal employees allegedly terminated because of their political affiliations, Nieves-Villanueva v. Soto-Rivera, 133 F.3d 92 (1st Cir. 1997) , the Court held it was error (but harmless) to permit an expert witness to testify as to what the law required and that her examination of the plaintiffs' personnel records led to the conclusion that they had been improperly hired or renewed in the first place. The witness' testimony was not of factual conclusions that could aid the jury but of questions of law, on which the Judge is to instruct and the jury to decide.

Hogan v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 812 F.2d 409 (8th Cir. 1987) : Although testimony by an employer's witnesses that they had not intended to discriminate involved a legal conclusion, which could have been excluded, the Court found that any error in overruling objections to the testimony was harmless, since the Judge on one occasion defined the term "discriminate" to mean "people are treated differently on the basis of their race."

[c] Opinion on Law -- Foreign Law

A/S Kreditt-Finans v. CIA Venetico De Navegacion S.A., 560 F. Supp. 705 (E.D. Pa. 1983) , aff'd, 729 F.2d 1446 (3d Cir. 1984) : The Court found that a bank officer was competent to testify to the validity of a Norwegian mortgage, even though he was not a lawyer. Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 44.1, a Court may consider any relevant material or source, whether or not admissible under the rules of evidence, in determining an issue under foreign law.

McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 591 F. Supp. 293 (E.D. Mo. 1983) , aff'd, 758 F.2d 341 (8th Cir. 1985) : The Court declined to follow a forum selection clause in a contract concerning military aircraft parts. It found, on the basis of an affidavit by an attorney who lived in Iran and who was actively involved in the legal community there, that the Iranian legal system was not prepared to fairly adjudicate the parties' contractual claims.

[d] Opinion on Law -- Immigration

United States v. Oliveros, 275 F.3d 1299 (11th Cir. 2001) : In a money laundering case, the principal government witness had faced detention for immigration violations, but the government obtained favorable treatment for him in exchange for his testimony. Affirming, the Court held there was no error in excluding an expert on immigration law who would have testified that the witness was subject to longer detention on the immigration charges than he had admitted at trial. The Court noted that the defendant should have presented the immigration law question (including pertinent expert opinions) to the Judge and asked the Judge to instruct the jury on the law.

[e] Opinion on Law -- Securities

United States v. Bilzerian, 926 F.2d 1285 (2d Cir. 1991) : Affirming a conviction for securities offenses, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a government expert to supply general background as to securities law filing requirements and to clarify ambiguities in specified instructions on the relevant blank form. There was also no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence by the defendant's expert as to the general understanding of a relevant phrase, as it related directly to the issue of whether the defendant's actual disclosures complied with the legal requirements. One Judge thought that much of the government witness' testimony consisted of legal opinions that should have been explored solely in the Court's instructions, and that the defense expert was prevented from answering questions that were in principle indistinguishable from those answered by the government expert. In Marx & Co. v. Diners' Club, Inc., n135 the plaintiffs sued for breach of a contract to sell the assets of their company to Diners' Club in exchange for unregistered stock in the purchaser's company. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held that "the District Court erred in permitting ... an expert witness called by plaintiffs, to give his opinion as to the legal obligations of the parties under the contract." The Court distinguished the permissible use of expert testimony to explain the practices of the securities business from the improper use of expert testimony to instruct the jury as to applicable principles of law.

Molecular Tech. Corp. v. Valentine, 925 F.2d 910 (6th Cir. 1991) : The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiffs in a securities fraud action, in part because the plaintiffs' expert was repeatedly allowed to testify as to the requirements of federal securities disclosure laws.

[f] Opinion on Law -- Taxes

United States v. Burton, 737 F.2d 439 (5th Cir. 1984) : Although it reversed an income tax conviction on another ground, the Court found no error in the exclusion of expert testimony that the defendant's claim of ignorance that wages are taxable income was not implausible. The Court suggested that better evidence might have been offered in the form of surveys, which would reduce "potential for confusion and protracted side trips." The Court distinguished a prior decision in United States v. Garber n136 on the ground that the expert testimony there was offered in the context of law that was so unsettled that it bordered on "legal vagueness." In United States v. Daly, n137 the Court affirmed convictions for tax avoidance by using churches and held it was proper to exclude expert testimony, offered to negate willfulness, that the state of the law was confused. There was no showing that the defendants had relied on the expert in planning their conduct, other evidence of the defendants' state of mind was admitted, and the Trial Judge found that the jury would be confused by the testimony.

United States v. Hatchett, 918 F.2d 631 (6th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a conviction for tax evasion, holding there was no error in precluding the defendant's attorney from explaining the legal authority for the advice given the defendant. The attorney was permitted to testify that he based his advice on research and was confident it was a sound position; to permit testimony about the specific results of the research could have confused the jury if the law presented by the witness conflicted with that as instructed by the Trial Judge.

United States v. Jungles, 903 F.2d 468 (7th Cir. 1990) : In the defendant's trial for evading taxes by a scheme in which he changed his status to "independent contractor," his expert was precluded from stating the legal principles surrounding the "independent contractor" relationship and from giving an opinion whether in a hypothetical set of circumstances a person in the defendant's position would be so considered. The Court held that exclusion of testimony regarding the principles was proper, but the opinion should not have been excluded. The error was harmless, however. In United States v. Windfelder, n138 the Court affirmed a defendant's conviction for understating his income in his federal tax return and for understating the estate of his aunt on an estate tax return. It found that testimony of expert witnesses with respect to whether the aunt authorized transfers of assets to the defendant for her expenses, whether the transfers were gifts to the defendant, or whether they were utilized by the defendant without authorization was proper opinion evidence as to the tax consequences of a transaction. The experts "utilized their expertise in accounting and tax matters in making their determinations, not their knowledge of the workings of the human mind."

United States v. Hawley, 768 F.2d 249 (8th Cir. 1985) : In a prosecution for failing to file tax returns, the Court upheld the exclusion of expert testimony that the defendant's failure to file was a reasonable construction of the law. The expert was not familiar with the defendant's beliefs; his opinion was based upon a review of statutes and decisions. The Judge rejected the testimony because it did not relate to the defendant's willfulness and represented a legal conclusion to which an expert may not testify. In our view, this is a close case: Testimony by an expert that a person in the taxpayer's position reasonably could have concluded the way the taxpayer did does not tell the jury what the law is; it tells the jury only that a person might reasonably have thought, albeit incorrectly, that filing a return was not required.

United States v. Scholl, 166 F.3d 964 (9th Cir. 1999) : Affirming convictions for filing false tax returns and currency structuring, the Court found no error in the exclusion of testimony by defense experts on tax and accounting law as to the confusing state of tax and accounting law. The experts were testifying to legal conclusions that were for the Trial Judge's determination. Moreover, the question for the jury was not whether the laws were confusing, but rather whether the defendant himself was confused -- "and on this issue Scholl's proffered experts had nothing to say."

United States v. Lankford, 955 F.2d 1545 (11th Cir. 1992) : Reversing a conviction for extortion and filing false income tax returns, the Court held that it was error to exclude testimony by a defense expert on the reasonableness of the defendant's conclusion that a $1,500 check he received was a gift rather than taxable income, as a subjective good-faith misunderstanding of the law or a good-faith belief that one is not violating the law can negate the statutory willfulness requirement of criminal tax offenses, so any evidence of the reasonableness of the defendant's belief was relevant to the determination of whether his violation of the tax laws was willful.

[a] Generally

Rodriguez v. Pacificare of Tex., Inc., 980 F.2d 1014 (5th Cir. 1993) : Affirming a summary judgment for the defendants in an action against a physician and a health maintenance organization for failing to provide adequate medical care and coverage, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in accepting the physician's affidavit as an expert in his own case, where the relevant qualifying criteria were satisfied.

Greyhound Computer Corp. v. International Bus. Machs. Corp., 559 F.2d 488, 1977-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P61603 (9th Cir. 1977) : "An interested witness may testify as to the amount of damage so long as the record reflects his competency and the factual basis for his conclusions."

Braun v. Lorillard Inc., 84 F.3d 230 (7th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action alleging that a smoker had died from cancer caused by asbestos contained in cigarette filters, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the chief executive officer of the defendant cigarette manufacturer to testify as an expert witness, as he was qualified by training and experience and he was not disqualified by reason of his interest in the litigation.

[b] Party or Interested Person As Expert Witness -- Employee of Party

Dunn v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 639 F.2d 11711 (5th Cir. 1981) , modified on other grounds, 645 F.2d 511 (5th Cir. 1981) : "That a witness is an employee of a party does not preclude his qualification as an expert ... . His potential bias may be explored on cross-examination and argued to the jury."

Hingson v. Pacific Sw. Airlines, 743 F.2d 1408 (9th Cir. 1984) : Reversing part of a judgment for an airline sued by a blind passenger who was required to sit in the front row of the passenger section, the Court held it was error to exclude testimony by the airline's director of planning and control for flight operations, who was a qualified expert. The fact that the expert worked for the defendant airline did not disqualify him from testifying for the plaintiff.

[66] Personal Knowledge Not Required

Sementilli v. Trinidad Corp., 155 F.3d 1130 (9th Cir. 1998) : Sementilli was injured while working as a seaman. The shipping company settled with Sementilli and then brought an indemnity action against the doctor who certified Sementilli as fit to be a seaman. Reversing summary judgment for the doctor, the Court held it was error to exclude the testimony of the medical expert proffered by the company that Sementilli was unfit for sea duty; that the doctor had previously declared him permanently disabled; and that given his psychological and physical condition, Sementilli was an "accident waiting to happen." The Trial Judge excluded the expert's testimony on the ground that he had not personally examined Sementilli and was not there when the accident occurred, but the Court noted that an expert need not have personal knowledge, and that the expert relied on medical records, which was permissible under Rule 703.

[67] Pharmacology Evidence

Ruiz-Troche v. Pepsi Cola of P.R. Bottling Co., 161 F.3d 77 (1st Cir. 1998) : Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff in a diversity action arising from a fatal traffic accident, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude testimony from the defendant's expert pharmacologist, on the basis of an autopsy report and the half-life values of the substances involved, that the decedent had "snorted" at least 200 mg of cocaine 30-60 minutes prior to the accident. The expert had relied on a mathematical formula said to be supported by several published studies supporting a "half-life technique" of assessing dosages. Recognizing that the scientific literature relied upon by the expert did not make "an open-and-shut case" because the studies indicate that the half-life of cocaine varies among individuals due to many factors, the Court stated that, nevertheless, the Trial Judge "set the bar too high" in excluding the expert's testimony on the basis of these possible variables.

Bocanegra v. Vicmar Servs., Inc., 320 F.3d 581 (5th Cir. 2003) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendants in a wrongful death action arising when the plaintiff's decedent, standing on the median strip after his vehicle was involved in an accident, was struck by an industrial sweeper truck. The plaintiff's expert toxicologist had not been permitted to testify that the sweeper driver's conceded marijuana use within 12 hours before the accident had impaired his perception and reaction time. The scientific findings underlying the expert's conclusions were widely accepted in the field of toxicology and the expert reliably applied those principles to the facts of the case.

[68] Photogrammetry

United States v. Everett, 825 F.2d 658 (2d Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed bank robbery convictions and held that an FBI agent was properly permitted to testify as an expert in photogrammetry to the height of a person shown in a surveillance photo.

United States v. Quinn, 18 F.3d 1461 (9th Cir. 1994) : The Court upheld convictions arising from a bank robbery, finding no error in permitting expert use of "photogrammetry" to estimate the height of a robber from surveillance pictures. The Trial Judge properly found that the technique was nothing more than a series of computer-assisted calculations that did not involve any "novel or questionable scientific technique."

[69] Photographic Identification

United States v. Brewer, 783 F.2d 841 (9th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed an armed bank robbery conviction, concluding there was no error in excluding testimony by the defense's forensic anthropologist, where the witness could not state conclusively that fthe defendant was not the robber pictured in surveillance photos. It held that the Trial Judge could have found that the testimony would not have helped the jury. See also United States v. Barrett n139(there was no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by a photographic expert who testified concerning similarities between clothing seized from the defendant and clothing shown in surveillance photos). In United States v. Collins, n140 the Court affirmed a conviction for armed bank robbery, upholding the government's use of an FBI expert who testified that shoes and a briefcase found in a search of the defendant's premises were the same as depicted in bank surveillance photographs. Because the witness was "an expert in the field of questioned documents and photographic comparison," the Court held that his testimony was technical and specialized and clearly helpful to the jury.

[70] Polygraph and Similar Evidence

United States v. Scheffer, 523 U.S. 303 (1998) : In a military prosecution, the Supreme Court held that Military

Rule of Evidence 707, a per se rule excluding polygraph evidence, did not violate a defendant's constitutional right to an effective defense when it excluded exculpatory polygraph test results. The right to an effective defense is tempered by the government's right to exclude unreliable evidence from a criminal trial, and "there is simply no consensus that polygraph evidence is reliable," so the Rule is "a rational and proportional means of advancing the legitimate interest in barring unreliable evidence." The decision was on constitutional grounds and the Court did not consider whether and under what conditions polygraph evidence might be admissible under the Federal Rules of Evidence.

United States v. Prince-Oyibo, 320 F.3d 494 (4th Cir. 2003) : In a prosecution for visa fraud, the Court found no error when the defendant was not permitted to present evidence of a favorable polygraph examination. The Court reasoned that the Circuit's per se rule could be changed only by the en banc Court, although the panel "might otherwise be inclined to hold that Daubert requires a more nuanced evaluation of polygraph evidence." One Judge dissented, on the ground that the Circuit's post-Daubert cases had "not addressed, let alone answered, the question of whether our per se rule" was consistent with the principles set forth in Daubert.

United States v. Posado, 57 F.3d 428 (5th Cir. 1995) : Concluding that the Circuit's per se rule against admission of polygraph testimony could not survive Daubert, the Court reversed drug convictions because defense polygraph evidence, offered to corroborate the defendants' testimony at a suppression hearing, had been excluded, and remanded the case for further proceedings. The Court emphasized that it was not holding that polygraph examinations are scientifically valid or that they always will assist the trier of fact; furthermore, it observed that Rule 403 might appropriately be invoked in some cases, even though polygraph evidence was no longer inadmissible per se. On remand in Posado, the polygraph results were held to be inadmissible after a Daubert hearing. United States v. Ramirez, 1995 WL 918083 (S.D. Tex. 1995) .

United States v. Taylor, 154 F.3d 675 (7th Cir. 1998) : Affirming convictions for narcotics and firearms offenses, the Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence from a polygraph examination of the defendant's girlfriend. While polygraph testing can be reliable when the examiner employs the probable lie control question technique, the expert's application of that technique was not reliable here because he used "stock" questions rather than questions tailored to the circumstances of the case. The expert also used a subjective visual scoring technique in calculating the results, rather than the more reliable objective numerical scoring system. The expert testified that he was not familiar with any social science studies of the last few years regarding the validation of polygraph technique.

United States v. Benavidez-Benavidez, 217 F.3d 720 (9th Cir. 2000) : The Court found no error in the exclusion of unstipulated polygraph evidence that purported to show that the defendant was truthful in denying knowledge of the marijuana in his van. The Trial Judge had held a Daubert hearing and found that the polygraph evidence satisfied all the Daubert factors except general acceptance, and then excluded the evidence under both Rule 702 and Rule 403 with passing mention of Rule 704(b). The Court affirmed under Rule 403 without deciding whether exclusion was also proper under the other two Rules, observing that Trial Judges have wide discretion to refuse to admit polygraph evidence and noting that "district courts are free to reject the admission of polygraph evidence on the basis of any applicable rule of evidence without analyzing all other potential bases for exclusion." In United States v. Cordoba, 194 F.3d 1053 (9th Cir. 1999) , a cocaine distribution prosecution, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in the exclusion, after a Daubert hearing, of an unstipulated polygraph examination, where the Trial Judge found no reliable real-life error rate, no general acceptance in the scientific community for courtroom fact-determinative use, and no reliable and accepted controlling standards. Even if polygraph evidence in general meets the requirements of Rule 702, the examination in this case was defective in several significant respects, and the risks of unfair prejudice associated with admitting evidence of a flawed exam substantially outweigh its probative value, so there was no abuse of discretion in excluding it under Rule 403. On an earlier appeal of Cordoba, n141 the Court had held that after the "flexible inquiry" mandated by the Supreme Court's decision in Daubert, its prior per se rule of exclusion was no longer tenable, but cautioned that its opinion was not to be taken as indicating any kind of enthusiasm for unstipulated polygraph evidence.

United States v. Call, 129 F.3d 1402 (10th Cir. 1997) : The defendant in a drug case offered expert testimony regarding a polygraph test he had taken. Noting that after Daubert the Circuit's rule of per se inadmissibility of unilaterally taken polygraph tests was no longer tenable -- although this did not suggest "a newfound enthusiasm for polygraph evidence" -- the Court found it unnecessary to determine whether the evidence satisfied the Daubert standards, and instead upheld exclusion under Rule 403. The evidence was proffered to bolster the defendant's credibility, and expert testimony in support of a witness' credibility "is often excluded because it usurps a critical function of the jury."

United States v. Henderson, 409 F.3d 1293 (11th Cir. 2005) : The Court upheld the convictions of a former police officer for pistol whipping an arrestee, submitting a misleading report about the incident, and making a false statement to an FBI agent. The majority held there was no abuse of discretion when evidence of two polygraph tests taken by the defendant was excluded under Daubert. The dissenting Judge argued that excluding evidence on this ground was foreclosed by United States v. Piccinonna, 885 F.2d 1529 (11th Cir. 1989) (en banc), which, in permitting use of polygraph evidence when the parties stipulate to admissibility or when parties seek to impeach or corroborate the testimony of a trial witness, indicated that polygraphy had progressed to a level of acceptance sufficient to allow its use unless there were problems with the examiner's qualifications or administration of the test. In United States v. Gilliard, 133 F.3d 809 (11th Cir. 1998) , the defendant, charged with Medicare and Medicaid fraud, submitted to a polygraph examination that indicated he was not being deceptive when he denied commission of the fraud. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the results under Rule 702, because of the paucity of tests and published studies addressing the validity of the polygraph technique used, and the defendant's failure to show that the technique had gained general acceptance within the relevant scientific community. Even if the evidence had met the Rule 702 threshold, it was not an abuse of discretion to exclude it under Rule 403.

[71] Product Design

Bogosian v. Mercedes-Benz of N. Am., Inc., 104 F.3d 472 (1st Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action brought by a motorist who had parked an automobile and then suffered injuries when it rolled back, allegedly because of a defect in the gear selection lever. There was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by the plaintiff's proffered expert that a defect in the shift lever's design led to the accident, since it did not rest upon a reliable factual and methodological foundation.

Zaremba v. General Motors Corp., 360 F.3d 355 (2d Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants in a product liability action arising from a rollover accident, finding no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the plaintiffs' expert's opinion that an alternative design for the car would have made it more crashworthy. The witness had not performed tests on his alternative design, had not subjected it to peer review or publication, and had not shown general acceptance of his design or his methodology. Further, he could not rely on tests conducted by the defendant, since neither those tests nor models, calculations, or drawings from the witness showed that the witness' hypothetical alternative design would have resulted in greater safety in the accident at issue.

Calhoun v. Yamaha Motor Corp., U.S.A., 350 F.3d 316 (3d Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action arising from the death of a 12-year-old riding a jet ski, the Court found no abuse of discretion when expert witnesses were precluded from testifying that the jet ski was defectively designed because riders would accidentally activate the "squeeze finger" throttle by clenching their hands as a "stress reaction." There was no literature or demonstrable tests confirming this theory, so any opinion based on it was speculative and unreliable. In Oddi v. Ford Motor Co., 234 F.3d 136 (3d Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed summary judgment for the manufacturer in a suit by a truck driver who was injured when his truck struck a guardrail and a bridge abutment pierced the floor of his cab. It upheld exclusion of an engineer who opined that the truck was defectively designed. The witness failed to test either of the two hypotheses he offered to support his opinion; he claimed he had studied bread trucks but could not say if they were the same kind as the plaintiff drove or were manufactured by the same manufacturer; he failed completely to consider that the design of the guardrail might have been the cause of the accident; his opinion was inconsistent with the laws of physics; he did not attempt to calculate the force inflicted by the truck on the guardrail or the strength of the guardrail; and he had no way of knowing if his suggested modifications of design would have been an improvement.

Oglesby v. General Motors Corp., 190 F.3d 244 (4th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in a product liability case, finding no error in the exclusion of a mechanical engineer's opinion that a plastic engine part was defective. The engineer did not know how or from what material the part was manufactured, he did not know any specifications prescribed for the part, and he did not perform any tests or calculations to determine its strength or the stresses to which it was subjected, yet he offered an opinion that there was apparently a manufacturing defect, most likely caused "in the formulation or handling of the thermosetting plastic" (although the part was made from a "nylon composite, glass filled" with "thermoplastic" characteristics). Because the expert lacked a sufficient knowledge base, he could not eliminate other equally plausible causes for the particular accident.

Guy v. Crown Equip. Corp., 394 F.3d 320 (5th Cir. 2004) : In a product liability action by a forklift operator injured when she lost her balance and her left leg came out through the operator-compartment opening and was crushed against a railing, the Court affirmed judgment as a matter of law for the manufacturer. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the plaintiff's expert regarding a feasible design alternative: his opinions were untested; he offered only conceptual suggestions and never presented a specific design before trial in time for the defendants to prepare a reply; and his analysis of the defendant's tests of its designs considered only "tip-over" and "off-the-dock" scenarios, not "left-leg-injury" scenarios such as were involved in this case. In a product liability action arising from an accident with a conveyor, Watkins v. Telsmith, Inc., 121 F.3d 984 (5th Cir. 1997) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by the plaintiff's proposed expert witness regarding alternative designs. The plaintiff's expert did not utilize the proper methodology for proposing alternative designs, since he only conceptualized possibilities but did not test any of the proposed alternatives; his testimony lacked empirical support concerning other available conveyors; if he made any drawings or calculations, he did not consider them important enough to keep; and he never examined the conveyor in question.

Nemir v. Mitsubishi Motors Corp., 381 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 2004) : The plaintiff, who was seriously injured when his seatbelt latch allegedly gave way in an automobile accident, offered testimony by an expert that when he tested the latch 20 times using purposeful manipulation, twice it did not perform properly. The Judge excluded the evidence on the ground that "[n]o reasonable driver purposefully manipulates the buckle at different speeds and different angles to achieve a state of partial lapse." Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court held it was error to exclude the expert's testimony, since "the point of the purposeful manipulation was to show that partial latching could occur under certain circumstances."

Fuesting v. Zimmer, Inc., 421 F.3d 528 (7th Cir. 2005) : In a product liability action arising from the failure of a prosthetic knee joint, the plaintiff's expert testified that sterilization by gamma irradiation in air had caused the implant's polyethylene to oxidate and ultimately to delaminate and prematurely fail. The Court held that the expert's testimony had not been subject to an adequate Daubert analysis. Furthermore, in testifying that superior alternatives existed, the expert had failed to perform a reliable comparison, had neglected to consider other factors that may have counseled use of the chosen method, and had disregarded the facts that the manufacturer followed the virtually universal industry practice in sterilizing knee implants and that no manufacturer at the time used any of the expert's proffered methods. In Masters v. Hesston Corp., 291 F.3d 985 (7th Cir. 2002) , a suit by a farmer injured by an allegedly defective hay baler, the Court affirmed the exclusion of the plaintiff's expert testimony and the grant of summary judgment to the manufacturer. The Court found no problem with the expert's statement of the relevant standards of care, but it found the standards were not properly applied to the facts of the case. In a product liability action arising from a forklift accident, Dhillon v. Crown Controls Corp., n142 the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant, finding no abuse of discretion in the rejection of evidence from experts offered by the plaintiff who proposed an alternative design. The experts had not taken any steps that would show professional rigor in the assessment of alternative designs; there was no evidence that their alternative had been favorably subject to peer review or generally accepted by manufacturers or standards organizations; and their conclusion that their alternative would have avoided the accident was obvious to a lay jury, so their evidence would only be helpful if they could show that the alternative was economically feasible or safe. In an action arising out of forklift accidents, In Bourelle v. Crown Equip. Corp., n143 the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant, holding there was no abuse of discretion in finding the plaintiffs' expert witness' opinions that the forklift was defectively designed insufficiently reliable. The expert never saw or inspected the vehicle itself and never observed it operating in the warehouse where the accidents occurred; he never tested his alternative design theories; no lab or organization had tested them; no other manufacturer had incorporated his proposed design; and he had not seen any industry studies regarding accident experience with the particular forklift. In McMahon v. Bunn-O-Matic Corp., n144 the plaintiff had received third-degree burns when coffee prepared in a coffee maker manufactured by the defendant was placed in a styrofoam cup, and the cup collapsed. Responding to a motion for summary judgment, the plaintiff submitted an affidavit from a mechanical engineer, which stated in its entirety that "at the temperatures at which this coffee was brewed and maintained the structural integrity of the styrofoam cup into which the coffee was poured would be compromised making it more flexible and likely to give way or collapse when its rigid lid is removed." The Court affirmed the Magistrate Judge's grant of summary judgment for the defendant, holding that the expert's affidavit was properly excluded under Daubert. The expert provided no reasoning, explanation, or empirical support, only a bare conclusion. Affirming a judgment for the defendant in a product liability case, Cummins v. Lyle Indus., n145 the Court held that the testimony of the plaintiff's design engineer, to the effect that the defendant should have used a different design to make its product safer, was properly excluded under Daubert. The expert's testimony was unscientific, because the expert had never tested his proposed alternative design. Many of the factors that must go into the conclusion that an alternative design should have been employed "are product-and-manufacturer-specific, and most cannot be determined reliably without testing."

Lauzon v. Senco Products, Inc., 270 F.3d 681 (8th Cir. 2001) : In a design defect case involving a pneumatic nailer, the Court found it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the testimony of the plaintiff's expert. In a lengthy opinion on Daubert principles, the Court concluded that the witness had sufficiently examined the nailer and the circumstances surrounding the accident; he relied on peer reviewed studies indicating that the type of nailer in question was dangerous and that an alternative design was safer; he relied on generally accepted methods; and he ruled out other obvious causes for the accident. In Giles v. Miners, Inc., 242 F.3d 810 (8th Cir. 2001) , an action was brought against the manufacturer of a grocery store freezer after a young girl received a frostbite injury when her hand stuck to the interior of the freezer. The Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the plaintiff's expert, who would have testified that the freezer was unreasonably dangerous without a mesh safety guard that would attach with duct tape to the freezer wall. There was no indication that the expert had analyzed how the proposed safety guard would interact with the freezer's proper functioning. Moreover, the expert's mesh insertion design alternative would violate government and industry design standards. In Jaurequi v. Carter Mfg. Co., n146 the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony for the plaintiff by a mechanical engineer that the farm machinery at issue was unreasonably dangerous because it lacked awareness barriers. The evidence failed the reliability prong of Daubert because the witness had not attempted to construct or draw such a device, much less test its utility, and he had not pointed to such a device being used in practice by any manufacturer. In Dancy v. Hyster Co., n147 the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in a product liability action arising from a lift truck accident, and found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the plaintiff's expert witness regarding a safer alternative design for the lift truck. The witness specialized in thermal science and had never designed a lift truck or similar machine, had never tested his theory for a safer design, had never seen the type of device he proposed on a similar machine, and had not even designed the device he suggested would have prevented the plaintiff's injury. In Peitzmeier v. Hennessy Indus., Inc., n148 a mechanic was injured while using a tire changer when a tire exploded. The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the manufacturer of the tire changer, holding that an engineering expert's testimony was properly excluded. The expert had not designed or tested any of the proposed safety devices he claimed were missing from the tire changer, and he had never designed or tested a platform for a tire changer. The Court also rejected the argument that review of an expert's methodology by other Courts could constitute "peer review" within the meaning of Daubert.

Diviero v. Uniroyal Goodrich Tire Co., 114 F.3d 851 (9th Cir. 1997) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendant in a personal injury case based on an allegedly defectively designed tire, the Court held that the testimony of the plaintiff's expert was properly excluded. The expert's conclusion that an adhesion defect caused the steel belts of the tire to separate was found "unsubstantiated and subjective": the expert could not dismiss other possible causes, he knew nothing about adhesion failures generally, and he could not explain the reasoning behind his opinion.

Kinser v. Gehl Co., 184 F.3d 1259 (10th Cir. 1999) : Although the Court affirmed a judgment awarding damages to the estate and survivor of a farmer who was killed while operating a baler manufactured by the defendant, it found error (harmless) in the admission of expert testimony on behalf of the plaintiffs by two engineers who concluded that the baler was defectively designed. The experts had no practical experience in mechanical design and had not tested the feasibility or safety of any of their proposals.

[72] Product Warnings

Calhoun v. Yamaha Motor Corp., U.S.A., 350 F.3d 316 (3d Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action arising from the death of a 12-year-old riding a jet ski, the Court found no abuse of discretion when expert witnesses were precluded from testifying that the warnings on the jet ski should have limited users to at least age 16. There was no support in the literature or otherwise for such a restriction, so any opinion to that effect was speculative and unreliable.

Bourelle v. Crown Equip. Corp., 220 F.3d 532 (7th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in an action arising out of forklift accidents, holding there was no abuse of discretion in finding the plaintiffs' expert witness' opinions that warnings on the forklift were defective insufficiently reliable. The expert failed to test or even to draft a proposed alternative warning, which was akin to "talking off the cuff" and not acceptable methodology.

Jaurequi v. Carter Mfg. Co., 173 F.3d 1076 (8th Cir. 1999) : The Court held in a product liability case that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony for the plaintiff by a mechanical engineer and a human factors engineer that the farm machinery at issue was unreasonably dangerous because the warnings on it were deficient in placement, design, orientation, and content. The evidence failed the reliability prong of Daubert because the witnesses had not created or designed, much less tested, warnings they would have considered more appropriate, and they had not pointed to such warnings being used in practice by any other manufacturer.

Ralston v. Smith & Nephew Richards, Inc., 275 F.3d 965 (10th Cir. 2001) : The plaintiff brought a product liability action alleging that inadequate warnings accompanied a surgical nail implanted in her broken femur. Affirming summary judgment granted for the manufacturer, the Court found no abuse of discretion in disregarding an opinion from the plaintiff's treating physician regarding the adequacy of the warnings. Although the witness was a board certified orthopaedic surgeon, she had done no research on intramedullary nailing and she had no experience drafting a surgical technique or warning for a product of any kind.

[73] "Profile" Evidence

United States v. White, 890 F.2d 1012 (8th Cir. 1989) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug-related crimes, holding that there was no clear abuse of discretion when law enforcement officials were permitted to use drug-courier profiles to explain the modus operandi of crimes the defendants were charged with, as the activities were not something with which most jurors are familiar. The Court cautioned that the evidence is prejudicial by nature and that it did not favor admission in all cases. See also United States v. Quigley, 890 F.2d 1019 (8th Cir. 1989) (holding it was error, but harmless, to admit testimony regarding a drug-courier profile when it was used as proof that the defendant committed the crime).

[74] Proper Subjects of Expert Testimony

United States v. Kayne, 90 F.3d 7 (1st Cir. 1996) : In a prosecution for fraudulently selling rare coins at an inflated value, the Trial Judge admitted testimony from eight coin dealers that the coins sold by the defendant were of substantially lower quality and value than represented in the accompanying documentation. The defendant argued that this was not a proper subject matter for expert testimony, but the Court found no error. It concluded that "[o]pinions of value are a traditional subject of expert testimony" and that "[o]ne could hardly expect a lay jury to form conclusions about such an esoteric subject as the value of rare coins without the help of an expert."

United States v. Mulder, 273 F.3d 91 (2d Cir. 2001) : In an extortion prosecution alleging that members of labor coalitions forced contractors to hire members of their coalition, the government called two government officials as experts to testify to the operations and structure of a labor coalition. Rejecting the defendants' argument that the testimony involved matters of common knowledge or common sense, the Court stated: "We have upheld expert testimony on the structure and tactics of the Mafia, United States v. Locascio, 6 F.3d 924 (2d Cir. 1993) , and, by virtue of television, best selling novels, and the movies, the Mafia is far better known to the general public than are labor coalitions." In United States v. Diallo, n149 the Court reversed a conviction for importing and possessing heroin, finding an abuse of discretion when a commodities analyst was not permitted to testify as an expert regarding the market price of gold in the United States and the profit to be made by smuggling gold out of Africa. The testimony supported the defendant's claim that he thought he was smuggling gold, not drugs. In United States v. Onumonu, n150 the defendant, charged with knowingly smuggling heroin from Nigeria in his alimentary canal, asserted he thought he was smuggling diamonds and offered an expert to testify to the feasibility and prevalence of smuggling diamonds in the same manner from Nigeria. The Court held it was error to exclude the testimony, as it was relevant to the defendant's subjective belief, did not fall under any of the Rule 403 exceptions to admissibility, and would have been helpful to a New York jury unlikely to be familiar with diamond smuggling out of Nigeria and even less so with the feasibility of smuggling diamonds by swallowing condoms.

United States v. Cavin, 39 F.3d 1299 (5th Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution of an outside counsel, a broker, and another attorney for conspiracy to defraud insurance regulators by inflating an insurance company's assets and related offenses, the Court reversed the convictions of the outside counsel, finding error in the exclusion of testimony by a veteran commercial lawyer regarding the ethical constraints under which attorneys operate in the regulatory area and the complex considerations facing a lawyer whose client is using or has used his services to accomplish a fraud. The Court noted that "[e]xpert testimony may be particularly appropriate when specialized areas of law, such as the insurance and financial matters relevant herein, are at issue."

Pena v. Leombruni, 200 F.3d 1031 (7th Cir. 1999) : In a civil rights suit, the plaintiffs claimed that a police officer used excessive force when he shot and killed the decedent after the decedent, who was "acting crazy," approached the officer with a large chunk of concrete. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court found no error in the exclusion of testimony by a criminologist and former police officer that the officer acted unreasonably in shooting and killing the decedent under the circumstances. The Court noted that the decedent's behavior was "unambiguously dangerous." The only question was whether the danger was sufficiently lethal and imminent to justify the use of deadly force, and that question was "within lay competence."

United States v. Fuentes-Cariaga, 209 F.3d 1140 (9th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a conviction for importing marijuana, finding no abuse of discretion when a non-percipient INS inspector was prohibited from testifying that she would not personally infer consciousness of guilt from a driver's nervousness at a border crossing. The nervousness of drivers stopped at the border is within the ordinary experience of jurors, the reasons therefor can be argued to the jury, and it is within the ordinary province of jurors to draw inferences from such a fact.

[75] Psychiatric and Psychological Evidence

[a] Civil Cases

Spencer v. General Elec. Co., 688 F. Supp. 1072 (E.D. Va. 1988) : In a sexual harassment case, the Judge held that the plaintiff could not introduce expert testimony that she suffered from post-traumatic stress disorder to prove that a rape occurred. He concluded that evidence of the disorder is not a reliable way of determining whether a rape occurred and that the prejudicial effect of the evidence outweighed its probative value.

Skidmore v. Precision Printing & Packaging, Inc., 188 F.3d 606 (5th Cir. 1999) : Reversing a judgment for a former employee who alleged sexual harassment and intentional infliction of emotional distress, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by a psychiatrist who examined the plaintiff and concluded that she suffered post-traumatic stress disorder. When the doctor testified to his experience, the criteria he used to make his diagnosis, and the standard methods of diagnosis in his field, he satisfied the Daubert-Kumho standard of assuring that he was employing in the courtroom "the same level of intellectual rigor that characterizes the practice of an expert in the relevant field." The Court also held that the doctor's opinion that the plaintiff had not lied to him or fabricated her symptoms was not an opinion as to her credibility, but amounted to a proper opinion that her symptoms seemed genuine. In an action by parents of a passenger killed in a plane crash, Haley v. Pan Am. World Airways, n151 the Court held that, where state law recognized a cause of action for preimpact fear, it was proper for a psychiatrist, who had treated survivors of aircraft accidents, to testify to "the five levels of anxiety that culminate in panic."

Walker v. Soo Line R.R., 208 F.3d 581 (7th Cir. 2000) : In an FELA action by an employee suing for injuries allegedly sustained when lightning struck a railroad tower, a psychologist who examined the plaintiff to determine his functional capacity was permitted to testify about the results of tests he had administered. However, the Judge excluded the psychologist's opinions regarding the plaintiff's IQ before and after the incident, because the psychologist had not evaluated the plaintiff before the incident and had relied on an erroneous account of his educational history. Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the psychologist had used an acceptable methodology, relying for his opinions on medical, educational, and professional histories reported by the plaintiff and the plaintiff's girlfriend, as well as on a test specifically designed to estimate a person's IQ before that person suffered a trauma, so inaccuracies in the history should go to the weight, not the admissibility, of the opinions. Further, the expert's testimony could assist the jury in determining whether any electrical trauma caused a decline in the plaintiff's IQ, even if the expert did not express an opinion on that ultimate question and could not state the causal relationship with complete certainty. The Judge had also excluded testimony by the physician who had headed the clinical team that examined and evaluated the plaintiff, on the grounds that the witness was not qualified to testify about post-traumatic stress disorder because she was not a psychiatrist or psychologist and because she relied primarily on the work of the psychologist first mentioned above, who had concluded that the plaintiff did not have PTSD. The Court found that exclusion of the physician's testimony was an abuse of discretion because (a) she was qualified to testify about the effect of electrical trauma on the body; (b) as the leader of a clinical medical team, she was not required to be qualified in every individual discipline encompassed by the team in order to testify to the team's conclusions; (c) reliance on the work of an expert who reaches an opposite conclusion using the same or similar data does not mean that one's opinion is per se unreliable under Daubert; and (d) the physician had relied on information from other professionals, in addition to the psychologist. In a civil rights action for excessive force used by police in enforcing a commitment petition, Wallace v. Mulholland, 957 F.2d 333 (7th Cir. 1992) , the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence of the committed person's psychiatric history. Where the issue in the case was his actual behavior and how the officers responded to it, evidence about the general nature of his condition and the likelihood that someone with that condition would act aggressively was probably irrelevant and certainly prejudicial. In a personal injury action brought for injuries suffered when a child allegedly pushed the stop button on an escalator, Carroll v. Otis Elevator Co., n152 the Court held that an experimental psychologist specializing in visual perception was qualified to testify that the design of the stop button was unreasonably attractive to and operable by children.

Jenson v. Eveleth Taconite Co., 130 F.3d 1287 (8th Cir. 1997) : In the damages phase of a Title VII action arising from sexual harassment in the workplace, the Special Master relied on Daubert to exclude all of the plaintiffs' testimony from psychological experts, reasoning that the experts had not "advanced a validated theory which furnishes a scientific basis for distinguishing between the causal effect of multiple psychological stresses or trauma, or for assigning relative impact or degree of impact to different trauma or stresses." The testimony of the expert psychologists was "thorough and meticulously presented" and the experts' methodology "was laid out clearly by each witness." The Court, in remanding for reconsideration of damages, emphasized "the probative value of expert psychological proof regarding causation of the claimant's depression and emotional distress."

S.M. v. J.K., 262 F.3d 914 (9th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for a housekeeper who charged her former employer with attempted sexual assault, the Court upheld the admission of the testimony byof a psychiatrist who diagnosed the plaintiff as suffering from Post Traumatic Stress Disorder. Although DSM-III required a "distressing event ... outside the range of usual human experience" to trigger the disorder and such an event arguably was not present in this case, the Court noted that "mental health professionals in everyday practice may disagree more than half the time on major diagnostic categories." Therefore "a variance from the DSM's diagnostic criteria will not automatically result in an unreliable diagnosis" under Daubert. Furthermore, the requirement was omitted from DSM-IV, suggesting that the expert's diagnostic criteria "apparently now enjoy general acceptance."

Christiansen v. City of Tulsa, 332 F.3d 1270 (10th Cir. 2003) : A mother brought an action against the City and several police officers after her son killed himself during a standoff with police. Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of an affidavit from the decedent's psychiatrist averring that the officers discouraged him from contacting the decedent during the standoff, and that if he had been allowed to make such contact, the decedent would probably have not committed suicide. The Court noted that "Dr. Crass' statements regarding what might have happened had he been allowed to intervene are pure speculation," and also that the psychiatrist's averment that the officers had acted "recklessly" was properly excluded as a legal conclusion. In Corneveaux v. CUNA Mut. Ins. Group, 76 F.3d 1498 (10th Cir. 1996) , the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to preclude an expert in educational and value testing from testifying on behalf of the plaintiff in an employment discrimination case that the employer had improperly used screening tests to confirm his preexisting notions about the plaintiff. The Court observed that "[t]his kind of value/aptitude testing is science, and it is the paradigmatic role of experts to help juries understand the application of science." However, there was no abuse of discretion in precluding a psychologist from explaining what the employer's notations of age and reliance on second-hand reports indicated about his decision-making process in hiring, as the jury had other testimony about those practices.

[b] Psychiatric and Psychological Evidence -- Condition of Accused

[i] Mens Rea Evidence

United States v. Schneider, 111 F.3d 197 (1st Cir. 1997) : Affirming a fraud conviction, the Court held there was no error in excluding testimony from two doctors that the defendant's capacity and judgment were significantly impaired by misprescription and overprescription of medical drugs. The Court disagreed with the conclusion below that the excluded evidence was irrelevant because of the Insanity Defense Reform Act, 18 U.S.C. § 17, but agreed that the evidence might have been misleading to a jury, and concluded that the Trial Judge would exclude the evidence under Rule 403 if called upon to revisit the question.

United States v. DiDomenico, 985 F.2d 1159 (2d Cir. 1993) : Affirming a conviction for wire fraud and interstate transportation of stolen computer equipment, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the defendant had a "dependent personality disorder," as the imprimatur of a clinical label was neither necessary nor helpful for the jury to make an assessment of the defendant's state of mind and would complicate the jury's task. One Judge dissented on the ground that the diagnosis, being neither commonplace nor beyond the boundaries of current psychiatric knowledge, could be helpful, and the jury could be relied on to evaluate the evidence with a critical eye and look beyond the clinical label in deciding whether the defendant's mental state included guilty knowledge. In United States v. McBride, n153 the Court reversed a conviction for offenses growing out of a scheme to deposit stolen treasury checks in a bank account and withdraw the cash obtained, where a psychiatrist had not been permitted to testify that the defendant was vulnerable to suggestion at the time of the crimes, thus negating specific intent. Although it recognized the Trial Judge's leeway in admitting or excluding expert testimony, the Court rejected his conclusion that the expert could be excluded because psychiatry was in its infancy and conflicting testimony might confuse the jury.

