United States v. Rollins, 544 F.3d 820 (7th Cir. 2008): In a prosecution of a drug conspiracy, a law enforcement agent was permitted to testify to his interpretation of what were apparently coded conversations between the conspirators. The Court found that the agent was properly permitted to testify as a lay witness, since he was not testifying to terms commonly used by drug conspiracies, but rather to unusual and idiosyncratic code used by this particular conspiracy. The agent's understanding "came only as a result of the particular things he perceived from monitoring intercepted calls, observing drug transactions of these conspirators, and talking with the cooperating conspirators about this drug operation." In Compania Administradora de Recuperacion v. Titan Int'l Inc., 533 F.3d 555 (7th Cir. 2008), the Court affirmed summary judgment granted to a creditor who sued for breach of a guaranty contract, holding that a witness' testimony as to the value of collateral was properly characterized as expert, not lay, testimony. The witness' only connection with the items in question was the fact that he had been an officer of a company that held a controlling interest in another company that at one time owned the collateral; his valuations were based on his extensive experience purchasing and selling the type of items being valued, rather than on personal knowledge. The Court relied on the Advisory Committee Note to the 2000 amendment to Rule 701 for the proposition that "a business owner or officer is allowed to testify [to the value of business property] without being qualified as an expert only because that testimony is tied to his or her personal knowledge." Because the witness was not timely designated as an expert, the Trial Court was within its discretion to exclude the witness' testimony due to the discovery violation. In United States v. Oriedo, 498 F.3d 593 (7th Cir. 2007), the court affirmed a conviction involving crack cocaine, holding it was error (but harmless) to admit as lay opinion an agent's testimony as to the way in which drug dealers package crack cocaine for resale. Although the testimony was couched as a matter of the agent's observation, he "brought the wealth of his experience as a narcotics officer to bear on those observations and made connections for the jury based on that specialized knowledge."

Jerden v. Amstutz, 430 F.3d 1231 (9th Cir. 2005) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a medical malpractice action, finding it was an abuse of discretion to permit the neurosurgical nurse practitioner who assisted the defendant during an operation on the plaintiff to testify that an MRI report used in connection with the operation indicated a brain tumor. It was error to admit the testimony as that of a fact witness who did not state any opinions as an expert, since the witness made detailed and scientific observations about the report and rendered opinions and inferences that he drew from his observations and that, as he admitted, he was not competent to provide.

United States v. Hamaker, 455 F.3d 1316 (11th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed bank fraud convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting the government's principal trial witness, a trained financial analyst with 23 years' experience, to testify as a lay witness. The witness did not testify to an expert opinion; rather, he reviewed and summarized voluminous financial documents and matched certain records against other records. This enabled the witness to testify to the results of the comparisons -- i.e., that the records showed that the company sent invoices to a bank for work done by employees whose time sheets showed that the work was not done for the bank. Although the witness conceded that his use of computer software might have made him more efficient at reviewing the records, the Court held that "his review itself was within the capacity of any reasonable lay person." In United States v. Dulcio, 441 F.3d 1269 (11th Cir. 2006) , a drug distribution case, a law enforcement agent testified to the modus operandi of people involved in the drug business and tied each codefendant's role to that typically seen in a narcotics importing business. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to permit such testimony as lay witness testimony, because it was based on "specialized knowledge" within the meaning of Rule 702.

[58.1] Materiality [Go To Main]

United States v. Wintermute, 443 F.3d 993 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for making a false statement to the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding a former chief counsel for the OCC from giving defense testimony that the defendant's alleged misrepresentations were not material because the OCC did not take certain actions when it learned the true facts. The test of materiality is whether the false statements were capable of influencing the agency's decision, not whether they actually succeeded in doing so, so the testimony would have served to confuse rather than assist the jury.

[58.2] Medical Conditions [Go To Main]

Hill v. Principi, 439 F.3d 18 (1st Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the Department of Veterans Affairs in an action by a psychiatrist who resigned her employment after being assigned additional duties, which she claimed violated the Rehabilitation Act. It found no error in permitting a defense expert, who had examined the plaintiff four times and reviewed her medical records, to testify as to his opinion of her medical condition. Reasoning that the expert "was called upon only to offer a routine diagnosis, on a patient he had examined, pertaining to a common condition well within his particular experience," the Court noted that the "mere fact that two experts disagree is not grounds for excluding one's testimony."

[60.1] Modus Operandi [Go To Main]

United States v. Hitt, 473 F.3d 146 (5th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a Mann Act conviction arising from sexual abuse of a teenage boy, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony that persons who sexually abuse children engage in a "grooming process" designed to reduce resistance to the sexual advances. The evidence was helpful to explain the behavior of persons accused of sexual offenses.

United States v. Batton, 602 F.3d 1191 (10th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for interstate transportation of a minor for unlawful sexual relations, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony from an expert about "grooming" of victims by sex offenders and that offenders are often trusted family members or friends rather than strangers. The evidence could be helpful to understand the defendant's conduct and to dispel jurors' misconceptions. The witness was not permitted to give opinions about how his testimony might relate to the facts of the case or about the credibility of witnesses.

[64] Opinion on Law [Go To Main]

[a] Generally

United States v. Safavian, 528 F.3d 957 (D.C. Cir. 2008) : The defendant was convicted of obstructing justice and making false statements by denying that a lobbyist with whom he had a relationship was "doing business" with the government agency headed by the defendant. Reversing, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude expert testimony on whether government-contracting professionals viewed inquiries about possible contracts, as opposed to actually having a contract, with the agency as "doing business." Although the term was defined in some statutes, the issue in this case was what the defendant intended in answering questions and making statements, so the "expert's testimony would have supplied crucial context and support for Safavian's proposed meaning."

United States v. Whitfield, 590 F.3d 325 (5th Cir. 2009) : An attorney was convicted for a bribery scheme in which he arranged, guaranteed, and paid off loans for state judges, in order to corruptly influence the outcome of cases he had filed in their courts. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of "expert" testimony that one of the cases was correctly decided, since the Judge was justified in concluding that the testimony would not assist the jury and was founded on unreliable methodology. In United States v. Wofford, 560 F.3d 341 (5th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed a conviction for theft or embezzlement from an employee benefit plan, finding no abuse of discretion when an expert for the defendant was not permitted to testify that the plan was not qualified under Internal Revenue Code provisions permitting corporate deductibility and employee tax deferment for contributions. As the only requirement under the charged statute was that the plan be subject to "any provision of title I" of the ERISA statute, evidence that the plan was not "tax-qualified" was irrelevant.

United States v. Noel, 581 F.3d 490 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for producing and possessing child pornography, but it found an abuse of discretion in permitting an Indiana detective who conducted the forensic examination of the computer media seized from the defendant's residence to testify that photos on the computer met the federal definition of child pornography. Although the witness was presented as an expert, she gave no explanation for her opinion, so it amounted to "nothing more than a statement that the photos were illegal," which would not assist the jury. In United States v. Chube, 538 F.3d 693 (7th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed convictions for unlawful distribution of controlled substances and health care fraud involving illegitimate prescriptions of OxyContin, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony by a doctor specializing in internal and addiction medicine and by a pharmacology expert. Both testified that the prescriptions written for 98 patients were not for a "legitimate medical purpose." The Court noted that the jury was told that the "standard of care" was an issue distinct from the question of "legality." The Court concluded that the experts did not improperly opine on the law, but indicated that the medical doctor had "come close to a statement about the Doctors' mental state." In United States v. Caputo, 517 F.3d 935 (7th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed convictions for selling unauthorized medical devices, finding no abuse of discretion in excluding proposed expert testimony, as the witness "would have testified about the meaning of the [FDA] statute and regulations. That's a subject for the court, not for testimonial experts." In RLJCS Enters. v. Professional Benefit Trust, 487 F.3d 494 (7th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed summary judgment for a multi-employer welfare benefit plan in an action by participants to recover stock of insurers whose policies were purchased by the trust and which had changed from mutual ownership. The Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding expert testimony regarding the demutualization process and the effects of a prior IRS private letter ruling, as the evidence was "about the meaning of trust indentures, contracts, and mutual-to-stock conversions [which] belongs in briefs, not in 'experts' reports." In United States v. Davis, 471 F.3d 783 (7th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a conviction for Medicaid fraud, finding no abuse of discretion when a witness was permitted to testify how the state Medicaid agency interpreted the requirements of the program. The Court noted that "[e]xperts are permitted to testify regarding how their government agency applies rules as long as the testimony does not incorrectly state the law or opine on certain ultimate legal issues in the case," and that "experts are allowed to testify about how they enforce regulations, whether transactions comply with regulations, and how they ensure that the public knows about regulations."

In re Prempro Products Liability Litig., 586 F.3d 547 (8th Cir. 2009) : In an action alleging that the plaintiff's breast cancer was caused by hormone replacement therapy, the Court found no abuse of discretion when testimony from the plaintiff's expert in support of punitive damages was struck as inadmissible. The witness was supposed to provide evidence regarding FDA regulations and the defendants' lack of compliance therewith. However, her testimony only began with a brief overview of some federal regulations; what followed was almost entirely a reading of the contents of specific exhibits without any analysis relating them to FDA guidelines.

Nationwide Transport Finance v. Cass Information Systems, Inc., 523 F.3d 1051 (9th Cir. 2008) : A finance company engaged in account receivable financing known as factoring sued a freight invoice payment service alleging intentional interference with contractual relationship and other contract and tort claims. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court found no abuse of discretion in granting a motion to strike one of the defendant's expert reports and to limit another defense expert's testimony. The defense expert whose report was stricken was permitted to discuss industry conditions, standards and practices, but the report was excluded because it contained numerous legal conclusions. The Court also found that, whether the other expert was regarded as offering lay or expert opinion, it was not an abuse of discretion to exclude legal conclusions, since "[r]esolving doubtful questions of law is the distinct and exclusive province of the trial judge."

United States Aviation Underwriters, Inc. v. Pilatus Bus. Aircraft, Ltd., 582 F.3d 1131 (10th Cir. 2009) : Reversing and remanding judgment for the plaintiffs in a product liability action arising from an accident when an aircraft's engine shut down, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to permit an expert for the plaintiffs to give testimony that simply restated an FAA regulation that was "written in straightforward language and quoted verbatim" in a jury instruction.

Mola Dev. Corp. v. United States, 516 F.3d 1370 (Fed. Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the government in a suit by a thrift holding company claiming that enactment of FIRREA breached its supervisory merger contract and constituted a taking. It held that an affidavit of a former official of the Federal Home Loan Bank of San Francisco, interpreting federal regulations, was entitled to no weight, because "the proper interpretation of these regulations is an issue of law" as to which expert testimony should neither be received nor considered.

[b] Opinion on Law -- Employment and Labor

Pelletier v. Main St. Textiles, LP, 470 F.3d 48 (1st Cir. 2006) : The plaintiff, who was injured while operating a forklift, claimed that the owner of the premises was negligent in maintaining the location and in ensuring the safety of the workers. The Court found no abuse of discretion in refusing to let the plaintiff's expert opine on whether OSHA regulations applied to the defendant's conduct, since "the general rule is that it is the judge's role, not a witness's, to instruct the jury on the law."

[c] Opinion on Law -- Foreign Law

Chavez v. Carranza, 559 F.3d 486 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court upheld an award of compensatory and punitive damages for victims of torture and their families in a suit against a former Salvadoran military officer. It held that because the Trial Judge properly declined to grant comity to the Salvadoran Amnesty Law, there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the defendant's expert testimony on the purpose of the Law. The opinion was not relevant and was also an opinion on the law, and "[a]n expert opinion on a question of law is inadmissible."

Sunstar, Inc. v. Alberto-Culver Co., 586 F.3d 487 (7th Cir. 2009) : In a trademark licensing suit involving foreign law issues, the Court noted that the content of foreign law may be, and most often is, proved by testimony or affidavits of experts, but that articles, treatises, and judicial opinions "are superior sources." The lawyers who testify to the meaning of foreign law "are paid for their testimony and selected on the basis for the convergence of their views with the litigating position of the client or their willingness to fall in with the views urged upon them by the client"; "[t]hose are banes of expert testimony." In the Court's view, because Judges are experts on law, it is not unreasonable to expect a Judge to resolve an issue of foreign law without the aid of expert testimony.

[e] Opinion on Law -- Securities

United States v. Stewart, 433 F.3d 273 (2d Cir. 2006) : Affirming convictions of Martha Stewart and her stockbroker for obstruction of justice in connection with an insider trading investigation, the Court found no error when a securities law expert was precluded from testifying about the legality of the stock trade at issue. The proffered testimony regarding the legal principles underlying insider trading and their application to Stewart's trade trespassed on the Judge's exclusive power to explain the law, and had the potential to confuse the jury with irrelevant facts, because the defendants were not charged with insider trading.

Berckeley Investment Group, Ltd. v. Colkitt, 455 F.3d 195 (3d Cir. 2006) : In a breach of contract action related to securities, a lawyer offered an affidavit stating that, on assumed facts, it would have been reasonable for Berckeley to have believed that it was entitled to a certain securities law exemption. Upholding admission of the affidavit, the Court emphasized that the Trial Court, in exercising its discretion, "must ensure that an expert does not testify as to the governing law of the case." Thus, the lawyer was not permitted to "testify as to whether Berckeley complied with legal duties that arose under the federal securities laws."

United States v. Setser, 568 F.3d 482 (5th Cir. 2009) : Affirming convictions for operating a multimillion-dollar Ponzi scheme, the Court held it was error (but harmless) for the receiver of the defendants' enterprises to testify that they constituted a "security fraud" and a "Ponzi scheme."

[f] Opinion on Law -- Taxes

Stobie Creek Inv. LLC v. United States, 608 F.3d 1366 (Fed. Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a judgment denying a taxpayer's refund claim, finding no abuse of discretion when an expert for the plaintiff was precluded from testifying about the tax laws "as they existed in 2000" and whether a tax opinion letter complied with standards set out in a Treasury Circular. Because the proffered opinion concerned a question of law, not of fact, it would not "assist" the factfinder.

[67] Pharmacology Evidence [Go To Main]

Kunz v. DeFelice, 538 F.3d 667 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a judgment for an arrestee suing for excessive force, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony from a defense witness, whose "credentials were weak, at best," that the plaintiff's ability to recall and narrate events on the night in question was impaired, given his admission to having used a small amount of heroin earlier in the evening. The witness knew neither a baseline against which to judge whether the plaintiff was impaired nor the plaintiff's habituation level (which might affect the impairing effects of the drug), and even if the witness' testimony were taken at face value, the impairing effect of the heroin should have worn off at least 90 minutes before the incident in question.

[69] Photographic Identification [Go To Main]

United States v. Sarras, 575 F.3d 1191 (11th Cir. 2009) : Affirming the defendant's conviction for inducing his minor step-daughter to engage in sexually explicit conduct for the purpose of producing photos of it and for possession of child pornography, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of expert testimony for the defense that the defendant's penis was not the one shown in computer photos, since the expert's vein-comparison methodology was not shown to be reliable. The Court also held that the Judge, who permitted a defense expert to testify as to how certain photos of the defendant's penis were taken, did not abuse discretion in permitting a government expert to testify in rebuttal that the defendant manipulated his penis during the photographs and to identify where a mole was actually located on the penis.

[70] Polygraph and Similar Evidence [Go To Main]

Munoz v. State Farm Lloyds of Texas, 522 F.3d 568 (5th Cir. 2008) : In an action on a fire insurance policy, the insurer defended on the ground that the plaintiffs had intentionally set the fire. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held it was reversible error to admit evidence that a grand jury did not indict the husband for arson, as such evidence is highly prejudicial. Although the plaintiffs argued that the insurer had opened the door to the evidence by introducing evidence that the husband had failed a polygraph examination, which they said was per se inadmissible, the Court noted that Daubert governs the admissibility of polygraph examination results, that neither party alleged that the results in this case were improperly admitted under Daubert, and that the plaintiffs had not objected to the introduction of the results at trial. Therefore, there was no support for the contention that the polygraph evidence was inadmissible and the door was not opened to the evidence of non-indictment. In United States v. Allard, 464 F.3d 529 (5th Cir. 2006) , the defendant had confessed to making a false claim of consumer product tampering after she was informed that she had failed a polygraph test, but at trial she claimed the confession was coerced. In response, the government introduced statements made during the examination and called the agent who administered it to explain the process and recount the events. The jury was instructed that it could consider the statements surrounding the test to determine the witness' credibility but that the results of the test were not admissible. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion. The requirements of Rule 702 did not apply because no technical, scientific, or expert testimony was being offered, and the probative value of the evidence to rebut the defendant's claim of a coerced confession was not substantially outweighed by any risk of prejudice to the defendant.

[70.1] Product Defect [Go To Main]

DG & G, Inc. v. Flexsol Packaging Corp., 576 F.3d 820 (8th Cir. 2009) : In an action by a cotton marketing association against a cotton gin operator alleging that the operator damaged cotton in the ginning process, the operator filed a cross-claim against the manufacturer of the bags used to bag the cotton, alleging that the bags were defective in retaining moisture added during the ginning process. The Court affirmed summary judgment for the manufacturer, finding no abuse of discretion when the operator's expert's report was excluded. The expert failed to follow the requirements of the method he employed to demonstrate that the product was defective, in that the method required that four specimens be tested and he tested only three (and he did not know how additional tests would affect his results), and he failed to use a dummy specimen as required; furthermore, he failed to test any of the bags used in this case.

Primiano v. Cook, 598F.3d 558 (9th Cir. 2010): In a product liability action by a patient whose elbow replacement failed after eight months, the Trial Judge granted summary judgment for the defendant after excluding the plaintiff's expert witness on the grounds that his opinion would not help the jury because he could not say why a part of the artificial elbow failed, he never saw or talked with the plaintiff, and there was no publication supporting his opinion that the device failed extraordinarily early. Reversing, the Court held that there was no requirement of explaining the cause of the failure, where the governing law required showing only that the product failed to perform in the manner reasonably to be expected; that seeing the patient was unnecessary when the expert saw the x-rays and the implant after it was removed; and that publication is not essential, especially when the phenomenon is so extraordinary that the specialists who publish articles do not see it in their practices.

[71] Product Design [Go To Main]

Hodges v. Mack Trucks, Inc., 474 F.3d 188 (5th Cir. 2006) : The injured driver of a truck sued the manufacturer of the truck and the manufacturer of the seatbelt, alleging design defects in the seatbelt and in the passenger-side door latch that caused him to be ejected in the accident. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by the driver's expert that the door latch failed and that there was a safer design available that would have substantially reduced the likelihood of the driver's injuries. It noted that the expert was an engineer with many years working in, and testifying against, the insurance industry.

Johnson v. Manitowoc Boom Trucks, Inc., 484 F.3d 426 (6th Cir. 2007) : In a product liability action for injuries incurred when a truck-mounted crane tipped over, the plaintiff's expert opined that the crane was defective without an electronic interlock system that would prevent its operating unless the outriggers were in place. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the expert's testimony. The expert had not tested the proposed system and did not have significant expertise in the design and application of such devices to cranes; interlocking outriggers were not generally accepted in the crane industry at the time the crane at issue was put into the marketplace, although they are, or are on their way to being, now; and the expert's opinion was prepared solely for litigation, which calls for application of the Daubert factors with greater rigor.

Winters v. Fru-Con Inc., 498 F.3d 734 (7th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed the exclusion of expert testimony and a judgment for the defendant in a suit by a worker whose hand was severed at the wrist while working at a food processing plant. The injury occurred when a computer that controlled the plant equipment was mistakenly switched from manual to automatic, causing a valve to close on the plaintiff's hand. There was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by a "human factors" expert who would have opined that the computer processing system was not designed properly, as well as testimony by a forensic engineer that the valve control system was defective, because neither expert had tested his alternative designs or used another method of research to compensate for the lack of testing.

Shuck v. CNH America, LLC, 498 F.3d 868 (8th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed a judgment against the manufacturer of a combine in a product liability action brought after a fire in the combine's engine compartment caused extensive damage to the combine and to corn that was on board, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting the testimony of the buyers' fire causation and mechanical experts. Although the experts did not test and study the damaged and burned combine parts, the Court found that it was reasonable to credit testimony that the components could not be tested due to the destruction and alteration of the components in the fire or the arrangement of the components in the damaged engine. The Court concluded that the experts "observed the relevant evidence, applied their specialized knowledge, and systematically included and excluded possible theories of causation." See also Sappington v. Skyjack, Inc., 512 F.3d 440 (8th Cir. 2008) (error to exclude design expert's testimony, where expert took account of relevant standards, reviewed relevant literature and current industry practices, and the feasability and risk utility of implementing a safer design). In Ahlberg v. Chrysler Corp., 481 F.3d 630 (8th Cir. 2007) , the plaintiff's decedent was killed when he attempted to stop a Dodge Ram from rolling down a driveway after his two-year-old grandson, who had been left alone in the truck with the key in the ignition and the engine running, apparently shifted the gear out of park. In an action against the manufacturer, the plaintiff alleged that the truck was defective because it did not have a brake-shift interlock device requiring the brake pedal to be depressed in order to shift out of park. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by a former Chrysler employee that the Ram was unreasonably dangerous because it lacked a BSI device. The plaintiff's proffer did not indicate that the witness employed any methodology, reliable or otherwise. In Smith v. Cangieter, 462 F.3d 920 (8th Cir. 2006) , a product liability action arising from an accident in which a vehicle with part-time four-wheel drive swerved out of control, the plaintiffs offered the report of an engineer, who opined that the vehicle was defective because the four-wheel drive system caused stability problems while driving on dry asphalt at highway speeds. Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the expert's report. While peer-reviewed articles established that loss of traction can occur with part-time four-wheel drive, the expert had no testing or research about the stage at which the vehicle becomes dangerous to operate or about the effect of a loss of traction on handling and safety, and so had no acceptable basis for his conclusion that the system was unsafe at highway speeds.

Stilwell v. Smith & Nephew, Inc., 482 F.3d 1187 (9th Cir. 2007) : In a product liability action brought after two nails inserted to stabilize the plaintiff's leg fracture failed, the plaintiff's expert metallurgist opined how the nails could have been designed or manufactured to reduce the risk of metal fatigue. The Trial Judge excluded the opinion on the ground that it would not be helpful on the issue whether the nails served the biomechanical purpose for which they were designed and granted summary judgment for the defendant. The Court held that the Judge had erroneously required the expert's testimony "to establish not only the presence of an alleged defect but also causation." The Judge "explain[ed] in great detail why Kumar's testimony fell short of guaranteeing Stilwell would prevail, [but] failed to demonstrate that a metallurgist's testimony that the metal device was both poorly manufactured and could have been designed to last longer than it did is not relevant to this products liability case." However, summary judgment was affirmed because the plaintiff presented no proof of a defect in the product causing her injuries.

[74] Proper Subjects of Expert Testimony [Go To Main]

United States v. Glover, 479 F.3d 511 (7th Cir. 2007) : In a prosecution for drug distribution offenses, the government proffered a police department technician as an expert to explain why the defendant's fingerprints were not found on a gun that the government alleged had been possessed by him. The expert testified that fingerprints are rarely obtained from guns due to various factors like sweating and the weather. Affirming, the Court rejected an argument that admitting the expert testimony was error because, inter alia, the jury needed no assistance on this point: it noted that "the average person might expect a gun to bear fingerprints if it was handled without gloves."

United States v. Jeanetta, 533 F.3d 651 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed drug and firearm convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting a police officer to explain the significance of various items -- including ZipLoc bags, radios, scanners, and night vision goggles -- seized during a search of the defendant's home. The Court found that the significance of these seemingly innocuous items was highly relevant to rebut the defendant's claim that he was merely a drug user and not a trafficker. "Because the importance of the items would not necessarily be apparent to a lay observer, the expert testimony was necessary to explain the significance of the items as they related to the world of drug dealing."

[75] Psychiatric and Psychological Evidence [Go To Main]

[a] Civil Cases

Goodman v. Harris County, 571 F.3d 388 (5th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in an excessive force civil rights action arising from the killing of a bicyclist by a deputy constable. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the testimony of a psychiatrist who had examined the deputy constable, opined that the deputy constable showed cognitive weaknesses and short-term memory problems, and gave a medical opinion on the psychological underpinnings of events described to him by the deputy constable. The testimony was helpful to the jury in understanding how the deputy constable viewed the bicyclist on the night of the shooting; although the expert testified that he observed inconsistencies in the deputy constable's description of events, the expert never opined that the deputy constable was lying.

Boyd v. City & County of San Francisco, 576 F.3d 938 (9th Cir. 2009) : In a § 1983 excessive force action arising from an incident in which the plaintiff's decedent was fatally shot at the end of a high-speed chase when he reached into his vehicle rather than obeying an instruction to get down on the ground, the defendants argued that the victim had been attempting to commit "suicide by cop." Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a psychiatrist was permitted to testify for the defense that her study of the circumstances surrounding the suspect's death led her to conclude that he had been attempting to commit "suicide by cop."

[b] Psychiatric and Psychological Evidence -- Condition of Accused

[i] Mens Rea Evidence

United States v. Day, 524 F.3d 1361(D.C. Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for mail and wire fraud and embezzlement from an employee benefit plan, finding no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by a neuroscientist that defendant lacked the requisite mens rea to form the intent to defraud. The expert's opinion was based on the premise that the defendant suffered from major depression, but the defendant's medical records and other experts' opinions did not support the premise. As the neuroscientist was not qualified to diagnose depression, his opinion lacked foundation and was not reliable.

United States v. Hofus, 598 F.3d 1171 (9th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for attempting to coerce and entice a minor to engage in sexual intercourse, finding no abuse of discretion when a psychologist was precluded from testifying that the defendant was engaged in texting as "fantasy alone" and was unlikely to act on the intentions (to engage in sex) expressed in his texts. It held that the likelihood the defendant would engage in sex with a minor was irrelevant to whether he would commit the charged crime of attempting to induce or entice a minor to engage in sexual activity, and that an opinion that the defendant texted "in fantasy alone" was the equivalent of saying he lacked the requisite mens rea, which would run afoul of Rule 704(b). One Judge dissented, arguing that the evidence was relevant, since "[i]f the defendant did not intend to have intercourse with the minor, he was unlikely to be attempting to persuade her to have intercourse," and that denying the "fantasy" evidence violated the right to present a defense. In United States v. Cohen, 510 F.3d 1114 (9th Cir. 2007) , the Court reversed the conviction of a defendant charged with aiding and assisting the filing of a false tax return, because the defendant's expert psychiatrist was erroneously precluded from testifying that a narcissistic personality disorder like the defendant's can cause a person to continue to believe something to be true despite overwhelming evidence of its patent absurdity. The Court held that the expert's testimony would have assisted the jury in determining whether the defendant had a good-faith belief that he was complying with the law, thereby negating the mens rea element of the 26 U.S.C. § 7206(2), which requires that a defendant "wilfully" assist in the filing of a false tax return. Without the expert testimony, the defendant had no way to explain the effect that his mental disorder may have had on his ability to form the requisite mens rea. In United States v. Sandoval-Mendoza, 472 F.3d 645 (9th Cir. 2006) , the Court reversed a conviction for conspiracy to sell methamphetamine because of an error in excluding the defendant's expert testimony. Two defense experts, a neuropsychologist and a neurologist, would have testified about the defendant's brain tumors and their effect on his cognitive performance. The Court found that the testimony was supportive of the defendant's entrapment defense, and stated that "[a]lthough the abuse of discretion standard of review is liberal, ... [w]hen credible, qualified experts disagree, a criminal defendant is entitled to have the jury, not the judge, decide whether the government has proved its case." Here, the Judge "applied an inappropriately rigid Daubert standard to medical expert testimony by not accepting what a good physician would in determining what is reliable knowledge in the medical profession." The Court added that "[a] trial court should admit medical expert testimony if physicians would accept it as useful and reliable," and concluded that the Judge should not have excluded the testimony merely because "it did not conclusively prove Sandoval-Mendoza's brain tumor caused susceptibility to inducement or lack of predisposition."

[ii] Psychiatric and Psychological Evidence -- Condition of Accused -- Other Evidence

United States v. Curtin, 588 F.3d 993 (9th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for interstate travel to engage in sexual acts with a minor, finding no abuse of discretion when a licensed marriage and family therapist called by the defense was permitted to testify about "Internet role playing fantasy," but was not permitted to offer opinions regarding the defendant's activities and intent. Much of the excluded testimony was based on a "survey" by the witness and her associates, which had not been published, peer reviewed, or presented for analysis of methodology. Furthermore, the survey was not correlated in time or location with the charged crimes, and the witness' opinion seemed not to be based on the behavior exhibited by the defendant.

[c] Psychiatric and Psychological Evidence -- Other Criminal Cases

United States v. Joseph, 542 F.3d 13 (2d Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for using the Internet to entice an underage girl to engage in unlawful sexual activity, the defense was precluded from calling an expert to testify about role-playing in the context of sexually explicit conversations on the Internet, including the realities and motivations of online role-playing via chatrooms and e-mail. Reversing the conviction on other grounds, the Court urged "a more thorough consideration to the defendant's claim to present" the testimony if it is offered at retrial. In the Court's view, the expert's field of study and experience qualified him to offer relevant testimony and the expert's opinions "appear to be highly likely to assist the jury 'to understand the evidence.' " One Judge, dissenting, believed that exclusion of the expert testimony was justified under Rule 403, as "[e]vidence that some people engage in role-playing on the Internet sheds little light on whether Joseph did so in this particular case," and even without the testimony the defense had ample opportunity to present its role-playing theory from the defendant's own testimony.

United States v. Simmons, 470 F.3d 1115 (5th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for sexual assault under color of law, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting a psychologist to testify that the victim's behavior and testimony were consistent with that of sexual assault victims. Although it recognized that a diagnosis of rape trauma syndrome is made for therapeutic and not forensic purposes, and assumes that a claimant is truthful, the Court held that testimony drawing on a diagnosis of rape trauma syndrome is not proscribed by Daubert. The Court reasoned that expert testimony need not satisfy every Daubert factor and noted that the reliability inquiry as applied to social scientists requires some flexibility.

United States v. Betcher, 534 F.3d 820 (8th Cir. 2008) : The defendant, charged with taking pornographic pictures of his minor granddaughters and distributing them, claimed that the girls took the pictures themselves. The Court found no error in permitting an expert to testify to the behavioral characteristics of sexually abused children in general. "Dr. Levitt's testimony as to delayed disclosure helped the jury understand why the girls did not reveal they had been photographed until they were confronted with the images. ... Dr. Levitt's testimony was relevant because it educated the jury on issues necessary to their determination of who manufactured the photographs."

[76] Qualifications of Experts [Go To Main]

[b] Qualifications of Experts -- Civil Rights Cases

Schmidt v. Magyari, 557 F.3d 564 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the City in an action by an arrestee who claimed that photographing her tattoo violated her rights. The Trial Judge properly excluded expert testimony offered by a police lieutenant on behalf of the plaintiff as to strip-search procedures, an officer's motivations, and the psychological impact of searches on arrestees. Rejecting the plaintiff's contention that the witness was sufficiently qualified by experience, the Court noted that "for an expert to be qualified based on experience, that experience must bear a close relationship to the expert's opinion." In this case there was "not a close fit": the expert had experience working as a traffic patrolman, a watch commander, and a security operator at public events. None of this experience had anything to do with strip searches or psychology.

[d] Qualifications of Experts -- Damages Experts

First Marblehead Corp. v. House, 541 F.3d 36 (1st Cir. 2008) : Five years after he resigned from the company, House attempted to exercise stock options and was told that they had expired three months after his resignation. The jury found that House had reasonably relied on negligent misrepresentations that the options would be viable for ten years, but it accepted testimony from an expert for the company that it would not have made financial sense for House to have exercised the options timely had he known of the three-month restriction. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admission of the expert's testimony, as he was an economist with nearly two decades of experience as a consultant in economics, finance, and strategy consulting, including providing investment advice to accredited investors. His testimony about how stock options function and how an investor would think about exercising those options involved topics not ordinarily within the knowledge of the jury. And the testimony provided the jury with information helpful in evaluating House's assertions as to what he would have done, without giving the expert's opinion about House's credibility or what he believed House would have done.

[k] Qualifications of Experts -- Forensic Experts

United States v. Mahone, 453 F.3d 68 (1st Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for attempted armed robbery, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a government witness was permitted to testify as an expert with respect to footwear impression identification, even though she was not qualified through the International Association for Identification. The witness had a master's degree in forensic science, testified that she had made more than 11,000 footwear comparisons, worked two years as a state police "latent impressions" specialist, testified twice as an expert on footwear impressions, and attended a 40-hour FBI course in footwear and tire impression evidence. The Court also found that there was an appropriate hearing into the "ACE-V" method for assessing footwear impressions, and sufficient evidence of the reliability of the method and its application in this case.

[k.1] Qualifications of Experts -- Fraud Cases

United States v. Cooks, 589 F.3d 173 (5th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed fraud and money laundering convictions, although it found an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) in permitting an agent of the FDIC to testify as an expert on mortgage fraud. The witness had sparse experience working on mortgage fraud cases, had never been qualified as an expert on mortgage fraud, had no specialized training or classes in mortgage fraud, and was seemingly unaware of basic statutes and literature that govern the field.

[n] Qualifications of Experts -- Industry Practice

Levin v. Dalva Bros. Inc., 459 F.3d 68 (1st Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed in part and reversed in part summary judgment granted in an action between buyers and sellers of antiques. It found no error in allowing the defendant's expert to testify that sheets used by an antique dealer to describe furniture comported with industry standards, as "[e]xpert testimony on industry standards is common fare in civil litigation."

United States v. Fallon, 470 F.3d 542 (3d Cir. 2006) : The defendant was charged with fraud after providing a forged FDA letter certifying a medical device that was the subject of a vendor agreement he was establishing with a leasing firm. To prove that the forgery was material, the president of the leasing firm testified that it had a policy, which he had brought with him from his prior employer, of requiring FDA clearances from medical device manufacturers. The defense countered with the testimony of a witness that he had never in 15 years in the medical leasing business requested or even seen an FDA clearance letter, but it was not permitted to introduce testimony by a former COO at a medical leasing company (the prior employer of the prosecution witness) as to the customs and practices of the medical leasing industry. Affirming, the Court held that exclusion of the industry practice evidence was error (but harmless); contrary to the Trial Judge's understanding, "a witness need not represent an entire industry in order to have sufficient knowledge of that industry's customs and practices so as to render substantial assistance to the jury."

United States v. Smith, 573 F.3d 639 (8th Cir. 2009) : The operator of an online pharmacy business was convicted for distributing controlled substances without an effective prescription and related offenses. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a pharmacist was permitted to testify that the information provided by alleged patients to the physician employed by the defendant was insufficient for a physician to have issued valid prescriptions. As executive director for 20 years of the National Association of Boards of Pharmacy and a frequent witness before legislatures on Internet pharmacies and the relevant laws, the witness was familiar with the legal standards for issuing prescriptions and qualified to testify about compliance with the applicable standards. The Court noted that the witness was not qualified to interpret the text of the statutes and regulations in court, but any error was harmless.

Am. Gen. Life Ins. Co. v. Schoenthal Family, LLC, 555 F.3d 1331 (11th Cir. 2009) : In a declaratory judgment and interpleader action by a life insurance company alleging that the insured materially misstated his assets, the Court affirmed summary judgment for the insurer, finding no abuse of discretion when a witness was permitted to give expert testimony regarding "general insurance industry financial underwriting standards and risk management issues," including that no insurer would issue a $7,000,000 policy for estate planning purposes to a man whose net worth was less than $200,000. The witness was qualified by his education (e.g., a doctoral degree in risk management) and experience (e.g., coauthoring a leading textbook on life insurance and serving as a paid consultant to various companies regarding the issuance of multi-million-dollar life insurance policies) to provide the information and opinions he did.

[o] Qualifications of Experts -- Law Enforcement Agents

United States v. Mejia, 597 F.3d 1329 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : In a prosecution for conspiring to import cocaine, that arose from a DEA-initiated Central American sting operation, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting a Guatemalan police officer with 14 years' experience to testify as to drug trafficking and transportation activities as they relate to Guatemala. The witness had not participated in cases that were prosecuted in the United States, but this did not affect his qualifications to testify about drug trafficking in Guatemala.

United States v. Garcia, 452 F.3d 36 (1st Cir. 2006) : In an illegal reentry case, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a law enforcement agent was permitted to testify as an expert in fingerprint comparison, although he had "a mere two days of training." It noted that the agent had received a certification in fingerprint comparison after taking a 16-hour course, he conducted more than 80 comparisons over a period of two years, his comparisons were often verified by other FBI officials, and he had testified as a fingerprint expert in federal court on several occasions. The Court noted that "some experts are more qualified than others" and that the agent "may have not had the same expertise as someone whose sole occupation is to compare latent prints." However, his training and experience were sufficient to permit him to testify as an expert; "[i]t was up to the jury to weigh that testimony, given what the jurors heard on direct and cross-examination about Plumb's training and experience."

United States v. Bynum, 604 F.3d 161 (4th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for transporting and possessing child pornography, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting an FBI analyst with 13 years of experience in examining questioned photographic evidence to authenticate the images in the charged pornography as those of real people and to testify that they were not computer-generated.

United States v. Lee, 502 F.3d 691 (7th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by a law enforcement officer on how gunshot residue can transfer from one surface to another, since the officer had no training in testing for the presence of gunshot residue. The Judge also properly excluded his testimony that a partial fingerprint was unsuitable for comparison, since he also had no training in the analysis of fingerprints.

Schmidt v. Magyari, 557 F.3d 564 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the City in an action by an arrestee who claimed that photographing her tattoo violated her rights. The Trial Judge properly excluded expert testimony offered by a police lieutenant on behalf of the plaintiff as to strip-search procedures, an officer's motivations, and the psychological impact of searches on arrestees. Rejecting the plaintiff's contention that the witness was sufficiently qualified by experience, the Court noted that "for an expert to be qualified based on experience, that experience must bear a close relationship to the expert's opinion." In this case there was "not a close fit": the expert had experience working as a traffic patrolman, a watch commander, and a security operator at public events. None of this experience had anything to do with strip searches or psychology.

[p] Qualifications of Experts -- Medical Testimony

[i] Accident Cases

Robinson v. Geico Gen'l Ins. Co., 447 F.3d 1096 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a judgment for an insurer that refused to pay for injuries allegedly caused by an automobile accident, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the testimony of a neurologist who testified that the injury to the plaintiff's shoulder could not have been caused by the relatively light impact she suffered in the accident. Rejecting an argument that the witness' testimony was really about orthopedics, not neurology, the Court noted that " Rule 702 does not require a defense medical expert to be of the identical medical specialty as the plaintiff's expert." Here, the expert's testimony > pertained to the cause of the shoulder problems that made Robinson's surgery necessary. His testimony regarding the usual onset of shoulder pain was within his realm of expertise as a neurologist. As a physician, he could testify regarding the likely type of injury one would sustain by the impact of the arm into the shoulder joint. Also, Dr. Horenstein's study of the subject qualified him to testify regarding the direction one would be forced in a rear-impact collision.

[iii] Qualifications of Experts -- Medical Testimony -- Medical Malpractice Cases

Pages-Ramirez v. Ramirez-Gonzalez, 605 F.3d 109 (1st Cir. 2010) : The Court reversed a judgment as a matter of law for an obstetrician sued by parents who alleged that medical malpractice during their son's delivery caused catastrophic injury, finding that it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the plaintiffs' expert on the ground that she was not board-certified in obstetrics and gynecology and had no privileges to administer the drug used during the mother's delivery or to perform a cesarean section. The expert was board-certified and practiced in perinatal and neonatal medicine, had published book chapters that deal with the drug that was administered, and served as a consultant during high-risk deliveries and recommended that C-sections be performed. Because the expert's credentials "easily meet, and, indeed, surpass the standard for admissibility of expert testimony," the expert should have been permitted to testify during the plaintiffs' case-in-chief on the standard of care and on medical causation.

Huss v. Gayden, 571 F.3d 442 (5th Cir. 2009) : The Court reversed a judgment for a patient who alleged that the defendants' negligence in administering a drug during her pregnancy caused cardiac injuries. The defendants offered a witness, who was board-certified in internal medicine with 15 years' practice as an internist and who had treated pregnant patients with cardiac conditions, to testify that the plaintiff's condition was idiopathic (of unknown origin), that there was no established evidence that the drug administered could cause the plaintiff's condition, and that the articles relied upon by the plaintiff's causation expert were insufficient to support the causative relationship he found and were contradicted by statistically reliable research. The Magistrate Judge trying the case excluded the witness on the ground that he had virtually no experience in OB/GYN and no experience at all with the drug in question, and there was "simply nothing in [his] background" that entitled him to express an opinion about causation of the plaintiff's condition. The Court held that exclusion of the expert's opinion was an abuse of discretion, since his "training and experience as a medical professional qualify him to tell the jury why the literature does not establish a causal link," and he did not need to be board-certified in cardiology or toxicology to explain the literature.

Gayton v. McCoy, 593 F.3d 610 (7th Cir. 2010) : In an action alleging that an inmate died from a heart attack because she did not receive proper medical care, the Court found no error in the exclusion of testimony by the plaintiff's medical expert that the inmate would not have died if prison officials had given her her cardiac medications. The doctor was not a cardiologist, and did not have any knowledge of "how these drugs function, whether they are efficacious in the short term as well as the long term, or how they prevent CHF [congestive heart failure] from reaching a critical stage." Moreover, the witness could not state "what effect, if any, these medications would have had given that the record reveals that [the inmate] had not been taking them consistently nor as instructed by her prescribing physician." Thus, the witness did not have the specialized cardiological or pharmacological knowledge necessary to make a conclusion that would help the jury. In contrast, the Court found that the witness was qualified to testify that the inmate's vomiting combined with her diuretic medications may have contributed to her tachycardia and subsequent death, since "[t]he effects of vomiting on potassium and electrolyte levels in the body is not specialized knowledge held only by cardiologists, and ... it is knowledge that any competent physician would typically possess."

Allen v. Brown Clinic, P.L.L.P., 531 F.3d 568 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a judgment for defendants in a medical malpractice case. The jury found that a defendant doctor was negligent in repairing a hiatal hernia through an "open surgery," but that the negligence was not the proximate cause of a patient's perforated esophagus. The Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting a board-certified general surgeon with extensive academic and professional experience to testify, even though the expert performed more laparoscopic surgeries than open surgeries and no longer did open surgeries now that the less invasive alternative was available. The Court noted that "any differences in his relative experience could be explored on cross-examination."

[iv] Qualifications of Experts -- Medical Testimony -- Product Liability and Toxic Exposure Cases

Gass v. Marriott Hotel Servs., 558 F.3d 419 (6th Cir. 2009) : In an action by hotel guests alleging that exposure to pesticides in their room caused subsequent illness, the Court found no abuse of discretion in rulings that permitted the plaintiffs' treating physicians to testify to their "symptoms, tests, diagnosis, and treatment," but not to the causation of the plaintiffs' illness. The physicians' professional experience qualified them regarding the former, but nothing in their medical expertise would allow them to testify regarding the specific pesticide that caused the plaintiffs' symptoms or when their exposure to the pesticide occurred. In Meridia Products Liability Litig. v. Abbott Labs., 447 F.3d 861 (6th Cir. 2006) , the court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in an action by persons allegedly injured from taking the drug Meridia for weight loss. It found no error in excluding testimony from the plaintiffs' expert pharmacologist that Meridia elevates blood pressure, and that the increase in blood pressure is a risk to heart health that outweighed any corresponding benefit of weight loss. The Court noted that the witness was a pharmacologist, not a cardiologist, and so was "not an expert on the effects of high blood pressure on the human body."

Cunningham v. Masterwear Corp., 569 F.3d 673 (7th Cir. 2009) : In a nuisance action by plaintiffs claiming that improper storage of perchloro-ethylene by a neighboring dry cleaner had caused respiratory injuries and loss of property value, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the plaintiffs' expert medical witness was disqualified. The witness was a physician specializing in treatment of respiratory diseases, but he had never treated a respiratory illness caused or aggravated by exposure to PCE, and he was not a toxicologist. Furthermore, he did not present, directly or by citation to scientific literature, a theory that would link the level and duration of the plaintiffs' exposure to PCE to their symptoms. In Lewis v. CITGO Petroleum Corp., 561 F.3d 698 (7th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in a negligence action for injuries allegedly sustained from exposure to hydrogen sulfide, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of expert causation testimony for the plaintiff. One of the witnesses was an allergist with no training or experience in toxicology or epidemiology, who had treated one patient 12 years earlier after hydrogen sulfide exposure and who in preparing his diagnosis in this case had spent only 30 minutes researching a medical database for relevant information about hydrogen sulfide exposure.

In re Hanford Nuclear Reservation Litig., 534 F.3d 986 (9th Cir. 2008) : In the trial of claims by bellwether plaintiffs alleging that radioiodine emissions by plutonium producers at a nuclear facility caused cancers and other life-threatening diseases, the Trial Judge barred the plaintiffs' expert endocrinologist from testifying about any pre-litigation articles he had written on iodine-131's effect on thyroid cells because none of his articles concluded that doses at less than 100 rads could cause disease, and there was no evidence that any of the plaintiffs had been exposed to radiation at that level. The Court held that the Judge's ruling was an abuse of discretion, since it deprived the jury of knowledge about the extent of the witness' pre-litigation expertise, which included extensive research and scholarship on the capacity of I-131 emissions to kill thyroid cells.

[v] Qualifications of Experts -- Medical Testimony -- Miscellaneous Cases

Planned Parenthood Cincinnati Region v. Taft, 444 F.3d 502 (6th Cir. 2006) (en banc): Affirming in part a preliminary injunction granted for abortion providers challenging the constitutionality of a state statute prohibiting "off-label" use of an abortion-inducing drug, the Court noted that it was improper to exclude testimony on medical and surgical abortion by the State's expert on the ground that she did not perform elective abortion procedures. "As with any other procedure or topic, an individual can acquire expertise regarding elective procedures through a variety of means other than actually performing the precise procedure at issue."

Happel v. Walmart Stores, Inc., 602 F.3d 820 (7th Cir. 2010) : In an action alleging that negligence by a pharmacy in filling a prescription for a nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory drug for a patient allergic to NSAIDs caused an anaphylactic reaction that exacerbated the patient's multiple sclerosis, the Court reversed the judgment for errors in awarding damages, but found no abuse of discretion in excluding causation testimony from the plaintiff's expert. The witness was not qualified to testify about the plaintiff's MS because he had very limited (and unrelated) experience with MS patients, his opinion was not supported by relevant medical literature, and he offered no experimental, statistical, or other scientific data to support his theory.

[q] Qualifications of Experts -- Navigation

Stolt Achievement, Ltd. v. Dredge B.E. Lindholm, 447 F.3d 360 (5th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed the judgment in a maritime collision case, finding no abuse of discretion when an experienced Master Mariner was permitted to testify about the effects of one ship's bow wave. Although the witness was not qualified to testify as to specific hydrodynamic effects, he did not testify to technical matters or calculations regarding the forces generated, but limited his conclusions to those based on his experience as a Master Mariner and his observations of the accident locale.

[r] Qualifications of Experts -- Patent Cases

SEB S.A. v. Montgomery Ward & Co., 594 F.3d 1360 (Fed. Cir. 2010) : In an action alleging infringement of a patented feature of a deep fryer, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a defense expert to testify as to infringement. Although he lacked expertise in the art of designing deep fryers, he was qualified with respect to designing thermal bridges, which was an element of the patent claim. In Sundance, Inc. v. Demonte Fabricating, Ltd., 550 F.3d 1356 (Fed. Cir. 2008) , the Court reversed a judgment against the plaintiff in a patent infringement action, finding that it was an abuse of discretion to permit a patent attorney to offer expert opinion testimony on the issue of obviousness and other issues of infringement or validity, since he offered "testimony on several issues which are exclusively determined from the perspective of ordinary skill in the art" despite the fact that he had "no skill in the pertinent art." The Court added that being a person of ordinary skill in the art does not automatically entitle a witness to testify as an expert on these matters, nor does Rule 702 require a witness to possess something more than ordinary skill in the art to testify as an expert. In Proveris Scientific Corp. v. Innovasystems, Inc., 536 F.3d 1256 (Fed. Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed a finding of infringement regarding a patent related to aerosol sprays commonly used in drug delivery devices. It found no abuse of discretion in a ruling that a mechanical engineer whose technical experience was limited to satellite design was not qualified to testify about laboratory equipment used in the development of drug delivery devices.

[s] Qualifications of Experts -- Physical Injuries

Lash v. Hollis, 525 F.3d 636 (8th Cir. 2008) : An arrestee claimed that an officer used excessive force against him by shocking him six times with a Taser. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the arrestee's expert testimony that the Taser was the cause of his kidney failure, as the expert had no experience with Tasers, Taser injuries, or the specific Taser at issue in the case.

[t] Qualifications of Experts -- Prescription Drug and Toxic Exposure Cases

Barrett v. Rhodia, Inc., 606 F.3d 975 (8th Cir. 2010) : In an action for injuries allegedly caused when a cloud of toxic gas escaped from a chemical drum used in a hazardous waste facility, the plaintiff, who had been 12-14 feet away, sought to introduce testimony establishing that he had been exposed to a sufficient concentration of the gas to cause his injuries from a board-certified allergist certified in toxicology, his treating physician, a clinical psychologist practicing in neuropsychotherapy, and a safety engineer with a degree in petroleum and natural gas engineering. Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in holding, with limited exceptions, that the proffered experts lacked the experience and scientific foundation to provide the causation testimony necessary for the plaintiff's case.

[u] Qualifications of Experts -- Product Liability Cases

[iii] Qualifications of Experts -- Product Liability Cases -- Vehicles and Equipment

[A] Consumer Accidents

Smith v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 495 F.3d 224 (5th Cir. 2007) : Affirming summary judgment for the manufacturer in a suit by a motorist who was injured when tread separated from a seven-year-old tire he had purchased as a spare, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by a polymer scientist who had concluded that the tire was defective in the absence of a nylon cap overlay. The witness had never designed a tire, nor conducted or reviewed any research into tire structure, and his only familiarity with tires came from riding on them. The Court observed that "[a]t most, Moore is qualified to testify that the tire's wire bonding could have been stronger with a nylon cap overlay." In response to the plaintiff's argument that "[a] tire is simply an application of the fundamental issues of polymer science," the Court stated: "That is true in some sense, just as it is true that asbestos, heart valves, and cupcakes can all be broken down into their basic atomic particles; but that does not mean an atomic physicist is qualified to testify regarding any asbestosis, medical malpractice, or confectionary issue. It's the science's application to tires that concerns us here, and Moore has absolutely no experience applying polymer science to tires."

[B] Qualifications of Experts -- Product Liability Cases -- Vehicles and Equipment -- Workplace Accidents

Pineda v. Ford Motor Co., 520 F.3d 237 (3d Cir. 2008) : A car mechanic brought a product liability action after the back window of an SUV shattered when he was working on the rear door lift. The plaintiff's expert would have testified that a step-by-step procedure was required in order to reduce the likelihood that the rear liftgate glass would fail when repairing the door lift, and that such a procedure should have been embodied in an instruction manual, but was not. Reversing summary judgment for the defendant granted after the expert was excluded on the ground that he was not qualified to testify about the adequacy of warnings, the Court noted that the expert had degrees in engineering and spent considerable time studying fracture mechanics and modeling materials such as glass. The expert "did not purport to opine on how the warning should be worded or how it should appear in order to effectively convey its message to an automobile technician. He only testified that neglecting to follow the steps of an instruction when replacing the 2002 Explorer's liftgate brackets and hinges might result in failure of the liftgate glass, and that a warning was necessary to alert a technician to the potential problem. [The expert] was substantively qualified to testify on this point because a proper warning is also a solution to an engineering problem."

[y.1] Qualifications of Experts -- Translation and Interpretation

United States v. Cui Qin Zhang, 458 F.3d 1126 (10th Cir. 2006) : In drug-possession trial, the prosecution introduced a tape recording of admissions made by the Mandarin-speaking defendant in a telephone call from jail after her arrest. Affirming, the Court held that the required Daubert gatekeeping had been performed with respect to the English translation of the tape, based on the Judge's statement overruling objections to the interpreter's qualifications: "This is a native Mandarin Chinese Speaker who has been speaking English since he was 10 years old. And I take it ... he's probably over 30 since he's been a police officer for 14 years."

[cc] Qualifications of Experts -- Other Cases

Levin v. Dalva Bros. Inc., 459 F.3d 68 (1st Cir. 2006) : In an action between buyers and sellers of antiques, the plaintiff's expert (Fallwell), testified as to the appraisal value and his visual observations of the antiques at issue, but was not permitted to opine as to whether the clock originated from a certain historical period, because he had "insufficient experience with Regence-era furniture to authenticate the clock based on his visual examination." The plaintiff argued that although Fallwell did not have experience identifying Regence-era furniture, such specialization is not required under Rule 702. Affirming, the Court held that "[b] excluding Fallwell's opinion on authenticity but allowing him to testify to appraisal value and his visual observations of the clock, the court reasonably limited Fallwell to offering opinions only in those areas in which he was qualified." The plaintiff also argued that another defense expert was unqualified to testify about the attributes of the clock because he had not authenticated its period of origin. The Court noted that although the expert had only assumed the clock's period of origin, experts are allowed to give opinions that are based upon assumptions not contrary to evidence introduced at trial. In Santos v. Posadas de Puerto Rico Assoc., Inc., 452 F.3d 59 (1st Cir. 2006) , an expert witness for the plaintiff, who slipped and fell while entering a hotel swimming pool, testified that there was a dangerous condition arising from a combination of factors: variable friction between the pool steps and their edges, the use of an unsuitable type of tile at the edges, the peculiar configuration of the stairs, and the absence of a handrail. Although the witness had no experience in the construction or design of swimming pools, the Court found he was sufficiently qualified, and affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff. It explained that "experts come in various shapes and sizes; there is no mechanical checklist for measuring whether an expert is qualified to offer opinion evidence in a particular field." Here, the expert held a doctorate in mechanical engineering, was certified by the National Academy of Safety as a tribologist (someone who deals with friction and its effect on how people walk), and had analyzed more than 2,000 slip and fall accidents.

United States v. Winkle, 477 F.3d 407 (6th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for bank fraud, finding no abuse of discretion when an employee of an accounting firm that was conducting an investigation of the affected banks was permitted to testify as an expert regarding the defendant's check kiting scheme. Although the witness was not a certified public accountant, he had a bachelor's degree in business, had worked five years as a bank examiner, and had worked twelve years with the accounting firm conducting due diligence and compliance reviews for government agencies. He had been taught how to spot check kiting activity, and part of his job was to ensure that the banks he examined had controls in place to monitor for check kiting.

Cincinnati Ins. Co. v. Bluewood, Inc., 560 F.3d 798 (8th Cir. 2009) : In an action by an apartment complex manager against a commercial property insurer alleging breach of contract and unreasonable refusal to pay in connection with water damage to apartments, the Court affirmed a judgment that awarded the manager no additional damages beyond those already paid by the insurer. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the testimony of the insurer's expert on mold. Although the manager focused on the expert's lack of a college education, the Court noted that the expert had participated in between 1500 and 2000 water remediation jobs over 15 years and regularly performed experimental testing relating to mold growth and prevention.

Milne v. USA Cycling, Inc., 575 F.3d 1120 (10th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the defendants in an action by injured participants in a mountain bike race against race organizers and a truck driver who collided with the plaintiffs. It found no abuse of discretion in excluding the testimony by the plaintiffs' expert regarding the applicable standards of care for mountain bike racing. Although the expert had experience organizing and supervising paved road bike races, he had no experience in organizing, supervising, or studying mountain bike races and was not an experienced mountain bike rider. The record demonstrated that the rules and practices that prevail at mountain bike races are different from those that prevail at traditional road races, so the expert was not sufficiently qualified.

[dd] Qualifications of Experts -- Witness' Professed Lack of Qualification

Watson v. United States, 485 F.3d 1100 (10th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a judgment for the government in a prisoner's suit for medical injuries, the Court found no abuse of discretion in a finding that the government's expert on the standard of care was qualified. In his deposition, the witness said that he did not consider himself an expert, although he also said that he was "talking about meeting the standard of care in the community." The Court rejected the argument that the witness' professed lack of expertise rendered him unqualified, noting that "[w]hile overly modest expert witnesses may not be exactly an everyday sort of problem in our legal system, neither can we ignore the prospect of mistakenly excluding a witness who really is expert but simply too demure to trumpet his or her qualities under cross-examination; it would hardly benefit the legal system to exclude from the stand self-deprecating individuals who rarely testify but have the expertise to do so in favor of those who are more extravagant and savvy to the legal system or who may make their living testifying in our courts." Here, the witness was qualified by being a medical doctor, board certified, with advanced training in several specialized areas, and by having served as an emergency room director and medical director of the Federal Transfer Center.

[78] Reliance on Other Experts [Go To Main]

Crowe v. Marchand, 506 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2007) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant physician in a medical malpractice case, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony by an orthopedic surgeon who did not review the patient's x-ray or MRI studies. The expert testified that he based his opinions on what other physicians' reports of those studies showed. The Court found that the information he relied upon provided a sufficient foundation for his opinion, since "[d]octors routinely rely on observations reported by other doctors," and "it is unrealistic to expect a physician, as a condition precedent to offering opinion testimony in a personal injury case, to have performed every test, procedure, and examination himself."

[79] Requirement of Expert Testimony [Go To Main]

Menz v. New Holland N. Am., Inc., 507 F.3d 1107 (8th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed summary judgments for the manufacturers of a tractor and a front-end loader in a suit by a tractor driver injured in a rollover accident, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the plaintiff's expert testimony. The Court rejected the plaintiff's argument that this exclusion should not have resulted in summary judgment because expert testimony was not required, concluding that "the products at issue in this case are fairly technical and complex, and are not the type of machinery commonly utilized by the typical lay juror."

[82] Risk Assessment [Go To Main]

Surles v. Greyhound Lines, Inc., 474 F.3d 288 (6th Cir. 2007) : The plaintiff, suing for personal injuries incurred when a deranged passenger attacked the driver of an interstate bus and caused a serious accident, argued that the defendant was negligent in failing to provide secure enclosures for its bus drivers. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting a witness to assess prior incident reports and evaluate the sufficiency of the defendant's driver training. Although he had no experience specific to the bus industry, the witness had 28 years as a police officer, including founding a unit that dealt with "managing violently inclined situations of the mentally ill," and subsequent experience with a consulting firm working with clients in the transportation industry on threat assessment issues and on training employees on "interpersonal human aggression and managing violently inclined employees." The Trial Judge conducted a hearing to ensure the reliability and relevancy of the testimony, precluded opinions on the issue of foreseeability as they would not have been helpful, and had a sufficient basis for concluding that the expert's conclusions were based on reliable application of his experience to a sufficient factual basis.

[83] Safety Experts [Go To Main]

Minix v. Canarecci, 597 F.3d 824 (7th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed summary judgments for defendants in an action alleging deliberate indifference when a jail inmate committed suicide. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the plaintiff's expert that the jail's nursing staff did not have the training required to competently assess an inmate's risk of suicide, as the expert cited no medical standards or principles in support of his conclusion and failed to explain his methodology.

Milne v. USA Cycling, Inc., 575 F.3d 1120 (10th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the defendants in an action by injured participants in a mountain bike race against race organizers and a truck driver who collided with the plaintiffs. It found no abuse of discretion in excluding the testimony by the plaintiffs' expert regarding the applicable standards of care for mountain bike racing. Although the expert had experience organizing and supervising paved road bike races, he had no experience in organizing, supervising, or studying mountain bike races and was not an experienced mountain bike rider. The record demonstrated that the rules and practices that prevail at mountain bike races are different from those that prevail at traditional road races, so the expert was not sufficiently qualified. The Court noted that even if the expert were qualified, his testimony on safety standards was unreliable because he relied almost exclusively on his own experience, which was inapplicable in the context of mountain bike racing. Therefore, his testimony about the safety precautions that should have been taken were "mere speculation."

[84] Scientific Evidence [Go To Main]

[c] Scientific Evidence -- Causation of Disease or Injury

[i] Drugs and Medical Devices

Riegel v. Medtronic, Inc., 451 F.3d 104 (2d Cir. 2006) , aff'd on other grounds, 128 S. Ct. 999, 169 L. Ed. 2d 892 (2008) : The plaintiff sued the manufacturer of a balloon catheter that exploded during his heart surgery. Because the catheter was inflated beyond its specifications and it was used even though the plaintiff had heavily calcified arteries and the product specification indicated that the catheter should not be used under such circumstances, it was the plaintiff's burden to show that a manufacturing defect, rather than overinflation or calcification, caused the catheter to explode. The plaintiff's engineer offered the view that based on the nature of the plaintiff's injury, the catheter must have burst not longitudinally, but radially, which, in his view, signified a manufacturing defect. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court found that the Judge, who rejected the expert's opinion, had properly identified "serious flaws" in the expert's opinion. The expert did not explain the basis of his conclusion that the plaintiff's injury was more indicative of a radial failure than a longitudinal failure. More importantly, the expert did not explain why a radial failure led to a conclusion of manufacturing defect, and why a radial failure could not have been caused by overinflation or calcification.

[iii] Scientific Evidence -- Causation of Disease or Injury -- Toxic Exposure

[A] Consumer Injuries

In re Hanford Nuclear Reservation Litig., 534 F.3d 986 (9th Cir. 2008) , amending 497 F.3d 1005 (9th Cir. 2007) : Reversing in part judgments from a trial in which bellwether plaintiffs representing a class of residents near a nuclear facility that helped make an atomic bomb during World War II claimed that radioiodine (I-131) emissions caused cancers and life threatening diseases, the Court found it was an abuse of discretion to bar the plaintiffs' endocrinologist expert from testifying as to pre-litigation articles he authored on I-131's impact on thyroid cells. The Judge relied on the fact that no article concluded that doses less than 100 rads can cause autoimmune disease. "This ruling was an abuse of discretion because it deprived the jury of testimony from Dr. Davies about the extent of his pre-litigation expertise regarding causes of thyroid illness."

[e.1] Scientific Evidence -- EDTA Testing

Cooper v. Brown, 510 F.3d 870 (9th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed the denial of habeas corpus relief to a state defendant convicted of multiple murders and sentenced to death. This was the third habeas petition filed by the defendant, and it followed a remand in Cooper v. Woodford, 358 F.3d 1117 (9th Cir. 2004) , in which the Court ordered the District Judge to order two scientific tests to be performed. One of the tests, for the preservative agent ethylene-diamine tetra-acetic acid (EDTA), was conducted on a bloody T-shirt in an effort to determine whether blood had been taken from a vial and planted on the shirt. Although the defendant complained that the testing protocol was flawed, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the conclusion that the EDTA testing lacked sufficient indicia of reliability to be admissible. It noted that "EDTA testing has not been subjected to peer review and there has been no discussion of forensic EDTA testing in scientific literature since a 1997 article that headlines the need for a better analytical method." Further, the error rate of EDTA testing cannot be determined, as "the widespread presence of EDTA in the environment can never be ruled out as the source of any EDTA detected in the specimen."

[h] Scientific Evidence -- Other Cases

United States v. W.R. Grace, 504 F.3d 745 (9th Cir. 2007) : In a prosecution related to the alleged release of asbestos-contaminated vermiculite from a mine, the Trial Judge ruled that government experts could not offer opinion testimony as to the amount of a release of asbestos-contaminated vermiculite based upon the defendants' historic product testing records, but that the experts could testify regarding the fact and extent of historic testing in order to show the defendants' knowledge of the dangerousness of the contaminated vermiculite. Reversing on interlocutory appeal, the Court held that the Judge erred in examining the experts' reliance on particular data, and stated that the Judge on remand should conduct a Rule 702 analysis in light of the experts' reasoning and methodology as a whole. The Court also found an abuse of discretion in the Judge's failure to consider whether the experts could testify as to the hazardous characteristics of historic releases as opposed to estimating the fiber concentrations in the charged releases. The Court held that because the expert testimony was admitted on the notice issue, the Judge implicitly found the historic testing data reliable, and thus should also have admitted the data to prove the propensity of the defendants' vermiculite to release asbestos.

[j] Scientific Evidence -- Sexual Abuse Cases

United States v. Eagle, 515 F.3d 794 (8th Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for aggravated sexual abuse, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the testimony of an expert regarding the victim's encopresis. The expert did not offer an opinion as to whether sexual abuse occurred or that the encopresis was caused by sexual abuse. Rather, the expert explained that encopresis is a nonspecific historical finding of abuse, which means that there are other reasons it may occur. The expert "provided testimony regarding characteristics of sexually abused children in general and how they compared with the characteristics exhibited by J.J. This is allowed under our precedent."

[85] Social Science Evidence [Go To Main]

United States v. Simmons, 470 F.3d 1115 (5th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for sexual assault under color of law, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting a psychologist to testify that the victim's behavior and testimony were consistent with that of sexual assault victims. Although it recognized that a diagnosis of rape trauma syndrome is made for therapeutic and not forensic purposes, and assumes that a claimant is truthful, the Court held that testimony drawing on a diagnosis of rape trauma syndrome is not proscribed by Daubert. The Court reasoned that expert testimony need not satisfy every Daubert factor and noted that the reliability inquiry as applied to social scientists requires some flexibility.

[87] Standards of Conduct [Go To Main]

[b] Standards of Conduct -- Miscellaneous Cases

Parker v. Gerrish, 547 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2008) : In a civil rights action by an arrestee alleging excessive force, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by a retired police officer with experience in police training that the defendant officer's use of a Taser "was inconsistent with generally established police practices."

United States v. Wexler, 522 F.3d 194 (2d Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions of a dermatologist for illegal distribution of controlled substances and health care fraud, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting expert testimony regarding the standard of care expected of dermatologists. The defendant complained that the testimony was irrelevant because a physician is not confined to one area of practice and may treat patients for conditions outside the area of specialty, but the Court held that "[w]hile failure to comply with the standard of care applicable to a medical specialty does not alone provide a basis for concluding that a physician's activities fall outside the usual course of professional practice, it surely is relevant to that determination."

North Am. Speciality Ins. Co. v. Britt Paulk Ins. Agency, 579 F.3d 1106 (10th Cir. 2009) : In an insurance action, the Court found no error in excluding proffered expert testimony regarding standard insurance industry practice. Because the jury could determine from the evidence whether the insurance company's actions comported with industry standards, an expert would not have assisted the jury.

[89] Statistical Evidence [Go To Main]

[b] Statistical Evidence -- Other Cases

United States v. Giambro, 544 F.3d 26 (1st Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of an unregistered firearm, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by a defense witness regarding the accuracy and completeness in the National Firearms Registration and Transfer Record. Although the witness had supposedly based his conclusions on a statistical analysis of filings with ATF, the Judge had properly found that "suppositions ... and conjecture abound[ed]" in the testimony, and that the witness had relied on "underlying data [that was] purely anecdotal and without scientific basis."

Lyondell Chem. Co. v. Occidental Chem. Corp., 608 F.3d 284 (5th Cir. 2010) : In a CERCLA apportionment and contribution action, it was necessary to calculate disposal volumes for each liable company based on uncertain input data, so minimum, intermediate, and maximum input values were established and a statistical expert calculated the required volumes. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the expert used the Monte Carlo statistical methodology, as it was shown to be sufficiently reliable for this specific application. In United States v. Valencia, 600 F.3d 389 (5th Cir. 2010) , the Court affirmed fraud convictions arising from a scheme to give false information regarding natural gas trades to industry publications in order to manipulate natural gas markets. It found no abuse of discretion when a witness retained by the government was permitted to express an opinion, based on analyses he conducted, regarding the likelihood that the defendants' false reporting affected the markets. Although the unprecedented nature of the expert's work made it highly impractical to subject his methods to peer review and publication, and there would be no general acceptance of the theory in the scientific or expert community, the arithmetic underpinnings of the analysis permitted testing the theories and determining the rate of error. Although the fit between the data and the theory was approximate, that could be highlighted on cross-examination.

[91] Sufficient Facts or Data as Basis [Go To Main]

Borges ex rel. S.M.B.W. v. Serrano-Isern, 605 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed summary judgments for an obstetrician and a hospital in a medical malpractice action alleging that the delayed performance of a Cesarean section led to improper diagnoses and resulting injuries to an infant. It held that the plaintiffs' obstetrical expert made it clear that there was no way that the defendant obstetrician could have known about an occult cord prolapse prior to undertaking the C-section, so the plaintiffs' neurological expert had no basis for concluding that the defendant obstetrician should have realized the condition earlier. In Pelletier v. Main St. Textiles, LP, 470 F.3d 48 (1st Cir. 2006) , the plaintiff, who was injured while operating a forklift, claimed that the owner of the premises was negligent in maintaining the location and in ensuring the safety of the work that was being done. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the plaintiff's expert, who would have testified to the customs and practices of the industry. Although expert testimony on the customs and practice of an industry is proper, there is no entitlement to offer such expert testimony. Here, the expert never inspected the facilities and equipment at issue, so the Judge was warranted in finding that the expert lacked sufficient facts or data upon which to base an opinion on the industry practices as applied to the premises at issue.

James v. Harris County, 577 F.3d 612 (5th Cir. 2009) : Affirming judgment as a matter of law for the County in an action by the family of a motorist shot and killed by a deputy sheriff during a traffic stop, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a criminologist was barred from testifying for the plaintiffs that the sheriff's department deputies "would have known that the use of deadly force was not thoroughly investigated and disciplined and, consistent with his theory, would have broken rules governing the use of force." Although the witness was permitted to testify that generally line workers will break rules if they are not enforced, he "offered no empirical evidence to connect his general theory to the Harris County Sheriff's Department; he never interviewed the department's deputies nor otherwise sought to collect evidence that might reveal whether informal networks of communication operated within the department." Finally, his testimony was not grounded in facts, as there was no evidence that it was common knowledge in the department that investigations of shootings were lax.

United States v. Brown, 461 F.3d 1062 (8th Cir. 2006) : Appealing from convictions arising from a scheme to divert pseudoephedrine to individuals who used it to manufacture methamphetamine, the defendants argued it was error to admit expert testimony that the expected sales of pseudoephedrine by an average convenience store were significantly less than the amount sold by the defendants' businesses. Affirming, the Court found that the expert had sufficient facts or data to reach a conclusion about what an average store could expect to sell, as the expert relied upon "data obtained from a national economic census regarding estimated national pseudoephedrine sales figures." It was therefore not critical that the expert did not visit any of the defendants' stores and had no information about their size, location, condition, or operations.

[94] Toxicology Tests [Go To Main]

Olson v. Ford Motor Co., 481 F.3d 619 (8th Cir. 2007) : The plaintiff, whose decedent was killed when he lost control of his Ford Explorer, sued the manufacturer alleging that a defect in the cruise control caused a sudden acceleration that the driver could not overcome even with hard braking. Affirming a judgment for the manufacturer, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding the level of alcohol in the decedent's vitreous humor and relating that to the decedent's likely blood-alcohol level at the time of the accident. The defendant's expert was a pharmacologist qualified by education and experience to testify about how alcohol affects human beings, and although he had not previously calculated a blood-alcohol level from a vitreous-humor-alcohol level, the actual conversion was a matter of simple arithmetic. Any suggestion that the sample of vitreous humor was faulty went only to the credibility of the testimony, not its admissibility, and was fully explored on examination and cross-examination. And there was evidence (albeit contradicted by witnesses for the plaintiff) that the method used by the defendant's expert for converting alcohol levels was reliable. In United States v. Cawthorn, 429 F.3d 793 (8th Cir. 2005) , vacated on other grounds, 128 S. Ct. 1060, 169 L. Ed. 2d 801 (2008) , the court affirmed a crack cocaine conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony on the unlikelihood that the defendant would get cocaine residue on his hands from casual contact with contaminated money. The expert had tested a money-counter and the hands of bank tellers over the course of a Saturday morning. The Court held, however, that it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to permit the same expert witness to testify that it was unlikely that one would get cocaine contamination from contact with steering wheels. There was no showing that the expert tested cars that had come into contact with cocaine or that were impounded for cocaine-related offenses.

[94.1] Translators [Go To Main]

United States v. Verdin-Garcia, 516 F.3d 884 (10th Cir. 2008) : Affirming drug trafficking convictions, the Court held there was no error in admitting without a Daubert hearing translations of intercepted Spanish-language telephone calls, which included slang terms. The translator in the case was familiar with the defendants' region of origin in Mexico and with its slang, and she had interpreted numerous conversations involving natives of the region.

[96] Unhelpful Evidence -- Within Ordinary Understanding [Go To Main]

Thompson v. City of Chicago, 472 F.3d 444 (7th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a judgment for police officers sued by survivors of a suspect who died following his arrest, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the plaintiff's expert testimony on the question whether the defendant officer used excessive force. "The jury, after having heard all of the evidence presented, was in as good a position as the experts to judge whether the force used by the officers to subdue Thompson was objectively reasonable given the circumstances in this case."

Cavataio v. City of Bella Villa, 570 F.3d 1015 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed judgments for a police chief and the City in an action by an arrestee and his wife alleging excessive force during an arrest and illegal touching of the wife's breast. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of expert testimony offered to prove that a policeman should not squeeze an elderly woman's breast, as expert testimony was not required for a jury to understand this proposition, so the testimony was not helpful.

United States v. Cruz-Escoto, 476 F.3d 1081 (9th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for being a deported alien found in the United States, finding no abuse of discretion when the defense was not permitted to introduce testimony from an expert on surveillance, which tended to impeach testimony by the arresting agent that he was continually looking west although his vehicle was facing south (which was relevant to whether the agent had observed the defendant cross the border and was therefore under "official restraint" because continuously under surveillance). There was no violation of Fifth or Sixth Amendment rights, as the evidence was irrelevant because it was within the understanding of a lay juror.

[97] Value of Property [Go To Main]

United States v. 33. 92356 Acres of Land, 585 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a decision to exclude the landowner's expert testimony as to the highest and best use of the land in a condemnation case. The expert's testimony was premised on the use of the land based on residential development and sand extraction, but those uses would have required rezoning or a variance and the expert had no support for the assumption that the Planning Board would approve a rezoning or a variance.

Cunningham v. Masterwear Corp., 569 F.3d 673 (7th Cir. 2009) : In a nuisance action by plaintiffs claiming that improper storage of perchloro-ethylene by a neighboring dry cleaner had caused respiratory injuries and loss of property value, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by a plaintiff that the value of the property had fallen $20,000 as a result of its contamination by PCE. The witness based this opinion on advice from a real estate agent when they were unable to sell at the initial listing price. The witness's opinion was not his own valuation, which is permissible, but simply hearsay of what the real estate agent said. And, more importantly, the opinion was not simply one of valuation but of causation, for which he had no basis.

[102] Waiver of Daubert Challenge [Go To Main]

Hill v. Principi, 439 F.3d 18 (1st Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the Department of Veterans Affairs in an action by a psychiatrist who resigned her employment after being assigned additional duties that she claimed violated the Rehabilitation Act. It held that the plaintiff failed to object in a timely fashion to the defense expert testimony, where she waited to object until moments before the witness was to testify despite having received the witness' report five months earlier. The Court noted that "because Daubert generally contemplates a 'gatekeeping' function, not a 'gotcha' function, untimely Daubert motions should be considered only in rare circumstances."

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 703 RULE 703

3-703 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 703.syn

§ 703.syn Synopsis to Chapter 703: RULE 703

703.01 Official Text

703.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Common-law Rule on Expert Reliance on Inadmissible Information

[2] Rule 703: Departure from the Common Law

[3] Judicial Function in Assessing Reasonable Reliance on Inadmissible Information

[4] Backdoor Hearsay and the 2000 Amendment to Rule 703

[5] Relationship to Rule 702

703.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Accountants' Opinions and Conclusions

[2] Balancing for Otherwise Inadmissible Data

[3] Chemical Tests

[4] Constitutional Concerns

[5] Data Made Inadmissible by Statute

[6] Disclosure of Facts to Jury

[7] Economic Data

[8] Firearms

[9] Fire Investigations

[10] Government Data

[11] Hearsay

[12] IRS Audits

[13] Judicial Evaluation of Expert's Basis

[14] Law Enforcement Information

[15] Medical Evidence

[a] Malpractice Cases

[b] Medical Evidence -- Other Cases

[c] Medical Evidence -- Product Liability and Toxic Tort Cases

[d] Medical Evidence -- Scientific Basis

[16] Other Expert's Opinion

[17] Personal Knowledge Not Required

[18] Psychiatric and Psychological Evidence

[19] Reasonable Reliance on Data

[a] Civil Cases

[b] Reasonable Reliance on Data -- Criminal Cases

[20] Relationship to Other Rules

[21] Reliance on Treatises

[22] State Law

[23] Statistics Prepared for Litigation

[24] Summary Judgment Motions

[25] Surveys and Opinion Polls

[a] Intellectual Property Cases

[b] Surveys and Opinion Polls -- Miscellaneous Cases

[26] Trial Evidence, Hypothetical Questions, and Testimony of Other Witnesses as a Basis

[27] Underlying Data

[28] Unreasonable Reliance

[a] Civil Cases

[b] Unreasonable Reliance -- Criminal Cases

[29] Valuation of Property

703.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] 2000 Amendment Committee Note

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 703 RULE 703

1-703 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 703.01

703.01 Official Text

Rule 703. Bases of Opinion Testimony by Experts

The facts or data in the particular case upon which an expert bases an opinion or inference may be those perceived by or made known to the expert at or before the hearing. If of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the particular field in forming opinions or inferences upon the subject, the facts or data need not be admissible in evidence in order for the opinion or inference to be admitted. Facts or data that are otherwise inadmissible shall not be disclosed to the jury by the proponent of the opinion or inference unless the court determines that their probative value in assisting the jury to evaluate the expert's opinion substantially outweighs their prejudicial effect.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 703 RULE 703

1-703 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 703.02

703.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Common-law Rule on Expert Reliance on Inadmissible Information

At common law, an expert could testify only on the basis of information that was either personally known to the witness or was part of the record. For instance, a physician who examined a patient could testify as to what the physician's observations revealed. Also, an expert could testify in the form of an opinion in response to a hypothetical question. For example, an attorney could assume a theory of the case that was both reasonably supported by the evidence and favorable to the attorney's client and ask the expert whether, on the basis of the assumed facts, a given conclusion could conceivably follow. Finally, the expert could be present at the trial and asked to assume the truth of the testimony elicited and to give an opinion on the basis of that testimony. In some jurisdictions this last method was either not permitted or was confined to cases in which the facts were not disputed. All of the above are now permissible bases for an expert opinion under Rule 703. Also, Rule 703, in conjunction with Rule 705, would seem to permit the third technique even when facts are in dispute. Most importantly, the Rule provides for an additional permissible basis, beyond that sanctioned by the common law: the expert can rely on information not admitted or admissible at trial, so long as it is the kind of information reasonably relied upon by experts in the field.

[2] Rule 703: Departure from the Common Law

The common-law rule was problematic because it ignored the fact that the expert, when acting outside the courtroom, may often rely on information that would not be admissible at a trial. For instance, to diagnose and treat a patient, a psychiatrist may rely in part upon interviews conducted with the patient's friends and relatives. If the psychiatrist is willing to rely on such sources of information to diagnose and treat the patient in real life, it makes no sense at trial to exclude an opinion based on the same sources.

Rule 703 departs from the common law in permitting an expert to form an opinion based on facts or data that are not admissible in evidence. n1 The original Advisory Committee's Note states that the Rule is intended to broaden the basis for expert opinions and to bring the judicial practice into line with the practice of the experts themselves when not in court. In other words, an expert should be allowed to use the same information in Court that he or she would use in real life. n2

The Rule provides that if the facts or data are of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the particular field of expertise, then the expert is permitted to use this information as a basis for her opinion. n3 An example offered by the Advisory Committee is that of a physician who forms a diagnosis based on (1) information from numerous sources, including statements by patients and relatives, and (2) reports and opinions from nurses, technicians, and other doctors. n4

It is also clear under the Federal Rule that a doctor will be able to rely upon medical journals and treatises. A psychiatrist may find the Rule especially useful, since modern psychiatric techniques seem to require consideration of information coming from numerous sources. Even if this information is not admissible, it may provide a proper basis for an expert psychiatric opinion. n5

[3] Judicial Function in Assessing Reasonable Reliance on Inadmissible Information

Under Rule 703, the Trial Judge must determine the reasonable reliance question: whether the expert relies on information that, though inadmissible, is the type of information that other experts in the field reasonably rely upon. n6 If the expert takes into account inadmissible information that other experts would not rely upon, the opinion is subject to exclusion under the Rule. n7

How does the Judge determine whether otherwise inadmissible facts or data are of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in a particular field? Just as a witness's own testimony may establish personal knowledge of an event about which the witness is testifying, it appears that an expert witness should be able to lay a foundation that establishes the reasonableness of relying on the inadmissible evidence. For example, if a psychiatrist is called to testify as to a person's mental condition, and if the psychiatrist indicates that the opinion is based in part on reports by school officials, the psychiatrist should be able also to testify at an admissibility hearing that such reports are ordinarily used and relied upon by other psychiatrists in making psychiatric diagnoses in nonlitigation contexts. Of course, it should be permissible for opposing counsel to introduce evidence to the contrary. The question is, however, whether the testimony from the experts should be dispositive on the issue of reasonable reliance. Does the Judge look solely to the testimony of the experts, or is a broader analysis required?

In Zenith Radio Corp. v. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., 505 F. Supp. 1313 (E.D. Pa. 1980) , rev'd, 723 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1983) , rev'd on other grounds, 475 U.S. 574 (1986) , the District Court, in its third evidence opinion in a massive antitrust case, discussed at length the appropriate use by expert witnesses of the material that the Judge had ruled inadmissible in prior pretrial orders. After tracing the background of the language now found in Rule 703, the Court concluded that the following six factors should be considered in ruling on the reasonable reliance question: n8

(1) The extent to which the opinion is pervaded or dominated by reliance on materials judicially determined to be inadmissible, on grounds of either relevance or trustworthiness;

(2) The extent to which the opinion is dominated or pervaded by reliance upon other untrustworthy materials;

(3) The extent to which the expert's assumptions have been shown to be unsupported, speculative, or demonstrably incorrect;

(4) The extent to which the materials on which the expert relied are within his immediate sphere of expertise, are of a kind customarily relied upon by experts in his field in forming opinions or inferences on that subject, and are not used only for litigation purposes;

(5) The extent to which the expert acknowledges the questionable reliability of the underlying information, thus indicating that he has taken that factor into consideration in forming his opinion;

(6) The extent to which reliance on certain materials, even if otherwise reasonable, may be unreasonable in the peculiar circumstances of the case.

The Court offered an example:

> We add that if, for example, an inadmissible document were one of a myriad of sources consulted by an expert, and if it were clear that the expert was cognizant of and took into consideration the questionability of that lone source, the opinion would likely be admissible. If, on the other hand, the expert's opinion is so dominated or pervaded by his reliance on materials which have been excluded for reasons which bear on their reliability, or is rife with similarly unreliable unsupported conclusions, having no support in the record, that opinion must also be excluded. In short, it is a balancing process. n9

The Court of Appeals reversed most of the summary judgment entered by the District Court. The Court disagreed with the Trial Judge's approach to expert witnesses. It reasoned that the proper inquiry is not what the Court deems reliable, but what experts in the relevant discipline deem it to be, and a majority found that the Trial Judge's standard was wrong as a matter of law.

We believe that the Trial Judge in Japanese Electronics recognized something that the Court of Appeals missed, i.e., experts may rely on data for some purposes without making any claim that the data are very accurate. Experts may have no choice in some instances but to rely on the best information that they can get. Yet, they might also concede that the information should be relied on for some purposes and not for others. The questions the Trial Judge asked were designed to discover whether the data upon which the experts wanted to rely in this particular case were data that the experts would rely upon in other settings in which they might be called upon to make important decisions outside of the courtroom venue. If the experts would not rely on the data in these other settings, then we question whether a Court should allow the expert to testify in reliance on such data. After all, the Rule says that the information must be that which is reasonably relied upon by experts in the field, and reasonableness depends on the circumstances.

We note that the interventionist view of the Trial Judge in Japanese Electronics receives substantial support from the Supreme Court's decision in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993) (see the discussion § 702.02[5]). The Court in Daubert emphasized the Trial Judge's essential role as a gatekeeper whose duty it is to assure that expert testimony is reliable. Because the basis of the expert's testimony is an essential component of its reliability, it follows that the Trial Judge cannot simply assess reasonable reliance on inadmissible information under Rule 703 by deferring completely to experts. Daubert gives the Trial Judge an independent role that cannot be delegated. Consequently, the Third Circuit has held after Daubert that the holding in Japanese Products to the effect that the principal arbiters of the reasonableness of reliance upon inadmissible evidence are the experts and not the Trial Judge does not survive Daubert. The Court explained as follows:

> Daubert makes clear for the first time at the Supreme Court level that courts have to play a gatekeeping role with regard to experts. In stating that Rule 702 is the primary locus of the gatekeeping role, the Court implies that there are at least some secondary loci in other Rules. By requiring the judge to look to the views of other experts rather than allowing the judge to exercise independent judgment, current Third Circuit case law eviscerates the judge's gatekeeping role with respect to an expert's data and instead gives that role to other experts. ... We now make clear that it is the judge who makes the determination of reasonable reliance, and that for the judge to make the factual determination under Rule 104(a) that an expert is basing his or her opinion on a type of data reasonably relied upon by experts, the judge must conduct an independent evaluation into reasonableness. The judge can of course take into account the particular expert's opinion that experts reasonably rely on that type of data, as well as the opinions of other experts as to its reliability, but the judge can also take into account other factors he or she deems relevant. n10

[4] Backdoor Hearsay and the 2000 Amendment to Rule 703

Rule 703 permits an expert to rely on inadmissible information, such as hearsay, if it is the type of information on which other experts in the field would reasonably rely. Rule 703 is not a hearsay exception, however. Simply because an expert reasonably relies on hearsay does not make it admissible for its truth. n11 The expert's opinion is distinguishable from the information upon which the expert relied. Yet if an expert reasonably relies on the hearsay, the information is admissible in a certain sense -- it is admissible to assist the factfinder in weighing the expert's testimony. That is, the hearsay is admissible for credibility purposes.

A danger arises when a proponent calls an expert who relies on hearsay, and introduces the hearsay "solely for the purpose of assisting the jury in evaluating the expert's testimony." The danger is obviously that the credibility tail will wag the hearsay dog. A proponent might even call an expert solely to admit the hearsay information on which the expert "relied." Thus, there is a danger that Rule 703 could be used as a backdoor hearsay exception.

The 2000 amendment to Rule 703 is intended to prevent a party from abusing the hearsay rule and other exclusionary rules by using an expert as a conduit for inadmissible evidence. (One member of the Standing Committee on Rule of Practice and Procedure lamented that the Advisory Committee was "trying to take all the fun out of practicing law.") The Rule provides that if the information is admissible only to illustrate the basis for an expert's opinion, then the jury can hear it only if its probative value substantially outweighs the risk of prejudice. This is an exclusionary balancing test that is the reverse of the standard Rule 403 balancing test. The probative value to be assessed is the degree to which the otherwise inadmissible information will assist the jury in assessing the weight of the expert's opinion; of course, this probative value will rise or fall depending on how important the expert's opinion is in the case. The prejudicial effect to be considered is the risk that the jury will consider the otherwise inadmissible information for its truth, even though instructed not to do so.

The amendment comes with a cost, because in certain cases the jury might have some difficulty assessing the weight of the expert's testimony because the expert will not be permitted to mention with specificity all of the information he relied upon. The Advisory Committee determined that such a hindrance of the jury's function will be rare. If the information is critical to assessing the expert's opinion, and if the expert's opinion is sufficiently important to the case, the information will ordinarily survive even the strict balancing test set forth in the amendment. Moreover, the Trial Court has discretion under the balancing test to employ compromise measures. For example, the Trial Court might permit the expert to make a general reference to the underlying information relied upon, while prohibiting a detailed disclosure. An illustration is a medical report that is not admissible; a medical expert might be permitted to state that he relied on a medical report, without being permitted to state in detail all of the assertions in that report. In this way, the jury can fairly assess the expert's opinion without the risk that the medical report will be considered for its truth.

What happens if the witness is not permitted to refer to the inadmissible information on direct examination, and then the adversary attacks the expert's basis on cross-examination? Can the expert then disclose his reliance on the inadmissible information if he could not have done so on direct? The answer depends on the circumstances. The balancing test set forth in the amendment is certainly flexible enough to accommodate this situation. And clearly the balancing test would be tilted more toward allowing disclosure of the inadmissible information if it was necessary to respond to an attack on the expert's basis. Similarly, if the adversary makes a closing argument about the insufficiency of the expert's basis, the proponent should ordinarily be permitted to respond by disclosing the inadmissible information relied upon by the expert.

It is critical to note that the amendment does not in any way affect the admissibility of the expert opinion itself. It does not provide new limits on the kind of information that the expert may rely upon. It simply regulates whether the information (assuming it is admissible only to illustrate the expert's opinion) can be disclosed to the jury. It is also important to emphasize that the amendment does not impose a balancing requirement on information relied upon by an expert that is admissible at trial but not yet admitted. For example, a summary expert could testify in an early part of the case and disclose the information relied upon that will be admitted later at trial. Such a practice is not an abuse -- the expert is not being called to provide a conduit to admit evidence that would otherwise be inadmissible. Thus, the balancing test applies only to information that will never be admitted for its truth at the trial.

A number of public commentators saw negative consequences from the application of the balancing test set forth in the amendment to Evidence Rule 703. The scenario of asserted negative consequences proceeds as follows: (1) The expert will be unable to disclose his basis and will thus be forced to limit his testimony to a bare conclusion, an ipse dixit, as the comments put it. (2) The opponent will be permitted to attack the expert's basis as inadequate, creating an unfair presentation of the evidence. (3) The proponent will then be permitted, in rebuttal, to disclose the basis that was not allowed to be disclosed on direct. The complaint is that this procedure gets you right back where you started from -- the jury hearing about inadmissible evidence -- but with the proponent having suffered a negative inference from not having disclosed the information on direct (i.e., the jury could think that the proponent was hiding something).

The Advisory Committee believed that these criticisms overstated the impact of the amendment. The amendment does not preclude the proponent from disclosing, on direct examination, inadmissible information relied upon by the expert. It simply sets forth a balancing test. Sometimes the probative value of the underlying information, in helping the jury to weigh the expert's opinion, will substantially outweigh the prejudice resulting from disclosure, especially when a limiting instruction is given to reduce the risk of prejudice. Sometimes the expert may be permitted to disclose some pieces of inadmissible information and not others. Sometimes, as recognized in the Committee Note, the expert will be permitted to refer generally to inadmissible information, but will not be able to disclose it in detail. Thus, the chance that an expert will be left with an ipse dixit -- no basis disclosed at all -- is remote. The chance of a Court applying a balancing test to preclude the disclosure of every part of the basis of an expert's testimony, but then letting the expert testify, seems very slim. Indeed, if an expert is left with a bare conclusion, that would be a good indication that the expert should not be testifying in the first place. Such an expert would have to be relying exclusively on inadmissible information, not reliable enough to be admitted under a hearsay exception. It is hard to see how any expert in those circumstances could expect to satisfy the reliability test imposed by Daubert.

As to the ability of the opponent to attack the expert's basis even though the proponent was not permitted to introduce the basis, this seeming disparity is in fact consistent with the structure of most of the exclusionary rules in the Federal Rules of Evidence. It is often the case that opponents make arguments that might take advantage of some exclusionary rule. Defendants in product liability cases are permitted to argue that a product was not defectively designed, by taking protection from the rules on subsequent remedial measures. Criminal defendants are allowed to bring in character evidence, whereas the prosecution cannot do so in its direct case. These exclusionary rules are based on the premise that the proponent could prejudice the trial by bringing in such evidence. There are two safeguards against exploitation of these Evidence Rules by opponents. First, if the opponent takes advantage of the exclusionary rule, the door is opened to rebuttal evidence that could not have been brought out on direct. Thus, if a product liability defendant claims that a design change was not feasible, a subsequent design change could be brought up in rebuttal. And a criminal defendant who testifies that he never did drugs could be impeached by a drug conviction that was initially excluded. Second, proponents can be permitted in certain circumstances and in the discretion of the Trial Court to bring out otherwise excluded evidence on direct, in order to respond in advance to an anticipated attack. For example, the prosecution can ordinarily bring out on direct examination that a witness has cut a deal. See the discussion in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 403, § 403.02[8].

All of these standard considerations are encompassed within the balancing test set forth in the amendment to Rule 703. For example, a Trial Judge could rule in some cases that inadmissible information relied upon by an expert could be disclosed on direct when it is apparent that the opponent will attack the witness's basis on cross-examination; under these circumstances, the probative value of disclosure could substantially outweigh the prejudicial effect remaining after a limiting instruction. It would depend on the circumstances. But even if the Trial Court does not permit the mention of the inadmissible information on direct, the opponent will have to be careful in attacking the expert's basis on cross-examination, because of the possibility of rebuttal. Often, the opponent may consider that the risks of an attack are too great (i.e., the inadmissible information will be disclosed in rebuttal), and in these cases the risk of a skewed presentation of the evidence is accordingly diminished -- that risk is diminished by the opponent's concern that the rebuttal will lose the proponent more points than the attack will gain.

It is true that the balancing test in the amendment is tilted toward prevention of disclosure of inadmissible information. Thus, the chances of a bare-bones conclusion on direct, an attack on cross-examination, and disclosure of inadmissible information in rebuttal are greater than they are under the Rule 403 balancing test. But that greater chance was considered acceptable, given the real risk that the proponent might simply be using the expert as a vehicle for obtaining backdoor admission of inadmissible evidence. Where that risk is high in the particular circumstances, the amendment essentially shifts some of the control over the disclosure from the proponent to the opponent. That shift was considered fair because it is the proponent who is creating the risk of using Rule 703 as a backdoor.

There are not many reported cases on the effect of the amendment to Rule 703. But the cases that are reported indicate that the amendment is working as intended -- it is preventing experts from being used as conduits for inadmissible hearsay. n12

[5] Relationship to Rule 702

The reasonable reliance requirement of Rule 703 is a relatively narrow inquiry -- much narrower, for example, than is the inquiry into whether the expert's opinion is helpful and reliable under Rule 702. While an opinion unreasonably based on inadmissible information is also unhelpful, we believe that it avoids confusion to consider the two Rules separately. Rule 703 regulates the expert's use of inadmissible information, while Rule 702 regulates the methodology, reliability, adequacy of basis, and helpfulness of the opinion, as well as the qualification of the expert witness.

In our view, the proper delineation between the two Rules was set forth in DeLuca v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 911 F.2d 941 (3d Cir. 1990) . DeLuca was a Bendectin case in which the plaintiff proffered expert testimony that Bendectin caused limb reduction in fetuses. The Trial Judge rejected the proffered testimony of the plaintiff's expert on the ground that the expert's recalculation of epidemiological studies was not accepted as reliable by experts in the field. The Judge relied on Rule 703. But the Third Circuit reversed and remanded, noting that Rule 703 has a narrow function; it seeks to delimit the type of information that an expert can rely upon. The Court concluded that Rule 703 would be satisfied if the epidemiological studies used as a basis for the expert's opinions were the same as those used by all other experts in the field, including the defendant's experts. The defendant's objection that the expert's reanalysis of those studies was unreliable could not be considered under Rule 703:

> Rule 703 is satisfied once there is a showing that an expert's testimony is based on the type of data a reasonable expert in the field would use. ... It does not address the reliability or general acceptance of an expert's methodology. When a statistician refers to a study as not statistically significant, he is not making a statement about the reliability of the data used, rather he is making a statement about the propriety of drawing a particular inference from that data.

This did not necessarily mean that the plaintiff's expert's reanalysis of epidemiological data was admissible. The DeLuca Court noted that if an expert's methodology is itself unreliable, the testimony can be excluded under Rule 702, even if the basis of the expert's opinion satisfied the reasonable reliance standard of Rule 703. The Court explained that the helpfulness standard of Rule 702 prevents an expert from using accepted data in an unreliable manner.

The distinction between Rule 703, which regulates the expert's use of inadmissible information, and Rule 702, which more broadly regulates the helpfulness, adequacy of basis, and reliability of the expert opinion, was also made by the Supreme Court in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993) . The Court held that the reliability of scientific expert testimony was governed by a flexible test under Rule 702. The Court further stated that > a judge assessing a proffer of expert scientific testimony under Rule 702 should also be mindful of other applicable rules. Rule 703 provides that expert opinions based on otherwise inadmissible hearsay are to be admitted only if the facts or data are of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the particular field in forming opinions or inferences upon the subject.

The distinction between Rule 703's regulation of inadmissible information and Rule 702's regulation of adequacy of basis and reliability is further clarified in the 2000 amendment to Rule 702. The amendment specifically states that under Rule 702, the Trial Court must find that the expert is relying on "sufficient facts or data." Thus, the question of adequacy of basis -- what lawyers and Courts call the "foundation requirement" -- is now specifically located in Rule 702. Rule 703 is left to regulate the quality of information relied upon by the expert.

The Advisory Committee Note to Rule 702 drives this point home. It states as follows:

> There has been some confusion over the relationship between Rules 702 and 703. The amendment makes clear that the sufficiency of the basis of an expert's testimony is to be decided under Rule 702. Rule 702 sets forth the overarching requirement of reliability, and an analysis of the sufficiency of the expert's basis cannot be divorced from the ultimate reliability of the expert's opinion. In contrast, the "reasonable reliance" requirement of Rule 703 is a relatively narrow inquiry. When an expert relies on inadmissible information, Rule 703 requires the trial court to determine whether that information is of a type reasonably relied on by other experts in the field. If so, the expert can rely on the information in reaching an opinion. However, the question whether the expert is relying on a sufficient basis of information -- whether admissible information or not -- is governed by the requirements of Rule 702.

We recognize that the result will often be the same no matter what Rule the Court employs. n13 But we believe that a Trial Judge's review of expert testimony will be clarified if the questions of use of inadmissible information (Rule 703) and methodology, adequacy of basis, and reliability (Rule 702) are kept separate, at least initially. As the Third Circuit recognized in In re Paoli R.R. Yard Litig., 35 F.3d 717 (3d Cir. 1994) , Rules 702 and 703 are not redundant. For example:

> There will be times when an expert's methodology is generally reliable but some of the underlying data is not of a type reasonably relied on by experts. In those cases, the expert can testify so long as he or she does not significantly rely on the unreliable data, and so long as his or her testimony survives Rule 702 without any reliance on the excluded data. Moreover, if the judge thinks that the expert would reach a different conclusion if he was not able to rely on this data, a conclusion that would no longer help the plaintiff (or defendant) to prove his or her case, the district court can exclude his opinion as irrelevant.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., Trepel v. Roadway Express, Inc., 194 F.3d 708 (6th Cir. 1999) (appraiser permitted to rely on hearsay statements concerning the value of comparable property, because experts in the field reasonably rely on such statements); South Cent. Petr., Inc. v. Long Bros. Oil Co., 974 F.2d 1015 (8th Cir. 1992) (finding no abuse of discretion when an expert in a mineral rights case was permitted to make revenue projections based on multiple hearsay about the oil well in question, as the underlying information was reasonably relied on by experts in the field and only the expert's opinion, not the underlying information, was admitted into evidence).

(n2)Footnote 2. See Carlson, Getting a Grip on Experts, 16 Litig. 36 (1990) (under Rule 703 experts testifying in Court may offer opinions that are based upon information they typically use in their daily work).

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., Ratliff v. Schiber Truck Co., 150 F.3d 949 (8th Cir. 1998) (accidentologist could rely on trooper's report on an accident, as this was a "document of the type reasonably relied upon by accident reconstructionists in forming their opinions"); United States v. Maddix, 96 F.3d 311 (8th Cir. 1996) (in a felon-firearm prosecution, an ATF agent testified as an expert that the revolver found on the defendant had been manufactured in California, then shipped to dealers in Arkansas, and eventually sold in Missouri; while the opinion was based on hearsay, the witness testified that firearms experts customarily rely upon tracking reports to determine whether firearms have been transported across state lines; thus, the report was properly considered as part of the basis of the expert's opinion); United States v. Theodoropoulos, 866 F.2d 587 (3d Cir. 1989) (an expert can base testimony respecting coded language in a narcotics conspiracy on transcripts not admitted into evidence; such transcripts would be relied upon by other experts in the field, and Rule 703 expands the permissible bases of expert opinion from traditional practice).

(n4)Footnote 4. See also United States v. Posey, 647 F.2d 1048 (10th Cir. 1981) (in a drug prosecution, it was permissible for one chemist to rely upon tests run by another in testifying that the tested substance was cocaine: "It is quite reasonable for a chemist to review another chemist's analysis when forming an opinion as to the veracity of the latter's test results.").

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., United States v. Bramlet, 820 F.2d 851 (7th Cir. 1987) (a psychiatrist can base testimony on recorded observations of hospital staff members; though inadmissible hearsay, it was the type of information that other psychiatrists would rely upon).

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., Slaughter v. Southern Talc Co., 919 F.2d 304 (5th Cir. 1990) (it was a violation of Rule 703 where the experts relied on sloppily compiled workplace questionnaires prepared in anticipation of litigation, as experts in the field would not reasonably rely on this information); Lynch v. Merrell-National Labs., 830 F.2d 1190 (1st Cir. 1987) (expert testimony inadmissible where it is based on animal studies that would not be considered by other experts in the field); In re Agent Orange Prod. Liab. Litig., 611 F. Supp. 1223 (E.D.N.Y. 1985) (expert opinion cannot be based upon patient checklists made in anticipation of litigation, because reputable physicians do not rely on such checklists to treat patients).

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., Redman v. John D. Brush & Co., 111 F.3d 1174 (4th Cir. 1997) (a metallurgic engineer's testimony that a safe was not burglar-deterrent was properly excluded; the expert relied solely on hearsay information from store personnel to identify a standard of burglar protection capacity; experts would not rely on this hearsay as an indication of industry safety standards); Gong v. Hirsch, 913 F.2d 1269 (7th Cir. 1990) (a doctor cannot reasonably rely upon a letter written by a nontreating physician that the plaintiff was suffering from an ulcer caused by a certain drug; the letter was written for purpose of obtaining benefits, and itself gave no basis for its conclusions; such a letter would not be relied upon by other experts).

(n8)Footnote 8. See also Shatkin v. McDonnell Douglas Corp., 565 F. Supp. 93 (S.D.N.Y. 1983) (The Court also has a duty to inquire into the trustworthiness of the underlying data and can exclude testimony where an expert has not reasonably based his opinion on trustworthy underpinnings.).

(n9)Footnote 9. See also Renaud v. Martin Marietta Corp., 972 F.2d 304 (10th Cir. 1992) (the Trial Judge is required by Rule 104(a) to make a preliminary determination regarding the trustworthiness of the factual basis on which an expert witness relies).

(n10)Footnote 10. In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litig., 35 F.3d 717 (3d Cir. 1994) . Ironically, Judge Becker, who was the District Court Judge in Japanese Electronics, wrote the opinion for the Court of Appeals in Paoli.

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., Peabody Coal Co. v. Director, Office of Workers' Compensation Programs, 165 F.3d 1126 (7th Cir. 1999) (hearsay information stated in an expert report is not admissible simply because an expert reasonably relied upon it).

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., Turner v. Burlington N.S.F. R.R., 338 F.3d 1058 (9th Cir. 2003) (fire investigator could not disclose the details of the lab report on which he based his opinion; the lab report was not otherwise admissible, and the expert's opinion was simply a restatement of the conclusions and factual data set forth in the lab report).

(n13)Footnote 13. For example, on remand in DeLuca, 791 F. Supp. 1042 (D.N.J. 1992) , the Trial Judge found that the plaintiff's expert's reanalysis of epidemiological data was inadmissible under both Rule 702 and 703. It was inadmissible under Rule 702 because the expert's methodology was different from other scientific disciplines and produced inaccurate and unreliable results. It was inadmissible under Rule 703 because the expert relied on his own data that could not be replicated by any other expert in the field. The Trial Judge stated that "[t]his is where Rules 702 and 703 intersect," and quoted the DeLuca Court to the effect that "[i]f a study's method of data collection is faulty, it may be that no expert would rely upon the data generated as a basis for drawing any inference about the studied subject."

In In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litig., 35 F.3d 717 (3d Cir. 1994) , the Court recognized that there will be times when both Rule 702 and Rule 703 apply, and elaborated as follows:

> For example, expert testimony that uses animal studies must, to be admissible for the purpose of drawing conclusions about humans, meet Rule 702's requirement of fit. This requires the court to assess whether there are good grounds for concluding that the animal studies demonstrate causation in humans. But for an expert to rely on animal studies (if their admissibility in evidence is not independently established), these studies must also meet the requirements of Rule 703: the conclusions of these studies must be data which must be of a type reasonably relied upon by experts to analyze causation in humans. If the expert's reliance on animal studies to draw conclusions about people constitutes a methodological flaw, it is a methodological flaw consisting of relying on data not of a type reasonably relied upon by experts. It would be problematic to conclude that this testimony was reliable enough to meet Rule 702 but not Rule 703 or vice versa. Testimony that is admissible as reliable under one Rule should not be inadmissible under another when the policy considerations underlying the two rules are the same.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 703 RULE 703

1-703 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 703.03

703.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Accountants' Opinions and Conclusions

Bauman v. Centex Corp., 611 F.2d 1115 (5th Cir. 1980) : In a federal securities action with pendent state claims, the Court upheld a decision to admit expert testimony that was based on a review of corporate documents and library research into the background of a company. This was the kind of information that certified public accountants rely upon in evaluating the operation of corporations.

AU Rustproofing Center, Inc. v. Gulf Oil Corp., 755 F.2d 1231 (6th Cir. 1985) : In a dealer's action charging Gulf with breach of contract and fraud, the Court held that an accountant's testimony that the dealer would have survived except for Gulf's breach was properly based on profit margin comparisons between the dealer and two service stations in neighboring towns. It observed that Gulf did not offer evidence to suggest that the comparisons were not the type relied upon by the accounting profession; in fact, Gulf's accounting expert based his opinion on a sample of profit margins for service stations in another set of cities.

Garnac Grain Co. v. Blackley, 932 F.2d 1563 (8th Cir. 1991) : In an action against an accounting firm for malpractice, the Trial Judge excluded an opinion by an expert as unreliable, because it was based only on the more extensive and somewhat contradicting report of an independent accountant brought in to investigate the matter. The Court held that the expert should have been permitted to testify, since the opinion, being based on facts supplied by an independent investigator, crossed the threshold of admissibility and in any event was reaffirmed by a subsequent opinion based on review of underlying work papers.

Paddack v. Dave Christensen, Inc., 745 F.2d 1254 (9th Cir. 1984) : In a suit by trustees of several employee trust funds against affiliated companies for breach of a collective bargaining agreement, the Court reversed and remanded a judgment for the companies because compliance audit reports that were made by an independent accounting firm and offered by the plaintiffs to show the defendants' contribution deficiencies were erroneously excluded. The reports were not business records of the accounting firm because they were not part of a regularly conducted activity and they were inadmissible under Rule 1006 because they relied upon inadmissible hearsay. However, because accountants ordinarily rely on audit reports in reaching opinions, Rule 703 permitted the accountant to base an opinion upon the reports.

[2] Balancing for Otherwise Inadmissible Data

Turner v. Burlington N.S.F. R.R., 338 F.3d 1058 (9th Cir. 2003) : The plaintiffs sued for property damage after a fire beginning on the railroad's right-of-way spread across their land. The defendant's fire investigator took debris samples at the scene and sent them to a lab, which reported that they contained petroleum distillate consistent with gasoline. The investigator was not permitted to give his opinion at trial that the fire resulted from arson, because it was based on the lab report, which was not admitted into evidence. The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs, holding that the witness was not using the report as data on which he reasonably relied in forming an opinion, but rather as the sole substantive evidence for his conclusion that the fire was caused by pouring gasoline on the debris. The Court interpreted the 2000 amendment to Rule 703 to create a presumption against use of underlying data that was otherwise inadmissible, and held that "[t]he prejudice that would result from admission of this evidence was substantial, whereas its probative value was minimal," so there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to admit the investigator's testimony.

[3] Chemical Tests

United States v. Smith, 964 F.2d 1221 (D.C. Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a conviction for drug trafficking, holding that a supervisor was properly permitted to testify that the results set out in the report of the DEA chemist who analyzed the drugs were correct, i.e., consistent with the supporting documentation, regardless of whether the analyzing chemist's report was itself admissible.

United States v. Jones, 687 F.2d 1265 (8th Cir. 1982) : In a prosecution for possession with intent to distribute heroin and cocaine, an expert was permitted to testify that a substance was cocaine by comparing it to a comparison sample that had been furnished by a drug manufacturer. The Court found that the expert could rely on the manufacturer's representation that its substance was cocaine.

United States v. Posey, 647 F.2d 1048 (10th Cir. 1981) : In a drug case, one chemist relied upon tests run by another in testifying that the tests supported the conclusion that the substance analyzed was cocaine. The Court approved, saying that "[i]t is quite reasonable for a chemist to review another chemist's analysis when forming an opinion as to the veracity of the latter's test results."

[4] Constitutional Concerns

Howard v. Walker, 406 F.3d 114 (2d Cir. 2005) : In the state trial of three men for burglary and felony murder, the Judge ruled that if the petitioner attacked through cross-examination the basis for the opinion of an expert testifying to the cause of the victim's death, the prosecution would be permitted to present to the jury all the evidence considered by the expert, including a custodial statement made by a non-testifying coconspirator. As a result of the ruling, the petitioner conducted only a cursory cross-examination of the expert and was convicted of having caused the victim's death. Reversing the denial of habeas corpus, the Court held that permitting the expert to rely on a statement inherently unreliable, and inadmissible under Bruton, was a violation of the petitioner's confrontation rights.

United States v. Abbas, 74 F.3d 506 (4th Cir. 1996) : The Court held there was no confrontation violation where a DEA chemist's results, which relied on "standards" determined by other chemists, were admitted without giving the defendant an opportunity to cross-examine the other chemists. The standards used were generally accepted in the field of qualitative chemical analysis and admissible under Rule 703, and the defendant had an opportunity to counter the standards evidence by proffering his own expert and by vigorously cross-examining the DEA chemist.

United States v. Mares, 940 F.2d 455 (9th Cir. 1991) : A defendant convicted for possessing heroin argued that his right to confront witnesses was violated by expert testimony by an agent that relied in part on statements made by nontestifying codefendants. He argued that because the statements were inadmissible under the Bruton rule, he was unable to cross-examine the agent as to the basis for his testimony out of a fear that the harmful statements would then be put before the jury. The Court noted that Rule 703 permits expert witnesses to rely on inadmissible evidence in forming an opinion in some circumstances, and commented that the confrontation issue raised was troubling, but held that the defendant had not preserved the issue by assuring an adequate record for review.

[5] Data Made Inadmissible by Statute

Robertson v. Union Pacific R.R., 954 F.2d 1433 (8th Cir. 1992) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant railroad in a personal injury action arising out of an automobile-train collision, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in instructing the plaintiffs' expert witness to disregard information compiled by the state highway department in formulating his opinion regarding the dangerousness of the crossing, as the federal law under which the information was compiled makes it inadmissible in Court and provides that it shall not be considered in any action for damages (see 23 U.S.C. § 409).

[6] Disclosure of Facts to Jury

Hutchinson v. Groskin, 927 F.2d 722 (2d Cir. 1991) : On redirect examination an expert witness for the defendant in a medical malpractice case identified three letters as written by prominent physicians, gave his own opinion as to the plaintiff's prognosis without citing the letters as a part of the basis, and then said his opinion was consistent with that of the three doctors. The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant, holding that the tactic simultaneously conveyed hearsay to the jury and improperly bolstered the witness' credibility.

Lewis v. Rego Co., 757 F.2d 66 (3d Cir. 1985) : The Court vacated a judgment for a manufacturer in a product liability suit arising out of the explosion of a propane cylinder, finding an abuse of discretion in permitting an engineer, who examined a safety release valve on the cylinder and the vessel on which the explosion occurred, to be cross-examined concerning the cause of the explosion, since his opinion was improperly based on a report that had been withdrawn and the cross-examination brought the withdrawn report before the jury.

United States v. Mest, 789 F.2d 1069 (4th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a murder conviction, finding that a videotaped hypnotic session that a psychiatrist conducted with the defendant had been properly excluded. Without deciding whether information obtained in such sessions could be relied upon, the Court held that it was not error to exclude such evidence as an attempt to offer the defendant's version of the events without subjecting him to cross-examination.

Boone v. Moore, 980 F.2d 539 (8th Cir. 1992) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in a civil rights action by an inmate who alleged deprivation of medical treatment, the Court held that a report by an audiologist upon which a testifying doctor relied should not have been admitted into evidence. The error was harmless, however, since the doctor had properly relied upon the report under Rule 703, and no objection was made when he read it to the jury.

United States v. McCollum, 732 F.2d 1419 (9th Cir. 1984) : The Court upheld a conviction for attempted bank robbery, finding it was a proper exercise of discretion to permit a forensic hypnotist to testify as to his opinion that the defendant was acting under the influence of hypnosis when he committed the crime and to show a portion of videotapes of his interviews with the defendant; likewise, there was no abuse of discretion in barring the expert from showing segments of the videotapes in which the defendant purported to have an enhanced memory following hypnosis. The Court reasoned that the defendant essentially tried to put testimony before the jury without being subject to cross-examination and that the Trial Judge reasonably prevented this while letting the expert explain his opinion to the jury.

[7] Economic Data

Advent Systems v. Unisys Corp., 925 F.2d 670 (3d Cir. 1991) : Remanding a contract action between computer software and hardware manufacturers, the Court noted, with respect to the plaintiff's damages expert, that there had been no factual inquiry and finding as to what data experts in the field find reliable, and that it had serious reservations about the validity of expert testimony based on prior predictions of sales for a given period when actual performance data for that same time span are available.

Simpson v. James, 903 F.2d 372 (5th Cir. 1990) : In affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in a diversity legal malpractice action, the Court held that the plaintiff's expert accountant properly relied on an exhibit based on corporate records, even though under state law an expert's opinion may not be admitted if based solely on hearsay of a type on which experts in the field customarily rely.

In re Citric Acid Litig., 191 F.3d 1090 (9th Cir. 1999) : Affirming summary judgment for a manufacturer charged with conspiring with competitors to fix prices and market shares, the Court held that facts stated in an expert report are not admissible simply because the expert relied upon them. The Court quoted from Brooke Group Ltd. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 509 U.S. 209, 242 (1993) : "Expert testimony is useful as a guide to interpreting market facts, but it is not a substitute for them."

American Key Corp. v. Cole Nat'l Corp., 762 F.2d 1569 (11th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the defendants in an antitrust case, finding that an economist's affidavit was insufficient to create a material dispute. The economist relied on information supplied by lay witnesses that the expert did not "verify."

[8] Firearms

United States v. Corey, 207 F.3d 84 (1st Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting an ATF agent to testify that the shotgun at issue had traveled across state lines. Although the agent had relied on conversations with employees of the shotgun's maker in reaching his opinion as to the site of manufacture, he also relied on technical reference manuals commonly consulted by firearms experts, his own knowledge and expertise as a firearms specialist, and the markings on the shotgun.

[9] Fire Investigations

United States v. Gardner, 211 F.3d 1049 (7th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a defendant's convictions arising out of the arson of her business, the Court found no error in permitting a government expert on causation of fires to testify that faulty wiring was not the ignition source and that the burn pattern was consistent with the use of an accelerant. The expert had reviewed 120 photos and three reports from investigators of the fire scene and interviewed people who were at the scene. The Court found that the evidence satisfied Daubert, and that the experts testified that photographs and reports "are the type of materials usually relied on in arson investigations to form an opinion about the cause of the fire," and so were an appropriate basis for the expert opinion.

[10] Government Data

Trull v. Volkswagen of Am., Inc., 187 F.3d 88 (1st Cir. 1999) : In a diversity product liability action arising out of a crash that occurred when the plaintiffs' vehicle slid on ice and collided with another car, the Court found no error when the defendants' experts were permitted to testify about an article concerning the effectiveness of rear seat belt restraints. The study described in the article was based upon data compiled by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration through the Fatal Accident Reporting System. The Court reasoned that the FARS data are reported by a public agency and cited Rule 803(8); it also suggested that the experts could rely upon such data under Rule 703.

[11] Hearsay

United States v. Dukagjini, 326 F.3d 45 (2d Cir. 2003) : Much of the government's evidence in a drug conspiracy case consisted of wiretap interceptions in which conversations "were disguised and ambiguous," so it offered the testimony of a DEA agent to testify about the meaning of various "code words." After holding that parts of the expert's testimony exceeded the limits of Rule 702, the Court concluded it was error for the witness to repeat hearsay in his testimony. Although in United States v. Locascio, 6 F.3d 924 (2d Cir. 1993) , the Court had permitted an expert on the structure of organized crime families to rely upon hearsay statements, in Dukagjini the witness was simply repeating the statements without applying any expertise. The errors were harmless, however. In United States v. Mulder, 273 F.3d 91 (2d Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed extortion convictions based on charges that members of labor coalitions forced contractors to hire members of their coalition. The government called two government officials as experts to testify to the operations and structure of a labor coalition. The Court found no error in the admission of this testimony, rejecting the defendants' argument that the testimony was impermissibly based on hearsay. One expert relied on statements of detectives he supervised, contractors who had been victimized, and informants to form his opinions; each of these sources normally would be relied upon by other experts. Another expert relied on published reports on the construction industry, which was "a normal source of information for an expert."

United States v. Avants, 367 F.3d 433 (5th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for aiding and abetting a racially motivated murder, the Court found no plain error or abuse of discretion in admitting a pathologist's testimony regarding the type of instrumentality that caused the death of the victim. In reaching his opinion, the pathologist had considered preliminary hearing testimony by a participant in the murder, and a statement made by the defendant. The Court reasoned that "[e]xpert witnesses are permitted, of course, to draw on a wide range of sources in forming their opinions." In an action by a bank against sureties that had issued a blanket bond, First Nat'l Bank v. Lustig, 96 F.3d 1554 (5th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed in part a judgment for the bank as to coverage and bad faith. The testimony of an investigator concerning the practices of the bank's loan committee was properly admitted, even though the investigator obtained his knowledge in part by talking with bank officials, since "[e]xperts may rely on hearsay evidence in forming their opinions."

Cummins v. Lyle Indus., 93 F.3d 362 (7th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a manufacturer in a design defect case. It upheld the exclusion of expert testimony regarding the useful life of a "limit switch" used in the defendant's machine, since it was unreasonable to rely on hearsay statements by representatives of the manufacturer, given that the expert could recall neither their names nor the dates of the conversations. In United States v. Lundy, n1

the Court affirmed a conviction for arson and mail fraud, finding that a detective on the Chicago police department bomb squad was properly permitted to testify as to the cause and origin of a fire. Cautioning that "[a]n arson expert cannot testify that he heard from an informant that the defendant torched the building and that thus in his expert opinion the defendant probably set the fire," and that "[d]istrict courts must ensure that expert testimony is in fact expert testimony, not merely opinion given by an expert," the Court found that interviews with witnesses to a fire are a standard investigatory technique and could be used to supplement the detective's own investigation. In United States v. Lawson, n2 the Court stated that "[a]n expert's testimony that was based entirely on hearsay reports, while it might satisfy Rule 703, would nevertheless violate a defendant's constitutional right to confront adverse witnesses"; it upheld the use of a government psychiatric expert who had some contact with the defendant but also relied upon the work of other doctors.

Sphere Drake Ins. PLC v. Trisko, 226 F.3d 951 (8th Cir. 2000) : Insurers sought to disclaim coverage after their insured, a maker and designer of jewelry, found that jewelry he had placed in the trunk of a rental car following a show was missing when he got to the airport to drop off the car. At trial the insured offered testimony from a detective with the local police department, who recounted that two informants had told him that two individuals had been paid $20,000 each to steal the jewelry. The Court noted that the informants' statements would have been hearsay had they been admitted for their truth, but there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the statements as part of the basis for the detective's opinion that the jewelry had been stolen, since he regularly relied on the statements of informants as an investigating officer. In a felon firearm prosecution, United States v. Maddix, n3 an ATF special agent testified as an expert that the revolver found on the defendant had been manufactured in California, then shipped to dealers in Arkansas, and eventually sold in Missouri. The defendant argued that this evidence of interstate transportation was hearsay, because the agent obtained the information from a tracking report. The Court found no error and affirmed the conviction. The agent testified that firearms experts customarily rely upon tracking reports to determine whether firearms have been transported across state lines, so the report was properly considered as part of the basis of the expert's opinion. In Pelster v. Ray, n4 an action by purchasers of a used car with a rolled-back odometer against a dealer and an auto auction through which the car was sold, the plaintiffs offered a state revenue investigator to testify that the odometers of 300 of 350 cars sold through the auction that he checked had been rolled back and that the dealer had been responsible for 204 of those 300 cars. The Court reversed a judgment for the buyers, holding that the investigator's testimony was inadmissible hearsay, since it rested upon out-of-court statements that a particular vehicle had a certain number of miles on the odometer on a given date and another out-of-court statement or document purporting to show a smaller number of miles at a later date. No showing was made that the investigator was an expert or that experts in any field rely upon the sources of information he relied upon.

Turner v. Burlington N.S.F. R.R., 338 F.3d 1058 (9th Cir. 2003) : The plaintiffs sued for property damage after a fire beginning on the railroad's right-of-way spread across their land. The defendant's fire investigator took debris samples at the scene and sent them to a lab, which reported that they contained petroleum distillate consistent with gasoline. The investigator was not permitted to give his opinion at trial that the fire resulted from arson, because it was based on the lab report, which was not admitted into evidence. The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs, holding that the witness was not using the report as data on which he reasonably relied in forming an opinion, but rather as the sole substantive evidence for his conclusion that the fire was caused by pouring gasoline on the debris. In a dispute between Indian tribes over the value of land, Masayesva v. Hale, 118 F.3d 1371 (9th Cir. 1997) , the Navajo tribe challenged the Hopi tribe's expert's testimony as to the value of corn grown on the property. The expert formulated his opinion from what others told him about corn prices. The Court found no error in this reliance, noting that "no statements from third parties were admitted for their truth," and "experts in the field, i.e., appraisers, regularly go to third parties for sales figures, as the Hopi expert did here."

[12] IRS Audits

United States v. Genser, 582 F.2d 292 (3d Cir. 1978) : In an income tax case, the Court approved allowing expert testimony from an IRS special agent concerning the results of IRS audits even though the opinion was partially based upon hearsay, since the agent relied upon audit papers prepared by other IRS agents. This information was of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the field and the defendants had a full opportunity to confront the opinions of the testifying witness and to examine them.

United States v. Brown, 548 F.2d 1194 (5th Cir. 1977) : In a prosecution for advising in the preparation and presentation of 12 fraudulent income tax returns, the Court held it was plain error for an IRS agent to testify that of 160 returns prepared by the defendant, the IRS found overstated itemized deductions in 90-95% of them. The information that the agent testified about was received from taxpayers and from a study of taxpayer records. The Court held that the out-of-court statements made by the 160 taxpayers to the agent were inadmissible hearsay and not admissible under Rule 703 because the agent affirmed as a fact what was not sufficiently known to her personal knowledge.

[13] Judicial Evaluation of Expert's Basis

In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litig., 35 F.3d 717 (3d Cir. 1994) (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 703.02[3]): The Court held that the Trial Judge's gatekeeping role under Daubert means that it is the Judge (rather than other experts, as under prior Circuit law) who determines under Rule 703 what data is reasonably relied upon by expert witnesses. Expert opinions as to reasonable reliance may be considered, but the Judge may also take into account other appropriate factors. In Advent Systems v. Unisys Corp., 925 F.2d 670 (3d Cir. 1991) , the Court remanded a contract action between computer software and hardware manufacturers, noting, with respect to the plaintiff's damages expert, that it had serious reservations about the validity of expert testimony based on prior predictions of sales for a given period when actual performance data for that same time span are available.

Greenwood Utils. Comm'n v. Mississippi Power Co., 751 F.2d 1484 (5th Cir. 1985) : Affirming a summary judgment for the defendant in an antitrust case, the Court indicated that when an expert's opinion is based on inadmissible facts, the Trial Judge should make a threshold factual inquiry to determine whether the facts are reasonably relied upon by experts in the field. It stated that "deference ought to be accorded to the expert's view that experts in his field reasonably rely on such sources of information."

Casillas v. United States Navy, 735 F.2d 338 (9th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a finding that the Navy had not discriminated against the plaintiff in failing to promote him. It concluded that the Trial Judge did not err in discounting the testimony of the plaintiff's statistical expert, where the Navy showed that the expert failed to focus on the appropriate labor pool.

[14] Law Enforcement Information

United States v. Morrison, 531 F.2d 1089 (1st Cir. 1976) : In a prosecution for conducting an illegal gambling business, the Court upheld allowing an FBI gambling expert to testify concerning the results of an analysis of betting slips and records seized from the gambling operation. Although the expert did not perform the calculations himself, he did ascertain the validity of the computations and he did not go beyond the reasonable reliance on the reports of others permitted an expert who customarily relies on such reports.

United States v. Locascio, 6 F.3d 924 (2d Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed RICO convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by experienced FBI agents that relied on hearsay as to such matters as the structure and operating rules of organized crime families and the identification of specific voices heard on tape, as law enforcement agents routinely and reasonably rely upon such hearsay in the course of their duties. The Trial Judge need not make an explicit finding that such underlying sources of information used by the expert are trustworthy.

United States v. Lundy, 809 F.2d 392 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a conviction for arson and mail fraud, finding that a detective on the Chicago police department bomb squad was properly permitted to testify as to the cause and origin of a fire. Cautioning that "[a]n arson expert cannot testify that he heard from an informant that the defendant torched the building and that thus in his expert opinion the defendant probably set the fire," and that "[d]istrict courts must ensure that expert testimony is in fact expert testimony, not merely opinion given by an expert," the Court found that interviews with witnesses to a fire are a standard investigatory technique and could be used to supplement the detective's own investigation.

Ratliff v. Schiber Truck Co., 150 F.3d 949 (8th Cir. 1998) : In a wrongful death action brought after a fatal highway accident, the Trial Judge permitted defense counsel to cross-examine the plaintiff's accidentologist with an accident report prepared by a State Highway Patrol trooper. The trooper's report indicated that the accident could have been avoided if the decedent had not been speeding. The Court found no error and affirmed. Because the trooper's report was a "document of the type reasonably relied upon by accident reconstructionists in forming their opinion," it did not matter whether the trooper himself was an expert. In a felon firearm prosecution, United States v. Maddix, n5 an ATF special agent testified as an expert that the revolver found on the defendant had been manufactured in California, then shipped to dealers in Arkansas, and eventually sold in Missouri. The defendant argued that this evidence of interstate transportation was hearsay, because the agent obtained the information from a tracking report. The Court found no error and affirmed the conviction. The agent testified that firearms experts customarily rely upon tracking reports to determine whether firearms have been transported across state lines, so the report was properly considered as part of the basis of the expert's opinion. In Pelster v. Ray, n6 an action by purchasers of a used car with a rolled-back odometer against a dealer and an auto auction through which the car was sold, the plaintiffs offered a state revenue investigator to testify that the odometers of 300 of 350 cars sold through the auction that he checked had been rolled back and that the dealer had been responsible for 204 of those 300 cars. The Court reversed a judgment for the buyers, holding that the investigator's testimony was inadmissible hearsay, since it rested upon out-of-court statements that a particular vehicle had a certain number of miles on the odometer on a given date and another out-of-court statement or document purporting to show a smaller number of miles at a later date. No showing was made that the investigator was an expert or that experts in any field rely upon the sources of information he relied upon.

United States v. Golden, 532 F.2d 1244 (9th Cir. 1976) : The Court held that a DEA agent's testimony as to the value of heroin was not inadmissible on the ground that it was based in part on information obtained from other narcotics agents familiar with the markets involved; such information was of a type reasonably relied upon by experts determining prevailing prices in clandestine markets.

United States v. Brown, 299 F.3d 1252 (11th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed the cocaine-related convictions, finding no plain error in the admission of testimony by a DEA agent as to drug valuation. The agent had substantial experience investigating narcotics smuggling. Although he had not been assigned to Bermuda, where the defendant was traveling, he relied upon information provided by a DEA agent in another office who had conferred with Bermuda authorities to arrive at an estimated value. The agent testified that he typically relied upon such information in valuing narcotics. Thus, even though it was hearsay, the Court found that the data upon which the agent relied was reasonably relied upon.

[15] Medical Evidence

[a] Malpractice Cases

Ramirez v. Debs-Elias, 407 F.3d 444 (1st Cir. 2005) : Affirming a judgment for the surgeon in a patient's medical malpractice action, the Court held that the defendant's expert properly referred to the published findings of a medical researcher in describing, on the basis of his own expertise, the current state of medical research that supported his testimony. The Court said that the expert could rely upon scholarly literature in the field, because "scholarly literature is information reasonably relied upon by medical experts." In a medical malpractice case, Ricciardi v. Children's Hosp. Med. Center, n7 the Court affirmed a directed verdict for the defendants in a medical malpractice case, upholding a ruling that a doctor's handwritten note stating that aortic cannula had accidentally come out of the patient during an operation could not serve as the basis for an expert opinion. The doctor had no personal knowledge of the event described and could not recall the source of the information, and there was no evidence that doctors in the field would reasonably rely on unattributed material. In Forrestal v. Magendantz, n8 a medical malpractice case, the Court concluded that one standard method of laying the foundation for expert testimony was to show that the testifying doctor based his opinions on review of hospital records, reports of other doctors, and depositions of other doctors

Hutchinson v. Groskin, 927 F.2d 722 (2d Cir. 1991) : On redirect examination an expert witness for the defendant in a medical malpractice case identified three letters as written by prominent physicians, gave his own opinion as to the plaintiff's prognosis without citing the letters as a part of the basis, and then said his opinion was consistent with that of the three doctors. The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant, holding that the tactic simultaneously conveyed hearsay to the jury and improperly bolstered the witness' credibility.

Gong v. Hirsch, 913 F.2d 1269 (7th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a medical malpractice suit, holding that a letter from the patient's physician to a doctor at the medical department of his employer was properly excluded as a basis for the plaintiff's expert's opinion because it was not the type of information reasonably relied on by experts. The letter contained conclusory statements by a doctor who was not the treating physician at the time of the illness in question, the likely source of the information was the plaintiff, and there was no indication the physician had any personal knowledge of the circumstances relating to the condition.

[b] Medical Evidence -- Other Cases

Coleman v. De Minico, 730 F.2d 42 (1st Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a judgment for police officers sued by a plaintiff claiming excessive use of force. It held that an oral surgeon who treated the plaintiff the day after his confrontation with the defendants was properly permitted to offer an opinion as to the cause of the plaintiff's injuries, even though the opinion was somewhat speculative and assumed certain facts not in evidence.

Walker v. Soo Line R.R., 208 F.3d 581 (7th Cir. 2000) : In an FELA action by an employee suing for injuries allegedly sustained when lightning struck a railroad tower, the Trial Judge excluded testimony by the physician who had headed the clinical team that examined and evaluated the plaintiff, on the grounds that the witness was not qualified to testify about post-traumatic stress disorder because she was not a psychiatrist or psychologist and because she relied primarily on the work of a psychologist who had concluded that the plaintiff did not have PTSD. Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court found that exclusion of the physician's testimony was an abuse of discretion because she was qualified to testify about the effect of electrical trauma on the body and she had reasonably relied on information from other professionals, in addition to the psychologist. In United States v. Bramlet, n9 the Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding that a government expert could rely upon observations of hospital staff members in concluding that the defendant was a malingerer attempting to create a false insanity defense. In United States v. Lawson, n10 the Court stated that "[a]n expert's testimony that was based entirely on hearsay reports, while it might satisfy Rule 703, would nevertheless violate a defendant's constitutional right to confront adverse witnesses"; it upheld the use of a government psychiatric expert who had some contact with the defendant but also relied upon the work of other doctors.

Boone v. Moore, 980 F.2d 539 (8th Cir. 1992) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in a civil rights action by an inmate who alleged deprivation of medical treatment, the Court held that a report by an audiologist upon which a testifying doctor relied should not have been admitted into evidence. The error was harmless, however, since the doctor had properly relied upon the report under Rule 703, and no objection was made when he read it to the jury.

State Farm Fire & Cas. Co. v. Estate of Jenner, 856 F.2d 1359 (1988) , vacated on other grounds, 874 F.2d 604 (9th Cir. 1989) : The Court reversed a summary judgment for an insurer that claimed it had no duty to defend or indemnify an insured for damages allegedly caused by his sexual molestation of a child. It held that declarations of two doctors, who had examined the insured's medical records and who had relied upon a consultation with the insured's former therapist, satisfied the reasonable reliance standard.

United States v. Baca, 687 F.2d 1356 (10th Cir. 1982) : The Court, upholding drug convictions, held that a doctor who had not personally examined a defendant could testify as to his competency on the basis of summaries of other doctors' evaluations.

[c] Medical Evidence -- Product Liability and Toxic Tort Cases

Holbrook v. Lykes Bros. S.S. Co., 80 F.3d 777 (3d Cir. 1996) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendants in an action alleging that a seaman's death from mesothelioma was caused by asbestos exposure, holding it was error to exclude testimony by the treating physician because he had relied on pathology reports to confirm his diagnosis. It would run counter to the Rules' liberal policy of admissibility to permit an outside expert hired solely for litigation purposes to rely on and testify about a pathology report, but to exclude testimony by the treating physician who ordered the report and relied on it for life-and-death decisions about the patient's treatment.

Mauldin v. Upjohn Co., 697 F.2d 644 (5th Cir. 1983) : The Court found that a pathologist testifying for the plaintiff in a product liability case properly relied on paraffin blocks containing tissue prepared by another pathologist, where the numbers on the pathology reports were identical to the numbers on the paraffin blocks. Even though the witness could not attest "with absolute certainty" that the tissues were taken from the plaintiff, he could offer sufficient evidence for the trier of fact to find that they were.

Hose v. Chicago N.W. Transp. Co., 70 F.3d 968 (8th Cir. 1995) : A railroad employee sued under the FELA, alleging that he suffered manganese encephalopathy arising from his work as a welder. The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an expert to give a diagnosis based on statements from the plaintiff and his wife regarding his physical symptoms. The opinion clearly had a sufficient factual basis, since in addition to patient history, the doctor relied on laboratory studies of the plaintiff's body and his work clothes, her own clinical examinations of the plaintiff, a series of MRIs, and reports from other doctors.

Schudel v. General Elec. Co., 120 F.3d 991 (9th Cir. 1997) : In a toxic exposure case arising at an industrial plant, the Court reversed a plaintiffs' judgment on Daubert grounds, but ruled that toxicological experts could rely upon interview data collected by the plaintiffs. The interviewer contacted many of the workers at the plant and discovered that some of them, including the plaintiffs, suffered from various medical symptoms. Two experts stated that toxicologists consider such interviews reliable, and the Court agreed that the Trial Judge properly exercised discretion to permit the experts to rely on the data.

Renaud v. Martin Marietta Corp., 972 F.2d 304 (10th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the defendants in an action alleging injuries from a contaminated water supply, holding that a single water sample taken from a wastewater pond two years after the plaintiffs had last received water from the water supply was an insufficient basis for an expert opinion on causation.

[d] Medical Evidence -- Scientific Basis

Ealy v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 897 F.2d 1159 (D.C. Cir. 1990) : A plaintiff's judgment in a product liability action seeking recovery for a child's birth defects allegedly caused by the mother's use of a drug (Bendectin) during pregnancy was reversed because the plaintiff's principal expert had been erroneously permitted to give an opinion regarding causation, even though none of the wealth of epidemiological data available concluded that the drug causes birth defects. The Court said this was not a question of novel causation theory but rather a lack of an adequate foundation. In Ambrosini v. Labarraque, n11 a suit for birth defects allegedly caused by Depo-Provera, the Court reversed a summary judgment granted to the defendants on the ground that the plaintiffs' experts had failed to provide an adequate scientific basis for their causation opinions. The Court found that no effort had been made to determine whether the basis of the opinions stated in the experts' affidavits was acceptable under Rule 703, and distinguished Ealy on the ground that the expert there had acknowledged that the data underlying his opinion was not of a type reasonably relied on by experts in the field. In Mendes-Silva v. United States, n12 the Court relied upon Ambrosini to reverse a summary judgment for the U.S. Public Health Service in a suit alleging that administration of a vaccine caused the plaintiff's encephalomyelitis. It reasoned that "[w]hen the underlying basis or methods of an expert's opinion are of a type reasonably relied upon by the experts in the field, the court must allow the opinion to be assessed by the factfinder -- even if the opinion reaches a novel conclusion."

Lynch v. Merrell-Nat'l Labs., 830 F.2d 1190 (1st Cir. 1987) : Affirming a manufacturer's summary judgment in a suit alleging that a drug caused birth defects, the Court held scientific studies of the drug that focused on animals and "analogous" chemicals did not provide a sufficient basis for an expert opinion that the drug caused birth defects in human beings, in the absence of any confirmatory epidemiological data.

In re "Agent Orange" Prod. Liab. Litig., 818 F.2d 187 (2d Cir. 1987) , aff'g 611 F. Supp. 1223 (E.D.N.Y. 1985) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for manufacturers of a herbicide in a suit by Vietnam veterans and members of their families, reasoning that the plaintiffs had failed to offer evidence that the defendants knew that Agent Orange posed a hazard of which the government was unaware. The Court stated that the existence of a "hazard must be based on a substantial body of scientific evidence" and that "[t]he hazard cannot be established by mere speculation or idiosyncratic opinion, even if that opinion is held by one who qualifies as an expert under Rule 702." The Trial Judge had held that expert opinions concerning a causal relationship between the herbicide and the plaintiffs' injuries would be inadmissible because they were not based upon facts or data upon which experts in the field ordinarily rely.

DeLuca v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 911 F.2d 941 (3d Cir. 1990) : The Trial Judge granted a summary judgment for the defendant in an action for birth defects allegedly caused by Bendectin on the ground that all relevant epidemiological studies had found no statistically significant link between the drug and birth defects. Reversing, the Court held that an affidavit by an expert in pediatric pharmacology reanalyzing the data for the plaintiff should not have been excluded under Rule 703, which refers only to whether the data would be relied on, not to whether others would reach the same conclusions based on the data. On remand, the Trial Judge granted summary judgment for the defendants, having excluded the expert's testimony because of its novel and unreliable methodology and its potential for confusing and misleading a jury. n13

Lima v. United States,708 F.2d 502 (10th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed dismissal of a swine flu vaccination case, finding no error in allowing the plaintiff's expert in epidemiology to testify and then subsequently striking his testimony on the grounds that the data relied on was inadmissible hearsay and not the kind reasonably relied upon by similar experts. In Marsee v. United States Tobacco Co., n14 a product liability suit on behalf of a user of snuff who contracted cancer, the Court held that epidemiological studies conducted among populations in Asia that were directed toward discovering any link between chewing of smokeless tobacco and cancer would be admitted in connection with an expert's opinion. The studies examined the chewing or dipping of substances that contained smokeless tobacco, and any differences were taken into account in conclusions reached in the studies.