United States v. Lamarre, 248 F.3d 642 (7th Cir. 2001) : The defendant, charged with defrauding a federal bank, claimed that his wife was responsible and that he was incapable of reading or understanding the loan documents that he signed and therefore lacked the specific intent to defraud. The defendant's expert clinical psychologist, who would have testified that the defendant lacked the capacity to understand the nature of the financial transactions that gave rise to the charges, was precluded on the ground that his testimony would "evade the common sense inquiry of jurors." The Court, finding the exclusion of the expert to be error (but harmless), remarked that Trial Judge's mistake began by failing to hold a Daubert hearing, which might have helped the Judge understand that the expert could assist the jury by showing through scientifically valid social science that their commonly held beliefs are incorrect. In United States v. Shlater, 85 F.3d 1251 (7th Cir. 1996) , a defendant who claimed insanity in an extortion prosecution offered testimony from a psychiatrist that he suffered from a "mild to moderate delusional disorder." The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the evidence. The fact in issue was whether the defendant, at the time of the extortion incident, "suffered from a severe disorder that affected his ability to distinguish right from wrong," and the psychiatrist's testimony "would have served to confuse the jury as to the requisite mental state of severe mental disorder required under the federal statute for criminal insanity."

United States v. Diggs, 82 F.3d 195 (8th Cir. 1996) : The Court held in a prosecution for felon firearm possession that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony from a psychologist specializing in the psychosocial development of the black male and a criminologist specializing in urban violence. The jury was able without expert assistance to determine whether the defendant was justified in possessing a gun when confronted by gang members who were holding his son. In United States v. Nunn, 940 F.2d 1148 (8th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed drug-related convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding psychiatric evidence that the defendant was unable to say "no" to his drug-dealing father, as the evidence did not show he was especially vulnerable to inducement by government agents and therefore would not have helped the jury understand his entrapment defense. In United States v. Felak, n154 the Court affirmed a tax evasion conviction, holding that psychiatric testimony that the defendant was "obsessed with his beliefs" was properly excluded as not helpful. See also United States v. Ellsworth n155(in a prosecution for willful failure to file tax returns, the Court upheld exclusion of psychiatric testimony that the defendant had a good faith belief that the income tax was optional).

United States v. Finley, 301 F.3d 1000 (9th Cir. 2002) : Reversing convictions arising from the defendant's attempts to use certain documents, prepared by the leader of "the Montana Freemen," as financial instruments, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude testimony by a licensed clinical psychologist that the defendant suffered from a delusional disorder, and that a person with a delusional disorder can be dissuaded from the delusion "only with tremendous, tremendous difficulty." Rejecting the argument that the witness' opinion was unreliable because it was based on his belief in the defendant's assertions, the Court noted that the diagnosis was based on "a variety of factors, including the statements made by the defendant to the psychologist in the course of his examination." The testimony did not usurp the jury's function, since they could accept the diagnosis and still find that the defendant knew the instruments were fraudulent. The testimony was helpful in offering an explanation why "an otherwise normal man could believe that these financial instruments were valid and reject all evidence to the contrary." In United States v. Rahm, 993 F.2d 1405 (9th Cir. 1993) , the Court reversed (2-1) counterfeiting convictions because of the improper exclusion of a psychologist's expert testimony offered to support the defendant's claim that she did not know the bills she possessed and passed were counterfeit. The psychologist had given the defendant two standardized tests and had concluded that her performance suggested difficulty with visual perception and that her personality style might be marked by lack of insight. The Court concluded that the Trial Judge relied upon two erroneous legal premises: that admission of psychological testimony requires that the defendant suffer from a mental disorder, and that an expert must be able to state conclusively that a defendant lacked mens rea. In United States v. Hoac, n156 the Court affirmed drug convictions, holding there was no error in excluding testimony by a clinical forensic psychologist as unhelpful to the jury. The witness, called to testify as to the defendant's intellect and general naivet'e and about how Chinese cultural factors might have led the defendant to travel long distances for legitimate business reasons, had performed no formal tests on the defendant and had only spoken with him twice, an hour each time. In United States v. Byers, n157 the Court affirmed convictions for willfully failing to file tax returns, upholding the exclusion of psychiatric evidence offered to prove that the defendant lacked the capacity to form an intention of not filing the returns. It reasoned that the testimony was ambiguous and that it was not at all clear that the testimony would have helped the jury.

[ii] Psychiatric and Psychological Evidence -- Condition of Accused -- Other Evidence

Barefoot v. Estelle, 463 U.S. 880 (1983) : Affirming the denial of habeas corpus relief to a state prisoner challenging his death sentence, the Supreme Court rejected a claim that psychiatric predictions of future dangerousness were insufficiently reliable to be considered in capital sentencing proceedings. A majority of the Court reasoned that a defendant could challenge the reliability of government experts by cross-examination and by presenting defense experts to testify to the limits of psychiatric expertise. The majority found no constitutional infirmity in an expert's making his prediction on the basis of a hypothetical question without examining the defendant. Three Justices dissented, arguing that a jury may be unduly swayed by claims of professional expertise.

United States v. Shay, 57 F.3d 126 (1st Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed a defendant's convictions for conspiracy and aiding and abetting an attempt to blow up his father's car. The government relied upon incriminating statements made by the defendant to the police, the media, and fellow inmates. In response, the defense attempted to call a psychiatrist to testify that the defendant suffered from Munchausen's Syndrome, a mental disorder that caused him to "spin out webs of lies which are ordinarily self-aggrandizing and serve to place him in the center of attention." The Court held that it was error to exclude the testimony under Rule 702 as unhelpful, since the testimony would have rebutted the common sense assumption that people do not make statements damaging to themselves unless they are true.

United States v. Barnette, 211 F.3d 803 (4th Cir. 2000) : The Court vacated the defendant's death sentence in a murder and hijacking case because the defense was not permitted to call a psychologist on surrebuttal in the capital sentencing phase to respond to expert testimony that the defendant was a "psychopath." However, the Court found no error in admitting the government witness' testimony, which was based on a Psychopathy Checklist. The Court declined to address whether Daubert applied at capital sentencing proceedings under federal law because, in any event, the Checklist was a reliable diagnostic tool. Relying on two articles written by his own expert, the defendant objected that the Checklist had not been standardized as to African-Americans or the post-middle-age population. The Court responded: "Absent evidence indicating more than such a disagreement between professionals, we do not believe the district court needed to go further to evaluate reliability."

United States v. Hall, 93 F.3d 1337 (7th Cir. 1996) : The Court vacated a kidnapping conviction because the defendant had not been permitted to introduce testimony from a psychologist and a psychiatrist that would have shown his susceptibility to giving a false confession. The testimony had been precluded only on the ground that it would not properly assist the jury, but the Trial Judge erred in failing to apply the Daubert framework to this testimony. The Court recognized that "[b]ecause the fields of psychology and psychiatry deal with human behavior and mental disorders, it may be more difficult at times to distinguish between testimony that reflects genuine expertise -- a reliable body of specialized knowledge -- and something that is nothing more than fancy phrases for common sense." In the instant case, the prosecution did not challenge the scientific basis of the proffered testimony, so the Court assumed that it was valid. The Court concluded that "[i]t was precisely because juries are unlikely to know that social scientists and psychologists have identified a personality disorder that will cause individuals to make false confessions that the testimony would have assisted the jury in making its decision."

United States v. Cortez, 935 F.2d 135 (8th Cir. 1991) : To help the jury understand the events surrounding the defendant's arrest and interrogation and his in-court testimony, the defense offered a psychologist to testify that the defendant had mental and emotional disorders manifested in an "inability to recall certain facts" and a withdrawn demeanor. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, as it would not be helpful to the jury because those aspects of the defendant's personality would be readily apparent when he testified.

United States v. Miller, 874 F.2d 1255 (9th Cir. 1989) : The Court held it was proper to exclude a psychologist's testimony concerning the effect on the defendant of his being told that he failed a polygraph test. It found that the jury was as equipped as the expert to make this evaluation.

United States v. Roark, 753 F.2d 991 (11th Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed convictions for bank robbery and conspiracy because the Trial Judge erroneously excluded the testimony of an expert psychological witness who would have testified to the defendant's susceptibility to suggestions, which was relevant to the weight to be given a confession obtained from the defendant.

[c] Psychiatric and Psychological Evidence -- Other Criminal Cases

United States v. Rouse, 111 F.3d 561 (8th Cir. 1997) : Affirming convictions for sexual abuse of children, the Court held, first, that an expert psychologist was properly precluded from expressing any opinion that a victim's accusations of sexual abuse were not credible. The Court divided on a second question, whether the expert was properly precluded from offering testimony, after explaining the dangers of implanted memory and suggestive practices when interviewing child witnesses, that in the government interviews with the victims "there's been a practice of suggestibility employed in these techniques." One Judge seemed to say that if there were any error in exclusion of the testimony, it was harmless; one said that it was harmless error; and one Judge dissented, restating views in a vacated majority opinion n158 that the expert's testimony satisfied the Daubert reliability test and that its exclusion was reversible error. In United States v. Plenty Arrows, 946 F.2d 62 (8th Cir. 1991) , a prosecution for sexual abuse of a child, a defense expert testified on direct that during an interview the victim denied that he had been sexually abused, and the expert testified on cross-examination that the victim's behavior was consistent with that of a sexually abused child. The Court held that the cross-examination was not an abuse of discretion, as the expert did not put her stamp of believability on the victim's entire story but merely helped the jurors by stating whether the evidence was consistent with the victim's claims. In Arcoren v. United States, n159 the Court, reviewing convictions for sexual abuse, held that there was no abuse of discretion when expert testimony regarding battered woman syndrome was admitted after a victim had recanted her grand jury testimony. The expert testimony, which included no opinion whether the witness suffered from the syndrome, provided the jury with a basis on which to understand and evaluate the changes in the witness' testimony. See also United States v. DeNoyer n160(finding no error in excluding testimony of a "school psychologist" who had not examined the child victim of sodomy, but who had formed an opinion based upon listening to the victim's testimony and that of a clinical psychologist who had examined the victim); United States v. St. Pierre n161(upholding admission of a clinical psychologist's testimony as to traits and characteristics of sexually abused children in a prosecution of a father for abusing his stepdaughter).

United States v. Vallejo, 237 F.3d 1009 (9th Cir. 2001) : Marijuana was found when the defendant's car was searched at a Mexican border checkpoint. In support of his interpretation of what was said and meant when he was interrogated, the defendant proffered his high school's psychologist and director of special education as an expert witness, to testify about the defendant's language disorder and the difficulties he experienced understanding and expressing English. Reversing a conviction for marijuana importation, the Court held it was error to exclude the expert, since the proposed testimony "addressed an issue beyond the common knowledge of the average layperson" and would have explained how the defendant and the officer "could have very different perceptions of what occurred during the interrogation, yet both could be correct from a communications standpoint." In United States v. Marsh, 26 F.3d 1496 (9th Cir. 1994) , the defendant was convicted for attempted extortion of a victim with whom he had a 24-year homosexual relationship. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by a psychologist that the victim suffered from a "dependent personality disorder" which would explain the relationship that led to giving the defendant money. In the Court's view, the victim's state of mind is irrelevant to the crime of attempted extortion; besides, the nature of the relationship was fully set out for the jury. The dissenting Judge believed that evidence of the "co-dependent" relationship was relevant to the defendant's state of mind and that the expert's specialized knowledge would have been helpful in evaluating the defendant's state of mind. In a prosecution for kidnapping and transporting two women for immoral purposes, United States v. Winters, n162 the Court held that expert psychiatric testimony that the women had suffered from post-traumatic stress disorder was properly admitted. The evidence assisted the jury in understanding the women's conduct and dispelled any suggestion that they acted voluntarily.

[76] Qualifications of Experts

[a] Antitrust Cases

Spray-Rite Serv. Corp. v. Monsanto Corp., 684 F.2d 1226 (7th Cir. 1982) , aff'd, 465 U.S. 752 (1984) : In an antitrust case alleging price fixing, the Court held that a marketing expert was properly permitted to testify on the question of damages, even though he was not an expert in all the fields of study on which he relied in testifying.

[b] Qualifications of Experts -- Civil Rights Cases

Eagleston v. Guido, 41 F.3d 865 (2d Cir. 1994) : Affirming a judgment against a victim of domestic violence who sued a police department and police officers for failing to protect her from her spouse, the Court held that testimony from the plaintiff's proffered expert was properly excluded. The expert would have testified that the police department failed to provide sufficient training and supervision for its officers when it changed from a policy of mediation to arrest in cases of domestic violence. The expert's purported qualification was that he had a doctorate in sociology, "a credential that does not in itself describe any specific body of scientific or technical expertise pertinent to this case." Thus, it was not an abuse of discretion to rule that the plaintiff had failed to establish the witness' expertise in either criminology or domestic violence.

Hayter v. City of Mount Vernon, 154 F.3d 269 (5th Cir. 1998) : Affirming denial of summary judgment in a civil rights action for wrongful arrest, the Court found no abuse of discretion in a finding that the plaintiff's expert on law enforcement practices was qualified to testify that no reasonable officer would have arrested the plaintiff under the circumstances presented. The expert had basic, intermediate, and advanced law enforcement certifications from the State of Texas, and an associate degree in law enforcement from a community college, and was also trained in the requirements for a lawful arrest.

[c] Qualifications of Experts -- Counterfeit Securities

United States v. Chang, 207 F.3d 1169 (9th Cir. 2000) : Affirming convictions for uttering and possessing a counterfeit Japanese certificate, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the testimony of a defense expert, an assistant professor of clinical marketing, who would have testified that the certificate was genuine. Although the expert had knowledge of the history and purpose for the issuance of such certificates, he admitted that he had no formal training in the identification of foreign certificates and did not claim any special training in detecting counterfeit securities. Thus, the witness' "practical experience in international finance did not amount to practical experience determining whether a particular security is counterfeit, the fact at issue in this case."

[d] Qualifications of Experts -- Damages Experts

Murphy v. National R.R. Passenger Corp., 547 F.2d 816 (4th Cir. 1977) : The Court remanded this FELA case because the Trial Judge refused to admit testimony about the qualifications of the plaintiff's experts after the defendant conceded that they were well qualified. The error was compounded by a jury instruction to the effect that the testimony of the experts should be disregarded if the jury determined that it was not based on sufficient education and experience.

Seatrax, Inc. v. Sonbeck Int'l, Inc., 200 F.3d 358 (5th Cir. 2000) : In an action for trademark infringement and misappropriation of trade secrets regarding offshore marine cranes, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony from the plaintiff's expert regarding the defendant's profits from its infringing activity. Although the witness had 15 years of experience in the marine crane industry, he had no formal or professional training in accounting and he did not conduct any independent examination of the defendant's gross sales figures, which were provided to him by the plaintiff's attorneys.

Tuf Racing Prods., Inc. v. American Suzuki Motor Corp., 223 F.3d 585 (7th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a suit for wrongful termination of a franchise agreement, holding there was no error when the plaintiff's accountant, a CPA, presented its theory of damages. Anyone with relevant expertise enabling him to offer responsible opinion testimony helpful to the trier may qualify as an expert witness, and there is no requirement that a damages witness in a case like this have a degree in economics, statistics, mathematics, or some other "academic" field that might bear on the calculation of damages.

Soo Line R.R. v. Fruehauf Corp., 547 F.2d 1365 (8th Cir. 1977) : Affirming a judgment for a railroad against a manufacturer of railroad cars, the Court approved the admission of expert testimony to interpret "complex technical construction specifications contained in the [parties'] agreement," and to prove the diminution in value of railroad cars resulting from their structural collapse. The former testimony was supplied by a mechanical engineer, the latter by an executive vice president of the railroad. With respect to the latter, the Court said that Rule "702 is not limited to experts in the strictest sense of the word but also encompasses a large group called 'skilled' witnesses, such as owners, bankers, and landowners testifying on the value of property."

Greyhound Computer Corp. v. International Bus. Machs. Corp., 559 F.2d 488 (9th Cir. 1977) : "An interested witness may testify as to the amount of damage so long as the record reflects his competency and the factual basis for his conclusions."

Lifewise Master Funding v. Telebank, 374 F.3d 917 (10th Cir. 2004) : In an action by a lending company against its loan financer for breach of contract, the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the plaintiff's proposed expert witness concerning damages. The witness had no familiarity, knowledge, or experience with damages analysis and was not qualified to explain how the damages model used worked or to opine on the statistical validity or interpretation of the results.

[e] Qualifications of Experts -- Discrimination Cases

Burkhart v. Washington Metro. Area Transit Auth., 112 F.3d 1207 (D.C. Cir. 1997) : A deaf person alleged that a transit police officer, who investigated an altercation between the plaintiff and a bus driver, had violated the Americans with Disabilities Act. The Court concluded that a 24-year veteran of the Metropolitan Police Department, who had served as an instructor in police training and procedures, was improperly permitted to testify as to whether the Authority violated the ADA, but it upheld the decision below finding the officer qualified to testify as to police practices, procedures, and training.

Mullins v. Crowell, 228 F.3d 1305 (11th Cir. 2000) : In support of his Rehabilitation Act claim that he was disabled from performing craft work, a plaintiff offered testimony from a general foreman with 11 years' experience supervising craftworkers of all types for the plaintiff's employer. The Court noted that the foreman's experience would qualify him to give expert testimony, although he was not a "medical, labor, or vocational expert."

[f] Qualifications of Experts -- Drug Cases

United States v. Carswell, 922 F.2d 876 (D.C. Cir. 1991) : Affirming a conviction for cocaine possession with intent to distribute, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by a witness regarding customary packaging of cocaine for personal use, when the witness did not recognize either of the street terms for the quantities in which cocaine was sold in the District.

United States v. Paiva, 892 F.2d 148 (1st Cir. 1989) : In affirming a conviction for cocaine distribution offenses, the Court held that a detective with 15 years' experience, who was working on the narcotics unit and who had encountered cocaine before, was qualified to express an opinion that a substance he had field-tested was cocaine.

United States v. Carson, 702 F.2d 351 (2d Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed convictions in a heroin conspiracy case, finding that government agents were properly permitted to testify that a defendant's furtive activities on a street corner appeared to be narcotics sales. The agents' conclusions were based on years of experience in investigating narcotics cases. In United States v. Pugliese, n163 the Court affirmed heroin-related convictions, finding that testimony of a government agent regarding typical characteristics of heroin addicts was properly admitted. The agent was qualified because of his ten years' experience in drug investigations. It did not matter that he lacked knowledge concerning local conditions in the South Florida heroin market absent some showing that those conditions might be different from the conditions existing in New York.

Cooper v. Laboratory Corp. of Am. Holdings, 150 F.3d 376 (4th Cir. 1998) : The plaintiff was fired for testing positive for alcohol in a urine sample. She sued the drug testing laboratory for failing to account for the fact that she was a diabetic, and for failing to consider whether the positive result may have been caused by fermentation or refrigeration. Affirming a grant of summary judgment for the defendant, the Court found that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the plaintiff's expert as unqualified. The witness, who would have testified that the laboratory's procedures were inadequate, had a general knowledge of chemistry, but he had no training, experience, or skill in the field of urine alcohol testing; his knowledge of the specific subject matter was based on one course in toxicology, taken 30 years before the start of this case.

United States v. Griffith, 118 F.3d 318 (5th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a conviction for possession of marijuana with intent to distribute, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a DEA agent to interpret cryptic recorded conversations as drug transactions. The witness had over eight years' experience as an agent, in which she participated in 50 investigations, often undercover, so she had ample opportunity to listen to drug dealers converse and to decipher the nuances of their conversations. In United States v. Johnson, n164 the Court upheld a ruling that a government witness could testify as an expert on the origins of marijuana that the government claimed was illegally brought into the country. The witness' qualifications involved "the experience of being around a great deal [of marijuana] and smoking it," but no special training or education. A professor called by the defense testified that there was no way to determine the origin of a particular sample of marijuana.

United States v. Lightfoot, 224 F.3d 586 (7th Cir. 2000) : In a trial for possession with intent to distribute narcotics, a law enforcement officer testified that the amount of cocaine retrieved was so great that it had to be destined for resale. Rejecting a contention that the officer was not qualified to render this opinion because he admitted that he was unfamiliar with the odor of cocaine during the cooking process, because it had no bearing on his general familiarity with the cocaine business, the Court found that the expert was sufficiently qualified by eight years of experience in investigating narcotics, as well as special training in narcotics enforcement. In United States v. Griffin, 194 F.3d 808 (7th Cir. 1999) , a prosecution for possession of cocaine base with intent to distribute, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by two crack dealers that the defendant's acts indicated an intent to distribute the crack he possessed and that the contents of certain baggies appeared to be crack, as the witnesses had sufficient experience to offer those opinions.

United States v. Robertson, 387 F.3d 702 (8th Cir. 2004) : Affirming drug and firearm convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by detectives that the amount of drugs possessed by the defendant was a "distribution amount." The Court noted that one detective was a ten-year veteran, he had attended a course sponsored by the DEA, and he gathered intelligence on the local narcotics trade as part of his daily routine. The other detective was a 13-year veteran of the force, had attended a DEA course, and had focused primarily on drug interdiction for the previous three years. In United States v. Santana, 150 F.3d 860 (8th Cir. 1998) , the Court affirmed cocaine convictions, finding no error in the admission of expert testimony from a law enforcement agent regarding the frequency with which fingerprints are recovered from plastic bags. The witness was sufficiently qualified by 26 years of experience in law enforcement, including extensive experience in drug-related investigations. In United States v. Johnson, n165 the Court held there was no error in a crack distribution conspiracy trial when an unindicted coconspirator was permitted to provide expert testimony on drug trafficking, as his six years' experience in setting up various drug distribution centers in different cities gave him specialized knowledge that would be helpful to the jury.

United States v. Golden, 532 F.2d 1244 (9th Cir. 1976) : Affirming convictions for unlawful importation of heroin, the Court approved the introduction of testimony by a DEA special agent as to the market price of the amount of heroin discovered in the defendants' bags when they arrived in San Francisco on a flight from Tokyo. The agent was qualified as an expert because: he had purchased heroin more than 400 times in the United States, Europe, and Asia; he had purchased heroin in Bangkok in 1967 and had recently obtained information as to prices in Thailand from another agent (the defendants were coming from Thailand); in the months prior to trial he had made purchases in the United States; and on 13 other occasions, he had testified as an expert witness on the market value of heroin.

United States v. Brown, 415 F.3d 1257 (11th Cir. 2005) : The principal issue in the bench trial of the defendants for distribution of a controlled substance analogue was whether the 1,4-butanediol they possessed had a chemical structure "substantially similar" to gamma hydroxybutyric acid (GHB), a controlled substance. The government offered testimony from a DEA forensic drug chemist and a biochemist with the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences; their testimony was admitted. The defense offered a freelance consultant in the field of chemistry who held a Ph.D. in plant pathology; the Judge heard this witness' testimony without ruling on his qualifications, but did not consider the testimony as reliable expert opinion in making findings of fact. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the Judge declined to qualify the defendants' witness as an expert, since his academic work and professional experience related more to plant pathology and botany than to chemistry.

[g] Qualifications of Experts -- Engineers

DaSilva v. American Brands, Inc., 845 F.2d 356 (1st Cir. 1988) : In a wrongful death action against a manufacturer of an industrial mixing machine, the Court held that a mechanical engineer was qualified on the basis of experience as an engineer in evaluating and recommending safety devices for machines to give an opinion concerning the mixing machine. It rejected the defendant's argument that only an expert who had experience with the specific machine in question should be permitted to give an opinion on its design.

Stagl v. Delta Air Lines, Inc., 117 F.3d 76 (2d Cir. 1997) : The Court reversed a judgment as a matter of law granted for the defendant in a personal injury action alleging negligent failure to control the crowd at a baggage carousel or to provide a means by which elderly and disabled passengers like the plaintiff could retrieve their luggage safely. It was error to exclude testimony by a mechanical engineer with experience in human-machine interactions on the ground that he had no experience in airline terminal or baggage claim area design. Because such experience could only be gained by working for the airline industry, requiring it would come close to letting the industry set its own standards.

Martin v. Fleissner GMBH, 741 F.2d 61 (4th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that experts in engineering design who were familiar with the processes used by a piece of equipment could testify concerning a design defect even though they were not experts on the equipment. In Garrett v. Desa Indus., 705 F.2d 721 (4th Cir. 1983) , the Court reversed a judgment for a defendant in an action seeking damages for injuries suffered when the plaintiff, a carpenter, was injured by the discharge of a stud driver manufactured by the defendant. It was an abuse of discretion to preclude a mechanical engineer from testifying about the negligent design of the stud driver simply because he had no prior experience with such a tool. The witness had tested stud drivers prior to trial and had experience with similar mechanisms.

Williams v. Pro-Tec, Inc., 908 F.2d 345 (8th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant manufacturer of an eyeguard worn by the plaintiff when he was hit by a racquetball and sustained eye injuries, holding that the self-acknowledged lack of medical expertise of the defendant's expert in mechanical engineering and accident reconstruction went to the weight rather than the admissibility of his opinion.

Compton v. Subaru of Am., Inc., 82 F.3d 1513 (10th Cir. 1996) : In a product liability action arising out of a roll-over accident, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the plaintiff's expert, an aerospace and mechanical engineer with 22 years of experience in automotive engineering, to testify regarding safe design of car roofs, even though he lacked experience designing car roofs or supporting structures. In Wheeler v. John Deere Co., 935 F.2d 1090 (10th Cir. 1991) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a mechanical engineer with special expertise in the safe design of farm equipment to testify to the dangers anticipated by ordinary consumers regarding a combine.

Polston v. Boomershine Pontiac-GMC Truck, Inc., 952 F.2d 1304 (11th Cir. 1992) : In a product liability action alleging enhanced injuries because the involved automobile was not crashworthy, the Court held that a mechanical engineer with substantial experience as an automobile accident investigator was properly permitted to opine that a lack of crashworthiness contributed to the plaintiff's injuries and was properly precluded from testifying which injuries were caused or enhanced by the allegedly defective condition. With his qualifications, he could testify to a reasonable degree of engineering certainty but not to a reasonable degree of medical certainty.

[h] Qualifications of Experts -- Environmental Cases

United States v. Cunningham, 194 F.3d 1186 (11th Cir. 1999) : The defendant was convicted for knowingly transporting and disposing of hazardous waste. He sought to show that he had a good faith belief that the compound involved was not hazardous waste by asking the manager of the waste management section of the state EPA hazardous materials division whether the chromium contained in the listed hazardous waste was different from the type of chromium contained in the compound at issue. The Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the testimony, as the witness was not a toxicologist and had no knowledge of the chemical composition of the compound at issue.

[i] Qualifications of Experts -- Financial Analysts

United States v. Majors, 196 F.3d 1206 (11th Cir. 1999) : The defendants were convicted of conspiracy to defraud investors by selling worthless securities, bogus licenses, and phony distributorships. Affirming, the Court held that although the government's proffered financial expert was not a certified accountant and had no experience in small business management or in the preparation of consolidated financial statements, there was no error in admitting his testimony, since the witness had worked as a financial analyst for the FBI for more than eight years and had performed financial analyses in more than 50 cases.

[j] Qualifications of Experts -- Firearms

United States v. Bowman, 353 F.3d 546 (7th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held that a government fingerprint expert was properly permitted to answer whether the location of a thumbprint was consistent with someone making the gun "safe." The defendant argued that this testimony was outside the witness' expertise, as he was qualified as a fingerprint expert and not an expert on gun-handling. However, the Court found that the witness had 37 years' experience in handling guns, having examined thousands of prints on guns, and he knew the gun type at issue and how one would normally hold it. Thus, the witness was "well within his expertise when concluding that, based on his undisputed discovery of a left thumbprint from the right side of the gun slide, the print was deposited in the process of someone making the gun safe."

[k] Qualifications of Experts -- Forensic Experts

Microfinancial, Inc. v. Premier Holidays Int'l, Inc., 385 F.3d 72 (1st Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a lender who sued a borrower and its principal for fraud and breach of contract arising out of a line of credit extended by the lender. It held that an ex-IRS agent with 33 years experience was qualified to analyze the flow of funds lent by the lender to the defendant into a "lock-box account" and to opine that the way in which the transactions were structured was fraudulent. Although the expert had no previous experience with lock-box accounts, the Court noted that he "did not deal with the esoterica of lock-box accounts, but, rather, with the tracking of funds into and out of the" accounts, which "fell within the heartland" of the expert's expertise.

Andrews v. Metro N. Commuter R.R., 882 F.2d 705 (2d Cir. 1989) : In an action by a pedestrian injured by a train, the Court held that it was error to allow a "forensic engineer" with no railroad experience to testify that it was "reasonable" for plaintiff, who had allegedly fallen from the station platform, to walk 3000 feet to the point of impact and that it was "negligent" of the train operator, on seeing the plaintiff on the track, to slow down and blow the horn rather than immediately put the train into emergency.

United States v. Barker, 553 F.2d 1013 (6th Cir. 1977) : Reversing bank robbery convictions, the Court held it was error to refuse to recognize a defense witness as a fingerprint expert, noting that the expert need not be "an outstanding practitioner," but must be a person who can help the jury.

United States v. Kladouris, 964 F.2d 658 (7th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a conviction for arson, holding there was no error in excluding testimony about the presence of petrochemicals by an expert with no training in chemistry. In United States v. Welch, 945 F.2d 1378 (7th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed a conviction for cocaine offenses, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by the defendant's witness regarding the accuracy of the government transcript of a tape-recorded conversation. The witness lacked training and experience in forensic tape analysis, was unfamiliar with the use of technological instruments to detect alterations, and was basing his opinion on a third-generation copy, when the FBI standards require that an opinion dealing with tape alteration be based on an analysis of the original recording.

United States v. Collins, 559 F.2d 561 (9th Cir. 1977) : Affirming a conviction for armed bank robbery, the Court upheld the government's use of an FBI expert who testified that shoes and a briefcase found in a search of the defendant's premises were the same as depicted in bank surveillance photographs. Because the witness was "an expert in the field of questioned documents and photographic comparison," the Court held that his testimony was technical and specialized and clearly helpful to the jury.

[l] Qualifications of Experts -- Gambling Cases

United States v. Lanzotti, 205 F.3d 951 (7th Cir. 2000) : Affirming convictions for participating in an illegal gambling business, the Court upheld the Trial Judge's refusal to permit the defendants' proffered expert to testify whether certain gambling machines were illegal, since the witness was not qualified as an expert in the area of gambling. He worked for the Illinois Liquor Commission, which regulates liquor, not gambling, and no other showing of qualification was made.

[m] Qualifications of Experts -- Handwriting Experts

United States v. Velasquez, 64 F.3d 844 (3d Cir. 1995) : In a drug trial the prosecution offered an expert to opine that the defendant's girlfriend and one of his accomplices had written a mailing label that had been used to ship drugs. The Trial Judge refused to permit a professor called by the defense to testify as a critic of the field of handwriting analysis. Vacating the conviction, the Court held that under Daubert the professor had sufficient specialized knowledge to be considered an expert, his proposed testimony was sufficiently reliable (having been subjected to peer review), and it fit the facts of the case.

United States v. Bourgeois, 950 F.2d 980 (5th Cir. 1992) : Affirming convictions for tax fraud, the Court held there was no clear error in refusing to qualify as an expert on handwriting a person who was not a member of the American Board of Forensic Document Examiners, but who said that he practiced forensic document examination and graphotherapy (alteration of personality by handwriting modification), had qualified for a masters in graphoanalysis (personality analysis through handwriting), and held a correspondence doctorate in metaphysics and religion.

United States v. Paul, 175 F.3d 906 (11th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a conviction for extortion, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting an expert document examiner to present handwriting analysis evidence that identified the defendant as the author of a note. The Court also held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding rebuttal testimony for the defendant from a law professor who had coauthored a 1989 law review article, based on a review of the literature, that was critical of forensic document examiners' ability to reach the correct conclusion in questioned document examinations: "His skill, experience, training and education as a lawyer did not make him any more qualified to testify as an expert on handwriting analysis than a lay person who read the same articles."

[n] Qualifications of Experts -- Industry Practice

Nora Beverages, Inc. v. Perrier Group of Am., Inc., 164 F.3d 736 (2d Cir. 1998) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendants in an action between bottlers of spring water, the Court held there was no error in excluding testimony of the plaintiff's "contracting practices" expert because his only experience was as a marketer in the beverage industry and he was never directly involved in negotiating co-packing agreements like those involved in this case. In an action for snow and ice damages to the plaintiff's airplane while taxiing at the defendant's airport, Pan American World Airways, Inc. v. Port Auth., 995 F.2d 5 (2d Cir. 1993) , the Court held there was no error in excluding the plaintiff's proposed expert witness, who had never completed local air traffic control training, had little experience in large airports, and was entirely unfamiliar with ground procedures at the airport involved, even though he had served as an expert witness on behalf of the federal government and private parties in various federal trials. In Andrews v. Metro N. Commuter R.R., n166 an action by a pedestrian injured by a train, the Court held that it was error to allow a "forensic engineer" with no railroad experience to testify that it was "reasonable" for plaintiff, who had allegedly fallen from the station platform, to walk 3000 feet to the point of impact and that it was "negligent" of the train operator, on seeing the plaintiff on the track, to slow down and blow the horn rather than immediately put the train into emergency.

Thomas J. Kline, Inc. v. Lorillard, Inc., 878 F.2d 791 (4th Cir. 1989) : The plaintiff in this breach of contract and price discrimination case offered testimony by a single expert witness that the defendant's change in credit practices was an unjustified credit and price discrimination. The Court held it was an abuse of discretion to permit the witness to give the opinion because there was no showing that her general business education included any training in the area of antitrust or credit or that she had any experience in such matters.

Huval v. Offshore Pipelines, Inc., 86 F.3d 454 (5th Cir. 1996) : In a contractor's suit against its insurance consultants for failure to procure insurance coverage, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a witness with 32 years' experience as an underwriter, accounts manager, and underwriting manager for various insurance companies to give expert testimony for the plaintiff, even though he had no experience acting as an agent where an insurance consultant was involved or in working directly with a London broker as the defendant had. In United States v. Heath, 970 F.2d 1397 (5th Cir. 1992) , a loan fraud prosecution, the defendants were precluded from offering a real estate lawyer who would have testified about using nonrecourse loans in real estate deals, because he would be testifying from his own experience, leaving the government no means to question his accuracy, and because there were no studies or statistics giving rise to reliable inferences. The Court held that exclusion of the testimony was error (but harmless), as the witness had specialized knowledge that could be helpful to the jury and the absence of scientific data went only to the weight of his opinions. In a FELA action, Lowery v. Illinois Cent. G. R.R., n167 the Court held that a witness with more than ten years' experience as a train master, operating rules examiner, and inspector of railroad equipment was qualified as an expert on hand brake operations, even though he had not been involved in the railroad business since 1973. In a Jones Act suit by a drilling rig worker injured during a "mud transfer" operation, Boyle v. Pool Offshore Co., n168 the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting opinion testimony by the plaintiff's expert, who had not only received formal training in rigging techniques and served as a safety director for an offshore drilling contractor, but also had seen the mud hose transfer operation many times and had been responsible for the safety of such operations.

Champion v. Outlook Nashville, Inc., 380 F.3d 893 (6th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an arrestee who sued police officers for using excessive force, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an expert to testify "about a discrete aspect of police practices, namely use of excessive force, based upon his particularized knowledge about the area," where the witness "had considerable experience in the field of criminology" and was testifying about "police practices about which he had specialized knowledge." It distinguished its opinion in Berry v. City of Detroit, infra, because "the concept of such a field as presented by [the witness in Berry] was far too broad." In a careful opinion applying Daubert principles, Berry v. City of Detroit, 25 F.3d 1342 (6th Cir. 1994) , the Court reversed a judgment against the City in a civil rights case, holding there was insufficient evidence of experience or study that would qualify the plaintiff's expert in "police policies and practices" to opine regarding the effect that claimed disciplinary shortcomings would have on the future conduct of 5000 individual City police officers.

First Union Nat'l Bank v. Benham, 423 F.3d 855 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a legal malpractice action against a mergers and acquisitions attorney and his firm for failing to assert a timely claim for valuation of stock acquired in a merger. The Judge had excluded expert testimony on the standard of practice of an Arkansas attorney on such matters, on the ground that the witness' conclusions were based on his own experience and on not that of other lawyers. The Court found that exclusion was an abuse of discretion, given that the witness was licensed as an attorney in Arkansas for over 36 years and had practiced extensively in the M&A area; it noted that Rule 702 permits opinion testimony based on specialized knowledge gained by "experience." In an action against an accounting firm for malpractice, Garnac Grain Co. v. Blackley, 932 F.2d 1563 (8th Cir. 1991) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding expert testimony by witnesses who had business degrees and basic accounting courses but who had no experience or training in auditing or generally accepted accounting standards. It was error, however, to exclude testimony by a retired business professor who had taught auditing for 40 years, even though his only auditing experience was in the 1940s and his CPA license had expired in 1981. In Circle J Dairy, Inc. v. A.O. Smith Harvestore Prods., Inc., n169 the Court affirmed a judgment for a dairy farm owner against the manufacturer and the distributor of a system for feeding livestock, holding that a part owner of a soil and feed testing service was properly permitted to testify as an expert on the physical condition of the herd and its permanent damage. It stated that Rule 702

"does not rank academic training over demonstrated practical experience."

Hangarter v. Provident Life & Acc. Ins. Co., 373 F.3d 998 (9th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a damage award for a chiropractor who sued his disability insurer for breach of contract, breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing, and intentional misrepresentation. It held that the plaintiff's expert -- who testified that the defendants' letter terminating the plaintiff's benefits was misleading, deceptive, and fell below industry standards -- was qualified to offer the opinion. He had 25 years experience working for insurance companies and as an independent consultant. He had actually worked for the defendants when many disability policies like the plaintiff's were sold and had received training on how insurance companies in general and the defendants in particular adjust claims. The Court also found that another witness was qualified to offer an opinion on the industry standard. This witness was a board-certified specialist in insurance medicine, worked as one defendant's vice-president and director of its medical department, and was educated on insurance policy law and disability policy language. In LuMetta v. United States Robotics, Inc., n170 the Court affirmed a judgment for a plaintiff claiming breach of an implied contract. It found no error in the exclusion of three expert witnesses offered by the defendant to show the reasonableness of a commission or a "finder's fee." None of the witnesses was sufficiently acquainted with the industry practice to have helped the jury.

Broadcort Capital Corp. v. Summa Med. Corp., 972 F.2d 1183 (10th Cir. 1992) : In an action by a securities clearing firm against a corporation for refusing to transfer and register a stock certificate, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding expert testimony on the securities business by a witness for the defendant, as he had only the general experience of an attorney who represented clients in the area of securities law and had no actual experience in representing a large brokerage house, transfer agent, or clearing house. In Jicarilla Apache Tribe v. Andrus, n171 a suit by the Tribe challenging oil and gas leases on a reservation, the Court upheld the admission of testimony by the Tribe's geologist. He had qualifications as a geologist, had experience with different oil companies, had been an officer of a company that had bid on Indian lands, and had prepared reserve studies on the basin involved in the case. This qualified him to testify concerning what he would have recommended as a bid on the rights.

Cronin v. Washington Nat'l Ins. Co., 980 F.2d 663 (11th Cir. 1993) : In an action for negligence and breach of contract arising out of the defendants' failure to procure a renewed health insurance policy, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by a witness with no underwriting experience that other insurance was available to the plaintiff.

[o] Qualifications of Experts -- Law Enforcement Agents

United States v. Williams, 212 F.3d 1305 (D.C. Cir. 2000) : The defendant was convicted for possession of a firearm and ammunition by a felon. The government contended that the defendant threw a gun over a bridge as he was being pursued by a police officer after fleeing from a traffic stop. The defendant contended that he was a drug user and threw his drugs, not a gun, over the bridge. A search below the bridge turned up a gun but no drugs. The Court affirmed the conviction, but found it was error to permit the officer who chased the defendant to testify on redirect examination that it was common for people who use drugs to carry a gun for protection. The officer's expertise was based on fewer than a dozen arrests involving firearms. The Court said that the inquiry whether drug dealers carry weapons "raises no eyebrows," but held that "[f]ewer than one dozen arrests involving possession of a firearm is not sufficient grounding to qualify him as an expert under Rule 702 of the Federal Rules of Evidence (FRE), particularly without evidence establishing that any of those arrests involved a drug user." The Court held, 2-1, that the error was harmless.

United States v. Ceballos, 302 F.3d 679 (7th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed drug conspiracy and money laundering convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting two experienced DEA agents to interpret code language used in recorded phone conversations. Although the conversations were in Spanish and neither agent spoke fluent Spanish, the Court found no authority prohibiting experts from interpreting drug code language in English translations of Spanish conversations. In United States v. Conn, 297 F.3d 548 (7th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed a conviction for willfully dealing in firearms without a license and upheld the admission of testimony by a BATF agent that, based on his training and experience, the defendant's firearms were not collector's items. The Court cautioned that this was not "a paradigmatic example of how such an issue ought to be developed at trial," since the government never actually sought to have the agent certified as an expert, and his description of his training and experience was "somewhat less than specific." Neither infirmity was fatal, however, because he was required to state the basis of his expertise and the defense was given ample opportunity to examine him about his background.

[p] Qualifications of Experts -- Medical Testimony

[i] Accident Cases

Edmonds v. Illinois Cent. G. R.R., 910 F.2d 1284 (5th Cir. 1990) : The Court remanded a FELA case for a new trial on damages, holding that the plaintiff's expert, a clinical psychologist, was not qualified to give an opinion on a causative link between stress caused by a job-related accident and the worsening of the plaintiff's preexisting heart condition. In Myers v. Griffin-Alexander Drilling Co., 910 F.2d 1252 (5th Cir. 1990) , an action by a drilling vessel employee who was injured after exposure to nitrogen gas, the Court held that there was no error in permitting an expert on hyperbaric medicine, most of whose work involved effects of gases underwater, to testify about effects of nitrogen on individuals at sea level.

Wooten v. United States, 574 F. Supp. 200 (W.D. Tenn. 1982) , aff'd, 722 F.2d 743 (6th Cir. 1983) : The Court granted damages to a Tort Claims Act plaintiff, finding that a registered nurse could testify as an expert concerning the safety precautions that were necessary to protect a patient under certain circumstances.

Smith v. BMW No. Am., Inc., 308 F.3d 913 (8th Cir. 2002) : The Court vacated summary judgment against the plaintiff, who alleged that failure of her car's air bag properly to deploy caused her severe injuries in an accident. The plaintiff proffered a forensic pathologist to testify that her neck was broken at the initial impact of the vehicle rather than in the subsequent rollover (thus tending to show that the defective air bag was causal) and that the air bag would have prevented or reduced her neck injuries had it deployed. The Trial Judge excluded the testimony essentially because the witness was not an expert in biomechanics, physics, or engineering and thus could not know how much force was exerted on the plaintiff in the accident or how much force her neck could withstand. However, the Court noted that the witness was not called to give testimony on those issues, but only on issues within his field: the injuries she sustained (to her neck) and the injuries she had not sustained (to her head). His testimony that the air bag would have reduced or prevented the plaintiff's injures was based on his knowledge of the basic operation of air bags and of how injuries of the type sustained by the plaintiff occur and can be prevented.

[ii] Qualifications of Experts -- Medical Testimony -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Montague, 958 F.2d 1094 (D.C. Cir. 1992) : In a drug prosecution, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the defense from cross-examining a government expert on narcotics distribution about the effects of crack cocaine on the user's memory and perception. The expert was not qualified to testify about a medical topic.

United States v. Crosby, 713 F.2d 1066 (5th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed kidnapping convictions, finding no error in the refusal to qualify a counselor at a Veterans' Center as an expert witness on posttraumatic stress syndrome. The Trial Judge reasonably insisted that an expert witness on the subject have medical training.

United States v. Withorn, 204 F.3d 790 (8th Cir. 2000) : In a prosecution for forcible rape of a 12-year-old, the Court found there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a nurse-midwife to testify, based on an examination of the victim on the morning of the incident, that her injuries were consistent with her description of a violent sexual assault and that they were probably caused by "blunt trauma." The witness had received special training in conducting examinations of rape victims, she had provided emergency coverage for obstetrics and gynecology in the past, and a significant part of her practice consisted of treating young teenage girls. In Davis v. United States, n172 the Court held that a public health inspector, who had investigated and managed cases involving sexually transmitted diseases for eight years, was qualified to give an opinion on the probability of transmission of gonorrhea from a female victim of a rape to the defendant in a collateral attack proceeding.

United States v. Dysart, 705 F.2d 1247 (10th Cir. 1983) : The Court upheld a conviction for threatening the life of the President. It found no error in the admission of the testimony of an osteopathic physician who testified concerning the defendant's sanity.

[iii] Qualifications of Experts -- Medical Testimony -- Medical Malpractice Cases

Gaydar v. Sociedad Instituto Gineco-Quirurgico y Planificacion Familiar, 345 F.3d 15 (1st Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for an abortion clinic patient in a malpractice action against a doctor and the clinic, the Court held that a general practitioner could qualify as an expert and testify as to ectopic pregnancies, even though he was not a doctor of obstetrics or gynecology. In a wrongful death medical malpractice action, Mitchell v. United States, 141 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 1998) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, finding no error the admission of testimony from an internist with specialties in hematology and oncology, who had substantial experience with Coumadin, a drug that the deceased was taking until six days before a colonoscopy, and had performed some colonoscopies earlier in his career. The Court concluded that the witness was qualified to testify as to the risk of stroke as compared to the risk of bleeding from a colonoscopy even though he was not a gastroenterologist; he testified that cardiologists and hematologists are very much aware of the relative benefits and risks of drugs like Coumadin and the effects of their discontinuation.

Schneider v. Fried, 320 F.3d 396 (3d Cir. 2003) : The Court reversed dismissal of a medical malpractice case because the plaintiff's medical experts had been improperly precluded from testifying. One expert had been precluded partly because he no longer practiced in the subspecialty area at issue in the case, but the Court held he was qualified because of his extensive experience working closely with physicians in that subspecialty area.

Dickenson v. Cardiac & Thoracic Surgery of E. Tenn., P.C., 388 F.3d 976 (6th Cir. 2004) : In a medical malpractice action against a cardiology practice and a pulmonologist for brain damage allegedly caused by premature removal of the plaintiff's ventilation tube following cardiac surgery, the plaintiff's expert was precluded from testifying concerning the standard of care regarding removal of a ventilation tube because he was a cardiac thoracic surgeon and was not trained in pulmonology, had never written any articles on the subject, and "could not identify any articles about pulmonology which he has read." Reversing summary judgment for the defendants, the Court held that the witness was qualified by virtue of almost 40 years' experience performing thousands of heart-related operations and managing the postoperative care of patients on a ventilator, including "[m]aybe two hundred" in the preceding three years. In Sommer v. Davis, 317 F.3d 686 (6th Cir. 2003) , the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants in a medical malpractice case, and held there was no abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge found that the plaintiff's expert, a St. Louis physician, had insufficient personal knowledge of the standard of care in Nashville or a similar community, as is required under the applicable Tennessee law.

Cooper v. Eagle River Memorial Hospital, 270 F.3d 456 (7th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for a hospital sued on behalf of an infant who died eight months following his mother's treatment at the hospital, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by a family physician regarding the standard of care for nurse practitioners. Although the physician had only limited experience with nurse practitioners, he was the director of a large multi-specialty clinic that employed two nurse practitioners and several other physician's assistants.

Mattke v. Deschamps, 374 F.3d 667 (8th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in a medical malpractice case based on an alleged error in the pathology lab, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony from the plaintiffs' only expert witness. He was not a pathologist; his primary areas of practice were sleep disorders and pulmonology; and while he had contacts with pathologists and pathology labs in the course of his practice, he was unfamiliar with the particular pathology phenomenon at issue in this case.

McDowell v. Brown, 391 F.3d 1283 (11th Cir. 2004) : In a § 1983 action by a former inmate alleging medical malpractice, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the plaintiff's experts. Although the Trial Judge erred in ruling that the physicians were unqualified to testify to the standard of care for nurses in a jail, the only scientifically reliable parts of their theories dealt with treatment delays 2-12 times as long as involved in this case.

[iv] Qualifications of Experts -- Medical Testimony -- Product Liability and Toxic Exposure Cases

Payton v. Abbott Labs., 780 F.2d 147 (1st Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a judgment for a woman who claimed injuries attributable to her mother's ingestion while pregnant of a drug manufactured by the defendant, but it found that two experts were properly permitted to testify for the plaintiff. The Court stated that "[d]efendant is correct that ... an expert must possess some specialized knowledge of the field in which he purports to be an expert, but defendant is incorrect insofar as it challenges the experts here for not having specialized knowledge as to the specific question at issue."

Holbrook v. Lykes Bros. S.S. Co., 80 F.3d 777 (3d Cir. 1996) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendants in an action alleging that a seaman's death from mesothelioma was caused by asbestos exposure, holding it was error to exclude testimony by the treating physician and an expert for the plaintiff because they lacked specialization enabling them to diagnose mesothelioma and determine its causes. The Trial Judge's restricted approach conflicted with the Court's liberal standard governing the qualifications of proffered expert witnesses and its acceptance of more general qualifications. Reversing a summary judgment for the defendants in consolidated suits by people working in or living near a railyard for damages resulting from PCB exposure, the Court held in In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litig., 916 F.2d 829 (3d Cir. 1990) , that testimony by the plaintiffs' experts was erroneously excluded because of insistence on a certain kind of degree or background. Reviewing a second summary judgment granted on remand, n173 the Court noted that, although it had eschewed imposing overly rigorous requirements of expertise and had been satisfied with more generalized qualifications, the level of expertise may indeed affect the reliability of the expert's opinion.

Jones v. Lincoln Elec. Co., 188 F.3d 709 (7th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a judgment for manufacturers and distributors of welding rods in a suit by a welder who claimed neurological injuries from being exposed to manganese present in fumes emitted from the rods. The central issue in the case was whether the plaintiff suffered from manganism or idiopathic Parkinson's disease. The Court indicated that the Trial Judge may have erred in permitting a professor of materials science to testify for the defense concerning the ability of the body to absorb manganese, since his research experience was not sufficient to permit him to testify about medical conclusions, but any error was harmless.

Williams v. Pro-Tec, Inc., 908 F.2d 345 (8th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant manufacturer of an eyeguard worn by the plaintiff when he was hit by a racquetball and sustained eye injuries, holding that the self-acknowledged lack of medical expertise of the defendant's expert in mechanical engineering and accident reconstruction went to the weight rather than the admissibility of his opinion.

Doe v. Cutter Biological, Inc., 971 F.2d 375 (9th Cir. 1992) : Reversing summary judgment for the defendants in a suit for injuries from an HIV-contaminated blood clotting factor, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to strike affidavits by the plaintiffs' experts. Although the experts were not licensed hematologists, they were opining within their area of expertise.

Ralston v. Smith & Nephew Richards, Inc., 275 F.3d 965 (10th Cir. 2001) : The plaintiff brought a product liability action alleging that inadequate warnings accompanied a surgical nail implanted in her broken femur. Affirming summary judgment granted for the manufacturer, the Court found no abuse of discretion in disregarding an opinion from the plaintiff's treating physician regarding the adequacy of the warnings. Although the witness was a board certified orthopaedic surgeon, she had done no research on intramedullary nailing and she had no experience drafting a surgical technique or warning for a product of any kind. In Summers v. Missouri Pac. R.R. Sys., 132 F.3d 599 (10th Cir. 1997) , two railroad employees sued their employer under the FELA for injuries allegedly caused by exposure to diesel exhaust fumes. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in an in limine order excluding the testimony of an expert witness, to whom one plaintiff had been referred for neuropsychological testing, which concluded that the plaintiff "was experiencing a probable dementia that was consistent with toxic exposure." The witness was a psychologist and not an expert in the field of medicine or toxicology, and her opinion was based in part on testing that was still in the research stage and had not been validated. In a suit for personal injuries allegedly caused by DPT vaccine, Graham v. Wyeth Labs., n174 the Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiffs and held it was error to exclude testimony by a pediatric ophthalmologist, who had treated the infant plaintiff, that the plaintiff had suffered a stroke before receiving the vaccination. Contrary to the Trial Judge's ruling, there is no requirement that an expert testifying that a vaccine did not cause injury be knowledgeable about the workings, nature, and medical literature concerning endotoxins.

Polston v. Boomershine Pontiac-GMC Truck, Inc., 952 F.2d 1304 (11th Cir. 1992) : In a product liability action alleging enhanced injuries because the involved automobile was not crashworthy, the Court held that a mechanical engineer with substantial experience as an automobile accident investigator was properly permitted to opine that a lack of crashworthiness contributed to the plaintiff's injuries and was properly precluded from testifying which injuries were caused or enhanced by the allegedly defective condition. With his qualifications, he could testify to a reasonable degree of engineering certainty but not to a reasonable degree of medical certainty.

[v] Qualifications of Experts -- Medical Testimony -- Miscellaneous Cases

Beins v. United States, 695 F.2d 591 (D.C. Cir. 1982) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the FAA in a pilot's suit for negligent denial of airman medical certificates, finding no prejudicial error in the exclusion of a witness offered by the plaintiff to testify as an expert on aviation medicine. Observing that an expert's lack of board certification or failure to author articles in his field does not disqualify him as an expert, the Court concluded that some of the testimony that was excluded involved neurological expertise rather than aviation medicine, that some of it covered subjects on which expert testimony was not needed, and that some of the witness' testimony actually was admitted and considered by the Court.

Pedraza v. Jones, 71 F.3d 194 (5th Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants in a suit by a prisoner who claimed that he was denied medical treatment for heroin withdrawal. One issue was whether the statute of limitations was tolled because of the plaintiff's mental condition. The Court held that an affidavit from a 30-year heroin addict was not admissible to prove that the plaintiff was mentally impaired due to heroin withdrawals. The affiant's personal experience with heroin addiction did not qualify him as an expert on withdrawals involving other people.

Fedro v. Reno, 21 F.3d 1391 (7th Cir. 1994) : A former U.S. Marshal bringing a Rehabilitation Act claim attempted to prove that his hepatitis-B was not disqualifying by calling a program manager for the Office of Personnel Management to testify to that effect on the basis of a letter from the treating physician and knowledge of Marshals Service standards. The Court held there was no error in excluding the testimony, as the witness lacked the superior knowledge, skill, experience, and education necessary to render a medical opinion. In Wilson v. City of Chicago, 6 F.3d 1233 (7th Cir. 1993) , the plaintiff, who had shot and killed two policemen, sued alleging that police had tortured him in extracting a confession. In reversing and remanding a judgment for the individual defendants, the Court noted that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by a witness for the plaintiff that the plaintiff's description of alleged electroshock treatment was consistent with the scientific understanding of its effects and thus unlikely to have been fabricated. The witness was a pathologist who studied torture on the side, but he failed to show he had the requisite medical or scientific knowledge to establish the effects of electroshock treatments.

Larson v. Kempker, 414 F.3d 936 (8th Cir. 2005) : The plaintiff, a death-row inmate, brought an action alleging that he was not adequately protected from second-hand smoke. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude the testimony of the plaintiff's expert on the effects of second-hand smoke, on the ground that the witness lacked the necessary education and training in any pertinent field despite having read the pertinent literature. Among other things, the expert had over 23 years' experience in researching the effects of second-hand smoke; he had a Ph.D. in physical chemistry; he authored an EPA report on second-hand smoke; and he advised government agencies in both the United States and Canada on possible responses to the health effects of second-hand smoke. In Smith v. Rasmussen, 249 F.3d 755 (8th Cir. 2001) , the plaintiff sued under § 1983 after the state Department of Human Services denied Medicaid benefits for sex reassignment surgery. The Court found no abuse of discretion when the Department's expert psychiatrist was not permitted to testify regarding the effectiveness and necessity of sex reassignment surgery in general or for the plaintiff. Although the expert was a board-certified general psychiatrist who had treated several patients with sexual disorders, he had examined only one patient with gender identity disorder, that had been eight years previous, and his contact with the patient was limited. His opinion concerning the plaintiff was based on a literature review, a review of the plaintiff's file, and two interviews with the plaintiff, but his opinion disagreed with sources he acknowledged to be authoritative. In Bradley v. Pizzaco of Neb., Inc., n175 the plaintiff brought a disparate impact case claiming that his discharge for failure to comply with the defendant's no-beard policy violated Title VII because the policy discriminates against black males. The Court held it was error to reject an opinion by the EEOC's dermatologist that 25 percent of black males cannot shave, as the record and the dermatologist's resume showed he had extensive experience in the field and had conducted studies, written articles, and lectured on the topic.

Sweet v. United States, 687 F.2d 246 (8th Cir. 1982) : A former serviceman brought suit against the United States, claiming that the Army failed to inform him that he had ingested LSD as part of an experiment. The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant, holding that an expert could testify that LSD could not have caused the plaintiff's problems, even in the absence of a personal examination of the plaintiff. The expert was one of the foremost experts in the field of LSD research.

Durflinger v. Artiles, 727 F.2d 888 (10th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a plaintiffs' judgment in a wrongful death action against doctors responsible for the release of a patient who shot and killed his mother and brother after he had contemplated murdering his grandparents and was found mentally ill by a probate Judge. It found that a clinical psychologist was properly permitted to testify concerning the standard of care expected of the defendants, even though the witness was not a psychiatrist. The Court noted that a clinical psychologist had been part of the team of doctors who made the decision to release the patient.

[q] Qualifications of Experts -- Navigation

United States v. Members of Estate of Boothby, 16 F.3d 19 (1st Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed an order evicting houseboats from a protected bay, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting expert testimony from a Corps of Engineers official familiar with the Corps' regulations regarding navigability and the vessels at issue. The witness was sufficiently qualified to testify to the applicability of the regulations to those vessels, even though she was not a naval architect.

[r] Qualifications of Experts -- Patent Cases

N.V. Maatschappij Voor Industriele Waarden v. A.O. Smith Corp., 590 F.2d 415 (2d Cir. 1978) : The Court found error in the Trial Judge's exclusion of testimony by a patent agent, who was an expert because of his experience rather than his training.

Crom Corp. v. Crom, 677 F.2d 48 (9th Cir. 1982) : In a dispute over patent rights, the Court held that the District Judge did not err in permitting an engineer with long experience in patent law to testify concerning the interpretation and application of patent claims even if he had no specific experience with the construction of water tanks, which were involved in the dispute.

Manufacturing Research Corp. v. Graybar Elec. Co., 679 F.2d 1355 (11th Cir. 1982) : In a patent infringement action, the Court said that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in permitting a patent applicant to testify as an expert witness despite his interest in the outcome of the case. The interest went to the weight of the testimony, not its admissibility.

Air Turbine Technology, Inc. v. Atlas Copco AB, 410 F.3d 701, 2005-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P74839 (Fed. Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed judgment for the defendant in an action for breach of contract, unfair competition, and infringement of a patent for a pneumatic industrial grinding tool. It upheld exclusion of testimony by a co-inventor of the allegedly infringed invention regarding the structure and workings of the device alleged to infringe, since having particularized knowledge as to the former does not necessarily mean he also has particularized knowledge as to the latter. In Texas Digital Sys., Inc. v. Telegenix, Inc., 308 F.3d 1193 (Fed. Cir. 2002) , the Court held that a witness who had owned and managed two patent licensing companies following his work in manufacturing displays in the early 1990s was competent and qualified to testify to damages in an infringement action related to LED displays. In Slip Track Sys., Inc. v. Metal-Lite, Inc., 304 F.3d 1256 (Fed. Cir. 2002) , an action between owners of patents for a building construction assembly to prevent drywall from cracking during earthquakes, the Court held that a witness with 40 years' experience in the construction industry who had taught about wall construction and another with six years' experience of wall building were qualified to testify that a contested prototype was a sufficient reduction to practice, even though they were not engineers skilled in the art of withstanding seismic forces. In Shelcore, Inc. v. Durham Indus., n176 the Court found that, although an expert was not a toy designer, his expertise in plastics manufacturing was sufficient to justify his testifying in a patent infringement case.

[s] Qualifications of Experts -- Physical Injuries

Robert v. Conti Carriers & Terminals, 692 F.2d 22 (5th Cir. 1982) : Affirming a judgment for an injured deckhand who brought a negligence action against a vessel owner, the Court found that a physical therapist was qualified to testify concerning the physical limitations of the plaintiff following his injury.

[t] Qualifications of Experts -- Prescription Drug and Toxic Exposure Cases

Payton v. Abbott Labs., 780 F.2d 147 (1st Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a judgment for a woman who claimed injuries attributable to her mother's ingestion while pregnant of a drug manufactured by the defendant, but it found that two experts were properly permitted to testify for the plaintiff. The Court stated that "[d]efendant is correct that ... an expert must possess some specialized knowledge of the field in which he purports to be an expert, but defendant is incorrect insofar as it challenges the experts here for not having specialized knowledge as to the specific question at issue."

McCullock v. H.B. Fuller Co., 61 F.3d 1038 (2d Cir. 1995) : In a worker's product liability action alleging injury suffered as a result of exposure to hot-melt glue fumes, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a consulting engineer who had practical experience and academic training regarding workplace fumes and vapors to testify whether the plaintiff was within the breathing zone of the fumes. Likewise, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an experienced otolaryngologist to testify that the plaintiff's vocal-cord polyps resulted from the fumes. On a prior appeal, in McCullock v. H.B. Fuller Co., 981 F.2d 656 (2d Cir. 1992) , the Court reversed a judgment as a matter of law for the defendant, but it found no error in the exclusion of expert testimony as to the adequacy of warning labels. The Court reasoned that the witness, an electrical and industrial engineer, lacked training in chemical engineering, toxicology, environmental engineering or the design of warning labels. Thus, while the witness might have been qualified to testify concerning the need for a ventilation system, he was not qualified to testify as to the adequacy of warning labels.

Braun v. Lorillard Inc., 84 F.3d 230 (7th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action alleging that a smoker had died from cancer caused by asbestos contained in cigarette filters, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by an expert for the plaintiff that he had found asbestos fibers in the smoker's lungs. The basis for the opinion was a spectrographic analysis of the residue when a section of the smoker's lung tissue was subjected to "high temperature ashing." Although the witness was an acknowledged expert in testing building materials for asbestos, he had never before conducted a test on human or animal tissue, nor had such a process been used by anyone else to test for asbestos fibers in tissue. The expert also had no knowledge of the methodologies that were or should be used in testing for asbestos in tissue.

Kennedy v. Baxter Healthcare Corp., 348 F.3d 1073 (8th Cir. 2003) (per curiam): Affirming a judgment for the manufacturer of latex gloves sued by a nurse who alleged that she developed a life-threatening allergy to the glove's proteins, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony from the plaintiff's expert, who was not a doctor or a toxicologist, but who would have opined on what makes a rubber glove unsafe for allergy purposes.

Doe v. Cutter Biological, Inc., 971 F.2d 375 (9th Cir. 1992) : Reversing summary judgment for the defendants in a suit for injuries from an HIV-contaminated blood clotting factor, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to strike affidavits by the plaintiffs' experts. Although the experts were not licensed hematologists, they were opining within their area of expertise.

Quinton v. Farmland Indus., 928 F.2d 335 (10th Cir. 1991) : The Court held that a doctor of veterinary medicine was qualified to testify regarding the toxic effects on dairy cows of excessive cockleburs in their feed, even though he was not a specialist in toxicology. In Graham v. Wyeth Labs., 906 F.2d 1399 (10th Cir. 1990) , the Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiffs in a suit for personal injuries allegedly caused by DPT vaccine, holding it was error to exclude testimony by a pediatric ophthalmologist who had treated the infant plaintiff that she had suffered a stroke before receiving the vaccination. Contrary to the Trial Judge's ruling, there is no requirement that an expert testifying that a vaccine did not cause injury be knowledgeable about the workings, nature, and medical literature concerning endotoxins.

[u] Qualifications of Experts -- Product Liability Cases

[i] Machinery and Tools

Exum v. General Elec. Co., 819 F.2d 1158 (D.C. Cir. 1987) : In a product liability suit by an employee injured while using a french fryer, the Court held that it was error to exclude the testimony of an engineer who had worked at OSHA and had considerable experience with industrial safety and product design issues. The fact that the witness had no specific expertise in kitchen design and had not examined a fast food kitchen did not disqualify him from rendering an opinion concerning the design of a french fryer used in a fast food operation.

DaSilva v. American Brands, Inc., 845 F.2d 356 (1st Cir. 1988) : In a wrongful death action against a manufacturer of an industrial mixing machine, the Court held that a mechanical engineer was qualified on the basis of experience as an engineer and in evaluating and recommending safety devices for machines to give an opinion concerning the mixing machine. It rejected the defendant's argument that only an expert who had experience with the specific machine in question should be permitted to give an opinion on its design.

Martin v. Fleissner GMBH, 741 F.2d 61 (4th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that experts in engineering design who were familiar with the processes used by a piece of equipment could testify concerning a design defect even though they were not experts on the equipment. Garrett v. Desa Indus. n177 was an action seeking damages for injuries suffered when the plaintiff, a carpenter, was injured by the discharge of a stud driver manufactured by the defendant. Reversing a judgment for a defendant, the Court found it was an abuse of discretion to prevent a mechanical engineer from testifying about the negligent design of the stud driver simply because he had no prior experience with such a tool. The witness had tested stud drivers prior to trial and had experience with similar mechanisms.

London v. MAC Corp. of Am., 44 F.3d 316 (5th Cir. 1995) : In a product liability action brought against the manufacturer of a shredder that the plaintiff was attempting to clean while standing on top of a gearbox cover ten feet off the ground, the Court held there was no error in excluding testimony offered for the plaintiff by a safety consultant. Not being an engineer, the witness lacked the expertise to address the design of the shredder, how it operates, or the function and use of its parts. The one matter he could testify to -- that it was unsafe to work in that position -- was common knowledge. The principal issue in Sullivan v. Rowan Cos., 952 F.2d 141 (5th Cir. 1992) , a seaman's injury case, was whether a tool was defective. The employer, cross-claiming against the tool manufacturer, tendered as an expert in metallurgical failure analysis an employee of a private laboratory that performed material failure analyses using electron microscopes. The Court held that, although a contrary decision would not necessarily have required reversal, there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the expert, whose education and training was in earth science, because he lacked academic or other training or experience in the metallurgical field. In Lavespere v. Niagara Mach. & Tool Works, Inc., n178 a product liability action by an injured worker against the manufacturer of a press brake, the Court held that a deposition by the plaintiff's expert was properly considered on a motion for summary judgment, even though the expert was an academic with no hands-on experience in designing safeguards for that particular device.

Deimer v. Cincinnati Sub-Zero Prods., Inc., 58 F.3d 341 (7th Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant manufacturer in a product liability action brought after a hypo-hyperthermia machine fell over onto a nurse moving it in a hospital. There was no error in excluding testimony by the plaintiff's expert regarding a defect in the machine's cord wrap, where the witness proffered unverified statements unsupported by any scientific method and, because he did not have the requisite experience to assess the unit's suitability for its intended purpose within its environment or its adherence to the prevailing standards for similar machines, there was no "fit" with the facts of the case.

Robertson v. Norton Co., 148 F.3d 905 (8th Cir. 1998) : The plaintiff was injured when a grinding wheel exploded. At trial he called a ceramics expert, who testified not only that the grinding wheel was defectively manufactured, but also that the defendant's product warnings were "completely inadequate." The Court found reversible error in admitting the testimony as to the product warnings because, inter alia, the witness was not qualified to give an opinion. He had never designed a warning for a ceramic product, and his knowledge of ceramics would not provide the expertise on "questions of display, syntax, and emphasis," relevant to warnings.

[ii] Qualifications of Experts -- Product Liability Cases -- Miscellaneous Products

Wilson v. Bradlees of New Eng., Inc., 250 F.3d 10 (1st Cir. 2001) : The plaintiff sued the manufacturer and retailers of a shirt that caught fire when she leaned across a burner on a stove. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court found no error when the plaintiff's expert in chemistry was permitted to testify to matters involving chemistry and the flammable properties of substances used in the shirt, but not to usages and practices in the silk-screening industry or to the commercial feasibility of printing shirt logos with flame-retardant ink. The expert admitted that he had no expertise on those subjects. In McDonald v. Federal Labs., n179 the Court upheld a judgment for a police officer who sued the manufacturer of a Mace cannister that had accidentally discharged. It found that the Trial Judge properly restricted the defendant's expert to testifying about the chemical aspects of the cannister and not to permit testimony about its design aspects. The expert "had no education in and expressed no familiarity with the engineering principles involved in the design" of the canister.

Knight v. Otis Elevator Co., 596 F.2d 84 (3d Cir. 1979) : The Court found an abuse of discretion when the plaintiff's expert, who had training in engineering and chemistry and who had experience with machine guarding, but who never examined the elevator in question in the case or designed an elevator, was not permitted to testify whether unguarded elevator control buttons constituted a design defect. The Court said that the expert's inexperience in the areas of design and manufacturing should go to the weight, and not to the admissibility, of his opinion.

Hardin v. Ski Venture, Inc., 50 F.3d 1291 (4th Cir. 1995) : In an action for personal injuries arising out of a ski accident, the plaintiff claimed that he lost control when he was blinded by artificial snow coming from a snowmaker. Affirming a verdict for the defendant, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the plaintiff's expert was precluded from testifying about the principles of snowmaking. The expert's experience in snowmaking was limited to design work on one small sledding hill; the fact that the witness had testified as an expert in other ski accident cases did not qualify him as an expert on snowmaking.

Ellis v. K-Lan Co., 695 F.2d 157 (5th Cir. 1983) : In an action by a father to recover damages for injuries sustained by his child when the child opened the cap on a container of acid-based drain unclogger, the Court held that an expert was properly permitted to testify concerning a defect in a safety cap, even though he was unfamiliar with the definition of "special packaging" under a federal statute. The Court noted that the federal statute was not conclusive on the question of a proper standard of care and reasoned that the expert's ignorance of the statutory definition went to the weight to be accorded his testimony.

Goodwin v. MTD Prods., Inc., 232 F.3d 600 (7th Cir. 2000) : A plaintiff alleged that he suffered an eye injury when struck by a plastic wingnut that had vibrated loose from the lawnmower he was using. The Court affirmed a judgment against the manufacturer, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant's expert witness was not permitted to testify that the plaintiff's injury could not have been caused by a plastic wingnut discharged from a lawnmower and that he did not believe the plaintiff when he testified that the was in the operator's zone behind the mower when he was injured. The witness, a mechanical engineer with no medical training, was not qualified to give expert testimony on medical questions, including the cause of an eye injury, and the witness' opinion about the plaintiff's credibility was merely based on speculation and not the proper subject of expert testimony. In Kirstein v. Parks Corp., 159 F.3d 1065 (7th Cir. 1998) , the plaintiff, while removing linoleum in his house, used a chemical adhesive remover, followed by lacquer thinner to remove the adhesive residue. He was severely burned when the remover and thinner exploded and caught fire. Affirming summary judgment for the manufacturers of the two products, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the plaintiff's expert was not permitted to testify. Although the witness had impressive credentials as a safety engineer, he was not a chemist, whose expertise would be helpful if not essential as a basis for the suggestion in his deposition that the combination of the two substances increased the danger posed by either one alone. Because he had done no testing on the products, alone or in combination, and provided no studies that employed such testing, he "offered only speculation," and his testimony was properly excluded despite his impressive credentials. In a personal injury action brought for injuries suffered when a child allegedly pushed the stop button on an escalator, Carroll v. Otis Elevator Co., n180 the Court held that an experimental psychologist specializing in visual perception was qualified to testify that the design of the stop button was unreasonably attractive to and operable by children.

Williams v. Pro-Tec, Inc., 908 F.2d 345 (8th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant manufacturer of an eyeguard worn by the plaintiff when he was hit by a racquetball and sustained eye injuries, holding that the self-acknowledged lack of medical expertise of the defendant's expert in mechanical engineering and accident reconstruction went to the weight rather than the admissibility of his opinion.

Ralston v. Smith & Nephew Richards, Inc., 275 F.3d 965 (10th Cir. 2001) : The plaintiff brought a product liability action alleging that inadequate warnings accompanied a surgical nail implanted in her broken femur. Affirming summary judgment granted for the manufacturer, the Court found no abuse of discretion in disregarding an opinion from the plaintiff's treating physician regarding the adequacy of the warnings. Although the witness was a board certified orthopaedic surgeon, she had done no research on intramedullary nailing and she had no experience drafting a surgical technique or warning for a product of any kind.

[iii] Qualifications of Experts -- Product Liability Cases -- Vehicles and Equipment

[A] Consumer Accidents

Bogosian v. Mercedes-Benz of N. Am., Inc., 104 F.3d 472 (1st Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action brought by a motorist who had parked an automobile and then suffered injuries when it rolled back, allegedly because of a defect in the gear selection lever. There was no error in excluding testimony by the plaintiff's proffered expert regarding transmission design, as he had at most an extensive background in automotive repair, but no experience or training in automotive design and no engineering degree or expertise.

Zaremba v. General Motors Corp., 360 F.3d 355 (2d Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants in a product liability action arising from a rollover accident, finding no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the plaintiffs' expert's opinion that an alternative design for the car would have made it more crashworthy. The Court noted that the witness had been given "the benefit of a substantial doubt" when he was found a qualified expert, since he had only a bachelor's degree in engineering and his only practical experience was in designing parts for automobile air bags; all has remaining employment had been consulting for purposes of litigation, primarily as an accident reconstructionist.

Satcher v. Honda Motor Co., 52 F.3d 1311 (5th Cir. 1995) : Affirming an award of actual damages in favor of a rider who lost his leg in a collision between his motorcycle and an automobile, the Court found no error in permitting a former Miami police chief to testify that motorcycle crash guards (which were lacking on the motorcycle used by the plaintiff) are effective in reducing injuries. While the witness had no scientific or engineering expertise in motorcycle design, he had been on the police motor squad for nine years and had investigated hundreds of motorcycle accidents.

Morales v. American Honda Motor Co., 151 F.3d 500 (6th Cir. 1998) : In a product liability action for injuries to a nine-year-old riding a small motorbike, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a witness shown to have qualifications and experience in consumer product safety to testify regarding the design of the motorbike, as well as regarding accident reconstruction, motorbike engineering, and child psychology.

Compton v. Subaru of Am., Inc., 82 F.3d 1513 (10th Cir. 1996) : In a product liability action arising out of a roll-over accident, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the plaintiff's expert, an aerospace and mechanical engineer with 22 years of experience in automotive engineering, to testify regarding safe design of car roofs, even though he lacked experience designing car roofs or supporting structures. In Taylor v. Cooper Tire & Rubber Co., 130 F.3d 1395 (10th Cir. 1997) , an exploding tire case, the Court found that an expert on materials failure was properly held unqualified to testify that a tire failure was the result of a manufacturing defect, since he conducted no tests and had no expertise in the manufacturing of tires. In Kloepfer v. Honda Motor Co., 898 F.2d 1452 (10th Cir. 1990) , a product liability action arising out of the death of a child riding as a passenger on an all-terrain vehicle, the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by a "children's accident preventionist," because the case involved operation of the ATV by an adult.

Polston v. Boomershine Pontiac-GMC Truck, Inc., 952 F.2d 1304 (11th Cir. 1992) : In a product liability action alleging enhanced injuries because the involved automobile was not crashworthy, the Court held that a mechanical engineer with substantial experience as an automobile accident investigator was properly permitted to opine that a lack of crashworthiness contributed to the plaintiff's injuries and was properly precluded from testifying which injuries were caused or enhanced by the allegedly defective condition. With his qualifications, he could testify to a reasonable degree of engineering certainty but not to a reasonable degree of medical certainty.

[B] Qualifications of Experts -- Product Liability Cases -- Vehicles and Equipment -- Workplace Accidents

Tokio Marine & Fire Ins. Co. v. Grove Mfg. Co., 958 F.2d 1169 (1st Cir. 1992) : In an action arising out of damage to a giant video screen when a crane installing it tipped over, the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by the plaintiff's expert as to alleged defects in the crane. The witness was a civil, rather than mechanical, engineer with no experience or training regarding the design and manufacture of cranes, and he had a "hired gun" background as an instant expert in an astonishing number of other areas that suggested he would not possess the professional safeguards ensuring objectivity.

Surace v. Caterpillar, Inc., 111 F.3d 1039 (3d Cir. 1997) : A construction worker whose foot was run over by a pavement profiler sought in his product liability action against the manufacturer to introduce testimony from a "human factors" expert that it was necessary in designing construction machinery to take account of the phenomenon of "habituation," where workers tend to "tune out" constantly repeated warning signals. The Court held there was no error in excluding the testimony, as the witness' training was in electrical engineering, not psychology, and his experience was in making machines "user friendly" rather than in considering the safety implications of a device. In Habecker v. Copperloy Corp., 893 F.2d 49 (3d Cir. 1990) , the Court reversed a judgment for the defendants in a product liability action arising out of a forklift accident, holding that the plaintiff's proposed expert, who had a master's degree in safety education, a doctorate in human factors and product safety design, taught at Purdue, was active in product safety groups and societies, and had been employed as a safety specialist, should have been permitted to testify regarding the causal relationship between the lack of operator restraints and operator injury. In Aloe Coal Co. v. Clark Equip. Co., n181 an action by a purchaser of a tractor shovel for damages to the shovel from a fire, the Court overturned a judgment against the manufacturer, finding it was error to permit a sales representative of another company to testify for the plaintiffs as to the cause of the fire. The witness was not an engineer, had no experience in designing construction machinery or determining the cause of equipment fires, and had never operated construction machinery. His sole claim of expertise, that he prepared damage estimates used to determine the costs of repairing and replacing equipment, was not sufficient to qualify him to assist the jury. In Hammond v. International Harvester Co., n182 the Court affirmed a judgment for a widow who brought a product liability action claiming a design defect in the tractor that her husband had driven. It found that a witness who had worked selling automotive and mechanical equipment and who had taught automobile repair and maintenance in a high school was qualified to testify as to a design defect in a tractor.

Dixon v. International Harvester Co., 754 F.2d 573 (5th Cir. 1985) : The Court overturned a judgment n.o.v. for the manufacturer of a "crawler tractor" in a suit for damages occurring when a pine sapling entered the cab of the tractor. The Court found it was error to hold that, because he lacked the necessary information and experience, the plaintiff's expert was not qualified to express an opinion as to the design and safety standard of the tractor. Since the expert had the requisite skill and had examined the design of the tractor, it was error to disregard his testimony when setting aside a jury verdict for the plaintiff.

Ancho v. Pentek Corp., 157 F.3d 512 (7th Cir. 1998) : The plaintiff had been injured by an automatic car that transported cardboard in a factory. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court found no error when the plaintiff's expert was not permitted to testify that the entire plant should have been redesigned to provide a safer system of transporting materials. The expert was a mechanical engineer, without any experience in the field of plant design, and thus lacked qualifications to give expert testimony about plant configuration.

Anderson v. Raymond Corp., 340 F.3d 520 (8th Cir. 2003) : In a product liability action for injuries the plaintiff suffered when she was thrown from a stand-up lift truck, the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant granted after the plaintiff's expert was found not qualified to state his opinion that the lift truck should have had a protective guard. The expert admitted that he was not an expert in the design or engineering of stand-up lift trucks; he had never designed or consulted on a design of a stand-up lift truck; he had never designed a component part or a warning of a stand-up lift truck; and he had never operated or even seen a stand-up lift truck until retained to testify in this case.

Alfred v. Caterpillar, Inc., 262 F.3d 1083 (10th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment entered as a matter of law after the testimony of the plaintiff's expert was stricken in a product liability action against the manufacturer of an asphalt paver, the Court agreed that a portion of the testimony was properly stricken. The expert's opinion as to the failure of the paver to comply with the Society of Automotive Engineers standards should not have been stricken, since he had nine years experience in failure analysis and evaluation of industrial accidents. As for the remainder of the opinion, the Court noted that the expert admitted that factual issues concerned "a field of expertise known as human factors," that he was not a specialist in the field of human factors, and that his knowledge of the field was gained during a trip to the library a week prior to trial and after he had arrived at his opinion, so the Trial Judge could reasonably have concluded that the expert lacked relevant "specialized knowledge." In Wheeler v. John Deere Co., 935 F.2d 1090 (10th Cir. 1991) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a mechanical engineer with special expertise in the safe design of farm equipment to testify to the dangers anticipated by ordinary consumers regarding a combine.

[v] Qualifications of Experts -- Railroad Accident Cases

Lauria v. AMTRAK, 145 F.3d 593 (3d Cir. 1998) : The Court reversed judgment as a matter of law entered for the defendant in a railroad worker's FELA action because the plaintiff had not been permitted to introduce testimony from a witness with 20 years' experience as trackman and supervisor of railroad tracks. The witness' experience sufficiently qualified him to assist the jury by applying his specialized knowledge regarding the defendant's responsibility to inspect and maintain in a safe condition the track on which the plaintiff had slipped. In an FELA action, Eckert v. Aliquippa & S. R.R., n183 the Court stated that an injured railroad brakeman with 30 years' experience was qualified to testify as an expert concerning whether injuries would have occurred if cars had properly coupled during a collision with a parked locomotive.

Lindsey v. Louisville & N. R.R., 775 F.2d 1322 (5th Cir. 1985) : A witness who had worked as railroad switchman was permitted to testify regarding the safety of a loading-unloading operation notwithstanding that he had no experience with piggy-back cars.

[w] Qualifications of Experts -- Reconstruction of Accidents

Wilson v. Woods, 163 F.3d 935 (5th Cir. 1999) : In a personal injury action arising from a truck-car collision, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by the plaintiff's accident reconstruction expert. The witness had mechanical engineering degrees, had taught mechanical and industrial engineering, and had 25 years' experience in fire reconstruction and investigation. However, he had only recently shifted his professional emphasis to automobile accident reconstruction, he had no degree or certificate in the subject, he had never conducted any studies or experiments in the field, and he was unable to show that his training or experience as a mechanical engineer gave him expertise in accident reconstruction distinguishable from training received by other mechanical engineers. In a § 1983 action arising out of a high speed chase and a roadblock, Rosado v. Deters, 5 F.3d 119 (5th Cir. 1993) , the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by the plaintiffs' proposed expert in accident reconstruction. The expert had been last qualified as an accident reconstructionist over 20 years earlier, had not taken any refresher courses, and was unable to provide the physical and mathematical bases for his opinion. In an action by surviving family members of an employee killed in a flash fire at an ammunitions plant against the manufacturer and supplier of a safety suit, Koonce v. Quaker Safety Prods. & Mfg. Co., n184 the Court found that an engineer who specialized in safety engineering and accident reconstruction was qualified.

Fox v. Dannenberg, 906 F.2d 1253 (8th Cir. 1990) : Holding that evidence from the plaintiff's expert engineers had been improperly excluded, the Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a wrongful death case in which a principal issue was whether the decedent or the defendant was driving at the time of the accident. The Trial Judge had ruled the witnesses were not qualified because neither had medical training or education. The Court held, however, that determining who was driving from the victims' location after the accident, their injuries, and the damage to the car's interior involved physical rather than medical science and both engineers had significant training and experience in that area. In Williams v. Pro-Tec, Inc., 908 F.2d 345 (8th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant manufacturer of an eyeguard worn by the plaintiff when he was hit by a racquetball and sustained eye injuries, holding that the self-acknowledged lack of medical expertise of the defendant's expert in mechanical engineering and accident reconstruction went to the weight rather than the admissibility of his opinion.

[x] Qualifications of Experts -- Statistics and Economics

IMPACT v. Firestone, 893 F.2d 1189 (11th Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendants in a civil rights employment action, but held that there was no abuse of discretion in rejecting opinion testimony by a political scientist regarding statistical disparities in employment decisions because the witness did not have expertise as a statistician or economist.

[y] Qualifications of Experts -- Tax Cases

American Tech. Resources v. United States, 893 F.2d 651 (3d Cir. 1990) : In an action contesting penalties for promoting abusive tax shelters, the Court held that the government's expert, with academic training and practical experience in valuing businesses, was properly permitted to give evidence on the value of a business.

United States v. Marabelles, 724 F.2d 1374 (9th Cir. 1984) : Affirming a self-employed painter's conviction for tax evasion, the Court found no error in the exclusion of a defense expert, a bank loan officer, who would have testified to a reference manual's figures for the costs of producing income in the painting business. The Trial Judge could have found that the witness was not an expert in taxation or in the painting business, that the manual had only marginal application to the facts of the case, and that the witness lacked sufficient expertise to convert the data on which he relied to the defendant's case.

[z] Qualifications of Experts -- Value of Property

Shane v. Shane, 891 F.2d 976 (1st Cir. 1989) : In a fraud suit between former owners of a closely held corporation, the Court held that the plaintiff was qualified by knowledge and experience to testify as an expert regarding the value of his shares and that his lack of knowledge of the corporation's financial condition during a particular period went only to the weight, not the admissibility, of his opinion.

Havee v. Belk, 775 F.2d 1209 (4th Cir. 1985) : The Court held that an expert who had experience in valuing publicly held stock could testify as to the value of closely held shares.

Hidden Oaks Ltd. v. City of Austin, 138 F.3d 1036 (5th Cir. 1998) : In a claim by the owner of an apartment complex for damages arising from a building inspector's "utility holds" on the complex for building code violations, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by a witness for the plaintiff that the holds had lowered the complex's market value below what it would have been without the holds. Although the witness had visited the city about once a month to buy and sell property for his employer, and part of his job was to evaluate various properties in order to advise his employer, he was not a licensed appraiser in any state, was not a licensed real estate broker, had no formal schooling in the methods of appraisal, and was unable to respond fully to questions regarding standard appraisal theory.

United States v. Tomasian, 784 F.2d 782 (7th Cir. 1986) : Affirming convictions for involvement with stolen goods, the Court upheld the exclusion of a proffered defense expert who wanted to testify as to the value of ivory tusks. The witness had no experience in appraising ivory and had simply contacted outside sources to learn the price per pound of ivory and multiplied the price by the number of pounds of tusks.