[16] Other Expert's Opinion

Dura Automotive Sys. v. CTS Corp., 285 F.3d 609 (7th Cir. 2002) : In this action to determine responsibility for a CERCLA cleanup of a well field, the Court found there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony from a hydrogeologist on the grounds that he was essentially being used as the "mouthpiece" for groundwater-flow modelers on whose mathematical models he relied and that there had not been timely disclosure allowing determination of the reliability of the models. One Judge dissented, contending that the majority had created a new rule that would require cautious parties "to engage in something like an infinite regression of the naming of experts," and that the line between experts who exercise significant discretion (who must be produced) and experts whose work is ministerial (who do not) was unworkable. In In re James Wilson Assoc., 965 F.2d 160 (7th Cir. 1992) , a creditor attempted to show the condition of a building involved in a bankruptcy proceeding through its expert witness, an architect, recounting statements of a consulting engineer retained by the architect. The Court held the evidence was properly excluded, as the architect would only be the engineer's spokesman, not offering an opinion within his own domain of expertise.

Arkwright Mut. Ins. Co. v. Gwinner Oil, Inc., 125 F.3d 1176 (8th Cir. 1997) : In a property insurers' subrogation action arising out of a propane explosion, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting an expert's opinion based in part on a report by an expert consultant who had investigated the accident but who had died before trial. The report was of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the field; in any event, the testifying expert had also relied on his own extensive experience and his own investigation of the physical evidence.

United States v. Floyd, 281 F.3d 1346 (11th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a conviction for being a felon in possession of ammunition, the Court found no error in permitting a government expert to testify to the interstate nexus of the ammunition. The expert relied in part on advice given by a technical advisor for the Association of Firearm and Tool Mark Examiners, which he testified was advice of the type reasonably relied upon by experts in the field. The Court noted that the advice was only part of his basis, since he examined the ammunition, consulted a catalog prepared by the maker of the ammunition and then, to verify the information he had obtained, he contacted the technical advisor.

[17] Personal Knowledge Not Required

Sementilli v. Trinidad Corp., 155 F.3d 1130 (9th Cir. 1998) : Sementilli was injured while working as a seaman. The shipping company settled with Sementilli and then brought an indemnity action against the doctor who certified Sementilli as fit to be a seaman. Reversing summary judgment for the doctor, the Court held it was error to exclude the testimony of the medical expert proffered by the company that Sementilli was unfit for sea duty on the ground that he had not personally examined Sementilli and was not there when the accident occurred. The Court noted that an expert need not have personal knowledge, and that the expert relied on medical records, which was permissible under Rule 703.

[18] Psychiatric and Psychological Evidence

United States v. Johnson, 956 F.2d 894 (9th Cir. 1992) , supplemented, 969 F.2d 849 (9th Cir. 1992) : A defendant convicted for drug offenses committed while in a ring run by a violent drug lord argued on appeal that she should have been permitted to cross-examine or call as her own witness a psychologist who gave testimony on battered women's syndrome in support of a codefendant's duress defense. The Court held there was no right to cross-examine, as the witness did not testify against the defendant, and there was no foundation for the expert to give testimony on behalf of the defendant, having only observed her testify at trial and not having conducted any interviews that are essential for a diagnosis.

[19] Reasonable Reliance on Data

[a] Civil Cases

American Universal Ins. Co. v. Falzone, 644 F.2d 65 (1st Cir. 1981) : The Court said: "[I]t is reasonable for one state fire marshal to rely on the contemporaneous and on-the-scene opinions of other investigators on his team as to the portion of the investigation that they carried out within their competence."

Stevens v. Cessna Aircraft Co., 634 F. Supp. 137 (E.D. Pa. 1986) , aff'd mem., 806 F.2d 254 (3d Cir. 1986) : Denying posttrial motions by a wife who unsuccessfully sued an airplane manufacturer for the death of her husband in a plane crash, the District Court reaffirmed its ruling that an expert in aeronautical medicine was properly permitted to testify concerning the stress the husband was under. His reliance on statements by the husband's friends, coworkers, and professors was typical of experts in his field.

Westfield Ins. Co. v. Harris, 134 F.3d 608 (4th Cir. 1998) : After the defendant's home was destroyed by a suspicious fire, his insurer hired an independent investigation firm to determine the fire's cause and origin. The investigator concluded that the fire had been deliberately set. At the trial of the insurer's declaratory judgment action to disclaim coverage, the insurer presented testimony of a state deputy fire marshal, who gave his opinion that the fire was incendiary. The witness' testimony was struck after he said that his opinion was based roughly 90 percent on what the investigator had discovered. Reversing a judgment for the insured, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the fire marshal's testimony, since the record amply established that the reports and data from the investigator were the type of materials ordinarily relied on by fire marshals in investigating fires, and the fact that both reached the same conclusion was not a legal reason to exclude the opinion. In Wilder Enters. v. Allied Artists Pictures Corp., n15 the Court, reversing an antitrust case on other grounds, said that an expert witness called by the plaintiff should have been permitted to testify concerning contracts covering the usual "splits" received by exhibitors and distributors of films despite absence of knowledge of the local market, since there was no evidence that splits changed according to location. However, the Court approved the exclusion of another expert who would have testified concerning the diminution in value of the plaintiff's real estate when there was no showing that he based his opinion on facts reasonably relied upon by other experts.

Primrose Oper. Co. v. National Am. Ins. Co., 382 F.3d 546 (5th Cir. 2004) : In an action by oil and gas operators who sued their commercial liability insurer for breach of its duty to defend in a landowner's action for pollution, the Court upheld the admission of testimony by a Texas attorney, who had been involved in the pollution suit, as to the reasonableness of the attorneys' fees charged the plaintiffs by two law firms. The Court noted that "[b]ecause trial courts are considered experts as to the reasonableness of attorneys' fees, the district court was properly qualified to conclude that the information upon which Boyer relied was of a type 'reasonably relied on' by such expert witnesses." In an antitrust case, Greenwood Utils. Comm'n v. Mississippi Power Co., n16 the Court affirmed a summary judgment for the defendant, and indicated that when an expert's opinion is based on inadmissible facts, the Trial Judge should make a threshold factual inquiry to determine whether the facts are reasonably relied upon by experts in the field. It stated that "deference ought to be accorded to the expert's view that experts in his field reasonably rely on such sources of information."

Trepel v. Roadway Express, Inc., 194 F.3d 708 (6th Cir. 1999) : To prove the value of a rare wood carving allegedly damaged by the express company's negligence, the plaintiff sought to introduce evidence of a telephone conversation with another collector, who said that she had been offered $2 million and later $2.5 million for her similar carving, and that she would be willing to sell for $3 million if she were offered that much. The Court held that the statements were proffered to prove the collector's belief in the carving's value, not as an offer to sell her carving, and were thus inadmissible hearsay. However, because experts in the field of appraising art such as that involved here frequently rely on evidence of comparable sales, regardless of how the evidence comes to them, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude mention of the collector's statements in the reports of the plaintiff's experts regarding the carving. One Judge dissented in part, on the ground that the collector's statement was not a comparable sale but only an offer and thus was inherently untrustworthy and an unreliable basis for an expert's opinion. In Cravens v. County of Wood, n17 the Court affirmed a judgment against the mother of a motorcyclist who claimed that the County had not placed adequate warning signs near a bridge renovation. It held that expert testimony of a highway patrol officer was admissible on the question of the deceased's speed at the time of the accident, even though the officer had not inspected the accident site or the motorcycle. The officer was entitled to rely upon official accident reports and accompanying photographs. In Mannino v. International Mfg. Co., n18 a design defect suit against the manufacturer of an infant seat, the Trial Judge excluded the testimony of the plaintiff's expert, a bio-medical engineer, largely because he did not believe that the expert could reasonably rely on the data he purported to use in formulating an opinion. The Court reversed, holding that when the expert explained his reliance on the data and there was nothing in the record to show that it was not reasonable, he should have been permitted to testify.

Hurst v. United States, 882 F.2d 306 (8th Cir. 1989) : The plaintiffs alleged that two jetties negligently constructed in a river channel under supervision of the Corps of Engineers had caused severe flooding of their property. The Court held that although a Corps river hydraulics expert who testified as to the cause of the flood had visited the site only once, two years after the flood, his opinion was sufficiently based on review of documents in evidence and hearing testimony of other witnesses, and any weaknesses in the factual underpinnings, which were fully developed in cross-examination, went to weight and not admissibility. In United States v. 1,014.16 Acres, n19 the District Court found that the testimony of a real estate appraiser, a hydrologist, and a forester was properly admitted in a condemnation case despite claims that some experts relied upon the opinions of others. The Judge noted that an expert cannot be expert in every field and that Rule 703 permits reasonable reliance on other expert opinions.

In re Aircrash, 684 F.2d 1301 (9th Cir. 1982) : In a suit by survivors of passengers killed in an airplane crash, the Court found that an expert should have been permitted to rely on the airline's training records concerning its pilot to support his opinion that the pilot was incompetent to fly. The Court emphasized that as long as the training records were of a type reasonably relied upon by aviation experts, it did not matter whether they would have been admitted were no expert present and relying on them.

Kinser v. Gehl Co., 184 F.3d 1259 (10th Cir. 1999) : Affirming a judgment awarding damages to the estate and survivor of a farmer who was killed while operating a baler manufactured by the defendant, the Court held that the Trial

Judge properly permitted the plaintiffs' expert witnesses to rely upon various documents purportedly issued by a manufacturing institute of which the defendant was a member. The Court declared that minutes of meetings and correspondence between members concerning accidents like the one involved in the instant case were "easily characterized as proper bases upon which an expert witness may rely for opinions regarding a manufacturer's knowledge of possible hazards and/or design defects." In a suit alleging that a drug caused birth defects, Wilson v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 893 F.2d 1149 (10th Cir. 1990) , the defendant manufacturer offered evidence that the rate of those sorts of defects had remained constant while sales and new therapy starts of the drug had risen and then declined to zero. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence, reasoning that charts of drug sales and new therapy starts, derived from FDA reports and reports of pharmaceutical companies to independent marketing research firms, and of birth defects reported to the Centers for Disease Control, although hearsay, were reasonably relied upon by birth defect experts. The fact that the charts did not take into account when the drug was actually consumed went to their weight, not their admissibility. In Mullan v. Quickie Aircraft Corp., n20 the Court reversed a judgment for the purchaser of an aircraft kit against the manufacturer and remanded for further proceedings, but it upheld the admission of expert testimony for the plaintiff, which was based in part on the factual portions of National Transportation Safety Board reports. The Court indicated that only the portions of the reports that contain conclusions are inadmissible under 49 U.S.C. § 1441(e), and that there is no reason why an expert cannot reach the same conclusions as those found in a report.

[b] Reasonable Reliance on Data -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Morrison, 531 F.2d 1089 (1st Cir. 1976) : In a prosecution for conducting an illegal gambling business, the Court upheld allowing an FBI gambling expert to testify concerning the results of an analysis of betting slips and records seized from the gambling operation. Although the expert did not perform the calculations himself, he did ascertain the validity of the computations and he did not go beyond the reasonable reliance on the reports of others permitted an expert who customarily relies on such reports.

United States v. Locascio, 6 F.3d 924 (2d Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed RICO convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by experienced FBI agents that relied on hearsay as to such matters as the structure and operating rules of organized crime families and the identification of specific voices heard on tape, as law enforcement agents routinely and reasonably rely upon such hearsay in the course of their duties. The Trial Judge need not make an explicit finding that such underlying sources of information used by the expert are trustworthy.

United States v. Gresham, 118 F.3d 258 (5th Cir. 1997) : The defendant was convicted for possession of an unregistered pipe bomb. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by two ATF agents, based on discussions with the manufacturers and corporate literature and materials maintained by the ATF, that components of the bomb had traveled in interstate commerce. The opinions were based on data reasonably relied upon by experts in the field, even if the sources were not admissible evidence. In United States v. Harper, n21 the Court held that an agent was properly permitted to testify as to the origin of a firearm based on markings on the gun, trade publications, and company catalogs.

United States v. Ware, 914 F.2d 997 (7th Cir. 1990) : In a prosecution for felon firearm possession, the Court held that an expert ATF agent's testimony that a shotgun had been manufactured in another state was properly based on his examination of markings on the gun and his personal research in various publications, trade books, and magazines. In United States v. Bramlet, n22 the Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding that a government expert could rely upon observations of hospital staff members in concluding that the defendant was a malingerer attempting to create a false insanity defense.

United States v. Kail, 804 F.2d 441 (8th Cir. 1986) : In a prosecution for mail fraud involving the sale of coins, the Court held that government experts properly relied upon American Numismatic Society grading standards, once they testified that the standards had industry-wide acceptance and were the chief guide to the current price of rare coins.

United States v. Unruh, 855 F.2d 1363 (9th Cir. 1987) : In a prosecution for misapplication of bank funds, the Court held that a bank examiner was properly permitted to rely, in preparing to testify, upon his notes and a report that he prepared, even though the report itself was not admissible under Rule 803(8)(C). In United States v. Golden, n23 the Court held that a DEA agent's testimony as to the value of heroin was not inadmissible on the ground that it was based in part on information obtained from other narcotics agents familiar with the markets involved; such information was of a type reasonably relied upon by experts determining prevailing prices in clandestine markets.

United States v. Affleck, 776 F.2d 1451 (10th Cir. 1985) : In a prosecution for securities and bankruptcy fraud, the Court upheld the introduction of testimony by an accountant concerning conversations that he had with the defendant's former accountants and employees. This testimony was used to corroborate and supplement the conclusions that the accountant had reached.

United States v. Ramos, 725 F.2d 1322 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a conviction for making a false statement in connection with a passport application, finding that the government's expert was properly permitted to rely upon information she obtained from New York officials in forming an opinion as to the authenticity of a birth certificate.

[20] Relationship to Other Rules

In re "Agent Orange" Prod. Liab. Litig., 818 F.2d 187 (2d Cir. 1987) , aff'g 611 F. Supp. 1223 (E.D.N.Y. 1985) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for manufacturers of a herbicide in a suit by Vietnam veterans and members of their families, reasoning that the plaintiffs had failed to offer evidence that the defendants knew that Agent Orange posed a hazard of which the government was unaware. The Court stated that the existence of a "hazard must be based on a substantial body of scientific evidence" and that "[t]he hazard cannot be established by mere speculation or idiosyncratic opinion, even if that opinion is held by one who qualifies as an expert under Rule 702." The District Court had held that expert opinions concerning a causal relationship between the herbicide and the plaintiffs' injuries would be inadmissible because they were not based upon facts or data on which experts in the field ordinarily rely. The Judge also relied upon Rule 403. In reaching its decision, the District Court ruled that various epidemiological studies by federal, state, and Australian governments would be admissible under Rule 803(8)(C) and those studies conclusively demonstrated that the herbicide did not cause the plaintiffs' injuries.

Holbrook v. Lykes Bros. S.S. Co., 80 F.3d 777 (3d Cir. 1996) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendants in an action alleging that a seaman's death from mesothelioma was caused by asbestos exposure, holding it was error to exclude testimony by the treating physician because he had relied on pathology reports to confirm his diagnosis. Such reliance does not reflect negatively on the expert's qualifications under Rule 702 or on an expert's ability to diagnose.

Nachtsheim v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 847 F.2d 1261 (7th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a manufacturer in an airplane crash case, holding there was no error in excluding expert testimony based in part on another accident, which the Trial Judge had ruled was not similar enough to be proved. Although an expert may rely upon some facts that are not admissible, the Court declined to hold that evidence excluded by another Rule (e.g., 403) always may be used as the basis for expert testimony.

Amarel v. Connell, 102 F.3d 1494 (9th Cir. 1996) , amended (9th Cir. 1997): Reversing in part an antitrust judgment, the Court found error under Rule 1006 in the admission of two summary exhibits. One was a summary of California and Thai rice prices that had been adjusted by the defendants' expert, and the other was a graph prepared by the expert. The defendants had not made available to the plaintiffs all the materials that went into the summary exhibit, including certain raw data. The error was not prejudicial, however, because under Rule 703 the experts could have discussed the information contained in the exhibits even though the exhibits themselves were not admissible. In Claar v. Burlington N. R.R., 29 F.3d 499 (9th Cir. 1994) , an FELA case for alleged chemical exposure, the Trial Judge reviewed the plaintiffs' experts' reasoning and methodology and concluded that they lacked the foundation and reliability necessary to support expert testimony. Affirming summary judgment for the defense, the Court noted that it was error for the Judge to rely on Rule 703 in excluding the experts' opinions, because Rule 703 only permits experts to testify regarding facts of which they have no personal knowledge; it does not deal with the Judge's authority to scrutinize the expert's methodology or reasoning. However, there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the opinions under Rule 702.

Renaud v. Martin Marietta Corp., 972 F.2d 304 (10th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the defendants in an action alleging injuries from a contaminated water supply, holding the Trial Judge was required by Rule 104(a) to make a preliminary determination regarding the trustworthiness of the factual basis on which an expert witness relies. This duty was properly fulfilled by excluding as unsound a causation opinion based on a single water sample taken from a wastewater pond two years after the plaintiffs had last received water from the water supply.

[21] Reliance on Treatises

Zenith Radio Corp. v. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., 723 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1983) , rev'd on other grounds, 475 U.S. 574 (1986) (discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 703.02[3]): In a massive antitrust case, in which the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants conspired to drive them out of the market for television receivers, the Court reversed most of the summary judgment entered by the District Court. The Court observed that an expert might rely upon a treatise, such as a foreign language publication, that might not be admissible under the hearsay exception. The expert might adopt portions of the treatise as part of his own testimony.

[22] State Law

Simpson v. James, 903 F.2d 372 (5th Cir. 1990) : In affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in a diversity legal malpractice action, the Court held that the plaintiff's expert accountant properly relied on an exhibit based on corporate records, even though under state law an expert's opinion may not be admitted if based solely on hearsay of a type on which experts in the field customarily rely.

[23] Statistics Prepared for Litigation

Soden v. Freightliner Corp., 714 F.2d 498 (5th Cir. 1983) : Affirming a product liability judgment against the manufacturer of a truck with an unreasonably dangerous fuel system, the Court upheld the exclusion of statistics and charts that were offered in connection with an expert witness' testimony. The statistics were prepared in anticipation of litigation from information supplied by a sister company; they were not part of a published study; they were not made available to the plaintiffs before trial; there was little to indicate exactly how the statistics were derived; and there was a question as to whether the statistics even covered accidents in which postcrash fires resulted, as opposed to accidents caused by fire. Thus, the statistics were insufficiently trustworthy to be relied upon by an expert and the charts that summarized the statistics were also properly excluded.

[24] Summary Judgment Motions

Ambrosini v. Labarraque, 966 F.2d 1464 (D.C. Cir. 1992) : In a product liability action for birth defects allegedly caused by Depo-Provera, the defendant drug manufacturer had been granted summary judgment on the ground that the plaintiffs' experts' affidavits did not identify the publications, studies, or methodology used in forming causation opinions. The Court reversed, holding that under Rule 705 an expert's affidavit, no matter what the basis, cannot be excluded solely because it fails to disclose the facts or data underlying the opinion, and that a determination of the affidavits' admissibility under Rule 703 required that the experts first be required to disclose the basis of their opinions. In Mendes-Silva v. United States, 980 F.2d 1482 (D.C. Cir. 1993) , the Court relied upon Ambrosini to reverse a summary judgment for the U.S. Public Health Service in a suit alleging that administration of a vaccine caused the plaintiff's encephalomyelitis. It reasoned that "[w]hen the underlying basis or methods of an expert's opinion are of a type reasonably relied upon by the experts in the field, the court must allow the opinion to be assessed by the factfinder even if the opinion reaches a novel conclusion." In Merit Motors, Inc. v. Chrysler Corp., n24 the Court stated that Rule 703 "was intended to broaden the acceptable basis of expert opinion, but it was not intended ... to make summary judgment impossible whenever a party has produced an expert to support its position." The Trial Judge must decide whether an expert's reliance on extrajudicial data is sufficiently reasonable to warrant reliance on the data; if it is not, the expert's opinion cannot stand in the way of summary judgment.

B.F. Goodrich v. Betkoski, 99 F.3d 505 (2d Cir. 1996) , clarified, 112 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 1997) : In a CERCLA action to recover costs incurred in the cleanup of hazardous substances in landfills, the Court held it was error to grant summary judgment against the plaintiffs after excluding the affidavit of an expert who had written more than 150 scholarly articles and a book dealing with disposal and treatment of hazardous waste. The Court stated that "where the reports used by Dr. Brown are of the sort ordinarily relied on by experts in forming opinions within their field of expertise, the reports need not be admissible at trial ... and need not actually be attached to the affidavit to satisfy Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e)."

In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litig., 916 F.2d 829 (3d Cir. 1990) : In reversing a summary judgment for the defendants in consolidated suits by people working in or living near a railyard for damages resulting from PCB exposure, the Court noted that the plaintiffs were unable to contest the reasonableness of the data and techniques relied on by the defendants' experts because the Trial Judge failed to conduct an in limine hearing and denied oral argument on the evidentiary issues and the related summary judgment motion.

Slaughter v. Southern Talc Co., 919 F.2d 304 (5th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a partial summary judgment for the defendants in an asbestos product liability action, holding that affidavits from the plaintiffs' expert witnesses were properly disregarded, as the reports on which they were based were so sloppily compiled and had so many obvious errors as to be of no value to the trier of fact. Furthermore, the reports, although referenced in the affidavits as exhibits, were never entered as summary judgment evidence. In Washington v. Armstrong World Indus., n25 the Court affirmed summary judgment for manufacturers in a suit by a colon cancer victim's spouse against asbestos manufacturers. It found that the Trial Judge could properly have excluded (and therefore disregarded with respect to the motion) expert testimony that amounted to an opinion that asbestos exposure caused the victim's cancer. The expert had not examined the victim, and he based his entire opinion on reports of examinations of other experts who had examined the victim and reached different conclusions.

Monks v. General Elec. Co., 919 F.2d 1189 (6th Cir. 1990) : Affirming a summary judgment for the defendant in a product liability action, the Court held there was error (but harmless) when an affidavit in opposition by the plaintiff's expert was struck on the ground it did not reveal the bases of his opinion. Although it did not go into extensive detail, the affidavit was more than a bare conclusory allegation and it was by an expert who had familiarized himself with the record.

In re Citric Acid Litig., 191 F.3d 1090 (9th Cir. 1999) : Affirming summary judgment for a manufacturer charged with conspiring with competitors to fix prices and market shares, the Court held that facts stated in an expert report are not admissible simply because the expert relied upon them. The Court quoted from Brooke Group Ltd. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 509 U.S. 209, 242 (1993) : "Expert testimony is useful as a guide to interpreting market facts, but it is not a substitute for them."

[25] Surveys and Opinion Polls

[a] Intellectual Property Cases

Piper Aircraft Corp. v. Wag-Aero, 741 F.2d 925 (7th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a judgment granting an airplane manufacturer a permanent injunction against infringement of the plaintiff's trademark. The Court found that a survey of owners of private planes was properly admitted to show that consumers were likely to assume incorrectly that certain parts and kits were manufactured by the plaintiff. Each owner was shown a copy of the defendant's catalogue and asked what company he believed had manufactured these parts and kits. The Court observed that "[p]laintiff followed the 'commendable procedure' of submitting the survey questions, along with the results of a preliminary survey, to the district court for a ruling in limine on the question of admissibility," and concluded that the survey was properly used even though it was not conducted until three days before trial, after the close of discovery. In rejecting hearsay attacks on the survey, the Court relied upon Rule 803(3) and Rule 703.

Prudential Ins. Co. v. Gibraltar Financial Corp., 694 F.2d 1150 (9th Cir. 1982) : The Court held it was error in a trademark infringement action to exclude a survey offered to prove that 14-31 percent of the public confused the plaintiff's and the defendant's corporate symbols. The Court said that neither reliability nor hearsay objections are sufficient to support rejection of survey evidence. In our view, this statement is overbroad. In trademark infringement cases, properly conducted surveys are likely to produce either nonhearsay responses or statements of belief admissible under Rule 803(3). But in other surveys, respondents may be providing the surveyor with hearsay responses that are inadmissible. Also, the very idea of a properly conducted survey, i.e., one that uses accepted techniques, requires that the data be reasonably relied upon by an expert, so reliability is a concern for the Trial Judge.

Harolds Stores, Inc. v. Dillard Dep't Stores, Inc., 82 F.3d 1533 (10th Cir. 1996) : The Court held in an action for infringement of a copyrighted fabric design that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a survey conducted by the plaintiff's expert to support damages claims, as it covered an adequate universe of respondents and was conducted according to generally accepted survey principles.

[b] Surveys and Opinion Polls -- Miscellaneous Cases

Gartenberg v. Merrill Lynch Asset Mgt., Inc., 573 F. Supp. 1293 (S.D.N.Y. 1983) , aff'd, 740 F.2d 190 (2d Cir. 1984) : The Court dismissed suits by money market fund shareholders who challenged management and advisory fees. It chose not to rely on a survey of investors conducted by an accounting firm, finding that the survey asked investors to engage in unhelpful speculation and that the survey provided only part of the information needed to support an expert opinion.

Baumholser v. Amax Coal Co., 630 F.2d 550 (7th Cir. 1980) : In a suit for damages to a home resulting from defendant's blasting operations, the Court held that an expert geologist was properly permitted to testify for the plaintiffs and to base his opinion on statistics gathered by a questionnaire directed to 169 residents living within a six-mile radius from defendant's mine. Although the Court said that the poll was not admissible because it was not reliable enough, it concluded that the expert could reasonably rely on the survey as a basis for an opinion.

Keith v. Volpe, 858 F.2d 467 (9th Cir. 1988) : Affirming a plaintiff's victory in a suit challenging the dislocations of individuals expected from freeway construction, the Court held that a survey, used by experts in formulating opinions regarding discrimination in relocation decisions, was properly admitted by the Trial Judge. It rejected arguments that the universe surveyed was too narrow and observed that the plaintiffs demonstrated that the survey complied with accepted social science techniques.

United States v. Esle, 743 F.2d 1465 (11th Cir. 1984) : Defendants charged with drug offenses claimed that Hispanics were underrepresented on the grand jury. The Court found that the Trial Judge properly gave no weight to an expert's testimony that rested in part on a survey conducted by radio stations that broadcast in Spanish or had a sizeable Latin audience. It reasoned that such stations had an incentive to present their listening pool in a light attractive to advertising and that the survey did not consider whether the listeners spoke English or were citizens and thus were eligible for jury service.

[26] Trial Evidence, Hypothetical Questions, and Testimony of Other Witnesses as a Basis

United States v. Scop, 846 F.2d 135 (2d Cir. 1988) , modified, 856 F.2d 5 (2d Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed fraud, conspiracy, and perjury convictions relating to stock transactions, concluding that the chief investigator of an SEC regional office improperly based his opinion on the "positive assessment of the trustworthiness and accuracy of the testimony of the government's witnesses." An expert may assume the credibility of witnesses in stating an opinion, but need not make -- and certainly should not state to the jury -- an assessment of witness credibility when offering an opinion based on trial testimony.

United States v. Mann, 712 F.2d 941 (4th Cir. 1983) : Upholding a firearms conviction, the Court found that an expert was properly permitted to testify that a gun was Hungarian-made, even though he never saw the gun. The expert was asked to rely on the testimony of one of the defendant's acquaintances who had seen the gun. This case is a reminder that the hypothetical question, while not required when experts are called, may be a useful, and sometimes a necessary, way of offering expert opinion -- i.e., the expert assumes the facts testified to by other witnesses.

Carter v. Massey-Ferguson, Inc., 716 F.2d 344 (5th Cir. 1983) : The Court upheld a judgment for a woodcutter who sued the manufacturer of a skidder that backed into and injured him. It found that an expert was properly permitted to give an opinion as to the importance of the skidder's failure to have a back-up alarm and to base his opinion on the plaintiff's testimony regarding the accident.

United States v. Crabtree, 979 F.2d 1261 (7th Cir. 1992) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in allowing an FBI agent, who had observed most of a bank fraud trial ostensibly as an expert witness on a check kiting charge, to testify regarding other charges as well. The agent could have qualified as a designated representative of the government, and under Rule 703 it was proper for him to base his expert testimony on facts learned at trial. In Estate of Carey v. Hy-Temp Mfg., Inc., 929 F.2d 1229 (7th Cir. 1991) , the Court, remanding a product liability action for a new trial, noted that an expert witness may be competent to give an opinion based upon hypothetical facts even though a foundation that the expert has personal knowledge of those facts has not been laid. In Bass v. Wallenstein, n26 an action by a prisoner's estate for wrongful death, the Court held that an expert had a proper basis for his opinion that the deceased would have had an excellent chance of being resuscitated if properly treated, since there was testimony supporting the assumption made by the expert.

Samples v. City of Atlanta, 916 F.2d 1548 (11th Cir. 1990) : In a § 1983 action brought by parents of a youth fatally shot by a police officer, the Court held there was no error in permitting an expert on use of force to testify on the basis of facts outside the hypothetical situation about which he was asked to give his opinion. The testimony was technically objectionable, but because it assumed facts already in evidence it did not prejudice a substantial right of the plaintiffs.

[27] Underlying Data

University of Rhode Island v. A.W. Chesterton Co., 2 F.3d 1200 (1st Cir. 1993) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in an action by the University to recover the cost of correcting corrosion on one of its vessels that had been treated with the defendant manufacturer's product, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by the university's controller concerning the amount of damages. The factual bases for his opinion included inadmissible hearsay for which there was no showing that it was of a type reasonably relied on by experts in damages assessment. Furthermore, the University came to trial with no supporting documentation to substantiate the witness' assessment of damages and, instead of attempting to assuage the Trial Court's legitimate concerns, chose to rely on a perceived "right" to have the testimony admitted under Rule 703.

Engebretsen v. Fairchild Aircraft Corp., 21 F.3d 721 (6th Cir. 1994) : Affirming a defendant's judgment in a product liability case, the Court held that reports containing opinions of defense expert witnesses as well as prejudicial hearsay should not have been admitted under Rules 702 and 703 simply because the experts testified. Rule 702 permits admission of expert opinion testimony, and Rule 703 permits an expert to base an opinion on inadmissible evidence but not to introduce that evidence for its truth. However, where the plaintiff extensively cross-examined the witnesses regarding the reports, the door was opened to their admission under Rule 106. In McMahon v. Libbey-Owens-Ford Co., n27 the Court affirmed a judgment for employees in an age discrimination case, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony concerning a statistical comparison of new hirees and employees transferred from other divisions with those terminated. The employer had a full chance to cross-examine the expert on the basis of his conclusions and to present its own expert and to explore its claim that the ages in the applicant pool would control the ages of new hirees.

Gong v. Hirsch, 913 F.2d 1269 (7th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a medical malpractice suit, holding that a letter from the patient's physician to a doctor at the medical department of his employer was properly excluded as a basis for the plaintiff's expert's opinion because it was not the type of information reasonably relied on by experts. The letter contained conclusory statements by a doctor who was not the treating physician at the time of the illness in question, the likely source of the information was the plaintiff, and there was no indication the physician had any personal knowledge of the circumstances relating to the condition.

South Cent. Petr., Inc. v. Long Bros. Oil Co., 974 F.2d 1015 (8th Cir. 1992) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when an expert in a mineral rights case was permitted to make revenue projections based on multiple hearsay about the oil well in question, as the underlying information was reasonably relied on by experts in the field and only the expert's opinion, not the underlying information, was admitted into evidence.

[28] Unreasonable Reliance

[a] Civil Cases

Montgomery County v. Microvote Corp., 320 F.3d 440 (3d Cir. 2003) : In a breach of warranty action against the seller of voting machines, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by an experienced witness that the machines met Federal Election Commission standards. The witness had relied, for performance data regarding the machines, on a document prepared by an employee of the defendant who had made a "reverse" "guestimate" about the amount of time the machines were down. He had also relied on other documents whose source or basis he could not identify, as well as a sampling of audit trail tapes selected by a defense attorney. The witness had not consulted data regarding actual election use that was apparently available. In In re TMI Litig., 193 F.3d 613 (3d Cir. 1999) , amended, 199 F.3d 158 (3d Cir. 2000) , an action was brought by area residents of the Three Mile Island nuclear power plant for injuries allegedly caused by a nuclear accident that released radioactive materials. As part of a case management order, a group of "typical" plaintiffs was selected for trial on the issue of whether the release of radioactive materials was substantial enough to have caused any injury. Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, the Court upheld the exclusion of testimony by two experts on Rule 703 grounds. In preparing their studies, the experts had improperly relied on medical summaries of individuals allegedly affected by the TMI radiation that had been prepared by consultants to and associates of plaintiffs' counsel. In Benjamin v. Peter's Farm Condo. Owners Ass'n, n28 the Court reversed the damages portion of a judgment for the plaintiff in a slip and fall case, because an economic expert's testimony about the plaintiff's post-injury earning capacity was improperly based upon the plaintiff's personal belief as to how much money he could earn. Although "mathematical exactness is not required," the Court noted that testimony must be based upon a factual foundation and that the plaintiff's belief was purely speculative.

Slaughter v. Southern Talc Co., 919 F.2d 304 (5th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a partial summary judgment for the defendants in an asbestos product liability action, holding that affidavits from the plaintiffs' expert witnesses were properly disregarded, as the reports on which they were based were so sloppily compiled and had so many obvious errors as to be of no value to the trier of fact.

Calhoun v. Honda Motor Co., 738 F.2d 126 (6th Cir. 1984) : The Court sustained a judgment n.o.v. for a motorcycle manufacturer in a wrongful death action. It found that expert opinion offered by the plaintiff was premised upon the fact that the motorcycle's brakes were wet at the time of the accident, a fact that had not been proved. Thus, the opinions could not support a judgment for the plaintiff. In Dallas & Mavis Forwarding Co. v. Stegall, n29 the plaintiff in an auto-truck collision offered the testimony of a trooper who had investigated the accident to establish the exact point of impact. Since the only data the trooper had came from statements of the parties and witnesses, the Court concluded that the Trial Judge properly excluded the opinion as not based on reliable data. The officer's report was excluded under Rule 803(8)(C) for the same reason.

Nachtsheim v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 847 F.2d 1261 (7th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a manufacturer in an airplane crash case, holding there was no error in excluding expert testimony based in part on another accident, which the Trial Judge had ruled was not similar enough to be proved. Although an expert may rely upon some facts that are not admissible, the Court declined to hold that evidence excluded by another Rule (e.g., 403) always may be used as the basis for expert testimony.

Faries v. Atlas Truck Body Mfg. Co., 797 F.2d 619 (8th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a judgment against a motorcycle rider who sued the manufacturers of his cycle and of a truck with which the cycle collided, finding that a police officer could not reasonably rely on the testimony of eyewitnesses to an accident to give an opinion as to what happened.

Schafer v. Time, Inc., 142 F.3d 1361 (11th Cir. 1998) : A picture of the plaintiff was erroneously misidentified in a magazine article as being that of a person involved in the Pan Am 103 bombing. Reversing a judgment for the defendant on other grounds, the Court held there no abuse of discretion in excluding a memorandum prepared by the defendant's public affairs director that addressed a number of charges that the sources for the article were unreliable. The memorandum was not admissible under Rule 703 as a basis for expert testimony that the defendants should have delayed or forgone publication of the story, since it was not shown to be the sort of document on which an expert typically relies. In an action to dissolve a consent decree that implemented an affirmative action plan for hiring City firefighters, United States v. City of Miami, Fla., 115 F.3d 870 (11th Cir. 1997) , the Court held it was error to continue the decree on the basis of expert testimony that underrepresentation was a vestige of past discrimination. The expert had relied on general census data rather than on the numbers of qualified applicants, he had done no research to support his opinion that the number of women in the department reflected the City's "reputation for unfairness," and he had erroneously determined the relevant labor market on the incorrect assumption that the City consistently enforced a residency requirement.

[b] Unreasonable Reliance -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Tran Trong Cuong, 18 F.3d 1132 (4th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a doctor's conviction for illegal distribution of controlled substances, holding it was error to permit a government expert to bolster his opinion by relying on conclusions of another expert who had prepared a report on some of the defendant's patients. The Court stated that reports "specifically prepared for purposes of litigation are not, by definition," reasonably relied upon by experts. In United States v. Swaim, n30 the Court reversed a conviction for filing false accounts with the Postal Service. The majority found that a postal inspector was improperly permitted to relate conversations with people who had access to the money in question and to refer to exhibits summarizing what the inspector learned in his investigation, whereas the dissent argued that the inspector qualified as an expert and his testimony was based on matters reasonably relied upon by similar experts.

United States v. Tranowski, 659 F.2d 750 (7th Cir. 1981) : The Court found that an astronomer testifying as a government expert impermissibly relied on a chart of "unknown origin and unknown accuracy." The qualification of the witness as an expert did not necessarily qualify the data on which he wished to rely.

United States v. Scrima, 819 F.2d 996 (11th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a conviction for income tax evasion, finding no error in the rejection of proffered expert testimony that was based upon the defendant's out-of-court statement concerning his possession of a large amount of money, as there was no showing that accountants reasonably rely on such statements. In United States v. Cox, n31 the Court affirmed convictions arising out of the purchase and importation of firearms. An expert witness was proffered by the defendant to testify that the CIA had taken scrap pieces of guns originally made in Russia and remanufactured them. The testimony was offered to impeach government witnesses who testified that the guns the defendant indicated were manufactured in Guatemala were actually manufactured in Russia. The Court said that the defense expert's knowledge was primarily historical and was based on hearsay, and that it could not be reasonably relied upon to support an expert opinion.

[29] Valuation of Property

Trepel v. Roadway Express, Inc., 194 F.3d 708 (6th Cir. 1999) : To prove the value of a rare wood carving allegedly damaged by the express company's negligence, the plaintiff sought to introduce evidence of a telephone conversation with another collector, who said that she had been offered $2 million and later $2.5 million for her similar carving, and that she would be willing to sell for $3 million if she were offered that much. The Court held that the statements were proffered to prove the collector's belief in the carving's value, not as an offer to sell her carving, and were thus inadmissible hearsay. However, because experts in the field of appraising art such as that involved here frequently rely on evidence of comparable sales, regardless of how the evidence comes to them, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude mention of the collector's statements in the reports of the plaintiff's experts regarding the carving.

United States v. McPhilomy, 270 F.3d 1302 (10th Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions for stealing stone from property owned by the Bureau of Land Management, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony on the quality, quantity, and value of the stone. The expert was a geologist who had worked for the BLM for eleven years evaluating minerals. His opinion as to value was reached by the same method he used in his job, using retail prices for comparable stone from nearby stone yards as determined by examining the comparable stone and asking the retailers about prices. Although the value figure was based in part on hearsay, the hearsay was the sort of evidence reasonably relied upon by experts in the field.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Lundy, 809 F.2d 392 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Lawson, 653 F.2d 299 (7th Cir. 1981) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Maddix, 96 F.3d 311 (8th Cir. 1996) .

(n4)Footnote 4. Pelster v. Ray, 987 F.2d 514 (8th Cir. 1993) .

(n5)Footnote 5. United States v. Maddix, 96 F.3d 311 (8th Cir. 1996) .

(n6)Footnote 6. Pelster v. Ray, 987 F.2d 514 (8th Cir. 1993) .

(n7)Footnote 7. Ricciardi v. Children's Hosp. Med. Center, 811 F.2d 18 (1st Cir. 1987) .

(n8)Footnote 8. Forrestal v. Magendantz, 848 F.2d 303 (1st Cir. 1988) .

(n9)Footnote 9. United States v. Bramlet, 820 F.2d 851 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n10)Footnote 10. United States v. Lawson, 653 F.2d 299 (7th Cir. 1981) .

(n11)Footnote 11. Ambrosini v. Labarraque, 966 F.2d 1464 (D.C. Cir. 1992) .

(n12)Footnote 12. Mendes-Silva v. United States, 980 F.2d 1482 (D.C. Cir. 1993) .

(n13)Footnote 13. DeLuca v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 791 F. Supp. 1042 (D.N.J. 1992) , aff'd mem., 6 F.3d 778 (3d Cir. 1993) .

(n14)Footnote 14. Marsee v. United States Tobacco Co., 639 F. Supp. 466 (W.D. Okla. 1986) , aff'd, 866 F.2d 319 (10th Cir. 1989) .

(n15)Footnote 15. Wilder Enters. v. Allied Artists Pictures Corp., 632 F.2d 1135 (4th Cir. 1980) .

(n16)Footnote 16. Greenwood Utils. Comm'n v. Mississippi Power Co., 751 F.2d 1484 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n17)Footnote 17. Cravens v. County of Wood, 856 F.2d 753 (6th Cir. 1988) .

(n18)Footnote 18. Mannino v. International Mfg. Co., 650 F.2d 846 (6th Cir. 1981) .

(n19)Footnote 19. United States v. 1,014.16 Acres, 558 F. Supp. 1238 (W.D. Mo. 1983) , aff'd, 739 F.2d 1371 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n20)Footnote 20. Mullan v. Quickie Aircraft Corp., 797 F.2d 845 (10th Cir. 1986) .

(n21)Footnote 21. United States v. Harper, 802 F.2d 115 (5th Cir. 1986) .

(n22)Footnote 22. United States v. Bramlet, 820 F.2d 851 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n23)Footnote 23. United States v. Golden, 532 F.2d 1244 (9th Cir. 1976) .

(n24)Footnote 24. Merit Motors, Inc. v. Chrysler Corp., 569 F.2d 666 (D.C. Cir. 1977) .

(n25)Footnote 25. Washington v. Armstrong World Indus., 839 F.2d 1121 (5th Cir. 1988) .

(n26)Footnote 26. Bass v. Wallenstein, 769 F.2d 1173 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n27)Footnote 27. McMahon v. Libbey-Owens-Ford Co., 870 F.2d 1073 (6th Cir. 1989) .

(n28)Footnote 28. Benjamin v. Peter's Farm Condo. Owners Ass'n, 820 F.2d 640 (3d Cir. 1987) .

(n29)Footnote 29. Dallas & Mavis Forwarding Co. v. Stegall, 659 F.2d 721 (6th Cir. 1981) .

(n30)Footnote 30. United States v. Swaim, 642 F.2d 726 (4th Cir. 1981) .

(n31)Footnote 31. United States v. Cox, 696 F.2d 1294 (11th Cir. 1983) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 703 RULE 703

1-703 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 703.04

703.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

Facts or data upon which expert opinions are based may, under the rule, be derived from three possible sources. The first is the firsthand observation of the witness, with opinions based thereon traditionally allowed. A treating physician affords an example. Rheingold, The Basis of Medical Testimony, 15 Vand. L. Rev. 473, 480 (1962). Whether he must first relate his observations is treated in Rule 705. The second source, presentation at the trial, also reflects existing practice. The technique may be the familiar hypothetical question or having the expert attend the trial and hear the testimony establishing the facts. Problems of determining what testimony the expert relied upon, when the latter technique is employed and the testimony is in conflict, may be resolved by resort to Rule 705. The third source contemplated by the rule consists of presentation of data to the expert outside of court and other than by his own perception. In this respect, the rule is designed to broaden the basis for expert opinions beyond that current in many jurisdictions and to bring the judicial practice into line with the practice of the experts themselves when not in court. Thus, a physician in his own practice bases his diagnosis on information from numerous sources and of considerable variety, including statements by patients and relatives, reports and opinions from nurses, technicians and other doctors, hospital records, and X rays. Most of them are admissible in evidence, but only with the expenditure of substantial time in producing and examining various authenticating witnesses. The physician makes life-and-death decisions in reliance upon them. His validation, expertly performed and subject to cross-examination, ought to suffice for judicial purposes. Rheingold, supra, at 531; McCormick 15. A similar provision is California Evidence Code 801(b).

The rule also offers a more satisfactory basis for ruling upon the admissibility of public opinion poll evidence. Attention is directed to the validity of the techniques employed rather than to relatively fruitless inquiries whether hearsay is involved. See Judge Feinberg's careful analysis in Zippo Mfg. Co. v. Rogers Imports, Inc., 216 F. Supp. 670 (S.D.N.Y. 1963) . See also Blum et al., The Art of Opinion Research: A Lawyer's Appraisal of an Emerging Service, 24 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1 (1956); Bonynge, Trademark Surveys and Techniques and Their Use in Litigation, 48 A.B.A.J. 329 (1962); Zeisel, The Uniqueness of Survey Evidence, 45 Cornell L.Q. 322 (1960); Annot., 76 A.L.R.2d 919 .

If it be feared that enlargement of permissible data may tend to break down the rules of exclusion unduly, notice should be taken that the rule requires that the facts or data be of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the particular field. The language would not warrant admitting into evidence the opinion of an accidentologist as to the point of impact in an automobile collision based on statements of bystanders, since this requirement is not satisfied. See Comment, Cal. Law Rev. Comm'n, Recommendation Proposing an Evidence Code 148-50 (1965).

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: The amendments are technical. No substantive change is intended.]

[2] 2000 Amendment Committee Note

2000 Amendment Committee Note

Rule 703 has been amended to emphasize that when an expert reasonably relies on inadmissible information to form an opinion or inference, the underlying information is not admissible simply because the opinion or inference is admitted. Courts have reached different results on how to treat inadmissible information when it is reasonably relied upon by an expert in forming an opinion or drawing an inference. Compare United States v. Rollins, 862 F.2d 1282 (7th Cir. 1988) (admitting, as part of the basis of an FBI agent's expert opinion on the meaning of code language, the hearsay statements of an informant), with United States v. 0.59 Acres of Land, 109 F.3d 1493 (9th Cir. 1997) (error to admit hearsay offered as the basis of an expert opinion, without a limiting instruction). Commentators have also taken differing views. See, e.g., Ronald Carlson, Policing the Bases of Modern Expert Testimony, 39 Vand.L.Rev. 577 (1986) (advocating limits on the jury's consideration of otherwise inadmissible evidence used as the basis for an expert opinion); Paul Rice, Inadmissible Evidence as a Basis for Expert Testimony: A Response to Professor Carlson, 40 Vand.L.Rev. 583 (1987) (advocating unrestricted use of information reasonably relied upon by an expert).

When information is reasonably relied upon by an expert and yet is admissible only for the purpose of assisting the jury in evaluating an expert's opinion, a trial court applying this Rule must consider the information's probative value in assisting the jury to weigh the expert's opinion on the one hand, and the risk of prejudice resulting from the jury's potential misuse of the information for substantive purposes on the other. The information may be disclosed to the jury, upon objection, only if the trial court finds that the probative value of the information in assisting the jury to evaluate the expert's opinion substantially outweighs its prejudicial effect. If the otherwise inadmissible information is admitted under this balancing test, the trial judge must give a limiting instruction upon request, informing the jury that the underlying information must not be used for substantive purposes. See Rule 105. In determining the appropriate course, the trial court should consider the probable effectiveness or lack of effectiveness of a limiting instruction under the particular circumstances.

The amendment governs only the disclosure to the jury of information that is reasonably relied on by an expert, when that information is not admissible for substantive purposes. It is not intended to affect the admissibility of an expert's testimony. Nor does the amendment prevent an expert from relying on information that is inadmissible for substantive purposes.

Nothing in this Rule restricts the presentation of underlying expert facts or data when offered by an adverse party. See Rule 705. Of course, an adversary's attack on an expert's basis will often open the door to a proponent's rebuttal with information that was reasonably relied upon by the expert, even if that information would not have been discloseable initially under the balancing test provided by this amendment. Moreover, in some circumstances the proponent might wish to disclose information that is relied upon by the expert in order to "remove the sting" from the opponent's anticipated attack, and thereby prevent the jury from drawing an unfair negative inference. The trial court should take this consideration into account in applying the balancing test provided by this amendment.

This amendment covers facts or data that cannot be admitted for any purpose other than to assist the jury to evaluate the expert's opinion. The balancing test provided in this amendment is not applicable to facts or data that are admissible for any other purpose but have not yet been offered for such a purpose at the time the expert testifies.

The amendment provides a presumption against disclosure to the jury of information used as the basis of an expert's opinion and not admissible for any substantive purpose, when that information is offered by the proponent of the expert. In a multi-party case, where one party proffers an expert whose testimony is also beneficial to other parties, each such party should be deemed a "proponent" within the meaning of the amendment.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
Supp. To CHAPTER 703 RULE 703

3-703 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 703, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 703. Bases of Opinion Testimony by Experts	Rule 703. Bases of an Expert's Opinion Testimony
The facts or data in the particular	An expert may base an opinion on case upon which an expert bases an opinion or inference may be those perceived by or made known to the expert at or before the hearing. If of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the particular field would reasonably rely on those kinds of facts or data in forming an opinion or inference upon the case that the expert has been made aware of or personally observed. If experts in the particular field would reasonably rely on those kinds of facts or data in the case that the expert has been made aware of or personally observed, they must be admissible even though not admissible for any other purpose. When the underlying facts or data are admissible, the expert may state an opinion or inference without first testifying to the underlying facts or data, unless the court requires otherwise. The expert may in any event be required to disclose the underlying facts or data on cross-examination.

Rule 703 was amended in 2000 to add the last sentence, which was added to guard against the risk that the proponent will disguise hearsay as expert opinion testimony. Under the amendment, the trial judge must determine whether the probative value of the facts or data used by the expert in forming an opinion substantially outweighs their prejudicial effect. The amendment was proposed by the Judicial Conference Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules in response to a concern that experts were frequently disclosing to the jury the inadmissible hearsay upon which they based their opinions, thereby circumventing the rules prohibiting hearsay. The amendment was intended to limit the admissibility of facts or data that are relied upon by experts, but that are not themselves admissible and are not subject to any hearsay exception. The amendment was not intended to affect the admissibility of facts or data that are admissible for any purpose other than as substantive evidence. Thus, if the facts or data are admissible for impeachment only, the amendment provides that the trial judge must determine whether the probative value of the facts or data for impeachment purposes substantially outweighs their prejudicial effect. The amendment was not intended to affect the admissibility of facts or data that are admissible for their truth under a hearsay exception. Thus, if the facts or data are admissible under a hearsay exception, the amendment does not require any balancing of probative value against prejudicial effect.

Rule 703 was amended in 2023 to add the last sentence, which was added to guard against the risk that the proponent will disguise hearsay as expert opinion testimony. Under the amendment, the trial judge must determine whether the probative value of the facts or data used by the expert in forming an opinion substantially outweighs their prejudicial effect. The amendment was proposed by the Judicial Conference Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules in response to a concern that experts were frequently disclosing to the jury the inadmissible hearsay upon which they based their opinions, thereby circumventing the rules prohibiting hearsay. The amendment was intended to limit the admissibility of facts or data that are relied upon by experts, but that are not themselves admissible and are not subject to any hearsay exception. The amendment was not intended to affect the admissibility of facts or data that are admissible for any purpose other than as substantive evidence. Thus, if the facts or data are admissible for impeachment only, the amendment provides that the trial judge must determine whether the probative value of the facts or data for impeachment purposes substantially outweighs their prejudicial effect. The amendment was not intended to affect the admissibility of facts or data that are admissible for their truth under a hearsay exception. Thus, if the facts or data are admissible under a hearsay exception, the amendment does not require any balancing of probative value against prejudicial effect.

in the particular field in forming opinions or inferences upon the subject, the facts or data need not be admissible in evidence in order for the opinion or inference to be admitted. Facts or opinion on the subject, they need not be admissible for the opinion to be admitted. But if the facts or data would otherwise be inadmissible, the proponent of the opinion may disclose the data that are otherwise inadmissible shall not be disclosed to the jury by the proponent of the opinion or inference unless the court determines that their probative value in assisting the m to the jury only if their probative value in helping the jury evaluate the opinion substantially outweighs their prejudicial effect.

jury to evaluate the expert's opinion substantially outweighs their prejudicial effect.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 703 has been amended as part of the general restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

The Committee deleted all reference to an "inference" on the grounds that the deletion made the Rule flow better and easier to read, and because any "inference" is covered by the broader term "opinion." Courts have not made substantive decisions on the basis of any distinction between an opinion and an inference. No change in current practice is intended.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
Supp. To CHAPTER 703 RULE 703

3-703 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 703.03

Supp. to § 703.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[4] Constitutional Concerns [Go To Main]

United States v. Ayala, 601 F.3d 256 (4th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed convictions for offenses arising out of participation in a violent street gang, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by expert witnesses on the gang's organization and violent nature, relying in part on interviews with gang members. Although acknowledging that the experts' testimony was proper under Rule 703, because the gang members' statements were of a type reasonably relied on by experts in the field, the defendants argued that this reliance violated their right to confrontation because the gang members' statements were testimonial. The Court stated that Crawford "does not prevent expert witnesses from offering their independent judgments merely because those judgments were in some part informed by their exposure to otherwise inadmissible evidence" and that "the question when applying Crawford to expert testimony is whether the expert is, in essence, giving an independent judgment or merely acting as a transmitter for testimonial hearsay." In this case, the experts "did not act as mere transmitters and in fact did not repeat statements of particular declarants to the jury." In United States v. Johnson, 587 F.3d 625 (4th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed convictions for drug crimes, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting expert testimony that decoded terms used by the defendants and coconspirators during recorded telephone conversations. It rejected an argument that the experts relied on hearsay statements by cooperators to help them reach a conclusion about the meaning of particular conversations, which violated confrontation rights under Crawford v. Washington because the experts were relying on testimonial hearsay. The Court noted that experts are allowed to consider inadmissible hearsay as long as it is of a type reasonably relied on by other experts, and that the experts never made reference to their interviews, so the jury heard no testimonial hearsay.

United States v. Turner, 591 F.3d 928 (7th Cir. 2010) : At a drug trial, the defendant objected that a government chemist, who testified that tests conducted on the substance seized from the defendant indicated that it was cocaine, did not conduct the tests and was relying on testimonial statements from other chemists, in violation of Crawford v. Washington. The Court found no error, holding that "the government's expert witness was properly allowed to rely on the information gathered and produced by a lab employee who did not testify at trial." The Court emphasized that no statements of the official who actually tested the substance was admitted at trial, and that the witness unequivocally established that his opinions about the test reports were his own. The Court rejected the argument that the Supreme Court's opinion in Melendez-Diaz v. Massachusetts,129 S. Ct. 2527 (2009) , requires that any official involved in forensic testimony must be produced for cross-examination. It read the case as only prohibiting the introduction of certificates of forensic testimony without any supporting testimony, and it observed that " Melendez-Diaz did not do away with Federal Rule of Evidence 703." In United States v. Moon, 512 F.3d 359 (7th Cir. 2008) , the Court held that an expert's testimony about readings taken from an infrared spectrometer and a gas chromatograph (which determined that the substance taken from the defendant was narcotics) did not violate the defendant's right to confrontation under Crawford because "data is not 'statements' in any useful sense. Nor is a machine a 'witness against' anyone." Moreover, the expert's reliance on another expert's lab notes did not violate Crawford because an expert is permitted to rely on hearsay (including testimonial hearsay) in reaching his conclusion. The Court noted that the defendant could "insist that the data underlying an expert's testimony be admitted, see Fed.R.Evid. 705, but by offering the evidence themselves defendants would waive any objection under the Confrontation Clause." The Court observed that the notes of the chemist, evaluating the data from the machine, were testimonial and should not have been independently admitted, but it found no plain error in the admission of these notes.

[6] Disclosure of Facts to Jury [Go To Main]

United States v. Milkiewicz, 470 F.3d 390 (1st Cir. 2006) : Toward the end of a fraud and tax fraud case in which several thousand pages of financial records were offered by the government to prove transactions in the scheme, the prosecutor called an IRS agent to testify about a series of charts that summarized the information contained in those financial records. The defense initially objected only to admission of the charts as independent evidence, but later argued that they should not have been given to the jury because one set contained errors and significant omissions rendering it unreliable and the other was improperly admitted through the agent, who was not qualified as a witness. Affirming, the Court took the occasion to clarify its approach to the treatment of summaries under the Rules, noting that "[i]n a case where voluminous underlying records are involved, the key difference between [the] various approaches appears to be the purpose for which the summaries are offered":

> Charts admitted under Rule 1006 are explicitly intended to reflect the contents of the documents they summarize and typically are substitutes in evidence for the voluminous originals. Consequently they must fairly represent the underlying documents and be " 'accurate and non-prejudicial.' " [citations omitted]
>
> By contrast, a pedagogical aid that is allowed under Rule 611(a) to illustrate or clarify a party's position, or allowed under Rule 703 to assist expert testimony, may be less neutral in its presentation. Record support is necessary because such devices tend to be "more akin to argument than to evidence," and "may reflect to some extent, through captions or other organizational devices or descriptions, the inferences and conclusions drawn from the underlying evidence by the summary's proponent." In some cases, however, such pedagogical devices may be sufficiently accurate and reliable that they, too, are admissible in evidence, even though they do not meet the specific requirements of Rule 1006.

The Court held that although most, if not all, of the charts would have been admissible into evidence under Rule 1006, there certainly was not abuse of discretion in allowing the jury to consider them under Rules 611(a) and 703. Deficiencies in the underlying records were explored on examination of the witnesses, "and gaps or other imperfections in the underlying data do not necessarily undermine the value of the summary charts as pedagogical aids under Rule 611(a)." As for the tax charts, the summarization of documents "took patience but not expertise," and an IRS agent was well qualified to make the computations, "particularly where, as here, the computation required no subjective judgment."

United States v. Leeson, 453 F.3d 631 (4th Cir. 2006) : In a felon firearm prosecution, the prosecution countered an insanity defense with a psychiatrist who opined that the defendant did not suffer from a severe mental illness. He based his opinion in part on statements by two different inmates that the defendant had approached them to recruit them in assisting him in "looking crazy." Rejecting an argument that it was error to allow the expert to disclose these statements to the jury, as part of the basis for his opinion, because they were hearsay, the Court noted that the information that the expert relied upon "was highly and directly relevant to the jury's task of evaluating that opinion." Thus, the Trial Judge "properly determined that the probative value of the inmates' out-of-court statements outweighed their prejudicial effect." We note that the Court misstated the balancing test to be applied under Rule 703: the probative value of the hearsay (in illuminating the basis of the expert opinion) must substantially outweigh the prejudicial effect.

Mike's Train House, Inc. v. Lionel, LLC, 472 F.3d 398 (6th Cir. 2006) : In an action claiming that Lionel misappropriated the plaintiff's trade secrets for producing model trains, the plaintiff's expert (Stein), a mechanical engineer, was permitted to testify to his opinion that Lionel's design drawings had been copied from drawings of the plaintiff's former employee who also worked for Lionel. Stein relied heavily on a report prepared by Lee, another expert retained by the plaintiff. He testified that he did a regression analysis on Lee's research and came to the same conclusion as Lee, i.e., that Lionel had copied the plaintiff's designs. Lee did not testify at trial and his report was not entered into evidence as it was hearsay. The Court held that it was error to allow Stein to testify to the degree of similarity between Lee's conclusions and his own, as the case law has "squarely rejected any argument that Rule 703 extends so far as to allow an expert to testify about the conclusions of other experts."

[7] Economic Data [Go To Main]

Structural Polymer Group, Ltd. v. Zoltek Corp., 543 F.3d 987 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a buyer who sued a seller for breach of a requirements contract for the sale of carbon fiber. It held that the buyer offered sufficient evidence to support the damages awarded. Although the seller complained that the buyer's expert relied on information provided by the buyer, the Court reasoned that "[a]s a rule, questions regarding the factual underpinnings of the expert's opinion affect the weight and credibility of her testimony, not its admissibility."

[11] Hearsay [Go To Main]

United States v. Mejia, 545 F.3d 179 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court vacated convictions for conspiracy to commit assaults in aid of racketeering activity. The prosecution arose after members of one gang shot members of other gangs. To prove the shootings arose in the course of racketeering activity, a state police officer who had been investigating gangs in the area was permitted to testify about the operations of the defendants' nationwide gang, as well as of the gang's local activities, including that its members had committed "between 18 and 22, 23" murders in the area in the five years prior to the trial. According to the officer, his testimony was based on custodial interviews with gang members, reports from other law enforcement personnel, and published sources. The Court held that much of the expert's testimony concerned material well within the grasp of the average juror. The testimony also substituted the expert's conclusion on an essential fact (that the gang committed murders in a pattern of racketeering activity) for competent evidence of that fact: "The Government cannot take a shortcut around its obligation to prove murder beyond a reasonable doubt just by having an expert pronounce that unspecified deaths of eighteen to twenty-three persons have been homicides committed by members of [the gang]." The Court also noted that the witness "was acting as a de facto 'case agent' in providing this summary information to the jury," a practice it had admonished against because case agents testifying as experts gain unmerited credibility when testifying about factual matters from first-hand knowledge. Furthermore, while law enforcement officers routinely and reasonably rely on hearsay in reaching their conclusions, an expert witness must not simply repeat hearsay evidence but must apply expertise to the inadmissible materials -- and in too many instances the expert in this case did not do so. This was particularly a problem with statements made in custodial interrogations, which were testimonial hearsay violating the defendants' Confrontation Clause rights. In United States v. Lombardozzi, 491 F.3d 61 (2d Cir. 2007) , a loansharking prosecution, a criminal investigator testified that the defendant was affiliated with organized crime, basing his opinion on conversations with cooperating witnesses and confidential informants, as well as on personal observation. The defendant did not object to admission of the testimony on Confrontation Clause grounds at trial. On appeal, the Court concluded that because the opinion in effect conveyed to the jury out-of-court testimonial statements that the defendant never had an opportunity to cross-examine, admission "may have constituted error," but it "did not rise to the level of reversible plain error."

United States v. Jennings, 599 F.3d 1241 (11th Cir. 2010) : In the prosecution of a scheme to sell fraudulent workers' compensation insurance, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting an expert to testify to information generally known by administrators in the field, to the extent it was based on conversations with workers' compensation professionals. The Court rejected a hearsay objection, explaining that testimony regarding the regulations known by third-party administrators was not an effort to prove what the regulations were from the statements of others; rather, it was testimony by the witness about her work and her familiarity with the regulatory environment, which was evidence in support of her competence to express an opinion regarding the awareness of certain industry requirements.

[14] Law Enforcement Information [Go To Main]

United States v. Mejia, 545 F.3d 179 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court vacated convictions for conspiracy to commit assaults in aid of racketeering activity. The prosecution arose after members of one gang shot members of other gangs. To prove the shootings arose in the course of racketeering activity, a state police officer who had been investigating gangs in the area was permitted to testify about the operations of the defendants' nationwide gang, as well as of the gang's local activities, including that its members had committed "between 18 and 22, 23" murders in the area in the five years prior to the trial. According to the officer, his testimony was based on custodial interviews with gang members, reports from other law enforcement personnel, and published sources. The Court held that much of the expert's testimony concerned material well within the grasp of the average juror. The testimony also substituted the expert's conclusion on an essential fact (that the gang committed murders in a pattern of racketeering activity) for competent evidence of that fact: "The Government cannot take a shortcut around its obligation to prove murder beyond a reasonable doubt just by having an expert pronounce that unspecified deaths of eighteen to twenty-three persons have been homicides committed by members of [the gang]." The Court also noted that the witness "was acting as a de facto 'case agent' in providing this summary information to the jury," a practice it had admonished against because case agents testifying as experts gain unmerited credibility when testifying about factual matters from first-hand knowledge. Furthermore, while law enforcement officers routinely and reasonably rely on hearsay in reaching their conclusions, an expert witness must not simply repeat hearsay evidence but must apply expertise to the inadmissible materials -- and in too many instances the expert in this case did not do so. This was particularly a problem with statements made in custodial interrogations, which were testimonial hearsay violating the defendants' Confrontation Clause rights.

United States v. Steed, 548 F.3d 961 (11th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a truck driver's conviction for possession of marijuana with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by the arresting officer (who was a qualified expert) regarding drug trafficking on the roadways, which was based in part on conversations with other officers and on literature published by organizations such as the National Drug Intelligence Center. The background information utilized by the witness was of the sort reasonably relied upon by experts in the law enforcement field.

[15] Medical Evidence [Go To Main]

[a] Malpractice Cases

Crowe v. Marchand, 506 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2007) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant physician in a medical malpractice case, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony by an orthopedic surgeon who did not review the patient's X-ray or MRI studies. The expert testified that he based his opinions on what other physicians' reports of those studies showed. The Court found that the information he relied upon provided a sufficient foundation for his opinion, since "[d]octors routinely rely on observations reported by other doctors," and "it is unrealistic to expect a physician, as a condition precedent to offering opinion testimony in a personal injury case, to have performed every test, procedure, and examination himself."

[b] Medical Evidence -- Other Cases

United States v. Seale, 600 F.3d 473 (5th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for a fatal kidnapping committed in 1964, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a forensic pathologist's conclusion that the victims' deaths were caused by fresh-water drowning. The sources for the conclusion properly included autopsy reports, video footage of the recovery of a body from a river, interviews with divers conducting the recovery effort, FBI reports, and photographs of physical evidence, as well as the testimony of a coconspirator.

[16] Other Expert's Opinion [Go To Main]

Mike's Train House, Inc. v. Lionel, LLC, 472 F.3d 398 (6th Cir. 2006) : In an action claiming that Lionel misappropriated the plaintiff's trade secrets for producing model trains, the plaintiff's expert (Stein), a mechanical engineer, was permitted to testify to his opinion that Lionel's design drawings had been copied from drawings of the plaintiff's former employee who also worked for Lionel. Stein relied heavily on a report prepared by Lee, another expert retained by the plaintiff. He testified that he did a regression analysis on Lee's research and came to the same conclusion as Lee, i.e., that Lionel had copied the plaintiff's designs. Lee did not testify at trial and his report was not entered into evidence as it was hearsay. The Court held that it was error to allow Stein to testify to the degree of similarity between Lee's conclusions and his own, as the case law has "squarely rejected any argument that Rule 703 extends so far as to allow an expert to testify about the conclusions of other experts."

[19] Reasonable Reliance on Data [Go To Main]

[a] Civil Cases

Ward v. Dixie Life Ins. Co., 595 F.3d 164 (4th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment and damage award for insureds who sued their insurers for breach of contract relating to supplemental cancer insurance policies. It found no abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge relied on six spreadsheets, in conjunction with the expert testimony of the plaintiffs' damages expert, to calculate damages. Five of the spreadsheets were created by the defendants and the sixth was compiled by plaintiffs' counsel from explanation-of- benefits statements provided by the insurers to the insureds. It was reasonable for the expert to rely upon the information provided by the insurers as to the actual costs of medical care and it was unnecessary to obtain the bills from the healthcare providers.

Chavez v. Carranza, 559 F.3d 486 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court upheld an award of compensatory and punitive damages for victims of torture and their families in a suit against a former Salvadoran military officer. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by an expert regarding military procedures and command responsibilities. To form her opinions, the expert relied upon interviews, commission reports, documentary research, and field research, as well as her expertise in the politics of Latin America. This was the kind of information on which other experts in the field reasonably rely.

Monsanto Co. v. David, 516 F.3d 1009 (Fed. Cir. 2008) : In an action alleging infringement of a gene-sequence patent, the plaintiff offered expert testimony that the defendant's fields had been planted exclusively with the infringing seeds. The defendant objected that the expert's opinion was based on scientific field tests conducted by the defendant's scientific team but not by the expert personally. The Court held that the tests were of the sort reasonably relied on by experts and thus a proper basis for the expert's testimony.

[b] Reasonable Reliance on Data -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Leeson, 453 F.3d 631 (4th Cir. 2006) : In a felon firearm prosecution, the prosecution countered an insanity defense with a psychiatrist who opined that the defendant did not suffer from a severe mental illness. He based his opinion in part on statements by two different inmates that the defendant had approached them to recruit them in assisting him in "looking crazy." Rejecting an argument that it was error to allow the expert to rely on these statements, the Court noted that the expert "sufficiently established that inmates in a federal mental health facility, in general, are reasonably relied upon by experts in his field."

United States v. Garcia, 447 F.3d 1327 (11th Cir. 2006) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting a law enforcement agent to testify as an expert witness to translate coded drug conversations. Although the officer's translation was based in part on information received from a cooperating witness who was a member of the drug conspiracy, the Court upheld the conclusion that "the debriefing of suspected drug traffickers is 'the type of evidence' that is 'reasonably relied upon' by seasoned drug enforcement officers 'in forming opinions or inferences' about the use of coded language of drug traffickers." The expert was, by virtue of his professional knowledge and ability, "competent to judge for himself the reliability of statements made by an admitted drug trafficker in post-arrest debriefings in forming an expert opinion about the drug traffickers' use of coded language."

[20] Relationship to Other Rules [Go To Main]

United States v. Smith, 566 F.3d 410 (4th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for firearms offenses and drug trafficking, finding no error when an ATF agent was permitted to testify as an expert regarding the place of manufacture of four firearms seized from the defendant's apartment. The agent consulted various references, including one reference book and an ATF database, in arriving at his opinion. The defendant objected that the testimony violated the best evidence rule, but the Court held that the agent was not attempting to prove the contents of any book or record, but was, instead, relying on materials reasonably relied upon by experts to form an opinion.

United States v. W.R. Grace, 504 F.3d 745 (9th Cir. 2007) : On an interlocutory appeal by the government in a prosecution related to the alleged release of asbestos-contaminated vermiculite from a mine, the Court found an abuse of discretion in the exclusion of certain parts of the government's expert testimony. The Court affirmed a Rule 403 decision to exclude a report by the Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry on pleural abnormalities of residents in the town where the defendants mined, but held it was an abuse of discretion to hold that experts could not rely upon the report to show that there were some associations or correlations between exposure to vermiculite in the town and pleural abnormalities. The Court reasoned that the fact that the study was associational, rather than an epidemiological study intended to show causation, did not bar the study from being used to inform an expert's opinion about the dangers of asbestos releases, provided that experts in the field reasonably rely on such studies. The Trial Judge had failed to conduct a Rule 703 analysis and instead "improperly replaced 703 balancing with 403 balancing."

[23.1] Subsequent Remedial Measures [Go To Main]

Pineda v. Ford Motor Co., 520 F.3d 237 (3d Cir. 2008) : A car mechanic brought a product liability action after the back window of an SUV shattered when he was working on the rear door lift. The plaintiff's expert would have testified that a step-by-step procedure was required in order to reduce the likelihood that the rear liftgate glass would fail when repairing the door lift, and that such a procedure should have been embodied in an instruction manual, but was not. The expert was excluded because, in opining on the need for a warning in an instruction manual, he relied on the fact that Ford included such warnings in an instruction model for a later model, which the Judge believed meant that his testimony was barred by Rule 407. Reversing summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held that excluding the expert was error; in its view, Rule 407 could not bar the testimony because the plaintiff was not trying to admit the subsequent remedial measure. Rather, the measure was being used only as the basis of the expert's opinion, which permits expert reliance on data "of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the particular field in forming opinions or inferences upon the subject." The Court found that it was reasonable for an engineer to rely upon a warning and alternative safety instruction subsequently issued by a manufacturer in forming an opinion that an earlier service manual fails to provide adequate instructions and warnings to automobile technicians.

[25] Surveys and Opinion Polls [Go To Main]

[a] Intellectual Property Cases

i4i Ltd. Partnership v. Microsoft Corp., 598 F.3d 831 (Fed. Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a action for infringement of a software patent, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony for the plaintiff regarding damages. The expert relied in part on a survey designed to estimate the amount of infringing use. The expert who designed the survey explained that it was compiled using acceptable survey methods, and both of the patent owner's experts testified that the survey drastically understated the amount of infringing use because it was limited to business use, did not cover individual customers, and assumed that any company that did not respond was not infringing.

[27] Underlying Data [Go To Main]

Boim v. Holy Land Found. for Relief & Devel., 549 F.3d 685 (7th Cir. 2008) (en banc): The Court affirmed a judgment for parents of a teenager killed in Israel by Hamas terrorists against an organization accused of having provided financial support for Hamas in violation of American law. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by an Israeli security expert regarding Hamas' responsibility in the matter, which was based in part on information from websites that he attributed to Hamas. The Court held that there was sufficient evidence that the websites of Islamic movements and Islamic terrorist organizations have long been accepted by security experts as valid, important, and indispensable sources of information. A dissenting opinion argued that the expert's opinion > is based exclusively on what these websites and documents say; he has no personal knowledge of who killed David Boim. So if these sources are not genuine or say something other than what he has represented, then his opinion is worthless. No expert worth his salt would base his opinion on internet and documentary sources without assuring himself that they are reliable ... . But Paz's affidavit does not describe any such efforts that he made, and there is no other evidence in the record that establishes the authenticity and reliability of the websites and documents whose contents he recounts.

136 of 156 DOCUMENTS

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 704 RULE 704

3-704 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 704.syn

§ 704.syn Synopsis to Chapter 704: RULE 704

704.01 Official Text

704.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] General Rule on Ultimate Issue Testimony

[2] Jury Instructions

[3] Opinions on the Law

[4] Rule 704(b): Mental State or Condition in Criminal Cases

[5] Problems in Applying Rule 704(b)

[6] Hypothetical Questions

[7] Law Enforcement Experts and Criminal Intent

[8] Constitutional Challenges

704.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Rule 704(a)

[a] Rule 704(a) -- Cause of Accident

[b] Rule 704(a) -- Cause of Disease or Injury

[c] Rule 704(a) -- Civil Rights Cases

[d] Rule 704(a) -- Criminal Cases

[e] Rule 704(a) -- Damages

[f] Rule 704(a) -- Employment Discrimination Cases

[g] Rule 704(a) -- Government Agents

[h] Rule 704(a) -- Identifications

[i] Rule 704(a) -- Knowledge or Intent

[j] Rule 704(a) -- Medical Witnesses

[k] Rule 704(a) -- Negligence and Recklessness

[l] Rule 704(a) -- Opinions as to Reasonableness, Necessity, etc.

[m] Rule 704(a) -- Opinions on Legal Matters

[i] Rule 704(a) -- Civil Cases

[ii] Rule 704(a) -- Opinions on Legal Matters -- Criminal Cases

[A] Rule 704(a) -- Firearms

[B] Rule 704(a) -- Opinions on Legal Matters -- Criminal Cases -- Fraud

[C] Rule 704(a) -- Opinions on Legal Matters -- Criminal Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

[D] Rule 704(a) -- Opinions on Legal Matters -- Criminal Cases -- Taxes

[n] Rule 704(a) -- Patent Cases

[o] Rule 704(a) -- Product Liability Cases

[p] Rule 704(a) -- Unhelpful Opinions

[2] Rule 704(b)

[a] Rule 704(b) -- Constitutional Challenges

[b] Rule 704(b) -- Cross-Examination

[c] Rule 704(b) -- Hypotheticals Mirroring the Evidence

[i] Mental Conditions

[ii] Rule 704(b) -- Hypotheticals Mirroring the Evidence -- Mental Elements

[d] Rule 704(b) -- Knowledge

[e] Rule 704(b) -- Law Enforcement Agents

[i] Drug Cases

[ii] Rule 704(b) -- Law Enforcement Agents -- Other Cases

[f] Rule 704(b) -- Lay Witnesses

[g] Rule 704(b) -- Medical Opinions

[h] Rule 704(b) -- Mens Rea Evidence

[i] Rule 704(b) -- Polygraph Evidence

[j] Rule 704(b) -- Profile Evidence

[k] Rule 704(b) -- Specific Intent

[i] Rule 704(b) -- Drugs

[ii] Rule 704(b) -- Specific Intent -- Fraud and Tax Evasion

[iii] Rule 704(b) -- Specific Intent -- Miscellaneous Cases

[l] Rule 704(b) -- Unhelpful Opinions

704.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] Senate Report No. 98-225 (adding subdivision (b) in 1984)

[3] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 281 (1999)

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 704 RULE 704

3-704 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 704.01

704.01 Official Text

Rule 704. Opinion on Ultimate Issue

(a) Except as provided in subdivision (b), testimony in the form of an opinion or inference otherwise admissible is not objectionable because it embraces an ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact.

(b) No expert witness testifying with respect to the mental state or condition of a defendant in a criminal case may state an opinion or inference as to whether the defendant did or did not have the mental state or condition constituting an element of the crime charged or of a defense thereto. Such ultimate issues are matters for the trier of fact alone.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 704 RULE 704

3-704 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 704.02

704.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] General Rule on Ultimate Issue Testimony

In many jurisdictions evidence in the form of opinion is excluded if it purports to resolve the ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact. Prior to the enactment of the Rules, there had been a trend, particularly with expert witnesses, to allow opinion testimony on the ultimate issues, where such an opinion would be helpful to the trier of fact. This trend was especially noticeable in cases involving complex or technical issues.

The reasoning behind Rule 704(a) is that if a witness (especially an expert) provides a solid foundation and explanation on an issue for which the factfinder needs assistance, the factfinder might be left hanging if the witness cannot cap off the testimony with a conclusion about the ultimate issue to which the expert is testifying. Testimony is a narrative, and jurors can be upset and confused if a witness leaves them with testimony that is less than a full narrative -- it is like the joke without the punchline, the mystery without the last page. Particularly with respect to experts, a conclusion on the ultimate issue often ties the witness' testimony together into a coherent whole, and as such it will be more helpful to state the conclusion along with the rest of the opinion. The Rule also recognizes that a distinction between ultimate and other issues is elusive, and that common-law decisions attempting to draw such a distinction were often arbitrary and unpredictable.

Rule 704(a) permits ultimate issue testimony, but only if it will be helpful in accordance with Rule 701 or 702. The testimony will not be helpful if the witness simply gives a conclusion on an ultimate issue without disclosing his or her reasoning process or any predicate facts. But it might be helpful if the witness, especially in the course of explaining difficult matters, lends context to detailed testimony by then drawing a conclusion on an ultimate issue. n1

Experts and lay witnesses are technically treated alike under Rule 704. As a practical matter, however, an expert's opinion on an ultimate issue is more likely to be helpful, and hence admissible, n2 than the ultimate conclusion of a lay witness, because the ultimate conclusion of a lay witness is really no better than what the jury can do on its own. n3

[2] Jury Instructions

When a witness testifies to an ultimate issue, the Trial Judge may well be concerned that the jury may be confused as to its responsibility. This concern can be alleviated to some extent by an instruction to the jury that it is the sole judge of credibility, the sole finder of fact, and the sole judge of the proper inferences to be drawn from the credible facts. The Judge may want to note that jurors may find a witness to be credible and believe the basic facts to which the witness' testimony relates without sharing the conclusions drawn by the witness.

[3] Opinions on the Law

In the course of examining an expert, counsel should be sure that the witness does not go beyond the expert's proper role and intrude upon an important function of the Trial Judge, which is to instruct the jury as to the requirements of law that apply to the particular facts of the case. n4

For example, in United States v. Scop, 846 F.2d 135 (2d Cir. 1988) , the defendants were charged with violation of a statute prohibiting fraudulent and manipulative securities practices, by creating artificial price levels to lure unsuspecting investors. The expert, Stanley Whitten, a chief investigator for the SEC, declared throughout his testimony that the defendants had engaged in a "fraudulent and manipulative" scheme. The Court found that the expert consciously used the same formulation throughout his testimony, and concluded that this was impermissible under Rule 704(a):

> It is true that Rule 704 states that testimony in the form of an opinion or inference otherwise admissible is not objectionable because it embraces an ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact. However, Rule 704 was not intended to allow experts to offer opinions embodying legal conclusions.
>
> Had Whitten merely testified that controlled buying and selling of the kind alleged here can create artificial price levels to lure outside investors, no sustainable objection could have been made. Instead, however, Whitten made no attempt to couch the opinion testimony in even conclusory factual statements but drew directly upon the language of the statute and accompanying regulations concerning manipulation and fraud. In essence, his opinions were legal conclusions that were highly prejudicial and went well beyond his province as an expert in securities trading. Moreover, because his opinions were calculated to invade the province of the court to determine the applicable law and to instruct the jury as to that law, they could not have been helpful to the jury in carrying out its legitimate functions.

The Scop Court distinguished between ultimate legal conclusions and ultimate factual conclusions, by using examples from previously decided drug cases in which expert opinion testimony had been permitted:

> In United States v. Carson, 702 F.2d 351 (2d Cir. 1983) , two Drug Enforcement Agency agents were allowed to testify concerning their opinion that conduct they observed involved a narcotics transaction. ... In United States v. Young, 745 F.2d 733 (2d Cir. 1984) , a police detective was allowed to testify, based on his observations, that he believed a narcotics transaction had taken place. In the same case, a DEA agent testifying as an expert witness was permitted to describe a typical chain of heroin distribution, including the characteristics and operating methods of a heroin mill. The district judge instructed the jury that this general description was unrelated to the facts or circumstances of the particular case. The agent then was allowed to testify that what he found in defendant's apartment was precisely what he would have expected to find in a heroin mill. In United States v. Brown, 776 F.2d 397 (2d Cir. 1985) , a police officer testifying as an expert was permitted to describe a typical drug buy in Harlem, including the role of the steerer. He was then permitted to testify over objection that the defendant acted as a steerer in a transaction the officer had observed.
>
> None of our prior cases, however, has allowed testimony similar to Whitten's repeated use of statutory and regulatory language indicating guilt. For example, telling the jury that a defendant acted as a steerer or participated in a narcotics transaction differs from opining that the defendant "possessed narcotics, to wit, heroin, with intent to sell," or "aided and abetted the possession of heroin with intent to > sell," the functional equivalent of Whitten's testimony in a drug case. It is precisely this distinction, between ultimate factual conclusions that are dispositive of particular issues if believed, e.g., medical causation, and inadequately explored legal criteria, that is drawn by the Advisory Committee's Note [to Rule 704].

Despite the Scop Court's effort to distinguish ultimate factual conclusions from ultimate legal conclusions, the distinction is blurry at best in many cases. When the jury hears from an expert that the defendant acted as a steerer in a drug transaction, the testimony comes perilously close to an instruction on guilt. In our view, ultimate factual conclusions must also be closely regulated, and only permitted where they would truly assist the jury in a technical or specialized area. Regulating only legal conclusions is insufficient, because the ultimate factual conclusion can be just as unhelpful as a bald legal conclusion. We believe that the result in Scop is sound, but that the examples the Court sought to distinguish were not really distinguishable; the expert's testimony should have been excluded in each of those prior cases as well.

[4] Rule 704(b): Mental State or Condition in Criminal Cases

In 1984 Congress amended Rule 704 as part of its response to the insanity verdict rendered in John Hinckley's trial for the attempted assassination of President Reagan. See 18 U.S.C. §§ 4241-4247. The effect is to bar experts -- at least psychiatrists and psychologists n5-- from testifying that a criminal defendant either had or did not have the requisite mental state for committing the crime charged. The limitation imposed by subsection (b) applies only in criminal cases and only to expert testimony offered on the accused's mental state.

The final sentence of subdivision (b) captures the spirit of the amendment: the Judge or jury is to decide the mental state question, not the expert. Presumably, the drafters of the amendment hoped that it would prevent the expert from invading the province of the trier of fact, and that it would clarify the roles of experts and triers. In our view, however, there is no need for the amendment, and the Rule does more harm than good.

Rule 704(a) permits only helpful ultimate issue testimony. Rule 704(b) by definition prohibits helpful testimony that would otherwise be admissible under Rule 704(a). It follows that Rule 704(b) must by definition exclude helpful expert testimony. Otherwise it has no reason for being. Unhelpful ultimate issue testimony is already excluded under Rule 702. For example, the Court in United States v. Scop, which is discussed in § 704.02[3], held that the expert's ultimate issue testimony on the defendants' guilt was conclusory and unhelpful and therefore should have been excluded under Rule 702. The Court did not need, and did not rely on, Rule 704(b) to exclude the evidence. Thus, the only situation in which Rule 704(b) can have any effect is when it is invoked to exclude helpful expert testimony. But why on earth should we exclude helpful expert testimony?

In using Rule 702 prior to the amendment of Rule 704, Trial Judges did not have to concern themselves with the question whether an opinion was ultimate, mediate, or something else. They had only to decide whether it would assist the trier of fact in reaching a fair decision in the case. The advent of Rule 704(b) has led to sporadic enforcement and difficult problems in drawing lines, as is discussed below.

[5] Problems in Applying Rule 704(b)

Rule 704(b) does not totally prohibit experts from testifying in criminal cases involving disputes over mens rea or insanity. Nor does it bar experts from giving opinions in cases in which mental state or condition is an element of a crime or defense. Rather, the language prevents an expert from giving an opinion as to whether the defendant did or did not have the requisite mental state or condition. As one Court put it: "Congress did not enact Rule 704(b) so as to limit the flow of diagnostic and clinical information. Rather, the Rule changes the style of question and answer that can be used to establish both the offense and the defense thereto." n6

Dr. Park Elliott Dietz, who led the team that evaluated John Hinckley for the United States Attorney's office, has written that barring expert opinions on the ultimate issue creates line-drawing problems, for the attorney calling a favorable witness will seek to elicit testimony that approaches the ultimate issue as nearly as the Court will permit and the witness will provide. (Why the Experts Disagree: Variations in the Psychiatric Evaluation of Criminal Insanity, Annals of The American Academy of Political Science, January, 1985). We would add that the line-drawing, while necessary under the Rule, serves only to separate the helpful testimony that can be admitted from the helpful testimony that cannot.

The Seventh Circuit's decision in United States v. West, 962 F.2d 1243 (7th Cir. 1992) , provides an interesting example of the line-drawing that must be done between conclusions on the defendant's mental state and otherwise permissible expert testimony. It also shows how Rule 704(b) can subvert the search for truth. West was charged with bank robbery and his defense was insanity. The Trial Judge appointed a psychiatrist to examine West. The psychiatrist concluded that West was suffering from schizoaffective disorder, a severe mental disease. But he also concluded that West understood the wrongfulness of his actions when he robbed the bank. The government moved to exclude the psychiatrist's testimony, and the Trial Court agreed, reasoning that it would be outrageous to allow a defendant to call an expert to testify to a mental disorder, when that very expert has concluded that there was no causal relationship between the illness and the crime charged.

The Court of Appeals reversed in West. It reasoned that the psychiatrist's ultimate conclusion that West knew right from wrong was inadmissible under Rule 704(b). But Rule 704(b) did not operate to exclude the psychiatrist's conclusion that the defendant was suffering from a mental disease. The West Court, like the Trial Judge, was clearly concerned that the expert's testimony, bereft of its ultimate conclusion, would be misrepresentative. However, the Court believed that it was obligated to follow the rules Congress has made, and not rewrite or avoid them, however unwise they may be. Thus, while Rule 704(b) was intended to prevent distortion of the factfinding process, the decision in West illustrates that the Rule can actually lead to distortions of the factfinding process.

Nor is the negative impact of Rule 704(b) limited to the prosecution's presentation. Defendants have also suffered from Rule 704(b). For example, in United States v. Bennett, 161 F.3d 171 (3d Cir. 1998) , the defendant was charged with fraud, check-kiting, money-laundering, and filing false statements and tax returns. In a pretrial ruling, the Judge precluded the defendant's psychiatric expert from testifying that the defendant's mental disorders made it "unlikely that he could form the intent to defraud" and "affected his ability to knowingly and wilfully submit false statements to the I.R.S." So the jury was left with general testimony about the defendant's mental disorders without a sufficient explanation of how these disorders might have affected his culpability for the charged crimes.

Rule 704(b) has also been invoked to preclude defendants from introducing exculpatory polygraph evidence, on the ground that the expert's testimony that the defendant was truthful constitutes testimony as to the defendant's mental state. n7 Rule 704(b) has further been applied to preclude testimony as to the defendant's physiological responses to a polygraph, the Courts finding "no principled distinction" between such testimony and a conclusion that the defendant was telling the truth. n8 So the costs of Rule 704(b) are spread widely across criminal trials.

[6] Hypothetical Questions

Under Rule 704(b) the expert can testify concerning mental diseases, but is prohibited by Rule 704(b) from testifying to a causal relationship between the disease and the defendant's actions. The parties might understandably try to get around this limitation by asking the expert a hypothetical question, such as: Does this mental disease characteristically include an inability to understand the wrongfulness of one's acts?

Judge Manion, concurring in West, discussed in § 704.02[5], concluded that such a hypothetical question could not be asked because it would be an impermissible evasion of the restrictions of Rule 704(b). Some Courts have agreed with this conclusion. For example, in United States v. Manley, 893 F.2d 1221 (11th Cir. 1990) , defense counsel wanted to ask the expert whether a hypothetical person with the described mental disease would be able to appreciate the nature and quality of his or her actions. The Court of Appeals upheld the Trial Judge's decision to preclude an answer to that hypothetical, on the ground that it would be an impermissible end-run around Rule 704(b).

Most Courts, however have been more permissive in allowing an expert to testify about a hypothetical person's mental state. For example, in United States v. Brown, 32 F.3d 236 (7th Cir. 1994) , the defendant was charged with bank robbery and interposed an insanity defense. The prosecution's psychiatrist testified that Brown suffered from a major depressive disorder, and may have suffered some depressive episodes with psychotic features. Following the description of this diagnosis, the prosecutor asked the witness whether a person suffering from the disorder described was, by that reason alone, unable to understand the wrongfulness of his acts The witness answered in that such a person could still appreciate the wrongfulness of his acts. Brown objected that this was ultimate issue testimony as to his legal sanity, barred by Rule 704(b). But the Trial Judge denied the objection and the Seventh Circuit affirmed.

The Court of Appeals in Brown concluded that despite the prohibitory language of Rule 704(b), testimony may be adduced exploring the particular characteristics of the mental disease and whether those characteristics render one afflicted with the disease able to appreciate the wrongfulness or the nature and quality of his behavior. Relying on the finest of distinctions, the Court noted that the prosecution's expert never testified to Brown's particular mental state. Instead the expert merely described the mental disorder from which Brown suffered and explained that such an affliction does not preclude a person from appreciating the nature or quality of his acts. Because the expert testimony was not specific to Brown's mental state but rather concerned the characteristics of his mental disorder, it was permitted by Rule 704(b). The expert never said "Brown had the requisite mental state to commit the crime." n9 It is clear that the Court in Brown was struggling with the Rule, and indeed it was critical of the Rule. The Court declared that the Rule had the misguided purpose of requiring jurors to decide the issue of sanity without being told what conclusion an expert would draw. Such a result is counterproductive because it denies juries the specialized knowledge of experts in just the type of complex case in which it is most useful.

Another example of fine line-drawing arose in United States v. Thigpen, 4 F.3d 1573 (11th Cir. 1993) (en banc), where the Court found no error in allowing the prosecutor to ask a series of questions to elicit an opinion as to whether schizophrenia by necessity implies that a person would be unable to appreciate the nature and quality of his acts. The Court stated that these questions were permissible because the prosecutor never asked the witness to opine whether Thigpen was able to appreciate the wrongfulness of his actions. The Court concluded as follows:

> While a thinly veiled hypothetical may not be used to circumvent Rule 704(b), the rule does not bar an explanation of the disease and its typical effect on a person's mental state.

The line drawn by the Court in Thigpen is between a hypothetical that includes virtually all of the characteristics of the defendant (i.e., a thinly veiled hypothetical), and a more general hypothetical about the nature of the disease and its effect on human conduct.

But this is hardly a bright line; and it is often meaningless to distinguish between general hypotheticals and thinly veiled hypotheticals. n10 For example, in United States v. Kristiansen, 901 F.2d 1463 (8th Cir. 1990) , the defendant was charged with escape from a halfway house. He claimed that he lacked willful intent due to insanity. Kristiansen's expert psychiatrist testified that Kristiansen had been under the influence of cocaine and suffered from psychosis. On cross-examination, the prosecutor asked: "Would this severe mental disease affect the individual's ability to appreciate the nature and quality of the wrongfulness of his acts?" The Trial Judge sustained an objection, and the Court of Appeals affirmed, reasoning that this was a hypothetical question designed to elicit testimony on the ultimate issue of intent.

On the other hand, the Court in Kristiansen held that the defendant should have been permitted to ask: "Could the severe mental disease affect the ability of an individual to appreciate the nature of the quality or the wrongfulness of his acts?" The Court of Appeals reasoned as follows:

> [T]he defense should have been permitted to ask this question because it relates to the symptoms and qualities of the disease itself and does not call for an answer that describes Kristiansen's culpability at the time of the crime. Rule 704(b) was not meant to prohibit testimony that describes the qualities of a mental disease.

There is obviously little difference between the two questions put to the expert in Kristiansen, yet the Court specifically held that one was permissible under Rule 704(b) and one was not. Thus, it is clear that the Rule as applied by the Courts calls for some fine line-drawing. Counsel would do well to craft their questions with care and to make certain that the question calls for a description of the mental disease rather than a conclusion about the defendant's mental state at the time of the crime. Thus, counsel is not permitted to ask, "Would a person suffering from the defendant's condition be able to appreciate the nature and quality of his actions?" But counsel is apparently permitted to ask, "Would the defendant's condition affect the ability of a person suffering from that condition to appreciate the nature and quality of his actions?" n11 So long as counsel is asking about the condition and not the defendant, the hypothetical can be loaded up with details that mirror the facts of the case.

[7] Law Enforcement Experts and Criminal Intent

It might appear that the amendment makes it more difficult for the prosecutor to use expert testimony even in cases where the technical defense of insanity is not raised. The prosecution often calls law enforcement agents as experts, and this testimony often has a bearing on the defendant's mental state. For example, the agent might be called to explain coded language on a surveillance tape, or to explain the modus operandi of drug dealers, or to explain that possession of a certain quantity of drugs is inconsistent with personal use. All of this testimony says something about the defendant's intent.

It could be argued that any testimony from an expert that bears upon the defendant's mental state should be excluded under Rule 704(b). But the Courts have not read the Rule that way. So long as the expert does not testify that the defendant acted with criminal intent, Courts have generally found the Rule 704(b) proscription inapplicable. n12

A typical case is United States v. Williams, 980 F.2d 1463 (D.C. Cir. 1992) . The prosecution's expert in a drug case testified that the more than 100 ziplock bags containing small amounts of drugs, which were found in a police raid on a premises, were meant to be distributed at street level. The defendant argued that this testimony impermissibly referred to his intent to distribute drugs. But the Court found that the expert's opinion did not violate the Rule 704(b) prohibition. It reasoned that the expert did not explicitly testify that the defendant had the mental state necessary to commit the crime charged. Rather, this testimony addressed the intentions of a hypothetical individual, not Williams in particular. Of course there was no hypothetical individual in front of the jury, only Williams, so it is apparent that the limitations imposed by the Court on mens rea testimony are ephemeral at best. n13

Some Courts have suggested that Rule 704(b) is applicable only to psychiatric and medical expert testimony. For example, United States v. Lipscomb, 14 F.3d 1236 (7th Cir. 1994) , involved typical expert testimony from drug enforcement agents, to the effect that the seized drugs were for street level distribution. The Court began by noting that Courts applying Rule 704(b) would typically find this testimony admissible, because the expert did not say that the particular defendant had an intent to distribute drugs. The Court found, however, that this distinction was relatively useless when applied to the testimony of law enforcement agent-experts:

> In the first place, though officers did not in fact say "intent" or "intended," they may as well have, for the effect would have been exactly the same. If the drugs found on Lipscomb were for street sale distribution, as each of the officers testified, then Lipscomb possessed them for that purpose; he intended to distribute them. Further, it would seem to make little difference that the officers' opinions were based on an analysis of the external circumstances of the arrest, for the officers still would have stated an opinion or inference as to whether the defendant did or did not have the mental state or condition > constituting an element of the crime charged, and this is what Rule 704(b) forbids.

Rather than admit outright that the Courts have simply ignored Rule 704(b), or that the Rule as promulgated makes no sense, the Lipscomb Court entertained the proposition that Rule 704(b) was never intended to apply to the testimony of law enforcement agent-experts:

> All this assumes, however, that Rule 704(b) does in fact apply to the officers' testimony, an assumption worth questioning in view of the courts' apparent reluctance to rigorously enforce the rule in similar cases. Indeed, there is reason to think that the rule states only a very limited exception to the general rule, set forth in Rule 704(a), that witnesses may give opinions on ultimate issues. ... [I]t is evident that Rule 704(b) was designed to avoid the confusion and illogic of translating the medical concepts relied upon by psychiatrists and other mental health experts into legal conclusions.

The Court concluded that the most sensible way to read the Rule, in light of its terms and purposes, is to apply it only to testimony based on a psychiatric or medical analysis of the defendant's mental processes. n14

The Lipscomb Court was ultimately unprepared, however, to conclude that Rule 704(b) was completely inapplicable to law enforcement agent-expert testimony. It came to the following conclusion:

> Notwithstanding these alternatives, we simply cannot ignore the fact that this court and others have routinely assumed that Rule 704(b) imposes an additional limitation, however slight, on the expert testimony of law enforcement officials. To reconcile that fact with our impression that the rule is of more limited scope, we conclude that when a law enforcement official states an opinion about the criminal nature of a defendant's activities, such testimony should not be excluded under Rule 704(b) as long as it is made clear, either by the court expressly or in the nature of the examination, that the opinion is based on the expert's knowledge of common criminal practices, and not on some special knowledge of the defendant's mental processes. Relevant in this regard, though not determinative, is the degree to which the expert refers specifically to the intent of the defendant, for this may indeed suggest, improperly, that the opinion is based on some special knowledge of the defendant's mental processes. n15

Most important was the Lipscomb Court's reminder that even if the law enforcement expert's testimony is not prohibited by Rule 704(b), it must still be helpful to the jury under Rule 702; and it cannot be unduly prejudicial or confusing, or else it is subject to exclusion under Rule 403.

Other Courts have rejected the argument that Rule 704(b) applies only to psychiatric and psychological testimony. As the Court stated in United States v. Morales, 108 F.3d 1031, 1036 (9th Cir. 1997) : "The language of Rule 704(b) is perfectly plain. It does not limit its reach to psychiatrists and other mental health experts. Its reach extends to all expert witnesses."

Any differences among the Circuits on this matter, however, are of little practical effect. Assuming the Rule reaches all experts, in most Circuits the limitation imposed by the Rule is so minimal that for the Rule to be violated, an expert would probably have to say, point blank, that the defendant intended (or did not intend) to commit the crime. n16 If the witness has to go that far to violate Rule 704(b), he also violates Rule 702, because his testimony is clearly of no assistance to the jury.

We share the Lipscomb Court's concern over the dangers inherent when law enforcement agents essentially instruct the jury to find the defendant guilty. We agree, however, that Rule 704(b) is unnecessary to rectify these dangers. Rather, the Court should require that the proffered testimony actually adds something important to the jury's understanding of the facts, otherwise the testimony should be excluded under Rule 702. Moreover, in some cases, even if the testimony is somewhat helpful, it might be unduly prejudicial and so subject to exclusion under Rule 403. Finally, if ultimate conclusions are allowed to be drawn, it is important to provide a limiting instruction that the expert has no special insight into the defendant's mental state and that the jury is the final arbiter of whether the prosecution has proved the elements of the crime.

There are occasional cases in which a Court has said enough is enough, and has found error when an expert's conclusion on a mental state is couched in a hypothetical that mirrors the facts of the case. For example, in United States v. Smart, 98 F.3d 1379 (D.C. Cir. 1996) , a narcotics case, a law enforcement agent was permitted to testify, on the basis of hypothetical facts identical to those in the case, that the facts met the "elements of drug distribution." The Court recognized that the witness never referred directly to the defendant's intent. However, he might as well have done so, given the explicit reference to the "elements" of drug trafficking, the crime with which the defendant was charged. The Court concluded that the use of the word "elements" carries "legal connotations that could have misled the jury into thinking that Detective Thomas was speculating on the ultimate legal issue of whether Smart had the requisite intent to distribute drugs." The Court noted that a Rule 704(b) violation could have been avoided if the Trial Court had instructed the jury that the expert was not qualified to testify on the ultimate issue of intent. But the Trial Court gave no such instruction. n17

[8] Constitutional Challenges

Rule 704(b) has been challenged by some defendants on the ground that its exclusion of ultimate issue testimony violates the defendant's constitutional right to an effective defense. These challenges have been rejected. For example, in United States v. Austin, 981 F.2d 1163 (10th Cir. 1992) , the Court held that the Rule served legitimate state interests and thus withstood constitutional attack:

> Rule 704(b) promotes fairness by eliminating confusing and often conflicting expert testimony concerning the ultimate legal issue to be found by the trier of fact. ... The rule prevents a confusing battle of the experts and preserves the decision on the ultimate issue of state of mind for the jury, rather than leaving it in the hands of retained experts. n18

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., Fiataruolo v. United States, 8 F.3d 930 (2d Cir. 1993) (in an action for refund of tax penalties assessed against responsible persons for a contractor's unpaid withholding taxes, the Court held there was no error in permitting an expert to opine that the plaintiff was not a responsible person under the statute, as the opinion was not a simple bald assertion of law but based on a detailed explanation of the factual situation); United States v. Buchanan, 787 F.2d 477 (10th Cir. 1986) (in a firearms case, a government witness was properly permitted to testify that a device was required to be registered; the testimony went to an ultimate fact but could have helped the jury; the witness explained in detail the basis of his opinion and the manner in which he came to his conclusion).

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Two Eagle, 318 F.3d 785 (8th Cir. 2003) (in a trial for assault involving "extreme physical pain" and "protracted and obvious disfigurement", it was not error to allow medical experts to testify that the injuries to the victims included disfigurement and extreme physical pain; the Court noted that the expert's testimony on an ultimate question was helpful to the jury and that exclusion of these opinions would "render a medical expert's testimony generally inadmissible if the medical expert used common descriptive terms that also appear in the statute"); Phillips v. Calhoun, 956 F.2d 949 (10th Cir. 1992) (city personnel directors with experience in municipal personnel matters were properly permitted to give affidavits concerning the customary meaning and usage of critical terms in the city's charter and other personnel documents; the affiants were not stating legal conclusions, but only offering informed opinion concerning the real-world signification of the terms).

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., Slayton v. Ohio Dept. of Youth Services, 206 F.3d 669 (6th Cir. 2000) (if lay witnesses had testified that the plaintiff had suffered illegal discrimination, this would have been impermissible, because "it seldom will be the case that a lay opinion on an ultimate issue will meet the test of being helpful to the trier of fact since the jury's opinion is as good as the witness' and the witness turns into little more than an oath helper"; however, in this case the witnesses only used the term "sexual harassment", in a colloquial and not a legal sense); Mitroff v. Xomox Corp., 797 F.2d 271 (6th Cir. 1986) (the plaintiff should not have been permitted to testify and have another lay witness testify that an assistant personnel manager working for the defendant stated that the defendant engaged in a pattern of age discrimination; testimony by a lay witness on an ultimate issue will rarely if ever be helpful to the trier of fact).

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., Snap-Drape, Inc. v. Commissioner, 98 F.3d 194 (5th Cir. 1996) (in a tax case, expert witness reports supporting the taxpayer's construction of the law were properly excluded; the taxpayer's reliance on Rule 704(a) was misplaced, because that Rule does not allow an expert to render conclusions of law); United States v. Weitzenhoff, 1 F.3d 1523 (9th Cir. 1993) ("[t]he court's admission of expert testimony on contested issues of law in lieu of instructing the jury was manifestly erroneous under Rule 704"); Adalman v. Baker, Watts & Co., 807 F.2d 359 (4th Cir. 1986) (in a securities action, testimony of legal counsel to a partnership as to the meaning and applicability of securities laws to transactions at issue was not admissible; Rule 704(a) abolishes the proscription on ultimate issue opinions, but it does not permit the expert witness to usurp the province of the judge.).

(n5)Footnote 5. The applicability of Rule 704(b) to experts other than psychiatrists and psychologists is discussed in § 704.02[7].

(n6)Footnote 6. United States v. Edwards, 819 F.2d 262, 265 (11th Cir. 1987) .

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Morales, 108 F.3d 1031 (9th Cir. 1997) .

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Campos, 217 F.3d 707 (9th Cir. 2000) .

(n9)Footnote 9. See also United States v. Dixon, 185 F.3d 393 (5th Cir. 1999) (no error in permitting an expert to testify that a person suffering from the defendant's mental disease "could still be able to appreciate the nature and quality or the wrongfulness of his acts"; the expert "merely stated that the presence of a mental illness does not answer, or contain a necessary inference that would answer, the ultimate issue"); United States v. Salamanca, 990 F.2d 629 (D.C. Cir. 1993) (an expert was permitted to testify that a person who drank as much as the defendant would have a diminished capacity to seek and plan).

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., United States v. Levine, 80 F.3d 129 (5th Cir. 1996) (finding no error where a psychologist was asked to assume facts that mirrored the events of the bank robbery, and gave an opinion that the facts were inconsistent with behavior that would be expected from someone suffering from bipolar disorder, the mental condition claimed by the defendant; hypothetical questions mirroring the fact pattern of the evidence are violative of Rule 704(b) only when the answering testimony contains a necessary inference as to whether the defendant did or did not have the mental state or condition constituting an element of the crime charged or of a defense thereto; the expert did not offer an opinion as to whether the defendant did or did not have the mental state or condition constituting an element of the offenses charged; rather, the expert's testimony focused on whether facts similar to those in evidence were consistent with the conduct of a hypothetical person suffering a severe manic episode).

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Davis, 835 F.2d 274 (11th Cir. 1988) (it was permissible to ask whether a person diagnosed with multiple personalities could be capable of appreciating what he or she was doing; this question sought an explanation of the disease and its typical effect on a person's mental state; it did not ask the expert to draw a conclusion as to whether the defendant actually had the requisite mental state).

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., United States v. Plunk, 153 F.3d 1011 (9th Cir. 1998) (law enforcement expert's translation of a coded conversation did not violate Rule 704(b); the officer simply interpreted the conversations, "allowing the jurors to determine for themselves the legal significance of the conversations as interpreted"). Compare United States v. Wood, 207 F.3d 1222 (10th Cir. 2000) (doctor charged with murder and lesser included offenses arising from treatment of a patient; it was error to admit expert testimony that the defendant's treatment was "reckless" and constituted a "homicide"; such testimony "necessarily dictates the final conclusion that Dr. Wood possessed the requisite mens rea for involuntary manslaughter").

(n13)Footnote 13. See also United States v. Younger, 398 F.3d 1179 (9th Cir. 2005) (no error in permitting an agent to testify that in his experience he had never known a person in the defendant's circumstances to be only a user and not a dealer; the agent did not testify about the defendant specifically and denied having any particular knowledge about the defendant or what his intent may have been); United States v. Brumley, 217 F.3d 905 (7th Cir. 2000) (no error in permitting expert to testify that amounts of metamphetamine in excess of one ounce were for distribution rather than personal use; the expert did not purport to base the testimony on some special knowledge of the defendant's mental state); United States v. Watson, 171 F.3d 695 (D.C. Cir. 1999) (no error in the admission of expert testimony that someone possessing the "equivalent of 700 bags of crack cocaine is in the business of making money selling drugs"; Rule 704(b) proscribes only responses suggesting some special knowledge of the defendant's mental state, not general testimony regarding the modus operandi of drug dealers); United States v. Valle, 72 F.3d 210 (1st Cir. 1995) (a narcotics detective was properly permitted to testify that the quantity of crack cocaine found at a search site was consistent with distribution as opposed to personal use; the witness offered no opinion as to the defendant's intent, but instead permitted the jury to draw its own conclusions).

(n14)Footnote 14. See also United States v. Gastiaburo, 16 F.3d 582 (4th Cir. 1994) (stating that Rule 704(b) does not apply to testimony of a law enforcement agent); United States v. Richard, 969 F.2d 849 (10th Cir. 1992) (suggesting, without deciding, that Rule 704(b) is limited to psychiatric and medical testimony).

(n15)Footnote 15. See also United States v. Willis, 61 F.3d 526 (7th Cir. 1995) (finding no error when a law enforcement agent was permitted to testify that he had never had a drug case where the courier didn't know what he was carrying; the Court reiterated its position that Rule 704(b) does not limit law enforcement opinion testimony, so long as it is made clear that the opinion is based on the expert's knowledge of common criminal practices, and not on some special knowledge of the defendant's mental processes).

(n16)Footnote 16. Some Courts are more serious than others about policing law enforcement testimony that mirrors the facts of the case. See, e.g., United States v. Mendoza-Medina, 346 F.3d 121 (5th Cir. 2003) (agent's testimony that couriers have knowledge that they are carrying drugs and often bring their wives and children with them while transporting drugs; these characteristics mirrored the facts of the case and the testimony was barred by Rule 704(b) even though the witness did not say "the magic words" that the defendant was knowingly transporting the drugs).

For a further discussion on testimony by law enforcement agents bearing on the defendant's criminal intent, and the limits of Rule 704(b), see Capra, A Recipe for Confusion: Congress and the Federal Rules of Evidence, 55 U. Miami L. Rev. 691 (2001).

(n17)Footnote 17. See also United States v. Boyd, 55 F.3d 667 (D.C. Cir. 1995) (the defendant was convicted of possession with intent to distribute cocaine, after a law enforcement officer was allowed to testify that, in his opinion, the hypothetical facts posed by the prosecutor showed possession with intent to distribute; the hypothetical facts exactly mirrored the facts leading up to the defendant's arrest; this was reversible error; the Court stated that it had never held that the Government may simply recite a list of hypothetical facts that exactly mirror the case at hand and then ask an expert to give an opinion as to whether such facts prove an intention to distribute narcotics).

(n18)Footnote 18. See also United States v. Salamanca, 990 F.2d 629 (D.C. Cir. 1993) (finding no violation of compulsory process rights in excluding a psychologist's testimony as to whether the defendant had the mental state necessary to commit the crime; the Judge permitted the expert to opine about the capacities of a person of the purported mental condition of the defendant who had consumed the quantity of beer the defendant had on the night of the assault); United States v. Blumberg, 961 F.2d 787 (8th Cir. 1992) (Rule 704(b) does not violate the defendant's due process right to present relevant expert opinion evidence in support of his insanity defense; the Rule allows admission of every fact about the defendant's mental condition, including the expert's diagnosis, the characteristics of the condition, and the expert's opinion about the defendant's mental state and motivation at the time of the crime; it only forbids experts from telling the jury what its finding should be on the ultimate issue in the case; the Court also rejected an equal protection challenge, finding a rational basis for the distinction between criminal defendants -- to whom the Rule applies -- and other litigants dealing with insanity issues).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 704 RULE 704

3-704 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 704.03

704.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Rule 704(a)

[a] Rule 704(a) -- Cause of Accident

Miksis v. Howard, 106 F.3d 754 (7th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a plaintiff's judgment in a personal injury action, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a sleep deprivation expert to testify that the defendant driver was fatigued and that sleep deprivation was a primary cause of the accident. There were factual disputes on those issues for which the expert's testimony could be helpful.

Scheerer v. Hardee's Food Sys., 148 F.3d 1036 (8th Cir. 1998) : In a slip and fall case, the Court found no error when defense counsel was permitted to elicit from the plaintiff's friend that the friend had said, at the time of the accident, that the accident had been caused by the plaintiff's wearing slippery shoes. Because the friend's contemporaneous statement was rationally based on her own first-hand perceptions and reasonably would have aided the jury's understanding of a fact in issue, it was admissible under Rule 701. The Court concluded that "because Mrs. Fann's contemporaneous statement of opinion was 'otherwise admissible,' it was not objectionable merely because it embraced an ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact."

[b] Rule 704(a) -- Cause of Disease or Injury

Williams v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 922 F.2d 1357 (8th Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a personal injury action brought by a store customer who allegedly suffered back injuries when a shelf display collapsed on him. It was plain error to refuse to allow the plaintiff to ask his medical experts whether he experienced a trauma to his back. The question was not tantamount to asking whether in their opinion the alleged incident actually occurred.

[c] Rule 704(a) -- Civil Rights Cases

Hygh v. Jacobs, 961 F.2d 359 (2d Cir. 1992) : In a civil rights action by an arrestee who alleged that excessive force was used, the plaintiff's expert testified that the arresting officer had used "deadly physical force" that was "totally improper" and for which there was no "real legitimate reason" in the circumstances. The Court held that the expert's definition of physical force was an impermissible legal conclusion not substantially different from the statutory formulation charged to the jury and that the opinions that the plaintiff's conduct was not justified or warranted should have been excluded (but the error was harmless).

Slakan v. Porter, 737 F.2d 368 (4th Cir. 1984) : Affirming a judgment for an inmate against prison guards in a civil rights suit, the Court found no error in the admission of expert testimony concerning the punitive nature of North Carolina's practice of using water hoses on inmates.

Salas v. Carpenter, 980 F.2d 299 (5th Cir. 1992) : In denying summary judgment to a sheriff sued for the alleged deprivation of a hostage's civil rights in his handling of negotiations with a gunman at the courthouse, the Trial Judge excluded the sheriff's affidavit regarding his objectives on the occasion as containing ultimate facts and admitted an affidavit by the plaintiff's expert on hostage negotiations that stated that the sheriff acted with deliberate indifference and conscious disregard. Reversing, the Court held that the sheriff's statement of his intent was not opinion testimony, but factual evidence of his mental state, and that the expert's opinions of the sheriff's state of mind would not be helpful to a jury.

Berry v. City of Detroit, 25 F.3d 1342 (6th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a judgment against the City in a civil rights case, holding it was error for the plaintiff's expert in "police policies and practices" to testify that the lax discipline policies of the police department indicated that the City was "deliberately indifferent" to the welfare of its citizens, as that is a legal term for the ultimate question of liability to be decided by the jury. In Heflin v. Stewart County, Tenn., 958 F.2d 709 (6th Cir. 1992) , reh'g granted on other grounds, 968 F.2d 1 (6th Cir. 1992) , the Court held that an expert who characterized the conduct of sheriff's personnel who found a detainee hanging in his cell as demonstrating deliberate indifference was merely emphasizing his view of the seriousness of the defendants' failures and not offering a legal conclusion. In Shahid v. City of Detroit, n1 a civil rights action brought for alleged failure to provide medical care to a jail inmate prior to his death, the Court held there was no error in excluding testimony by the plaintiff's expert that the defendant officers had been negligent, because the expert assumed a fact to be determined by the jury and because the expert's opinion amounted to an impermissible "legal conclusion."

Phillips v. Calhoun, 956 F.2d 949 (10th Cir. 1992) : Affirming a summary judgment for the defendant in a civil rights action by an attorney discharged by a city, the Court held that city personnel directors with experience in municipal personnel matters were properly permitted to give affidavits concerning the customary meaning and usage of critical terms in the city's charter and other personnel documents. The affiants were not stating legal conclusions, but only offering informed opinion concerning the real-world significance of the terms. See also Zuchel v. City & County of Denver, Colo., 997 F.2d 730 (10th Cir. 1993) (an expert in a § 1983 action against a municipality was properly permitted to testify that an officer's use of deadly force was inappropriate, where he did not give an opinion that the officer's conduct was unconstitutional). In McEwen v. City of Norman, Okla., n2 a civil rights action alleging that excessive force was used during the chase and arrest of a motorcyclist after a collision with a police car, the Court noted that the defendant's expert witness on police procedures had rendered opinions that indicated to the jury the precise result they should reach on certain matters, such as the officers' intention in positioning their cars and whether they used excessive force as testified by others. At most, however, the testimony was not helpful, and the jury was not likely to be misled because of complete and explicit cautionary instructions, so there was no plain error in its admission.

[d] Rule 704(a) -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Glover, 265 F.3d 337 (6th Cir. 2001) : To prove that the defendant in a carjacking case took a motor vehicle that had been transported, shipped, or received in interstate or foreign commerce, an agent of the National Insurance Crime Bureau, who had expertise in interpreting vehicle identification numbers, testified, on the basis of the VIN, that the car had been manufactured abroad and transported to a local dealer who sold the vehicle. Affirming, the Court held that this testimony did not usurp the role of the jury, and was permissible to help the jury interpret the VIN to determine the place of manufacture of the victim's vehicle.

United States v. Seschillie, 310 F.3d 1208 (9th Cir. 2002) : The defendant, charged in connection with an incident involving four shootings, claimed that each occurred accidentally when people were struggling over a gun. The Trial Judge permitted a criminologist to describe several scenarios that can lead to an accidental discharge, but did not allow him either to give an opinion whether the shootings in this case were accidental or to identify facts in the witnesses' testimony that were consistent with accidental discharge. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the Judge's conclusions that the jury could determine, as a matter of "common sense," whether the shootings as described by the witnesses were accidental according to the expert's theories, and that the jury would not be assisted in that determination by any specialized knowledge.

[e] Rule 704(a) -- Damages

Salas v. Wang, 846 F.2d 897 (3d Cir. 1988) : In a medical malpractice case brought on behalf of a child who suffered severe brain damage, the Court concluded that it was not reversible error to permit a plaintiff's expert to testify as to aggregate damages, since the expert might have been able to assist the jury in performing calculations, such as a reduction of a lump sum award to present value. The Court rejected the argument that the expert's opinion might have an undue influence on the jury, concluding that the argument "is at odds with both the letter and the spirit of the federal rules, which encourage the use of expert testimony to render trials more rational and efficient."

Smith v. Ingersoll-Rand Co., 214 F.3d 1235 (10th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a product liability action against the manufacturer of a machine for removing road pavement, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony from a forensic economist regarding hedonic damages. There was a sufficient finding that the expert's testimony explaining the concept of hedonic damages was relevant and reliable, and the expert did not apply the facts of this case to the criteria he proffered or give his opinion of the hedonic damages appropriate in this case.

[f] Rule 704(a) -- Employment Discrimination Cases

Slayton v. Ohio Dep't of Youth Servs., 206 F.3d 669 (6th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in her Title VII action for a hostile work environment, the Court found no error in admitting testimony by two agency officials who concluded that if the plaintiff's assertions of fact were true, then the plaintiff had been subjected to "sexual harassment" within the meaning of the internal policy of the employing agency. The Court noted that while lay testimony embracing an ultimate issue is specifically allowed by Rule 704(a), it will seldom be helpful to the trier of fact. In this case, however, the witnesses were not giving testimony on an ultimate issue, as they did not refer to Title VII liability, but expressly addressed only the internal agency policy. The Judge's instructions were sufficient to cure any confusion between statutory and agency standards of "sexual harassment." In an age discrimination case, Mitroff v. Xomox Corp., n3 the Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff because witnesses testified that an assistant personnel manager for the defendant had stated that the corporation engaged in a pattern of age discrimination. The declarant was not qualified as an expert on the subject, and as a lay witness, his opinion on the ultimate issue was, as usual, not helpful to the trier of fact. Furthermore, the evidence was highly prejudicial. In an age discrimination case, Davis v. Combustion Eng'g, Inc., n4 the Court upheld the admission of expert testimony for the plaintiff by a witness who concluded that age was the reason for the termination of the plaintiff's employment. The Court indicated that the expert's conclusion that the discrimination was unlawful might have been objectionable because the expert used a legal criterion not clearly articulated, but it found that the expert's unfamiliarity with the governing federal statute had been plainly pointed out to the jury so that any error was harmless. In Torres v. County of Oakland, n5 the Court held that it was error (but harmless) for a witness, who had taken part in the selection of a person for a new supervisory position, to give an opinion as to whether the plaintiff had been discriminated against because of national origin. This called for an impermissible legal conclusion.

[g] Rule 704(a) -- Government Agents

United States v. Garcia, 413 F.3d 201 (2d Cir. 2005) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) when a case agent was permitted to testify, "based on [our] investigation" or "[a]s far as our investigation determined," regarding the roles of certain participants, including the defendant, in a drug conspiracy. Although opinion testimony is not inadmissible simply because it embraces an ultimate issue, the agent's opinion that the defendant was a partner with another in receiving cocaine "was essentially telling the jury that he had concluded that Garcia was guilty of the crimes charged," and opinion testimony merely telling the jury what result to reach is inadmissible.

United States v. Mohney, 949 F.2d 1397 (6th Cir. 1991) : In a tax evasion prosecution, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an IRS agent to opine that currency obtained in a business had not been reported as part of the gross receipts, as the opinion did not usurp the jury's function of determining guilt but was helpful to the jury in understanding the transactions and the agent's opinion that tax was due and owing.

United States v. Hughes, 15 F.3d 798 (8th Cir. 1994) : An expert testified that the purity level of crack cocaine found in the defendant's pocket was the same as the purity level of crack found in his trunk and that it is unusual to find two batches with the same purity level. Distinguishing United States v. Arenal, infra, the Court held that in this case, the jury was allowed to draw its own conclusion whether the two exhibits of crack were from the same source or batch. In United States v. Arenal, n6 the Court reversed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, concluding that a police officer should not have been permitted to testify that cocaine would seem to have come from a common source because it was "cut" in the same way. The Court indicated that the officer could have properly testified that Inositol is used to cut cocaine, but that at the street level it was common to find various cutting agents used, and that the conclusion offered by the officer added nothing that would have helped the jury.

United States v. Kinsey, 843 F.2d 383 (9th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed cocaine convictions, holding that a detective was properly permitted to testify to an opinion that a defendant was involved in distributing drugs based upon the amount of cocaine that he had and its street value.

United States v. Nixon, 918 F.2d 895 (11th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed drug distribution conspiracy convictions, holding there was no error in denying a motion for mistrial after a detective used the term "conspiracy" in his testimony, as it was clear he was using the term as a factual, not a legal, conclusion and did not track unduly the statutory definition of the offense. In United States v. Burchfield, n7 the Court upheld convictions for counterfeiting offenses, finding that it was proper for a government agent to testify to the modus operandi of counterfeiters -- i.e., that it was common for conspirators to divide functions so that one carries a "bag" containing large sums of counterfeit money while another actually passes the counterfeit money.

[h] Rule 704(a) -- Identifications

United States v. Bice-Bey, 701 F.2d 1086 (4th Cir. 1983) : Upholding a conviction for credit card fraud involving a telephone order for electronic equipment, the Court found that an FBI agent was properly permitted to identify the voice on a tape as appellant's, even though one principal issue in the case was who made the fraudulent call. In United States v. Sellers, n8 the Court reversed a bank robbery conviction because the defendant's photo expert was not permitted to testify that the defendant was not the person shown in bank surveillance pictures, although the government's expert was allowed to testify that identification of the bandit by these particular pictures was impossible. The Court, citing Rule 704, assumed both opinions were admissible.

[i] Rule 704(a) -- Knowledge or Intent

United States v. Rea, 958 F.2d 1206 (2d Cir. 1992) : The Court held, in a prosecution for willful evasion of gasoline excise taxes, that it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony by a lay witness to the transactions at issue that a defendant "had to" know that the purpose of the scheme for invoicing sales was to permit tax evasion. Even though the showing of a rational basis for the opinion was inadequate at the time it was offered, that foundation was eventually supplied; however, the opinion was not helpful to the jury, who not only knew what the witness had described but also knew more of the defendant's industry experience and of the contents of the defendant's records than the witness.

Bauman v. Centex Corp., 611 F.2d 1115 (5th Cir. 1980) : The Court found that an expert's opinion referring to the intent or knowledge of corporate management would have been helpful to the jury.

[j] Rule 704(a) -- Medical Witnesses

United States v. Johnson, 637 F.2d 1224 (9th Cir. 1980) : In a prosecution for assault resulting in serious bodily injury, the Court upheld the introduction of a doctor's testimony that the victim suffered serious bodily injury, where the doctor made it clear which facts he relied upon and the defendant was free to cross-examine the doctor.

[k] Rule 704(a) -- Negligence and Recklessness

Hermitage Indus. v. Schwerman Trucking Co., 814 F. Supp. 484 (D.S.C. 1993) : The Court granted the plaintiff's in limine motion to preclude the defendant's expert in a negligence case from testifying that the plaintiff was "negligent" and that the plaintiff's conduct was a "direct, proximate and efficient cause" of the explosion. The Judge held that "testimony by a witness in the form of a legal conclusion is clearly inadmissible."

Owen v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 698 F.2d 236 (5th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed a judgment in favor of a bulldozer operator who sued a gas pipeline operator claiming that the operator's negligence in placing the pipeline resulted in its being struck by the bulldozer. The Court upheld the exclusion of an expert opinion, based on all the evidence and the exhibits, as to the cause of the accident. Although Rule 704 removed restrictions on testimony as to ultimate issues, it did not open the door to "questions which would merely allow the witness to tell the jury what result to reach." Moreover, the Court expressed concern that when the expert was permitted to testify as to whether the plaintiff was following proper practices in handling the bulldozer, the expert was being asked to give an opinion as to the legal, rather than factual, cause of the accident. See also Matthews v. Ashland Chem., Inc. n9(the Trial Judge did not err in excluding, as a legal conclusion, expert testimony that the user's premises were "ultrahazardous or unreasonably dangerous").

United States v. Sheffey, 57 F.3d 1419 (6th Cir. 1995) : The defendant was charged with murder and assault after an automobile collision in which he was driving impaired with prescription drugs and alcohol. At trial eyewitnesses were asked whether the defendant had driven "recklessly, in extreme disregard of human life." The Court held that although the question embraced the terms of the jury instruction on malice aforethought, these terms do not have a separate, distinct, and specialized meaning in the law different from that present in the vernacular, so the witnesses were not being called on to provide unhelpful legal conclusions. In McGowan v. Cooper Indus., n10 the Court reversed a judgment for the manufacturer of an air compressor that exploded and injured the plaintiffs, holding that an expert witness was properly barred from testifying that the manufacturer's representative was negligent. The expert should have been permitted to testify to industry standards, but the jury could understand those standards and needed no help to decide whether the representative in this case owed a duty and breached it.

Parker v. Williams, 855 F.2d 763 (11th Cir. 1988) , vacated on other grounds, 862 F.2d 1471 (11th Cir. 1989) : In a suit by a former prisoner who alleged that a jailer sexually assaulted her, the Court held that it was not reversible error to permit the plaintiff's expert to testify that the sheriff was grossly negligent in hiring the jailer. The Court stated that "[t]his is a close question," but it noted that the Trial Judge has wide discretion in admitting expert testimony and in instructing the jury on the proper weight to be given such testimony and on the meaning of legal terms. The Court found that the Judge's instruction made it difficult to conclude that the expert was testifying in terms of inadequately explored legal criteria. The Court added that gross negligence "is not exclusively a legal conclusion; it also encompasses a finding of ultimate fact." In Haney v. Mizell Mem. Hosp., n11 the Court affirmed a judgment for defendants in a diversity medical malpractice action, holding there was no error in preventing one of the plaintiff's experts from giving an opinion as to whether "the doctor who made the diagnosis that you've read in this case ... was negligent or not." One possible ground for exclusion was the absence of evidence that the witness was familiar with the state standards of care and the question to the expert failed to demonstrate clearly what legal criteria he was purporting to use.

[l] Rule 704(a) -- Opinions as to Reasonableness, Necessity, etc.

United States v. Williams, 343 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 2003) : In the prosecution of a deputy sheriff for shooting an unarmed, apprehended suspect in the back, the chief of police of a nearby town, the chief deputy sheriff, and another sheriff, all of whom were involved in the apprehension of the suspect, testified that the shooting was not reasonable. The Court held that the testimony did not violate Rule 704(b) because the witnesses did not testify as to the defendant's mental state, but it did violate Rule 704(a) because "[r]easonableness under the Fourth Amendment or Due Process Clause is a legal conclusion." The error was harmless, however. In an action for refund of penalties assessed for late payment of estate tax liabilities, Estate of Sowell v. United States, 198 F.3d 169 (5th Cir. 1999) , the plaintiff claimed a statutory excuse, that it was not liable because its delinquency was "due to reasonable cause and not due to willful neglect." At trial the Estate sought to ask its expert witness several hypothetical questions concerning what a reasonable fiduciary would do when confronted with facts identical to those in the case. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the questions, since they called for responses constituting a legal opinion "telling the trier of fact what to decide." Salas v. Carpenter n12 was a suit against a sheriff for the alleged deprivation of a hostage's civil rights in his handling of negotiations with a gunman at the courthouse. In denying summary judgment to the sheriff, the Trial Judge excluded the sheriff's affidavit regarding his objectives on the occasion as containing ultimate facts and admitted an affidavit by the plaintiff's expert on hostage negotiations which stated that the sheriff acted with deliberate indifference and conscious disregard. Reversing, the Court held that the sheriff's statement of his intent was not opinion testimony, but factual evidence of his mental state, and that the expert's opinions of the sheriff's state of mind would not be helpful to a jury.

Simon v. St. Louis Co., 735 F.2d 1082 (8th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a judgment against a former police officer who alleged that the County violated the Rehabilitation Act in failing to reinstate him. The plaintiff was a paraplegic as a result of a gunshot wound sustained in the line of duty. The Court found no error in allowing three police department experts to testify on the "reasonableness, necessity and legitimacy" of two challenged department policies.

United States v. Castro, 887 F.2d 988 (9th Cir. 1989) : The Court found no error in the admission of expert testimony in a prosecution for misapplication of bank funds to the effect that loans should not have been granted. It concluded that such evidence did not purport to speak to the defendant's mental state, but focused on the creditworthiness of the borrowers.

Samples v. City of Atlanta, 916 F.2d 1548 (11th Cir. 1990) : The Court held there was no error in permitting an expert on use of force to testify in a § 1983 action brought by parents of a youth fatally shot by a police officer whether it was reasonable for the officer to discharge his firearm when the victim charged him with a knife. Although the literal wording of the question tended to call for an answer invading the province of the jury, the questions leading up to the testimony and the manner in which the expert answered the question properly informed the jury that the expert was testifying regarding prevailing standards in the field of law enforcement. In a wrongful death action, Hanson v. Waller, n13 the Court held that an officer who reconstructed the accident was properly permitted to testify that neither participant did anything wrong or anything that contributed to the accident. In United States v. Gold, n14 the Court held that testimony by a person experienced in the eyewear business that the volume of cataract eyewear sales at a particular place was "excessive" was properly admitted.

[m] Rule 704(a) -- Opinions on Legal Matters

[i] Rule 704(a) -- Civil Cases

Burkhart v. Washington Metro. Area Transit Auth., 112 F.3d 1207 (D.C. Cir. 1997) : A deaf person alleged that a transit police officer, who investigated an altercation the plaintiff had with a bus driver, had violated the Americans with Disabilities Act. The Court held it was error to accept from the plaintiff's expert testimony that the officer's means of communications with the plaintiff were not "as effective" as the officer's means of communication with others. The expert grossly misstated the law as to what constitutes "as effective" communication, and the quoted phrase as used in the regulations is a term of art with a meaning separate and distinct from the vernacular. For the same reason, the expert's testimony that the officer was not "trained to proficiency" was impermissible.

Nieves-Villanueva v. Soto-Rivera, 133 F.3d 92 (1st Cir. 1997) : In a civil rights action by municipal employees allegedly terminated because of their political affiliations, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to permit an expert witness to testify as to what the law required and that her examination of the plaintiffs' personnel records led to the conclusion that they had been improperly hired or renewed in the first place. The witness' testimony was not of factual conclusions that could aid the jury but of questions of law.

Fiataruolo v. United States, 8 F.3d 930 (2d Cir. 1993) : In an action for refund of tax penalties assessed against "responsible persons" for a contractor's unpaid withholding taxes, the Court held there was no error in permitting an expert to opine that the plaintiff was not a responsible person under the statute, as the opinion was not a simple bald assertion of law but based on a detailed explanation of the factual situation. In Hygh v. Jacobs, 961 F.2d 359 (2d Cir. 1992) , a civil rights action by an arrestee who alleged that excessive force was used, the plaintiff's expert testified that the arresting officer had used "deadly physical force" that was "totally improper" and for which there was no "real legitimate reason" in the circumstances. The Court held that the expert's definition of physical force was an impermissible legal conclusion not substantially different from the statutory formulation charged to the jury and that the opinions that the plaintiff's conduct was not justified or warranted should have been excluded (but the error was harmless).

Adalman v. Baker, Watts & Co., 807 F.2d 359 (4th Cir. 1986) : In a securities action, the Court held that testimony of legal counsel to a partnership as to the meaning and applicability of securities laws to transactions at issue was not admissible. It reasoned that Rule 704(a) abolishes the proscription on ultimate issue opinions, "but it should not, and does not, permit the expert witness to usurp the province of the judge."

Askanase v. Fatjo, 130 F.3d 657 (5th Cir. 1997) : Affirming summary judgment against a bankruptcy trustee asserting claims against the debtor's directors and others, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding a lawyer from testifying that the defendants had breached their fiduciary duties. Although a lawyer may testify as to legal matters involving questions of fact, the opinions excluded in this case went to issues for the trier of fact to decide. In a tax case, Snap-Drape, Inc. v. Commissioner, 98 F.3d 194 (5th Cir. 1996) , the taxpayer sought to admit two expert witness reports supporting the taxpayer's construction of the law. The Court held that the Tax Court properly excluded these reports. The taxpayer's reliance on Rule 704(a) was misplaced, because that Rule "does not allow an expert to render conclusions of law."

Good Shepherd Manor Found., Inc. v. City of Momence, 323 F.3d 557 (7th Cir. 2003) : The City shut off the water supply to a group home for developmentally disabled adults, claiming that the owners had failed to fulfill an agreement to extend the water and sewage lines to the far border of the property. In an action under federal discrimination acts, the plaintiffs offered testimony from a law professor who worked in urban planning that, inter alia, the City's action violated the Fair Housing Amendments Act and the owner had no duty to extend the water and sewage lines. The Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the testimony, since "expert testimony as to legal conclusions that will determine the outcome of the case is inadmissible," and the testimony about the owner's duty was also irrelevant to the question whether the City's motivation was discriminatory against disabled people.

Alumbaugh v. Union Pac. R.R., 322 F.3d 520 (8th Cir. 2003) : In an action for personal injuries caused when a motorcycle overturned on a railroad grade crossing, testimony by the plaintiff's expert, who was knowledgeable about the repair of grade crossings of this particular type, "to the effect that, before the accident, the crossing had been in a state of disrepair for a substantial period of time, so that Union Pacific should have known of the condition and taken remedial action," was held inadmissible because it would have "invade[d] the province of the jury." The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant, holding that the jury was entitled to hear the expert's opinion about the crossing's condition, as "the jury could have reasonably inferred, from the state of deterioration, that the condition had been present long enough to be noticed by a reasonable landowner." In Estes v. Moore, 993 F.2d 161 (8th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed a judgment for an arresting officer alleged by the plaintiff to have used excessive force, holding that testimony by an expert as to whether probable cause existed for the arrest was no more than a legal conclusion. In Police Ret. Sys. v. Midwest Invest. Advisory Serv., n15 the Court affirmed in part the judgment in a fraud action brought by a retirement system in connection with investment of its contributions, holding that the plaintiff's expert went too far in giving testimony as to the meaning of the Securities Act anti-fraud provision. Although the error allowed the expert to usurp the Judge's place in explaining the law, the error was harmless, because the defendant's experts also testified regarding the provision and there were documents in evidence from the SEC interpreting and explaining the provision. In Harris v. Pacific Floor Mach. Mfg. Co., n16 a suit against the manufacturer of a floor buffer, the Court held that an injured minor's expert was properly precluded from giving an opinion on the ultimate question of the adequacy of warnings on a floor buffer that the minor was operating at the time of an accident. The expert was permitted to explain the criteria he would use in forming an opinion, and the jury was left to apply the criteria to the facts of the case.

Phillips v. Calhoun, 956 F.2d 949 (10th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the defendant in a civil rights action by an attorney discharged by a city, holding that city personnel directors with experience in municipal personnel matters were properly permitted to give affidavits concerning the customary meaning and usage of critical terms in the city's charter and other personnel documents. The affiants were not stating legal conclusions but only offering informed opinion concerning the real-world signification of the terms. In A.E. v. Independent School Dist. No. 25, 936 F.2d 472 (10th Cir. 1991) , an action under the Education for All Handicapped Children Act, the Court held that any error in admitting testimony by the plaintiff's expert that the child's problems were not of such magnitude as to meet the federal definition of "seriously emotionally disturbed" was harmless. In a civil rights suit, Specht v. Jensen, n17 the Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiffs, who alleged that the defendants unlawfully searched their home and office. Expert testimony by an attorney that a search took place, that there was no consent, and that the search was illegal per se usurped the province of the Judge. The dissenting Judges observed that the jury was instructed that it was bound by the Judge's instructions on the law, and that the expert testimony was not necessarily improper, because it applied the law to the facts of the case and might have assisted the jury in understanding the issues.

Montgomery v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 898 F.2d 1537 (11th Cir. 1990) : In an action for breach of a fiduciary responsibility insurance contract, the plaintiff offered expert testimony about the interpretation of the policy and the scope of the insurer's duty to defend. The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff, holding that the expert's testimony was an impermissible legal conclusion. In Parker v. Williams, n18 a suit by a former prisoner who alleged that a jailer sexually assaulted her, the Court held that it was not reversible error to permit the plaintiff's expert to testify that the sheriff was grossly negligent in hiring the jailer. The Court stated that "[t]his is a close question," but it noted that the Trial Judge has wide discretion in admitting expert testimony and in instructing the jury on the proper weight to be given such testimony and on the meaning of legal terms. The Judge's instruction made it difficult to conclude that the expert was testifying in terms of inadequately explored legal criteria. The Court added that gross negligence "is not exclusively a legal conclusion; it also encompasses a finding of ultimate fact." In Haney v. Mizell Mem. Hosp., n19 the Court affirmed a judgment for defendants in a diversity medical malpractice action, holding there was no error in preventing one of the plaintiff's experts from giving an opinion as to whether "the doctor who made the diagnosis that you've read in this case ... was negligent or not." One possible ground for exclusion was the absence of evidence that the witness was familiar with the state standards of care and the question to the expert failed to demonstrate clearly what legal criteria he was purporting to use.

[ii] Rule 704(a) -- Opinions on Legal Matters -- Criminal Cases

[A] Rule 704(a) -- Firearms

United States v. Just, 74 F.3d 902 (8th Cir. 1996) : In a prosecution for possession of an unregistered machinegun, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the government's expert witness to testify that the firearm in question was a "machinegun" as that term is used in the statute. The jury heard evidence about the firearm's characteristics and conflicting expert opinions on whether it was a machinegun. The testimony from the government expert was helpful, in part because the defendant's expert admitted that he was not familiar with the statutory definition of the term.

United States v. Buchanan, 787 F.2d 477 (10th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed convictions for possessing an unregistered firearm and conspiracy, finding that a government witness was properly permitted to testify that a device was required to be registered. The testimony went to an ultimate fact but could have helped the jury.

[B] Rule 704(a) -- Opinions on Legal Matters -- Criminal Cases -- Fraud

United States v. Scop, 846 F.2d 135 (2d Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed stock fraud convictions, concluding that the government went beyond the proper bounds of expert testimony when an expert was permitted to testify that in his opinion individuals manipulated stock, engaged in a manipulative and fraudulent scheme, and were material participants. Such opinions, the Court concluded, "were legal conclusions that were highly prejudicial and went well beyond his province as an expert in securities trading," and "they could not have been helpful to the jury in carrying out its legitimate functions."