In re Tamen, 22 F.3d 199 (9th Cir. 1994) : The Court held in an action for breach of agreements to sell and develop real property that there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the plaintiff to testify as an expert regarding damages, even though he had little experience in property development and his only previous venture was unsuccessful. In United States v. 99. 66 Acres of Land, 970 F.2d 651 (9th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed the judgment in an eminent domain action, holding there was no error in excluding expert testimony by the landowner's accountant, who lacked training or practice as an appraiser and who was unfamiliar with data used in his cash flow analysis.

[aa] Qualifications of Experts -- Vocational Rehabilitation

Elcock v. Kmart Corp., 233 F.3d 734 (3d Cir. 2000) : To establish the extent of her disability and lost earning capacity resulting from a slip and fall, the plaintiff offered opinion testimony from a witness that was based on her psychological condition, the extent of her physical injuries, employment factors, and tests performed on the plaintiff. The expert had no formal training in vocational rehabilitation, but he had a degree in a field tangentially related to that about which he testified, he had reviewed the vocational rehabilitation literature, and he had attended conferences on the subject. Finding that the witness' qualifications fell within the outer bounds of the Waldorf standard, infra, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in a ruling that the witness was qualified. However, the marginal nature of the qualifications was a factor in the decision to reverse a judgment for the plaintiff because no Daubert hearing had been conducted. In Waldorf v. Shuta, 142 F.3d 601 (3d Cir. 1998) , the plaintiff suffered injuries in a car accident that rendered him a quadriplegic; he appealed from the denial of a motion for a new trial on damages, claiming, among other things, that the defendant's expert witness on vocational rehabilitation was not sufficiently qualified. The Court affirmed and found no abuse of discretion in permitting the witness to testify as an expert. The witness had no academic training in the field of vocational rehabilitation, but he had significant practical experience through his employment at a developmental disabilities council in attempting to provide jobs for disabled individuals; in that capacity he also became familiar with the relevant literature in the field. The Court concluded that "ordinarily an otherwise qualified witness is not disqualified merely because of a lack of academic training," and that the witness had "substantially more knowledge than an average lay person regarding employment opportunities for disabled individuals."

United States v. Bahena, 223 F.3d 797 (8th Cir. 2000) : In a trial on drug charges, the government proffered a tape recording with incriminating statements, and claimed that it was the defendant's voice on the tape. To disprove this contention, the defendant proffered an expert in voice spectrography, who would testify that the voice on the tape was not the defendant's. Affirming the convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the expert on the ground that he was not sufficiently qualified. The witness had no formal training in voice spectrography, he could not say for certain when he first began in the field, his answers to technical questions were vague, he was not a member of any professional organization in the field, and he was not familiar with published industry standards.

[cc] Qualifications of Experts -- Other Cases

United States v. Alzanki, 54 F.3d 994 (1st Cir. 1995) : In a prosecution for holding a household servant in involuntary servitude, the government called a "victimologist" to rebut defense evidence that the servant often ventured outside the defendant's unlocked apartment without fleeing. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the expert's testimony, even though her principal training and experience related to victims of sexual abuse. She had extensively researched comparable clinical behavior manifested by victims of physical abuse of a non-sexual nature, so she was qualified to testify that the servant's response was consistent with the behavior of abuse victims generally.

Friendship Heights Assocs. v. Vlastimil Koubek, A.I.A. 785 F.2d 1154 (4th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a judgment for an architect and a paint manufacturer in an action by a building owner who claimed damages after paint peeled from a building soon after it was painted. It found error in the exclusion of an expert witness who had a master's degree in chemical and ceramic engineering and a doctorate in silicate sciences as well as experience heading a laboratory that performed tests to determine the properties of building materials and concrete. Although the Trial Judge was concerned that the witness lacked practical experience, the Court found that she was a qualified expert.

United States v. Swanquist, 161 F.3d 1064 (7th Cir. 1998) : Affirming the conviction of a banker for making false statements in loan applications, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in preventing an accountant called by the defendant from testifying about "off balance sheet financing." As an accountant with no banking experience, the witness was not qualified to tell the jury that a practice of omitting certain assets and liabilities was acceptable within the banking community.

Wheeling Pittsburgh Steel Corp. v. Beelman River Terminals, Inc., 254 F.3d 706 (8th Cir. 2001) : The plaintiff sued for damages to its steel kept in the defendant's warehouse when the Mississippi River flooded. Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court held, inter alia, that it was an abuse of discretion to permit the defendant's witness, a hydrologist specializing in flood risk management, to give testimony regarding safe warehousing practices. Though qualified to testify that the defendant was diligent and reasonable in assessing available river data in historical context and in making judgments about reasonably foreseeable river levels and the risks they posed to the warehouse in light of the available information, the witness was not qualified to give expert opinions about the specific efforts and specific levels of protection consistent with good warehousing practices.

United States v. Morales, 108 F.3d 1031 (9th Cir. 1997) : A defendant, charged with willfully making false entries in a union ledger, was not permitted to introduce expert testimony from a CPA regarding the defendant's knowledge and understanding of bookkeeping principles. Reversing the conviction, the Court held, inter alia, that the expert's experience judging bookkeepers' reliability and competence enabled her to offer an informed and helpful opinion on the defendant's level of bookkeeping knowledge. In United States v. Barker, 967 F.2d 1275 (9th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed a government contractor's convictions for presenting false claims, holding it was not an abuse of discretion to permit a civil engineer who had worked for the government seven years analyzing claims and reviewing contractors' documents to testify regarding overcharges and doublebilling.

[77] Relationship to Other Rules

United States v. Campos, 217 F.3d 707 (9th Cir. 2000) : The defendant was convicted for importation and possession of marijuana with intent to distribute, after she crossed from Tijuana in a van that had a false compartment full of marijuana. The Court held that the Trial Judge properly excluded polygraph evidence that purported to show that the defendant was truthful in saying she did not know she had drugs in her van when she crossed the border. Under United States v. Morales, 108 F.3d 1031 (9th Cir. 1997) (en banc), the polygraph expert's opinion would be an inadmissible opinion as to mental state of the defendant and would be barred by Rule 704(b), notwithstanding Rule 702.

Therefore, no Daubert hearing was required; if evidence is inadmissible under one rule, "there is no need for a court to determine whether it satisfies predicate evidentiary standards pertaining to another rule." In Rogers v. Raymark Indus., 922 F.2d 1426 (9th Cir. 1991) , a product liability wrongful death case arising out of World War II shipyard asbestos exposure, the Trial Judge excluded testimony by one of the plaintiff's experts, finding it to be minimally probative, confusing, and cumulative under Rule 403. The Court found no abuse of discretion, rejecting the plaintiff's argument that she needed the testimony because it would be more articulate, eloquent, and clear than that from coworkers who had forgotten the details or were too unsophisticated to describe their working conditions accurately.

[78] Reliance on Other Experts

Dura Automotive Sys. v. CTS Corp., 285 F.3d 609 (7th Cir. 2002) : In this action to determine responsibility for a CERCLA cleanup of a well field, the Court found there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony from a hydrogeologist on the grounds that he was essentially being used as the "mouthpiece" for groundwater-flow modelers on whose mathematical models he relied and that there had not been timely disclosure allowing determination of the reliability of the models. One Judge dissented, contending that the majority had created a new rule that would require cautious parties "to engage in something like an infinite regression of the naming of experts," and that the line between experts who exercise significant discretion (who must be produced) and experts whose work is ministerial (who do not) was unworkable.

[79] Requirement of Expert Testimony

Wills v. Amerada Hess Corp., 379 F.3d 32 (2d Cir. 2004) : A deceased seaman's wife brought a Jones Act action alleging that her decedent contracted squamous cell carcinoma from his exposure to benzene on the defendant's ships. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the plaintiff's proffered expert's testimony as unreliable under Daubert, and rejected the plaintiff's argument that expert testimony was not necessary to prove causation. Although expert testimony is not necessary in cases where jurors "are as capable of comprehending the primary facts and of drawing correct conclusions from them as are witnesses possessed of special or peculiar training," here "the causal link between exposure to toxins and other behavior and squamous cell carcinoma is sufficiently beyond the knowledge of the lay juror that expert testimony is required to establish causation."

Wilburn v. Maritrans GP Inc., 139 F.3d 350 (3d Cir. 1998) : The plaintiff was injured when he was swept off the deck of a tugboat. The jury found that the defendant was negligent and the tugboat was unseaworthy. The Trial Judge granted the defendant's motions for judgment as a matter of law and for a new trial on the ground that the evidence was insufficient because the plaintiff failed to present expert testimony. The Court reversed the orders on the ground that expert testimony was not necessary, because the barge captain could have testified to the cause of the accident as a lay witness.

Sherbert v. Alcan Aluminum Corp., 66 F.3d 965 (8th Cir. 1995) : The plaintiff broke his leg when heavy material slipped off a forklift operated by an employee of the defendant. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found that expert testimony was not necessary to establish a standard of care for forklift operation: "The operation of a forklift involves simple principles of balance well within the common knowledge of lay jurors." In Carlsen v. Javurek, n185 the Court reversed judgments for defendants in an action for the wrongful death of a hospital patient because the jury had been instructed that it could only find negligence on the basis of expert opinion; the lack of care alleged in the instant case was comprehensible to lay jurors.

United States v. Kimler, 335 F.3d 1132 (10th Cir. 2003) : The defendant, convicted of receiving and distributing images of child pornography over the Internet, argued that, under the Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234 (2002) , the government was required to present expert testimony that the images were of real children rather than computer-generated, "virtual" children. Affirming, the Court concluded that "Free Speech Coalition did not establish a broad, categorical requirement that, in every case on the subject, absent direct evidence of identity, an expert must testify that the unlawful image is of a real child. Juries are still capable of distinguishing between real and virtual images; and admissibility remains within the province of the sound discretion of the district court."

[80] Rescue Operations

Beck v. Haik, 377 F.3d 624 (6th Cir. 2004) : In a civil rights action on behalf of a drowning victim, which alleged that the county prevented a private water rescue organization from rescuing the victim, part of the dispute was whether the county provided a "meaningful alternative" to private rescue. A diving rescue expert who would have testified that county officials failed to use proper rescue techniques after the victim fell into the water was excluded on the ground that the dispute was not about whether the county engaged in a perfect rescue operation. Holding that exclusion of the evidence was error, the Court noted that the testimony suggested that the county was engaged in a body recovery operation rather than a rescue, which "would obviously fall short of being a meaningful alternative to rescue." However, there was no error in excluding the expert's conclusion that the victim would have survived if private rescuers would have been permitted to enter the water, since this was a medical judgment for which the expert lacked the necessary medical training.

[81] Rhetorician

United States v. Ingle, 157 F.3d 1147 (8th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed a conviction for aiding and abetting a murder, finding no abuse of discretion in denying the defendant's request for authorization to hire a rhetorician to serve as an expert witness on the issue of the voluntariness of his tape-recorded admissions to fellow inmates. The issue of voluntariness is for the Judge, not the jury, and it is "inherently implausible" to suggest the rhetorician would have been helpful in persuading the jury that the admissions were unreliable.

[82] Risk Assessment

Metabolife Int'l, Inc. v. Wornick, 264 F.3d 832 (9th Cir. 2001) : A manufacturer of herbal diet pills sued for defamation after the defendants reported that the pills were unsafe. Reversing summary judgment for the defendants, the Court found that the Judge's reasons for rejecting expert testimony that the product was safe were insufficient under Daubert. The Judge had excluded testimony using the methodology of risk assessment, which consists of "reviewing incident reports and the literature on a particular topic and then forming an opinion based on the information reviewed," because the experts had simply listed the articles they relied upon and had not explained how the literature supported their opinions. The Court rejected the argument that the testimony was reliable simply because the experts were relying on peer-reviewed articles, but it found that when the experts pointed to objective sources for their opinion, they had at least minimally complied with Daubert's reliability standards. As a gatekeeper under Daubert, the Judge was free to probe the relationship between the literature and the experts' opinions on remand.

[83] Safety Experts

Saldana v. Kmart Corp., 260 F.3d 228 (3d Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment granted against the plaintiff in a slip and fall case, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony from a safety expert. The expert's conclusion that the defendant was negligent because it failed to follow OSHA regulations applied an incorrect legal standard and was therefore irrelevant. Her conclusion (offered on the issue of constructive notice) regarding the time it would take a bottle of wax to empty and cause a puddle like that in the case was based on tests of questionable accuracy and provided no assistance on the essential question when the spill commenced or concluded.

Jenkins v. Arkansas Power & Light Co., 140 F.3d 1161 (8th Cir. 1998) : The plaintiff, suing for injuries incurred when he dove into a reservoir and collided with an unmarked submerged island, offered testimony by an officer responsible for major Corps of Engineers reservoirs regarding proper reservoir management as it relates to the safety of recreational users. The Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the testimony. Testimony regarding the private defendant's federal duties and responsibilities was an issue of law for the Trial Judge. Testimony as to what actually happened (in regard to what might have prevented the accident) was unnecessary because there was an eyewitness, the facts were not complex, and the plaintiff's expert had no experience in investigating diving accidents. Testimony regarding the plaintiff's actions and whether they were negligent related to an issue for the jury as to which the expert had no helpful specialized knowledge, since he admitted that his opinion was based on swimming with his brothers when growing up. In Wood v. Minnesota Mining & Mfg. Co., 112 F.3d 306 (8th Cir. 1997) , the Court affirmed a judgment for a truck driver injured when a train struck his truck on the defendant's property, and held that it was proper to admit expert testimony from a highway safety specialist who had 16 years' experience directing the office of traffic and safety which oversees all of the state's public railway crossings.

Getter v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 66 F.3d 1119 (10th Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a slip and fall case, holding that testimony by the plaintiff's safety expert was properly excluded. The expert would have testified that the floor of the defendant's store was maintained in an unsafe condition, but the Court held that "the normal life experiences and qualifications of the jury would permit it to draw its own conclusions concerning the safety of the floor, based upon the lay testimony of eyewitnesses."

[84] Scientific Evidence

[a] Admissibility Principles

Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993) : This case is discussed more fully in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 702.02[5]. The Court rejected the Frye general acceptance test for scientific evidence and concluded that "under the Rules the trial judge must ensure that any and all scientific testimony or evidence admitted is not only relevant, but reliable." On remand from the Supreme Court, the Court of Appeals held that summary judgment was properly granted against the plaintiffs because the testimony of their experts, which was offered to prove that Bendectin caused the plaintiffs' limb reduction, was inadmissible under Rule 702. Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 43 F.3d 1311 (9th Cir. 1995) .

In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litig., 35 F.3d 717 (3d Cir. 1994) (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 702.02[6]): Reversing in part a second summary judgment for the defendants in consolidated suits by people working in or living near a railyard for damages resulting from PCB exposure, the Court observed, inter alia, that: Daubert confirmed the Circuit's basic holding that an expert's testimony is admissible so long as the process or technique used in formulating the opinion is reliable; a Trial Judge should take into account all the factors listed by either Daubert or Downing (infra), as well as any others that are relevant, in determining the reliability of a scientific technique or method; the notion of "fit" means that the requirement of reliability, or "good grounds," extends to each step in an expert's analysis all the way through the step that connects the work of the expert to the particular case; and the evidentiary standard of reliability, while higher than a prima facie showing, is lower than the merits standard of correctness -- it is "good grounds," not perfect grounds, nor the best conclusion. In United States v. Downing, n186 the Court exhaustively analyzed the propriety of admitting expert testimony on eyewitness identification, suggesting the approach to be followed by a Trial Judge asked to rule upon the admission of scientific evidence. The Court indicated that the Judge should > conduct a preliminary inquiry focusing on (1) the soundness and reliability of the technique used in generating the evidence, (2) the possibility that admitting the evidence would overwhelm, confuse, or mislead the jury, and (3) the proffered connection between the scientific research and test result to be presented, and particular disputed factual issues in the case.

The Court's analysis in Downing was heavily relied upon by the Supreme Court in Daubert.

[b] Scientific Evidence -- Ammunition Identification

United States v. Davis, 103 F.3d 660 (8th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a bank robbery conviction, the Court held that the District Court had fully executed its gatekeeping function and had not abused its discretion in admitting expert testimony, based on Inductively Coupled Plasma-Atomic Emission Spectrometry analysis, that bullets expended at the scene came from a cartridge box found in the defendant's car.

[c] Scientific Evidence -- Causation of Disease or Injury

[i] Drugs and Medical Devices

Meister v. Medical Eng'g Corp., 267 F.3d 1123 (D.C. Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in an action by a plaintiff alleging that she contracted sclerodoma (a tissue disease) as a result of breast implants, the Court upheld the exclusion of causation experts who testified on the basis of individual case reports, a temporal connection, and a differential diagnosis. The differential diagnosis was not reliable because there was no evidence that breast implants could cause sclerodoma. Inferring causation simply from temporal proximity, from "the mere simultaneous existence" of exposure and injury "clearly is not an appropriate methodology." And the case studies were of limited value because they were "not controlled studies," and the causation conclusions flew in the face of an "overwhelming body of contradictory epidemiological evidence." In a Bendectin case, Raynor v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 104 F.3d 1371 (D.C. Cir. 1997) , the plaintiffs' experts testified to causation on the basis of chemical studies, in vitro studies, and animal studies. The Court, affirming a JNOV for the defendant, concluded that this methodology was unscientific because it came to a conclusion contrary to every existing epidemiological study. The Court distinguished its opinion in Ambrosini v. Labarraque (see infra), where the same type of testimony was held admissible, on the ground that the drug at issue in Ambrosini had not been the subject of significant epidemiological study. In this case, the plaintiffs' experts' methodology and conclusion had not been peer reviewed; their testimony suffered from "testing" problems since there was no way to verify that animal and chemical studies are accurate as applied to humans; the error rate is likely to be quite high when sound epidemiological studies produce opposite results from nonepidemiological ones; and reliance on chemical and animal studies in the face of contradicting epidemiological evidence is not a generally accepted methodology. By contrast, in Ambrosini v. Labarraque, n187 an action alleging that birth defects were caused by the drug Depo-Provera, the Court held that in rejecting the testimony of an epidemiologist and a teratologist, the Trial Judge had misconceived "the limited gatekeeper role envisioned in Daubert." Both experts had relied on standard methodologies and published studies. Both were highly qualified, which is "circumstantial evidence as to whether the expert employed a scientifically valid methodology or mode of reasoning." The fact that one expert had not published his conclusions was understandable, because the drug Depo-Provera is no longer prescribed during pregnancy. It was also relevant that the teratologist had testified to his conclusions about Depo-Provera at an FDA hearing, before the instant litigation arose. Both experts sufficiently ruled out some other possible causes for the plaintiff's birth defect, and the fact that other possible causes might have remained "uneliminated" went only to weight and not admissibility. Finally, the fact that the epidemiologist could not state categorically that Depo-Provera causes birth defects did not render his testimony inadmissible under the "fit" prong of Daubert, which requires only that the testimony be relevant -- it need not be sufficient to prove the point.

Baker v. Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, 156 F.3d 248 (1st Cir. 1998) : The plaintiff alleged that she suffered pelvic inflammatory disease from using the Dalkon Shield intrauterine device in 1973-1974. The plaintiff showed symptoms of PID in 1974 and required surgery in 1979. In 1996 the plaintiff's blood tested positive for chlamydia, indicating that at some prior time she had been infected by chlamydia. The Trial Judge excluded the Trust's expert witnesses, whose opinion was that the PID probably was caused by the chlamydia infection, and limited the Trust's examination of the plaintiff's expert. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found that the Trust experts' opinions had an adequate basis, including the fact that the plaintiff suffered a sexually transmitted disease in 1972 and one such disease tends to be correlated with others. The Court also rejected an argument that the experts were properly excluded under Rule 403, since the probative value of the expert opinion was clear as was its importance to the defense, and the jury could have been instructed on the widespread nature of chlamydia in order to reduce its possible prejudice.

Benedi v. McNeil-P.P.C., Inc., 66 F.3d 1378 (4th Cir. 1995) : In a consumer's product liability action for severe liver damage caused by the combination of alcohol and acetaminophen, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in the determination that the plaintiff's experts employed reliable methodology when basing their causation opinions on patient history, examination, lab and pathology data, and study of the peer-reviewed literature, since the medical community daily uses the same methodologies in diagnosing patients.

Glaser v. Thompson Med. Co., 32 F.3d 969 (6th Cir. 1994) : Reversing a summary judgment for the manufacturer of a diet pill that allegedly caused intracranial bleeding and personal injuries, the Court held that the scientific validity of the reasoning underlying the plaintiff's expert's opinion of causation was sufficiently established. The dissenting Judge disputed the applicability of the cited scientific studies and concluded that the expert's opinion was based on post hoc, ergo propter hoc reasoning, not scientific reasoning. In Novak v. United States, n188 the Court held that judgment should be entered for the United States in a suit by a widow who claimed her husband died as a result of a swine flu vaccination. It concluded that expert evidence relating to causation of a disease by swine flu vaccine was not admissible in view of the fact that the specific cause of the disease was unknown and conjectural at best.

Fuesting v. Zimmer, Inc., 421 F.3d 528 (7th Cir. 2005) : The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in a product liability action arising from the failure of a prosthetic knee joint. The plaintiff's expert had testified that sterilization by gamma irradiation in air had caused the implant's polyethylene to oxidate and ultimately to delaminate and prematurely fail. The Court held that the expert's testimony had not been subject to an adequate Daubert analysis: his theory had not been subjected to any scientific tests or experiments; it had not been published or subjected to peer review, nor had it received scientific acceptance; the expert did not bridge the analytical gap between basic principles and the complex conclusions he reached; and his opinion had been developed expressly for the litigation. In an action by a smoker who alleged that a nicotine patch caused a heart attack, Rosen v. Ciba-Geigy Corp., 78 F.3d 316 (7th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed a summary judgment for the defendant, holding that the plaintiff's expert's deposition lacked scientific rigor, as it offered neither a theoretical reason nor any experimental, statistical, or other scientific data from which a causal relation might be inferred. In a wrongful death action arising from a hemophiliac's death from AIDS, Gruca v. Alpha Therapeutic Corp., n189 the Court reversed judgments for the defendant blood plasma manufacturers, holding that it was error for the Trial Judge to decline to determine the admissibility under Daubert of the plaintiffs' proffered expert testimony concerning antigenic stimulation. In Porter v. Whitehall Labs., n190 the Court affirmed a summary judgment for the defendants in a product liability action alleging that ibuprofen had caused acute kidney failure, holding that none of the plaintiff's experts' opinions was well grounded in the scientific method and thus they did not meet Daubert's standards.

Sorensen v. Shaklee Corp., 31 F.3d 638 (8th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants in a product liability action seeking recovery for mental retardation of children allegedly caused by their parents' pre-conception ingestion of alfalfa tablets. The plaintiffs' proposed expert testimony was not relevant because it assumed the presence of a chemical that there was no proof the tablets contained, and it had none of the Daubert factors indicating scientific validity.

Kennedy v. Collagen Corp., 161 F.3d 1226 (9th Cir. 1998) : Relying on peer-reviewed articles, clinical trials and product studies conducted by the defendant, an investigation by the Texas Department of Health, examination of the plaintiff and review of her medical history, medical laboratory tests, and medical reports, the plaintiff's expert offered an opinion that the defendant's collagen product caused the plaintiff's autoimmune disorder. The Trial Judge rejected the testimony because there was no specific study connecting the product with the disease and there was no consensus in the medical community on the point. Reversing summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held that it was an abuse of discretion to ignore scientific studies establishing the validity of the methodology relied upon by the expert; his reasoning was based on objective, verifiable evidence and scientific methodology of the kind traditionally used by experts in his field. On remand from the Supreme Court, the Court of Appeals held in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 43 F.3d 1311 (9th Cir. 1995) , that summary judgment was properly granted against the plaintiffs because the testimony of their experts, which was offered to prove that Bendectin caused the plaintiffs' limb reduction, was inadmissible under Rule 702. None of the plaintiffs' experts had conducted research that pre-existed or was independent of the litigation; none of the research and analysis had been "subjected to normal scientific scrutiny through peer review and publication"; the experts failed to explain with particularity the methodology they followed; and they could not point to any objective external source to validate their methodology. In an action for a birth defect allegedly caused by a fertility drug, Lust v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., n191 the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant, holding that expert testimony offered by the plaintiff on causation was properly excluded. The expert's research had not been subjected to peer review and although it had been developed before the present litigation, he was already a professional plaintiffs' witness at the time. Furthermore, he presented no evidence that his method and premises were accepted by or espoused by a recognized minority of teratologists. In Hopkins v. Dow Corning Corp., n192 an action for damages suffered from defective silicone breast implants, the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, holding that testimony from the plaintiff's experts was properly admitted as proof of causation. Relying on Daubert, the Court concluded that the experts "based their opinions on the types of scientific data and utilized the types of scientific techniques relied upon by medical experts in making determinations regarding toxic causation where there is no solid body of epidemiological data to review."

Norris v. Baxter Healthcare Corp., 397 F.3d 878 (10th Cir. 2005) : In an action by the recipient of silicone gel breast implants alleging systemic autoimmune disease, the Court found no error in the exclusion of the plaintiff's causation experts. Their testimony did not satisfy Daubert's requirement that the underlying reasoning or methodology be scientifically valid, because they "completely ignored or discounted without explanation the many epidemiological studies which found no medically reliable link between silicone breast implants and systemic disease." Their reliance on differential diagnosis and case studies was misplaced, since under accepted scientific methodology those techniques are valid only when general causation has been established. In Hollander v. Sandoz Pharms. Corp., 289 F.3d 1193 (10th Cir. 2002) , an action alleging that the defendant's drug Parlodel, given to stop lactation in new mothers, caused the plaintiff to suffer a postpartum hemorrhagic stroke, the Court found no abuse of discretion when testimony by the plaintiffs' expert testimony was excluded because: (1) the experts were unable to explain the physiological mechanism by which Parlodel caused strokes; (2) the kinds of case reports on which the plaintiffs relied have been repeatedly rejected as a scientific basis for establishing causation; (3) the fact that the drug belongs to a class of compounds that have been shown to cause hypertension did not constitute reliable evidence that it caused strokes; and (4) the animal studies on which the experts relied were too dissimilar from the facts of the case.

Rider v. Sandoz Pharm. Corp., 295 F.3d 1194 (11th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed exclusion of expert testimony and a resultant summary judgment in an action alleging that the defendant's drug Parlodel, given to stop lactation in new mothers, caused the plaintiffs to suffer postpartum hemorrhagic strokes. The Court found that case reports on which the plaintiffs' expert principally relied, even if quite detailed (and many were not), are not reliable enough to demonstrate a causal link because they report a single patient's symptoms in an uncontrolled context. Other supporting evidence -- "dechallenge/rechallenge" tests, animal studies, and chemical similarity -- did not supply sufficient assurances of reliability. In a silicone breast implant case, Toole v. Baxter Healthcare Corp., 235 F.3d 1307 (11th Cir. 2000) , the plaintiff presented witnesses who testified that her implants caused her disease or who testified to the disease process when the human body reacts with silicone or silica. The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, finding no abuse of discretion when the experts' testimony was determined sufficiently reliable, since they had conducted research, published in peer-reviewed journals, and treated hundreds of patients with silicone gel implants. In Allison v. McGhan Medical Corp., n193 the Court affirmed a summary judgment for breast implant manufacturers. The plaintiff had submitted proposed testimony by a board certified immunologist, a board certified pathologist, and a treating board certified rheumatologist. The Court found no abuse of discretion in determinations that: certain studies were not sufficiently reliable, especially when contrasted with more than 20 epidemiological studies that found no statistical correlation between silicone breast implants and systemic disease; the pathologist's theories were based more on personal opinion than scientific knowledge; the treating rheumatologist did not satisfy Georgia's standard of reasonable probability; and the rheumatologist's opinions were based upon unreliable methodology.

Terran v. Secretary of Health & Human Servs., 195 F.3d 1302 (Fed. Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a decision denying compensation under the National Child Vaccine Injury Act of 1986 to a child who began suffering seizures after receiving DPT vaccine. The Special Master had applied the factors set forth in Daubert and had determined that the plaintiff's expert's theory regarding the causal link between the pertussis toxin and the plaintiff's condition did not meet the standards for scientific reliability. The Court concluded that the Special Master had properly used the Daubert factors as a framework for analysis but not as four tests that each had to be satisfied.

[ii] Scientific Evidence -- Causation of Disease or Injury -- Other Cases

Vargas v. Lee, 317 F.3d 498 (5th Cir. 2003) : In a motorist's personal injury action, the Court vacated a judgment for the plaintiff and remanded for recalculation of damages because an expert was improperly permitted to testify that the accident caused the plaintiff to develop symptoms of fibromyalgia syndrome. The Court held that scientific understanding of the syndrome had not progressed sufficiently to change its conclusion in Black v. Food Lion, Inc., infra, that expert testimony regarding the causation of the syndrome by traumatic injury did not satisfy the Daubert factors or any other standard of reliability. In a slip and fall case, Black v. Food Lion, 171 F.3d 308 (5th Cir. 1999) , a treating physician was permitted to testify that the plaintiff suffered from fibromyalgia syndrome, and that this condition was caused by the trauma from the slip and fall. Reversing, the Court found that the expert's theory -- that the fall caused trauma that caused hormonal damage leading to fibromyalgia -- failed under the Daubert factors. Her theory had not been verified by testing and had not been peer-reviewed. The expert herself recognized that fibromyalgia has no known etiology. Moreover, the expert's conjecture did not satisfy the standard for general acceptance and had no known potential rate of error. The Trial Judge had permitted the testimony on the ground that the expert had followed a proper protocol by eliminating other possible causes of fibromyalgia. That, however, was "not an exercise in scientific logic but in the fallacy of post-hoc propter-hoc reasoning, which is as unacceptable in science as in law."

Quinton v. Farmland Indus., 928 F.2d 335 (10th Cir. 1991) : Affirming judgments against the defendant in an action for damages to dairy cattle injured by feed containing excessive cockleburs, the Court held that limitations regarding the extant research on cockleburs did not render inadmissible the plaintiff's expert's extrapolations from the debilitating toxic effects of the plant reported in the literature to the sick animals he examined.

[iii] Scientific Evidence -- Causation of Disease or Injury -- Toxic Exposure

[A] Consumer Injuries

Campbell v. Metropolitan Property & Cas. Ins. Co., 239 F.3d 179 (2d Cir. 2001) : In a declaratory judgment action against a liability insurer for lead-paint poisoning injuries, it was necessary for the plaintiffs to prove that there was injury within the first eight months of exposure to the paint. Affirming in part a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admission of testimony from an expert conceded by the defendants to be "preeminent in his field" that injury to blood cells could occur within ten days of exposure. Reliability under Daubert was supported by: experience at the hospital center he led, where treating approximately 3,000 active cases meant that his theories were being tested daily in practice, and there was no evidence of any rate of error; numerous peer-reviewed articles directly related to the opinions to which he was testifying; and wide acceptance of his theories.

Heller v. Shaw Indus., Inc., 167 F.3d 146 (3d Cir. 1999) : The plaintiffs alleged in a product liability action against the maker of a carpet installed in their house that volatile organic compounds (VOCs) emitted by the carpet caused the wife's respiratory illnesses. The Trial Judge excluded an opinion by an allergy-immunology specialist because no research supported his contention that the level of VOCs detected could cause the illness experienced, his differential diagnosis did not rule out all alternative possible causes, and the evidence showing a temporal relationship between installation of the carpet and the plaintiff's symptoms was weak. The Court noted that an expert's opinion need not be based on published studies so long as the methodology is scientifically valid, and that a differential diagnosis need not rule out all alternative causes so long as the diagnostic techniques employed provide good grounds for the conclusion. However, the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant because the expert had heavily relied on the temporal relationship, which was unreliable in this case because the plaintiff was ill both before the carpet was installed and after it was removed. The Court also found no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by an industrial hygienist who sampled the air in the plaintiffs' house at various times, measured the concentrations of VOCs, and concluded that the symptoms were caused by prolonged exposure to VOCs from the carpet. While the witness' methodology for measuring VOC concentrations might have been proper, his methodology for determining the concentrations at earlier times was unreliable, and the levels that he did find were far below those found to cause human illness. In Kannankeril v. Terminix Int'l, Inc., 128 F.3d 802 (3d Cir. 1997) , the Court reversed summary judgment for the defendant, an exterminator sued for injuries suffered by homeowners allegedly as a result of pesticide application, because the plaintiffs' expert testimony on causation was improperly excluded. The expert's opinion was sufficiently reliable under Daubert, where it had a substantial factual basis in his review of relevant medical records and the defendant's application records, and the supporting scientific theory is widely accepted.

Ruffin v. Shaw Indus., 149 F.3d 294 (4th Cir. 1998) (per curiam): The plaintiffs sued the manufacturer and the retailer of a carpet for breach of implied warranty, alleging that they had suffered toxic injuries from chemicals in the carpet. Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence by the plaintiffs' experts, who had tested a sample of the carpet and found it caused biological responses in mice. The experts' methodology had not been validated by independent replication, peer reviewers had been uniformly critical, it was not generally accepted, and it did not (despite the experts' contention) follow the standard protocol for similar testing. In Cavallo v. Star Enter., 100 F.3d 1150 (4th Cir. 1996) , an action to recover for a respiratory disease from exposure to a jet fuel spill, the Trial Court granted summary judgment for the defendant, reasoning that the plaintiff's toxicological experts could not satisfy the Daubert standards: the experts' methodology had not been validated and was not supported by scientific literature; the literature relied upon by the experts concerned much higher exposures than that suffered by the plaintiff; and the experts' reliance on the temporal proximity between exposure and injury was inconsistent with the scientific method. Noting that the Judge's "interpretation is restrictive in this case, but it is not inconsistent with Daubert," the Court found no abuse of discretion in the determination that the methodology and reasoning used by the witness did not "have a significant place in the discourse of experts in the field," as required by Daubert.

Braun v. Lorillard Inc., 84 F.3d 230 (7th Cir. 1996) : In an action alleging that a smoker died from cancer caused by asbestos contained in cigarette filters, the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant and held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by an expert for the plaintiff that he had found asbestos fibers in the smoker's lungs. The basis for the opinion was a spectrographic analysis of the residue when a section of the smoker's lung tissue was subjected to "high temperature ashing." Although the witness was an acknowledged expert in testing building materials for asbestos, he had never before conducted a test on human or animal tissue, nor had such a process been used by anyone else to test for asbestos fibers in tissue, and the expert had no knowledge of the methodologies that were or should be used in testing for asbestos in tissue.

Wright v. Willamette Indus., Inc., 91 F.3d 1105 (8th Cir. 1996) : In an action alleging personal injuries due to exposure to formaldehyde emanating from a nearby fiberboard plant, the Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiffs and held that the testimony of the plaintiff's expert on causation should not have been admitted. The expert testified that the injuries were more probably than not related to exposure to formaldehyde, "but that opinion was not based on any knowledge about what amounts of wood fibers impregnated with formaldehyde involve an appreciable risk of harm to human beings who breathe them." Therefore, the expert's testimony was speculative and unscientific under Daubert.

McClain v. Metabolife Int'l, Inc., 401 F.3d 1233 (11th Cir. 2005) : In an action claiming that a herbal weight-loss supplement containing ephedrine and caffeine caused the plaintiffs' strokes and heart attacks, the Judge denied, after a Daubert hearing, a motion to exclude causation testimony from a pharmacologist and a neurologist. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held that when the Judge disavowed ability to handle the Daubert issues it was an abuse of discretion to abdicate the gatekeeping role. In any event, it was an abuse of discretion to admit the experts' testimony, as it lacked reliability. The pharmacologist used questionable principles and neglected established scientific ones, and made unjustifiable use of studies, reports, and consumer complaints. The opinions of the neurologist, a clinician, were subject to similar infirmities and were not saved by reliance on a differential diagnosis method (which cannot provide proof of specific causation in the absence of reliable evidence of general causation), anecdotal case reports (which cannot ordinarily provide proof of causation by themselves), or a challenge/de-challenge/re-challenge methodology lacking sufficient controls. In Rink v. Cheminova, Inc., 400 F.3d 1286 (11th Cir. 2005) , the Court affirmed a summary judgment for the manufacturer of a pesticide, in a class action alleging that the plaintiffs became ill as a result of their exposure to the pesticide after it was kept at unsafe temperatures. The Trial Judge found that testimony by an expert who purported to reconstruct the storage temperatures was unreliable in light of the expert's inexperience with the key substance in the pesticide, his failure to visit the storage sites and to consider the testimony of workers at the sites, and his continued use of data in subsequent reports even though the data was previously found to be unreliable. The Court agreed that the expert could not simply take data from one storage site and assume that it was applicable to other sites, and that the expert's assumptions about the sites were unsupported by sufficient factual information. The Court further found that the testimony of the plaintiff's toxicology experts was properly excluded, because these experts simply relied on the other expert's findings, which were properly found unreliable.

[B] Scientific Evidence -- Causation of Disease or Injury -- Toxic Exposure -- Workplace Injuries

General Elec. Co. v. Joiner, 522 U.S. 136 (1997) : In a suit alleging that the plaintiff's cancer was caused by exposure to PCBs, the Supreme Court found that the Trial Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the plaintiff's expert testimony on causation. The experts' reliance on studies involving infant mice was unscientific, because the mice contracted a different kind of cancer than that suffered by the plaintiff; moreover, the studies could not be replicated in adult mice nor in any other species. The experts' reliance on four epidemiological studies was likewise flawed. Two of the studies found no statistically significant connection between PCBs and cancer; one study did not mention PCBs; and the fourth study, which found a statistically significant connection, involved subjects who were exposed to a variety of other carcinogens.

Amorgianos v. AMTRAK, 303 F.3d 256 (2d Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in a painter's action claiming that exposure to xylene in paint vapors caused neurological injuries. Testimony by an industrial hygienist regarding the xylene concentration at the work site was properly rejected because the expert failed to apply his own methodology reliably, neglecting to include in his calculations certain variables that he said were relevant and that were available to him. The Court found no abuse of discretion in rejecting general causation opinions that the Trial Judge, after a rigorous analysis of the experts' methods, found were unreliable because the analytical gap between the studies on which they were based and the conclusions was simply too great.

Westberry v. Gislaved Gummi AB, 178 F.3d 257 (4th Cir. 1999) : An employee of a window manufacturer alleged that talcum powder used as a lubricant on gaskets for the windows caused him severe sinus problems. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in a product liability action against the gasket manufacturer, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting opinion testimony from the plaintiff's treating physician that the plaintiff's sinus problems were caused by inhalation of airborne talc in the workplace. Although the expert's opinion was based only on a differential diagnosis, the Court held that a reliable differential diagnosis provides a valid foundation for an expert opinion and that the expert's diagnosis was sufficiently reliable in this case.

Burleson v. Texas Dept. of Criminal Justice, 393 F.3d 577 (5th Cir. 2004) : In an action by an inmate who claimed that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to his health when they allowed him to weld with tungsten electrodes, the plaintiff offered the expert testimony of a "well-credentialed toxicologist and expert in occupational medicine" that he inhaled thorium dust, that the dust lodged in his airways, and that it damaged surrounding cells. However, the expert conceded he had never calculated an individual's radiation exposure to thoriated tungsten welding electrodes, and he lacked any special training or medical certificates in any radiation-related disciplines or medical physics. Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, the Court upheld exclusion of the testimony, which the Magistrate Judge had concluded "was based on speculation, guesswork, and conjecture to support his theory" and was unsupported by any studies linking the prisoner's type of cancer to the 2% thoriated tungsten welding electrodes. In Curtis v. M&S Petroleum, Inc., 174 F.3d 661 (5th Cir. 1999) , the Court held that it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the testimony of a doctor who concluded that the plaintiff-workers suffered numerous health problems as a result of overexposure to benzene. The expert relied on extensive scientific literature establishing a connection between benzene and the symptoms experienced by the plaintiffs. He also properly relied on the "strong temporal connection" between benzine exposure and the onset of symptoms. A temporal connection alone is entitled to little weight in determining causation; it is entitled to greater weight when there is "an established scientific connection between exposure and illness or other circumstantial evidence supporting the causal link." Although the expert could not be sure of the exact extent of the plaintiffs' exposure, he reliably determined, based on conditions at the plant and the symptoms suffered by the plaintiffs, that they were exposed to benzene at levels several hundred times the permissible level, so it was not necessary for the plaintiffs to show the precise level of exposure. In Moore v. Ashland Chem. Inc., 151 F.3d 269 (5th Cir. 1998) (en banc), a truck driver, a long-time smoker with a history of asthma, sued for an asthmatic-type condition (RADS) allegedly caused when he was exposed to toluene while cleaning up a chemical spill. The plaintiff proffered a board-certified internist with training and experience in pulmonary disease, allergy, and environmental medicine, who concluded that the plaintiff's condition was caused by the exposure. In Daubert proceedings the expert admitted that he had never before treated a RADS patient exposed to toluene and that his other RADS patients had been exposed to chemicals stronger and more irritating than toluene; he did not explain how any of the other chemicals he believed caused RADS had properties similar to the toluene. The District Court excluded the expert's causation opinion, although it allowed him to testify about his examination of the plaintiff, the tests he conducted, and the RADS diagnosis. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the en banc Court found no abuse of discretion. The expert had not given any reasons why his examination and tests were important to his conclusion and he offered no scientific support for his general theory that toluene exposure at any level would cause RADS. One Judge concurred in the result and one Judge concurred specially to state that neither exclusion nor admission of this expert's testimony would be an abuse of discretion. Three Judges dissented, arguing that a clinical physician may express a causation opinion based on generally accepted clinical methodology without hard scientific corroboration under Daubert, and that the temporal connection between exposure and onset is an important consideration in determining causation. In a wrongful death action, Allen v. Pennsylvania Eng'g Corp., n194 the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant, holding that expert testimony concluding that the decedent's brain cancer was caused by exposure to ethylene oxide had been properly excluded. The Court found the testimony insufficiently reliable, where no epidemiological study had found a statistically significant link between EtO exposure and human brain cancer; the results of animal studies were inconclusive at best; and there was no evidence of the level of the plaintiff's occupational exposure to EtO. Rejecting the experts' "weight of the evidence" methodology in concluding that EtO caused brain cancer, the Court noted that although government agencies use the methodology to establish prophylactic rules governing human exposure to possible carcinogens, this preventive perspective is based on a threshold of proof that is "reasonably lower than that appropriate in tort law."

Cantrell v. GAF Corp., 999 F.2d 1007 (6th Cir. 1993) : Affirming judgments for employees exposed to asbestos during the course of their employment, the Court held that a doctor was properly permitted to testify that exposure to asbestos and smoking together caused one plaintiff's laryngeal cancer and to base his opinion both on epidemiological evidence reported in medical literature and on his examination of the plaintiff and two other employees with laryngeal cancer. The Court stated that "[n]othing in Rules 702 or 703 or in Daubert prohibits an expert witness from testifying to confirmatory data, gained through his own clinical experience, on the origins of a disease or the consequences of exposure to certain conditions."