United States v. Izydore, 167 F.3d 213 (5th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed fraud convictions against defendants who conspired to loot a company in bankruptcy, finding no reversible error in allowing the bankruptcy trustee to testify, regarding money owed by the defendants to the company, that it "was taken, and it was not legally taken in my opinion." The statement was not so much an opinion whether the defendants were guilty of the charged crimes as an opinion that the money properly belonged to the company; in any event, the single remark was at most harmless error.

United States v. Zipkin, 729 F.2d 384 (6th Cir. 1984) : The Court reversed a conviction for fraudulently appropriating money belonging to an estate for which he was receiver. It found error in the admission of a Bankruptcy Judge's testimony as to whether bankruptcy law in effect at the time of the alleged misappropriation allowed an interim payment to a receiver, since "[a] jury listening to a Bankruptcy Judge testify as to a question of bankruptcy law would be expected to give special credence to such testimony."

United States v. Van Dyke, 14 F.3d 415 (8th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a conviction for bank fraud because the Trial Judge precluded a qualified defense witness from explaining or clarifying the significance of FDIC regulations, although a prosecution witness had been permitted to testify how the regulation can be violated and offer his opinion that the defendant had committed violations.

United States v. Simpson, 7 F.3d 186 (10th Cir. 1993) : In a prosecution for misapplication of bank funds, the Court held it was a close question whether it was proper to preclude the defendant's expert on banking practices from expressing an opinion as to whether the charged transactions constituted misapplication or concealment of funds. Particularly because the defense was given considerable latitude in asking whether the transactions conformed with standard banking practices, the ruling below was not an abuse of discretion.

United States v. Gold, 743 F.2d 800 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed Medicare fraud convictions, as it found that testimony by Medicare officials concerning whether particular claims were eligible for reimbursement was properly admitted.

[C] Rule 704(a) -- Opinions on Legal Matters -- Criminal Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Feliciano, 223 F.3d 102 (2d Cir. 2000) : In a racketeering prosecution, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting an agent to express an opinion that the defendant's organization had been involved in narcotics trafficking. The opinion was reasonably based on the agent's perceptions and expertise, and was not phrased in statutory terms such as "enterprise" or "racketeering activity." Affirming a conviction for conspiracy, bank fraud, and corrupt payments in United States v. Duncan, 42 F.3d 97 (2d Cir. 1994) , the Court held there was no error in admitting testimony by an IRS agent to the effect that falsified IRS filings "obstruct[] and defeat[] [the] entire process," as the expert's testimony did not repeatedly use legally specialized terms and it was based on his personal knowledge.

United States v. Barile, 286 F.3d 749 (4th Cir. 2002) : In his trial for making materially false statements to the Food and Drug Administration, the defendant sought to impeach a government witness with documents created by the FDA's Office of Criminal Investigation during its investigation of a submission by the defendant's company to the FDA concerning a product enhancement, which made reference to matters the reviewer considered significant. Reversing, the Court held it was error to exclude the evidence on the ground that it amounted to an opinion on a jury issue, since nothing in the FDA documents gave the reviewer's opinion on what constitutes a violation of the false statements statute, or even what is legally required for the company's original submission, and the statements would greatly assist the jury in determining whether any false statements were material. The Court also held that testimony by the defendant's expert, who concluded that the data submitted by the defendant to the FDA was "not unreasonable," was not a legal conclusion and did not invade the province of the jury.

United States v. Williams, 343 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 2003) : In a civil rights prosecution of a deputy sheriff for shooting an unarmed, apprehended suspect in the back, the chief of police of a nearby town, the chief deputy sheriff, and another sheriff who were involved in the apprehension of the suspect all testified that the shooting was not reasonable. The Court held that the testimony did not violate Rule 704(b) because the witnesses did not testify as to the defendant's mental state, but it did violate Rule 704(a) because "[r]easonableness under the Fourth Amendment or Due Process Clause is a legal conclusion." The error was harmless, however.

United States v. Two Eagle, 318 F.3d 785 (8th Cir. 2003) : The defendant was convicted of assault involving serious bodily injury, which requires "extreme physical pain" or "protracted and obvious disfigurement." The Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting the victims' doctors to testify that the injuries to the victims included disfigurement and extreme physical pain, noting that "an expert, as distinguished from a lay witness, may express his opinion on the ultimate jury question." It also reasoned that to exclude such testimony "would be to render a medical expert's testimony generally inadmissible if the medical expert used common descriptive terms that also appear in the statute." The Court noted that medical and legal terms "often overlap, and a medical expert cannot be expected to use different words merely to avoid this problem." In United States v. Bednar, n20 the Court affirmed a former stockbroker's convictions for various offenses, including failure to make and keep a required record. Citing Rule 704, the Court held that it was permissible for an expert from the SEC to testify that an account card for a margin account was one of the records a broker was required to keep.

United States v. Weitzenhoff, 35 F.3d 1275 (9th Cir. 1994) : The Court held that it was error (but harmless) in a Clean Water Act prosecution to permit experts for both sides to testify regarding how a permit should be construed and to allow the jury to decide which construction was correct.

[D] Rule 704(a) -- Opinions on Legal Matters -- Criminal Cases -- Taxes

United States v. Fogg, 652 F.2d 551 (5th Cir. 1981) : The Court held there was no error for an IRS agent to testify about the correct tax treatment of certain transactions, where the opinion was based on facts in evidence and the Trial Judge instructed the jury on the weight to be given expert testimony.

United States v. Jungles, 903 F.2d 468 (7th Cir. 1990) : In the defendant's trial for evading taxes by a scheme in which he changed his status to "independent contractor," his expert was precluded from stating the legal principles surrounding the "independent contractor" relationship and from giving an opinion whether in a hypothetical set of circumstances a person in the defendant's position would be so considered. The Court held that exclusion of testimony regarding the principles was proper, but the opinion should not have been excluded. The error was harmless, however.

United States v. Clardy, 612 F.2d 1139 (9th Cir. 1980) : An IRS agent was allowed to testify that interest was not deductible in this tax case.

[n] Rule 704(a) -- Patent Cases

Symbol Techs., Inc. v. Opticon, Inc., 935 F.2d 1569 (Fed. Cir. 1991) : Affirming a judgment of infringement of a patent for laser bar-code scanners, the Court held there was no error in permitting the plaintiff's expert to testify that there was infringement without a foundation showing how each element of the device was infringed. Although claim interpretation is a question of law, an expert may give an opinion on the ultimate question of infringement. Challenging the factual underpinnings of the expert's testimony was the defendant's responsibility during cross-examination.

[o] Rule 704(a) -- Product Liability Cases

Garrett v. Desa Indus., 705 F.2d 721 (4th Cir. 1983) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant manufacturer in an action seeking damages for injuries suffered when a carpenter was injured by the discharge of a stud driver. The Court found it was an abuse of discretion to preclude a mechanical engineer from testifying that the driver was negligently designed and manufactured.

Harris v. Pacific Floor Mach. Mfg. Co., 856 F.2d 64 (8th Cir. 1988) : In a suit against the manufacturer of a floor buffer, the Court held that an injured minor's expert was properly precluded from giving an opinion on the ultimate question of the adequacy of warnings on a floor buffer that the minor was operating at the time of an accident. The expert was permitted to explain the criteria he would use in forming an opinion, and the jury was left to apply the criteria to the facts of the case. In Strong v. E.I. DuPont de Nemours Co., n21 the Court affirmed judgments for defendants in a product liability case, approving a ruling that prevented an expert from testifying that various warnings concerning the defendants' products were so inadequate as to make the products unreasonably dangerous. The Judge had properly relied upon the Advisory Committee's Note to Rule 704 in reasoning that the form of the questions was bad and that the questions were too simplistically phrased to be helpful to the jury.

Karns v. Emerson Elec. Co., 817 F.2d 1452 (10th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a judgment against a manufacturer of a machine in a product liability action, finding no error in permitting the plaintiff's expert to testify that the machine was "unreasonably dangerous beyond the expectation of the average user," and that the defendant "acted recklessly" in producing and distributing it. Although it recognized that this particular testimony was not helpful, the Court observed that the facts were technical and the expert explained the bases for his opinions in sufficient detail to permit the jury to independently evaluate his conclusions.

[p] Rule 704(a) -- Unhelpful Opinions

Kostelecky v. NL Acme Tool/NL Indus., 837 F.2d 828 (8th Cir. 1988) : Although the Court affirmed a judgment for a tool company in an action by a worker who was injured in an accident on an oil rig on which the company was performing work, it found that an accident report by a coworker was erroneously admitted. The report stated that the accident was the plaintiff's own fault, and as such was "evidence that merely tells the jury what result to reach." In United States v. Valverde, n22 a prosecution for conspiracy to escape from federal custody, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly barred the defendant's corrections expert from testifying that tape-recorded statements were consistent with nonserious conversations between guards and inmates. It concluded that the defendant "essentially wanted to ask the expert to tell the jury whether his conversations with the guards were in fact bribery attempts," and "[t]his was precisely the issue before the jury."

United States v. Seschillie, 310 F.3d 1208 (9th Cir. 2002) : The defendant, charged in connection with an incident involving four shootings, claimed that each occurred accidentally when people were struggling over a gun. The Trial Judge permitted a criminologist to describe several scenarios that can lead to an accidental discharge, but did not allow him either to give an opinion whether the shootings in this case were accidental or to identify facts in the witnesses' testimony that were consistent with accidental discharge. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the Judge's conclusions that the jury could determine, as a matter of "common sense," whether the shootings as described by the witnesses were accidental according to the expert's theories, and that the jury would not be assisted in that determination by any specialized knowledge. In Little Oil Co. v. Atlantic Richfield Co., n23 the Court affirmed a judgment for a franchiser sued by a franchisee, holding that the Trial Judge properly barred an expert, whose testimony totaled 400 pages, from presenting conclusions regarding three ultimate facts. It reasoned that the expert had provided all the information that the jury needed to draw its own conclusions.

Karns v. Emerson Elec. Co., 817 F.2d 1452 (10th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a judgment against a manufacturer of a machine in a product liability action, finding no error in permitting the plaintiff's expert to testify that the machine was "unreasonably dangerous beyond the expectation of the average user," and that the defendant "acted recklessly" in producing and distributing it. Although it recognized that this particular testimony was not helpful, the Court observed that the facts were technical and the expert explained the bases for his opinions in sufficient detail to permit the jury to independently evaluate his conclusions.

[2] Rule 704(b)

[a] Rule 704(b) -- Constitutional Challenges

United States v. Salamanca, 990 F.2d 629 (D.C. Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed a conviction for assaulting a federal officer, holding there was no violation of compulsory process rights in excluding a psychologist's testimony as to whether the defendant had the mental state necessary to commit the crime. The Court noted that the Judge permitted the expert to opine about the capacities of a person of the purported mental condition of the defendant who had consumed the quantity of beer the defendant had on the night of the assault.

United States v. Blumberg, 961 F.2d 787 (8th Cir. 1992) : Affirming convictions for transporting and possessing stolen property, the Court held that the Rule did not violate the due process right to present relevant expert opinion evidence in support of an insanity defense. The Rule allows admission of every fact about the defendant's mental condition, including the expert's diagnosis, the characteristics of the condition, and the expert's opinion about the defendant's mental state and motivation at the time of the crime; it only forbids experts from telling the jury what its finding should be on the ultimate issue in the case. The Court also rejected an equal protection challenge, finding a rational basis for the distinction between criminal defendants and other litigants dealing with insanity issues.

United States v. Austin, 981 F.2d 1163 (10th Cir. 1992) : Affirming a conviction for assaulting a correctional officer in a case in which sanity was disputed, the Court held that a government expert was properly permitted to testify to a current diagnosis of the defendant's mental condition, and it rejected a constitutional challenge to the Rule's limitations on expert testimony.

United States v. Freeman, 804 F.2d 1574 (11th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a bank robbery conviction, the Court found that Rule 704(b) did not unduly restrict the defendant in the preparation of his defense in violation of the Fifth Amendment. In United States v. Alexander, n24 the Court found that the Rule 704(b) restriction on expert testimony was rational, but advised that as long as expert testimony is not impermissible opinion as to legal sanity or insanity, Courts should be liberal in admitting testimony.

[b] Rule 704(b) -- Cross-Examination

United States v. Cox, 826 F.2d 1518 (6th Cir. 1987) : Affirming a conviction for armed robbery, the Court held that the government did not improperly examine a defense expert who testified to the defendant's capacity to conform his conduct to the requirements of law.

United States v. Porter, 842 F.2d 1021 (8th Cir. 1988) : Affirming a conviction for concealing a mortgaged tractor with intent to defraud, the Court concluded that the government did not violate the Rule by asking a defense expert, who testified in support of an insanity defense that the defendant's mental disorders could impair an ability to know right from wrong, whether she agreed with a government psychologist's conclusion that the defendant could distinguish right from wrong. The Court reasoned that the government could respond to the testimony elicited on direct examination and that, even if the cross-examination exceeded the bounds permitted by Rule 704(b), the error was harmless.

[c] Rule 704(b) -- Hypotheticals Mirroring the Evidence

[i] Mental Conditions

United States v. Levine, 80 F.3d 129 (5th Cir. 1996) : Affirming bank robbery and firearm convictions, the Court found that the government properly elicited opinion testimony from its expert psychologist. The prosecutor asked the expert to assume facts that mirrored the events of the bank robbery, and elicited the expert's opinion that the facts were inconsistent with behavior that would be expected from someone suffering from bipolar disorder, the mental condition claimed by the defendant. The Court stated that hypothetical questions mirroring the fact pattern of the evidence are violative of Rule 704(b) only "when the answering testimony contains a necessary inference as to whether the defendant did or did not have the mental state or condition constituting an element of the crime charged or of a defense thereto." In this case, the expert did not offer such an opinion; rather, "the expert's testimony focused on whether facts similar to those in evidence were consistent with the conduct of a hypothetical person suffering a severe manic episode."

United States v. Manley, 893 F.2d 1221 (11th Cir. 1990) : The defendant in a bank robbery case attempted to support his insanity plea by asking as a hypothetical question whether a person suffering from manic depression would be able to appreciate the nature and quality or wrongfulness of their actions; after an objection to the hypothetical question was sustained, he offered evidence that he was suffering from the disorder. The Court held that objection to the thinly-veiled hypothetical question was properly sustained because it not only assumed facts that identified the defendant but also directly tracked the language of the insanity statute.

[ii] Rule 704(b) -- Hypotheticals Mirroring the Evidence -- Mental Elements

United States v. Smart, 98 F.3d 1379 (D.C. Cir. 1996) : The Court found error (albeit harmless) where a law enforcement agent was permitted to testify in a narcotics case, on the basis of "hypothetical" facts identical to those in the case, that the facts "met the elements" of drug distribution. The Court recognized that the witness never referred directly to the defendant's "intent," but he "might as well" have done so given the reference to the "elements" of drug trafficking. In a drug trafficking case, United States v. Toms, 136 F.3d 176 (D.C. Cir. 1998) , the prosecutor presented an expert law enforcement officer with a hypothetical tracking the facts of the defendant's arrest and asked about the respective roles of the defendant as driver and his companion, who was sitting on top of a gun, in a car containing drugs and cash. The Court repeated its disapproval of this method of questioning, but found no abuse of discretion in permitting the expert to testify that the driver in such a case was the supplier and the other man the enforcer, since the answer was responsive to the question without purporting to describe the defendant's "intent" to distribute drugs. In United States v. Boyd, 55 F.3d 667 (D.C. Cir. 1995) , the Court reversed a conviction for possession with intent to distribute cocaine, after a law enforcement officer was allowed to testify that, in his opinion, the hypothetical facts posed by the prosecutor showed "possession with intent to distribute." The hypothetical facts exactly mirrored the facts leading up to the defendant's arrest. While law enforcement agents are permitted to testify to the modus operandi of drug dealers, the Court stated that it had never held "that the Government may simply recite a list of 'hypothetical' facts that exactly mirror the case at hand and then ask an expert to give an opinion as to whether such facts prove an intention to distribute narcotics."

United States v. Mancillas, 183 F.3d 682 (7th Cir. 1999) : At a trial for marijuana distribution, the DEA expert, given a hypothetical that mirrored the facts of the case and asked whether the marijuana in such a hypothetical was being held for distribution or for personal consumption, answered that "it's for distribution." The Court found no error, concluding that the expert's opinion "was based on his knowledge of criminal practices generally, and not on some special knowledge of Mancillas' mental process."

[d] Rule 704(b) -- Knowledge

United States v. Willis, 61 F.3d 526 (7th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a conviction for unlawful possession with intent to distribute marijuana, the Court found no error when a law enforcement agent was permitted to testify that he had never had a case "where the courier didn't know what he was carrying." The Court reiterated the Circuit's position that Rule 704(b) does not limit law enforcement opinion testimony, so long as it is made clear that the opinion "is based on the expert's knowledge of common criminal practices, and not on some special knowledge of the defendant's mental processes."

United States v. Vasquez, 213 F.3d 425 (8th Cir. 2000) : Officers made a controlled delivery to the defendant of a package as to which a drug-sniffing dog had alerted in a FedEx parcel sorting station. At trial the defendant claimed he did not know the package contained drugs. A government expert testified that drug traffickers do not typically use couriers who are unaware they are transporting drugs. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admission of the testimony, since it included no improper opinion concerning the defendant's personal knowledge.

United States v. Campos, 217 F.3d 707 (9th Cir. 2000) : The defendant was convicted for importation and possession of marijuana with intent to distribute, after she crossed over from Tijuana in a van that had a false compartment full of marijuana. The Court held that there was no plain error in permitting a Customs agent to testify that in his opinion an organization trafficking in marijuana would not entrust 151 pounds of the drug to a courier who did not know what she was transporting. The majority noted that it had not approved of such evidence in a noncomplicated case in which a proper objection was made. A dissenting Judge argued that such testimony it clearly amounted to an opinion on the mental state of the defendant and the error was plain.

[e] Rule 704(b) -- Law Enforcement Agents

See also annotations in § 704.03[2][c], "Hypotheticals Mirroring the Evidence," § 704.03[2][d], "Knowledge," and § 704.03[2][k], "Specific Intent."

[i] Drug Cases

United States v. Bailey, 319 F.3d 514 (D.C. Cir. 2003) : In a narcotics prosecution, a detective testifying as an expert stated that "no one would want to tag along [on a large-scale drug transaction] who was an innocent person." The Court found no plain error under Rule 704(b) in admitting this evidence, since the expert mostly testified to general information about narcotics operations and made clear that his testimony was not based on any knowledge of the defendant's conduct, but rather on his prior experience in narcotics interdiction. Thus, the jury was made aware "that the expert was not qualified to testify to the ultimate issue of intent." In United States v. Watson, 171 F.3d 695 (D.C. Cir. 1999) , although it reversed a conviction for drug possession with intent to distribute on other grounds, the Court found no error in the admission of testimony by an expert on drug trafficking that the 100 grams of cocaine base attributed to the defendant would contain 700 "dosage units" and that someone possessing the "equivalent of 700 bags of crack cocaine is in the business of making money selling drugs." Rule 704(b) proscribes only responses suggesting some special knowledge of the defendant's mental processes, not general testimony regarding the modus operandi of drug dealers. In United States v. White, n25 the Court affirmed convictions arising out of a drug conspiracy, and found no error in admitting the testimony of a law enforcement agent concerning the modus operandi of individuals involved in drug trafficking. The prosecutor carefully avoided any of the "mirroring hypotheticals" that had concerned the Court in other cases, and the testimony constituted general background testimony on the structure and function of a drug conspiracy. In United States v. Conyers, n26 the Court held that Rule 704(b) was not violated where the law enforcement agent testified that the sort of packaging used by the defendant was "consistent with drug distribution in the District of Columbia" and that the gun found on the defendant was the weapon of choice among local drug dealers. The testimony did not "speak directly to the guilt or innocence of the accused." In In re Sealed Case, n27 the Court affirmed drug-related convictions, holding there was no error in permitting the prosecution to ask a detective whether he had an opinion as to whether possession of a certain quantity of drugs was consistent with personal use or with intent to distribute. This was proper testimony about modus operandi; but it was error (albeit harmless) to permit the prosecution to ask a detective his opinion as to the purpose for which the defendant had drugs in his house, since this called for an impermissible opinion as to the defendant's intent.

United States v. DiMarzo, 80 F.3d 656 (1st Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed convictions for a cocaine distribution conspiracy in which two defendants asserted they had not known a third was planning to conduct a drug deal, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an undercover agent in the case to testify on redirect that in his experience innocent observers were not invited to accompany criminals engaged in completing a drug deal. The testimony did not implicate the opinion rules, since it was simply the witness' personal experience relating to a subject bearing directly upon the appropriateness of a jury inference, nor did it encroach on the jury's factfinding function regarding the ultimate issue of guilt. In United States v. Valle, 72 F.3d 210 (1st Cir. 1995) , a prosecution for possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute, a narcotics detective testified that the quantity of crack found at the search site was consistent with distribution, as opposed to personal use. The Court noted that Rule 704(b) prohibits all direct expert testimony concerning a criminal defendant's intent, regardless of the witness' field of expertise, where intent is an element of the crime charged. However, there was no error in admitting the testimony, since the Rule does not prohibit experts from testifying, as here, to predicate facts from which a jury might infer such intent.

United States v. Gastiaburo, 16 F.3d 582 (4th Cir. 1994) : The Court held that the error, if any, in permitting an officer to opine that drugs were possessed with intent to distribute was not plain error.

United States v. Mendoza-Medina, 346 F.3d 121 (5th Cir. 2003) : In a truck driver's trial for possession of marijuana, a DEA agent testified about how drug traffickers recruit smugglers, suggesting that such smugglers knew they were transporting drugs, and mentioning specifically facts closely paralleling the case, including the amount of drugs given to new recruits and the presence of wives and children to mask the trafficking offense. Affirming, the Court found that admission of the agent's testimony was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error). The testimony was closely akin to drug courier profile evidence, which is inadmissible because it is inherently prejudicial and violates Rule

704(b)'s bar on expert testimony to prove a mental element, here, the courier's knowledge that he was transporting drugs. In United States v. Ramirez-Velasquez, 322 F.3d 868 (5th Cir. 2003) , the Court, affirming marijuana-related convictions, found it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony from a DEA agent that drivers of vehicles with marijuana are paid by drug conspiracy organizations on the basis of past performance and that these organizations tend to seek trustworthy drivers because their cargo is valuable and uninsurable. The Court relied on its admonition in United States v. Gutierrez-Farias, 294 F.3d 657 (5th Cir. 2002) , that "[t]he government goes too far in soliciting the functional equivalent of an opinion whether the defendant knew he was carrying drugs."

United States v. Love, 336 F.3d 643 (7th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed drug and firearm convictions, finding no plain error in permitting a DEA expert to testify that it was unusual for persons involved in a drug conspiracy to bring people to a drug deal if they do not know what is going on. The Court reasoned that the expert did not refer to the intent of the defendant, but limited himself to testimony about the common practices of drug dealers. In a prosecution for possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute, United States v. Brumley, 217 F.3d 905 (7th Cir. 2000) , the Court found no abuse of discretion when a DEA agent was permitted to testify that amounts of methamphetamine in excess of one ounce were distribution as opposed to personal use amounts. The testimony was not subjective or speculative, but based on the agent's experience in approximately 100 methamphetamine investigations, and did not purport to be based on some special knowledge of the defendant's mental state. Affirming a conviction for unlawful possession with intent to distribute marijuana in United States v. Willis, n28 the Court found no error when a law enforcement agent was permitted to testify that he had never had a case "where the courier didn't know what he was carrying." The Court reiterated the Circuit's position that Rule 704(b) does not limit law enforcement opinion testimony, so long as it is made clear that the opinion "is based on the expert's knowledge of common criminal practices, and not on some special knowledge of the defendant's mental processes." See also United States v. Lipscomb n29(the Rule does not preclude law enforcement experts from offering opinions that seized narcotics were possessed with intent to distribute; the Rule was mainly designed to avoid the confusion and illogic of translating medical concepts relied on by mental health experts into legal conclusions).

United States v. Younger, 398 F.3d 1179 (9th Cir. 2005) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when a police officer was permitted to testify that never in his 26 years' experience had a person in circumstances mirroring the defendant's been only a crack user and not also a dealer. The expert did not testify about the defendant and expressly denied having any particular knowledge about the defendant or what his intent may have been. In United States v. Gonzales, 307 F.3d 906 (9th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed drug and firearms convictions, and upheld the admission of testimony by a DEA agent that the weight of the drugs seized from the defendant would be used for distribution as opposed to personal use. The Court found no violation of Rule 704(b), because the agent never stated directly that the defendant had the intent to distribute and a jury could have found that the defendant was not the typical person described by the agent. In United States v. Murillo, n30 the defendant was arrested driving a rental car in which over one million dollars worth of drugs were found hidden. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony from a DEA agent about the modus operandi of drug traffickers, including the typical travel itineraries of drug couriers, why couriers use rental cars, and how traffickers do not entrust large quantities of drugs to people who are unaware that they are transporting them. The testimony was helpful to determining whether the defendant was simply an unknowing courier. At the same time, the agent did not go beyond his experience with drug traffickers and impermissibly provide an explicit opinion as to the defendant's knowledge or state of mind. In United States v. Plunk, n31 the defendant, convicted for offenses arising out of a drug distribution conspiracy, claimed that a law enforcement agent who interpreted for the jury various alleged coded conversations was giving impermissible testimony about his mental state. The Court found no error, stating that the expert "offered the opinion about the meaning of drug jargon in encrypted exchanges between the conspirators, allowing the jurors to determine for themselves the legal significance of the conversations as interpreted." In United States v. Gomez-Norena, n32 the Court held there was no plain error when an agent testified that the defendant's actions and possession of a large amount of cocaine were consistent with an intent to distribute it and at no time gave an opinion as to what the defendant actually thought.

United States v. Mendez-Zamora, 296 F.3d 1013 (10th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed conspiracy convictions relating to methamphetamine, finding no error in the admission of a police officer's testimony that one defendant was a broker and occasionally a distributor and that another assisted the brokers. In United States v. Richard, 969 F.2d 849 (10th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed convictions arising out of a marijuana possession and distribution conspiracy, holding there was no violation of the Rule when an agent identified the roles of each participant and offered his opinion that those roles were typically performed in similar drug transactions, but did not expressly draw the inference that they were in fact aware of the nature of the transaction.

[ii] Rule 704(b) -- Law Enforcement Agents -- Other Cases

United States v. Schneiderhan, 404 F.3d 73 (1st Cir. 2005) : The defendant was charged with obstruction of justice by telling a Boston mobster about a wiretap. At trial, two law enforcement witnesses testified that someone experienced in dealing with organized crime would know that revealing the existence of electronic surveillance to a target would compromise the investigation. Finding it was error (but harmless) under Rule 704(b) to admit the testimony, the Court rejected the government's "ingenious" argument that the witnesses spoke of knowledge whereas the crime was a specific intent crime, so that an opinion as to knowledge was not an opinion as to mens rea. Here, the witness' testimony approached a carbon copy of the defendant's circumstances. In United States v. Mikutowicz, 365 F.3d 65 (1st Cir. 2004) , the Court affirmed convictions for tax offenses, and upheld the admission of testimony by an IRS agent explaining why the IRS concluded that the deductions claimed by the defendant and his companies were improper. The Court found no violation of Rule 704(b): the agent explained why the IRS reached its conclusion and did not purport to testify as to the defendant's state of mind.

United States v. Barber, 80 F.3d 964 (4th Cir. 1996) (en banc): The Court affirmed money laundering convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an IRS special agent to explain how the defendants' activities constituted concealment for purposes of money laundering, as he did not give any opinion regarding subjective intent in pursuing a particular activity.

United States v. Williams, 343 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 2003) : In a civil rights prosecution of a deputy sheriff for shooting an unarmed arrestee in the back, the chief of police of a nearby town, the chief deputy sheriff, and another sheriff, all of whom were involved in the apprehension of the suspect, testified that the shooting was not reasonable. The Court held that the testimony did not violate Rule 704(b) because the witnesses did not testify as to the defendant's mental state, but it did violate Rule 704(a) because "[r]easonableness under the Fourth Amendment or Due Process Clause is a legal conclusion." The error was harmless, however. In United States v. Willey, 57 F.3d 1374 (5th Cir. 1995) , the Court, although "not recommend[ing] the present case as a model for eliciting expert testimony," found no abuse of discretion when an IRS agent was permitted to give her opinion in a money laundering case that certain transactions concealed the true source, nature, ownership, or control of the funds. The Court noted that the agent had not testified that the transactions were designed to conceal the source of the funds, which was the ultimate issue in the case.

United States v. Romero, 189 F.3d 576 (7th Cir. 1999) : The defendant was charged with kidnapping and transporting a minor with intent to engage in criminal sexual activity after developing a relationship with a 12-year-old boy over the Internet. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony regarding the characteristics of "preferential" child molesters from an FBI expert on child molesters. The agent's testimony focused primarily on the actions typically taken by child molesters, and on redirect he explained what types of actions might distinguish the actual molester from the mere collector of child pornography, but he did not in any sense state his belief about what was going through the defendant's mind when he met the victim.

United States v. Webb, 115 F.3d 711 (9th Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of ammunition by a felon, finding no error in the admission of police expert testimony regarding the reasons criminals conceal weapons in the engine compartments of their cars. Rejecting the argument that the testimony violated Rule 704(b), the Court observed that the expert described a typical case and offered no opinion as to Webb's state of mind.

[f] Rule 704(b) -- Lay Witnesses

United States v. Polishan, 336 F.3d 234 (3d Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed the securities fraud and related convictions of an executive, finding no plain error in the admission of testimony by co-workers of the defendant that described his role in the company and the type of information to which he had access. Although it acknowledged that "[t]here is a fine line between statements that permissibly offer a witness's testimony about his or her own perceptions while supporting inferences about knowledge, and statements that constitute opinions on a witness's knowledge," it found that the testimony in this case left to the jury the ultimate conclusion as to whether the defendant knew about accounting irregularities. Moreover, the Court held that none of the witnesses was an expert, so that none of their testimony could have violated Rule 704(b). While that reasoning is technically accurate (as the Rule 704(b) exclusion applies only to expert testimony), it fails to note that if a lay witness is testifying that the defendant had the mental state necessary to commit the crime charged, the opinion is very likely to be of no assistance to the jury, and thus would be inadmissible under Rule 701.

[g] Rule 704(b) -- Medical Opinions

United States v. Gold, 661 F. Supp. 1127 (D.D.C. 1987) : Denying an in limine motion by the government to exclude all evidence of the defendant's mental condition and the effect of that condition on his capacity to have specific intent, the Trial Judge ruled that an expert could testify as to the facts of a defendant's mental state or condition. The expert was barred, however, from offering any opinion as to whether the defendant lacked the capacity to distinguish right from wrong or to conform his behavior to legal requirements.

United States v. DiDomenico, 985 F.2d 1159 (2d Cir. 1993) : Affirming a conviction for wire fraud and interstate transportation of stolen computer equipment, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the defendant had a "dependent personality disorder." The majority read the "proffered testimony as stating the bottom-line inference" (that the defendant did not know the equipment was stolen because of her dependence on her boyfriend, from whom she received it), "and leaving it to the jury merely to murmur, 'Amen.' " One Judge dissented, on the ground that the expert was only presenting a psychiatric/medical diagnosis from which a jury might then draw inferences concerning whether the defendant possessed the mental state required for a legal finding of guilt.

United States v. Dixon, 185 F.3d 393 (5th Cir. 1999) : The defendant asserted an insanity defense to robbery, assault, and kidnapping charges, but the Trial Judge refused to give an insanity instruction, in part because a psychiatrist testified for the government that (1) the defendant was not suffering from a severe mental disease at the time of the crimes, and (2) a person suffering from the diseases indicated in his medical records could appreciate the wrongfulness of his acts. Although it reversed the conviction for failure to give the insanity instruction, the Court held that the expert's testimony was properly considered. On the first point, an expert is free to testify as to whether the defendant was suffering from a severe mental illness at the time of the crime, just not whether the condition prevents the defendant from appreciating the wrongfulness of his actions. As to the second point, the testimony did not violate the rule against using hypothetical questions that mirror the facts of the case, since the expert testified only to the possibility that a person suffering from Dixon's disease "could still be able to appreciate the nature and quality or the wrongfulness of his acts," which "does not answer, or contain a necessary inference that would answer, the ultimate issue."

United States v. Brown, 32 F.3d 236 (7th Cir. 1994) : In the defendant's bank robbery trial, where he raised an insanity defense, the government's psychiatric expert testified that the defendant suffered from a major depressive disorder. The prosecution was permitted to ask psychiatric experts for both sides whether such a major depressive disorder indicates "that a person is unable to understand the wrongfulness of his acts"; the prosecution's expert answered in the negative. The Court found no violation of Rule 704(b), reasoning that the prosecution's expert never testified "as to Brown's peculiar mental state; he merely described Brown's mental disorder and that such an affliction does not preclude one from appreciating the nature or quality of his acts." While finding that the Rule was not violated, the Court criticized the Rule as denying juries "the specialized knowledge of experts in just the type of complex case in which it is most useful." In United States v. West, 962 F.2d 1243 (7th Cir. 1992) , the Trial Judge, hearing the opinion of the defense psychiatrist in a bank robbery case that the defendant's mental condition was not so severe as to keep him from knowing what he was doing or that it was wrong, granted the government's motion to exclude the expert from testifying. The Court reversed on the ground that the defendant had been precluded totally from offering his insanity defense, contrary to the congressional intention only to bar the ultimate issue opinion. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 704.02[5].

United States v. Kristiansen, 901 F.2d 1463 (8th Cir. 1990) : The Court held that the defendant, charged with escape from a halfway house facility, had properly been prohibited from asking his psychiatric witness whether he was able to appreciate the nature and quality of his actions but that harmless error was committed in barring a question whether mental disease or defect of the type the defendant allegedly had would affect a person's ability to appreciate the nature and quality of his actions, because the question related to the symptoms and qualities of the disease itself and did not call for an answer describing the defendant's culpability at the time of the crime. In United States v. Dubray, n33 the Court affirmed a rape conviction, holding that the prosecution's expert properly testified that the defendant was not psychotic at the time he committed the rape. This testimony did not purport to establish his sanity at the time, and was proper diagnostic testimony offered to rebut the defendant's claim that he had experienced a transient psychiatric episode. In United States v. Gipson, n34 the Court held that an expert was properly permitted to testify that the defendant did not suffer from a mental disease or defect when he attempted to escape. The expert did not purport to address the legal issue whether the defendant had the requisite specific intent.

United States v. Cook, 53 F.3d 1029 (9th Cir. 1995) : After the defendant in a bank robbery case presented an insanity defense, a psychiatrist called by the government testified to the defendant's mental disorders and then answered a hypothetical question based on the facts of the case with the opinion that such behavior was consistent with delusional behavior. Although the Court found no plain error, it expressed the view that the government engaged in overkill, since it was clear from the expert's other testimony that he did not believe the defendant had a mental defect that prevented him from committing the crime, and the question objected to on appeal went very close to calling for an opinion whether the defendant had a required mental state, which is prohibited by Rule 704(b).

United States v. Wood, 207 F.3d 1222 (10th Cir. 2000) : A doctor was charged with murder and lesser included offenses after he injected a patient with a large amount of potassium chloride in an attempt to treat the patient, and the patient died as a result. The Court held that testimony by a medical expert that the defendant's treatment was "reckless" and constituted a "homicide" was error which, together with other errors, required a reversal of the defendant's conviction for involuntary manslaughter. The Court reasoned that the expert's testimony "necessarily dictates the final conclusion that Dr. Wood possessed the requisite mens rea for involuntary manslaughter" and that this "intrusion into the province of the jury is precisely the sort of testimony Rule 704(b) is designed to prevent." In United States v. Denny-Shaffer, 2 F.3d 999 (10th Cir. 1993) , the defendant, charged with kidnapping, asserted an insanity defense based on a multiple personality disorder. In reversing the Trial Judge's rejection of the defense, the Court noted that an expert witness' testimony that the defendant's illness was "serious and severe" was not violative of the Rule. In United States v. Austin, n35 the Court affirmed a conviction for assaulting a correctional officer, holding that, in a case in which sanity was disputed, a government expert was properly permitted to testify to a current diagnosis of the defendant's mental condition.

United States v. Manley, 893 F.2d 1221 (11th Cir. 1990) : The defendant in a bank robbery case attempted to support his insanity plea by asking as a hypothetical question whether a person suffering from manic depression would be able to appreciate the nature and quality or wrongfulness of their actions; after an objection to the hypothetical question was sustained, he offered evidence that he was suffering from the disorder. The Court held that objection to the thinly-veiled hypothetical question was properly sustained because it not only assumed facts that identified the defendant but also directly tracked the language of the insanity statute. In United States v. Davis, n36 the Court upheld a conviction for bank robbery, concluding that a clinical psychologist was properly permitted to testify for the government that a person suffering from multiple personalities, as the defendant claimed he was, is able to understand what he is doing. It also held that testimony by a government expert that the defendant was not suffering multiple personalities, but exhibited an antisocial personality that was consistent with his behavior, was not excluded by Rule 704. See also United States v. Thigpen n37(finding no error in permitting an expert to opine whether schizophrenia by necessity implies that a person would be unable to appreciate the nature and quality of his acts, where no question was asked about whether the defendant would be able to appreciate his actions). In United States v. Edwards, n38 the Court upheld permitting a psychiatrist to testify for the prosecution in response to the defendant's insanity defense to a bank robbery charge, saying that "Congress did not enact Rule 704(b) so as to limit the flow of diagnostic and clinical information," and "[e]very actual fact concerning the defendant's mental condition is still as admissible after the enactment of Rule 704(b) as it was before." In United States v. Alexander, n39 the Court upheld a conviction for possessing stolen mail matter. It found that the restriction on expert testimony was rational, but advised that as long as expert testimony is not impermissible opinion as to legal sanity or insanity, Courts should be liberal in admitting testimony.

[h] Rule 704(b) -- Mens Rea Evidence

United States v. Finley, 301 F.3d 1000 (9th Cir. 2002) : Reversing various convictions arising from the defendant's attempts to use certain documents, prepared by the leader of "the Montana Freemen," as financial instruments, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude testimony by a licensed clinical psychologist that the defendant suffered from a delusional disorder, and that a person with a delusional disorder can be dissuaded from the delusion "only with tremendous, tremendous difficulty." The testimony did not usurp the jury's function, since they could accept the diagnosis and still find that the defendant knew the instruments were fraudulent. The testimony was helpful in offering an explanation why "an otherwise normal man could believe that these financial instruments were valid and reject all evidence to the contrary." In United States v. Morales, 108 F.3d 1031 (9th Cir. 1997) , a defendant, charged with wilfully making false entries in a union ledger, was not permitted to introduce expert testimony from a CPA regarding the defendant's knowledge and understanding of bookkeeping principles. Reversing her conviction, the Court held that Rule 704(b) applies to all expert witnesses -- not just mental health experts -- who are asked to state an opinion as to the defendant's mental state or condition. However, the only testimony prohibited under the Rule is that from which, if it is credited, it necessarily follows that the defendant did or did not possess the requisite mens rea. Because the conclusion sought by the defendant, that her errors were due to ignorant but innocent mistakes, was by no means compelled even if the jury believed the expert, it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the testimony.

[i] Rule 704(b) -- Polygraph Evidence

United States v. Campos, 217 F.3d 707 (9th Cir. 2000) : The defendant was convicted for importation and possession of marijuana with intent to distribute, after she crossed from Tijuana in a van that had a false compartment

full of marijuana. The Court held that the Trial Judge properly excluded polygraph evidence which purported to show that the defendant was truthful in saying she did not know she had drugs in her van when she crossed the border. The Court reasoned that under the principle of United States v. Morales, 108 F.3d 1031 (9th Cir. 1997) (en banc), the polygraph expert's opinion would be an inadmissible opinion on the mental state of the defendant and would be barred by Rule 704(b).

[j] Rule 704(b) -- Profile Evidence

United States v. Hayward, 359 F.3d 631 (3d Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for transporting a minor with the intent to engage in criminal sexual activity, the Court found no violation of Rule 704(b) in the admission of testimony from a behavioral scientist concerning the general profile of an acquaintance molester. The Court cited prior cases admitting expert testimony that supports the inference or conclusion that the defendant either did or did not have the requisite mens rea, provided that (1) the expert does not draw the ultimate inference or conclusion for the jury, and (2) that inference or conclusion does not necessarily follow from the testimony.

[k] Rule 704(b) -- Specific Intent

[i] Rule 704(b) -- Drugs

United States v. Valle, 72 F.3d 210 (1st Cir. 1995) : In a trial for possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute, a narcotics detective testified that the quantity of crack found at the search site was consistent with distribution, as opposed to personal use. The Court noted that Rule 704(b) prohibits all direct expert testimony concerning a criminal defendant's intent, regardless of the witness' field of expertise, where intent is an element of the crime charged. However, there was no error in admitting the testimony, since the Rule does not prohibit experts from testifying, as here, to predicate facts from which a jury might infer such intent.

United States v. Watson, 260 F.3d 301 (3d Cir. 2001) : The defendant was charged with possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute after he was arrested on an intercity bus carrying a bag with approximately 100 baggies of the drug. At trial arresting officers were asked their opinions whether the drugs were possessed "with the intent to distribute, transfer or deliver or the intent to personally use" them, as well as whether the bus trip "was taken for the purpose of distribution, transfer and delivery of drugs, as opposed to procurement of drugs for personal use." Reversing, the Court held that the officers' testimony went beyond testifying to common practices and impermissibly went directly to the defendant's intent. By contrast, in United States v. Davis, 397 F.3d 173 (3d Cir. 2005) , the Court found no abuse of discretion when an experienced police officer was permitted to opine regarding facts in a hypothetical question resembling the facts of the case that it "would be possession with intent to deliver the narcotics." Unlike in Watson, the testimony was given in response to hypothetical rather than specific questions regarding the intent of the defendants on trial and the prosecutor did not refer to the individual's state of mind when questioning the expert. Furthermore, there was no evidence that the witness had any prior relationship with the defendants and therefore no risk that the jury would conclude he had any special insights into their thoughts or intent.

United States v. Speer, 30 F.3d 605 (5th Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for drug-trafficking offenses, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a DEA agent to testify that the amount of drugs possessed by the defendants was more than would be purchased for personal use and was consistent with trafficking. The agent never testified explicitly as to the defendants' intent or state of mind, but merely analyzed the evidence in light of his expertise. In United States v. Roberts, n40 the Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude testimony by a psychologist that the personality of a defendant charged with cocaine offenses was consistent with his claimed activity as a self-appointed vigilante. The Court reasoned that just as expert testimony might be used to demonstrate that a defendant was incapable of forming the specific state of mind required for an offense, a defendant may offer evidence in support of a "reverse-sting" defense that his mental condition rendered him incapable of forming the requisite intent.

[ii] Rule 704(b) -- Specific Intent -- Fraud and Tax Evasion

United States v. Bennett, 161 F.3d 171 (3d Cir. 1998) : Pleading nolo contendere to charges of fraud, check-kiting, money-laundering, and filing false statements and tax returns, the defendant reserved the right to appeal a pre-trial ruling precluding certain expert psychiatric testimony. The Court affirmed, holding that the Trial Judge properly excluded answers to questions asking whether the defendant's mental disorders: (1) "precluded him from forming the intent to defraud"; (2) made it "unlikely that he could form the intent to defraud"; (3) made it "unlikely that he would have engaged in conduct designed to defraud"; (4) precluded him "from forming the specific intent to defraud individuals"; (5) made it "unlikely that he could defraud the individuals and entities"; (6) "affected his ability to knowingly and willfully submit false statements to the I.R.S."; and (7) made it "unlikely that he would knowingly and willfully submit false statements to the I.R.S." The Court declared that these questions went "beyond merely assisting the jury, explaining the nature of Bennett's mental disease, or describing the typical effect of Bennett's mental disorders on his mental state. Instead, they required the expert witness to state expressly whether Bennett possessed the requisite intent to commit the crimes charged in the indictment."

United States v. Dotson, 817 F.2d 1127 (5th Cir. 1987) , vacated in part on other grounds, 821 F.2d 1034 (5th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed drug-related convictions, holding that a government expert properly testified to facts that indicated an intent on the part of a defendant to evade taxes. The Court noted that it was doubtful that the defendant raised a sufficiently specific objection during the trial, and concluded that, except for a small portion of the testimony, the expert focused on facts and did not attempt to offer a conclusion on the defendant's state of mind.

United States v. Frost, 125 F.3d 346 (6th Cir. 1997) : The defendant was charged in a complex case with fraudulently billing the government. A government expert, who never testified, was of the opinion that the defendant had not billed certain entries in a deceptive manner, and that small businesses such as the defendant's "often bill costs to the government in ways that they think are correct, but are technically disallowable," but this information was never turned over to the defendant. The Trial Judge refused to grant a Brady hearing, reasoning that the expert's opinion was not exculpatory because it could not have been admitted at trial under Rule 704(b). The Court found the denial of a hearing to be error and remanded, reasoning that while the expert could not have testified that the defendant lacked an intent to defraud, he could have testified, consistently with Rule 704(b), that the defendant did not bill the government in a deceptive manner. Moreover, the testimony of how small businesses operate was not direct testimony of the defendant's intent; the expert could have testified that the defendant "engaged in the same common practices of those who clearly lack the requisite criminal intent."

United States v. Turner, 400 F.3d 491 (7th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a money laundering conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when an IRS agent was permitted to testify about a "typical money laundering conspiracy" and that certain transactions seemed to be structured to avoid IRS reporting requirements. The agent did not refer to the intent of the defendant and only stated that "the transactions were of the type that looked like structuring, not that they actually were structuring." In United States v. Owens, 301 F.3d 521 (7th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed fraud convictions against a real estate appraiser, holding that expert opinions characterizing the defendant's appraisals as "misleading and fraudulent" did not violate Rule 704(b) because the expert did not comment directly on the defendant's mental state. In United States v. Vest, n41 a doctor was charged with fraudulently subjecting his patients to unnecessary medical tests. At trial, one of the Government's experts, a medical doctor, testified that the only reason the defendant ordered certain medical tests was for money. The defendant argued that this testimony violated Rule 704(b), but the Court found no error, noting that the expert "was not billed as a psychiatrist and did not testify based on any psychiatric analysis of Vest's mental processes." The Court concluded that "Rule 704(b) is a narrow exception to the general rule that experts may state opinions on ultimate issues." In United States v. Windfelder, n42 the Court affirmed a defendant's conviction for understating his income in his federal tax return and for understating the estate of his aunt on an estate tax return. It found that testimony of expert witnesses with respect to whether the aunt authorized transfers of assets to the defendant for her expenses, whether the transfers were gifts to the defendant, or whether they were utilized by the defendant without authorization was proper opinion evidence as to the tax consequences of a transaction. The Court found no violation of Rule 704(b) for two reasons: The experts "utilized their expertise in accounting and tax matters in making their determinations, not their knowledge of the workings of the human mind," and their testimony related to the intent of the aunt, not the defendant. It found error (albeit harmless), however, in the admission of testimony by an IRS agent that the defendant intentionally understated his income, since this opinion as to knowledge or wilfulness addressed an element of the crime charged.

United States v. Felak, 831 F.2d 794 (8th Cir. 1987) : Affirming a conviction for tax evasion, the Court upheld the exclusion of defense psychiatric evidence that the defendant did not possess the mental state to satisfy the definition of "wilful," "evasion," or "fraud" as alleged in the indictment.

United States v. Gomez-Osorio, 957 F.2d 636 (9th Cir. 1992) : The Court held it was error, but not plain error, for an expert to testify that the defendant, who was charged with illegal monetary transactions, had structured the transactions in order to evade the reporting requirements. Although the evidence instructed the jury that the statute's intent element had been satisfied, the witness' primary thrust was explaining the defendant's role in the scheme and the government did not refer to the testimony in its closing arguments.

United States v. Lankford, 955 F.2d 1545 (11th Cir. 1992) : Reversing a conviction for extortion and filing false income tax returns, the Court held that it was error to exclude testimony by a defense expert on the reasonableness of the defendant's conclusion that a $1500 check he received was a gift rather than taxable income, as a subjective good-faith misunderstanding of the law or a good-faith belief that one is not violating the law can negate the statutory wilfulness requirement of criminal tax offenses, so any evidence of the reasonableness of the defendant's belief was relevant to the determination of whether his violation of the tax laws was willful. The dissenting Judge believed that the witness had no helpful knowledge on the defendant's subjective awareness of his legal duty at the time of the transaction and, to the extent the expert was opining on the defendant's wilfulness, his testimony violated Rule 704(b).

[iii] Rule 704(b) -- Specific Intent -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Hillsberg, 812 F.2d 328 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a murder conviction, finding that psychiatric evidence that a defendant lacked the capacity to form specific intent to kill was properly excluded under Rule 704(b). Because the psychiatrist had found no mental disease or defect impairing the defendant and sought to testify on the effects of alcohol on mental state, the Court reasoned that lay jurors are capable of assessing the probable effects of alcohol and that "permitting an expert to describe the ordinary occurrence of intoxication in such orphic terms creates the danger of misleading the jury."

United States v. Wang, 49 F.3d 502 (9th Cir. 1995) : In a prosecution for conspiring to smuggle aliens unlawfully, a government expert was permitted to opine that the defendants "were involved in an organization to smuggle aliens." Treating this as an opinion that the defendant had the mental state constituting an element of the crime charged, the Court observed that the better practice would be for the prosecutor not to ask such questions arguably bearing on intent and for a Trial Judge not to find such answers admissible. Any error was harmless, however, and the convictions were affirmed.

United States v. Dennison, 937 F.2d 559 (10th Cir. 1991) : Affirming convictions for assault and sexual abuse, the Court held there was no error in excluding testimony by the defendant's expert that an individual suffering from borderline personality disorder does not have the capacity to form specific intent while under the influence of drugs and alcohol. Although the testimony was premised on a hypothetical person and couched in terms of the characteristics of the illness itself, the necessary inference was that the instant defendant did not have the capacity to form specific intent at the time of his crimes. In United States v. Esch, n43 the Court upheld convictions for sexual exploitation of children, holding that a psychologist's testimony that a defendant had a "dependent personality" and was duped into acting was properly excluded. To the extent that the expert was attempting to provide an opinion on the defendant's mental state, the testimony was inadmissible under Rule 704(b). To the extent that the expert was attempting to opine on the defendant's personality characteristics, the testimony related to matters as to which the jury needed no special help.

[l] Rule 704(b) -- Unhelpful Opinions

United States v. Masat, 896 F.2d 88 (5th Cir. 1990) : The defendant in a tax evasion prosecution attempted to offer testimony by psychologists indicating that his beliefs when hiding assets were strong and sincerely held. The Court held that the evidence was not barred by Rule 704(b), as it was not a direct statement on the issue of intent, but since it concerned an issue within the ability of an ordinary juror to decide and did not appear to address how the defendant's mental afflictions affected his reasoning or actions, there was no abuse of discretion in excluding it.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. Shahid v. City of Detroit, 889 F.2d 1543 (6th Cir. 1989) .

(n2)Footnote 2. McEwen v. City of Norman, Okla., 926 F.2d 1539 (10th Cir. 1991) .

(n3)Footnote 3. Mitroff v. Xomox Corp., 797 F.2d 271 (6th Cir. 1986) .

(n4)Footnote 4. Davis v. Combustion Eng'g, Inc., 742 F.2d 916 (6th Cir. 1984) .

(n5)Footnote 5. Torres v. County of Oakland, 758 F.2d 147 (6th Cir. 1985) .

(n6)Footnote 6. United States v. Arenal, 768 F.2d 263 (8th Cir. 1985) .

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Burchfield, 719 F.2d 356 (11th Cir. 1983) .

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Sellers, 566 F.2d 884 (4th Cir. 1977) .

(n9)Footnote 9. Matthews v. Ashland Chem., Inc., 770 F.2d 1303 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n10)Footnote 10. McGowan v. Cooper Indus., 863 F.2d 1266 (6th Cir. 1988) .

(n11)Footnote 11. Haney v. Mizell Mem. Hosp., 744 F.2d 1467 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n12)Footnote 12. Salas v. Carpenter, 980 F.2d 299 (5th Cir. 1992) .

(n13)Footnote 13. Hanson v. Waller, 888 F.2d 806 (11th Cir. 1989) .

(n14)Footnote 14. United States v. Gold, 743 F.2d 800 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n15)Footnote 15. Police Ret. Sys. v. Midwest Invest. Advisory Serv., 940 F.2d 351 (8th Cir. 1991) .

(n16)Footnote 16. Harris v. Pacific Floor Mach. Mfg. Co., 856 F.2d 64 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n17)Footnote 17. Specht v. Jensen, 853 F.2d 805 (10th Cir. 1988) (en banc).

(n18)Footnote 18. Parker v. Williams, 855 F.2d 763 (11th Cir. 1988) , vacated on other grounds, 862 F.2d 1471 (11th Cir. 1989) .

(n19)Footnote 19. Haney v. Mizell Mem. Hosp., 744 F.2d 1467 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n20)Footnote 20. United States v. Bednar, 728 F.2d 1043 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n21)Footnote 21. Strong v. E.I. DuPont de Nemours Co., 667 F.2d 682 (8th Cir. 1981) .

(n22)Footnote 22. United States v. Valverde, 846 F.2d 513 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n23)Footnote 23. Little Oil Co. v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 852 F.2d 441 (9th Cir. 1988) .

(n24)Footnote 24. United States v. Alexander, 805 F.2d 1458 (11th Cir. 1986) .

(n25)Footnote 25. United States v. White, 116 F.3d 903 (D.C. Cir. 1997) .

(n26)Footnote 26. United States v. Conyers, 118 F.3d 755 (D.C. Cir. 1997) .

(n27)Footnote 27. In re Sealed Case, 99 F.3d 1175 (D.C. Cir. 1996) .

(n28)Footnote 28. United States v. Willis, 61 F.3d 526 (7th Cir. 1995) .

(n29)Footnote 29. United States v. Lipscomb, 14 F.3d 1236 (7th Cir. 1994) (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 704.02[7]).

(n30)Footnote 30. United States v. Murillo, 255 F.3d 1169 (9th Cir. 2001) .

(n31)Footnote 31. United States v. Plunk, 153 F.3d 1011 (9th Cir. 1998) .

(n32)Footnote 32. United States v. Gomez-Norena, 908 F.2d 497 (9th Cir. 1990) .

(n33)Footnote 33. United States v. Dubray, 854 F.2d 1099 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n34)Footnote 34. United States v. Gipson, 862 F.2d 714 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n35)Footnote 35. United States v. Austin, 981 F.2d 1163 (10th Cir. 1992) .

(n36)Footnote 36. United States v. Davis, 835 F.2d 274 (11th Cir. 1988) .

(n37)Footnote 37. United States v. Thigpen, 4 F.3d 1573 (11th Cir. 1993) (en banc).

(n38)Footnote 38. United States v. Edwards, 819 F.2d 262 (11th Cir. 1987) .

(n39)Footnote 39. United States v. Alexander, 805 F.2d 1458 (11th Cir. 1986) .

(n40)Footnote 40. United States v. Roberts, 887 F.2d 534 (5th Cir. 1989) .

(n41)Footnote 41. United States v. Vest, 116 F.3d 1179 (7th Cir. 1997) .

(n42)Footnote 42. United States v. Windfelder, 790 F.2d 576 (7th Cir. 1986) .

(n43)Footnote 43. United States v. Esch, 832 F.2d 531 (10th Cir. 1987) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 704 RULE 704

3-704 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 704.04

704.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

The basic approach to opinions, lay and expert, in these rules is to admit them when helpful to the trier of fact. In order to render this approach fully effective and to allay any doubt on the subject, the so-called ultimate issue rule is specifically abolished by the instant rule.

The older cases often contained strictures against allowing witnesses to express opinions upon ultimate issues, as a particular aspect of the rule against opinions. The rule was unduly restrictive, difficult of application, and generally served only to deprive the trier of fact of useful information. 7 Wigmore 1920, 1921; McCormick 12. The basis usually assigned for the rule, to prevent the witness from usurping the province of the jury, is aptly characterized as empty rhetoric. 7 Wigmore 1920, p. 17. Efforts to meet the felt needs of particular situations led to odd verbal circumlocutions which were said not to violate the rule. Thus a witness could express his estimate of the criminal responsibility of an accused in terms of sanity or insanity, but not in terms of ability to tell right from wrong or other more modern standard. And in cases of medical causation, witnesses were sometimes required to couch their opinions in cautious phrases of might or could, rather than did, though the result was to deprive many opinions of the positiveness to which they were entitled, accompanied by the hazard of a ruling of insufficiency to support a verdict. In other instances the rule was simply disregarded, and, as concessions to need, opinions were allowed upon such matters as intoxication, speed, handwriting, and value, although more precise coincidence with an ultimate issue would scarcely be possible.

Many modern decisions illustrate the trend to abandon the rule completely. People v. Wilson, 25 Cal. 2d 341, 153 P.2d 720 (1944) , whether abortion necessary to save life of patient; Clifford-Jacobs Forging Co. v. Industrial Comm'n, 19 Ill. 2d 236, 166 N.E.2d 582 (1960) , medical causation; Dowling v. L. H. Shattuck, Inc., 91 N.H. 234, 17 A.2d 529 (1941) , proper method of shoring ditch; Schweiger v. Solbeck, 191 Or. 454, 230 P.2d 195 (1951) , cause of landslide. In each instance the opinion was allowed. [Editor's Note: The inference in this Note, that Rule 704 imposes no limitations on ultimate issue testimony, must be qualified in light of the later addition of Rule 704(b) by Congress. Rule 704(b) prevents an expert from drawing a conclusion that a criminal defendant had or did not have the requisite mental state to commit the crime charged.]

The abolition of the ultimate issue rule does not lower the bars so as to admit all opinions. Under Rules 701 and 702, opinions must be helpful to the trier of fact, and Rule 403 provides for exclusion of evidence which wastes time. These provisions afford ample assurances against the admission of opinions which would merely tell the jury what result to reach, somewhat in the manner of the oath-helpers of an earlier day. They also stand ready to exclude opinions phrased in terms of inadequately explored legal criteria. Thus the question, Did T have capacity to make a will would be excluded, while the question, Did T have sufficient mental capacity to know the nature and extent of his property and the natural objects of his bounty and to formulate a rational scheme of distribution would be allowed. McCormick 12.

For similar provisions see Uniform Rule 56(4); California Evidence Code 805; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure 60-456(d); New Jersey Evidence Rule 56(3).

[2] Senate Report No. 98-225 (adding subdivision (b) in 1984)

With respect to limitations on the scope of expert testimony by psychiatrists and other mental health experts, section 406 of title IV of the bill amends Rule 704 of the Federal Rules of Evidence to provide:

> No expert witness testifying with respect to the mental state or condition of a defendant in a criminal case may state an opinion or inference as to whether the defendant did or did not have the mental state or condition constituting an element of the crime or of a defense thereto. Such ultimate issues are matters for the trier of fact alone.

The purpose of this amendment is to eliminate the confusing spectacle of competing expert witnesses testifying to directly contradictory conclusions as to the ultimate legal issue to be found by the trier of fact. Under this proposal, expert psychiatric testimony would be limited to presenting and explaining their diagnoses, such as whether the defendant had a severe mental disease or defect and what the characteristics of such a disease or defect, if any, may have been. The basis for this limitation on expert testimony in insanity cases is ably stated by the American Psychiatric Association:

> [I]t is clear that psychiatrists are experts in medicine, not the law. As such, it is clear that the psychiatrist's first obligation and expertise in the courtroom is to do psychiatry, i.e., to present medical information and opinion about the defendant's mental state and motivation and to explain in detail the reason for his medical-psychiatric conclusions. When, however, ultimate issue questions are formulated by the law and put to the expert witness who must then say yea or nay, then the expert witness is required to make a leap in logic. He no longer addresses himself to medical concepts but instead must infer or intuit what is in fact unspeakable, namely, the probable relationship between medical concepts and legal or moral constructs such as free will. These impermissible leaps in logic made by expert witnesses confuse the jury. [Footnote omitted.] Juries thus find themselves listening to conclusory and seemingly contradictory psychiatric testimony that defendants are either sane or insane or that they do or do not meet the relevant legal test for insanity. This state of affairs does considerable injustice to psychiatry and, we believe, possibly to criminal defendants. In fact, in many criminal insanity trials both prosecution and defense psychiatrists do agree about the nature and even the extent of mental disorder exhibited by the defendant at the time of the act.

Psychiatrists, of course, must be permitted to testify fully about the defendant's diagnosis, mental state and motivation (in clinical and commonsense terms) at the time of the alleged act so as to permit the jury or judge to reach the ultimate conclusion about which they and only they are expert. Determining whether a criminal defendant was legally insane is a matter for legal fact-finders, not for experts. [American Psychiatric Association Statement on the Insanity Defense at 18-19. See also Hearings, Limiting the Insanity Defense at 256-258 (statement of Dr. Loren Roth, University of Pittsburgh) and 272-273 (statement of Dr. Seymour L. Halleck, University of North Carolina.]

Moreover, the rationale for precluding ultimate opinion psychiatric testimony extends beyond the insanity defense to any ultimate mental state of the defendant that is relevant to the legal conclusion sought to be proven. The Committee has fashioned its Rule 704 provision to reach all such ultimate issues, e.g., premeditation in a homicide case, or lack of predisposition in entrapment.

[3] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 281 (1999)

Rule 704 -- Opinion on Ultimate Issue

Rule 704 presents a different problem from the ones previously discussed, in that Congress did not reject the Advisory Committee's proposal at the time that the Federal Rules of Evidence were initially adopted. Rather, in 1984, Congress added a subdivision to Rule 704 that renders the original Advisory Committee Note misleading. As originally proposed by the Advisory Committee and adopted without change by Congress, Rule 704 provided that "[T]estimony in the form of an opinion or inference is not objectionable because it embraces an ultimate issue to be decided,. by the trier of fact." The reasoning behind the rule is sound: assuming that an expert provides a solid foundation and explanation on an issue for which the fact finder needs assistance, the expert should not be precluded from providing a logical and helpful conclusion to his testimony. The fact finder is simply left hanging if the expert is not permitted to cap off the testimony by stating a conclusion on the ultimate issue to which the expert is testifying. Sometimes, a conclusion on an ultimate issue ties the expert's testimony into a coherent whole, and as such it helps the jury to understand the issues in dispute. ...

The Advisory Committee Note to Rule 704 states that the "ultimate issue" rule is abolished. It criticizes any per se limitation on ultimate issue testimony as "unduly restrictive, difficult of application, and generally serv[ing] only to deprive the trier of fact of useful information." The Advisory Committee Note asserts that that the ultimate issue rule can lead to "odd verbal circumlocutions". For example, "a witness could express his estimate of the criminal responsibility of an accused in terms of sanity or insanity, but not in terms of ability to tell right from wrong or other more modern standard."

The Committee Note provides a powerful argument for rejecting the ultimate issue rule. But Congress passed the Insanity Defense Reform Act of 1984, one provision of which added a subdivision (b) to Rule 704. See 18 U.S.C. H 4241-4247. This amendment was promulgated outside the rulemaking process, and so there is no Advisory Committee Note that can be referred to. Rule 704(b) provides that an expert in a criminal case is not permitted to testify that a criminal defendant did or did not have the requisite mental state to commit the charged crime.

It is obvious that there is a conflict between the original Advisory Committee Note to Rule 704 and the subsequent amendment. Rule 704(b) plainly revives the ultimate issue rule in criminal cases. It raises the very anomaly referred to in the Advisory Committee Note-that an expert witness could say something about the mental state of the defendant, but simply cannot say the buzzword "intent" or "incapable of understanding the wrongfulness of his actions." The fact remains, however, that Congress has amended Rule 704, and as a result, the original Advisory Committee Note to the rule is misleading, at least as to ultimate issue testimony in criminal cases.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
Supp. To CHAPTER 704 RULE 704

3-704 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 704, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 704. Opinion on Ultimate Issue	Rule 704. Opinion on an Ultimate Issue
(a) Except as provided in subdivision (b), testimon	(a) In General -- Not Automatically Objection

	y in the form of an opinion or inference otherwise admissible is not objectionable because it embraces an ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact.		able. An opinion is not objectionable just because it embraces an ultimate issue.
(b)	No expert witness testifying	(b)	Exception. In a criminal case, an with respect to the mental state or condition of a defendant in a criminal case may state an opinion or inference as to whether the defendant did or did not have the mental state or condition constituting an element of the crime charged or of a defense. Those expert witness must not state an opin ion abou t whet her

the defend ant did or did not have a men tal state
or condition that constitutes an elemen t of
the crim e char ged or of a defens
e.
Tho se

stituting an element of the crime charged or of a defense thereto. Such ultimate issues are matters for the trier of fact alone.	matters are for the trier of fact alone.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 704 has been amended as part of the general restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

The Committee deleted all reference to an "inference" on the grounds that the deletion made the Rule flow better and easier to read, and because any "inference" is covered by the broader term "opinion." Courts have not made substantive decisions on the basis of any distinction between an opinion and an inference. No change in current practice is intended.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
Supp. To CHAPTER 704 RULE 704

3-704 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 704.03

Supp. to § 704.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Rule 704(a) [Go To Main]

[c] Rule 704(a) -- Civil Rights Cases

United States v. Farrell, 563 F.3d 364 (8th Cir. 2009) : Affirming convictions for peonage, the Court held it was error (but not plain error) for an expert witness to opine on the strength of the government's case and the credibility of its witnesses through references to the "incredible" and "strong" nature of the evidence against the defendants. Likewise, the expert invaded the fact-finding function of the jury by testifying that the workers "were not controlling their money" and were "forced to pay [the debt]," which was not simply a factual conclusion but an attempt to express an opinion as to the defendants' guilt and state that the worker witnesses were telling the truth.

[d] Rule 704(a) -- Criminal Cases

United States v. McIver, 740 F.3d 550 (4th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a physician's conviction for unlawful distribution of controlled substances, finding no error in the admission of testimony from an anesthesiologist qualified as an expert in pain management that the defendant's prescribing and treatment practices were "outside the course of legitimate medical practice." The terms used by the expert, although similar to those used by courts to express the underlying issue, were not "sufficiently specialized to render his testimony inadmissible" but rather fell "within the limited vernacular that is available to express whether a doctor acted outside the bounds of his professional practice."

[g.1] Rule 704(a) -- Hypothetical Questions

United States v. Jennings, 487 F.3d 564 (8th Cir. 2007) : In a mail fraud case against a former state legislator, a former state official was asked whether he would have approved a transaction had he known of a legislator's financial interest in it. Affirming, the Court held that the question was not a prejudicial "guilt-assuming hypothetical," but a proper way of showing that the undisclosed financial interest was a material fact in making the government agency decision; the government's question did not allude to the specific interest in this case or assume wrongdoing on the defendant's part, but was a general inquiry.

[j] Rule 704(a) -- Medical Witnesses

United States v. McIver, 740 F.3d 550 (4th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a physician's conviction for unlawful distribution of controlled substances, finding no error in the admission of testimony from an anesthesiologist qualified as an expert in pain management that the defendant's prescribing and treatment practices were "outside the course of legitimate medical practice." The terms used by the expert, although similar to those used by courts to express the underlying issue, were not "sufficiently specialized to render his testimony inadmissible" but rather fell "within the limited vernacular that is available to express whether a doctor acted outside the bounds of his professional practice."

[l] Rule 704(a) -- Opinions as to Reasonableness, Necessity, etc.

United States v. Perkins, 470 F.3d 150 (4th Cir. 2006) : In the civil rights prosecution of a police officer for using excessive force, police officers were permitted to give both lay and expert testimony that there was no "law enforcement reason" or no "legitimate reason" for the blows that were struck. Affirming, the Court rejected the defense argument that the officers' testimony amounted to inadmissible legal conclusions, noting that opinion testimony is helpful, as opposed to stating a legal conclusion, when it offers an opinion that does not simply echo a term that has a specialized, distinct meaning in the law. In this case, the officers were asked whether they saw any legitimate reason for the defendant to kick the victim or whether there was any legitimate reason for the officer to inflict the kicks. The Court concluded that the admissibility of the testimony presented a close question, but "the Government's questions were phrased in such a manner so as to avoid the baseline legal conclusion of reasonableness... . The officers' responses that they personally saw no reason for Perkins's kicks provided the jury with concrete examples against which to consider the more abstract question of whether an 'objectively reasonable officer' would have employed the same force."

Schmidt v. Magyari, 557 F.3d 564 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the City in an action by an arrestee who claimed that photographing her tattoo violated her rights. Expert testimony by a police lieutenant on behalf of the plaintiff was properly excluded to the extent that it offered legal conclusions regarding the reasonableness of conduct in light of Fourth Amendment standards.

[m] Rule 704(a) -- Opinions on Legal Matters

[i] Rule 704(a) -- Civil Cases

Chavez v. Carranza, 559 F.3d 486 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court upheld an award of compensatory and punitive damages for victims of torture and their families in a suit against a former Salvadoran military officer. It held that because the Trial Judge properly declined to grant comity to the Salvadoran Amnesty Law, there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the defendant's expert testimony on the purpose of the Law. The opinion was not relevant and was also an opinion on the law, and "[a]n expert opinion on a question of law is inadmissible."

Anderson v. Suiters, 499 F.3d 1228 (10th Cir. 2007) : The plaintiff sued for violations of her privacy rights after a videotape, allegedly showing her estranged husband raping her while she was unconscious, was broadcast without her consent and contrary to her wishes. Affirming summary judgment for the media defendants, the Court held that no issue of a material fact was created by the declaration by an expert witness for the plaintiff that the videotape was not "newsworthy" or an issue of "public concern." This determination, based on the undisputed facts in the record, was the ultimate question of law before the Court, and expert testimony on "ultimate questions of law, i.e., legal opinions or conclusions, is not favored."

[ii] Rule 704(a) -- Opinions on Legal Matters -- Criminal Cases

[B] Rule 704(a) -- Opinions on Legal Matters -- Criminal Cases -- Fraud

United States v. Setser, 568 F.3d 482 (5th Cir. 2009) : Affirming convictions for operating a multimillion-dollar Ponzi

scheme, the Court held it was error (but harmless) for the receiver of the defendants' enterprises to testify that they constituted a "security fraud" and a "Ponzi scheme."

United States v. Winkle, 477 F.3d 407 (6th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a bank fraud conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when a prosecution expert testified to his conclusion that a check kite had occurred. The expert was qualified, and his testimony was "otherwise admissible" because it was helpful to a jury that might not have understood the scheme because of its complexity and it did not impermissibly refer to the defendant's state of mind.

United States v. Davis, 471 F.3d 783 (7th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for Medicaid fraud, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a witness was permitted to testify how the state Medicaid agency interpreted the requirements of the program. The Court noted that "[e]xperts are permitted to testify regarding how their government agency applies rules as long as the testimony does not incorrectly state the law or opine on certain ultimate legal issues in the case," and that "experts are allowed to testify about how they enforce regulations, whether transactions comply with regulations, and how they ensure that the public knows about regulations."

[C] Rule 704(a) -- Opinions on Legal Matters -- Criminal Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Noel, 581 F.3d 490 (7th Cir. 2009) : Although the Court affirmed convictions for producing and possessing child pornography, it found an abuse of discretion in permitting an Indiana detective who conducted the forensic examination of the computer media seized from the defendant's residence to testify that photos on the computer met the federal definition of child pornography. Although the witness was presented as an expert, she gave no explanation for her opinion, so it amounted to "nothing more than a statement that the photos were illegal," which would not assist the jury.

[D] Rule 704(a) -- Opinions on Legal Matters -- Criminal Cases -- Taxes

United States v. Moran, 493 F.3d 1002 (9th Cir. 2007) : In a prosecution for tax fraud and wire and mail fraud, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting a government witness to give an opinion that a program offered by the defendants was a "sham." Even if the transactions were a sham, the jury would still have to draw its own inference from that predicate testimony to answer the ultimate factual question of whether "the return was false as to something that was necessary to a determination of whether income tax was owed."

United States v. Bedford, 536 F.3d 1148 (10th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to assist taxpayers in filing fraudulent tax returns, holding that an IRS agent was properly permitted to testify as to the proper tax consequences of a transaction. The expert did not seek to offer an opinion on whether the defendant did in fact intend to evade taxes.

[q] Rule 704(a) -- Use of Vernacular That May Have a Legal Connotation

United States v. Perkins, 470 F.3d 150 (4th Cir. 2006) : In the civil rights prosecution of a police officer for using excessive force, police officers were permitted to give both lay and expert testimony that there was no "law enforcement reason" or no "legitimate reason" for the blows that were struck. Affirming, the Court rejected the defense argument that the officers' testimony amounted to inadmissible legal conclusions, noting that opinion testimony is helpful, as opposed to stating a legal conclusion, when it offers an opinion that does not simply echo a term that has a specialized, distinct meaning in the law. The Court noted that "[o]n the one hand, conclusory testimony that a company engaged in 'discrimination,' that landlord was 'negligent,' or that investment house engaged in a 'fraudulent and manipulative scheme' involves the use of terms with considerable legal baggage; such testimony nearly always invades the province of the jury... . On the other hand, the legal meaning of some terms is not so distinctive from the colloquial meaning, if a distinction exists at all, making it difficult to gauge the helpfulness, and thus admissibility, of the testimony under Rule 704." The distinction between the statutory meaning of "unreasonable" use of force, and the colloquial meaning was found "not as clear as with other more technical terms like 'negligence' or 'fraud,' i.e., terms that had their common vernacular stem from their legalistic roots." In this case, the officers were asked whether they saw any legitimate reason for the defendant to kick the victim or whether there was any legitimate reason for the officer to inflict the kicks. The Court concluded that the admissibility of the testimony presented a close question, but "the Government's questions were phrased in such a manner so as to avoid the baseline legal conclusion of reasonableness... . The officers' responses that they personally saw no reason for Perkins's kicks provided the jury with concrete examples against which to consider the more abstract question of whether an 'objectively reasonable officer' would have employed the same force."

United States v. Ahmed, 472 F.3d 427 (6th Cir. 2006) : Affirming the defendant's conviction for making false statements concerning his employment history when he was interviewed for a position as a baggage screener, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting an assistant director in the personnel security division at the Transportation Security Administration to testify as a lay witness that information the defendant provided in a particular section of a questionnaire had not been honest and that this influenced TSA's decision concerning employment suitability. The Court found that the testimony was based on personal knowledge and was relevant to establishing the materiality of the false statements. Although the defendant complained that the testimony amounted to a legal conclusion, the Court concluded that the testimony that the answers were "false" was nothing more than a non-technical expression of the witness's opinion. As such, the terms used by the witness did not carry a "separate, distinct and specialized meaning in the law different from that present in the vernacular."

[2] Rule 704(b) [Go To Main]

[b.1] Defendant's Own Statements

United States v. Diekhoff, 535 F.3d 611 (7th Cir. 2008) : The defendant was convicted of kidnapping and related offenses after he pleaded insanity. Affirming, the Court found no error in allowing the prosecution's expert psychologist to testify that when she interviewed him, he admitted that he knew that what he did was wrong. The defendant contended that this testimony amounted to an expert opinion on his sanity, barred by Rule 704(b), but the Court concluded that the expert simply related the defendant's statement and did not state any opinion at all. "Although this observation was probative of the ultimate issue, it did not result from Dr. Stribling's expertise or the application of her technical knowledge to the fact of the case." While one could infer from the statement that it was made by a sane person, "such an inference stems from a general understanding about how the world works" and not from any expert opinion.

[d] Rule 704(b) -- Knowledge

United States v. Shaffer, 472 F.3d 1219 (10th Cir. 2007) : The defendant was convicted for possessing and distributing child pornography when he obtained pornography on the Internet and made it available to other users through a file-sharing application. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a computer expert was precluded from opining that, based on the file structure of the defendant's hard drive, he was on a "porn fishing expedition with no particular calculation toward any particular type of material, other than generally sexually explicit material." The Court reasoned that the expert "sought to suggest to the jury, at the very least by inference, that Mr. Shaffer did not knowingly possess or distribute unlawful child pornography as opposed to simple adult pornography. Yet it was precisely this issue that was hotly contested in, and an essential element of, the crimes with which he was charged." Thus, the testimony came within the bar of Rule 704(b).

[e] Rule 704(b) -- Law Enforcement Agents

[i] Drug Cases

United States v. Martinez, 476 F.3d 961 (D.C. Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to import cocaine, finding no error in the admission of expert testimony by a former DEA agent that the United States was the most likely destination of Colombian cocaine transported through Central America. The testimony did not improperly refer to the defendant's particular mental state, but was only about drug organizations in general.

United States v. Lopez, 547 F.3d 364 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed drug distribution and firearm convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting an investigator from the United States Attorney's office to testify that drug paraphernalia and drugs seized from the defendant's car were more consistent with distribution than with personal use, where the expert did not testify to the defendant's intent.

United States v. Price, 458 F.3d 202 (3d Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for drug and weapon offenses, finding no plain error in the admission of testimony by a police expert that drug dealers are very likely to carry guns and drug buyers almost never do. The testimony said not a word about the defendant's mental state and was proper testimony about the common practices of drug dealers.

United States v. Ibarra, 493 F.3d 526 (5th Cir. 2007) : The Court reversed a conviction for possession with intent to distribute over five kilograms of cocaine because a law enforcement agent had been permitted to testify that he had never seen a courier entrusted with an amount of cocaine that size without the courier knowing that he was carrying something illegal. The expert's testimony "went directly to the ultimate issue to be determined by the jury."

United States v. Are, 590 F.3d 499 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug conspiracy, finding that testimony by law enforcement agents regarding the meaning of coded language in intercepted communications did not impermissibly constitute an opinion on the defendant's mental state. The defendants argued that once the jury credited the testimony, no inference was necessary to find that the defendants possessed the requisite intent to knowingly use the phone to conduct drug transactions, but the Court noted that "the jury would still have to evaluate the coded terms in the context of the entire conversation to determine whether, as a whole, the conversation was intended to further a drug transaction." In United States v. Morris, 576 F.3d 661 (7th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed convictions for drug and firearm offenses, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by a police sergeant as to the common practices of street-level narcotics sales, including what quantities of drugs are generally possessed for purposes of distribution, and to opine that 23.7 grams of heroin "would be consistent with distribution quantity." The sergeant never expressed any opinion about the defendant's actual state of mind and, although the sergeant was involved in the raid that found the drugs, there was no likelihood that the jury would conclude that he was offering an opinion about the defendant's intent. The Court emphasized that "[t]he government's decision not to use [the sergeant] as a fact witness was an important step in avoiding potential juror confusion or crossing the line into improper opinion." In United States v. Blount, 502 F.3d 674 (7th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed a conviction for possessing a firearm in furtherance of a drug trafficking crime, holding that an officer's expert opinion that the defendant's gun was used in furtherance of drug crimes was based on the way the drugs and gun were discovered rather than on what he knew about the defendant. Thus, the testimony assisted the jury to infer the defendant's motives from a general trend linking drugs and guns. The Court also rejected the argument that the officer's "testimony was a mere legal conclusion and as such was unhelpful to the jury"; it reasoned that "[t]he average juror does not know how a drug business is run," "Boerm did not couch his testimony in legal terms," and "[t]here is a difference between stating a legal conclusion and providing concrete information against which to measure abstract legal concepts." In United States v. Glover, 479 F.3d 511 (7th Cir. 2007) , the court affirmed a conviction for drug distribution offenses, finding no error when a law enforcement agent was permitted to testify that street level drug dealers typically sell very small quantities; that they often maintain small stashes of drugs nearby for resupply, rather than carrying all their drugs with them; and that firearms are common tools of the trade for drug dealers. The Court noted that the officer made no direct reference to the defendant's intent to distribute drugs, "and the structure of his examination made clear that he was speaking generally about the practices of street level drug dealers, not specifically about Glover."

United States v. Urbina, 431 F.3d 305 (8th Cir. 2005) : The defendant was convicted for possession with intent to distribute cocaine after his truck was stopped on the highway and six bundles of cocaine were found hidden in an auxiliary gas tank. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting a DEA agent to testify that he had never seen a drug dealer entrust as large a quantity of drugs to a courier who was not aware of what he was transporting. The evidence was relevant to rebut a defense that the defendant did not know the cocaine was present in the tank; it was helpful to a jury not familiar with the practices of the drug trade; and the prosecution did not elicit an opinion on the ultimate issue of the defendant's knowledge, which would be impermissible.

United States v. Anchrum, 590 F.3d 795 (9th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug and firearms offenses, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting a DEA agent who had participated in the incident leading to the defendant's arrest to also testify as an expert regarding the various reasons a hypothetical drug dealer would possess a firearm. The Judge avoided problems with an agent testifying in dual roles by separating the testimony into "phases." Furthermore, the officer's expert testimony avoided opinions about the defendant's mental state by talking of a hypothetical drug dealer and describing the reasons in the second person point of view.

United States v. Steed, 548 F.3d 961 (11th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a truck driver's conviction for possession of marijuana with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by the arresting officer that the defendant's hands were shaking, he had sweat on his forehead even though the air conditioner had been on, and that he avoided making eye contact. Although this testimony likely gave rise to an inference that the defendant knew he was transporting contraband, the experienced officer did not expressly state the inference and let the jury draw its own conclusions.

[g] Rule 704(b) -- Medical Opinions

United States v. Eff, 524 F.3d 712 (5th Cir. 2008) : A Forest Service firefighter, charged with arson, offered testimony by medical witnesses that he suffered from a genetic disorder that causes brain, behavioral, and neurocognitive deficiencies; the experts concluded that as a result of his condition the defendant was unable to appreciate the nature and quality or wrongfulness of his acts. Affirming, the Court held that the conclusion was inadmissible under Rule 704(b), because that was the ultimate issue in the defendant's insanity defense.

United States v. Chube, 538 F.3d 693 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for unlawful distribution of controlled substances and health care fraud involving illegitimate prescriptions of OxyContin, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony by a doctor specializing in internal and addiction medicine and by a pharmacology expert. Both testified that the prescriptions written for 98 patients were not for a "legitimate medical purpose." The Court noted that the jury was told that the "standard of care" was an issue distinct from the question of "legality." The Court concluded that the experts did not improperly opine on the law, but indicated that the medical doctor had "come close to a statement about the Doctors' mental state." In United States v. Gladish, 536 F.3d 646 (7th Cir. 2008) , the Court reserved a conviction for attempted sexual activity with a minor arising from an Internet chat room solicitation of an undercover agent impersonating a 14-year-old, holding it was an abuse of discretion to preclude a defense psychologist from testifying that the defendant suffered from a "character pathology" leading to "the emotional and physical distance he prefers in his adult interpersonal relationships due to pronounced fear of ridicule and rejection." "The psychologist could not have been permitted to testify that the defendant did not intend to have sex with 'Abagail,' but he could have testified that it was unlikely, given the defendant's psychology, that he would act on his intent."

[h] Rule 704(b) -- Mens Rea Evidence

United States v. Hofus, 598 F.3d 1171 (9th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for attempting to coerce and entice a minor to engage in sexual intercourse, finding no abuse of discretion when a psychologist was precluded from testifying that the defendant was engaged in texting as "fantasy alone" and was unlikely to act on the intentions (to engage in sex) expressed in his texts. It held that the likelihood the defendant would engage in sex with a minor was irrelevant to whether he would commit the charged crime of attempting to induce or entice a minor to engage in sexual activity, and that an opinion that the defendant texted "in fantasy alone" was the equivalent of saying he lacked the requisite mens rea, which would run afoul of Rule 704(b). One Judge dissented, arguing that the evidence was relevant, since "[i]f the defendant did not intend to have intercourse with the minor, he was unlikely to be attempting to persuade her to have intercourse," and that denying the "fantasy" evidence violated the right to present a defense. In United States v. Cohen, 510 F.3d 1114 (9th Cir. 2007) , the Court reversed the conviction of a defendant charged with aiding and assisting the filing of a false tax return, because the defendant's expert psychiatrist was erroneously precluded from testifying that a narcissistic personality disorder like the defendant's can cause a person to continue to believe something to be true despite overwhelming evidence of its patent absurdity. The Court held that the expert's testimony would have assisted the jury in determining whether the defendant had a good-faith belief that he was complying with the law, thereby negating the mens rea element of the 26 U.S.C. § 7206(2), which requires that a defendant "wilfully" assist in the filing of a false tax return. Without the expert testimony, the defendant had no way to explain the effect that his mental disorder may have had on his ability to form the requisite mens rea. The Court noted that to the extent the Trial Judge was concerned that some of the expert's testimony would violate Rule 704(b), the "best way for the district court to have insured the exclusion of the potentially inadmissible aspects of Dr. Roitman's testimony was not to bar him from testifying altogether, but to sustain the government's objections to particular questions likely to elicit inadmissible evidence under the rule." If the Judge had followed this procedure, then the expert testimony "would have gone to a predicate matter -- whether Cohen suffered from a Narcissistic Personality Disorder. Even if the jury had accepted this diagnosis, the jury would still have been required to determine what impact, if any, that condition might have on Cohen's ability to form the requisite mens rea -- the intent to evade the tax laws."

[j] Rule 704(b) -- Profile Evidence

United States v. Cuellar, 478 F.3d 282 (5th Cir. 2007) (en banc), reversed on other grounds, 128 S. Ct. 1994, 170 L. Ed. 2d 942 (2008) : The defendant, a suspected drug courier, was convicted of international money laundering after a bundle of cash was found hidden in a car he was driving to Mexico. A law enforcement expert was permitted to testify that "[t]he people who are driving money or who are driving dope know they are transporting either dope or money, something of value." The Court found that this testimony violated Rule 704(b), as it was essentially profile evidence and an opinion on the defendant's mental state. The defendant did not make a specific objection at trial, however, and the Court found no plain error.

[k] Rule 704(b) -- Specific Intent

[i] Rule 704(b) -- Drugs

United States v. Are, 590 F.3d 499 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug conspiracy, finding that testimony by law enforcement agents regarding the meaning of coded language in intercepted communications did not impermissibly constitute an opinion on the defendant's mental state. The defendants argued that once the jury credited the testimony, no inference was necessary to find that the defendants possessed the requisite intent to knowingly use the phone to conduct drug transactions, but the Court noted that "the jury would still have to evaluate the coded terms in the context of the entire conversation to determine whether, as a whole, the conversation was intended to further a drug transaction."

[ii] Rule 704(b) -- Specific Intent -- Fraud and Tax Evasion

United States v. Cohen, 510 F.3d 1114 (9th Cir. 2007) : The Court reversed the conviction of a defendant charged with aiding and assisting the filing of a false tax return, because the defendant's expert psychiatrist was erroneously precluded from testifying that a narcissistic personality disorder like the defendant's can cause a person to continue to believe something to be true despite overwhelming evidence of its patent absurdity. The Court held that the expert's testimony would have assisted the jury in determining whether the defendant had a good-faith belief that he was complying with the law, thereby negating the mens rea element of the 26 U.S.C. § 7206(2), which requires that a defendant "wilfully" assist in the filing of a false tax return. Without the expert testimony, the defendant had no way to explain the effect that his mental disorder may have had on his ability to form the requisite mens rea. The Court noted that to the extent the Trial Judge was concerned that some of the expert's testimony would violate Rule 704(b), the "best way for the district court to have insured the exclusion of the potentially inadmissible aspects of Dr. Roitman's testimony was not to bar him from testifying altogether, but to sustain the government's objections to particular questions likely to elicit inadmissible evidence under the rule." If the Judge had followed this procedure, then the expert testimony "would have gone to a predicate matter -- whether Cohen suffered from a Narcissistic Personality Disorder. Even if the jury had accepted this diagnosis, the jury would still have been required to determine what impact, if any, that condition might have on Cohen's ability to form the requisite mens rea -- the intent to evade the tax laws."

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 705 RULE 705

3-705 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 705.syn

§ 705.syn Synopsis to Chapter 705: RULE 705

705.01 Official Text

705.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Basic Rule

[2] Flexibility of the Rule

[3] Discovery of the Basis of an Expert Opinion

[4] Control by the Court

[5] Risks of Not Bringing Out Basis on Direct

705.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Cross-Examination

[2] Discovery for Cross-Examination

[3] Failure To Produce Supporting Materials

[4] Hypothetical Questions

[a] Generally

[b] Hypothetical Questions -- Omission of Fact from Hypothetical Question

[5] Motions To Strike

[6] Obligations of Direct Examiner

[7] Relationship to Other Rules

[8] Summary Judgment

[9] Unsupported Opinion

705.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] 1993 Amendment Committee Note

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 705 RULE 705

1-705 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 705.01

705.01 Official Text

Rule 705. Disclosure of Facts or Data Underlying Expert Opinion

The expert may testify in terms of opinion or inference and give reasons therefor without first testifying to the underlying facts or data, unless the court requires otherwise. The expert may in any event be required to disclose the underlying facts or data on cross-examination.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 705 RULE 705

1-705 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 705.02

705.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Basic Rule

Before the Federal Rules were adopted, Federal Courts disagreed on whether the data used by experts in formulating their opinions had to be brought out at trial by the party calling the expert as a condition precedent to admission of the expert's opinion. Some Courts required that the expert disclose on direct examination the sources used, while others assumed the credibility of the opinion without requiring such disclosure and left exploration of the sources for cross-examination.

Rule 705 by its terms puts the burden on the adverse party to expose any weaknesses in the basis of the expert's opinion, including the expert's reliance on out-of-court sources. Description of the basis is not a condition precedent to the admissibility of expert testimony. n1

[2] Flexibility of the Rule

Now that Rule 703 permits experts to rely on certain inadmissible data, the direct examiner may wish to bring out all the data on which the expert relied in order to bolster the testimony. Rule 705 permits the examiner to do this, assuming the Court believes that bringing out the data not independently admissible is acceptable, an issue that is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 703, § 703.02[3], [4]. However, the Rule does not require that the basis be explicated during direct examination. Apparently the Rule's drafters recognized that the data on which an expert bases an opinion might sometimes confuse the trier of fact and that the examiner should be permitted to forgo testimony as to basis when confusion or undue consumption of time might be avoided by offering the opinion without many supporting details.

Rule 705 does not require the Court to admit expert testimony that lacks a sufficient basis in facts or data. The Rule must be read in tandem with Rule 702(1), which requires that an expert's opinion must be based on "sufficient facts or data." Rule 705 simply deals with the procedure and timing for presenting the underlying facts or data to the jury. n2

It should be noted that while Rule 705 provides flexibility, in practice counsel will ordinarily present a significant amount of supporting data on direct examination of the expert. Such disclosure may be necessary to make the opinion understandable and to allow the expert to appear well-qualified to the jury. Disclosure of the basis on direct also allows counsel to bring out and explain any weakness in the expert's basis, before it is brought out by the adversary on cross-examination.

The Rule provides that the cross-examiner "may" inquire into the underlying facts. Our view is that it is very important for the cross-examiner to be able to probe the basis for an expert opinion and that great leeway should be given to the cross-examiner to test the opinion by asking about its data base. In most cases the word "may" should be read to mean that the cross-examiner has a right to inquire into the details of an expert's opinion. This right should be subject to limitation under Rules 403 and 611(a), however.

[3] Discovery of the Basis of an Expert Opinion

Because experts are not required to state the basis of their opinions on direct examination, it is extremely important that opposing counsel fully utilize opportunities to discover before trial the basis for expert opinions. Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 16(a)(1)(E) provides that upon request, the government shall disclose to the defendant a written summary of expert testimony that it intends to use. The summary must describe the witness's opinions, the bases and the reasons therefor, and the witness' qualifications. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(a)(2)(B) requires the preparation and disclosure of a report signed by the expert containing a complete statement of all opinions to be expressed and the basis and reasons therefor; the data or other information considered by the witness in forming the opinions; any exhibits to be used as a summary of or support for the opinions; and a description of the expert's qualifications, compensation, and a listing of other cases in which the expert has testified within the previous four years. n3 The Civil Rule requirement applies only to an expert "who is retained or specially employed to provide expert testimony in the case or whose duties as an employee of the party regularly involve giving expert testimony." It does not apply, for example, to corporate agents who are used as experts on a one-time basis.

[4] Control by the Court

The Rule does not require counsel to lay out an expert's basis on direct examination. However, the Advisory Committee Note to a 1993 Amendment to the Rule states that disclosure of the expert's basis may be required in advance if a serious question is raised under Rule 702 or 703 as to the admissibility of the expert's testimony. That is, the Court will ordinarily require disclosure of the basis of the expert's opinion before ruling on an objection under Rule 702 or 703. The last clause of the first sentence of Rule 705 specifically authorizes the Trial Judge to require testimony as to the basis in advance. It is easier to avoid an objectionable opinion than to strike one from the memory of jurors who have heard it.

[5] Risks of Not Bringing Out Basis on Direct

There are risks involved in calling an expert to testify without eliciting the basis of the opinion on direct examination. The upside possibility is that the cross-examiner will actually strengthen the expert's testimony by unwittingly exposing a solid basis for the expert's opinion. The downside risk is that the adversary will sense that a trap is laid -- especially in light of the expanded discovery provided by the Federal Rules -- and forgo cross-examination of the expert, choosing instead to call his or her own expert. That would leave counsel who called the first expert with no option other than to attempt to bring out that expert's basis on redirect or rebuttal. But this option requires an act of mercy from the Trial Judge under Rule 611. Counsel cannot count on a second chance to do what the Judge might think should have been done earlier.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., International Adhesive Coating Co. v. Bolton Emerson Int'l, Inc., 851 F.2d 540, 544 (1st Cir. 1988) :

> If in arriving at his opinion the expert has reasonably relied on facts or data before trial, the basis for > the opinion need not be disclosed as a condition to admitting the testimony. The burden is on opposing counsel through cross-examination to explore and expose any weaknesses in the underpinnings of the expert's opinion.

See also United States v. Havvard, 260 F.3d 597 (7th Cir. 2001) (no error in admitting expert testimony where the expert's basis was not described in detail on direct examination; uncovering the basis for the opinion is a matter for cross-examination under Rule 705); Smith v. Ford Motor Co., 626 F.2d 784, 793 (10th Cir. 1980) (the effect of Rule 705 is to place the full burden of exploration of the facts and assumptions underlying the testimony of an expert witness squarely on the shoulders of opposing counsel's cross-examination.).

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., Slaughter v. Southern Talc Co., 919 F.2d 304 (5th Cir. 1990) (Rule 705 does not provide for admissibility of an expert's bare conclusion derived from erroneous data).

(n3)Footnote 3. For an excellent discussion of the impact of the Rule 26 amendments on expert testimony, see Joseph, Emerging Expert Issues under the 1993 Disclosure Amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 164 F.R.D. 97 (1996) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 705 RULE 705

1-705 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 705.03

705.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Cross-Examination

United States v. Wright, 783 F.2d 1091 (D.C. Cir. 1986) : In a kidnapping case, the Court held that one defendant's confrontation rights were not violated when a codefendant's psychiatrist was erroneously permitted to testify during cross-examination about a statement made by the codefendant concerning the offense. The government had the right to examine the basis of the doctor's opinion and the doctor's reference to what was said to him was not offered for its truth, but to explain his opinion.

United States v. A & S Council Oil Co., 947 F.2d 1128 (4th Cir. 1991) : The principal government witness in a prosecution for false claims fraud had taken polygraph tests in which the government examiner concluded he was "not truthful." A government motion in limine to exclude polygraph evidence was granted, and at trial the defense was not permitted to inquire about the tests while cross-examining a government expert whose report (entered in evidence) concluded that the key witness was competent. The Court reversed, holding that as a panel it could not overturn the Circuit's rule excluding polygraph evidence offered to prove the examinee's truthfulness, but that under Rule 705 the expert could be examined on the polygraph report he had considered in reaching his opinion on competency. In United States v. Gillis, n1 the Court affirmed convictions for involvement with stolen property and held that the government properly cross-examined a psychiatrist who had examined the defendant and testified on his behalf in a 1980 prosecution for transportation of a stolen motor vehicle and kidnapping. When the defendant elicited from the doctor his 1980 diagnosis, the government was permitted to examine him concerning the facts supporting it. The Court found that the government avoided mentioning the outcome of the prior trial and had a need to explore the basis of the expert opinion.

Polythane Sys. v. Marina Ventures Int'l, Ltd., 993 F.2d 1201 (5th Cir. 1993) : Although the Court affirmed a judgment for the manufacturer of a flotation foam in an action seeking a declaration of nonliability for problems with a dock, it found there was error in permitting the manufacturer to introduce a report prepared by its expert (who did not testify) simply because the manufacturer elicited on cross-examination of the marina's expert that the witness had relied on the report. The Court noted that an expert may be permitted to disclose the data relied upon, but "such disclosure does not facilitate the admission of otherwise inadmissible evidence." See also Bryan v. John Bean Div., 566 F.2d 541 (5th Cir. 1978) (finding error in the cross-examination of one expert about opinions of two other experts, where the testifying expert had not relied on those conclusions).

United States v. Whitetail, 956 F.2d 857 (8th Cir. 1992) : Affirming a conviction for murder, the Court held it was proper to cross-examine defense experts about the underlying facts or data upon which they had based their opinions. In Hale v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., n2 an action involving a wheel rim explosion, the Court held that the plaintiffs properly cross-examined a defense expert about dissimilar accidents after the expert testified that the wheel rim was a safe design and that he had no problems with it. In Fluckey v. Chicago & N.W. Transp. Co., n3 the Court affirmed a judgment for a railroad in a wrongful death case, finding that cross-examination of the railroad's expert was not improperly restricted. The hypothetical question asked of the expert was not supported by the evidence.

United States v. Barton, 731 F.2d 669 (10th Cir. 1984) : The Court concluded that the government was properly permitted to ask an expert, who was called by the defense to testify that a primer residue test on the defendant was inconclusive, whether barium residue had been found on the defendant's hand. Since the expert did not testify that the test results were negative or unreliable, the Court reasoned that the government could ask the expert to explain what the test actually showed and why it was deemed inconclusive.

Studiengesellschaft Kohle, m.b.H. v. Dart Indus., 862 F.2d 1564 (Fed. Cir. 1988) : The Court held that an expert on patent royalties did not have to testify affirmatively as to his mental processes and calculations in arriving at a royalty floor, where an infringer did not cross-examine on the issue and the special master appointed to determine damages did not require such testimony.

[2] Discovery for Cross-Examination

United States v. Hensel, 699 F.2d 18 (1st Cir. 1983) : In a marijuana conspiracy prosecution, the Court upheld a ruling that the government did not have to turn over Drug Enforcement Agency documents, reports, etc., to assist the defense in cross-examination of an agent who testified, when the agent had not relied on the material in arriving at his opinion.

[3] Failure To Produce Supporting Materials

United States v. Jones, 72 F.3d 1324 (7th Cir. 1995) : In a counterfeiting case involving fingerprint evidence, the prosecution expert was unable at trial to identify the points of identity he had discerned between the known prints of one of the defendants and the prints found on counterfeit currency. The expert explained that he had prepared photographic enlargements, but had not brought them to Court, and that he could not identify any points of similarity in the prints on the witness stand without either a magnifying glass or the photographic enlargements. Affirming the convictions, the Court held there was no error in refusing to strike the expert's testimony, since the defendants would have been entitled to a continuance so that the prosecution could have produced supporting materials, but they had not requested a continuance. The defendants' decision to forgo a continuance and instead highlight on cross-examination the absence of supporting materials for the expert's opinion "must be viewed as a tactical decision by the defense."

[4] Hypothetical Questions

[a] Generally

United States v. Wilson, 798 F.2d 509 (1st Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed income tax convictions, finding that an expert, who was expected to answer hypothetical questions unsupported by facts proved by the defense, was properly excluded from testifying.

United States v. Garcia Abrego, 141 F.3d 142 (5th Cir. 1998) : In a drug, money laundering, and CCE case, a doctor who had examined the defendant upon his arrival in the United States testified to the effects of several medications that Mexican authorities had administered to the defendant. The prosecutor asked the doctor about the effects of a 20-milligram dose of Valium on a person who has used the drug for many years. The Court held that "[a]n expert may testify in response to a hypothetical question containing facts that have evidentiary support in the trial record," and observed that two coconspirators testified to the defendant's Valium use. In Theriot v. Bay Drilling Corp., n4 an action arising out of a worker's injuries on a drilling barge, the Court held that hypothetical questions posed to an expert without personal knowledge must assume a fair, undistorted collection of facts.

Taylor v. Burlington N. R.R., 787 F.2d 1309 (9th Cir. 1986) : In an opinion reversing a judgment for a former railroad employee in a FELA case on another ground, the Court observed that hypothetical questions are not abolished by the Rules, even though Rule 705 largely removes the need for them, and that such questions "must not require the expert to assume facts that are not in evidence."

[b] Hypothetical Questions -- Omission of Fact from Hypothetical Question

Piotrowski v. Southworth Prods. Corp., 15 F.3d 748 (8th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a product liability action, holding there was no abuse of discretion when the plaintiff's treating physician was asked a hypothetical question that omitted reference to the plaintiff's visits to a chiropractor four years prior to the accident. The omission was not material in the circumstances, and the hypothetical taken as a whole fairly and accurately presented the plaintiff's condition.

[5] Motions To Strike

Benjamin v. Peter's Farm Condo. Owners Ass'n, 820 F.2d 640 (3d Cir. 1987) : Reversing a judgment for a plaintiff who alleged injuries from a slip and fall, the Court held that a motion to strike an economic expert's testimony was timely where the defendant did not know until cross-examination of the speculative basis for the expert opinion.

[6] Obligations of Direct Examiner

United States v. Mangan, 575 F.2d 32 (2d Cir. 1978) : Although it affirmed convictions for defrauding the IRS, the Court said that it did "not much like the way in which this matter [presentation of a government fingerprint expert] was handled." Citing Rule 705, the Court emphasized that the government had a "serious obligation not to obstruct a criminal defendant's cross-examination of expert testimony." It added that the government should have told its expert to be prepared in Court to respond to defense requests for information about the basis of the expert's opinion.

[7] Relationship to Other Rules

University of Rhode Island v. A.W. Chesterton Co., 2 F.3d 1200 (1st Cir. 1993) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in an action by the University to recover the cost of correcting corrosion on one of its vessels that had been treated with the defendant manufacturer's product, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by the University's controller concerning the amount of damages. The University came to trial with no supporting documentation to substantiate the witness' assessment of damages and, instead of attempting to assuage the Trial Judge's legitimate concerns, chose to rely on a perceived "right" to have the testimony admitted under Rule 703.

Melville v. American Home Assurance Co., 443 F. Supp. 1064 (E.D. Pa. 1977) , rev'd on other grounds, 584 F.2d 1306 (3d Cir. 1978) : The District Court indicated that Rule 705 does not give a right to cross-examine opinions contained in public records admitted under Rule 803(8)(C), but it observed that where the foundation of an opinion would be discredited under Rule 705 cross-examination, the presumptive trustworthiness of the opinion might well be sufficiently impugned to disqualify the report under the proviso to Rule 803(8)(C).

[8] Summary Judgment

Boyd v. State Farm Ins. Cos., 158 F.3d 326 (5th Cir. 1998) : Affirming a grant of summary judgment in favor of an employer in a Title VII action, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly rejected a conclusory affidavit of the plaintiff's medical expert. The Court held that Rule 705 does not operate on summary judgment to permit experts to give opinions without any disclosure of the underlying facts and data.

[9] Unsupported Opinion

United States v. Havvard, 260 F.3d 597 (7th Cir. 2001) : In a trial for felon firearm possession, the government's fingerprint expert related his extensive background, described the general scientific basis for fingerprint analysis and the particular comparison techniques he uses to match fingerprints, and then stated that a latent print found on a pistol recovered at the time of the defendant's arrest matched an exemplar print of the defendant's left index finger. The Court found there was no error in admitting the witness' conclusion without more elaboration, since uncovering the basis for the opinion was a matter for cross-examination under Rule 705.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Gillis, 773 F.2d 549 (4th Cir. 1985) .

(n2)Footnote 2. Hale v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 820 F.2d 928 (8th Cir. 1987) .

(n3)Footnote 3. Fluckey v. Chicago & N.W. Transp. Co., 838 F.2d 302 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n4)Footnote 4. Theriot v. Bay Drilling Corp., 783 F.2d 527 (5th Cir. 1986) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 705 RULE 705

1-705 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 705.04

705.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

The hypothetical question has been the target of a great deal of criticism as encouraging partisan bias, affording an opportunity for summing up in the middle of the case, and as complex and time consuming. Ladd, Expert Testimony, 5 Vand. L. Rev. 414, 426-27 (1952). While the rule allows counsel to make disclosure of the underlying facts or data as a preliminary to the giving of an expert opinion if he chooses, the instances in which he is required to do so are reduced. This is true whether the expert bases his opinion on data furnished him secondhand or observed by him firsthand.

The elimination of the requirement of preliminary disclosure at the trial of underlying facts or data has a long background of support. In 1937 the Commissioners on Uniform State Laws incorporated a provision to this effect in their Model Expert Testimony Act, which furnished the basis for Uniform Rules 57 and 58. Rule 4515, NYCPLR (McKinney 1963), provides:

> Unless the court orders otherwise, questions calling for the opinion of an expert witness need not be hypothetical in form, and the witness may state his opinion and reasons without first specifying the data upon which it is based. Upon cross-examination, he may be required to specify the data... .

See also California Evidence Code 802; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure 60-456, 60-457; New Jersey Evidence Rules 57, 58.

If the objection is made that leaving it to the cross-examiner to bring out the supporting data is essentially unfair, the answer is that he is under no compulsion to bring out any facts or data except those unfavorable to the opinion. The answer assumes that the cross-examiner has the advance knowledge which is essential for effective cross-examination. This advance knowledge has been afforded, though imperfectly, by the traditional foundation requirement. Rule 26(b)(4) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, as revised, provides for substantial discovery in this area, obviating in large measure the obstacles which have been raised in some instances to discovery of findings, underlying data, and even the identity of the experts. Friedenthal, Discovery and Use of an Adverse Party's Expert Information, 14 Stan. L. Rev. 455 (1962).

These safeguards are reinforced by the discretionary power of the judge to require preliminary disclosure in any event.

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows:

The amendment is technical. No substantive change is intended.]

[2] 1993 Amendment Committee Note

1993 Amendment Committee Note

This rule, which relates to the manner of presenting testimony at trial, is revised to avoid an arguable conflict with revised Rules 26(a)(2)(B) and 26(e)(1) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure or with revised Rule 16 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, which require disclosure in advance of trial of the basis and reasons for an expert's opinions.

If a serious question is raised under Rule 702 or 703 as to the admissibility of expert testimony, disclosure of the underlying facts or data on which opinions are based may, of course, be needed by the court before deciding whether, and to what extent, the person would be allowed to testify. This rule does not preclude such an inquiry.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
Supp. To CHAPTER 705 RULE 705

3-705 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 705, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 705. Disclosure of Facts or Data Underlying Expert Opinion	Rule 705. Disclosing the Facts or Data Underlying an Expert's Opinion
The expert	Unless the

may testify in terms of opinion or inference and give reasons therefor without first testifying to the underlying facts or data, unless the court requires otherwise. The expert may in any event be required to disclose those court orders otherwise, an expert may state an opinion -- and give the reasons for it -- without first testifying to the underlying facts or data. But the expert may be required to disclose those required to disclose the underlying facts or data on cross-examination.	facts or data on cross-examination.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 705 has been amended as part of the general restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

The Committee deleted all reference to an "inference" on the grounds that the deletion made the Rule flow better and easier to read, and because any "inference" is covered by the broader term "opinion." Courts have not made substantive decisions on the basis of any distinction between an opinion and an inference. No change in current practice is intended.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
Supp. To CHAPTER 705 RULE 705

3-705 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 705.03

Supp. to § 705.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Cross-Examination [Go To Main]

United States v. Lee, 502 F.3d 691 (7th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a defendant's conviction for being a felon in possession of a firearm found in a car in which he was a passenger, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting government expert fingerprint testimony concerning a partial print found on the gun. The expert testified that the print did not belong to the driver of the car and that she could not exclude or identify the defendant as the source of the print. The Court reasoned that the fact that the testimony excluded the driver rendered the testimony relevant. The defendant attempted to cross-examine the expert as to whether she had asked six other scientists at her laboratory to review the partial fingerprint and whether one scientist indicated that the partial print was not suitable for comparison. The government argued that the cross-examination was proper only if the expert relied on the consultation in rendering an opinion. The Trial Judge conducted voir dire of the expert, who indicated that she asked six other analysts to review the print and considered their opinions in reaching her conclusion that the print was suitable for comparison. The Judge barred the defendant from cross-examining on the opinions the expert received, on the ground that the expert did not base her conclusion on the other experts' opinions, but only confirmed her conclusions. The Court stated that "[a]lthough the call is close, we find that the district court did not abuse its discretion in barring Lee from cross-examining Bodine [the expert] regarding the opinions of the six analysts," and "[a]t any rate any harm from denying cross-examination on this point was limited and does not warrant reversal." We respectfully suggest that the cross-examination the defendant sought to undertake is precisely that contemplated by Rule 705.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 706 RULE 706

3-706 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 706.syn

§ 706.syn Synopsis to Chapter 706: RULE 706

706.01 Official Text

706.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Need for Court-Appointed Expert

[2] Special Master, Court-Appointed Expert, Technical Assistant

[3] Analyzing the Rule

[a] Generally

[b] Analyzing the Rule -- Choosing the Expert

[c] Analyzing the Rule -- Compensation for Experts

[d] Analyzing the Rule -- Ex parte Communications

[4] Reluctant Experts

[5] Notification of Experts

[6] Rights of Parties

[7] Instructing the Jury

[8] Experts to Assist the Criminal Defendant

706.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Antitrust Cases

[2] Copyright Cases

[3] Cross-Examination of Expert

[4] Desirability of Appointment

[5] Discretion To Appoint

[6] Expert Witnesses Called to Testify by Parties

[7] Habeas Corpus Proceeding

[8] Law Enforcement Officers

[9] Patent Cases

[10] Payment of Expert

[11] Procedure for Appointment

[12] Revealing Appointment to Jury

[13] Scope of Rule

[14] Technical Advisors

[15] Timing of Appointment

706.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 706 RULE 706

3-706 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 706.01

706.01 Official Text

Rule 706. Court Appointed Experts

(a) Appointment. -- The court may on its own motion or on the motion of any party enter an order to show cause why expert witnesses should not be appointed, and may request the parties to submit nominations. The court may appoint any expert witnesses agreed upon by the parties, and may appoint expert witnesses of its own selection. An expert witness shall not be appointed by the court unless the witness consents to act. A witness so appointed shall be informed of the witness' duties by the court in writing, a copy of which shall be filed with the clerk, or at a conference in which the parties shall have opportunity to participate. A witness so appointed shall advise the parties of the witness' findings, if any; the witness' deposition may be taken by any party; and the witness may be called to testify by the court or any party. The witness shall be subject to cross-examination by each party, including a party calling the witness.

(b) Compensation. -- Expert witnesses so appointed are entitled to reasonable compensation in whatever sum the court may allow. The compensation thus fixed is payable from funds which may be provided by law in criminal cases and civil actions and proceedings involving just compensation under the fifth amendment. In other civil actions and proceedings the compensation shall be paid by the parties in such proportion and at such time as the court directs, and thereafter charged in like manner as other costs.

(c) Disclosure of appointment. -- In the exercise of its discretion, the court may authorize disclosure to the jury of the fact that the court appointed the expert witness.

(d) Parties' experts of own selection. -- Nothing in this rule limits the parties in calling expert witnesses of their own selection.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 706 RULE 706

3-706 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 706.02

706.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Need for Court-Appointed Expert

Generally speaking the Trial Court can rely on the parties, working through the adversary system, to reach the truth fairly by calling their own experts. However, it may occasionally occur that the experts are in such wild disagreement that the Trial Court might find it helpful and in furtherance of the search for truth to appoint an impartial expert. n1 Other instances may arise, again infrequently, where the Court might require technical assistance to sift through highly complex issues and unwieldy material, and where it might be useful to have that witness testify. n2 However, because of the justifiable concern that the appointment of an expert witness by the Court will be outcome-determinative, Judges have generally been reluctant to invoke this Rule. n3 The Rule gives the Court the authority to appoint an expert, but it does not require the Court to do so. n4

[2] Special Master, Court-Appointed Expert, Technical Assistant

Rule 706 is applicable only when an expert is appointed by the Court to testify as a witness. The Rule does not purport to circumscribe the Trial Judge's authority to appoint a non-testifying technical consultant to assist the Judge in understanding highly complex issues. Of course, the inherent power of the Court to appoint a technical consultant, while outside the Rule, does raise process questions that caution against such an appointment in most cases. n5

There is some overlap between the roles filled by a Court-appointed expert witness, a technical adviser, and a special master appointed under Fed. R. Civ. P. 53. n6 The expectations for each appointee will be very case-dependent. Flexibility is required to match the appointee's role with the needs of the case. The failure of either the Rules of Evidence or the Rules of Procedure to carefully delineate and distinguish among the various roles is actually a good thing, in that it gives the Court and the appointee maximum flexibility. It may be appropriate, depending on the case, for the appointee to switch from role to role at various times throughout the case, as long as the parties are kept in the loop.

[3] Analyzing the Rule

[a] Generally

Rule 706 is best broken down into three separate parts for purposes of analysis. First, there is the relationship of counsel and the Judge with respect to appointment and compensation of expert witnesses. Second, there is the relationship between the expert witness and the Court. Third, there is the relationship between the expert witness and the parties.

[b] Analyzing the Rule -- Choosing the Expert

Rule 706 provides that the Court shall inform the parties if it desires to appoint an expert witness on its own motion. Notice comes in the form of an order to show cause why an expert witness should not be appointed. n7 Similarly, if one party wishes the Court to appoint an expert, an order will be issued to any other parties to show cause why the expert witness should not be appointed. The Court may appoint any expert witness agreed upon by the parties; the Court also may appoint any expert witness of its own selection.

Officials of the Federal Judicial Center conducted empirical research on Court-appointed experts, and found that in a large minority of the appointments (29 of 66), the Judge used pre-existing personal or professional contacts to identify an expert. n8 This practice is criticized because it may reflect a narrow spectrum of professional opinion that was suited to the interests of the Judges' former clients and colleagues and that the parties may perceive such an expert as biased. The risk of a sweetheart appointment has led one commentator to suggest that Rule 706 be amended to require the parties to submit a list of proposed experts to be appointed for each area of disputed testimony. n9

ABA Litigation Section Civil Trial Practice Standard 11(a) sets forth the following suggested limitations on the process of selecting a Court-appointed expert:

> a. Selection.
>
> i. The court should invite the parties to recommend jointly an expert to be appointed by the court.
>
> ii. If the parties cannot agree, the court should invite them to submit names of a specified number of experts with a summary of their qualifications and an explanation of the manner in which those qualifications fit the issues in the case.
>
> iii. The court may choose one or more experts recommended by any of the parties; or it may reject the experts recommended by the parties and select an expert unilaterally.
>
> iv. Before selecting an expert unilaterally, the court should
>
> A. Consider seeking recommendations from a relevant professional organization or entity that is responsible for setting standards or evaluating qualifications of persons who have expertise in the relevant area, or from the academic community, and
>
> B. Afford the parties an opportunity to object to the appointee on the basis of bias, qualifications or experience.

These standards provide helpful guidance, and give a proper warning that a Judge should not appoint an expert simply because of a pre-existing relationship.

It should be noted that there has always been some resistance on the part of many members of the bar to the concept of Court-appointed expert witnesses. Fears that such experts will appear more impartial than their backgrounds permit them to be and that they are likely to have too much impact are not unreasonable. The Advisory Committee Note notwithstanding, the decision to appoint the Court's expert may be a troublesome one; it is surely more than one of detail, and certainly it is an oddity in an adversary system. Because many members of the bar distrust the impartial expert, it seems advantageous for the Court to choose an expert agreed upon by opposing parties unless some strong reason appears in a particular case for ignoring the parties' wishes. n10 If the parties can agree on an expert, it is highly probable that the expert will appear neutral in the eyes of the litigants. Nothing of importance is lost, and the parties would not then be distrustful that a Judge-selected expert will represent one of several competing schools of thought. n11

[c] Analyzing the Rule -- Compensation for Experts

Reasonable compensation for a Court-appointed expert may be payable from funds that are allocated by law for criminal cases and certain civil actions. In all other civil actions and proceedings, the Rule provides that compensation shall be paid by the parties as allocated by the Court, and is recoverable as part of costs.

One problem that can arise in civil cases is that a party may be unable or unwilling to pay for the expert. A party might understandably be reluctant to pay an expert if the party suspects that the witness will testify adversely to the party's case. The Rule provides a good deal of flexibility and discretion in allocating, and enforcing payment of, the expert's expenses. This includes allocating the costs disproportionately among the parties, or even allocating all of the costs to one party. Ledford v. Sullivan, 105 F.3d 354, 360-361 (7th Cir. 1997) provides a good discussion of the power to allocate all of the costs of an expert to one side:

> A number of circuits have recognized that Rule 706(b) grants a district court the discretion to apportion all the costs of an expert to one side. See, e.g., Steele v. Shah, 87 F.3d 1266, 1271 (11th Cir. 1996) (remanding the case because the lower court failed to exercise its discretion to appoint and compensate an expert if the plaintiff was in fact indigent); McKinney v. Anderson, 924 F.2d 1500, 1511 (9th Cir. 1991) (finding that the phrase "such proportion as the court directs," in an appropriate case, permits the district court to apportion all costs to one side); Webster v. Sowders, 846 F.2d 1032, 1038-39 (6th Cir. 1988) (stating that "[a] District Court has authority to apportion costs under this rule [706(b)], including excusing impecunious parties from their share"); United States Marshals Serv. v. Means, 741 F.2d 1053, 1059 (8th Cir. 1984) (stating that discretionary power to advance fees of expert witnesses should be exercised only under compelling circumstances).
>
> In this case, when the district court stated that no funds existed to pay for the appointment of an expert, it failed to recognize that it had the discretion to apportion all the costs to one side. We caution against reading Rule 706(b) in such a narrow fashion that the rule would allow for court-appointed experts only when both sides are able to pay their respective shares. Read in such a restrictive way, Rule 706(b) would hinder a district court from appointing an expert witness whenever one of the parties is indigent, even when that expert's testimony would substantially aid the court.

[d] Analyzing the Rule -- Ex parte Communications

Rule 706 does not address whether either the Judge or the parties can communicate ex parte with the Court-appointed expert witnesses. As to Judge-expert communications, there is a general recognition that while ex parte communications are problematic and should generally be discouraged, they may be essential, especially during the appointment process. n12 However, safeguards have been suggested to allay concerns of the parties as to the ex parte nature of these communications.

The ABA Litigation Section has promulgated Civil Trial Practice Standards to cover the problem of ex parte communications between a Judge and an appointed expert witness. Standard 11(b) provides as follows:

> b. Communications between Court and Expert. The court shall assure that the parties are aware of all communications between the court and a court-appointed expert by:

i. Permitting the parties to be present when the court meets or speaks with the expert;

ii. Providing that all communications between court and expert will be in writing with copies to the parties; or

iii. Recording oral communications between court and expert and making a transcript or copy of the recording available to the parties. n13

As to ex parte communications between counsel and the Court-appointed expert, their permissibility should be dependent on the expert's role in the case. If, for example, the expert must conduct a medical examination of the plaintiff, or if the expert must obtain specimens from one of the parties, then ex parte communications are not only warranted but essential. On the other hand, the obvious due process concerns arising from ex parte communications indicate that they should not be permitted in the ordinary case, and that even where such communications are necessary, the Court should provide for the safeguard of post-communication disclosure.

ABA Litigation Section Civil Trial Practice Standard 11(c) provides the following guidelines as to ex parte communications between the Court-appointed expert witness and the parties:

c. Communications between Parties and Expert. The court shall assure that every party is aware of all communications between any party and a court-appointed expert by:

i. Permitting all parties to be present when any party meets or speaks with the expert, or

ii. Providing that all communications between any party and the expert will be in writing, or if oral, shall be tape recorded, with copies to all parties.

[The Task Force that promulgated this standard comments that it is operative only if the Court has not prohibited such contact, which the Court has the inherent authority to do.]

[4] Reluctant Experts

The purpose of the Rule is to get the best help available, and accordingly the Rule provides that a reluctant witness is to be avoided. An expert witness may not be appointed by the Court unless the expert consents to act. Rule 706 does not address the question of when the parties, or the Trial Judge under Rule 614, are permitted to call a knowledgeable but unwilling expert who will be asked questions within his or her expertise with no additional preparation required. n14 Rule 706 is confined to appointment of experts who will prepare specially for trial. One of the reasons that experts might be reluctant to testify is that they fear being set upon by the parties for endless depositions and the like. Courts have rightly begun to protect Court-appointed expert witnesses from unnecessary harassment. For example, in the Breast Implant Litigation proceedings in Alabama, Judge Pointer appointed counsel to protect the interests of the Court-appointed experts. Other Courts have imposed limits on the multiple deposition of Court-appointed expert witnesses. n15

[5] Notification of Experts

Once the expert consents to be a witness and is formally appointed, the witness must be notified by the Court of his or her duties. Notification can take one of two forms. Either the Court can notify the expert in writing and file a copy of the writing with the clerk, or the expert can be notified at a conference in which the parties have an opportunity to participate.

[6] Rights of Parties

A Court-appointed expert witness must advise the parties of any proposed findings. Parties are entitled to take the expert's deposition and the expert may be called to testify by the Court or by any party. The expert is subject to cross-examination by all parties, including a party calling him as a witness. n16 The fact that the Court appoints an expert, either on its own motion or in response to a request by a party, does not limit the right of parties to call their own expert witnesses.

[7] Instructing the Jury

Should the Judge inform the jury that an expert has been appointed by the Court? The Rule leaves the matter to the Judge's discretion. There is of course a risk that the appointment of an expert will be outcome-determinative, and some commentators have proposed that because of this risk Rule 706 should be amended to prohibit judicial comment on the Court appointment. n17 Others have suggested that the Rule be amended to require the Judge to instruct the jury against excessive reliance on the appointed expert's testimony. n18 Of course, even without an amendment to the Rule, such a limiting instruction is prudent as a matter of course. An effective instruction will probably avoid any possible claim that the jury felt somehow bound by the testimony of a witness aligned with the Court.

Section 11(d) of the ABA Litigation Section Civil Trial Practice Standards provides helpful guidance on the question of informing jurors about the expert's Court-appointed status:

> d. Jury Instructions. If an expert witness retained by the court testifies at trial, > i. No Identification as Court Appointee. The court ordinarily should not identify the witness as one appointed by the court.
>
>
> ii. If Identified as Court Appointee. If the court determines that, in the circumstances, it is appropriate to identify the witness as a court appointee, the court should instruct the jury that:
>
> A. It is not to give greater weight to the testimony of a court-appointed expert than any other witness simply because the court chose the expert;
>
> B. The jury may consider the fact that the witness is not retained by either party in evaluating the witness's opinion; and
>
> C. The jury should carefully assess the nature of, and basis for, each witness's opinion.
>
> iii. Questioning. The witness should be examined by counsel, in an order determined by the court.

[8] Experts to Assist the Criminal Defendant

In Ake v. Oklahoma, 470 U.S. 68 (1985) , the Supreme Court held that when sanity is likely to be a significant factor at trial, an indigent criminal defendant is entitled to the assistance of a Court-appointed psychiatrist for the preparation and presentation of a defense. This right was derived from the principle that the Due Process Clause requires that indigents must be provided with the raw materials integral to building an effective defense. The Court held that the defendant in Ake made an adequate showing that insanity was likely to be a significant factor at the trial. This finding was based on several factors, including the filing of the insanity plea, the Trial Court's decision to have the defendant evaluated for competency to stand trial, the finding by the prosecution's expert that the defendant was competent only when given large doses of medication, and the expert's opinion that the defendant's severe mental impairment after the crime could have existed earlier.

Under the analysis in Ake, the defendant may be constitutionally entitled to the assistance of nonpsychiatric experts as well, e.g., forensic experts. The indigent defendant will have to show that an expert's assistance is necessary to the presentation of a critical issue for the defense. n19

Generally speaking, the Lower Courts have construed Ake narrowly. n20 However, there are some Lower Court cases that have reversed convictions for failure to provide expert assistance deemed necessary under the circumstances. n21

If the defense in a criminal case needs expert help to prepare for trial, we suggest that the Court make the appointment pursuant to the 1964 Federal Criminal Justice Act, as amended, 18 U.S.C. § 3006(e) (permitting appointment of experts), rather than under Rule 706. We make this suggestion because Rule 706 permits all parties to depose an expert, and we think that an expert who helps the criminal defendant with trial preparation ought not to be deposed. Rule 706 should be reserved for those cases in which the Court knows that one or more parties will offer expert evidence and believes that an impartial expert will assist the trier of fact in fairly evaluating the facts.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., Walker v. American Home Shield Long Term Disability Plan, 180 F.3d 1065 (9th Cir. 1999) (Trial Court was within its discretion to appoint a medical expert where the expert testimony of the parties was confusing and conflicted); In re High Fructose Corn Syrup Antitrust Litig., 295 F.3d 651 (7th Cir. 2002) (remanding a price-fixing case, the Court suggested that the Trial Judge appoint an expert witness under Rule 706, "rather than leave himself and the jury completely at the mercy of the parties' warring experts" concerning the inferences to be drawn from the massive technical statistical evidence in the case)..

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 982 F.2d 721 (2d Cir. 1992) , modified on other grounds, 993 F.2d 7 (2d Cir. 1993) (both the District Court and the Bankruptcy Court have the power to appoint experts under Rule 706 to assist them on the difficult matter of estimating future claims in asbestos litigation).

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., Hiern v. Sarpy, 161 F.R.D. 332 (E.D. La. 1995) (declaring that Courts should appoint experts only in extreme circumstances, and the mere fact that the parties' retained experts have expressed divergent opinions does not require the Court appoint an expert to aid in resolving the conflict; concluding that the Court's appointment of an expert "would just add an additional witness, who may testify in favor of one side or the other ... giving one side an inappropriate numerical advantage.").

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., Quiet Technology DC-8, Inc., v. Hurel-Dubois UK Ltd., 326 F.3d 1333 (11th Cir. 2003) ("we are unfamiliar with any set of circumstances under which a district court bears an affirmative obligation to appoint an independent expert").

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., Reilly v. United States, 863 F.2d 149 (1st Cir. 1988) (Rule 706 was not intended to subsume the judiciary's power to appoint technical advisors; the Court, however, expressed its strongly-held view that the appointment of a technical advisor must arise out of some cognizable judicial need for specialized skills, and that "[a]ppropriate instances, we suspect, will be hen's-teeth rare.").

In FTC v. Enforma Natural Prods., 362 F.3d 1204 (9th Cir. 2004) , the Court endorsed a list of procedural safeguards for Trial Courts to follow when appointing a technical advisor. The Trial Court should

> (1) utilize a fair and open procedure for appointing a neutral technical advisor; (2) address any allegations of bias, partiality, or lack of qualifications; (3) clearly define and limit the technical advisor's duties; (4) make clear to the technical advisor that any advice he or she gives to the court cannot be based on any extra-record information; and (5) make explicit, either through an expert's report or a record of ex parte communications, the nature an content of the technical advisor's advice.

(n6)Footnote 6. Commentators have expressed the opinion that the problems of dealing with Court-appointed experts are ordinarily problems of case management and pre-trial practice that are more properly addressed in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure than in the Federal Rules of Evidence. See, e.g., Joseph Cecil & Thomas Willging, Accepting Daubert's Invitation: Defining a Role for Court-Appointed Experts in Assessing Scientific Validity, 43 Emory L.J. 995 (1994).

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., Philadelphia Mtg. Trust v. Touche Ross & Co., 930 F.2d 306 (3d Cir. 1991) (the mechanism for appointing an expert is a show cause order, which permits the Court to appoint an expert on whom the parties agree or for the Court to select its own; the Court may not select an expert proposed by one party without giving all parties a chance to respond).

(n8)Footnote 8. Cecil & Willging, Accepting Daubert's Invitation: Defining a Role for Court-Appointed Experts in Assessing Scientific Validity, 43 Emory L.J. 995 (1994).

(n9)Footnote 9. See Johnson, Court-Appointed Scientific Expert Witnesses: Unfettering Expertise, 2 High TecH. L.J. 249 (1988).

(n10)Footnote 10. See In re High Fructose Corn Syrup Antitrust Litig., 295 F.3d 651 (7th Cir. 2002) (remanding a price-fixing case and suggesting that the Trial Judge direct the party-designated experts to agree upon a neutral expert who could then be appointed under Rule 706).

(n11)Footnote 11. For an article suggesting that, despite Rule 706, the Trial Judge should be reluctant to appoint independent experts when the parties object, see Stephen A. Saltzburg, The Unnecessarily Expanding Role of the American Trial Judge, 64 Va. L. Rev. 1 (1978). The article also suggests that the Trial Judge should refrain from calling expert witnesses, even those appointed by the Court, as the Court's witnesses.

(n12)Footnote 12. See the discussion in Cecil & Willging, Accepting Daubert's Invitation: Defining a Role for Court-Appointed Experts in Assessing Scientific Validity, 43 Emory L.J. 995, 1029-33 (1994). See also United States v. Craven, 239 F.3d 91 (1st Cir. 2001) ("most ex parte contacts between a trial judge and another participant in the proceedings risk harm, and ex parte communications with key witnesses (such as court-appointed experts) are no exception. To the contrary, such ex parte contacts can create situations pregnant with problematic possibilities.").

(n13)Footnote 13. See Reilly v. United States, 863 F.2d 149 (1st Cir. 1988) (noting this procedure with approval).

(n14)Footnote 14. See, e.g., Wright v. Jeep Corp., 547 F. Supp. 871 (E.D. Mich. 1982) (permission of a witness with expertise was not required because he was not a Court-appointed expert; however, the party who called the witness would have to pay him a professional fee).

(n15)Footnote 15. See, e.g., In re Joint E. & S. Dists. Asbestos Litig., 151 F.R.D. 540 (S.D.N.Y. 1993) (denying a motion to depose Court-appointed experts; in light of Daubert and the gatekeeping function that it imposes, it is more efficient for a Court to hold a pre-trial Daubert hearing at which the Court-appointed expert could be questioned by all parties in the presence of the Trial Judge).

(n16)Footnote 16. Nemir v. Mitsubishi Motors Corp., 381 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 2004) (error to prohibit parties from calling and questioning a Court-appointed expert).

(n17)Footnote 17. See, e.g., Bua, Experts Some Comments Relating to Discovery and Testimony Under New Rules of Evidence, 21 Trial Law. Guide 1 (1977).

(n18)Footnote 18. See, e.g., Lee, Court-Appointed Experts and Judicial Reluctance: A Proposal to Amend Rule 706 of the Federal Rules of Evidence , 6 Yale Law and Policy Review 480 (1988).

(n19)Footnote 19. See, e.g., Caldwell v. Mississippi, 472 U.S. 320 (1985) , where the Court held that undeveloped assertions that an expert will be beneficial are insufficient to entitle a defendant to appointment of an expert under Ake.

(n20)Footnote 20. See generally Harris, Ake Revisited: Expert Psychiatric Witnesses Remain Beyond Reach for the Indigent, 68 N.C. L. Rev 763 (1990).

(n21)Footnote 21. See, e.g., Dunn v. Roberts, 963 F.2d 308 (10th Cir. 1992) (holding that denial of funds to retain a psychiatric expert to explain the nature of battered spouse syndrome precluded the defendant from presenting an effective defense in a prosecution for aiding and abetting felony-murder; specific intent was an essential element of aiding and abetting, and a psychiatric expert could have aided the defense by supporting the defendant's assertion that her presence at the scene of the crime was the result of repeated battering and not the result of an intent to assist in criminal conduct).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 706 RULE 706

3-706 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 706.03

706.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Antitrust Cases

In re High Fructose Corn Syrup Antitrust Litig., 295 F.3d 651 (7th Cir. 2002) : Reversing summary judgment for the defendants in a price-fixing case, the Court recommended that if the case went to trial, the Judge should "use the power that Rule 706 ... expressly confers upon him to appoint his own expert witness, rather than leave himself and the jury completely at the mercy of the parties' warring experts" regarding the inferences to be drawn from the considerable technical statistical evidence in the case. The Court suggested that the Judge direct the party-designated experts to agree upon a neutral expert who could then be appointed under Rule 706.

[2] Copyright Cases

Computer Assocs. Int'l, Inc. v. Altai, Inc., 982 F.2d 693 (2d Cir. 1992) : In a copyright and trade secret case, the Court reasoned that, even though "[t]he well-established general rule in this circuit has been to limit the use of expert opinion in determining whether works are substantially similar," "[s]ince the test for illicit copying is based upon the response of ordinary lay observers," "in deciding the limits to which expert opinion may be employed in ascertaining the substantial similarity of computer programs, we cannot disregard the highly complicated and technical subject matter at the heart of these claims." Thus, the Court recognized "the reality that computer programs are likely to be somewhat impenetrable by lay observers," and upheld the use of a Court-appointed expert to assist the Trial Judge.

[3] Cross-Examination of Expert

Gilbane Bldg. Co. v. Federal Reserve Bank, 80 F.3d 895 (4th Cir. 1996) : The Court held in a construction contract dispute that a plaintiff was not improperly denied the right to cross-examine an expert consulted by a special master trying the case. The plaintiff had agreed to the informal procedures used in the special master proceedings and never requested an opportunity to review the expert's findings and to cross-examine him before the special master's report was filed.

[4] Desirability of Appointment

Eastern Air Lines v. McDonnell Douglas Corp., 532 F.2d 957 (5th Cir. 1976) : In a breach of contract action, the Court suggested that the Trial Judge should consider the desirability of appointing a neutral expert to assist the jury in dealing with "the extreme variation between the estimates provided by the parties' experts" if the case was retried following reversal of the District Court judgment.

[5] Discretion To Appoint

Webster v. Sowders, 846 F.2d 1032 (6th Cir. 1988) : In a suit by an inmate claiming that the State was exposing prisoners to dangerous levels of asbestos, the Court concluded that the Trial Court "was potentially within its authority" to reappoint an expert, who had previously been appointed to oversee asbestos removal, to provide an independent view as to whether federal regulations were being satisfied. However, findings of fact were required to justify the continued employment of the expert and to assess the costs against the State.

Oklahoma Natural Gas Co., Div. of Oneok, Inc. v. Mahan & Rowsey, Inc., 786 F.2d 1004 (10th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a judgment in an action by a gas company to recover damages and to prevent a Chapter 11 debtor from producing natural gas from the company's underground storage reservoir, the Court held that the District Judge was not required to appoint an expert under Rule 706 simply because the parties' experts had divergent opinions.

Quiet Technology DC-8, Inc. v. Hurel-Dubois UK Ltd., 326 F.3d 1333 (11th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in an action against the manufacturer of a thrust reverser that the plaintiff company wanted to employ in a jet engine, the Court upheld the admission of expert testimony for the defendant based upon a "CFD study," which "is a relatively new scientific discipline that uses computer models to measure fluid dynamics, e.g., the flow of air around and through a jet engine." It also found no abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge declined to appoint an independent expert to help it assess the admissibility of the defendant's expert testimony. The Court reasoned that "we are unfamiliar with any set of circumstances under which a district court bears an affirmative obligation to appoint an independent expert... . [A]s long as the district court thoroughly considers a request for the appointment of such an expert and reasonably explains its ultimate decision thereon, that decision is vested in the sound discretion of the trial court." In Steele v. Shah, 87 F.3d 1266 (11th Cir. 1996) , a prisoner's civil rights action against a physician for discontinuing psychotropic medication, the Trial Judge denied without explanation the plaintiff's motion under Rule 706 for appointment of an expert witness. Reversing summary judgment for the defendant, the Court noted that the plaintiff was entitled to a reasoned ruling upon his motion.

[6] Expert Witnesses Called to Testify by Parties

Nemir v. Mitsubishi Motors Corp., 381 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 2004) : The plaintiff was seriously injured when his seatbelt latch allegedly gave way in an automobile accident. After an earlier remand of the case, the Judge appointed two expert witnesses under Rule 706 to help determine "whether the seatbelt buckle presented an inherent unreasonable risk of danger to the plaintiff." When one of the experts concluded that the defect was unreasonably dangerous, the Judge disregarded his testimony and refused to instruct on the plaintiff's theory of strict liability. Further, the Judge prohibited the plaintiff from introducing the favorable witness' testimony. Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court held it was error to prohibit the plaintiff from calling the expert, since Rule 706 provides that any party "may" call the witness to testify and does not condition a party's doing so on the Judge's approval. In Buchanan v. American Motors Corp., n1 a product liability suit pending in North Carolina, the defendant manufacturer attempted to subpoena an expert residing in Michigan for a deposition that would require him to spend substantial time testifying and disclosing raw data that he collected over the course of long study. The Court recognized that the witness had no privilege not to testify, but decided it was not an abuse of discretion to quash the subpoena as unduly burdensome.

[7] Habeas Corpus Proceeding

Smith v. Armontrout, 604 F. Supp. 840 (W.D. Mo. 1984) : Determining that the brother of a death row inmate had raised sufficient question as to the inmate's competency to waive a federal habeas corpus proceeding, the District Court decided to appoint its own expert to examine the inmate.

[8] Law Enforcement Officers

United States v. Walls, 70 F.3d 1323 (D.C. Cir. 1995) : Affirming convictions in a narcotics case, the Court found no error in the Trial Judge's designation of two undercover agents as experts to translate the jargon in taped conversations between the defendants and the agents. The Court stated that "[j]urors as well as judges often need help in deciphering the jargon of the drug trade."

[9] Patent Cases

Syntex Ophthalmics, Inc. v. Tsuetaki, 701 F.2d 677 (7th Cir. 1983) : Following the Trial Judge's initial decision to grant an injunction in a trade secret case, the defendants moved for a stay and filed various motions to permit use of certain processes. To aid it in the resolution of the motions, the Judge appointed a patent lawyer as the Court's expert. The lawyer filed a report and was examined in open Court by all parties. The Judge adopted the report and denied the motions. The Court found that the expert was qualified and that the Judge did not err in barring the defendants from presenting their own "partisan" experts, since the additional experts were unnecessary in light of a "complete" record. If, however, their testimony would have differed from that provided by the expert, we believe they should have been heard. While the Judge ultimately might have rejected their testimony, it is also possible that the experts might have persuaded him that they were more qualified than the lawyer he appointed.

Green v. Rich Iron Co., 944 F.2d 852 (Fed. Cir. 1991) : The Court held in an infringement action that an order compelling the patentee to seek reissue of the patent from the Patent and Trademark Office because of the PTO's "special expertise" could not be made under the Rule, because PTO examiners cannot be compelled to testify about their mental processes in reaching a decision on an application.

[10] Payment of Expert

Leesona Corp. v. Varta Batteries, Inc., 522 F. Supp. 1304 (S.D.N.Y. 1981) : This patent infringement case discusses the mechanics of appointing and compensating a Court-appointed expert.

United States v. R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., 416 F. Supp. 313 (D.N.J. 1976) : The Court rejected the United States' argument that the fees and expenses of an expert witness appointed by the Court were not properly chargeable to the United States under Rule 706 with the comment that "[a]ll who come before the court are equals in the eyes of the law. The United States, as plaintiff, has no special or different status than any other party. In fact, in its role as plaintiff, it carries the burden of persuasion."

United States ex rel. TVA v. 109 Acres of Land, 404 F. Supp. 1392 (E.D. Tenn. 1975) : The District Court held that the fee of a Court-appointed expert witness in an eminent domain proceeding on behalf of the Tennessee Valley Authority was to be paid by the Administrative Office of the United States Courts.

United States Marshals Serv. v. Means, 741 F.2d 1053 (8th Cir. 1984) (en banc): In an action by the United States to evict Native Americans and others allegedly illegally occupying federal lands, the Court held that Rules 614(a) and 706(b), read in light of 28 U.S.C. §§ 1920 and 2412 and Fed. R. Civ. P. 54(d), permit a Trial Judge under "compelling circumstances" to advance the fees and expenses of lay and expert witnesses called by the Court in aid of indigent civil litigants. Such fees and expenses are subsequently to be taxed as costs.

McKinney v. Anderson, 924 F.2d 1500 (9th Cir. 1991) , vacated, 502 U.S. 903 (1991) , reinstated on remand, 959 F.2d 853 (1992) , aff'd, 509 U.S. 25 (1993) : The Court reversed in part a directed verdict for prison officials in an action by an inmate alleging that exposure to secondary cigarette smoke was an Eighth Amendment violation. The Court held that, in refusing appointment of an expert witness because no funds have been provided by law for compensation of an expert witness in civil rights cases and the plaintiff was proceeding in forma pauperis, the Magistrate Judge read the Rule too restrictively. The Court recommended that on remand appointment of an expert be considered, recognizing that all the costs may be apportioned to one side under the Rule.

[11] Procedure for Appointment

In re Philadelphia Mtg. Trust, 930 F.2d 306 (3d Cir. 1991) : Reversing an order taxing as costs the fees paid expert witnesses employed by a trustee with approval of the Bankruptcy Court, the Court noted that appointment of expert witnesses under Rule 706, which does permit the taxation of fees as costs, has procedural safeguards and serves different purposes compared to approval of experts under the Bankruptcy Code.

[12] Revealing Appointment to Jury

Grothusen v. National R.R. Passenger Corp., 603 F. Supp. 486 (E.D. Pa. 1984) : The Court denied posttrial motions by the losing plaintiff in a FELA case, holding that it was proper to disclose to the jury the fact that the Court had appointed an independent expert.

[13] Scope of Rule

In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 982 F.2d 721 (2d Cir. 1992) , modified on other grounds, 993 F.2d 7 (2d Cir. 1993) : Reversing approval by the District and Bankruptcy Courts of a settlement restructuring the mechanism for distributing compensation to thousands of persons claiming asbestos-related injuries, the Court held that both the District Court and the Bankruptcy Court have the power to appoint experts under Rule 706 to assist them on the difficult matter of estimating future claims.

[14] Technical Advisors

Reilly v. United States, 863 F.2d 149 (1st Cir. 1988) : In a medical malpractice case arising from birth injuries, the Trial Judge appointed a technical expert to assist in the calculation of damages. Rejecting the defendant's argument that the appointment did not comply with Rule 706, the Court observed that the Rule "was not intended to subsume the judiciary's power to appoint technical advisors." It added, however, its "strongly-held view that the appointment of a technical advisor must arise out of some cognizable judicial need for specialized skills," and that "[a]ppropriate instances, we suspect, will be hen's-teeth rare."

Association of Mexican-American Educators v. State of California, 231 F.3d 572 (9th Cir. 2000) (en banc): In a civil rights action challenging tests used in credentialling public school teachers, the Court held there was no error when the Trial Judge employed a specialist in psychometrics as a technical advisor. The Judge invited the parties to object to the specialist's appointment (they did not do so) and advised them that he expected to put the specialist on the stand toward the end of the trial, ask him his views, and permit cross-examination. However, the specialist was never called as a witness and there was no indication that the Judge relied on his opinions as a source of evidence. Therefore, the Court held that the specialist remained within the role of technical advisor (similar to the role of a specialized law clerk) rather than expert witness, so Rule 706 did not apply and there was no requirement that the advisor submit to cross-examination or furnish an expert's report. Reviewing an ERISA claim for wrongful termination of long-term disability benefits, in Walker v. American Home Shield Long Term Disability Plan, 180 F.3d 1065 (9th Cir. 1999) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the Judge appointed an independent medical expert to help evaluate medical evidence. The fact that evidence concerning the plaintiff's fibromyalgia, "an elusive disease of unknown cause," was confusing and conflicting presented an appropriate occasion to appoint an independent expert to assist the Judge.

[15] Timing of Appointment

Students of Cal. School for the Blind v. Honig, 736 F.2d 538 (9th Cir. 1984) , vacated on other grounds, 471 U.S. 148 (1985) : The Court affirmed entry of an injunction requiring additional tests to determine the safety of a school. It approved the Judge's reopening of the case after the conclusion of the parties' testimony and the appointment of a neutral expert to evaluate the adequacy of seismic safety at the school site. It observed that "[a]ppointments under Rule 706 are reviewable only for abuse of discretion," and found no abuse in this case, where the parties were permitted to thoroughly examine the Court-appointed expert.

United States v. Weathers, 618 F.2d 663 (10th Cir. 1980) : Although it affirmed a defendant's conviction, the Court suggested that the Trial Judge may have violated Rule 706 in ordering sua sponte a further psychiatric examination of a defendant following a bench trial and submission of the case.

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. Buchanan v. American Motors Corp., 697 F.2d 151 (6th Cir. 1983) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
CHAPTER 706 RULE 706

3-706 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 706.04

706.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

The practice of shopping for experts, the venality of some experts, and the reluctance of many reputable experts to involve themselves in litigation, have been matters of deep concern. Though the contention is made that court appointed experts acquire an aura of infallibility to which they are not entitled, Levy, Impartial Medical Testimony Revisited, 34 Temple L.Q. 416 (1961), the trend is increasingly to provide for their use. While experience indicates that actual appointment is a relatively infrequent occurrence, the assumption may be made that the availability of the procedure in itself decreases the need for resorting to it. The ever present possibility that the judge may appoint an expert in a given case must inevitably exert a sobering effect on the expert witness of a party and upon the person utilizing his services.

The inherent power of a trial judge to appoint an expert of his own choosing is virtually unquestioned. Scott v. Spanjer Bros., 298 F.2d 928 (2d Cir. 1962) ; Danville Tobacco Ass'n v. Bryant-Buckner Assocs., 333 F.2d 202 (4th Cir. 1964) ; Sink, The Unused Power of a Federal Judge to Call His Own Expert Witnesses, 29 S. Cal. L. Rev. 195 (1956); 2 Wigmore 563, 9 id. 2484; Annot., 95 A.L.R.2d 383 . Hence the problem becomes largely one of detail.

The New York plan is well known and is described in Report by Special Committee of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York; Impartial Medical Testimony (1956). On recommendation of the Section of Judicial Administration, local adoption of an impartial medical plan was endorsed by the American Bar Association. 82 A.B.A. Rep. 184-85 (1957). Descriptions and analyses of plans in effect in various parts of the country are found in Van Dusen, A United States District Judge's View of the Impartial Medical Expert System, 32 F.R.D. 498 (1963) ; Wick and Kightlinger, Impartial Medical Testimony Under the Federal Civil Rules: A Tale of Three Doctors, 34 Ins. Counsel J. 115 (1967); and numerous articles collected in Klein, Judicial Administration and the Legal Profession 393 (1963). Statutes and rules include *California Evidence Code 730-*733; Illinois Supreme Court Rule 215(d), Ill. Rev. Stat. 1969, c. 110A, 215(d); Burns Indiana Stats. 1956, 9-1702; Wisconsin Stats. Annot. 1958, 57.27.

In the federal practice, a comprehensive scheme for court appointed experts was initiated with the adoption of Rule 28 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure in 1946. The Judicial Conference of the United States in 1953 considered court appointed experts in the civil cases, but only with respect to whether they should be compensated from public funds, a proposal which was rejected. Report of the Judicial Conference of the United States 23 (1953). The present rule expands the practice to include civil cases.

Subdivision (a). Is based on Rule 28 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, with a few changes, mainly in the interest of clarity. Language has been added to provide specifically for the appointment either on motion of a party or on the judge's own motion. A provision subjecting the court appointed expert to deposition procedures has been incorporated. The rule has been revised to make definite the right of any party, including the party calling him, to cross-examine.

Subdivision (b). Combines the present provision for compensation in criminal cases with what seems to be a fair and feasible handling of civil cases, originally found in the Model Act and carried from there into Uniform Rule 60. See also California Evidence Code 730-731. The special provision for Fifth Amendment compensation cases is designed to guard against reducing constitutionally guaranteed just compensation by requiring the recipient to pay costs. See Rule 71A(l) of the Rules of Civil Procedure.

Subdivision (c). Seems to be essential if the use of court appointed experts is to be fully effective. Uniform Rule 61 so provides.

Subdivision (d). Is in essence the last sentence of Rule 28(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: The amendments are technical. No substantive change is intended.]

[2] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Letter from James F. Schaeffer to Hon. William L. Hungate, June 26, 1973, and accompanying material, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 138, 141-44 (1973).

Letter from W. Vincent Rakestraw to Hon. James O. Eastland, June 14, 1974, in Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 121, 125-26 (1974).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
Supp. To CHAPTER 706 RULE 706

3-706 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 706, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 706. Court Appointed Experts		Rule 706. Court-Appointed Expert Witnesses
(a)	Appointment. The court may on its	(a)	Appointment Process. On a party's mo-own motion or on the motion of any party enter an order to show cause why expert witnesses should not be appointed, and may request the parties to submit nominations. The court may appoint any tion or on its own, the court may order the parties to show cause why expert witnesses should not be appointed and may ask the parties to submit nominations. The court may appoint any may appoint any expert witnesses agreed upon by the parties, and may appoint expert witnesses of its own selection. An expert witness shall not be appointed by the court unless the witness consents to act.

sent s to act. A wit- ness so ap- poin ted shall be in- form ed of the wit- ness' du- ties by the cour t in writ- ing, a copy of whic h shall be filed with the clerk , or at a con- fer- ence in whic h the parti es shall have opportunity to particip ate.

A witness
so appoin ted shall advise
the parti es of
the witness' findings, if any;
the witness'
deposition may be take n by any part y;
and
the witness
may be calle d to testi

fy by the court or any party. The witness shall be subject to cross-examination by each party, including a party calling the witness.

(b) Expert's Role. The court must inform the expert of the expert's duties. The court may do so in writing and have a copy filed with the clerk or may do so orally at a conference in which the parties have an opportunity to participate. The expert:

(1) must advise the parties of any findings the expert makes;

(2) may be deposed by any party;

(3) may be called to testify by the court or any party; and

(4) may be cross-examined by any party, includ ing the party that called the expert.

(b) Compensation. Expert witnesses so appointed are entitled to reasonable compensation in whatever sum the court may allow. The compensation thus fixed is payable as follows:

(c) Compensation. The expert is entitled to a reasonable compensation, as set by the court. The compensation is payable as follows:

able from funds which may be provided by law in criminal cases and civil actions and proceedings involving just compensation under the fifth amendment. In other civil actions and proceedings the compensation shall be paid by the parties in such proportion and at such time as the court directs, and thereafter charged in like manner as other costs.

(1) in a criminal case or in a civil case involving just compensation under the Fifth Amendment, from any funds that are provided by law; and

(2) in any other civil case, by the parties in the proportion and at the time that the court directs -- and the compensation is then charged like other costs.

(c) Disclosure of appointment. In the exercise of its discretion, the court may authorize disclosure to the jury of the fact that the court appointed the expert.

(d) Disclosing the Appointment to the Jury. The court may authorize disclosure to the jury that the court appointed the expert.

pointed the expert witness.

(d) Parties' expert s of own selection. Nothing in this rule limits the parties in calling expert witnesses of their own selection.

(e) Parties' Choice of Their Own Experts. This rule does not limit a party in calling its own experts.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 706 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

156 of 156 DOCUMENTS

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VII. Opinions and Expert Testimony
Supp. To CHAPTER 706 RULE 706

3-706 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 706.03

Supp. to § 706.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[5.1] Expert for Benefit of Party [Go To Main]

Hannah v. United States, 523 F.3d 597 (5th Cir. 2008) : A prisoner, who brought a Federal Tort Claims action alleging that he received negligent treatment for a sinus condition, petitioned the Trial Court to appoint an expert for him under Rule 706. The Court found no error in the rejection of the petition, reasoning that "Rule 706 contemplates the appointment of an expert to aid the court. Hannah seeks an expert for his own benefit." While some courts have invoked Rule 706 to appoint an expert for an indigent party and to have the fees for that expert entirely borne by the adversary, the case law does not suggest that a Judge "can be compelled to act under Rule 706 or that the district court in this case abused its discretion in denying an expert."

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 801 RULE 801

4-801 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 801.syn

§ 801.syn Synopsis to Chapter 801: RULE 801

801.01 Official Text

801.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Definition of Hearsay

[a] Importance of the Hearsay Rule

[b] Definition of Hearsay -- Relationship to Rule 403

[c] Definition of Hearsay -- Definition of a "Statement" -- Assertive versus Nonassertive Conduct

[d] Definition of Hearsay -- Statement Made Other Than While Testifying at the Trial or Hearing

[e] Definition of Hearsay -- Statement Offered to Prove the Truth of the Matter Asserted

[f] Definition of Hearsay -- Notice and Effect on the Listener

[g] Definition of Hearsay -- Evidence of Association

[h] Definition of Hearsay -- State of Mind

[i] Definition of Hearsay -- Implied and Indirect Assertions

[j] Definition of Hearsay -- Statements Admitted for the Fact That They Are Made

[2] Statements That Are Defined as Not Hearsay

[a] Departure from Common Law

[b] Statements That Are Defined as Not Hearsay -- Rationale for Categorization as Not Hearsay

[3] Prior Inconsistent Statements That Are Not Hearsay

[a] Admissible for Their Truth

[b] Prior Inconsistent Statements That Are Not Hearsay -- Hearing or Other Proceeding

[c] Prior Inconsistent Statements That Are Not Hearsay -- Subject to Cross-Examination

[d] Prior Inconsistent Statements That Are Not Hearsay -- Inconsistency and Lack of Memory

[4] Prior Consistent Statements That Are Not Hearsay

[a] Development of Rule

[b] Prior Consistent Statements That Are Not Hearsay -- Limitation on Use

[c] Prior Consistent Statements That Are Not Hearsay -- Timing and Use for Rehabilitation, Not for Truth

[5] Identifications

[6] Admissions

[a] Relationship to Common-Law Rule

[b] Admissions -- Multiple Parties

[c] Admissions -- Personal Admissions

[d] Admissions -- Adoptive Admissions

[e] Admissions -- Authorized Admissions

[f] Admissions -- Agents' Admissions

[i] Expansion of Common-Law Rule

[ii] Admissions -- Agents' Admissions -- Personal Knowledge

[iii] Admissions -- Agents' Admissions -- Coemployee Statements

[iv] Admissions -- Agents' Admissions -- Proof of Agency

[v] Admissions -- Agents' Admissions -- Statements by Translators

[vi] Admissions -- Agents' Admissions -- Statements by Attorneys as Agent's Admissions

[g] Conspirator Statements

[i] Relationship to Common-Law Rule

[ii] Conspirator Statements -- Foundation Requirements for Admission of Conspirator Statements

[A] Elements of Foundation

[B] Conspirator Statements -- Foundation Requirements -- Preponderance of the Evidence

[C] Conspirator Statements -- Foundation Requirements -- Independent Evidence

[D] Conspirator Statements -- Foundation Requirements -- Order of Proof

[iii] Conspirator Statements -- Breadth of Rule 801(d)(2)(E)

[7] Confrontation Concerns

801.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Rule 801(a) -- Statement

[a] Rule 801(a) -- Assertive Conduct

[b] Rule 801(a) -- Implied Assertions

[c] Rule 801(a) -- Statements of Identification and Names

[2] Rule 801(c) -- Hearsay

[a] Rule 801(c) -- Circumstantial Evidence

[b] Rule 801(c) -- Confrontation Clause Inapplicable to Nonhearsay

[c] Rule 801(c) -- Conspiratorial Acts

[d] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Hearsay

[i] Rule 801(c) -- Civil Cases

[ii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Hearsay -- Criminal Cases

[A] Rule 801(c) -- Defense Evidence

[B] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Hearsay -- Criminal Cases -- Official and Confidential Informants

[C] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Hearsay -- Criminal Cases -- Other Cases

[iii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Hearsay -- Indirect Hearsay

[e] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay

[i] Rule 801(c) -- Background or Context

[A] Rule 801(c) -- Civil Cases

[B] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Background or Context -- Criminal Cases

[ii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Consumer Confusion

[iii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Contracts

[iv] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Credibility

[v] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Directions, Instructions, Recommendations

[vi] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Employment Discrimination Cases

[vii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Existence of Information

[viii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- False Statements

[ix] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Impeachment

[x] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Information Automatically Generated

[xi] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Knowledge and Notice

[A] Rule 801(c) -- Civil Cases

[B] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Knowledge and Notice -- Criminal Cases

[xii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Nonassertive Conduct

[xiii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Personal Knowledge Distinguished

[xiv] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Prior Statement Adopted by Witness

[xv] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Receipts, Registration Cards, Invoices

[xvi] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Questions

[xvii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Statements Affecting Legal Rights

[xviii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Statements Relied Upon

[A] Rule 801(c) -- Civil Cases

[B] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Statements Relied Upon -- Criminal Cases

[xix] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- State of Mind

[xx] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Support for Administrative Decision

[xxi] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Threats

[xxii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Tools of the Trade

[xxiii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Trade Inscriptions and Identifying Marks

[xxiv] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Verbal Acts

[f] Rule 801(c) -- Judgment of Acquittal

[g] Rule 801(c) -- Relevance Requirement

[3] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Prior Statement By Witness -- Inconsistent

[a] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Defendant's Use of the Rule

[b] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Grand Jury Testimony

[c] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Inconsistency Required

[d] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Leading Questions

[e] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Memory Problems; Vague Testimony

[f] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Opportunity for Cross-examination

[g] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Other Proceedings

[h] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Presence of Declarant

[i] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Relationship to Impeachment

[j] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Timing of Introduction

[4] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Prior Statement By WitnesS -- ConsistenT

[a] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Anticipating Impeachment

[b] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Completion Use Only

[c] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Corroborating Accused's Testimony

[d] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Corroborating Witness' Testimony

[e] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Hearsay Within Hearsay

[f] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Nontestifying Declarant

[g] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Opportunity for Cross-Examination

[h] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Opportunity for Examination

[i] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Prior Statement of Cooperating Witness

[j] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Rehabilitation Use Only

[k] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Response to Inconsistent Statement

[l] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Scope of Rehabilitation

[m] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Subject to Cross-Examination

[n] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Suggestion of Fabrication

[i] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Civil Cases

[ii] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Suggestion of Fabrication -- Criminal Cases

[o] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Timing of Prior Consistent Statement

[5] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Prior Statement By Witness -- Identification

[a] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Drawings

[b] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Failure To Identify at Trial

[c] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Memory Problem

[d] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Photo Identification

[e] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Police Reports

[f] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Recanting Witness

[g] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Scope of the Rule

[h] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Testimony by Government Agent

[6] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Admission By Party-Opponent -- Party's Own Statement

[a] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- "Admissions Against Interest"

[b] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Charts and Diagrams

[c] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Consent Decree

[d] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Constitutional Problems

[e] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Depositions and Prior Testimony

[f] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Foundation -- Standard of Proof

[g] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Guilty Pleas

[h] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Interpretation of Statements

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Interrelated Statements

[j] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Judicial Admissions

[k] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Legal Briefs

[l] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Letters to the Trial Judge

[m] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Multiple Parties

[n] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Non-inculpatory Statements

[o] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Omissions

[p] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Real Party in Interest

[q] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Representative Capacity

[r] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Statements Made While Cooperating with the Authorities

[s] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Statements Offered in the Declarant's Favor

[t] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Summary Judgment Use

[u] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Trustworthiness Problems

[7] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Admission By Party-Opponent -- Adoption Or Belief In Truth

[a] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Admissions in Interrogatories

[b] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Adoption by Assent

[c] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Adoption by Implication

[d] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Adoption by Publication

[e] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Adoption by Silence

[f] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Adoption of Documents and Records

[g] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Documents Offered in Court or Arbitration

[h] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Findings by Court

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Insufficient Showing of Adoption

[j] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Letters and Correspondence

[k] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Police Interrogations

[l] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Possession

[m] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Prior Conversations

[n] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Surveys and Opinion Polls

[8] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Admission By Party-Opponent -- Authorized Statement

[a] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Agents' Statements

[b] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Employees' Statements

[c] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Experts

[d] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Internal Memoranda

[e] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Interpreters

[f] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Parent and Subsidiary Entities

[g] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Personal Knowledge

[h] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Statements by Counsel

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Trial or Deposition Testimony

[9] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Admission By Party-Opponent -- Agency Relationship

[a] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Admission Against Fellow Employee

[b] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Confrontation Concerns

[c] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Depositions

[d] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- During the Relationship

[e] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Employee of Related Employer

[f] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Examples of Agents' Admissions

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Employment Discrimination Cases

[ii] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Examples of Agents' Admissions -- Other Cases

[g] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Government Agents and Employees

[h] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Government Attorneys

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Government Informants

[j] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Government Publications

[k] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Independent Contractors

[l] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Invocation of Privilege by Agent

[m] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Joint Parties

[n] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Judicial Admissions

[o] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Multiple Agents

[p] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Partners

[q] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Personal Knowledge

[r] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Proving Agency

[s] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Relationship to Other Rules

[t] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Scope of Agent's Employment

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Employment Cases

[ii] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Scope of Agent's Employment -- Other Cases

[u] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Statements by Counsel

[v] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Statements for Internal Use

[10] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Admission By Party-Opponent -- Coconspirators

[a] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Acquittal of Conspiracy

[b] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Appellate Review

[c] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Availability of Declarant

[d] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Bench Trials

[e] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Cautionary Instructions

[f] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Civil Cases

[g] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Confrontation Concerns

[h] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Conspiracy Not Charged

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Declarant's Participation in Conspiracy

[j] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Defendant's Participation in Conspiracy

[k] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- During the Conspiracy

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Miscellaneous Cases

[ii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- During the Conspiracy -- Statements After Declarant's Arrest

[iii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- During the Conspiracy -- Statements After Defendant's Arrest

[iv] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- During the Conspiracy -- Statements After Objectives Attained or Failed

[v] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- During the Conspiracy -- Statements Before Defendant Joined

[vi] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- During the Conspiracy -- Statements Before Proceeds Divided

[vii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- During the Conspiracy -- Statements Outside Charged Period

[l] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Existence of Conspiracy

[m] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Foundation

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Conditional Admission of Statement

[ii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Foundation -- Hearings

[iii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Foundation -- Miscellaneous Cases

[iv] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Foundation -- Requirement of Record

[v] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Foundation -- Rulings

[n] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Independent Evidence of Foundation

[o] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Informants' Statements

[ii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required

[A] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Efforts To Conceal

[B] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required -- Information to Conspirators

[C] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required -- Miscellaneous Cases

[D] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required -- Obtaining Assistance

[E] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required -- Reassurance, Encouragement, etc.

[F] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required -- Statements to Undercover Agents or Informants

[G] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required -- Threats to Witnesses

[iii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Excludable or Exclusion Required

[A] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Civil Cases

[B] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Excludable or Exclusion Required -- Criminal Cases

[p] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Multiple Conspiracies

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Statement Admissible

[ii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Multiple Conspiracies -- Statement Inadmissible

[q] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Notes As Coconspirator Statements

[r] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Order of Presentation

[s] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Personal Knowledge

[t] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Relationship to Other Rules

[u] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Resubmitting Foundation Questions to Jury

[v] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Statements Made to Cooperating Witnesses

[w] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Statements Made to Non-Conspirators

[x] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Unidentified Declarants

[y] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Use by Accused

[z] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Written Statements

801.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 282 (1999)

[3] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

[4] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

[5] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

[6] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

[7] 1997 Amendment Committee Note

[8] Citations to Hearings and Debates

2 of 176 DOCUMENTS

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 801 RULE 801

4-801 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 801.01

801.01 Official Text

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. -- A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. -- A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay. -- "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

(d) Statements which are not hearsay. -- A statement is not hearsay if --

(1) Prior statement by witness. -- The declarant testifies at the trial or hearing and is subject to cross-examination concerning the statement, and the statement is (A) inconsistent with the declarant's testimony, and was given under oath subject to the penalty of perjury at a trial, hearing, or other proceeding, or in a deposition, or (B) consistent with the declarant's testimony and is offered to rebut an express or implied charge against the declarant of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive, or (C) one of identification of a person made after perceiving the person; or

(2) Admission by party-opponent. -- The statement is offered against a party and is (A) the party's own statement, in either an individual or a representative capacity or (B) a statement of which the party has manifested an adoption or belief in its truth, or (C) a statement by a person authorized by the party to make a statement concerning the subject, or (D) a statement by the party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship, or (E) a statement by a coconspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy. The contents of the statement shall be considered but are not alone sufficient to establish the declarant's authority under subdivision (C), the agency or employment relationship and scope thereof under subdivision (D), or the existence of the conspiracy and the participation therein of the declarant and the party against whom the statement is offered under subdivision (E).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 801 RULE 801

4-801 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 801.02

801.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Definition of Hearsay

[a] Importance of the Hearsay Rule

Rule 801 defines hearsay as a statement other than one made by a witness testifying at a trial or hearing that is offered in evidence to prove the truth of the information set forth in the statement. The hearsay rule is designed to exclude a certain type of unreliable evidence. Hearsay is presumptively unreliable because when an out-of-court statement is offered for its truth, it is only probative if the person who made the statement -- the declarant -- was telling the truth. But the truthfulness of an out-of-court declarant cannot be assessed by the ordinary methods with which we determine the truth of testimonial evidence -- oath, cross-examination, and the factfinder's scrutiny of the witness' demeanor. Therefore, hearsay is presumptively unreliable.

[b] Definition of Hearsay -- Relationship to Rule 403

Rule 403 provides an important protection when an out-of-court statement is offered as nonhearsay for its effect on the listener. The conduct of the listener in response to the statement must be of some importance in the case, and the statement must be probative to explain the listener's response or state of mind. And even if probative for its effect on the listener, the out-of-court statement must be excluded if the probative value is substantially outweighed by the risk that the jury will use the statement as proof of the matter asserted. For example, if a declarant makes a statement to a police officer accusing the defendant of committing a crime, the government will often try to admit the statement for the nonhearsay purpose of explaining the officer's conduct. This is also referred to as "background" use of nonhearsay evidence. Yet, in many cases these statements are subject to exclusion under Rule 403. This is because when the question is whether the defendant is guilty, there is often only minimal probative value in explaining why an officer acted in a certain way; and in contrast, there is a substantial risk of prejudice because the jury could impermissibly use the statement for its truth. n1 It is important for the nonoffering party in these circumstances to make a specific objection on Rule 403 grounds. n2 A hearsay objection is insufficient because the statement is, at least technically, not being offered for its truth.

If the probative value of the statement for its effect on the listener is not substantially outweighed by the risk that the jury will use the statement for its truth, the nonoffering party is at any rate entitled to a limiting instruction upon request. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 403, § 403.02[21], for a further discussion of these matters.

[c] Definition of Hearsay -- Definition of a "Statement" -- Assertive versus Nonassertive Conduct

If proffered evidence is not a "statement" within the meaning of Rule 801(a), then it cannot be hearsay, and so cannot be excluded under the Rule. Rule 801(a) defines a statement as an oral or written assertion, or nonverbal conduct of a person intended as an assertion. Common-law jurisdictions divide on whether nonverbal conduct that is not intended as an assertion is hearsay if it is introduced to show the truth of the actor's underlying beliefs. The classic case is Wright v. Doe d. Tatham, 7 A. & E. 313, 112 Eng. Rep. 488 (Ex. 1837), aff'd, 5 Cl. & Fin. 670, 7 Eng. Rep. 559 (H.L. 1838) . The parties were fighting over the sanity of one Marsden, since his sanity was crucial in this testamentary contest. The House of Lords asked the Judges whether certain letters addressed to Marsden were admissible. The letters were written by Marsden's nephew and described the nephew's travels in America and other mundane matters. There was no explicit assertion in the letters that the nephew believed Marsden to be sane (e.g., "Uncle Marsden, you are sane."). The theory of admitting the letters was that the nephew must have thought that Marsden was sane and competent or they would not have been written, making the letters circumstantial evidence of sanity. That is, the nephew had an underlying belief that Marsden was sane, and the letters were offered for the truth of that belief. The assertion of competence was implicit rather than explicit. The Court held that the letters must be excluded as hearsay. It saw no distinction between implicit and explicit assertions.

One of the famous hypotheticals used in Wright was that of the ship captain who sails off on a ship with his family. Can this conduct be offered to prove that the ship was seaworthy? The Wright Court answered in the negative, reasoning that the ship captain was essentially a declarant, and that in order for the conduct to be probative of seaworthiness, it would have to be presumed, in the absence of cross-examination, that the declarant believed the vessel was seaworthy and that this belief was reasonable. The reasoning is that if the ship captain had been asked about the vessel and declared it seaworthy, this declaration would obviously have been hearsay to prove the condition of the boat. The Wright Court essentially found the ship captain's activity to be equivalent to an oral statement.

The result of the ship captain hypothetical changes under Rule 801. Conduct is not hearsay merely because it is offered to prove the truth of the belief that generated the conduct. Rather, under Rule 801, conduct can only be hearsay if the declarant intended by the conduct to communicate information. The Trial Judge has to determine whether conduct was intended to assert something or not. The Advisory Committee's Note states that "[t]he rule is so worded as to place the burden upon the party claiming that the intention existed; ambiguous and doubtful cases will be resolved against him and in favor of admissibility." An obvious example in which conduct could be hearsay is where the declarant points to something, or shakes his head yes or no. n3 An obvious example in which conduct would not be hearsay is proof that a person was walking under an umbrella, offered to show it was raining. n4

The reasons for excluding non-assertive conduct from the hearsay rule are persuasive. A principal reason for excluding hearsay is that the veracity of the declarant cannot be tested by cross-examination. In the case of non-assertive acts, the actor by definition does not intend to make an assertion, meaning that the risk of insincerity is substantially diminished. The actor is at least not trying to lie. Moreover, non-assertive conduct is usually more reliable than the ordinary out-of-court statement, because by conduct the declarant has risked action on the correctness of his belief -- he has put his money where his mouth is. As applied to the ship captain example, it is one thing to say "this boat is seaworthy"; it is quite another to travel in the boat with your family.

Subdivision (b) of Rule 801 defines a declarant as a person who makes a statement. Because of the interrelationship of sections (a) and (b) of the Rule, it is apparent that a declarant includes an actor whose conduct is intended as an assertion. The logic of this is as follows: A declarant is a person who makes a statement, and a statement is defined to include nonverbal conduct if that conduct is intended as an assertion; thus, a person who intentionally makes a nonverbal assertion is a declarant.

[d] Definition of Hearsay -- Statement Made Other Than While Testifying at the Trial or Hearing

Usually it is not difficult to determine whether a statement was made at some time other than during the trial or hearing. Out-of-court statements obviously are made outside of a hearing or trial. There are two points that must be considered, however, in deciding whether a statement is hearsay. First, the definition of hearsay offered in subdivision (c) would include any statement made in a different hearing or proceeding. Thus, a statement in a former trial or in a preliminary hearing is hearsay if offered for its truth in a subsequent proceeding. Of course, it might be admitted under an exception or exemption from the hearsay rule. Second, statements that are recounted on the witness stand by the declarant who made them, i.e., prior statements of testifying witnesses, are also within the definition of hearsay. n5

Subdivision (d)(1), which will be discussed shortly, recognizes that some prior statements by a declarant present in Court for cross-examination should be admitted even if offered for their truth. That subdivision states that qualifying statements are not hearsay, notwithstanding the definition found in (c).

With respect to testifying witnesses who made prior statements, a hearsay problem can ordinarily be avoided simply by asking the witness about the underlying fact related in the statement rather than about the prior statement itself. For example, "I told my husband that I saw the white car go through the red light" is hearsay if offered to prove that the white car went through the red light. However, if the witness simply testifies that she saw the white car go through the red light, there is no hearsay problem. n6 This is not a complete answer to the hearsay problem, however, because a party might well wish to introduce the prior statement together with a current statement of fact, either to bolster the witness' in-court testimony or because the prior statement has some independent evidentiary significance. If this is the case the party must deal with the hearsay rule, and its exceptions.

In light of the detail of Rule 801, there usually is little debate over whether a statement was made at a time other than during the trial or hearing. Thus, the threshold question for the Trial Judge when a hearsay statement is made usually is whether the statement is offered for its truth.

[e] Definition of Hearsay -- Statement Offered to Prove the Truth of the Matter Asserted

Often lawyers have difficulty understanding exactly what is meant by the expression "to offer a statement for some other purpose than its truth." The following illustration might help to clarify the difference between a statement offered for its truth, hence hearsay, and a statement offered for some other purpose.

Consider the classic case suggested by Justice Holmes of the man who shouts fire falsely in a crowded theater. He is prosecuted for the offense, and various witnesses are called who testify that the man did indeed shout the word "fire," but objection is made by the defendant that such testimony is hearsay, i.e., it is testimony about an out-of-court statement introduced for the truth of the matter stated. Would you sustain the objection? The answer should be "no." The statement is not introduced to prove that there was a fire in the theater. In fact, it is introduced as part of the prosecution's case designed to prove the opposite, namely, that there was no fire. This kind of case is representative of statements that are known as "operative legal facts," or cases that involve statements that have "independent legal significance." n7 In other words, because a man can be prosecuted for falsely shouting "fire" in a crowded theater, the mere fact that the word is spoken has legal significance. If it should appear that there really was a fire, then, of course, the defendant would go free. But, to disable the prosecution from showing that the word was spoken would mean that there could be no prosecution.

Contrast this with a case in which witness A takes the stand and testifies for the prosecution that witness B told witness A that the defendant had shouted "fire" falsely in a crowded theater. Witness A was not present in the theater at the time, but later heard witness B describe the event in full detail. This is our classic hearsay case. The prosecution is introducing the testimony, i.e., witness B's story, to prove that the story is true. In other words, through witness A, the prosecution is intending to prove that witness B spoke the truth. This is not allowed, unless some exception to the hearsay rule can be found. On the other hand, if witness A were a grand juror testifying in a perjury trial in which B was charged with lying to the grand jury concerning the fire, A's statement would be admitted to prove the fact that B made the statement to the grand jury. Thus, the hearsay rule depends on the purpose for which the statement is offered; the same statement will be hearsay if offered for one purpose (i.e., the truth of an assertion) and non-hearsay if offered for any other. n8

There are a number of situations in which statements are not hearsay because they are not being offered for their truth. For example, a statement such as a law or regulation or an order is neither true nor false. It may be a good or bad statement in terms of its efficacy, but statements that do not assert, even implicitly, that things are true will not be hearsay.

Another example of non-hearsay is a statement that is offered as part of a claim that the statement was false or misleading -- e.g., mail fraud, wire fraud, and obstruction cases. It is offered because the proponent believes that it was false, so it cannot be hearsay as defined in subdivision (c). n9

This is not to say that it is always easy to delineate the line between statements offered for their truth and those that are not. Indeed, Courts have sometimes erred in this task. An example is United States v. Sadler, 234 F.3d 368 (8th Cir. 2000) . Sadler was charged with bank robbery. An officer testified that Sadler confessed his guilt to him without even being asked to do so. Sadler contended that the officer was lying. Sadler proffered the testimony of the attorney who was representing him at the time of the alleged confession. The attorney would have testified that moments before allegedly confessing to the deputy, Sadler spoke to the attorney and unequivocally asserted his innocence. In response to a hearsay objection, the defendant argued that his statement to his former attorney was admissible for the nonhearsay purpose of impeaching the credibility of the officer who testified that the defendant confessed to him. The Trial Court excluded Sadler's statement as hearsay and the Court found no error. The Court stated that "the proffered testimony would only have its desired effect if in fact the statements [to the attorney] were true." In our view, this analysis is misguided. Sadler's protestation of innocence was relevant regardless of its truth. The police officer testified that Sadler went out of his way to volunteer a confession. Even if Sadler was not telling his attorney the truth, his declaration of innocence impeaches the police officer's testimony because it makes the officer's account less plausible. It seems unlikely that Sadler would be protesting innocence to his lawyer and then, a short time later, loudly volunteering his guilt to a police officer. n10

[f] Definition of Hearsay -- Notice and Effect on the Listener

Statements are not hearsay if offered to prove that because they were made, listeners had notice or knowledge of the information related in the statements. If a statement is offered for its effect on the listener, in order to explain the listener's conduct, it does not matter whether the declarant was telling the truth. For example, warnings about defects in equipment may be used to prove notice, although the same statements that give notice would be hearsay if offered to prove the fact that there were defects. n11

The Fifth Circuit case of United States v. Cantu, 876 F.2d 1134 (5th Cir. 1989) , provides a good example of the nonhearsay use of an out-of-court statement for its effect on the listener. Cantu was charged with a drug crime and offered a defense of entrapment. At trial he was not permitted to testify to the statements that were made to him by Santander, an undercover government agent, that reflected a persistent effort on Santander's part to get Cantu to secure drug customers. Santander's statements were excluded as hearsay, but the Court of Appeals found that this was error. The Court reasoned that the statements "were offered as evidence of Cantu's state of mind, bearing directly on his entrapment defense," and that the actual truth of the statements was therefore irrelevant. n12

The Judge in Cantu had expressed concern that Cantu might have been lying on the witness stand about whether Santander actually made these statements. But the Court of Appeals rightly rejected this concern as misplaced. As the Court explained: "Cantu's credibility, like the testimony of any witness, was subject to the crucible of cross-examination and was within the exclusive province of the jury. The veracity of a claim that certain statements were made was subject to evaluation like any other testimony presented at trial." The hearsay rule is concerned about the credibility of out-of-court declarants; the credibility of in-court witnesses is left to the jury.

[g] Definition of Hearsay -- Evidence of Association

Another example of a well-accepted nonhearsay use of out-of-court statements occurs when a statement is offered to prove an association between two or more persons. For example, if correspondence is sent back and forth between two persons, it tends to prove that they have some association, independent of the truth of the correspondence. The hearsay rule does not apply because the letters tend to prove association no matter what they say. This scenario is often employed by the government in conspiracy cases. n13 Of course, if the probative value of the evidence as proof of association is substantially outweighed by the risk that the jury will use the statements for their truth, the statements should be excluded under Rule 403.

[h] Definition of Hearsay -- State of Mind

One problem type of case has spurred much commentary, but it is a problem in theory more than in practice. An example is when one spouse makes a statement such as "I hate you" to the other spouse in the presence of third parties. If this statement were offered in a case to prove that the declarant was no longer in love with the other spouse, it would appear to be hearsay. It could be argued, however, that the fact that such a statement was made in the presence of other people itself is evidence of an absence of love so that the making of the statement in these circumstances is circumstantial evidence of state of mind, not hearsay. This kind of case may produce differences of opinion as to the proper classification, but the existence of a state of mind exception to the hearsay rule in Rule 803(3) indicates that such statements will be admissible and that the theoretical debate has little practical significance. n14 See the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 803, § 803.02[4], for a discussion of the state of mind exception.

[i] Definition of Hearsay -- Implied and Indirect Assertions

An out-of-court statement is hearsay only if the statement is offered to prove the truth of the "matter asserted." Does this mean that the hearsay rule excludes only statements offered for the truth of matters expressly asserted? If a statement is offered for the truth of a matter that is implied rather than expressed, does the utterance escape the hearsay prohibition? Professor Milich, in Re-examining Hearsay Under the Federal Rules: Some Method for the Madness, 39 U. Kan. L. Rev. 893 (1991), considers the following hypothetical illustration of the problem of implied assertions:

> Assume, in a murder case, that the prosecution wants to prove that Joe is a sharpshooter. If a declarant makes a statement that "Joe is a sharpshooter," this is an express assertion of fact and is excluded as hearsay. But there are a number of equivalent statements that make the same point without making an express assertion. Among them: (1) "Joe can shoot a tick off a running jaguar at 200 yards"; (2) "You ought to go hunting with Joe"; and (3) "Have you ever seen anyone shoot a rifle like Joe?"

If the hearsay rule excludes only out-of-court statements offered for the truth of matters expressly asserted, then none of these three statements are hearsay. The government is not offering the statement to show that Joe can actually shoot a tick off a jaguar at 200 yards; nor that anyone ought to go hunting with Joe; nor that anyone has seen anyone else shoot a rifle like Joe.

A strong argument can be made, however, that there should be no difference between express and implied assertions, at least where the declarant is trying to make the same point by implication that he could otherwise make expressly. Given the subtlety of language, there is no reason to rest the hearsay rule on purely semantic distinctions. Certainly the hearsay dangers of an implied assertion are on a par with those attendant to an express assertion: The factfinder will be relying on the credibility of an uncross-examined declarant who may be lying or mistaken. n15 As Professor Milich states, a literalist approach to hearsay "guts the hearsay rule." In the above hypothetical, it would lead to the bizarre result that a wild exaggeration (shooting the tick off a jaguar) could be heard by the jury, whereas a more careful attempt to approximate the truth (he is a good shot) could not. A literalist approach would also mean that the use of irony, aphorism, or metaphor could never be excluded as hearsay, even though everyone would know what the declarant intended to assert. Finally, Professor Milich makes the important point that "making the hearsay issue turn on the mere form of the out-of-court statement may tempt witnesses to 'recall' the statements in a nondeclarative form to circumvent the rule." n16

The Advisory Committee Note to Rule 801 states that "verbal conduct which is assertive but offered as a basis for inferring something other than the matter asserted" is "excluded from the definition of hearsay by the language of subdivision (c)." We think that the Advisory Committee's reading is not self-evident. The language "truth of the matter asserted" is flexible enough to cover "matters" that are implied as well as express. n17

Most Courts have been reluctant to adopt the implication of the Advisory Committee that the hearsay rule is inapplicable to implied verbal assertions. One well-known example is United States v. Reynolds, 715 F.2d 99 (3d Cir. 1983) . Parran and a codefendant, Reynolds, were charged with conspiring to possess and cash a social security check belonging to someone else. Reynolds was arrested after he attempted to cash the check. Parran was across the street observing the proceedings. Parran crossed the street and casually walked by Parran and the officers. As Parran walked by, Reynolds called out to Parran, "I didn't tell them anything about you." The Court analyzed the admissibility of that statement as follows:

> As the government uses it, the statement's probative value depends on the truth of an assumed fact it implies. Unless the trier assumes that the statement implies that Reynolds did not tell the postal inspectors that Parran was involved in the conspiracy to defraud, even though Parran was in fact involved, the statement carries no probative weight for the government's case. ... Consequently, we believe that, as the government uses it, the statement's relevance goes well beyond the fact that it was uttered. ... [T]he government offers it to prove the truth of the assumed fact of defendant's guilt implied by its conduct. Accordingly, we reject the government's suggestion in this case that only a statement's express assertion should be considered in deciding whether it constitutes hearsay. n18

The problems of a literalist approach to the hearsay rule, excluding only express assertions, are well illustrated by the case of United States v. Ybarra, 70 F.3d 362 (5th Cir. 1995) . To prove that the defendant lived in a house where a firearm was found, the government offered this statement from the defendant's wife to police officers: "[T]here is no way [Ybarra] is coming home as long as you police are here." The Court held that the statement was not hearsay because it was offered to prove something other than the fact that Ybarra would not come home. Rather, it was offered to prove that Ybarra lived in the house. This ignores the fact that the government did offer the statement for the truth of the assertion that was implied by the wife's statement -- i.e., that Ybarra lived there. The Court's decision that the statement was not offered for the truth of the matter asserted rests on a constricted and highly semantic view of "the matter asserted," and creates problems if the statement is changed in any slight degree. If the wife had said, "Yeah, he lives here and he won't be coming back while police are here," the statement would undeniably be hearsay. There is no substantial distinction between that hypothetical statement and the statement actually made by the wife in Ybarra. Moreover, what would the Court have done if the wife had said, "This is Ybarra's castle," or more obliquely, "Don't you cops have any respect? A man's home is his castle." Would these statements not be hearsay because the government would not be offering them to prove that the place was Ybarra's castle? The "express assertion" view of the hearsay rule leads to absurd results.

We believe that a statement should be treated as hearsay whenever it is offered to prove the truth of either an express or implied assertion, so long as the Trial Judge finds that the declarant intended to communicate that assertion when he made the statement. We note that most Federal Courts are in agreement with the view that implied assertions are hearsay if they are intentionally communicated by the speaker--and not hearsay if there is no intent to communicate the implication. An example is United States v. Summers, 414 F.3d 1287 (10th Cir. 2005) , where the defendant's accomplice in a bank robbery was arrested and said to the officer, "How did you guys find us so fast?" The Court held that an implied assertion is hearsay if the speaker intended to communicate the implication that is sought to be used at trial. It also noted that the burden is on the opponent to show that the speaker had the intent to assert the implication in the statement. Applying this intent-based test to the facts, the Court held that the defendant satisfied his burden of demonstrating that by positing the question, "How did you guys find us so fast?", the declarant intended to make an assertion. It explained as follows:

> It begs credulity to assume that in positing the question Mohammed was exclusively interested in modern methods of law enforcement, including surveillance, communication, and coordination. Rather, fairly construed the statement intimated both guilt and wonderment at the ability of the police to apprehend the perpetrators of the crime so quickly.

An intent-based approach to implied assertions has several virtues. First, at least where statements intentionally asserting one thing are being used to prove something else that the declarant was not trying to say, the hearsay risks are reduced. This is because the declarant is unlikely to have intended to mislead on matters that he had no intent to communicate in the first place. One of the major dangers of hearsay -- the risk of insincerity -- is thus minimized, and an intent-based test would allow such unintentional statements to be admitted.

Second, an intent-based approach provides a unitary test for non-assertive conduct and verbal communications. As discussed above, conduct is hearsay only if the actor intends to communicate by his action and the conduct is offered for the truth of that communication. An intent-based approach applies the same rule for verbal communications.

Third, an intent-based approach toward implied assertions is favored by most modern commentators. n19

Fourth, an intent-based test allows the hearsay rule to apply and exclude statements that are exaggerations (such as "Joe can shoot a tick off a jaguar"), or metaphor or sarcasm. All such statements are basically the equivalent of an express assertion. If offered to prove the truth of the implied and intended meaning, the evidence is hearsay under an intent-based approach. This is clearly the appropriate result, even though the statement is not being offered to prove the literal truth of the matter expressly asserted; reserving the hearsay rule to express assertions only will deprive the rule of almost all practical effect.

There are many examples of implied but intentional assertions that should be treated as hearsay. A declarant's statement that "the sky is on fire" is hearsay when offered to show that the speaker witnessed a sunset. n20 A declarant's statement, "Well, at least I never forged a will!" is hearsay when offered to prove the implication that the person to whom the statement was made is a forger. n21 A declarant's statement, "The automobile was going faster than a speeding bullet," is hearsay when offered to prove that the car was exceeding the speed limit. These statements are hearsay because the "matter asserted" includes what the declarant reasonably intended to assert. Given the subtlety of language, there is no reason to rest the hearsay rule on purely semantic distinctions between express and implied assertions.

This is not to say that an intent-based approach to implied assertions is free from difficulty. There is some indeterminacy in the application of any intent-based test. As Professor Milich puts it, "[T]he quest for the declarant's intent in cases of verbal conduct involves a search for what the declarant truly had 'in mind.' " But any problem, we think, can be adequately handled by an objective, rather than subjective, test of intent. The question should be whether a reasonable person making a statement such as the declarant made would have intended to communicate the implied assertion that the proponent is offering for its truth. As with conduct, the burden should be placed on the nonoffering party to show that the declarant had the intent to communicate the implied assertion.

A good example of the intent-based approach to implied assertions is United States v. Weeks, 919 F.2d 248 (5th Cir. 1990) . Weeks was charged with kidnapping. The victims testified that their abductors used the names "Jimmy" and "Gato" in addressing each other. To establish that Weeks was "Gato," the government called a witness who testified that he had heard others refer to Weeks as "Gato" when they addressed him, e.g., "How ya doin' Gato?" The Court held that the out-of-court statements addressed to "Gato" were properly admitted. It found that Weeks had not satisfied his burden of showing that declarants who referred to him as "Gato" were intending to communicate an implied assertion, i.e., "Weeks is nicknamed 'Gato.' " Rather, it was more likely that they were trying to communicate other ideas, and were simply using the term "Gato" as they would any other name: as a means of introduction or reference. As the declarants probably had other things in mind than simply to advertise their belief about Weeks' nickname, the statements were not hearsay. n22

In contrast, in United States v. Berrios, 132 F.3d 834 (1st Cir. 1998) , the government had proof that a man named "Pablo" was a drug dealer, and sought to prove that the defendant went by the nickname "Pablo." The defendant called a witness who would have testified that she was present at a drug deal with her husband, and her husband introduced her to the seller, saying "This is Pablo." The witness would have testified that the person introduced as "Pablo" was not the defendant. The Court held that the out-of-court statement of the witness' husband, "This is Pablo," was properly excluded as hearsay. That is the correct result under an intent-based test. The intent of the husband was to assert to his wife that the person before her went by the name "Pablo." If the husband had said to his wife privately, "Watch out for Pablo, he is dangerous," this would not be an intentional assertion that the person identified went by the name Pablo. Rather, the intent of the speaker would be to warn his wife to stay away from the identified person.

[j] Definition of Hearsay -- Statements Admitted for the Fact That They Are Made

If an out-of-court statement is probative simply because it has been made, without regard to its truth, then the hearsay rule is satisfied. An example of a statement properly admitted for the fact it was made is what has been called a "verbal act" -- meaning that the making of the statement itself is enough to trigger certain rights or liabilities, without regard to its truth, such as an offer to sell or a guaranty of a loan. n23 But the Court must carefully determine whether there is any legitimate purpose in admitting the statement for "the fact that it was made." Often the "fact that it was made" argument is simply an attempt to obscure legitimate hearsay concerns.

An example of the proper approach is United States v. Harwood, 998 F.2d 91 (2d Cir. 1993) . Harwood and McKee were arrested in a van in which LSD was found, and both were charged with possession with intent to distribute. Harwood's defense was that he was simply a passenger with no knowledge that LSD was in the van. He wanted to introduce McKee's out-of-court statement that Harwood had simply been "in the wrong place at the wrong time" and "the same would have happened to any person driving a vehicle in which [McKee] was a passenger." But the Trial Court held that the statement was inadmissible hearsay. On appeal, Harwood argued that the Trial Court erred, because he was merely offering McKee's statement "for the fact that it was made." But the Court of Appeals saw through the argument by applying accepted standards of relevance. McKee's statement had no relevance merely because it was made. That the statement was made would prove that McKee could speak; that he could speak English; that he had a thought process; that he was calm and rational. But none of these matters was in dispute. As Judge McLaughlin put it: "What would be relevant is that Harwood was in truth in the wrong place at the wrong time -- not that McKee thought so. Hence, the statement is irrelevant unless it was true, in which case it would be hearsay."

For similar reasons, the Court rejected Harwood's argument that McKee's statement was properly offered to prove McKee's "pattern of verbal behavior." McKee's pattern of verbal behavior was simply irrelevant to whether Harwood was involved in a drug transaction. Judge McLaughlin concluded that this ready list of not-for-truth purposes could not be "invoked like a mantra to circumvent a hearsay objection."

[2] Statements That Are Defined as Not Hearsay

[a] Departure from Common Law

Subdivision (d) of Rule 801 marks a departure from preexisting law. Every one of the statements discussed in subdivision (d) of the Rule comes within the hearsay rule as defined in subdivision (c) -- yet subdivision (d) explicitly states that these statements are not hearsay. In this respect, the departure from common law is more analytical than practical. However, it is useful to consider section (d) in its two parts, because subsection (1) involves statements that are not traditional hearsay exceptions in a majority of jurisdictions. In changing the law with respect to these statements, the Federal Rule has considerable practical impact. Subsection (2), on the other hand, involves statements that all fall within traditional hearsay exceptions, although the definitions provided under the Federal Rule may modify the common law. With respect to this subsection, the impact of the redefinition, from "not hearsay" to "hearsay subject to an exception" is negligible.

[b] Statements That Are Defined as Not Hearsay -- Rationale for Categorization as Not Hearsay

Subdivision (d) technically provides an exemption from, rather than an exception to, the hearsay rule. The statements covered by subdivision (d) are categorized as "not hearsay" rather than as "hearsay subject to an exception" because the basis for admitting these statements is different from that supporting the other standard hearsay exceptions, such as excited utterances and dying declarations, which are found in Rules 803, 804, and 807. Statements falling within these latter exceptions are admitted because they are made pursuant to circumstantial guarantees of reliability that substitute for the in-court guarantees of oath, cross-examination, etc. For example, excited utterances are made while the declarant is under the influence of a startling event and for that reason is less likely to be able to lie.

In contrast, prior statements of testifying witnesses (subdivision (d)(1)) are admitted not because they were reliable when made, but because the person who made them is testifying at the trial or hearing under oath and subject to cross-examination. And admissions (subdivision (d)(2)) are allowed not because they are reliable, but because the adversary or his agents made them -- if a party happens to make an unreliable statement, it is not up to the Judge to protect him from use of the statement by the adversary; it is up to the party to try to explain the statement or to diminish its importance.

The drafters of the Federal Rules thought that it would be confusing to lump prior statements of testifying witnesses and admissions together with reliability-based exceptions under a single label of "hearsay exceptions." In fact, however, the Federal Rules regime is more confusing in the end because statements that clearly fit the definition of hearsay are labeled, ipse dixit, "not hearsay."

There is no practical difference between an exception to the hearsay rule and an exemption from that rule. If a statement fits either an exemption or an exception, it is not excluded by the hearsay rule, and it can be considered as substantive evidence if it is not excluded by any other Rule (e.g. Rule 403).

[3] Prior Inconsistent Statements That Are Not Hearsay

[a] Admissible for Their Truth

Subdivision (d)(1) of the Rule is divided into three parts. The first deals with prior inconsistent statements. In common-law jurisdictions, such statements are not admissible for the truth of the matters stated. They are admissible only to test the credibility of a witness. Subdivision (d)(1)(A) of the Rule departs from the common-law model by providing that when a witness testifies and is subject to cross-examination concerning a prior inconsistent statement, the prior statement may be admitted for its truth if the witness made it while testifying under oath in a previous proceeding (including grand jury) or in a deposition. n24 A hypothetical case may help to illustrate the difference between the common law and the Federal Rules approach.

If the prosecution in a criminal case calls an eyewitness to testify that the witness saw the defendant commit a bank robbery, and if the witness takes the stand and denies having seen the defendant commit the robbery, the prosecution may wish to introduce into evidence a previous contradictory statement by the witness. In common-law jurisdictions, such a statement could be introduced to test the credibility of the witness (assuming that a valid claim of surprise or hostility permitted the party offering the witness to impeach his own witness), but the prior statement could not be introduced for its truth. Under the Federal Rule, the statement can come in for its truth, but only if the statement was made under oath in a proceeding. Otherwise it cannot be used to prove the truth of the matter stated unless it falls under some other exemption or exception from the hearsay ban. (We have deliberately chosen a hypothetical that raises questions about the possible overlap between parts (d)(1)(A) and (d)(1)(C).)

Many commentators have urged that as long as a witness is present at trial for cross-examination, there are adequate guarantees of trustworthiness, and that any statement, whether or not it has previously been tested by cross-examination or subjected to the oath requirement, should be admissible.

The Advisory Committee sided with these commentators, recommending that as long as a witness is available and testifying subject to cross-examination, all prior inconsistent statements could be adequately tested and should be admitted. The House originally wanted to restrict prior inconsistent statements introduced for their truth to statements made previously under oath and subject to cross-examination. The Senate initially favored the Advisory Committee's approach. Rule 801(d)(1)(A) emerges as a compromise. Prior cross-examination is not required (distinguishing this exception from the prior testimony exception of Rule 804(b)(1)) but the prior statement must have been given under oath at a formal proceeding.

Because Rule 801(d)(1)(A) limits the admissibility of prior inconsistent statements for substantive purposes to only those statements made under oath at a proceeding, inconsistent statements not meeting the requirements of the Rule may be used only for impeachment purposes. n25 There is a legitimate concern that clever lawyers may attempt to call witnesses solely to "impeach" them with inconsistent statements in the hope that the jury will consider the inconsistent statements as substantive evidence. The Courts have generally not permitted this to happen, however. The Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 607, § 607.02[2], discusses this problem in detail.

Where a prior inconsistent statement does not qualify for substantive use under Rule 801(d)(1)(A), the nonoffering party is entitled to a limiting instruction that the statement is to be used only for impeachment purposes. n26

[b] Prior Inconsistent Statements That Are Not Hearsay -- Hearing or Other Proceeding

One of the more extreme cases decided under Rule 801(d)(1)(A) is United States v. Castro-Ayon, 537 F.2d 1055 (9th Cir. 1976) , holding that a statement obtained by a Border Patrol agent who administered an oath to the declarant is admissible for its truth if the declarant is present at trial for cross-examination. We believe that the Court read the words "other proceeding" too broadly. In our view, "other proceedings" should be routine and formal proceedings conducted by a legal officer or under her supervision, and of a type that would lead a declarant to believe that the duty to tell the truth was the same, or nearly the same, as at a trial. Most Courts have held, contrary to Castro-Ayon, that investigative questioning by law enforcement officers, does not constitute an "other proceeding" within the meaning of the Rule, even if a statement is made to the officer under oath. n27

[c] Prior Inconsistent Statements That Are Not Hearsay -- Subject to Cross-Examination

The Supreme Court has given a broad interpretation to the term "subject to cross-examination concerning the statement." In United States v. Owens, 484 U.S. 554 (1988) , the Court said that a statement of prior identification was admissible from a witness who said he remembered making the statement, but had no memory of the event in question or of any circumstances surrounding the making of the statement. The Court held that the Rule's requirement of being subject to cross-examination is ordinarily satisfied when the witness is placed on the stand, under oath, and responds willingly to questions. Thus, the witness is subject to cross-examination within the meaning of the rule, even if his only answers are "I can't remember." In reference to prior inconsistent statements, Justice Scalia declared: "It would seem strange ... to assert that a witness can avoid introduction of testimony from a prior proceeding that is inconsistent with his trial testimony, see Rule 801(d)(1)(A), by simply asserting lack of memory of the facts to which the prior testimony related."

The situation is different if the witness who made the prior statement refuses to testify. A witness who refuses to testify cannot be found "subject to cross-examination" within the meaning of Rule 801(d)(1). Thus, in United States v. Torrez-Ortega, 184 F.3d 1128 (10th Cir. 1999) , the Court found reversible error when a prosecution witness refused to testify and the government introduced his prior grand jury statement under Rule 801(d)(1)(A). The Court distinguished Owens as a case in which the witness who made the prior statement answered all questions on cross-examination; obtaining a concession of lack of memory might well be effective cross-examination, whereas no cross-examination is possible if the witness simply refuses to answer all questions.

[d] Prior Inconsistent Statements That Are Not Hearsay -- Inconsistency and Lack of Memory

In Owens, the witness who made the prior statement identifying Owens as the perpetrator lacked all memory of the underlying event. The Court held that the witness was subject to cross-examination within the meaning of Rule 801(d)(1), but the witness' prior statement was neither offered nor admitted as a prior inconsistent statement. Rather, it was admitted as a statement of identification under Rule 801(d)(1)(C). It seems clear that the witness' prior statement in Owens could not have been admitted under Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- not because the witness wasn't subject to cross-examination, but rather because the prior statement was not inconsistent with his in-court testimony. His in-court testimony was "I don't remember." This is not necessarily inconsistent with the earlier statement "Owens hit me." On the other hand, some statements asserting lack of memory may indeed be inconsistent with a previous statement. Specifically, this would arise if the witness is simply feigning memory loss in an attempt to avoid an encounter with the truth of the prior statement. Thus, the distinction generally applied by the Courts is between: (1) feigned memory loss, which permits the use of prior inconsistent statements on the ground that the witness is in essence repudiating the prior statement by taking refuge in a lack of memory; and (2) bona fide memory loss, which precludes the use of a prior statement on the ground that it is not inconsistent with a subsequent loss of memory. n28 Thus, in a case like Owens, where the witness' memory loss was clearly bona fide (he had been hit over the head with a lead pipe), a prior statement of the witness would not be admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(A). However, if the previous statement was a prior identification, as was the case in Owens, it would be admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(C), because that Rule contains no requirement that the prior statement be inconsistent with the subsequent testimony; and even the forgetful witness would be "subject to cross-examination" within the meaning of the Rule, for reasons already discussed.

[4] Prior Consistent Statements That Are Not Hearsay

[a] Development of Rule

Subdivision (d)(1)(B) of Rule 801 covers the substantive use of prior consistent statements. Such statements are admissible at common law only for credibility purposes, and only when probative to rebut an express or implied charge of recent fabrication on the part of a witness. It is interesting to note that under the House version of the Rule, a prior consistent statement could be introduced for its truth whether or not it was given under oath, although in common-law jurisdictions, prior consistent statements and prior inconsistent statements receive similar treatment in that both are excluded when offered for their truth. The Senate version tracked the common law.

Why did the House want to differentiate? The answer lies in practical aspects of testimony. Once a witness testifies and an attack is made on the witness' credibility, if the cross-examiner manages to impeach the witness or to break down the witness' story, it is likely that any prior consistent statement will fall with it. If the trial testimony is rejected as unbelievable by the trier of fact, an identical out-of-court statement also will be rejected.

Contrast this with the situation when a prior inconsistent statement is introduced. The party offering the prior statement hopes that the trial testimony will be disbelieved and that the inconsistent statement will be accepted as true. Here, it is only when trial testimony fails that the inconsistent statement will be used as substantive evidence. Because the party offering an inconsistent statement as substantive evidence wants the trier of fact to accept it as true, and in preference to trial testimony, arguably greater circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness should be required than in the case of consistent statements.

The Conference compromise rejects common-law uniformity, which would have been provided by the Senate version, and apparently accepts the arguments for differentiation. Thus, prior consistent statements are, in one respect, more readily admissible than inconsistent statements. Consistent statements need not have been made under oath or in a proceeding. On the other hand, the distinction between substantive use and impeachment use is much less significant for prior consistent statements than it is for prior inconsistent statements. With prior consistent statements, the substance of the statement is already before the factfinder by way of the witness' in-court testimony. Consequently, an error in either admitting or excluding a statement for its truth under Rule 801(d)(1)(B) is more likely, though not certain, to be harmless. n29

[b] Prior Consistent Statements That Are Not Hearsay -- Limitation on Use

Rule 801(d)(1)(B) limits substantive admissibility of consistent statements to cases in which some suggestion is made that the witness has fabricated testimony or has been the subject of undue influence. The reason for this restriction is that consistent statements are easily manufactured prior to trial and thus are often not very reliable or probative of truthfulness. A witness could lie or distort facts on several occasions as easily as on one. However, once the suggestion is made that the witness has a motive to fabricate trial testimony or that the witness has been unduly influenced, consistent statements made prior to the time when there was a motive for the witness to lie or the influence was likely are especially probative and are admissible under Rule 801. n30

Prior consistent statements might also be useful for purposes other than to rebut a charge of fabrication or bad motive. For example, if the witness is charged with a bad memory, a statement by the witness made near to the event and consistent with the in-court testimony tends to rebut the charge. Rule 801(d)(1)(B), however, provides for substantive admissibility only when the prior consistent statement rebuts a charge of fabrication or bad motive. If the prior consistent statement is used for any other rehabilitative purpose, it may be admitted only as proof of the witness' credibility, and not as substantive evidence. n31 Persuasive arguments have been made that Rule 801(d)(1)(B) should be amended to provide that a prior consistent statement is admissible for its truth whenever it is admissible to rehabilitate the credibility of the witness. n32 This would certainly make the Rule more straightforward and simpler to apply in practice. But that is not the current rule.

[c] Prior Consistent Statements That Are Not Hearsay -- Timing and Use for Rehabilitation, Not for Truth

At one time there was dispute among the Courts about whether a statement can be admissible for its truth under Rule 801(d)(1)(B) when the witness is attacked for having a motive to falsify and the prior consistent statement was made after the motive to falsify arose. The Supreme Court resolved this dispute in Tome v. United States, 513 U.S. 150 (1995) . The defendant in Tome was tried for sexual abuse of his young daughter. At trial the daughter implicated the defendant, basically by answering yes or no to a series of leading questions. On cross-examination defense counsel asked 348 questions, many of which were background questions, some of which concerned her allegations of abuse, and some of which were designed to show that the daughter preferred living with her mother to living with her father. The daughter refused to answer many of the questions. The prosecution then called six witnesses, each of whom testified that the daughter had made statements to them accusing the defendant of sexual abuse. The Tenth Circuit held that all of these statements were properly admitted for their truth under Rule 801(d)(1)(B). n33

It should be noted that the Court of Appeals in Tome had rejected the defendant's argument that there was no charge of recent fabrication or improper motive that would trigger the necessity of introducing prior consistent statements. The Court stated that "the defense's questions on cross-examination clearly implied that A.T. had fabricated the allegations of abuse out of a desire to live with her mother." By getting her to express her opinion about where she would rather live, defense counsel "attacked more than her general credibility or memory." The Court of Appeals was clearly correct in its assertion that a charge of fabrication or improper motive can be made implicitly as well as explicitly. Of course, not every attack on credibility opens the door for rehabilitation with prior consistent statements; for example, if the witness is attacked for having an untruthful character, or as simply lying, he cannot be rehabilitated with prior consistent statements because such statements do not respond to the attack that the witness is generally a liar or is lying on the stand. n34 But if there is an implicit attack on the witness' motivation, the party who sponsors the witness should be permitted a response. n35 The Supreme Court did not grant certiorari as to this aspect of the decision in Tome.

The Tenth Circuit had also rejected Tome's argument that the girl's consistent statements should not have been admitted because they were made at a time when she had the desire to live with her mother, i.e., they were made subject to the same motive to falsify as existed at the time the witness testified. The Court was of the opinion that Rule 801(d)(1)(B) does not require that a statement predate the charged motive to fabricate before it can be admitted as a prior consistent staement. It reasoned that a "pre-motive" limitation on the Rule would be too broad because "it is simply not true that an individual with a motive to lie will always do so." The Court of Appeals opted for a case-by-case approach that would consider whether, "in light of the potentially powerful motive to fabricate, the prior consistent statement has significant probative force bearing on credibility apart from mere repetition." Here the Court found that the charged motive was "not particularly strong" and that the child's prior statements were "spontaneous" and not coached. Hence they were, in the Court's view, properly admitted for their truth under Rule 801(d)(1)(B).

It is this ruling in Tome on which the Supreme Court granted review. In an opinion by Justice Kennedy for five Justices, the Court held that a prior consistent statement is not admissible for its truth under Rule 801(d)(1)(B) unless the statement was made before the charged fabrication or improper influence or motive arose. Because of this temporal limitation, the daughter's consistent statements in Tome could not be admitted as proof that the defendant abused her.

Justice Kennedy relied heavily on the common-law rule, under which prior consistent statements were not admissible to rebut a charge of recent fabrication or improper motive unless they were made before the fabrication or motive to falsify arose. According to Justice Kennedy, the drafters of the Federal Rules intended to preserve the common-law "pre-motive" timing requirement. He based this conclusion on several factors: (1) the "somewhat peculiar language" of Rule 801(d)(1)(B) tracked the language concerning prior consistent statements in common-law cases, thus implying an intent to carry over the common-law timing rule; (2) the Notes by the Advisory Committee "disclose a purpose to adhere to the common law in the application of evidentiary principles, absent express provisions to the contrary" and there is no indication in the Notes of an intent to abrogate the common-law pre-motive requirement with respect to prior consistent statements; (3) the common-law Courts uniformly adhered to the pre-motive requirement, and "with this state of unanimity confronting the drafters of the Federal Rules of Evidence, we think it unlikely that they intended to scuttle entirely [the common-law requirement]"; (4) imposing a pre-motive requirement on prior consistent statements was consistent with the Advisory Committee's generally cautious approach to prior consistent statements, or, as the Court put it, the Committee's "stated unwillingness to countenance the general use of prior prepared statements as substantive evidence."

It is odd that the Tome Court relied so heavily on the common law in finding a pre-motive requirement in Rule 801(d)(1)(B). The common-law rule concerned admissibility of prior consistent statements solely to rehabilitate the credibility of a witness. The common law did not provide that such statements could be admitted for their truth. So it is clear that the Advisory Committee did intend to change the common-law rule, in a rather fundamental way. This certainly diminishes the strength of the majority's argument that the Advisory Committee was wedded to the common-law pre-motive requirement.

While the Court's reliance on the common law provides a weak basis for its decision, this does not mean that the Court was wrong to impose a pre-motive requirement for prior consistent statements offered as substantive evidence. Justice Kennedy was clearly correct in his assertion that a pre-motive requirement was implicit in Rule 801(d)(1)(B). Such a construction is required in order to make sense out of the categories of prior consistent statements that could qualify for substantive admissibility under the Rule. The Rule states that only those prior consistent statements that are offered to rebut a charge of fabrication, motive, or influence can be used substantively -- i.e., for the truth of the statement as opposed to use for rehabilitation of a witness' credibility. But many prior consistent statements could be offered for other kinds of rebuttal. If the drafters of the Federal Rules did not intend to impose a pre-motive requirement, then there would have been no need to carve out those statements offered to rebut a charge of fabrication, motive, or influence for special substantive treatment. It is only the pre-motive requirement that distinguishes prior consistent statements offered to rebut a charge of fabrication, motive, or influence from all other consistent statements. As Justice Scalia put it in his concurring opinion: "Only the premotive-statement limitation makes it rational to admit a prior corroborating statement to rebut a charge of recent fabrication or improper motive, but not to rebut a charge that the witness' memory is playing tricks."

The strongest support for the Tome Court's adoption of the pre-motive requirement is a policy argument: it is best when considering prior consistent statements to have a bright-line rule that tends to limit their admissibility. If Trial Judges are allowed to admit prior consistent statements whenever they are merely relevant to rebut an express or implied charge of fabrication, improper motive, or influence, then the opponent of the evidence -- often a criminal defendant as in Tome -- will be subject to all manner of bolstering statements of adverse witnesses. The case will often be decided on the basis of the witness' hearsay rather than on the witness' in-court testimony. As Justice Kennedy put it: "[T]he whole emphasis of the trial could shift to the out-of-court statements, not the in-court ones."

Tome itself was a case in point. In response to what the Lower Courts found to be a "weak" charge of improper motive -- that the child fabricated her testimony so that she could remain with her mother because she preferred where her mother lived -- the Government was permitted to present a parade of sympathetic and credible witnesses who did no more than recount the girl's detailed out-of-court statements to them. Because these statements were made at a time when the witness had the same motive to fabricate that she allegedly had at trial, they were not very relevant to rebut the charge of fabrication -- assuming they were relevant at all. Notably, at closing argument before the jury, the Government placed great reliance on the prior statements for substantive purposes but did not once seek to use them to rebut the impact of the alleged motive. The "rehabilitation" was really a smokescreen for bringing hearsay in front of the jury. And the hearsay involved direct and detailed accusations by the victim accusing the defendant of sexual abuse.

The risk of an unbridled use of Rule 801(d)(1)(B) is therefore that the Trial Court may play fast and loose with principles of relevance, shifting the trial from a focus on in-court witnesses to out-of-court statements. This danger is reflected in Justice Breyer's dissenting opinion, in which he argued for a flexible, relevance-based approach to the admissibility of prior consistent statements, rather than a rigid pre-motive requirement. And yet, when assessing whether the statements offered against Tome at trial were even relevant to rebut the weak charge of fabrication, Justice Breyer punted. He found "no reason to reevaluate this factbound conclusion" of the Trial Court. The majority, aware of the fact that prior consistent statements that post-date a motive are almost always irrelevant as rebuttal evidence at any rate, and unwilling to leave the question of relevance to possible Trial Court abuse, chose the proper result -- a bright-line, pre-motive requirement for admissibility.

It is important to remember that the Court in Tome did not hold that the pre-motive requirement must always be satisfied before prior consistent statements may even be heard by the factfinder. Prior consistent statements can be introduced for credibility purposes, to rehabilitate a witness, whenever they are responsive to an attack on credibility. One such situation is where the consistent statement is offered to explain or to clarify an inconsistent statement introduced by the adversary. n36 If the witness claims, for example, that the apparently inconsistent statement was taken out of context, he can explain the context, and this explanation may include the introduction of statements consistent with his testimony. Rule 801 is not needed to justify such an explanation. The evidence is relevant under Rule 401 and admissible under Rule 402 to rehabilitate the witness' credibility. n37 As the Court stated in United States v. Harris, 761 F.2d 394 (7th Cir. 1985) , the general principle set forth in Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- i.e., "the motive to fabricate must not have existed at the time the statements were made or they are inadmissible" -- "need not be met to admit into evidence prior consistent statements which are offered solely to rehabilitate a witness rather than as evidence of the matters asserted in those statements."

However, to be admitted substantively, in the absence of some other hearsay exception, a prior consistent statement must be relevant to rebut a charge of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive and must have been made before the motive to fabricate arose. n38 Where a consistent statement is admissible for other rehabilitation purposes such as to explain an inconsistency, and yet is not admissible as substantive evidence under Rule 801(d)(1)(B), the adversary is entitled to a limiting instruction as to the appropriate use of the evidence. n39

Perhaps the distinction just made -- between consistent statements offered solely for rehabilitation and those offered under the Rule as substantive evidence to rebut a charge of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive -- is an insubstantial one. Since consistent statements are identical to trial testimony, an instruction that some of them should not be considered for their truth is, as stated above, unlikely to be understood by a jury. A line between substantive and rehabilitative use of these statements may well be of little use. Yet this is the line drawn by the Rule, which carves out only certain prior consistent statements for substantive use: those that rebut a charge of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive. And most importantly, the Tome pre-motive requirement assures that many prior consistent statements -- those made to rebut a charge of fabrication or motive and yet which post-date the motive -- will not be admissible at all, either substantively or for impeachment purposes. This will help to ensure that the jury decides the case on the basis of testimony at the trial rather than on prior statements of witnesses. n40

[5] Identifications

As proposed by the Advisory Committee and approved by the House, Rule 801(d)(1)(C) established that an identification of a person made after perceiving him n41 is not hearsay if the person making the identification is produced at the trial or hearing and is subject to cross-examination. While such identifications are certainly hearsay, there was a belief that they are more reliable than in-court identifications. The Senate objected to the proposed Rule, and it was deleted. But in 1975, an amendment restored the provision. Interestingly, the Senate concluded upon further reflection that its initial concern that prior identifications are too weak to support a conviction "appears misdirected," because the language does not cover the "weight" to be given the evidence and "all hearsay exceptions" (technically this is an exemption rather than an exception) allow into evidence statements that may not have been made under oath (except prior inconsistent statements and former testimony). Moreover, the identifying witness must be available for cross-examination. Finally, the Senate noted that the earlier in time the identification takes place, the more likely it is that memory problems will be avoided.

Although we support the amendment, we believe that the prospect that prior identifications will be admissible as substantive evidence should lead the Supreme Court to reconsider Kirby v. Illinois, 406 U.S. 682 (1972) , United States v. Ash, 413 U.S. 300 (1973) , and Manson v. Brathwaite, 432 U.S. 98 (1977) , and to require greater care in the conduct of identification procedures. Unfortunately, there is no evidence of a judicial inclination toward requiring better procedures. n42 In fact, in United States v. Owens, discussed in § 801.02[3][c], the Court referred with apparent approval to the Advisory Committee's belief that use of out-of-court identifications was to be fostered rather than discouraged, and held that a witness who had no memory of his identification was nonetheless subject to cross-examination about it within the meaning of the Rule.

In our discussion of Rule 801(d)(1)(A), § 801.02[3][a], we offered a hypothetical bank robbery case. It is helpful to return to it again here. If an eyewitness, who told the police after the robbery that "Frank Smith robbed me," testifies at trial that "Frank Smith was not present at the time of the robbery," is the prior statement admissible under (C) if it is not made under oath in a proceeding, as required under (A)? Certainly, if the witness picked out Frank Smith's picture as that of the robber and later denied at trial, under oath, that Smith was the culprit, the identification would fit under the Rule, because the witness would be available and subject to cross-examination. n43 However, if the prior statement was not made in the course of an actual photographic or corporeal identification (for example, if the witness simply goes to the police and says, "Jim did it"), we think that the Rule should not be read to admit the statement. An application of the Rule that would cover any statement in which any declarant identified a person as a perpetrator would be overbroad. It would undermine the requirement of Rule 801(d)(1)(A) that prior inconsistent statements must be under oath. It would also undermine the requirement of Rule 801(d)(1)(B) that prior consistent statements are admissible for their truth only when they rebut a charge of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive.

As implied in the above paragraph, a prior identification need not have been made under oath, it need not have been made in a proceeding, and it is not limited to rehabilitating a witness who is attacked for recent fabrication or improper influence or motive. This is why the Rule must be limited to statements made during the course of an actual identification procedure. If not, the limitations in the other provisions of Rule 801(d)(1) can be too easily disregarded.

An identification can be proved under Rule 801(d)(1)(C) by a witness other than the declarant, so long as the declarant (i.e., the person who made the pretrial identification) is subject to cross-examination at the trial or hearing. It follows that the pretrial identification is not inadmissible simply because the declarant is unable to identify the defendant in Court; the declarant is still subject to cross-examination. n44 Nor would it matter if the declarant repudiates his identification on the stand; such a witness is still subject to cross-examination within the meaning of the Rule after Owens. n45 However, the person who made the identification must be subject to cross-examination; if that witness is unavailable, the Rule is inapplicable. n46

[6] Admissions

[a] Relationship to Common-Law Rule

Subsection (d)(2) of Rule 801 is composed of the family of statements generally comprising the admissions exception to the hearsay rule. As indicated above, because an exception is applicable to these statements, they are admitted for their truth in common-law jurisdictions. The Federal Rule provides for exemptions rather than exceptions. As discussed above, the fact that the Federal Rules choose the redefinition approach, rather than the approach of creating exceptions, is of no great moment.

The admissions exception to the hearsay rule is one that does not fit neatly within any of the justifications for other exceptions (e.g., reliability, cross-examination of the declarant). It is, rather, a function of the adversary system; the best justification is that a party can hardly complain that statements he may have made, sometimes through others, were not under oath and subject to cross-examination. The risk of hearsay is that the adversary may be hiding an untrustworthy declarant, whose statement would be impervious to cross-examination; thus, the protection of the hearsay rule is needed to assure that the adversary system is fair. n47 But there is no risk of adversarial unfairness when the possibly untrustworthy declarant is the very party against whom the statement is offered. As such, no showing of trustworthiness is required for a hearsay statement to be admissible as an admission. n48

[b] Admissions -- Multiple Parties

Rule 801(d)(2) admits statements offered "against a party." This term presents no problems in a two-party case, but there is a problem of interpretation when there are multiple parties on one side of the litigation. For example in United States v. Harwood, 998 F.2d 91 (2d Cir. 1993) , Harwood and McKee were arrested in a van in which LSD was found, and both were charged with possession with intent to distribute. Harwood's defense was that he was simply a passenger with no knowledge that LSD was in the van. He wanted to introduce McKee's out-of-court statement that Harwood had simply been "in the wrong place at the wrong time," and "the same would have happened to any person driving a vehicle in which he [McKee] was a passenger." Harwood argued that the statement was admissible as a party-admission by McKee. But the Court held that the exemption requires that the statement must be offered "against the party" who made it. As the Rule puts it in its caption, the statement must be made by or attributable to a "party-opponent." Consequently, McKee's statement could not be used by Harwood, because McKee was not a "party-opponent" of Harwood. Rather, they were codefendants; the government was the party-opponent of both of them. n49

We think that the Harwood Court's construction of the admissions exemption is questionable. It smacks of technicality. Harwood and McKee were codefendants, but they were not presenting a united defense against the government. Rather, each accused the other of placing the LSD in a hidden part of the van. In a very real sense, the defendants were party-opponents, even though they were placed on the same side of the "v." in the styling of the case. Under the circumstances, Harwood's acquittal was dependent on "convicting" McKee. As the government could have used McKee's statements to help convict him, there is no reason why Harwood should have been prohibited from doing so.

Nor is the use of admissions among codefendants outside the plain meaning of Rule 801(d)(2). The Rule requires that the admission be "offered against a party." Again, Harwood was offering McKee's statement "against" McKee as a functional matter.

We also note that the Harwood reading of the Rule ends up treating civil and criminal defendants unequally. Civil defendants can become party-opponents by cross-claiming, thereby permitting the use of party admissions against each other. Criminal defendants, however, cannot file cross-claims, and are therefore totally dependent on the government's decision whether to admit the statement of one of the codefendants.

[c] Admissions -- Personal Admissions

Rule 801(d)(2)(A) is the exception for a statement made by a party in an individual or representative capacity. This is the simplest example of an admission. All that is required to satisfy Rule 801(d)(2)(A) is that the statement was made by the party and that it is offered at trial by a party-opponent.

As discussed more fully in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 602, § 602.02[3], a party-admission is admissible even if the party made the statement in the absence of personal knowledge. n50

It is important to note that a party-admission need not have been made with a disserving motivation. Indeed, the party may have thought at the time that the statement was beneficial to his interests, e.g., an exculpatory story that later turns out to have been false. The touchstone of admissibility is that the statement is beneficial to, and offered by, the party-opponent at the time of trial. n51 It follows that a party can never admit a statement in her favor under this Rule; the statement must be offered by a party-opponent. n52 As the Court noted in United States v. McDaniel, 398 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 2005) , Rule 801(d)(2) "does not extend to a party's attempt to introduce his or her own statements through the testimony of other witnesses" because if it did, "parties could effectuate an end-run around the adversarial process by, in effect, testifying without swearing an oath, facing cross-examination, or being subjected to first-hand scrutiny by the jury."

[d] Admissions -- Adoptive Admissions

Rule 801(d)(2)(B) codifies what the common law calls an adoptive admission. An adoptive admission occurs when a party expressly or implicitly adopts or acquiesces in the statement of another; this can be by way of implication, by conduct, or even by silence. n53

The fact that a statement is made in the presence of a party is not by itself enough to warrant admitting the statement into evidence. There must be some circumstances indicating acquiescence. n54 But this does not mean that an adoptive admission can never be found through the party's silence. If, under the circumstances, a reasonable person would have denied the statement, silence can be deemed an adoption. n55

An interesting case showing the boundaries of "adoption" is United States v. Hove, 52 F.3d 233 (9th Cir. 1995) . Hove was a lawyer charged with currency structuring. The government sought to admit two instances of allegedly adoptive admissions. In the first, an officer who was investigating one of Hove's clients asked Hove to explain the circumstances of two suspicious bank deposits; Hove said he would have to investigate and get back to the officer. The Court held that this response could not be considered an adoptive admission because the officer's questioning "did not constitute an accusation that Hove himself had committed the crime of structuring." Moreover, it could be said that even if the officer had accused Hove directly, Hove's response ("I'll have to check it out and get back to you") was far from an adoption of any accusation.

In the second instance, an officer invited Hove to tell his side of the story to the grand jury, and Hove declined. The Court held that "declining an invitation to testify in front of the grand jury simply does not constitute an admission by silence." The Court was properly concerned that an overbroad application of the adoptive admissions doctrine would impinge on the defendant's constitutional right to remain silent.

Of course, an adoptive admission is dependent upon a showing that the party heard the statement and understood it. This is a question of conditional relevance governed by Rule 104(b). Thus, "before admitting a statement as an adoptive admission, the trial court must determine whether a jury could find that the defendant comprehended and acquiesced in the statement." n56 In contrast, the party's adoption of a statement once heard is an admissibility requirement and accordingly is governed by the preponderance standard of Rule 104(a); the Trial Judge must find it more likely than not that the party manifested an adoption or belief in the truth of the statement. n57

[e] Admissions -- Authorized Admissions

Rule 801(d)(2)(C) covers statements by any person authorized by a party to make statements concerning some subject matter. One issue that the Advisory Committee faced in drafting this particular subsection was whether a person who is authorized to make statements only to the principal should be able to "bind" the principal if the statements are revealed to outsiders. The Rule takes the position that once someone is entrusted with a duty or responsibility to make statements, it does not matter whether or not the principal is to be the sole recipient of the statements. Thus, under this Rule, a party's books or records are usable against him, even though they are prepared by another person and they were prepared by this person with an intent only to disclose them to the principal.

Rule 801(d)(2)(C) obviously has a significant overlap with Rule 801(d)(2)(D), though the former provision clearly covers fewer statements by agents than the latter. Where an agent is authorized to speak on behalf of the principal, and the statement is about a matter within the scope of the agent's employment, a Court will often invoke both subdivisions to justify the admissibility of the statement. n58

[f] Admissions -- Agents' Admissions

[i] Expansion of Common-Law Rule

In most common-law jurisdictions, a statement by an agent or servant can only be used against the principal if the agent or servant is employed for the purpose of making such statements. Under the Federal Rules, those statements are admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(C), discussed in the preceding section. Federal Rule 801(d)(2)(D) goes much further than the common law by providing that an agent's statement is admissible against the principal if it concerns a matter within the agent's scope of authority. A classic case is where a driver of a truck owned by his employer runs a red light and causes an accident; the driver apologizes to the other party involved in the accident and comments that he is sorry that he ran the red light. Clearly, this is a personal admission if the driver is sued, as our discussion of Rule 801(d)(2)(A) above indicates. In most common-law jurisdictions, such a statement cannot be used against the employer-owner of the vehicle unless that person authorized the driver to make such statements; simply authorizing the driver to drive the truck is not enough. Rule 801(d)(2)(D) permits the statement to be used against the employer-owner as well as against the driver, because if the speaker is authorized to drive the truck, then his admission about his driving covers a matter within the scope of his authority. n59 If the statement concerns a matter outside the agent's scope of authority, then it is not admissible under this exemption. n60

[ii] Admissions -- Agents' Admissions -- Personal Knowledge

Can an agent's statement be admissible against the principal if the agent had no personal knowledge to support the statement? The concern over such statements is that the principal will be bound by statements of dubious reliability -- e.g., employee gossip. But the Courts have mostly held that such a concern is misconceived when it comes to admissions, because admissions are not based on reliability; rather, they are based on adversarial principles. The Courts, with some exceptions, reason that a party is not entitled to protection against the adversary's use of a possibly unreliable or uninformed statement of the party or the party's agent. n61 Some protection is provided, however, by the requirement that the matter spoken of must be within the agent's scope of employment. Rule 801(d)(2)(D) does not cover every statement made by gossips at the water cooler.

[iii] Admissions -- Agents' Admissions -- Coemployee Statements

One question that has presented some difficulty is whether a statement by one employee can ever be admissible against another employee under Rule 801(d)(2)(D). The Courts have held that such a statement can qualify as an agent's admission under Rule 801(d)(2)(D), but admissibility depends on whether there is a de facto agency relationship between the declarant and the party-employee. For example, in Zaken v. Boerer, 964 F.2d 1319 (2d Cir. 1992) , the plaintiff brought an action against the CEO of the company who fired her, alleging that she was fired for pregnancy. At trial, she offered the hearsay statement of the company's vice president of sales to the effect that the plaintiff's predecessor had also been fired for pregnancy. The Court held that this statement was admissible against the CEO in his individual capacity. The declarant was answerable to the defendant within the corporate structure; the defendant was the company's principal owner, who directed its day-to-day operations and made all final decisions. The Court concluded: "When the factors proving an agency relationship are present, the testimony should not be excluded simply because it is offered against a corporate employee rather than the corporation itself." n62 The Court also held that the statement was within the scope of the Vice President's employment, because he had some responsibility for hiring and firing decisions.

Obviously, there can be harder cases than Boerer, such as where an employee in one division makes a statement sought to be used against the head of another division, or where the employees share the same job description but the declarant reports daily to the party, or vice-versa, or where the party's control over an entity is subject to dispute. n63 In resolving these difficult questions of agency, most Courts require that the party-opponent must "control the daily tasks of the declarant" in order for Rule 801(d)(2)(D) to apply, though some more permissive Courts find more generalized control by the principal to be sufficient. n64

[iv] Admissions -- Agents' Admissions -- Proof of Agency

In order for a statement to be admissible as an agency admission, the proponent must establish that the declarant was the agent of the party-opponent at the time the statement was made. n65 The proponent must also establish the scope of the agency. n66 Often this is not difficult because existence and scope of agency are obvious. But in some cases the proponent must resort to circumstantial evidence to prove the existence and scope of the agency. An interesting example of this proposition is Pappas v. Middle Earth Condominium Ass'n, 963 F.2d 534 (2d Cir. 1992) . The plaintiff brought a personal injury suit for injuries he suffered when he slipped and fell on an icy walkway leading to his condominium. After he fell, his friend phoned the defendant, the condominium's management company, to complain about the icy condition of the walkway. Shortly thereafter, a man appeared with a shovel and a bucket to clear away the ice. He made statements indicating that the management company had a poor record of maintenance of the sidewalk. The Trial Court refused to admit these statements on the ground that the plaintiff did not adequately show that the declarant was an agent speaking about a matter over which he had been granted authority by the defendant.

The Court of Appeals reversed. It held that to provide a sufficient foundation for vicarious admissions, a party need only establish:

> (1) the existence of the agency relationship, (2) that the statement was made during the course of the relationship, and (3) that it relates to a matter within the scope of the agency. The authority granted in the agency relationship need not include authority to make damaging statements, but simply the authority to take action about which the statements relate.

The Court accepted the generally held notion that the proffered hearsay statement does not itself suffice to establish the agency relationship -- a notion that was subsequently codified by the 1997 amendment to Rule 801(d)(2). That is, it would not have been enough for the man with the shovel to simply say, "the condominium management sent me to clean up the ice." But the plaintiff did not rely only on the declarant's own statement of his agency. Here, circumstantial evidence existed to demonstrate that the declarant was an agent and that the agency relationship extended to maintaining the walkway. The declarant responded immediately after the plaintiff's complaint to the employer, and came prepared with materials to repair the icy conditions; his statements were indicative of an employment relationship with the defendant. It was unlikely under the circumstances that he was a passing bystander, or that he was an employee acting beyond the scope of the employment relationship. Considering the circumstantial evidence together with the declarant's own statements, the Court held that the plaintiff had established the existence and scope of the agency. n67

[v] Admissions -- Agents' Admissions -- Statements by Translators

When a party-opponent does not speak English, questions arise as to whether an out-of-court statement by the party related by a translator can be admitted as an agency admission. For example, in United States v. Da Silva, 725 F.2d 828 (2d Cir. 1983) , the defendant gave a false exculpatory statement to a DEA agent when a search of his luggage at Customs uncovered cocaine. At trial the government, through the testimony of the DEA agent, sought to introduce the false exculpatory statement as proof of Da Silva's consciousness of guilt. But an evidentiary problem was created because Da Silva could not speak English and the DEA agent could not speak Spanish. The DEA agent had sought to bridge the communication gap by enlisting the services of a bilingual Customs Inspectional Aide. When the Aide entered the room, Da Silva, speaking in Spanish, asked the Aide whether he spoke Spanish. The Aide responded affirmatively, and Da Silva said "Thank God," in Spanish. Then Da Silva proceeded to give his false exculpatory story, which the Aide translated to the DEA agent.

The Court held that the statements of the translator were admissible as statements of an agent under either Rule 801(d)(2)(C) or Rule 801(d)(2)(D). The Court concluded that Da Silva authorized the Aide to act as his translator, in light of his clear relief at having the Aide available, and by his "conscious reliance" on the Aide's translation. Under these circumstances, the Court was not troubled by the fact that the Aide was an employee of the government. In his role as translator, the Aide could legitimately serve as an agent of both Da Silva and the government. n68

The Court in Da Silva cautioned, however, that an inference of agency cannot be drawn if the translator has a motive to falsify, or if the translator is demonstrably incompetent. So for example, if two people are arrested at Customs, and one translates for the other to the effect that the translator had nothing to do with the smuggling and that it was all the other person's fault, the Court should refuse to admit the statement as an agent's admission. n69

[vi] Admissions -- Agents' Admissions -- Statements by Attorneys as Agent's Admissions

A statement of an attorney is, subject to certain conditions, admissible against the client under Federal Rule 801(d)(2)(C) or (D). The leading case on this subject is United States v. McKeon, 738 F.2d 26 (2d Cir. 1984) , where the defendant was charged with conspiracy to export firearms. A crucial piece of evidence against him was a copy of a document that the government argued was made from a copier in McKeon's wife's office. In his opening argument, defense counsel stated that a defense expert would show that the copy was not, in fact, made on the copier in Mrs. McKeon's office. The case was subsequently terminated by mistrial. Before the retrial, defense counsel was informed that the prosecution would call an expert to testify that the copy was made on the copier in Mrs. McKeon's office, and that the expert to be called was the teacher of the expert retained by the defense. Given his now-dim prospects in a battle of the experts, defense counsel at the new trial argued that McKeon had been duped into having the crucial documents copied on the copying machine at his wife's office. The government moved to introduce defense counsel's opening statement at the prior trial as an admission by an agent, to prove McKeon's consciousness of guilt.

The Court in McKeon recognized that statements by an attorney are generally admissible as agency admissions against the client. It observed, however, that caution should be exercised before admitting statement made by counsel in prior criminal cases. The Court noted five concerns, some of them in the nature of those considered under Rule 403:

(1) Free use of prior jury argument might consume substantial time to explore marginal matters, because the probative value of a change in strategy may only be evident after an in-depth consideration of such matters as whether new evidence has been found.

(2) The jury might draw unfair inferences from a prior jury argument. The defendant has the right to choose the weak spots in the government's case, and choosing a different weak spot in the second trial does not necessarily mean that the defendant admits the strength of other aspects of the prosecution's case.

(3) The free admissibility of prior jury argument may deter counsel from vigorous advocacy. Unless the truth-seeking process demands it, counsel should not have to pull her punches at one trial due to apprehension about arguments to be made at a second trial.

(4) In order to explain the inconsistency between the two arguments of counsel, the defendant may have to testify, thus risking impeachment and the waiver of the attorney-client privilege.

(5) Introduction of the attorney's statement may mean that the attorney would become one who "ought to be called as a witness" by the defendant. Where that is the case, admission of the prior jury argument will result in disqualification of the defense counsel.

For all these reasons, the McKeon Court imposed three limitations before an argument of counsel in a prior trial could be offered against a criminal defendant: n70

First, there must be a true inconsistency between the arguments. Speculations of counsel, arguments about the credibility of witnesses, and general attacks on the prosecution's case should not be admitted against the defendant at a different trial, because these arguments are too ambiguous to be inconsistent with a later factual assertion.

Second, the Court must determine that the statements of counsel "were such as to be the equivalent of testimonial statements by the defendant"; in other words, the Trial Court must find that the defendant authorized the attorney to make the statements. The mere fact of an attorney-client relationship is insufficient proof on this point, because "considerable delegation is normally involved and such delegation tends to drain the evidentiary value" from the attorney's statement. Therefore, there must be evidence of the client's participatory role, either directly or inferentially. An example of a sufficient showing is where the attorney's statement must have been derived from factual input supplied by the client.

Third, the Court should, after a hearing, determine by a preponderance of the evidence that the prosecution seeks to draw a fair inference from the inconsistency and that an innocent explanation does not exist.

On the facts, the McKeon Court found that the attorney's prior opening statement was admissible. The Court reasoned that the opening argument in the later trial was facially inconsistent with the previous one: either the copy was made on the copier at Mrs. McKeon's office or it was not. Also, there was every reason to believe, given the points argued by counsel, that McKeon participated in forming the strategy at both trials. Moreover, McKeon "did not stand mute and put the government to its proof at the last trial." Rather, he took a completely inconsistent stance. Finally, McKeon could give no innocent explanation for the inconsistency, even though the Trial Judge offered to consider such an explanation in camera to prevent disclosure of privileged communications or work product.

It therefore appears, on the basis of McKeon and like cases, n71 that statements by counsel will be admitted as agency admissions, so long as there is some evidence to indicate that the attorney was authorized to make the statements. This means that it behooves counsel to get his or her story straight at the outset. While some may argue that the free use of attorney's statements as admissions will chill counsel from vigorous advocacy, it can be argued with equal force that such free admissibility will encourage counsel "to be more careful in verifying the accuracy of information offered by the client." n72

While McKeon concerns statements made by criminal defense counsel, the principles of agency-admission are applicable to statements by other counsel as well. For example, in United States v. Salerno, 937 F.2d 797 (2d Cir. 1991) , rev'd on other grounds, 505 U.S. 317 (1992) , the government in one megatrial sought to show that Auletta was an extortion victim -- a "puppet on a string" as the government put it. In a different megatrial involving similar as well as overlapping facts, the government indicted Auletta and sought to prove at trial that he was a voluntary bid-rigger, a major player. Auletta sought to introduce the indictment from the previous megatrial that referred to him as a victim of extortion. The Court held that statements made by government counsel at the prior megatrial concerning Auletta's minimal role were admissible under Rules 801(d)(2)(C) and (D). As the Court put it, "[T]he government has taken the same evidentiary clay that they used in the [first] case and, for purposes of this trial, resculpted Auletta from a 'puppet on a string' to a bid-rigger." The Court recognized that the government was free to characterize the actors in the prior trial as it wished, but concluded that the jury "is at least entitled to know that the government at one time believed, and stated, that its proof established something different from what it currently claims." n73

Similarly, attorney-as-agent admissions are often found in civil cases where pleadings are superseded, or inconsistent positions are taken in separate litigations. n74 A typical case is Andrews v. Metro North Commuter R. Co., 882 F.2d 705 (2d Cir. 1989) , where the plaintiff's initial complaint alleged that he was struck by a train while walking along the tracks in a train yard. There was substantial evidence that the plaintiff was highly intoxicated at the time. The plaintiff's counsel filed an amended pleading that purported to explain how the plaintiff found himself walking in a train yard: He was waiting on a commuter platform and slipped and fell because of a defective condition consisting of ice and snow; unable to get back on the platform, he wandered along the track bed in a daze until he was struck by the train. The Court of Appeals held that the Trial Court had abused its discretion in refusing to allow the jury to consider the superseded complaint as an admission. The Court relied on McKeon for the proposition that "a party cannot advance one version of the facts in his pleadings, conclude that his interests would be better served by a different version, and amend his pleadings to incorporate that version, safe in the belief that the trier of fact will never learn of the change in stories." n75

[g] Conspirator Statements

[i] Relationship to Common-Law Rule

Rule 801(d)(2)(E) codifies the traditional coconspirator Rule, which admits into evidence statements of one coconspirator against another as long as those statements were made during the course of and in furtherance of the conspiracy. As stated in the Advisory Committee Note, coconspirator statements are admitted not because they are reliable, but because their admission is consistent with the substantive law of conspiracy and the adversarial nature of litigation. As such, like other admissions, a coconspirator statement can be admitted even if the declarant was speaking without personal knowledge. n76

Rule 801(d)(2)(E) need only be used when statements of one conspirator are offered for their truth against another.

> [M]any declarations of co-conspirators have been held admissible as "acts" of the conspiracy. The mere fact that such statements were uttered is the important input to the jury, and the introduction of the statement for that purpose is made sufficiently reliable by the defendant's opportunity to cross-examine the witness who testifies to having heard the statement being made.

Davenport, The Confrontation Clause and the Co-Conspirator Exception in Criminal Prosecutions: A Functional Analysis, 85 Harv. L. Rev. 1378, 1398 (1972). The statements referred to by Professor Davenport (an example being a verbal agreement to enter into a conspiracy) are independently admissible because they are not covered by the definition of hearsay in Rule 801(c). Thus, the remainder of the discussion of conspirators' statements will concern those that are admissible if at all only under Rule 801(d)(2)(E).

[ii] Conspirator Statements -- Foundation Requirements for Admission of Conspirator Statements

[A] Elements of Foundation

The coconspirator hearsay exemption has three separate foundation requirements that the proponent must meet:

(1) The declarant and the opponent must be members of the same conspiracy; it is not enough that the declarant and the opponent are both members of some conspiracy -- they must be members of the same conspiracy. n77

(2) The statement must be made by the declarant during the course of the conspiracy. That is, the conspiracy must be in operation at the time the statement was made. A statement is not made during the course of the conspiracy if the conspiracy has terminated. Generally speaking, a conspiracy is terminated when its central criminal goal has been achieved or abandoned. n78 For monetary crimes, the central criminal goal is achieved when the money is divided up among the coconspirators. n79 Courts have held that actions designed to evade detection, after money has been divided up, are not in the course of the original conspiracy. n80 Statements made to evade detection might well be part of a subsequent conspiracy, however.

(3) The statement must be made with the intent to further the conspiracy. If the statement was simply idle chatter by a conspirator, or simply serves to blame or "finger" people as conspirators, it will not be admissible under this exemption. n81 However, statements that on their face seem only to inculpate members of the conspiracy may in fact further the conspiracy by keeping other members apprised of conspiratorial developments, by providing reassurance, or by encouraging others to join, assist, or deal with the conspiracy. n82

The first foundation requirement for admission of conspirator statements -- existence of a conspiracy between the declarant and the party-opponent -- has posed difficulties regarding two questions: (1) How much evidence is required regarding the foundation facts, and (2) can the statement itself be considered by the Trial Judge in making the preliminary determination? Subsidiary questions exist as to when and how the Trial Judge is to make the necessary finding that the party-opponent (usually a criminal defendant) and the declarant were coconspirators.

[B] Conspirator Statements -- Foundation Requirements -- Preponderance of the Evidence

In Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) , the Court held that coconspirator statements may be admitted only upon a showing by a preponderance of the evidence that a conspiracy existed and that the declarant and the defendant were participants in it.

The Supreme Court's rulings in Bourjaily, that the foundation facts are to be determined by the Trial Judge, and that the prosecution must prove the foundation facts by a preponderance of the evidence, were based on Rule 104(a). Although that Rule does not explicitly provide the standard of proof to be applied by the Judge, the Bourjaily Court observed that the traditional requirement is that admissibility requirements must be established by a preponderance of proof. The Court reasoned that the preponderance standard ensures that before admitting evidence, the Trial Judge will have found it more likely than not that the technical issues and policy concerns addressed by the Rules will have been afforded due consideration. No higher standard of proof was required to protect against the risk of error, because all that was at stake was the technical policies behind the Rules of Evidence.

The preponderance standard can provide the criminal defendant with some meaningful protection because it requires the Judge to find facts. To determine admissibility, the Judge must assess the credibility of witnesses and make a finding based on a fair assessment of the evidence, rather than on an assumption that the evidence should be taken in the light most favorable to the government. See Stephen A. Saltzburg, Standards of Proof and Preliminary Questions of Fact, 27 Stan. L. Rev. 271, 302-04 (1975).

[C] Conspirator Statements -- Foundation Requirements -- Independent Evidence

In Bourjaily, the Court decided that the Trial Judge could consider the proffered statement itself in determining its admissibility. That decision was contrary to the rule previously followed in the Federal Courts that the preliminary facts must be established by evidence independent of the statement being offered. Glasser v. United States, 315 U.S. 60, 74-75 (1942) . According to the Court, the Glasser "no-bootstrapping rule" had been changed by Federal Rules 104(a) and 1101(d)(1), which provide that Trial Judges are not bound by the Rules of Evidence (except with respect to privileges) in making preliminary determinations. Thus, a hearsay objection would not be proper at a hearing in which the Judge is to determine whether a coconspirator statement is admissible under the hearsay exception. Most of the Circuits had taken the position that the Rules permitted consideration of hearsay and other inadmissible evidence other than the subject statement itself, but that Congress had given no indication it wanted to change the Glasser rule to permit consideration of the challenged statement as proof of its own admissibility requirements. The Bourjaily Court saw the matter differently: "It would be extraordinary to require legislative history to confirm the plain meaning of Rule 104."

A 1997 amendment to Rule 801(d)(2) codifies the Bourjaily rule and extends it to proof of authorization under subdivision (2)(C), and to proof of agency under subdivision (2)(D). In determining any of these preliminary questions, the Trial Court must consider the hearsay statement itself as part of the proof.

The Bourjaily decision regarding independent evidence, now codified in Rule 801(d)(2), is founded on assumptions about the reliability of conspirators' statements. The Court in Bourjaily reasoned that out-of-court statements of purported coconspirators are only presumed unreliable, with the presumption rebuttable by appropriate corroborative proof. It reasoned further that individual pieces of evidence may be insufficient by themselves to prove a point but may in cumulation prove it. Taken together, these principles indicate that a piece of evidence, unreliable in isolation, may be quite probative when corroborated by other evidence. Thus, Trial Judges must be permitted to evaluate conspirators' statements for their evidentiary worth as revealed by the particular circumstances of the case.

For example, assume that the declarant sells drugs to street dealers. One day, a street dealer comes to the declarant, who has no drugs, but states to the street dealer, "My supplier Mark is sending me a shipment today, don't worry." This statement is presumptively unreliable as proof that Mark is in a drug conspiracy with the declarant. However, other evidence of suspicious association between the parties, such as large financial transactions, trips to drug source cities together, and Mark's unexplained wealth, might point to a conspiracy between them, lending corroboration to the declarant's assertion. What initially seemed unreliable now seems consistent with the known facts.

Before Bourjaily, the admissible evidence had to rise to the level of proof by a preponderance of the evidence that the declarant and the defendant were coconspirators before the hearsay statement could be considered by the jury. This is no longer required; the independent evidence need not rise to any particular standard of proof, so long as the entire submission, including the challenged hearsay statement itself, proves conspiracy between the declarant and the defendant by a preponderance of the evidence.

Bourjaily has its greatest impact in cases where the government's independent evidence of conspiracy is too weak to stand on its own, but strong enough to be corroborative of an inculpatory statement of a professed coconspirator. The impact can truly be deemed major in those cases in which an application of a pre-Bourjaily independent evidence requirement would result in exclusion of the proffered hearsay and a consequent inability even to get the case to the jury.

In Bourjaily, the Court found it unnecessary to decide whether a Trial Judge could rely solely on the proffered statement itself to conclude that a conspiracy existed. But the analysis in Bourjaily really foreclosed that possibility. The Court declared that a coconspirator hearsay statement was presumptively unreliable, but that the presumption could be overcome by corroborative independent evidence. Following that line of reasoning, it would not seem possible that the presumption of unreliability can be overcome in the complete absence of corroborative evidence. Predictably, Lower Courts after Bourjaily held as a matter of law that the proffered hearsay statement cannot itself satisfy the preponderance standard of admissibility. n83 The 1997 amendment to the Rule has codified these quite reasonable Lower Court rulings. The amendment provides that the contents of the hearsay statement must be considered as part of the foundation, but that the hearsay statements are not alone sufficient to establish the necessary connection between the defendant and the declarant.

While Rule 801(d)(2) requires consideration of the proffered statement in determining its admissibility, it does not follow that the Judge is always required to give the hearsay substantial weight in making the determination. As hearsay, it may well be "idle chatter" or malicious gossip made under circumstances providing no assurance of trustworthiness. If that is a significant possibility, the Trial Judge's focus will have to be on the strength of the independent evidence.

Courts after Bourjaily have held that the independent evidence must be at least "fairly incriminating" on its own before that evidence together with the hearsay statement can satisfy the Bourjaily preponderance requirement. As the Ninth Circuit put it in United States v. Silverman, 861 F.2d 571, 578 (9th Cir. 1988) :

> Evidence of wholly innocuous conduct or statements by the defendant will rarely be sufficiently corroborative of the co-conspirator's statement to constitute proof, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the defendant knew of and participated in the conspiracy. Evidence of innocent conduct does little, if anything, to enhance the reliability of the co-conspirator's statement. A co-conspirator's statement, which is presumptively unreliable hence inadmissible standing alone, is no more reliable when coupled with evidence of conduct that is completely consistent with defendant's unawareness of the conspiracy.

In Silverman, the Court held that statements of the defendant's sister identifying the defendant as her drug supplier were inadmissible under the coconspirator exception. The only independent evidence of a conspiratorial connection put forth by the government was that the sister would travel to the town where the defendant lived; that the defendant would pick her up at the airport; that when the sister returned to her home, she would have drugs; and that the defendant subsequently concealed his identity from a DEA agent. The Court held that the brother-sister association was "too innocent" to connect the defendant to any conspiracy, and that the subsequent concealment of identity was not sufficiently related to the brother-sister connection to render it sufficiently probative of a conspiracy between them. The Court concluded that the independent evidence proffered by the government "was so marginally corroborative that it failed to overcome the presumptive unreliability" of the sister's hearsay statements.

We agree with the Silverman Court that the independent evidence must at least establish a reasonable suspicion of conspiracy before the jury can be permitted to consider the declarant's statement. Otherwise there is an unacceptable risk that the defendant will be convicted solely from the mouths of self-appointed coconspirators who are not produced for trial. n84 We suggest that the Courts, in evaluating the independent evidence presented, use a standard analogous to the reasonable suspicion test that is used to determine the legality of a Terry stop under the Fourth Amendment. That test, as applied to coconspirator hearsay, would be: whether the independent evidence, standing alone, presents a fair possibility that the defendant and the declarant are coconspirators. n85 The government need not overcome every possible innocent explanation of the facts presented. n86 But, on the other hand, independent evidence that is not at all suggestive of criminal association (such as the brother-sister evidence in Silverman) should not suffice. n87

We believe that if the independent evidence is reasonably suspicious, and if that evidence combined with the hearsay statement itself establishes a conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence, then the defendant will be sufficiently protected from unfair conviction out of the mouths of self-appointed coconspirators.

[D] Conspirator Statements -- Foundation Requirements -- Order of Proof

Trial Judges have several procedural options when deciding whether the prosecution has satisfied the foundation requirements of Rule 801(d)(2)(E). One option is to hold a pretrial hearing and make a ruling on admissibility following the hearing, as the Judge does with an ordinary evidence problem. Appellate Courts have expressed a preference for this procedure, but they also recognize that in many complex conspiracy cases, this would be tantamount to trying a case twice -- the prosecution would introduce evidence of conspiracy to establish the foundation requirements for the admissibility of the hearsay, and then proffer the same evidence again at trial. So Trial Judges also have the option to allow coconspirator hearsay to be admitted at trial, subject to a condition -- i.e., the government must satisfy the preponderance of the evidence standard as the case progresses. n88

If the admissibility question is deferred, there are further permutations. The Trial Judge could make the preponderance of the evidence ruling at the close of all the evidence; or the ruling could come at the close of the government's case. In fact, there is no great difference between these two approaches. At the close of the government's case, Trial Judges must decide whether the requisite facts have been proved by a preponderance of the evidence. If not, the conspirators' statements should not be admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). If the government has satisfied the preponderance standard at this point, it still must be remembered that the defendant will not yet have presented evidence. In any hearing on an ordinary evidence issue, both sides have a chance to be heard. The same is true of the Rule 801(d)(2)(E) issue. Thus, the Trial Judge will have to consider the preponderance of the evidence question again, when all the evidence is in. This would either be the time that the Judge makes the formal ruling to admit evidence, or when she reconsiders the ruling made at the close of the government's case. The difference in approach should not be important.

If the Trial Judge defers the admissibility question and subsequently finds that the government has not met its burden of establishing the Rule 801(d)(2)(E) requirements, then a mistrial should be declared unless it is clear that a limiting instruction will suffice to protect the defendant from the obvious prejudice arising from the jury's having already heard the inadmissible hearsay. n89

We suggest that if the Trial Judge is thinking about deferring the question of admissibility of coconspirator hearsay until trial, the government should be required to provide a summary of its foundation evidence. If the summary indicates that the government will have trouble providing a foundation, then the Judge should either require a hearing on the admissibility of the hearsay, or else structure the order of proof at trial so that a ruling can be made before the hearsay is admitted. By these methods, a subsequent mistrial can perhaps be avoided. n90

While the Trial Judge has discretion as to when and how to make a ruling on coconspirator hearsay, it is clear that the Judge must make a finding on admissibility at some point. The failure to make a finding is not necessarily reversible error, however. For example, if the Trial Judge fails to make an explicit ruling on the admissibility of coconspirator hearsay, and yet denies a motion for directed verdict or a motion for acquittal, this might constitute an implicit finding that the government has established the foundation requirements of the hearsay exception; at least this is so when the conspiracy that spawned the hearsay statement is the same conspiracy charged in the case. The failure to make an explicit finding on admissibility might in these circumstances be harmless error. n91

If no determination on admissibility is made even implicitly, the impact of the evidentiary error must be assessed. An efficient procedure has been set out by the Tenth Circuit in United States v. Perez, 989 F.2d 1574 (10th Cir. 1993) (en banc): The Appellate Court must assume that the challenged statements were inadmissible, and then assess whether the introduction of the statements at trial was harmless error. If the Appellate Court finds the presumptively erroneous admission to be harmless, then the conviction is affirmed. If the presumed error was not harmless, the case must be remanded for the Trial Judge to conduct the inquiry and make the findings that should have been made in the first place. If the Trial Judge on remand finds by a preponderance of the evidence that the declarant and the defendant were coconspirators and that the statements were made in the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy, then the conviction stands and the Court of Appeals retains jurisdiction to review the Trial Court's determination of the coconspiracy exemption question. If, on the other hand, the Trial Judge determines on remand that Rule 801(d)(2)(E) was not satisfied, then the conviction must be set aside, because the Appellate Court has already concluded that the error was not harmless.

Courts have uniformly held that the jury should not be informed that a Trial Judge has made a finding that there is sufficient evidence of conspiracy to satisfy Rule 801(d)(2)(E). This would tend to confuse the jury and lend unwarranted weight to the hearsay statement and the evidence of conspiracy. n92

[iii] Conspirator Statements -- Breadth of Rule 801(d)(2)(E)

The hearsay exemption for coconspirator statements does not require that a conspiracy be charged in the case, only that the proponent show that the defendant and the declarant are members of the same conspiracy and that the statement was made during the course of and in furtherance of the conspiracy. n93 The Rule can apply in a wide variety of cases. Even statements by an acquitted conspirator may be used, due to the different standards of proof governing admissibility and guilt. n94 Statements by unindicted conspirators may also be used. n95 Indeed, the coconspirator hearsay exemption applies even in civil cases. n96

[7] Confrontation Concerns

Assume that an out-of-court statement is admissible either as not hearsay under Rule 801(c), or as fitting within a hearsay exemption under Rule 801(d). If the statement is offered against a criminal defendant, a further question arises: Is the statement admissible under the Confrontation Clause? Before the Court's decision in Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) , the answer to that question was an unqualified "yes." But the Court's analysis in Crawford complicates that answer somewhat. What follows is a short discussion of Crawford, and then a discussion of how statements admitted under Rule 801 interact with the rights of an accused under the Confrontation Clause.

Crawford:

The Court in Crawford held that the defendant's right to confrontation was violated because uncross-examined "testimonial" hearsay was admitted against him at trial under a state hearsay exception for declarations against interest. Crawford involved a statement made by the defendant's wife to police officers that implicated the defendant and herself. Under the jurisprudence established in Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56 (1980) , a hearsay statement satisfies the Confrontation Clause if (1) it fits a "firmly-rooted" hearsay exception, or (2) the statement carries "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness" that assure its reliability. The State Courts found that Mrs. Crawford's statement to police officers satisfied the "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness" prong of Roberts, reasoning that Mrs. Crawford was not trying to shift blame, and that she was relating relatively recent events to a "neutral" police officer.

The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Scalia, rejected the Roberts structure for determining whether a hearsay statement satisfies the Confrontation Clause, at least if the hearsay is "testimonial." Justice Scalia engaged in an extensive historical analysis and determined that the original intent of the Confrontation Clause was not to exclude unreliable evidence per se, but rather to exclude "testimonial" evidence that had not been cross-examined by the accused.

The bottom line from Crawford is that "testimonial" hearsay statements cannot be admitted against an accused unless the declarant is unavailable and the accused has or had the opportunity to cross-examine the declarant. Unless these two requirements are met, the "testimonial" hearsay statement must be excluded even if it is clearly reliable and even if it fits into a standard hearsay exception. An example of a statement that would qualify under Crawford is testimony from a prior trial in which the defendant was subject to the same charges, and the witness is unavailable for the subsequent trial.

On the other hand, if the hearsay statement is not "testimonial," the Courts after Crawford have uniformly held that the Roberts test continues to regulate the admissibility of the hearsay. While the Court in Crawford at least implied that there would be no constitutional regulation for non-testimonial hearsay, and was no fan of the Roberts reliability requirement, the Lower Courts after Crawford has reasoned that Roberts applies to non-testimonial hearsay until the Supreme Court specifically rules otherwise; and it did not so rule in Crawford, which involved only "testimonial" hearsay. n97

So a critical question after Crawford is whether a hearsay statement is "testimonial" or not. Surprisingly, the Court did not try to define the term "testimonial." The closest the Court came to a definition is set forth in the following passage:

> Various formulations of this core class of "testimonial" statements exist: "ex parte in-court testimony or its functional equivalent -- that is, material such as affidavits, custodial examinations, prior testimony that the defendant was unable to cross-examine, or similar pretrial statements that declarants would reasonably expect to be used prosecutorially," Brief for Petitioner 23; "extrajudicial statements ... contained in formalized testimonial materials, such as affidavits, depositions, prior testimony, or confessions," White v. Illinois, 502 U.S. 346, 365 (1992) (THOMAS, J., joined by SCALIA, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment); "statements that were made under circumstances which would lead an objective witness reasonably to believe that the statement would be available for use at a later trial," Brief for National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers et al. as Amici Curiae 3. These formulations all share a common nucleus and then define the Clause's coverage at various levels of abstraction around it.
>
> ...
>
> Whatever else the term ["testimonial"] covers, it applies at a minimum to prior testimony at a preliminary hearing, before a grand jury, or at a former trial; and to police interrogations. These are the modern practices with closest kinship to the abuses at which the Confrontation Clause was directed.

In another part of the opinion, the Court indicated that statements taken at guilty plea allocutions are testimonial:

> Courts have invoked Roberts to admit other sorts of plainly testimonial statements despite the absence of any opportunity to cross-examine. See United States v. Aguilar, 295 F.3d 1018, 1021-1023 (CA9 2002) (plea allocution showing existence of a conspiracy); United States v. Centracchio, 265 F.3d 518, 527-530 (CA7 2001) (same); United States v. Dolah, 245 F.3d 98, 104-105 (CA2 2001) (same); United States v. Petrillo, 237 F.3d 119, 122-123 (CA2 2000) (same).

While the precise definition of "testimonial" is not clear, n98 what is clear is that Crawford provides some limitation on the use of hearsay by the prosecution in federal criminal trials.

Statements Admitted Under Rule 801 and the Confrontation Clause:

(1) Not hearsay (Rule 801(c)). In Tennessee v. Street, 471 U.S. 409 (1985) , the Court held that the nonhearsay use of an out-of-court statement raised no confrontation concerns. The Court's rationale was that the essential guarantee of the Confrontation Clause is to provide the defendant with a right to cross-examine the witnesses against him. If a statement is not offered for the truth of the matter asserted, cross-examination of the declarant would serve no purpose because the declarant would have no relevant testimony to give. For example, assume that the prosecution wanted to prove that the victim was alive while he was being beaten by the defendant. To prove this point, the prosecution calls a witness who saw the beating and will testify that the victim cried out "Don't hit me anymore, I'm still alive!" The victim's statement is not hearsay because its truth is irrelevant; it is enough that the victim could speak -- that proves he was alive. Nor is the Confrontation Clause violated by introducing this testimony. Under Crawford the primary purpose of the Confrontation Clause is to guarantee cross-examination. But in this case cross-examination of the victim, even if he were alive, would do no good. The only question that could be asked is whether the victim actually said anything at the time of the beating--but this fact has already been shown by the in-court testimony of the witness who heard it. In sum, if an out-of-court statement is offered for a purpose other than proving the truth of the information related therein, its admission will not violate the Confrontation Clause. The Court in Crawford specifically reaffirmed its holding in Street that if a statement is non-hearsay, its admission does not violate the Confrontation Clause.

(2) Prior statements of testifying witnesses (Rule 801(d)(1)). The Court has indicated that when a witness is present at trial and subject to cross-examination, the prior statements of that witness can be admitted for their truth and the Confrontation Clause will not be violated. The ability to cross-examine the witness about the prior statement is sufficient to satisfy any concerns about confrontation. As applied to the Federal Rules of Evidence, this means that statements admissible under Rule 801(d)(1) will never violate the Confrontation Clause because the basic condition to admissibility under this Rule is that the declarant is testifying at the trial and subject to cross-examination. In United States v. Owens, 484 U.S. 554 (1988) , the Court specifically held that a prior identification of a testifying witness, who lacked memory of the event, was admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(C), and also that admission of the hearsay statement did not violate the Confrontation Clause. The Court stated that "the confrontation clause guarantees only an opportunity for effective cross-examination, not cross-examination that is effective in whatever way, and to whatever extent, the defense might wish." n99 Courts after Crawford have held that Owens remains good law. n100

(3) Admissions (Rule 801(d)(2)). First, it is clear that if the admission is by the defendant himself, or is adopted by him, then it is the defendant's own hearsay statement that is being admitted. Clearly, a person has no constitutional right to confront himself. n101 Crawford does not change this rule, because even if the accused's statement is testimonial, there is no right to cross-examine yourself. Applying Crawford literally would mean that a defendant who made a voluntary confession pursuant to police interrogation would have a right to exclude this "testimonial" statement under the Confrontation Clause. Clearly Crawford did not contemplate such a result.

As to agency admissions, their admissibility will depend in the first instance on whether they are "testimonial" under Crawford. It is likely that most statements made by the agent of an accused will not be testimonial because they will not be made with an eye toward a criminal prosecution. But some such statements might be testimonial; for example, if a corporate agent admits to an interrogating police officer that in the course of his employment he followed directions from his superiors and violated a criminal law, that statement is likely to be found testimonial. If an agent's statement is not testimonial, then its admissibility remains governed by Roberts, and under that test a hearsay statement is admissible if it fits a firmly-rooted hearsay exception. Agency statements have been found to fit a firmly-rooted exception. n102

As to coconspirator statements, they are only admissible if they are made during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy. It seems unlikely that a coconspirator would make a qualifying statement that would result in "testimony" under Crawford. For example, if the coconspirator is confessing to police officers, or making a plea allocution, those statements are not in furtherance of the conspiracy and so not admissible under the exception. The Court in Crawford held that coconspirator statements are "by their nature" not testimonial. And Lower Courts after Crawford have uniformly held that statements admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) are by definition not testimonial. n103 While nontestimonial hearsay remains governed by the Roberts test, the Court in Bourjaily held that Rule 801(d)(2)(E) is a firmly rooted hearsay exception; as such, statements fitting within that exception automatically satisfy the Roberts test.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., United States v. Williams, 133 F.3d 1048 (7th Cir. 1998) (informant's accusation that the defendant robbed a bank could not be admitted for the non-hearsay purpose of proving the "background" of the police investigation, because the risk that the jury would use the accusation as proof of the defendant's guilt substantially outweighed its probative value for background purposes); United States v. Cass, 127 F.3d 1218 (10th Cir. 1997) (out-of-court accusations were improperly admitted as "background": "Hearsay evidence that directly goes to guilt is particularly difficult to limit to background purposes."); United States v. Reyes, 18 F.3d 65 (2d Cir. 1994) (reversing a conviction due to error in admitting statements made to a Customs agent which implicated the defendant in a conspiracy; even though the jury was instructed that the statements were admitted only as background, and even though the statements were relevant to explain the background of the investigation, the likelihood was high that the jury would have considered the statements for their truth anyway: "contrary to the government's contention, the mere identification of a relevant non-hearsay use of such evidence is insufficient to justify its admission if the jury is likely to consider the statement for the truth of what was stated with significant resultant prejudice"). Compare United States v. Davis, 154 F.3d 772 (8th Cir. 1998) (testimony by law enforcement officer concerning accusations he heard about the defendant was properly admitted to explain the reasons for his investigation, after defense counsel attacked the motives of the investigators); United States v. Gilliam, 994 F.2d 97 (2d Cir. 1993) (911 call concerning the location of a gun was admissible as nonhearsay, where it was offered to explain why a police officer returned to the scene of the defendant's arrest and arrested the defendant's friend; the statement was offered in rebuttal after the defendant argued that the officers were merely harassing the defendant and his friend).

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Cruz, 993 F.2d 164 (8th Cir. 1993) (detective's testimony concerning information he had received from unnamed sources was not hearsay, because it was offered to explain the officer's motivation for investigating the defendant; in the absence of an objection, the Court did not consider whether the evidence should have been excluded under Rule 403).

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., United States v. Katsougrakis, 715 F.2d 769 (2d Cir. 1983) (testimony by a government witness that he visited his friend who had been burned in a fire, and that the friend, heavily bandaged and unable to speak, nodded his head affirmatively when asked whether he had been paid to start the fire, was hearsay, but was admissible under the exception for statements against penal interest; the Court found that the government plainly used the nod for the truth of an assertion and, therefore, it was hearsay).

(n4)Footnote 4. See Milich, Re-Examining Hearsay under the Federal Rules: Some Method for the Madness, 39 U. Kan. L. Rev. 893, 903 (1991):

> For example, to prove that it was raining at the time, witnesses testify that they saw Mary opening her umbrella as she was walking out the door. Under the Wright v. Tatham approach, this evidence is hearsay because Mary's conduct implied that she believed it was raining and her belief implies that it was, in fact, raining. But the language of Rule 801(a)(2) points to a result at odds with the Wright v. Tatham approach: "Nonverbal conduct of a person" qualifies as a potential hearsay statement only "if it is intended by the person as an assertion." Opening an umbrella normally is not intended to be an assertion about anything, and, thus, such nonverbal conduct does not fall within the federal definition of hearsay.

(n5)Footnote 5. Thus, subdivision (c) focuses on whether there is an opportunity to test the statement when it is made, rather than on whether the reliability of a statement turns on the credibility of a witness who is in Court where he or she may be tested.

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., Landsberg v. Scrabble Crossword Game Players, Inc., 736 F.2d 485, 490 (9th Cir. 1984) (prior statements of a testifying witness were properly excluded as hearsay: "In each case the witness could have been asked what Landsberg had done, not what the witness said he had said Landsberg had done.").

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., United States v. Bellucci, 995 F.2d 157 (9th Cir. 1993) (in a bank fraud case, the defendant claimed that error occurred at trial when the government proved the federally insured status of the bank by introducing the bank's FDIC certificate of insurance; this claim was meritless because the FDIC certificate "affects the legal rights of the parties" independent of the truth of any assertion in the certificate; the certificate is like a written contract that memorializes the fact of an agreement; statements which themselves give rise to substantive rights and liabilities are not hearsay); United States v. Moss, 9 F.3d 543 (6th Cir. 1993) (statement soliciting a bribe is not hearsay because it is a verbal act establishing that the solicitation was made; the act of solicitation itself gives rise to legal consequences).

(n8)Footnote 8. See also Barnes v. Prudential Ins. Co., 76 F.3d 889 (8th Cir. 1996) (a survivor of an insured claimed that the company's agent negligently failed to provide forms to the insured so that he could change the policy to make the plaintiff his beneficiary; testimony by an insurance agent that the insured told him four times that he wanted to make the plaintiff his beneficiary was improperly excluded as hearsay, because the insured's statements were relevant to prove the agent's knowledge of the insured's wishes, and were not offered for their truth; however, statements by the insured to others, to the effect that that he had told the insurance agent to change the beneficiary, were inadmissible hearsay).

(n9)Footnote 9. See, e.g., United States v. Trala, 386 F.3d 536 (3d Cir. 2004) (statements to a police officer by an accomplice, which misrepresented her identity and the source of the money in the defendant's car, were not hearsay because they were not admitted for their truth; the relevance of the statements was dependent on their being false; under these circumstances, cross-examination of the accomplice would serve no purpose), vacated on other grounds, 126 S. Ct. 1078 (2006) ; United States v. Holmes, 406 F.3d 337 (5th Cir. 2005) (statement by an accomplice covering up a crime was not hearsay because it was not offered for its truth; rather, the government offered the testimony "to establish its falsity through independent evidence"); United States v. Hathaway, 798 F.2d 902, 905 (6th Cir. 1986) :

> When statements are offered to prove the falsity of the matter asserted, there is no need to assess the credibility of the declarant. Since there is no need to assess the credibility of the declarant of a false statement, we know of no purpose which would be served by extending the definition of hearsay to cover statements offered for the falsity of the matter asserted. We therefore join those courts which have concluded that statements offered to prove the falsity of the matter asserted are not hearsay.

(n10)Footnote 10. See also Ostad v. Oregon Health Sciences Univ., 327 F.3d 876 (9th Cir. 2003) (prior inconsistent statement was not hearsay because it was offered to impeach the witness' credibility and not for its truth).

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., Morgan v. Massachusetts Gen. Hosp., 901 F.2d 186 (1st Cir. 1990) (in a civil rights action by an employee alleging racial discrimination, sexual harassment, and retaliatory discharge, affidavits and reports were properly admitted for the nonhearsay purpose of showing the steps taken to investigate an assault alleged by the defendant as a legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason for the plaintiff's discharge). See also Rogers v. Ingersoll-Rand Co., 144 F.3d 841 (D.C. Cir. 1998) (statements that consumer charges of product defect were without merit were erroneously excluded as hearsay; the statements were not offered to prove that the consumer charges were inaccurate, "but rather to prove that the defendant was not on notice of the alleged design defect").

(n12)Footnote 12. See also United States v. Branham, 97 F.3d 835 (6th Cir. 1996) (in a drug case, one defendant's testimony concerning a paid government informant's attempts to involve the defendant in a number of illegal activities was erroneously excluded as hearsay, because the statements were offered to show their effect on the defendant rather than for their truth); United States v. Hanson, 994 F.2d 403 (7th Cir. 1993) (statement made to the defendant that he did not have to file a certain form was not offered for its truth but rather for its impact on the defendant's state of mind; exclusion on hearsay grounds was therefore error).

(n13)Footnote 13. See, e.g., United States v. Anello, 765 F.2d 253, 261 (1st Cir. 1985) ("There is considerable case authority for the proposition that notations of names, addresses, phone numbers and the like written on slips of paper or entered into address books are not hearsay when offered to connect the bearer or owner to the person indicated."); United States v. Thorne, 997 F.2d 1504 (D.C. Cir. 1993) (no error to admit drug records to show that the names listed were connected with each other and were also connected with amounts of money and beeper extensions; testimony did not indicate the amounts of money or the actual numbers listed); United States v. McIntyre, 997 F.2d 687 (10th Cir. 1993) (various receipts were admissible not for truth but "only to link various of the defendants together by the circumstance that documents bearing the names of certain defendants of the location of certain drug transactions" were found in the possession of one of the conspirators).

(n14)Footnote 14. See, e.g., Fun-damental Too, Ltd. v. Gemmy Indus. Corp., 111 F.3d 993 (2d Cir. 1997) (evidence that retail customers complained about product confusion was admissible, either as non-hearsay under Rule 801, or under the Rule 803(3) exception for statements of the declarant's state of mind).

(n15)Footnote 15. See Seidelson, Implied Assertions and Federal Rule of Evidence 801: A Quandary for Federal Courts, 24 Duq. L. Rev. 741 (1986) (arguing that hearsay rule should not rest on a semantic distinction between express and implied assertions).

(n16)Footnote 16. See also Park v. Huff, 493 F.2d 923 (5th Cir. 1974) (noting that if the hearsay rule covered only express assertions of fact, the rule "could easily be circumvented through clever questioning and coaching of witnesses, so that answers were framed as implied rather than as direct assertions"), aff'd on reh'g en banc, 506 F.2d 849 (5th Cir. 1975) .

(n17)Footnote 17. See Seidelson, Implied Assertions and Federal Rule of Evidence 801: A Quandary for Federal Courts, 24 Duq. L. Rev. 741 (1986) (arguing that the Advisory Committee's reading of Rule 801(c) is unpersuasive and not controlling).

(n18)Footnote 18. See also Lyle v. Koehler, 720 F.2d 426 (6th Cir. 1983) (concluding that letters are hearsay because "the inferences they necessarily invite form an integral part of the letters"; reference to "matter asserted" in Rule 801(c) covers both express and implied assertions).

(n19)Footnote 19. See, e.g., Milich, supra, at 907 ("[I]ntent to communicate is the key to distinguishing between hearsay and non-hearsay under the federal definition."); Callen, Hearsay and Informal Reasoning, 47 Vand. L. Rev. 43, 113 (1994):

> When deciding whether a statement is hearsay for a particular purpose, courts should recognize that propositions the speaker generally intends the hearer to understand from the communication should be part of an assertion for purposes of the hearsay rule. Classifying assertions implied from communicative conduct as hearsay facilitates factfinders' use of their experience in informal reasoning at trial.

(n20)Footnote 20. See Park, "I Didn't Tell Them Anything About You": Implied Assertions As Hearsay Under the Federal Rules of Evidence , 74 Minn. L. Rev. 783 (1990) (listing and discussing the examples); Edmund Morgan, Hearsay Dangers and the Application of the Hearsay Concept, 62 Harv. L. Rev. 177, 189 (1948).

(n21)Footnote 21. Comment, Hearsay: The Threshold Question, 9 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 14 n.48 (1976).

(n22)Footnote 22. See also United States v. Jackson, 88 F.3d 845 (10th Cir. 1996) : The defendant, whose name was Kenny, was charged with narcotics violations. The police officer who arrested him testified that he seized the defendant's pager and called the telephone number displayed on the pager; the person who answered said "Is this Kenny?" This testimony was held properly admitted as non-hearsay. The Court stated that "the important question is whether the assertion is intended" and found it "hard to believe that the declarant intended to assert that Mr. Jackson was in possession of the pager and that he was responding to her call."

(n23)Footnote 23. See, e.g., Cloverland-Green Spring Dairies, Inc. v. Pennsylvania Milk Marketing Board, 298 F.3d 201 (3d Cir. 2002) ("a statement offered to sell a product at a particular price is a 'verbal act,' not hearsay, because the statement itself has legal effect").

(n24)Footnote 24. See, e.g., United States v. Ricketts, 317 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 2003) (the defendant's request for an instruction that prior inconsistent statements could only be used for impeachment was properly rejected; the statements at issue were made at a guilty plea hearing and a grand jury hearing, and therefore were admissible as substantive evidence); United States v. Bomski, 125 F.3d 1115 (7th Cir. 1997) (Trial Judge should not have instructed the jury that a witness' grand jury statement that was inconsistent with his trial testimony could only be considered for credibility; because the statement was under oath, it was admissible for its truth under Rule 801(d)(1)(A)).

(n25)Footnote 25. United States v. Williams, 272 F.3d 845 (7th Cir. 2001) (prior inconsistent statements made to authorities were admissible only for impeachment because they were not made at a "proceeding").

(n26)Footnote 26. See, e.g., United States v. Tafollo-Cardenas, 897 F.2d 976 (9th Cir. 1990) (finding harmful error where the Trial Court refused to give an instruction that a prior inconsistent statement not made under oath could be used only for impeachment purposes).

(n27)Footnote 27. See, e.g., United States v. Day, 789 F.2d 1217 (6th Cir. 1986) (pretrial interview with IRS agent does not constitute an "other proceeding"; Congress wished to limit the use of Rule 801(d)(1)(A) to highly reliable statements); United States v. Dietrich, 854 F.2d 1056 (7th Cir. 1988) (stationhouse interrogation does not constitute an "other proceeding"). See also United States v. Perez, 870 F.2d 1222 (7th Cir. 1989) (pretrial interview with an adverse witness under oath does not qualify as a statement made at a deposition or other proceeding).

(n28)Footnote 28. See, e.g., United States v. Keeter, 130 F.3d 297 (7th Cir. 1997) (witness who feigns lack of memory is subject to cross-examination within the meaning of Rule 801(d)(1)(A) and a prior statement is inconsistent with an untruthful statement of lack of memory); United States v. Bigham, 812 F.2d 943 (5th Cir. 1987) (feigned memory loss is inconsistent with a prior statement); United States v. DiCaro, 772 F.2d 1314, 1321 (2d Cir. 1985) ("[P]articularly in a case of manifest reluctance to testify, if a witness has testified to certain facts before a grand jury and forgets them at trial, his grand jury testimony falls squarely within Rule 801(d)(1)(A)."); United States v. Balliviero, 708 F.2d 934 (5th Cir. 1983) (faulty memory is not inconsistent with a previous statement).

(n29)Footnote 29. See, e.g., United States v. Lewis, 987 F.2d 1349 (8th Cir. 1993) (erroneous exclusion of the defendant's prior consistent staement was harmless, because the defendant had testified at trial to his version of the events); United States v. White, 11 F.3d 1446 (8th Cir. 1993) (prior consistent statement was improperly admitted for its truth because it preceded the witness' motive to fabricate; but the error was harmless because the statement was "duplicative" of the witness' in-court testimony). Compare United States v. Lozada-Rivera, 177 F.3d 98 (1st Cir. 1999) (error in admitting law enforcement officer's report as a prior consistent statement was not harmless; the report contained damaging admissions of the defendant, and also provided the jury "with an authoritative condensation of the government's whole case against the defendant").

(n30)Footnote 30. See, e.g., United States v. Barrett, 937 F.2d 1346 (8th Cir. 1991) (consistent statement of the complainant, made before any motive to falsify arose, was held properly admitted for its truth under Rule 801(d)(1)(B)); United States v. Payne, 944 F.2d 1458 (9th Cir. 1991) (prior consistent statements were properly admitted for their truth, to show that the complainant's alleged motive to fabricate was largely speculative).

(n31)Footnote 31. See, e.g., United States v. Keltner, 147 F.3d 662 (8th Cir. 1998) (prior consistent statement properly admitted for rehabilitation purposes when the defendant had cross-examined the prosecution witness with prior statements but omitted portions; the government was entitled to admit those portions without regard to Rule 801(d)(1)(B)); United States v. Gluzman, 154 F.3d 49 (2d Cir. 1999) (prior consistent statement of an accomplice was properly admitted for rehabilitation outside Rule 801(d)(1)(B)).

(n32)Footnote 32. See Hon. Frank W. Bullock, Jr. & Steven Gardner, Prior Consistent Statements and the Premotive Rule, 24 Fla. State L. Rev. 509 (1997) (noting that distinctions between substantive and nonsubstantive use of prior consistent statements "are normally distinctions without practical meaning" and advocating that "the Federal Rules should explicitly provide that all prior consistent statements, when admissible to rehabilitate, are admissible as substantive evidence.").