Wintz v. Northrop Corp., 110 F.3d 508 (7th Cir. 1997) : To defeat a summary judgment motion, the plaintiffs proffered the testimony of a toxicologist who concluded that the plaintiff-infant's birth defects were caused by exposure to bromide in utero. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held there was no error in finding this testimony insufficiently reliable under Daubert. At the time he formed his opinion, the witness knew only that the infant's mother had worked with a chemical containing bromide, and that the infant's symptoms were consistent with bromide exposure. He did not know the amount or extent of exposure or the specifics of the work environment, nor did he attempt to correlate any specific dose the mother received with the infant's symptoms. In an action by workers who allegedly became ill due to pesticide exposure, Bradley v. Brown, 42 F.3d 434 (7th Cir. 1994) , the plaintiffs offered clinical ecologists' opinions that "multiple chemical sensitivity" was a proximate cause of their injuries. The Court held there was no error in rejecting the evidence, where the experts' methodology was merely anecdotal and their opinion would be entirely too subjective and speculative, and peer review of clinical ecology pointed to the conclusion that the "science" of MCS's etiology had not progressed from the hypothetical to knowledge capable of assisting a factfinder. In O'Conner v. Commonwealth Edison Co., n195 a personal injury action by a nuclear power plant worker against a public utility and a contractor, the Court held there was no error in excluding testimony by the plaintiff's causation expert that he could determine whether cataracts were radiation-induced simply by observation. The articles referenced by the expert established that his methodology had no basis in scientific fact.

Bonner v. ISP Technologies, Inc., 259 F.3d 924 (8th Cir. 2001) : An assembly line worker sued for psychological problems and other symptoms allegedly caused by exposure to an organic solvent. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admission of expert causation testimony. One expert was permitted to give his opinion that exposure to the solvent caused the plaintiff's acute symptoms but not his opinion that it caused her permanent symptoms; while he relied on essentially the same scientific bases for both opinions, the Court noted that the temporal connection made the former opinion reliable enough to pass Rule 702 muster. The Court rejected arguments that another expert's opinion should have been excluded because his theory was developed for litigation, was not subjected to peer review, had not appeared in scientific literature, and was not supported by epidemiological studies. The defendant had not cited any scientific theory or studies contradicting the expert's theory, and the Trial Judge had "conducted an exacting review of the science involved and correctly concluded that, because Dr. Singer's methodology was scientifically valid, the scientific questions were best addressed by allowing each side to present its experts and then submitting their opinions to the jury." In a product liability action for respiratory disease, Turner v. Iowa Fire Equip. Co., 229 F.3d 1202, 2000-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P15900 (8th Cir. 2000) , the plaintiff offered testimony from her treating physician that her condition was caused by baking soda accidentally discharged from fire extinguishing equipment at her workplace. Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, the Court held that: Daubert applies to treating physicians testifying as experts just as much as to physicians hired solely for purposes of litigation; the witness' differential diagnosis was performed for the purpose of identifying the plaintiff's condition, not its cause; his causation opinion was not based on a methodology that had been tested, subjected to peer review, and generally accepted in the medical community, since he did not systematically rule out all other possible causes; and his opinion did not gain reliability simply because a few publications indicated that the condition could have been caused as alleged, when he had not relied on those items in formulating his opinion and he did not scientifically eliminate other possible causes. In National Bank of Commerce v. Associated Milk Producers, Inc., n196 a cheese plant employee sued a milk supplier alleging that his laryngeal cancer was caused by five exposures to aerosolized milk containing aflatoxin M-1 (AFM). The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the plaintiff's expert testimony because: the experts had no scientific knowledge of the level of AFM exposure that would subject a person in the plaintiff's circumstances to an appreciable risk of laryngeal cancer; there were no scientific studies or medical literature correlating AFM and laryngeal cancer; the studies on which the experts relied did not support a finding that the levels of AFM in this case could cause laryngeal cancer; and none of the experts based their opinions on pre-litigation research on AFM, none were oncologists, none examined or treated the plaintiff, and the treating physician was not called as a witness. In Hose v. Chicago N.W. Transp. Co., n197 a railroad employee sued under the FELA, alleging that he suffered manganese encephalopathy arising from his work as a welder. The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, holding that the plaintiff's medical testimony regarding causation was admissible although the experts did not demonstrate that the plaintiff suffered clinically verifiable signs of Parkinson's disease. The Court noted that such signs are usual or typical in cases involving manganese encephalopathy, but concluded that the employer did not demonstrate that manganese encephalopathy must be accompanied by signs of Parkinson's disease.

Schudel v. General Elec. Co., 120 F.3d 991 (9th Cir. 1997) : In a toxic exposure case arising at an industrial plant, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit testimony from a toxicologist that a plaintiff suffered from encephalopathy which was caused by exposure to certain solvents. The testimony lacked reliability because it was based on studies involving other organic solvents, and there was no showing that it was scientifically acceptable to draw general conclusions about the neurotoxicity of the solvents from studies of other chemicals, especially when testimony indicated that small differences in molecular structure often have significant consequences. Furthermore, the plaintiff's exposure was neither long enough nor intense enough to fall within the ranges described in the studies, and there was no showing that extrapolation outside those ranges was scientifically acceptable. In a FELA case for alleged chemical exposure, Claar v. Burlington N. R.R., 29 F.3d 499 (9th Cir. 1994) , the Trial Judge reviewed the plaintiffs' experts' reasoning and methodology and concluded that they lacked the foundation and reliability necessary to support expert testimony. Affirming summary judgment for the defense, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the opinions under Rule 702, as the experts had failed to explain their conclusions, had failed to follow what they conceded to be standard procedures in making a diagnosis, and had formed their opinions before reading the relevant literature.

Goebel v. Denver & R.G.W. R.R., 346 F.3d 987 (10th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an employee alleging that he sustained acute high altitude cerebral edema (HACE) as a result of exposure to diesel fumes and pollutants in a high-altitude railroad tunnel. Finding no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony from the plaintiff's causation expert, the Court concluded that the Judge's review of the scientific literature supported a finding of an adequate link between the existing data and the expert's conclusions regarding general and specific causation. There was no abuse of discretion in the finding that the plaintiff's expert's differential diagnosis was reliable, since it followed a standard and accepted methodology, the expert adequately explained why the plaintiff might not have exhibited every symptom of the diagnosed condition, and the expert adequately considered and ruled out most of the alternative explanations for HACE. In Mitchell v. Gencorp., 165 F.3d 778 (10th Cir. 1999) , the plaintiff claimed that exposure to benzene in the company's "flammable room" caused him to contract chronic myelogenous leukemia. To establish the level of his exposure to toxic chemicals, he proffered the testimony of an industrial hygienist, who relied on the plaintiff's statements, a review of safety data sheets, and pictures showing some chemical spills in the "flammable room." The Court found no error in exclusion of the testimony, for "[i]t makes little sense to argue that a scientist can look at pictures and a list of chemicals contained in a room and arrive at a level of exposure." To establish causation, the plaintiff proffered the testimony of four doctors, who relied on published works indicating a link between exposure to benzene and certain types of leukemia other than that suffered by the plaintiff. Again, there was no error in exclusion, since there was no evidence that the plaintiff had actually been exposed to benzene, and the doctors did not have scientific data supporting their conclusion that the plaintiff's admitted exposure to chemicals similar to benzene would affect the body in the same way as benzene. Moreover, even if the plaintiff were exposed to benzene, the studies on which the doctors relied indicated that benzene caused a type of leukemia different than that contracted by the plaintiff.

[d] Scientific Evidence -- DNA Identification

United States v. Shea, 211 F.3d 658 (1st Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed racketeering, carjacking, and other convictions, finding no error when a government expert was permitted to testify that DNA in blood samples of two defendants matched DNA found at different crime scenes. The Trial Judge conducted a lengthy Daubert hearing, and the Court concluded that any flaws in the expert's application of an otherwise reliable methodology went to weight and credibility and not to admissibility.

United States v. Jakobetz, 955 F.2d 786 (2d Cir. 1992) : Affirming a kidnapping conviction, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting DNA profiling evidence. In determining that the helpfulness standard had been met, the Trial Judge had carefully considered the general acceptance of the theory and the specific techniques used to apply it, as well as the reliability of the particular data being offered. The Court stated that in future cases, judicial notice could be taken of the theory and techniques of DNA profiling and admissibility should require only a preliminary showing of the reliability of the particular data.

United States v. Trala, 386 F.3d 536 (3d Cir. 2004) : The prosecution in a bank robbery case elicited expert testimony connecting the defendant with a cap worn by the robber through DNA identification by the PCR/STR method. Although the defendant objected that the method was not reliable when applied to samples containing mixed DNA, the Court found there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence and noted that the Trial Judge's "painstaking opinion provides a thorough and compelling analysis of the court's rejection of Trala's challenges to the DNA evidence."

United States v. Beverly, 369 F.3d 516 (6th Cir. 2004) : Affirming convictions for bank robberies and firearms offenses, the Court rejected claims that it was an abuse of discretion to admit testimony concerning mtDNA evidence (mitochondrial DNA). The Court noted that "mtDNA is not as precise an identifier as nuclear DNA," and "[b]ecause it is not possible to achieve the extremely high level of certainty of identity provided by DNA, mtDNA typing has been said to be a test of exclusion, rather than one of identification." However, the Trial Judge conducted careful and extensive hearings, the scientific basis for the use of mtDNA evidence was well established, the testing methods were sufficiently reliable to be admissible, and any questions relating to the specific tests in question were fully developed and subject to cross-examination. In United States v. Bonds, 12 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed conspiracy and firearms convictions, holding that DNA evidence presented by the government that was admitted under the Frye general acceptance test would have met the Daubert test. Issues such as the reliability of the particular application of the methodology and the possibility of ethnic substructure affecting frequency estimates go to the weight, not the admissibility, of the evidence.

United States v. Boswell, 270 F.3d 1200 (8th Cir. 2001) : A veterinarian was convicted for making false statements to the government in a swine disease eradication program by adulterating or substituting blood samples taken from hogs. To prove that certain samples did not come from the same sources, the government offered PCR test results of the swine DNA. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence, as the PCR process is approximately ten years old, has undergone extensive testing, has been recognized as reliable for matching human DNA, and was shown to be an acceptable and recognized test on swine DNA in the DNA testing community. Finally, the defendant failed to prove that there were any significant deficiencies in the protocol and procedures used by the laboratory conducting the tests in this case. In United States v. Beasley, 102 F.3d 1440 (8th Cir. 1996) , the Court held that DNA testing by the polymerase chain reaction method was reliable under Daubert, and that Courts could take judicial notice of its reliability in the future. The Court found that any potential for contamination of samples was a question of weight rather than admissibility, but it noted that in any particular case, "the reliability of the proffered test results may be challenged by showing that a scientifically sound methodology has been undercut by sloppy handling of the samples, failure to properly train those performing the testing, failure to follow the proper protocols, and the like." In United States v. Black Cloud, n198 the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when a DNA expert was permitted to testify in an incest case that the defendant's genes matched the paternal genes of his niece's child at all three of the examined locations and that only one in 2237 Native Americans have all three of the genes and could possibly be the child's father. The Trial Judge conducted a hearing and found that the expert's scientific techniques were reliable before admitting the testimony.

United States v. Hicks, 103 F.3d 837 (9th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a conviction for carjacking, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting expert testimony, based on the polymerase chain reaction method of DNA testing, that none of the three perpetrators of the crime could be excluded as a contributor to the DNA sample on a vaginal swab taken from a victim.

United States v. Davis, 40 F.3d 1069 (10th Cir. 1994) : Affirming convictions arising from an attempted armed robbery, the Court held that expert testimony of DNA identification had fulfilled the Daubert requirements. The government had called an FBI agent trained in DNA profiling, who testified as to how FBI technicians prepared samples, how the samples were tested, and how the protocol of DNA identification was followed in the specific case. The Court rejected the argument that evidence of statistical probability of a random match should not have been admitted, since "statistical probabilities are basic to DNA analysis and their use has been widely researched and discussed."

[e] Scientific Evidence -- Drug Identification

United States v. Ortiz, 610 F.2d 280 (5th Cir. 1980) : The Court rejected the defendant's attack on expert testimony that the substance he possessed was cocaine, since the expert's test was based upon accepted scientific theory and knowledge.

[f] Scientific Evidence -- Hair Identification

United States v. Cyphers, 553 F.2d 1064 (7th Cir. 1977) : Affirming convictions for armed bank robbery, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly admitted the testimony of a government witness that hairs recovered from articles used by the robbers were "microscopically like" hair samples taken from the defendants. The Court emphasized that there is no requirement that an expert opinion be expressed in terms of a reasonable scientific certainty. Rather, the lack of certainty is something that goes to the weight to be given the evidence, not to its admissibility.

[g] Scientific Evidence -- Oil Matching

United States v. Distler, 671 F.2d 954 (6th Cir. 1981) : Upholding a water pollution conviction, the Court found that "oil matching" by a gas chromatograph analysis was "a generally accepted method of matching oil samples," that the method was "highly reliable," and that it had "a significant degree of national and international recognition." Thus, expert testimony based on the method was held properly received, as it would be after Daubert.

[h] Scientific Evidence -- Other Cases

United States v. Sinskey, 119 F.3d 712 (8th Cir. 1997) : In a prosecution for Clean Water Act violations by manipulating test results when releasing waste water from a meat packing plant, the government introduced another employee's "secret logs" that recorded the actual level of ammonia nitrogen in the discharges. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the logs, since the means of testing used in preparing the logs was sufficiently accurate and reliable, and the deviations in this case from the standard protocol for doing the testing were shown not to affect the reliability of the results. In Pioneer Hi-Bred Int'l v. Holden Found. Seeds, Inc., 35 F.3d 1226 (8th Cir. 1994) , an action for alleged trade secret misappropriation of the genetic makeup of certain seed corn, the Court held that scientific evidence from electrophoresis, liquid chromatography, and growout testing was properly admitted, as the techniques were widely used in the industry, conducted by qualified experts, and considered helpful enough to be relied upon by both parties in the suit.

[i] Scientific Evidence -- Quantitative Electroencephalograms

Nadell v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't, 268 F.3d 924 (9th Cir. 2001) : The plaintiff claimed physical injuries resulting from police officers' excessive force. The Trial Judge excluded the plaintiff's expert, who had performed a quantitative electroenchephalogram (QEEG) on the plaintiff and concluded that the plaintiff suffered physical injuries during her arrest. The QEEG technique involves the mathematical processing, analysis, and display of digitally recorded EEG data. The Court found no error in the exclusion of the expert testimony. The QEEG technique was "error prone" and inadequately subjected to peer review. Moreover, the plaintiff had suffered serious head injuries as a child, and the QEEG technique could not distinguish between those previous injuries and any injuries that might have occurred during the arrest.

[j] Scientific Evidence -- Sexual Abuse Cases

United States v. Powers, 59 F.3d 1460 (4th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a defendant's conviction for sexual abuse of his minor daughter, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly excluded the results of a "penile plethysmograph" test offered to prove that the defendant did not exhibit the characteristics of a "fixated pedophile." The Court found that the test is not a valid diagnostic tool and that it lacked accepted standards, although it might be useful in the treatment of offenders.

United States v. Black Cloud, 101 F.3d 1258 (8th Cir. 1996) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when a DNA expert was permitted to testify in an incest case that the defendant's genes matched the paternal genes of his niece's child at all three of the examined locations and that only one in 2237 Native Americans have all three of the genes and could possibly be the child's father. The Trial Judge conducted a hearing and found that the expert's scientific techniques were reliable before admitting the testimony. In Gier v. Educational Serv. Unit No. 16, 66 F.3d 940 (8th Cir. 1995) , an action brought on behalf of handicapped children, alleging that they were physically and sexually abused while attending a state school, the Court found no error in the exclusion of experts who employed an evaluation methodology based on interviews with parents and clinical interviews with the children, including role playing with anatomically correct dolls. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 702.02[9].

[k] Scientific Evidence -- Voice Identification

United States v. Salimonu, 182 F.3d 63 (1st Cir. 1999) : The prosecution in a drug case introduced tape recordings of incriminating conversations and, for purposes of comparison, a voice exemplar that contained a recording of the defendant's voice. The defendant sought to introduce the testimony of two experts to establish that the voice on the taped conversation and the defendant's voice on the exemplar were different. The Trial Judge admitted testimony from the developer of a spectrogram computer program but would not permit a linguist to testify based on his listening to the tapes that the two voices were different. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the assessment below that the linguist's analysis was not reliable, given the absence of an error rate, testimony that voices could be disguised, and the lack of other indicia of reliability.

United States v. Jones, 24 F.3d 1177 (9th Cir. 1994) : Affirming a conviction for distributing cocaine base, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding proffered expert testimony on voice identification by a defense witness, where the witness had no specialized training, had himself developed the aural subjective comparison technique, did not employ a voice spectrograph, and could cite no studies or research supporting his theory or other experts who used his technique.

[85] Social Science Evidence

Wessmann v. Gittens, 160 F.3d 790 (1st Cir. 1998) : To show that teachers had low expectations of minority students, which was alleged to be an attitudinal remnant of the segregation era justifying continued minority set-asides in school admissions, the defendants in a Boston discrimination case offered testimony by a sociologist who based his conclusions on an analogy from a "climate survey" he had done of the Kansas City school system and on anecdotal evidence about teacher attitudes in the Boston system. Reversing a judgment for the defendants, the Court held that the expert's conclusions should not have been credited, since he had conceded that he had not brought the same scientific methodology and intellectual rigor to the analysis as he would in his out-of-court research.

United States v. Hammoud, 381 F.3d 316 (4th Cir. 2004) (en banc): The defendant was convicted for activities supporting Hizballah, a designated foreign terrorist organization. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony from a former FBI agent currently employed by a think tank, who specialized in Middle Eastern terrorist groups. His methodology was one generally applied in the social sciences, collecting as much information as possible and balancing new information against the body of information previously built, and his findings were subject to continual peer review. The witness applied his methodology to his conclusions regarding this case and his conclusions regarding Hizbollah's structure, the significance of the defendant's contacts with the leaders of Hizbollah, and the relation of Hizbollah's funding activities to the defendant's activities were helpful to the jury in understanding the issues in the case.

Tyus v. Urban Search Mgt., 102 F.3d 256 (7th Cir. 1996) : In the trial of a Fair Housing Act suit alleging that advertising for a rental building targeted only whites, the plaintiffs proffered two social science experts, one to testify how an all-white advertising campaign affects African-Americans and the other about the history of racial discrimination in the local market. Both were precluded on the ground that their testimony was too general to be helpful, but the Court, reversing a judgment for the defendants, held it was error not to scrutinize the testimony under the Daubert "framework," to ensure "that the person possesses genuine expertise in a field and that her court testimony adheres to the same standards of intellectual rigor that are demanded in her professional work." The Court added that "the measure of intellectual rigor will vary by the field of expertise and the way of demonstrating expertise will also vary. Furthermore, ... genuine expertise may be based on experience or training."

[86] Specialized Knowledge Lacking

City of Hobbs v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 162 F.3d 576 (10th Cir. 1998) : In the City's suit against insurer for bad faith in defense of an action arising from a police shooting, the City proffered an expert who would have testified, on the basis of 30 years' experience in claims handling, that the insurer had handled the claim improperly. The Judge excluded the expert because, while generally knowledgeable about insurance claims handling, he lacked "specialized knowledge about handling of bad faith cases in New Mexico involving third party insurance disputes." The Court found no abuse of discretion, noting that "[alt]hough a proffered expert possesses knowledge as to a general field, the expert who lacks specific knowledge does not necessarily assist the jury."

[87] Standards of Conduct

[a] Medical Malpractice

Schneider v. Fried, 320 F.3d 396 (3d Cir. 2003) : Reversing the dismissal of a medical malpractice case because the plaintiff's medical experts had been improperly precluded from testifying, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude an expert's testimony because he has said at one point that he was commenting on his own practice, not that of other physicians. Despite that comment, he had testified extensively about the general standard of care, which was the proper subject of his testimony.

Dickenson v. Cardiac & Thoracic Surgery of E. Tenn., P.C., 388 F.3d 976 (6th Cir. 2004) : In a medical malpractice action against a cardiology practice and a pulmonologist for brain damage allegedly caused by premature removal of the plaintiff's ventilation tube following cardiac surgery, the Trial Judge did not permit the plaintiff's expert to testify concerning the standard of care regarding removal of a ventilation tube because he was a cardiac thoracic surgeon and was not trained in pulmonology, had never written any articles on the subject, and "could not identify any articles about pulmonology which he has read." Affirming summary judgment for the cardiology practice, the Court found that the witness had no basis for his opinion that the cardiac surgeon is responsible for the pulmonologist's decision of when to extubate a patient, and there was contrary evidence from the affidavits of five local physicians regarding the local practice as to responsibility for patient management.

[b] Standards of Conduct -- Miscellaneous Cases

Hintz v. Jamison, 743 F.2d 535 (7th Cir. 1984) : The Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting a civil engineer to testify to the state's requirements for signs on roads.

Sherbert v. Alcan Aluminum Corp., 66 F.3d 965 (8th Cir. 1995) : The plaintiff broke his leg when heavy material slipped off a forklift operated by an employee of the defendant. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found that expert testimony was not necessary to establish a standard of care for forklift operation. The Court declared that

"[t]he operation of a forklift involves simple principles of balance well within the common knowledge of lay jurors." In Carlsen v. Javurek, n199 the Court reversed judgments for defendants in an action for the wrongful death of a hospital patient because the jury had been instructed that it could only find negligence on the basis of expert opinion; the lack of care alleged in the instant case was comprehensible to lay jurors.

McKenzie v. Benton, 388 F.3d 1342 (10th Cir. 2004) : A former deputy sheriff with a history of psychological problems sued the county sheriff alleging that his refusal to rehire her violated the Americans with Disabilities Act. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court found no error in the admission of testimony by a Chicago police supervisor that it would be "totally improper" to rehire the plaintiff because she had engaged in dangerous behavior and her medical/mental health history made it unreasonable to rehire her. The supervisor's long experience would have assisted the jury in determining whether the plaintiff was qualified for the position, whether it was "objectively reasonable" for the sheriff not to rehire her, and whether the plaintiff was a direct threat to herself or others. The Court also found no plain error when a psychologist who was an expert in law enforcement qualification standards testified that the sheriff's department acted in a reasonable manner in not pursuing the plaintiff's re-employment application.

[88] State Law

In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litig., 35 F.3d 717 (3d Cir. 1994) : The Court held that Pennsylvania's requirement that an expert giving a causation opinion testify "to a reasonable degree of medical certainty" was an element of the plaintiff's burden of proof, not just a standard of admissibility. Therefore, the requirement applied in a diversity case, even though federal evidence law imposes no such requirement. In Salas v. Wang, n200 the Court held that, whether or not state law would permit an expert to so testify, it was not reversible error to permit a plaintiff's expert to testify as to aggregate damages in a medical malpractice case brought on behalf of a child who suffered severe brain damage. The Court concluded that the expert might have been able to assist the jury in performing calculations, such as a reduction of a lump sum award to present value, and that the federal approach to expert testimony was at least arguably procedural, so federal law applied.

El-Meswari v. Washington Gas Light Co., 785 F.2d 483 (4th Cir. 1986) : In a wrongful death action, the Court found no error in the exclusion of expert testimony concerning a mother's physical injuries allegedly resulting from the loss of her son. The governing Virginia law recognizes damages for emotional anguish but not indirect physical injuries, and the Court concluded that the jury was capable of ascertaining whether the mother suffered emotional distress without hearing lengthy expert testimony concerning noncompensable injuries that was offered as corroboration of the distress.

Zachery v. Wheeler, 511 F. Supp. 591 (E.D. Tenn. 1981) : In this diversity case arising from an auto accident, the Court rejected the testimony of an accidentologist, but first decided that the ruling would not create such a conflict with Tennessee decisions as to encourage forum shopping.

Stutzman v. CRST, Inc., 997 F.2d 291 (7th Cir. 1993) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiffs in an automobile accident case, the Court held that the Federal Rules on experts apply in diversity cases and that expert testimony that the accident could have aggravated a medical condition was admissible, even though State Courts would have required that the doctor testify to a reasonable degree of medical certainty.

McGowne v. Challenge-Cook Bros., 672 F.2d 652 (8th Cir. 1982) : In a product liability diversity action the Court looked to state law to determine admissibility of expert opinion regarding the effect of inflation on the lost earning capacity of a deceased. It also observed, however, that under Rule 702 the District Judge has great discretion in ruling on the scope of expert testimony.

[89] Statistical Evidence

[a] Employment Cases

Currier v. United Tech. Corp., 393 F.3d 246 (1st Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in an age discrimination case, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of statistical evidence that a reduction in the work force had a disproportionate effect on older employees. Although the expert's "analysis skittered near the line of inadmissibility," the Court found that the defendant cross-examined the expert and showed the flaws in his analysis, and that the defendant also challenged the probative value of the statistics before the jury, which was situated to assess their significance.

Raskin v. Wyatt Co., 125 F.3d 55 (2d Cir. 1997) : In an ADEA action, the plaintiff's expert statistician had found that the defendant's employees retired earlier than comparable employees in the workforce generally, and concluded that this was attributable to the defendant's discrimination against older workers. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court found that this testimony was properly excluded as unreliable under Daubert. First, the expert did not account for the presence in the comparison group of those without pension plans and those who were self-employed -- "categories of people who tend to work longer and to an older age than people who work for companies that have pension plans." Thus, the expert artificially inflated the retirement age in the comparison group. Second, the expert failed to account for other possible causes of differentiation between the defendant's employees and the population at large.

Anderson v. Westinghouse Savannah R. Co., 406 F.3d 248 (4th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants in an action by black employees alleging disparate impact of their employers' Ranked Performance Pay Process (RP3). The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the plaintiff's expert statistician regarding racial differences in the rankings under RP3, since the expert analyzed by job groupings across the Savannah River site, rather than by individual jobs within each division as the employers' policy called for using the RP3 ranking process. As a result the expert's studies failed to compare similarly situated workers and were thus not relevant.

Tyler v. Union Oil Co., 304 F.3d 379 (5th Cir. 2002) : In an age discrimination case, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony for the plaintiffs by a statistician. Although the class protected by the ADEA is employees over 40, the Court held that statistical groupings comparing employees over 50 with those under 50 were permissible, since an ADEA plaintiff may establish a prima facie case by showing replacement by someone younger, even if the replacement was within the protected class. The defendant's objection that the expert created his own database went to probative weight rather than to admissibility, since there was no suggestion that the compilation itself was unreliable and the argument that the underlying data, which had been provided by the defendant in discovery, was unreliable was raised in cross-examination. Objections to the omission of variables and to the use of age as a continuous variable in the analysis also went to weight rather than admissibility. In Mu noz v. Orr, 200 F.3d 291 (5th Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants in a Title VII class action by Hispanic males challenging promotion practices at an Air Force base. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence from the plaintiffs' statistical expert. In particular, his analysis began with an assumption that there was discrimination, an indicator of lack of objectivity; his report stated that discrimination was the "cause" of disparities, when statistics can show only correlation, not causation; the analysis failed to consider other variables, such as education and experience, as explanations for observed discrepancies, and it did not include a multiple regression analysis; and the expert relied only on the plaintiffs' compilations of data, giving rise to "common-sense skepticism" regarding the evaluation.

Bennett v. Roberts, 295 F.3d 687 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming summary judgment against an African-American applicant who alleged racial discrimination in a school district's hiring practices, the Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence from the plaintiff's statistical expert, since the expert had not properly identified the relevant labor market in his analysis. The expert had not considered the degree to which potential applicants in the metropolitan statistical area would be interested in working in the district, the effects of commuting patterns on the relevant pool, or the extent to which the district would hire applicants from within the state. In Bell v. Environmental Protection Agency, 232 F.3d 546 (7th Cir. 2000) , EPA employees who had been denied promotions brought Title VII claims based on race and national origin discrimination. Reversing summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held it was error not to have considered expert evidence that there were statistically significant differences between native and foreign born applicants in receiving promotions and that there were differences, although not statistically significant, regarding promotion of African-Americans. Although statistics cannot be used as the primary means of establishing discrimination in disparate treatment situations, they can be used in conjunction with other evidence of disparate treatment to show whether the alleged disparity is the result of discrimination. The Court also held that the plaintiffs' analysis of all promotions in the upper Midwest region of the EPA, rather than just the 16 eligible applicants for the position used by the Judge, encompassed the appropriate labor market. In Adams v. Ameritech Servs., Inc., n201 an age discrimination action by employees terminated or demoted during a downsizing program, summary judgment was granted for the defendants after evidence from a statistician that showed correlations between the ages of employees and the companies' decisions to terminate was excluded. Reversing, the Court observed that statistical evidence can be very useful to prove discrimination when the theory is disparate treatment or discriminatory pattern and practice, although it will likely not be sufficient in itself. The Court concluded that the expert's studies were prepared in a reliable and statistically sound way, containing relevant evidence that a trier of fact would have been entitled to consider. In Sheehan v. Daily Racing Form, Inc., n202 the plaintiff sued for age discrimination when he was terminated in a corporate downsizing. The plaintiff opposed the employer's motion for summary judgment with the affidavit of a statistician, who compared the age of those dismissed and those retained, and concluded that the probability that retention of office personnel was uncorrelated with age was less than five percent. Affirming the grant of summary judgment to the employer, the Court held that the affidavit failed to meet the Daubert standard: the statistician's methodology was defective because he arbitrarily excluded certain personnel from the sample tested, and he failed to correct for any potential explanatory variations other than age. The expert's failure to make any adjustment for variables bearing on the decision whether to discharge or retain a person on the list other than age indicated a failure to exercise the degree of care that a statistician would use in his scientific work, outside the context of litigation. In Tagatz v. Marquette Univ., n203 a case in which the plaintiff served as his own expert witness, the Court rejected the argument "that if the plaintiff in a Title VII case presents evidence that passes standard tests of statistical significance, the defendant must present a statistically significant rebuttal or lose." It reasoned that when data show a real, not a spurious, difference between the means of two samples, they do not necessarily demonstrate that the difference is due to a particular attribute such as religious or age discrimination.

Wilmington v. J.I. Case Co., 793 F.2d 909 (8th Cir. 1986) : The Court upheld a judgment for a plaintiff who sued his employer for subjecting him to discriminatory terms and conditions of employment because of his race. It found no error in the admission of expert testimony that the relationship between the number of blacks employed by the defendant and the percentage of discharged workers who were black was statistically significant. Although there were only 27 discharges, the Court found that the statistical base was not too small to support the testimony.

Hemmings v. Tidyman's Inc., 285 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a judgment for two women who sued their employer for gender discrimination, the Court upheld the plaintiffs' statistical expert's decision to compare gender disparities in promotions and wages by using a data set composed entirely of the company's management employees.

The Court rejected arguments that the data set did not include the "qualified individuals" for promotion or that it should have used only corporate management and not the management employees of local stores.

[b] Statistical Evidence -- Other Cases

Gideon v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 761 F.2d 1129 (5th Cir. 1985) : In an action by a plaintiff who sued after contracting asbestosis, the Court sustained judgments against some, but not all asbestos manufacturers, and upheld the introduction of testimony by a biostatistician-epidemiologist specializing in the cause of disease, who testified concerning the risk of cancer and reduced life expectancy associated with asbestosis.

United States v. August, 745 F.2d 400 (6th Cir. 1984) : An attorney and a Bankruptcy Court intake clerk were convicted for a scheme to circumvent the blind draw case assignment system so that few of the lawyer's cases would be assigned to a particular Bankruptcy Judge. The Court affirmed, finding that the Trial Judge properly permitted an expert statistician to testify concerning the low mathematical probability that, absent manipulation of the blind draw system, the Judge whom the attorney avoided would have received so few of the attorney's cases. The expert's testimony was "highly probative and appropriate to assist the jury in interpreting the statistical significance of the distribution."

People Who Care v. Rockford Bd. of Educ., 111 F.3d 528 (7th Cir. 1997) : The Court held that expert testimony attributing discrimination as the cause for minority students underperforming was unreliable under Daubert; the expert made no attempt to exclude causes other than poverty, and used an unreliable indicator of poverty levels.

Marvin Lumber & Cedar Co. v. PPG Indus., Inc., 401 F.3d 901 (8th Cir. 2005) : The manufacturer of wooden windows sued the manufacturer of a wood preservative, alleging that the preservative allowed premature rot in the windows, which caused the plaintiff to lose profits and goodwill. Affirming in part a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by a statistician who evaluated wood-rot data collected by the plaintiff. The defendant argued that the data had been collected by the plaintiff's legal department and that the sample was too small and not representative, but the Court concluded that this challenge went primarily to the factual basis for the expert's analysis rather than to its evidentiary reliability, and thus to the credibility, not the admissibility, of the evidence. In United States v. Sdoulam, 398 F.3d 981 (8th Cir. 2005) , the defendant, an operator of convenience stores, was charged with conspiring to distribute pseudophedrine with reason to believe it would be used to manufacture methamphetamine. The prosecution offered testimony from a statistician who, using local and national census and marketing data, compared the pseudophedrine sales at the defendant's stores with the estimated monthly average at convenience stores nationwide and opined that the difference was so great that the possibility of its occurring by chance was infinitesimal. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, since the expert laid an adequate foundational support for his conclusions and made no statement regarding the mathematical probability that the defendant was guilty of the crimes charged.

United States v. Artero, 121 F.3d 1256 (9th Cir. 1997) : The Court rejected the defendant's challenge to the ethnic composition of the grand jury, which was based on testimony from a statistician that the percentage of Hispanics on the jury wheel was substantially less than the percentage of Hispanics in the local population. This conclusion of underrepresentation was unreliable, because the expert used the percentage of Hispanics in the general population, whereas "[t]he right question is whether Hispanics eligible to serve on federal juries were unreasonably represented because of systematic exclusion," and many Hispanics in Southern California have recently arrived in this country and as such are ineligible for jury service. In United States v. Gwaltney, n204 the Court affirmed a conviction of a police officer for violating civil rights, finding that expert statistical evidence concerning the percentage of the male population whose semen would contain a certain blood antigen and enzyme and the percentage of males with antisperm antibodies could be helpful to the trier of fact. In United States v. Rogers, n205 the Court sustained a defendant's convictions for five armed bank robberies, holding that an FBI agent properly testified as an expert that out of 1,800 bank robberies in the Los Angeles area, only two involved a person wearing a bandanna when exiting a vault. It rejected the argument that the statistical evidence would be given undue weight by a jury.

City of Tuscaloosa v. Harcros Chems., Inc., 158 F.3d 548, 1998-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P72307 (11th Cir. 1998) : In an antitrust action against five chemical companies alleging that the defendants engaged in a conspiracy to fix prices for repackaged chlorine, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion when the entire testimony of the statistician proffered by the plaintiffs was excluded. The Judge's exclusion of the testimony because it failed to show a successful conspiracy was a "conflation of admissibility issues with issues regarding the sufficiency of the plaintiffs' evidence." The expert was not required to prove the plaintiffs' case by himself. The Court found that the expert utilized well-established and reliable methodologies in the preparation of most of his statistics. However, there was no error in excluding the statistician's testimony insofar as he characterized certain bids as "signals" to coconspirators, and insofar as he testified about applicable legal standards; testimony on these subjects was outside the witness' expertise.

[90] Sufficiency of Expert Testimony

B.F. Goodrich v. Betkoski, 99 F.3d 505 (2d Cir. 1996) , clarified, 112 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 1997) : The Court reversed summary judgments for defendants in a CERCLA case, because the Trial Court had disregarded, as "lacking 'probative merit,' " a 141-page affidavit by the plaintiffs' expert. The "carefully researched, detailed, and directly relevant" affidavit was based on summaries of admissible evidence and on reports of the sort ordinarily relied on by experts in forming opinions in their field of expertise, even though not all the reports were attached to the affidavit and not all the underlying facts and data were detailed. Furthermore, the expert's opinion relied on the methodology and data typically used and accepted in these sorts of cases, and was not "junk science." In In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., n206 on remand from a decision n207 holding the plaintiff's expert's evidence that asbestos caused colon cancer sufficient to defeat summary judgment, the jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff. The Trial Court, however, granted judgment as a matter of law for the defendants, on the ground that Daubert imposed an obligation on the Judge to scrutinize strictly expert testimony for its sufficiency as well as its admissibility. Reversing and reinstating the verdict, the Court of Appeals held that Daubert did not change the standard for assessing the sufficiency of evidence or for granting judgment as a matter of law. While the Trial Judge has an expanded role in assessing the admissibility of scientific expert testimony, this does not allow the Judge to usurp the jury's function by acting as a gatekeeper as to sufficiency.

Marbled Murrelet v. Babbitt, 83 F.3d 1060 (9th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed the grant of injunctive relief against a logging company in an action by an environmental group to protect a nesting habitat. It held that, because the company failed to request a ruling at trial on its Daubert objections to expert testimony, it could not make a sufficiency of the evidence argument on appeal that seemed to be based on a Daubert analysis.

[91] Sufficient Facts or Data as Basis

Stecyk v. Bell Helicopter Textron, Inc., 295 F.3d 408 (3d Cir. 2002) : The plaintiffs, suing for wrongful death in a helicopter crash, alleged that a shaft seal was installed backwards and leaked flammable fluid, which was ingested by an engine as the craft was attempting to land. To prove that the flammable fluid had another source, an expert for the defendant manufacturer testified that it was hydraulic fluid. The plaintiffs objected that the testimony lacked an adequate factual basis because there was insufficient evidence of the presence of hydraulic fluid inside the engine. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court found a sufficient factual foundation in evidence that hydraulic fluid was found in places where it should not have been, including outside the engine and near the engine. Once the defendant met the foundational requirements for admissibility, it was up to the plaintiffs to highlight the weaknesses in the expert's opinion through cross-examination. One Judge dissented, finding the expert's factual foundation insufficient.

[92] Summary Judgment

Cortes-Irizarry v. Corporacion Insular, 111 F.3d 184 (1st Cir. 1997) : Vacating an order for summary judgment in a medical malpractice case, the Court held that Daubert review of expert testimony on summary judgment should proceed with caution:

> Given the complex factual inquiry required by Daubert, courts will be hard-pressed in all but the most clearcut cases to gauge the reliability of expert proof on a truncated record. Because the summary judgment process does not conform well to the discipline that Daubert imposes, the Daubert regime should be employed only with great care and circumspection at the summary judgment stage.

First United Fin. Corp. v. United States Fid. & Guar. Co., 96 F.3d 135 (5th Cir. 1996) : Opposing a motion for summary judgment in a suit to recover on a fidelity bond for losses resulting from employee dishonesty, the plaintiff proffered affidavits from two financial experts who reviewed pertinent bank files and records and concluded that certain employees acted dishonestly. Affirming the grant of summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held that this testimony was properly rejected, since an expert "may only assist and not replace the fact finder." The Court concluded that "the admissibility of expert testimony is governed by the same rules, whether at trial or on summary judgment."

Navarro v. Fuji Heavy Indus., Ltd., 117 F.3d 1027 (7th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a summary judgment for the defendant in a personal injury case, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly excluded an engineering expert's affidavit under Daubert. The expert asserted that the defendant, a car manufacturer, should have known about the risk of internal rusting, but the expert had not conducted a study of the matter and thus his assertions were "nakedly conclusional." Rejecting the plaintiff's argument that the gaps in the expert's testimony would have been filled in if the defendant, before moving for summary judgment, had deposed the expert, the Court declared that "there is no duty to cross-examine or depose your opponent's witnesses so that they can supplement the testimony they failed to give on direct examination or in their affidavit. An expert's affidavit must be sufficiently complete to satisfy the Daubert decision, and one of those criteria ... is that the expert show how his conclusion ... is grounded in -- follows from -- an expert study of the problem."

[93] Testing in Accordance with Legal Requirements

Rushing v. Kansas City S. Ry., 185 F.3d 496 (5th Cir. 1999) : Although the Court reversed a partial summary judgment for the defendant in a nuisance action by homeowners complaining of noise and vibrations from the defendant's property, it found no plain error in the admission of an expert affidavit submitted by the defendant. The expert used the test that is required by the federal Noise Control Act, and "[w]hen applicable law mandates the use of a particular test, the proponent of the test's results should not have to establish its reliability," and "its reliability irrebuttably should be presumed."

[94] Toxicology Tests

O'Neill v. Windshire-Copeland Assocs., 372 F.3d 281 (4th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a judgment for defendants in an action to recover for serious personal injuries suffered when the plaintiff fell from a second-story balcony at an apartment complex, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the results of a toxicology test taken while the plaintiff was being treated in the hospital were admitted. The test showed that the plaintiff had a blood alcohol content of.18 an hour after her fall. The Court rejected the argument that the use of an alcohol swab to sterilize her arm tainted the test. The fact that the test result was printed on a form that said "these results should not be used for any legal purpose" did not disqualify the test, given that doctors rely upon the test and reliable procedures are used in conducting it.

[95] Trial Court's Discretion

[a] Expert Testimony Confusing or Cumulative

El-Meswari v. Washington Gas Light Co., 785 F.2d 483 (4th Cir. 1986) : In a wrongful death action, the Court found no error in the exclusion of expert testimony concerning a mother's physical injuries allegedly resulting from the loss of her son. The governing Virginia law recognizes damages for emotional anguish but not indirect physical injuries, and the Court concluded that the jury was capable of ascertaining whether the mother suffered emotional distress without hearing lengthy expert testimony concerning noncompensable injuries that was offered as corroboration of the distress.

United States v. Sinclair, 74 F.3d 753 (7th Cir. 1996) : The Court held, in the prosecution of a financial institution officer for taking kickbacks, that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding expert testimony as to the illegality of certain contractual relationships. Although the evidence might have tended to show a motive for bias in some of the witnesses, it was likely to distract or confuse the jury, and the defendant could raise an inference of bias in other ways. The Court rejected the defendant's argument that Daubert changed the way that probative value is balanced for expert testimony. In Spesco, Inc. v. General Elec. Co., n208 the Court affirmed a judgment holding the defendant liable for a fire. It found no error in the admission of testimony by one of the plaintiff's experts that allegedly departed from the theory of the other experts that had been disclosed during discovery. The expert's testimony was cumulative of that of other experts, so there was no error in denying the defendant a six-week continuance to conduct additional experiments in order to counter the expert's opinion.

Justice v. Carter, 972 F.2d 951 (8th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a legal malpractice action, holding there was clearly no abuse of discretion in precluding the plaintiffs from introducing "comparable" Court cases in support of their expert's opinion that their bankruptcy plan was feasible. Such evidence is not helpful to the jury and presents the dangers of having a malpractice decision turn on what a particular Judge would likely have done rather than on what a reasonable Judge would have decided.