(n33)Footnote 33. United States v. Tome, 3 F.3d 342 (10th Cir. 1993) .

(n34)Footnote 34. See, e.g., United States v. Bishop, 264 F.3d 535 (5th Cir. 2001) (prior consistent statements of a prosecution witness were not admissible where defense lawyers implied that the witness was lying or mistaken, but made no allegation that the witness had an improper motive).

(n35)Footnote 35. See, e.g., United States v. Lozada-Rivera, 177 F.3d 98 (1st Cir. 1999) ("Generally speaking, a charge of improper motive or recent fabrication need not be expressly made or buttressed by concrete evidence. But the proponent of the evidence must point to specific questions during his adversary's examination that suggest recent fabrication or bias. Merely appealing to credibility as a live issue will not do the trick."); Gaines v. Walker, 986 F.2d 1438 (D.C. Cir. 1993) (a charge of fabrication is not made merely because counsel points out inconsistencies in the witness' testimony; but where counsel argues that an officer made up a charge after the fact, this amounted to an allegation of fabrication that could be rebutted by a consistent statement).

(n36)Footnote 36. See, e.g., United States v. Stover, 329 F.3d 859 (D..C. Cir. 2003) (Tome not applicable where consistent statements were offered to clarify or rebut an inconsistency); United States v. Brennan, 798 F.2d 581 (2d Cir. 1986) (prior statement was not admissible to rebut a charge of improper motive, but it was admissible to clarify an inconsistency: "prior consistent statements may be admissible for rehabilitation even if not admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(B)").

(n37)Footnote 37. See, e.g., United States v. Pierre, 781 F.2d 329 (2d Cir. 1986) :

> When the prior statement tends to cast doubt on whether the prior inconsistent statement was made or on whether the impeaching statement is really inconsistent with the trial testimony, its use for rehabilitation purposes is within the sound discretion of the trial judge. Such use is also permissible when the consistent statement will amplify or clarify the allegedly inconsistent statement.

(n38)Footnote 38. See, e.g., United States v. Awon, 135 F.3d 96 (1st Cir. 1998) (error to admit statements under Rule 801(d)(1)(B); prosecution witnesses were attacked on the ground that they were seeking leniency, and the prior statements were made only after the witnesses were informed that the police knew they were involved in criminal activity and could benefit themselves by cooperating; therefore the consistent statements were not made before the motive to falsify arose).

(n39)Footnote 39. See, e.g., United States v. Castillo, 14 F.3d 802 (2d Cir. 1994) (a prior consistent statement can be offered to rehabilitate the witness' credibility even though it is not admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(B); however, a limiting instruction must be given and the prosecutor cannot abrogate "the court's limiting instructions by improperly arguing the truth of the hearsay testimony" during opening and closing arguments); United States v. White, 11 F.3d 1446 (8th Cir. 1993) (although rehabilitative statements "were admissible when accompanied by a limiting instruction," they were not admissible for their truth under Rule 801(d)(1)(B) because they did not precede the witness' motive to fabricate; the Trial Court therefore erred in admitting the statements without a limiting instruction; but the error was harmless since the prior consistent statements were "duplicative" of the witness' testimony at trial).

(n40)Footnote 40. See, e.g., United States v. Forrester, 60 F.3d 52 (2d Cir. 1995) (reversing a defendant's cocaine convictions, in part because a prior statement of a government witness was erroneously introduced; defense counsel asserted that a cooperating witness was making up her story; a consistent statement made by the witness after her arrest was not admissible because the witness' motive to fabricate arose as soon as she was arrested, thus the consistent statement post-dated the motive to falsify).

(n41)Footnote 41. The language "after perceiving him" is superfluous and probably is the result of having been included in other drafts that contained slightly different language from that found in the Rule.

(n42)Footnote 42. For a discussion of the constitutional limitations on pretrial identification evidence, see S. Saltzburg & D. Capra, American Criminal Procedure, ch. 4 (7th ed. 2004). 2004).

(n43)Footnote 43. See, e.g., United States v. Lopez, 271 F.3d 472 (3d Cir. 2001) (identification by witness who denied making it was admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(C)).

(n44)Footnote 44. See, e.g., United States v. Salameh, 152 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 1998) (prior identification by a witness was admissible even though the witness incorrectly pointed to two jurors as the perpetrators when testifying at trial; the witness was subject to cross-examination, and a prior identification is admissible "regardless of whether the witness confirms the identification in court"); Adail v. Wyrick, 711 F.2d 99, 102 (8th Cir. 1983) (Federal Courts admit "pretrial identifications made after the crime without corroborating in-court identifications under Rule 801(d)(1)(C)").

(n45)Footnote 45. See, e.g., United States v. O'Malley, 796 F.2d 891, 899 (7th Cir. 1986) ("Nothing in this rule prohibits the introduction of out-of-court statements identifying the defendant made by the declarant who at trial admitted that he made the prior identification but now denies that the defendant was the same involved in the crime.").

(n46)Footnote 46. See, e.g., United States v. Brewer, 36 F.3d 266 (2d Cir. 1994) (because the identifying witnesses were not called to testify, the testimony of the officer who saw the identifications could not be admitted under Rule 801(d)(1)(C)).

(n47)Footnote 47. See generally Mirjan Damaska, Evidence Law Adrift at 122-25 (1997).

(n48)Footnote 48. See, e.g., Jewell v. CSX Transp., 135 F.3d 361 (6th Cir. 1998) , where the Court found that a party-admission was properly admitted even though the declarant suffered from brain damage:

> Trustworthiness is not a separate requirement for admission under Rule 801(d)(2)(A). The admissibility of statements of a party-opponent is grounded not in the presumed trustworthiness of the statements, but on a kind of estoppel or waiver theory, that a party should be entitled to rely on his opponent's statements. As noted in the advisory committee notes to Rule 801(d)(2)(A), admissions by a party-opponent are excluded from the category of hearsay 'on the theory that their admissibility in evidence is the result of the adversary system rather than satisfaction of the conditions of the hearsay rule.' "

(n49)Footnote 49. Accord United States v. Gossett, 877 F.2d 901 (11th Cir. 1989) .

(n50)Footnote 50. See, e.g., Mahlandt v. Wild Canid Survival & Research Center, Inc., 588 F.2d 626 (8th Cir. 1978) (the defendant's statement that a wolf in his custody bit a child was properly admitted against the defendant, even though he did not see the wolf bite the child).

(n51)Footnote 51. See, e.g., United States v. McGee, 189 F.3d 626 (7th Cir. 1999) (defendant's false exculpatory statements were properly admitted; to be admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(A), the statement need only be made by the party against whom it is offered; there is no requirement that the statement be inculpatory when made); United States v. Turner, 995 F.2d 1357 (6th Cir. 1993) (the defendant's false exculpatory statement, made to government officials, was properly admitted against him under Rule 801(d)(2)(A); the Rule does not limit an admission to a statement against interest; all that is required is that the statement was made by the party, and that it is relevant and offered against him at trial).

(n52)Footnote 52. United States v. Bond, 87 F.3d 695 (5th Cir. 1996) (Magistrate Judge properly excluded a tape made by the defendant; the defendant offered the tape to benefit himself, not as evidence of a statement made by a party used against that party).

(n53)Footnote 53. See, e.g., United States v. Ward, 377 F.3d 671 (7th Cir. 2004) (defendant's silence in the face of his sister's accusation of bank robbery was properly admitted as an adoptive admission; foundation was established that the defendant heard the statement, and the accusation was "the type of statement that a party normally would respond to if innocent"); United States v. Pulido-Jacobo, 377 F.3d 1124 (10th Cir. 2004) (defendant's possession of a receipt for speakers, over a two-month period, constituted an adoptive admission that the speakers were his).

(n54)Footnote 54. See, e.g., Weigand v. United States, 760 F.2d 1072 (10th Cir. 1985) ("By reprinting the newspaper articles and distributing them to persons with whom defendants were doing business, defendants unequivocally manifested their adoption of the inflated statements made in the newspaper articles."). Compare United States v. Orellana-Blanco, 294 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 2002) (accusations made against defendant were not admissible as adoptive admissions because the evidence established a significant language barrier, indicating that the defendant may not have understood what was said to him).

(n55)Footnote 55. See, e.g., United States v. Hoosier, 542 F.2d 687 (6th Cir. 1976) (defendant was silent when his girlfriend mentioned his criminal activity to a mutual friend: "Under the total circumstances, we believe that probable human behavior would have been for appellant promptly to deny his girl friend's statement if it had not been true -- particularly when it was said to a person to whom he had previously related a plan to rob a bank. While we agree with appellant's counsel that more is needed to justify admission of this statement than the mere presence and silence of the appellant, we observe that there was more in this record.").

(n56)Footnote 56. United States v. Joshi, 896 F.2d 1303, 1312 (11th Cir. 1990) (sufficient foundation was laid where the defendant responded with comprehension to other inquiries at the same time).

(n57)Footnote 57. United States v. Harrison, 296 F.3d 994 (10th Cir. 2002) (whether the defendant adopted a statement "is a preliminary question of fact to be decided by the court"; and "the Court determines the question under a preponderance of the evidence standard").

(n58)Footnote 58. See, e.g., United States v. McKeon, 738 F.2d 26 (2d Cir. 1984) (a statement made by an attorney on behalf of the client was admissible under subdivisions (d)(2)(C) and (d)(2)(D)).

(n59)Footnote 59. See, e.g., Woodman v. Haemonetics Corp., 51 F.3d 1087 (1st Cir. 1995) (a statement from a line supervisor attributing age animus to her supervisors should have been admitted; the line supervisor was acting within the scope of her employment because part of her job was to be involved in employment and personnel decisions, and she was communicating her opinion about information she received at a meeting concerning employment matters); Corley v. Burger King Corp., 56 F.3d 709 (5th Cir. 1995) (statements by a restaurant manager, that he was delivering something to the restaurant at the time of the accident and that he had looked away prior to the accident should have been admitted; the statement concerned "a matter within the scope of the agency or employment").

(n60)Footnote 60. See, e.g., Barner v. Pilkington North America, Inc., 399 F.3d 745 (6th Cir. 2005) (in an employment discrimination case, there was no error in the Trial Court's ruling that hearsay statements made by co-workers concerning past acts of discrimination were not admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(D), because they did not concern a matter within the scope of the co-workers' employment: "the scope of their employment did not include work assignments"); Jacklyn v. Schering-Plough Healthcare Prods. Sales Corp., 176 F.3d 921 (6th Cir. 1999) (statement by the plaintiff's former supervisor indicating that she was being discharged because she was a woman properly excluded; the plaintiff provided no evidence that the supervisor had responsibilities over employment decisions).

(n61)Footnote 61. See, e.g., United States v. Lauersen, 343 F.3d 604 (2d Cir. 2003) ("we have not required personal knowledge for statements by a party's agent"); Society of Roman Catholic Church v. Interstate Fire & Cas., 126 F.3d 727 (5th Cir. 1997) (statements by a sales manager of the defendant were properly admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(D); the fact that the agent had no personal knowledge of the matters asserted was "irrelevant" because personal knowledge is not required for admissions); Mahlandt v. Wild Canid Survival & Research Center, Inc., 588 F.2d 626 (8th Cir. 1978) (agent's statement, made without personal knowledge, held properly admitted against the principal); Union Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Chrysler Corp., 793 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1986) (noting the split of authority on the question and holding that an agent's admission made without personal knowledge was properly admitted).

(n62)Footnote 62. See also United States v. Agne, 214 F.3d 47 (1st Cir. 2000) (statements by an employee of a company affiliated with the company controlled by the defendant were properly admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(D); the statements of a corporate employee may be admitted against an officer when "the factors which normally make up an agency relationship are present"; in this case, the employee was specifically designated by the defendant to handle and report on the business matter at issue in the case, and was directly responsible to the defendant on those matters).

(n63)Footnote 63. See, e.g., United States v. Wiedyk, 71 F.3d 602 (6th Cir. 1995) (charges against an officer of an employee welfare fund; testimony by a government witness as to statements made by his deceased partner was improperly admitted against the defendant; the declarant worked for an entity hired by the defendant's fund, but there was no showing that the defendant controlled the fund to an extent sufficient to warrant admission of statements by the declarant as statements by an agent of the defendant). The Court in Wiedyk recognized that an individual could in other contexts have such extensive control over an entity that statements by the entity's agent would be imputed to the individual.

(n64)Footnote 64. See, e.g., Boren v. Sable, 887 F.2d 1032 (10th Cir. 1989) (statement of a shop foreman was not admissible against "an absentee owner" where the shop foreman was not answerable to the owner on a daily basis); Lippay v. Christos, 996 F.2d 1490 (3d Cir. 1993) (agency is determined by whether the declarant is continually supervised by the party-opponent; a government informant's statements were not admissible as vicarious admissions against a government official, where the informant operated more as a "partner" than as a subordinate). For a more permissive test of agency, see United States v. Rioux, 97 F.3d 648 (2d Cir. 1996) (Sheriff charged with extortion and related crimes; testimony of deputies and special deputies of the Sheriff as to statements made by their supervisors was properly admitted; to qualify the supervisors as his agents, it was not necessary to show that the Sheriff controlled the declarants' daily tasks; it was sufficient that the Sheriff hand-picked the declarants, they served at his pleasure, and they were answerable to the Sheriff).

(n65)Footnote 65. Several courts have held that Rule 801(d)(2)(D) covers statements by independent contractors as well as agents. See, e.g., Beck v. Haik, 377 F.3d 624 (6th Cir. 2004) (statement of a consultant, about a matter within the scope of his employment, was admissible against the principal under Rule 801(d)(2)(D); though there is little precedent, "courts confronting similar fact situations have tended to hold contractors and advisors to fall within the 'agency' relationship contemplated by Rule 801(d)(2)(D)").

(n66)Footnote 66. See, e.g., Wilkinson v. Carnival Cruise Lines, 920 F.2d 1560 (11th Cir. 1991) (in an action brought for injuries suffered when an automatic sliding glass door ran over the plaintiff's foot, hearsay statements by a cabin steward regarding the defendant's notice of previous problems with the door were erroneously admitted; the steward had no responsibilities in the cruise ship's engineering department or in the swimming pool area where the door was located); NLRB v. Sherwood Trucking Co., 775 F.2d 744 (6th Cir. 1985) (statement to former employees by their former supervisor was not an agent's admission because there was insufficient evidence to demonstrate that the declarant was a supervisor with authority to hire and fire when the statement was made).

(n67)Footnote 67. See also United States v. Portsmouth Paving Corp., 694 F.2d 312 (4th Cir. 1982) (circumstantial evidence that an unidentified person answering the phone was a secretary authorized to relay the message of her employer sufficiently established the scope of agency).

(n68)Footnote 68. See also United States v. Beltran, 761 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1985) (statement was admissible as an agency admission where the translator was a DEA agent).

(n69)Footnote 69. Compare United States v. Lopez, 937 F.2d 716 (2d Cir. 1991) (translator's statements to an undercover agent, relating conversation in Spanish between coconspirators, was held admissible because the coconspirators also spoke English and "it stands to reason that if [the translator] had distorted their conversation, they would have noticed it and corrected her").

(n70)Footnote 70. Compare United States v. Amato, 356 F.3d 216 (2d Cir. 2004) (statements of attorney made outside of court were properly admitted against the defendant as agent's admissions; the concerns expressed in McKeon are largely inapplicable to statements made by counsel out of court).

(n71)Footnote 71. See also United States v. Brothers Constr. Co. of Ohio, Inc., 219 F.3d 300 (4th Cir. 2000) (statement of general counsel admitted against the corporation under Rule 801(d)(2)(D)); United States v. Harris, 914 F.2d 927 (7th Cir. 1990) (statements made by defense counsel to an eyewitness concerning the possibility of mistaken identification, were held admissible as agency admissions where the mistaken identity defense was abandoned at trial); Purgess v. Sharrock, 33 F.3d 134 (2d Cir. 1994) (a footnote in a brief filed on the defendant's behalf by counsel in a related case was admissible as an agency admission).

(n72)Footnote 72. United States v. Valencia, 826 F.2d 169, 175 (2d Cir. 1987) (Meskill, J., dissenting). The Court in Valencia refused to find an agency admission where defense counsel allegedly made a statement to the prosecutor at an informal bail conference. The Court was concerned that proving that the attorney even made the statement would result in mutual disqualification of prosecutor and defense counsel, a process that would not be worth the benefit of admitting the evidence. There was no such concern in McKeon, where the defense attorney made the statement in open court.

(n73)Footnote 73. See also United States v. Kattar, 840 F.2d 118 (1st Cir. 1988) (government argument in one case that an organization violated the law was admissible against the government in a different case where it argued that the organization was law-abiding).

(n74)Footnote 74. See, e.g., Williams v. Union Carbide Corp., 790 F.2d 552 (6th Cir. 1986) (pleadings in one suit, which alleged that the defendant was solely responsible for the plaintiff's injury, were admissible in a subsequent suit against a different defendant).

(n75)Footnote 75. See also Sunkyong Int'l, Inc. v. Anderson Land & Livestock Co., 828 F.2d 1245 (8th Cir. 1987) ("A pleading abandoned or superseded through amendment no longer serves any function in the case, but may be introduced into evidence as the admission of a party.").

Note that statements of a party's expert witness have not been considered agency admissions, at least if the expert is not otherwise an employee of the party. An expert retained for litigation is considered by necessity to be independent from the parties to a litigation. See, e.g., Kirk v. Raymark Indus., Inc., 61 F.3d 147 (3d Cir. 1995) (testimony of an expert called by the defendant in an unrelated asbestos case could not be used in the instant case against the defendant as an admission by an authorized agent; the expert was not one of the defendant's employees, and an agency could not be found simply because the expert testified at the previous trial on the defendant's behalf: "Because an expert witness is charged with the duty of giving his or her expert opinion regarding the matter before the court, we fail to comprehend how an expert witness, who is not an agent of the party who called him, can be authorized to make an admission for that party.").

(n76)Footnote 76. See, e.g., United States v. Lindemann, 85 F.3d 1232 (7th Cir. 1996) (a foundation of personal knowledge need not be established for coconspirator statements: "every court that has addressed the issue has held that coconspirator statements are not subject to the requirements of Rule 602").

(n77)Footnote 77. See, e.g., United States v. Gigante, 166 F.3d 75 (2d Cir. 1999) (hearsay statements could not be admitted solely on the finding of a "general overriding conspiracy among all of these alleged Mafia groups"; there must be a conspiracy with some specific criminal goal, and the defendant and the declarant must both be members of this conspiracy). Compare United States v. Russo, 302 F.3d 37 (2d Cir. 2002) (distinguishing Gigante and finding that the defendant and the declarant were involved in a conspiracy to maintain an organized crime syndicate, and criminal acts discussed were an objective of that conspiracy).

(n78)Footnote 78. See, e.g., United States v. Tse, 135 F.3d 200 (1st Cir. 1998) (gang members' statements made eight months after attempted murders were not made in the course of the conspiracy, because at that time it was clear that the murder plans had been abandoned).

(n79)Footnote 79. United States v. Emuegbunam, 268 F.3d 377 (6th Cir. 2001) (statement was made during the course of a drug conspiracy as the conspirators had not yet received payment for the drugs).

(n80)Footnote 80. See, e.g., United States v. Mojica-Baez, 229 F.3d 292 (1st Cir. 2000) (no error to admit hearsay statement made by a conspirator shortly after a bank robbery occurred: "there is a distinction, for purposes of the conspirator statement exception to the hearsay rule, between an initial conspiracy to commit a crime and later actions to conceal a crime"; however, in this case the statement was made during the course of the bank robbery conspiracy because the proceeds had not yet been divided). Compare United States v. Magluta, 418 F.3d 1166 (11th Cir. 2005) (statement from juror who received a bribe from defendant should not have been admitted under the coconspirator exemption; the statement was made two years after the juror was paid; the Court relied on Grunewald v. United States, 353 U.S. 391 (1957) , and declared that the "central purpose of the bribery conspiracy" was to secure an acquittal in return for cash, so that once the verdict was rendered, that central purpose was completed: "In light of Grunewald, we cannot infer that a subsidiary conspiracy to conceal the bribe existed for almost two-and-a-half years after the bribery agreement had been made and carried out.").

(n81)Footnote 81. See, e.g., United States v. Desena, 260 F.3d 150 (2d Cir. 2001) ("casual storytelling in a bar, more than two years after the event" was not in furtherance of the conspiracy but instead was "mere idle chatter"); United States v. LiCausi, 167 F.3d 36 (1st Cir. 1999) (statements made by one conspirator to his girlfriend should not have been admitted under the coconspirator hearsay exemption; the declarant was simply venting his anxiety and blowing off steam in reaction to developments in the conspiracy); United States v. Cornett, 195 F.3d 776 (5th Cir. 1999) (statements by coconspirator did not further the conspiracy, when they were made by the declarant to her former boyfriend as a "casual aside").

(n82)Footnote 82. See, e.g., United States v. Tom, 330 F.3d 83 (1st Cir. 2003) (coconspirator's statement to a drug buyer that he had dealt with the defendant for a year was a statement of reassurance and so in furtherance of the conspiracy); United States v. Jefferson, 215 F.3d 820 (8th Cir. 2000) (statements made by one conspirator to another were in furtherance of the conspiracy where the declarant was reporting a botched murder attempt to keep the other conspirators apprised of developments: "Statements that describe past events are in furtherance of the conspiracy if they are made simply to keep coconspirators abreast of current developments and problems facing the group."); United States v. Bowman, 215 F.3d 951 (9th Cir. 2000) (narrations of past events are sometimes inadmissible as coconspirator statements, but in this case the coconspirator's statements to his girlfriend were in furtherance of the conspiracy because the declarant was seeking his girlfriend's assistance in criminal acts).

(n83)Footnote 83. See, e.g., United States v. Sepulveda, 15 F.3d 1161 (1st Cir. 1993) (some independent evidence was required before coconspirator evidence could satisfy the hearsay exemption); United States v. Gordon, 844 F.2d 1397 (9th Cir. 1988) (for coconspirator hearsay statements to be admissible, "there must be some evidence, aside from the proffered statements, of the existence of the conspiracy and the defendant's involvement").

(n84)Footnote 84. See United States v. Capelton, 350 F.3d 231 (1st Cir. 2003) (finding sufficient independent evidence of the existence of a conspiracy to support admissibility of coconspirator hearsay).

(n85)Footnote 85. For a discussion of the reasonable suspicion standard, with examples, see S. Saltzburg & D. Capra, American Criminal Procedure ch. 2 (7th ed. 2004).

(n86)Footnote 86. See, e.g., United States v. Peveto, 881 F.2d 844 (10th Cir. 1989) (evidence that the defendant and the declarant lived in the same apartment complex in one city and moved to the same complex in another city and evidence of narcotics paraphernalia found in the defendant's apartment established, in connection with facts in the statement -- that ownership of drug houses could be concealed by a lawyer, whom the declarant understood to be the defendant -- by a preponderance of evidence that the defendant was a member of the conspiracy).

(n87)Footnote 87. See, e.g., United States v. Clark, 18 F.3d 1337 (6th Cir. 1994) (finding sufficient independent evidence to support introduction of coconspirator statements; the Court stated that "'[s]ome' independent evidence is not merely a scintilla, but rather enough to rebut the presumed unreliability of hearsay"); United States v. Neal, 78 F.3d 901 (4th Cir. 1996) (the Court found three pieces of evidence that, together with the hearsay statements themselves, established a drug conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence; the independent evidence was: corroboration that the coconspirators had become aware of police surveillance; the defendant's own statement to an undercover agent that the declarant would not be able to sell him any drugs; and a sheet of paper found in the defendant's apartment with the declarant's name and telephone number on it).

(n88)Footnote 88. See, e.g., United States v. Hasner, 340 F.3d 1261 (11th Cir. 2003) (no error when coconspirator statements were provisionally admitted subject to the government connecting them up with sufficient foundation evidence); United States v. McCarthy, 961 F.2d 972 (1st Cir. 1992) (there was no error in admitting coconspirator statements conditionally, where previous trials of other alleged coconspirators indicated it was likely that the foundation would be established; at the close of evidence, the Trial Judge reviewed only the evidence adduced at the defendant's trial and found that the prosecution had met its burden of showing the existence of the conspiracy and the participation of the declarant and the defendant therein); United States v. Ferra, 900 F.2d 1057 (7th Cir. 1990) (admitting coconspirator hearsay statements subject to connection is not a routine but, rather, an exceptional procedure, appropriate only when the evidence on the question of conspiracy is extensive; most of the time it is better, especially because of double jeopardy problems, to make a preliminary determination rather than to decide the admissibility question on a mistrial motion).

(n89)Footnote 89. See, e.g., United States v. Wood, 851 F.2d 185 (8th Cir. 1988) (the Trial Judge may admit coconspirator hearsay subject to connection, but the government is on notice that at the conclusion of all the evidence, the Court will make an explicit determination on the record of whether, in its view, the government has proved a conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence; if the Trial Judge determines that the government has failed to carry its burden, the Court will declare a mistrial unless an instruction to the jury to disregard the evidence would suffice to cure any prejudice). Compare United States v. Freeman, 208 F.3d 332 (1st Cir. 2000) (coconspirator hearsay was admitted subject to establishing a conspiratorial connection between the defendant and the declarant; when the government failed to make that connection at trial, the Trial Judge struck the statement and issued a curative instruction; this was held a sufficient remedy, the Court noting that the hearsay statement was only a small part of the evidence in a seven-day trial and had little relevance to the only charge on which the defendant was convicted).

(n90)Footnote 90. See, e.g., United States v. Ferra, 900 F.2d 1057 (7th Cir. 1990) (even in complex cases, the Trial Judge should require parties to state what they believe the evidence will establish, and then decide whether that will suffice); United States v. Shoffner, 826 F.2d 619 (7th Cir. 1987) (the Court upheld the Trial Judge's finding that statements were in furtherance of conspiracy, but it observed that it might have been preferable for the Trial Judge to preview the government's evidence that would support its Rule 801(d)(2)(E) ruling rather than admit statements upon a representation that the government would prove at trial they were made in furtherance of conspiracy).

(n91)Footnote 91. See, e.g., United States v. Fragoso, 978 F.2d 896 (5th Cir. 1992) (for a statement to be admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(E), the Court must find by a preponderance of the evidence that the declarant and the defendant are members of the same conspiracy; this finding need not be made before the hearsay statement is heard by the jury; however, the finding of fact must be made at some point; here, the Trial Court never made a finding that the defendant and the declarant were coconspirators, but the error was harmless, because by denying the defendant's motion for acquittal at the close of the trial, "the court implicitly found the evidence sufficient to establish a conspiracy"). See also United States v. Jensen, 41 F.3d 946 (5th Cir. 1994) (coconspirator hearsay statements were properly admitted even though the Trial Court never made explicit findings concerning their admissibility; the failure to make findings was harmless, because the Trial Court had denied the defendant's motion for a directed verdict, and this was an implicit finding of evidence of conspiracy sufficient to meet the requirement of Rule 801(d)(2)(E)).

(n92)Footnote 92. See, e.g., United States v. Hartley, 678 F.2d 961 (11th Cir. 1982) (it would be improper for a Trial Judge to tell a jury that he made a preliminary determination that a conspiracy existed; once the Trial Judge decides that the statements are admissible, they should be admitted like other evidence, without special instructions); United States v. Elam, 678 F.2d 1234 (5th Cir. 1982) (where the Trial Judge determines that the requisite foundation has been established for the introduction of conspirator statements, no jury instruction is necessary and none should be given).

(n93)Footnote 93. See, e.g., United States v. Vega, 285 F.3d 256 (3d Cir. 2002) (statements properly admitted if in furtherance of an uncharged conspiracy); United States v. DeVillio, 983 F.2d 1185 (2d Cir. 1993) (the prosecution must show by a preponderance of evidence that the defendant and the declarant are members of the same conspiracy, but there is no requirement that the defendant actually be charged with conspiracy).

(n94)Footnote 94. See, e.g., United States v. Barksdale-Contreras, 972 F.2d 111 (5th Cir. 1992) (statements of coconspirators were admissible even though a defendant was acquitted of conspiracy, given the different standards applicable to admissibility and guilt determinations); United States v. Peralta, 941 F.2d 1003 (9th Cir. 1991) (the difference between what must be proved to invoke the hearsay exception and what must be proved in order to convict a person of the crime of conspiracy, as well as the difference in the burden of proof, means that preclusion doctrines do not automatically bar the use of statements by a person who has been acquitted of conspiracy charges).

(n95)Footnote 95. See, e.g., United States v. Smith, 550 F.2d 277 (5th Cir. 1977) .

(n96)Footnote 96. See, e.g., Smith v. Updegraff, 744 F.2d 1354 (8th Cir. 1984) (in a civil rights action against a sheriff and others, statements by the sheriff were properly admitted against other defendants once the plaintiff proved that there was a conspiracy and that the statements were made in furtherance thereof while the conspiracy was ongoing); Miltland Raleigh-Durham v. Myers, 807 F. Supp. 1025 (S.D.N.Y. 1992) (in an action by limited partners against a general partner alleging, inter alia, fraud, the plaintiffs demonstrated sufficient evidence of conspiracy to warrant admission of statements under Rule 801(d)(2)(E)).

(n97)Footnote 97. See, e.g., Horton v. Allen, 370 F.3d 75 (1st Cir. 2004) (non-testimonial hearsay should be evaluated under the Ohio v. Roberts test to determine whether it violates the defendant's right to confrontation); United States v. Holmes, 406 F.3d 337 (5th Cir. 2005) (with respect to nontestimonial hearsay statements, "Crawford leaves in place the Roberts approach to determining admissibility."); United States v. Franklin, 415 F.3d 537 (6th Cir. 2005) ("the Supreme Court did not explicitly overrule its prior Confrontation Clause jurisprudence with its holding in Crawford" insofar as it applied to nontestimonial hearsay; "Consequently, with respect to non-testimonial hearsay statements, Roberts and its progeny remain the controlling precedents.").

(n98)Footnote 98. The Court may provide a further indication of what it means by "testimonial" in the 2005-6 term, as it has granted certiorari in two state cases involving the admissibility of 911 calls and reports to police officers after Crawford.

(n99)Footnote 99. See, e.g., United States v. Milton, 8 F.3d 39 (D.C. Cir. 1993) (after Owens, if the declarant testifies, there is no Confrontation Clause violation so long as the witness answers questions: "When a witness has forgotten the basis for and the giving of testimony under oath in an earlier proceeding, and that testimony is then introduced into evidence, defense questioning, though impaired, is not futile for the reasons given in Owens.").

(n100)Footnote 100. See, e.g., United States v. Kappell, 418 F.3d 550 (6th Cir. 2005) (holding that admission of testimonial hearsay did not violate the Confrontation Clause because the declarant was subject to cross-examination within the meaning of Owens).

(n101)Footnote 101. See, e.g., United States v. Rollins, 862 F.2d 1282 (7th Cir. 1988) ("Where, as here, a party manifests an intent to adopt another person's statements as his or her own, the need to cross-examine the absent informant is not present and the confrontation clause is not violated.").

(n102)Footnote 102. See, e.g., United States v. Saks, 964 F.2d 1514 (5th Cir. 1992) (hearsay exemption for agency admissions, Rule 801(d)(2)(D), is "firmly rooted" and therefore a statement admissible under that exemption automatically satisfies the Confrontation Clause).

(n103)Footnote 103. United States v. Sanchez-Berrios, 424 F.3d 65 (1st Cir. 2005) (noting that Crawford "explicitly recognized that statements made in furtherance of a conspiracy by their nature are not testimonial"); United States v. Hendricks, 395 F.3d 173 (3d Cir. 2005) (even under the broadest definition of "testimonial" discussed in Crawford -- reasonable anticipation of use in a criminal trial or investigation -- hearsay statements were not testimonial, as they were informal statements among coconspirators).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 801 RULE 801

4-801 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 801.03

801.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Rule 801(a) -- Statement

[a] Rule 801(a) -- Assertive Conduct

United States v. Katsougrakis, 715 F.2d 769 (2d Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to commit mail fraud and mail fraud growing out of arson of a diner. It found that testimony by a government witness that he visited his friend, who had been burned in the arson, in the hospital and that the friend, heavily bandaged and unable to speak, nodded his head affirmatively when asked whether he had been paid to burn the diner was admissible as a statement against penal interest. The Court found that the government plainly used the nod for the truth of an assertion, and therefore it was hearsay.

Re/Max Int'l, Inc. v. Realty One, Inc., 173 F.3d 995 (6th Cir. 1999) : As evidence of a conspiracy in an antitrust case, the plaintiffs introduced testimony from a witness that when he expressed antitrust concerns to the CEO of one defendant, the CEO responded that "there was no need to worry because someone would have to prove" he spoke to the principal shareholder of the other defendant and the CEO then "leaned forward, smiled, and said 'of course we didn't.' " The Court found that the oral utterances and the act of leaning forward and smiling, when considered together as the CEO obviously intended, were a statement that the CEO had "talked" to his counterpart but that no one would be able to prove it. This statement was admissible against the CEO's employer under Rule 801(d)(2)(D).

[b] Rule 801(a) -- Implied Assertions

United States v. Long, 905 F.2d 1572 (D.C. Cir. 1990) : The Court held, in a cocaine distribution prosecution, that evidence a caller to the defendant's apartment at the time of his arrest asked the officer who answered whether the defendant "still had stuff" was not objectionable as hearsay because the caller's question was not intended to convey an assertion.

United States v. Palma-Ruedas, 121 F.3d 841 (3d Cir. 1997) : A defendant in a kidnapping and cocaine conspiracy case argued that his greeting, "Nice to meet you," tended to rebut a contention that he had previously attended a meeting with the person greeted. The Court held there was no error in excluding the statement as hearsay because it was offered for its implied assertion that the defendant had never previously met the person. In United States v. Reynolds, n1 the Court held that the hearsay rule was applicable to a statement that was offered for the truth of an implied assertion. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 801.02[1][i].

United States v. Lewis, 902 F.2d 1176 (5th Cir. 1990) : The defendants in a drug trafficking case objected to testimony by an officer that when a beeper seized from the defendants went off, he called the number, identified himself as one of them, and the person at the other end asked, "Did you get the stuff?" The Court held that although implicit in the question may be an assertion that the defendants were expecting to receive some "stuff," the question was not a positive declaration and therefore not an assertion within the meaning of the Rule.

United States v. Singer, 687 F.2d 1135 (8th Cir. 1982) , aff'd in part & rev'd in part, 710 F.2d 431 (8th Cir. 1983) (en banc): In a drug prosecution, a panel of the Court held that an envelope addressed to two defendants containing a notice to terminate their tenancy was not hearsay when offered to show that the two lived together, since the landlord who addressed it was not asserting that the two lived together. The en banc Court reversed on other grounds, but adopted and reaffirmed this part of the panel opinion.

[c] Rule 801(a) -- Statements of Identification and Names

United States v. Allen, 960 F.2d 1055 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (per curiam): Affirming convictions for drug charges, the Court held that if there was any error in admitting evidence of a defendant's alias to connect him with certain drugs, it was undoubtedly harmless. The Court noted that evidence of names is commonly regarded as either not hearsay because it is not an assertion or so imbued with reliability because of its common usage as to make any objection frivolous.

United States v. Weeks, 919 F.2d 248 (5th Cir. 1990) : In affirming a conviction for kidnapping offenses, the Court held there was no error in admitting a warden's testimony as to the defendant's prison nickname, since the matter was nonassertive oral conduct and therefore was not hearsay.

United States v. May, 622 F.2d 1000 (9th Cir. 1980) : In a prosecution for unlawfully reentering a naval installation, the Court held that photographs on apprehension data cards were not hearsay, because they were not assertions. The Court also said that declarations by people of their names were properly admitted, because a name is not really testimonial and thus not hearsay.

United States v. Jackson, 88 F.3d 845 (10th Cir. 1996) : The defendant, whose name was Kenny, was charged with narcotics violations. The police officer who arrested him testified that he seized the defendant's pager and called the telephone number displayed on the pager; the person who answered said, "Is this Kenny?" Holding the testimony properly admitted as non-hearsay, the Court stated that "the important question is whether the assertion is intended" and found it "hard to believe that the declarant intended to assert that Mr. Jackson was in possession of the pager and that he was responding to her call."

[2] Rule 801(c) -- Hearsay

[a] Rule 801(c) -- Circumstantial Evidence

Keisling v. SER-Jobs for Progress, Inc., 19 F.3d 755 (1st Cir. 1994) : The Court vacated a judgment for the plaintiff in an age discrimination case because the defendant had not been permitted to elicit that the supervisor whose conduct was at issue had made comments that she herself was "too old for this job." The statements were not offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted; rather, the fact that they were made may have indicated that the supervisor's alleged comments that the plaintiff was too old for the job were not reflective of age animus but of frustration with a difficult job in a difficult economic environment. In United States v. Alosa, 14 F.3d 693 (1st Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed drug trafficking convictions, holding that drug ledgers found in the defendant's home were not hearsay, but rather were circumstantial evidence of the character and use of the place where they were found and of the authors' participation in the conspiracy. In United States v. Hensel, n2 a marijuana conspiracy prosecution, the Court found that certain lists in the possession of one defendant at the time of his arrest were properly admitted, not for their truth, but as circumstantial evidence that this defendant had a relationship with those named on the lists. The defendant's possession of the lists was not an assertion and thus not hearsay.

Headley v. Tilghman, 53 F.3d 472 (2d Cir. 1995) : In an opinion reversing habeas corpus relief granted to a state prisoner, the Court noted that questions by an unidentified caller to an alleged drug distribution location, "Are you up? Can I come by? Are you ready?," were not admitted for their truth, but as circumstantial evidence that the petitioner used his beeper to receive requests for drugs. Although the questions imply assertions, admissibility is won by emphasizing the performance aspects of the statement, which means that the hearsay risks are not as intensively implicated as when an idea is directly enunciated in a statement. In a prosecution for receiving stolen property, United States v. Rosa, 17 F.3d 1531 (2d Cir. 1994) , the Court held that lists showing the estimated market value of watches and jewelry for which the defendant was asking prices 80-90 percent lower were properly admitted over hearsay objections. The lists were not offered for the truth of the stated values, but to show that the disparity between value and price was so great as to imply that the defendants surely believed they were dealing with stolen goods. In United States v. Detrich, n3 the defendant, charged with importing heroin in a suit found in his luggage, claimed that a friend had given him the suit to deliver to the friend's brother for the brother's wedding. A statement by the brother to a DEA agent that he was getting married was excluded on hearsay grounds, but the Court reversed. The statement, regardless of its truth, provided circumstantial evidence of what the defendant had been told and thus of his state of mind.

United States v. Lis, 120 F.3d 28 (4th Cir. 1997) : In a prosecution for embezzlement, the defendant sought to rebut evidence that her expenses exceeded her income by testifying that after her husband died, she had found a briefcase full of money in their house, which she said he had received as kickbacks from his customers. To prove that the money in the briefcase was her husband's, the defendant proffered paper strips found in the briefcase, containing summed columns of numbers in her husband's handwriting, which generally corresponded to the amount of money allegedly found in the suitcase. The Court held it was error to exclude the columns of numbers as hearsay, noting that the probative value of the evidence did not depend on the accuracy of the addition, but was only evidence of a link between the husband and the money in the briefcase.

United States v. Webster, 750 F.2d 307 (5th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that a defendant's out-of-court statements relating that an airplane was stored on his property were not hearsay when offered to prove that the fact he made the statements suggested that he had nothing to hide with respect to the plane.

United States v. Dandy, 998 F.2d 1344 (6th Cir. 1993) : Affirming a conviction for tax fraud, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the clergyman who was allegedly used by the defendant for diverting income had told his secretary, "[T]ell him to get off my back and get himself another patsy." The statement was not an assertion capable of being true or false and it was being used only as evidence of the clergyman's state of mind indicating a breakdown in his relationship with the defendant.

United States v. Blandina, 895 F.2d 293 (7th Cir. 1989) : The defendant in a net-worth tax evasion case had stated that he obtained cash by selling coins from a collection he had received from his late father. The Court held that an IRS agent was properly permitted to testify to having interviewed 61 coin dealers and attended two coin shows and having found no one who had bought coins from the defendant; the testimony was not offered to prove the truth of the coin dealers' statements, but only to establish that the agent had conducted a thorough investigation and the results thereof.

United States v. Wilson, 532 F.2d 641 (8th Cir. 1976) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy to distribute heroin, the Court held there was no error in admitting two notebooks found in a house from which the defendants allegedly carried on their illegal business. The Court held that the notebooks were not hearsay, because they were not offered for their truth, but only as circumstantial proof that the apartment was used for drug trafficking.

United States v. Lopez-Alvarez, 970 F.2d 583 (9th Cir. 1992) : After a prosecution witness testified that the defendant had several times during their joint incarceration spoken of the charged kidnapping and murder, the defense attempted to ask whether other persons in the jail had also made statements about the incident. The Court held that precluding the cross-examination on hearsay grounds was error (but harmless), as the examination was not intended to develop an alternate version of the incident but merely to demonstrate that details of the crimes had been discussed in his presence, which could account for his knowing the details he related to DEA agents without having been a participant. In United States v. Jaramillo-Suarez, 950 F.2d 1378 (9th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed convictions for a cocaine distribution conspiracy, holding that a pay-owe sheet found at an apartment used by the defendant was not hearsay when offered only as circumstantial evidence to show the character and use of the place where it was found. See also United States v. Enriquez-Estrada n4(authenticated drug ledgers were admissible to show the character and use of the house in which they were found). Compare United States v. Lai, n5 where the District Court had admitted similar records merely because they were indicia of criminal activity, but the government used them to prove particular transactions in the charged drug conspiracy. Although the government argued on appeal that the records were admissible as business records or coconspirator statements, the Court remanded for a determination whether there was a proper basis for admitting the records and, if not, whether a new trial was required. In United States v. Snow, n6 the government offered, as proof that Bill Snow knowingly possessed an unregistered firearm, the briefcase in which the gun was found. Affixed to the briefcase was a red tape with the lettering "Tri. Tron. Electronics" and "Bill Snow." The Court held that the tape was not being offered for the truth of the words contained upon it; rather, the tape, when connected with its possession by the appellant, was circumstantial evidence of guilt.

United States v. McIntyre, 997 F.2d 687 (10th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed a defendant's drug convictions, holding that testimony by police officers concerning the names and locations of apartment rental, credit card, and rental car receipts was properly admitted as circumstantial evidence rather than for the truth of any matter stated in the documents.

[b] Rule 801(c) -- Confrontation Clause Inapplicable to Nonhearsay

United States v. Trala, 386 F.3d 536 (3d Cir. 2004) , vacated on other grounds, 126 S. Ct. 1078 (2006) : At the time the defendant in a robbery case was arrested, his companion made conflicting false statements regarding her identity and the source of money in their car. Affirming, the Court rejected a Confrontation Clause challenge to the statements. Although the statements were found testimonial because they were taken by a police officer in the course of interrogation, the Court held that Crawford v. Washington applies only when the statement is offered for its truth, which was not the case here because the statements were offered only to establish the defendant's consciousness of guilt. The Trial Judge had not expressly cautioned the jury against considering the statements for their truth, but there was "absolutely no risk that the jury would mistakenly assume the truth" of the statements, since they were admitted because they were so obviously false.

[c] Rule 801(c) -- Conspiratorial Acts

United States v. Boyd, 566 F.2d 929 (5th Cir. 1978) : The Court held that taped conversations of a gambling business were "verbal acts" of the charged conspiracy. In United States v. Scallion, n7 the defendants were convicted of wire fraud in a scheme involving obtaining credit from Las Vegas casinos with false credit information from a Louisiana bank. The Court held that certain casino records, including the credit applications by the conspirators were not hearsay; the statements were acts of the conspiracy, and thus had independent legal significance.

United States v. Wolfson, 634 F.2d 1217 (9th Cir. 1980) : The Court found the words of agreement in a conspiracy to be nonhearsay.

[d] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Hearsay

[i] Rule 801(c) -- Civil Cases

Rotolo v. Digital Equip. Corp., 150 F.3d 223 (2d Cir. 1998) : In a suit brought by a keyboard operator against a computer manufacturer for repetitive stress injuries, the Court found reversible error in the admission of a videotape of executives and experts from the Apple Computer Corporation, a rival of the defendant. In the tape, the participants emphasized the existence of a possible causal relation between computer keyboard use and repetitive stress injuries and discussed Apple's efforts to remedy the problem. The tape was not admissible to show notice, because it was never publicly released and therefore the defendant could not have been put on notice about it. "Simply put, the Apple videotape was inadmissible hearsay."

Guy v. Crown Equip. Corp., 394 F.3d 320 (5th Cir. 2004) : In a product liability action by a forklift operator injured when she lost her balance and her left leg came out through the operator-compartment opening and was crushed against a railing, the Court affirmed judgment as a matter of law for the manufacturer. There was no abuse of discretion when the plaintiff was not permitted to ask the defendant's expert about responses by K-Mart employees concerning the past use of operator-compartment doors on forklifts, as the plaintiff made no effort to show that the testimony fell with an exception to the hearsay rule. In Prather v. Prather, n8 the Court reversed an employee's judgment in a breach of contract case because of the erroneous admission of the employee's statements to two witnesses relating the terms of the alleged agreement; his state of mind was irrelevant, only the truth of the statements mattered.

Field v. Trigg County Hosp., Inc., 386 F.3d 729 (6th Cir. 2004) : In a medical malpractice action the defendant physician testified that he had consulted unnamed doctors at a major medical center and that they told him he was following appropriate treatment for the plaintiff. The Court held that admitting the testimony was error and vacated a judgment for the defendant. By testifying not only to the fact that a consultation took place but also to the substance of the other doctors' responses, the defendant was offering the evidence for its truth. The hearsay was not admissible under the exception for statements for purpose of medical diagnosis or treatment because the statements were not made by or on behalf of the person seeking care. In Trepel v. Roadway Express, Inc., 194 F.3d 708 (6th Cir. 1999) , to prove the value of a rare wood carving allegedly damaged by the express company's negligence, the plaintiff sought to introduce evidence of a telephone conversation with another collector, who said that she had been offered $2 million and later $2.5 million for her similar carving, and that she would be willing to sell for $3 million if she were offered that much. The Court held that the statements were proffered to prove the collector's belief in the carving's value, not as an offer to sell her carving, and were thus inadmissible hearsay.

Travelers Cas. & Sur. Co. of Am. v. Wells Fargo Bank N.A., 374 F.3d 521 (7th Cir. 2004) : In an action to recover for wrongful payment of a fraudulent check, the Court held that affidavits from employers of the depositor, which stated that the check was not authorized, were hearsay and inadmissible. In Martin v. Shawano-Gresham School Dist., 295 F.3d 701 (7th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants in an action by parents of a seventh-grade student who committed suicide after being suspended for possessing a cigarette. The Court held that the deposition testimony by the father of the student that he understood from his wife that the student was suspended from three volleyball games was inadmissible hearsay. The Court also held that a classmate's testimony that the student told her that she felt that it was unfair that her penalty was a more severe one than imposed on a friend the same day for the same offense also was hearsay if offered to prove that there was a disparity of treatment. In an employment discrimination case, Friedel v. City of Madison, n9 the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants, holding that statements of police officers that concerned what they had heard about officers exchanging answers and passing academy training without meeting a requirement was inadmissible hearsay. Thus, it was properly disregarded when the Trial Judge ruled on the summary judgment motion.

Qualley v. Clo-Tex Int'l., Inc., 212 F.3d 1123 (8th Cir. 2000) : In a RICO fraud suit involving a purchase of Nigerian crude oil that was never delivered, the Court vacated a judgment for the plaintiff, holding it was error to admit deposition testimony in which the deponent said that he called a bank and spoke to an employee who told the deponent what names were on an account, because the bank employee's statement was inadmissible hearsay. In a wrongful death action, Maddox v. Patterson, 905 F.2d 1178 (8th Cir. 1990) , the Court held that testimony by a nurse, who visited the decedent only to catheterize her, to the effect that an unidentified person had said that the decedent had been semi-comatose for six days was properly excluded as hearsay. In a patent infringement case, Square Liner 360 degrees, Inc. v. Chisum, n10 the Court found that a letter to the party claiming infringement from a company that had been consulted for marketing assistance, in which the marketing company said that the invention was "most original and practical," was hearsay and could not qualify as a business record.

Mahone v. Lehman, 347 F.3d 1170 (9th Cir. 2003) : In a prisoner's § 1983 action after he was placed in solitary confinement in a cold, bare strip cell without clothing or running water, the Court reversed a judgment for the defendants because the plaintiff was improperly asked what he had "been diagnosed as" after the incident. The psychiatrist's diagnosis was hearsay because it was relevant only if the jury believed the therapist's opinion. In Flores v. United States, n11 a bail bondsman sued to recover money seized from him by the IRS. The Court reversed a finding that the money belonged to a person with outstanding tax liabilities to the United States, holding that a letter from a Mexican bank delivered to a border station, which stated that the money belonged to the person owing taxes, was inadmissible hearsay.

Sanjuan v. IBP, Inc., 160 F.3d 1291 (10th Cir. 1998) : In an action by a former employee who alleged that he had been discharged in retaliation for making a worker's compensation claim, the plaintiff introduced testimony by the defendant's supervisors that they had heard complaints from injured employees to the effect that they were harassed following injuries or medical benefits claims. The Court held that the evidence was inadmissible hearsay because it repeated out-of-court statements by the other employees to prove that the defendant did in fact have a practice of mistreating injured employees. In a product liability wrongful death action involving a pipelayer, Huffman v. Caterpillar Tractor Co., 908 F.2d 1470 (10th Cir. 1990) , the Court held that testimony relating expressions of concern by co-workers that the decedent may not have been competent to operate the machine were properly excluded as hearsay. In New England Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Anderson, n12 an insurance company sued to set aside a life insurance policy as fraudulently procured by a beneficiary, who allegedly conspired to murder the insured, her first husband. The Court held that a newspaper account of the affair was hearsay, inadmissible as an adoptive admission or under the residual exception.

Nettles v. Electrolux Motor AB, 784 F.2d 1574 (11th Cir. 1986) : Although the Court affirmed a judgment for a wood cutter in a product liability action against a chain saw manufacturer, it found that testimony of a claims adjuster for a workers' compensation fund, that 49 of the 50 chainsaw claims the adjuster had "seen" in her office involved the defendant's saws, should not have been admitted. The testimony was hearsay evidence, but the error was harmless. In ADP-Fin. Computer Servs., Inc. v. First Nat'l Bank, n13 the Court affirmed a judgment for a computer services company against a bank for the bank's failure to pay for services rendered, finding that a customer survey conducted by the plaintiff was hearsay and not admissible for the defendant. The customer comments were not business records and were not statements by a party.

Superior Fireplace Co. v. Majestic Prods. Co., 270 F.3d 1358 (Fed. Cir. 2001) : The owner of a patent in an infringement action sought to prove that a certificate of correction had been properly issued by introducing a declaration by its patent attorney that the patent examiner had said the certificate was granted because the error sought to be corrected was a typographical error on his part. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the declaration as hearsay, since it was offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted and there was no showing that the examiner's statement was contrary to his pecuniary or proprietary interest or tended to subject him to civil or criminal liability.

[ii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Hearsay -- Criminal Cases

[A] Rule 801(c) -- Defense Evidence

United States v. Sesay, 313 F.3d 591 (D.C. Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a conviction for drug and firearm offenses, holding that a statement in a police report that unidentified witnesses saw a person other than the defendant with the gun was properly excluded as hearsay. It was not relevant for anything other than the truth of the statement. The Court added that, if the evidence had any relevance as "background," the probative value was substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect.

United States v. Berrios, 132 F.3d 834 (1st Cir. 1998) : In a drug case, the government introduced evidence indicating that a man named "Pablo" was the drug dealer, and introduced other evidence indicating that the defendant Mario Mendez was known as "Pablo." The Court found no error in the exclusion of testimony from a witness that she was present at a drug deal in which her husband introduced the seller as "Pablo," and that "Pablo" was not Mendez. The evidence was hearsay, because for the witness' testimony to be "tenable the statement made by her husband must have been true."

United States v. Palma-Ruedas, 121 F.3d 841 (3d Cir. 1997) : A defendant in a kidnapping and cocaine conspiracy case argued that his greeting, "Nice to meet you," tended to rebut a contention that he had previously attended a meeting with the person greeted. The Court held there was no error in excluding the statement as hearsay because it was offered for its implied assertion that the defendant had never previously met the person.

United States v. Bishop, 264 F.3d 535 (5th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed a conviction for tax evasion offenses, finding no error in the exclusion of testimony from the defendant's tax lawyer that Bishop's former bookkeeper said she knew Bishop received a $400,000 fee in 1994, that it was her fault it was omitted from the books used to prepare his tax returns, and that she did not know why she failed to record the fee. The Court reasoned that Bishop offered the statements in order to prove the truth of their content, "that is, to show it was not his fault that all or a portion of the $400,000 fee was not reported to the IRS."

United States v. Hatchett, 918 F.2d 631 (6th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a conviction for tax evasion, holding that testimony by the defendant's attorney as to statements the defendant made to the attorney about his then-pending tax situation were properly excluded as hearsay because they were only relevant to an advice-of-counsel defense if the jury considered them truthful. The dissenting Judge said that the majority had conflated two issues: whether the defendant disclosed his tax situation to his attorney, on which the defendant's statements were relevant regardless of their truth; and whether the contents of the disclosure were true, for which the testimony was hearsay. All agreed that a videotape of a television news show focusing on practices at the local IRS office was properly excluded as hearsay.

United States v. Arroyo, 406 F.3d 881 (7th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed heroin-related convictions, rejecting the defendant's argument that a memorandum prepared by an IRS agent relating a statement by a confidential informant was admissible to prove the state of mind of the investigating officers. The Court found that the defendant actually offered the memo to prove the truth of the informant's statement, which was inadmissible hearsay. In United States v. Rettenberger, 344 F.3d 702 (7th Cir. 2003) , a defendant, charged with fraudulently obtaining disability insurance payments by faking mental impairment, attempted to introduce a tape recording of an interview he had with an agent posing as a Social Security worker. The defendant argued that his mention of working on a project was belated notice to the agency about a fact missing from his disability application. That particular use was not hearsay, but the remainder of the tape was full of the defendant's descriptions of his limited abilities, which could have been relevant only for the truth of his narration, and thus hearsay. When the prosecutor made a hearsay objection to the tape, defense counsel did not propose to redact it, so the Court held there was no error in excluding the tape.

United States v. Sadler, 234 F.3d 368 (8th Cir. 2000) : Affirming convictions for armed bank robbery and firearm possession, the Court held that testimony from an attorney who had represented the defendant in state court that the defendant protested his innocence moments before confessing to a deputy was inadmissible hearsay. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 801.02[1][e].

United States v. Fontenot, 14 F.3d 1364 (9th Cir. 1994) : The defendant, charged with hiring someone to murder his wife, sought to introduce as exculpatory evidence his statement shortly after a telephone conversation that "they are going to kill [my wife]" and another statement made four days later that he had to go to San Francisco and that his life was in danger by going but in even more danger if he didn't go. The Court held there was no error in excluding the statements, as they were hearsay offered to prove the facts asserted and they did not fall within any of the exceptions.

[B] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Hearsay -- Criminal Cases -- Official and Confidential Informants

United States v. Williams, 358 F.3d 956 (D.C. Cir. 2004) : The Court remanded the defendant's case for a hearing on whether his counsel's performance was constitutionally ineffective, after counsel made no objection to testimony from the arresting officers that they had pursued the defendant after receiving complaints from nontestifying witnesses that they had been victims of armed robberies. To the extent that the testimony was relevant to a fact of consequence in the trial for felon firearm possession, it was hearsay because it was relevant only for the truth of the assertion that the defendant possessed a weapon. To the extent that the testimony was offered as "background" information, it was inadmissible because its considerable prejudicial effect substantially outweighed its minimal value as background. In United States v. Evans, 216 F.3d 80 (D.C. Cir. 2000) , an FBI agent was permitted to testify in a drug prosecution that he had received information from a federal inmate that the defendant was involved in drug trafficking. The testimony was ostensibly admitted not for its truth, but only as "background," to explain the agent's conduct in arresting the defendant. The Court found it was error (but harmless) to admit the statement, since its probative value for the nonhearsay purpose of background evidence was substantially outweighed by the risk that the jury would use the information for its truth, "and hence as evidence of his propensity to commit the crimes with which he was charged."

United States v. Garcia-Morales, 382 F.3d 12 (1st Cir. 2004) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) in a drug conspiracy case when the government's first witness, the Customs Service agent in charge of the investigation, testified, before any evidence of conspiracy was presented, that the defendant was a member of the conspiracy, and also testified to an informant's conversation with a conspirator even though he was not a participant in the conversation. The Court found the testimony was hearsay based upon information provided by others. In United States v. Mazza, n14 the Court affirmed cocaine convictions, but it criticized the Trial Judge's permitting two government agents to testify as to what an informant told them the defendants had done and said in various conversations. The Judge instructed the jury that the testimony was offered not for its truth, but to explain why the agents acted as they did. The Court found that this evidence had almost no probative value, even though the defendants raised an entrapment defense. It reasoned that the agents could have testified that they debriefed the informant after his conversations with the defendants and left the informant to testify as to what the defendants said. The error was harmless, however.

United States v. Forrester, 60 F.3d 52 (2d Cir. 1995) : After a 17-year-old female telephoned police to alert them to drug-related activities at a motel, officers found the caller, another female, and the defendant in a motel room, but found no drugs or drug paraphernalia. At the defendant's trial on cocaine charges, the government asked its first witness, the police sergeant who took the telephone call, whether he had been involved in a "narcotics-related incident" at the motel. He answered affirmatively and was cross-examined as to the scene that he found at the motel. Thereafter, the government elicited from the sergeant hearsay testimony as to what the 17-year-old caller had told him. The government argued that the call was admissible to explain why the officer came to the scene and arrested the defendants. Reversing because the hearsay testimony was improperly admitted, the Court held that the government's proffered not-for-truth purpose had no relevance in the case. The defense was based upon a claim that prostitution, not drug use, was occurring at the motel, and this defense did not suggest any impropriety on the part of the police. Thus, there was no basis to introduce hearsay to explain the sergeant's conduct. In United States v. Reyes, 18 F.3d 65 (2d Cir. 1994) , the Court reversed a conviction for conspiring to import narcotics, holding it was error to admit as nonhearsay a Customs agent's testimony regarding statements by two persons who implicated the defendant in the conspiracy, even though the declarants' exact words were not repeated. Although the jury was instructed that the statements were not admitted for their truth, the likelihood was sufficiently high that the jury would have treated the evidence for its truth anyway. The Court also rejected the argument that the evidence was properly admitted as "background" and observed that "contrary to the government's contention, the mere identification of a relevant non-hearsay use of such evidence is insufficient to justify its admission if the jury is likely to consider the statement for the truth of what was stated with significant resultant prejudice." In United States v. Ocampo, n15 a defendant in a drug case won reversal of his conviction on the ground that a witness was permitted to testify that an unidentified informant told him that the defendant was known by another name. The Court found this to be inadmissible hearsay. In United States v. Check, n16 the Court reversed a drug conviction because the government improperly utilized its undercover agent as a trial witness. The agent testified about several conversations he had with an informant. Although the agent purported to relate only his own out-of-court statements, in effect he introduced the informant's statements as well.

United States v. Lopez, 340 F.3d 169 (3d Cir. 2003) : A federal inmate, charged with possession of heroin, argued that the heroin, which was found in a laundry bag, was possessed by someone else. The Court reversed the conviction because inadmissible hearsay was admitted against the defendant. Two officers, when asked why they searched the defendant's cell, testified that they had "received information" that Lopez had drugs on his person or in his cell. The government argued that this testimony was proper, as it established "background" in that it explained why the officers decided to search the defendant's cell. But the Court held that the real use of the informant's statements was to prove that the defendant in fact possessed drugs. In a prosecution for felon firearm possession, United States v. Sallins, 993 F.2d 344 (3d Cir. 1993) , the arresting officer testified that, in response to a radio call, he had been looking for a black male wearing all black clothing who was carrying a gun. The Court held it was reversible error to introduce the contents of the radio call, which was hearsay going far beyond any background necessary to explain why the officers acted as they did.

United States v. Johnston, 127 F.3d 380 (5th Cir. 1997) : The Court held that prosecutors engaged in misconduct in a massive drug trafficking prosecution when they repeatedly asked law enforcement agents what steps they took during their investigation and why they took those steps. They were thereby able to indirectly introduce damaging hearsay testimony of informants and other law enforcement agents. The Court said that "[t]he questions were clearly improper and highly prejudicial to the defendants," but concluded that the errors were harmless in the circumstances. In a prosecution for felon firearm possession, United States v. Evans, 950 F.2d 187 (5th Cir. 1991) , a BATF agent who searched the defendant's apartment in St. Louis testified that a woman at the apartment told him that the defendant owned a gun, showed him where it was usually kept (it was not there), and described the gun. The evidence was admitted ostensibly to give "background" on the surveillance in El Paso that led to the defendant's arrest with a similar gun secreted in his car. Reversing the conviction, the Court held that the woman's statement was used for its truth and was the only direct evidence showing that the defendant would have known the gun was in the car. In United States v. Escobar, n17 the Court reversed a conviction for marijuana offenses because a police officer explained how his attention focused on the defendant by relating computer information that stated the defendant was a suspected marijuana smuggler. The evidence was hearsay, clearly prejudicial, and was not offered for any proper limited purpose. In United States v. Hernandez, n18 the Court reversed a defendant's cocaine convictions, because of error in permitting a government witness to testify that U.S. Customs had identified the defendant as a drug smuggler. The testimony was hearsay and could not be used to prove the state of mind of the witness, a DEA agent, since his state of mind was irrelevant. Compare United States v. Garza, n19 a civil rights prosecution against police officers charging them with illegal arrests. The Court found it was error (but harmless) to exclude testimony about what the officers were told about the arrestees. The statements were not offered for their truth, but to explain the arrests.

United States v. Silva, 380 F.3d 1018 (7th Cir. 2004) : In a prosecution for methamphetamine crimes, a DEA agent testified to conversations between a non-testifying DEA informant and an alleged supplier that mentioned the defendant as the person making a delivery. The prosecution argued that the evidence was offered to explain the actions taken by the witness in response to the hearsay. Reversing, the Court noted that "[t]here are no doubt times when the testimony regarding a tip from an informant is relevant," but found that the broad argument made by the government "would eviscerate the constitutional rights to confront and cross-examine one's accusers." In a bank robbery case where identity was the disputed issue, United States v. Williams, 133 F.3d 1048 (7th Cir. 1998) , a government agent was permitted to testify that a confidential informant told him that the defendants committed the robbery. This testimony was ostensibly offered not for its truth, but rather "to establish the course of the police investigation." The Court held that the testimony was hearsay and its admission was reversible error. The Court noted that "[c]ontext and background can be established, and are properly established, without the admission of the confidential informant's hearsay declaration." Even if the informant's statement were probative of "context," the risk of prejudicial use of the statement as hearsay substantially outweighed its probative value. In United States v. Lovelace, n20 the defendant was arrested driving a rental car with its trunk full of cocaine and drug paraphernalia after police received an informant's tip that the defendant was to be at a particular location with cocaine for sale. Reversing, the Court held that the prejudicial effect of testimony about the tip in connecting the defendant to the drugs substantially exceeded any probative value in giving context to the officers' conduct. The Court noted that "it is the court's direction that distinguishes a tip from hearsay for the jury," but that "[a] jury is unlikely to follow an instruction given where the admission of the tip adds little to the context of the investigation or where the substance of the tip is overwhelmingly incriminating," as here. In a cocaine distribution prosecution, United States v. Dominguez, n21 the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit an agent's testimony that she had learned from Guatemalan police that tests of the delivered packages had revealed cocaine.

United States v. Blake, 107 F.3d 651 (8th Cir. 1997) : Reversing convictions for felon firearm possession and methamphetamine possession, the Court held it was error to admit a statement by an unidentified confidential informant identifying the defendant as a methamphetamine dealer. Although the statement might explain why a police investigation was undertaken, there was no showing in this case that the propriety of the investigation was in issue or that the evidence was otherwise relevant to an issue at trial.

United States v. Dean, 980 F.2d 1286 (9th Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession because the arresting deputy sheriff had been permitted to testify that he went to the defendant's home after another person had told him that the defendant had extorted money by discharging a gun near his ear. The deputy's reasons for going to the home or conducting the search that uncovered the weapon were not relevant because the defendant consented to the search; the statements were relevant to prove the possession, but only inadmissible hearsay when used for that purpose.

United States v. Becker, 230 F.3d 1224 (10th Cir. 2000) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) in a drug and weapons trial to admit a hearsay statement by a confidential informant accusing the defendant of manufacturing and selling methamphetamine. The Court noted that the government at several points in the trial invoked the informant's statements for the truth of the matter asserted, but it found the error harmless because the Judge had instructed the jury to consider the statement only as supporting the search warrant that was obtained and the officer testified that the informant never observed Becker manufacturing drugs. At a trial for making a false statement to a federal agent, in United States v. Cass, 127 F.3d 1218 (10th Cir. 1997) , the prosecution attempted to prove that the defendant's report that she had been kidnapped and raped was concocted by calling an FBI agent, who testified extensively to statements from others indicating that the defendant had staged her own kidnapping. Rejecting arguments that the statements were nonhearsay background offered after the defense "opened the door" by asserting in its opening statement that the FBI had failed to conduct a proper kidnapping investigation, the Court noted that "[h]earsay evidence that directly goes to guilt is particularly difficult to limit to background purposes," and that the prosecution in fact used the out-of-court statements in jury argument as if they were true. The error was harmless, however.

[C] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Hearsay -- Criminal Cases -- Other Cases

United States v. Stover, 329 F.3d 859 (D.C. Cir. 2003) : Affirming drug-related convictions, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit video and audio tape recordings of transactions between one defendant (Lama) and the undercover agent. There was insufficient proof that Lama was acting in furtherance of the conspiracy to admit the tapes as coconspirator's statements, and they were not admissible as " 'verbal acts' to the extent they demonstrated that Lama was a drug dealer and provided context to the other conversations in which Lama and his co-conspirators used clothing terminology to refer to drugs," as they were not statements with independent legal significance.

United States v. Garcia-Duarte, 718 F.2d 42 (2d Cir. 1983) : The Court held that a customer record book of drug transactions that included a reference that a certain person was engaged in transactions with the book's author was hearsay if offered to prove the truth of the transactions.

United States v. McGlory, 968 F.2d 309 (3d Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed convictions related to a major heroin distribution conspiracy, rejecting the government's contention that "owe sheets" referring to drug transactions were only circumstantial evidence and not hearsay, but held that most of the sheets introduced were sufficiently shown to be coconspirator statements.

United States v. Williams, 41 F.3d 192 (4th Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for possession of cocaine found in a suitcase at an airport, the government introduced evidence that a caller inquiring about the suitcase had said his name was "Wilson" and he was staying in room 412 in the Crystal City Holiday Inn. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to introduce a detective's testimony that he called the Crystal City Holiday Inn and was told "there was no Mr. Wilson in room 412," as the statement was made by an out-of-court declarant and offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

United States v. Marshall, 762 F.2d 419 (5th Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a conviction for theft of a lawn mower because the government improperly elicited testimony from an investigator that she had examined records of an Air Force post exchange and had found three lawn mowers missing. Since the records were not produced or authenticated, the testimony was hearsay elicited from a lay witness.

United States v. Hamilton, 128 F.3d 996 (6th Cir. 1997) : The defendant was convicted of tax evasion after the Judge excluded proffered receipts in reliance on a sealed pleading by a former defense counsel, which stated that she had reason to believe the defendant intended to commit perjury when testifying at trial. The Court held that it was improper to rely on the pleading, which was inadmissible hearsay, in determining the admissibility of the receipts, but the error was harmless. In United States v. Johnson, 71 F.3d 539 (6th Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed a physician's conviction for illegal distribution of drugs and mail fraud, holding it was error to admit testimony by a clinic employee that when she told the defendant's partner that pharmacies had called about prescriptions written by the defendant, the partner became upset and said she would speak to the defendant about that. However, the error was harmless, because the witness later heard the partner tell the defendant over the telephone to "stop writing prescriptions like that," which was evidence that the defendant knew he was prescribing medication without a legitimate medical purpose.

United States v. Tafollo-Cardenas, 897 F.2d 976 (9th Cir. 1990) : The declarant told agents at the time of her arrest that the defendant had given her heroin in Mexico to deliver, but at trial she said the statement was a lie. The Trial Judge refused to instruct that the prior statement could be used only for impeachment, apparently persuaded that United States v. Owens n22(see the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 801.02[3][c]), allowed its substantive use. The Court reversed, holding that the statement came within no hearsay exception, it was not admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(A) because it was not given under oath at a proceeding or deposition, the limiting instruction should have been given, and admission without the instruction was not harmless. In United States v. Bordallo, n23 a prosecution for extortion and bribery, the Court held that a written "perspective" by the defendant's campaign manager, which reflected his involvement in a payoff and his view of political attitudes in Guam, was hearsay, since it was offered to prove the truth of its contents -- i.e., that payoffs were common. Its erroneous admission was harmless, however.

United States v. Hanzlicek, 187 F.3d 1228 (10th Cir. 1999) : The defendant was charged with fraud in connection with a counterfeit check scheme he learned from the leader of the Montana Freemen, LeRoy Schweitzer. During the trial, an FBI agent was permitted to testify that banks had paid out $1.8 million on Schweitzer's fraudulent checks; the testimony was permitted to show "the effectiveness of the scheme." The Court held that admission of the evidence was error (but harmless), since it was hearsay to prove the checks were actually cashed, which was the fact necessary to establish the effectiveness of the scheme. In United States v. Glass, 128 F.3d 1398 (10th Cir. 1997) , when the defendant was arrested at an airport, he said he was going to visit "his grandmother, Ruthy Maye Simmons." Reversing the defendant's conviction for aiding and abetting his codefendant's possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, the Court held it was error to admit evidence that the nontestifying codefendant had said Ms. Simmons was not only her grandmother but also was deceased. The statement was inadmissible hearsay, offered for its truth to controvert the defendant's assertion of his travel plans. In United States v. Jefferson, n24 the Court held that a bill for purchase of a pager was inadmissible hearsay to prove that a defendant had purchased the pager. Admission of the evidence in a prosecution for possessing drugs with intent to distribute was harmless error, however.

United States v. Hunerlach, 197 F.3d 1059 (11th Cir. 1999) : Affirming convictions for tax evasion and filing a false statement, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit the testimony of an IRS agent that two alleged officers of the defendant's companies said that they were not real directors. The only relevance of the statements was to show that they were true and that the corporations were not bona fide companies.

[iii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Hearsay -- Indirect Hearsay

Ryan v. Miller, 303 F.3d 231 (2d Cir. 2002) : The Court granted a writ of habeas corpus for a petitioner convicted of murder in New York. Ryan's conviction in his first trial had been set aside because a codefendant's confession implicating him was erroneously admitted. A second trial ended in a mistrial after a prosecution witness testified that he had reviewed the illegal confession in preparation for his testimony. At the third trial, which led to the conviction being reviewed, the Judge allowed officers connected with the interrogation of Ryan to testify what they did as the interrogation of the codefendant progressed, but without testifying to what the codefendant had said. Thus, for example, the officer coordinating the interrogations testified that at some point he received a call from the detective questioning the codefendant and as a result he directed the detective questioning Ryan to advise Ryan of his rights on a murder charge. The Court held that this sort of testimony implicitly relayed the codefendant's accusation of Ryan, and since that was inadmissible hearsay, Ryan's confrontation rights had been violated.

[e] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay

[i] Rule 801(c) -- Background or Context

[A] Rule 801(c) -- Civil Cases

Foster-Miller, Inc. v. Babcock & Wilcox Can., 210 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff manufacturer, who claimed that the defendant, a competitor, had violated a confidentiality agreement and misappropriated trade secrets regarding a hose used for cleaning nuclear-powered steam generators. In arguing that its hose was not an obvious extension of existing technology, the plaintiff used notes in which an unavailable declarant reported canvassing hose makers, who had indicated that developing such a hose posed insuperable technical problems. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the notes, since they were offered not to prove the facts asserted, but to provide context for a witness who testified that he had made a subsequent search for suppliers who would make that type of hose.

[B] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Background or Context -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Vazquez-Rivera, 407 F.3d 476 (1st Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring to distribute heroin, holding that the case agent did not offer hearsay when he testified that he "already knew" the defendant was involved in drug trafficking. The statement was offered to explain why he did not include certain information in a report, not for its truth. In United States v. McDowell, 918 F.2d 1004 (1st Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed convictions for drug trafficking, holding that statements in a recorded conversation by a conspirator who had been arrested were admissible to put the defendant's statements into perspective and make them intelligible to the jury and recognizable as admissions.

United States v. Slaughter, 386 F.3d 401 (2d Cir. 2004) (per curiam): The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony that a civilian had pointed out the discarded weapon, allowing a policeman to recover it. The testimony was proffered for the legitimate purpose of explaining how the officer came to find the weapon and its probative value was not outweighed by any danger of unfair prejudice.

United States v. Wills, 346 F.3d 476 (4th Cir. 2003) : In the defendant's trial for kidnapping a person who was going to testify against him, the government evidence included taped conversations between the defendant and his brother in which the defendant revealed his scheme to kidnap and kill the witness. The defendant argued that his brother's end of the conversation was inadmissible hearsay. Affirming, the Court reasoned that the defendant's own statements were admissible as party admissions under Rule 801(d)(2)(A), and the brother's statements were not hearsay because they were offered only to give the defendant's statements context and make them understandable. Defendants appealing convictions arising out of a bid-rigging conspiracy in United States v. Romer, n25 claimed error in the admission of a newspaper article that described an unrelated bid-rigging conviction. The Court found that the article was offered "to place in its proper context the conspirators' taped discussion about the article," and concluded that "[i]n light of the independent relevance of the article and the district court's careful instruction to the jury regarding the limits of its use, we are confident that the article was admissible."

United States v. Posada-Rios, 158 F.3d 832 (5th Cir. 1998) : On cross-examination of a cooperating witness in a massive drug trafficking case, counsel elicited testimony indicating that one defendant had not been aware of other defendants' illegal activities. Later in the trial, the counsel asked a DEA agent on cross-examination whether he had participated in the debriefing of the cooperating witness "where he said my client wasn't in the drug business." In rebuttal the agent testified that the cooperating witness had said that the defendant knew two codefendants were engaging in drug trafficking and money laundering. The Court found no abuse of discretion, since the defense cross-examinations made the agent's recounting of the hearsay statements relevant to refute an implication that the government had acted in bad faith by prosecuting someone the government knew to be innocent, and the jury was properly instructed to use the statements only for their effect in forming the bases for the agents' subsequent conduct. In United States v. Cheramie, 51 F.3d 538 (5th Cir. 1995) , the Court held there was no confrontation violation when a tape recording of a conversation between the defendant and a confidential informant who was unavailable to testify at trial was admitted, as the informant's statements were admitted only for the limited purpose of providing a context for the defendant's statements and the jury was so instructed. In United States v. Vizcarra-Porras, n26 the Court found no error in a drug possession case when the arresting officer, in explaining how he came to arrest the defendant, recounted conversations in which it was asserted that the defendant had heroin, wanted to sell it, and would be coming across the border. The government consistently asserted (and limiting instructions were given) that the only reason for offering the testimony was to explain the origin of the investigation, not for the hearsay purpose of proving the defendant was predisposed to smuggle heroin, contrary to his entrapment defense.

United States v. Aguwa, 123 F.3d 418 (6th Cir. 1997) : The defendant was arrested after the suspect from whom DEA agents were attempting to make a controlled buy never appeared, but the informant recognized another man nearby who offered to help secure heroin for the informant. The other man placed several phone calls and shortly thereafter the defendant arrived and supplied the informant with heroin. Affirming a conviction for distributing heroin, the Court held there was no error when the DEA agents recounted statements by the informant that she recognized the other man and that he was calling individuals who might supply the heroin. Those statements were not offered for their truth, but only to explain how and why the agents came to be involved with this particular defendant, and none of the statements directly implicated the defendant in criminal activity. In United States v. Pulley, 922 F.2d 1283 (6th Cir. 1991) , the Court held there was no error in admitting a Customs officer's testimony in a cocaine prosecution that a little boy in the defendant's house had told him of a suspicious occurrence involving the defendant. As the testimony helped explain why the officer had continued a search for drugs after a trained "drug dog" had not detected anything, it was not inadmissible hearsay. In United States v. Martin, n27 a government investigator "set the scene" of an investigation into illicit trafficking in food stamps by recounting a general statement by an unnamed declarant that the defendant had been involved. The Court held the evidence was not "hearsay per se" because it was offered for the limited purpose of explaining how and why the investigation began and was not being used to supply otherwise unavailable evidence on the substantive charges.

United States v. Inglese, 282 F.3d 528 (7th Cir. 2002) : Employees of a federally licensed gun shop were charged with knowingly selling guns to straw purchasers, who would in turn give the guns to felons. The defendants made a hearsay objection when one of the straw purchasers testified that her boyfriend told her that he had been in jail, was a member of a street gang, and could not legally purchase a gun. The Court found no error in admitting this testimony. It was not hearsay, because it was offered "for the effect it had on the listener"--to explain why the witness had gone to the gun shop to purchase guns for her boyfriend. In United States v. Linwood, 142 F.3d 418 (7th Cir. 1998) , when officers entered the defendant's house to arrest her for selling cocaine base, the defendant was not there but her 12-year-old daughter was. When the defendant returned to the house minutes later and was told that her daughter had told the officers that her mother had been selling crack, the defendant began to pound her fists and yell at her daughter that she was not a cocaine dealer and to insist that the drugs belonged to her live-in boyfriend. The daughter also told the officers where the "dope money" was kept. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the daughter's statements, since they were offered only to establish why the defendant reacted as she did upon hearing the first statement and to show why an officer found the money where it was hidden. Any prejudicial effect from the jury's using the statements for their truth was minimized by repeated and careful instructions as to the proper non-hearsay purposes for which the statements could be used. Furthermore, the daughter testified at trial and could be cross-examined about the facts asserted in her statements. In United States v. Zizzo, n28 the Court affirmed racketeering convictions, finding no error in the introduction of taped conversations between an undercover informant and unindicted coconspirators. The statements of the coconspirators were admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(E), and the responsive statements of the informant were not hearsay, because they were offered only to "give context to the conspirators' ends of the conversations." In United States v. Levine, n29 the Court affirmed murder convictions and held there was no error in admitting evidence that the victims had accused the defendant of embezzlement, as the accusations, when the defendant learned of them, affected his state of mind and provided his motive for murder. In United States v. Lazcano, n30 a prosecution for distributing heroin, the Court held there was no error in permitting an informant to testify that the defendant was introduced to him as a member of a Mexican crime family, since the statement was offered not to prove the defendant was indeed a member of the crime family, but to set the context in which the DEA investigation originated, and the jury was carefully instructed to use it only for that purpose.

United States v. Looking Cloud, 419 F.3d 781 (8th Cir. 2005) : Affirming a murder conviction, the Court held that testimony that people within the American Indian Movement, of which the defendant was a member, had accused the victim of being an informant and that the victim stated she feared for her life were properly admitted to show the defendant's motive for killing her. In United States v. Malik, 345 F.3d 999 (8th Cir. 2003) , the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that an informant had reported to police that the defendant said he had a gun and was willing to use it against the police. The Court said that the "propriety of a police investigation" was in issue because "[t]he testimony of Malik's witness, that she did not see or feel a gun on Malik nor did she see him drop or throw a weapon, placed the officers' credibility in issue, suggesting that the officers planted or lied about the weapon dropped by Malik." In our view, the correct approach was taken by the concurring Judge, who concluded that:

> this is the type of hearsay that is clearly excluded by the hearsay rule. An out of court statement (the unidentified male statement that he saw Malik with a gun) is used to prove the truth of the matter asserted (that Malik possessed a firearm). The fact that Malik challenged the credibility of the officers' testimony does not make the statement admissible. Under the majority's holding, the police officers would be allowed to testify about a statement made by any third party, even weeks after the incident, who claim to have seen Malik with a gun.

In a prosecution for sexual abuse, United States v. Running Horse, n31 the Court held that there was no error in admitting testimony of the band teacher to whom the victim reported the abuse. The evidence was admitted as background information to assist the jury in understanding the origin of the investigation of the defendant, and the jury was instructed that it was not offered to prove that the matters reported had happened. In United States v. Davis, n32 the Court affirmed convictions for drug and firearm offenses. It found that testimony by a state law enforcement officer as to information he acquired during his investigation was properly admitted to explain the reasons for his investigation after defense counsel attacked the motivations for the investigation. In United States v. Alonzo, n33 the Court reversed convictions for conspiring to possess cocaine because a coconspirator's statement made while cooperating with the police after his arrest had been admitted against the defendants. The Court noted that on remand the Trial Judge could consider whether the statements were not hearsay if offered only to explain why the agents did what they did, but should keep in mind the prejudicial effect of such evidence and the need to avoid hearsay statements whenever possible in presenting background evidence.

United States v. Beckman, 298 F.3d 788 (9th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed marijuana convictions, holding that a Customs agent's testimony that a codefendant told him that the codefendant was jailed with two of his drug couriers, including the defendant, was not admitted for its truth. The testimony was offered to show that the codefendant brought up his relationship to the defendant on his own, not at the prodding of the government or to escape punishment. In United States v. Munoz, 233 F.3d 1117 (9th Cir. 2000) , a mail fraud trial arising from a Ponzi scheme, an attorney for the scheme's corporate vehicle testified that at one point he sent a letter to all the corporation's salesmen requesting that they suspend selling the investment. He was permitted on direct examination also to discuss a conversation he had with one of the corporation's organizers regarding a state investigation into the scheme then being conducted. The Court held that the testimony was not hearsay because it was not offered to prove the truth of the allegations made in the investigation, but only to explain why the attorney had written the letters to the salesmen, who included the defendants. In United States v. Payne, n34 the Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for carnal knowledge of a female under age 16, holding there was no error in admitting out-of-court statements indicating the victim had been abused, as they were introduced only to explain a sequence of events.

United States v. Wilson, 107 F.3d 774 (10th Cir. 1997) : Affirming convictions for felon firearm possession and cocaine possession, the Court held there was no error in admitting evidence of reports by a confidential informant regarding drug sales, as the evidence explained why the government began its investigation focusing on the defendant. In our view, the evidence served only to put before the jury out-of-court assertions that the defendant was selling drugs, since the propriety of or reason for the investigation was not at issue.

United States v. Smith, 918 F.2d 1551 (11th Cir. 1990) : Affirming convictions for importing cocaine, the Court held that recorded conversations between a coconspirator and a government informant were properly admitted as in furtherance of the conspiracy when there was evidence of the informant's participation in the conspiracy before he became an informant. The Court noted that the informant's statements in the recorded conversations were alternatively admissible not for the truth of the matter asserted, but to place the coconspirator's comments in context for the jury.

[ii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Consumer Confusion

Fun-Damental Too, Ltd. v. Gemmy Indus. Corp., 111 F.3d 993 (2d Cir. 1997) : The Court held in a trademark infringement case that evidence of dealer complaints that the infringing product was being sold at a lower price to other retailers was not hearsay. The evidence indicated the dealers' state of mind and was being offered to prove the existence of customer confusion, not differential sale prices.

Lyons Partnership, L.P. v. Morris Costumes, Inc., 243 F.3d 789 (4th Cir. 2001) : The owner of the intellectual property rights to the children's television character "Barney" sued a costume rental company for infringement.

Reversing in part a judgment for the defendants, the Court held it was improper to dismiss as "unreliable hearsay" evidence that children at a school rally confused the defendants' costume with Barney and that newspaper reporters erroneously described the costumed character as Barney. The evidence was nonhearsay, because it was offered to show the beliefs of the children and the reporters rather than the truth of their assertions, and it was highly probative of actual confusion.

[iii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Contracts

Kepner-Tregoe, Inc. v. Leadership Software, Inc., 12 F.3d 527 (5th Cir. 1994) : The Court held, in a copyright licensing case, that the defendant's objection to admission of a licensing agreement on the ground of hearsay was inapt, as a contract is a verbal act with a legal reality independent of the truth of any statement contained in it.

Mueller v. Abdnor, 972 F.2d 931 (8th Cir. 1992) : In an action for breach of a real estate sales agreement in which the defendant counterclaimed for slander of title, the Court held that a contract with a third party that fell through and the defendant's contract with its eventual purchaser were admissible, on the issue of damages, as verbal acts and not as proof of the facts asserted therein.

West Coast Truck Lines v. Arcata Community Recycling Ctr., Inc., 846 F.2d 1239 (9th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that evidence of an oral agreement was not hearsay, since the evidence of statements was admitted to show that they were made, rather than for the truth of facts asserted. In NLRB v. H. Koch & Sons, 578 F.2d 1287 (9th Cir. 1978) , the Court approved the introduction of testimony that a union accepted an offer concerning severance pay, because the testimony was not being offered to show that the people who assented to the contract were telling the truth; the only important thing was whether they uttered words of assent.

[iv] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Credibility

United States v. Norman T., 129 F.3d 1099 (10th Cir. 1997) : In a nonjury trial of a juvenile delinquency proceeding for aggravated sexual abuse, the Judge admitted evidence of the questions and answers given when the five-year-old victim's mother and grandmother asked her about her complaints of vaginal pain before taking her to the hospital for an examination. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence for the nonhearsay purpose of rebutting any contention that the questioning had been suggestive.

[v] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Directions, Instructions, Recommendations

United States v. Balthazard, 360 F.3d 309 (1st Cir. 2004) : The defendants were convicted of a conspiracy to grow marijuana plants after officers raided a warehouse containing a massive marijuana-growing operation. Affirming, the Court found no error in the admission of notes found at the warehouse. The notes were simply instructions from one conspirator to another concerning the care and feeding of marijuana plants and did not contain any hearsay statements, since they were "relevant regardless of whether the instructions they contain[ed] were ever followed." In a prosecution for extortion arising from a scheme involving falsified warrant applications, United States v. Murphy, 193 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1999) , the Court observed that instructions to a conspirator to falsify information in warrant applications and to not report moneys seized in raids conducted pursuant to the warrants were not hearsay, since they were not offered for the truth of the matters asserted but only to show that such instructions were given. In United States v. Hicks, n35 the Court held that a conversation was not hearsay when it was offered to prove that a defendant enlisted another in an attempt to make good on a threat. In Curreri v. International Bhd. of Teamsters, n36 the Court reversed a judgment against a union in an action for injuries that the plaintiff received when he crossed a picket line, finding error in the exclusion of testimony by the union's business agent concerning directions he gave to workers on the first day of the strike. The instructions were not hearsay; they were conduct probative of whether the union instigated violence or attempted to prevent it. See also Gutierrez-Rodriguez v. Cartagena n37(evidence of prior complaints against a defendant police officer were not hearsay in a civil rights action, since they were offered to show that the supervisory response was inadequate rather than for their truth).

United States v. Bellomo, 176 F.3d 580 (2d Cir. 1999) : On appeal of RICO convictions, defendants argued that hearsay had been admitted as coconspirator statements without the required finding of a specific conspiracy beyond the general existence of the Mafia. The Court found that many of the instances objected to were not instances of hearsay, since the statements fell into the category of commands as to which the witness was a percipient hearer. Thus, gestures by a mob boss conveying "no making of members" or "no killing of people" without the boss's okay were unobjectionable. According to the Court, "Statements offered as evidence of commands, threats, or rules directed to the witness, rather than for the truth of the matter asserted therein, are not hearsay."

United States v. Reilly, 33 F.3d 1396 (3d Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for illegal ocean dumping and making false statements to a grand jury, the Court held that the contents of certain radiotelegrams were not hearsay, as the messages consisted largely of instructions, which are not declarations of fact capable of being true or false.

Butters v. Vance Int'l Inc., 225 F.3d 462 (4th Cir. 2000) : The plaintiff, a security agent for a United States security services corporation, sued for gender discrimination because she was not permitted to serve a full rotation guarding a Saudi Arabian princess in California. The defendants were granted summary judgment on the basis of immunity under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. Affirming, the Court held there was no error in admitting evidence that a Saudi military officer in charge of the princess had said the plaintiff could not serve the full rotation. The statements were not hearsay but were relevant solely for the fact they were made, because they showed that the Saudis, not the defendants, were responsible for the plaintiff's assignment.

Business Elec. Corp. v. Sharp Elec. Corp., 780 F.2d 1212 (5th Cir. 1986) , aff'd, 485 U.S. 717 (1988) : Reversing an antitrust judgment against Sharp, the Court noted that it was error to exclude a document indicating a policy of replacing dealers who did not meet a sales quota. The document was not hearsay, the Court reasoned, since it stated company policy. Similarly, another document stating that the plaintiff had fallen short of its quota was nonhearsay if offered to prove the belief of the defendant. See also Muncie Aviation Corp. v. Party Doll Fleet, Inc. n38(tried pre-Rules) (two advisory circulars promulgated by the FAA containing recommendations for landing procedures were relevant on the standard of care in this aircraft collision case; Rule 801(c) was invoked to show that the evidence probably was not hearsay but was circumstantial evidence not offered for its truth).

Crawford v. Garnier, 719 F.2d 1317 (7th Cir. 1983) : Affirming an employee's judgment in an action alleging that his termination from a federal emergency employment program violated his First Amendment rights, the Court upheld the admission of the plaintiff's testimony that an employment analyst who worked for the defendant had told him to fill out an application in a certain way. The testimony was not hearsay, since it merely related instructions that were not offered for their truth.

United States v. Morales-Macias, 855 F.2d 693 (10th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed a defendant's conviction for transporting illegal aliens, finding that directions given to aliens seeking transportation were not hearsay and were offered to explain how the aliens came upon the defendant. In United States v. Shepherd, n39 the Court held that instructions by one person to another were not hearsay where they were offered to show they were given, not that they were true.

United States v. Tokars, 95 F.3d 1520 (11th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed convictions arising from a cocaine distribution ring that engaged in murder, kidnapping, torture, and money laundering. It concluded that evidence that one defendant's murdered wife had turned over documents to another person, and directed that the documents be turned over to the police if anything happened to her, did not constitute hearsay. A direction given by the wife was not a statement of fact offered for its truth.

[vi] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Employment Discrimination Cases

Staniewicz v. Beecham, Inc., 687 F.2d 526 (1st Cir. 1982) : In an age discrimination suit, the Court held that the results of a telephone audit of an employee's customers by a supervisor were not hearsay when they were offered not for their truth, but only to show why a meeting was called that ultimately led to the employee's resignation.

Cameron v. Community Aid for Retarded Children, Inc., 335 F.3d 60 (2d Cir. 2003) : The plaintiff's supervisor discharged her when his investigation revealed that she had been abusive and intimidating, she was not trusted by her staff, and she had urged the staff to join her in a bid to unseat her supervisor. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant in the plaintiff's ADA action, the Court held that the statements from the staff were not hearsay because they were offered for their effect on the supervisor's mind in making the discharge decision, and were not used to prove the truth of the matters asserted. In a § 1983 action, Barrett v. Orange County Human Rights Comm'n, 194 F.3d 341 (2d Cir. 1999) , the Commission's former executive director alleged that he was dismissed for exercising First Amendment rights. The Court found no error in the admission of testimony by commissioners that they had been told by other commissioners of the plaintiff's arrogant, difficult, and obstructionist conduct and statements. The evidence was not hearsay because it was not admitted to show that the third parties' statements were true, but rather that the witnesses were motivated by the plaintiff's behavior and not by his comments on politically sensitive issues. In Mazzella v. RCA Global Commun., Inc., n40 the Court held that evidence of complaints about an employee's performance was admissible to show why superiors acted, not for their truth.

Rinehimer v. Cemcolift, Inc., 292 F.3d 375 (3d Cir. 2002) : An employee, who suffered from asthma, was discharged after he developed pneumonia. Affirming a judgment for the defendant in a disability discrimination action, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony that the employer was told by its doctor that the plaintiff could not wear a respirator. The evidence was not offered for its truth but to explain why the manager did not allow the employee to return to his job as a working foreman and wear a respirator.

Green v. Administrators of Tulane Educ. Fund, 284 F.3d 642 (5th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a judgment for a former employee who claimed sexual harassment and retaliation by a university, the Court held that the plaintiff was properly permitted to offer evidence of three other complaints made against the supervisor who allegedly harassed her. The evidence was admitted to show that the university was on notice that the supervisor might have been engaged in harassment, not for its truth. In Wallace v. Texas Tech Univ., 80 F.3d 1042 (5th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed a judgment against an assistant basketball coach who claimed discrimination when he was not rehired, holding that specific instances cited in the head coach's affidavit of the plaintiff's refusing to follow directions and questioning the head coach's judgment were not hearsay even though not based on personal knowledge, as those incidents were not offered for their truth but only as proof of the motive for failing to renew the contract. In an age discrimination action, Stendebach v. CPC Int'l, Inc., n41 the Court held that documents offered to show the methodology used by the employer's committee to rate employees were properly not offered for their truth, but to show that they existed.

Smith v. Great Am. Restaurants, Inc., 969 F.2d 430 (7th Cir. 1992) : The Court held in an age discrimination case that there was no abuse of discretion in allowing witnesses to recount statements by the plaintiff that repeated discriminatory statements by the defendant's supervisor, as the testimony showed both that the plaintiff's version of events was consistent and that certain other employees resigned for purposes other than to join the plaintiff in a new business.

Wolff v. Brown, 128 F.3d 682 (8th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a judgment for an employer in a wrongful discharge case, the Court held that internal documents prepared by employees describing instances of the plaintiff's job misconduct were properly admitted. The reports were not hearsay, because they were offered to explain why the employer discharged the plaintiff. See also Crimm v. Missouri P. R. Co. n42(a managing agent's handwritten notes and report are not hearsay in an age discrimination case if offered to show that the company had a basis for making an employment decision).

Bouman v. Block, 940 F.2d 1211 (9th Cir. 1991) : Reviewing a Title VII sex discrimination action, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by the plaintiff that she did not take an examination because she was told she would not be promoted. The evidence was admissible to show the plaintiff's state of mind in deciding whether to take the examination. In a suit by an employee who alleged breach of contract by an employer, Henein v. Saudi Arabian Parsons Ltd., n43 the Court held that statements by the Saudi Arabian government concerning the employee were admissible as nonhearsay evidence of why the employer discharged the employee.

Moore v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 683 F.2d 1321 (11th Cir. 1982) : In an age discrimination case, Sears introduced memoranda prepared by the plaintiff's supervisor to show why it fired the plaintiff. The Court held that the evidence was not hearsay. It was not offered for its truth, but to show that Sears had a nondiscriminatory reason for the discharge.

[vii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Existence of Information

Harvey Barnett, Inc. v. Shidler, 338 F.3d 1125 (10th Cir. 2003) : Reviewing summary judgment for the defendant in a trade secret case, the Court held there was no error when the Judge relied on library books and information downloaded from the Internet in determining that variations of the plaintiff's methods "are known both inside and outside the children's aquatic business," and that a variation of the plaintiff's methods "could be created through a perusal of commercially available ... books." The materials considered were not admitted for the truth of the matter asserted therein, but for the very fact that publicly-available information existed.

[viii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- False Statements

United States v. Perholtz, 842 F.2d 343 (D.C. Cir. 1988) : In a racketeering case involving procurement of Postal Service contracts, the Court held that a "script" prepared by one defendant for another person, in an effort to influence what he would say about the scheme, was nonhearsay. The government offered the script to prove that the information contained therein was false, rather than true.

United States v. Munson, 819 F.2d 337 (1st Cir. 1987) : The Court held that false statements by conspirators to conceal their actions were not hearsay.

United States v. Aponte, 31 F.3d 86 (2d Cir. 1994) : In a postal robbery conspiracy case, the Trial Judge excluded as hearsay evidence that a government witness had given a fabricated statement and false descriptions of the "robbers."

The Court held that the statements were not hearsay because they were offered to show the witness' capacity for deception, not for the truth of the matter asserted; however, they were properly excluded under Rule 608(b) as extrinsic evidence of the character and conduct of the witness.

United States v. Palma-Ruedas, 121 F.3d 841 (3d Cir. 1997) : During a kidnapping and drug distribution conspiracy, a detective came to the door of a house in which conspirators were staying. A defendant and the wife of another answered the door; the latter gave a false name for the former. The Court held that the woman's statement was not hearsay because it was not offered for its truth. Rather, the false statement tended to show the defendant's consciousness of guilt because he did not correct it, and the jury could reasonably have inferred that he welcomed the misidentification.

United States v. Moore, 748 F.2d 246 (5th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that a letter written by the defendant was not hearsay where it was not offered for its truth but to establish mail fraud. See also United States v. Adkins, 741 F.2d 744 (5th Cir. 1984) (statements offered to prove falsity, not truth, are not hearsay).

United States v. Hathaway, 798 F.2d 902 (6th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a fraud conviction, the Court concluded that business records were admissible as nonhearsay when they were offered to show that they existed, something denied by the defendant as an excuse for not returning funds to customers. The Court also noted that statements offered to prove the falsity of the matters asserted were not hearsay.

United States v. Feldman, 825 F.2d 124 (7th Cir. 1987) : Affirming convictions for fraud, the Court held that testimony concerning representations by salesmen was nonhearsay evidence offered to prove that the statements were false. Thus, it was not necessary to decide whether the statements were agents' admissions. See also United States v. Hoag, 823 F.2d 1123 (7th Cir. 1987) (letters claimed to be false were not hearsay).

United States v. Knigge, 832 F.2d 1100 (9th Cir. 1987) , amended, 846 F.2d 591 (9th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that the hearsay rule does not bar evidence of statements offered for purposes of showing that they were false. In United States v. Gibson, n44 the Court held that testimony by investors as to what salesmen said to get them to invest was not hearsay; it was offered to prove a scheme. See also United States v. Wellington n45(false representations alleged as mail fraud are not hearsay).

United States v. Costa, 31 F.3d 1073 (11th Cir. 1994) : The Court held that a custodial statement in which the declarant sought to exculpate himself was not hearsay, where the government sought to create an inference of his guilt by showing, through the introduction of other evidence, that the declarant had lied to his interrogators.

[ix] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Impeachment

Conte v. General Housewares Corp., 215 F.3d 628 (6th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a judgment for a painter who was severely injured when an extension pole he used to paint a water tank came into contact with energized power lines, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to exclude on hearsay grounds a statement by another painter that he knew the power lines were hot. The statement was offered to impeach the witness' contrary trial testimony, and not for its truth.

United States v. McGee, 408 F.3d 966 (7th Cir. 2005) : The defendants in a drug trafficking conspiracy trial sought to impeach a cooperating witness with two letters the witness had written to the prosecutor in which he said he was "not a bad person" and was "riding with the government 100%" and that he knew enough information so that "we can make arrangements for [me] to go home." The Court noted that "the better practice would have been" for the Judge to allow each defense attorney some leeway to cross-examine the witness on the letters, as evidence of his biases and motivations for testifying, but that any error was harmless. The Court rejected the government's assertion that the letters were inadmissible hearsay, noting that they were "textbook examples of impeachment evidence."

United States v. Sadler, 234 F.3d 368 (8th Cir. 2000) : In a trial for armed bank robbery and firearm possession, the defendant offered testimony from an attorney who had represented him in state court that the defendant protested his innocence moments before confessing to a deputy. Affirming, the Court rejected a defense argument that the evidence was admissible for the nonhearsay purpose of impeaching the credibility of the officer, who testified that the defendant confessed to him, saying that "the proffered testimony would only have its desired effect if in fact the statements [to the attorney] were true." This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 801.02[1][e]. In a product liability action for automobile injuries allegedly caused by a defective gearshift, Foster v. General Motors Corp., 20 F.3d 838 (8th Cir. 1994) (per curiam), the defendant introduced the original police report prepared by the investigating officer, together with a copy of the report received from the plaintiffs' attorney that contained alterations in a different handwriting that blamed the accident on the car's gearshift. The Court held the second report was not hearsay lacking trustworthiness for admission under the public records exception; rather, it was offered only to impeach a plaintiff's direct testimony that he did not alter the report before giving it to his attorney and thereby to rebut the claim that the gearshift caused the accident.

Ostad v. Oregon Health Sciences Univ., 327 F.3d 876 (9th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for a former resident at a medical university who claimed that he was terminated in retaliation for questioning a physician's billing practices, the Court upheld the admission of prior inconsistent statements of a defense witness, noting that they were offered for impeachment rather than for their truth.

[x] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Information Automatically Generated

United States v. Khorozian, 333 F.3d 498 (3d Cir. 2003) : In a bank fraud prosecution the Court held that it was error (but harmless) to exclude a fax offered by the defense because the header, which included the transmission date, was hearsay. The header was not hearsay because "[u]nder FRE 801(a), a statement is something uttered by 'a person,' so nothing 'said' by a machine ... is hearsay."

United States v. Hamilton, 413 F.3d 1138 (10th Cir. 2005) : In a prosecution for transporting child pornography, the Court held there was no error in admitting header information on computer images over a hearsay objection. The header, which was automatically generated by the hosting computer whenever an image was uploaded, included the screen name of the poster, the subject of the posting, the date, and the person's IP address. Because the header was generated without the assistance or input of a person, "there was neither a 'statement' nor a 'declarant' involved here within the meaning of Rule 801," so the information was not hearsay.

[xi] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Knowledge and Notice

[A] Rule 801(c) -- Civil Cases

Rogers v. Ingersoll-Rand Co., 144 F.3d 841 (D.C. Cir. 1998) : In a product liability action for injuries from a milling machine, the plaintiff offered evidence that the same model of milling machine had killed a worker in Canada a year earlier. The defendant responded with testimony from a coroner's inquest into the Canadian incident, which indicated that those investigating the incident concluded that the accident was caused by the victim's own carelessness. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude the testimony from the coroner's inquest as hearsay, since the testimony was not offered for its truth, "but rather to prove that the defendant was not on notice of the alleged design defect."

Coyne v. Taber Partners I, 53 F.3d 454 (1st Cir. 1995) : Reversing a summary judgment for the defendant hotel in a negligence suit by a guest injured during a labor dispute, the Court held that a newspaper article describing the tense circumstances and potential for violence was not hearsay because it was not offered for its truth but rather to establish that the hotel knew or should have known of the violent nature of the protest.

Green v. Administrators of Tulane Educ. Fund, 284 F.3d 642 (5th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a judgment for a former employee who claimed sexual harassment and retaliation by a university, the Court held that the plaintiff was properly permitted to offer evidence of three other complaints made against the supervisor who allegedly harassed her. The evidence was admitted to show that the university was on notice that the supervisor might have been engaged in harassment, not for its truth. In a wrongful death action arising from an accident on a conveyor, Alexander v. Conveyors & Dumpers, Inc., n46 the Court affirmed a judgment for the manufacturer, holding that testimony by the deceased co-worker concerning a conversation he had had with the deceased concerning the conveyor was not hearsay, since it was admitted to show knowledge of danger and assumption of the risk, not the truth of statements made in the conversation.

Cook v. Navistar Int'l Transp. Corp., 940 F.2d 207 (7th Cir. 1991) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action brought by a truck driver who was injured while attempting to climb the rear of the cab, the Court held it was error, but harmless, to exclude industry publications that would have shown the defendant had notice of prevailing design standards and that it did not, in fact, produce the best system it could have, given this knowledge. In an action for willful violations of an automatic stay, Price v. Rochford, 947 F.2d 829 (7th Cir. 1991) , the Court noted that newspaper articles reporting that the plaintiff was in bankruptcy raised no hearsay problem because they were offered only for the notice they gave readers.

Barnes v. Prudential Ins. Co., 76 F.3d 889 (8th Cir. 1996) : The Court reversed a judgment for an insurer in an action by an insured's surviving sibling, who claimed that the company's agent negligently failed to provide forms to the insured so that he could change the policy to make the plaintiff his beneficiary. It held that testimony by an insurance agent that the insured told him four times that he wanted to make the plaintiff his beneficiary was improperly excluded as hearsay. The insured's statements were relevant to prove the agent's knowledge of the insured's wishes, and were not offered for their truth. However, statements by the insured to others, to the effect that he had told the insurance agent to change the beneficiary, were inadmissible hearsay.

CalMat Co. v. United States Dep't of Labor, 364 F.3d 1117 (9th Cir. 2004) : Upholding a decision finding that whistleblower protection provisions had been violated, the Court held that testimony about racially offensive name-calling and reporting the incident to the employee's supervisor was not hearsay. The name-calling evidence was not offered for the truth of the statements but merely to show the statements were made, and the reports to the supervisor reflected first-hand perceptions of the witness and were relevant not for the truth of the statements but to show notice to the employer. In Los Angeles News Service v. CBS Broadcasting, Inc., 305 F.3d 924 (9th Cir. 2002) , the plaintiff news organization videotaped the notorious beating of Reginald Denny and obtained copyrights for four segments of its tape. In a copyright infringement action, the Court reversed in part summary judgment for the defendants, holding that a statement by the husband of the woman who shot the tape that he requested a videotape from a television station's archivist was not hearsay, because it was offered to show that the request led the station to send him the tape.

Benford v. Richards Med. Co., 792 F.2d 1537 (11th Cir. 1986) : In an action by a patient against a manufacturer of a hip prosthesis, the Court held that testimony by an employee of a company, hired by the defendant to make metallurgical evaluations of metals being considered for use in a prosthesis, that he heard a former president of his company advise the defendant's representative on the telephone not to use stainless steel in a hip prosthesis was nonhearsay when used to show notice of potential problems with the use of the metal.

[B] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Knowledge and Notice -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Baird, 29 F.3d 647 (D.C. Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for conflict of interest violations, the government showed that a legal officer had advised the defendant against his conduct, and the defendant attempted to introduce evidence that other legal and contracting officers had given other advice, which was relayed to the defendant by another officer. Reversing, the Court held it was error to exclude the evidence as hearsay, since it was offered only for its effect on the defendant's knowledge and intent, not for the truth of the matters asserted.

United States v. Oguns, 921 F.2d 442 (2d Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a conviction for heroin offenses, holding there was no error in admitting testimony that in a phone conversation during a search of the defendant's apartment, an unidentified caller asked, "Have the apples arrived there?" The statement was not hearsay because an inquiry is not an assertion, and the fact the caller's identity was not known did not matter when the phone call was offered as circumstantial evidence of the defendant's knowledge and intent regarding the importation and distribution charges. In United States v. Puzzo, 928 F.2d 1356 (2d Cir. 1991) , the Court held, in the prosecution of a conspiracy to import and distribute heroin, that it was error (but harmless) to exclude as hearsay a defendant's testimony concerning conversations with a coconspirator tending to prove that the defendant had been duped into believing he would be carrying jewelry, not drugs, from Italy.

United States v. Parry, 649 F.2d 292 (5th Cir. 1981) : The Court held that the defendant's statement to his mother that he was working for a narcotics agent was not hearsay because it was not offered for its truth, but to show his knowledge of the agent's identity.

United States v. Johnson, 71 F.3d 539 (6th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a physician's conviction for illegal distribution of drugs and mail fraud, the Court held it was error to admit testimony by a clinic employee that when she told the defendant's partner that pharmacies had called about prescriptions written by the defendant, the partner became upset and said she would speak to the defendant about that. However, the error was harmless, because the witness later heard the partner tell the defendant over the telephone to "stop writing prescriptions like that," which was evidence that the defendant knew he was prescribing medication without a legitimate medical purpose. In United States v. Mays, 69 F.3d 116 (6th Cir. 1995) , a prosecution for selling allegedly pure orange juice adulterated with sugar, the Court held that testimony that purchasers had reported the results of scientific tests was not hearsay, since it was not offered to prove the existence of sugar in the juice, but rather was used to prove the intent element of the fraud charge by creating an inference that the defendants knew of the adulteration.

United States v. Moore, 845 F.2d 683 (7th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that an inmate's letters to the defendant asking her to obtain drugs for him to sell so that he could fund his legal appeals were admissible to show that the defendant was aware of the inmate's interest in obtaining money, even illegally.

United States v. Kurkowski, 281 F.3d 699 (8th Cir. 2002) : The defendant, charged with drug dealing, claimed entrapment and argued that the government targeted him without reason. The Court held that evidence of the reasons behind the government's interest in the defendant thus became relevant, so an officer's testimony recounting an unnamed informant's story of the defendant's earlier drug sales was admissible nonhearsay.

United States v. Rogers, 321 F.3d 1226 (9th Cir. 2003) : The defendant was convicted of money laundering for serving as a referral agent for a Ponzi scheme. The Court held there was no error in admitting evidence of the criminal complaint filed against the scheme's organizer, to show that once the defendant received a copy of the complaint he was aware that the scheme might be fraudulent. That was a proper purpose, for which the evidence was not hearsay. In a money laundering prosecution, United States v. Artega, 117 F.3d 388 (9th Cir. 1997) , the government introduced Western Union "to-send" money order forms found in a defendant's apartment that contained as the recipient's name an alias proved to have been used by another conspirator. The government acceded to an instruction that the forms were not admissible for the truth of any matter asserted, so the Court held that the convictions would be reviewed using the evidence only for proper purposes remaining after that limitation. The Court held that because it was unlikely that anyone not involved in the conspiracy would have had knowledge or reason to use the alias, it provided strong circumstantial evidence that the defendant had knowledge necessary to commit the charged acts. In a prosecution of a kickback scheme, United States v. Kenney, n47 the Court held that testimony by an Assistant U.S. Attorney that he had told a witness' attorney that immunity was unacceptable and the witness would be prosecuted for his involvement in the scheme was not hearsay, as it was offered to show the witness knew he would not be given immunity and, therefore, had no motive to lie to gain points with the prosecutor. In United States v. Castro, n48 the Court held credit reports were admissible in a prosecution for misapplication of bank funds to prove information available to a loan official, not for their truth.

United States v. Cancelliere, 69 F.3d 1116 (11th Cir. 1995) , amended (11th Cir. 1996): The defendant was convicted for obtaining bank loans by falsely representing that he was the beneficiary of a trust fund and that his father would give him financial assistance. At trial, the government introduced letters from the defendant's father, written to the defendant, indicating that the trust fund was depleted and that the defendant would no longer receive financial assistance. The Court reasoned that the letters were potentially admissible to prove two points: that the defendant's statements to the banks were false because he had no trust fund or financial assistance, and that the defendant (in light of the letters) knew the statements were false. While the letters were hearsay if offered for the former purpose, they were nonhearsay if offered for the latter. Since the letters were probative for a nonhearsay purpose, and since the jury was instructed to consider the letters only as proof of the defendant's state of mind, the Court found no error in their admission.

[xii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Nonassertive Conduct

United States v. Zenni, 492 F. Supp. 464 (E.D. Ky. 1980) : In a prosecution for illegal bookmaking activities, the Court held that telephone conversations overheard by government agents executing a search warrant in which unknown callers attempted to place bets on sporting events were not hearsay, but involved "implied assertions" that properly are classified as nonassertive verbal conduct.

United States v. Cassano, 372 F.3d 868 (7th Cir. 2004) : At trial of a fraud scheme involving currency transaction structuring, a cooperating witness was permitted to testify that he asked two unidentified individuals, who declined to join the conspiracy, before the defendant agreed to join. The Court held that the witness' testimony that the individuals would not join was not hearsay because it contained nothing that could reasonably be characterized as an assertion of fact by the individuals. Even if some assertion were made, the evidence was not offered to prove its truth but only to describe its effect on the witness and how it was he came to seek the defendant's help.

[xiii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Personal Knowledge Distinguished

United States v. Soto-Beniquez, 356 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions in a complex drug conspiracy and continuing criminal enterprise prosecution, the Court held that an officer's testimony that he observed a field test of narcotics was not hearsay, since he testified only to his observations and not to statements by those conducting the tests.

[xiv] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Prior Statement Adopted by Witness

Amarin Plastics, Inc. v. Maryland Cup Corp., 946 F.2d 147 (1st Cir. 1991) : The Court held in a breach of contract action that exhibits to an admissible deposition were not hearsay because the deponent had testified that the exhibits were his own statements and that they were true, so they became his present testimony.

[xv] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Receipts, Registration Cards, Invoices

United States v. Tin Yat Chin, 371 F.3d 31 (2d Cir. 2004) : The Court vacated a conviction arising from an immigration fraud scheme because credit card receipts offered by the defendant to prove an alibi were improperly excluded. The receipts "[did] not trigger the traditional reliability concerns of hearsay -- defects in memory, perception, narration, or sincerity." Once a foundation of authenticity was established, they were circumstantial evidence that someone using the defendant's name made the purchases, from which the jury could infer that the purchases were made by the defendant himself, which tended to support his alibi.

United States v. Pulido-Jacobo, 377 F.3d 1124 (10th Cir. 2004) : The defendants, arrested in a car in which narcotics had been secreted, contested the link between them and the contraband that was required to establish constructive possession. They objected on hearsay grounds to the admission of a two-year-old receipt, found in one defendant's wallet, for repairs to a truck engine, which matched a copy found in the car's console. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of the engine receipts, since they were not offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted but only as circumstantial evidence that the defendant had sufficient control of the car to store an old receipt in it.

[xvi] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Questions

Lexington Ins. Co. v. Western Pa. Hospital, 423 F.3d 318 (3d Cir. 2005) : Affirming summary judgment for the insurer in a coverage dispute, the Court suggested that an internal business form containing handwritten notations was not hearsay because the document was an inquiry into whether the data processing department could find information, "[n]otwithstanding the fact that this inquiry could reveal assumptions the declarant might have made" about the matter. In the Court's view, "the declarant was not making an assertion, but rather was asking a question, which does not constitute hearsay under Rule 801(a)(1) and (c)." The Court added in a footnote that even if the document constituted an assertion, it would likely be admissible as an admission by a party-opponent under Rule 801(d)(2)(D).

United States v. Wright, 343 F.3d 849 (6th Cir. 2003) : In the defendant's trial for offenses that included a murder arising out of a cocaine distribution scheme, the Judge admitted testimony from the victim's wife that she had received a telephone call from the defendant's girlfriend before the murder, and the girlfriend asked where the defendant was. The defendant objected that the girlfriend's statement was hearsay. But the Court found no error, since a question "merely seeks answers and usually has no factual content."

[xvii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Statements Affecting Legal Rights

Cloverland-Green Spring Dairies, Inc. v. Pennsylvania Milk Marketing Board, 298 F.3d 201 (3d Cir. 2002) : The Court reversed much of a summary judgment for Board members in a case challenging the Board's enforcement of minimum wholesale and retail milk prices, In the course of its opinion, the Court noted that "a statement offering to sell a product at a particular price is a 'verbal act,' not hearsay, because the statement itself has legal effect."

United States v. Boulware, 384 F.3d 794 (9th Cir. 2004) : The Court reversed a conviction on tax charges, finding an abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence of a State Court judgment entered in a suit by the defendant against a former girlfriend. The government alleged that the defendant diverted funds from a company by giving the funds to his girlfriend and wife without reporting any of the money on his income tax returns. The state judgment established that money given to the girlfriend was not a gift and was to be held in constructive trust for the company. The Court reasoned that the judgment was relevant to prove that the money was held in trust, which established the legal effect of the transaction and thus the judgment was not hearsay. In Stuart v. Unum Life Ins. Co. of Am., 217 F.3d 1145 (9th Cir. 2000) , the Trial Judge remanded an insurance dispute removed from State Court on the ground that the defendants had not carried their burden of showing that the plan was an ERISA plan, which would have subjected the case to federal jurisdiction. Reversing an order granting the plaintiffs costs and expenses for improper removal, the Court held that it was error to treat the group insurance policy as inadmissible hearsay, since it was a legally operative document that defined the rights and liabilities of the parties in the case, including the rights and liabilities bearing on whether it was an ERISA plan. In United States v. Alexander, n49 the Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding there was no error in admitting an FDIC certificate of insurance to prove the bank's insured status. Although the certificate had been admitted at trial under the residual exception, because it was a written statement affecting legal rights, it fell outside the definition of hearsay.

[xviii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Statements Relied Upon

[A] Rule 801(c) -- Civil Cases

Ramirez Rodriguez v. Boehringer Ingelheim, 425 F.3d 67 (1st Cir. 2005) : In an age discrimination action by a drug salesman who had been terminated, the Court held there was no error in considering out-of-court statements by physicians who asserted that the plaintiff had dealt with drug samples improperly. The statements were not offered for their truth but to show the basis on which the employer decided to terminate him. In Pace v. Insurance Co. of N. Am., n50 the Court held that letters containing the results of interviews with a vessel's owner and captain were admissible to prove why an insurer refused to pay and to demonstrate good faith, not for the truth of the statements. See also Kassel v. Gannett Co. n51(portions of a Veterans' Administration investigative report offered in a libel action were not hearsay, since they were admitted as state of mind evidence on the contested issue of why the VA took action, rather than as proof of the matters asserted).

Rinehimer v. Cemcolift, Inc., 292 F.3d 375 (3d Cir. 2002) : An employee, who suffered from asthma, was discharged after he developed pneumonia. Affirming a judgment for the defendant in a disability discrimination action, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony that the employer was told by its doctor that the plaintiff could not wear a respirator. The evidence was not offered for its truth but to explain why the manager did not allow the employee to return to his job as a working foreman and wear a respirator.

Cebollero v. Commissioner, 967 F.2d 986 (4th Cir. 1992) : In an income tax deficiency suit against owners of a liquor store, a revenue agent testified that in reconstructing the store's income, she had called the county liquor board for an accurate list of prices paid for the goods sold. The Court held that the call was properly admitted for the limited purpose of showing the reasonableness of the agent's method, not to prove the actual prices paid, as the issue before the Tax Court was not the amount owed but the reasonableness of the government's deficiency determination.

Martin Texas Energy Co. v. Washington Gas Light Co., 890 F.2d 784 (5th Cir. 1989) : In a suit by the seller of natural gas against the buyer for breach of contract and against a pipeline for tortious interference, a pipeline employee testified that he had been told by an employee of the seller not to disclose to the buyer the source of the gas to be transported. The seller objected that the statement was hearsay, but the Court held it was offered only to show that an improper request had been made that would justify the pipeline in refusing to transmit the gas, not that the seller actually wished to engage in improper conduct.

Woods v. City of Chicago, 234 F.3d 979 (7th Cir. 2000) : Affirming summary judgments for the defendants in a civil rights suit arising from a warrantless arrest, the Court held there was no error in considering an arrest report and a verified criminal complaint made by the alleged victim. While the documents would not be admissible as business records to prove the truth of included statements made by persons who were not part of the business, in this case they were offered only for their effect on the defendants, to provide a basis for concluding that a reasonable person in the officer's position would have probable cause to believe that an offense had been committed.

Orsini v. O/S Seabrooke O.N., 247 F.3d 953 (9th Cir. 2001) : The defendants in a Jones Act case claimed that the injured seaman had given a release; the seaman claimed it was coerced. Reversing summary judgement for the defendants, the Court held that fellow crew members' statements recounted in an affidavit were not hearsay because they were offered for the effects those statements had on his state of mind and not for the truth of the matters asserted.

FDIC v. Marina, 892 F.2d 1522 (11th Cir. 1990) (per curiam): In a proceeding by the FDIC to collect debts due a closed bank, the borrowers attempted to prove that the bank released certain guaranties prior to its closing by virtue of an accord and satisfaction. The Trial Judge excluded as hearsay testimony by the bank's former president that the accord and satisfaction had been entered into because the parties were informed that Small Business Administration regulations made a guaranty unenforceable. The Court reversed, holding that the evidence was not offered to prove that the guaranty was, in fact, unenforceable, but only as evidence of a basis for the parties' belief.

American Airlines v. United States, 204 F.3d 1103 (Fed. Cir. 2000) : In a refund action to recover withholding and other taxes that had not been collected on per diem payments to employees, the Court held it was error to exclude studies of business travel costs on hearsay grounds. The studies were offered not to prove that the per diem rates were at or below the employees' actual expenses, but to show the reasonableness of the taxpayer's belief that its per diem rates fairly represented its employees' actual expenses.

[B] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Statements Relied Upon -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Legarda, 17 F.3d 496 (1st Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for drug possession, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude testimony by the defendant recounting innocuous reasons offered by various declarants that would prompt him to perform the acts that eventually led to his arrest. In United States v. Yefsky, 994 F.2d 885 (1st Cir. 1993) , the Court held it was error (but harmless) in a fraud and conspiracy prosecution to exclude testimony by the defendant's wife, who served as his bookkeeper, about a conversation in which a codefendant said she would not have to file forms for him. The evidence was not hearsay, as it demonstrated the wife's reliance on the statement and the defendant's lack of intent to help the codefendant evade taxes.

United States v. Kohan, 806 F.2d 18 (2d Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a conviction for bank fraud, finding that testimony that described conversations between a defendant and a codefendant in which the codefendant made certain statements concerning the sale of property should have been admitted as nonhearsay to show the understanding of the defendant and the background against which he acted.

United States v. Jackson, 621 F.2d 216 (5th Cir. 1980) : A conviction for making false bank entries was reversed in part because the defendant was not permitted to testify to a conversation that, he claimed, would have shown that he did not know his entry was false. It was improper to exclude the evidence as hearsay, since it was not offered for its truth, but only to show what the defendant was told and relied upon.

United States v. Branham, 97 F.3d 835 (6th Cir. 1996) : A defendant in a marijuana conspiracy trial sought to support his entrapment defense by introducing a government informant's statements attempting to involve the defendant in a number of illegal activities, but the statements were excluded at trial as hearsay. The Court held that the statements were not hearsay because they were offered for their effect on the defendant's state of mind, not as proof of the matters asserted. The error was harmless, however. In United States v. Horton, n52 the Court held that evidence of statements made was not hearsay when it was offered to show the victim's reaction to the statements. In United States v. Gibson, n53 the Court found error, albeit harmless, in the exclusion on hearsay grounds of a statement made by one union official that was offered to explain the defendant's subsequent conduct. The Court observed that where a statement is relevant because it was made, not because it is asserted to be true, there is no hearsay problem with the statement.

United States v. Hanson, 994 F.2d 403 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court held that it was error (but harmless) in a tax prosecution to exclude evidence of a conversation that a defendant claimed to have had with his employer's vice president, which was offered to prove that the defendant was told that he did not have to reveal certain information on a conflict-of-interest form. The statement was offered to explain its effect on the defendant's conduct, not for its truth. In United States v. Harris, n54 a prosecution of two young women for failure to pay income tax on money received from a wealthy widower, letters from the transferor stating that he enjoyed giving things to the transferee were excluded as hearsay. The Court reversed, holding that the letters were not hearsay, because they were offered to prove the recipient's lack of willfulness, not the truth of the matters asserted. In United States v. Norwood, n55 the Court affirmed a conviction for knowing possession of stolen mail matter, but it found error (albeit harmless) in the exclusion as hearsay of testimony as to what a declarant said in giving the defendant a credit card. Use of the testimony to prove the defendant's state of mind was not hearsay.

United States v. Roberts, 676 F.2d 1185 (8th Cir. 1982) : The Court found it was error (but harmless) to exclude statements made by a government witness that were offered not for their truth, but to show why the defendant went to a certain location following a conversation with the witness.

United States v. Bishop, 291 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2002) : The defendants in a tax fraud case claimed that they relied upon the advice of their accountant (L), since deceased, in treating certain money received as loans rather than as income. The defendants, who called a corporate accountant (G) to testify as to his conversations with the defendants about the tax advice they received from L, argued that G's testimony was admissible as nonhearsay to prove good faith reliance on advice. Affirming, the Court held that G was properly prevented from testifying to what defendants told him that L had said; that testimony was offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. The Court also held, however, that it was error (but harmless) to exclude one defendant's testimony as to what L advised him, because the defendant "had the right to tell the court his own version of the tax advice on which he claimed to have relied." In United States v. Saavedra, n56 the Court affirmed wire fraud and conspiracy convictions, and found that testimony of victims concerning calls that they had received was not hearsay where it was not offered for its truth, but to show how credit card numbers had been fraudulently obtained. See also United States v. Kirk n57(testimony that employees made fraudulent statements was admissible not for its truth, but to show the effect on the listeners).

[xix] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- State of Mind

United States v. Hayes, 369 F.3d 564 (D.C. Cir. 2004) : The prosecution in a trial for conspiracy to submit false overtime claims to the government introduced the tape recording of a telephone conversation in which the conspirators' supervisor told a cooperating conspirator to "get [the defendant]." The tape was admitted, although it "may not add anything," in an effort to connect the defendant to covering up the conspiracy. Responding to the suggestion that he participated in the cover-up, the defendant sought to introduce the tape of a second conversation, about an hour later, in which he told the cooperating conspirator to "tell the truth." The second tape was excluded as "self-serving hearsay," but the Court held it was nonhearsay admissible to prove the defendant's state of mind: telling his coconspirator to "tell the truth" indicated that he did not think he did anything wrong, making it less likely that he had the specific intent to sustain the charges. The error was harmless, however. In United States v. Thompson, 279 F.3d 1043 (D.C. Cir. 2002) , the defendant was charged with crack distribution after he gave an undercover officer a large drink cup with a lid on it, was handed a bundle of money, asked "What's this?," was told $1,500, asked "Are you straight?," was told "I'm straight," and exited the car where the transaction took place. The defendant denied knowing cocaine was in the cup and testified that earlier a codefendant had asked him to deliver the cup, saying it contained $2,600, which the defendant assumed was to pay a gambling debt. The government's hearsay objection to the codefendant's statement was properly overruled, because the statement was offered for the nonhearsay purpose of proving the defendant's state of mind. The defendant also tried to recount what the codefendant said after he returned with the $1,500, but a hearsay objection was sustained as to any post-transaction statements. The Court held that although it was possible that post-transaction statements might also be nonhearsay relevant to the defendant's state of mind, any error had not been preserved.

Talley v. Bravo Pitino Restaurant, Ltd., 61 F.3d 1241 (6th Cir. 1995) : In reversing a summary judgment for the defendant in a Title VII race discrimination action, the Court held that disparaging racist comments made by persons controlling the defendant were improperly excluded from consideration on hearsay grounds. The statements were not offered to prove their truth but to demonstrate the speakers' racial attitudes.

United States v. Price, 418 F.3d 771 (7th Cir. 2005) : In a drug prosecution, the Court found no error in the admission of a copy of a police alert seized from the home of one of the coconspirators. The alert was prepared by the local police department and listed many of the defendants as members of the drug conspiracy. The Court found that the alert was not offered for the truth of its assertions but rather to prove that members of the conspiracy were aware of the alert and were engaging in counter-surveillance of police activity. The Court also held that because the alert was not offered for its truth, its admission did not violate the defendants' right to confrontation under Crawford v. Washington. In a defamation and antitrust action between competing travel agencies, Israel Travel Advisory Serv. v. Israel Identity Tours, 61 F.3d 1250 (7th Cir. 1995) , the Court held that it was error (but harmless) to exclude evidence of telephone calls made by customers comparing the agencies. The statements were not offered for their truth but to show that customers were confused.

[xx] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Support for Administrative Decision

Moore v. Plaster, 313 F.3d 442 (8th Cir. 2002) : A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging that he had been subjected to retaliatory discipline. Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, the Court held that a confidential file and investigation report, a transcribed interview, and other materials considered as part of the summary judgment record were not inadmissible hearsay. They were not considered to determine the truth of the matters asserted, but rather to determine whether the prison officials, who may rely on hearsay in disciplinary proceedings, had "some evidence" to support the contested disciplinary actions.

[xxi] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Threats

United States v. Herrera, 600 F.2d 502 (5th Cir. 1979) : The Court overturned a conviction for illegal transportation of aliens, holding that the defendant should have been permitted to testify to the contents of threatening telephone calls that she claimed to have received. The evidence was not hearsay, since the important thing when the defense was duress was that the threats were made, not whether they would have been carried out.

United States v. Williams, 952 F.2d 1504 (6th Cir. 1991) : Affirming a conviction for extortion, the Court held that statements to the victim indicating the defendant's power to block a rezoning were not hearsay, but rather evidence bearing on the reasonableness of the victim's fear of economic harm.

United States v. Swanson, 9 F.3d 1354 (8th Cir. 1993) : In a prosecution for manufacturing marijuana, the defendant offered testimony regarding threats made by a cooperating witness against another person to support a coercion defense, but it was excluded as hearsay. The Court held that because the threat was not offered to prove the truth of matters asserted, it was not hearsay, but the evidence was nevertheless properly excluded because it was impermissible character evidence and extrinsic evidence offered to attack credibility.

[xxii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Tools of the Trade

United States v. Gonzales, 307 F.3d 906 (9th Cir. 2002) : Affirming drug and firearms convictions, the Court upheld the admission of testimony by a DEA agent that three sheets of paper found in a notebook in the defendant's backpack were "pay/owe" sheets commonly used by drug dealers to keep track of drug sales. The Trial Judge had found that the sheets were hearsay but instructed the jury that they were admitted to explain the agent's testimony. Disagreeing that they were hearsay, and concluding that they were "tools of the trade," the Court emphasized that the sheets were not offered for the specific information conveyed on them, but for their significance as objects closely associated with the drug trade.

[xxiii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Trade Inscriptions and Identifying Marks

Los Angeles News Service v. CBS Broadcasting, Inc., 305 F.3d 924 (9th Cir. 2002) : The plaintiff news organization videotaped the notorious beating of Reginald Denny and obtained copyrights for four segments of its tape. In a copyright infringement action, the Court reversed in part summary judgment for the defendants, holding that the identifying slate that appears on the opening frames of the tape supplied by the station "is most appropriately characterized as circumstantial evidence of origin, rather than as an 'assertion' within the meaning of the hearsay rule," since "[t]he slate is more akin to a postmark or a time stamp." In a prosecution for criminal possession of a firearm that had moved in interstate commerce, United States v. Alvarez, 972 F.2d 1000 (9th Cir. 1992) (per curiam), the Court held that the inscription "Garnika, Spain" on the gun was a "mechanical trace" not excludable under the hearsay rule and not requiring extrinsic evidence of authenticity.

United States v. Thody, 978 F.2d 625 (10th Cir. 1992) : Affirming a conviction for criminal possession of a weapon that had traveled in interstate commerce, the Court noted that the manufacturer's imprint "Made in Spain" is technically not an assertion as contemplated by the Rule and therefore not hearsay.

[xxiv] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Verbal Acts

United States v. Southard, 700 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1983) : In a gambling prosecution, the Court found that records and telephone conversations were verbal acts used to prove that bets had been recorded and that betting conversations had taken place and were not hearsay.

Giove v. Stanko, 977 F.2d 413 (8th Cir. 1992) : In an action to set aside certain transfers of property as fraudulent conveyances, the Court held there was no error in admitting an affidavit filed in State Court by one of the debtors that he was a pauper, as it was a verbal act reflecting his state of mind and relevant, regardless of its truth, to whether the transfers were made with fraudulent intent. In a breach of contract action, Modern Leasing, Inc. v. Falcon Mfg. of Cal., Inc., n58 the Court held that testimony about conversations concerning a lessee's manager's position was not hearsay, because it was offered only to prove the lessor's reasonable inquiry rather than the truth of the facts asserted.

United States v. Pang, 362 F.3d 1187 (9th Cir. 2004) : The prosecution introduced invoices from the defendant and checks from a customer paying those invoices at a trial for structuring currency transactions and income tax evasion. The Court held that the checks were not hearsay because they were legally operative verbal conduct, and the invoices were party admissions admissible against the defendant.

United States v. Paradies, 98 F.3d 1266 (11th Cir. 1996) : Affirming convictions arising out of a public corruption scheme, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting tape recordings of breakfast/bribery meetings between a conspirator cooperating with the government and two other councilmembers, in which the cooperating witness made several references to the defendant. Admission of the tapes was upheld because, inter alia, the contemporaneous words characterizing non-verbal conduct, like the transfer of money, were not hearsay.

Knorr v. Pearson, 671 F.2d 1368 (C.C.P.A. 1982) : In a patent interference proceeding, testimony by a third party as to what one inventor said to another on the telephone was a nonhearsay "verbal act," whereas testimony as to what that inventor told the witness the other inventor said was inadmissible hearsay.

[f] Rule 801(c) -- Judgment of Acquittal

United States v. De La Rosa, 171 F.3d 215 (5th Cir. 1999) : The defendant was charged with three counts in a conspiracy to influence a jury; the jury acquitted on the first count and deadlocked on the remaining two charges. At a second trial on the remaining charges, the Trial Judge prohibited any reference to the prior trial or to the acquittal. Relying on a "vast body of authority" that a judgment of acquittal is hearsay, not otherwise exempt from the operation of the hearsay rule, the Court found no error and affirmed.

[g] Rule 801(c) -- Relevance Requirement

United States v. Meserve, 271 F.3d 314 (1st Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions for robbery and firearms offenses, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to permit a detective to testify that he drove by the defendant's house on the night of the robbery because the defendant met the description of the robber given by eyewitnesses. The prosecution claimed that the testimony was not hearsay because it was offered to prove why the detective drove by the house, but the Court found that the detective's motivation was irrelevant to any fact in dispute. In United States v. Mazza, n59 the Court affirmed cocaine convictions, but it criticized the Trial Judge's permitting two government agents to testify as to what an informant told them the defendants had done and said in various conversations, purportedly to explain why the agents acted as they did. The Court found that this evidence had almost no probative value, even though the defendants raised an entrapment defense. It reasoned that the agents could have testified that they debriefed the informant after his conversations with the defendants and left the informant to testify as to what the defendants said.

United States v. Forrester, 60 F.3d 52 (2d Cir. 1995) : After a 17-year-old female telephoned police to alert them to activities at a motel, officers found the caller, another female, and the defendant in a motel room, but found no drugs or drug paraphernalia. At the defendant's trial on cocaine charges, the government asked its first witness, the police sergeant who took the telephone call, whether he had been involved in a "narcotics-related incident" at the motel. He answered affirmatively and was cross-examined as to the scene that he found at the motel. Thereafter, the government elicited from the sergeant hearsay testimony as to what the 17-year-old caller had told him. The government argued that the call was admissible to explain why the officer came to the scene and arrested the defendants. Reversing because the hearsay testimony was improperly admitted, the Court held that the government's proffered not-for-truth purpose had no relevance in the case. The defense was based upon a claim that prostitution, not drug use, was occurring at the motel, and this defense did not suggest any impropriety on the part of the police. Thus, there was no basis to introduce hearsay to explain the sergeant's conduct.

United States v. Fountain, 2 F.3d 656 (6th Cir. 1993) : The Court found that it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony by an agent about what he had been told prior to executing a warrant. Although the statements were offered to explain the agent's actions, not for their truth, the Court observed that the reason for his action was not in issue, and "[o]therwise inadmissible hearsay evidence is not made admissible simply because it is claimed to be probative of a fact that is not in issue in the case."

United States v. Silva, 380 F.3d 1018 (7th Cir. 2004) : In a prosecution for methamphetamine offenses, a DEA agent testified to conversations between a non-testifying DEA informant and an alleged supplier that mentioned the defendant as the person making a delivery. The prosecution argued that the evidence was offered to explain the actions taken by the witness in response to the hearsay. Reversing, the Court noted that "[t]here are no doubt times when the testimony regarding a tip from an informant is relevant," but found that the broad argument made by the government "would eviscerate the constitutional rights to confront and cross-examine one's accusers."

[3] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Prior Statement By Witness -- Inconsistent

[a] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Defendant's Use of the Rule

United States v. Lashmett, 965 F.2d 179 (7th Cir. 1992) : As part of a scheme to defraud an insurer, the defendant's accomplices filed a complaint and affidavits in a civil suit. At the fraud trial, the accomplices testified that statements in the papers were false; the defendant wanted to introduce the papers for their truth, i.e., to show that the witnesses were lying about having made false statements. The Court held that the statements should have been admitted for their truth, as they were given under oath at a prior legal proceeding, but the error was harmless.

United States v. Smith, 776 F.2d 892 (10th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed a conviction for voluntary manslaughter arising out of a traffic accident, but found that testimony by a traffic accident reconstruction specialist at the defendant's first trial should have been admissible as substantive evidence when the specialist was called by the defense and his testimony at the second trial was inconsistent with his original testimony. The error was harmless, however. In a prosecution for receiving stolen silver bars, United States v. Plum, n60 the Court held it was error (but harmless) to restrict use of a cooperating witness' preliminary hearing testimony inconsistent with his trial testimony to impeachment.

[b] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Grand Jury Testimony

United States v. Smith, 419 F.3d 521 (6th Cir. 2005) : When a witness gave different testimony at the defendant's drug-trafficking trial, the government was permitted to impeach the witness and offer his grand jury testimony as substantive evidence. The defendant did not object to the testimony being read, but did object to the jury's getting a transcript of the grand jury testimony. Affirming, the Court noted that under Engebretsen v. Fairchild Aircraft Corp., 21 F.3d 721 (6th Cir. 1994) , prior statements in a document are ordinarily admitted by being read and the document should be admitted only when necessary and with a limiting instruction to guard against the dangers of undue emphasis and being taken out of context. In this case, the Judge made no finding of necessity and gave no limiting instruction; this was an abuse of discretion, but harmless error. At the trial of a cocaine distribution conspiracy in United States v. Odom, 13 F.3d 949 (6th Cir. 1994) , the government called an accomplice and asked about his grand jury testimony, which he said was perjured; on cross-examination, the defense elicited testimony inconsistent with the grand jury testimony; and at the conclusion of the witness' trial testimony, transcripts of his grand jury testimony and a recantation hearing were admitted as substantive evidence. The Court held there was no error, as it is immaterial whether the prosecution or the defense elicits the foundation for prior inconsistent statements; furthermore, a sufficient inconsistency is shown when the witness labels prior testimony as false. One Judge dissented, on the grounds that the witness had made no statements at trial with which the grand jury testimony was inconsistent before it was elicited and that labeling a prior statement as false is not a proper substitute for a true response from the witness contradicting his prior testimony.

[c] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Inconsistency Required

United States v. Odom, 13 F.3d 949 (6th Cir. 1994) : This case is discussed in § 801.03[3][b], "Grand Jury Testimony."

United States v. Jacoby, 955 F.2d 1527 (11th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed convictions for fraud involving an insolvent savings and loan, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a witness' grand jury testimony that only gave greater detail and did not contradict the witness' trial testimony.

[d] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Leading Questions

United States v. Morgan, 555 F.2d 238 (9th Cir. 1977) : Affirming a conviction for aiding an officer of a savings and loan company in receipt of an illegal kickback, the Court upheld the introduction of grand jury testimony as substantive evidence when the government impeached its own witnesses. The grand jury testimony involved extremely leading questions of a type "not to be applauded." The Court implied that "unduly suggestive or conclusory" questions might produce evidence that would not be admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(A) and perhaps not under Rule 607. The Court also pointed out the need for a flexible approach to deciding when an inconsistency occurs. In United States v. Champion Int'l Corp., n61 the Court held that prior inconsistent testimony by a witness before a grand jury is admissible under the Rule if the same witness testifies at trial, even though some of the grand jury testimony was elicited by means of leading questions.

[e] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Memory Problems; Vague Testimony

United States v. Owens, 484 U.S. 554 (1988) : The Court indicated that a witness who asserts lack of memory of the facts to which prior testimony relates is nonetheless "subject to cross-examination" within the meaning of Rule 801(d)(1).

United States v. Milton, 8 F.3d 39 (D.C. Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed convictions for stealing money of the United States, holding there was no error in admitting grand jury testimony of a prosecution witness who said at trial that she could remember almost nothing of the facts in issue or what she told the grand jury. The witness was "subject to cross-examination," and defense counsel elicited testimony that tended to discredit her grand jury testimony.

United States v. Hemmer, 729 F.2d 10 (1st Cir. 1984) : Affirming bank robbery convictions, the Court found that the Trial Judge properly admitted grand jury testimony of a girlfriend of one of the defendants when she experienced memory lapses and made statements inconsistent with her grand jury testimony.

United States v. Palumbo, 639 F.2d 123 (3d Cir. 1981) : The Court indicated that a prior statement of a government witness who suffered a memory failure at trial was not admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(A), since lack of memory was not necessarily inconsistent with her statement to the police concerning the source of her drugs.

United States v. Murphy, 696 F.2d 282 (4th Cir. 1982) : In a bank robbery trial, when a key grand jury witness took the stand and denied the truthfulness of his grand jury testimony, the government offered that testimony for its truth under Rule 801(d)(1)(A). Affirming, the Court found that the testimony was properly admitted, despite some vagueness on the part of the witness about what he said before the grand jury.

United States v. Bigham, 812 F.2d 943 (5th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed convictions for violating the civil rights of two inmates, as it held that prior grand jury testimony by a prison official that he had seen beatings of prisoners was properly admitted when the official claimed no recollection of the events at trial. In this case, the Court found that the Trial Judge could have found that the loss of memory was feigned, and it left open the question whether a prior statement could be admitted absent such a finding.

United States v. Distler, 671 F.2d 954 (6th Cir. 1981) : Affirming a conviction for violating a federal water pollution law, the Court approved the admission of grand jury testimony for its truth, holding that "partial or vague recollection is inconsistent with total or definite recall." The Court also noted that much of the testimony was identification testimony, which need not be inconsistent to be admitted.

United States v. Keeter, 130 F.3d 297 (7th Cir. 1997) : The defendant complained that grand jury testimony of a government witness was improperly admitted into his trial for smuggling drugs into prison because at the trial the witness feigned a lack of memory. The Court affirmed, holding that a witness who feigns lack of memory is "subject to cross-examination" within the meaning of Rule 801(d)(1)(A), and that a prior statement is inconsistent with an untruthful statement of lack of memory. In a prosecution alleging a scheme to bribe a U.S. Senator at the expense of a Teamsters' pension fund, United States v. Williams, n62 the Court found no error in the admission of grand jury testimony given by a government witness whose testimony at the trial was "limited, vague, and not inculpatory." It emphasized that the word "inconsistent" is not limited to "statements diametrically opposed or logically incompatible."

United States v. Russell, 712 F.2d 1256 (8th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed convictions for aiding and abetting the passing and uttering of forged postal money orders. It upheld the introduction of grand jury testimony by a key government witness who claimed at trial he could not remember contact with the defendant. The Court rejected the argument that the grand jury testimony was not inconsistent with the absence of memory at trial, observing that inconsistency is not limited to diametrically opposed answers and may extend to evasive answers and inability to recall. In United States v. Thompson, n63 the Court held that the Trial Judge had considerable discretion to find that evasive answers were inconsistent with earlier testimony and to admit the testimony as substantive evidence under Rule 801. It also held that no limiting instruction had to be given since the statements were admissible as substantive evidence.

United States v. Knox, 124 F.3d 1360 (10th Cir. 1997) : Affirming convictions for mail fraud, the Court found that prior statements of two testifying witnesses, implicating the defendant in the fraud scheme, were admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(A). The statements were made by the witnesses at their change of plea hearings, while under oath. The statements were inconsistent with the witnesses' trial testimony, in which they stated that they could not recall whether the defendant was involved in the scheme. The Trial Judge found that the asserted memory loss of the witnesses was feigned. The Court stated that "[a] well-settled body of case law holds that where a declarant's memory loss is contrived it will be taken as inconsistent with a prior statement for purposes of applying Rule 801(d)(1)(A)."

[f] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Opportunity for Cross-examination

United States v. Vargas, 933 F.2d 701 (9th Cir. 1991) : When the prosecutor indicated that a principal government witness (an informant) in a drug case would invoke the Fifth Amendment, the Trial Judge sua sponte established a procedure by which the witness was examined outside the jury's presence and an edited transcript was prepared. When the witness was then examined in front of the jury, counsel were permitted to ask only questions from the transcript, and if the Judge deemed an answer inconsistent with that in the transcript, he read the earlier answer to the jury. The Court reversed, holding that the procedure violated the Rules and the Confrontation Clause. Because the witness was available, the transcript read to the jury was not admissible as former testimony, and because the Judge would not permit cross-examination questions before the jury if they were not included in the transcript, the transcript was not admissible as prior inconsistent statements by a witness subject to cross-examination.

United States v. Torrez-Ortega, 184 F.3d 1128 (10th Cir. 1999) : The Court held that a witness who asserts an illegitimate claim of privilege and essentially refuses to answer questions at trial is not subject to cross-examination within the meaning of Rule 801(d)(1)(A) and the Confrontation Clause. Therefore it was error for the Trial Judge to admit grand jury testimony of a witness who was read excerpts of the testimony and declared his Fifth Amendment privilege when asked if the testimony was his; he also invoked the privilege and refused to answer questions on cross-examination. The Court distinguished United States v. Owens, n64 which held that a witness was subject to cross-examination despite loss of memory concerning the events at issue, because the witness in Owens willingly answered questions on cross-examination while the witness in the instant case refused to testify at all.

[g] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Other Proceedings

Santos v. Murdock, 243 F.3d 681 (2d Cir. 2001) : Affirming summary judgment for an arrestee who claimed the defendants submitted an arrest warrant containing false statements and arrested the defendant without probable cause, the Court held that a sworn statement given to the plaintiff's lawyer by a witness who had been twice deposed was not sufficient to defeat summary judgment. Since the statement, which was inconsistent with the deposition testimony, was not made in a "proceeding," it would only be admissible at trial for impeachment purposes and not as substantive evidence.

United States v. Ricketts, 317 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions for various offenses involving a drug conspiracy, the Court upheld denial of the defendant's proposed instruction that prior inconsistent statements could be used only for impeachment. Because sworn statements made at a guilty plea hearing and at a grand jury hearing, which were admissible as substantive evidence under Rule 801(d)(1)(A), had been introduced, the proposed instruction did not accurately reflect the applicable law, so there was no abuse of discretion in denying it. In United States v. Day, n65 the Court reversed convictions in a tax evasion case because the government introduced "highly prejudicial and incriminating excerpts" from a testifying codefendant's pretrial interview with an IRS agent. The Court observed that the record was devoid of any evidence that the agent had the legal authority to administer an oath that would subject the declarant to the penalty of perjury. Moreover, the Court reasoned that Congress was concerned with limiting the use of Rule 801(d)(1)(A) to highly reliable statements, and the statement did not qualify for substantive use "because the circumstances surrounding the recording of the statement militate against reliability and truthfulness."

United States v. Williams, 272 F.3d 845 (7th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed cocaine related convictions, finding no error in the exclusion as substantive evidence of a letter and affidavit by a coconspirator saying that he never saw one defendant with drugs and never saw another coconspirator talk about drug deals with the defendant. These statements were inconsistent with the coconspirator's trial testimony, but were not admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(A), because neither the affidavit nor the letter was made in "a proceeding." In United States v. Lashmett, 965 F.2d 179 (7th Cir. 1992) , as part of a scheme to defraud an insurer, the defendant's accomplices filed a complaint and affidavits in a civil suit. At the fraud trial, the accomplices testified that statements in the papers were false; finding no impeachment value once the lies were admitted, the Trial Judge excluded the papers. The Court held that the statements should have been admitted for their truth, as they were given under oath at a prior legal proceeding, but the error was harmless. In United States v. Dietrich, n66 the Court affirmed a conviction for dealing in counterfeit notes, but it held that a witness' statement -- unrecorded, obtained without any indicia of legal formality, and given to agents who had authority to arrest her -- was no different from a typical police station interrogation, and failed to qualify as an "other proceeding." In United States v. Micke, n67 the Court held that an affidavit of a government witness was not admissible as substantive evidence to the extent it was inconsistent with trial testimony, since it was obtained by an IRS agent in an investigation rather than in a "proceeding." In United States v. Perez, n68 the Court affirmed drug and weapons convictions, holding that a pretrial interview with an adverse witness, which was taken by a Court reporter, was not admissible, since it did not comply with the requirements of a deposition under Fed. R. Crim. P. 15.

United States v. Armijo, 5 F.3d 1229 (9th Cir. 1993) : The Court held it was plain error in a drug prosecution to admit a prior inconsistent statement to FBI agents without a limiting instruction. In United States v. Tafollo-Cardenas, 897 F.2d 976 (9th Cir. 1990) , the declarant told agents at the time of her arrest that in Mexico the defendant had given her heroin to deliver, but at trial she said the statement was a lie. The Trial Judge refused to instruct that the prior statement could be used only for impeachment, apparently persuaded that United States v. Owens n69 allowed its substantive use. The Court reversed, holding that the statement came within no hearsay exception, it was not admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(A) because it was not given under oath at a proceeding or deposition, the limiting instruction should have been given, and admission without the instruction was not harmless.

[h] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Presence of Declarant

United States v. Silverstein, 737 F.2d 864 (10th Cir. 1984) : The Court held it was error in a prosecution of an inmate for killing another inmate to admit under Rule 801(d)(1)(A) a prior statement of a codefendant whose trial had been severed. Although the severance was obtained so that the defendant could call the codefendant to testify, the defendant chose not to, and the Court stated that "[a] defendant has no duty to call any witness."

[i] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Relationship to Impeachment

United States v. Bomski, 125 F.3d 1115 (7th Cir. 1997) : After an accomplice gave exculpatory testimony in a bank robbery case, the prosecution introduced the witness' grand jury testimony implicating the defendants. At the end of the trial, the Judge gave a pattern instruction limiting consideration of prior inconsistent statements to the credibility of a witness and not to establish the truth of the matters asserted. The Court held that the instruction should not have been given, because the grand jury testimony fit the hearsay exception, but concluded that the error was harmless.

[j] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Timing of Introduction

Alexander v. Conveyors & Dumpers, Inc., 731 F.2d 1221 (5th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the manufacturer in a wrongful death action arising from an accident on a conveyor, holding that it was permissible for the defendant to ask a defense witness about deposition testimony that was inconsistent with her trial testimony without actually offering the deposition statements as evidence until later in the case. It reasoned that the Rule does not control the timing of formal submission of prior statements so long as the declarant who made them testifies and is subject to cross-examination about them.

United States v. Odom, 13 F.3d 949 (6th Cir. 1994) : At the trial of a cocaine distribution conspiracy, the government called an accomplice and asked about his grand jury testimony, which he said was perjured; on cross-examination, the defense elicited testimony inconsistent with the grand jury testimony; and at the conclusion of the witness' trial testimony, transcripts of his grand jury testimony and a recantation hearing were admitted as substantive evidence. The Court held there was no error, as it is immaterial whether the prosecution or the defense elicits the foundation for prior inconsistent statements; furthermore, a sufficient inconsistency is shown when the witness labels prior testimony as false. One Judge dissented, on the grounds that the witness had made no statements at trial with which the grand jury testimony was inconsistent before it was elicited and that labeling a prior statement as false is not a proper substitute for a true response from the witness contradicting his prior testimony.

[4] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Prior Statement By WitnesS -- ConsistenT

[a] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Anticipating Impeachment

Ross v. Saint Augustine's College, 103 F.3d 338 (4th Cir. 1996) : After the plaintiff gave testimony against the defendant in a reverse-discrimination suit, her fortunes as a student changed radically, causing psychological injury necessitating psychiatric treatment. In her subsequent action against the college for reckless infliction of emotional distress, the plaintiff missed most of the trial on advice of her psychiatrist. Before she testified, several other witnesses were permitted to provide, as "corroborating" evidence, hearsay testimony as to what she had said. The statements were confirmed by documentary evidence or by her subsequent testimony, and all were subjected to impeachment efforts during the defendant's thorough cross-examination of the plaintiff. The Court held that although there was a violation of the sequence required by Rule 801(d)(1)(B), the risks it had identified in United States v. Bolick, infra, were not present and the violation did not affect any substantial right of a party, so any error was harmless. In United States v. Bolick, 917 F.2d 135 (4th Cir. 1990) , the Court reversed a conviction for selling cocaine because a government agent had testified to prior consistent statements by informant witnesses before those highly impeachable witnesses had given testimony or had their credibility called into question. The dissenting Judge believed that admission of the evidence was within the Trial Court's discretion regarding the proper order of proof, as the statements provided background helpful to a complete understanding of the agent's testimony.

United States v. Beaulieu, 194 F.3d 918 (8th Cir. 1999) : In a child sexual abuse prosecution, the prosecution was allowed to introduce testimony, by the victim's mother and a friend, that the victim had told them of abuse by the defendant. The Trial Judge admitted the evidence "conditionally" in response to the government's argument that it was being introduced as a preemptive rebuttal to an improper motive charge that it believed the defense would make later. However, defense counsel never asserted the victim had an improper motive or fabricated her account, except in closing argument, where counsel simply argued that the victim had made up the story from the start. Reversing, the Court held that the statements were inadmissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(B) because the defense made no charge of improper motive or recent fabrication. In United States v. Azure, n70 the Court indicated that statements should not be admitted under this Rule until a witness has been cross-examined.

[b] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Completion Use Only

United States v. Keltner, 147 F.3d 662 (8th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed racketeering convictions, finding no error when the government was permitted to question a witness on redirect examination about prior consistent statements even though they were made after the witness' motive to lie or fabricate had arisen. The Court reasoned that the defendants had cross-examined the witness about prior statements but had omitted portions, which the government was entitled to elicit under the role of completeness rather than under Rule 801(d)(1)(B).

[c] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Corroborating Accused's Testimony

United States v. Lewis, 987 F.2d 1349 (8th Cir. 1993) : The defendant in a cocaine conspiracy prosecution testified he had made a trip to Florida to turn others in to the DEA. The Court held that his girlfriend should have been allowed to corroborate his testimony that he had told her the purpose of the trip before going, but the error was harmless.

[d] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Corroborating Witness' Testimony

United States v. Acker, 52 F.3d 509 (4th Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed a bank robbery conviction because an officer was permitted to recount a statement given by the principal prosecution witness after he had been arrested and indicted for participation in the robbery. The evidence was erroneously admitted only to corroborate the witness' testimony and not to rebut a charge of fabrication; in any event, it would have been difficult to satisfy the foundation requirement that the statement was made before the witness had a motive to fabricate.

United States v. Ruiz, 249 F.3d 643 (7th Cir. 2001) : Two undercover officers, one at the front and one at the back, maintained surveillance of a house suspected as a drug trafficking location. The defendant was arrested after an apparent drug transfer at the back of the house was interrupted by one of the officers. After that officer testified, his partner recounted what he had been told by radio about the incident as it was happening. The Court held the testimony was admissible as a prior consistent statement, since the proof was elicited after the declarant testified and defense counsel raised the implication that parts of his testimony were fictional, e.g., by showing that they were omitted from his post-incident report. The fact that the statements were made while events were still unfolding meant they were made before the declarant's credibility was put into question.

[e] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Hearsay Within Hearsay

United States v. Pendas-Martinez, 845 F.2d 938 (11th Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed a conviction for marijuana offenses, finding that a Coast Guard officer's handwritten report of events on the night of a chase of a small boat from which marijuana was thrown was improperly admitted. Even if the officer had been sufficiently attacked to justify rehabilitation, the report contained hearsay within hearsay and therefore was more than a prior statement of the officer.

[f] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Nontestifying Declarant

United States v. Sadler, 234 F.3d 368 (8th Cir. 2000) : Affirming convictions for armed bank robbery and firearm possession, the Court held that testimony from an attorney who had represented the defendant in State Court that the defendant protested his innocence moments before confessing to a deputy was inadmissible hearsay. The Court held that the testimony could not be admitted under Rule 801(d)(1)(b) as consistent with the defendant's not guilty plea, because the defendant did not testify.

[g] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Opportunity for Cross-Examination

United States v. Deeb, 13 F.3d 1532 (11th Cir. 1994) : The defendant in a cocaine importation case failed to appear for his scheduled trial, which proceeded against his codefendants in his absence. When he was finally apprehended and tried, the government introduced deposition testimony by a cooperating witness who was unavailable to testify. The government also introduced that witness' testimony at the codefendant's trial, under the prior consistent statement, former testimony, and residual exceptions. The Court affirmed, but held that the former testimony was not admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(B) because the witness was not "subject to cross-examination concerning the statement" at the deposition, as the defendant was not notified until later that the government intended to offer it.

[h] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Opportunity for Examination

United States v. Piva, 870 F.2d 753 (1st Cir. 1989) : Affirming a marijuana conviction, the Court held that an officer's testimony regarding an informant's prior consistent statement was properly admitted even before the defendant had an opportunity to examine the informant about the statement. No showing was made that the defense was unable to recall the informant and to examine him.

United States v. Bond, 87 F.3d 695 (5th Cir. 1996) : Affirming the Trial Judge's refusal to permit a defendant to withdraw his guilty plea, the Court held that a Magistrate Judge properly excluded a tape made by the defendant while he was a fugitive, since the defendant did not testify and could not therefore offer evidence of a prior consistent statement.

[i] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Prior Statement of Cooperating Witness

United States v. Wilson, 355 F.3d 358 (5th Cir. 2003) : In a narcotics prosecution, a cooperating witness, Osborne, testified that he had sold drugs for Odom. On cross-examination, defense counsel focused on the benefits that Osborne derived from his plea bargain with the government. On redirect, the government introduced a letter that Osborne wrote to another coconspirator, McDade, three years prior to entering into the plea agreement. In the letter, Osborne referred to cocaine that McDade handled for Odom and threatened to tell Odom that McDade had been cheating him if McDade did not provide Osborne with money to pay for an attorney to defend an unrelated charge. The Court found no error in admitting the letter as a prior consistent statement:

> Even though Osborne may have also had a motive to fabricate when he wrote the letter, considering Osborne wrote his letter three years earlier, while in prison on an unrelated charge, to a person who could not directly help Osborne avoid prison time, the district court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the motive to write the letter was different than the motive to fabricate arising from his plea bargains charged at trial. A prior consistent statement need not rebut all motives to fabricate, but only the specific motive alleged at trial.

United States v. Anderson, 303 F.3d 847 (7th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine base, holding that there was no plain error in admitting evidence of post-arrest statements by drug dealers identifying the defendant as their supplier. The Court found that defense counsel had insinuated through cross-examination of the dealers that they had communicated with each other after their arrests while they were incarcerated near each other, and that they decided to frame Anderson to reduce their own sentences. The post-arrest statements, taken before the witnesses had any opportunity to consult, were thus admissible to rebut the claim that they decided later to frame Anderson. In United States v. Stoecker, 215 F.3d 788 (7th Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed convictions for making false statements to financial institutions and giving or receiving bribes, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of statements, consistent with his trial testimony, made by a government witness several years before he entered into a plea agreement with the government. The Court found that, between the questions asked by the defense on cross-examination and voir dire, the Trial Judge could have found that the defendant sought to imply that the witness fabricated his testimony because of his deal with the government. The consistent statements rebutted the charge of fabrication because they pre-dated the plea agreement by approximately five years.

[j] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Rehabilitation Use Only

United States v. Stover, 329 F.3d 859 (D.C. Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed drug-related convictions, finding no error in the admission of a witness' prior statements to the FBI on redirect examination after the witness was cross-examined concerning an inconsistency between his trial testimony and one statement he made to the FBI. The Court concluded that neither Rule 801(d)(1)(B) nor Tome v. United States, 513 U.S. 150 (1995) , governs statements offered only to clarify or rebut an inconsistency raised on cross-examination. Although some of the statements offered were not relevant to rebut inconsistencies, the error in admitting the irrelevant statements was harmless.

United States v. Mercado Irizarry, 404 F.3d 497 (1st Cir. 2005) : Affirming cocaine-related convictions, the Court held that a police officer's testimony about a prior statement by a cooperating witness was properly admitted as a prior consistent statement, on the ground that the witness' consistent sworn statement about the events had already been introduced into evidence by the defense in an attempt to impeach his direct testimony. In a tax fraud case, United States v. Simonelli, 237 F.3d 19 (1st Cir. 2001) , a principal prosecution witness was the defendant's accountant, who testified under immunity. On cross-examination, the accountant admitted making inconsistent statements, and committing perjury, in his initial grand jury appearance, when making a subsequent proffer, and at a second grand jury appearance. On redirect the witness was permitted to read testimony he had given to the grand jury that was consistent with his trial testimony; this prior testimony covered both specific points raised in the cross-examination and other points within the scope of the overall cross-exam. The Court held that some of the prior consistent statements were properly admitted, where they provided a larger context in which trial testimony could be understood as not really inconsistent with prior statements. However, it was error (but harmless) to admit grand jury statements that were not relevant to understand or rehabilitate trial testimony, but simply to bolster it by presenting again the evidence presented on direct, through the testimony about statements to the grand jury.

United States v. Gluzman, 154 F.3d 49 (2d Cir. 1998) : The defendant argued that a prior consistent statement of her accomplice, who testified as a prosecution witness at her trial for interstate domestic violence, was not admissible under Tome v. United States, because it was made after the defendant was arrested. Affirming, the Court found that the statement was offered for rehabilitation outside Rule 801(d)(1)(B), and therefore the Tome pre-motive requirement was inapplicable. In United States v. Castillo, 14 F.3d 802 (2d Cir. 1994) , defense counsel, seeking to discredit an undercover officer's testimony by arguing that he lied about the presence of a gun to justify his snorting cocaine during a drug purchase, contrasted the officer's testimony that he told his superior immediately after the buy that he had been forced to ingest cocaine "at gunpoint" with his testimony that the gun was displayed but never removed from an accomplice's waistband. The Court held it was not an abuse of discretion to admit testimony from the superior repeating what the officer had said to him, as the evidence was offered only to rehabilitate credibility rather than for its truth, and thus it did not matter if the officer had a motive to fabricate when he was debriefed by his superior. In United States v. Pierre, n71 the Court affirmed a heroin conviction, finding that the Trial Judge properly admitted evidence that an agent's formal report stated that the defendant refused to make a controlled delivery, after the defense elicited testimony from the agent that his notes of his interview with the defendant contained no reference to the refusal. The Court reasoned that "a prior consistent statement may be used for rehabilitation when the statement has a probative force bearing on credibility beyond merely showing repetition," without implicating Rule 801(d)(1)(B). In United States v. Brennan, n72 the Court, affirming a former State Judge's bribery and corruption convictions, followed Pierre and held that the Trial Judge properly admitted grand jury testimony to rehabilitate a witness who had been attacked on cross-examination with suggestions that he had made inconsistent statements to the grand jury.

United States v. Casoni, 950 F.2d 893 (3d Cir. 1991) : When the defendant sought on cross-examination to impeach the principal witness in a trial of racketeering offenses by suggesting he fabricated his testimony to gain immunity, the government called the witness' attorney to testify to what the witness had told him at their first meeting, before the attorney advised him to seek immunity by offering testimony that incriminated others in the scheme. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in finding the statements were made before the motive to fabricate arose, even though there was evidence that the witness knew he was in trouble before he consulted the attorney. When, as here, the statements are offered only to rehabilitate, the possibility that a motive to fabricate existed when the statements were made is a matter of relevance, not a condition barring admissibility.

United States v. Ellis, 121 F.3d 908 (4th Cir. 1997) : Affirming convictions arising out of a bank robbery, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting summaries of FBI interviews with a cooperating witness as prior consistent statements, since they were offered only for the limited purpose of rehabilitating the witness' credibility. In such a situation, the only requirement is that the prior statement have some rebutting force beyond the mere fact that the witness has repeated on a prior occasion a statement consistent with his trial testimony; the restrictions of Rule 801(d)(1)(B) and the "pre-motive rule" of Tome v. United States do not apply.

United States v. Denton, 246 F.3d 784 (6th Cir. 2001) : Affirming kidnapping convictions, the Court found no error in the admission of prior consistent statements by a government witness. Defense counsel impeached the witness by having her read selected questions and answers from her written statements to the police, which appeared to be inconsistent with her trial testimony. In order to rebut the contention that the statements were inconsistent, the government was entitled to have the witness read her statements into the record in their entirety. Because the consistent statements were offered to rehabilitate the witness and not for their truth, there was no need to comply with the requirements of Rule 801(d)(1)(B). Affirming a defendant's judgment in a product liability case, Engebretsen v. Fairchild Aircraft Corp., 21 F.3d 721 (6th Cir. 1994) , the Court held that reports containing opinions of defense expert witnesses as well as prejudicial hearsay should not have been admitted under Rules 702 and 703 simply because the experts testified. However, because the plaintiffs relied on the reports in impeaching the experts, the reports were properly admitted for rehabilitation rather than for their truth. The Court added in a footnote that a Judge may be obliged to limit rehabilitation to testimony about documents rather than to admission of the documents themselves.

United States v. Harris, 761 F.2d 394 (7th Cir. 1985) : This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 801.02[4][c].

United States v. Kenyon, 397 F.3d 1071 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court reversed convictions for child sex abuse, holding that prior consistent statements made by the victim to a physician's assistant were erroneously admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(B). The statements were not admissible to rebut an attack of recent fabrication, because the defendant made only a general attack, including allegations of bias, on the victim's credibility. Although the consistent statements might have been admissible to rehabilitate the victim's credibility, the Court refused to affirm on this ground, because the consistent statements were "neither offered nor admitted on that basis, and the jury was never instructed that the evidence was received for a limited purpose." In United States v. Andrade, n73 the Court affirmed fraud convictions, holding there was no error in admitting evidence of an agent's notes concerning an interview with a defendant. The defendant questioned two other witnesses concerning the notes and left the impression of inaccuracies in the notes and the suggestion that there might have been collaboration between government witnesses.

United States v. Beltran, 165 F.3d 1266 (9th Cir. 1999) : When the government in a drug prosecution offered extrinsic evidence of a witness' prior consistent statements, the Judge overruled a hearsay objecection and gave a clear limiting instruction that the prior statements could be used only in considering the witness' credibility. The Court noted that the Judge's instruction was incorrect on the law, but even if the statements had been improperly admitted, it must be assumed that the jury did not use the statements as substantive evidence, so any error was harmless. A concurring Judge argued that it was error to rule that prior consistent statements could be offered simply because defense counsel asked the child witness whether he had prepared his testimony with the prosecutor and his mother prior to trial; to hold that such a question invites use of prior statements would render the limitations in the rule "a nullity and open the floodgates to the admission of practically any prior consistent statement." This Judge disagreed that the instruction reduced the impact of the error, since "[t]he credibility/substance distinction is illusory in this context," but would have affirmed solely because the statements were cumulative of other defense evidence. In United States v. Collicott, 92 F.3d 973 (9th Cir. 1996) , defense counsel, cross-examining a prosecution witness in a drug case, asked her what time of day she had told an arresting officer that a drug dealer had come to the hotel room she was sharing with the defendant, but she said she did not remember. Defense counsel then called the officer to recount what the witness said about the time the dealer arrived. On cross-examination of the officer, the government elicited other statements the witness had made to the officer during that conversation about the defendant's connection with the dealer. Reversing the conviction, the Court held that the remainder of the conversation was not admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(B) because the statements were not made before the existence of a motive to fabricate. Neither could the remainder come in on the ground that the defendant had "opened the door" by introducing the officer's testimony, which was inconsistent with the witness' stated failure of memory, since they did not clarify or provide context for the inconsistent statements, but merely augmented the inconsistency and further impeached the witness by contrasting her detailed conversation with her testimony denying memory of the conversation. In United States v. Payne, n74 the Court affirmed a conviction for carnal knowledge of a female under age 16, holding that prior consistent statements could be admitted, even though made after the motive to fabricate arose, when they came from the same investigative reports from which impeaching inconsistent statements had been drawn, as they demonstrated that the inconsistencies were a minor part of an otherwise consistent account.

United States v. Paradies, 98 F.3d 1266 (11th Cir. 1996) : Affirming convictions arising out of a public corruption scheme, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting tape recordings of breakfast/bribery meetings between a conspirator cooperating with the government and two other councilmembers, in which the cooperating witness made several references to the defendant. Because the tapes were made after the witness began working for the government, it was error to admit them under Rule 801(d)(1)(B). However, admission of the tapes was upheld because, inter alia, the conversations were innocuous and they tended to rehabilitate the witness' testimony that the people involved had a familiar relationship and had regular breakfast meetings.

[k] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Response to Inconsistent Statement

United States v. Coleman, 631 F.2d 908 (D.C. Cir. 1980) : The Court said that "[e]ven where the suggestion of contradiction is only imputation of an inaccurate memory, a prior consistent statement is admissible to rebut the inference."

United States v. Zuniga-Lara, 570 F.2d 1286 (5th Cir. 1978) : The Court upheld the introduction of a prior consistent statement to rehabilitate a government witness who was impeached on cross-examination on the basis of his failure to include information in a written report.

United States v. Allen, 579 F.2d 531 (9th Cir. 1978) : The Court approved the admission of evidence that a cooperating witness in this armed bank robbery case made consistent statements, after the defense emphasized an inconsistent statement and "contended that her testimony on direct examination was the result of an attempt to avoid criminal prosecution."

Rainey v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 827 F.2d 1498 (1987) , reinstating en banc 784 F.2d 1523 (11th Cir. 1986) , aff'd in part and rev'd in part, 488 U.S. 153 (1988) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendants in an action by spouses of two people killed in a Navy aircraft. It found error when the defendant was permitted to cross-examine one plaintiff about portions of a letter he had written to a Navy officer investigating the crash, but the plaintiff was denied the opportunity assured by Rule 106 to place the evidence in perspective by bringing out other portions of the letter. The Court added that since the defendant used the portions of the letter as a prior inconsistent statement, the plaintiff should have been permitted to introduce other portions as prior consistent statements under Rule 801(d)(1)(B). The Supreme Court affirmed the Rule 106 decision, so it did not address the Rule 801(d)(1)(B) point.

[l] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Scope of Rehabilitation

United States v. Pedroza, 750 F.2d 187 (2d Cir. 1984) : The Court criticized the admission of hearsay statements pursuant to the government's representation that the declarants would subsequently testify. This procedure permitted the government to benefit from statements that would not have been admitted under Rule 801(d)(1)(B), since the declarants had not been attacked and rehabilitation was neither necessary nor permissible.

United States v. Brantley, 733 F.2d 1429 (11th Cir. 1984) : One codefendant in a marijuana importation case prepared, with his counsel, a 31-page statement in the hopes of obtaining a good plea bargain. He subsequently pleaded guilty and testified for the government. On cross-examination, he was asked whether his statement disclosed all the facts to which he testified. In response to the implication that the witness might have fabricated facts, the government introduced the entire statement. The Court upheld its admission, finding that no request had been made to eliminate any specific portions. This is a troubling case. Surely, the government should have been permitted to show that its witness was consistent after the witness was attacked. But the showing of consistency could have been narrowly confined to the facts at which the cross-examination was directed. The probative value for rehabilitation of admitting 31 pages might have been substantially outweighed by the danger that the jury would unduly rely on the written statement, which amounted to a summary of this witness' complete testimony on direct examination.

[m] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Subject to Cross-Examination

United States v. Hebeka, 25 F.3d 287 (6th Cir. 1994) : In a food stamp fraud prosecution, defense counsel attacked the credibility of the government's star witness, Dennis Alfred, by implying that he fabricated his testimony to avoid prosecution. The Court found no error when a rehabilitating prior consistent statement was introduced through another witness rather than through Alfred himself. The Court noted that Alfred was in court and subject to cross-examination, and could easily have been recalled after the third party's testimony.

United States v. Green, 258 F.3d 683 (7th Cir. 2001) : In a trial for a crack cocaine distribution conspiracy, an investigator was permitted to read his notes of an interview with a cooperating witness. The Court held that the notes were properly admitted as past recollection recorded, and the included statements of the cooperating witness were admissible without being adopted by the declarant because they were independently admissible as prior consistent statements. The Court overruled its unique reading of Rule 801(d)(1)(B) in United States v. West, 670 F.2d 675 (7th Cir. 1982) , which interpreted the requirement of cross-examination to mean that the out-of-court statement must be elicited through the declarant rather than through a third party to whom the declaration was made. Although in Green cross-examination of the declarant had been completed when his prior consistent statements were introduced, he was still available for cross-examination on the statements, so Rule 801(d)(1)(B)'s requirement was satisfied.

[n] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Suggestion of Fabrication

[i] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Civil Cases

Gaines v. Walker, 986 F.2d 1438 (D.C. Cir. 1993) : Reversing an arrestee's judgment against a police officer alleged to have inflicted unnecessary force, the Court held that the defendant should have been permitted to offer his police report as a prior consistent statement. In response to the defense that the officer merely responded to the plaintiff's attempt to knife him, the plaintiff cross-examined the officer as to the difference between the offenses of carrying a deadly weapon and possession of a prohibited weapon. The officer responded that the possession crime implies an intent to use the weapon; the plaintiff then elicited that the document prepared by the U.S. Attorney's office regarding the incident, which likely would have been based upon the officer's report, charged the plaintiff only with carrying, and not with possession. Although the Court recognized that not every attempt to impeach a witness by showing inconsistencies between trial testimony and pretrial statements amounts to a charge of recent fabrication, it concluded that the only reasonable interpretation of the questions put to the officer was to suggest that he had fabricated his account of the plaintiff's use of the knife.

Thomas v. United States, 41 F.3d 1109 (7th Cir. 1994) : Affirming a judgment assessing penalties against corporate officers for wilfully failing to pay withheld employment taxes to the government, the Court held that a prior consistent statement of one of the officers (Thomas) was properly excluded. Thomas testified that he left the corporation because he thought it was headed toward financial ruin. On cross-examination, the government implied that Thomas quit in part because he was afraid of incurring liability for the corporation's unpaid employment taxes. An IRS form prepared by Thomas after he left the corporation was consistent with his testimony as to his reasons for leaving, but the Court held that the document was properly excluded because the government had not charged Thomas with fabricating his testimony. Stating that "[o]ne may impeach for lack of credibility without going so far as to charge recent fabrication," the Court concluded that the "line of questioning was intended to show that Thomas was not telling the whole story, that an additional reason for his leaving was his fear that he would be liable for the unpaid taxes."

Mayoza v. Heinold Commodities, Inc., 871 F.2d 672 (7th Cir. 1989) : The Court affirmed a judgment for brokers who were sued by a commodities investor, holding that the plaintiff's wife was properly barred from testifying to a statement made during a telephone conversation with his principal broker, as no effort had been made to prove that the husband had recently fabricated testimony. In Christmas v. Sanders, n75 the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a civil rights action against a police officer, upholding the exclusion of two police reports offered as consistent statements. It found that there was no charge made of recent fabrication and that the reports might have been rejected in any event because of their extensive references to the testimony of other witnesses.

Breneman v. Kennecott Corp., 799 F.2d 470 (9th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a judgment for an employer in a sex discrimination case, the Court upheld exclusion of handwritten notes apparently made by a supervisor concerning a conversation he had with the plaintiff where it was unclear when the notes were made and the defendant did not imply fabrication on the part of the plaintiff.

Garcia v. Watkins, 604 F.2d 1297 (10th Cir. 1979) : The Court held it was error to exclude evidence of a statement made following an auto accident by a plaintiff who, the defendants implied, was fabricating her testimony.

[ii] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Suggestion of Fabrication -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Wright, 783 F.2d 1091 (D.C. Cir. 1986) : In a kidnapping case, the Court found that evidence that a defendant allegedly attempted to send a note to the victim prior to his arrest was not admissible as a prior consistent statement until such time as the government attempted to suggest that the defendant's trial testimony was fabricated.

United States v. Lozada-Rivera, 177 F.3d 98 (1st Cir. 1999) : The defendant, charged with taking part in a drug conspiracy, contended that he was an innocent businessman. The government called a DEA agent who testified that the defendant made incriminating statements on the day of his arrest, which the defendant denied. On cross-examination of the agent, defense counsel asked whether he had ever had a "problem" with the defendant's family, and brought out the fact that the agent had gone to school with the defendant's children 20 years earlier. The agent denied having any problem. The Court held it was error to admit in rebuttal a formal report prepared by the agent, in which he recounted, consistently with his testimony, his version of the interview with the defendant on the day of his arrest. The report was not admissible either for rehabilitation or for its truth. Defense counsel's mild cross-examination of the agent did not qualify as an implicit charge of improper motive. In United States v. Alzanki, 54 F.3d 994 (1st Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed a conviction for holding a household servant in involuntary servitude, and held there was no error in admitting the servant's prior consistent statements to nurses, a therapist, and a police officer. The defense had impugned her motives by cross-examination suggesting that she had recently met with a Hollywood producer interested in purchasing film rights to her story and that she had been interviewed by Boston papers to drum up publicity for her story. In United States v. Arias-Santana, n76 the Court affirmed convictions for cocaine distribution, holding that a police report identifying the defendant at a drug buy, which would normally be inadmissible under Rule 803(8)(B), was admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(B) after the report was used on cross-examination and the officer was impliedly charged with recent fabrication. In United States v. Vest, n77 the Court held that responses of a witness during a phone conversation were admissible, since the witness' credibility was questioned on cross-examination and the witness had no motive to fabricate at the time of the conversation.

United States v. Wilkerson, 361 F.3d 717 (2d Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a Hobbs Act conviction arising out of a fatal robbery, holding that a prior consistent statement of a prosecution witness was properly offered for its truth. The statement was introduced to rebut an implication by defense counsel that the witness' testimony had changed in light of recent government assistance in securing public housing, and it had been made at least three years before the development of this alleged motive to fabricate.

United States v. Provenzano, 620 F.2d 985 (3d Cir. 1980) : Even though the Trial Judge did not actually find that certain out-of-court statements were in furtherance of a conspiracy, the Court concluded that they were admissible anyway, since they were consistent with the declarant's trial testimony and tended to rebut the implicit defense claim that the declarant's testimony was a fabrication used to buy his way out of prison.

United States v. Bishop, 264 F.3d 535 (5th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed a conviction for income tax offenses, but it found that the Trial Judge should not have admitted IRS agents' notes regarding meetings they had with the defendant. Although defense attorneys implied that one agent made mistakes or lied while testifying, "it does not appear that his supposed fabrications were recent or made with an improper motive." The cross-examination of another agent was an attempt to refresh her recollection rather than an effort to imply that her earlier testimony was false. "Rule 801(d)(1)(B) cannot be construed to allow the admission of what would otherwise be hearsay every time a law enforcement officer's credibility or memory is challenged; otherwise, cross-examination would always transform hearsay notes into admissible evidence." In United States v. Henderson, 19 F.3d 917 (5th Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed a conviction for fraudulent banking activities, holding that cross-examination of a government witness about an FBI investigation raised questions about the witness' motives and possible collusion between the witness and the government, which provided a foundation for admission of prior statements by the witness consistent with his trial testimony. After the defendant in United States v. Pe na n78 insinuated that a testifying DEA agent may have inserted facts he learned subsequently into his final report on his interview with the defendant, the agent's handwritten notes on the interview were admitted. The Court held that the defendant had opened the door to the notes made the day of the interview by challenging the final report made 17 days after the interview.

United States v. Smith, 746 F.2d 1183 (6th Cir. 1984) : The Court reversed a conviction arising from the robbery of a postal employee because the defendant's brother's confession was admitted at trial before the brother actually testified. The Court found that the confession was not admissible as a consistent statement, since no charge of improper motive had been made when the statement was offered.

United States v. Williams, 128 F.3d 1128 (7th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony that the defendant's companion had told others in phone calls from jail shortly after the incident that the guns were hers and the defendant had admitted ownership only to protect her. Cross-examination as to whether she had told the U.S. Attorney, BATF, or the police the guns were hers was not an implied charge of recent fabrication but only an impeachment of her credibility, since it showed only that she did not tell her story to everyone, not that she was telling a new and different story at trial. In United States v. Cherry, 938 F.2d 748 (7th Cir. 1991) , the Court held that the defendant's extensive cross-examination challenging the core of the victim's testimony in a sexual abuse case could constitute an implied charge of recent fabrication justifying admissibility of prior consistent statements.

United States v. Kenyon, 397 F.3d 1071 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court reversed convictions for child sex abuse, holding that prior consistent statements made by the victim to a physician's assistant were erroneously admitted under Rule 801(d)(1)(B). The statements were not admissible to rebut an attack of recent fabrication, because the defendant made no such attack on the victim. The defense "mounted a general attack on A.L.'s credibility, including allegations of bias against Kenyon, with no evidence to imply that A.L. had recently fabricated the matters previously recounted" to the physician's assistant. In United States v. Webb, 214 F.3d 962 (8th Cir. 2000) , the defendant sheriff was convicted for violating the victim's civil rights by assaults on two occasions when she requested help in enforcing a restraining order against her husband. The initial indictment charged only the second assault, and the government indicated to the defense that the first took place on June 23. A superseding indictment charged both and gave the date of the first assault as June 18. At trial the defense attacked the victim's recollection of the date of her first visit to the sheriff's office, questioning whether it had taken place at all and suggesting that she had changed her mind about the date once she learned he had an alibi for June 23. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony from staff at a family violence prevention shelter that she had visited after the first assault, since it tended to rebut the implication that the victim had fabricated the first visit, even if the witnesses could not testify to the exact date of the sexual assault of which the victim had complained. In a child sexual abuse case, United States v. Beaulieu, n79 the prosecution was allowed to introduce testimony by the victim's mother and a friend that the victim had told them of abuse by the defendant. The Trial Judge admitted the evidence "conditionally" in response to the government's argument that it was being introduced as a preemptive rebuttal to an improper motive charge that it believed the defense would make later. However, defense counsel never asserted the victim had an improper motive or fabricated her account, except in closing argument, where counsel simply argued that the victim had made up the story from the start. Reversing, the Court held that the statements were inadmissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(B) because the defense made no charge of improper motive or recent fabrication. In United States v. Barrett, n80 a sexual abuse prosecution in which the defendant argued that the victim changed her story about the attack from first saying she was awake before penetration to later saying she was awake only after penetration had occurred, the Court held that an FBI agent was properly permitted to testify that shortly after the assault, the victim had told him that she was not aware of the defendant until after he had penetrated her. In United States v. Red Feather, n81 the Court affirmed sexual assault convictions of a father who abused his daughter, and held that the daughter's diary entries were properly admitted to rehabilitate her after a cross-examination that suggested she had been coached by social service counselors. In United States v. Nelson, n82 the Court sustained a conviction for failing to file income tax returns and held it was not error to exclude the defendant's offer of a prior statement that was consistent with his trial testimony. Since the government's cross-examination indicated only that the defendant's explanation had differed on a prior occasion, not that he had fabricated testimony, the Court declined to disturb the ruling below that the prior statement was unnecessary for rehabilitation.

United States v. Bao, 189 F.3d 860 (9th Cir. 1999) : When police came with a search warrant to investigate illegal printing of computer manuals at the defendant's shop, several officers remained at the scene while others went to interview the person identified as having placed the order. In the meantime, the defendant, who had not been placed under arrest, was interviewed by a newsreporter and stated that he did not know he was doing anything illegal. When he was subsequently interrogated by police he admitted the printing was illegal, and the government introduced that statement in its case-in-chief. The Trial Judge excluded the exculpatory statement to the newsreporter, and the Court affirmed. The government had made no suggestion of improper motive or fabrication by admitting the defendant's admission during its case-in-chief, since the defendant had not yet testified at that point (and in fact did not take the stand until after the exculpatory statement was excluded), and the admission had been introduced as substantive evidence rather than to impeach.

United States v. Sutton, 732 F.2d 1483 (10th Cir. 1984) : In a prosecution for obstruction of justice and conspiracy, the Court upheld the admission of testimony by a government witness' wife as to her husband's statements concerning the defendant's telephone instructions to destroy records. Since the defendant had cross-examined the witness in a way that suggested the fabrication of his testimony concerning the telephone conversations, the wife's testimony was admissible to rehabilitate the witness.

United States v. Ettinger, 344 F.3d 1149 (11th Cir. 2003) : A witness testified in a trial for assaulting a federal officer that the defendant had said shortly after the incident that he had told the victim, "I told you I was going to get you." The witness had not included the remark in his own report made after the attack, but the government was permitted to introduce an FBI report made one week after the attack that recounted the witness' statement including the remark. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, as the defense implied during cross-examination of the witness that he had fabricated hearing the defendant's statement. Affirming a conviction for violating civil rights in United States v. Farmer, 923 F.2d 1557 (11th Cir. 1991) , the Court held there was no error in admitting a prior consistent statement where the implication that testimony had been fabricated fairly arose from the line of questioning pursued.

[o] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Timing of Prior Consistent Statement

Tome v. United States, 513 U.S. 150 (1995) : In reversing and remanding a conviction for child sex abuse, the Court held that Rule 801(d)(1)(B) permits the introduction of a declarant's consistent out-of-court statements to rebut a charge of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive only when those statements were made before the charged fabrication, influence, or motive arose. Accordingly, the child's out-of-court statements implicating her father were erroneously admitted for their truth under the Rule, because the statements were made at a time when the child had a motive to fabricate (i.e., a desire to live with her mother rather than her father).

United States v. Awon, 135 F.3d 96 (1st Cir. 1998) : Affirming arson and related convictions, the Court held that the Trial Judge erred, albeit harmlessly, in admitting prior consistent statements of two prosecution witnesses. The defense attacked the witnesses on the ground that they were seeking leniency, and the prior statements were made only after the witnesses were informed that the police knew they were involved in the arson and were promised leniency if they cooperated. Since the statements did not predate the witnesses' motivation to obtain leniency, they could not be admitted under Rule 801(d)(1)(B).

United States v. Forrester, 60 F.3d 52 (2d Cir. 1995) : A witness who had been arrested as a member of the conspiracy gave testimony in a cocaine trial that implicated the defendant. On cross-examination defense counsel asserted that the witness was making up her story. In response, the prosecutor had marked for identification, and used to refresh the recollection of the witness, a handwritten statement that the witness had prepared for the government three weeks after her arrest; the statement was consistent with her trial testimony. The Court held it was error to permit use of the document as a prior consistent statement. Because the witness' motive to fabricate arose as soon as she was arrested, the consistent statement post-dated the motive to falsify. The Court concluded that "the Tome rationale applies to a document marked for identification where the government has admitted that its purpose in using the statements contained in the document was to rebut the inference that the witness was making up [her] story." See also United States v. Quinto, n83 which anticipated Tome in reversing a conviction for tax evasion when the government was improperly permitted to introduce a detailed IRS memorandum as a prior consistent statement after a witness was subjected to vigorous cross-examination. The Court concluded that the IRS memorandum was not made prior to the time that the motive to falsify arose, since the defendant contended that, from the beginning, government agents were ruthlessly seeking a conviction, regardless of actual guilt.

United States v. Henderson, 717 F.2d 135 (4th Cir. 1983) : The Court upheld a bank robbery conviction, finding no error in permitting the prosecution to bring out a prior consistent statement of an important government witness. The statement was made after arrest, but before a plea bargain was struck. Thus, the Court concluded, it was made prior to the time that a motive to falsify existed.

United States v. Riddle, 103 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 1997) : Reversing a bank chairman's conviction for fraud in connection with loans in which he was interested, the Court noted that it was no longer permissible to admit a prior consistent statement made after the declarant had an improper motive to fabricate testimony. Thus, it was error to admit a proffer made in the course of plea bargaining by another participant in the scheme.

United States v. Trujillo, 376 F.3d 593 (6th Cir. 2004) : Two witnesses testified at a trial for marijuana trafficking that they had carried marijuana for the defendant. On cross-examination, the defense attempted to impeach them with inconsistent statements they had given to DEA agents in post-arrest interviews. The prosecution then called the agents in order to rehabilitate the witnesses with statements made during the post-arrest interviews that were consistent with their trial testimony. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit the prior consistent statements, as "[i]t is simply not believable to suggest that, a day or two after [the witnesses] were stopped with more than fifty kilograms of marijuana in their car, they did not have a motive to lie, regarding the source of the marijuana, in order to get lenient treatment." In a prosecution for mail fraud, United States v. Toney, 161 F.3d 404 (6th Cir. 1998) , the defendant called Armstrong (the mastermind of the scheme), who had already entered a guilty plea, to testify that the defendant was an unwitting participant. The government then impeached Armstrong with a statement made when she was arrested, in which she had referred to the defendant as a full-fledged accomplice. Defense counsel then sought to introduce an affidavit Armstrong made after the government filed a criminal complaint against both Armstrong and Toney, in which she stated that Toney was an unwitting participant. The Trial Judge held that the statement was made after Armstrong's motive to falsify arose -- although the Judge did not know "what the motive might be here" -- and the Court found no clear error.

United States v. Williams, 128 F.3d 1128 (7th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony that the defendant's companion had told others in phone calls from jail shortly after the incident that the guns were hers and the defendant had admitted ownership only to protect her. It was not indisputably clear that the statement was made before she had a motive to fabricate, since she could well have thought that the defendant should not be carrying a gun with his criminal record. In United States v. Fulford, 980 F.2d 1110 (7th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed convictions for methamphetamine distribution offenses, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting postarrest consistent statements of a cooperating witness for rehabilitation after it was suggested his testimony was a recent fabrication. The defense implied the witness' motive to fabricate arose from his cooperation agreement, so statements prior to that agreement were relevant to rehabilitate. In United States v. Davis, n84 the Court held that there had been no abuse of discretion in excluding the tape of a television interview offered by the defendant in a political corruption prosecution to rebut a charge he had fabricated his defense, because the interview was conducted seven days after FBI agents had indicated to him he was the subject of an investigation. In United States v. Feldman, n85 the Court affirmed convictions for fraud in a scheme to use false bank guarantee letters to fulfill the collateral requirements for trading in stock options. After defense counsel emphasized in his opening statement and on cross-examination of a codefendant that he had made a deal with the government, the prosecutor was properly permitted to introduce a statement that the codefendant had made to the FBI prior to entering into a plea agreement. The Court found that no motive to help the government at the expense of the defendant existed when the statement was made.

United States v. Esparza, 291 F.3d 1052 (8th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a cocaine conviction, the Court held that the defendant's statement, made at the time of his arrest, that he did not know that drugs were in his trailer, was not admissible as a prior consistent statement because he had the same motive to lie at the time of arrest as at trial. In a prosecution for sexual abuse, United States v. White, n86 the Court held that statements of the child victim to a social worker regarding the abuse were not admissible as substantive evidence consistent with the victim's testimony because they were made after the motive to fabricate implied by the defendant's questioning and evidence came into existence. The error was harmless, however.

Arizona v. Johnson, 351 F.3d 988 (9th Cir. 2003) : In the trial of a Border Patrol agent for sexually assaulting an alien in his custody, the government introduced statements denying consent made by the victim to another agent after she was picked up at a border crossing where the defendant had left her following the incident. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, as the statements were consistent with the victim's testimony, offered to rebut a contention that she fabricated her story because she wanted to stay in the United States for the duration of the investigation and trial, and made before any motive to falsify arose, because there was no evidence that at the time the statements were made the victim had been offered any special treatment or had been told that she could stay in the United States for a sustained period. In United States v. Bao, 189 F.3d 860 (9th Cir. 1999) , when police came with a search warrant to investigate illegal printing of computer manuals at the defendant's shop, several officers remained at the scene while others went to interview the person identified as having placed the order. In the meantime, the defendant, who had not been placed under arrest, was interviewed by a newsreporter and stated that he did not know he was doing anything illegal. When he was subsequently interrogated by police he admitted the printing was illegal, and the government introduced that statement in its case-in-chief. The Trial Judge excluded the exculpatory statement to the newsreporter, and the Court affirmed. Even though the defendant was not in custody at the time he spoke to the reporter, he clearly knew that he was a suspect in a criminal investigation and he had a motive to misrepresent to the reporter the knowledge of the crime he had committed. In United States v. Collicott, n87 defense counsel, cross-examining a prosecution witness in a drug case, asked her what time of day she had told an arresting officer that a drug dealer had come to the hotel room she was sharing with the defendant, but she said she did not remember. Defense counsel then called the officer to recount what the witness said about the time the dealer arrived. On cross-examination of the officer, the government elicited other statements the witness had made to the officer during that conversation about the defendant's connection with the dealer. Reversing the conviction, the Court held that the remainder of the conversation was not admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(B) because the witness' motive to falsify was exactly the same when the arrest took place as at trial. See also United States v. Rohrer n88(affirming cocaine convictions, but holding that a diagram made by a witness shortly before signing a cooperation agreement was improperly used to rehabilitate the witness).

United States v. Moreno, 94 F.3d 1453 (10th Cir. 1996) : The Court found it was error (but harmless) to admit a cooperating witness' prior consistent statement, which was made after the witness was arrested but before he entered into a plea agreement. The statement was not made before the motive to falsify arose, because the witness "had an incentive to concoct a story" implicating the defendant as soon as he was arrested. In a prosecution for conspiring to manufacture methamphetamine, United States v. Albers, 93 F.3d 1469 (10th Cir. 1996) , the Court held that it was error (but harmless) to introduce prior consistent statements made, in one case, after the declarant had been arrested on unrelated charges, and in the other, after the declarant's guilty pleas had been accepted but while he was still seeking to appeal his sentence.

United States v. Drury, 396 F.3d 1303 (11th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a murder-for-hire conviction, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a prior consistent statement offered by the defendant. While being held in the arresting officer's vehicle following his arrest, the defendant told his son that the purported scheme was part of a "role-playing exercise" arranged by the ATF instructor who was living with the defendant. The defendant had never previously mentioned the exercise and the instructor denied ever discussing or engaging in such a thing. The Court held that although there could be no per se exclusion of a prior consistent statement made after the declarant's arrest, there was ample support in the record for the determination below that the defendant had adequate motive and opportunity to fabricate the story that he told his son. In United States v. Prieto, 232 F.3d 816 (11th Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed robbery convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion when statements made by an accomplice after his arrest were admitted under Rule 801(d)(1)(B). Refusing to adopt a bright-line rule that a motive to fabricate necessarily attaches upon arrest, the Court found that the witness had spoken after hearing his Miranda rights and with no suggestion that he expected, or his interrogators offered, benefits in exchange for his cooperation.

[5] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Prior Statement By Witness -- Identification

[a] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Drawings

United States v. Moskowitz, 581 F.2d 14 (2d Cir. 1978) : In an armed bank robbery prosecution the government offered a drawing made by an artist from information supplied by witnesses, and two witnesses testified that the drawing looked like the robber. Affirming, the Court unanimously agreed that the two witnesses' statements were admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(C). The majority believed that the sketch itself was not hearsay; the concurring Judge thought it would be a more straightforward analysis to regard the sketch as an integral part of the prior identification evidence. Under either approach, the evidence was properly admitted.

[b] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Failure To Identify at Trial

United States v. Salameh, 152 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 1998) : In the trial arising from the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center, a prosecution witness identified two jurors, rather than two defendants, as perpetrators. The government responded with evidence that the witness had previously identified the two defendants in a photo array. Affirming, the Court found no error in admitting the evidence of the prior identification, noting that a prior identification "is admissible under Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(1)(C), regardless of whether the witness confirms the identification in court." Since the witness was subject to cross-examination about the prior identification, the Rule was satisfied. In United States v. Simmons, 923 F.2d 934 (2d Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed RICO convictions arising out of a massive heroin distribution conspiracy, holding there was no error in admitting evidence that a witness had positively identified a defendant from a 13-photograph array. Even though she did not identify him at trial and even though the government did not record the events surrounding an earlier procedure where she did not identify him, there was no indication the identification was impermissibly suggestive. In United States v. DiTommaso, n89 the Court affirmed convictions for participation in drug trafficking and money laundering, holding that a witness' prior photographic identifications of a defendant were properly elicited, even though the witness was unable to make an in-court identification.

United States v. Blackman, 66 F.3d 1572 (11th Cir. 1995) : The Court held there was no error in permitting an FBI agent to testify that a bank teller had identified a defendant from a photospread as being one of the participants in the charged bank robbery, although the teller could not identify the defendant at trial.

[c] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Memory Problem

United States v. Owens, 484 U.S. 554 (1988) : A correctional counselor at a federal prison was attacked and severely beaten, leaving him with severely impaired memory. At the defendant's trial for assault with intent to murder, the victim had no present memory of his attacker's identity and admitted on cross-examination that he could not remember seeing his assailant, but said he remembered identifying the defendant to an FBI agent who visited him in the hospital. He could not remember any of his other hospital visitors or whether they had suggested who the attacker was. The Court of Appeals reversed the defendant's conviction on hearsay and confrontation grounds, but the Supreme Court held that neither Rule 801(d)(1)(C) nor the Confrontation Clause was violated by admitting evidence of the identification to the FBI agent.

[d] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Photo Identification

United States v. Salameh, 152 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 1998) : In the trial arising from the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center, a prosecution witness identified two jurors, rather than two defendants, as perpetrators. The government responded with evidence that the witness had previously identified the two defendants in a photo array. Affirming, the Court found no error in admitting the evidence of the prior identification. Since the witness was subject to cross-examination about the prior identification, the Rule was satisfied. In United States v. Simmons, 923 F.2d 934 (2d Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed RICO convictions arising out of a massive heroin distribution conspiracy, holding there was no error in admitting evidence that a witness had positively identified a defendant from a 13-photograph array. Even though she did not identify him at trial and even though the government did not record the events surrounding an earlier procedure where she did not identify him, there was no indication the identification was impermissibly suggestive. In United States v. DiTommaso, n90 the Court affirmed convictions for participation in drug trafficking and money laundering, holding that a witness' prior photographic identifications of a defendant were properly elicited.

United States v. Hudson, 564 F.2d 1377 (9th Cir. 1977) : Although it reversed a conviction for armed post office robbery on other grounds, the Court approved the introduction as substantive evidence of prior photographic identifications. "Though a prior identification may be equivocal, the jury is entitled to give it such weight as it will after hearing the testimony under direct and cross examination."

United States v. Blackman, 66 F.3d 1572 (11th Cir. 1995) : The Court held there was no error in permitting an FBI agent to testify that a bank teller had identified a defendant from a photospread as being one of the participants in the charged bank robbery. In United States v. Hines, 955 F.2d 1449 (11th Cir. 1992) , the Court reversed convictions for aggravated sexual assault, holding it was an abuse of discretion to admit photospreads from which the complainant had identified the defendants as her assailants, as there was no demonstrable need to introduce the photographs, the photos implied the defendants had prior criminal records, and the agent's testimony highlighted that the photos were of known criminals.

[e] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Police Reports

United States v. Davis, 181 F.3d 147 (D.C. Cir. 1999) : In a drug prosecution, a police officer's redacted "buy report," which identified the defendant as the seller, was held properly admitted. The officer testified at trial, and therefore the identification in the "buy report" was admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(C).

[f] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Recanting Witness

United States v. Lopez, 271 F.3d 472 (3d Cir. 2001) : In prosecution for robbery and murder, the government subpoenaed a witness to testify that he told the police on the day of a crime that he had seen three of the defendants in the area of the crime, but at trial the witness denied making any such statement. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a police lieutenant was then permitted to testify that the witness had identified the three defendants, as Rule 801(d)(1)(C) applies to identifications like the one made in this case.

United States v. O'Malley, 796 F.2d 891 (7th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed racketeering and extortion convictions, as it held that a recanting witness' prior identification was admissible under the Rule. The witness was present for cross-examination, and the identification was therefore admissible as substantive evidence.

United States v. Shryock, 342 F.3d 948 (9th Cir. 2003) : In a prosecution for gang-related murder and racketeering, one of the alleged victims testified that he had been shot but that he could not identify his assailant or pick him from a photo lineup. He also testified that at a defendant's parole revocation hearing he had testified the defendant did not shoot him. The government later called a police detective to testify that the victim identified the defendant as his assailant during a hospital interview and when shown a photo lineup at his home. The Court held that the detective's testimony was admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(C), because the victim was present at trial and available for cross-examination.

[g] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Scope of the Rule

United States v. Marchand, 564 F.2d 983 (2d Cir. 1977) : A conviction for possession and distribution of marijuana was affirmed on appeal, as the Court rejected a contention that Rule 801(d)(1)(C)'s language "identification ... made after perceiving him" should be limited to statements made after a corporeal identification. The Court held that the Rule covers all identifications of a suspect after a crime is committed as long as proper procedures are used.

[h] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Testimony by Government Agent

United States v. Paredes-Rodriguez, 160 F.3d 49 (1st Cir. 1998) : Appealing from drug and firearms convictions, the defendant argued that a police officer should not have been permitted to testify to a witness' out-of-court identification, because the witness' own identification testimony at trial had been "shaky," so the officer's testimony served only to bolster the witness' identification. Finding no error because the witness testified at trial and was subject to cross-examination, the Court noted that the witness' less-emphatic trial identification would "merely confirm the validity of the premise underlying Rule 801(d)(1)(C)."

United States v. Brewer, 36 F.3d 266 (2d Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution arising from a bank robbery, the defendant sought to prove that eyewitnesses to the robbery failed to identify him in a photo array. The defendant called the police officer who conducted the array, and argued that the officer could testify, under the present sense impression exception, to the witness' failure to identify the defendant. However, the Court held that the statements by the identifying witnesses were not made immediately after the event within the meaning of Rule 803(1) -- the relevant event being the robbery itself and not the failure to identify the defendant. The Court concluded that the admissibility of a failure to make an identification was covered by Rule 801(d)(1)(C) and not by Rule 803(1). Since the witnesses were not called to testify, the testimony of the officer could not be admitted under Rule 801(d)(1)(C).

United States v. Brink, 39 F.3d 419 (3d Cir. 1994) : In a trial for bank robbery, the bank teller identified the defendant, but stated that she was unable to recall the bank robber's eye color. An FBI agent then testified that the day after the robbery, the teller told him that the robber had dark-colored eyes. The defendant, who had light-colored eyes, sought to use the teller's prior statement as substantive proof of innocence, but the Trial Judge would only give an instruction limiting use of the teller's prior statement to assessing her credibility. The Court reversed, holding that the ruling was error because exculpatory identifications fall within the Rule, and the Rule permits a third party (e.g., the FBI agent) to testify to the witness' prior identification, so long as the identifying witness is subject to cross-examination at trial.

United States v. Cueto, 611 F.2d 1056 (5th Cir. 1980) : A law enforcement officer was allowed to testify about a witness' out-of-court identification to corroborate the witness' testimony that such an identification was made. Because the witness was present and subject to cross-examination, Rule 801(d)(1)(C) was satisfied.

United States v. Jarrad, 754 F.2d 1451 (9th Cir. 1985) : The Court sustained convictions for bank robbery. It found that Rule 801(d)(1)(C) was satisfied where a witness testified for the government that she had been shown photos by an FBI agent but had not identified the defendant, and an FBI agent testified that the witness had stated that the defendant's picture was "similar to or reminded her of" the person she had seen. Both the witness and the agent were available for cross-examination.

[6] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Admission By Party-Opponent -- Party's Own Statement

[a] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- "Admissions Against Interest"

United States v. Dimitroff, 541 F.2d 629 (6th Cir. 1976) : A defendant convicted of possessing controlled substances with intent to distribute contended on appeal that an affidavit he signed stating that he had picked up certain drugs from a doctor without the knowledge of the supplier of the drugs was improperly admitted against him because it was hearsay. The Court properly concluded that the statement was an admission, although it made the mistake of referring to the statement as "an admission against interest." Surprisingly, the Court apparently took seriously the contention that the statement might have been rendered inadmissible if not accompanied by independent evidence showing its trustworthiness. There is no such requirement in the Federal Rule. Perhaps the Court confused admissions and declarations against interest.

[b] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Charts and Diagrams

Trull v. Volkswagen of Am., Inc., 187 F.3d 88 (1st Cir. 1999) : In a product liability action arising from an automobile collision, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendants were permitted to cross-examine a police officer who investigated the accident about a diagram that the plaintiffs used in a prior State Court suit against the state. The diagram suggested that the vehicles collided at a right angle during the accident, while the officer testified that the accident was a side impact collision. The evidence tended to show that the plaintiffs took a contradictory position in earlier litigation.

S. Leo Harmonay, Inc. v. Binks Mfg. Co., 597 F. Supp. 1014 (S.D.N.Y. 1984) , aff'd mem., 762 F.2d 990 (2d Cir. 1985) : In a successful breach of contract action by a subcontractor against a general contractor, the District Court held that two "bar charts" prepared by the defendant for use in construction could be admitted on behalf of the plaintiff as party admissions.

[c] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Consent Decree

United States v. Cohen, 946 F.2d 430 (6th Cir. 1991) : In a prosecution for making and selling pirated video tapes, the Court held there was no error in admitting a consent judgment from the companion civil copyright infringement suit. The judgment was the defendant's personal admission agreeing to be enjoined permanently from infringing the plaintiffs' copyrights. The dissenting Judge noted that the consent judgment did not contain an admission of liability or wrongdoing and would have characterized it as a settlement agreement offered only to prove liability and therefore inadmissible under Rule 408.

[d] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Constitutional Problems

Gray v. Maryland, 523 U.S. 185 (1998) : The defendant argued that his right to confrontation was violated when his codefendant's confession was admitted at their joint trial. The defendant relied on Bruton v. United States, n91 where the Court held that a codefendant's confession cannot be admitted in a joint trial if the confession directly implicates the nonconfessing codefendant. In these circumstances, a limiting instruction is insufficient to protect the defendant's right to confrontation. The government relied on Richardson v. Marsh, infra, which held that the Bruton rule was not violated where the codefendant's confession was redacted to delete any reference to the nonconfessing codefendant. In Gray the confession was redacted by substituting for the defendant's name in the confession a blank space or the word "deleted." The Court relied on Bruton, and held that this limited redaction was insufficient to protect the defendant's right to confrontation. The Court stated that "[r]edactions that simply replace a name with an obvious blank space or a word such as deleted ... leave statements that, considered as a class, so closely resemble Bruton's unredacted statements that, in our view, the law must require the same result." The Court reasoned that the jury would all too easily link up the redaction to the nonconfessing codefendant, and that "the obvious deletion may well call the jurors' attention specially to the removed name." The Court distinguished Richardson as a case in which the confession was redacted to refer only to the actions of the confessing codefendant and another person who was not a defendant at the trial. Four Justices dissented, per Justice Scalia, arguing that since the redacted confession did not specifically refer to the non-confessing codefendant, the result was controlled by Richardson.

Cruz v. New York, 481 U.S. 186 (1987) : The Court rejected the "interlocking confession" rule whereby one nontestifying codefendant's confession could be admitted against another defendant pursuant to a limiting instruction as long as the other defendant had made a confession that interlocked with the codefendant's confession. Writing for the Court, Justice Scalia reasoned that an interlocking confession "bears a positively inverse relationship to devastation," because it tends to confirm the defendant's own confession which, in the real world, the defendant is seeking to avoid by claiming that it was inaccurately reported or untrue when made. Thus, the Court held that "where a nontestifying codefendant's confession incriminating the defendant is not directly admissible against the defendant, ... the Confrontation Clause bars its admission at their joint trial, even if the jury is instructed not to consider it against the defendant, and even if the defendant's own confession is admitted against him." Four Justices dissented.

Richardson v. Marsh, 481 U.S. 200 (1987) : On the same day that it decided Cruz, supra , the Court held that "the Confrontation Clause is not violated by the admission of a nontestifying codefendant's confession with a proper limiting instruction when, as here, the confession is redacted to eliminate not only the defendant's name, but any reference to her existence." In a murder case, one codefendant's confession to the crime described a conversation that he had in a car on the way to the victims' home in which the killings were discussed. Although the other defendant was not mentioned, there was testimony that suggested this defendant had arrived in the car. The Trial Judge instructed the jury that the nontestifying codefendant's confession could not be used against the other defendant. Justice Scalia's opinion for the Court found no Confrontation Clause violation and distinguished Bruton v. United States, supra , on the ground that the nonconfessing defendant was directly implicated by the confession in Bruton. Justice Scalia discussed the practical need for joint trials in criminal cases and reasoned that the possibility that a jury would find a logical link between evidence properly admitted against a defendant and a confession that the jury may not use against the defendant was not substantial enough to require a rule forbidding the introduction of the confession. Three Justices dissented.

United States v. Lewis, 537 F. Supp. 151 (D.D.C. 1982) , aff'd, 716 F.2d 16 (D.C. Cir. 1983) : Two defendants moved to have their trial severed from a third who had made "strongly incriminatory declarations" that were admissible only against him. Recognizing the problem that any jury would have in confining the statements to a single defendant, the Trial Judge decided to impanel two juries, the first to hear the case against the defendants who had moved for severance and the second to hear the case against the other defendant. Proceeding in this manner, the Judge enabled the government to avoid two wholly separate trials while he protected the defendants from any unfair use of a single defendant's admissions.

United States v. Vega Molina, 407 F.3d 511 (1st Cir. 2005) : In the trial of multiple defendants for murders following a botched robbery, the prosecution introduced the confession of one nontestifying defendant in which the names of other participants were replaced with neutral phrases like "another person." The Court held that admission of the confession did not violate the codefendants' rights under Bruton, but that the failure to give a cautionary instruction was reversible plain error as to one codefendant because the evidence against him was "noticeably thinner" than against the other codefendant and the prosecutor in closing argument relied heavily on the confession to implicate him.

United States v. Gibson, 409 F.3d 325 (6th Cir. 2005) : A coal mining company and two of its superintendents were convicted for violating mine safety regulations. Affirming, the Court rejected a Sixth Amendment objection to testimony by a government witness that one of the superintendents had told him that the other had said that the company was operating equipment in an illegal manner. The hearsay was not "testimonial" under Crawford, and it was trustworthy, since it was not made to curry favor or shift blame to other participants.

United States v. Sutton, 337 F.3d 792 (7th Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions for bank robberies, the Court held there was no Bruton violation when one codefendant's confession was introduced with the names of the conspirators replaced with terms like "another individual," "the individual," "third individual," "that person," and "the guy." This kind of editing is not a blank space deletion of the sort held improper in Gray v. Maryland, nor was there an easily identified one-to-one correspondence between the replacement words and the defendants.

United States v. Edwards, 159 F.3d 1117 (8th Cir. 1998) : In an arson prosecution, a principal source of evidence against the defendants was their repeated boasts over the years of being involved with starting the fires, as well as a tape-recorded statement made by one of them to investigators. None of the defendants testified at the trial, and each claimed on appeal that testimony regarding the others' admissions violated his or her Confrontation Clause rights. Affirming, the Court held that the defendants' rights had been sufficiently protected under Richardson v. Marsh, supra , by repeated instructions to the jury to use each admission only against the declarant and by redaction of the statements to eliminate specific identification of the declarant's codefendants. Unlike the situation in Gray v. Maryland, supra , in this case codefendants' names were replaced with a pronoun or similarly neutral word in a way that did not draw attention to the redaction and would not be incriminating unless linked to a codefendant by other trial evidence.

United States v. Sarracino, 340 F.3d 1148 (10th Cir. 2003) : Affirming murder convictions, the Court held it was a Bruton error (but harmless) to admit a nontestifying codefendant's statement that the victim had "gurgled" as he was put into a car and the defendant and the codefendant drove off to the place where the body was found.

United States v. Gonzalez, 183 F.3d 1315 (11th Cir. 1999) : The Court reversed convictions for distribution of cocaine because a defendant's confession was redacted in such a way that it still implicated the precise number of the confessor's codefendants. Furthermore, it was a Bruton error (but harmless) to leave a physical description of one of the codefendants in the redacted confession. In United States v. Beale, 921 F.2d 1412 (11th Cir. 1991) , the Court reversed one defendant's RICO conviction for armored truck robberies because a nontestifying codefendant's postarrest statement that he knew the defendant by a particular street name was the only evidence connecting the defendant to the alias by which another witness had identified one of the conspirators.

[e] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Depositions and Prior Testimony

Meriwether v. Coughlin, 879 F.2d 1037 (2d Cir. 1989) : In this civil rights action brought by prisoners who alleged they had been unconstitutionally transferred between institutions and beaten by corrections officers, the Court held that there was no error admitting testimony by the defendant commissioner of corrections at another proceeding where he admitted knowing of the corrections officers' "code of silence," as it was inconsistent with the defendants' position at trial that the commissioner relied on his subordinates during the events in question.

United States v. Ballard, 779 F.2d 287 (5th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a conviction for making false statements in a bankruptcy petition. It found that statements by the defendant in a deposition in a civil case were admissible, despite his attempt to blame an adverse party in that case for improperly eliciting the statements.

[f] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Foundation -- Standard of Proof

United States v. Harvey, 117 F.3d 1044 (7th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a conviction for cultivating marijuana, the Court held that handwritten notes concerning the marijuana operation were sufficiently authenticated as the defendant's. In the course of its discussion, the Court suggested that a preponderance standard applies to foundation questions under Rule 801, compared to the prima facie showing required to authenticate evidence under Rule 901. It was unnecessary to decide the issue, however, since the government had provided enough evidence to show it more likely than not that the notes were the defendant's.

United States v. Gil, 58 F.3d 1414 (9th Cir. 1995) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court held that a drug ledger was properly admitted for its truth. The government provided an adequate foundation under Rule 104(b) to support a finding that the defendant prepared the ledger. The government's handwriting expert testified that the ledger was probably written by the defendant, and there was also circumstantial evidence that the defendant wrote the ledger entries. Accordingly, the ledger was admissible as a party admission, and it was for the jury to decide whether the defendant actually prepared the ledger. In our view, the question of whether a proffered statement is that of the party is governed by the preponderance standard of Rule 104(a), rather than the prima facie evidence standard of Rule 104(b). We believe this result is mandated by Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) .

[g] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Guilty Pleas

Hancock v. Dodson, 958 F.2d 1367 (6th Cir. 1992) : In a civil rights action on behalf of an arrestee rendered incompetent, allegedly as a result of the arrest, the Court held that the arrestee's guilty plea to misdemeanor assault and battery charges arising out of the incident was admissible as a party admission. Even though he was not physically able to rebut the plea at trial, he had ample opportunity to contest it prior to trial.

United States v. Haddad, 10 F.3d 1252 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, holding that the defendant's prior State Court guilty plea regarding the same firearm was properly admitted as an admission, regardless of whether it met the constitutional standard for a guilty plea.

United States v. Holmes, 794 F.2d 345 (8th Cir. 1986) : Upholding a conviction for making false and fraudulent statements to a government agency, the Court found that a guilty plea to a state charge of theft by receipt of stolen property was properly admitted as an admission to prove knowledge by the defendant of the falsity of his statement. In United States v. Riley, n92 the Court upheld the introduction in a Mann Act prosecution of the defendant's guilty plea in State Court to a pimping charge.

[h] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Interpretation of Statements

United States v. Pelletier, 845 F.2d 1126 (1st Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed a conviction for cocaine trafficking, finding that the Trial Judge properly admitted statements made by the defendant following his arrest. It observed that "the statement about his clients could reasonably be interpreted as a reference to the crimes for which he was charged."

United States v. Pizarro, 756 F.2d 579 (7th Cir. 1985) : The Court upheld a conviction for distribution of heroin, finding no error in the admission of evidence that during a first trial of the case the defendant approached a special agent while the jury was deliberating and said: "Hey man, can I have my dope back?" Although the defendant argued that the question was a joke, the Court concluded that the jury could evaluate its significance.

People of Terr. of Guam v. Ojeda, 758 F.2d 403 (9th Cir. 1985) : The Court held that a burglary defendant's offer to pay damages to the victim if charges were dropped was admissible, since "statements need not be incriminating to be admissions." It found the offer to be relevant to show consciousness of guilt.

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Interrelated Statements

United States v. Guzman, 754 F.2d 482 (2d Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of cocaine, finding that statements made to the defendant by a detective were admissible to render intelligible the answers made by the defendant to the statements.

United States v. Flores, 63 F.3d 1342 (5th Cir. 1995) : Affirming convictions arising out of narcotics transactions, the Court found no error in the admission of tape recorded conversations between a defendant and a government informant. The defendant's statements were admissible as party-admissions, and the informant's statements were reciprocal and integrated utterances that were admissible to put the defendant's statements in context. In United States v. Gutierrez-Chavez, n93 the Court found that a codefendant's portions of a postarrest telephone conversation with the defendant were admissible as reciprocal and integrated utterances between two parties for the limited extent of putting the defendant's responses into context.

United States v. Davis, 890 F.2d 1373 (7th Cir. 1989) : Tape recordings of conversations between an informant and a defendant charged with political corruption offenses in which the defendant solicited and subsequently accepted money for political favors were properly admitted as evidence of the defendant's admissions; the informant's responses were held properly admitted for the limited purpose of placing the defendant's statements in context.

[j] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Judicial Admissions

188 LLC v. Trinity Indus., Inc., 300 F.3d 730 (7th Cir. 2002) : In a commercial dispute, the defendant argued that the plaintiff was "bound" by an admission made in a pleading that the plaintiff had subsequently amended. The Court held that this argument was properly rejected: "Under some circumstances, a party may offer earlier versions of its opponent's pleadings as evidence of the facts therein, but they are not judicial admissions, and the amending party may offer evidence to rebut its superseded allegations." In Cooper v. Carl A. Nelson & Co., 211 F.3d 1008 (7th Cir. 2000) , a worker was injured when he fell while traversing a drainage ditch at a construction site. It was unclear whether he slipped on planks that were across the ditch or on a muddy incline leading to the planks. The Trial Judge granted summary judgment against the original complaint, which alleged a fall on the planks, and the plaintiff filed an amended complaint on the theory left open by the Judge's ruling, that he fell on the incline. The Judge granted the defendant's motion in limine to preclude any mention that the plaintiff fell on the planks, on the ground that the amended complaint was a judicial admission binding the plaintiff at trial. Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the summary judgment ruling had been based on a misapprehension of the ruling, and that therefore the amended complaint filed in response to the ruling should not have bound the plaintiff at trial. Thus, evidence that the plaintiff slipped on the planks should have been admissible.

[k] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Legal Briefs

Kassel v. Gannett Co., 875 F.2d 935 (1st Cir. 1989) : In ordering a retrial on the damages issue in this defamation action by a Veterans' Administration psychologist who alleged that defendant's libelous newspaper story led to the VA's reassigning him to a position where he had nothing to do, the Court held that a brief filed pro se by the plaintiff in a labor grievance proceeding protesting the reassignment should not have been excluded because his statements there that he had been transferred in reprisal for union activities and prior successful grievances were highly probative admissions directly contrary to his position at trial. The Court noted its reluctance to treat appellate briefs in one action as evidentiary admissions in another, but considered the instant circumstances as favoring admissibility, because the brief had been written by the plaintiff himself rather than by an attorney, on an issue common to both cases, and it did not purport to be other than his view of what the "real world facts are."

[l] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Letters to the Trial Judge

United States v. Barrington, 806 F.2d 529 (5th Cir. 1986) : In a prosecution for interstate travel with intent to promote prostitution, the Court upheld the introduction of a letter written by the defendant to the Trial Judge asking for mercy on the ground that she had been rehabilitated as a result of serving time on a state charge, the truth of which she did not deny. The Court found that the defendant's decision to make an admission to the Trial Judge enhanced the reliability of her statements.

[m] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Multiple Parties

FDIC v. Mmahat, 907 F.2d 546 (5th Cir. 1990) : In an action against an attorney for an insolvent savings and loan association, the Court held that regulatory agency examination reports admissible as public records satisfied Rule 805 as to included hearsay because the statements were party-admissions made by a person who, at the time they were introduced, was another defendant in the instant action.

Stalbosky v. Belew, 205 F.3d 890 (6th Cir. 2000) : The estate of a decedent sued a truck driver, who raped and murdered the decedent, for wrongful death and the truck driver's employer for negligent hiring and retention. Affirming summary judgment for the employer, the Court held that a statement in which the truck driver told an investigator for the plaintiff that the employer was aware of the driver's criminal history was inadmissible. The statement was not being offered against the party making it, as required by the Rule, but against another party, the employer. In Jewell v. CSX Transp., 135 F.3d 361 (6th Cir. 1998) , the plaintiff's decedent was killed, and his wife and his six-year-old daughter were injured, in a grade-crossing collision between their pickup and the defendant's train. At trial of their action against the railroad, the defendant introduced testimony from six witnesses that the daughter had told them after the accident that the other two were arguing immediately before the accident and that when she told them a train was coming, she was told to be quiet. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the girl's statements were party admissions under Rule 801(d)(2)(A); however, it did not mention that the little girl's statements were admitted not only against her, but also against the other plaintiffs.

United States v. Hay, 122 F.3d 1233 (9th Cir. 1997) : Reversing a mail fraud conviction arising from an insurance scheme, the Court held it was error to admit against the defendant an admission made by his codefendant.

Robinson v. Audi NSU Auto Union A.G., 739 F.2d 1481 (10th Cir. 1984) : In a suit against the manufacturer, the importer, the distributor, and the retailer of a car involved in a rear-end collision, the Court held that statements made by Volkswagen of America were personal admissions that could be used to show knowledge of problems with the design of a gas tank. These statements were not admissible against the manufacturer, however, since they were made prior to the time that VOA became the manufacturer's agent. Although VOA argued that the statements were made on behalf of a German company for which VOA acted as agent, the Court held that absent a clear indication by VOA that it was making the statements as an agent only, the statements were admissible as its own admissions.

[n] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Non-inculpatory Statements

United States v. McGee, 189 F.3d 626 (7th Cir. 1999) : At a bank robbery trial the prosecution introduced three statements the defendant had given to an investigating detective. In each statement the defendant had denied any knowledge of or involvement in the robbery, but the three statements gave three different versions of the day's events. The defendant argued that the statements were not admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(A) because they were not inculpatory. Affirming the conviction, the Court held that by the terms of the Rule an admission need only be made by the party against whom it is offered and need not be inculpatory.

[o] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Omissions

Moylan v. Meadow Club, Inc., 979 F.2d 1246 (7th Cir. 1992) : In an action for overtime pay under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Court held there was no error in admitting a letter and conversations by the plaintiff, at a time when he was trying to settle up accounts with his employer, that made no mention of overtime wages. The evidence was a party admission and the omission impeached his claim by contradiction.

[p] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Real Party in Interest

Donovan v. Crisostomo, 689 F.2d 869 (9th Cir. 1982) : In a suit by the Secretary of Labor seeking injunctive relief and back pay, the Court held that statements of some employees that they did not in fact work overtime were not admissions, since the Secretary was the real party in interest and the statements were not his.

[q] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Representative Capacity

Estate of Shafer v. Commissioner, 749 F.2d 1216 (6th Cir. 1984) : The Court sustained a determination upholding the IRS notice of deficiency against an estate. The Court held that an executor of an estate had traditionally been treated as a party in litigation involving the estate. It found that Rule 801(d)(2)(A) continued this treatment and that statements by an executor were admissible when offered by the government as party admissions.

[r] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Statements Made While Cooperating with the Authorities

United States v. Billingsley, 160 F.3d 502 (8th Cir. 1998) : At a trial on drug charges, the Judge permitted an agent to testify to the contents of a taped conversation between the defendant and his drug supplier. The conversation occurred after the defendant had been arrested and had agreed to cooperate with the government. The defendant argued that his statements could not have been admitted as party-admissions, because he was only saying what the police told him to say. But the Court found no error, reasoning that the defendant's argument was "nothing more than a voluntariness argument." Since the defendant's statements were made voluntarily, they were properly admitted as party-admissions.

[s] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Statements Offered in the Declarant's Favor

United States v. Yousef, 327 F.3d 56 (2d Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions for a conspiracy to bomb United States commercial airliners in southeast Asia and for crimes relating to the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center, the Court held there was no error in precluding one defendant from offering his own prior statement to prove that a codefendant duped him. The Court reasoned that the defendant was free to testify that he had been duped, but his out-of-court statement was inadmissible hearsay because it was offered for its truth by the declarant.

United States v. Bond, 87 F.3d 695 (5th Cir. 1996) : Affirming the Trial Judge's refusal to permit a defendant to withdraw his guilty plea, the Court held that a Magistrate Judge properly excluded a tape made by a defendant while a fugitive. The defendant offered the tape to benefit himself, not as evidence of a statement made by a party to be used against that party.

United States v. McDaniel, 398 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 2005) : Affirming mail and bank fraud convictions, the Court found no error in excluding statements made by one defendant to a Postal Inspector that contained both inculpatory and exculpatory information. The defendant offered them as admissions, but the Court stated that Rule 801(d)(2) "does not extend to a party's attempt to introduce his or her own statements through the testimony of other witnesses."

[t] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Summary Judgment Use

Beers-Capitol v. Whetzel, 256 F.3d 120 (3d Cir. 2001) : In a § 1983 action arising from sexual assaults by an employee of a juvenile detention facility upon residents, the Court reversed summary judgment granted for one of the defendants, a co-worker of the perpetrator. Her statement that she "kind of knew" that the perpetrator was "messing" with students was an admission permitting an inference that she was aware that a substantial risk of harm existed.

[u] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Trustworthiness Problems

Savarese v. Agriss, 883 F.2d 1194 (3d Cir. 1989) : In a civil rights action alleging that the plaintiffs had been fired from the county transportation authority based on their political beliefs, the Court held that statements by the authority's chairman, a party to the action in his official capacity, were properly admitted even though he was deceased at the time of trial, because no guarantee of trustworthiness is required for admissions.

Jewell v. CSX Transp., 135 F.3d 361 (6th Cir. 1998) : The plaintiff's decedent was killed, and his wife and his six-year-old daughter were injured, in a grade-crossing collision between their pickup and the defendant's train. At trial of their action against the railroad, the defendant introduced testimony from six witnesses that the daughter had told them after the accident that the other two were arguing immediately before the accident and that when she told them a train was coming, she was told to be quiet. The plaintiffs offered evidence that the little girl had suffered brain damage and retrograde amnesia from the accident, and they argued on appeal that because she had no "independent" recollection of the accident, her statements were not made in her "individual ... capacity." Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court observed that the plaintiffs had confused the terms "independent" and "individual"; the girl had made the statements in her individual capacity. The Court noted that Rule 801(d)(2)(A) does not have a trustworthiness requirement, and that whether the statements were the product of independent recollection or suggested by others went to their weight, not their admissibility.

United States v. Pinalto, 771 F.2d 457 (10th Cir. 1985) : In this mail fraud case, the Court reversed a pretrial ruling that had suppressed tapes on the ground that the defendant's statements were unreliable because the informer conversing with the defendant had a motive to lie in order to gather evidence to escape liability.

[7] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Admission By Party-Opponent -- Adoption Or Belief In Truth

[a] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Admissions in Interrogatories

Zenith Radio Corp. v. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., 723 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1983) , rev'd on other grounds, 475 U.S. 574 (1986) : In a massive antitrust case in which the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants conspired to drive them out of the market for television receivers, the Court reversed most of the summary judgment entered for the defendants. The Trial Judge had held that answers to interrogatories that cross-referenced documents were not admissions unless expressed as admissions. But the Court concluded that under Fed. R. Civ. P. 33 a cross-reference to documents adopts the contents of the documents as answers to the interrogatory, and the answering party is estopped from claiming otherwise.

[b] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Adoption by Assent

United States v. Negron-Narvaez, 403 F.3d 33 (1st Cir. 2005) : The defendant, who pleaded guilty to drug trafficking offenses, challenged his conviction on the ground that there was an inadequate factual basis for his plea. Affirming, the Court held that defense counsel's statements, which were verified in open court by the defendant, constituted adoptive admissions attributable to, and usable against, the defendant.

United States v. Allen, 10 F.3d 405 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed a conviction for aiding and abetting the conduct of an illegal gambling business, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting audio and videotaped conversations between the defendant and an informant. From the entire context of each conversation, including nonverbal cues the jury could see on the tapes and the defendant's failure to contest any incriminating statements, the jury could find that the defendant had adopted the informant's statements. In United States v. Rollins, n94 the Court affirmed cocaine convictions, and held that tape-recorded conversations were admissible as adoptive admissions to the extent that the defendant adopted an informant's half of the conversation by agreeing to statements and by following through on stated arrangements. In United States v. Young, n95 the Court affirmed a defendant's bank robbery conviction, finding that the defendant had adopted a statement by another robber, which essentially became background for the defendant's own statement.

United States v. King, 351 F.3d 859 (8th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a conviction for violating the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of certain tape-recorded conversations between the defendant and coconspirators, since the defendant had adopted his coconspirators' incriminating statements in the conversations.

[c] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Adoption by Implication

United States v. Beckham, 968 F.2d 47 (D.C. Cir. 1992) : When an undercover officer purchased some crack cocaine, the seller said, "I only had one, but you can get another from my buddy"; the defendant immediately got up from his chair, walked over to a stash of crack packaged for distribution, and began to open it. Affirming, the Court held that the quoted statement was erroneously admitted under the coconspirator exception because there was no independent evidence of a conspiracy, but that the error was harmless because the statement would have been admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(B) because the defendant indicated his endorsement of it.

Vazquez v. Lopez-Rosario, 134 F.3d 28 (1st Cir. 1998) : The plaintiff alleged that he was fired from a public job because of a political difference with a supervisor. Appealing from a grant of summary judgment, the plaintiff argued that evidence that he accused the defendant-supervisor of making statements about him, and that the supervisor had agreed in response that he had made "some remarks," should have been admitted as an adoptive admission. Affirming, the Court found that the supervisor's statement was insufficient to establish an adoptive admission that he was responsible for the plaintiff's dismissal. The plaintiff had not explicitly accused the supervisor of retaliating against him, and so it "would hardly be unnatural to fail to respond to an accusation that Vazquez does not claim to have made."

United States v. Higgs, 353 F.3d 281 (4th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed convictions for murder and related offenses, holding there was no error in admitting a tape-recorded telephone conversation as an adopted admission. The conversation was between the defendant and a former jailhouse friend, who read aloud an article reporting the conviction of an accomplice who claimed that he shot the victims because of fear of the defendant. The Court held that the recording indicated that the defendant heard and understood the allegations and commented on them to some extent. It found no indication that the defendant was silent because he knew or thought he was being recorded. The Court also upheld the instruction to the jury that it could consider the defendant's silence an admission of the truth if it found "in accordance with your common sense and experience, that the defendant would have denied the statements had they been untrue." The Judge also cautioned the jury that "you should bear in mind that some people will remain silent even if they are innocent."

United States v. Henke, 222 F.3d 633 (9th Cir. 2000) : At a press conference held by the defendant, who was charged with securities fraud, a reporter had asked a question that amounted to an accusation that the defendant was "cooking the books" of a corporation. The defendant responded "next question, please." Reversing on other grounds, the Court found that the Trial Judge did not err in reasoning that "the natural response to such an accusation would be to deny it," and admitting the defendant's response.

United States v. Harrison, 296 F.3d 994 (10th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for sexual abuse of a child, the Court upheld the admission of a statement by the victim to a tribal police officer, where during the making of the statement the defendant had looked at the victim and said words to the effect, "I told you I was sorry and it wouldn't happen again." Although the Trial Judge had admitted the statement under Rule 807, the Court concluded that it was admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(B), and that the Judge had made the necessary finding that the defendant "manifested an adoption or belief in [the] truth" of the victim's statement. In Wright-Simmons v. City of Oklahoma City, 155 F.3d 1264 (10th Cir. 1998) , the Court reversed a summary judgment for the City as to a claim that the plaintiff's supervisor created a racially hostile work environment. The plaintiff had contacted a representative of the personnel department about the incidents she claimed were discriminatory. The representative interviewed two other supervisors who attributed the plaintiff's deteriorating performance to her supervisor's inappropriate comments and also interviewed 13 past or present employees who confirmed the plaintiffs' allegations. The representative wrote a two-page report for the City Manager, who subsequently met with the plaintiff's supervisor and told him he would be fired if he did not resign. The Court held that the report and accompanying interview notes were adopted by the City Manager, since he would not have sought the supervisor's resignation had he not believed the report.

United States v. Champion, 813 F.2d 1154 (11th Cir. 1987) : Affirming marijuana-related convictions, the Court found that one defendant adopted another's statement when, after the statement was made, he nudged the other defendant in the ribs and told him that he did not want him to speak about the incident any more.

[d] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Adoption by Publication

Alvord-Polk, Inc. v. F. Schumacher & Co., 37 F.3d 996 (3d Cir. 1994) : Reviewing a summary judgment for wallpaper manufacturers in an antitrust case, the Court held that articles published in a trade association journal were adopted by the trade association when they were published.

[e] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Adoption by Silence

Weston-Smith v. Cooley Dickinson Hospital, Inc., 282 F.3d 60 (1st Cir. 2002) : Affirming summary judgment for a hospital in a suit by an employee who claimed she was laid off because she had taken maternity leave, the Court found no error in the exclusion of the plaintiff's testimony that she had confronted her supervisor with an accusation that she was being fired for taking maternity leave, and the supervisor remained silent on the matter and changed the subject. The Court noted that the confrontation occurred during a social occasion and that "in context" there were a great many reasons why the supervisor might have chosen not to respond. In United States v. Fortes, n96 the Court observed:

> [W]e have no difficulty in concluding that an inquiry of two persons [by an acquaintance who testified at trial] as to whether they had "done a bank robbery," followed by an affirmative response by one of them describing his participation with the other in the crime, is the type of exchange to which the silence of the unresponsive accomplice, assuming he is present and conscious of the conversation, "gives consent."

United States v. Tocco, 135 F.3d 116 (2d Cir. 1998) : At a trial for arson and related crimes, a witness testified that he told the defendant's brother (who was a codefendant) that he had heard that the brother and another person had set the defendant's clothes store on fire, and that the brother simply nodded his head in response. The Court held that the testimony was admissible as an adoptive admission by the brother. This was the type of statement that the brother, under the circumstances, could have been expected to deny if it were untrue. Any ambiguity in the meaning of the responsive nod "was ultimately a question for the jury to assess" under Rule 104(b). Affirming a conviction for aiding and abetting bribery in United States v. Shulman, n97 the Court observed that an adoptive admission does not require that the adopted statement incriminate the person adopting it. The nature of the statement is relevant, the Court noted, in deciding whether a reasonable person would remain silent after hearing it. See also United States v. Williams n98(the defendant's failure to deny a coconspirator's statement, which plainly suggested the defendant was guilty of wrongdoing, was an adoptive admission and thus admissible whether or not the conspiracy had ended at the time the statement was made); United States v. King n99("[t]he general rule is to look at the circumstances to see whether it was more reasonably probable that a man would answer the charge made against him than that he would not").

United States v. Robinson, 275 F.3d 371 (4th Cir. 2001) : A witness testified to hearing the two defendants describing a murder. Although she could not see them and could not identify which defendant made any given statement, she could discern two separate voices. The Court held that all the statements were admissible against both defendants, as party admissions by the speaker and as adoptive admissions by the other, since the witness testified that neither defendant contradicted the other, and in the circumstances a defendant disagreeing with statements made by the other would have made his disagreement known. In United States v. Basic Constr. Co., n100 the Court affirmed a bid-rigging conviction, finding that evidence of silence on the part of a corporate officer at a meeting in which a statement was made, "I'll see if we can get anything for this work," was properly admitted as a tacit admission where a witness who also heard the statement testified that he believed it referred to bid-rigging. In United States v. Kilbourne, n101 the Court affirmed a murder conviction and upheld admission of the testimony by a friend of the defendant to the effect that when confronted with the fact that the defendant had called this friend and told him about the victim's death before the defendant allegedly learned of the death from a telephone call from another friend, the defendant turned silent.

United States v. Central Gulf Lines, 974 F.2d 621 (5th Cir. 1992) : In action on cargo damage claims, the Court held there was no error in admitting survey reports made by independent surveyors, as the defendant's representative had met several times with a representative of the surveyor and had never objected to the survey reports. In Rock v. Huffco Gas & Oil Co., 922 F.2d 272 (5th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants in a negligence suit for injuries allegedly suffered by an employee of an offshore catering service, holding that accident reports made by the defendants' employees were not admissions; the reports simply documented the plaintiff's account of the alleged accidents and nothing indicated adoption of that version of the facts.

United States v. Hoosier, 542 F.2d 687 (6th Cir. 1976) : A defendant convicted for armed bank robbery contended on appeal that his girlfriend's statement that he had lots of money, made in the presence of the defendant to a witness to whom he had earlier related a plan to rob a bank, was admitted against him improperly because it was hearsay. The Court held that because there was more here than the defendant's mere presence and his silence, the statement was properly admitted as an adoptive admission.

United States v. Ward, 377 F.3d 671 (7th Cir. 2004) : After committing a bank robbery, the defendant and his sister went to the house of a friend who was storing a bag for the defendant. When the friend did not produce the bag, the sister, the friend, and the defendant engaged in a heated discussion, during the course of which the sister said that the bag contained "the money [that the defendant and his wife] got when they robbed the bank." The defendant did not respond to this assertion. Affirming, the Court found that the sister's statement concerning the bank robbery was properly admitted against the defendant as an adoptive admission. The statement was made during a conversation in which the defendant was an active participant, so a sufficient foundation was established that the defendant heard the statement. Further, the defendant's silence qualified as an admission "because his sister's accusation is the type of statement that a party normally would respond to if innocent."

United States v. Kehoe, 310 F.3d 579 (8th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed convictions for racketeering offenses, holding that a statement by an accomplice regarding a murder made to the defendant's mother was an adoptive admission. The defendant actively participated in the conversation and did not deny the statements. There was nothing to suggest that he did not understand the statement. The Court also found no violation of the Confrontation Clause, because the defendant "effectively was a witness against himself" by adopting the statement of another. In a voting fraud case, United States v. Townsley, n102 the Court held that tape recordings of conversations in the presence of the defendants were admissible as adoptive admissions. In United States v. Ojala, n103 the Court affirmed a conviction for willfully and knowingly failing to make timely income tax filings, upholding the introduction of statements made in the defendant's presence by his attorney concerning the defendant's intention with respect to the filing of his returns. According to the Court, the statements, which the defendant did not contradict or object to, qualified as adoptive admissions or possibly as authorized or agent's admissions.

United States v. Hove, 52 F.3d 233 (9th Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed a lawyer's conviction for currency structuring, holding that two responses from the defendant to investigating officers were improperly admitted as adoptive admissions by silence. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 801.02[6][d]. In United States v. Schaff, 948 F.2d 501 (9th Cir. 1991) , when officers searching the home of a defendant charged with drug offenses asked him who made entries in a notebook they found, he claimed he did not know, but when his sister later told them in his presence that she made them at his direction, he said nothing. The Court held that the defendant's silence could be treated as an adoptive admission, as he was not in custody at the time his sister spoke. In United States v. Monks, n104 the Court affirmed convictions for bank robbery, holding that a statement by one defendant was admissible as an adoptive admission of the other where the Trial Judge found that the evidence was sufficient for a jury to conclude that the other defendant heard, understood, and acquiesced in the statement.

United States v. Wolf, 839 F.2d 1387 (10th Cir. 1988) : In a prosecution of a husband and wife for the murder of their child, the Court held that the wife's failure to deny child abuse accusations was admissible as an adoptive admission.

[f] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Adoption of Documents and Records

Computer Sys. Eng'g, Inc. v. Qantel Corp., 740 F.2d 59 (1st Cir. 1984) : The Court found that a page from a profit-and-loss statement, which reflected the expected performance of one of the defendant's distributors, and which was given to the plaintiff by the defendant's vice president, was an adoptive admission.

Chicago College of Osteopathic Medicine v. George A. Fuller Co., 719 F.2d 1335 (7th Cir. 1983) : In a construction contract dispute, the Court upheld a judgment holding the owner liable for breach of various duties to the general contractor, even though it found that a document prepared by the owner was improperly admitted. The document failed to indicate fault with the contractor's work, and the contractor argued that this was an implicit expression of satisfaction with it. The Court reasoned that a witness should have been called to establish that there was a duty or practice to include complaints about the contractor in such a document before it was admitted.

United States v. Gil, 58 F.3d 1414 (9th Cir. 1995) : In a drug prosecution, the Court held that a drug ledger was properly admitted for its truth. The government established an adequate foundation under Rule 104(b) to support a finding that the defendant either made or adopted the ledger. The ledger was found on the defendant's coffee table; the transactions described in the ledger corresponded with the defendant's activities that were observed by the police; and the entries corresponded with a separate ledger that was prepared by the defendant. In our view, the question of whether a proffered statement is that of the party is governed by the preponderance standard of Rule 104(a), rather than the prima facie evidence standard of Rule 104(b). We believe this result is mandated by Bourjaily v. United States., 483 U.S. 171 (1987) .

Wagstaff v. Protective Apparel Corp., 760 F.2d 1074 (10th Cir. 1985) : The Court held it was error to exclude as hearsay newspaper articles that the defendants distributed to persons with whom they did business. The plaintiff's decedent, as well as others, received the articles, which contained statements concerning the defendants' financial condition, and the distribution amounted to an adoption of the contents of the articles.

[g] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Documents Offered in Court or Arbitration

United States v. Warren, 42 F.3d 647 (D.C. Cir. 1994) : Although it affirmed convictions for narcotics and firearms offenses, the Court held that it was error to exclude a police officer's statement, contained in the criminal complaint against the defendant, which indicated that a person other than the defendant leased the apartment in which the drugs were found. As part of a sworn statement of facts submitted by the government to a Federal Magistrate Judge, the statement was admissible as an adoptive admission against the government. In United States v. Morgan, n105 the Court reversed a conviction for possession of narcotics with intent to distribute on the ground that statements by the government in a search warrant application, which indicated that the narcotics might have been the property of someone other than the defendant, were improperly excluded.

United States v. Kattar, 840 F.2d 118 (1st Cir. 1988) : Affirming a conviction for extortion, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude statements made in legal memoranda and briefs filed by the Department of Justice that were offered by the defendant.

United States v. Woo, 917 F.2d 96 (2d Cir. 1990) : Affirming a conviction for drug offenses, the Court noted that erroneous descriptions of the defendant's conduct at the time of arrest included in the case agent's affidavit supporting the complaint and in his grand jury testimony, not being based on personal knowledge but on information gained from law enforcement sources, might well be adoptive admissions by the government. There was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, however, as the statements may well have caused the jury to confuse the issues and draw unsubstantiated inferences concerning the conduct of government agents. In Brownko Int'l, Inc. v. Ogden Steel Co., n106 a construction litigation, the Court held that a company did not adopt another company's minutes by offering them as evidence in an arbitration, since the use made of the evidence did not include adopting the factual assertion found in the minutes.

[h] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Findings by Court

United States v. Joshi, 896 F.2d 1303 (11th Cir. 1990) : The Trial Judge admitted an adoptive admission without making a preliminary finding that the defendant comprehended and acquiesced in the statement, saying that if there were insufficient evidence through the trial, relief would be under Fed. R. Crim. P. 29. The Court said that the Judge's approach was improper because it needlessly risked the possibility of reversal for erroneous admission, but held that in this case there was sufficient evidence of the foundation requirements that admission was not a clear abuse of discretion. In United States v. Jenkins, n107 the Court affirmed convictions for cocaine offenses, holding that a statement by one defendant to another was admissible as a tacit admission where it concerned getting money for cocaine and no response was forthcoming. The Court stated that an adoptive admission involves two steps: the Trial Judge makes a preliminary determination whether the requirements of the Rule have been satisfied, and the jury makes the ultimate determination. The Court did not decide whether it is necessary to instruct the jury as to its role with respect to such admissions, since an instruction was given in this case. In United States v. Carter, n108 the Court affirmed marijuana convictions, finding that statements made by one defendant concerning smuggling activities in a car in which other defendants were riding were adoptive admissions and were properly admitted, despite the Trial Judge's failure to make findings in support of admissibility.

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Insufficient Showing of Adoption

United States v. Orellana-Blanco, 294 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 2002) : The defendant was convicted of marriage fraud and making a false statement on an immigration document, after entering an allegedly sham marriage. Crucial evidence included a "Record of Sworn Statement," made when the defendant applied for a green card. The INS agent who conducted the interview did not testify at trial; instead testimony was given by another INS agent, who was present to translate questions and answers but was not present for the entire interview. The exhibit contained notations by the nontestifying INS agent, including opinions about whether some of the defendant's factual assertions were true. There was no direct evidence on whether the answers attributed to the defendant were verbatim statements or formulations by the INS agents. Reversing, the Court observed that, even though the defendant signed the form, it was not admissible as an adoptive admission because "[t]he evidence established a considerable language barrier, and did not support an inference that the form was read to Orellana-Blanco with the answers, or that he read it, or that he could read it."

[j] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Letters and Correspondence

Southern Stone Co. v. Singer, 665 F.2d 698 (5th Cir. 1982) : In an action to recover on a debt, the Court held it was improper to admit a letter written by the plaintiff's counsel to one defendant purporting to state what that defendant had previously said to him concerning the actions of the defendants. "[T]he mere failure to respond to a letter does not indicate an adoption unless it was reasonable under the circumstances for the sender to expect the recipient to respond and to correct erroneous assertions."

[k] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Police Interrogations

United States v. Jinadu, 98 F.3d 239 (6th Cir. 1996) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found that accusations made by a police officer while he was interrogating the defendant were admissible as adoptive admissions. The defendant responded in the affirmative to the accusations, and the government established a foundation that the defendant understood English and heard all of the accusations.

[l] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Possession

United States v. Paulino, 13 F.3d 20 (1st Cir. 1994) : To prove the defendant's connection with the drug business in an apartment in which he was arrested, the government offered a postal money order receipt found in the apartment that bore his name, the address of the apartment, and a notation that it was used for a rent payment. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the receipt as an adoptive admission, evidenced by the defendant's possession plus other circumstances connecting him to the receipt and the apartment.

United States v. Carrillo, 16 F.3d 1046 (9th Cir. 1994) : The Court held that a purported profit statement found in the defendant's pocket when he was arrested on drug charges was properly admitted as an adoptive admission, where he had been negotiating sale prices and quantities for cocaine that were consistent with the figures on the slip of paper.

United States v. Pulido-Jacobo, 377 F.3d 1124 (10th Cir. 2004) : The defendants, arrested in a car in which narcotics had been secreted, contested the link between them and the contraband that was required to establish constructive possession. They objected on hearsay grounds to the admission of a two-month-old receipt found in one defendant's wallet that described speakers matching speakers found in the trunk of the car. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion: the defendant's possession of the speaker receipt, plus his having kept it for two months after the purchase and the presence of the matching speakers, constituted his adoptive admission that the speakers were his, which was circumstantial evidence of the extent of his control over the vehicle.

[m] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Prior Conversations

United States v. Faymore, 736 F.2d 328 (6th Cir. 1984) : Affirming a doctor's convictions for narcotics offenses, the Court found that the defendant had adopted a prior conversation between a person purporting to act as his agent and an undercover agent when he indicated in a subsequent meeting with the agent that he was the doctor mentioned in the conversation.

[n] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Surveys and Opinion Polls

Schering Corp. v. Pfizer Inc., 189 F.3d 218 (2d Cir. 1999) : The plaintiff and defendants, manufacturers of competing antihistamines, had entered a settlement agreement in which the defendants had agreed not to advertise their product as "nonsedating" or "low sedating." Seeking an injunction against violations of the agreement and the Lanham Act, the plaintiff offered five surveys in which physicians were asked to relate their memories of communications made by the defendants' sales representatives. The Judge excluded the surveys and denied the injunction. Reversing, the Court held that one survey that a defendant had commissioned and in which the defendant's employee had manifested a belief in its trustworthiness should have been admitted as a party admission. The employee's report regarding the survey's results drew inferences from the underlying hearsay statements in the survey and thus adopted them for their truth.

[8] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Admission By Party-Opponent -- Authorized Statement

[a] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Agents' Statements

Michaels v. Michaels, 767 F.2d 1185 (7th Cir. 1985) : The Court held in a securities fraud action against a closely held corporation's owners that telexes sent by a broker to a potential buyer of the corporation were admissible as an agent's statements.

[b] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Employees' Statements

B-W Acceptance Corp. v. Porter, 568 F.2d 1179 (5th Cir. 1978) : In an action by a lender to recover against guarantors of corporate notes, the Court held that testimony by the lender's branch manager at a previous trial was admissible because the lender authorized the manager to testify to what he knew. In Kingsley v. Baker/Beech-Nut Corp., n109 a suit by a former employee claiming severance compensation under his former employer's personnel policy, the Court held that testimony by an employee of the defendant that the plaintiff's superior said on the telephone that he would make the plaintiff quit was admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(C). Although the proof did not conclusively establish to whom the superior was speaking during the telephone conversation, the Court held that statements made to any third party fell within the Rule.

[c] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Experts

Kirk v. Raymark Indus., Inc., 61 F.3d 147 (3d Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed a plaintiff's verdict in an asbestos case on non-evidentiary grounds, noting that on retrial the testimony of an expert called by the defendant in an unrelated asbestos case could not be used in the instant case against the defendant as an admission by an authorized agent. The expert witness was not one of the defendant's employees, and an agency could not be found simply because the expert testified at the previous trial on the defendant's behalf. "Because an expert witness is charged with the duty of giving his or her expert opinion regarding the matter before the court, we fail to comprehend how an expert witness, who is not an agent of the party who called him, can be authorized to make an admission for that party." It is important, we think, to note that the Court did not address whether a party's reliance on previous expert opinion might amount to an adoptive admission.

Collins v. Wayne Corp., 621 F.2d 777 (5th Cir. 1980) : In a product liability action arising out of a bus collision with a tractor-trailer, the Court affirmed a judgment for the bus manufacturer, but it concluded that a deposition of an expert employed by the defendant should have been admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(C), since the expert was hired to investigate and to report his conclusions, and "[i]n giving his deposition he was performing the function that Wayne [the defendant] had employed him to perform."

[d] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Internal Memoranda

Farner v. Paccar, Inc., 562 F.2d 518 (8th Cir. 1977) : Affirming a judgment against a truck manufacturer in a product liability wrongful death action, the Court held there was no error in allowing interoffice memoranda of one of the defendant's engineers, which discussed design problems with certain tractor springs, to be admitted into evidence.

[e] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Interpreters

United States v. Beltran, 761 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1985) : The Court upheld marijuana convictions, finding that testimony by a drug agent as to what an interpreter told him that various defendants said was properly admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(C).

United States v. Da Silva, 725 F.2d 828 (2d Cir. 1983) : This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 801.02[6][f][v].

United States v. Cordero, 18 F.3d 1248 (5th Cir. 1994) (per curiam): Affirming convictions for a marijuana distribution conspiracy, the Court held there was no plain error in admitting testimony as to a third party's translation of a defendant's Spanish statement. There were no unusual circumstances calling for an exception to the principle that an interpreter is no more than a language conduit, so his translation does not create an additional level of hearsay.

DCS Sanitation Mgt., Inc. v. Occupational Safety & Health Review Comm'n, 82 F.3d 812 (8th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed the Commission's decision upholding three OSHA citations for wilful violation of federal safety regulations. The findings against the employer were based in part on hearsay statements from employees that had been translated from Spanish by an interpreter retained by OSHA. The Federal Rules of Evidence are applicable in Review Commission hearings (OSHRC R.P. 2200.71 (1992)). The Court rejected the argument that the translations constituted an impermissible level of hearsay beyond the agency statements. It noted that the employer raised no questions about the ability or bias of the interpreter, and the mere fact that the interpreter was paid by OSHA "was hardly sufficient by itself to require a judge not to attribute the statements directly to the declarant."

United States v. Nazemian, 948 F.2d 522 (9th Cir. 1991) : Affirming a conviction for drug offenses, the Court found no plain error in admitting testimony by a DEA agent as to statements of the defendant made through an interpreter retained by the agent. Rather than rigidly adopting a "language conduit" or an "agency" (see United States v. Felix-Jerez, 667 F.2d 1297 (9th Cir. 1982)) approach to treatment of extrajudicial statements through interpreters, the Court stated that the better approach is to consider on a case-by-case basis whether the translated statements should be considered the statements of the speaker. Here, there was no specific evidence of the interpreter's bias or inaccurate translations, and there was subsequent conduct corroborating the accuracy of the transactions.

United States v. Alvarez, 755 F.2d 830 (11th Cir. 1985) : In a prosecution for drug offenses and the murder of a federal agent, the Court held that statements made in Spanish by a defendant and translated by one undercover agent for the benefit of another agent were admissible.

[f] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Parent and Subsidiary Entities

Donovan v. Local 738, 575 F. Supp. 52 (D. Md. 1983) : In an action by the Secretary of Labor to set aside a union election, the Court found that a report prepared by an administrative assistant to an international union was not admissible as an authorized admission by a local union.

Reid Bros. Logging Co. v. Ketchikan Pulp Co., 699 F.2d 1292 (9th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed a plaintiff's judgment in an antitrust action, finding that a survey prepared by an employee of a parent corporation of one of the defendant companies was admissible as an authorized admission where the person making the report had access to all the defendant's books and records, he was accompanied by the defendant's employees on visits to logging camps, and the report was circulated to the defendant.

[g] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Personal Knowledge

Grace United Methodist Church v. Cheyenne, 427 F.3d 775 (10th Cir. 2005) : In an action challenging a city's refusal to grant a permit to a church to operate a day care facility, the Court found no error in the admission of a letter from a Bishop of the church that undercut the church's position. The Court held that the Bishop was high enough in the church structure to qualify as a speaking agent under Rule 801(d)(2)(C), and although the Bishop lacked personal knowledge of the information related in the letter, Court said that personal knowledge is not required for party admissions because "no guarantee of trustworthiness is required in the case of an admission."

[h] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Statements by Counsel

Vincent v. Louis Marx & Co., 874 F.2d 36 (1st Cir. 1989) : The Court held that a District Court has discretion to balance probative value against prejudicial effect under Rule 403 before permitting a prior pleading filed on behalf of a party to be admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(C). It remanded the case so that the balancing test could be applied.

Purgess v. Sharrock, 33 F.3d 134 (2d Cir. 1994) : The Court found no error in the admission against the defendant of a footnote in a brief filed on the defendant's behalf by counsel in a related case. Disqualification of the defendant's counsel was not required in light of the instruction to the jury that "the lawyer representing the defendant who made that statement now states that the statement is incorrect." That instruction obviated the need for the defendant's counsel to testify as a witness. In United States v. GAF Corp., 928 F.2d 1253 (2d Cir. 1991) , the Court reversed convictions in the third trial of a stock fraud case, holding that the defendants should have been permitted to introduce the original bill of particulars to support their theory that the government's original version of the events had been discredited at the second trial and that it had therefore deliberately adopted fundamental changes in its version of the facts in order to enhance its chances of success. United States v. McKeon, 738 F.2d 26 (2d Cir. 1984) , and Andrews v. Metro N. Commuter R.R., 882 F.2d 705 (2d Cir. 1989) , both of which held that an attorney's statement was properly admitted against the client, are discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 801.02[6][f][vi].

Lightning Lube, Inc. v. Witco Corp., 4 F.3d 1153 (3d Cir. 1993) : In a fraud, tortious interference, and RICO action by a quick lube franchisor against its oil supplier, the Court held it was error to admit extrajudicial statements by the defendant's attorneys in connection with the filing of a counterclaim (later dismissed) as evidence of the defendant's malice, as there was no evidence that the statements were related to the management of the litigation or that the defendant otherwise authorized its attorneys to make the statements.

United States v. Blood, 806 F.2d 1218 (4th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a conviction for embezzlement from an employee benefit welfare fund, the Court reasoned that "[g]enerally, statements by an attorney concerning a matter within his employment may be admissible against the retaining client." It added that "a clear and unambiguous admission of fact made by a party's attorney in an opening statement in a civil or criminal case is binding upon a party." Although the Court apparently held prosecutors and defense counsel to the same standard, it held that the government did not make a clear and unambiguous admission, so there was no error in refusing to treat statements by government counsel and references in voir dire requests as admissions. In United States v. Martin, n110 the Court affirmed a conviction for tax evasion, holding that statements made by the defendant's attorney to the IRS were agent's admissions. It observed that "an attorney's admission of criminal liability might not be admissible against the client," but found that the statements in the instant case did not rise to this level, since the lawyer told the IRS that his client did not know that certain sums were reportable as income.

Dartez v. Owens-Illinois, Inc., 910 F.2d 1291 (5th Cir. 1990) : Reversing a judgment for the plaintiffs in an asbestos case, the Court held it was error to admit as party admissions statements in posttrial briefs filed by the defendants in a separate action, as such briefs are restricted to the facts developed in the record. In Mitchell v. Lone Star Ammunition, Inc., 913 F.2d 242 (5th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs in a product liability action against manufacturers of a defective artillery shell, holding that the plaintiffs had not abandoned their claims against one defendant when counsel stated in closing argument that another defendant was 100 percent at fault. The statement was no more than an opinion on the application of the law to the facts, and the Court was unwilling to bind the plaintiffs to an innocent statement of their attorney made during the heat of closing argument. In Universal Am. Barge Corp. v. J-Chem, Inc., n111 an action for indemnification arising out of the fire loss of a barge cargo, the Court held that admissions of the plaintiff's counsel in an arbitration would be admissible over a hearsay objection, but were not conclusive and binding in a case separate from the one in which the admissions were made.

Barnes v. Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp., 201 F.3d 815 (6th Cir. 2000) : Two plaintiffs each sued more than a dozen manufacturers and distributors of asbestos products for the wrongful deaths of their decedents. Trial went forward against only one defendant, all the others having settled with the plaintiffs or had their cases dismissed. At trial the defendant was permitted to introduce the complaints filed by each plaintiff and to read the names of all the original defendants to the jury. Although judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs, they appealed because the defendant's responsibility was apportioned at only 5% in one case and 2% in the other. The Court held there was no error in reading the complaints, since they were admissions in which the plaintiffs admitted the existence of potential claims against the named defendants, which might be relevant to causation.

United States v. Parsons, 646 F.2d 1275 (8th Cir. 1981) : The Court held that a bankruptcy petition prepared by an attorney could be admitted against the client as an admission.

United States v. Bentson, 947 F.2d 1353 (9th Cir. 1991) : The Court held that a statement by defense counsel in closing argument that the defendant had not filed valid tax returns was a judicial admission binding before both the Trial and the Appellate Courts.

Dugan v. EMS Helicopters, Inc., 915 F.2d 1428 (10th Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiffs in a wrongful death action against the owner and operator of a helicopter because a complaint filed by the plaintiffs in a separate action against the helicopter's manufacturers was erroneously excluded. The complaint, which alleged the crash was proximately caused by the manufacturing defendants, was factually inconsistent with the position taken in the present action. See also LWT, Inc. v. Childers, 19 F.3d 539 (10th Cir. 1994) (finding an abuse of discretion in a breach of warranty action to exclude the buyer's pleading in a state suit that contained inconsistent allegations). In State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Dyer, n112 a declaratory judgment action by an Illinois insurer to disclaim coverage in a state wrongful death suit, the Court held that a finding of diversity between the insurer and a defendant driver whose whereabouts were unknown was not clearly erroneous, noting that another defendant had asserted Wyoming citizenship for the driver in her complaint filed in the state wrongful death suit, which belied her implicit assertion in this action that the driver might have Illinois citizenship.

United States v. DeLoach, 34 F.3d 1001 (11th Cir. 1994) : Affirming a conviction for making false statements to obtain loans, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the defense from offering comments made by the prosecutor in the closing argument in an earlier trial of codefendants. The comments, which referred to the credibility of witnesses and invited the jury to draw certain inferences, were neither statements of fact nor inconsistent with the government's position in the present case. In Hanson v. Waller, n113 a wrongful death action, the Court held that a letter from the plaintiff's to the defendant's counsel was properly admitted as an admission. The Court noted that although an attorney does not have authority to make admissions for his client in all instances, he does have authority to make admissions directly related to management of the litigation.

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Trial or Deposition Testimony

Collins v. Wayne Corp., 621 F.2d 777 (5th Cir. 1980) : In a product liability action arising out of a bus collision with a tractor-trailer, the Court affirmed a judgment for the bus manufacturer, but it concluded that a deposition of an expert employed by the defendant should have been admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(C), since the expert was hired to investigate and to report his conclusions and "[i]n giving his deposition he was performing the function that Wayne [the defendant] had employed him to perform." The error was found to be harmless. In B-W Acceptance Corp. v. Porter, n114 an action by a lender to recover against guarantors of corporate notes, the Court held that testimony of the lender's branch manager at a previous trial was admissible because the lender authorized the manager to testify to what he knew.

[9] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Admission By Party-Opponent -- Agency

Relationship

[a] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Admission Against Fellow Employee

United States v. Paxson, 861 F.2d 730 (D.C. Cir. 1988) : The Court sustained a conviction for making false declarations to a grand jury and held that extrajudicial statements by the vice-president of a company to the effect that certain bids were rigged were properly admitted as agent's statements. Although the declarant was not an agent of the defendant, he was an employee of the corporation in which the defendant was president and in which the defendant owned the bulk of the stock. The Court concluded that it would be "a hypertechnical construction of the rule" to hold that the statement could not be used against a corporate superior.

Zaken v. Boerer, 964 F.2d 1319 (2d Cir. 1992) : This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 801.02[6][f][iii].

Lippay v. Christos, 996 F.2d 1490 (3d Cir. 1993) : Reversing a judgment for Lippay in his malicious prosecution action, the Court held that it was error to permit Lippay's mother to testify that an informant working with Christos told her that he told Christos all along that he could not identify Lippay as the source of drugs. Because the suit was brought against Christos personally, not against the state, the majority concluded it would "not impute the statements of a declarant to a party-opponent who is merely the declarant's co-employee." To have an agency relationship, a supervisor must direct the declarant's work "on a continuing basis." Concurring, Judge Becker argued that "the correct rule is that an out-of-court statement may be admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(D) when a sufficient supervisory relationship exists between two individuals who share a unity of interest regarding the subject matter of the testimony in question."

United States v. Wiedyk, 71 F.3d 602 (6th Cir. 1995) : In the prosecution of a union benefits fund officer for taking kickbacks, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony by an employee of an organization hired by the fund that another employee of the organization had told him not to bother seeking out more cost-effective providers because the defendant was steering the fund's business. Although the defendant and arguably the declarant were employees of the fund, the defendant did not have such control over the fund or over the declarant that the declarant was an employee or agent of the defendant.

Boren v. Sable, 887 F.2d 1032 (10th Cir. 1989) : The plaintiff, who had been injured in an industrial accident, sued the plant manager for negligence. The Court held that hearsay statements of co-workers were not admissible against the manager as admissions by the manager's agents. In United States v. Young, n115 the Court reversed a conviction for mail fraud and false statement on other grounds, but it found that statements of a corporate accountant were properly admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(D) against the defendant, who was a corporate vice president. The Court observed that when statements by one employee are offered against another, their admissibility "will necessarily depend on the nature of the relationship between the declarant and the defendant."

[b] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Confrontation Concerns

United States v. King, 134 F.3d 1173 (2d Cir. 1998) : The government charged the boxing promoter Don King with wire fraud, and a mistrial was declared when the jury deadlocked. The government then charged both King and his corporation, of which King was the sole shareholder, with wire fraud based on the same transactions at issue in the first trial. At a pretrial hearing, the Trial Judge held that King's testimony at the initial trial could not be admitted against the corporation, on the ground that admitting testimony in which King sought to shift blame to the corporation would violate the corporation's right to confrontation. On interlocutory appeal, the Court reversed, holding that a Confrontation Clause objection is not available when a corporation, owned entirely by one person, seeks to preclude the use against it of that person's testimony from a prior trial. When the corporation is the alter ego of its sole shareholder, it "has no valid complaint that it lacked the opportunity to conduct its own cross-examination of the witness with respect to testimony that was subject to explanation or clarification by the shareholder-witness upon questioning by his counsel at the first trial." The Court further concluded that "[t]he same considerations that render the Confrontation Clause inapplicable also refute [the corporation's] contention that King's testimony is not admissible against his corporation under Rule 801(d)(2)(D)."

United States v. Photogrammetric Data Services, Inc., 259 F.3d 229 (4th Cir. 2001) : Affirming the fraud convictions of a company and one of its managers, the Court found no error in the admission of incriminating hearsay statements made by the manager to law enforcement agents as well as other statements made by the manager to an informant (a co-employee). The statements concerned matters within the scope of the manager's employment and were made during the existence of the employment relationship, and thus were admissible against the company under Rule 801(d)(2)(D). Although the Court found no confrontation violation under the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts analysis, we note that the statements to law enforcement agents could well be considered "testimonial," and thus inadmissible, under Crawford v. Washington.

[c] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Depositions

Dartez v. Fibreboard Corp., 765 F.2d 456 (5th Cir. 1985) : In a suit by a worker against various manufacturers alleging injury as a result of exposure to asbestos, the Court held that a deposition of a witness in an earlier asbestos suit was improperly admitted in this case. The witness' company had been dismissed as a defendant, so the deposition testimony was not admissible as an agent's statement, and no effort was made to show that the witness was unavailable.

Daniel v. Ben E. Keith Co., 97 F.3d 1329 (10th Cir. 1996) : In a product liability action alleging defective labels on bleach, the defendant seller produced for a deposition, as the most knowledgeable person available to testify about the label, an employee of the company that labeled and packaged the defendant's bleach. The Court held there was no error in disallowing the deponent's testimony as an admission of a party-opponent, even though state product liability law might impose liability on his employer for its role in the chain of distribution, since the plaintiffs neither pleaded nor proved an agency relationship between the defendant and the deponent's employer.

[d] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- During the Relationship

Blanchard v. Peoples Bank, 844 F.2d 264 (5th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that an attorney's affidavits as to recollections of a former bank employee were inadmissible, since the recollections were reported after the agency relationship ended.

Calhoun v. Baylor, 646 F.2d 1158 (6th Cir. 1981) : Affirming a judgment for a bankruptcy trustee suing to recover royalties and fees paid by the bankrupt company, the Court held that statements of former agents of the company were not admissible against the trustee, since Rule 801(d)(2) "does not include statements by predecessors in interest among the types of statements the rule makes admissible."

Young v. James Green Mgmt., Inc., 327 F.3d 616 (7th Cir. 2003) : Two former employees sued their employer alleging that they were terminated as a result of racial discrimination. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a resignation letter sent to the employer by a manager, stating that he was resigning as a result of being asked to participate in illegal discrimination. The statements in the letter were made after the manager resigned and thus was no longer an agent of the employer. In Walsh v. McCain Foods Ltd., 81 F.3d 722 (7th Cir. 1996) , three individual plaintiffs, who were the sole shareholders of a corporation, brought a breach of contract action alleging that the defendant bought the corporation but failed to pay on promissory notes pursuant to the sales agreement. The defendant sought to introduce an admission by one of the plaintiffs that the plaintiffs had concealed material information. The admitting plaintiff had settled prior to trial, however, and the Trial Judge held that his admission could not be used against the other two. The Court rejected the argument that the statement was an agency admission, since the admission was made four years after the corporation was sold, and any agency relationship that had existed among the plaintiffs was terminated upon the sale of the corporation.

Kinser v. Gehl Co., 184 F.3d 1259 (10th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a judgment awarding damages to the estate and survivor of a farmer who was killed while operating a baler manufactured by the defendant, finding no error when the plaintiffs were permitted to read into evidence deposition excerpts of a retired employee who was deposed in three previous lawsuits involving the defendant's balers. The Court noted that the employee continued to consult for the defendant on projects he had overseen while working for the company, and that the deposition excerpts all concerned events and policies occurring during his tenure.

[e] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Employee of Related Employer

United States v. Agne, 214 F.3d 47 (1st Cir. 2000) : Affirming convictions for bank fraud and making a false statement on a loan application, the Court found no error in the admission of hearsay statements from an employee of a company affiliated with the company controlled by the defendant. The Court held that the statements of a corporate employee may be admitted against a corporate officer when "the factors which normally make up an agency relationship are present." Here, there was an agency relationship, since the employee was specifically designated by the defendant to handle and report on the business matter at issue in the case, and was directly responsible to the defendant on these matters.

Yates v. Rexton, Inc., 267 F.3d 793 (8th Cir. 2001) : The Court reversed summary judgment granted for the defendant in an age discrimination case because statements by executives in the defendant's corporate parent were improperly disregarded as hearsay. Although the executives were not the decision-makers with respect to the plaintiff's termination, the parent corporation exercised control over the defendant, and the executives were intimately involved in the process of shaping the defendant's workforce. Thus, their statements were those of an agent of a party-opponent.

In re Sunset Bay Assoc., 944 F.2d 1503 (9th Cir. 1991) : Reversing a summary judgment for the lender and its chief lending officer in fraud claims relating to a construction loan default, the Court held that statements by a loan officer were admissible against both defendants, although the officer was an employee only of the lender. When an employee's superior has instructed the employee to act in furtherance of a fraudulent scheme, statements made by the employee relating to that scheme are admissible under the Rule.

Daniel v. Ben E. Keith Co., 97 F.3d 1329 (10th Cir. 1996) : In a product liability action alleging defective labels on bleach, the defendant seller produced for a deposition, as the most knowledgeable person available to testify about the label, an employee of the company that labeled and packaged the defendant's bleach. The Court held there was no error in disallowing the deponent's testimony as an admission of a party-opponent, even though state product liability law might impose liability on his employer for its role in the chain of distribution, since the plaintiffs neither pleaded nor proved an agency relationship between the defendant and the deponent's employer.

[f] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Examples of Agents' Admissions

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Employment Discrimination Cases

Woodman v. Haemonetics Corp., 51 F.3d 1087 (1st Cir. 1995) : Vacating an order granting summary judgment for the defendant in an age discrimination case, the Court held that the Trial Judge should have admitted, under Rule 801(d)(2)(D), a statement from a line supervisor attributing age animus to her supervisors. The line supervisor was acting within the scope of her employment because part of her job was to be involved in employment and personnel decisions; and she was communicating her opinion about information she received at a meeting concerning employment matters.

Cook v. Arrowsmith Shelburne, Inc., 69 F.3d 1235 (2d Cir. 1995) : Reversing summary judgment against an employee alleging she had been discharged because of her gender, the Court held there was no error in admitting the plaintiff's testimony that her immediate supervisor and the supervisor who dismissed her had said her firing was because the General Manager wanted a man in the job, as all were making statements concerning a matter within the scope of their employment.

Abrams v. Lightolier, Inc., 50 F.3d 1204 (3d Cir. 1995) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in an age discrimination case, the Court held that a statement by a supervisor that the defendant company "frowned on older people" was properly admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(D). The Court stated that where a supervisor is authorized to speak with subordinates about the employer's employment practices, a statement of the supervisor's "understanding regarding the criteria utilized by management in making decisions on hiring, firing, compensation and the like is admissible against the employer." The Court rejected the argument that the agent's statement constituted double hearsay; rather, the statement was simply an opinion by the agent.

EEOC v. Watergate at Landmark Condominium, 24 F.3d 635 (4th Cir. 1994) : To prove that a condominium association had discharged an employee on the basis of her age, the plaintiff introduced statements by residents serving as volunteers on various association committees. The Court held that the residents were "agents" of the defendant association for purposes of the Rule, although they were neither officials nor employees and the committees were technically only advisory to the Board of Directors; agency was found because the committees were critical to the decisional process of the association.

Wilkerson v. Columbus Separate School Dist., 985 F.2d 815 (5th Cir. 1993) : In an employment discrimination action by a white football coach claiming his contract was not renewed after a black teacher had been fired, the coach offered deposition testimony that the school board president had said a black board member told him, "You got the black, now you are going to get the white." The Court held the statements were double hearsay but were admissible against the school district because both declarants were its agents.

Moore v. KUKA Welding Sys. & Robot Corp., 171 F.3d 1073 (6th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a Title VII race discrimination case, holding there was no error in admitting testimony by a co-employee of the plaintiff that the witness' brother-in-law, who worked for the same employer, told him at a social occasion that the plaintiff's supervisor had told the brother-in-law that "some bad stuff's going to happen" in the plaintiff's area and that the witness should stay out of it unless he wanted to be fired. The supervisor was the employer's agent with respect to personnel issues, and he used the brother-in-law as an agent of the company for purposes of communicating the warning to the witness. In any event, the supervisor was a witness subject to examination in court, so the defendants "had an opportunity to put before the jury their version of the event in question." Reversing a summary judgment for the defendant in an age discrimination case, Kraus v. Sobel Corrugated Containers, Inc., 915 F.2d 227 (6th Cir. 1990) , the Court held that an affidavit alleging that the plaintiff's department manager had praised her work and requested five years' notice if she ever planned to leave the company was improperly discounted. The alleged statements would clearly be admissible at trial as vicarious admissions; the fact they were made in a social setting would go to their weight, not to their admissibility.

Allen v. Chicago Transit Auth., 317 F.3d 696 (7th Cir. 2003) : The Court reversed summary judgment for the Authority in an employment discrimination action because the Trial Judge failed to give any weight to a finding by the Authority's own investigator that a supervisor's explanation for promoting a white man over the African-American female plaintiffs was not credible. The finding was admissible both as an admission made by an employee of a party opponent within the scope of his employment and as an investigative report of a public agency. In Bell v. Environmental Protection Agency, 232 F.3d 546 (7th Cir. 2000) , EPA employees who had been denied promotions brought Title VII claims based on race and national origin discrimination. In granting summary judgment to the defendant, the Trial Judge excluded as hearsay a memorandum written by a member of the EPA promotion selection panel which stated that the EPA did not promote the best candidates. The Court found that the memorandum was admissible as an agent's admission to rebut the agency's assertion in litigation that it honestly believed it was promoting the more qualified candidates. In a former employee's age discrimination action, Hybert v. Hearst Corp., n116 the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting as vicarious admissions his supervisor's statements about the attitudes and intentions of management higher-ups regarding older employees. See also Crawford v. Garnier n117(noting that instructions from an employment analyst about how to fill out an application would have been admitted as agents' admissions whether or not the analyst had been authorized to say what he did); Nekolny v. Painter n118(upholding the introduction of testimony by an agent concerning her superior's state of mind with respect to one plaintiff).

Eliserio v. United Steelworkers Local 310, 398 F.3d 1071 (8th Cir. 2005) : In an employee's action claiming racial harassment by the union, the Court held that statements made by local union officials about a matter of union concern and within the scope of their duties as union officials were admissions of a party opponent. In an employment discrimination action arising from the firing of a black personnel manager in a hotel, EEOC v. HBE Corp., 135 F.3d 543 (8th Cir. 1998) , the Court held there was no error in admitting statements by other managers that indicated the CEO of the hotel's corporate parent had a policy of excluding blacks from significant managerial positions and otherwise discriminated against blacks in the hotel. The other managers were speaking within the scope of their authority, which extended to management and employment decisions. Thus, the double hearsay -- statements by these agents as to what the CEO had said -- was admissible because both levels qualified as agents' statements. The Court also upheld testimony that an agent had said that "the corporate office" did not want a black person to be assistant personnel director, reasoning that the attribution was sufficient where the original speaker's identity could be inferred from the context. In a diversity action charging discrimination under state law, Russell v. United Parcel Serv., Inc., n119 the Court held that the Trial Judge should have admitted statements by two of the defendant's supervisors to the effect that a manager was treating her badly because she had filed claims against the company. Citing both Rules 701 and 801(d), the Court said that the statements were admissible as admissions even though they were cast in the form of opinions.

O'Donnell v. Georgia Osteopathic Hosp., 748 F.2d 1543 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a jury's finding that the defendant hospital discriminated against the plaintiff because of her age, and upheld the admission of testimony by the person who replaced the plaintiff, which described discussions a staff doctor reported he had with the executive director of the hospital concerning the plaintiff's treatment. The Court found that the extrajudicial statements represented two-step agents' admissions.

[ii] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Examples of Agents' Admissions -- Other Cases

Astra Pharmaceutical Prods., Inc. v. Occupational Safety & Health Review Comm'n, 681 F.2d 69 (1st Cir. 1982) : On review of an OSHA decision, the Court approved reliance on statements by a company's employees even though it recognized that the statements were not "free from ambiguity."

Yohay v. City of Alexandria Employees Credit Union, Inc., 827 F.2d 967 (4th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that a credit union employee's statement to the assistant manager that she had obtained the credit information at issue at the request of the credit union's manager was admissible as an agent's statement in a suit against the credit union under the Fair Credit Reporting Act. In Bostick Oil Co. v. Michelin Tire Corp., n120 an antitrust case brought by a distributor after a tire manufacturer terminated his contract as distributor, the Court said that a memorandum prepared by the manufacturer's district manager concerning the distributor's sales activities was admissible when offered by the distributor as long as the manager was authorized to make the memorandum or it concerned a subject within the scope of his agency.

Scofi v. McKeon Constr. Co., 666 F.2d 170 (5th Cir. 1982) : The Court held in a wrongful death action that the statements by an independent contractor's foreman relating his safety responsibilities were admissible against the contractor.

Stalbosky v. Belew, 205 F.3d 890 (6th Cir. 2000) : The estate of a decedent sued a truck driver, who raped and murdered the decedent, for wrongful death and the truck driver's employer for negligent hiring and retention. Although it affirmed summary judgment for the employer, the Court held that a statement by the "semi-retired" chairman of the board of the employer should have been considered against it. In an antitrust case, Re/Max Int'l, Inc. v. Realty One, Inc., 173 F.3d 995 (6th Cir. 1999) , the plaintiffs introduced as evidence of a conspiracy testimony from a witness that when he expressed antitrust concerns to the CEO of one defendant, the CEO responded that "there was no need to worry because someone would have to prove" he spoke to the principal shareholder of the other defendant and the CEO then "leaned forward, smiled, and said 'of course we didn't.' " The Court found that the oral utterances and the act of leaning forward and smiling, when considered together as the CEO obviously intended, were a statement that the CEO had "talked" to his counterpart but that no one would be able to prove it. Reversing summary judgment for the defendants, the Court held that this statement was admissible against the CEO's employer under Rule 801(d)(2)(D), since it was made concerning a matter within the scope of the CEO's employment during the existence of the relationship. In Robert R. Jones Assoc., Inc. v. Nino Homes, n121 the Court held that a custom house builder was entitled to profits that it would have earned but for an infringer's unauthorized duplication and use of drawings, and that testimony concerning a statement by an architect hired by the infringer was properly admitted as an agent's admission. The architect had said the president of the infringing firm had given him a photocopy of the plaintiff's floor plans and instructed him to copy them.

In re High Fructose Corn Syrup Antitrust Litig., 295 F.3d 651 (7th Cir. 2002) : Reversing summary judgment for the defendants in a price-fixing case, the Court held it was error for the Judge to disregard a statement by plant manager for one of the defendants, "We have an understanding within the industry not to undercut each other's prices." His statement was admissible as an admission by a party because he was commenting on a matter within the scope of his employment. In a prosecution for willful copyright infringement, United States v. Cross, 816 F.2d 297 (7th Cir. 1987) , the Court found that statements by an employee of two co-owners of a business were properly admitted as an agent's statements and that it was not necessary for the government to satisfy the exemption for conspirator statements.