Shad v. Dean Witter Reynolds, Inc., 799 F.2d 525 (9th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed convictions for "churning" stock accounts, finding it was error to exclude expert opinion on whether the accounts in question were churned. The Trial Judge excluded the testimony because it would have extended a four-day trial to 11 days, but "[c]hurning consists of the conjunction of three complex factors," and that expert testimony was necessary to help the jury understand these factors. In United States v. Gonzales, n209 the Court held there was no error in excluding expert testimony that a police officer did not communicate well in Spanish, offered to prove that the officer could not be sure that the defendant understood his rights, where the expert did not propose to test the officer's conversational ability and the evidence was cumulative. In United States v. Marabelles, n210 the Court affirmed a self-employed painter's convictions for tax evasion, finding no error in the exclusion of a defense expert, a bank loan officer, who would have testified to a reference manual's figures for the costs of producing income in the painting business. The testimony was, inter alia, cumulative of testimony by another witness.

Balogh's of Coral Gables, Inc. v. Getz, 798 F.2d 1356, 1986-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P67271 (11th Cir. 1986) (en banc), reinstating 778 F.2d 649, 1985-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P66889 (1985) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in an antitrust case, finding no error in the exclusion of expert testimony that might have complicated, rather than clarified, the one simple factual issue in the case. In United States v. Rouco, n211 the Court affirmed a conviction for murdering an undercover officer, ruling that the Trial Judge properly excluded expert testimony concerning arrest procedures offered by the defendant to support a claim that he believed the deceased was a "Mafia hit-man" who was trying to kill him. The Judge was warranted in concluding that the testimony would not help the jury assess the defendant's belief at the time of the killing and that any probative value was outweighed by the danger of confusion.

[b] Trial Court's Discretion -- Expert Testimony Prejudicial

Spencer v. General Elec. Co., 688 F. Supp. 1072 (E.D. Va. 1988) : In a sexual harassment case, the Judge held that the plaintiff could not introduce expert testimony that she suffered from posttraumatic stress disorder to prove that a rape occurred. He concluded that evidence of the disorder is not a reliable way of determining whether a rape occurred and that the prejudicial effect of the evidence outweighed its probative value.

United States v. Green, 548 F.2d 1261 (6th Cir. 1977) : At a trial for conspiracy to manufacture a controlled substance, government experts testified concerning the drug that the defendants were charged with conspiring to manufacture. Citing Rule 702, the Court stated that it was a clear abuse of discretion to allow the government to introduce extensive expert testimony of both dubious relevance and cumulative prejudicial impact, including the physiological effects of the drug being manufactured, its quantity, and its market price. "We view this invocation of the 'dope peddler' image as a highly inflammatory trial tactic which innately prejudiced Appellants' rights to a fair trial."

[c] Trial Court's Discretion -- Test for Reliabiliity

[96] Unhelpful Evidence -- Within Ordinary Understanding

McCabe v. Rattiner, 814 F.2d 839 (1st Cir. 1987) : The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of expert testimony in a libel action as to the meaning of the word "scam" as used in a newspaper story, on the ground that the testimony would not have helped the trier of fact.

United States v. Portsmouth Paving Corp., 694 F.2d 312, 1982-83 Trade Cas. (CCH) P65034 (4th Cir. 1982) : In the course of affirming convictions for conspiracy on the part of defendants to rig bids and fix prices in connection with highway construction, the Court found that the exclusion of expert testimony offered to suggest an innocent explanation for bidding patterns was permissible where "the proffered testimony of the appellants' expert did little more than correlate higher contracting costs with longer hauling distances," which added nothing to what other witnesses had said.

Peters v. Five Star Marine Serv., 898 F.2d 448 (5th Cir. 1990) : In an action for injuries suffered on a drilling platform, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by a maritime operations expert regarding the hazards of off-loading a vessel in heavy seas and the defendant's obligation to keep the deck clean and cargo properly stowed. Expert testimony would be unhelpful and unnecessary, as the jury could adeptly assess the situation using only their common experience and knowledge.

Stromback v. New Line Cinema, 384 F.3d 283 (6th Cir. 2004) : Affirming summary judgment for a movie distributor sued by the author of a poem and screenplay for copyright infringement, the Court held that no remand was needed to consider expert testimony: "[W]here, as here, the subject matter is not complex or technical, such as a computer program or a functional object, ... but instead involves a literary work aimed at a general audience, expert testimony will seldom be necessary to determine substantial similarity."

United States v. Welch, 368 F.3d 970 (7th Cir. 2004) : The defendant was charged in 2002 with the robbery of a credit union in 1997. Although he was not identified in a lineup, three individuals who knew him testified that they believed he was the man depicted in bank surveillance photographs. Affirming, the Court found no error when a defense expert was precluded from testifying regarding the propensity of witnesses to identify a person based on familiarity with clothing, the tendency of witnesses to misidentify a person based upon factors of which the witness is unaware, and the deterioration of memory over time. The testimony would not assist the jury, and there was no "fit" between the expert's testimony and the circumstances of the identifications, as the witnesses knew the defendant very well prior to the crime and had as much time as they needed to view the surveillance films in a stress-free atmosphere. In Hoffman v. Caterpillar, Inc., 368 F.3d 709 (7th Cir. 2004) , a plaintiff with only one arm brought an ADA action on the ground that her employer refused to train her to operate a high-speed document scanner. A pretrial in limine ruling precluded an expert for the plaintiff from testifying about her ability to operate the scanner at mandated production levels, on the ground that the expert had not observed the plaintiff operating the machine; however, the expert was permitted to testify generally about whether a one-handed person could operate the machine. After the in limine order and before the beginning of the trial, the plaintiff received instruction on the machine, and a videotape was made of her operating it. The Judge denied a request to change the in limine order, and the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant, finding no abuse of discretion in the ruling. Although the videotape would provide a sufficient basis for the expert's opinion, the jury could determine for themselves from the videotape the plaintiff's ability, so the expert testimony would be of no help. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant in a slip and fall case, Buckner v. Sam's Club, Inc., 75 F.3d 290 (7th Cir. 1996) , the Court upheld the exclusion of an expert's affidavit which merely stated the obvious: "[I]mproperly displayed merchandise can fall to the floor where someone might step on it and fall." The affidavit offered nothing to assist the trier of fact on the question of causation, because the plaintiff presented no evidence of the presence of any object on which she might have slipped.

United States v. Romo, 413 F.3d 1044 (9th Cir. 2005) : In a prosecution for threatening the President, the Court held it was error (but harmless) for the Director of Presidential Correspondence to testify that her office would have deemed the defendant's letter a direct threat to the President. The Court reasoned that "[n]o expert testimony was necessary on that point because the average juror requires no assistance assessing what a reasonable person would foresee," which is the statutory standard for threatening communications. Besides the witness' position "makes her highly sensitive to threats and far from an accurate bellwether of what a reasonable person would foresee." In United States v. Castaneda, 94 F.3d 592 (9th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed a narcotics convictions, holding that the Trial Judge properly excluded the testimony of a witness familiar with migrant farmworkers as to why an illegal alien might fear government officials. The Court concluded that the subject of the testimony was not one that needed illumination from an expert.

Ahrens v. Ford Motor Co., 340 F.3d 1142 (10th Cir. 2003) : The plaintiff's decedent was killed when the tractor he was driving ran over him as a result of a collision with a car. The plaintiff sued the tractor's manufacturer, alleging a defect because the tractor was not equipped with a rollover bar and a seat belt to protect the operator from rollover accidents and being thrown from the tractor. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the relevant factual issue was the degree to which the ordinary consumer would contemplate the danger of not having a seat belt in the event of a collision. To the extent that the plaintiff's expert addressed the risks of operating a tractor without a seat belt, the testimony was inadmissible because that risk could be understood by ordinary jurors. In a prosecution for securities and bankruptcy fraud, United States v. Affleck, n212 the Court found no error in the exclusion of expert testimony from a "memory expert," since "[t]he average person is able to understand that people forget."

Cook ex rel. Tessier v. Sheriff of Monroe County, 402 F.3d 1092 (11th Cir. 2005) : In an action brought after an inmate hanged himself, the plaintiff offered the testimony of an expert on suicide prevention in correctional facilities, who was prepared to testify that the detention center was deliberately indifferent to the risks of suicide in this case. The Court found no error in the exclusion of this testimony, as most of it covered obvious conclusions that the jury could make, and the rest was unsupported by a sufficient factual foundation.

[97] Value of Property

Ed Peters Jewelry Co. v. C & J Jewelry Co., 124 F.3d 252 (1st Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed judgment as a matter of law for the defendant in a sales agent's action to recover commissions, holding there was no error in excluding a CPA's testimony proffered by the plaintiff. Although the expert was giving an opinion on the value of a security interest in a company, he omitted certain liabilities, had no independent knowledge of the company's indebtedness, and used unreliable methodology in calculating significant items. In United States v. Kayne, 90 F.3d 7 (1st Cir. 1996) , the defendant was convicted of fraudulently selling rare coins at an inflated value. Affirming, the Court found no error in the admission of testimony from eight coin dealers that the coins sold by the defendant were of substantially lower quality and value than represented in the accompanying documentation. "Opinions of value are a traditional subject of expert testimony," and "[o]ne could hardly expect a lay jury to form conclusions about such an esoteric subject as the value of rare coins without the help of an expert."

FDIC v. Suna Assocs., 80 F.3d 681 (2d Cir. 1996) : In a proceeding for a deficiency judgment, the FDIC offered the testimony of an expert, who valued the real estate on the basis of a sale of all of the property to a single purchaser and testified that he used a valuation methodology that was a blend of two approaches to valuation: direct sales comparison and income capitalization. The defendant objected that the testimony was based on "a developmental analysis unknown to appraisal literature, unique to [the expert] and on factual assumptions which were without any reasonable foundation." But the Court, citing Daubert as establishing a flexible and permissive approach, found the expert's "hybrid of two widely-recognized methods" of valuation to be sufficiently reliable, and dismissed the internal contradictions in the expert's testimony as presenting a question of weight.

United States v. 68.94 Acres of Land, 918 F.2d 389 (3d Cir. 1990) : The Court vacated and remanded a judgment for landowners in an eminent domain case, holding it was an abuse of discretion to exclude expert testimony based in part on economic analysis, which is not considered in traditional appraisals. There was no abuse of discretion in striking testimony by a landowner regarding the property's value, which was based only on the opinion of another expert whose testimony was excluded pursuant to a proper discovery sanction.

United States v. 14.38 Acres of Land, 80 F.3d 1074 (5th Cir. 1996) (per curiam): In an eminent domain action, the District Court granted the government's motion in limine to exclude expert testimony regarding damages suffered as a result of moving a levee, on the ground that the testimony would be speculative because the experts were tentative about the possibility of flooding on the property. Vacating and remanding, the Court held that too stringent a reliability test had been applied and the experts' inability to predict the extent of flooding did not render their testimony entirely speculative; indeed, the government would not likely have erected a flood-control levee were the possibility mere speculation and conjecture.

Eckelkamp v. Beste, 315 F.3d 863 (8th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed judgments for the defendants in an action alleging breach of ERISA fiduciary duties, and found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the plaintiffs' expert that the defendant fiduciaries were overcompensated and that they had undervalued company stock. In the compensation analysis, the expert failed to take into account that all the employees were paid considerably above market rates, he premised his analysis on comparisons to companies that in many ways were not comparable, and he did not ensure that the jobs of executives he was comparing were comparable. In the appraisal he used a "control premium" when there was no evidence the company appeared likely to be sold, and he "double counted" certain dividends that had already been paid. In United States v. 75.13 Acres of Land, n213 the Court held in a condemnation action that qualified experts are permitted to testify that in their judgment certain other sales are comparable to the property in question.

Masayesva v. Hale, 118 F.3d 1371 (9th Cir. 1997) : In a dispute between Indian tribes over the value of grazing land, the Navajo tribe challenged the Hopi tribe's expert's testimony under Daubert. The Court held that the expert, an economist with a specialty in range economics and with dozens of peer-reviewed articles to his credit, was properly qualified to testify to the value of the property. "The Navajo's reliance on Daubert is misplaced because Dr. Workman's testimony derives from his relatively straightforward application of range economics, rather than on a novel scientific theory."

United States v. McPhilomy, 270 F.3d 1302 (10th Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions for stealing stone from property owned by the Bureau of Land Management, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony on the quality, quantity, and value of the stone. The expert was a geologist who had worked for the BLM for 11 years evaluating minerals. His conclusion as to the quality of the stone was based on personal inspection and his expertise. While his "opinion would have been more reliable had he employed more costly and extensive tests," it was sufficiently reliable, given his considerable expertise and his use of the same methodology he used as a certified mineral examiner for the BLM. His opinion as to value was reached by the same method he used in his job, using retail prices for comparable stone from nearby stone yards as determined by examining the comparable stone and asking the retailers about prices. In a civil rights action, Malloy v. Monahan, 73 F.3d 1012 (10th Cir. 1996) , the plaintiff alleged that injuries from the defendants' use of excessive force caused him to lose profits from his business of purchasing, rehabilitating, and selling houses. The Court held that the plaintiff had sufficient expertise and personal knowledge to render an opinion as to the value of his properties and lost future profits of his own real estate ventures.

United States v. 0.161 Acres of Land, 837 F.2d 1036 (11th Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed a judgment in an eminent domain action, finding that testimony by the property owners' expert as to his opinion of fair market value should have been admitted, even though the expert was not familiar with the particulars of certain sales of property that he considered in reaching his opinion. His lack of knowledge went to weight, not admissibility.

[98] Vehicle Identification Expert

United States v. Glover, 265 F.3d 337 (6th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed convictions for carjacking, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting an agent of the National Insurance Crime Bureau (a link between the insurance industry and law enforcement in the investigation of vehicle fraud and theft) to testify that the vehicle identification number of the victim's car indicated that it had been manufactured in Japan and thus had necessarily traveled in foreign commerce. The witness' expertise in interpreting the VIN numbers assisted the jury in determining the place of manufacture, and cautionary instructions reduced any possible prejudice.

[99] Veterinarians

Jahn v. Equine Services, PSC, 233 F.3d 382 (6th Cir. 2000) : The Court reversed a summary judgment for veterinarians sued by the owner of a champion pony that died after surgery. The owner's experts' opinions were within their expertise, were based on a scientific method, and were derived from the facts at hand, which were less than optimal because of the defendants' inadequate record keeping. The Court also criticized the Trial Judge for rejecting the experts' testimony because it was inconsistent with the factual conclusion of the pathologist, as that was an issue for the trier of fact.

[100] Vocational Rehabilitation

Elcock v. Kmart Corp., 233 F.3d 734 (3d Cir. 2000) : To establish the extent of her disability and lost earning capacity resulting from a slip and fall, the plaintiff offered opinion testimony from a witness that was based on her psychological condition, the extent of her physical injuries, employment factors, and tests performed on the plaintiff. The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff, holding that questions regarding the reliability of the expert's methodology made it error not to conduct a Daubert hearing.

Ammons v. Aramark Uniform Servs., Inc., 368 F.3d 809 (7th Cir. 2004) : In conjunction with a worker's compensation claim, the plaintiff in an ADA action met with a vocational rehabilitation counselor, who concluded that the plaintiff was subject to a "sedentary restriction" and was not capable of returning to his past work. After suit was filed and the plaintiff retained the counselor as an expert witness, the counselor made a three-hour visit to the facility and concluded that the plaintiff's restrictions "did not preclude him from performing the majority of the work duties." Affirming summary judgment for the employer, the Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the expert's opinion. Since the expert had not observed all the equipment and machinery involved in the plaintiff's duties, had not reviewed the depositions of a manager and a co-worker knowledgeable about the facility, and had not re-interviewed the plaintiff, her opinion was speculative and unreliable.

[101] Voice Identification

United States v. Salimonu, 182 F.3d 63 (1st Cir. 1999) : The prosecution in a drug case introduced tape recordings of incriminating conversations and, for purposes of comparison, a voice exemplar that contained a recording of the defendant's voice. The defendant sought to introduce the testimony of two experts to establish that the voice on the taped conversation and the defendant's voice on the exemplar were different. The Trial Judge admitted testimony from the developer of a spectogram computer program but would not permit a linguist to testify based on his listening to the tapes that the two voices were different. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the assessment below that the linguist's analysis was not reliable, given the absence of an error rate, testimony that voices could be disguised, and the lack of other indicia of reliability. Furthermore, the linguist's testimony that a layperson could distinguish the differences that he found by listening carefully to the tapes meant that the testimony would not assist the trier of fact, as is required by Rule 702.

United States v. Jones, 24 F.3d 1177 (9th Cir. 1994) : Affirming a conviction for distributing cocaine base, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding proffered expert testimony on voice identification by a defense witness, where the witness had no specialized training, had himself developed the aural subjective comparison technique, did not employ a voice spectrograph, and could cite no studies or research supporting his theory or other experts who used his technique.

[102] Waiver of Daubert Challenge

Alfred v. Caterpillar, Inc., 262 F.3d 1083 (10th Cir. 2001) : The Court stated that "counsel should not 'sandbag' Daubert concerns until the close of an opponent's case, thereby placing opposing counsel and the trial court at a severe disadvantage." The Court indicated that a Trial Judge may disallow Daubert motions raised late in the trial process.

CHAPTER 702 RULE 702

3-702 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 702.04

702.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

An intelligent evaluation of facts is often difficult or impossible without the application of some scientific, technical or other specialized knowledge. The most common source of this knowledge is the expert witness, although there are other techniques for supplying it.

Most of the literature assumes that experts testify only in the form of opinions. The assumption is logically unfounded. The rule accordingly recognizes that an expert on the stand may give a dissertation or exposition of scientific or other principles relevant to the case, leaving the trier of fact to apply them to the facts. Since much of the criticism of expert testimony has centered upon the hypothetical question, it seems wise to recognize that opinions are not indispensable and to encourage the use of expert testimony in nonopinion form when counsel believes the trier can itself draw the requisite inference. The use of opinions is not abolished by the rule, however. It will continue to be permissible for the expert to take the further step of suggesting the inference which should be drawn from applying the specialized knowledge to the facts. See Rules 703 to 705.

Whether the situation is a proper one for the use of expert testimony is to be determined on the basis of assisting the trier. "There is no more certain test for determining when experts may be used than the common sense inquiry whether the untrained layman would be qualified to determine intelligently and to the best possible degree the particular issue without enlightenment from those having a specialized understanding of the subject involved in the dispute." Ladd, Expert Testimony, 5 Vand. L. Rev. 414, 418 (1952). When opinions are excluded, it is because they are unhelpful and therefore superfluous and a waste of time. 7 Wigmore § 1918.

The rule is broadly phrased. The fields of knowledge which may be drawn upon are not limited merely to the "scientific" and "technical" but extend to all "specialized" knowledge. Similarly, the expert is viewed, not in a narrow sense, but as a person qualified by "knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education." Thus within the scope of the rule are included not only experts in the strictest sense of the word, e.g., physicians, physicists and architects, but also the large group sometimes called "skilled" witnesses, such as bankers or landowners testifying to land values.

[2] 2000 Amendment Committee Note

2000 Amendment Committee Note

Rule 702 has been amended in response to Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993), and to the many cases applying Daubert, including Kumho Tire Co. v. Carmichael, 119 S.Ct. 1167 (1999). In Daubert the Court charged trial judges with the responsibility of acting as gatekeepers to exclude unreliable expert testimony, and the Court in Kumho clarified that this gatekeeper function applies to all expert testimony, not just testimony based in science. See also Kumho, 119 S.Ct. at 1178 (citing the Committee Note to the proposed amendment to Rule 702, which had been released for public comment before the date of the Kumho decision). The amendment affirms the trial court's role as gatekeeper and provides some general standards that the trial court must use to assess the reliability and helpfulness of proffered expert testimony. Consistently with Kumho, the Rule as amended provides that all types of expert testimony present questions of admissibility for the trial court in deciding whether the evidence is reliable and helpful. Consequently, the admissibility of all expert testimony is governed by the principles of Rule 104(a). Under that Rule, the proponent has the burden of establishing that the pertinent admissibility requirements are met by a preponderance of the evidence. See Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987).

Daubert set forth a non-exclusive checklist for trial courts to use in assessing the reliability of scientific expert testimony. The specific factors explicated by the Daubert Court are (1) whether the expert's technique or theory can be or has been tested--that is, whether the expert's theory can be challenged in some objective sense, or whether it is instead simply a subjective, conclusory approach that cannot reasonably be assessed for reliability; (2) whether the technique or theory has been subject to peer review and publication; (3) the known or potential rate of error of the technique or theory when applied; (4) the existence and maintenance of standards and controls; and (5) whether the technique or theory has been generally accepted in the scientific community. The Court in Kumho held that these factors might also be applicable in assessing the reliability of non-scientific expert testimony, depending upon "the particular circumstances of the particular case at issue." 119 S.Ct. at 1175.

No attempt has been made to "codify" these specific factors. Daubert itself emphasized that the factors were neither exclusive nor dispositive. Other cases have recognized that not all of the specific Daubert factors can apply to every type of expert testimony. In addition to Kumho, 119 S.Ct. at 1175, see Tyus v. Urban Search Management, 102 F.3d 256 (7th Cir. 1996) (noting that the factors mentioned by the Court in Daubert do not neatly apply to expert testimony from a sociologist). See also Kannankeril v. Terminix Int'l, Inc., 128 F.3d 802, 809 (3d Cir. 1997) (holding that lack of peer review or publication was not dispositive where the expert's opinion was supported by "widely accepted scientific knowledge"). The standards set forth in the amendment are broad enough to require consideration of any or all of the specific Daubert factors where appropriate.

Courts both before and after Daubert have found other factors relevant in determining whether expert testimony is sufficiently reliable to be considered by the trier of fact. These factors include:

> (1) Whether experts are "proposing to testify about matters growing naturally and directly out of research they have conducted independent of the litigation, or whether they have developed their opinions expressly for purposes of testifying." Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 43 F.3d 1311, 1317 (9th Cir. 1995).
>
> (2) Whether the expert has unjustifiably extrapolated from an accepted premise to an unfounded conclusion. See General Elec. Co. v. Joiner, 522 U.S. 136, 146 (1997) (noting that in some cases a trial court "may conclude that there is simply too great an analytical gap between the data and the opinion proffered").
> (3) Whether the expert has adequately accounted for obvious alternative explanations. See Claar v. Burlington N. R.R., 29 F.3d 499 (9th Cir. 1994) (testimony excluded where the expert failed to consider other obvious causes for the plaintiff's condition). Compare Ambrosini v. Labarraque, 101 F.3d 129 (D.C. Cir. 1996) (the possibility of some uneliminated causes presents a question of weight, so long as the most obvious causes have been considered and reasonably ruled out by the expert).

(4) Whether the expert "is being as careful as he would be in his regular professional work outside his paid litigation consulting." Sheehan v. Daily Racing Form, Inc., 104 F.3d 940, 942 (7th Cir. 1997) . See Kumho Tire Co. v. Carmichael, 119 S.Ct. 1167 1176 (1999) (Daubert requires the trial court to assure itself that the expert "employs in the courtroom the same level of intellectual rigor that characterizes the practice of an expert in the relevant field").

(5) Whether the field of expertise claimed by the expert is known to reach reliable results for the type of opinion the expert would give. See Kumho Tire Co. v. Carmichael, 119 S.Ct.1167, 1175 (1999) (Daubert's general acceptance factor does not "help show that an expert's testimony is reliable where the discipline itself lacks reliability, as, for example, do theories grounded in any so-called generally accepted principles of astrology or necromancy.") Moore v. Ashland Chemical, Inc., 151 F.3d 269 (5th Cir. 1998) (en banc) (clinical doctor was properly precluded from testifying to the toxicological cause of the plaintiff's respiratory problem, where the opinion was not sufficiently grounded in scientific methodology); Sterling v. Velsicol Chem. Corp., 855 F.2d 1188 (6th Cir. 1988) (rejecting testimony based on "clinical ecology" as unfounded and unreliable).

All of these factors remain relevant to the determination of the reliability of expert testimony under the Rule as amended. Other factors may also be relevant. See Kumho, 119 S.Ct. 1167, 1176 ("[W]e conclude that the trial judge must have considerable leeway in deciding in a particular case how to go about determining whether particular expert testimony is reliable."). Yet no single factor is necessarily dispositive of the reliability of a particular expert's testimony. See, e.g., Heller v. Shaw Industries, Inc., 167 F.3d 146, 155 (3d Cir. 1999) ("not only must each stage of the expert's testimony be reliable, but each stage must be evaluated practically and flexibly without bright-line exclusionary (or inclusionary) rules."); Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 43 F.3d 1311, 1317, n.5 (9th Cir. 1995) (noting that some expert disciplines "have the courtroom as a principal theatre of operations" and as to these disciplines "the fact that the expert has developed an expertise principally for purposes of litigation will obviously not be a substantial consideration.").

A review of the caselaw after Daubert shows that the rejection of expert testimony is the exception rather than the rule. Daubert did not work a "seachange over federal evidence law," and "the trial court's role as gatekeeper is not intended to serve as a replacement for the adversary system." United States v. 14.38 Acres of Land Situated in Leflore County, Mississippi, 80 F.3d 1074, 1078 (5th Cir. 1996) . As the Court in Daubert stated: "Vigorous cross-examination, presentation of contrary evidence, and careful instruction on the burden of proof are the traditional and appropriate means of attacking shaky but admissible evidence." 509 U.S. at 595 . Likewise, this amendment is not intended to provide an excuse for an automatic challenge to the testimony of every expert. See Kumho Tire Co. v. Carmichael, 119 S.Ct.1167, 1176 (1999) (noting that the trial judge has the discretion "both to avoid unnecessary 'reliability' proceedings in ordinary cases where the reliability of an expert's methods is properly taken for granted, and to require appropriate proceedings in the less usual or more complex cases where cause for questioning the expert's reliability arises.").

When a trial court, applying this amendment, rules that an expert's testimony is reliable, this does not necessarily mean that contradictory expert testimony is unreliable. The amendment is broad enough to permit testimony that is the product of competing principles or methods in the same field of expertise. See, e.g., Heller v. Shaw Industries, Inc., 167 F.3d 146, 160 (3d Cir. 1999) (expert testimony cannot be excluded simply because the expert uses one test rather than another, when both tests are accepted in the field and both reach reliable results). As the court stated in In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litigation, 35 F.3d 717, 744 (3d Cir. 1994) , proponents "do not have to demonstrate to the judge by a preponderance of the evidence that the assessments of their experts are correct, they only have to demonstrate by a preponderance of evidence that their opinions are reliable... . The evidentiary requirement of reliability is lower than the merits standard of correctness." See also Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 43 F.3d 1311, 1318 (9th Cir.

1995) (scientific experts might be permitted to testify if they could show that the methods they used were also employed by "a recognized minority of scientists in their field."); Ruiz-Troche v. Pepsi Cola, 161 F.3d 77, 85 (1st Cir. 1998) ("Daubert neither requires nor empowers trial courts to determine which of several competing scientific theories has the best provenance.").

The Court in Daubert declared that the "focus, of course, must be solely on principles and methodology, not on the conclusions they generate." 509 U.S. at 595 . Yet as the Court later recognized, "conclusions and methodology are not entirely distinct from one another." General Elec. Co. v. Joiner, 522 U.S. 136, 146 (1997) . Under the amendment, as under Daubert, when an expert purports to apply principles and methods in accordance with professional standards, and yet reaches a conclusion that other experts in the field would not reach, the trial court may fairly suspect that the principles and methods have not been faithfully applied. See Lust v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 89 F.3d 594, 598 (9th Cir. 1996) . The amendment specifically provides that the trial court must scrutinize not only the principles and methods used by the expert, but also whether those principles and methods have been properly applied to the facts of the case. As the court noted in In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litig., 35 F.3d 717, 745 (3d Cir. 1994) , "any step that renders the analysis unreliable ... renders the expert's testimony inadmissible. This is true whether the step completely changes a reliable methodology or merely misapplies that methodology."

If the expert purports to apply principles and methods to the facts of the case, it is important that this application be conducted reliably. Yet it might also be important in some cases for an expert to educate the factfinder about general principles, without ever attempting to apply these principles to the specific facts of the case. For example, experts might instruct the factfinder on the principles of thermodynamics, or bloodclotting, or on how financial markets respond to corporate reports, without ever knowing about or trying to tie their testimony into the facts of the case. The amendment does not alter the venerable practice of using expert testimony to educate the factfinder on general principles. For this kind of generalized testimony, Rule 702 simply requires that: (1) the expert be qualified; (2) the testimony address a subject matter on which the factfinder can be assisted by an expert; (3) the testimony be reliable; and (4) the testimony "fit" the facts of the case.

As stated earlier, the amendment does not distinguish between scientific and other forms of expert testimony. The trial court's gatekeeping function applies to testimony by any expert. See Kumho Tire Co. v. Carmichael, 119 S.Ct. 1167, 1171 (1999) ("We conclude that Daubert's general holding -- setting forth the trial judge's general 'gatekeeping' obligation -- applies not only to testimony based on 'scientific' knowledge, but also to testimony based on 'technical' and 'other specialized' knowledge."). While the relevant factors for determining reliability will vary from expertise to expertise, the amendment rejects the premise that an expert's testimony should be treated more permissively simply because it is outside the realm of science. An opinion from an expert who is not a scientist should receive the same degree of scrutiny for reliability as an opinion from an expert who purports to be a scientist. See Watkins v. Telsmith, Inc., 121 F.3d 984, 991 (5th Cir. 1997) ("[I]t seems exactly backwards that experts who purport to rely on general engineering principles and practical experience might escape screening by the district court simply by stating that their conclusions were not reached by any particular method or technique."). Some types of expert testimony will be more objectively verifiable, and subject to the expectations of falsifiability, peer review, and publication, than others. Some types of expert testimony will not rely on anything like a scientific method, and so will have to be evaluated by reference to other standard principles attendant to the particular area of expertise. The trial judge in all cases of proffered expert testimony must find that it is properly grounded, well-reasoned, and not speculative before it can be admitted. The expert's testimony must be grounded in an accepted body of learning or experience in the expert's field, and the expert must explain how the conclusion is so grounded. See, e.g., American College of Trial Lawyers, Standards and Procedures for Determining the Admissibility of Expert Testimony after Daubert, 157 F.R.D. 571, 579 (1994) ("[W]hether the testimony concerns economic principles, accounting standards, property valuation or other non-scientific subjects, it should be evaluated by reference to the 'knowledge and experience' of that particular field.").

The amendment requires that the testimony must be the product of reliable principles and methods that are reliably applied to the facts of the case. While the terms "principles" and "methods" may convey a certain impression when applied to scientific knowledge, they remain relevant when applied to testimony based on technical or other specialized knowledge. For example, when a law enforcement agent testifies regarding the use of code words in a drug transaction, the principle used by the agent is that participants in such transactions regularly use code words to conceal the nature of their activities. The method used by the agent is the application of extensive experience to analyze the meaning of the conversations. So long as the principles and methods are reliable and applied reliably to the facts of the case, this type of testimony should be admitted.

Nothing in this amendment is intended to suggest that experience alone -- or experience in conjunction with other knowledge, skill, training or education -- may not provide a sufficient foundation for expert testimony. To the contrary, the text of Rule 702 expressly contemplates that an expert may be qualified on the basis of experience. In certain fields, experience is the predominant, if not sole, basis for a great deal of reliable expert testimony. See, e.g., United States v. Jones, 107 F.3d 1147 (6th Cir. 1997) (no abuse of discretion in admitting the testimony of a handwriting examiner who had years of practical experience and extensive training, and who explained his methodology in detail); Tassin v. Sears Roebuck, 946 F.Supp. 1241, 1248 (M.D.La. 1996) (design engineer's testimony can be admissible when the expert's opinions "are based on facts, a reasonable investigation, and traditional technical/mechanical expertise, and he provides a reasonable link between the information and procedures he uses and the conclusions he reaches"). See also Kumho Tire Co. v. Carmichael, 119 S.Ct.1167, 1178 (1999) (stating that "no one denies that an expert might draw a conclusion from a set of observations based on extensive and specialized experience.").

If the witness is relying solely or primarily on experience, then the witness must explain how that experience leads to the conclusion reached, why that experience is a sufficient basis for the opinion, and how that experience is reliably applied to the facts. The trial court's gatekeeping function requires more than simply "taking the expert's word for it." See Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 43 F.3d 1311, 1319 (9th Cir. 1995) ("We've been presented with only the experts' qualifications, their conclusions and their assurances of reliability. Under Daubert, that's not enough."). The more subjective and controversial the expert's inquiry, the more likely the testimony should be excluded as unreliable. See O'Conner v. Commonwealth Edison Co., 13 F.3d 1090 (7th Cir. 1994) (expert testimony based on a completely subjective methodology held properly excluded). See also Kumho Tire Co. v. Carmichael, 119 S.Ct. 1167, 1176 (1999) ("[I]t will at times be useful to ask even of a witness whose expertise is based purely on experience, say, a perfume tester able to distinguish among 140 odors at a sniff, whether his preparation is of a kind that others in the field would recognize as acceptable.").

Subpart (1) of Rule 702 calls for a quantitative rather than qualitative analysis. The amendment requires that expert testimony be based on sufficient underlying "facts or data." The term "data" is intended to encompass the reliable opinions of other experts. See the original Advisory Committee Note to Rule 703. The language "facts or data" is broad enough to allow an expert to rely on hypothetical facts that are supported by the evidence. Id.

When facts are in dispute, experts sometimes reach different conclusions based on competing versions of the facts. The emphasis in the amendment on "sufficient facts or data" is not intended to authorize a trial court to exclude an expert's testimony on the ground that the court believes one version of the facts and not the other.

There has been some confusion over the relationship between Rules 702 and 703. The amendment makes clear that the sufficiency of the basis of an expert's testimony is to be decided under Rule 702. Rule 702 sets forth the overarching requirement of reliability, and an analysis of the sufficiency of the expert's basis cannot be divorced from the ultimate reliability of the expert's opinion. In contrast, the "reasonable reliance" requirement of Rule 703 is a relatively narrow inquiry. When an expert relies on inadmissible information, Rule 703 requires the trial court to determine whether that information is of a type reasonably relied on by other experts in the field. If so, the expert can rely on the information in reaching an opinion. However, the question whether the expert is relying on a sufficient basis of information--whether admissible information or not--is governed by the requirements of Rule 702.

The amendment makes no attempt to set forth procedural requirements for exercising the trial court's gatekeeping function over expert testimony. See Daniel J. Capra, The Daubert Puzzle, 38 Ga.L.Rev. 699, 766 (1998) ("Trial courts should be allowed substantial discretion in dealing with Daubert questions; any attempt to codify procedures will likely give rise to unnecessary changes in practice and create difficult questions for appellate review."). Courts have shown considerable ingenuity and flexibility in considering challenges to expert testimony under Daubert, and it is contemplated that this will continue under the amended Rule. See, e.g., Cortes-Irizarry v. Corporacion Insular, 111 F.3d 184 (1st Cir. 1997) (discussing the application of Daubert in ruling on a motion for summary judgment); In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litig., 35 F.3d 717, 736, 739 (3d Cir. 1994) (discussing the use of in limine hearings); Claar v. Burlington N. R.R., 29 F.3d 499, 502-05 (9th Cir. 1994) (discussing the trial court's technique of ordering experts to submit serial affidavits explaining the reasoning and methods underlying their conclusions).

The amendment continues the practice of the original Rule in referring to a qualified witness as an "expert." This was done to provide continuity and to minimize change. The use of the term "expert" in the Rule does not, however, mean that a jury should actually be informed that a qualified witness is testifying as an "expert". Indeed, there is much to be said for a practice that prohibits the use of the term "expert" by both the parties and the court at trial. Such a practice "ensures that trial courts do not inadvertently put their stamp of authority" on a witness' opinion, and protects against the jury's being "overwhelmed by the so-called 'experts'." Hon. Charles Richey, Proposals to Eliminate the Prejudicial Effect of the Use of the Word "Expert" Under the Federal Rules of Evidence in Criminal and Civil Jury Trials, 154 F.R.D. 537, 559 (1994) (setting forth limiting instructions and a standing order employed to prohibit the use of the term "expert" in jury trials).

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 702, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 702 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

3-702 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 702.03

Supp. to § 702.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Accident Reconstruction [Go To Main]

Sigler v. American Honda Motor Co., 532 F.3d 469 (6th Cir. 2008) : The plaintiff in a product liability action allegedly suffered head injuries when her vehicle, traveling 70 miles per hour, left the road and collided with a small tree after going down an embankment and the airbag did not deploy. Reversing summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by an expert for the plaintiff regarding the speed at which the vehicle likely struck the tree and the possible cause for the airbag's failure to deploy. The expert was an experienced auto mechanic, but the speed of the collision was a matter of accident reconstruction, an area in which he lacked expertise; analyzing an automobile after an accident was an area in which he possessed expertise, but his method involved physically examining the vehicle, which did not occur in this case.

[5] Antitrust Violations [Go To Main]

Major League Baseball Properties. Inc. v. Salvino, Inc., 542 F.3d 290 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for Major League Baseball's exclusive licensing agent on a counterclaim by a company that alleged antitrust and other claims challenging the lawfulness of the exclusive arrangement. It held that the defendant's expert witness offered only a conclusory opinion unaccompanied by any evidentiary citation or any elaboration and thus failed to contradict the opinion of the plaintiff's expert that the exclusive arrangement had procompetitive effects.

Kentucky Speedway, LLC v. National Ass'n of Stock Car Auto Racing, Inc., 588 F.3d 908 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants in an action alleging antitrust violations in sanctioning auto races. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence from the plaintiff's experts, as they had improperly defined the relevant market and had applied a version of a standard test that was idiosyncratic, was produced solely for this litigation, and did not satisfy Daubert criteria.

Champagne Metals v. Ken-Mac Metals, Inc., 458 F.3d 1073 (10th Cir. 2006) : The parties in an antitrust action participated in an "upstream" market and a "downstream" market for aluminum. The plaintiff's economic expert opined regarding the upstream market, but his testimony was based entirely on evidence from the downstream market. Affirming in part summary judgment for the defendants, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the expert's testimony, since only the plaintiff's attorney, and not the expert, proffered an explanation as to why the experience in one market was relevant to the situation in the other.

[10] Ballistics Evidence [Go To Main]

United States v. Williams, 506 F.3d 151 (2d Cir. 2007) : In a prosecution for racketeering, drug trafficking, and murder, the Court found no abuse of discretion when ballistics evidence was held admissible. The Trial Judge had noted that a similar attack on the reliability of ballistics evidence had been rejected by another District Judge; and before the expert's testimony was submitted to the jury, the government provided an exhaustive foundation for the witness's expertise and a detailed description of the process she used to come to her conclusions. Noting that it was not holding "that any proffered ballistic expert should be routinely admitted," the Court observed that "expert testimony long presumed reliable before Rule 702 must nonetheless be subject to the careful examination that Daubert and Kumho Tire require."

United States v. Mikos, 539 F.3d 706 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a murder conviction, the Court found no error in admitting the testimony of a ballistics expert that the defendant's revolver was one of the models that could have been the murder weapon; he disclosed that at least 15 other models could have fired the bullets. The Court noted that the expert did not testify that bullets with such-and-such rifling must have come from a particular model of gun, let alone from a specific weapon, which would have overstated what could be learned from the database on which he relied. Rather, he reliably applied the data for the purpose of saying that the rifling on the bullets did not rule out the defendant's make and model of gun.

[10.1] Banking and Financial Instruments [Go To Main]

United States v. Pansier, 576 F.3d 726 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed the conviction of a tax protester who had submitted purported sight drafts issued by the Treasury as payment for state and federal taxes. It found no abuse of discretion in permitting a bank examiner with the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency to testify that the sight drafts were worthless financial instruments. The witness qualified as an expert in legitimate and fictitious financial instruments and banking; he provided sufficient evidence about his methods for ensuring the reliability of his analyses; his testimony touching on the Uniform Commercial Code and Treasury accounts was given within the context of his analysis of the financial instruments; and his testimony regarding the ultimate issue of the falsity of the instruments did not impermissibly refer to the defendant's state of mind or intent to defraud.

[12] Business Custom; Industry Practice [Go To Main]

United States v. Safavian, 528 F.3d 957 (D.C. Cir. 2008) : The defendant was convicted of obstructing justice and making false statements by denying that a lobbyist with whom he had a relationship was "doing business" with the government agency headed by the defendant. Reversing, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude expert testimony on whether government-contracting professionals viewed inquiries about possible contracts, as opposed to actually having a contract, with the agency as "doing business." Although the term was defined in some statutes, the issue in this case was what the defendant intended in answering questions and making statements, so the "expert's testimony would have supplied crucial context and support for Safavian's proposed meaning."

Pelletier v. Main St. Textiles, LP, 470 F.3d 48 (1st Cir. 2006) : The plaintiff, who was injured while operating a forklift, claimed that the owner of the premises was negligent in maintaining the location and in ensuring the safety of the workers. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the plaintiff's expert, who would have testified to the customs and practices of the industry. Although expert testimony on the customs and practice of an industry is proper, there is no entitlement to offer such expert testimony. Here, the expert never inspected the facilities and equipment at issue, so the Judge was warranted in finding that the expert lacked sufficient facts or data upon which to base an opinion on the industry practices as applied to the premises at issue. The Judge gave the plaintiff several opportunities to clarify the customs and practices about which the expert would testify and the plaintiff offered several "shifting explanations," which provided some reason for the Judge to think that the expert was merely attempting to opine on the applicability of OSHA regulations to the defendants' conduct, which was a matter on which the Judge would instruct the jury.

SR Int'l Bus. Ins. Co. v. World Trade Center Properties, LLC, 467 F.3d 107 (2d Cir. 2006) : In litigation over whether destruction of the World Trade Center towers constituted one or two "occurrences" for purposes of insurance coverage, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a witness with over 30 years of experience in the insurance industry and familiar with the practices related to "per occurrence" property provisions to testify as to custom and usage in the industry.

United States v. Fallon, 470 F.3d 542 (3d Cir. 2006) : The defendant was charged with fraud after providing a forged FDA letter certifying a medical device that was the subject of a vendor agreement he was establishing with a leasing firm. To prove that the forgery was material, the president of the leasing firm testified that it had a policy, which he had brought with him from his prior employer, of requiring FDA clearances from medical device manufacturers. The defense countered with the testimony of a witness that he had never in 15 years in the medical leasing business requested or even seen an FDA clearance letter, but it was not permitted to introduce testimony by a former COO at a medical leasing company (the prior employer of the prosecution witness) as to the customs and practices of the medical leasing industry. Affirming, the Court held that exclusion of the industry practice evidence was error (but harmless); contrary to the Trial Judge's understanding, "a witness need not represent an entire industry in order to have sufficient knowledge of that industry's customs and practices so as to render substantial assistance to the jury." In Berckeley Inv. Group, Ltd. v. Colkitt, 455 F.3d 195 (3d Cir. 2006) , a breach of contract action related to securities, a lawyer offered an affidavit stating that, on assumed facts, it would have been reasonable for Berckeley to have believed that it was entitled to a certain securities law exemption. Upholding admission of the affidavit, the Court concluded that the lawyer's opinion could be helpful to the jury in understanding the customs and business practices in the securities industry; the lawyer was an experienced former counsel for the SEC with expertise in offshore securities transactions. "The customs and business practices in the securities industry at the time the parties entered into the Agreement provides an important context which will aid the jury in determining whether Berckeley had the requisite scienter at the time to evade the registration requirements." The Court emphasized that the Trial Court, in exercising its discretion, "must ensure that an expert does not testify as to the governing law of the case." Thus, the lawyer was not permitted to "testify as to whether Berckeley complied with legal duties that arose under the federal securities laws."