Wright v. Farmers Co-op, 681 F.2d 549 (8th Cir. 1982) : In an action by owners of a motor home against a co-op whose employee overfilled the home's propane tank, the Court held that a statement by the employee, tape-recorded by an insurance adjuster, was an agent's admission. See also Pillsbury Co. v. Cleaver-Brooks Div. n122(upholding admission of agent's statements that were adopted by another agent).

Harris v. Itzhaki, 183 F.3d 1043 (9th Cir. 1999) : Reversing summary judgment for the defendant in a Fair Housing Act case, the Court held there was a jury question whether the woman who kept spare keys, collected rent checks, and showed vacant units to prospective tenants was an agent of the defendants, and thus whether her statement that the defendants did not want to rent to blacks was admissible as a vicarious admission. The Court noted that whether an agency relationship exists for purposes of the Fair Housing Act is determined under federal, not state, law. In Hilao v. Estate of Marcos, 103 F.3d 767 (9th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs in a class action against the former Philippine president for human-rights abuses, and held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting statements made by members of the Philippine military or paramilitary forces to the plaintiffs or witnesses in this case. There was sufficient evidence from the statements themselves and from expert testimony about the structure of the forces to determine an agency relationship existed. In In re Aircrash in Bali, Indonesia, n123 the Court held that an airline's report on its safety record and problems was admissible as an admission by employees. In Abatti v. Commissioner, n124 the Court reversed the Tax Court, ruling that papers compiled by the taxpayers' accountant in the course of an audit were admissible against the taxpayers under Rule 801(d)(2)(D).

Rainbow Travel Serv. v. Hilton Hotels Corp., 896 F.2d 1233 (10th Cir. 1990) : The Court held, in a breach of contract action by a travel service whose clients were bumped from reservations, that in proving the defendant hotel's overbooking policy, a witness was properly permitted to testify to statements by a shuttle bus driver employed by the defendant that his job was to transport guests who had been bumped and to try to keep them happy. In United States v. Shunk, n125 the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, holding that the defendant's statements to undercover officers that his brother had sold a pistol to them ratified the brother's prior statements that he was the defendant's agent and made the brother's statements admissible as agent's admissions. In Whiteley v. OKC Corp., n126 the Court affirmed a judgment for a plaintiff who claimed that the defendant had breached express and implied warranties as to propane that was delivered to the plaintiff. It noted that testimony by a third party as to what his own employee told him about an accident at the defendant's yard was hearsay that was properly excluded, and it found that testimony by the third party as to statements made by the defendant's employee was properly admitted as an agent's admission.

Kenney v. Lewis Revels Rare Coins, Inc., 741 F.2d 378 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed judgments for the plaintiffs, who were injured when a truck driven by the defendant's employees collided with the plaintiffs' van, and upheld the admission of a trooper's testimony concerning statements made at the scene by the employees and a diagram based on the statements. The statements were agents' admissions.

[g] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Government Agents and Employees

United States v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 498 F. Supp. 353 (D.D.C. 1980) : In this large civil antitrust action, the Court determined that the plaintiff was the United States, not the Department of Justice, and that statements by agents of the United States could qualify as admissions.

Corrigan v. United States, 609 F. Supp. 720 (E.D. Va. 1985) , rev'd on other grounds, 815 F.2d 954 (4th Cir. 1987) : The guardian of a former soldier who had been incapacitated following an automobile crash that occurred after the soldier had been drinking at a non-commissioned officers' club sued the government for damages. The Court held that a bartender's statements concerning the intoxicated state of the soldier were admissible as agent's admissions.

Murrey v. United States, 73 F.3d 1448 (7th Cir. 1996) : The Court reversed a judgment for the United States in an FTCA suit by a patient's estate alleging medical malpractice by a government hospital. The Judge had excluded evidence that the Secretary of Veterans' Affairs publicly announced that poor care had contributed to the death of the patient, and evidence that the department's lawyers informed the patient's widow that his death had been "caused by a medical misadventure" and invited her to file a tort claim. Rejecting an argument that admission of the evidence would violate the statutory limit of $25,000 on an agency's authority to settle a claim under the FTCA, the Court stated that this "would have some merit if all admissions made by an agency were treated as judicial admissions, for then by making admissions an agency could effectively bypass the $25,000 limitation," but when the admissions are used only as evidence, "the fact that an agency makes a case more difficult to defend by the Department of Justice because the head of the agency or one of its officers makes damaging admissions is a peril of litigation, not an unauthorized settlement offer."

Hilao v. Estate of Marcos, 103 F.3d 767 (9th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiffs in a class action against the former Philippine president for human rights abuses, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting statements made by members of the Philippine military or paramilitary forces to the plaintiffs or witnesses in this case. There was sufficient evidence from the statements themselves and from expert testimony about the structure of the forces to determine an agency relationship existed.

Skaw v. United States, 740 F.2d 932 (Fed. Cir. 1984) : In an action against the United States to recover for the alleged taking of unpatented mining claims, the Court vacated a summary judgment for the United States, holding that the Trial Judge erred in refusing to consider a letter from a Forest Service supervisor stating that the plaintiffs' lessee had made a valid discovery of minerals on the claim. The statement was admissible as an agent's admission.

[h] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Government Attorneys

United States v. Zizzo, 120 F.3d 1338 (7th Cir. 1997) : Affirming racketeering convictions, the Court found no error in the exclusion of four statements made by government prosecutors in other cases in which they called one hearsay declarant and one witness in the instant case liars. The Court stated that "[b]ased on the common law principle that no individual should be able to bind the sovereign, we generally decline to apply Rule 801(d)(2) to statements made by government employees in criminal cases," but recognized that "a number of courts have rejected that approach when dealing with statements made by government attorneys." (Citing United States v. Kattar, 840 F.2d 118 (1st Cir. 1988) .)

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Government Informants

United States v. Yildiz, 355 F.3d 80 (2d Cir. 2004) : Affirming a Hobbs Act conviction, the Court adhered to "the common law rule that a government agent's out-of-court statements are not admissible for their truth in a criminal prosecution as admissions by a party opponent." Maintaining that the common law rule retained its viability even though Rule 801(d)(2)(D) makes no mention of a limitation for government agents, the Court reasoned that the government's "many agents and actors are supposedly uninterested personally in the outcome of the trial and are historically unable to bind the sovereign."

United States v. Summers, 598 F.2d 450 (5th Cir. 1979) : The Court affirmed a Hobbs Act conviction, finding that telephone conversations recorded on tape were properly admitted to show that the defendant was to receive certain money, since the person whose statements implicated the defendant was an agent making statements within the scope of employment. The Court did find error in the introduction of statements by the agent after the agent began working with the government, but said it was harmless.

United States v. Branham, 97 F.3d 835 (6th Cir. 1996) : A defendant in a marijuana conspiracy trial sought to support his entrapment defense by introducing a government informant's statements attempting to involve the defendant in a number of illegal activities, but the statements were excluded by the Trial Judge as hearsay. The Court noted that the statements were made by the agent of a party-opponent within the scope of his agency, but held that they were not hearsay because they were offered for their effect on the defendant's state of mind, not as proof of the matters asserted. Error in excluding the evidence was harmless, however.

United States v. Arroyo, 406 F.3d 881 (7th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed heroin-related convictions, rejecting the argument that a memorandum prepared by an IRS agent relating a statement by a confidential informant was admissible as an agent's admission. The Court noted that it had previously held that government agents are not party-opponents; it could also have noted that even if the memo were an agent's admission, it is not clear that the confidential informant would also have qualified as an agent. The memo quoted the informant, and thus there was double hearsay -- the memo itself and the informant's statement. In United States v. Prevatte, 16 F.3d 767 (7th Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed convictions for explosives and firearms violations arising from a bombing-burglary scheme, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding postarrest statements by a conspirator who was cooperating with the government as agent's admissions. It declined to disturb its longstanding rule that no individual's statement could bind the sovereign.

[j] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Government Publications

United States v. Van Griffin, 874 F.2d 634 (9th Cir. 1989) : In a prosecution for driving under the influence of alcohol, the Court found error (harmless, however) in the exclusion of a government manual that set forth certain procedures that are necessary for reliable testing. The Court declined to say that every U.S. publication is admissible as a party admission, but found that the manual offered by the defendant was prepared by the department charged with developing rules for highway safety and was relevant to the charge brought against the defendant.

[k] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Independent Contractors

Sabel v. Mead Johnson & Co., 737 F. Supp. 135 (D. Mass. 1990) : The Court held, in a product liability action against a drug manufacturer, that statements by outside experts at a meeting convened and financed by the defendant between the experts and its employees were not admissible as agents' admissions because the defendant did not control the manner or means of discussion employed by the participants at the meeting, and there was no evidence the consultants were empowered to speak on its behalf.

Sanford v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 923 F.2d 1142 (5th Cir. 1991) : Reviewing consolidated asbestos injury cases, the Court held that a report made by the partner of a testifying expert for the defendants in asbestos cases was inadmissible under the Rule, as a person must be subject to the principal's control in order to be deemed an agent, and it is highly doubtful that a physician would be subject to the control of nine asbestos manufacturers. Furthermore, the plaintiffs offered no evidence to satisfy their burden of showing an agency relationship between the defendants and the doctor.

Beck v. Haik, 377 F.3d 624 (6th Cir. 2004) : The Court held that the statement of a consultant, made about a matter within the scope of his employment, was admissible against a principal under Rule 801(d)(2)(D). The Court noted that though there is little precedent, "courts confronting similar fact situations have tended to hold contractors and advisors to fall within the 'agency' relationship contemplated by Rule 801(d)(2)(D)."

Merrick v. Farmers Ins. Group, 892 F.2d 1434 (9th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed judgments for the defendant insurance company in an age discrimination case, holding that statements by two of the defendant's insurance agents and one of its district managers about what had happened at a Christmas party were properly excluded because the plaintiff did not establish that the declarants were agents as opposed to independent contractors or that their statements concerned a matter within the scope of their agency.

[l] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Invocation of Privilege by Agent

RAD Servs. v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 808 F.2d 271 (3d Cir. 1986) : Affirming a judgment for an insurer in an action by a company to recover costs incurred in disposing of hazardous waste, the Court held that a jury was properly permitted to infer from the fact that agents of the company invoked their privilege against self-incrimination during depositions with respect to critical facts that their answers would have been adverse to the company.

[m] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Joint Parties

Movie 1 & 2 v. United Artists Commun., Inc., 909 F.2d 1245 (9th Cir. 1990) : The Trial Judge granted summary judgment for the defendants in an antitrust action against film exhibitors and distributors after excluding from evidence statements by an employee of a defendant distributor. The Court reversed, holding that the statements were admissible at least against the distributor and the exhibitor with which the statements indicated the distributor was conspiring. In Fenner v. Dependable Trucking Co., n127 the Court reversed a judgment for a plaintiff motorist against the employer of another motorist and the operator of the premises where the accident occurred. To prove the speed of the other vehicle, the plaintiff was permitted to produce the testimony of a witness who had heard an employee of the premises state that the other vehicle was moving too fast. The Court observed that this statement was an agent's admission of the operator of the premises, not of the employer of the other motorist. Thus, it could not be used to prove that the other motorist was speeding.

City of Tuscaloosa v. Harcros Chems., Inc., 158 F.3d 548 (11th Cir. 1998) : In an antitrust action against five chemical companies for a conspiracy to fix prices for repackaged chlorine, the Court reversed a grant of summary judgment for one of the defendants. The CEO of that defendant had stated to friends that he was engaged in fixing chlorine prices; this was clearly a statement about a matter within the scope of the CEO's authority, and thus should have been admitted against his corporate employer under Rule 801(d)(2)(D). It was not admissible against the other companies, however.

[n] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Judicial Admissions

Sanders v. New York City Human Resources Admin., 361 F.3d 749 (2d Cir. 2004) : Affirming a judgment for the City in a Title VII action alleging race and gender discrimination and retaliation, the Court held that findings by various agency employees who had investigated the plaintiff's complaints that concluded her supervisor had retaliated against her were admissible as agents' admissions under the hearsay rule. However, they were simply the employees' opinions, based on circumstantial evidence, and not judicial admissions usable against the defendant to establish a matter conclusively.

[o] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Multiple Agents

Sea-Land Service, Inc. v. Lozen Int'l, LLC, 285 F.3d 808 (9th Cir. 2002) : Reversing summary judgment for a carrier on a claim by a shipper seeking damages for the carrier's failure to deliver a shipment in a timely manner, the Court held that e-mails created by an employee of the carrier that were forwarded to the shipper by another employee were admissible as agency admissions. The employee who wrote the first e-mail acted within the scope of his authority and the e-mail was adopted by the other employee within the scope of her authority. The Court appeared to recognize that one employee cannot adopt a statement by another on behalf of any employer unless the adoption was within the scope of employment.

[p] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Partners

United States v. Saks, 964 F.2d 1514 (5th Cir. 1992) : Affirming convictions for fraud, the Court held that a deposition given by a nontestifying codefendant in a civil suit was properly admitted, as the defendants were partners and thus agents for each other, the deposition testimony related to matters within the scope of the deponent's agency as a general partner, and it was made during the winding up of the partnership and thus during the existence of the agency relationship.

[q] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Personal Knowledge

Brookover v. Mary Hitchcock Mem. Hosp., 893 F.2d 411 (1st Cir. 1990) : The plaintiff in a medical malpractice action introduced evidence that after the patient's fall, the nurses in the defendant hospital said that he should have been restrained. The Court held that the evidence should not have been admitted as an agent's admission because there was no proof that the nurses were employees of the hospital, but that the defendant had waived the objection by asserting only the declarants' lack of personal knowledge of the circumstances. The Court went on to hold that, at least under the facts of the case, personal knowledge was not required for the agent's admissions. In an action by a lender against Chrysler, the lessee of computer equipment, and Chrysler's sublessee, CSA, Union Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Chrysler Corp., n128 the Court held that a letter written by a CSA accountant was properly admitted against CSA where the accountant responded to an inquiry as part of his duties. It did not decide whether an agent's admission requires that the agent have personal knowledge of the facts underlying a statement, since the accountant based his letter on a sublease that he examined. The Court noted that CSA did not object on the ground that the accountant did not have sufficient information to give an opinion, and suggested that had the objection been made, the letter still might have been admitted, given CSA's ability to explain its significance to the jury.

United States v. Lauersen, 343 F.3d 604 (2d Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a conviction for health care fraud, holding that the testimony by the defendant's patient that she told the defendant's nurse that her patient file was much thinner than on a previous visit and the nurse replied that the defendant's office "had a tip, therefore, they destroyed the files before the government agency came in to confiscate" them was admissible as an agent's admission. The Court reasoned that "it was surely within the scope of the nurse's employment to assure a patient that a file being examined was the patient's and to provide an explanation to allay the patient's justifiable doubts." In response to the defendant's claim that there was no showing that the nurse had personal knowledge, the Court responded that personal knowledge was readily inferable from her statement "we destroyed your file," and added that "[i]n any event, we have not required personal knowledge for statements by a party's agent."

Society of Roman Catholic Church v. Interstate Fire & Cas., 126 F.3d 727 (5th Cir. 1997) : In a dispute over whether the plaintiff was properly informed of the coverage of an insurance policy, the Court held that statements by a sales manager of the insurer were properly admitted as agency admissions. The fact that the agent had no personal knowledge of the matters asserted was "irrelevant," because personal knowledge is not required for admissions.

MCI Commun. Corp. v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 708 F.2d 1081 (7th Cir. 1983) : In this massive antitrust case, the Court upheld the admission of an internal AT&T study that reflected statements by managers within the scope of their duties: "The fact that the report is based on hearsay or reflects opinion goes to its weight and credibility, not its admissibility."

Mahlandt v. Wild Canid Survival & Research Center, Inc., 588 F.2d 626 (8th Cir. 1978) : In a personal injury action on behalf of a child attacked by a wolf, the Court found that statements by an agent of the defendant corporation were admissible under subdivision (d)(2)(D). The Court held that there is no implied requirement in the Rule "that the declarant have personal knowledge of the facts underlying his statement."

[r] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Proving Agency

Belton v. Washington Metro. Area Transit Auth., 20 F.3d 1197 (D.C. Cir. 1994) : Reversing a judgment for a pedestrian injured in a bus accident on another ground, the Court noted that a statement regarding the accident that was included with other statements from bystanders in the investigating officer's report should not be allowed as an admission against the defendant unless the officer could actually trace it to the bus driver.

Gomez v. Rivera Rodriguez, 344 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 2003) : Reversing a judgment for municipal employees who claimed that their discharges had been politically motivated, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit testimony regarding statements by the defendant mayor's wife that tended to show political animus by the mayor. The Court found no independent evidence to support the contention that the wife was an agent for the mayor or for the municipality in connection with the plaintiffs' employment. In Vazquez v. Lopez-Rosario, 134 F.3d 28 (1st Cir. 1998) , the Court affirmed summary judgment against the plaintiff, who alleged that he was fired from a public job because of a political difference with a supervisor. The Court held that many statements made to the plaintiff by government officials about his employment situation were properly excluded and that error in excluding others was harmless. Many of the statements were nothing more than "hallway gossip," where the original declarant is unknown and therefore "it is impossible to determine whether the original declarant also fits within the party-opponent definition." In a medical malpractice action, Brookover v. Mary Hitchcock Mem. Hosp., n129 the plaintiff introduced evidence that after the patient's fall, the nurses in the defendant hospital said that he should have been restrained. The Court held that the evidence should not have been admitted as an agent's admission because there was no proof that the nurses were employees of the hospital, but that the defendant had waived the objection by asserting only the declarants' lack of personal knowledge of the circumstances.

United States v. Rioux, 97 F.3d 648 (2d Cir. 1996) : Affirming a Sheriff's convictions for extortion and related crimes, the Court held that testimony of deputies and special deputies of the Sheriff as to statements made by their supervisors was properly admitted. The Court rejected the Sheriff's argument that, to qualify the supervisors as his agents, the government had to show that the Sheriff controlled the declarants' daily tasks. The Court found it sufficient that the Sheriff hand-picked the declarants, they served at his pleasure, and they were answerable to the Sheriff. Pappas v. Middle Earth Condo. Ass'n, 963 F.2d 534 (2d Cir. 1992) , which held that agency can be proved by circumstantial evidence, is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 801.02[6][f][iv].

Davis v. Mobil Oil Exploration & Producing Southeast, Inc., 864 F.2d 1171 (5th Cir. 1989) : The Court affirmed the liability portion of a drilling rig employee's negligence action against the operator and rig owner. It held that two of the plaintiff's co-workers were properly permitted to testify to an unsafe directive issued by a Mobil company man at a safety meeting on the day of the plaintiff's accident. Although the plaintiff could not demonstrate by name the identity of the man who issued the directive, the Court found sufficient evidence that the man was an agent of the defendant to warrant admission of the evidence.

American Eagle Ins. Co. v. Thompson, 85 F.3d 327 (8th Cir. 1996) : In an insurer's declaratory action to disclaim coverage for the pilot in an air crash, the Court held that statements by an insurance agent after the accident that assured coverage were improperly admitted against the insurer. The declarant had negotiated policies on behalf of the pilot's alleged employer, but there was no showing that he was an agent of the insurer.

Hilao v. Estate of Marcos, 103 F.3d 767 (9th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiffs in a class action against the former Philippine president for human rights abuses, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting statements made by members of the Philippine military or paramilitary forces to the plaintiffs or witnesses in this case. There was sufficient evidence from the statements themselves and from expert testimony about the structure of the forces to determine an agency relationship existed. In City of Long Beach v. Standard Oil Co., 46 F.3d 929 (9th Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed a judgment for an oil company in an antitrust case, finding no error in the exclusion of handwritten notes offered against the defendant as an agency admission. The Court concluded that the plaintiffs had failed to show that the author made the notes as an agent of the defendant company. In Merrick v. Farmers Ins. Group, n130 the Court affirmed judgments for the defendant insurance company in an age discrimination case, holding that statements by two of the defendant's insurance agents and one of its district managers about what had happened at a Christmas party were properly excluded because the plaintiff did not establish that the declarants were agents, as opposed to independent contractors, or that their statements concerned a matter within the scope of their agency.

[s] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Relationship to Other Rules

Aliotta v. AMTRAK, 315 F.3d 756 (7th Cir. 2003) : The plaintiff's decedent, who had been standing on a railroad platform, was somehow struck and killed by a high-speed train passing through the station. The plaintiff offered deposition testimony by the risk manager of one of the defendant railroads that a large, high-speed train creates a vacuum that will pull a person standing too close towards the train. The Trial Judge granted the defendants' motion in limine on the grounds that the witness' statements were not admissions under Rule 801(d)(2)(D) and that the witness was not qualified to give expert testimony under Rule 702. The Court held that the statements were an admission because the witness was speaking about knowledge he had acquired during the course of his job, which was to investigate accidents and speak to other railroad employees about the causes and potential causes of train accidents. However, the Court also held that admissions, although not subject to the personal knowledge requirement of Rule 602 and lay opinion limitations of Rule 701, are subject to the provisions governing expert testimony in Rules 701(c) and 702. Because the witness' scientific statements were unreliable under Daubert, they were properly excluded as offered for the truth of the existence of a dangerous "vacuum effect." If offered only to prove that the railroad was aware of a risk, they would only duplicate other evidence that the railroad knew narrow platforms to be a safety risk, so they might have been properly excluded under Rule 403. The Court concluded that there was no error in exclusion of the deposition statements.

[t] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Scope of Agent's Employment

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Employment Cases

Larch v. Mansfield Mun. Elec. Dep't, 272 F.3d 63 (1st Cir. 2001) : The plaintiff sued under a state whistleblower statute after he was dismissed from his position as manager of the Department allegedly because he refused to obey a Commissioner's order to hire a friend as a meter reader. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of another Commissioner's statement that "he would kick [the plaintiff's] ass out of town and ... make life miserable for the department," since the Commissioner's job description encompassed, and the statements were related to, oversight of the Department.

Blackburn v. United Parcel Serv., Inc., 179 F.3d 81 (3d Cir. 1999) : The plaintiff alleged that he had been discharged from UPS in violation of a state whistleblower statute; the defendant countered that he had violated the company's anti-nepotism policy. In support of his contention that the defense was pretextual, the plaintiff offered testimony that other UPS employees had informed him that certain named employees were related. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court found there was insufficient showing that the declarants were speaking about matters within the scope of their employment, and therefore the statements were inadmissible as vicarious admissions. In an age discrimination case, Armbruster v. Unisys Corp., 32 F.3d 768 (3d Cir. 1994) , the Court reversed a summary judgment for the defendant, but held that an alleged statement that the employer could not afford to keep employees over 50 years of age was properly disregarded because the declarant was not a decisionmaker and the original source of the comment could not be identified as a person with authority in the matter.

Staheli v. University of Miss., 854 F.2d 121 (5th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a university sued by a professor who was denied tenure, holding that there was no error in excluding evidence that an accounting professor had told the plaintiff that the university chancellor was upset about an incident involving the plaintiff. The accounting professor had nothing to do with the tenure decision, and the statement did not fall within the scope of his agency even though the professor served on the faculty senate and the university's planning council.

Schweitzer v. Teamsters Local 100, 413 F.3d 533 (6th Cir. 2005) : Although the Court affirmed summary judgment against a plaintiff who alleged he was terminated to avoid payment of his benefits in violation of ERISA, it found an abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony that the defendant's Secretary-Treasurer had told the witness that the plaintiff had been let go because the defendant did not want to pay his benefits. The plaintiff presented no evidence regarding the scope of the declarant's authority, but the Court concluded that "it is reasonable to surmise" that a matter regarding a decision to terminate an employee falls within the scope of the position of union Secretary-Treasurer, especially when the defendant's attorney had represented that the decision was made by the President, "in consultation with [the] Secretary-Treasurer." In Barner v. Pilkington N. Am., Inc., 399 F.3d 745 (6th Cir. 2005) , the Court affirmed a jury verdict for the defendant employers in a racial discrimination case, finding no error in the exclusion of hearsay statements made by co-workers concerning past acts of discrimination that the co-workers claimed they had suffered in work assignments. The Court held that these statements could not be admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(D), because the scope of the co-workers' employment did not include work assignments. In Carter v. University of Toledo, 349 F.3d 269 (6th Cir. 2003) , the plaintiff sued for race discrimination after her visiting appointment was not renewed by the University's College of Education. The Court found that a statement by the University's Vice Provost, which tended to show that the defendant's cited reasons for nonrenewal were pretextual, was properly admitted as an agent's admission. Although the Vice Provost did not have direct authority to decide on the plaintiff's renewal, his responsibility for the University's affirmative action process made his statements about the racial composition of the faculty within the ambit of his authority. In an employment discrimination action for constructive discharge, Jacklyn v. Schering-Plough Healthcare Prods. Sales Corp., n131 the plaintiff offered evidence that a former supervisor had told her that her divisional manager "did not want any 'skirts' working for him." The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant, holding there was no error in excluding the former supervisor's statement, since there was no evidence he had responsibilities regarding the plaintiff's employment at the time he allegedly made the statement. The Court also upheld exclusion of similar statements by the divisional manager that the plaintiff said had been recounted to her by her supervisor at the relevant time. Although the declarant was her supervisor, he was not involved in the actions that the plaintiff claimed led to her constructive discharge, so his recounting of the divisional manager's statements did not concern matters within the scope of his agency or employment. In NLRB v. Sherwood Trucking Co., n132 the Court denied enforcement of a Labor Board order requiring the company to offer 12 truckers back pay and reinstatement and to recognize and bargain with the union. It found that a crucial statement to former employees by their former supervisor was not an agent's admission because there was insufficient evidence to demonstrate that the declarant was a supervisor with authority to hire and fire when the statement was made. In Hill v. Spiegel, Inc., n133 the Court reversed a plaintiff's judgment in an age discrimination suit, finding that testimony by a former employee of the defendant company relating statements made by other employees concerning the plaintiff's discharge were improperly admitted. There was no evidence to warrant a finding that the discharge of the plaintiff was within the scope of these employees' duties.

Haywood v. Lucent Tech., Inc., 323 F.3d 524 (7th Cir. 2003) : Affirming summary judgment against a former employee who alleged racial discrimination, retaliation, and defamation, the Court noted that the plaintiff's only evidence of a defamatory statement was her own testimony that another employee told her about information received from the employee's superiors in corporate security. Although statements by the superiors might have been Rule 801(d)(2)(D) admissions, there was no evidence that the employee who related those statements spoke within the scope of employment, so there was a level of hearsay that was not overcome. In an employment discrimination case, Krause v. City of La Crosse, 246 F.3d 995 (7th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant City, finding no error in the exclusion of transcripts of an interview in which a former Assistant Police Chief for the City told the plaintiff's investigator that the plaintiff had been reassigned as a punishment for complaining about discrimination. The statement was inadmissible hearsay, since an assistant police chief was not acting within his scope of employment when he discussed the alleged motivations of members of the City's finance department in transferring the plaintiff to another office. In an ADEA case brought by a Court Commissioner (a judicial officer), Halloway v. Milwaukee County, n134 the Court held that statements by a Corporation Counsel office member and a former Clerk of Court recounting alleged statements by the plaintiff's supervising Judge were properly excluded. There was no showing that either declarant was involved in the decision-making process or was acting within the scope of his duties, even as "liaison" to the supervising Judge, when relating the conversation. In Stagman v. Ryan, n135 an accountant who was employed by the Illinois Attorney General's office brought a § 1983 action, alleging that his First Amendment rights had been violated by terminating his employment for engaging in union-related activities. The plaintiff's principal evidence in opposing the defendants' motions for summary judgment was an affidavit by a personnel officer in the AG's office that, inter alia, recounted statements by the plaintiff's supervisor to the effect that the Attorney General would be advised before the plaintiff was fired. Although the evidence was not sufficient to overcome summary judgment for the Attorney General, the Court held that the statements were admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(D) because the supervisor was shown to have been a participant in the decision to discharge the plaintiff. However, the Court found that a statement made by a bureau chief in the AG's office, after the supervisor requested the chief to discuss removing the plaintiff from a collective bargaining team with union officials, was properly excluded. There was no showing that the chief was an employee of the supervisor or that her responsibilities included persuading the union which members to put on its bargaining team.

Watson v. O'Neill, 365 F.3d 609 (8th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the Secretary of the Treasury in a suit alleging racial discrimination in promotions, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a racially insulting remark attributed to one of the employer's managers. Although the Court observed that the plaintiff "correctly notes that inflammatory racial remarks are admissible to establish an on-going pattern of racial harassment and discriminatory animus," it noted that the Trial Judge found little, if any, evidence that the manager was the actual decisionmaker, and that the statement occurred four years before the promotion decision. In Yates v. Rexton, Inc., 267 F.3d 793 (8th Cir. 2001) , the Court reversed summary judgment granted for the defendant in an age discrimination case because statements by executives in the defendant's corporate parent were improperly disregarded as hearsay. Although the executives were not the decision-makers with respect to the plaintiff's termination, the parent corporation exercised control over the defendant, and the executives were intimately involved in the process of shaping the defendant's workforce. Thus, their statements were those of an agent of a party-opponent.

Skillsky v. Lucky Stores, Inc., 893 F.2d 1088 (9th Cir. 1990) : In a wrongful termination action, the Court held that statements recounting what the defendant's "big wheels" had allegedly said, which were attributed by the witness' supervisor to employees of the defendant, were properly held inadmissible because there was no showing the declarants were speaking about matters within the scope of their employment. See also Merrick v. Farmers Ins. Group, 892 F.2d 1434 (9th Cir. 1990) (in an age discrimination case, statements by the defendant insurance company's insurance agents and a district manager about what happened at a Christmas party were properly excluded because the plaintiff did not establish that the declarants were agents as opposed to independent contractors or that their statements concerned a matter within the scope of their agency); Breneman v. Kennecott Corp. n136(the plaintiff did not show that statements were within the scope of authority where one employee testified to what a second employee had stated that a third employee said).

Jaramillo v. Colorado Judicial Dep't, 427 F.3d 1303 (10th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the employer in an age discrimination case, finding no error in the refusal to consider testimony about the situation from the plaintiff's co-employees, as none were involved in the decisionmaking process or claimed to have received their information from employees involved in the decisionmaking process affecting the employment action at issue. In a Title VII and ADEA action by an employee who had been demoted, Abuan v. Level 3 Communications, Inc., 353 F.3d 1158 (10th Cir. 2003) , the plaintiff introduced a statement made by his supervisor at a going-away party for the supervisor, in which the supervisor said that a substantial reason for his resignation was the company's unethical treatment of the plaintiff. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found no abuse of discretion. The supervisor was a high corporate officer, the remarks were within the scope of his own employment while discussing the treatment of his subordinate, and they were made while he was still an agent or employee of the company. In a suit alleging sexual harassment, Purrington v. University of Utah, n137 the Court affirmed a judgment for an employer, concluding that testimony from two University professors about conversations they had with other University personnel about the plaintiff was properly excluded because the plaintiff failed to demonstrate that the statements by University personnel concerned matters within the scope of their employment. In a gender discrimination suit, Sorensen v. City of Aurora, n138 the Court held that the plaintiff failed to show that a statement by a deputy fire chief was within the scope of his agency.

Miles v. M.N.C. Corp., 750 F.2d 867 (11th Cir. 1985) : In an employment discrimination action, the Court found it was error to exclude a derogatory statement concerning African-American women made by an assistant superintendent of hiring for the company. Since he was involved in hiring decisions, the assistant's statement was admissible as an agent's admission.

[ii] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Scope of Agent's Employment -- Other Cases

Marcic v. Reinauer Transp. Cos., 397 F.3d 120 (2d Cir. 2005) : The plaintiff in a Jones Act case proffered the statement of a deck hand at the scene that the paint on which the plaintiff slipped had no sand in it. Although the plaintiff speculated that the deck hand was probably one of the persons who painted the rail, so that his statement would "relate to a matter" within the scope of his employment, the plaintiff did not offer any evidence that this was the case, so the Court found no error in exclusion of the statement. In United States v. Lauersen, 343 F.3d 604 (2d Cir. 2003) , the Court affirmed a conviction for health care fraud, holding that the testimony by the defendant's patient that she told the defendant's nurse that her patient file was much thinner than on a previous visit and the nurse replied that the defendant's office "had a tip, therefore, they destroyed the files before the government agency came in to confiscate" them was admissible as an agent's admission. The Court reasoned that "it was surely within the scope of the nurse's employment to assure a patient that a file being examined was the patient's and to provide an explanation to allay the patient's justifiable doubts." In United States v. Rioux, n139 the Court affirmed a sheriff's convictions for extortion and related crimes, holding that testimony by deputies and special deputies of the sheriff as to statements made by their supervisors was properly admitted as statements of agents. The Court found that there was evidence that the supervisors discussed suspension decisions regarding deputies with the sheriff and that they enforced the sheriff's instruction to the deputies that they had to pay dues as a condition of employment. It was not necessary that the supervisors be final decisionmakers for their statements to be within the scope of their employment.

Precision Piping & Instruments, Inc. v. E.I. Du Pont de Nemours & Co., 951 F.2d 613 (4th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in an antitrust action, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding statements made by the defendants' employees. In one situation, there was no evidence that the employee had actual or apparent authority regarding the matter about which he spoke; in another, it was possible there was such authority, but because the statements and the circumstances in which they were made were confusing and the declarant testified and was fully cross-examined, the ruling below was not an abuse of discretion.

Corley v. Burger King Corp., 56 F.3d 709 (5th Cir. 1995) (per curiam): In a personal injury action arising out of a collision with a car driven by a Burger King store manager, summary judgment was granted for the defendant on the ground that there was no showing the manager was acting in the course and scope of his employment at the time of the accident. The Court reversed, holding that the manager's statement at the scene that he was taking some carbon dioxide to the store was an admissible statement concerning a matter within the scope of his employment as manager. In United States v. Summers, n140 the Court affirmed a Hobbs Act conviction, finding that telephone conversations recorded on tape were properly admitted to show that the defendant was to receive certain money, since the person whose statements implicated the defendant was an agent making statements within the scope of employment. The Court did find error in the introduction of statements by the agent after the agent began working with the government, but said it was harmless.

In re Air Crash Disaster, 86 F.3d 498 (6th Cir. 1996) : In a suit between the airline and the aircraft manufacturer for contribution and reimbursement for settlements arising from an air crash, the Court held it was error (but harmless) for an expert retained by the manufacturer to testify that he had heard from airline employees that the Vice President for Flight Operations had called the airline's crew members "SOBs" after looking in the cockpit at the crash site. Although the Vice President's statements would have been admissible against the airline, the hearsay exception for agents' admissions did not apply to the other employees' recounting of his statements, since it was not part of their job to investigate accident scenes or communicate the results of investigations.

Aliotta v. AMTRAK, 315 F.3d 756 (7th Cir. 2003) : The plaintiff's decedent, who had been standing on a railroad platform, was somehow struck and killed by a high-speed train passing through the station. The plaintiff offered deposition testimony by the risk manager of one of the defendant railroads that a large, high-speed train creates a vacuum that will pull a person standing too close towards the train. The Trial Judge granted the defendants' motion in limine on the grounds that the witness' statements were not admissions under Rule 801(d)(2)(D) and that the witness was not qualified to give expert testimony under Rule 702. Affirming exclusion of the statements, the Court held that they were an admission because the witness was speaking about knowledge he had acquired during the course of his job, which was to investigate accidents and speak to other railroad employees about the causes and potential causes of train accidents. However, the statements were properly excluded as unreliable scientific evidence. In United States v. Draiman, n141 the Court affirmed a mail fraud conviction arising from the defendant's filing fraudulent insurance claims following a burglary. It upheld the admission of evidence concerning an exhibit prepared by an accountant for the defendant's company in the ordinary course of business as both an agent's admission and a business record.

Gulbranson v. Duluth, M. & I.R. Ry., 921 F.2d 139 (8th Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in a FELA action, holding that minutes of the defendant's car department safety committee had been admitted erroneously, as there was no showing who the speakers were or that they were the defendant's agents speaking about matters within the scope of their employment. In Tallarico v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., n142 an action by a handicapped minor for violation of the Air Carriers Access Act when she was not permitted to board a flight unaccompanied, the Trial Judge excluded the plaintiff's evidence that two of defendant's employees later made derogatory remarks about the plaintiff and the incident in issue. The Court upheld the exclusion, as the persons who made the statements were nonmanagement employees and were not involved in the defendant's decision not to allow the plaintiff to board the flight.

Los Angeles News Service v. CBS Broadcasting, Inc., 305 F.3d 924 (9th Cir. 2002) : The plaintiff news organization videotaped the notorious beating of Reginald Denny and obtained copyrights for four segments of its tape. In a copyright infringement action, the Court affirmed in part summary judgment for the defendants, finding no error in the exclusion of testimony by the husband of the woman who shot the tape that he had spoken to an editor at a station and to a Westinghouse lawyer and they had said that the station and Westinghouse had copied and used the tape. The Court noted that the party claiming that a statement is an agent's admission must demonstrate that the declaration was within the scope of the agency. In an antitrust conspiracy case, In re Coordinated Pretrial Proceedings, 906 F.2d 432 (9th Cir. 1990) , the Court reversed a summary judgment for the defendants, holding that statements by a defendant's marketing director that the defendant would support certain pricing policies were admissible against the defendant even though the declarant had testified that he did not have authority on his own to raise prices. His testimony that he gathered market intelligence and acted as liaison between top management and the field on pricing, as well as other circumstances, indicated the statements were within the scope of his employment. See also Oki America, Inc. v. Microtech Int'l, Inc. n143(Microtech failed to demonstrate that a statement by an Oki sales manager was within the scope of his employment, especially given the manager's testimony that he knew nothing about Microtech as a customer). In Hoptowit v. Ray, n144 a suit against state officials by inmates challenging prison conditions, the Court found no error in admitting an investigative report prepared by employees of the state Attorney General's office for the state Department of Social and Health Services. It is not necessary to show that a statement is within the scope of the agency; it is sufficient to show that the statement related to a matter within the scope of the agency.

Mercado v. City of Orlando, 407 F.3d 1152 (11th Cir. 2005) : The plaintiff sued police officers and the City for using excessive force when intervening to prevent him from committing suicide, after he was shot with a "less lethal" projectile that struck his head and caused brain injuries. Affirming summary judgment for the City, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the plaintiff's sister was precluded from testifying that a City police officer (not involved in the incident) told her that Orlando trains its officers to "shoot people in the head." not the body. There was no evidence aside from the statement establishing the declarant's employment relationship and its scope. In Wilkinson v. Carnival Cruise Lines, Inc., 920 F.2d 1560 (11th Cir. 1991) , the Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in an action brought for injuries suffered when an automatic sliding glass door ran over her foot. Hearsay statements by a cabin steward regarding the defendant's notice of previous problems with the door were erroneously admitted, since the steward had no responsibilities in the cruise ship's engineering department or in the swimming pool area where the door was located. In Lloyd v. Professional Realty Servs., Inc., n145 the Court upheld exclusion of statements, stating that the plaintiffs were unable to show that the declarant's statements related to any authority that had been conferred upon him by the defendants.

[u] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Statements by Counsel

United States v. Amato, 356 F.3d 216 (2d Cir. 2004) (per curiam): Affirming a conviction for attempted tampering with a cooperating witness, the Court held that statements by the defendant's attorney which were inconsistent with other testimony about the defendant's efforts to contact the cooperating witness were admissible as agent's admissions. The Court noted that the concerns expressed in United States v. McKeon, infra, regarding use of counsel's jury arguments against the client are largely inapplicable to out-of-court statements made by counsel. In United States v. Valencia, n146 the Court affirmed (2-1) a pretrial ruling that statements made by a defense lawyer during informal conversations with the prosecutor could not be admitted as agent's admissions to prove the defendant's consciousness of guilt. The Court found that admission of such statements "would pose some threat to chilling the prospects for plea negotiations," even though no such negotiations were in progress in the instant case. It distinguished its opinion in United States v. McKeon n147(see the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 801.02[6][f][vi]), on several grounds: A statement made in Court is transcribed so that a dispute about what was said is unlikely; the attorney's opening statement at a trial in McKeon did not pose a threat to plea bargaining; and the McKeon statement was directly inconsistent with the defense at the prior trial. In Litton Sys., Inc. v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., n148 the Court affirmed a large antitrust judgment for the plaintiffs, upholding the exclusion of notes made by an attorney for the plaintiff indicating that various employees told him about wrongdoing on the part of other employees. The Court said that "what some Litton employees said about other employees in the course of his investigation does not bring the events he [the attorney] summarized within the scope of his agency or employment."

United States v. Brothers Constr. Co. of Ohio, Inc., 219 F.3d 300 (4th Cir. 2000) : Two corporations were charged with fraudulently receiving public funds in a scheme involving a public construction project that was supposed to be conducted by a "disadvantaged business enterprise." Brothers Company, the DBE, operated as a straw man, while the actual work was done by Bunn Construction, the other defendant, and Brothers received a kickback for lending its name to the project. The general counsel for Bunn testified before a grand jury that he knew that the actual work on the project was done by Bunn employees and not by Brothers. When the attorney claimed his self-incrimination privilege at trial, the grand jury testimony was admitted under the residual exception as proof that the defendants had falsely represented to the government that Brothers had worked on the project. The Court found that the grand jury testimony should not have been admitted as residual hearsay, but affirmed nonetheless, on the ground that the testimony could have been admitted against Bunn as an agency admission. At the time of the grand jury testimony, the general counsel was an employee of the corporation, and he was speaking about a matter within the scope of his authority. The testimony could not be admitted against Brothers, since the counsel was employed by Bunn and not Brothers, but any error in admitting the testimony against Brothers was harmless.

Hardy v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 851 F.2d 742 (5th Cir. 1988) : Reversing a judgment for plaintiffs who sued asbestos manufacturers for damages resulting from exposure to asbestos, the Court held that excerpts from two appellate briefs in other cases were improperly admitted. The issues in the other cases were different because they involved insurance coverage, and the Court reasoned that the appellate briefs differed from Trial Court pleadings in making statements about what the Trial Court record shows rather than about "the facts as they unfolded in the real world."

Williams v. Union Carbide Corp., 790 F.2d 552 (6th Cir. 1986) : Reversing a judgment for a plaintiff who claimed that he was injured when exposed to chemicals while working for a contractor at the defendant's plant, the Court held it was error to prohibit the defendant from cross-examining the plaintiff about a prior suit in which he attributed the same injuries to an explosion. It stated that "[a]n opening statement made by an attorney is admissible in a later lawsuit against his client," and that statements made in pleading in a prior case are admissible. Although the prior statements were made by the plaintiff's attorney, the plaintiff could be questioned about them.

United States v. Brandon, 50 F.3d 464 (7th Cir. 1995) : The Court held in a wire fraud prosecution that a response made to a grand jury subpoena by the defendant's prior attorney was properly admitted. Because the attorney did not represent the defendant in the criminal matter and there was no suggestion he would have done so, none of the policies weighing against admissibility of statements made by an attorney acting as agent for his client was infringed. In United States v. Harris, 914 F.2d 927 (7th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed an armed bank robbery conviction, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting statements by the defendant's former counsel, who had been investigating a mistaken identity theory, as vicarious admissions. Under the circumstances, the Court reasoned that there was no impairment of the privilege against self-incrimination or the rights to counsel of one's choice and effective assistance of counsel, nor would admission deter vigorous and legitimate advocacy. In a case involving similar facts, United States v. Sanders, n149 the Court affirmed a drug conviction, finding that the Trial Judge properly admitted testimony concerning a visit (made five months before the defendant was indicted) by the defendant's attorney to two alleged coconspirators who were then incarcerated. The attorney told the coconspirators that he represented the defendant and asked whether they had made statements to the police. The Court reasoned that the defendant waived any attorney-client privilege claim by objecting at trial only on hearsay grounds, and concluded that the hearsay objection was unavailing under Rule 801(d)(2)(D).

Sunkyong Int'l, Inc. v. Anderson Land & Livestock Co., 828 F.2d 1245 (8th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a judgment in a breach of contract action and held that "[a] pleading abandoned or superseded through amendment no longer serves any function in the case, but may be introduced into evidence as the admission of a party."

United States v. Flores, 679 F.2d 173 (9th Cir. 1982) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, holding that a letter in which the defendant's attorney admitted the defendant's ownership of the gun was properly introduced.

[v] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Statements for Internal Use

Theriot v. J. Ray McDermott & Co., 742 F.2d 877 (5th Cir. 1984) : The Court upheld in a Jones Act suit the admission of a report prepared for the defendant by a foreman whose job was to investigate injuries to workers. That the report was made for the company did not render it inadmissible on behalf of the injured seaman.

MCI Commun. Corp. v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 708 F.2d 1081 (7th Cir. 1983) : In this important antitrust case, the Court upheld the admission of an internal AT&T study which reflected statements by managers within the scope of their duties: "The fact that the report is based on hearsay or reflects opinion goes to its weight and credibility, not its admissibility."

[10] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Admission By Party-Opponent -- Coconspirators

[a] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Acquittal of Conspiracy

United States v. Carroll, 860 F.2d 500 (1st Cir. 1988) : The Court held that a ruling admitting conspirator statements is not invalidated by a subsequent acquittal of the conspirator-declarant. In United States v. Dworken, n150 the Court affirmed a marijuana conviction, holding that conspirator statements were properly admitted, even though the jury acquitted all defendants of the single charged conspiracy.

United States v. Barksdale-Contreras, 972 F.2d 111 (5th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed convictions arising out of a kidnapping plot, holding that statements of coconspirators were admissible even though a defendant was acquitted of conspiracy, given the different standards applicable to admissibility and guilt determinations.

United States v. Todd, 920 F.2d 399 (6th Cir. 1990) : The Court held, in a prosecution of a drug distribution conspiracy, that statements by a declarant who had been tried previously and acquitted of the charge of conspiracy could be admitted under the Rule, as the burden of proof necessary to convict is higher than the preponderance burden required for admission of evidence. See also United States v. Ayotte n151(conspirator statements could properly be used to convict a defendant of substantive offenses, even though the jury returned a not guilty verdict on the conspiracy charge).

United States v. Peralta, 941 F.2d 1003 (9th Cir. 1991) : Affirming a conviction for hostage taking and extortion, the Court held there was no error in admitting extrajudicial statements of a person in furtherance and during the course of a conspiracy, even though the declarant had been acquitted of conspiracy charges. The difference between what must be proved to invoke the hearsay exception and what must be proved in order to convict a person of the crime of conspiracy, as well as the difference in the burden of proof, mean that preclusion doctrines do not automatically bar the use of statements by a person who has been acquitted of the crime of conspiracy.

[b] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Appellate Review

United States v. Machor, 879 F.2d 945 (1st Cir. 1989) : In this narcotics prosecution the Court held that the failure to make a finding of admissibility when counsel properly objects to the evidence but does not request a final determination is not subject either to automatic reversal or to reversal only for plain error. Rather, there will be no reversible error if the Appellate Court's examination of the record reveals that the Trial Judge acknowledged that a Rule 801(d)(2)(E) problem existed and the government met its burden of proof; otherwise, the case may be remanded with instructions to make the determination.

United States v. Rahme, 813 F.2d 31 (2d Cir. 1987) : Affirming a defendant's heroin convictions, the Court stated that a finding that statements are in furtherance of conspiracy will not be overturned unless it is clearly erroneous.

United States v. Bolla, 685 F.2d 929 (5th Cir. 1982) : Affirming marijuana-related convictions, the Court said that it would not overturn a Trial Judge's decision to admit conspirator statements unless the decision was clearly erroneous. See also United States v. Acosta n152(a Trial Court's finding that the Rule is satisfied is judged on appeal by the clearly erroneous standard).

United States v. Gessa, 971 F.2d 1257 (6th Cir. 1992) (en banc): The Court said that it would apply a clearly-erroneous, rather than an abuse-of-discretion, standard of review to the factual determinations required by the Rule, and held that coconspirator statements were properly admitted in this case.

United States v. Rodriguez, 975 F.2d 404 (7th Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed an in limine order excluding coconspirator statements, holding that all Rule 801(d)(2)(E) rulings, whether based on pretrial proffers or after an evidentiary hearing or at trial, are reviewed for clear error. The Court rejected the government's argument that pretrial proffers be subjected to de novo review, considering it perverse to apply more searching review to the one method of making such rulings the Court has expressly approved of as efficient.

United States v. Gordon, 844 F.2d 1397 (9th Cir. 1988) : The Court observed that "[w]e have held that the issue of whether the government has established a prima facie case of conspiracy in its offer of proof is a legal question to be reviewed de novo," but that the Supreme Court's Bourjaily opinion stated that the Court did not find the Trial Judge's factfinding to be clearly erroneous. Declining to decide whether Bourjaily actually mandates a clearly erroneous standard, the Court found that under any standard, conspirator statements were properly admitted. See also United States v. Zavala-Serra n153(noting that Bourjaily indicates the clearly erroneous standard applies, but finding both de novo and clearly erroneous standards satisfied).

United States v. Ayarza-Garcia, 819 F.2d 1043 (11th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that admission of statements under the Rule was not clearly erroneous. After holding that the Trial Judge's findings on the admissibility of conspirator statements would be reviewed under the "clearly erroneous" standard in United States v. Caldwell, n154 the Court upheld the Judge's finding that there was insufficient evidence to support the introduction of a hearsay statement as to one defendant and reversed a similar ruling as to another defendant.

[c] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Availability of Declarant

United States v. Inadi, 475 U.S. 387 (1986) : The Supreme Court rejected the defendant's Confrontation Clause argument and held that a showing of unavailability was not required before conspirator statements are offered by the government.

[d] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Bench Trials

United States v. Alfonso, 738 F.2d 369 (10th Cir. 1984) : Affirming a conviction for distributing cocaine, the Court held that in a bench trial the Judge must follow the same standard of admissibility for conspirator statements as in a jury trial, but the Judge need not expressly state for the record in a bench trial that the government has met its burden of establishing admissibility.

[e] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Cautionary Instructions

United States v. Drougas, 748 F.2d 8 (1st Cir. 1984) : Affirming convictions involving importation and possession of marijuana, the Court indicated that the Trial Judge properly refused to give a cautionary instruction concerning conspirator statements that were conditionally admitted. Such an instruction may be prejudicial to a defendant if the Judge ultimately rules that the statements are admissible and instructs the jury that the foundation facts have been found.

United States v. Tracy, 12 F.3d 1186 (2d Cir. 1993) : In the prosecution of two leaders of a large drug trafficking conspiracy, the Trial Judge told the jury that statements proffered as coconspirator statements were admitted on a conditional basis and later told them that the government had proved the existence of a conspiracy to his satisfaction, so that the statements were admissible against both defendants. The Court held that the instructions were inappropriate because, while it might be proper to alert the jury that there may be a later ruling to disregard conditionally admitted evidence, the jury should not be told what facts the Judge believes have been established when making a determination of admissibility. The error was harmless, however. In United States v. Mastropieri, n155 the Court said it expected that "trial judges in this circuit not only will shoulder the responsibility of making the determination of admissibility, ... but will hereafter refrain from giving the jury a 'second bite' " through a jury instruction.

United States v. Ascarrunz, 838 F.2d 759 (5th Cir. 1988) : The Court held in a drug prosecution that a Trial Judge need not instruct the jury that it must find a defendant to have been a member of a conspiracy on the basis of evidence other than a coconspirator's statement before using the statement against the defendant. In United States v. Elam, n156 the Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to import and distribute marijuana, saying that it was "plain that only when the trial judge has determined, at the close of the evidence, that the prosecution has not demonstrated the defendant's participation in a conspiracy by a preponderance of independent evidence, that an instruction to the jury should be considered." Where the Trial Judge determines that the requisite foundation has been established for the introduction of conspirator statements, no jury instruction is necessary and none should be given.

United States v. August, 745 F.2d 400 (6th Cir. 1984) : The Court noted that it was error, but harmless in this case, for the Trial Judge to tell the jury about the finding that he made concerning a conspiracy.

United States v. Brown, 940 F.2d 1090 (7th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a conviction for participating in a conspiracy to distribute cocaine, holding that the defendant's activities on the night of his arrest and the manner of his surrender, together with the coconspirator's statements themselves, were sufficient for a determination that the defendant was a member of the conspiracy. Although an instruction that the jury consider only the defendant's acts and statements in determining whether he became a member of the conspiracy was erroneous, it acted to the defendant's advantage by preventing the jury from considering incriminating evidence of his involvement in the conspiracy. In United States v. Peters, n157 the Court found that a Trial Judge's explanation of his ruling admitting conspirator statements was not prejudicial, but clearly stated that Judges should not explain rulings admitting such evidence and should, at most, merely caution jurors that conspirator statements have not been subjected to cross-examination. In United States v. Tuchow, n158 the Court made an unfortunate error when it requested Trial Judges to instruct the jury that statements not offered for their truth, but which indicate the nature and scope of a conspiracy, are admissible for a limited purpose and are not independent evidence of the defendant's participation in the conspiracy. Since the sufficiency of the evidence offered as a basis for admitting conspirator statements is a question for the Court alone, the jury should not be instructed on the matter.

United States v. Hartley, 678 F.2d 961 (11th Cir. 1982) : Affirming conspiracy, RICO, and other convictions, the Court observed that where the Judge determines that conspirator statements are admissible, there is no reason to give a cautionary instruction to the jury. The Court also noted that it would be improper for a Trial Judge to tell a jury that he made a preliminary determination that a conspiracy existed. Once the Judge decides that the statements are admissible, they should be admitted like other evidence without special instructions.

[f] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Civil Cases

Earle v. Benoit, 850 F.2d 836 (1st Cir. 1988) : In a civil rights action alleging a conspiracy to harass the plaintiff, the Court held that it was proper to strike the plaintiff's testimony concerning statements made by town police officers, since the plaintiff had failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence a conspiracy between the officers and the defendant state troopers. The Court also held it was proper to rule that the statements were inadmissible prior to the close of evidence, since the plaintiff had an opportunity to point to evidence that would satisfy Rule 801 and was unable to do so.

State of N.Y. v. Hendrikson Bros., 840 F.2d 1065 (2d Cir. 1988) : The Court used the Bourjaily test for conspirator statements in this civil antitrust action and concluded that the plaintiff had established by a preponderance of the evidence the requisite elements for reliance on the conspirator's rule.

Rossi v. Standard Roofing, Inc., 156 F.3d 452 (3d Cir. 1998) : In an antitrust action involving an alleged group boycott, the Court reversed a summary judgment for some defendants and affirmed as to others. It concluded that the plaintiff had demonstrated by a preponderance of the evidence that a statement by one defendant was admissible against others as a coconspirator statement. In an antitrust action by an unsuccessful applicant for a franchise, Big Apple BMW, Inc. v. BMW of N. Am., Inc., 974 F.2d 1358 (3d Cir. 1992) , the Court vacated in part a summary judgment for the defendants, and held there was sufficient evidence of a conspiracy shown to admit statements of alleged coconspirators.

Precision Piping & Instruments, Inc. v. E.I. Du Pont de Nemours & Co., 951 F.2d 613 (4th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in an antitrust action, holding there was no error in excluding statements offered under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) because the preliminary showing of a conspiracy was insufficient. In making that determination, the Trial Judge acted properly in weighing the credibility and reliability of evidence, including hearsay statements.

Paul F. Newton & Co. v. Texas Commerce Bank, 630 F.2d 1111 (5th Cir. 1980) : In a securities action, the Court said that the same approach to conspirators' statements utilized in criminal cases also should be used in civil cases, although "the district court's discretion in controlling the order of proof may be broader ... in a civil action." The Court also implied that a corporate agent's statements made during and in furtherance of a conspiracy involving the corporation could be used against other conspirators.

Re/Max Int'l, Inc. v. Realty One, Inc., 173 F.3d 995 (6th Cir. 1999) : As evidence of a conspiracy in an antitrust case, the plaintiffs introduced testimony from a witness that when he expressed antitrust concerns to the CEO of one defendant, the CEO responded that "there was no need to worry because someone would have to prove" he spoke to the principal shareholder of the other defendant and the CEO then "leaned forward, smiled, and said 'of course we didn't.' " The Court found that the oral utterances and the act of leaning forward and smiling, when considered together as the CEO obviously intended, were a statement that the CEO had "talked" to his counterpart but that no one would be able to prove it. Although the Court reversed summary judgment that had been granted for the defendants, it found no clear error in the ruling below that the statement was not admissible against the second defendant under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) because it did not further the conspiracy.

Qualley v. Clo-Tex Int'l., Inc., 212 F.3d 1123 (8th Cir. 2000) : Vacating a judgment for a plaintiff in a RICO fraud action involving a purchase of Nigerian crude oil that was never delivered, the Court held it was error to admit deposition testimony in which other people's statements quoted by the deponent were offered for their truth. Admission of the statements under the coconspirator exception was clearly erroneous, since there was no evidence aside from the contents of the statements themselves that tended to connect the speakers with the defendants, and the only document linking the various individuals was insufficient to establish a conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence. Affirming a summary judgment for the defendant in a price-fixing case, Pink Supply Corp. v. Hiebert, Inc., n159 the Court held that evidence of alleged conspirator statements could be disregarded when there was no independent evidence of conspiracy.

In re Coordinated Pretrial Proceedings, 906 F.2d 432 (9th Cir. 1990) : Reversing a summary judgment for the defendants in an antitrust conspiracy case, the Court held that there was sufficient independent evidence of the conspiracy to make statements by various of the defendants' agents admissible against all the defendants. In Filco v. Amana Refrigerator, Inc., n160 the Court affirmed a summary judgment for retailers and a manufacturer in a price fixing antitrust case. It found that there was no independent evidence of conspiracy, so certain conspirator statements would not have been admissible.

[g] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Confrontation Concerns

Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) : The Supreme Court held that the Confrontation Clause is satisfied when a statement is properly admitted under the coconspirator rule. In United States v. Inadi, 475 U.S. 387 (1986) , the Supreme Court held that a showing of unavailability was not required before conspirator statements are offered by the government. We note that under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) , coconspirator statements are unlikely to be "testimonial," so confrontation concerns will rarely if ever be at issue. Crawford is discussed in the

Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 801.02[7].

United States v. Sanchez-Berrios, 424 F.3d 65 (1st Cir. 2005) : The Court held that a statement made in the course and furtherance of a conspiracy was by its nature not testimonial within the meaning of Crawford v. Washington. As non-testimonial hearsay, the statement's admissibility under the Confrontation Clause was dependent on compliance with Ohio v. Roberts, and the admission of the hearsay satisfied Roberts because the coconspirator exemption is a firmly rooted hearsay exception. Moreover, admission of the coconspirator hearsay did not violate the defendant's constitutional rights under Bruton v. United States, because "there is no Bruton problem" when the nontestifying codefendant's statement is admissible under a firmly-rooted hearsay exception.

United States v. Holmes, 406 F.3d 337 (5th Cir. 2005) : To avoid a statute of limitations bar in a medical malpractice case, the defendant lawyer conspired with a court clerk to have filings back-dated. During discovery on the limitations issue in the malpractice case, the clerk gave a deposition in which she falsely explained how apparent discrepancies might have occurred. In the defendant's subsequent trial for mail fraud and conspiracy, the prosecution introduced the clerk's deposition. Although the defendant repeatedly referenced the deposition as exculpatory, on appeal he claimed that introduction of the deposition against him was a confrontation violation. The Court held that the clerk's deposition testimony constituted statements in furtherance of the conspiracy. Without deciding whether coconspirator statements in a deposition are "testimonial" under Crawford, the Court held that in this case there was no Sixth Amendment problem because the statements were not offered for their truth. In United States v. Robinson, 367 F.3d 278 (5th Cir. 2004) , the Court affirmed a drug trafficker's murder convictions and death sentence, holding that coconspirator statements are not "testimonial" under the Supreme Court's Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) , Confrontation Clause analysis.

United States v. Lee, 374 F.3d 637 (8th Cir. 2004) : The defendant was convicted of murder in aid of racketeering after killing a gun dealer and his family. Affirming, the Court found no error in the admission of inculpatory statements made by a coconspirator to his brother. The defendant argued that the statements were testimonial under Crawford v. Washington because they were "detailed, confessional, and made after the events to a cooperating individual." The Court held they were not testimonial because the statements were made to a coconspirator and they were admissible as coconspirator statements because they were made in furtherance of a conspiracy involving the brother to sell the stolen guns. In United States v. Reyes, 362 F.3d 536 (8th Cir. 2004) , the Court affirmed drug-related convictions, holding that the defendants' right to confrontation was not violated by the admission of coconspirator statements under Rule 801(d)(2)(E), because coconspirator statements are not "testimonial" under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) .

United States v. Allen, 425 F.3d 1231 (9th Cir. 2005) : The Court held that coconspirator statements admitted against the defendant were not "testimonial" under Crawford v. Washington and their admission did not violate the defendant's right to confrontation. In contrast, a statement made to a police officer by a former coconspirator after he was arrested, which identified the defendant as a person recruited for the conspiracy, was testimonial. There was no constitutional error in admitting this statement, however, because the declarant testified at trial and was cross-examined.

[h] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Conspiracy Not Charged

United States v. Grossman, 843 F.2d 78 (2d Cir. 1988) : The Court noted that the government need not charge a conspiracy to take advantage of the conspirator's rule.

United States v. Horton, 847 F.2d 313 (6th Cir. 1988) : The Court found the foundation sufficient to admit a coconspirator's statement, even though no conspiracy was charged.

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Declarant's Participation in Conspiracy

United States v. Candelaria-Silva, 166 F.3d 19 (1st Cir. 1999) : Affirming drug trafficking convictions, the Court held there was no error in admitting a letter written by an alleged member of the charged conspiracy. Seizure of the letter at the home of a conspirator, contents referring to the subject matter of the conspiracy, and testimony regarding the roles of the writer and persons named in the letter constituted strong evidence that the letter was prepared by a coconspirator during and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

United States v. Monteleone, 257 F.3d 210 (2d Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions for racketeering, murder and other offenses, the Court found no error in the admission of coconspirator statements by a conspirator who was cooperating with the government. It reasoned that "[m]embership in a criminal conspiracy and rendering services to the government as an informant are not necessarily mutually exclusive roles. The status as a co-conspirator of one who is passing information to the government turns on whether his efforts as an agent of the government supplant his efforts as an agent of his co-conspirators. We draw a distinction between a co-conspirator who exchanges information with the government while still pursuing the conspiracy's criminal objectives, and one whose conduct as a 'co-conspirator' is shaped and directed by the desires of the government. Scarpa falls squarely into the former category."

United States v. Dakota, 188 F.3d 663 (6th Cir. 1999) : Although the Court affirmed a convictions for paying kickbacks to an agent of an Indian tribal organization, it found error in the admission of documents seized from the defendant's son's home. A federal agent who was present when the documents were seized sought to lay a foundation, but the Court held that the lack of evidence as to the role of the son in the kickback operation precluded admission of the records as coconspirator statements. Affirming convictions for extortion and false statement in an official corruption case, United States v. Rogers, 118 F.3d 466 (6th Cir. 1997) , the Court held it was probably error (but harmless, in any event) to admit under the coconspirator exemption statements by a declarant whose only proved link to the conspirators was a government informant. In United States v. Todd, n161 a prosecution of a drug distribution conspiracy, the Court held that statements by a declarant who had been tried previously and acquitted of the charge of conspiracy could be admitted under the Rule, as the burden of proof necessary to convict is higher than the preponderance burden required for admission of evidence.

United States v. Peralta, 941 F.2d 1003 (9th Cir. 1991) : Affirming a conviction for hostage taking and extortion, the Court held there was no error in admitting extrajudicial statements of a person in furtherance and during the course of a conspiracy, even though the declarant had been acquitted of conspiracy charges. The difference between what must be proved to invoke the hearsay exception and what must be proved in order to convict a person of the crime of conspiracy, as well as the difference in the burden of proof, mean that preclusion doctrines do not automatically bar the use of statements by a person who has been acquitted of the crime of conspiracy.

[j] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Defendant's Participation in Conspiracy

United States v. Geronimo, 330 F.3d 67 (1st Cir. 2003) : The defendant was acquitted on a charge of conspiracy to import the drug Ecstasy, but convicted of aiding and abetting the importation. On appeal, he argued that it was error to admit hearsay statements of the conspirators under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) because, while he conceded that a conspiracy existed, the evidence was insufficient that he was a member of that conspiracy. The Court found no plain error, given evidence of the defendant's numerous calls to the conspirators, his arranging a meeting of the conspirators before the drugs were to be imported, and his attempt to accept delivery of the drug.

United States v. Rivera, 22 F.3d 430 (2d Cir. 1994) : In a narcotics prosecution, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit a statement made by Rivera's coconspirator, Aponte-Vega, to the effect that Rivera was Aponte-Vega's partner in a drug conspiracy and that Rivera had a stash house where heroin was kept. The statement was made by Aponte-Vega pursuant to a plan (unrelated to the drug conspiracy) to rob various people; the statement identified Rivera as a possible person who could be robbed. The Court concluded that Aponte-Vega's statement could not be considered in furtherance of the conspiracy of which Rivera was a member, because Rivera was in fact an intended target of the robbery proposal.

United States v. Barksdale-Contreras, 972 F.2d 111 (5th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed convictions arising out of a kidnapping plot, holding that statements of coconspirators were admissible even though a defendant was acquitted of conspiracy, given the different standards applicable to admissibility and guilt determinations.

United States v. Brown, 940 F.2d 1090 (7th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a conviction for participating in a conspiracy to distribute cocaine, holding that the defendant's activities on the night of his arrest and the manner of his surrender, together with the coconspirator's statements themselves, were sufficient for a determination that the defendant was a member of the conspiracy. Although an instruction that the jury consider only the defendant's acts and statements in determining whether he became a member of the conspiracy was erroneous, it acted to the defendant's advantage by preventing the jury from considering incriminating evidence of his involvement in the conspiracy. In United States v. Arvanitis, 902 F.2d 489 (7th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to commit arson by hiring a RICO enterprise, but held that a statement by one of the RICO conspirators was improperly admitted against the defendant because proof that he was a purchaser of the RICO conspiracy's services was insufficient to establish his participation in that conspiracy.

United States v. Roach, 28 F.3d 729 (8th Cir. 1994) : Affirming convictions for possession of ephedrine with intent to manufacture methamphetamine, the Court held there was sufficient evidence of a defendant's participation in a conspiracy to admit her codefendant's out-of-court statement implicating her.

United States v. Castaneda, 16 F.3d 1504 (9th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed two defendants' convictions for money laundering because coconspirator statements had been admitted without sufficient independent evidence that the defendants were members of the conspiracy.

United States v. Peveto, 881 F.2d 844 (10th Cir. 1989) : One defendant in this narcotics conspiracy prosecution objected to introduction of another defendant's statement identifying him as a fellow conspirator. The Court held that evidence that the two lived in the same apartment complex in one city and moved to the same complex in another city and evidence of narcotics paraphernalia found in the defendant's apartment could be considered in connection with facts in the statement -- that ownership of dope houses could be concealed by a lawyer, whom the declarant understood to be the defendant -- in deciding by a preponderance of evidence that the defendant was a member of the conspiracy.

[k] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- During the Conspiracy

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Walls, 70 F.3d 1323 (D.C. Cir. 1995) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court held that statements by the defendants' coconspirator identifying several members of the conspiracy were properly admitted. The defendants argued that the declarant had withdrawn from the conspiracy before she made the statements. The Court recognized that there was mutual distrust between the declarant and the other conspirators, and that consideration had been given to expelling the declarant. Nonetheless, the declarant was still a member of the conspiracy at the time of the statements, because "she remained loyal to the conspiracy and made no affirmative attempt to withdraw."

United States v. Tse, 135 F.3d 200 (1st Cir. 1998) : The defendant was charged as leader of a Boston gang having ties to Hong Kong with attempted murder in aid of a racketeering enterprise. The Court held that gang members' statements occurring eight months after the attempted murders and after the defendant was in Hong Kong with no intention of returning to Boston were not made during the conspiracy, but their admission was harmless error.

United States v. Tracy, 12 F.3d 1186 (2d Cir. 1993) : In the prosecution of two leaders of a large drug trafficking conspiracy, the government introduced a copy of the complaint in the case that was annotated by one of the defendants with death threats against informant and agent sources of the allegations. The annotations had apparently been made after all the other conspirators had been arrested. The document was admitted against the conspirator making the annotations as evidence that he had sufficient familiarity with the operation to identify the unnamed informants; the Trial Judge instructed that it was not binding on the other defendant on trial, but that acts and statements of coconspirators could be considered against any defendant in determining whether the government had proved the charges. The Court held that the annotated complaint should not have been admitted against the codefendant who did not make it, because the statements were not made during and in furtherance of the conspiracy, and that the instruction was insufficient to protect the codefendant from its use against him, but the error was harmless.

United States v. Walker, 796 F.2d 43 (4th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed an espionage conviction, holding that conspirator statements were properly admitted, since a conspiracy is presumed to continue and the defendant did not prove withdrawal. In United States v. Truslow, n162 convictions for a conspiracy to obstruct justice were reversed because the Trial Judge erroneously accepted the government's argument that statements made during the life of the conspirator (declarant) were admissible. The italicized word should have been conspiracy, since it is the life of the combination, not its members, that is important.

United States v. Koopmans, 757 F.2d 901 (7th Cir. 1985) : In a prosecution for introducing marijuana into prison, the Court found error, albeit harmless, in the admission of a conspirator's statement, where another conspiracy between them had ended before the statement was made and they were no longer conspiring together.

United States v. Lewis, 759 F.2d 1316 (8th Cir. 1985) : The Court stated that a conspiracy is presumed to exist until it is actually terminated. See also United States v. Johnson, 767 F.2d 1259 (8th Cir. 1985) (tape-recorded statements were inadmissible when made prior to the conspiracy, but error was harmless).

[ii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- During the Conspiracy -- Statements After Declarant's Arrest

United States v. Howard, 115 F.3d 1151 (4th Cir. 1997) : Affirming cocaine conspiracy convictions, the Court held that statements made by one coconspirator with his nephew about another defendant's role in the conspiracy were properly admitted, even though the statements were made while the declarant was in jail. The Court declined to hold that statements made during incarceration automatically fall outside the scope of the coconspirator exception, stating that "[u]nfortunately, a conspiracy's activities do not always end when some of its members go to jail." The discussions related to the continued mechanics and operations of the conspiracy. In United States v. Blackshire, n163 the Court reversed a conviction for conspiring to distribute and distributing heroin, holding that it was error to admit against the defendant a codefendant's statement to a police officer after her arrest. The Court stated that a conspirator's statement made after arrest is not admissible against coconspirators because it is not made in furtherance of the conspiracy, nor during its continuance.

United States v. Arce, 997 F.2d 1123 (5th Cir. 1993) : Affirming convictions for a cocaine distribution conspiracy, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony about a jailhouse conversation between conspirators after their arrest, where there was no evidence that the conspiracy was continuing. In United States v. Pineda-Ortuno, 952 F.2d 98 (5th Cir. 1992) , the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit a coconspirator's statement dictated to agents after the declarant was arrested. In United States v. Triplett, n164 the Court affirmed an arson conviction, holding that a coconspirator's threats to a witness, made in jail after the declarant's arrest, were in furtherance of avoiding punishment.

United States v. Williams, 87 F.3d 249 (8th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed a conviction for various offenses arising out of a scheme to profit from stolen Treasury checks. It approved the admission of statements by another coconspirator to investigators after the declarant's arrest, reasoning that statements made during the concealment phase of a conspiracy may fall within the coconspirator rule if made "in furtherance of the conspiracy," and that, even though "[p]ost-arrest confessions or statements incriminating others by one coconspirator are not made in furtherance of a conspiracy," the statements admitted in this case were not confessions implicating the defendant but were made to enable the other coconspirators to continue to pursue their common objectives. In United States v. Alonzo, 991 F.2d 1422 (8th Cir. 1993) , the Court reversed convictions for conspiring to possess cocaine because a coconspirator's statement made while cooperating with the police after his arrest had been admitted against the defendants. In United States v. Carper, n165 the Court, reviewing drug convictions, held that admitting an alleged coconspirator's statement to police after his arrest was error, but harmless. In United States v. Smith, n166 the Court ruled that tape recordings of conversations between a conspirator who had been arrested and agreed to cooperate and other conspirators were admissible under the hearsay exemption because the conspiracy to distribute heroin was a continuing one and was still in existence at the time the conversations were taped. All three members of the panel agreed that the conspirator who agreed to cooperate with the state could not make statements on the tape that would qualify for admission under the hearsay exemption, but they differed on the impact on the jury of the admission of such statements in the instant case.

United States v. Taylor, 802 F.2d 1108 (9th Cir. 1986) : Affirming convictions arising out of a conspiracy to sell stolen corporate bonds, the Court observed that although statements made by a coconspirator after his arrest cannot be used against fellow conspirators, statements by unarrested conspirators who are still operating in furtherance of the conspiracy may be admitted.

United States v. Perez-Garcia, 904 F.2d 1534 (11th Cir. 1990) : The Court held that it was error to admit under the Rule a statement made after the declarant and his coconspirators had been arrested, as by that time the conspiracy had terminated. In United States v. Jones, 913 F.2d 1552 (11th Cir. 1990) , the Court held there was no error in admitting a tape-recorded telephone conversation between two coconspirators, one of whom had already been arrested, as the other's statements were made in furtherance of a conspiracy in which he and the defendant were still participating.

[iii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- During the Conspiracy -- Statements After Defendant's Arrest

United States v. Urrego-Linares, 879 F.2d 1234 (4th Cir. 1989) : The Court affirmed convictions for cocaine trafficking offenses, holding that statements by one coconspirator to another who was secretly cooperating with the government, made after the defendant was arrested, were in the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy that was still continuing.

United States v. Robinson, 390 F.3d 853 (6th Cir. 2004) : Affirming drug and firearm convictions, the Court held that coconspirator statements made after the defendant was in jail and no longer an active participant were properly admitted against him, since "he is nonetheless presumed to be a continuing member, and is chargeable for the subsequent acts of co-conspirators, so long [as] the conspiracy was ongoing and Robinson did not establish his affirmative withdrawal from the conspiracy."

United States v. Hubbard, 22 F.3d 1410 (7th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed convictions for a conspiracy to manufacture PCP, holding that statements made by a codefendant after the defendant was arrested and had begun cooperating were properly admitted as coconspirator statements. The defendant had not informed the codefendant of his withdrawal from the conspiracy, and his continued association with known targets of the investigation and his attempts to warn them of police involvement indicated that he had not made the required "clean breast to the authorities" even though he had started to assist the government. In United States v. Patel, n167 the Court affirmed convictions in connection with a hashish importing conspiracy, holding that recorded statements by a coconspirator were properly admitted, even though the defendant was at that time cooperating with the authorities and had agreed to make the phone call recorded, as the defendant had not communicated his abandonment to any of his coconspirators, nor had he made a clean breast to the authorities.

[iv] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- During the Conspiracy -- Statements After Objectives Attained or Failed

United States v. Serrano, 870 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1989) : The Court reversed a conviction for fraud, finding that conspirator statements had been made long after the objectives of the alleged conspiracy had either failed or been achieved. The Court reasoned that "when the acts of concealment are done after the central objectives are attained, for the purpose only of covering up after the crime, they are inadmissible."

United States v. Floyd, 555 F.2d 45 (2d Cir. 1977) : Affirming armed bank robbery convictions, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit a statement by one defendant to a third person on the day after the robbery in which he admitted robbing the bank, implicated his codefendant, and arranged with the third person to burn the getaway car. The Court noted that the established Federal rule "is that once 'the central criminal purposes of a conspiracy have been attained, a subsidiary conspiracy to conceal may not be implied from circumstantial evidence showing merely that the conspiracy was kept a secret and that the conspirators took care to cover up their crime in order to escape detection and punishment.' " (Quoting Grunewald v. United States, 353 U.S. 391, 401-02 (1957) .) Accord United States v. DeVaugn n168(reversing a conviction for heroin distribution because a telephone conversation between an undercover agent and a coconspirator following delivery of the heroin was admitted although the conspiracy ended with delivery).

United States v. Moses, 148 F.3d 277 (3d Cir. 1998) : The defendant in a tax fraud case argued that statements made by his coconspirators to a grand jury investigating the defendant's suspected willful failure to pay taxes were improperly admitted, since by the time the grand jury convened, the defendant had already failed to pay taxes, so the conspiracy was over. Affirming the conviction, the Court noted that the indictment alleged a continuing conspiracy to evade taxes that included overt acts of concealment after the taxes were due. Since the grand jury testimony occurred while the taxes were still collectible, it was not outside the term of the conspiracy, and was properly admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(E).

In re High Fructose Corn Syrup Antitrust Litig., 295 F.3d 651 (7th Cir. 2002) : Reversing summary judgment for the defendants in a price-fixing case, the Court noted that assertions of the privilege against self-incrimination by officers of one of the defendants could be used to show that the charged conspiracy involved their employer, but could not be used against the other defendants under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) because when the officers refused to speak the conspiracy was long over, so their "statements" were not during and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

United States v. Sollars, 979 F.2d 1294 (8th Cir. 1992) : Affirming denial of a severance motion in an arson trial, the Court held that statements by the arsonist recounting how his codefendant planned the fire, made to a coconspirator who agreed after the fire to provide the arsonist with an alibi, were made during the concealment phase of the conspiracy and in furtherance of it and would have been admissible in separate trials.

United States v. Silverstein, 737 F.2d 864 (10th Cir. 1984) : Reversing a defendant's conviction for killing a fellow prison inmate, the Court found that a statement one witness attributed to a codefendant was made after any conspiracy to commit murder ended and during a stage in which the defendants attempted to conceal guilt, so it could not have properly been admitted as a conspirator statement.

United States v. Magluta, 418 F.3d 1166 (11th Cir. 2005) : The defendant had been acquitted of criminal charges, but more than two years later an undercover investigator was sent to talk to a juror who was suspected of having received a bribe from the defendant. The investigator posed as an associate of the defendant who was instructing the juror to keep quiet about the money he had received at the time of the acquittal. The juror admitted receiving the bribe and promised to keep quiet about it. At the defendant's trial for obstruction of justice by juror bribery, the juror's statement was admitted under the coconspirator exemption, but the Court held this was error and reversed the conviction. The statement was not made during the course of the conspiracy because any conspiracy between the defendant and the juror ended when the juror was paid and the defendant was acquitted. In United States v. Carter, n169 the Court affirmed RICO conspiracy and other drug-related convictions, finding that statements were made during a conspiracy where the conspiracy included as an objective the obstruction of justice.

[v] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- During the Conspiracy -- Statements Before Defendant Joined

United States v. Flemmi, 402 F.3d 79 (1st Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed the convictions of a retired Boston police officer arising from his assistance in hiding weapons and impeding an investigation of a criminal enterprise in which his brother was a controlling member. It held that coconspirator statements were properly admitted against the defendant even if they were made before he became a conspirator. In United States v. Saccoccia, 58 F.3d 754 (1st Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed convictions arising out of laundering of drug money, holding that a defendant, who joined a conspiracy after statements were made, had "effectively adopted" those statements. See also United States v. Goldberg, 105 F.3d 770 (1st Cir. 1997) (questioning the policy, but indicating the panel was neither free nor inclined to depart from Saccoccia, which follows most Circuits). In United States v. Masse, n170 the Court affirmed a cocaine distribution conviction, holding that a statement made by a coconspirator was admissible against a defendant-conspirator even if the statement was made before the defendant joined the conspiracy.

United States v. Badalamenti, 794 F.2d 821 (2d Cir. 1986) : The Court held that statements of a defendant's coconspirators were admissible even if made before he joined the conspiracy, where the defendant was aware of what his conspirators had been doing and saying on behalf of the enterprise.

United States v. Jackson, 757 F.2d 1486 (4th Cir. 1985) : The Court held that statements made during and in furtherance of the conspiracy are admissible against a defendant even though he joins the conspiracy after they are made.

United States v. Rocha, 916 F.2d 219 (5th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed convictions for kidnapping, extortion, and conspiracy, holding that statements made before a defendant joined the conspiracy were properly admitted, as there was evidence of his subsequent knowledge and willingness to participate in the conspiracy.

United States v. Robinson, 390 F.3d 853 (6th Cir. 2004) : Affirming drug and firearm convictions, the Court held that coconspirator statements made before the defendant entered the conspiracy were properly admitted against him, and reiterated its statement in United States v. Gravier, 706 F.2d 174 (6th Cir. 1983) , that "[i]t has long been established that a conspirator may join a conspiracy already in progress and be held responsible for actions done in furtherance of the conspiracy before he joined."

United States v. Handlin, 366 F.3d 584 (7th Cir. 2004) : The Court held in an arson conspiracy prosecution that it was irrelevant whether coconspirator statements were made before the defendant joined the conspiracy, "so long as he joined it at some point." Since there was no argument that the defendant was not part of the conspiracy at some point and the Court found there was a single overarching conspiracy rather than multiple conspiracies, the statements were admissible under the coconspirator exception. In United States v. Sophie, 900 F.2d 1064 (7th Cir. 1990) , the Court held that a statement about a defendant made in furtherance of a conspiracy he only later joined was properly admitted against him. See also United States v. Liefer n171(the "defendant and the declarant need not both be members of the conspiracy at the time of the statement, for a defendant who joins a conspiracy after its inception adopts all prior acts and declarations in furtherance of the conspiracy by his fellow co-conspirators").

United States v. Jiminez-Perez, 238 F.3d 970 (8th Cir. 2001) : Affirming drug trafficking convictions, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in the admission of statements made by a coconspirator shortly before he was arrested. Even if the defendants did not join the conspiracy until after the declarant was arrested, there was a conspiracy involving the declarant in existence when he made the statements, it did not fold with his arrest, and that same overall conspiracy was the one joined by the defendants. In United States v. Leroux, n172 the Court affirmed a mail fraud conviction, holding that "statements made by co-conspirators before a defendant joins the conspiracy are admissible as long as the conspiracy or scheme existed at the time the statements were made."

United States v. Segura-Gallegos, 41 F.3d 1266 (9th Cir. 1994) : Affirming narcotics convictions, the Court held that statements by the defendant's coconspirators were properly admitted against him, even if the statements were made before the defendant joined the conspiracy. It noted that statements made prior to the defendant's joining the conspiracy would not be admissible to show his participation, but in this case the statements did not refer to the defendant and were offered to show the preparations that were taken before a narcotics transaction. In United States v. Mkhsian, 5 F.3d 1306 (9th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed convictions for a cocaine distribution conspiracy, holding there was no error in admitting statements by codefendants before one defendant entered the conspiracy, as one who joins an ongoing conspiracy is deemed to have adopted the prior acts and declarations of conspirators after the formation and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

United States v. Brown, 943 F.2d 1246 (10th Cir. 1991) : Adopting the "prevailing view among the Circuits," the Court held in a bankruptcy fraud prosecution that previous statements made by coconspirators were admissible against the defendant who subsequently joined the conspiracy.

United States v. Tombrello, 666 F.2d 485 (11th Cir. 1982) : The Court held that statements by one conspirator made during and in furtherance of a conspiracy may be admitted against members of the conspiracy who joined after the statements were made.

[vi] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- During the Conspiracy -- Statements Before Proceeds Divided

United States v. Mojica-Baez, 229 F.3d 292 (1st Cir. 2000) : Reviewing bank robbery convictions, the Court found no error in the admission of hearsay statements by one of the conspirators made shortly after the robbery occurred but before the money had been divided up. It rejected the argument that the statements were made after the conspiracy ended, noting that "[t]here is a distinction, for purposes of the co-conspirator statement exception to the hearsay rule, between an initial conspiracy to commit a crime and later actions to conceal the crime." Under First Circuit precedent, a bank robbery conspiracy includes the division and the hiding of the money. In United States v. Ibern-Maldonado, n173 the Court held that a statement made at the time a pilot was being paid for transporting marijuana was admissible, since the conspiracy continued until the proceeds were divided.

United States v. Knuckles, 581 F.2d 305 (2d Cir. 1978) : The Court, affirming narcotics convictions, said that "it is fair to say that where a general objective of the conspirators is money, the conspiracy does not end, of necessity, before the spoils are divided among the miscreants."

United States v. Emuegbunam, 268 F.3d 377 (6th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a conviction for conspiring to import heroin, the Court upheld the admission of a tape-recorded conversation between a former coconspirator who was cooperating with the government and the defendant's brother, who was also a coconspirator. Although the former coconspirator was cooperating, the Court reasoned that the conspiracy continued until the former coconspirator's suppliers received full payment for the heroin. In United States v. Howard, n174 the Court affirmed convictions arising out of an arson-insurance mail fraud scheme, concluding that conspirator statements uttered before the conspirators had collected the insurance proceeds and aimed at avoiding detection of the conspiracy were made during the life of the conspiracy.

United States v. Xheka, 704 F.2d 974 (7th Cir. 1983) : The Court found that conspirator statements were properly admitted, since the conspiracy was to burn down a building in order to collect insurance, and at the time the statements were made, the insurance had not yet been paid. Accord United States v. Zabic, 745 F.2d 464 (7th Cir. 1984) ; see also United States v. Doyle n175(an arson conspiracy involved not only bombing of a building but also payment to the arsonist; statements made prior to the payment were admissible).

[vii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- During the Conspiracy -- Statements Outside Charged Period

United States v. Piper, 298 F.3d 47 (1st Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed cocaine-related convictions, holding that a coconspirator's statements made two days after the last of three drug sales occurred were properly admitted. The Court observed that mere cessation of activity does not constitute withdrawal from a conspiracy, and that when a conspiracy "contemplates a continuity of purpose and a continued performance of acts, it is presumed to exist until there has been an affirmative showing that it has terminated." Here, the charged conspiracy included three separate drug sales spanning a 13-day period. In United States v. Munson, n176 the Court held that testimony that an admitted coconspirator said, while selling cocaine to the witness, that the defendant was his supplier was admissible under the coconspirator rule even though the sale took place outside the period of the conspiracy charged in the indictment. As long as another conspiracy existed, any statement in furtherance thereof satisfied the Rule and was admissible.

United States v. Castleberry, 116 F.3d 1384 (11th Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed Hobbs Act convictions for conspiring with a prosecutor to fix DUI cases. It held that entries from the prosecutor's pocket calendar were properly admitted as conspirator's statements even though they were made in mid-1987 and the indictment charged that the conspiracy began on a date unknown but which was before the first day of 1988. The Court concluded that the entries were reasonably close to the dates alleged in the indictment and satisfied the "during the course" requirement.

[l] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Existence of Conspiracy

United States v. Gigante, 166 F.3d 75 (2d Cir. 1999) : In a RICO prosecution of the boss of a Mafia family, the Judge admitted some conspirator statements solely on the finding of a "general overriding conspiracy among all of these alleged Mafia groups." The Court held this was error, as there must be a conspiracy with some specific criminal goal, but the error was harmless because some of the statements were made in furtherance of specific conspiratorial goals, some would have been properly admissible as declarations against interest or under the state of mind exception, and the remainder were not prejudicial in the circumstances.

United States v. Cruz, 910 F.2d 1072 (3d Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed convictions of a cocaine distribution conspiracy, holding that actions of defendants sufficiently established the existence of a conspiracy as to admit statements by an unidentified coconspirator.

United States v. Neal, 78 F.3d 901 (4th Cir. 1996) : In a drug prosecution, the government introduced an alleged coconspirator's statements to an undercover buyer that the defendant had ordered a moratorium on drug sales due to police surveillance. The Court found three pieces of evidence that, together with the hearsay statements themselves, established a conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence: corroboration that the coconspirators had become aware of police surveillance; the defendant's own statement to the undercover agent that the declarant would not be able to sell him any drugs; and a sheet of paper found in the defendant's apartment with the declarant's name and telephone number on it.

United States v. Mahkimetas, 991 F.2d 379 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed a conviction for cocaine distribution, finding error (but harmless) in the admission of a statement by the defendant's mother to an undercover officer, since no conspiracy existed at the time the mother made the statement to the undercover officer. Once the defendant agreed to participate, a conspiracy existed and additional statements by the mother qualified as coconspirator statements. The Court observed that a conspiracy may not be formed solely between a criminally-motivated person and a government agent or informer, although the fact that one party to a conversation is a government agent does not preclude admission if the declarant is shown to be a member of a conspiracy with others.

United States v. Whalen, 844 F.2d 529 (8th Cir. 1988) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit a statement by a murder defendant's mother that she wiped a knife clean. The fact that the mother might have told the defendant not to speak to police was insufficient to establish a conspiracy between mother and son.

United States v. LaHue, 254 F.3d 900 (10th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed convictions for violating the Medicare Antikickback Act, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting numerous statements as coconspirator admissions. The Court noted that there is no requirement that the common plan required as part of the foundation be for an unlawful purpose. In United States v. Mobile Materials, Inc., n177 the prosecution of a highway construction bid-rigging conspiracy, the Court held that evidence of bid-rigging on projects other than those charged in the indictment could be introduced to show the existence of a conspiracy involving the defendant and the declarant in which admissible coconspirator's statements were made. In United States v. Bucaro, n178 the Court held that the government need not prove that a combination between the defendant and others was for unlawful purposes, since evidence that there was a conspiracy to accomplish any goal sufficed.

[m] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Foundation

See also annotations in § 801.03[10][r], "Order of Presentation."

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Conditional Admission of Statement

United States v. Freeman, 208 F.3d 332 (1st Cir. 2000) : The first witness in the trial of a police officer on charges of witness tampering and conspiring to take bribes from the owner of a striptease club testified that her employer, the club owner, had told her that he provided free drinks to police officers to avoid "beefs" with them and that he was to call city, not state, police in the event of a licensing violation committed on the premises. The testimony was admitted provisionally under the coconspirator exemption. Subsequently, the owner testified that he provided benefits to the defendant because of fear, not any willing agreement between the two. Toward the end of the government's case-in-chief, the Judge concluded there was insufficient evidence of a conspiracy to admit the coconspirator statements, the evidence was stricken, and the jury were instructed to disregard it. Affirming the defendant's conviction of witness tampering (the jury acquitted him of the conspiracy charge), the Court held that striking the evidence and issuing the curative instruction were sufficient to avoid any prejudice caused by provisional admission of the hearsay, especially since it was only a brief part of a seven-day trial and had scant relevance on the charges of which the defendant was convicted.

United States v. McDougal, 137 F.3d 547 (8th Cir. 1998) : In a trial for fraud in connection with a Small Business Administration loan, coconspirator statements were admitted conditionally during the government's case-in-chief, but the conspiracy count was dismissed at the end of the government's evidence. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in denying a mistrial motion, since the testimony was not prejudicial to the defendant. Furthermore, there was no error in failing to give cautionary instructions regarding the statements, since the general instruction tendered by the defense was too vague and counsel did not identify specific testimony as to which cautionary instructions were requested.

United States v. Hasner, 340 F.3d 1261 (11th Cir. 2003) (per curiam): The Court affirmed mail fraud convictions, finding no error when coconspirator statements were provisionally admitted subject to the government connecting them up with sufficient foundation evidence. The Court noted that, contrary to the defendants' assertions, the 1997 amendment to Rule 801(d)(2)(E) did not change the practice permitting admission subject to connection, but only codified three issues relating to foundation evidence that were raised by Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) .

[ii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Foundation -- Hearings

United States v. Medina, 761 F.2d 12 (1st Cir. 1985) : The Court declined to require a pretrial hearing to resolve objections to conspirator statements.

United States v. Williams, 264 F.3d 561 (5th Cir. 2001) : Affirming the conviction of a former city councilman for conspiracy to commit extortion and solicitation of bribes, the Court rejected the defendant's claim that the Trial Judge erred in failing to conduct a hearing and failing to make a finding on the record regarding coconspirator statements.

Since this was a retrial before the same Judge on the same charges, the Trial Court was well within its discretion in finding without a hearing that the requirements of Rule 801(d)(2)(E) were satisfied. In United States v. Nichols, n179 the Court affirmed convictions for mail fraud and conspiracy, finding no error in the Trial Judge's having a "proffer hearing" rather than an evidentiary hearing in order to make a preliminary decision on the admissibility of statements. Most importantly, the Court said that if the defendant wanted the Judge to reconsider his ruling after hearing defense evidence, he must ask the Judge to do so.

United States v. Hoover, 246 F.3d 1054 (7th Cir. 2001) : Affirming CCE and drug convictions, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly admitted coconspirator statements, even though the Judge failed to hold an evidentiary hearing. Although a hearing is one way to go about the task of determining the foundation, it is not the only or even the best way in all cases; a Judge may act on the basis of a pretrial evidentiary proffer or evidence introduced in the early stages of trial. In United States v. Vargas, 16 F.3d 155 (7th Cir. 1994) , the Court held that although preliminary proof on the admissibility of a coconspirator statement is desirable, there was no abuse of discretion in adducing such proof in the form of a written proffer rather than a full-blown pretrial hearing.

United States v. Owens, 70 F.3d 1118 (10th Cir. 1995) : Without broadly and unequivocally endorsing the summary procedures used in this drug conspiracy case, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting coconspirator statements after a hearing at which only an FBI agent testified to information coconspirators provided after entering into plea agreements. In United States v. Roberts, 14 F.3d 502 (10th Cir. 1993) , the Court indicated it was reluctant to approve substitution of a written proffer for a pretrial hearing on admissibility or provisional admission subject to being connected up, because the hearing or provisional admission provides the Judge with more options, e.g., judging the conversation in context and identifying the speaker. Nevertheless, there was no abuse of discretion in ordering a written proffer in a complex drug case, where a hearing was potentially unwieldy and the Judge invited the parties to press continuing objections and made contemporaneous rulings and gave limiting instructions during trial. See also United States v. McMurry n180(finding no error in failing to hold a pretrial hearing, where the Judge made the requisite factual determinations before admitting the statements).

United States v. Allison, 908 F.2d 1531 (11th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed convictions of a cocaine distribution conspiracy, holding that a defendant was not entitled to a hearing on admissibility before a coconspirator's statement was admitted, where the government made its offer of proof and the Trial Judge made a preliminary determination to admit the statements based on the offer, subject to the government's ability to prove the defendant's participation in the conspiracy. In United States v. Roe, n181 the Court affirmed convictions arising out of a fraudulent investment scheme, stating that a hearing on the admissibility of conspirator statements is significantly preferable to admission of statements subject to establishing a foundation by the end of trial. It held, however, that the Judge is not required to make an express declaration that such a hearing is impractical before conditionally admitting conspirator statements. In United States v. Hewes, n182 the Court emphasized that a pretrial hearing is not always the best way to deal with conspirator statements, approving the conditional admission of statements followed by a proper ruling under the preponderance standard. The Court noted that the Trial Judge had required the government to submit a summary of its nonhearsay evidence in connection with its ruling.

[iii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Foundation -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. McCarthy, 961 F.2d 972 (1st Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug offenses, holding there was no clear error in admitting coconspirator statements conditionally, where previous trials of alleged coconspirators indicated it was likely that the foundation would be established. At the close of evidence, the Trial Judge reviewed only the evidence adduced at the defendant's trial and found that the prosecution had met its burden of showing the existence of the conspiracy and the participation of the declarant and the defendant therein. In a mail fraud case, United States v. Silvano, n183 the Court found sufficient evidence of conspiracy to warrant introduction of conspirator statements. It reasoned that a Trial Judge may consider evidence relating to events subsequent to a declaration in deciding whether sufficient evidence of conspiracy exists.

Precision Piping & Instruments, Inc. v. E.I. Du Pont de Nemours & Co., 951 F.2d 613 (4th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a judgment on a directed verdict for the defendants in an antitrust action, holding there was no error in excluding statements offered under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) because the preliminary showing of a conspiracy was insufficient. In making that determination, the Trial Judge acted properly in weighing the credibility and reliability of evidence, including hearsay statements.

United States v. Wood, 851 F.2d 185 (8th Cir. 1988) : The Court reaffirmed the basic approach to conspirator statements that it had adopted in United States v. Bell, 573 F.2d 1040 (8th Cir. 1978) , and held that a pretrial hearing on the admissibility of statements is not required. The Trial Judge may admit the statements subject to connection, but the government is on notice that at the conclusion of all the evidence the Court will make an explicit determination on the record of whether in its view the government has proved a conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence. If the Trial Judge determines that the government has failed to carry its burden, the Court will declare a mistrial unless an instruction to the jury to disregard the evidence would suffice to cure any prejudice.

United States v. Smith, 893 F.2d 1573 (9th Cir. 1990) : The Court held that a calendar/drug ledger kept by a deceased conspirator was properly admitted in the trial of a drug conspiracy where the government provided independent evidence of the deceased conspirator's financial and cocaine transactions with other conspirators, proof that the ledger recorded many of those transactions, and proof that the ledger was kept and the entries made while the conspirator was engaged in the purchase and distribution of cocaine. Thus, there was sufficient evidence that the ledger was authored by the deceased conspirator to be admissible against other conspirators.

[iv] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Foundation -- Requirement of Record

United States v. Continental Group, Inc., 603 F.2d 444 (3d Cir. 1979) : The Court stated that Judges have discretion to admit the coconspirator hearsay statements "subject to later connection," provided they do so with care. It also said that the Trial Court should make an explicit statement (not to the jury, but for the record) that it has found a conspiracy to exist by a preponderance of the independent evidence. However, in United States v. Ammar, 714 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1983) , the Court declined to reverse where no explicit statement was made.

United States v. Jensen, 41 F.3d 946 (5th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed convictions stemming from a fraudulent scheme which led to a failure of certain savings and loan institutions, holding that coconspirator hearsay statements were properly admitted even though the Trial Judge never made explicit findings concerning their admissibility. The Court held that the failure to make findings was harmless, because the Judge had denied the defendant's motion for a directed verdict, and this was an implicit finding of evidence of conspiracy sufficient to meet the requirement of Rule 801(d)(2)(E). In United States v. Fragoso, 978 F.2d 896 (5th Cir. 1992) , although no findings as to the predicate facts were ever made when coconspirator statements were admitted in a cocaine conspiracy trial, the Court held the error was harmless. Under Bourjaily there is a procedural duty upon appropriate motion to make the findings at some time; whether express findings should precede admission of the statements is committed to the Trial Court's broad discretion.

United States v. Smith, 320 F.3d 647 (6th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed convictions for offenses arising from an extortion scheme against banks, and held that there was no abuse of discretion in the admission of coconspirator statements. The Trial Judge made only a conclusory statement that "the government has put in sufficient facts from which a reasonable juror could determine that the alleged conspiracy did in fact exist," but the Court found sufficient evidence in the record supporting admission. In United States v. Kone, 307 F.3d 430 (6th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed convictions involving violations of the immigration laws. Regarding the admission of many statements offered under Rule 801(d)(2)(E), it observed that "[r]egrettably, the district court did not make specific findings to support how, in its view, the government had met is burden as to each of the Rule 801(d)(2)(E) elements with respect to each of the contested statements," and opined that "[i]n fact, most, if not all of the challenged statements are made by non-conspiratorial declarants and are, consequently, clearly inadmissible under 801(d)(2)(E)." However, the abuse of discretion in admitting the statements was harmless error. In United States v. Curro, n184 the Court concluded that a Trial Judge is not obligated to state reasons supporting a finding that the conspirator exemption is satisfied, but added that "[o]n more complex rulings, some explanation undoubtedly would be helpful even if not required." It also cautioned that "a mere conclusory statement will not always suffice."

United States v. Perez, 989 F.2d 1574 (10th Cir. 1993) (en banc): This case, in which the Court required Trial Judges to make record findings for statements offered under Rule 801(d)(2)(E), is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 801.02[6][g][ii][D]. See also United States v. Rascon, 8 F.3d 1537 (10th Cir. 1993) (reversing and remanding because an abuse of discretion was not harmless when statements were admitted without the requisite findings on the record that they were in furtherance and that the declarant was a member); United States v. Powell, 973 F.2d 885 (10th Cir. 1992) (in bench trials, explicit findings are required only when the defendant makes a specific request). In United States v. Gary, 999 F.2d 474 (10th Cir. 1993) , the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit coconspirator statements in a cocaine distribution case without making the required findings on the record, where the declarant testified at trial and was subject to cross-examination.

United States v. Fernandez, 797 F.2d 943 (11th Cir. 1986) : The Court observed that a Trial Judge's failure to make a specific determination that the foundation for conspirator statements was satisfied may be harmless error where the record demonstrates the propriety of the admission of evidence.

[v] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Foundation -- Rulings

United States v. Murphy, 193 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1999) : In a prosecution for extortion arising from a scheme involving falsified warrant applications, the Trial Judge told counsel prior to jury deliberations that the findings on admissibility of coconspirator statements would be made after the verdict. Although noting that it "is surely the better practice (absent very unusual circumstances)" to make the explicit findings before the case goes to the jury, the Court found no error in postponing the ruling, since counsel in any doubt as to the evidence properly subject to closing argument and jury consideration should ask for a ruling. In a prosecution for conspiring to sell stolen property, United States v. Richardson, 14 F.3d 666 (1st Cir. 1994) , the Trial Judge admitted coconspirator statements conditionally, with a final determination to be made at the end of the government's case. Affirming, the Court noted that the Circuit rule requires the determination to be made at the close of all the evidence, but that the defendant had waived the error by failing to object. In United States v. Cranston, n185 the Court found that although the Trial Judge erred in ruling on the admissibility of conspirator statements on the second day of trial rather than at the end of the case, there was sufficient evidence to support the ruling.

United States v. DeRoche, 726 F.2d 1025 (5th Cir. 1984) : Prior to trial on charges of possession and sale of stolen property and conspiracy, the defendant asked the Trial Judge to hold a hearing on the admissibility of conspirator statements. No hearing was held, and twice during the trial the government asked the Judge to rule that sufficient evidence of conspiracy had been adduced to satisfy the Rule. On both occasions, the Judge indicated that he did not believe that the government had met its burden and told the jury to consider the statement only against the person who made it. But, at the close of evidence, the Judge submitted the case to the jury without any limiting instruction. The Court observed that defense counsel should have asked the Judge to rule on admissibility at the close of the evidence, but found that, in light of the Judge's statements in response to the government requests for a ruling, it was impossible to tell whether the Judge had found the conspirator statements to be admissible after all the evidence was in. It reversed the conviction and remanded the case for a new trial.

United States v. Castro, 908 F.2d 85 (6th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed convictions for narcotics offenses but ordered a limited remand, holding it was error for the Trial Judge, having admitted coconspirators' statements subject to a later demonstration of their admissibility, to neglect to make the required foundation findings at the end of the trial. In a prosecution for making and presenting false tax refund checks, United States v. Holloway, n186 the Court observed that when conspirator statements are offered, a Trial Judge has several options: hold a mini-hearing for purposes of making a finding on the admissibility question; require the government to produce its independent evidence before ruling on the admissibility of the challenged statements; or admit the statements subject to a later finding under the preponderance standard. If the third option is followed, "the court should stress to counsel that the statements are admitted subject to defendant's continuing objection" and that the prosecutor will have to show the foundation facts by a preponderance of the evidence. "At the conclusion of the government's case-in-chief, the court should rule on the defendant's hearsay objection." Since the Judge failed to make a ruling on the admissibility question, the Court remanded for a finding.

United States v. Roulette, 75 F.3d 418 (8th Cir. 1996) : Affirming cocaine-related convictions, the Court held that, although the Trial Judge failed to make a finding on the elements of the coconspirator exception after conditionally admitting coconspirator hearsay statements, the defendant was not prejudiced.

[n] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Independent Evidence of Foundation

Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) : The Supreme Court held that the preponderance of the evidence standard governs preliminary factfinding under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). It also held that Rules 104(a) and 1101(d)(1) demonstrate a plain congressional intent to permit Courts to consider the contents of challenged conspirator statements in making preliminary factual determinations. It left undecided, however, whether a Court may rely solely on conspirator statements to find that Rule 801(d)(2)(E) is satisfied. The 1997 amendment to the Rule makes clear that some independent evidence is required.

United States v. Beckham, 968 F.2d 47 (D.C. Cir. 1992) : When an undercover officer purchased some crack cocaine, the seller said, "I only had one, but you can get another from my buddy"; the defendant immediately got up from his chair, walked over to a stash of crack packaged for distribution, and began to open it. The Court held that the quoted statement was erroneously admitted under the coconspirator exception because there was no independent evidence of a conspiracy, but that the error was harmless because the statement would have been admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(B) because the defendant indicated his endorsement of it.

United States v. Capelton, 350 F.3d 231 (1st Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed cocaine convictions, finding sufficient independent evidence of the existence of a conspiracy to admit statements under the coconspirator exception. In United States v. Sepulveda, 15 F.3d 1161 (1st Cir. 1993) , the Court, reviewing drug trafficking conspiracy convictions, held that admission of two coconspirator's statements without independent evidence was harmless error. In United States v. Tarvers, n187 the Court found sufficient independent evidence of conspiracy, in addition to conspirator statements, to satisfy the Bourjaily standard.

United States v. Padilla, 203 F.3d 156 (2d Cir. 2000) : The Court held there was no clear error in a RICO prosecution when a note from one defendant to a bribed witness was admitted against the other defendant as tending to prove his consciousness of guilt. A reference to the second defendant in the note demonstrated a relationship between the defendants not existing in a vacuum but in the context of what the jury could find was a conspiracy to suborn perjury, and thus was independent evidence sufficient to corroborate the substantial hearsay evidence that the second defendant was a member of the conspiracy to obstruct justice. In United States v. Tellier, 83 F.3d 578 (2d Cir. 1996) , the Court reversed a RICO conviction because the sole evidence for one of the predicate acts (conspiracy to distribute marijuana) was a hearsay statement from the defendant's alleged coconspirator. Though the defendant did not object to the admission of the hearsay at trial, the Court found plain error, because the government proffered no independent evidence of the conspiracy, in violation of the clear rule that some independent evidence is required. See also United States v. Jaramillo-Montoya n188(concluding that the offered statements, considered with independent evidence, were sufficient to establish a conspiracy for purposes of the evidence rule).

United States v. Gambino, 926 F.2d 1355 (3d Cir. 1991) : Affirming convictions for drug offenses, the Court held there was sufficient independent evidence for admission of coconspirator statements.

United States v. McConnell, 988 F.2d 530 (5th Cir. 1993) : Reversing convictions for conspiracy to commit and commission of mail fraud, the Court held that the government had failed to proffer independent evidence providing a proper foundation for alleged conspirator statements. In United States v. Hagmann, 950 F.2d 175 (5th Cir. 1991) , the Court held that a pattern jury instruction, which stated that only the acts and statements of the defendant could be considered in determining whether that defendant had become a member of the conspiracy, no longer accurately stated the law after Bourjaily. See also United States v. Chase n189(the offered statements plus independent evidence laid a proper foundation).

United States v. Clark, 18 F.3d 1337 (6th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed bank robbery convictions, finding sufficient independent evidence to support introduction of coconspirator statements. The Court stated that " '[s]ome' independent evidence is not merely a scintilla, but rather enough to rebut the presumed unreliability of hearsay."

United States v. Petty, 132 F.3d 373 (7th Cir. 1997) : The Court upheld admission of coconspirator statements in a prosecution for aiding and abetting tampering with motor vehicle identification numbers. The defendant correctly asserted that hearsay statements of the conspirators alone cannot establish the existence of the conspiracy, but in this case the hearsay was adequately corroborated by other evidence. In United States v. Martinez de Ortiz, 907 F.2d 629 (7th Cir. 1990) (en banc), the Court relied on Bourjaily's holding that hearsay (including the statement) may be considered in determining the admissibility of coconspirator statements, and on the generally accepted principle that the jury does not reexamine the sufficiency of the foundation for such statements once admitted by the Trial Judge, in holding that a pattern jury instruction, which stated that only the acts and statements of the particular defendant may be considered when determining whether that defendant became a member of the conspiracy, was confusing and unnecessary. Three Judges concurred in affirming the conviction, but dissented on the ground that proof of membership in a conspiracy, just as proof of agency, should not be made only by the acts or declarations of agents; some acknowledging act or declaration by the principal (conspirator) must be shown, a point made by the challenged instruction. In United States v. Potts, n190 the Court applied Bourjaily and found sufficient evidence to support the introduction of conspirator statements in a prosecution for conspiracy to transport and present altered postal money orders. Although most of the statements were made with respect to smuggling drugs into a prison, and the defendant was not charged with this offense, the Court found that the conspiracy charged and the drug conspiracy were coextensive.

United States v. Clay, 16 F.3d 892 (8th Cir. 1994) : The Court held that the defendant's own admissions provided the independent evidence in this case. In United States v. Campbell, n191 the Court found that Bourjaily was satisfied.

United States v. Castaneda, 16 F.3d 1504 (9th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed convictions for money laundering because coconspirator statements had been admitted without sufficient independent evidence that the defendants were members of the conspiracy. In United States v. Torres, 908 F.2d 1417 (9th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed drug conspiracy convictions, noting that a coconspirator's statements may not alone establish the existence of the conspiracy; relevant areas of inquiry on that issue include the nature of the scheme, the identity of the participants, the quality, frequency, and duration of each conspirator's transactions, and the commonality of times and goals. In United States v. Silverman n192(discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 801.02[6][g][ii][C]), the Court held (2-1) that there was insufficient foundational evidence to satisfy Bourjaily.

United States v. Lopez-Gutierrez, 83 F.3d 1235 (10th Cir. 1996) : The Court held that taped conversations of a coconspirator and a putative buyer were properly admitted against the defendant in a drug prosecution. The Trial Court did not rely solely on the coconspirator hearsay itself to determine that the defendant and the declarant were coconspirators; it also relied on a card found in the coconspirator's possession that connected him to the defendant as a drug source, and on taped conversations between the defendant and the declarant. In United States v. Owens, 70 F.3d 1118 (10th Cir. 1995) , a drug conspiracy case, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting coconspirator statements after a hearing at which only an FBI agent testified to information coconspirators provided after entering into plea agreements. The argument that the government was required to corroborate the information with independent evidence was rejected; admissibility requires only information independent of the statements being offered, not independent of the conspirators. In United States v. Smith, n193 the Court held that the admission of tape recordings was proper, since the tapes, when considered together with independent evidence, satisfied the foundation requirement.

United States v. Chestang, 849 F.2d 528 (11th Cir. 1988) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy to possess and to distribute cocaine, the Court held there was sufficient independent evidence, in addition to the statements, to support the finding by a preponderance.

[o] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Informants' Statements

United States v. Rogers, 118 F.3d 466 (6th Cir. 1997) : Reviewing convictions for extortion and false statement in an official corruption case, the Court held that statements by a former conspirator who was cooperating with the government were not admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(E), but could be heard by the jury to put another conspirator's statements into context.

United States v. Darden, 70 F.3d 1507 (8th Cir. 1995) : On appeal of racketeering convictions for drug trafficking, the Court concluded that statements by a government informant could not qualify as coconspirator statements when they were made after the informant agreed to cooperate with the government. Such statements were neither made nor intended to be made to further conspiratorial goals. Admission of the statements was harmless error, however.

[ii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required

[A] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Efforts To Conceal

United States v. Fahey, 769 F.2d 829 (1st Cir. 1985) : The Court held that a statement by a conspirator that was made to mislead an FBI agent was in furtherance of the conspiracy.

United States v. Mendoza-Medina, 346 F.3d 121 (5th Cir. 2003) : The defendant truck driver, charged with possession of marijuana with intent to distribute, claimed that it was his first time smuggling drugs for his employer, Ramirez, who had a history of narcotics trafficking. At trial, a DEA agent testified that agents seized $368,000 in cash from Ramirez after a trip hauling freight that he and the defendant had made two months before the charged incident. The agent opined that the money was drug related and reported Ramirez's statements to him that, when they arrived at the end of the trip, he got out of the cab to open the gate while defendant parked the truck and unhitched the trailer. Ramirez claimed that he found the money in boxes by the road, that he took the boxes and left in his car, and that defendant was not aware that he had found the cash. The agent also opined that Remirez had lied about finding the cash. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting this testimony, since there was sufficient evidence that the defendant and Ramirez were engaged in a conspiracy, and that the statements to the agent were made in furtherance of the conspiracy, since they were likely made to conceal the source of the cash and ensure that the conspiracy could continue. In United States v. Phillips, 219 F.3d 404 (5th Cir. 2000) , the defendant was a tax assessor who was charged with putting people on the public payroll even though they did no work. The daughter of one of these "ghost" employees testified at trial that her mother told her all about the scam after the daughter expressed her suspicions. Upholding admission of the mother's statements under the coconspirator exemption, the Court found they were in furtherance of the conspiracy. It reasoned that the mother confessed to her daughter "in an effort to exact sympathy so that the scheme could remain a secret." In the course of affirming drug trafficking convictions in United States v. Broussard, n194 the Court held that conversations in which one conspirator told another to use a safe phone indicated a desire to have the conspiracy concealed from DEA agents, and that such statements are in furtherance of conspiracy. In United States v. Triplett, n195 the Court affirmed an arson conviction, holding that a coconspirator's threats to a witness, made in jail after the declarant's arrest, were in furtherance of avoiding punishment.

United States v. Franklin, 415 F.3d 537 (6th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed bank robbery convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of statements by one defendant to a witness that implicated another defendant. It concluded that the statements were made in furtherance of the conspiracy, because "[s]tatements that are designed to facilitate the concealment of a conspiracy's criminal accomplishments are admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(E)."

United States v. Skidmore, 254 F.3d 635 (7th Cir. 2001) : The defendant's wife explained to a gun shop secretary, with whom they had become friendly, that she rather than her husband always completed the paperwork when purchasing firearms at the shop because he was a convicted felon. Affirming his conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the secretary's testimony regarding this explanation, as it was a coconspirator statement under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). The fact that the wife was never observed paying in connection with these gun purchases tended to show that she was conspiring with her husband to act as a straw purchaser, and her decision to reveal the actual reason she repeatedly designated herself as purchaser "can be characterized as an expression of trust as well as an attempt to secure the confidence of her friend, thereby preventing further detection of what she and her husband were doing." In United States v. DiDomenico, n196 The Court affirmed convictions for RICO and predicate acts of murder, extortion, etc., and held there was no error in admitting statements by a conspirator regarding a murder five years earlier, since the conspiracy was still going on when the declarant, in an effort to prevent its unraveling, made his reassuring statements. In United States v. Troop, n197 the Court held that a coconspirator's statement expressing concern that a participating informant was in law enforcement was in furtherance of the conspiracy because avoiding detection by law enforcement officials furthers the aims of the conspiracy.

United States v. Manfre, 368 F.3d 832 (8th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for an arson conspiracy, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by the brother of a conspirator that when the conspirator received telephone calls from the defendant, he would take the phone to another room and refuse to divulge the contents of the conversation despite the witness' suspicions. The Court held that "[a] statement of a conspirator which conceals the conspiracy without revealing any of the conspirators' illegal objectives from one who appears suspicious is in furtherance of the conspiracy." In United States v. Alcantar, 271 F.3d 731 (8th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed convictions for conspiring to distribute methamphetamine, holding that a secret tape recording of a conversation between two conspirators while seated in the back seat of a patrol car, in which they expressed concern that police might find drugs in their pickup and agreed to "stick to" their concocted story, was admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(E), as it was in furtherance of the conspiracy. In United States v. Mayberry, n198 the Court affirmed a conviction for maliciously damaging a building, holding that a coconspirator's statement to a person outside the conspiracy could be in furtherance of the conspiracy because it could be construed as seeking assistance or cooperation in avoiding detection by law enforcement authorities. In United States v. Garcia, n199 the Court affirmed a conviction of conspiracy to import counterfeit money, holding that a coconspirator's statements were properly admitted in furtherance of the conspiracy when made, in one case, to delay or prevent the arrest of a conspirator and, in another, to enlist a family member's assistance by revealing to him the conspiracy.

[B] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required -- Information to Conspirators

United States v. Tarantino, 846 F.2d 1384 (D.C. Cir. 1988) : Affirming drug conspiracy convictions, the Court held that statements by one conspirator to another that provided key information to enable the other conspirator to carry out his duties were in furtherance of the conspiracy, and were not mere narrations of past acts.

United States v. Martinez-Medina, 279 F.3d 105 (1st Cir. 2002) : Affirming narcotics convictions, the Court rejected arguments that some statements among conspirators were improperly admitted because they were not in furtherance of the conspiracy. The statements conveyed information to fellow conspirators about the operations of the drug conspiracy or discussed strategies for dealing with the threat posed by rivals to the drug conspiracy.

United States v. Russo, 302 F.3d 37 (2d Cir. 2002) : The Court upheld obstruction of justice convictions that arose from efforts by the defendants, after the trial of an organized crime case in which Russo's son was a defendant, to contact a juror in violation of a court order and to hide a witness subpoenaed by a grand jury. The Court held that declarations by nondefendant members of the Colombo crime family were admissible as coconspirator statements. Distinguishing United States v. Gigante, 166 F.3d 75 (2d Cir. 1999) , the Court explained that it held in Gigante that statements of individuals made in furtherance of a plan to kill a particular person should not have been admitted against a defendant who was not part of that plan because the murder plan was not an objective of the conspiracy which the defendant joined. Here, by contrast, the defendant and the declarant were in a conspiracy to maintain an organized crime syndicate and the declarant's statements furthered maintenance of the syndicate by giving associated persons information about its membership. In a RICO prosecution, United States v. Diaz, 176 F.3d 52 (2d Cir. 1999) , the defendant argued that statements about a double murder made by one of the defendant's coconspirators to another were not "in furtherance" of the RICO conspiracy, but were merely "idle chatter," since the murder had been completed and the conspirator was simply relating historical facts. The Court found no error in admission of the statements, because they "clearly promoted the goals" of the conspiracy, by apprising another member of its progress, assisting the declarant in getting away, and "foster[ing] the cohesiveness of the conspiracy." See also United States v. Paone n200(the "in furtherance" requirement is met when a conspirator is apprised of the progress of the conspiracy, or when the statements are designed to induce his assistance).

United States v. Patton, 594 F.2d 444 (5th Cir. 1979) : The Court said, affirming a drug conspiracy conviction, that "although the phrase 'in furtherance of the conspiracy' has a talismanic ring to it, the phrase must not be applied too strictly or the purpose of the exception would be defeated." It approved the introduction of statements "made by one conspirator to a fellow conspirator identifying yet another conspirator [the defendant] as the ultimate purchaser of the marijuana."

United States v. Salgado, 250 F.3d 438 (6th Cir. 2001) : In the prosecution of a drug conspiracy, the Court found no error in the admission a hearsay statement between two conspirators, indicating that one of the defendants was driving cocaine up from Florida. The conversation identifying one of the defendants as the transporter of drugs was more than mere "idle chatter"; it was designed to inform coconspirators that a substitute driver had been found for the person who ordinarily transported the drugs, and that a new supply of drugs would soon be delivered. Affirming convictions for conspiring to possess more than 1,000 pounds of marijuana with intent to distribute in United States v. Hitow, n201 the Court held that one conspirator's statement to a second that the defendant had obtained 1,800 pounds of marijuana was properly admitted as in furtherance of the conspiracy because it told the second conspirator, who was high up in the distribution chain, who was purchasing marijuana and in what quantities, thus informing him of the activity and status of the conspiracy.

United States v. Johnson, 200 F.3d 529 (7th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a conviction for conspiring to distribute cocaine, the Court found no error in the admission of one coconspirator's statement to another that the defendant had been allocated a particular territory for distribution, since it furthered the conspiracy by conveying to the hearer the breadth of the conspiracy, its geographical divisions, and his role with respect to those divisions, thereby precluding internecine competition and allowing the conspiracy to allocate its resources more efficiently and minimize waste. In United States v. Herrero, 893 F.2d 1512 (7th Cir. 1990) , the Court held that statements keeping the recipient abreast of and knowledgeable about the conspiracy were properly admitted in the trial of a cocaine conspiracy prosecution.

United States v. Jordan, 260 F.3d 930 (8th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine, holding that statements made to criminal participants to keep them abreast of events were in furtherance of conspiracy. In United States v. Jefferson, 215 F.3d 820 (8th Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed gang-related convictions involving murder and drug trafficking, holding that statements made by one conspirator to another were in furtherance of conspiracy where the declarant was reporting a botched murder attempt to keep the other conspirators abreast of developments.

United States v. Bowman, 215 F.3d 951 (9th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed bank robbery convictions, finding no error in the admission of statements the defendant's partner made to the partner's girlfriend, which explained that the partner had sent a key to a storage locker to another conspirator and that the locker contained incriminating evidence. These statements were in furtherance of the conspiracy, since they were made to keep the conspiring girlfriend "up to speed" about the conspirators' efforts. In United States v. Zavala-Serra, n202 the Court noted that in deciding whether a statement was in furtherance of conspiracy, the Court looks to the intent of the declarant, not to the actual effects of the statement. Thus, statements intending to apprise another conspirator of ongoing developments are in furtherance of the conspiracy.

United States v. Harris, 908 F.2d 728 (11th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed cocaine importation conspiracy convictions, holding that "reminiscence" or "retrospective" statements that provided information keeping coconspirators abreast of the conspiracy's current status were properly admitted as in furtherance of the conspiracy.

[C] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Kaplan, 832 F.2d 676 (1st Cir. 1987) : The Court held that hearsay statements could be admitted as having been made in furtherance of a conspiracy even if the defendant was unaware of some of the acts related in the statements.

United States v. Cruz, 797 F.2d 90 (2d Cir. 1986) : The Court found that statements by one narcotics seller to an undercover officer were in furtherance of a conspiracy even though another defendant had given an instruction that no narcotics should be sold to the officer. See also United States v. Persico n203(conspirator statements that informed witnesses of the status of the conspiracy were in furtherance thereof).

United States v. Pecora, 798 F.2d 614 (3d Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed racketeering convictions, finding that statements about past acts of the conspiracy made in a conversation with an informant were properly admitted, since the discussion of past events was an integral part of an ongoing business. In United States v. Jannotti, n204 the Court affirmed RICO and Hobbs Act convictions, finding that many conspirator statements were properly admitted, but also finding that portions of videotapes of two meetings contained discussions that were not in furtherance of the conspiracies charged.

United States v. Johnson, 872 F.2d 612 (5th Cir. 1989) : The Court took a broad view of the "in furtherance" language and held that boasts by one conspirator may be in furtherance of the conspiracy.

United States v. Hamilton, 689 F.2d 1262 (6th Cir. 1982) : In the course of affirming convictions for conspiracy to deal in explosives, the Court upheld the admission of conspirator statements. It emphasized that the statements need not actually have furthered the conspiracy; it is sufficient that they were intended to promote the conspiratorial activities.

United States v. Godinez, 110 F.3d 448 (7th Cir. 1997) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court upheld the admission of a statement from one of the coconspirators to a prospective member of the conspiracy that described the structure of the conspiracy and named the defendant as a member. The Court noted that "[s]tatements that further the conspiracy can take many forms, including statements made to recruit potential coconspirators." Here, the declarant's statements "showed a level of trust" in the prospective member that might have helped recruit him into the conspiracy. In United States v. Powers, 75 F.3d 335 (7th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed a cocaine conspiracy conviction, holding that a statement may be in furtherance of a conspiracy even if it was not made exclusively, or even primarily, to further the conspiracy. It concluded that a statement by two coconspirators that portions of money seized by the government belonged to them was in furtherance of conspiracy since it was made as part of an effort to learn about the seizure. In United States v. Van Daal Wyk, n205 the Court held that a conspirator's statements amounted to measures taken to control damage to an ongoing conspiracy and were in furtherance of the conspiracy. In a marijuana prosecution, United States v. Mealy, n206 the Court held that statements could be in furtherance of a conspiracy even if made to a person who was actually a government informant.

United States v. Darden, 70 F.3d 1507 (8th Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed racketeering convictions involving drug trafficking, holding that certain coconspirator statements were admissible because "statements that describe past events are in furtherance of the conspiracy if they are made to plan future activities." In United States v. Meeks, n207 the Court held that statements by one conspirator that a cocaine dealer was going to have someone killed and statements as to sources of drugs were in furtherance of conspiracy. See also United States v. Lewis n208(the "in furtherance of" requirement "is construed broadly").

United States v. Williams, 989 F.2d 1061 (9th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed drug convictions and approved the admission of five coconspirator statements, finding all to have been in furtherance of conspiracy. Although one statement was not made to a conspirator, it was an effort to set a drug sale in motion and was integral to the conspiracy. Another statement, in which a conspirator expressed frustration to a girlfriend, was not in furtherance of conspiracy, but was deemed admissible as a declaration against interest. In United States v. Moody, n209 the Court upheld a finding that statements made in the planning stage of a drug conspiracy concerning the travel required to obtain the drugs were in furtherance of the conspiracy. See also United States v. Paris n210(a statement by a drug dealer to a customer identifying the dealer's source was admissible as in furtherance of a cocaine conspiracy); United States v. Crespo de Llano n211(a statement by a conspirator concerning the site of cocaine sale negotiations was made to keep a proposed buyer abreast of activities and was in furtherance of the conspiracy); United States v. Tille n212("When a purpose of the conspiracy is to formulate future strategies of concealment, narrations of past events may be in furtherance of the continuing conspiracy."). In United States v. Dowling, n213 the Court found that a statement by a codefendant was properly admitted as a conspirator statement where it was made to induce a third party to supply materials that would be used in the conspiracy. See also United States v. O'Connor n214(a conspirator's statement that two other defendants were partners with another person was in furtherance of the conspiracy as it assured undercover agents that two defendants had authority to resolve a dispute; a conspirator's statement that enlarged the size of the debt an informant had to repay by giving drugs to the defendants was also in furtherance of the conspiracy).

United States v. Reyes, 798 F.2d 380 (10th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a cocaine conviction, the Court stated that it had no "talismanic formula for determining when a conspirator's statements are in furtherance of the conspiracy" and that it rejected "the defendant's proposition that the statements must actually further the conspiracy to be admissible." It is sufficient, the Court reasoned, that the statements are intended to promote conspiratorial objectives.

United States v. Hernando Ospina, 798 F.2d 1570 (11th Cir. 1986) : The Court held that a statement by one defendant that, although he only handled money transactions, he knew a codefendant was in the narcotics business was in furtherance of conspiracy.

[D] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required -- Obtaining Assistance

United States v. Mangan, 575 F.2d 32 (2d Cir. 1978) : The Court noted that a statement made to induce another to join the conspiracy can be "in furtherance."

United States v. Shores, 33 F.3d 438 (4th Cir. 1994) : In a murder-for-hire prosecution, a coconspirator told a jailhouse informant that he and the defendant had been involved in a murder-for-hire plot; the coconspirator gave details of the plot, as well as future plans to kill witnesses and suborn perjury. The Court held that all of these statements were properly admitted as in furtherance of a conspiracy between the defendant and the coconspirator. While the question was "close," the statements in context could reasonably be construed as being designed, at least in part, to induce the jailhouse informant "to join or provide assistance to the conspiracy, by providing him with necessary background and familiarizing him with the members of the conspiracy."

United States v. Dorn, 561 F.2d 1252 (7th Cir. 1977) : The Court said, when approving the admission of statements made by a husband to a wife in an effort to enlist the wife's support for a criminal enterprise, that "conversations made by conspirators to prospective co-conspirators for membership purposes are acts in furtherance of the conspiracy."

United States v. Garcia, 893 F.2d 188 (8th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a conviction of conspiracy to import counterfeit money, holding that a coconspirator's statements were properly admitted in furtherance of the conspiracy when made, in one case, to delay or prevent the arrest of a conspirator and, in another, to enlist a family member's assistance by revealing to him the conspiracy.

United States v. Bowman, 215 F.3d 951 (9th Cir. 2000) : Affirming bank robbery convictions, the Court recognized that narrations of past events are sometimes inadmissible as coconspirator statements, but found that the defendant's partner's statements to his girlfriend admitting that he was a bank robber were admissible because the partner was seeking her assistance in criminal acts.

[E] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required -- Reassurance, Encouragement, etc.

United States v. Tom, 330 F.3d 83 (1st Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed cocaine-related convictions, holding that a coconspirator's statement to a drug buyer that he had dealt with the defendant for a year was a statement of reassurance and thus admissible as in furtherance of the conspiracy. In United States v. Newton, 326 F.3d 253 (1st Cir. 2003) , a drug trafficking prosecution, the defendant argued that a coconspirator's statement describing a murder was not in furtherance of the objective of eliminating individuals because by that time they were already dead. Affirming, the Court held that the defendant construed the relevant objective of the conspiracy too narrowly; the statements furthered the broad objectives of the drug trafficking conspiracy by reassuring a major supplier that the organization was effectively addressing external threats to its security and profitability.

United States v. Maldonado-Rivera, 922 F.2d 934 (2d Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed convictions for bank robbery offenses committed by members of a Puerto Rican independence group, holding there was no error in admitting as a coconspirator statement a communique that bore the group's logo and recited that plans for the robbery had taken over a year to complete. The communique furthered the conspiracy by providing reassurance as to the group's status and solvency, new information about its membership, and encouragement for future activities. In United States v. Rahme, n215 the Court affirmed heroin convictions, holding that one conspirator's statements that the defendant's people were the source of the heroin were properly admitted. They were in furtherance of the conspiracy because they were efforts to reassure another conspirator of the ability to produce heroin.

United States v. Ammar, 714 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1983) : In a drug conspiracy case, the Court concluded that "[s]tatements between conspirators which provide reassurance, serve to maintain trust and cohesiveness among them, or inform each other of the current status of the conspiracy further the ends of the conspiracy and are admissible" if they otherwise qualify under the Rule. See also United States v. De Peri n216(statements providing reassurance to coconspirators were properly admitted).

United States v. Lindell, 881 F.2d 1313 (5th Cir. 1989) : In a prosecution for various narcotics offenses, one defendant objected to testimony that another conspirator had told a third that the defendant was a "smuggler pilot" on the ground the statement was not in furtherance since he was accused of being the bagman in the operation, not the pilot. The Court, saying that the requirement must not be applied too strictly or the purpose of the exception would be defeated, held that the statement was properly admitted, as it allowed the hearer to infer that the defendant was someone who could be trusted in a drug smuggling operation.

United States v. Rios, 842 F.2d 868 (6th Cir. 1988) : The Court indicated that assuring coconspirators that one had an outlet for goods was in furtherance of a conspiracy.

United States v. Sophie, 900 F.2d 1064 (7th Cir. 1990) : The Court held that one drug dealer's introduction of the defendant to another dealer as "my million dollar marijuana customer" was in furtherance of a cocaine conspiracy, as it provided assurance the defendant could be trusted.

United States v. Flynn, 852 F.2d 1045 (8th Cir. 1988) : In a racketeering case, the Court held that conspirator statements that discussed past events were made to "pull the troops together" and to "provide renewed fervor among the members of the conspiracy." They therefore satisfied the in furtherance requirement.

United States v. Smith, 833 F.2d 213 (10th Cir. 1987) : The Court stated that statements that provide reassurances are in furtherance of a conspiracy.

United States v. Santiago, 837 F.2d 1545 (11th Cir. 1988) : The Court indicated that boasts and other conversations that allay suspicions of coconspirators may be in furtherance of a conspiracy.

[F] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required -- Statements to Undercover Agents or Informants

United States v. Piper, 298 F.3d 47 (1st Cir. 2002) : Affirming cocaine-related convictions, the Court held that statements by a coconspirator to a government informant are admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(E), provided that the statements were in furtherance of the conspiracy and made while the conspiracy was ongoing.

[G] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required -- Threats to Witnesses

United States v. Westmoreland, 312 F.3d 302 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a conviction of murder-for-hire in connection with drug trafficking, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by the wife of a participant in the drug scheme that her husband told her that he had helped the defendant bury the body of an individual who owed the defendant money and who had "talk[ed] too much," which she regarded as a personal threat. There was sufficient evidence that the husband was a member of the conspiracy, and the statements could be found in furtherance of the conspiracy because, in making them, the husband intended to preserve the conspiracy by frightening his wife in order to dissuade her from informing the authorities about the drug scheme.

[iii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Excludable or Exclusion Required

[A] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Civil Cases

Re/Max Int'l, Inc. v. Realty One, Inc., 173 F.3d 995 (6th Cir. 1999) : As evidence of a conspiracy in an antitrust case, the plaintiffs introduced testimony from a witness that when he expressed antitrust concerns to the CEO of one defendant, the CEO responded that "there was no need to worry because someone would have to prove" he spoke to the principal shareholder of the other defendant and the CEO then "leaned forward, smiled, and said 'of course we didn't.' " The Court found that the oral utterances and the act of leaning forward and smiling, when considered together as the CEO obviously intended, were a statement that the CEO had "talked" to his counterpart but that no one would be able to prove it. Although the Court reversed summary judgment that had been granted for the defendants, it found no clear error in the ruling below that the statement was not admissible against the second defendant under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) because it did not further the conspiracy.

In re High Fructose Corn Syrup Antitrust Litig., 295 F.3d 651 (7th Cir. 2002) : Reversing summary judgment for the defendants in a price-fixing case, the Court noted that assertions of the privilege against self-incrimination by officers of one of the defendants could be used to show that the charged conspiracy involved their employer, but could not be used against the other defendants under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) because when the officers refused to speak the conspiracy was long over, so their "statements" were not during and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

Battle v. Lubrizol Corp., 673 F.2d 984 (8th Cir. 1982) : In an antitrust case, the Court found that statements by a defendant distributor to his office staff to the effect that he intended to force a common supplier to stop supplying the plaintiff distributor were not in furtherance of a conspiracy and thus were admissible only as personal admissions against the one defendant.

City of Tuscaloosa v. Harcros Chems., Inc., 158 F.3d 548 (11th Cir. 1998) : In an antitrust action against five chemical companies for a conspiracy to fix prices for repackaged chlorine, the Court found no error in the exclusion of hearsay statements by the CEO of one of the defendants, when offered against the other defendants. The CEO had stated to friends that he was engaged in fixing chlorine prices. While this statement was admissible against the CEO's corporate employer under Rule 801(d)(2)(D), it was not admissible against the other corporations because it did not satisfy the requirements of Rule 801(d)(2)(E). Specifically, it was not made in furtherance of the conspiracy, as it was made to friends over drinks at the golf course. A statement that merely "spills the beans, with no intention of recruiting the auditor into the conspiracy does not further the conspiracy."

[B] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Excludable or Exclusion Required -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Stover, 329 F.3d 859 (D.C. Cir. 2003) : Affirming drug-related convictions, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit statements by defendant Lama to an undercover agent during a recorded drug deal as coconspirator's statements. It rejected the government's argument that "because the indictment alleged that Lama distributed heroin to 'Henry and other coconspirators,' any heroin that Lama distributed during the life of the conspiracy was in furtherance of the conspiracy." The only evidence purporting to show the recorded deal was part of the conspiracy was evidence that Lama also engaged in drug deals with another conspirator, which provided "no basis to draw the further inference" that the deals were part of the same conspiracy.

United States v. Piper, 298 F.3d 47 (1st Cir. 2002) : Although it affirmed cocaine-related convictions, the Court held that statements made by a coconspirator to a drug buyer expressing the coconspirator's dissatisfaction with the defendant and the possibility of using an alternative supplier were not in furtherance of the conspiracy. As an attempt to persuade the buyer to purchase drugs from a source other than the defendant, they were "antithetic to the central object of the charged conspiracy," and thus inadmissible. In United States v. LiCausi, 167 F.3d 36 (1st Cir. 1999) , the Court affirmed convictions for a robbery conspiracy, holding it was error (but harmless) to admit statements made by one conspirator to his girlfriend in which he recounted details of several of the robberies and attempts. Having been made after the crimes described took place, they did not yield significant enough information to constitute reports to a conspirator (assuming the girlfriend was such); rather they appeared to be instances of blowing off steam or venting anxiety.

United States v. Desena, 260 F.3d 150 (2d Cir. 2001) : In a prosecution for crimes arising from motorcycle gang activity, the Court held it was error to admit statements by a gang leader recounting an arson attempt in which the defendant was involved, because they were made in the course of "casual storytelling in a bar, more than two years after the event," and thus were "mere idle chatter" and not made in furtherance of the conspiracy. The error was harmless, however, because the statements were admissible under Rule 804(b)(3). In United States v. Lieberman, n217 the Court found that statements of one conspirator did not qualify for admission under Rule 801, since they occurred in a "casual conversation," which made it "difficult to envision how it [the conversation] would have furthered the conspiracy." However, the statements were declarations against penal interest and thus admissible under Rule 804. In United States v. Lang, n218 the Court found that a statement could not have been in furtherance of a conspiracy when one alleged conspirator made statements to an undercover agent three days after the defendant's arrest. The Court said that the "in furtherance of" language was to be read as "protective of defendants."

United States v. Jannotti, 729 F.2d 213 (3d Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed RICO and Hobbs Act convictions, finding that many conspirator statements were properly admitted, but also finding that portions of videotapes of two meetings contained discussions that were not in furtherance of the conspiracies charged.

United States v. Heater, 63 F.3d 311 (4th Cir. 1995) : In a prosecution for various marijuana-related offenses, the Court observed that a statement by one defendant that she and another defendant owned a marijuana field was not made in furtherance of a conspiracy, but was simply an observation made to a person who was not a member of the conspiracy. The statement did not qualify as "in furtherance of" a conspiracy simply because the defendant-declarant sometimes delivered marijuana to the witness, absent a showing that the statement was made in the context of a larger discourse about the drug conspiracy. However, the statement was a personal admission, properly admitted against the defendant-declarant. In United States v. Urbanik, n219 the Court reversed marijuana convictions, holding that statements made during a casual conversation were not in furtherance of a conspiracy and were "idle conversation."

United States v. Cornett, 195 F.3d 776 (5th Cir. 1999) : The Court reversed a defendant's conviction for a drug conspiracy because a statement allegedly tying her to the conspiracy was improperly admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). The statement was made in the context of a long conversation about relationships and trust in relationships -- the defendant was a girlfriend who had replaced the declarant in the lead conspirator's affections -- and could not reasonably be construed as referring to the conspiracy's business; rather, it was "a mere casual aside" in a conversation about "the spurned lover" and "the other woman." In United States v. El-Zoubi, 993 F.2d 442 (5th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for offenses in connection with arson of his business, holding it was error (but harmless) to admit the arsonist's statement to a neighboring store owner that he was going to burn the building, as there was no indication the declarant thought the conspiracy was more likely to succeed if the other owner knew of his intent. In United States v. Means, n220 a mail fraud case involving the use of improper influence by a bank comptroller, the Court concluded that a statement by the president of a bank to a witness to the effect that he was going to talk to some people who could get a charter and that it would cost $25,000 should not have been admitted as a conspirator's statement. The statement was "mere idle conversation" and was not in furtherance of the conspiracy. The error was harmless, however. See also United States v. Phillips n221("casual, retrospective comments made in conversations about past events" are not in furtherance of a conspiracy).