United States v. Anderson, 560 F.3d 275 (5th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a conviction for sex trafficking of children, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony from the director of a center specializing in serving victims of sexual exploitation regarding the typical characteristics of adolescent prostitutes and the behavior of pimps. The testimony was helpful in shedding light on whether the defendant was a pimp or merely someone with a flashy lifestyle and a penchant for travel and whether the government's young witnesses traveled with him quite independently or as part of a pimp-prostitute relationship.

Naeem v. McKesson Drug Co., 444 F.3d 593 (7th Cir. 2006) : A discharged female employee claimed that she had been subjected to gender discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. An in limine ruling precluded the plaintiff's human resources expert from opining whether the defendant followed accepted human resource policies but allowed testimony regarding whether the defendant followed its own policies. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff on the IIED claims, the Court held that the Judge's simple conclusion that the witness had sufficient expertise to assist the jury was insufficient to show that an adequate Daubert analysis had been performed, so admission of the testimony would not be given the normal deferential review. The Court concluded that it was an error (but harmless) to admit the testimony, because it did not meet the requisite level of reliability: While the expert had examined the defendant's personnel policy manual and depositions by its employees, his opinions were not tied to specific portions of the manual and appeared to be general observations regarding what is normal or usual business practice.

PFS Distrib. Co. v. Raduechel, 574 F.3d 580 (8th Cir. 2009) : The plaintiff sued former employees who established a competing business for breach of fiduciary duties and sued the accountants and bankers who advised them for civil conspiracy. Affirming judgments for the accountants and bankers, the Court found no abuse of discretion when an accounting expert and a banking expert testified to the respective professional standards, as their testimony was relevant to the knowledge and state of mind of the advisers when serving the former employees. In Cedar Hill Hardware & Constr. Supply v. Insurance Corp. of Hannover, 563 F.3d 329 (8th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the insurer in an insurance coverage dispute, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by an expert with exhaustive experience in the insurance industry. His testimony regarding underwriting standards in the industry was relevant to whether the omitted information was material, and his testimony concerning industry practice regarding suspected arson was relevant to whether the insurer had vexatiously delayed and resisted paying the claim.

[14] Cause of Accident [Go To Main]

[a] Generally

Santos v. Posadas de Puerto Rico Assoc., Inc., 452 F.3d 59 (1st Cir. 2006) : An expert witness for the plaintiff, who slipped and fell while entering a hotel swimming pool, testified that there was a dangerous condition arising from a combination of factors: variable friction between the pool steps and their edges, the use of an unsuitable type of tile at the edges, the peculiar configuration of the stairs, and the absence of a handrail. Rejecting an argument that the expert's testimony was unreliable, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting it, and affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff. The expert had interviewed the plaintiff, visited the pool, measured the steps, examined photographs of the area, reviewed applicable codes and standards, made needed calculations, and drawn upon his extensive friction-testing of various tiles that were similar to those used to edge the pool steps. The Trial Judge "knew that any doubts as to either the accuracy of Galdos's opinion or the weight to be given to it would be thoroughly explored by means of defense counsel's cross-examination, the Hotel's presentation of contrary expert testimony, and the jury instructions."

St. Paul Mercury Ins. Co. v. The Viking Corp., 539 F.3d 623 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for a sprinkler manufacturer sued by an insurer on a claim that a defective sprinkler resulted in a fire that damaged the building of an insured. It held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by the manufacturer's expert, who had extensive experience in microscopy, that the wear and tear on the sprinkler suggested the possibility of tampering, and that he used the process of elimination to reach his conclusion. The Court noted that "an expert's testimony need not eliminate all other possible causes of the injury. The fact that several possible causes might remain 'uneliminated' only goes to the accuracy of the conclusion, not to the soundness of the methodology."

Pro Service Automotive, L.L.C. v. Lenan Corp., 469 F.3d 1210 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a summary judgment for the manufacturer of a waste oil heater sued by plaintiffs alleging that the heater caused their building to burn down, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the plaintiff's expert testimony on accident causation. The expert did not engage in testing or other engineering analysis to support his opinion. He provided no mathematical analysis to support his hypothesis and failed to explain how the heater would cause a fire under his theory, when it had operated for months in the condition that the expert claimed caused the fire.

[b] Cause of Accident -- Product Injuries

Bryte v. American Household, Inc., 429 F.3d 469 (4th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the manufacturer of an electric throw in a wrongful death action. It found no abuse of discretion when a state fire investigator's expert testimony that the electric throw caused the fire was excluded because the investigator failed to exclude all or most of the other possible sources of the fire. Other possibilities, such as the presence of a lighted candle, were not excluded by the expert "in any methodical or reliable fashion. And we are not obliged to credit [the expert's] say-so supporting his own reliability by way of excluding other causes."

Sigler v. American Honda Motor Co., 532 F.3d 469 (6th Cir. 2008) : The plaintiff in a product liability action allegedly suffered head injuries when her vehicle, traveling 70 miles per hour, left the road and collided with a small tree after going down an embankment and the airbag did not deploy. Reversing summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by an expert for the plaintiff regarding the speed at which the vehicle likely struck the tree and the possible cause for the airbag's failure to deploy. The expert was an experienced auto mechanic, but the speed of the collision was a matter of accident reconstruction, an area in which he lacked expertise; analyzing an automobile after an accident was an area in which he possessed expertise, but his method involved physically examining the vehicle, which did not occur in this case.

Menz v. New Holland N. Am., Inc., 507 F.3d 1107 (8th Cir. 2007) : Affirming summary judgments for the manufacturers of a tractor and a front-end loader in a suit by a tractor driver injured in a rollover accident, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the plaintiff's expert testimony that a defect in the tractor caused the accident. The expert's conclusion was "mere speculation and conjecture," since he "did not believe it was necessary to reconstruct the events preceding the accident; rather, he repeatedly testified the only way to make the tractor safe was by installing a [rollover protection system]," and he "failed to offer any theory, supported by or based on sufficient facts or data, regarding how to design out the tractor's alleged inherent instability."

[15] Cause of Disease or Injury [Go To Main]

[b] Cause of Disease or Injury -- Drugs, Toxic Exposure, etc.

Wells v. SmithKline Beecham Corp., 601 F.23d 375 (5th Cir. 2010): The Court granted summary judgment for a pharmaceutical manufacturer sued by a patient who lost $10 million gambling while taking a dopamine agonist to alleviate Parkinson's symptoms. It found no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by the plaintiff's three experts, who based their general causation conclusion on literature which they claimed showed an association between the drug and problem gambling. The literature for the most part contained only anecdotal evidence and not statistically significant epidemiology, and the one study that reached statistical significance focused on a "class finding" and did not purport to do a controlled test on the specific drug at issue, which functions differently from other dopamine agonists. In Knight v. Kirby Inland Marine Inc., 482 F.3d 347 (5th Cir. 2007) , in a toxic tort action alleging that on-the-job exposure to benzene caused the plaintiffs' cancer, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the plaintiffs' toxicology expert and affirmed summary judgment for the defendants. The plaintiffs' expert relied on more than 50 case-control studies to reach his conclusion on general causation, i.e., that exposure to benzene can cause cancer. While case-control studies "are not per se inadmissible evidence on general causation," there was an analytical gap between all 50 studies and any relevant conclusion of general causation in this case. For example, one study involved workers in a variety of occupations, subject to greater and lengthier exposures than the plaintiffs; another study involved "a wide range of chemicals to which appellants were never exposed"; a third study concluded only that there was a "suggestion" of a causative connection between benzene and cancer.

Barrett v. Rhodia, Inc., 606 F.3d 975 (8th Cir. 2010) : In an action for injuries allegedly caused when a cloud of toxic gas escaped from a chemical drum used in a hazardous waste facility, the plaintiff, who had been 12-14 feet away, sought to introduce testimony establishing that he had been exposed to a sufficient concentration of the gas to cause his injuries from a board-certified allergist certified in toxicology, his treating physician, a clinical psychologist practicing in neuropsychotherapy, and a safety engineer with a degree in petroleum and natural gas engineering. Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in holding, with limited exceptions, that the proffered experts lacked the experience and scientific foundation to provide the causation testimony necessary for the plaintiff's case. In In re Prempro Products Liability Litig., 514 F.3d 825 (8th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in an action claiming that estrogen products for symptoms related to menopause caused the plaintiff's breast cancer. It held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a defense expert to testify, based on his opinion that it takes a minimum of 12 years from toxic exposure to detection of breast cancer, that the plaintiff's cancer was present before the ten-year period during which she used hormone replacement therapy. The witness' conclusion was "an exercise in basic math using simple deductive reasoning." The Court also held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by an expert for the plaintiff that contradicted testimony the expert gave in his deposition. In Marmo v. Tyson Fresh Meats, Inc., 457 F.3d 748 (8th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed judgments for a packing plant owner sued by a residential property owner who claimed she was injured by hydrogen sulfide gas emitted from the plant's wastewater treatment lagoons. The Court found no abuse of discretion in limiting the plaintiff's toxicology expert to testifying that the plaintiff's injuries were consistent with hydrogen sulfide exposure and barring an opinion on causation. The Court noted that it had previously held that a toxicologist may testify that exposure to a substance caused a person's symptoms and injuries, but there was no "blanket rule that toxicologists are qualified to render an opinion on causation." In this case, the toxicologist interviewed the plaintiff but did not examine her and did not inquire about other toxic exposures, did not exclude confounding factors, and used a causation standard that was not subject to expression in terms of a potential rate of error and was a much lower standard than medical causation.

Millenkamp v. Davisco Foods Int'l, Inc., 562 F.3d 971 (9th Cir. 2009) : Buyers of milk permeate for cattle food won a judgment on breach of warranty claims against the seller of the product in an action alleging that calves died as a result of ingesting the product. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony that the milk permeate caused the calves' illness. The expert "arrived at his conclusions using scientific methods and procedures," and his "conclusions were not mere subjective beliefs or unsupported speculation." The expert provided foundation testimony as to his background in calf nutrition and knowledge of acidosis, relied upon peer-reviewed publication, and analyzed the buyers' feed mixture with a peer-reviewed computer program. In In re Hanford Nuclear Reservation Litig., 534 F.3d 986, 1013-1014 (9th Cir. 2008) , the Court reviewed the trial of claims by bellwether plaintiffs alleging that radioiodine emissions by plutonium producers at a nuclear facility caused cancers and other life-threatening diseases. It found no abuse of discretion in precluding the plaintiffs' expert epidemiologist from testifying that scientific extrapolation supports a finding that radiation below 40 rads could cause hypothyroidism or autoimmune thyroiditis. Because the data used to reach the conclusions were not reliable, the expert was properly precluded from "speculating that such extrapolation would likely produce results showing causation below 40 rads, and, second, stating that current epidemiological data do not contradict or prevent such a finding."

Attorney Gen'l of Okla. v. Tyson Foods, Inc., 565 F.3d 769 (10th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed denial of a preliminary injunction to the State in an environmental action seeking to enjoin poultry processors from applying poultry waste to any land within a river watershed. There was no abuse of discretion when the State's expert testimony on the connection between bacterial contamination in the river watershed and farmers' use of poultry litter as fertilizer was found unreliable. The expert used a novel and untested methodology, and made discretionary decisions about which data to use in making calculations that had not been published or peer-reviewed.

[c] Cause of Disease or Injury -- Medical Testimony

[i] Cause of Disease or Injury -- Medical Testimony -- Differential Diagnosis

Granfield v. CSX Transp., Inc., 597 F.3d 474 (1st Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a railroad carrier employee who claimed that he was required to operate locomotives with malfunctioning equipment and that this caused him to suffer lateral epicondylitis. There was no abuse of discretion in permitting a board-certified orthopedic surgeon, who treated over 100 patients a year with the same injury, to testify as to medical causation. The Court observed that "[w]e have previously agreed that a differential diagnosis is a proper scientific technique for medical doctor expert testimony," and found it relevant that the expert's opinion "was formed before litigation was contemplated." The Court recognized that the expert did not rely on peer-reviewed studies but noted that such reliance is only one element under the Daubert analysis.

Best v. Lowe's Home Ctrs., Inc., 563 F.3d 171 (6th Cir. 2009) : In a personal injury action claiming loss of smell caused by exposure to a swimming pool chemical spilled in a store, the Judge excluded causation testimony from the plaintiff's treating otolaryngologist, on the ground that his opinion involved improper extrapolation, reliance on anecdotal evidence and temporal proximity, insufficient information about the case, failure to consider other possible causes, and subjectivity. Reversing summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the plaintiff had provided a sufficient foundation for the expert's opinion based on a differential diagnosis, as the doctor had objectively ascertained the nature of the patient's injury, used a valid methodology to "rule in" exposure to the pool chemical as a cause of the injury, and engaged in standard techniques to "rule out" alternative causes to reach a conclusion as to which cause was most likely.

Gayton v. McCoy, 593 F.3d 610 (7th Cir. 2010) : In an action alleging that an inmate died from a heart attack because she did not receive proper medical care, the Court found an abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the plaintiff's medical expert that the inmate's vomiting could have exacerbated her heart attack and hastened her death. It noted that the expert had conducted a "differential diagnosis based on [the inmate's] medical history and the facts surrounding her incarceration" and therefore provided "a sufficient scientific basis" for his opinion. In Ervin v. Johnson & Johnson, Inc., 492 F.3d 901 (7th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in an action alleging that its prescription medication caused a blood clot that required partial amputation of the plaintiff's leg. The plaintiff's causation expert purported to apply a differential diagnosis, but "ruled in" the defendant's medication solely on the basis of temporal proximity and an Internet Google search indicating one case report of a similar clot. The witness did not rely on any published work indicating a causal relation, nor did he consider the plaintiff's pre-existing conditions, which published studies indicated can cause clots. Therefore, there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the expert's testimony.

In re Prempro Products Liability Litig., 586 F.3d 547 (8th Cir. 2009) : In an action alleging that the plaintiff's breast cancer was caused by hormone replacement therapy, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by the plaintiff's expert on specific causation. Given proof from the plaintiff's oncologist that the plaintiff suffered from hormone-dependent breast cancer, it was not necessary in conducting a differential diagnosis to consider breast cancer risk factors and a family history of breast cancer but rather to focus on ruling out the two possible sources of the hormones feeding the plaintiff's cancer, the plaintiff's own or the hormone replacement therapy. In Bland v. Verizon Wireless, (VAW) L.L.C., 538 F.3d 893 (8th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants in an action alleging that freon, sprayed by a store employee into a customer's water bottle, had caused the plaintiff to suffer exercise-induced asthma when she drank from the bottle. The Court held that causation testimony based on a differential diagnosis was properly excluded, since the cause of exercise-induced asthma is unknown in the majority of cases, and the expert did not rule out other possible causes. Furthermore, the expert was unaware of either the toxicity or the exposure levels for freon.

Hendrix v. Evenflo Co., Inc. 609 F.3d 1183 (11th Cir. 2010) : The plaintiffs alleged that a baby's head trauma, suffered when a child restraint system malfunctioned during a minor accident, caused autism spectrum disorder (ASD) that was diagnosed several years later. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the rejection of testimony by two experts who purported to conclude, on the basis of differential diagnosis, that head trauma could and did cause ASD in this case. The experts failed to "rule in" head trauma as a cause of ASD, since the medical textbooks and epidemiological studies relied upon by the experts to rule in head trauma did not in fact support that premise. In Guinn v. AstraZeneca Pharm.

LP, 602 F.3d 1245 (11th Cir. 2010) (per curiam), the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in an action alleging that a prescription antipsychotic drug caused the plaintiff to develop diabetes. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony from the plaintiff's causation expert, as she had not, in applying a differential diagnosis methodology, adequately considered and excluded possible alternative causes of the plaintiff's weight gain and diabetes while taking the drug, but had relied principally only on temporal proximity. Furthermore, she had deviated from the standard diagnostic techniques, especially interviewing the patient, that she normally used to rule out potential alternative causes.

[ii] Cause of Disease or Injury -- Medical Testimony -- Miscellaneous Cases

Wackman v. Rubsamen, 602 F.3d 391 (5th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed in part a judgment for the survivors of a deceased hospice patient in a wrongful death action against the patient's caregivers, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony that the patient had died from a morphine overdose. A study showing that morphine could be detected in livers preserved in formalin was properly admitted although the patient's body had been embalmed with a different type of fluid. Furthermore, the expert's opinion was based on more than just the morphine detected; he had ruled out other causes of death. In United States v. Seale, 600 F.3d 473 (5th Cir. 2010) , the Court affirmed a conviction for a fatal kidnapping committed in 1964, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a forensic pathologist's conclusion that the victims' deaths were caused by fresh-water drowning. The sources for the conclusion properly included autopsy reports, video footage of the recovery of a body from a river, interviews with divers conducting the recovery effort, FBI reports, and photographs of physical evidence, as well as the testimony of a coconspirator. The defense was given every opportunity to challenge the opinion with evidence that the decayed condition in which the bodies were found and the lack of soft tissue available for analysis precluded a definitive conclusion.

United States v. Martinez, 588 F.3d 301 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions of an anesthesiologist on drug and fraud charges, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by an addiction specialist that drugs prescribed by the defendant caused the deaths of two patients. The expert's opinion was based upon toxicology reports and the patient's files, and the expert conceded on cross-examination that he could not say beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant's prescription caused one death. In Sigler v. American Honda Motor Co., 532 F.3d 469 (6th Cir. 2008) , a product liability action, the plaintiff allegedly suffered head injuries when her vehicle, traveling 70 miles per hour, left the road and collided with a small tree after going down an embankment and the airbag did not deploy. Assuming that the vehicle was traveling at least 20 miles per hour at the time it struck the tree and that the plaintiff's head struck the interior of the vehicle during the collision, the plaintiff's medical expert opined that the trauma likely aggravated or exacerbated her preexisting seizure disorder. The expert's opinion was excluded as "irrelevant and unreliable," on the ground that there was no evidence supporting his assumptions, but the Court found evidence in the record from which inferences supporting the assumptions could be drawn. Thus, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the testimony, and reversed summary judgment for the defendant.

Happel v. Walmart Stores, Inc., 602 F.3d 820 (7th Cir. 2010) : In an action alleging that negligence by a pharmacy in filling a prescription for a nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory drug for a patient allergic to NSAIDs caused an anaphylactic reaction that exacerbated the patient's multiple sclerosis, the Court reversed the judgment for errors in awarding damages, but found no abuse of discretion in excluding causation testimony from the plaintiff's expert. The witness was not qualified to testify about the plaintiff's MS because he had very limited (and unrelated) experience with MS patients, his opinion was not supported by relevant medical literature, and he offered no experimental, statistical, or other scientific data to support his theory. In Cunningham v. Masterwear Corp., 569 F.3d 673 (7th Cir. 2009) , in a nuisance action by plaintiffs claiming that improper storage of perchloro-ethylene by a neighboring dry cleaner had caused respiratory injuries and loss of property value, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the plaintiffs' expert medical witness was disqualified. The witness was a physician specializing in treatment of respiratory diseases, but he had never treated a respiratory illness caused or aggravated by exposure to PCE, and he was not a toxicologist. Furthermore, he did not present, directly or by citation to scientific literature, a theory that would link the level and duration of the plaintiffs' exposure to PCE to their symptoms. In Lewis v. CITGO Petroleum Corp., 561 F.3d 698 (7th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in a negligence action for injuries allegedly sustained from exposure to hydrogen sulfide, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of expert causation testimony for the plaintiff. One expert, testifying regarding emotional injuries, had not examined the plaintiffs until two-and-a-half years after the incident; had concluded that one plaintiff did not have post-traumatic stress disorder at the time of his evaluation, but "likely met criteria" for PTSD at some point following the accident, based only on his interview with the plaintiff and not on review of her prior medical records; and had failed to relate the disorders he observed to other potential causes, including underlying conditions he found. As the plaintiffs failed to show the experts' opinions were based on anything other than speculation, the testimony was properly disregarded.

United States v. Two Elk, 536 F.3d 890 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse of a child, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of medical testimony as to how acute the injuries to the victim were. The Court rejected the argument that the doctor had to testify as to "a reasonable medical certainty" and held that the testimony must be reliable, as the Judge found the testimony to be in this case. In Polski v. Quigley Corp., 538 F.3d 836 (8th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed summary judgment against plaintiffs claiming that a nasal spray had caused loss of smell and taste, finding no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony from an otolaryngologist that the spray's active ingredient damaged the "smell tissue" high inside the human nose. The premise of the testimony was that the spray bottle could expel some quantity of the medication the full distance through the nasal passages, but neither the expert nor anyone else had tested that theory.

Neiberger v. FedEx Ground Package Sys., 566 F.3d 1184 (10th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a personal injury action arising from an auto-van accident, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by an expert for the defendants that nonunion of the plaintiff's spine was probably caused by smoking following spinal surgery rather than by the accident. The proposition that smoking greatly increased the risk of nonunions was supported by several peer-reviewed articles in medical journals, a position statement of the American Academy of Orthopedic Surgeons, and the plaintiff's own expert, and it was applied by the defendant's witness in a manner generally accepted in the medical community, including eliminating the possibility that the accident could have been the cause of the injury.

[16] Cause of Economic Injury [Go To Main]

In re Williams Secs. Litig. - WCG Subclass, 558 F.3d 1130 (10th Cir. 2009) : In a securities fraud class action, the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the plaintiffs' expert testimony on loss causation. The expert failed to demonstrate that it was the revelation of the fraud, and not other factors, that led to the decline in the company's share price.

[20] Civil Rights Cases [Go To Main]

Hathaway v. Bazany, 507 F.3d 312 (5th Cir. 2007) : In a civil rights action brought against a police officer who shot and killed a teenage driver at a traffic stop when the vehicle suddenly accelerated toward the officer, the plaintiffs offered testimony by a law enforcement officer with special expertise in firearms training (who happened to be the decedent's father and a plaintiff) that the defendant officer was behind the car and out of danger when he fired the shot. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the proffered testimony, as it lacked both a reliable methodology and sufficient factual support for the reliability of the initial assumptions.

United States v. Farrell, 563 F.3d 364 (8th Cir. 2009) : Affirming convictions for peonage, the Court held it was error

(but not plain error) for an expert witness to opine on the strength of the government's case and the credibility of its witnesses through references to the "incredible" and "strong" nature of the evidence against the defendants. Likewise, the expert invaded the fact-finding function of the jury by testifying that the workers "were not controlling their money" and were "forced to pay [the debt]," which was not simply a factual conclusion but an attempt to express an opinion as to the defendants' guilt and state that the worker witnesses were telling the truth.

[20.1] Class Certification [Go To Main]

American Honda Motor Co. v. Allen, 600 F.3d 813 (7th Cir. 2010) : Vacating certification of a class action by motorcycle buyers seeking repairs to an alleged problem with the steering assembly, the Court held that the Judge should have conclusively ruled on a Dabuert challenge to the theory used by the plaintiffs' engineering expert, since the admissibility of his opinion was essential to the determination whether common issues predominated. The Court indicated its belief that the opinion was unreliable.

Dukes v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 603 F.3d 571 (9th Cir. 2010) (en banc): Reviewing class certification granted for female employees of Wal-Mart in a Title VII class action, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge accepted testimony by a sociologist who used a "social framework analysis" to examine the distinctive features of Wal-Mart's policies and practices. Wal-Mart did not challenge the methodology or contend that the expert's findings lacked relevance, but challenged only certain inferences drawn by the expert, and it was for the jury to decide whether or not the opinions were persuasive. The Court also found no abuse of discretion when the Judge relied upon a statistical expert for the plaintiffs who did a separate regression analysis for each of the 41 regions containing Wal-Mart stores. The Court emphasized that it was deciding only whether it was an abuse of discretion to find, based on all the evidence presented, that there existed common questions of fact sufficient to justify class certification, and that it was not "re-examining the relative strength or persuasiveness of the commonality evidence ourselves."

[22] Credibility Testimony [Go To Main]

[a] Abuse Cases

United States v. Simmons, 470 F.3d 1115 (5th Cir. 2006) : At a trial for sexual assault under color of law, a government expert witness testified that the defendant's behavior following the alleged incident and her in-court testimony were consistent with that of a rape victim. Affirming, the Court held that the expert had not usurped the jury's role. "Mental health experts are permitted to testify that symptoms and recollections appear genuine and that the expert believes she or he has not been duped by a fabricated account." The Court noted that the expert emphasized in his testimony that he never gives testimony "as to whether a rape did or did not occur."

United States v. Benally, 541 F.3d 990 (10th Cir. 2008) : In a trial for abusive sexual contact with a child, the defendant's confession to police officers was admitted, and he sought to challenge that confession by calling an expert who would have testified to the frequency of false confessions and the interrogation techniques known to cause them. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the expert's testimony, as it would have "encroached upon the jury's vital and exclusive function to make credibility determinations." Although the expert would not have given an explicit opinion that the defendant had confessed falsely, "with or without the opinion, the import of her expert testimony would be the same: disregard the confession and credit the defendant's testimony that his confession was a lie." The Court distinguished cases establishing that psychiatric experts may testify that a defendant has a mental condition that would make it unlikely for him to have truthfully confessed.

[b] Credibility -- Other Cases

United States v. Farrell, 563 F.3d 364 (8th Cir. 2009) : Affirming convictions for peonage, the Court held it was error (but not plain error) for an expert witness to opine on the strength of the government's case and the credibility of its witnesses through references to the "incredible" and "strong" nature of the evidence against the defendants. Likewise, the expert invaded the fact-finding function of the jury by testifying that the workers "were not controlling their money" and were "forced to pay [the debt]," which was not simply a factual conclusion but an attempt to express an opinion as to the defendants' guilt and state that the worker witnesses were telling the truth.

[25] Damages [Go To Main]

[a] Antitrust

In re Scrap Metal Antitrust Litig., 527 F.3d 517 (6th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs in a case alleging that the defendants fixed prices in purchasing unprocessed scrap metal. It found no abuse of discretion in admitting damages testimony by the plaintiffs' expert economist. He was qualified, his testimony was relevant, and his methodology was generally accepted as reliable, so the "substantial room for debate" about his data set and the "substantial bases upon which to criticize" certain of his assumptions were matters of credibility going to the weight, not the admissibility, of the evidence.

[c] Damages -- Contracts

First Marblehead Corp. v. House, 541 F.3d 36 (1st Cir. 2008) : Five years after he resigned from the company, House attempted to exercise stock options and was told that they had expired three months after his resignation. The jury found that House had reasonably relied on negligent misrepresentations that the options would be viable for ten years, but it accepted testimony from an expert for the company that it would not have made financial sense for House to have exercised the options timely had he known of the three-month restriction. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admission of the expert's testimony, as he was an economist with nearly two decades of experience as a consultant in economics, finance, and strategy consulting, including providing investment advice to accredited investors. His testimony about how stock options function and how an investor would think about exercising those options involved topics not ordinarily within the knowledge of the jury. And the testimony provided the jury with information helpful in evaluating House's assertions as to what he would have done, without giving the expert's opinion about House's credibility or what he believed House would have done.

Wasson v. Peabody Coal Co., 542 F.3d 1172 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a judgment unfavorable to a lessor seeking to recover allegedly underpaid coal mining royalties. It found no abuse of discretion in allowing damages testimony offered by the lessor's accountant as an expert, which asserted that the coal price used to calculate royalties was too low, based on the difference between the price used by the lessee when calculating royalties for a particular month and the fuel cost data for that month reported by one of the lessee's customers to the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. The opinion was unreliable because it included only a single customer, the figures for a single month were extrapolated for 20 years of alleged underpayment, and the witness admitted that he had never worked with a FERC report, did not know what items were included or excluded in the fuel cost data in such reports, and was unaware of FERC data having been used to test the accuracy of a royalty payment. In Emerald Invs. L.P. v. Allmerica Fin. Life Ins. & Ann. Co., 516 F.3d 612 (7th Cir. 2008) , a breach of contract action by an investor whose "market timing" arbitrage scheme had been terminated when the defendant unilaterally amended account transfer rules, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by the plaintiff's damages expert. The expert's initial report, which proposed that the plaintiff would have earned an annual rate of return on its investment of 34% for 20 years, was "preposterous," since "[t]he essence of an arbitrage opportunity is that it is transient. It is the exploitation of an economic anomaly, and the process of exploiting the anomaly eliminates it." Here, the choice of a 34% return was a blind extrapolation from the plaintiff's history that ignored changed circumstances that had already led the rate to decline to 14% in the year of the breach. The expert's first report "was so irresponsible as to justify the judge's decision to exclude the second report summarily. [He] had demonstrated a willingness to abandon the norms of his profession in the interest of his client. Such a person cannot be trusted to continue as an expert witness in the case in which he has demonstrated that willingness, and perhaps not in other cases either."

US Salt, Inc. v. Broken Arrow, Inc., 563 F.3d 687 (8th Cir. 2009) : In a breach of contract action involving supplies of salt, the Court found no error when expert testimony on lost profits was excluded. The expert relied almost exclusively on the plaintiff's speculative estimates without any independent verification; he conducted little if any investigation or analysis of market conditions; and he revised his opinion on damages dramatically, from $1,800,000 to a range of $600,000 to $1,060,000. In Margolies v. McCleary, Inc., 447 F.3d 1115 (8th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a damages award in a breach of contract action brought by a manufacturer of potato chips against a distributor. The distributor argued that the manufacturer's damages expert mistakenly made certain factual assumptions about future levels of market share and costs of reentering the market. Finding no error, the Court stated that "the factual basis of an expert's opinion generally relates to the weight a jury ought to accord that opinion" and "unless the factual or methodological basis for the testimony is fundamentally unreliable, its admission is not an abuse of discretion." In this case, the expert made assumptions "in areas where it was impossible to gather more concrete data due to McCleary's non-performance." The expert's assumptions "were not the product of mere conjecture with no factual basis; they were estimates generated through consideration of [the product's] past performance and potential for future performance, given current accepted market conditions."

[d] Damages -- Distributorships, Franchises, and Other Business Relationships

Cole v. Homier Distrib. Co., 599 F.3d 856 (8th Cir. 2010) : In Cole's action for breach of an oral agreement to distribute Homier tractors, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding Cole's damages expert because his report relied on incorrect factual premises and contained speculative calculations. For example, the expert erred in assuming that when the distributorship agreement was terminated, Cole lost its ability to sell Homier products, and the lost profits analysis was skewed by that incorrect assumption. The Court also faulted the expert for using a 25-year lost profit calculation when the distributorship agreement permitted termination for cause by giving 90 days' notice.

[g] Damages -- Property Interests and Transactions

Synergetics, Inc. v. Hurst, 477 F.3d 949 (8th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the manufacturer of ophthalmic equipment against former employees for trade secret misappropriation, finding no error in allowing the plaintiff's expert on damages to testify, although his opinion was based on the assumption that the relevant market involved only two suppliers, when in fact there were other possible sources of competition. The Court stated that an expert's opinion should be excluded only if it was so "fundamentally unsupported that it could offer no assistance to the jury" and that while other methods for calculating damages were available, "so long as the methods employed are scientifically valid, Appellants' mere disagreement with the assumptions and methodology used does not warrant exclusion of expert testimony."

United States v. 87.98 Acres, 530 F.3d 899 (9th Cir. 2008) : Affirming the judgment in an eminent domain proceeding to secure an easement for high-voltage electrical transmission lines, the Court found no abuse of discretion when an environmental planner with extensive experience advising developers regarding the impact of electromagnetic frequencies from power transmission lines on the use and development of property was permitted to testify to public perceptions on the effects of EMFs among residential homeowners and home buyers, but was not permitted to testify to the extent and level of EMFs from the transmission line at issue. While the existence of EMFs was relevant to public perceptions and property values, there was no evidence that EMF measurements affect public perceptions, so a jury could only speculate concerning the effect of a particular measurement on public perception.

i4i Ltd. Partnership v. Microsoft Corp., 598 F.3d 831 (Fed. Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a action for infringement of a software patent, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony for the plaintiff regarding damages. The witness used a model based on a hypothetical negotiation between the parties at the time the infringement began, calculating a royalty rate and then multiplying that rate by the number of infringing products. The witness established that the hypothetical negotiation model is accepted among damage experts and economists, and the calculations were based on sufficient facts or data, although other data could have been used. In Monsanto Co. v. McFarling, 488 F.3d 973 (Fed. Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the holder of patents on herbicide-resistant soybeans in an action against a seed-buying farmer for breach of the license agreement and infringement of the patents. It held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a certified valuation expert to give an opinion on the amount of a reasonable royalty for use of the invention. That the witness was neither a farmer nor an agronomist went to the weight rather than the admissibility of the opinions. In DSU Medical Corp. v. JMS Co., 471 F.3d 1293 (Fed. Cir. 2006) , a patent infringement action, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding damages testimony from an expert who did not consider the effects of the availability of a noninfringing competing product and who "relied too heavily on hypothesized contracts in hypothesized markets that lacked sound economic grounding." In MicroStrategy Inc. v. Business Objects, S.A., 429 F.3d 1344 (Fed. Cir. 2005) , the Court, affirming in part judgments against the plaintiff in a patent infringement and business tort case, held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding damages testimony from an expert witness who attributed all the plaintiff's post-2000 losses solely to the defendant, despite the fact that the plaintiff had continuing financial struggles arising from the burst of the "dot com" bubble of the late 1990s. "While an expert need not consider every possible factor to render a 'reliable' opinion, the expert still must consider enough factors to make his or her opinion sufficiently reliable in the eyes of the court."

[26] Daubert Hearings [Go To Main]

United States v. Williams, 506 F.3d 151 (2d Cir. 2007) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge refused to hold a Daubert hearing on the reliability of the testimony by the government's ballistics expert. "While the gatekeeping function requires the district court to ascertain the reliability of Kuehner's methodology, it does not necessarily require that a separate hearing be held in order to do so" -- particularly if, at the time the expert testimony is presented to the jury, a sufficient basis for allowing the testimony is on the record. In this case, the Judge had noted that a similar attack on the reliability of ballistics evidence had been rejected by another District Judge; and, before the expert's testimony was submitted to the jury, the government provided an exhaustive foundation for the witness's expertise and a detailed description of the process she used to come to her conclusions.

United States v. Ozuna, 561 F.3d 728 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion when the Judge accepted expert testimony comparing handwriting in a suppression hearing without conducting a Daubert hearing. The Court held that the primary rationale behind a Daubert hearing -- the Judge's gatekeeping so that unreliable expert testimony does not carry too much weight with the jury -- is inapplicable in a suppression hearing. Thus, there was no requirement that a hearing be held.

United States v. Kenyon, 481 F.3d 1054 (8th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a child-sex-abuse conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when the Judge, without conducting a Daubert hearing, permitted an expert to testify regarding various characteristics of sexually abused children. The Court noted that when "a district court is satisfied with an expert's education, training, and experience, and the expert's testimony is reasonably based on that education, training, and experience, the court does not abuse its discretion by admitting the testimony without a preliminary hearing." In Miller v. Baker Implement Co., 439 F.3d 407 (8th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a summary judgment for the defendants in a subrogee's action for loss of a cotton picker that was destroyed in a fire. It found no abuse of discretion in excluding the plaintiff's expert testimony without a hearing based on affidavits submitted by the plaintiff, a detailed explanation of the proposed expert testimony, and a legal memorandum addressing the expert evidence issues. While Daubert hearings "may be necessary in some cases, the basic requirement under the law is that parties have an opportunity to be heard before the district court makes its decisions."

Millenkamp v. Davisco Foods Int'l, Inc., 562 F.3d 971 (9th Cir. 2009) : Buyers of milk permeate for cattle food won a judgment on breach of warranty claims against the seller of the product in an action alleging that calves died as a result of ingesting the product. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the Judge's decision to admit expert causation testimony without first holding a Daubert hearing. "The parties provided the district court with briefing on his scientific expertise and proposed testimony prior to trial. The district court could properly determine that this information comprised an adequate record from which the court could make its ruling." In United States v. Lopez-Martinez, 543 F.3d 509 (9th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed a conviction for smuggling aliens into the United States, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting a Border Parol agent to testify as to methods and patterns of human trafficking without holding a Daubert hearing, since a Judge has the same latitude in the gatekeeping process as in the ultimate determination of reliability.

United States v. Allen, 603 F.3d 1202 (10th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a drug conviction and held there was no error in a ruling that no Daubert hearing was necessary before admitting the testimony of the government's expert. The Judge gave the defense an opportunity to support the request for a hearing and the defense elected not to do so. In United States v. Nacchio, 555 F.3d 1234 (10th Cir. 2009) (en banc), vacating in part 519 F.3d 1140 (10th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed a conviction for insider trading, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the defendant's expert economic witness when he was called to testify. Although no Daubert hearing was held (no motion for such a hearing was made until after the Judge's ruling), and defense counsel asserted that he expected to provide the foundation upon voir dire, the Court found that the defense was on notice that the Rule 702 requirements were in issue and had ample opportunity to provide evidence of the expert's reasoning and methodology before he was placed on the stand, so it was in the Judge's discretion to conclude that the expert should not testify because of a failure to establish that his testimony would be a product of reliable principles reliably applied.

[27] Designation As "Expert" [Go To Main]

United States v. Johnson, 488 F.3d 690 (6th Cir. 2007) : Although the defendant in a drug trafficking case had made no objection, the Court expressed its disapproval of the Trial Judge's having declared before the jury that a testifying officer was to be considered an expert. "When a court certifies that a witness is an expert, it lends a note of approval to the witness that inordinately enhances the witness's stature and detracts from the court's neutrality and detachment."

[28.1] Drug Identification [Go To Main]

United States v. Moreland, 437 F.3d 424 (4th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for possession of cocaine base with intent to distribute, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by a West Virginia State Police forensic expert that the substances obtained from the defendant were cocaine base. Although the expert could not identify what type of chemical reaction was taking place in her tests or the chemical structure of all of the chemicals used in the tests, and did not know the error rate for the tests, she testified that the lab followed the protocols for testing that were accepted in the scientific community, the machine she used was calibrated on a daily basis, and reviews of her work had consistently demonstrated it to be error-free. The Court reasoned that a Trial Judge "need not determine that the proffered expert testimony is irrefutable or certainly correct." It concluded that although the witness "had significant gaps in her knowledge, these gaps were relevant to the weight of her testimony, not its admissibility."

[30] Economists [Go To Main]

United States ex rel. Miller v. Bill Harbert Int'l Constr., Inc., 608 F.3d 871 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : In a False Claims Act case arising from a bid-rigging conspiracy, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting expert testimony from an economist regarding how bid-rigging cartels work, as the testimony was reliable and could be helpful to the jury.

First Marblehead Corp. v. House, 541 F.3d 36 (1st Cir. 2008) : Five years after he resigned from the company, House attempted to exercise stock options and was told that they had expired three months after his resignation. The jury found that House had reasonably relied on negligent misrepresentations that the options would be viable for ten years, but it accepted testimony from an expert for the company that it would not have made financial sense for House to have exercised the options timely had he known of the three-month restriction. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admission of the expert's testimony, as he was an economist with nearly two decades of experience as a consultant in economics, finance, and strategy consulting, including providing investment advice to accredited investors. His testimony about how stock options function and how an investor would think about exercising those options involved topics not ordinarily within the knowledge of the jury. And the testimony provided the jury with information helpful in evaluating House's assertions as to what he would have done, without giving the expert's opinion about House's credibility or what he believed House would have done.

Boca Raton Community Hosp., Inc. v. Tenet Health Care Corp., 582 F.3d 1227 (11th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in a RICO action related to Medicare reimbursements, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence from the plaintiff's expert. The expert's opinion on injury and damages treated as unlawful some charges that the plaintiff's liability theory treated as lawful.

[30.1] Electronic Evidence [Go To Main]

Wendler & Ezra, P.C. v. American Int'l Group, Inc., 521 F.3d 790 (7th Cir. 2008) : A law firm specializing in representing truck drivers in tort suits brought a defamation action against a competitor alleging that the competitor posted on a bulletin board frequented by truck drivers an e-mail message that purported to be from an unhappy client of the plaintiff firm. To show that the e-mail came from the competitor, the plaintiff offered an affidavit by the webmaster at teamster.net, who stated that software told him that the posting originated from an IP address registered to the competitor. The Court held the affidavit was properly excluded, because it failed to say "what software had been employed, how it worked, what data had been provided to the program, and what if anything had been done to find out whether the poster had spoofed one of AIG's addresses." The Court added that "[p]roof that the message originated from AIG's address would not necessarily establish that AIG was complicit; it would be necessary to track the message from an originating computer and learn who had access to that machine before it would be possible to hold AIG vicariously liable." The Court reiterated that "[w]e have said over and over that an expert's ipse dixit is inadmissible."

[31] Employment Discrimination Cases [Go To Main]

[b] Employment Discrimination Cases -- Expert Testimony Excludable or Exclusion Required

Chadwick v. WellPoint, Inc., 561 F.3d 38 (1st Cir. 2009) : In an action by an employee who alleged that the failure to promote her was the result of sex discrimination, the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff but held there was no abuse of discretion when the plaintiff's expert testimony was excluded. The proposed expert was a sociologist with expertise in employment discrimination and sex-based stereotypes in the workplace, who would opine on the prevalence and taxonomy of sex-stereotype employment discrimination and on how comments and behaviors of the supervisors working for the defendant were consistent with larger societal patterns and were likely based on sex-based stereotypes. However, the expert's lack of familiarity with the details of the case rendered her testimony unhelpful.

Naeem v. McKesson Drug Co., 444 F.3d 593 (7th Cir. 2006) : A discharged female employee claimed that she had been subjected to gender discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. An in limine ruling precluded the plaintiff's human resources expert from opining whether the defendant followed accepted human resource policies but allowed testimony regarding whether the defendant followed its own policies. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff on the IIED claims, the Court held that the Judge's simple conclusion that the witness had sufficient expertise to assist the jury was insufficient to show that an adequate Daubert analysis had been performed, so admission of the testimony would not be given the normal deferential review. The Court concluded that it was an error (but harmless) to admit the testimony, because it did not meet the requisite level of reliability: While the expert had examined the defendant's personnel policy manual and depositions by its employees, his opinions were not tied to specific portions of the manual and appeared to be general observations regarding what is normal or usual business practice.

[32] Engineers [Go To Main]

[a] Expert Testimony Admissible or Admission Required

Hodges v. Mack Trucks, Inc., 474 F.3d 188 (5th Cir. 2006) : The injured driver of a truck sued the manufacturer of the truck and the manufacturer of the seatbelt, alleging design defects in the seatbelt and in the passenger-side door latch that caused him to be ejected in the accident. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by the driver's expert that the door latch failed and that there was a safer design available that would have substantially reduced the likelihood of the driver's injuries. It noted that the expert was an engineer with many years working in, and testifying against, the insurance industry.

Surles v. Greyhound Lines, Inc., 474 F.3d 288 (6th Cir. 2007) : The plaintiff, suing for personal injuries incurred when a deranged passenger attacked the driver of an interstate bus and caused a serious accident, argued that the defendant was negligent in failing to provide secure enclosures for its bus drivers. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting a witness to testify that an entry-resistant barrier could have prevented the attack in this case and that such a barrier is feasible. The witness was an engineer whose work experience included time in the transportation sector focusing specifically on buses. In fact, he had designed a barrier such as he testified about. The Trial Judge conducted a hearing to ensure the reliability and relevancy of the testimony, precluded opinions on the issue of foreseeability as they would not have been helpful, and had a sufficient basis for concluding that the expert's conclusions were based on reliable application of his experience to a sufficient factual basis.

[b] Engineers -- Expert Testimony Excludable or Exclusion Required

Beaudette v. Louisville Ladder, Inc., 462 F.3d 22 (1st Cir. 2006) : In a product liability action arising from the collapse of a fiberglass ladder, the plaintiff's expert, an engineer, offered testimony that there was a manufacturing defect in the ladder because there were "resin-rich" areas in the fiberglass, in violation of the ANSI standard for manufacturing fiberglass ladders. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant granted after the expert's testimony was excluded, the Court found no abuse of discretion. The expert's opinion was not supported by any testing or any technical literature, and the ANSI standard was qualified by the phrase "in accordance with good commercial practice," about which he had no information, as he was not familiar with the ladder manufacturing business and was not an expert in the process by which the ladder was manufactured.

[33] Environmental Experts [Go To Main]

Olin Corp. v. Certain Underwriters at Lloyd's London, 468 F.3d 120 (2d Cir. 2006) : In an action to recover indemnification for pollution remediation under CERCLA, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony for the plaintiff by the head of an environmental civil engineering firm. Although some of the expert's opinions were not particularly well supported, there was some evidence in the record to support all of his conclusions except possibly one, and "[r]ather than selectively excluding the portions of [the expert]'s testimony that the court thought were not well supported, the judge considered the testimony as a whole. This was not error[,]" since the weaknesses in the opinion would be pointed out to the jury by cross-examination and the defendant's experts.

United States v. Bailey, 571 F.3d 791 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the government in a proceeding to enforce a Corps of Engineers' order for restoration of wetlands on which a landowner had built a road without a permit. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony that the site was a wetland, although one of the indicators used by the expert might lead to false positives; even so, there was a sufficient showing that the evidence was reliable.

[37] Expert Witness Originally Retained by Adverse Party [Go To Main]

Jasty v. Wright Medical Technology, Inc., 528 F.3d 28 (1st Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment against an orthopedic surgeon who sued a manufacturer of orthopedic implant devices for breach of contract. The surgeon complained he was not permitted to call the manufacturer's expert as a witness, but the Court held that "a trial court has discretion to decide whether to require a witness to testify for an opposing party," and that in the absence of any showing of need for the surgeon to call the witness it could not say that the Trial Judge failed to exercise discretion in excluding the testimony.

[38] Eyewitness Identification [Go To Main]

United States v. Rodriguez-Berrios, 573 F.3d 55 (1st Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for the fatal carjacking of his ex-wife, finding no error in the exclusion of expert testimony on eyewitness identification after one witness testified that she had seen the defendant in the victim's car striking her shortly before the victim's disappearance and another witness testified to seeing a man and a woman in the car and hearing "loud voices." The Court concluded that the Judge had properly examined the factors that it had set forth as relevant to the admissibility of eyewitness experts, reasonably found that the eyewitness testimony was not the sole evidence upon which the government relied, and had a reasonable basis to conclude that the jury was capable of considering the effects of lighting, lack of attention, and post-event information in assessing the eyewitness testimony.

United States v. Brownlee, 454 F.3d 131 (3d Cir. 2006) : Reversing convictions arising from a carjacking, the Court found error in the exclusion of testimony from the defendant's expert on eyewitness identification. The expert would have testified that people who make an identification can have a misplaced confidence in their accuracy. The Court noted that the case was primarily about the accuracy and reliability of identifications; that the expert used a reliable methodology; and that the exclusion of the expert's testimony on confidence of accuracy "significantly undermined Brownlee's ability to challenge effectively the witnesses' certainty and confidence in their identifications -- a point the Government used to its benefit both in presenting testimony and arguing to the jury it its closing at trial." Given that "witnesses ofttimes profess considerable confidence in erroneous identifications" and that "jurors seldom enter a courtroom with the knowledge that eyewitness identifications are unreliable," it followed that "expert testimony was the only method of imparting the knowledge concerning confidence-accuracy correlation to the jury." The Court also stated that "the science of eyewitness perception has achieved the level of exactness, methodology and reliability of any psychological research."

United States v. Rodriguez-Felix, 450 F.3d 1117 (10th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed drug trafficking convictions, finding no error in the exclusion of testimony from a defense expert on the unreliability of eyewitness identifications. It noted that such expert testimony could not be excluded automatically; admissibility depends on the reliability of the methods used by the particular expert, and whether the identification problems reviewed by the expert are sufficiently difficult to evaluate that the jury might need assistance. Here, the expert's methodology was unreliable:

> The description of Dr. Clark's research is wholly inadequate -- it fails to indicate whether it has been subjected to peer review, whether it has been published, and whether it has been accepted by other psychologists in the field. Indeed, Dr. Clark states that he is currently in the process of testing his theory. Additionally, other than generalized assertions regarding the factors which can affect an eyewitness identification, the report fails to sufficiently reference specific and recognized scientific research, which underlies Dr. Clark's conclusions, such that the court could determine if this foundational research had been subjected to peer review, and, if so, whether it had been accepted in the community. The requirements of Daubert are not satisfied by casual mention of a few scientific studies, which fail to demonstrate that an expert's conclusions are grounded in established research, recognized in the scientific community, or otherwise accepted as scientific knowledge.

The Court also noted that the testimony would not have assisted the jury, because "cross-examination amply exposed the common-sense deficiencies in the prosecution's identification case."

[39] Fingerprint Identification [Go To Main]

United States v. Pena, 586 F.3d 105 (1st Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for drug and firearm offenses, the Judge expressed doubts about the reliability of fingerprint identification evidence where the governing protocol used no specific minimum number of points to confirm a match, but noted that "the case law is overwhelmingly in favor of admitting fingerprint experts under virtually any circumstance," and reasoned that the only reason to exclude the testimony or give a limiting instruction would be "if there had been data, real evidence presented about the limitations of fingerprinting." Here, the defendant's motion to exclude relied on a single law review article. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence, given the widespread acceptance in spite of the relative subjectivity of certain protocols.

United States v. John, 597 F.3d 263 (5th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a fraud conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony that the defendant's fingerprints were found on certain documents. The Court noted that "there is no universally accepted number of matching points that is required for proper identification, as this varies depending on the quality of the print," and it relied on opinions from other Circuits that this "sliding-scale" analysis was "testable, generally accepted, and sufficiently reliable and that its known error rate is essentially zero." The Court also rejected the argument that the evidence was unreliable because the test had not been subjected to "blind verification" by a second expert, since no case law holds that blind verification is required.

United States v. Calderon-Segura, 512 F.3d 1104 (9th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for illegal re-entry into the United States, finding no abuse of discretion in the denial of a "full Daubert hearing" on, and the admission of, expert testimony that an inked thumb-print exemplar taken from the defendant matched the inked thumb-print appearing on his 1999 warrant of removal. The defendant's motion "was based almost exclusively on evidence demonstrating the unreliability of latent fingerprint identification, whereas this case involved only the examination of two inked fingerprints, the reliability and admissibility of which is long-established." The defendant also "failed to show that the exemplars at issue in this case lacked clarity, were fragmented, or contained any other defects or artifactual interference that might call into question the accuracy or reliability of their identification."

United States v. Baines, 573 F.3d 979 (10th Cir. 2009) : In an extensive opinion, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony that a latent fingerprint matched the fingerprint of the defendant that was taken when he was arrested. The Court recognized that there are "multiple questions regarding whether fingerprint analysis can be considered truly scientific in an intellectual, abstract sense" but declared that "nothing in the controlling legal authority we are bound to apply demands such an extremely high degree of intellectual purity." Applying the Daubert/Kumho factors, the Court recognized the concerns that fingerprint analysis was subjective, and that there was really no peer review of the process. As to rate of error, the Court concluded that whatever the flaws in the studies conducted on false positives, "the known error rate remains impressively low." And, as to the factor of general acceptance, the Court concluded that while acceptance by a community of unbiased experts "would carry greater weight, we believe that acceptance by other experts in the field [i.e., law enforcement and fingerprint analysts] should also be considered. And when we consider that factor with respect to fingerprint analysis, what we observe is overwhelming acceptance."

United States v. Douglas, 489 F.3d 1117 (11th Cir. 2007) : Affirming convictions for kidnapping, robbery, and carjacking, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by a fingerprint expert regarding the age of a fingerprint on a vehicle and the manner in which the print was made. There was sufficient evidence that the methodology by which the expert reached his opinions was reliable and reasoned.

[40] Fire Investigations [Go To Main]

Presley v. Lakewood Eng'g & Mfg. Co., 553 F.3d 638 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for a manufacturer in a personal injury action brought by a homeowner after a fire allegedly caused by a defective space heater. There was no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the plaintiff's expert on the cause of the fire, as he failed to conduct relevant tests, relied on a theory that was not supported by any scientific study, and engaged in "vague theorizing based upon general principles."

103 Investors I, L.P. v. Square D Co., 470 F.3d 985 (10th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the manufacturer of an electrical distribution system that was the source of a building fire, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the plaintiff's expert witness. Although the witness was a qualified fire investigator, he had no experience or knowledge related to the manufacture of electrical distribution systems, so his opinion that the fire was caused by contaminants that originated during the manufacturing process lacked reliability.

[41] "Fit" Between Expert Testimony and the Facts [Go To Main]

Muskat v. United States, 554 F.3d 183 (1st Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the government in a tax refund case, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony from the taxpayer's expert that a large slice of a family business's goodwill was attributable to the taxpayer. It held that the expert's testimony was directed to the goodwill of the company whereas the principal issue at trial was whether a non-compete agreement represented compensation for the transfer of personal goodwill. Because all of the company's goodwill was sold under the agreement, the expert's testimony would not have shed light on the meaning of the non-compete agreement.

United States v. Schiff, 602 F.3d 152 (3d Cir. 2010) : In a stock fraud action, the prosecution sought to prove the materiality of alleged misstatements and omissions by introducing evidence of the drop in the company's stock price upon disclosure of correcting information. On interlocutory review of an order excluding testimony from the government's expert witness because he considered only exogenous factors that might have affected the stock price and did not consider that potential negative effects of other unrelated events disclosed in the announcement, the Court held that the lack of fit between the facts and the expert's opinion justified exclusion of the expert's testimony.

[42] Forensic Experts [Go To Main]

United States v. Mahone, 453 F.3d 68 (1st Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for attempted armed robbery, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a government witness was permitted to testify as an expert with respect to footwear impression identification, even though she was not qualified through the International Association for Identification. The Court also found that there was an appropriate hearing into the "ACE-V" method for assessing footwear impressions, and sufficient evidence of the reliability of the method and its application in this case.

United States v. Ford, 481 F.3d 215 (3d Cir. 2007) : Affirming a bank robbery conviction, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by a government expert that three partial shoeprints lifted from the counter in the bank were similar to the type of imprints that would be made by the shoes worn by the defendant when he was apprehended. The expert was qualified, his testimony would aid the jury, and it was based on a method accepted as reliable both in federal Courts and the forensic community. The Court noted a distinction between forensic identification sciences, whose reliability "rests upon the experience and observational powers of their practitioners," and the type of science typically at issue in Daubert cases: "While a strict application of the Daubert factors to forensic identification sciences might be a fruitless exercise, due to the inherently experiential nature of this type of expertise, the District Court will be in the best position to make this determination."

United States v. Rodriguez, 581 F.3d 775 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for kidnapping resulting in death, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting a government pathologist to testify about the results of acid-phosphate tests conducted on the victim's body, indicating the presence of semen in her vagina and cervix. The Court noted that the pathologist "did not invent acid-phosphate testing; he testified to attending national medical conferences and reviewing scientific literature on the topic. The test results are based on scientific data, and assist the jury in its fact-finding." Although the expert testified that his conclusion was based on acid-phosphate measurements in living people and there could be uncertainty about the factual basis of the timing of the chemical process in a corpse, this went to weight and not admissibility.

[43] "Gatekeeping" [Go To Main]

[a] Bench Trials

Trustees of Chi. Painters v. Royal Int'l Drywall, 493 F.3d 782 (7th Cir. 2007) : In an action to collect union benefit contributions from an employer, the Judge, as fact finder, relied on two experts to determine the number of hours the employees worked. These witnesses offered their opinions on how long it would have taken the employees to tape a drywall. The Court found no error, noting that the experts properly testified on the basis of extensive experience. It stated that in a bench trial the Daubert requirements may be less rigidly applied, because "in the context of a bench trial, the judge would be able to consider any shortcomings of their expertise drawn out through cross-examination" and "if the gatekeeper and the factfinder are one and the same ... the need to make such decisions prior to hearing the testimony is lessened." Reviewing a bankruptcy case, In re Salem, 465 F.3d 767 (7th Cir. 2006) , the Court noted that in bench trials the Judge may hear the evidence and make reliability determinations during, rather than in advance of, trial, but that the reliability standard of Rule 702 is not lessened.

[b] "Gatekeeping" -- Findings Required

Nunez v. Allstate Ins. Co., 604 F.3d 840 (5th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for an insurer sued for additional payments on Hurricane Katrina damage claims. It found no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by an insurance adjuster retained by the plaintiffs; even without the benefit of the Judge's explanation of the ruling, rulings from other Judges in the district and facts propounded by the defendant demonstrated that the witness was unqualified and his opinions were unreliable.

United States v. Jawara, 474 F.3d 565 (9th Cir. 2007) : The Judge in an immigration fraud case ruled on the admissibility of expert testimony after reviewing briefs and other materials relating to the in limine motion and hearing lengthy oral argument, stating only: "The testimony will be allowed, and the Court finds that a Daubert hearing is unnecessary." Affirming, the Court noted that "[a] lthough the district court's ruling suggests an implicit finding of reliability, the failure to make an explicit reliability finding was error." The error was harmless, however.

United States v. Roach, 582 F.3d 1192 (10th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for drug and firearms possession by an alleged gang member, the Judge chose not to conduct a Daubert hearing before trial on testimony by a prosecution gang expert. When an objection was made to the witness' testimony at trial, the Judge responded by explaining Rule 702 to the jury and then stating that "I've determined that the jury may consider [the witness] as an expert and give [his expert testimony] such consideration as they deem appropriate. Affirming, the Court held that it was error (but harmless) to admit the testimony on such a conclusory statement, without making any factual findings. In Burlington No. & S.F. Ry. v. Grant, 505 F.3d 1013 (10th Cir. 2007) , the Court reversed judgments for the defendant in an action to recover pollution remediation costs, holding that, since the Trial Judge failed to make any findings on the record when excluding testimony by the plaintiff's expert, it could not infer proper performance of the gatekeeping function based on the Judge's few statements and questions during the Daubert hearing. Thus, it reversed the ruling excluding the testimony and remanded for further proceedings.

[d] "Gatekeeping" -- Requirement of Gatekeeping Analysis

Naeem v. McKesson Drug Co., 444 F.3d 593 (7th Cir. 2006) : A discharged female employee claimed that she had been subjected to gender discrimination and intentional infliction of emotional distress. An in limine ruling precluded the plaintiff's human resources expert from opining whether the defendant followed accepted human resource policies, but allowed testimony regarding whether the defendant followed its own policies. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff on the IIED claims, the Court held that the Judge's simple conclusion that the witness had sufficient expertise to assist the jury was insufficient to show that an adequate Daubert analysis had been performed, so admission of the testimony would not be given the normal deferential review. The Court concluded that it was an error (but harmless) to admit the testimony, because it did not meet the requisite level of reliability: While the expert had examined the defendant's personnel policy manual and depositions by its employees, his opinions were not tied to specific portions of the manual and appeared to be general observations regarding what is normal or usual business practice.

[45] Handwriting Experts [Go To Main]

United States v. Garza, 448 F.3d 294 (5th Cir. 2006) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the defendant's handwriting expert that signatures on the defendant's confession and consent to search form were forged. Although her opinion was based on examination of photocopied documents, the expert stated that she did not know how many times the documents had been photocopied and admitted that the best practice is to look at original signatures, not photocopies.

United States v. Prime, 431 F.3d 1147 (9th Cir. 2005) : This opinion supersedes the one annotated in the Main Volume of the Manual.

[48] Impeachment of Experts [Go To Main]

In re Hanford Nuclear Reservation Litig., 534 F.3d 986 (9th Cir. 2008) , amending 497 F.3d 1005 (9th Cir. 2007) : Reversing in part judgments from a trial in which bellwether plaintiffs representing a class of residents near a nuclear facility that helped make an atomic bomb during World War II claimed that radioiodine (I-131) emissions caused cancers and life threatening diseases, the Court found it was error to allow the defendants to cross-examine the plaintiffs' expert endocrinologist, Dr. Davies, by asking him about the deposition testimony of another expert whose testimony the defendants had persuaded the Judge to exclude as unduly speculative. Dr. Davies had neither read nor relied upon the other expert's deposition, and the Court concluded that the deposition was inadmissible hearsay.

[50] Intellectual Property Cases [Go To Main]

Mike's Train House, Inc. v. Lionel, LLC, 472 F.3d 398 (6th Cir. 2006) : In an action claiming that Lionel misappropriated the plaintiff's trade secrets for producing model trains, the plaintiff's expert (Stein), a mechanical engineer, was permitted to testify to his opinion that Lionel's design drawings had been copied from drawings of the plaintiff's former employee who also worked for Lionel. That conclusion was based upon 21 self-selected criteria, including factors such as the drawing's title and part number. Stein also relied heavily on a report prepared by Lee, another expert retained by the plaintiff. The Court held that it was error to allow Stein to testify. First, the Trial Court "abandoned its gate-keeping function by failing to make any findings regarding the reliability of Stein's testimony." Second, admitting Stein's testimony was an abuse of discretion because it was unreliable. Stein "created the criteria with which he compared the design drawings" and "there is no evidence that his methodology had ever been tested, subjected to peer review, or enjoyed general acceptance." Moreover, Stein admitted that he "arbitrarily determined how much significance each of the twenty-one criteria would have on his assessment of whether there was evidence of copying." Finally, "Stein not only created his report for the purposes of litigation, but ... created the precise methodology for that purpose as well." The Court noted its suspicion "of methodologies created for the purpose of litigation, because expert witnesses are not necessarily always unbiased scientists."

Corwin v. Walt Disney Co., 475 F.3d 1239 (11th Cir. 2007) : The plaintiff claimed that the defendant's theme park infringed the copyright of a painting that was a rendering of a third party's idea for an international theme park in miniature. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court found that four experts' reports were properly excluded. Although the experts were qualified, their opinions focused on the concepts and ideas behind the painting and the theme park, rather than on the expression of those concepts and ideas, which is the only proper subject of copyright.

Simpson v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, 470 F.3d 356 (D.C. Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed denial of a motion to dismiss a suit by a passenger who claimed damages after she and her late husband had been removed from a ship by Libyan authorities, finding that the terrorism exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act was satisfied by the plaintiff. Her expert witness explained "likely scenarios" as to Libya's intended purpose, which was to exact a quid pro quo by means of the detention; he was well qualified and his opinions were based on reliable materials.

[c] Law Enforcement Agents -- Drug Cases

[iii] Law Enforcement Agents -- Drug Cases -- Interpreting Statements, Code, etc.

United States v. Johnson, 587 F.3d 625 (4th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug crimes, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting expert testimony that decoded terms used by the defendants and coconspirators during recorded telephone conversations. It rejected an argument that the experts relied on hearsay statements by cooperators to help them reach a conclusion about the meaning of particular conversations, which violated confrontation rights under Crawford v. Washington because the experts were relying on testimonial hearsay. The Court noted that experts are allowed to consider inadmissible hearsay as long as it is of a type reasonably relied on by other experts, and that the experts never made reference to their interviews, so the jury heard no testimonial hearsay. In United States v. Wilson, 484 F.3d 267 (4th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed convictions of a cocaine distribution conspiracy, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by one of the investigating officers interpreting recorded conversations among the conspirators. The officer fully explained the methodology he used in interpreting coded phrases. Although he occasionally did not apply his methodology reliably, adding language rather than interpreting the language used, the errors were harmless.

United States v. York, 572 F.3d 415 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a cocaine distribution conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when an FBI agent who handled the investigation and helped execute a "sting" was permitted to interpret drug jargon in taped conversations between the defendant and the informant used in the sting. Although the Judge did not formally anoint the agent as an expert, the Court found that any error was harmless, as the defense did not object to the testimony until well after the agent began to interpret words and had a full opportunity to cross-examine the agent. In United States v. Farmer, 543 F.3d 363 (7th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed drug-related convictions, finding no abuse of discretion when a DEA agent was permitted to testify as to the meaning of coded language contained in tape-recorded conversations. The Court noted that the potential for prejudice when a witness testifies as both a lay witness and an expert may be addressed by appropriate cautionary instructions and by examination of the witness in such a way as to make clear when the witness is testifying to fact and when the witness is offering an expert opinion.

United States v. Reed, 575 F.3d 900 (9th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting a law enforcement officer to testify about the meaning of coded language used in wiretapped recordings. The Court agent's testimony "was based on his experience investigating PCP traffickers and on his specific experience investigating the present case. His testimony was not inherently unreliable and it was helpful in defining ambiguous terms used in the wiretap recordings. The terms related to PCP manufacturing and were outside the knowledge of the lay juror." In United States v. Decoud, 456 F.3d 996 (9th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed convictions for a crack cocaine distribution conspiracy, finding no abuse of discretion when a government drug expert was permitted to testify that certain words recorded on tape were code for drug deals and drug use. The expert explained the methodology he used to interpret each word and indicated that for words he had not heard before he relied upon his training and experience, the context of each word in a specific call, and each call in the context of other calls that he understood.

United States v. Emmanuel, 565 F.3d 1324 (11th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a conviction for narcotics trafficking offenses, the Court held that most of a police expert's testimony was properly specific and closely related to his interpretation of drug codes and jargon, and that when he, at times, went beyond interpreting code words to interpreting conversations as a whole, the error was harmless.

[iv] Law Enforcement Agents -- Drug Cases -- Opinions About Conduct or Other Circumstances in Case

United States v. Lopez, 547 F.3d 364 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed drug and firearm convictions, finding no abuse of discretion when an investigator from the United States Attorney's office, who had two decades of experience investigating drug crimes, was permitted to testify that drug paraphernalia seized from the defendant's car was evidence of distribution.

[v] Law Enforcement Agents -- Drug Cases -- Practices of Drug Trade

United States v. Martinez, 476 F.3d 961 (D.C. Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to import cocaine, finding no error in the admission of expert testimony by a former DEA agent that the United States was the most likely destination of Colombian cocaine transported through Central America. That evidence regarding general trafficking routes was not duplicative of factual testimony that the defendant's particular conspiracy imported cocaine into the United States.

United States v. Sanchez-Hernandez, 507 F.3d 826 (5th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a marijuana possession conviction, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by law enforcement agents that explained, based on their experience, how drug smuggling operations were conducted in crossing the Rio Grande. The agents testified that the lead person in a smuggling outfit would often wear camouflage so that he could hide if trouble were encountered, and that drugs were often carried in duffle bags like the one the defendant was carrying. Noting that prior decisions hold that drug courier profile testimony is inadmissible to prove substantive guilt based on similarities between a defendant and a profile, the Court stated that "[a]lthough the agents' testimony came close to crossing the line into drug profiling evidence because of its tendency to imply the defendant's knowledge of the drug activity," the agents had testified on the basis of their specialized knowledge, on a subject matter that would assist the jury.

United States v. Avila, 557 F.3d 809 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute numerous controlled substances, finding no plain error when an expert displayed photographs of hidden compartments he had discovered in cars involved in other cases he had investigated and explained how "drug cartels" used this method to transport drugs. Following testimony by cooperating witnesses that the defendant or his agents transported large amounts of drugs using hidden compartments, the expert's testimony helped the jury understand the evidence, and nothing about the expert's testimony would cause the jury to decide the case on an improper basis.

United States v. Jeanetta, 533 F.3d 651 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed drug and firearm convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting a police officer to explain the significance of various items -- including ZipLoc bags, radios, scanners, and night vision goggles -- seized during a search of the defendant's home. The Court found that the significance of these seemingly innocuous items was highly relevant to rebut the defendant's claim that he was merely a drug user and not a trafficker. "Because the importance of the items would not necessarily be apparent to a lay observer, the expert testimony was necessary to explain the significance of the items as they related to the world of drug dealing." In United States v. Gill, 513 F.3d 836 (8th Cir. 2008) , the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting expert testimony by a law enforcement agent on the link between firearms and drug-trafficking. That the agent's experience did not include interactions with individuals who were both trafficking drugs and licensed to carry firearms went to the weight and not the admissibility of the testimony. In United States v. Urbina, 431 F.3d 305 (8th Cir. 2005) , the defendant was convicted for possession with intent to distribute cocaine after his truck was stopped on the highway and six bundles of cocaine were found hidden in an auxiliary gas tank. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting a DEA agent to testify that he had never seen a drug dealer entrust as large a quantity of drugs to a courier who was not aware of what he was transporting. The evidence was relevant to rebut a defense that the defendant did not know the cocaine was present in the tank; it was helpful to a jury unfamiliar with the practices of the drug trade; and the prosecution did not elicit an opinion on the ultimate issue of the defendant's knowledge, which would be impermissible.

United States v. Garcia, 447 F.3d 1327 (11th Cir. 2006) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no error in admitting expert testimony from an experienced DEA agent, who explained how drug trafficking organizations compartmentalize operations and roles; that drug traffickers typically stash drug proceeds in houses of people they trust; that drug traffickers use scales to weigh and package drugs; that drug traffickers often possess weapons for protection; and that drug traffickers use coded language. The Court found that this testimony could assist the jury in understanding the operations of drug conspiracies.

[vii] Law Enforcement Agents -- Drug Cases -- Use of Cash

United States v. Millbrook, 553 F.3d 1057 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion when a law enforcement agent was permitted to give expert testimony that the number of small bills the defendant was carrying in the $1039 bundle found at his arrest was consistent with drug distribution.

[d] Law Enforcement Agents -- Dual Roles

United States v. Mejia, 545 F.3d 179 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court vacated convictions for conspiracy to commit assaults in aid of racketeering activity. The prosecution arose after members of one gang shot members of other gangs. To prove the shootings arose in the course of racketeering activity, a state police officer who had been investigating gangs in the area was permitted to testify about the operations of the defendants' nationwide gang, as well as of the gang's local activities, including that its members had committed "between 18 and 22, 23" murders in the area in the five years prior to the trial. According to the officer, his testimony was based on custodial interviews with gang members, reports from other law enforcement personnel, and published sources. The Court held that much of the expert's testimony concerned material well within the grasp of the average juror. The testimony also substituted the expert's conclusion on an essential fact (that the gang committed murders in a pattern of racketeering activity) for competent evidence of that fact: "The Government cannot take a shortcut around its obligation to prove murder beyond a reasonable doubt just by having an expert pronounce that unspecified deaths of eighteen to twenty-three persons have been homicides committed by members of [the gang]." The Court also noted that the witness "was acting as a de facto 'case agent' in providing this summary information to the jury," a practice it had admonished against because case agents testifying as experts gain unmerited credibility when testifying about factual matters from first-hand knowledge. Furthermore, while law enforcement officers routinely and reasonably rely on hearsay in reaching their conclusions, an expert witness must not simply repeat hearsay evidence but must apply expertise to the inadmissible materials -- and in too many instances the expert in this case did not do so. This was particularly a problem with statements made in custodial interrogations, which were testimonial hearsay violating the defendants' Confrontation Clause rights.

United States v. Baptiste, 596 F.3d 214 (4th Cir. 2010) : In a cocaine distribution prosecution a police officer was permitted to testify simultaneously as an expert on the manner and means of drug trafficking and as a fact witness. Affirming, the Court concluded that "the district court could have done more to ensure that [the officer]'s lay and expert testimony were demarcated more clearly in order to prevent juror confusion and to prevent jurors from giving undue weight to [his] lay testimony," but found no plain error.

United States v. Lopez-Medina, 461 F.3d 724 (6th Cir. 2006) : Vacating a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, the Court found that testimony by law enforcement officers, who had 23 years of combined experience and training in narcotics-related crimes, concerning counter-surveillance techniques was reliable and would assist the jury. However, regarding the officers' dual roles as fact and expert witnesses, the Court found error "[b]ecause there was no cautionary jury instruction regarding the agents' dual witness roles nor clear demarcation between their fact testimony and expert opinion testimony."

United States v. Goodwin, 496 F.3d 636 (7th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed drug trafficking convictions, finding no abuse of discretion when a case agent was permitted to give testimony both as a fact witness and as an expert interpreting drug code language. A pattern jury instruction was given to avoid jury confusion and prejudice; counsel were permitted to cross-examine the witness extensively; the witness' testimony was limited to providing a foundation for the wiretaps and to expertly interpreting the code language; and the government structured its questioning to prevent the two subject matters from overlapping.

United States v. Anchrum, 590 F.3d 795 (9th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug and firearms offenses, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting a DEA agent who had participated in the incident leading to the defendant's arrest to also testify as an expert regarding the various reasons a hypothetical drug dealer would possess a firearm. The Judge avoided problems with an agent testifying in dual roles by separating the testimony into "phases." In United States v. Freeman, 498 F.3d 893 (9th Cir. 2007) , the Court, affirming a cocaine conviction, held that a police detective's lay opinion testimony interpreting ambiguous recorded telephone conversations was properly admitted based upon his personal knowledge of the investigation, and testimony as to other terms of which the witness had no personal knowledge was properly admitted because the agent had attained specialized knowledge of drug trafficking and had been qualified as an expert. The Court rejected a claim that it was error for the detective to testify as both lay and expert witness, although it agreed with United States v. Dukagjini, 326 F.3d 45 (2d Cir. 2003) (see Main Volume § 702.03[54][d]), that there are dangers when a law enforcement agent gives testimony in dual roles. The Court concluded that it was error (but harmless) to admit some portions of the detective's testimony, particularly opinions that relied on or conveyed hearsay evidence, and interpretation of clear statements that the jury would understand on its own. In United States v. Freeman, 488 F.3d 1217 (9th Cir. 2007) , a cocaine prosecution, a detective testified to the meaning of encoded drug jargon and gave his interpretations of ambiguous recorded telephone conversations. The Court affirmed, finding that the witness was qualified by experience to offer expert testimony about drug jargon and that he used a sufficiently reliable methodology. It also found that the detective's lay opinion testimony interpreting the telephone conversations was admissible given his role in the investigation, but it expressed concern that the blurred distinction between lay and expert testimony may have permitted the detective to rely upon and convey inadmissible hearsay evidence. It also expressed concern that the "dual roles created a risk that there was an imprimatur of scientific or technical validity to the entirety of his testimony," but it found no plain error in the Judge's failure to give a cautionary instruction sua sponte.

[e] Law Enforcement Agents -- Firearms

United States v. Cormier, 468 F.3d 63 (1st Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed convictions related to drug trafficking, finding no abuse of discretion when an experienced ATF agent was permitted to testify regarding the "interstate nexus" of firearms used in one of the charged offenses. The agent relied on publicly available records, conversations with manufacturers, research texts, and inspection of one of the weapons.

United States v. Mullins, 446 F.3d 750 (8th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting an ATF officer to testify that the defendant's starter pistol could easily be converted to expel a projectile. The testimony was based upon an independent visual examination of the starter gun and the defendant's expert agreed that this was a proper method to determine whether it could readily be converted to a firearm.

[h] Law Enforcement Agents -- Gang Experts

United States v. Mejia, 545 F.3d 179 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court vacated convictions for conspiracy to commit assaults in aid of racketeering activity. The prosecution arose after members of one gang shot members of other gangs. To prove the shootings arose in the course of racketeering activity, a state police officer who had been investigating gangs in the area was permitted to testify about the operations of the defendants' nationwide gang, as well as of the gang's local activities, including that its members had committed "between 18 and 22, 23" murders in the area in the five years prior to the trial. According to the officer, his testimony was based on custodial interviews with gang members, reports from other law enforcement personnel, and published sources. The Court held that much of the expert's testimony concerned material well within the grasp of the average juror. The testimony also substituted the expert's conclusion on an essential fact (that the gang committed murders in a pattern of racketeering activity) for competent evidence of that fact: "The Government cannot take a shortcut around its obligation to prove murder beyond a reasonable doubt just by having an expert pronounce that unspecified deaths of eighteen to twenty-three persons have been homicides committed by members of [the gang]." The Court also noted that the witness "was acting as a de facto 'case agent' in providing this summary information to the jury," a practice it had admonished against because case agents testifying as experts gain unmerited credibility when testifying about factual matters from first-hand knowledge. Furthermore, while law enforcement officers routinely and reasonably rely on hearsay in reaching their conclusions, an expert witness must not simply repeat hearsay evidence but must apply expertise to the inadmissible materials -- and in too many instances the expert in this case did not do so. This was particularly a problem with statements made in custodial interrogations, which were testimonial hearsay violating the defendants' Confrontation Clause rights.

United States v. Street, 548 F.3d 618 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed a conviction for aiding and abetting murder in furtherance of drug trafficking, holding it was error to admit testimony from a police expert about outlaw motorcycle gangs, including their violence toward women and "snitches." The defendant was not, however, a member of the gang on which the testimony focused, nor had he ever set foot in the gang's headquarters. The evidence indicated that two gang members had occasionally worked on motorcycles with the defendant, supplied him with precursor chemicals, and purchased and used the final product, but there was no factual grounding for the prosecutor's claim in his closing argument that the gang's lifestyle had "started to rub off on [the defendant]." All in all, the expert's gang testimony "was excessive, unduly prejudicial, and in great part completely irrelevant to the charged offenses."

[i] Law Enforcement Agents -- Miscellaneous Testimony

United States v. Brooks, 610 F.3d 1186 (9th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed convictions for child sex trafficking and for interstate transportation of a minor for prostitution, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of an experienced detective's expert testimony regarding the business of prostitution and the relationships between pimps and prostitutes. The issues are not the subject of common knowledge, and the testimony helped place other witnesses' testimony into context and provided the jury a means to assess their credibility. In United States v. Mejia-Luna, 562 F.3d 1215 (9th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed a conviction for alien smuggling, finding no abuse of discretion when an Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent was permitted to testify as an expert witness regarding the structure and methods of alien smuggling operations. The testimony assisted the jury in understanding the evidence and the defendant's particular role in the operation.

[j] Law Enforcement Agents -- "Overview" Testimony

United States v. Flores-de-Jesus, 569 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 2009) : Although the Court affirmed drug convictions, it reiterated concerns about the "use of a law enforcement officer as the first witness in a multi-defendant drug prosecution to provide an 'overview' of the prosecution's case" that it expressed in United States v. Casas, 356 F.3d 104 (1st Cir. 2004) (Manual § 702.03[54][j]). The Court recognized that "[t]here may be value in having a case agent describe the course of his investigation in order to set the stage for the testimony to come about the nature of the conspiracy and the defendants involved." However, absent a basis of personal knowledge, "the overview witness may not offer substantive testimony about the nature of the conspiracy or the involvement of particular defendants"; such overview testimony may raise Confrontation Clause questions. The Court added that "[d]elineating the boundaries of acceptable overview testimony becomes even more complicated when the 'overview' witness is also qualified as an expert." In this case, the prosecution improperly used an overview witness who was "essentially endorsing the testimony of other witnesses in what can only be viewed as an attempt by the government to bolster the credibility of those later witnesses." The Court warned that "[h]enceforth, there can be no justification in this circuit for the government's repetition of the errors that we have identified here in the use of overview testimony in criminal cases."

[k] Law Enforcement Agents -- Summary Testimony

United States v. Mejia, 545 F.3d 179 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court vacated convictions for conspiracy to commit assaults in aid of racketeering activity. The prosecution arose after members of one gang shot members of other gangs. To prove the shootings arose in the course of racketeering activity, a state police officer who had been investigating gangs in the area was permitted to testify about the operations of the defendants' nationwide gang, as well as of the gang's local activities, including that its members had committed "between 18 and 22, 23" murders in the area in the five years prior to the trial. According to the officer, his testimony was based on custodial interviews with gang members, reports from other law enforcement personnel, and published sources. The Court held that much of the expert's testimony concerned material well within the grasp of the average juror. The testimony also substituted the expert's conclusion on an essential fact (that the gang committed murders in a pattern of racketeering activity) for competent evidence of that fact: "The Government cannot take a shortcut around its obligation to prove murder beyond a reasonable doubt just by having an expert pronounce that unspecified deaths of eighteen to twenty-three persons have been homicides committed by members of [the gang]." The Court also noted that the witness "was acting as a de facto 'case agent' in providing this summary information to the jury," a practice it had admonished against because case agents testifying as experts gain unmerited credibility when testifying about factual matters from first-hand knowledge. Furthermore, while law enforcement officers routinely and reasonably rely on hearsay in reaching their conclusions, an expert witness must not simply repeat hearsay evidence but must apply expertise to the inadmissible materials -- and in too many instances the expert in this case did not do so. This was particularly a problem with statements made in custodial interrogations, which were testimonial hearsay violating the defendants' Confrontation Clause rights.

United States v. Smith, 601 F.3d 530 (6th Cir. 2010) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no error in the admission of summary testimony from a law enforcement agent as to the structure of the organization and the role played by the defendant within that organization. The summary testimony aided the jury in "organizing proof" that was otherwise "plausibly confusing to the jury." However, the Judge should have given cautionary instructions regarding the agent's dual roles as both a lay and expert witness, and informing the jury of the summary's purpose "and that it does not constitute evidence." Because the defendant did not ask for either instruction at trial, review was for plain error and there was none.

[55] Lay Witness Distinguished [Go To Main]

United States v. Wilson, 605 F.3d 985 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding a former drug dealer who was called as a lay witness to interpret various taped phone calls. The Court reasoned that "[a] witness with firsthand experience of a particular drug operation may testify under Rule 701," but in the absence of firsthand experience, a witness must be qualified as an expert.

United States v. Hatch, 514 F.3d 145 (1st Cir. 2008) : The defendant was convicted for filing false tax returns, having not reported income received as the first winner of the "reality-TV" show "Survivor." On appeal, he complained that two accountants, who were never formally designated as experts by the government, were improperly permitted to give expert testimony. Affirming, the Court held that the accountants, who had prepared tax returns for the defendant, were called as and gave testimony as fact witnesses, and to the extent their unobjected-to testimony might be said to have included expert opinion, it "could in no way be considered to be plain error."

United States v. Perkins, 470 F.3d 150 (4th Cir. 2006) : In the trial of a police officer for using excessive force in making an arrest, officers who were at the scene were permitted to testify that unnecessary blows were struck, as were three officers without personal knowledge of the event. None of these witnesses were designated as experts, and the defendant argued that it was error to permit them to testify as lay witnesses. Affirming, the Court found that the testimony of officers at the scene "was framed in terms of their eyewitness observations and particularized experience as police officers" and thus was admissible under Rule 701. It held, however, that the opinion testimony of the three other officers "crossed the line between Rules 701 and 702." Their opinions "were elicited in response to hypothetical questions based on second-hand accounts, making their testimony similar, if not indistinguishable from" expert testimony. The error in admitting that testimony as lay opinion was harmless, however.

United States v. McMillan, 600 F.3d 434 (5th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a fraud conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when a CPA and a former insurance regulator, who had been employed by the defendant, were permitted to testify regarding the recording of assets on the books of the defendant's company. Both "properly testified as fact witnesses about their observations and perceptions in the case in response to specific solicitations from [the defendant]." The Court also found that testimony by an auditor for the state department of insurance who conducted a targeted review of the company's financial statements was largely factual, and that to the extent it may have implicated specialized accounting knowledge, any error would be harmless. In United States v. Valencia, 600 F.3d 389 (5th Cir. 2010) , the Court affirmed fraud convictions arising from a scheme to give false information regarding natural gas trades to industry publications in order to manipulate natural gas markets. It found no abuse of discretion when a former risk manager at one of the involved companies was permitted to testify as a lay witness to the effects of the false reporting. The testimony related to his former job duties, and he recreated much of the analysis he regularly performed when evaluating risk tolerances. Although much of the data had been provided to him after he left the company, his knowledge and analysis were derived from duties he held there, so his testimony was based on personal knowledge and experience gained whiled employed by the company. In United States v. Jackson, 549 F.3d 963 (5th Cir. 2008), the Court affirmed the conviction and death sentence of a federal prisoner charged with killing a fellow inmate, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by a special investigator at the prison that inmates typically remove their shirts before fist fights, but typically pad their clothes in knife fights. The Court concluded that the testimony was background information about prison fights that could assist the jury in determining the defendant's and the victim's states of mind, given evidence showing that the victim had taken his shirt off before the fight while the defendant had not. The Court also found no plain error in the admission of the testimony as lay opinion. The witness testified on the basis of his "past experiences based on personal observation as an investigative agent," while expert testimony involves "more than common sense or the officer's past experiences formed from first hand observation."

United States v. Ganier, 468 F.3d 920 (6th Cir. 2006): In a prosecution for obstruction of justice arising from the deletion of computer files subpoenaed by a grand jury, testimony from Drueck, a forensic computer specialist who would have testified regarding manipulation of the defendant's computer files, was excluded as a discovery sanction on the ground that the defense had not been provided with a written summary of the testimony as required by Fed. R. Crim. P. 16(a)(1)(G). On interlocutory appeal the government argued that Drueck's testimony was not expert testimony, because it was not scientific or technical, and therefore no advance disclosure was required. However, the Court held that the proposed testimony was based on specialized knowledge and therefore was admissible if at all under Rule 702. It explained that "[t]he average layperson today may be able to interpret the outputs of popular software programs as easily as he or she interprets everyday vernacular, but the interpretation Drueck needed to apply to make sense of the software reports is more similar to the specialized knowledge police officers use to interpret slang and code words used by drug dealers." Although in the past witnesses had been permitted to apply specialized knowledge while giving lay testimony, "the 2000 amendment to Federal Rule of Evidence 701 clarified that lay opinions or inferences cannot be based on scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge within the scope of Rule 702." Thus, the government had violated its discovery obligations under Rule 16, but the Court held that the order precluding the witness was excessive under the circumstances, so it vacated the decision below and remanded for reconsideration.