United States v. Darwich, 337 F.3d 645 (6th Cir. 2003) : The Court vacated the defendant's sentence for a marijuana distribution conviction because the Judge had used inadmissible hearsay in determining the amount of marijuana that had been sold, including statements by a government witness that his nephews sometimes told him how many pounds of marijuana they bagged a night. The Court held these were not statements made in furtherance of the conspiracy, but were "casual conversation about past events."

United States v. Williams, 272 F.3d 845 (7th Cir. 2001) : Affirming cocaine related convictions, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit a statement by a coconspirator to a detective that cash found strapped to his body was drug money obtained from a particular person. A confession to a police officer generally cannot be in furtherance of a conspiracy. In United States v. Santos, 20 F.3d 280 (7th Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed money laundering convictions, holding it was error (but harmless) to admit a codefendant's statements to an IRS agent, as the agent was not part of any conspiracy and the codefendant was merely commenting on his past activities and did not intend his remarks to further any objectives of the scheme. In United States v. Pallais, n222 the Court affirmed convictions related to a large drug trafficking ring, noting that while talk about a conspiracy among or by the conspirators should not be presumed to be unrelated to accomplishment of its goals, idle chatter, mere chitchat, casual admissions of culpability, and other noise and static in the information stream are not admissible, nominally because they are not in furtherance, but really because they are insufficiently reliable to be considered by the jury. In United States v. Johnson, n223 the Court held it was error, but harmless, to admit in a mail fraud prosecution evidence of a coconspirator's statement to a third person that nothing would happen to that person if he were caught attempting a similar scheme, as the statement did nothing to further the conspiracy. Affirming convictions for prostitution offenses and tax evasion in United States v. Doerr, n224 the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit a statement made to a frequent patron explaining the presence of a red curtain at one of the clubs involved, because it was only a narrative of a past event; it was also harmless error to admit a statement that "I can't believe you don't know what's going on" made between coconspirators, because it was only mocking the hearer's ignorance and it was not a part of the normal information flow between conspirators.

United States v. Gjerde, 110 F.3d 595 (8th Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed a defendant's conviction for conspiring to defraud HUD by obtaining a loan for his coconspirators. However, it was error to admit under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) testimony by an FBI agent that a coconspirator told him that a company was set up as a straw company simply to facilitate the fraudulent loan. The Court found that the government could not meet its burden of establishing that the statement was in furtherance of the conspiracy, since the statement was made three and a half years after the loan was obtained and was not made to conceal the conspiracy. The error was harmless because the statement was admissible as a declaration against interest. In United States v. Mitchell, 31 F.3d 628 (8th Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed a conviction for structuring currency transactions, holding it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless) to admit a coconspirator's statements that simply informed the listener of the declarant's criminal activities and did not further the objectives of the conspiracy. In United States v. Wood, n225 the Court held that a statement by a cooperating witness to his wife was not in furtherance of a conspiracy, but its admission was harmless error. See also United States v. Snider n226(finding one conspirator's statements were casual comments concerning other members of the marijuana operation, not in furtherance of the conspiracy).

United States v. Nazemian, 948 F.2d 522 (9th Cir. 1991) : Affirming a conviction for drug offenses, the Court held that a coconspirator's statements that he would not sell heroin because the defendant had never paid for a prior heroin transaction were purely historical, with no connection or purpose to the conspiracy in question, and thus not in furtherance. See also United States v. Bibbero n227(it was reversible error to admit a statement by one conspirator to a government witness, that marijuana belonged to the defendant, because the statement "was idle conversation" and did not further the conspiracy); United States v. O'Connor n228(a conspirator's statements seeking to induce an undercover agent to have future dealings after completion of the conspiracy was not in furtherance of the conspiracy).

United States v. Wolf, 839 F.2d 1387 (10th Cir. 1988) : In a prosecution of a husband and wife for the murder of their child, the Court held that a statement by the wife that the husband had hit the child was a mere narrative and did not further the conspiracy.

United States v. Blakey, 960 F.2d 996 (11th Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a conviction for bank fraud and counterfeiting, holding that a coconspirator's statement to an investigator for the bank implicating the defendant was erroneously admitted, as it was a simple attempt to shift the blame, not a statement made to mislead the investigation or otherwise advance any objective of the conspiracy. In United States v. Posner, n229 the Judge ruled in limine in a criminal tax prosecution that a letter written by a real estate appraiser to a college, stating that the appraisal he had made of the defendant's land gift was unrealistic, was inadmissible against the defendant. There was no evidence that the letter was written to allay suspicions; in fact, the letter would have raised suspicions. Thus, the letter was not in furtherance of a conspiracy.

[p] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Multiple Conspiracies

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Statement Admissible

United States v. Marino, 277 F.3d 11 (1st Cir. 2002) : Affirming racketeering convictions, the Court held that statements made by members of one rival faction of an organized crime family were properly admitted in a prosecution of members of another faction. The Court rejected the argument that statements by rivals could not be in furtherance of a conspiracy, since here there was an overarching organized crime family conspiracy, in the course of and in furtherance of which the statements were made. In United States v. Hurley, 63 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed RICO and money laundering convictions, holding there was no error in admitting statements by regional managers of rival drug cartels under Rule 801(d)(2)(E), since the Trial Judge found that the regional managers were, more probably than not, both members of the charged money-laundering conspiracy. In United States v. Dunn, n230 the Court upheld the admission of a tape recording as a conspirator's statement in an extortion case. It indicated that statements made during and in furtherance of one conspiracy may be used to prove another conspiracy, although there is a relevance hurdle that first must be overcome.

United States v. Vega, 285 F.3d 256 (3d Cir. 2002) : Affirming a conviction for heroin distribution offenses, the Court held that testimony of a witness regarding the defendant's participation in another conspiracy, and notebook pages containing references to the defendant with regard to the other conspiracy, were properly admitted over hearsay and character evidence objections. The notebooks were admissible as coconspirator statements, since they were made in furtherance of the uncharged conspiracy by a member of that conspiracy during the conspiracy, and there was sufficient evidence that the defendant was a member of that conspiracy. The Court implicitly concluded that as long as coconspirator statements are relevant to the crime charged, they may be admitted despite the fact that they were in furtherance of an uncharged conspiracy. In a prosecution for drug and money laundering offenses, United States v. Ellis, 156 F.3d 493 (3d Cir. 1998) , the defendant complained that statements made by a money laundering coconspirator were made during a time when the laundering had not extended to drug offenses. Although the Court agreed that there might have been two conspiracies, it held that out-of-court statements may be admitted even though the defendant is not charged with any conspiracy in the indictment.

United States v. Delgado, 401 F.3d 290 (5th Cir. 2005) : Affirming racketeering convictions, the Court held that coconspirator statements were properly admitted and reiterated its statement in United States v. Arce, 997 F.2d 1123 (5th Cir. 1993) , that "[t]he conspiracy that forms the basis for admitting the coconspirators' statements need not be the same conspiracy for which the defendant is indicted."

United States v. Maliszewski, 161 F.3d 992 (6th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed marijuana convictions, finding that most conspirator statements were properly admitted. Although some of the statements referred to cutting a middleman supplier out of the conspiracy, the Court reasoned that "there is no rule that says if some members of a conspiracy talk about getting rid of another member, that conversation is not in furtherance of the first conspiracy, but is instead directed at an entirely new conspiracy," and that "even if that were the case, ... the statements would nonetheless be admissible since they would certainly be in furtherance of the new conspiracy." In United States v. Bibby, n231 the Court held that the Trial Judge erred in finding a single conspiracy, but it found that the error was harmless, since all statements were properly admitted in the light of the multiple conspiracies that were proved.

United States v. Frazier, 213 F.3d 409 (7th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed narcotics conspiracy convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of statements that had been made by members of a criminal organization, since there was sufficient evidence that that particular organization was linked to the defendants' organization and was part of a single conspiracy. In United States v. Potts, n232 the Court found sufficient evidence to support the introduction of conspirator statements in a prosecution for conspiracy to transport and present altered postal money orders. Although most of the statements were made with respect to smuggling drugs into a prison, and the defendant was not charged with this offense, the Court found that the conspiracy charged and the drug conspiracy were coextensive.

United States v. Townsley, 843 F.2d 1070 (8th Cir. 1988) , modified on other grounds en banc , 856 F.2d 1189 (8th Cir. 1988) : In a voting fraud case, the Court held that conversations were in furtherance of a 1983 conspiracy to conceal a 1980 vote fraud conspiracy and were therefore admissible as substantive evidence. Moreover, the Court reasoned that the existence of the 1983 conspiracy tended to prove the earlier one. In United States v. Snider, n233 three defendants were charged with a marijuana conspiracy. Although the Court found that the government proved two conspiracies, not the single one charged, and reversed on the conspiracy count, it reasoned that the evidence that the defendants were conspirators was strong enough to satisfy the preponderance of the evidence standard.

United States v. Layton, 855 F.2d 1388 (9th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for conspiring to kill a Congressman, holding that speeches made by a cult leader were admissible as conspirator statements. In an earlier opinion, n234 the Court had held that the speeches were in furtherance of a conspiracy. On this appeal, the Court held that the conspirator exemption "applies to statements made during the course and in furtherance of any enterprise, whether legal or illegal, in which the declarant and the defendant jointly participated."

United States v. Matthews, 411 F.3d 1210 (11th Cir. 2005) : The defendant in a major cocaine conspiracy case argued that a conversation between coconspirators was erroneously admitted because the conversation focused on a sale of Ecstasy and he was not charged with distributing that drug. The Court held, however, that because the conversation also included reference to a cocaine transaction there was no error in its admission: "[W]e see no reason to think that the ... conversation could not have been 'during the course and in furtherance of' two different conspiracies."

[ii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Multiple Conspiracies -- Statement Inadmissible

United States v. Murphy, 193 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1999) : An attorney was charged with extortion in connection with a scheme involving falsified warrant applications. The Court held that in admitting coconspirator statements the Trial Judge may not sufficiently have distinguished between the charged extortion conspiracy and the broader false warrant conspiracy, of which the defendant was not shown to have been a member, but that any error was harmless. In United States v. Morrow, n235 the Court affirmed mail fraud convictions in a case involving multiple overlapping conspiracies, holding it was error (but harmless) to admit statements under the coconspirator rule when the defendant was not at some point a member of the same conspiracy that generated the statement.

United States v. Gigante, 166 F.3d 75 (2d Cir. 1999) : In a RICO prosecution of the boss of a Mafia family, the Judge admitted some conspirator statements solely on the finding of a "general overriding conspiracy among all of these alleged Mafia groups." The Court held this was error, as there must be a conspiracy with some specific criminal goal, but the error was harmless because some of the statements were made in furtherance of specific conspiratorial goals, some would have been properly admissible as declarations against interest or under the state of mind exception, and the remainder were not prejudicial in the circumstances.

United States v. Garcia, 13 F.3d 1464 (11th Cir. 1994) : The Court held, in a prosecution for thefts from interstate commerce, that it was error (but harmless) to admit statements made in the course of one conspiracy that predated another conspiracy with which he was charged. Where there are multiple conspiracies, it is error to admit a statement merely advancing some other conspiracy not involving the defendant against whom it is admitted.

[q] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Notes As Coconspirator Statements

United States v. SKW Metals & Alloys, Inc., 195 F.3d 83 (2d Cir. 1999) : Affirming the convictions of a company and its executive vice president for conspiring to fix prices, the Court held that notes that the president of one supplier took of conversations with the convicted vice president and other coconspirators were admissible as coconspirator statements. The Court reasoned that the notes were summaries of understandings and future commitments and thus were "statements" and were intended by the president to act as a record and a guide to future conduct.

[r] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Order of Presentation

See also annotations in § 801.03[10][m], "Foundation."

Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) : In footnote 1 of its opinion holding that the preponderance of the evidence standard governs preliminary factfinding and that challenged statements may be considered as part of the factfinding, the Court stated that "we do not express an opinion on the proper order of proof that trial courts should follow in concluding that the preponderance standard has been satisfied in an ongoing trial." This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 801.02[6][g][ii][B].

United States v. Gantt, 617 F.2d 831 (D.C. Cir. 1980) : The Court indicated that a Trial Judge may conditionally admit conspirators' statements subject to a later finding of conspiracy by the Judge, and that a motion to strike or a mistrial would have to be granted if the government failed to offer sufficient independent evidence.

United States v. Grassi, 616 F.2d 1295 (5th Cir. 1980) : The Court said that a Trial Judge "should determine that there is enough merit in the prosecution's case to risk the admission of hearsay that might later prove inadmissible." The evidence presented at the hearing in this case was inadequate to justify a "threshold" ruling admitting conspirators' statements, and the trial evidence had not removed doubts about the statements' admissibility, so the error in the initial decision to admit them was not harmless.

United States v. Cox, 923 F.2d 519 (7th Cir. 1991) : In ruling on the admissibility of a coconspirator's statements, the Trial Judge followed the permissible procedure of having a pretrial proffer, conditional ruling, and ultimate ruling at the end of the government's case, but required as a matter of policy that the preliminary proffer be ex parte, thus withholding the evidence from the defendant's counsel through oral argument on appeal. Although it expressed concern and bewilderment over this policy when there was no reasonable justification for sealing, the Court nevertheless held there was no reversible error. In United States v. Ferra, 900 F.2d 1057 (7th Cir. 1990) , the Court reversed a conviction for selling guns and cocaine, noting that admitting coconspirators' statements subject to connection is not a routine but an exceptional procedure, appropriate only when the evidence on the question of conspiracy is extensive. Most of the time, it is better to make a preliminary determination rather than to decide the admissibility question on a mistrial motion; even in complex cases, the Trial Judge should require parties to state what they believe the evidence will establish and then decide whether that will suffice.

United States v. Legato, 682 F.2d 180 (8th Cir. 1982) : Affirming a conviction of drug distribution and conspiracy, the Court found no error in the Trial Judge's making his ruling admitting conspirator statements before the close of all the evidence where the proof was so great that the timing did not matter. Although the Judge erred in telling the jury in connection with admitting the statements that he had found a conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence, the Court found that error was not prejudicial where the Judge also told the jury that they could believe that the declarant was lying. See also Llach v. United States n236(upholding conditional admission of conspirator statements subject to a later ruling, with two Judges emphasizing that it is preferable for independent proof to be presented first). In United States v. Reda, n237 the Court warned Trial Judges that admission of conspirator statements subject to "connecting up" always poses the risk that mistrial may be required if the foundation for the statements ultimately fails. It reiterated prior suggestions that the government's independent evidence should be introduced so that the Judge may rule on the admissibility of conspirator statements before the jury hears them.

United States v. Arbelaez, 719 F.2d 1453 (9th Cir. 1983) : The Court upheld the conditional admission of conspirator statements.

United States v. Urena, 27 F.3d 1487 (10th Cir. 1994) : Affirming a conviction for drug-related offenses, the Court held that the strongly preferred order of proof is first to hold a hearing outside the presence of the jury to determine by a preponderance of the evidence the existence of a predicate conspiracy, but that it was not an abuse of discretion to omit the hearing where a significant amount of evidence suggesting a predicate conspiracy had been permitted before the coconspirator statement was offered. See also United States v. Pinto n238(statements may be admitted subject to being connected up); United States v. Monaco n239(recognizing that the Judge need not rule before trial begins on the admissibility of statements).

United States v. Monaco, 702 F.2d 860 (11th Cir. 1983) : The Court stated that a Trial Judge need not reconsider a ruling admitting conspirator statements at the end of trial unless a request for reconsideration is made.

[s] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Personal Knowledge

United States v. Ammar, 714 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1983) : In a drug conspiracy case, the Court concluded that statements by one conspirator may be used against others, if they qualify under the Rule, even though there is no showing that the declarant conspirator had personal knowledge of the facts about which he spoke.

United States v. Goins, 11 F.3d 441 (4th Cir. 1993) : Affirming a conviction for cocaine offenses, the Court held that declarants of coconspirator statements need not be shown to have personal knowledge of matters asserted.

United States v. Lindemann, 85 F.3d 1232 (7th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed a conviction for wire fraud in a scheme arising out of a conspiracy to kill horses and collect on insurance. It held that a foundation of personal knowledge need not be established for coconspirator statements, and observed that "every court that has addressed the issue has held that coconspirator statements are not subject to the requirements of Rule 602."

[t] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Relationship to Other Rules

United States v. Lieberman, 637 F.2d 95 (2d Cir. 1980) : The Court found that statements of one conspirator did not qualify for admission under Rule 801, since they occurred in a "casual conversation," which made it "difficult to envision how it [the conversation] would have furthered the conspiracy." However, the Court found the statements to be declarations against penal interest and thus admissible under Rule 804.

United States v. Heater, 63 F.3d 311 (4th Cir. 1995) : In a prosecution for various marijuana-related offenses, the Court observed that a statement by one defendant that she and another defendant owned a marijuana field was not made in furtherance of a conspiracy. The statement was simply an observation made to a person who was not a member of the conspiracy. The statement did not qualify as "in furtherance of" a conspiracy simply because the declarant-defendant sometimes delivered marijuana to the witness, absent a showing that the statement was made in the context of a larger discourse about the drug conspiracy. The Court held, however, that the statement was a personal admission, properly admitted against the declarant-defendant.

United States v. Maliszewski, 161 F.3d 992 (6th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed marijuana convictions, finding that most conspirator statements were properly admitted. A conversation between a husband and wife was held not to have been in furtherance of the conspiracy even though both were coconspirators, because it furthered their own individual objectives or was just idle chatter between spouses. There was no error in the admission of the conversation, however, since it qualified as a declaration against interest because the conversation inculpated both spouses in criminal activity.

United States v. Brown, 31 F.3d 484 (7th Cir. 1994) : In the prosecution of a scheme to defraud banks by third-party processing of telemarketing charges, testimony regarding three persons' statements that they had furthered the scheme was admitted over a hearsay objection on the government's assurance that it would show they were unindicted coconspirators. When the government failed to make this showing, however, the Trial Judge let the testimony stand, on the ground it was "other bad acts" evidence admissible to show the defendants' knowledge and intent. The Court held that this was error (but harmless), as the government's Rule 404(b) argument was a concession that there was no showing a conspiracy existed, as required for Rule 801(d)(2)(E), and even "other acts" evidence is inadmissible if it is also hearsay.

United States v. Gjerde, 110 F.3d 595 (8th Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed a defendant's conviction for conspiring to defraud HUD by obtaining a loan for his coconspirators. However, it was error to admit under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) testimony by an FBI agent that a coconspirator told him that a company was set up as a straw company simply to facilitate the fraudulent loan. The Court found that the government could not meet its burden of establishing that the statement was in furtherance of the conspiracy, since the statement was made three and a half years after the loan was obtained and was not made to conceal the conspiracy. The error was harmless because the statement was admissible as a declaration against interest. In Battle v. Lubrizol Corp., n240 an antitrust case, the Court found that statements by a defendant distributor to his office staff to the effect that he intended to force a common supplier to stop supplying the plaintiff distributor were not in furtherance of conspiracy and thus were admissible only as personal admissions against the one defendant.

United States v. Nazemian, 948 F.2d 522 (9th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a conviction for drug offenses, holding that a coconspirator's statements that he would not sell heroin because the defendant had never paid for a prior heroin transaction were purely historical, with no connection or purpose to the conspiracy in question, and thus not in furtherance. However, the statements were also against the unavailable declarant's penal interest and admissible under Rule 804(b)(3).

[u] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Resubmitting Foundation Questions to Jury

United States v. Mastropieri, 685 F.2d 776 (2d Cir. 1982) : In the course of affirming income tax convictions, the Court said that it expected "that trial judges in this circuit not only will shoulder the responsibility of making the determination of admissibility, ... but will hereafter refrain from giving the jury a 'second bite' " through a jury instruction.

United States v. Chindawongse, 771 F.2d 840 (4th Cir. 1985) : The Court stated that the admissibility question is for the Court, not the jury.

United States v. Ascarrunz, 838 F.2d 759 (5th Cir. 1988) : The Court held in a drug prosecution that a Trial Judge need not instruct the jury that it must find a defendant to have been a member of a conspiracy on the basis of evidence other than a coconspirator's statement before using the statement against the defendant. In United States v. Elam, n241 the Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to import and distribute marijuana, saying that it was "plain that only when the trial judge has determined, at the close of the evidence, that the prosecution has not demonstrated the defendant's participation in a conspiracy by a preponderance of independent evidence, that an instruction to the jury should be considered." Where the Trial Judge determines that the requisite foundation has been established for the introduction of conspirator statements, no jury instruction is necessary and none should be given.

United States v. Swidan, 888 F.2d 1076 (6th Cir. 1989) : The Court disapproved instructing the jury concerning the standard it should apply before considering coconspirator statements.

United States v. Martinez de Ortiz, 907 F.2d 629 (7th Cir. 1990) (en banc): The Court noted that every Circuit considering the question had held that the jury may not reexamine the question whether there is "enough" evidence of the defendant's participation to allow coconspirator statements to be used; the Judge's decision to admit is conclusive. In United States v. Tuchow, n242 the Court made an unfortunate error when it requested Trial Judges to instruct the jury that statements not offered for their truth, but which indicate the nature and scope of a conspiracy, are admissible for a limited purpose and are not independent evidence of the defendant's participation in the conspiracy. Since the sufficiency of the evidence offered as a basis for admitting conspirator statements is a question for the Court alone, the jury should not be instructed on the matter.

[v] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Statements Made to Cooperating Witnesses

United States v. Wright, 343 F.3d 849 (6th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed convictions for offenses that included a murder arising out of a cocaine distribution scheme, holding that tape-recorded statements between a conspirator cooperating with the government and two other conspirators were properly admitted against the defendant. The Court held that statements of coconspirators gained from a cooperating coconspirator are admissible so long as they were made during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

United States v. King, 351 F.3d 859 (8th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a conviction for violating the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of certain tape-recorded conversations between the defendant and coconspirators even though one of the coconspirators, Kingsley, was acting under the direction and surveillance of government agents to obtain evidence against the others. "[T]he fact that Kingsley allied himself with the government 'has no effect on the continuing conspiratorial efforts of his associates who remain at large,' and does not bar admission of his statements under Rule 801(d)(2)(E)."

[w] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Statements Made to Non-Conspirators

United States v. Castellini, 392 F.3d 35 (1st Cir. 2005) : In a money laundering case, the defendant's alleged coconspirator had made statements to an undercover agent, attempting to enlist him in the conspiracy, and these statements were offered against the defendant under the coconspirator hearsay exemption. The Court noted that as a matter of law there could be no conspiracy with an undercover agent. But statements made by the coconspirator to the agent to enlist him in a conspiracy already underway could be admissible against members of the conspiracy if the statements were in furtherance of a conspiracy. Although it was a close question here whether there was a conspiracy underway at the time the statements were made, some of the statements were admissible to prove background, not for their truth, and any error in admitting other statements was harmless.

United States v. Hoover, 246 F.3d 1054 (7th Cir. 2001) : Affirming CCE and drug convictions, the Court held that coconspirator statements that involved threats made to a witness were properly admitted. It did not matter whether the witness was a coconspirator; what mattered was that the declarant and the defendants against whom the statements were admitted were members of the conspiracy, and that the threats were made in furtherance of that conspiracy.

United States v. Frazier, 280 F.3d 835 (8th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed convictions arising from a heroin distribution operation, finding no error in the admission of testimony by a government informant as to what the defendants told him about the location of drug distribution points and when sales would be made. The Court observed that the Rule does not require that a statement be made by a coconspirator to a coconspirator, but merely requires that it be made by a declarant who was a coconspirator and admitted against a defendant who was a coconspirator, as long as the statement was made during and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

United States v. Williamson, 53 F.3d 1500 (10th Cir. 1995) : The Court held that statements made by one of the conspirators to a person who transacted business with the conspiracy, and who ultimately acted as an undercover informant, were properly admitted in a drug conspiracy trial, even though the Trial Judge had erroneously found that the undercover informant was a member of the conspiracy. The error made no difference, because under the Rule "the appropriate focus is on whether the statements were 'made by' a member of the conspiracy, and not on whether the statements were 'made to' a member of the conspiracy."

[x] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Unidentified Declarants

United States v. McGlory, 968 F.2d 309 (3d Cir. 1992) : Affirming convictions related to a major heroin distribution conspiracy, the Court rejected the government's contention that "owe sheets" referring to drug transactions were not hearsay, but held that most of the sheets introduced were sufficiently shown by circumstantial evidence to be admissible statements by unidentified coconspirators. In United States v. Cruz, 910 F.2d 1072 (3d Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed convictions of a cocaine distribution conspiracy, holding that actions of defendants sufficiently established the existence of a conspiracy as to admit statements by an unidentified coconspirator.

United States v. Squillacote, 221 F.3d 542 (4th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed convictions for espionage, holding that records of the former East German spy agency were properly admitted under the coconspirator exception. There was ample evidence that the defendants had conspired with personnel of the agency, that the statements were made during the course of the conspiracy, and that the agency was acting in furtherance of the conspiracy in compiling the defendants' real and code names, the object of their assignments, etc. While the identity of the declarants of unsigned documents could not be known, the information included in them, which was corroborated in many respects, compelled the conclusion that the documents were made by or at the direction of agents with knowledge of and involvement in the conspiracy with the defendants.

United States v. Greer, 939 F.2d 1076 (1991) , reinstated in part, 968 F.2d 433 (5th Cir. 1992) (en banc): The Court affirmed convictions for conspiring to oppress black, Hispanic, and Jewish citizens in the exercise of their constitutional rights, holding it was error, but harmless, to admit a statement by an unidentified declarant in a group of 12-15 white males during the investigation of a racial assault. While the government could demonstrate that the conspiracy existed at the time and the statement was made during the course and in furtherance to the conspiracy, it failed to show that the declarant and the defendants were members of the conspiracy, because only five defendants were convicted of the conspiracy out of a possible 15 who were present when the statement was made and there was a good possibility that the person who made the statement was not a member of the conspiracy.

United States v. Breitkreutz, 977 F.2d 214 (6th Cir. 1992) : The Court held that although the author was not precisely identified, the statements in a drug ledger and the circumstances of its seizure allowed a reasonable conclusion that the statements were made during the course of and in furtherance of a drug conspiracy of which the defendant was a part. In a prosecution of two defendants and a medical clinic for conspiring to distribute controlled substances, United States v. Mahar, n243 the Court found error in the admission of 12 pages of handwritten notes found in the clinic, where a handwriting expert identified five pages as being in the writing of the clinic's doctor and three in the handwriting of the father of the clinic's president. Although the Trial Judge found that a conspiracy existed and that the defendants were members, no finding was made as to whether the authors of the notes were members of the conspiracy, or whether the notes were made by either or both in the course of and in furtherance of a conspiracy.

United States v. Smith, 223 F.3d 554 (7th Cir. 2000) : In the prosecution of a massive street gang drug conspiracy, the government offered "The List," a document describing the territorial and hierarchical organization of the entire operation, which had been found in the files of an organization owned by the gang leader's female partner. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting "The List" as a coconspirator statement, since the details it contained were such that it could only have been written by a member of the gang or someone sufficiently involved with the operation to be intimately familiar with it, and thus a coconspirator.

United States v. Gonzales, 90 F.3d 1363 (8th Cir. 1996) : Affirming convictions for money laundering, the Court found there was sufficient evidence to treat Western Union money transfer applications as admissions by coconspirators, even though some of the declarants were not identified. The government need only show by a preponderance that the unknown declarant was a coconspirator. "Where the statement itself and the surrounding circumstances provide sufficient evidence of reliability, unidentifiability will not be particularly important."

United States v. Christopher, 923 F.2d 1545 (11th Cir. 1991) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit a statement under the Rule where it was unclear who made the statement and there was no specific finding that the declarant (whoever it was) was a coconspirator with the defendant and that the statement was made during the course of and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

[y] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Use by Accused

United States v. Milstein, 401 F.3d 53 (2d Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed convictions for illegal distribution of prescription drugs, holding that tape-recorded conversations between two individuals identified by the defendant as coconspirators were properly excluded, since the statement was offered by a coconspirator, rather than against one as required by the Rule.

United States v. Kapp, 781 F.2d 1008 (3d Cir. 1986) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to transport stolen motor vehicles, the Court upheld the exclusion of a tape-recorded conversation between a government informant and a coconspirator offered against the government. The statement was not a party admission by the government.

[z] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Written Statements

United States v. Candelaria-Silva, 166 F.3d 19 (1st Cir. 1999) : Affirming drug trafficking convictions, the Court held there was no error in admitting a letter written by an alleged member of the charged conspiracy. Seizure of the letter at the home of a conspirator, contents referring to the subject matter of the conspiracy, and testimony regarding the roles of the writer and persons named in the letter constituted strong evidence that the letter was prepared by a coconspirator during and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Reynolds, 715 F.2d 99 (3d Cir. 1983) .

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Hensel, 699 F.2d 18 (1st Cir. 1983) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Detrich, 865 F.2d 17 (2d Cir. 1988) .

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Enriquez-Estrada, 999 F.2d 1355 (9th Cir. 1993) .

(n5)Footnote 5. United States v. Lai, 944 F.2d 1434 (9th Cir. 1991) .

(n6)Footnote 6. United States v. Snow, 517 F.2d 441 (9th Cir. 1975) .

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Scallion, 533 F.2d 903 (5th Cir. 1976) .

(n8)Footnote 8. Prather v. Prather, 650 F.2d 88 (5th Cir. 1981) .

(n9)Footnote 9. Friedel v. City of Madison, 832 F.2d 965 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n10)Footnote 10. Square Liner 360 degrees Inc. v. Chisum, 691 F.2d 362 (8th Cir. 1982) .

(n11)Footnote 11. Flores v. United States, 551 F.2d 1169 (9th Cir. 1977) .

(n12)Footnote 12. New England Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Anderson, 888 F.2d 646 (10th Cir. 1989) .

(n13)Footnote 13. ADP-Fin. Computer Servs., Inc. v. First Nat'l Bank, 703 F.2d 1261 (11th Cir. 1983) .

(n14)Footnote 14. United States v. Mazza, 792 F.2d 1210 (1st Cir. 1986) .

(n15)Footnote 15. United States v. Ocampo, 650 F.2d 421 (2d Cir. 1981) .

(n16)Footnote 16. United States v. Check, 582 F.2d 668 (2d Cir. 1978) .

(n17)Footnote 17. United States v. Escobar, 674 F.2d 469 (5th Cir. 1982) .

(n18)Footnote 18. United States v. Hernandez, 750 F.2d 1256 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n19)Footnote 19. United States v. Garza, 754 F.2d 1202 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n20)Footnote 20. United States v. Lovelace, 123 F.3d 650 (7th Cir. 1997) .

(n21)Footnote 21. United States v. Dominguez, 992 F.2d 678 (7th Cir. 1993) .

(n22)Footnote 22. United States v. Owens, 484 U.S. 554 (1988) .

(n23)Footnote 23. United States v. Bordallo, 857 F.2d 519 (1988) , modified on other grounds, 872 F.2d 334 (9th Cir. 1989) (en banc).

(n24)Footnote 24. United States v. Jefferson, 925 F.2d 1242 (10th Cir. 1991) , supplemented, 931 F.2d 1396 (10th Cir. 1991) .

(n25)Footnote 25. United States v. Romer, 148 F.3d 359 (4th Cir. 1998) .

(n26)Footnote 26. United States v. Vizcarra-Porras, 889 F.2d 1435 (5th Cir. 1989) .

(n27)Footnote 27. United States v. Martin, 897 F.2d 1368 (6th Cir. 1990) .

(n28)Footnote 28. United States v. Zizzo, 120 F.3d 1338 (7th Cir. 1997) .

(n29)Footnote 29. United States v. Levine, 5 F.3d 1100 (7th Cir. 1993) .

(n30)Footnote 30. United States v. Lazcano, 881 F.2d 402 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n31)Footnote 31. United States v. Running Horse, 175 F.3d 635 (8th Cir. 1999) .

(n32)Footnote 32. United States v. Davis, 154 F.3d 772 (8th Cir. 1998) .

(n33)Footnote 33. United States v. Alonzo, 991 F.2d 1422 (8th Cir. 1993) .

(n34)Footnote 34. United States v. Payne, 944 F.2d 1458 (9th Cir. 1991) .

(n35)Footnote 35. United States v. Hicks, 848 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1988) .

(n36)Footnote 36. Curreri v. International Bhd. of Teamsters, 722 F.2d 6 (1st Cir. 1983) .

(n37)Footnote 37. Gutierrez-Rodriguez v. Cartagena, 882 F.2d 553 (1st Cir. 1989) .

(n38)Footnote 38. Muncie Aviation Corp. v. Party Doll Fleet, Inc., 519 F.2d 1178 (5th Cir. 1975) .

(n39)Footnote 39. United States v. Shepherd, 739 F.2d 510 (10th Cir. 1984) .

(n40)Footnote 40. Mazzella v. RCA Global Commun., Inc., 642 F. Supp. 1531 (S.D.N.Y. 1986) , aff'd, 814 F.2d 653 (2d Cir. 1987) .

(n41)Footnote 41. Stendebach v. CPC Int'l, Inc., 691 F.2d 735 (5th Cir. 1982) .

(n42)Footnote 42. Crimm v. Missouri P. R. Co., 750 F.2d 703 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n43)Footnote 43. Henein v. Saudi Arabian Parsons Ltd., 818 F.2d 1508 (9th Cir. 1987) .

(n44)Footnote 44. United States v. Gibson, 690 F.2d 697 (9th Cir. 1982) .

(n45)Footnote 45. United States v. Wellington, 754 F.2d 1457 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n46)Footnote 46. Alexander v. Conveyors & Dumpers, Inc., 731 F.2d 1221 (5th Cir. 1984) .

(n47)Footnote 47. United States v. Kenney, 911 F.2d 315 (9th Cir. 1990) .

(n48)Footnote 48. United States v. Castro, 887 F.2d 988 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n49)Footnote 49. United States v. Alexander, 48 F.3d 1477 (9th Cir. 1995) .

(n50)Footnote 50. Pace v. Insurance Co. of N. Am., 838 F.2d 572 (1st Cir. 1988) .

(n51)Footnote 51. Kassel v. Gannett Co., 875 F.2d 935 (1st Cir. 1989) .

(n52)Footnote 52. United States v. Horton, 847 F.2d 313 (6th Cir. 1988) .

(n53)Footnote 53. United States v. Gibson, 675 F.2d 825 (6th Cir. 1982) .

(n54)Footnote 54. United States v. Harris, 942 F.2d 1125 (7th Cir. 1991) .

(n55)Footnote 55. United States v. Norwood, 798 F.2d 1094 (7th Cir. 1986) .

(n56)Footnote 56. United States v. Saavedra, 684 F.2d 1293 (9th Cir. 1982) .

(n57)Footnote 57. United States v. Kirk, 844 F.2d 660 (9th Cir. 1988) .

(n58)Footnote 58. Modern Leasing, Inc. v. Falcon Mfg. of Cal., Inc., 888 F.2d 59 (8th Cir. 1989) .

(n59)Footnote 59. United States v. Mazza, 792 F.2d 1210 (1st Cir. 1986) .

(n60)Footnote 60. United States v. Plum, 558 F.2d 568 (10th Cir. 1977) .

(n61)Footnote 61. United States v. Champion Int'l Corp., 557 F.2d 1270 (9th Cir. 1977) .

(n62)Footnote 62. United States v. Williams, 737 F.2d 594 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n63)Footnote 63. United States v. Thompson, 708 F.2d 1294 (8th Cir. 1983) .

(n64)Footnote 64. United States v. Owens, 484 U.S. 554 (1988) .

(n65)Footnote 65. United States v. Day, 789 F.2d 1217 (6th Cir. 1986) .

(n66)Footnote 66. United States v. Dietrich, 854 F.2d 1056 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(n67)Footnote 67. United States v. Micke, 859 F.2d 473 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(n68)Footnote 68. United States v. Perez, 870 F.2d 1222 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n69)Footnote 69. United States v. Owens, 484 U.S. 554 (1988) .

(n70)Footnote 70. United States v. Azure, 801 F.2d 336 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n71)Footnote 71. United States v. Pierre, 781 F.2d 329 (2d Cir. 1986) .

(n72)Footnote 72. United States v. Brennan, 798 F.2d 581 (2d Cir. 1986) .

(n73)Footnote 73. United States v. Andrade, 788 F.2d 521 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n74)Footnote 74. United States v. Payne, 944 F.2d 1458 (9th Cir. 1991) .

(n75)Footnote 75. Christmas v. Sanders, 759 F.2d 1284 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n76)Footnote 76. United States v. Arias-Santana, 964 F.2d 1262 (1st Cir. 1992) .

(n77)Footnote 77. United States v. Vest, 842 F.2d 1319 (1st Cir. 1988) .

(n78)Footnote 78. United States v. Pe na, 949 F.2d 751 (5th Cir. 1991) .

(n79)Footnote 79. United States v. Beaulieu, 194 F.3d 918 (8th Cir. 1999) .

(n80)Footnote 80. United States v. Barrett, 937 F.2d 1346 (8th Cir. 1991) .

(n81)Footnote 81. United States v. Red Feather, 865 F.2d 169 (8th Cir. 1989) .

(n82)Footnote 82. United States v. Nelson, 735 F.2d 1070 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n83)Footnote 83. United States v. Quinto, 582 F.2d 224 (2d Cir. 1978) .

(n84)Footnote 84. United States v. Davis, 890 F.2d 1373 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n85)Footnote 85. United States v. Feldman, 711 F.2d 758 (7th Cir. 1983) .

(n86)Footnote 86. United States v. White, 11 F.3d 1446 (8th Cir. 1993) .

(n87)Footnote 87. United States v. Collicott, 92 F.3d 973 (9th Cir. 1996) .

(n88)Footnote 88. United States v. Rohrer, 708 F.2d 429 (9th Cir. 1983) .

(n89)Footnote 89. United States v. DiTommaso, 817 F.2d 201 (2d Cir. 1987) .

(n90)Footnote 90. United States v. DiTommaso, 817 F.2d 201 (2d Cir. 1987) .

(n91)Footnote 91. Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123 (1968) .

(n92)Footnote 92. United States v. Riley, 684 F.2d 542 (8th Cir. 1982) .

(n93)Footnote 93. United States v. Gutierrez-Chavez, 842 F.2d 77 (5th Cir. 1988) .

(n94)Footnote 94. United States v. Rollins, 862 F.2d 1282 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(n95)Footnote 95. United States v. Young, 814 F.2d 392 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n96)Footnote 96. United States v. Fortes, 619 F.2d 108 (1st Cir. 1980) .

(n97)Footnote 97. United States v. Shulman, 624 F.2d 384 (2d Cir. 1980) .

(n98)Footnote 98. United States v. Williams, 577 F.2d 188 (2d Cir. 1978) .

(n99)Footnote 99. United States v. King, 560 F.2d 122 (2d Cir. 1977) .

(n100)Footnote 100. United States v. Basic Constr. Co., 711 F.2d 570 (4th Cir. 1983) .

(n101)Footnote 101. United States v. Kilbourne, 559 F.2d 1263 (4th Cir. 1977) .

(n102)Footnote 102. United States v. Townsley, 843 F.2d 1070 (8th Cir. 1988) , modified on other grounds en banc, 856 F.2d 1189 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n103)Footnote 103. United States v. Ojala, 544 F.2d 940 (8th Cir. 1976) .

(n104)Footnote 104. United States v. Monks, 774 F.2d 945 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n105)Footnote 105. United States v. Morgan, 581 F.2d 933 (D.C. Cir. 1978) .

(n106)Footnote 106. Brownko Int'l, Inc. v. Ogden Steel Co., 585 F. Supp. 1432 (S.D.N.Y. 1983) .

(n107)Footnote 107. United States v. Jenkins, 779 F.2d 606 (11th Cir. 1986) .

(n108)Footnote 108. United States v. Carter, 760 F.2d 1568 (11th Cir. 1985) .

(n109)Footnote 109. Kingsley v. Baker/Beech-Nut Corp., 546 F.2d 1136 (5th Cir. 1977) .

(n110)Footnote 110. United States v. Martin, 773 F.2d 579 (4th Cir. 1985) .

(n111)Footnote 111. Universal Am. Barge Corp. v. J-Chem, Inc., 946 F.2d 1131 (5th Cir. 1991) .

(n112)Footnote 112. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Dyer, 19 F.3d 514 (10th Cir. 1994) .

(n113)Footnote 113. Hanson v. Waller, 888 F.2d 806 (11th Cir. 1989) .

(n114)Footnote 114. B-W Acceptance Corp. v. Porter, 568 F.2d 1179 (5th Cir. 1978) .

(n115)Footnote 115. United States v. Young, 736 F.2d 565 (10th Cir. 1983) , rev'd on other grounds, 470 U.S. 1 (1985) , adhered to on remand, 767 F.2d 737 (10th Cir. 1985) .

(n116)Footnote 116. Hybert v. Hearst Corp., 900 F.2d 1050 (7th Cir. 1990) .

(n117)Footnote 117. Crawford v. Garnier, 719 F.2d 1317 (7th Cir. 1983) .

(n118)Footnote 118. Nekolny v. Painter, 653 F.2d 1164 (7th Cir. 1981) .

(n119)Footnote 119. Russell v. United Parcel Serv., Inc., 666 F.2d 1188 (8th Cir. 1981) .

(n120)Footnote 120. Bostick Oil Co. v. Michelin Tire Corp., 702 F.2d 1207 (4th Cir. 1983) .

(n121)Footnote 121. Robert R. Jones Assoc., Inc. v. Nino Homes, 858 F.2d 274 (6th Cir. 1988) .

(n122)Footnote 122. Pillsbury Co. v. Cleaver-Brooks Div., 646 F.2d 1216 (8th Cir. 1981) .

(n123)Footnote 123. In re Aircrash in Bali, Indonesia, 871 F.2d 812 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n124)Footnote 124. Abatti v. Commissioner, 644 F.2d 1385 (9th Cir. 1981) .

(n125)Footnote 125. United States v. Shunk, 881 F.2d 917 (10th Cir. 1989) (per curiam).

(n126)Footnote 126. Whiteley v. OKC Corp., 719 F.2d 1051 (10th Cir. 1983) .

(n127)Footnote 127. Fenner v. Dependable Trucking Co., 716 F.2d 598 (9th Cir. 1983) .

(n128)Footnote 128. Union Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Chrysler Corp., 793 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1986) .

(n129)Footnote 129. Brookover v. Mary Hitchcock Mem. Hosp., 893 F.2d 411 (1st Cir. 1990) .

(n130)Footnote 130. Merrick v. Farmers Ins. Group, 892 F.2d 1434 (9th Cir. 1990) .

(n131)Footnote 131. Jacklyn v. Schering-Plough Healthcare Prods. Sales Corp., 176 F.3d 921 (6th Cir. 1999) .

(n132)Footnote 132. NLRB v. Sherwood Trucking Co., 775 F.2d 744 (6th Cir. 1985) .

(n133)Footnote 133. Hill v. Spiegel, Inc., 708 F.2d 233 (6th Cir. 1983) .

(n134)Footnote 134. Halloway v. Milwaukee County, 180 F.3d 820 (7th Cir. 1999) .

(n135)Footnote 135. Stagman v. Ryan, 176 F.3d 986 (7th Cir. 1999) .

(n136)Footnote 136. Breneman v. Kennecott Corp., 799 F.2d 470 (9th Cir. 1986) .

(n137)Footnote 137. Purrington v. University of Utah, 996 F.2d 1025 (10th Cir. 1993) .

(n138)Footnote 138. Sorensen v. City of Aurora, 984 F.2d 349 (10th Cir. 1993) .

(n139)Footnote 139. United States v. Rioux, 97 F.3d 648 (2d Cir. 1996) .

(n140)Footnote 140. United States v. Summers, 598 F.2d 450 (5th Cir. 1979) .

(n141)Footnote 141. United States v. Draiman, 784 F.2d 248 (7th Cir. 1986) .

(n142)Footnote 142. Tallarico v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 881 F.2d 566 (8th Cir. 1989) .

(n143)Footnote 143. Oki America, Inc. v. Microtech Int'l, Inc., 872 F.2d 312 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n144)Footnote 144. Hoptowit v. Ray, 682 F.2d 1237 (9th Cir. 1982) .

(n145)Footnote 145. Lloyd v. Professional Realty Servs., Inc., 734 F.2d 1428 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n146)Footnote 146. United States v. Valencia, 826 F.2d 169 (2d Cir. 1987) .

(n147)Footnote 147. United States v. McKeon, 738 F.2d 26 (2d Cir. 1984) .

(n148)Footnote 148. Litton Sys., Inc. v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 700 F.2d 785 (2d Cir. 1983) .

(n149)Footnote 149. United States v. Sanders, 979 F.2d 87 (7th Cir. 1992) .

(n150)Footnote 150. United States v. Dworken, 855 F.2d 12 (1st Cir. 1988) .

(n151)Footnote 151. United States v. Ayotte, 741 F.2d 865 (6th Cir. 1984) .

(n152)Footnote 152. United States v. Acosta, 763 F.2d 671 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n153)Footnote 153. United States v. Zavala-Serra, 853 F.2d 1512 (9th Cir. 1988) .

(n154)Footnote 154. United States v. Caldwell, 771 F.2d 1485 (11th Cir. 1985) .

(n155)Footnote 155. United States v. Mastropieri, 685 F.2d 776 (2d Cir. 1982) .

(n156)Footnote 156. United States v. Elam, 678 F.2d 1234 (5th Cir. 1982) .

(n157)Footnote 157. United States v. Peters, 791 F.2d 1270 (7th Cir. 1986) .

(n158)Footnote 158. United States v. Tuchow, 768 F.2d 855 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n159)Footnote 159. Pink Supply Corp. v. Hiebert, Inc., 788 F.2d 1313 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n160)Footnote 160. Filco v. Amana Refrigeration, Inc., 709 F.2d 1257 (9th Cir. 1983) .

(n161)Footnote 161. United States v. Todd, 920 F.2d 399 (6th Cir. 1990) .

(n162)Footnote 162. United States v. Truslow, 530 F.2d 257 (4th Cir. 1975) .

(n163)Footnote 163. United States v. Blackshire, 538 F.2d 569 (4th Cir. 1976) .

(n164)Footnote 164. United States v. Triplett, 922 F.2d 1174 (5th Cir. 1991) .

(n165)Footnote 165. United States v. Carper, 942 F.2d 1298 (8th Cir. 1991) .

(n166)Footnote 166. United States v. Smith, 578 F.2d 1227 (8th Cir. 1978) .

(n167)Footnote 167. United States v. Patel, 879 F.2d 292 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n168)Footnote 168. United States v. DeVaugn, 579 F.2d 225 (2d Cir. 1978) .

(n169)Footnote 169. United States v. Carter, 721 F.2d 1514 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n170)Footnote 170. United States v. Masse, 816 F.2d 805 (1st Cir. 1987) .

(n171)Footnote 171. United States v. Liefer, 778 F.2d 1236 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n172)Footnote 172. United States v. Leroux, 738 F.2d 943 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n173)Footnote 173. United States v. Ibern-Maldonado, 823 F.2d 698 (1st Cir. 1987) .

(n174)Footnote 174. United States v. Howard, 770 F.2d 57 (6th Cir. 1985) (en banc).

(n175)Footnote 175. United States v. Doyle, 771 F.2d 250 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n176)Footnote 176. United States v. Munson, 819 F.2d 337 (1st Cir. 1987) .

(n177)Footnote 177. United States v. Mobile Materials, Inc., 881 F.2d 866 (10th Cir. 1989) .

(n178)Footnote 178. United States v. Bucaro, 801 F.2d 1230 (10th Cir. 1986) .

(n179)Footnote 179. United States v. Nichols, 695 F.2d 86 (5th Cir. 1982) .

(n180)Footnote 180. United States v. McMurry, 818 F.2d 24 (10th Cir. 1987) .

(n181)Footnote 181. United States v. Roe, 670 F.2d 956 (11th Cir. 1982) .

(n182)Footnote 182. United States v. Hewes, 729 F.2d 1302 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n183)Footnote 183. United States v. Silvano, 812 F.2d 754 (1st Cir. 1987) .

(n184)Footnote 184. United States v. Curro, 847 F.2d 325 (6th Cir. 1988) .

(n185)Footnote 185. United States v. Cranston, 686 F.2d 56 (1st Cir. 1982) .

(n186)Footnote 186. United States v. Holloway, 731 F.2d 378 (6th Cir. 1984) .

(n187)Footnote 187. United States v. Tarvers, 833 F.2d 1068 (1st Cir. 1987) .

(n188)Footnote 188. United States v. Jaramillo-Montoya, 834 F.2d 276 (2d Cir. 1987) .

(n189)Footnote 189. United States v. Chase, 838 F.2d 743 (5th Cir. 1988) .

(n190)Footnote 190. United States v. Potts, 840 F.2d 368 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n191)Footnote 191. United States v. Campbell, 845 F.2d 782 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n192)Footnote 192. United States v. Silverman, 861 F.2d 571 (9th Cir. 1988) .

(n193)Footnote 193. United States v. Smith, 833 F.2d 213 (10th Cir. 1987) .

(n194)Footnote 194. United States v. Broussard, 80 F.3d 1025 (5th Cir. 1996) .

(n195)Footnote 195. United States v. Triplett, 922 F.2d 1174 (5th Cir. 1991) .

(n196)Footnote 196. United States v. DiDomenico, 78 F.3d 294 (7th Cir. 1996) .

(n197)Footnote 197. United States v. Troop, 890 F.2d 1393 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n198)Footnote 198. United States v. Mayberry, 896 F.2d 1117 (8th Cir. 1990) .

(n199)Footnote 199. United States v. Garcia, 893 F.2d 188 (8th Cir. 1990) .

(n200)Footnote 200. United States v. Paone, 782 F.2d 386 (2d Cir. 1986) .

(n201)Footnote 201. United States v. Hitow, 889 F.2d 1573 (6th Cir. 1989) .

(n202)Footnote 202. United States v. Zavala-Serra, 853 F.2d 1512 (9th Cir. 1988) .

(n203)Footnote 203. United States v. Persico, 832 F.2d 705 (2d Cir. 1987) .

(n204)Footnote 204. United States v. Jannotti, 729 F.2d 213 (3d Cir. 1984) .

(n205)Footnote 205. United States v. Van Daal Wyk, 840 F.2d 494 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(n206)Footnote 206. United States v. Mealy, 851 F.2d 890 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(n207)Footnote 207. United States v. Meeks, 857 F.2d 1201 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n208)Footnote 208. United States v. Lewis, 759 F.2d 1316 (8th Cir. 1985) .

(n209)Footnote 209. United States v. Moody, 778 F.2d 1380 (1985) , modified on other grounds, 791 F.2d 707 (9th Cir. 1986) .

(n210)Footnote 210. United States v. Paris, 812 F.2d 471 (9th Cir. 1987) .

(n211)Footnote 211. United States v. Crespo de Llano, 830 F.2d 1532 (9th Cir. 1987) .

(n212)Footnote 212. United States v. Tille, 729 F.2d 615 (9th Cir. 1984) .

(n213)Footnote 213. United States v. Dowling, 739 F.2d 1445 (9th Cir. 1984) , rev'd on other grounds, 473 U.S. 207 (1985) .

(n214)Footnote 214. United States v. O'Connor, 737 F.2d 814 (9th Cir. 1984) .

(n215)Footnote 215. United States v. Rahme, 813 F.2d 31 (2d Cir. 1987) .

(n216)Footnote 216. United States v. De Peri, 778 F.2d 963 (3d Cir. 1985) .

(n217)Footnote 217. United States v. Lieberman, 637 F.2d 95 (2d Cir. 1980) .

(n218)Footnote 218. United States v. Lang, 589 F.2d 92 (2d Cir. 1978) .

(n219)Footnote 219. United States v. Urbanik, 801 F.2d 692 (4th Cir. 1986) .

(n220)Footnote 220. United States v. Means, 695 F.2d 811 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n221)Footnote 221. United States v. Phillips, 664 F.2d 971 (5th Cir. 1981) .

(n222)Footnote 222. United States v. Pallais, 921 F.2d 684 (7th Cir. 1990) .

(n223)Footnote 223. United States v. Johnson, 927 F.2d 999 (7th Cir. 1991) .

(n224)Footnote 224. United States v. Doerr, 886 F.2d 944 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n225)Footnote 225. United States v. Wood, 834 F.2d 1382 (8th Cir. 1987) .

(n226)Footnote 226. United States v. Snider, 720 F.2d 985 (8th Cir. 1983) .

(n227)Footnote 227. United States v. Bibbero, 749 F.2d 581 (9th Cir. 1984) .

(n228)Footnote 228. United States v. O'Connor, 737 F.2d 814 (9th Cir. 1984) .

(n229)Footnote 229. United States v. Posner, 594 F. Supp. 923 (S.D. Fla. 1984) , aff'd, 764 F.2d 1535 (11th Cir. 1985) .

(n230)Footnote 230. United States v. Dunn, 758 F.2d 30 (1st Cir. 1985) .

(n231)Footnote 231. United States v. Bibby, 752 F.2d 1116 (6th Cir. 1985) .

(n232)Footnote 232. United States v. Potts, 840 F.2d 368 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n233)Footnote 233. United States v. Snider, 720 F.2d 985 (8th Cir. 1983) .

(n234)Footnote 234. United States v. Layton, 720 F.2d 548 (9th Cir. 1983) .

(n235)Footnote 235. United States v. Morrow, 39 F.3d 1228 (1st Cir. 1994) .

(n236)Footnote 236. Llach v. United States, 739 F.2d 1322 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n237)Footnote 237. United States v. Reda, 765 F.2d 715 (8th Cir. 1985) .

(n238)Footnote 238. United States v. Pinto, 838 F.2d 426 (10th Cir. 1988) .

(n239)Footnote 239. United States v. Monaco, 700 F.2d 577 (10th Cir. 1983) .

(n240)Footnote 240. Battle v. Lubrizol Corp., 673 F.2d 984 (8th Cir. 1982) .

(n241)Footnote 241. United States v. Elam, 678 F.2d 1234 (5th Cir. 1982) .

(n242)Footnote 242. United States v. Tuchow, 768 F.2d 855 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n243)Footnote 243. United States v. Mahar, 801 F.2d 1477 (6th Cir. 1986) .

5 of 176 DOCUMENTS

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 801 RULE 801

4-801 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 801.04

801.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

Special Introductory Note: The Hearsay Problem

In General

The factors to be considered in evaluating the testimony of a witness are perception, memory, and narration. Morgan, Hearsay Dangers and the Application of the Hearsay Concept, 62 Harv. L. Rev. 177 (1948); Selected Writings on Evidence and Trial 764, 765 (Fryer ed. 1957); Shientag, Cross-Examination -- A Judge's Viewpoint, 3 Record 12 (1948); Strahorn, A Reconsideration of the Hearsay Rule and Admissions, 85 U. Pa. L. Rev. 484, 485 (1937), Selected Writings, supra, 756, 757; Weinstein, Probative Force of Hearsay, 46 Iowa L. Rev. 331 (1961). Sometimes a fourth is added, sincerity, but in fact it seems merely to be an aspect of the three already mentioned.

In order to encourage the witness to do his best with respect to each of these factors, and to expose any inaccuracies which may enter in, the Anglo-American tradition has evolved three conditions under which witnesses will ideally be required to testify: (1) under oath, (2) in the personal presence of the trier of fact, (3) subject to cross-examination.

(1) Standard procedure calls for the swearing of witnesses. While the practice is perhaps less effective than in an earlier time, no disposition to relax the requirement is apparent, other than to allow affirmation by persons with scruples against taking oaths.

(2) The demeanor of the witness traditionally has been believed to furnish trier and opponent with valuable clues. Universal Camera Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 340 U.S. 474, 495-96, 71 S. Ct. 456, 95 L. Ed. 456 (1951) ; Sahm, Demeanor Evidence: Elusive and Intangible Imponderables, 47 A.B.A.J. 580 (1961), quoting numerous authorities. The witness himself will probably be impressed with the solemnity of the occasion and the possibility of public disgrace. Willingness to falsify may reasonably become more difficult in the presence of the person against whom directed. Rules 26 and 43(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal and Civil Procedure, respectively, include the general requirement that testimony be taken orally in open court. The Sixth Amendment right of confrontation is a manifestation of these beliefs and attitudes.

(3) Emphasis on the basis of the hearsay rule today tends to center upon the condition of cross-examination. All may not agree with Wigmore that cross-examination is "beyond doubt the greatest legal engine ever invented for the discovery of truth," but all will agree with his statement that it has become a "vital feature" of the Anglo-American system. 5 Wigmore § 1367, p. 29. The belief, or perhaps hope, that cross-examination is effective in exposing imperfections of perception, memory, and narration is fundamental. Morgan, Foreword to Model Code of Evidence 37 (1942).

The logic of the preceding discussion might suggest that no testimony be received unless in full compliance with the three ideal conditions. No one advocates this position. Common sense tells that much evidence which is not given under the three conditions may be inherently superior to much that is. Moreover, when the choice is between evidence which is less than best and no evidence at all, only clear folly would dictate an across-the-board policy of doing without. The problem thus resolves itself into effecting a sensible accommodation between these considerations and the desirability of giving testimony under the ideal conditions.

The solution evolved by the common law has been a general rule excluding hearsay but subject to numerous exceptions under circumstances supposed to furnish guarantees of trustworthiness. Criticisms of this scheme are that it is bulky and complex, fails to screen good from bad hearsay realistically, and inhibits the growth of the law of evidence.

Since no one advocates excluding all hearsay, three possible solutions may be considered: (1) abolish the rule against hearsay and admit all hearsay; (2) admit hearsay possessing sufficient probative force, but with procedural safeguards; (3) revise the present system of class exceptions.

(1) Abolition of the hearsay rule would be the simplest solution. The effect would not be automatically to abolish the giving of testimony under ideal conditions. If the declarant were available, compliance with the ideal conditions would be optional with either party. Thus the proponent could call the declarant as a witness as a form of presentation more impressive than his hearsay statement. Or the opponent could call the declarant to be cross-examined upon his statement. This is the tenor of Uniform Rule 63(1), admitting the hearsay declaration of a person "who is present at the hearing and available for cross-examination." Compare the treatment of declarations of available declarants in Rule 801(d)(1) of the instant rules. If the declarant were unavailable, a rule of free admissibility would make no distinctions in terms of degrees of noncompliance with the ideal conditions and would exact no quid pro quo in the form of assurances of trustworthiness. Rule 503 of the Model Code did exactly that, providing for the admissibility of any hearsay declaration by an unavailable declarant, finding support in the Massachusetts act of 1898, enacted at the instance of Thayer, Mass. Gen. L. 1932, c. 233 § 65, and in the English act of 1938, St. 1938, c. 28, Evidence. Both are limited to civil cases. The draftsmen of the Uniform Rules chose a less advanced and more conventional position. Comment, Uniform Rule 63. The present Advisory Committee has been unconvinced of the wisdom of abandoning the traditional requirement of some particular assurance of credibility as a condition precedent to admitting the hearsay declaration of an unavailable declarant.

In criminal cases, the Sixth Amendment requirement of confrontation would no doubt move into a large part of the area presently occupied by the hearsay rule in the event of the abolition of the latter. The resultant split between civil and criminal evidence is regarded as an undesirable development.

(2) Abandonment of the system of class exceptions in favor of individual treatment in the setting of the particular case, accompanied by procedural safeguards, has been impressively advocated. Weinstein, The Probative Force of Hearsay, 46 Iowa L. Rev. 331 (1961). Admissibility would be determined by weighing the probative force of the evidence against the possibility of prejudice, waste of time, and the availability of more satisfactory evidence. The bases of the traditional hearsay exceptions would be helpful in assessing probative force. Ladd, The Relationship of the Principles of Exclusionary Rules of Evidence to the Problem of Proof, 18 Minn. L. Rev. 506 (1934). Procedural safeguards would consist of notice of intention to use hearsay, free comment by the judge on the weight of the evidence, and a greater measure of authority in both trial and appellate judges to deal with evidence on the basis of weight. The Advisory Committee has rejected this approach to hearsay as involving too great a measure of judicial discretion, minimizing the predictability of rulings, enhancing the difficulties of preparation for trial, adding a further element to the already over-complicated congeries of pretrial procedures, and requiring substantially different rules for civil and criminal cases. The only way in which the probative force of hearsay differs from the probative force of other testimony is in the absence of oath, demeanor, and cross-examination as aids in determining credibility. For a judge to exclude evidence because he does not believe it has been described as "altogether atypical, extraordinary... ." Chadbourn, Bentham and the Hearsay Rule -- A Benthamic View of Rule 63 (4)(c) of the Uniform Rules of Evidence, 75 Harv. L. Rev. 932, 947 (1962).

(3) The approach to hearsay in these rules is that of the common law, i.e., a general rule excluding hearsay, with exceptions under which evidence is not required to be excluded even though hearsay. The traditional hearsay exceptions are drawn upon for the exceptions, collected under two rules, one dealing with situations where availability of the declarant is regarded as immaterial and the other with those where unavailability is made a condition to the admission of the hearsay statement. Each of the two rules concludes with a provision for hearsay statements not within one of the specified exceptions "but having comparable circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness." Rules 803(24) and 804(b)(6). [Editor's Note: The latter exception was enacted as (b)(5), and both exceptions have been transferred to a single Rule 807 by a 1997 amendment.] This plan is submitted as calculated to encourage growth and development in this area of the law, while conserving the values and experience of the past as a guide to the future.

Confrontation And Due Process

Until very recently, decisions invoking the confrontation clause of the Sixth Amendment were surprisingly few, a fact probably explainable by the former inapplicability of the clause to the states and by the hearsay rule's occupancy of much the same ground. The pattern which emerges from the earlier cases invoking the clause is substantially that of the hearsay rule, applied to criminal cases: an accused is entitled to have the witnesses against him testify under oath, in the presence of himself and trier, subject to cross-examination; yet considerations of public policy and necessity require the recognition of such exceptions as dying declarations and former testimony of unavailable witnesses. Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237, 15 S. Ct. 337, 39 L. Ed. 409 (1895) ; Motes v. United States, 178 U.S. 458, 20 S. Ct. 993, 44 L. Ed. 1150 (1900) ; Delaney v. United States, 263 U.S. 586, 44 S. Ct. 206, 68 L. Ed. 462 (1924) . Beginning with Snyder v. Massachusetts, 291 U.S. 97, 54 S. Ct. 330, 78 L. Ed. 674 (1934) , the Court began to speak of confrontation as an aspect of procedural due process, thus extending its applicability to state cases and to federal cases other than criminal. The language of Snyder was that of an elastic concept of hearsay. The deportation case of Bridges v. Wixon, 326 U.S. 135, 65 S. Ct. 1443, 89 L. Ed. 2103 (1945) , may be read broadly as imposing a strictly construed right of confrontation in all kinds of cases or narrowly as the product of a failure of the Immigration and Naturalization Service to follow its own rules. In re Oliver, 333 U.S. 257, 68 S. Ct. 499, 92 L. Ed. 682 (1948) , ruled that cross-examination was essential to due process in a state contempt proceeding, but in United States v. Nugent, 346 U.S. 1, 73 S. Ct. 991, 97 L. Ed. 1417 (1953) , the court held that it was not an essential aspect of a "hearing" for a conscientious objector under the Selective Service Act. Stein v. New York, 346 U.S. 156, 196, 73 S. Ct. 1077, 97 L. Ed. 1522 (1953) , disclaimed any purpose to read the hearsay rule into the Fourteenth Amendment but in Greene v. McElroy, 360 U.S. 474, 79 S. Ct. 1400, 3 L. Ed. 2d 1377 (1959) , revocation of security clearance without confrontation and cross-examination was held unauthorized, and a similar result was reached in Willner v. Committee on Character, 373 U.S. 96, 83 S. Ct. 1175, 10 L. Ed. 2d 224 (1963) . Ascertaining the constitutional dimensions of the confrontation-hearsay aggregate against the background of these cases is a matter of some difficulty, yet the general pattern is at least not inconsistent with that of the hearsay rule.

In 1965, the confrontation clause was held applicable to the states. Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400, 85 S. Ct. 1065, 13 L. Ed. 2d 923 (1965) . Prosecution use of former testimony given at a preliminary hearing where petitioner was not represented by counsel was a violation of the clause. The same result would have followed under conventional hearsay doctrine read in the light of a constitutional right to counsel, and nothing in the opinion suggests any difference in essential outline between the hearsay rule and the right of confrontation. In the companion case of Douglas v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 415, 85 S. Ct. 1074, 13 L. Ed. 2d 934 (1965) , however, the result reached by applying the confrontation clause is one reached less readily via the hearsay rule. A confession implicating petitioner was put before the jury by reading it to the witness in portions and asking if he made that statement. The witness refused to answer on grounds of self-incrimination. The result, said the Court, was to deny cross-examination, and hence confrontation. True, it could broadly be said that the confession was a hearsay statement which for all practical purposes was put in evidence. Yet a more easily accepted explanation of the opinion is that its real thrust was in the direction of curbing undesirable prosecutorial behavior, rather than merely applying rules of exclusion, and that the confrontation clause was the means selected to achieve this end. Comparable facts and a like result appeared in Brookhart v. Janis, 384 U.S. 1, 86 S. Ct. 1245, 16 L. Ed. 2d 314 (1966) .

The pattern suggested in Douglas was developed further and more distinctly in a pair of cases at the end of the 1966 term. United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218, 87 S. Ct. 1926, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1149 (1967) , and Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263, 87 S. Ct. 1951, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1178 (1967) , hinged upon practices followed in identifying accused persons before trial. This pretrial identification was said to be so decisive an aspect of the case that accused was entitled to have counsel present; a pretrial identification made in the absence of counsel was not itself receivable in evidence and, in addition, might fatally infect a courtroom identification. The presence of counsel at the earlier identification was described as a necessary prerequisite for "a meaningful confrontation at trial." United States v. Wade, supra, 388 U.S. at 236, 87 S. Ct. at 1937 . Wade involved no evidence of the fact of a prior identification and hence was not susceptible of being decided on hearsay grounds. In Gilbert, witnesses did testify to an earlier identification, readily classifiable as hearsay under a fairly strict view of what constitutes hearsay. The Court, however, carefully avoided basing the decision on the hearsay ground, choosing confrontation instead. 388 U.S. 263, 272 n.3, 87 S. Ct. 1951 . See also Parker v. Gladden, 385 U.S. 363, 87 S. Ct. 468, 17 L. Ed. 2d 420 (1966) , holding that the right of confrontation was violated when the bailiff made prejudicial statements to jurors, and Note, 75 Yale L.J. 1434 (1966).

Under the earlier cases, the confrontation clause may have been little more than a constitutional embodiment of the hearsay rule, even including traditional exceptions, but with some room for expanding them along similar lines. But under the recent cases the impact of the clause clearly extends beyond the confines of the hearsay rule. These considerations have led the Advisory Committee to conclude that a hearsay rule can function usefully as an adjunct to the confrontation right in constitutional areas and independently in nonconstitutional areas. In recognition of the separateness of the confrontation clause and the hearsay rule, and to avoid inviting collisions between them or between the hearsay rule and other exclusionary principles, the exceptions set forth in Rules 803 and 804 are stated in terms of exemption from the general exclusionary mandate of the hearsay rule, rather than in positive terms of admissibility. See Uniform Rule 63(1) to (31) and California Evidence Code §§ 1200-1340.

Rule 801

General Provisions

Subdivision (a). The definition of "statement" assumes importance because the term is used in the definition of hearsay in subdivision (c). The effect of the definition of "statement" is to exclude from the operation of the hearsay rule all evidence of conduct, verbal or nonverbal, not intended as an assertion. The key to the definition is that nothing is an assertion unless intended to be one.

It can scarcely be doubted that an assertion made in words is intended by the declarant to be an assertion. Hence verbal assertions readily fall into the category of "statement." Whether nonverbal conduct should be regarded as a statement for purposes of defining hearsay requires further consideration. Some nonverbal conduct, such as the act of pointing to identify a suspect in a lineup, is clearly the equivalent of words, assertive in nature, and to be regarded as a statement. Other nonverbal conduct, however, may be offered as evidence that the person acted as he did because of his belief in the existence of the condition sought to be proved, from which belief the existence of the condition may be inferred. This sequence is, arguably, in effect an assertion of the existence of the condition and hence properly includable within the hearsay concept. See Morgan, Hearsay Dangers and the Application of the Hearsay Concept, 62 Harv. L. Rev. 177, 214, 217 (1948), and the elaboration in Finman, Implied Assertions as Hearsay: Some Criticisms of the Uniform Rules of Evidence, 14 Stan. L. Rev. 682 (1962). Admittedly evidence of this character is untested with respect to the perception, memory, and narration (or their equivalents) of the actor, but the Advisory Committee is of the view that these dangers are minimal in the absence of an intent to assert and do not justify the loss of the evidence on hearsay grounds. No class of evidence is free of the possibility of fabrication, but the likelihood is less with nonverbal than with assertive verbal conduct. The situations giving rise to the nonverbal conduct are such as virtually to eliminate questions of sincerity. Motivation, the nature of the conduct, and the presence or absence of reliance will bear heavily upon the weight to be given the evidence. Falknor, The "Hear-Say" Rule as a "See-Do" Rule: Evidence of Conduct, 33 Rocky Mt. L. Rev. 133 (1961). Similar considerations govern nonassertive verbal conduct and verbal conduct which is assertive but offered as a basis for inferring something other than the matter asserted, also excluded from the definition of hearsay by the language of subdivision (c).

When evidence of conduct is offered on the theory that it is not a statement, and hence not hearsay, a preliminary determination will be required to determine whether an assertion is intended. The rule is so worded as to place the burden upon the party claiming that the intention existed; ambiguous and doubtful cases will be resolved against him and in favor of admissibility. The determination involves no greater difficulty than many other preliminary questions of fact. Maguire, The Hearsay System: Around and Through the Thicket, 14 Vand. L. Rev. 741, 765-67 (1961).

For similar approaches, see Uniform Rule 62 (1); California Evidence Code §§ 225, 1200; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-450(a); New Jersey Evidence Rule 62 (1).

Subdivision (b). No Advisory Committee Note.

Subdivision (c). The definition follows along familiar lines in including only statements offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. McCormick § 225; 5 Wigmore § 1361, 6 id. § 1766. If the significance of an offered statement lies solely in the fact that it was made, no issue is raised as to the truth of anything asserted, and the statement is not hearsay. Emich Motors Corp. v. General Motors Corp., 181 F.2d 70 (7th Cir. 1950) , rev'd on other grounds, 340 U.S. 558, 71 S. Ct. 408, 95 L. Ed. 534 , letters of complaint from customers offered as a reason for cancellation of dealer's franchise, to rebut contention that franchise was revoked for refusal to finance sales through affiliated finance company. The effect is to exclude from hearsay the entire category of "verbal acts" and "verbal parts of an act," in which the statement itself affects the legal rights of the parties or is a circumstance bearing on conduct affecting their rights.

The definition of hearsay must, of course, be read with reference to the definition of statement set forth in subdivision (a).

Testimony given by a witness in the course of court proceedings is excluded since there is compliance with all the ideal conditions for testifying.

Subdivision (d). Several types of statements which would otherwise literally fall within the definition are expressly excluded from it:

(1) Prior statement by witness. Considerable controversy has attended the question whether a prior out-of-court statement by a person now available for cross-examination concerning it, under oath and in the presence of the trier of fact, should be classed as hearsay. If the witness admits on the stand that he made the statement and that it was true, he adopts the statement and there is no hearsay problem. The hearsay problem arises when the witness on the stand denies having made the statement or admits having made it but denies its truth. The argument in favor of treating these latter statements as hearsay is based upon the ground that the conditions of oath, cross-examination, and demeanor observation did not prevail at the time the statement was made and cannot adequately be supplied by the later examination. The logic of the situation is troublesome. So far as concerns the oath, its mere presence has never been regarded as sufficient to remove a statement from the hearsay category, and it receives much less emphasis than cross-examination as a truth-compelling device. While strong expressions are found to the effect that no conviction can be had or important right taken away on the basis of statements not made under fear of prosecution for perjury, Bridges v. Wixon, 326 U.S. 135, 65 S. Ct. 1443, 89 L. Ed. 2103 (1945) , the fact is that, of the many common-law exceptions to the hearsay rule, only that for reported testimony has required the statement to have been made under oath. Nor is it satisfactorily explained why cross-examination cannot be conducted subsequently with success. The decisions contending most vigorously for its inadequacy in fact demonstrated quite thorough exploration of the weaknesses and doubts attending the earlier statement. State v. Saporen, 205 Minn. 358, 285 N.W. 808 (1939) ; Ruhala v. Roby, 379 Mich. 102, 150 N.W.2d 146 (1967) ; People v. Johnson, 68 Cal. 2d 646, 68 Cal. Rptr. 599, 441 P.2d 111 (1968) . In respect to demeanor, as Judge Learned Hand observed in Di Carlo v. United States, 6 F.2d 364 (2d Cir. 1925) , when the jury decide that the truth is not what the witness says now, but what he said before, they are still deciding from what they see and hear in court. The bulk of the case law nevertheless has been against allowing prior statements of witnesses to be used generally as substantive evidence. Most of the writers and Uniform Rule 63 (1) have taken the opposite position.

The position taken by the Advisory Committee in formulating this part of the rule is founded upon an unwillingness to countenance the general use of prior prepared statements as substantive evidence, but with a recognition that particular circumstances call for a contrary result. The judgment is one more of experience than of logic. The rule requires in each instance, as a general safeguard, that the declarant actually testify as a witness, and it then enumerates three situations in which the statement is excepted from the category of hearsay. Compare Uniform Rule 63 (1) which allows any out-of-court statement of a declarant who is present at the trial and available for cross-examination.

(A) Prior inconsistent statements traditionally have been admissible to impeach but not as substantive evidence. Under the rule they are substantive evidence. [Editor's Note: Modified by the Congress to provide for substantive admissibility only if the prior statement was made under oath at a formal proceeding.] As has been said by the California Law Revision Commission with respect to a similar provision:

> Section 1235 admits inconsistent statements of witnesses because the dangers against which the hearsay rule is designed to protect are largely nonexistent. The declarant is in court and may be examined and cross-examined in regard to his statements and their subject matter. In many cases, the inconsistent statement is more likely to be true than the testimony of the witness at the trial because it was made nearer in time to the matter to which it relates and is less likely to be influenced by the controversy that gave rise to the litigation. The trier of fact has the declarant before it and can observe his demeanor and the nature of his testimony as he denies or tries to explain away the inconsistency. Hence, it is in as good a position to determine the truth or falsity of the prior statement as it is to determine the truth or falsity of the inconsistent testimony given in court. Moreover, Section 1235 will provide a party with desirable protection against the "turncoat" witness who changes his story on the stand and deprives the party calling him of evidence essential to his case.

Comment, California Evidence Code § 1235. See also McCormick § 39. The Advisory Committee finds these views more convincing than those expressed in People v. Johnson, 68 Cal. 2d 646, 68 Cal. Rptr. 599, 441 P.2d 111 (1968) . The constitutionality of the Advisory Committee's view was upheld in California v. Green, 399 U.S. 149, 90 S. Ct. 1930, 26 L. Ed. 2d 489 (1970) . Moreover, the requirement that the statement be inconsistent with the testimony given assures a thorough exploration of both versions while the witness is on the stand and bars any general and indiscriminate use of previously prepared statements.

(B) Prior consistent statements traditionally have been admissible to rebut charges of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive but not as substantive evidence. Under the rule they are substantive evidence. The prior statement is consistent with the testimony given on the stand, and, if the opposite party wishes to open the door for its admission in evidence, no sound reason is apparent why it should not be received generally.

(C) The admission of evidence of ... identification finds substantial support, although it falls beyond a doubt in the category of prior out-of-court statements. Illustrative are People v. Gould, 54 Cal. 2d 621, 7 Cal. Rptr. 273, 354 P.2d 865 (1960) ; Judy v. State, 218 Md. 168, 146 A.2d 29 (1958) ; State v. Simmons, 63 Wash. 2d 17, 385 P.2d 389 (1963) ; California Evidence Code § 1238; New Jersey Evidence Rule 63 (1)(c); N.Y. Code of Criminal Procedure § 393b. Further cases are found in 4 Wigmore § 1130. The basis is the generally unsatisfactory and inconclusive nature of courtroom identifications as compared with those made at an earlier time under less suggestive conditions. The Supreme Court considered the admissibility of evidence of prior identification in Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263, 87 S. Ct. 1951, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1178 (1967) . Exclusion of lineup identification was held to be required because the accused did not then have the assistance of counsel. Significantly, the Court carefully refrained from placing its decision on the ground that testimony as to the making of a prior out-of-court identification ("That's the man") violated either the hearsay rule or the right of confrontation because not made under oath, subject to immediate cross-examination, in the presence of the trier. Instead the Court observed:

> There is a split among the States concerning the admissibility of prior extrajudicial identifications, as independent evidence of identity, both by the witness and third parties present at the prior identification. See 71 A.L.R.2d 449 . It has been held that the prior identification is hearsay, and, when admitted through the testimony of the identifier, is merely a prior consistent statement.

The recent trend, however, is to admit the prior identification under the exception that admits as substantive evidence a prior communication by a witness who is available for cross-examination at the trial. See 5 A.L.R.2d Later Case Service 1225-1228 ... 388 U.S. at 272, n. 3, 87 S.Ct. at 1956 .

[Editor's Note: This part was deleted by the Congress, but it was subsequently restored.]

(2) Admissions. Admissions by a party-opponent are excluded from the category of hearsay on the theory that their admissibility in evidence is the result of the adversary system rather than satisfaction of the conditions of the hearsay rule. Strahorn, A Reconsideration of the Hearsay Rule and Admissions, 85 U. Pa. L. Rev. 484, 564 (1937); Morgan, Basic Problems of Evidence 265 (1962); 4 Wigmore § 1048. No guarantee of trustworthiness is required in the case of an admission. The freedom which admissions have enjoyed from technical demands of searching for an assurance of trustworthiness in some against-interest circumstance, and from the restrictive influences of the opinion rule and the rule requiring firsthand knowledge, when taken with the apparently prevalent satisfaction with the results, calls for generous treatment of this avenue to admissibility.

The rule specifies five categories of statements for which the responsibility of a party is considered sufficient to justify reception in evidence against him:

(A) A party's own statement is the classic example of an admission. If he has a representative capacity and the statement is offered against him in that capacity, no inquiry whether he was acting in the representative capacity in making the statement is required; the statement need only be relevant to representative affairs. To the same effect is California Evidence Code § 1220. Compare Uniform Rule 63 (7), requiring a statement to be made in a representative capacity to be admissible against a party in a representative capacity.

(B) Under established principles an admission may be made by adopting or acquiescing in the statement of another. While knowledge of contents would ordinarily be essential, this is not inevitably so: "X is a reliable person and knows what he is talking about." See McCormick § 246, p. 527, n. 15. Adoption or acquiescence may be manifested in any appropriate manner. When silence is relied upon, the theory is that the person would, under the circumstances, protest the statement made in his presence, if untrue. The decision in each case calls for an evaluation in terms of probable human behavior. In civil cases, the results have generally been satisfactory. In criminal cases, however, troublesome questions have been raised by decisions holding that failure to deny is an admission: the inference is a fairly weak one, to begin with; silence may be motivated by advice of counsel or realization that "anything you say may be used against you"; unusual opportunity is afforded to manufacture evidence; and encroachment upon the privilege against self-incrimination seems inescapably to be involved. However, recent decisions of the Supreme Court relating to custodial interrogation and the right to counsel appear to resolve these difficulties. Hence the rule contains no special provisions concerning failure to deny in criminal cases.

(C) No authority is required for the general proposition that a statement authorized by a party to be made should have the status of an admission by the party. However, the question arises whether only statements to third persons should be so regarded, to the exclusion of statements by the agent to the principal. The rule is phrased broadly so as to encompass both. While it may be argued that the agent authorized to make statements to his principal does not speak for him, Morgan, Basic Problems of Evidence 273 (1962), communication to an outsider has not generally been thought to be an essential characteristic of an admission. Thus a party's books or records are usable against him, without regard to any intent to disclose to third persons. 5 Wigmore § 1557. See also McCormick § 78, pp. 159-61. In accord is New Jersey Evidence Rule 63(8)(a). Cf. Uniform Rule 63(8)(a) and California Evidence Code § 1222 which limit status as an admission in this regard to statements authorized by the party to be made "for" him, which is perhaps an ambiguous limitation to statements to third persons. Falknor, Vicarious Admissions and the Uniform Rules, 14 Vand. L. Rev. 855, 860-61 (1961).

(D) The tradition has been to test the admissibility of statements by agents, as admissions, by applying the usual test of agency. Was the admission made by the agent acting in the scope of his employment? Since few principals employ agents for the purpose of making damaging statements, the usual result was exclusive of the statement. Dissatisfaction with this loss of valuable and helpful evidence has been increasing. A substantial trend favors admitting statements related to a matter within the scope of the agency or employment. Grayson v. Williams, 256 F.2d 61 (10th Cir. 1958) ; Koninklijke Luchtvaart Maatschappij N.V. KLM Royal Dutch Airlines v. Tuller, 292 F.2d 775, 784, 110 U.S. App. D.C. 282 (1961) ; Martin v. Savage Truck Lines, Inc., 121 F. Supp. 417 (D.D.C. 1954) , and numerous state court decisions collected in 4 Wigmore, 1964 Supp., pp. 66-73, with comments by the editor that the statements should have been excluded as not within scope of agency. For the traditional view, see Northern Oil Co. v. Socony Mobil Oil Co., 347 F.2d 81, 85 (2d Cir. 1965) and cases cited therein. Similar provisions are found in Uniform Rule 63(9)(a), Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-460 (i)(1), and New Jersey Evidence Rule 63(9)(a).

(E) The limitation upon the admissibility of statements of coconspirators to those made "during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy" is in the accepted pattern. While the broadened view of agency taken in item (iv) might suggest wider admissibility of statements of coconspirators, the agency theory of conspiracy is at best a fiction and ought not to serve as a basis for admissibility beyond that already established. See Levie, Hearsay and Conspiracy, 52 Mich. L. Rev. 1159 (1954); Comment, 25 U. Chi. L. Rev. 530 (1958). The rule is consistent with the position of the Supreme Court in denying admissibility to statements made after the objectives of the conspiracy have either failed or been achieved. Krulewitch v. United States, 336 U.S. 440, 69 S. Ct. 716, 93 L. Ed. 790 (1949) ; Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471, 490, 83 S. Ct. 407, 9 L. Ed. 2d 441 (1963) . For similarly limited provisions, see California Evidence Code § 1223 and New Jersey Rule 63(9)(b). Cf. Uniform Rule 63(9)(b).

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendments are technical. No substantive change is intended."]

[2] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 282 (1999)

Prior Inconsistent Statements -- Rule 801(d)(1)(A)

Under common law, a statement of a witness that was inconsistent with his in-court testimony could be admitted to impeach the witness's credibility, but there was no special hearsay exception to allow such a statement to be admissible for its truth. The Advisory Committee thought that the common-law rule, distinguishing between impeachment and substantive use of prior inconsistent statements, was nonsensical. It noted that the major concern of the hearsay rule is that an out-of-court statement could not be tested for reliability because the person who made the statement could not be cross-examined about it. But with prior inconsistent statements, "[t]he declarant is in court and may be examined and crossexamined in regard to his statements and their subject matter." Moreover, "[t]he trier of fact has the declarant before it and can observe his demeanor and the nature of his testimony as he denies or tries to explain away the inconsistency." Finally, "the inconsistent statement is more likely to be true than the testimony of the witness at the trial because it was made nearer in time to the matter to which it relates and is less likely to be influenced by the controversy that gave rise to the litigation." For all these reasons, the Advisory Committee's proposed Rule 801(d)(1)(A) would have exempted all prior inconsistent statements of testifying witnesses from the hearsay rule. The Advisory Committee's Note to the proposal makes this clear: "Prior inconsistent statements traditionally have been admissible to impeach but not as substantive evidence. Under the rule they are substantive evidence."

Congress, however, cut back on the Advisory Committee proposal. In the form ultimately adopted, Rule 801(d)(1)(A) states that only those prior inconsistent statements "given under oath subject to the penalty of perjury at a trial, hearing, or other proceeding, or in a deposition" are admissible as substantive evidence. The rationales for this limitation, as expressed by the House Committee on the Judiciary, are that: 1) if the statement was given under oath at a formal proceeding, "there can be no dispute as to whether the prior statement was made"; and 2) the requirements of oath and formality of proceeding "provide firm additional assurances of the reliability of the prior statement."

The requirements imposed by Congress in Rule 801(d)(1)(A) have little to do with the concerns that are at the heart of the hearsay rule. First, while the requirement of a formal proceeding tends to alleviate concern over whether the prior inconsistent statement was ever made, that concern has nothing to do with the hearsay rule. The making of the statement (as distinguished from its truth) is a question addressed by in-court testimony: the in-court witness testifies that the statement was or was not made, and this becomes a jury question. Second, the requirements of oath and formality do little to guarantee the reliability of the prior out-of-court statement. The whole basis for reliability of these statements is that the declarant is the same person as the witness who is testifying under oath at the time of trial, and can therefore be cross-examined about the prior statement. That reliability guarantee is not dependent on the circumstances under which the out-of-court statement was made. Thus, the limitations imposed by Congress do not seem to mesh very well with the concerns expressed.

However, while the Advisory Committee's proposal has a stronger basis in the theory of the hearsay rule, the fact remains that it is not the law. Therefore, the Advisory Committee's categorical assertion that prior inconsistent statements "are substantive evidence" is misleading.

[3] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

Present Federal law generally permits the use of prior inconsistent statements of a witness for impeachment only. Subdivision (d)(1) as proposed by the Court would permit such statements to be admissible as substantive evidence. Although there was some support expressed for the Court Rule, based largely on the need to counteract the effect of witness intimidation, the Subcommittee decided to adopt a compromise version of the Rule patterned after the position of the Second Circuit. See United States v. De Sisto, 329 F.2d 929 (2d Cir. 1964) , cert. denied, 377 U.S. 979 ; United States v. Cunningham, 446 F.2d 194 . The Rule as approved draws a distinction between types of prior inconsistent statements and allows only those made before a grand jury, or at a trial or hearing, or in a deposition, to be admissible for their truth. The rationale for the Subcommittee's decision was that (1) unlike in other situations, there can be no dispute as to whether the prior statement was made; and (2) the context of a formal proceeding and an oath provided firm additional assurances of the reliability of the statement. The Subcommittee intends that nothing in the Rule should be deemed to impair the secrecy of grand jury investigations.

[4] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Present federal law, except in the Second Circuit, permits the use of prior inconsistent statements of a witness for impeachment only. Rule 801(d)(1) as proposed by the Court would have permitted all such statements to be admissible as substantive evidence, an approach followed by a small but growing number of State jurisdictions and recently held constitutional in California v. Green, 399 U.S. 149 (1970) . Although there was some support expressed for the Court Rule, based largely on the need to counteract the effect of witness intimidation in criminal cases, the Committee decided to adopt a compromise version of the Rule similar to the position of the Second Circuit. The Rule as amended draws a distinction between types of prior inconsistent statements (other than statements of identification of a person made after perceiving him which are currently admissible, see United States v. Anderson, 406 F.2d 719, 720 (4th Cir.) , cert. denied, 395 U.S. 967 (1969)) and allows only those made while the declarant was subject to cross-examination at a trial or hearing or in a deposition, to be admissible for their truth. Compare United States v. DeSisto, 329 F.2d 929 (2d Cir.) , cert. denied, 377 U.S. 979 (1964) ; United States v. Cunningham, 446 F.2d 194 (2d Cir. 1971) (restricting the admissibility of prior inconsistent statements as substantive evidence to those made under oath in a formal proceeding, but not requiring that there have been an opportunity for cross-examination). The rationale for the Committee's decision is that (1) unlike in most other situations involving unsworn or oral statements, there can be no dispute as to whether the prior statement was made; and (2) the context of a formal proceeding, an oath, and the opportunity for cross-examination provided firm additional assurances of the reliability of the prior statement.

[The following excerpt is from House Report, No. 94-355, 94th Cong., 1st Sess. (1975), relating to the amendment adding subdivision 801(d)(1)(C) to the Federal Rule. -- Ed.]

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1549) to amend the Federal Rules of Evidence, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report favorably thereon without amendment and recommend that the bill do pass.

Purpose

The purpose of this legislation is to amend Rule 801(d)(1) of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

Background

The Federal Rules of Evidence govern proceedings in federal courts and before United States magistrates. Article VIII of those Rules deals with hearsay evidence, and Rule 801 provides general definitions for Article VIII. Subdivision (d)(1) of Rule 801 defines certain statements not to be hearsay and therefore not inadmissible under Rule 802, which makes hearsay statements generally inadmissible.

When the Federal Rules of Evidence bill (H.R. 5463) passed the House on February 6, 1974, by a vote of 377 to 13, it contained the following provision:

A statement is not hearsay if ... the defendant testifies at the trial or hearing and is subject to cross-examination concerning the statement, and the statement is ... (C) one of identification of a person made after perceiving him. [Emphasis added.]

The Senate-passed version of H.R. 5463 omitted the italicized language.

The House-Senate Conference Committee on H.R. 5463 met in December 1974 to iron out the differences between the House and Senate versions of the bill. The Senate strenuously insisted upon its version of Rule 801(d)(1); in fact, it was indicated that any compromise that included the House version of the rule would face extended discussion during the Senate debate. In the face of this, the House Conferees agreed to the Senate version of Rule 801(d)(1).

S. 1549, which is cosponsored in the Senate by Senators Philip A. Hart, John L. McClellan and Roman Hruska, seeks to put back into Rule 801(d)(1) the language that was struck at Conference. In other words, the Senate is now acceding to the House version of Rule 801(d)(1).

Analysis of the Bill

Rule 801(d)(1)(C), as it is proposed to read, has a precondition to the use of the out-of-court statement of identification. The person who made the statement (the "declarant") must testify at the trial or hearing and must be subject to cross-examination concerning the statement. Even if this precondition is met, the out-of-court statement of identification must still meet constitutional standards. If the precondition is satisfied and the constitutional standards are met, then the out-of-court statement of identification is admissible.

A. Constitutional Standards

Out-of-court statements of identification can be made in different contexts. They can be made at a preindictment or a postindictment lineup. They can be made at a one-person showup that takes place shortly after the crime. They can also be made after being shown a series of photographs.

When there is a postindictment lineup, the Constitution requires that the defendant's counsel be present. United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967) . When there is a preindictment lineup, there is no requirement that defendant's counsel be present. Kirby v. Illinois, 406 U.S. 682 (1972) . Likewise, when a group of photographs is shown to someone, there is no requirement that the defendant's lawyer be present. Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377 (1968) .

Out-of-court identification procedures -- including lineups, showups and displays of photographs -- must meet the due process standard of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution. Kirby v. Illinois, 406 U.S. 682 (1972) (preindictment lineup); Foster v. California, 394 U.S. 440 (1969) (preindictment lineup followed by face-to-face showup); Stovall v. Denno, 388 U.S. 293 (1967) (one-person showup); Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377 (1968) (display of photographs). The due process standard requires looking at the totality of the circumstances to determine whether the identification procedure was "unnecessarily suggestive and conducive to irreparably mistaken identification." Kirby v. Illinois, 406 U.S. 682, 691 (1972) .

If the identification procedure does not measure up to the Constitutional standard, then the witness' out-of-court statement is not admissible. Furthermore, the witness cannot make an in-court identification unless there is clear and convincing evidence that there is an independent basis for the in-court identification. United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967) ; Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263 (1967) .

B. Case Law

There was a split among the authorities as to whether out-of-court statements of identification are admissible. See Annot., 71 A.L.R.2d 449 .

The recent trend, however, is to admit the prior identification under the exception that admits as substantive evidence a prior communication by a witness who is available for cross-examination at trial.

Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263, 272 n.3 (1967) .

Federal courts admit out-of-court statements of identification. See, e.g., United States v. Miller, 381 F.2d 529 (2d Cir. 1967) (photographic display); United States v. Shannon, 424 F.2d 475 (3d Cir. 1970) , cert. denied, 400 U.S. 844 (photographic display followed by one-person showup); Bolling v. United States, 18 F.2d 863 (4th Cir. 1927) (on-the-scene identification); United States v. Fabio, 394 F.2d 132 (4th Cir. 1968) (preindictment lineup); United States v. Cooper, 472 F.2d 64 (5th Cir. 1973) , cert. denied, 414 U.S. 840 (photographic display); United States v. Lincoln, 494 F.2d 833 (9th Cir. 1974) (photographic display); Eidson v. United States, 272 F.2d 684 (10th Cir. 1959) (preindictment lineup); Clemons v. United States, 408 F.2d 1230 (D.C. Cir. 1968) (cellblock confrontation).

Thus, Rule 801(d)(1)(C) as proposed in S. 1549 is fully consistent with current Federal case law. Federal case law treats such statements as exceptions to the hearsay rule; Rule 801(d)(1)(C) defines them not to be hearsay. The result is the same in either instance -- the statement is admissible if the person who made it testifies and is subject to cross-examination.

C. Rationale

Courtroom identifications can be very suggestive. The defendant is known to be present and generally sits in a certain location. Out-of-court identifications are generally more reliable. They take place relatively soon after the offense, while the incident is still reasonably fresh in the witness' mind. Out-of-court identifications are particularly important in jurisdictions where there may be a long delay between arrest or indictment and trial. As time goes by, a witness' memory will fade and his identification will become less reliable. An early, out-of-court identification provides fairness to defendants by ensuring accuracy of the identification. At the same time, it aids the government by making sure that delays in the criminal justice system do not lead to cases falling through because the witness can no longer recall the identity of the person he saw commit the crime.

The justification for not admitting out-of-court statements of identification was stated in the Senate Report on the Federal Rules of Evidence bill (H.R. 5463) to be a "concern that a person could be convicted solely upon evidence admitted under this [exception]." Senate Report No. 93-1277, at 16. However, Rule 801(d)(1) is not addressed to the issue of the sufficiency of evidence but to the issue of its admissibility. This was pointed out in Senate Report on the Federal Rules of Evidence in reference to subdivision (A) of Rule 801(d)(1).

It would appear that some of the opposition to this Rule is based on a concern that a person could be convicted solely upon evidence admissible under this Rule. The Rule, however, is not addressed to the question of the sufficiency of evidence to send a case to the jury, but merely to its admissibility.

Senate Report No. 93--1277, at 16 n.20.

Conclusion

S. 1549 will put into the Federal Rules of Evidence the prevailing Federal practice and will reinstate language that the House overwhelmingly approved last Congress. It will simply provide that out-of-court identifications are admissible if they meet constitutional requirements. The Committee recommends passage of S. 1549.

...

[5] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

Rule 801 defines what is and what is not hearsay for the purpose of admitting a prior statement as substantive evidence. A prior statement of a witness at a trial or hearing which is inconsistent with his testimony is, of course, always admissible for the purpose of impeaching the witness' credibility.

As submitted by the Supreme Court, subdivision (d)(1)(A) made admissible as substantive evidence the prior statement of a witness inconsistent with his present testimony.

The House severely limited the admissibility of prior inconsistent statements by adding a requirement that the prior statement must have been subject to cross-examination, thus precluding even the use of grand jury statements. The requirement that the prior statement must have been subject to cross-examination appears unnecessary since this rule comes into play only when the witness testifies in the present trial. At that time, he is on the stand and can explain an earlier position and be cross-examined as to both.

The requirement that the statement be under oath also appears unnecessary. Notwithstanding the absence of an oath contemporaneous with the statement, the witness, when on the stand, qualifying or denying the prior statement, is under oath. In any event, of all the many recognized exceptions to the hearsay rule, only one (former testimony) requires that the out-of-court statement have been made under oath. With respect to the lack of evidence of the demeanor of the witness at the time of the prior statement, it would be difficult to improve upon Judge Learned Hand's observation that when the jury decides that the truth is not what the witness says now but what he said before, they are still deciding from what they see and hear in court.

The rule as submitted by the Court has positive advantages. The prior statement was made nearer in time to the events, when memory was fresher and intervening influences had not been brought into play. A realistic method is provided for dealing with the turncoat witness who changes his story on the stand.

New Jersey, California, and Utah have adopted a rule similar to this one; and Nevada, New Mexico, and Wisconsin have adopted the identical Federal rule.

For all of these reasons, we think the House amendment should be rejected and the rule as submitted by the Supreme Court reinstated. [It would appear that some of the opposition to this Rule is based on a concern that a person could be convicted solely upon evidence admissible under this Rule. The Rule, however, is not addressed to the question of the sufficiency of evidence to send a case to the jury, but merely as to its admissibility. Factual circumstances could well arise where, if this were the sole evidence, dismissal would be appropriate.]

As submitted by the Supreme Court and as passed by the House, subdivision (d)(1)(C) of Rule 801 made admissible the prior statement identifying a person made after perceiving him. The committee decided to delete this provision because of the concern that a person could be convicted solely upon evidence admissible under this subdivision.

The House approved the long-accepted rule that "a statement by a co-conspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy" is not hearsay as it was submitted by the Supreme Court. While the rule refers to a co-conspirator, it is this committee's understanding that the rule is meant to carry forward the universally accepted doctrine that a joint venturer is considered as a co-conspirator for the purposes of this rule even though no conspiracy has been charged. United States v. Rinaldi, 393 F.2d 97, 99 (2d Cir.) , cert. denied, 393 U.S. 913 (1968) ; United States v. Spencer, 415 F.2d 1301, 1304 (7th Cir., 1969) . [Except for footnote 21 which is included in brackets in the second to the last paragraph, all footnotes are deleted. -- Ed.]

[Editor's Note: The following excerpt is from Senate Report, No. 94-199, 94th Cong., 1st Sess. (1975), relating to the amendment adding subdivision 801 (d)(1)(C) to the Federal Rule.]

> The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 1549) to amend the Federal Rules of Evidence for certain courts and proceedings, having considered the same, reports favorably thereon and recommends that the bill do pass.
>
> Purpose

The purpose of this legislation is to amend the Federal Rules of Evidence to make clear that nonsuggestive lineup, photographic and other identifications, made in compliance with the Constitution, are admissible in evidence.

Statement

The Federal Rules of Evidence, as submitted by the Supreme Court and passed by the House of Representatives, included the following provision in Rule 801(d)(1)(C):

A statement is not hearsay if ... the declarant testifies at the trial or hearing and is subject to cross-examination concerning the statement, and the statement is ... one of identification of a person made after perceiving him. [Emphasis supplied.]

A similar provision was contained in the Preliminary Draft of the Proposed Rules (March 1969), the Revised Draft (March 1971), the Judicial Conference Proposed Draft, and the Supreme Court Draft (November 1972).

Senator Philip A. Hart (for himself and Senators Hruska and McClellan) introduced S. 1549 on April 29, 1975, to add a new subparagraph (d)(1) to Rule 801, Definitions, of Article VIII (Hearsay).

The purpose of the provision was to make clear, in line with the recent law in the area, that nonsuggestive lineup, photographic and other identifications are not hearsay and therefore are admissible. In the lineup case of Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263, 272 n. 3 (1967) , the Supreme Court, noting the split of authority in admitting prior out-of-court identifications, stated, "The recent trend, however, is to admit the prior identification under the exception [to the hearsay rule] that admits as substantive evidence a prior communication by a witness who is available for cross-examination at the trial." And the Federal Courts of Appeals have generally admitted these identifications. See, e.g., Clemons v. United States, 408 F.2d 1230 (D.C. Cir. 1968) (en banc), cert. denied, 394 U.S. 964 (1969) ; United States v. Miller, 381 F.2d 529, 538 (2d Cir. 1967) (Friendly, J.); Eidson v. United States, 272 F.2d 684, 686 (10th Cir. 1959) . See also 4 Wigmore, Evidence, § 1130 (Chadbourn rev. 1972) which strongly supports admissibility of prior identifications. Additional authority is collected in Rothstein, Understanding the New Federal Rules of Evidence, pp. 385-86, 390, and 669-70 (1975 Supplement).

In the course of processing the Rules of Evidence in the final weeks of the 93rd Congress, the provision excluding such statements of identification from the hearsay category was deleted. Although there was no suggestion in the committee report that prior identifications are not probative, concern was there expressed that a conviction could be based upon such unsworn, out-of-court testimony. Upon further reflection, that concern appears misdirected. First, this exception is addressed to the "admissibility" of evidence and not to the "sufficiency" of evidence to prove guilt. Secondly, except for the former testimony exception to the hearsay exclusion, all hearsay exceptions allow into evidence statements which may not have been made under oath. Moreover, under this rule, unlike a significant majority of the hearsay exceptions, the prior identification is admissible only when the person who made it testifies at trial and is subject to cross-examination. This assures that if any discrepancy occurs between the witness' in-court and out-of-court testimony, the opportunity is available to probe, with the witness under oath, the reasons for that discrepancy so that the trier of fact might determine which statement is to be believed.

Upon reflection, then, it appears the rule is desirable. Since these identifications take place reasonably soon after an offense has been committed, the witness' observations are still fresh in his mind. The identification occurs before his recollection has been dimmed by the passage of time. Equally as important, it also takes place before the defendant or some other party has had the opportunity, through bribe or threat, to influence the witness to change his mind.

Both experience and psychological studies suggest that identifications consisting of nonsuggestive lineups, photographic spreads, or similar identifications, made reasonably soon after the offense, are most [sic] reliable than in-court identifications. Admitting these prior identifications therefore provides greater fairness to both the prosecution and defense in a criminal trial. See McCormick, Evidence, 602 (2d ed. 1972). Their exclusion would thus be detrimental to the fair administration of justice.

That the trier of fact, whether it be judge or jury, cannot properly perform its function if highly probative and constitutional identification evidence is kept from it has been recognized by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in an en banc decision in Clemons v. United States, 408 F.2d at 1243 :

The rationale behind the exclusion of hearsay evidence has little force in the case of witnesses ... who are available for cross-examination. We also think that juries in criminal cases, before being called upon to decide the awesome question of guilt or innocence, are entitled to know more of the circumstances which culminate in a courtroom identification -- an event which, standing alone, often means very little to a conscientious and intelligent juror, who routinely expects the witnesses to identify the defendant in court and who may not attach great weight to such an identification in the absence of corroboration.

For these reasons, evidence of an earlier identification made by a person who is now testifying at the trial should not be treated as inadmissible hearsay.

Again, it should be emphasized that though the rule makes prior identifications admissible, they still must meet constitutional muster. In Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 218 (1967) , the Supreme Court held that the Sixth Amendment right to assistance of counsel applied to lineup identifications. Even though the Court held that the right to counsel applied only to post-indictment lineups, Kirby v. Illinois, 406 U.S. 682 (1972) , other cases make clear that the Due Process Clause is applicable to all pretrial lineups and that it forbids a lineup that is unnecessarily suggestive and conducive to mistaken identification. Stovall v. Denno, 388 U.S. 293 (1967) ; Foster v. California, 394 U.S. 440 (1969) . Having the identifying witness on the stand (which is required by the first clause of Rule 801(d)(1)), coupled with these constitutional safeguards, provide adequate assurances of trustworthiness to warrant the admissibility of such prior identifications.

Finally, the committee notes that several States which have adopted Evidence Codes in the last few years have included a rule which provides for the admissibility of prior identifications. Cal. Evid. Code § 1238 (West 1966); Kan. Civ. Pro. Stat. Ann. § 60-460(a) (Vernon 1964); Nev. Rev. Stat. § 51.035(2)(c) (1973); New Jersey Evidence Rule § 63(1)(c); N.M. Stat. Ann. § 20-4-801(d)(1)(C) (1973); N.Y. Crim. Pro. § 60.25 (McKinney Supp. 1971); Utah Rules of Evidence § 63(1) (1971); Wis. Stat. Ann. § 908.01(4)(a) (Spec. Pamphlet 1974); Proposed Maine Rules of Evidence § 801(d)(1)(C) (Tent. Draft. Dec. 1974).

Conclusion

For these reasons, the committee recommends that the bill do pass.

[6] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

Rule 801 supplies some basic definitions for the rules of evidence that deal with hearsay. Rule 801(d)(1) defines certain statements as not hearsay. The Senate amendments make two changes in it.

The House bill provides that a statement is not hearsay if the declarant testifies and is subject to cross-examination concerning the statement and if the statement is inconsistent with his testimony and was given under oath subject to cross-examination and subject to the penalty of perjury at a trial or hearing or in a deposition. The Senate amendment drops the requirement that the prior statement be given under oath subject to cross-examination and subject to the penalty of perjury at a trial or hearing or in a deposition.

The Conference adopts the Senate amendment with an amendment, so that the rule now requires that the prior inconsistent statement be given under oath subject to the penalty of perjury at a trial, hearing, or other proceeding, or in a deposition. The rule as adopted covers statements before a grand jury. Prior inconsistent statements may, of course, be used for impeaching the credibility of a witness. When the prior inconsistent statement is one made by a defendant in a criminal case, it is covered by Rule 801(d)(2).

The House bill provides that a statement is not hearsay if the declarant testifies and is subject to cross-examination concerning the statement and the statement is one of identification of a person made after perceiving him. The Senate amendment eliminated this provision.

The Conference adopts the Senate amendment. [This was changed by subsequent amendment as noted above. -- Ed.]

[7] 1997 Amendment Committee Note

1997 Amendment Committee Note

Rule 801(d)(2) has been amended in order to respond to three issues raised by Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) . First, the amendment codifies the holding in Bourjaily by stating expressly that a court shall consider the contents of a coconspirator's statement in determining "the existence of the conspiracy and the participation therein of the declarant and the party against whom the statement is offered." According to Bourjaily, Rule 104(a) requires these preliminary questions to be established by a preponderance of the evidence.

Second, the amendment resolves an issue on which the Court had reserved decision. It provides that the contents of the declarant's statement do not alone suffice to establish a conspiracy in which the declarant and the defendant participated. The court must consider in addition the circumstances surrounding the statement, such as the identity of the speaker, the context in which the statement was made, or evidence corroborating the contents of the statement in making its determination as to each preliminary question. This amendment is in accordance with existing practice. Every court of appeals that has resolved this issue requires some evidence in addition to the contents of the statement. See, e.g., United States v. Beckham, 968 F.2d 47, 51 (D.C. Cir. 1992) ; United States v. Sepulveda, 15 F.3d 1161, 1181-82 (1st Cir. 1993) , cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 2714 (1994) ; United States v. Daly, 842 F.2d 1380, 1386 (2d Cir.) , cert. denied, 488 U.S. 821 (1988) ; United States v. Clark, 18 F.3d 1337, 1341-42 (6th Cir.) , cert. denied, 115 S. Ct. 152 (1994) ; United States v. Zambrana, 841 F.2d 1320, 1344-45 (7th Cir. 1988) ; United States v. Silverman, 861 F.2d 571, 577 (9th Cir. 1988) ; United States v. Gordon, 844 F.2d 1397, 1402 (9th Cir. 1988) ; United States v. Hernandez, 829 F.2d 988, 993 (10th Cir. 1987) , cert. denied, 485 U.S. 1013 (1988) ; United States v. Byrom, 910 F.2d 725, 736 (11th Cir. 1990) .

Third, the amendment extends the reasoning of Bourjaily to statements offered under subdivisions (C) and (D) of Rule 801(d)(2). In Bourjaily, the Court rejected treating foundation facts pursuant to the law of agency in favor of an evidentiary approach governed by Rule 104(a). The Advisory Committee believes it appropriate to treat analogously preliminary questions relating to the declarant's authority under subdivision (C), and the agency or employment relationship and the scope thereof under subdivision (D).

[8] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Letter from Hon. John L. McClellan to Hon. Albert B. Maris, August 12, 1971, in Supplement to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 47, 57-59 (1973), [Exhibit I to Letter from Hon. John L. McClellan to Hon. William L. Hungate, May 2, 1973].

Letter from Hon. Albert B. Maris to Herbert E. Hoffman, May 30, 1973, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 98 (1973).

Letter from Edward W. Cleary to Herbert E. Hoffman, May 31, 1973, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 98-99 (1973).

Letter from James F. Schaeffer to Hon. William L. Hungate, June 22, 1973, and accompanying material, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 122, 125-29 (1973).

Debate in the House of Representatives, 120 Cong. Rec. H560--H563 (daily ed. February 6, 1974).

Letter from Hon. Roszel C. Thomsen to Hon. James O. Eastland, May 22, 1974, and accompanying material, in Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 53-54, 64-66 (1974).

Testimony of Edward W. Cleary, June 4, 1974, Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 50-52 (1974).

Testimony of J. Francis Paschal, June 4, 1974, Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 90 (1974).

Prepared Statement of W. Vincent Rakestraw, June 5, 1974, in Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 109, 111-12 (1974).

Testimony and Statement of Herbert Semmel, June 5, 1974, Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 299, 301-04, 307-18 (1974).

[The following citations relate to the amendment adding subdivision 801(d)(1)(C) to the Rule.]

Debate in the Senate, 121 Cong. Rec. S7128--S7129 (daily ed. April 30, 1975); 121 Cong. Rec. S11098--S11099 (daily ed. June 18, 1975); 121 Cong. Rec. S17713 (daily ed. Oct. 7, 1975).

Debate in the House of Representatives, 121 Cong. Rec. H9653--H9655 (daily ed. Oct. 6, 1975).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
Supp. To CHAPTER 801 RULE 801

4-801 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 801, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

ARTICLE VIII. HEARSAY	ARTICLE VIII. HEARSAY
Rule 801. Definitions	Rule 801. Definitions That Apply to This Article; Exclusions from Hearsay

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement. A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(a) Statement. "Statement" means a person's oral assertion, written assertion, or nonverbal conduct, if the person intended it as an assertion.

(b) Declarant. A "declarant" is a person who

(b) Declarant. "Declarant" means the person

	makes a statement.		who made the statement.
(c)	Hearsay. "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter as-	(c)	Hearsay. "Hearsay" means a statement that:

	serted.
	(1) the declarant does not make while testifying at the current trial or hearing; and
	(2) a party offers in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted in the statement.
(d)	Statements	(d)	Statements

nts which are not hearsay. A statement is not hearsay if --	nts That Are Not Hearsay. A statement that meets the following conditions is not hearsay:
(1) Prior statement by witness. The declarant testifies at the trial or hearing and is subject to cros		(1)	A Declarant-Witness's Prior Statement. The declarant testifies and is subject to cross-ex-

sexami nation
con-cerni ng
the state men t,
and
the state men t is (A) inconsistent with the de-clar-ant's testi mon
y, and was given under oath subject to
the penalty of perjury at a trial, heari ng,

ami
nation abou t a prior state men t,
and
the state men
t:

or other proceeding, or in a deposition, or (B) consistent with the declarant's testimony and is offered to rebut an express or implied charge against the declarant of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive, or (C) one of identification of a person made after perceiving the person; or

(A) is inconsistent with the declarant's testimony and was given under penalty of perjury at a trial, hearing, or other proceeding or in a deposition;

(B) is consistent with the declarant's testimony and is offered to rebut an express or implied charge that the de-clar-

ant recentl y fabric-ated it or acted from a recent improp er in-fluence
or moti ve in so testi fy-ing;
or

(C) iden tifie s a person as som eone
the de-clarant perceiv ed
earli er.

(2) Admission by (2) An Opposing party-opponent. The statement is offered against a party and is (A) the party's own statement, in either an individual or a representative capacity or (B) a statement of which the party has man Party's Statement . The statement is offered against an opposing party and:

ifes-ted an adoption
or belief in its truth
, or (C) a state men t by a person authorized by
the part y to mak e a state men t con-cerni ng
the subject,
or (D) a state men t by
the part y's agen t or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship, or (E) a statement by a coconspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy. The contents of the statement shall be considered but are not alone sufficient to establish the declarant's authority under subdivision (C), the agency or employ men t relationship

and scop e there of under sub-division
(D), or
the exist-ence
of
the conspiracy
and
the particip atio n
there in of the de-clarant
and
the part y agai nst who m
the state ment is offered under subdivision (E).

(A) was made by the party in an individual or representative capacity;

(B) is one the party manifested that it adopted or believed to be true;

(C) was made by a person whom the party authorized to make a statement on the subject;

(D) was made by the party's agent or employee on a matter within the scope of that relationship and while it existed; or

(E) was made by the party's coconspirator during and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

The statement must be considered but does not by itself establish the declarant's authority under (C); the existence or scope of the relationship under (D); or the existence of the conspiracy or participation in it under (E).

Committee Note

The language of Rule 801 has been amended as part of the general restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Statements falling under the hearsay exclusion provided by Rule 801(d)(2) are no longer referred to as "admissions" in the title to the subdivision. The term "admissions" is confusing because not all statements covered by the exclusion are admissions in the colloquial sense -- a statement can be within the exclusion even if it "admitted" nothing and was not against the party's interest when made. The term "admissions" also raises confusion in comparison with the Rule 804(b)(3) exception for declarations against interest. No change in application of the exclusion is intended.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
Supp. To CHAPTER 801 RULE 801

4-801 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 801.03

Supp. to § 801.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Rule 801(a) -- Statement [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 801(a) -- Assertive Conduct

United States v. Martinez, 588 F.3d 301 (6th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for health care fraud, the government offered, to prove that the defendant's manner of giving pain injections was improper, a video it had commissioned in which a physician demonstrated the proper manner for giving the injections. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit the video. All portions of the video were "statements": not only the oral and written verbal parts, but also the depictions of the physician's conduct, which was nonverbal conduct intended as an assertion of the proper way to do the procedure. The statements were offered for the truth of the assertion that that was the way to give the injection. And no hearsay exception applied. In particular, this video did not come within the learned treatise exception of Rule 803(18) because it was prepared for litigation purposes, not subject to peer review or public scrutiny, and not prepared primarily for professionals with the reputation of the author at stake.

[2] Rule 801(c) -- Hearsay [Go To Main]

[b] Rule 801(c) -- Confrontation Clause Inapplicable to Nonhearsay

United States v. Hansen, 434 F.3d 92 (1st Cir. 2006) : The Court held that the admission of an undercover informant's statements, made in a conversation with the defendant, did not violate the Confrontation Clause, because they were not offered for their truth but rather to provide context for the defendant's own statements.

United States v. Paulino, 445 F.3d 211 (2d Cir. 2006) : The Court stated: "It has long been the rule that so long as statements are not presented for the truth of the matter asserted, but only to establish a context, the defendant's Sixth Amendment rights are not transgressed. Nothing in Crawford v. Washington is to the contrary."

United States v. Warman, 578 F.3d 320 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed drug conspiracy convictions, finding no error in admitting an agent's testimony regarding the roles of various members of a motorcycle gang in selling drugs, based on "information he had developed" from various cooperators and informants. The Court said that "although the ... statements ... may be testimonial in nature, they were not offered for the truth of the matter asserted, but rather, merely to provide background about the FBI's investigation of the [gang] and [the defendant]. Because they do not go to the heart of the government's case against [the defendant], they do not violate the Confrontation Clause." In United States v. Powers, 500 F.3d 500 (6th Cir. 2007) , in a drug prosecution, a law enforcement officer testified that he had received information about the defendant's prior criminal activity from a confidential informant. Affirming, the Court held it was both evidentiary and constitutional error (but harmless) to admit the informant's statements. It rejected the government's argument that even though the informant's statements were testimonial (because made to a police officer in anticipation of litigation), they were not hearsay, because they were not offered for their truth but rather "to show why the police conducted a sting operation" against the defendant, and accordingly did not violate Crawford. The Court reasoned that "details about Defendant's alleged prior criminal behavior were not necessary to set the context of the sting operation for the jury. The prosecution could have established context simply by stating that the police set up a sting operation."

[d] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Hearsay

[i] Rule 801(c) -- Civil Cases

Alpert v. United States, 481 F.3d 404 (6th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the IRS in a taxpayer's action for a refund, holding that an affidavit by the taxpayer that certain named creditors and other unsecured creditors had written off the debt of his subchapter-S corporation in particular years was insufficient to establish a discharge of debt at that time. The statement regarding the writing off of debts by the named creditors was apparently based solely on information that the taxpayer received from elsewhere and was thus inadmissible hearsay.

Gunville v. Walker, 583 F.3d 979 (7th Cir. 2009) : Affirming summary judgment for state officials sued by former employees who alleged that their termination violated their First and Fourteenth Amendment rights, the Court held that testimony by an assistant to a state personnel manager that the manager told her that voter records were "pulled" for certain personnel decisions was hearsay because it was offered to prove that the records were in fact pulled. In Schindler v. Seiler, 474 F.3d 1008 (7th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in a defamation action by a neurosurgeon who alleged that the defendant accused him of paralyzing patients. It held that testimony by the defendant, that another doctor told him that the plaintiff had said the defendant was a bad doctor who had paralyzed four patients, was inadmissible hearsay. Although statements that constitute slander are not hearsay, the doctor's out-of-court assertion that the plaintiff made the statement was hearsay.

Mason v. Corr. Med. Servs., Inc., 559 F.3d 880 (8th Cir. 2009) : In an inmate's action for alleged indifference to his medical needs, the plaintiff attempted to prove that the prison's medical director was aware of his situation by offering testimony of another inmate that he heard a prison physician confer on the telephone with a person addressed as the medical director. Affirming summary judgment for the medical director, the Court held the testimony was hearsay, as it was an out-of-court statement by the physician offered to prove that the medical director was the person on the other end of the phone. In Moore v. Indehar, 514 F.3d 756 (8th Cir. 2008) , a § 1983 action, an arrestee suing for excessive force offered a police report by a colleague of the arresting officer and the colleague's recommendation that the officer receive a Medal of Honor, to prove the officer's intent to target the arrestee. The Court held that the Trial Judge properly disregarded the documents when ruling on the defendant' summary judgment motion, as they were hearsay and thus inadmissible.

McInnis v. Fairfield Communities, Inc., 458 F.3d 1129 (10th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a Title VII gender discrimination action, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of emails written by a supervisor. The statements were not admissible as nonhearsay to prove the employer's state of mind in making an employment decision, because neither the declarant nor the addressees made the termination decision at issue in the case.

[ii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Hearsay -- Criminal Cases

[A] Rule 801(c) -- Defense Evidence

United States v. Davis, 596 F.3d 852 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : The national treasurer of a fraternity was charged with writing checks to cash and depositing them into his personal bank account. In support of his claim that he had used funds derived from those checks to pay fraternity expenses, he offered testimony from his wife that she had seen him making payments for fraternity expenses. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the wife's testimony, as her only knowledge that the expenses were the fraternity's came from hearsay statements by the defendant or on bills that she saw.

United States v. Guzman, 603 F.3d 99 (1st Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed an arson conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in limiting the defendant's cross-examination of a former cellmate as to what the defendant told the cellmate that the defendant's lawyers had said to him. The defense was permitted to try to establish that the cellmate's testimony may have been influenced by what he learned about the details of the arson from discovery documents in the cell, but was not permitted to try to prove through the cellmate the truth of statements made by the defendant himself.

United States v. Hoffecker, 530 F.3d 137 (3d Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for mail and wire fraud arising from a commodities-sales scheme, the Court found no error when the defense was not permitted to play the entirety of a tape recording, portions of which the government had offered as admissions by a party-opponent. The recording was of a presentation made by the defendant to a government undercover operation he was seeking to recruit as a boiler-room. The defendant argued that it was evidence of his state of mind -- that the program was always to be operated in a legitimate manner -- but the Court found that the statements were simply exculpatory, made to people he had every reason to sign on to sell aggressively for his own gain. Furthermore, they were not necessary to explain or place in context the portions admitted or any other evidence or testimony.

[B] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Hearsay -- Criminal Cases -- Official and Confidential Informants

United States v. Cabrera-Rivera, 583 F.3d 26 (1st Cir. 2009) : In a robbery prosecution, the government offered statements that accomplices made to police officers, arguing that the statements were not offered for their truth, but rather to explain how the government was able to find other evidence in the case. The Court rejected the argument, since the government at trial emphasized the details of the accusations that had nothing to do with leading the government to other evidence, and the government did not contend that one of the accomplice's confessions led to any other evidence. Because the statements were testimonial, and because they were in fact offered for their truth, admission of the statements violated Crawford. In United States v. Benitez-Avila, 570 F.3d 364 (1st Cir. 2009) , a prosecution of an armed robbery that took place outside a gas station owned by the victim's husband, a federal agent testified that the husband told him that the husband had received a tip from an informant who said that one of the assailants was known as "Gemelo," which means twin in Spanish, and that the agent had established that the defendant was a twin by examining mugshots of the defendant and his deceased twin brother. The Court found that the testimony about the husband's statement was double hearsay. It was not admissible for the not-for-truth purpose of showing the basis for the agent's focusing his investigation, because that "was not a relevant issue in the trial." Although "prosecutors, in an effort to make the evidence of defendants' guilt more lively and to captivate the jurors with the drama of the hunt for the solution to the crime, will often organize the presentation of the evidence of guilt in the form or a narrative of the investigation," "[t]he issue in a criminal trial, upon which the government bears the burden of proof, is whether the evidence proves the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt," and "[w]hether government agents had a reasonable, good faith basis for investigating the defendant is a completely different question, which is not in issue unless the defendant puts it in issue." The Court concluded that a prosecutor "cannot justify the receipt of prejudicial, inadmissible evidence simply by calling it 'background' or 'context' evidence, or by asserting that it has a nonhearsay relevance to an issue that is itself not relevant." Admission of the hearsay evidence was harmless error, however. In United States v. Maher, 454 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2006) , at the defendant's drug trial, several accusatory statements from an informant (Johnson) were admitted ostensibly to explain why the police focused on the defendant as a possible drug dealer. The Court found that these statements were testimonial under Crawford v. Washington, because "the statements were made while the police were interrogating Johnson after Johnson's arrest for drugs; Johnson agreed to cooperate and he then identified Maher as the source of drugs... . In this context, it is clear that an objectively reasonable person in Johnson's shoes would understand that the statement would be used in prosecuting Maher at trial." Rejecting the argument that there was no Confrontation Clause violation because the statements were not admitted for their truth, the Court explained:

> The government's articulated justification -- that any statement by an informant to police which sets context for the police investigation is not offered for the truth of the statements and thus not within Crawford -- is impossibly overbroad ... [and] may be used not just to get around hearsay law, but to circumvent Crawford's constitutional rule... . Here, Officer MacVane testified that the confidential informant had said Maher was a drug dealer, even though the prosecution easily could have structured its narrative to avoid such testimony. The ... officer, for example, could merely say that he had acted upon "information received," or words to that effect. It appears the testimony was primarily given exactly for the truth of the assertion that Maher was a drug dealer and should not have been admitted given the adequate alternative approach.

However, the Court found no plain error, noting, inter alia, that the testimony was followed immediately by a sua sponte instruction not to use Johnson's statements for their truth.

United States v. Warman, 578 F.3d 320 (6th Cir. 2009) : Affirming drug conspiracy convictions, the Court held it was plain error (but harmless) to admit an agent's testimony that an informant had identified the defendant as a supplier of narcotics to the conspiracy. The statement was hearsay and testimonial, so its admission violated the Confrontation Clause. In United States v. Powers, 500 F.3d 500 (6th Cir. 2007) , in a drug prosecution, a law enforcement officer testified that he had received information about the defendant's prior criminal activity from a confidential informant. Affirming, the Court held it was both evidentiary and constitutional error (but harmless) to admit the informant's statements. It rejected the government's argument that even though the informant's statements were testimonial (because made to a police officer in anticipation of litigation), they were not hearsay, because they were not offered for their truth but rather "to show why the police conducted a sting operation" against the defendant, and accordingly did not violate Crawford. The Court reasoned that "details about Defendant's alleged prior criminal behavior were not necessary to set the context of the sting operation for the jury. The prosecution could have established context simply by stating that the police set up a sting operation." In United States v. Caver, 470 F.3d 220 (6th Cir. 2006) , the court affirmed convictions for cocaine offenses, holding it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony by a police officer that a sergeant briefed other officers and said that Caver was responsible for dealing a lot of drugs in a certain area. Although the government argued that the testimony provided background information explaining how law enforcement became involved with Caver, the Court found that Caver was arrested when a drug deal was spotted, at a time when the background information had nothing to do with the arrest. Thus, the only purpose for offering the testimony was for the truth of the sergeant's accusations, and the sergeant's statements were therefore hearsay.

United States v. Anderson, 450 F.3d 294 (7th Cir. 2006) : Affirming convictions for crack cocaine distribution, the Court held it was plain (but harmless) Confrontation Clause error for the investigating agent to testify about what a nontestifying informant had told him about the defendants.

United States v. Singh, 494 F.3d 653 (8th Cir. 2007) : Affirming convictions for methamphetamine distribution, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony by a detective recounting statements by a confidential informant regarding interactions with a defendant. The statements were hearsay and the declarant was not speaking as a coconspirator in furtherance of the conspiracy but as a cooperating informer.

United States v. Hinson, 585 F.3d 1328 (10th Cir. 2009) : In a drug case, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit, as explaining the "background" of the police investigation, out-of-court statements to police officers that implicated the defendant in drug activity. It found that the accusations were not necessary to prove the context of the police investigation because the government had already offered admissible evidence to prove how the police focused their investigation on the defendant, and it noted that "a prosecutor cannot justify the receipt of prejudicial, inadmissible evidence simply by calling it 'background' or 'context' evidence." It also observed that when evidence is introduced that bears on the ultimate issue in the case but is not necessary to explain the background of an investigation, "the only reasonable conclusion we can reach is that the evidence was offered, not as background, but as support for the government's case against the defendant ... . That purpose is impermissible, and this evidence should not have been admitted. Nor should this evidence have been offered by the prosecution."

United States v. Arbolaez, 450 F.3d 1283 (11th Cir. 2006) : In a marijuana prosecution, the government introduced statements made by one of the defendant's accomplices to law enforcement officers during a search, not for truth but to explain the officers' reactions to the statements. Finding admission of the statements error (but harmless), the Court noted that it had held that "testimony as to the details of statements received by a government agent ... even when purportedly admitted not for the truthfulness of what the informant said but to show why the agent did what he did after he received that information constituted inadmissible hearsay." It also found that the accomplice's statements were "testimonial" under Crawford v. Washington, because they were made in response to questions from police officers. In United States v. Baker, 432 F.3d 1189 (11th Cir. 2005) , the Court, reviewing convictions for a cocaine distribution conspiracy, held that it was an abuse of discretion to admit hearsay statements made to various police officers to "explain" the officers' investigation. The Court concluded that the statements were used to prove the truth of the matters asserted.

[C] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Hearsay -- Criminal Cases -- Other Cases

United States v. Al-Moayad, 545 F.3d 139 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed convictions for conspiring to provide material support to designated terrorist organizations (Hamas and Al-Qaeda). The Court found an abuse of discretion in the admission of a mujahidin form during the government's rebuttal case that purported to show that one of the defendants had sponsored a fighter to attend a training camp, since there was no finding about the existence of a conspiracy in which the defendant against whom the form was offered participated. The Court also ruled that the form was not admissible to rebut the "false impression that no evidence corroborated" the testimony of an informant-witness, as hearsay evidence is not admissible for its truth to rebut a false impression created during the defendant's case-in-chief.

United States v. Martinez, 588 F.3d 301 (6th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for health care fraud, the government offered, to prove that the defendant's manner of giving pain injections was improper, a video it had commissioned in which a physician demonstrated the proper manner for giving the injections. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit the video. All portions of the video were "statements": not only the oral and written verbal parts, but also the depictions of the physician's conduct, which was nonverbal conduct intended as an assertion of the proper way to do the procedure. The statements were offered for the truth of the assertion that that was the way to give the injection. And no hearsay exception applied. In particular, this video did not come within the learned treatise exception of Rule 803(18) because it was prepared for litigation purposes, not subject to peer review or public scrutiny, and not prepared primarily for professionals with the reputation of the author at stake.

United States v. DeMarce, 564 F.3d 989 (8th Cir. 2009) : The defendant was convicted for attempted aggravated sexual abuse of his 11-year-old niece after he attempted to rape her in his car. When he dropped her off at home following the incident, she first lied about the source of her injuries, but a few minutes later told the true story, which her mother related at trial. Affirming, the Court held that admission of most of the testimony was error, but harmless. It rejected the government's argument that the testimony was admissible to explain why the mother contacted the police, because the testimony was not restricted at trial to this purpose and was admitted for its truth. It held that the daughter's statement was inadmissible as an excited utterance because the fact that she first fabricated a statement before correcting it demonstrated a level of reflection inconsistent with an excited utterance. The Court held that the daughter's statement was admissible under Rule 803(3) to the extent that she described her physical state at the time of the statement, but not to the extent she described the events leading up to her physical state, as that was an inadmissible statement of memory. In United States v. Wright, 540 F.3d 833 (8th Cir. 2008) , in a prosecution for aggravated child sexual abuse, one witness testified that based on what a victim had told her, she had reported the conversation to the sheriff, including identifying the defendant. Affirming, the Court noted that the testimony would be admissible to provide "background information as to why the police began their investigation," but that it was "not wholly convinced the witnesses' detailed testimony was necessary for background ... , [and] was instead likely offered for the truth of the matter asserted." Any error was harmless, however. Although the Court affirmed a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse of a child in United States v. Two Elk, 536 F.3d 890 (8th Cir. 2008) , it found an abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by an FBI agent that another individual told the agent that he was not involved in any abuse. The other individual was a prime suspect and his denial of culpability was hearsay because it was offered to prove that he did not commit the crime.

United States v. Sine, 493 F.3d 1021 (9th Cir. 2007) : In a mail fraud prosecution, the Court held it was error, but not reversible plain error, to permit the government to ask witnesses on cross-examination questions that incorporated adverse findings by a Judge in related civil litigation. Factual determinations by a Judge in a civil action are inadmissible hearsay not coming within any hearsay exception, and a Judge's findings can unduly affect a jury, which is likely to defer to credibility determinations made by an authoritative, professional factfinder rather than determine those issues for themselves.

United States v. Caraway, 534 F.3d 1290 (10th Cir. 2008) : The defendant was convicted of mailing an explosive to a man who was dating his ex-wife. At trial the government, on direct examination of the defendant's daughter, asked her about a prior statement in which she admitted driving the defendant's son to the post office to mail the explosive. The daughter admitted making the statement but repudiated it. The Court found that it was error (but harmless) to admit the evidence of the daughter's prior statement. It could not at that point have been admitted for impeachment purposes, "because she had not yet testified to the contrary. And it could not be used substantively because for that purpose it would be inadmissible hearsay." The Court also noted that even if the statement were introduced after the daughter testified that she was not involved, it was error for the government to argue its substantive effect to the jury in closing.

[e] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay

[0.1] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Absence of Statements

Gorman v. Wolpoff & Abramson, LLP, 584 F.3d 1147 (9th Cir. 2009) : In an action by a credit card holder against the issuer for violations of the Fair Credit Reporting Act and related claims, the Court, reversing in part, held that the holder's declaration that he had reviewed many of his personal credit reports and none of them included a notice that he disputed delinquent charges was not hearsay. The reports were not being offered for their truth, but to prove that no statement noticing the dispute was contained in them.

[i] Rule 801(c) -- Background or Context

[A] Rule 801(c) -- Civil Cases

Garner v. Missouri Dep't of Mental Health, 439 F.3d 958 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a judgment in a Title VII action against a plaintiff who claimed to have been wrongfully discharged, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony about unsubstantiated allegations against the plaintiff. The allegations were not admitted for their truth but to explain why the supervisor had suspended the plaintiff and started an investigation that ultimately led to the plaintiff's termination on unrelated charges.

[B] Rule 801(c) -- Background or Context -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Hicks, 575 F.3d 130 (1st Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed cocaine-related convictions, finding no error in the admission of a telephone call that the defendant placed from jail in which he instructed his girlfriend how to package and sell cocaine. It held that admission of the girlfriend's statements in the telephone call did not violate the defendant's right to confrontation, because they were admissible not for their truth but to provide the context for understanding the defendant's own incriminating statements. In United States v. Cruz-Diaz, 550 F.3d 169 (1st Cir. 2008) , in a joint trial for bank robbery, one defendant's counsel asked a police officer on cross-examination about the failure of police to pursue various investigatory options after it detained the two defendants. The officer responded by quoting statements by the codefendant that incriminated both. Affirming, the Court held that the statements were not hearsay (and not in violation of Crawford or Bruton) because they were not offered for their truth but only to explain the police actions and respond to a defense picture of police and FBI ineptitude. In United States v. Page, 521 F.3d 101 (1st Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed convictions for cocaine distribution, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting an audiotape of a conversation in which a drug dealer was giving instructions to an associate to give one defendant a share of drug proceeds and the defendant could be heard in the background on the associate's end of the line. The tape was not offered to prove the drug transaction but to prove the trust relationship between the dealer and the defendant. In United States v. Colon-Diaz, 521 F.3d 29 (1st Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed a conviction for drug distribution, finding no plain error in the admission of testimony by an informant that federal agents asked her to go purchase drugs from the defendant's "yellow point" location. The evidence was admitted for the purpose of demonstrating why the informant went to that location, and not to prove that the defendant owned the location. The Court noted that the defense had approved a limiting instruction that the jury "may not take that answer for its veracity, that it was the defendant's yellow point." The Court also pointed out that other testimony by task force members offered to show why they went to the defendant's location or focused on the defendant was admitted to explain their actions, not for its truth, and was accompanied by appropriate limiting instructions.

United States v. Johnson, 529 F.3d 493 (2d Cir. 2008) : The government case agent in a drug conspiracy prosecution testified extensively to the course of the investigation, and in doing so related out-of court statements from various individuals about the defendant's alleged drug activities. The government argued that these accusations were admissible to prove "background," but the Court found error (albeit harmless). In its extensive analysis of such "background" evidence, the Court observed that > the government may be tempted to make its presentation to the jury more compelling, dramatic, and seductive by telling the exciting story of the investigation and how it progressed from suspicion to certitude, and how traps were set which resulted in the defendant's capture, red handed. But the issue to be tried is not how the investigation was conducted, but whether the evidence proves the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. The agent's state of mind as the investigation progressed is ordinarily of little or no relevance to the question of the defendant [sic] guilt. A prosecutor's tactical desire to tell the jury an exciting, captivating story does not justify expanding the scope of admissible evidence to include improper matter, which, although offered as pertinent to the agent's state of mind, may be used by the jury prejudicially as evidence confirming the defendant's guilt. When the evidence is proper with respect to an unimportant issue but improper and prejudicial on a crucially important issue, it is unlikely to pass the balancing test of Rule 403.

In United States v. Dupre, 462 F.3d 131 (2d Cir. 2006) , defendants were convicted for wire fraud in a scheme promising 1000-to-1 returns for funds invested purportedly to unfreeze assets once held by the family of Philippines president Marcos. The Court affirmed, finding no error in the admission of messages from a group of investors, which speculated that the scheme was a fraud. The statements were not hearsay because they were not offered to prove the facts asserted but to provide context for the defendants' responding messages; furthermore, they served to rebut the defendants' argument that they had no reason to know the scheme was fraudulent.

United States v. Price, 458 F.3d 202 (3d Cir. 2006) : The defendant was arrested by backup officers after a surveillance officer observing drug activity saw him remove a gun from his waistband and place it in a car trunk. At trial, the surveillance officer testified to what he had seen, and then the backup officers testified that they moved in after receiving a radio call from the surveillance officer reporting the defendant's possession of a gun. Affirming a conviction for drug and weapon offenses, the Court found no error in permitting the backups to mention the gun as nonhearsay background, as the testimony explained why the surveillance operation had been terminated without amassing any concrete evidence of drug transactions.

United States v. Dunigan, 555 F.3d 501 (5th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a bank robbery conviction, the Court held that an officer's testimony as to out-of-court statements offered solely to explain how police investigated a crime were not hearsay. "Testimony describing an investigation's background should not be needlessly objected to on hearsay grounds where it goes only to how police investigated a crime rather than to the truth of the matter asserted." The Court rejected an argument that the officer's testimony should have been excluded under Rule 403, concluding that the statements were highly probative, because they "explained the investigation's time line and how the defendant was eventually located." In contrast, the prejudice to the defendant was limited because the out-of-court statements "did not implicate his specific car in the robbery but merely eliminated another class of cars."

United States v. Deitz, 577 F.3d 672 (6th Cir. 2009) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no plain error in allowing an FBI agent to testify that agents tailed the defendant to what turned out to be a drug transaction because a confidential informant had reported to them about Deitz's drug activity. The informant's statement was testimonial under Crawford v. Washington, because it was an accusation made to a police officer. However, it was not hearsay, because "it provided mere background information, not facts going to the very heart of the prosecutor's case," so its admission did not violate Deitz's right to confrontation. In United States v. Davis, 577 F.3d 660 (6th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession. It held that the contents of a woman's statement to police that she had recently seen the defendant with a gun in a car she described along with the license plate was not hearsay, because it was not offered to prove the truth of the contents but was used to explain the police investigation that led to the defendant and the defendant's conduct when he learned the police were looking for him. In United States v. Gibbs, 506 F.3d 479 (6th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, holding that testimony by an agent that a parolee told the agent that the defendant had some long guns hidden in his basement bedroom was not offered for its truth, but was offered to explain why the bedroom was searched.

United States v. Taylor, 569 F.3d 742 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no error in the admission of numerous references to statements by a nontestifying eyewitness that "[the defendant] just took a gun across the street." The statement was offered for the nonhearsay purpose of explaining the officers' action, for example, why they looked across the street, why they questioned a person there, and why they handcuffed the defendant when he approached. This was not a situation where the police were "testifying to statements harvested from an ongoing relationship with an informant," but rather the explanation of the police response to a developing potentially dangerous situation." In United States v. Bermea-Boone, 563 F.3d 621 (7th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed cocaine convictions, holding that transcripts of two recorded conversations between coconspirators and the defendant were not hearsay, because they were used to provide context for the defendant's admissions rather than for their truth. Thus, there was no violation of the Confrontation Clause, because the coconspirators did not function as witnesses against the defendant. In United States v. Burt, 495 F.3d 733 (7th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed a conviction on child pornography charges, finding no error in the admission of a properly authenticated Yahoo! chat log of a conversation between the defendant and a government witness. The defendant's statements in the chat were properly admitted as party admissions, and the witness' half of the conversation, being necessary to provide context for the defendant's comments, was not hearsay because it was not offered for the truth of the matter asserted. In United States v. James, 487 F.3d 518 (7th Cir. 2007) , a case arising from a drug transaction between the defendant and an informant, the defense theory was that the defendant was an innocent person who had been set up by the informant, a career criminal looking to save himself from prison and from other drug dealers. After this theory was pursued on the cross-examination of one agent by questions regarding the informant's background, the prosecution was permitted on examination of another agent to ask about the informant's background as a cooperating informant and the informant's experience with the defendant, in order to provide context for the investigation and explain why the government had chosen to work with the defendant. Affirming, the Court found no error in admitting statements recounting the informant's experience with the defendant over a hearsay objection, as statements offered to provide background and context and to bear on credibility, should it become an issue, are not offered to prove the truth of the matters asserted, and the jury was so instructed.

United States v. DeMarce, 564 F.3d 989 (8th Cir. 2009) : The defendant was convicted for attempted aggravated sexual abuse of his 11-year-old niece after he attempted to rape her in his car. When he dropped her off at home following the incident, she first lied about the source of her injuries, but a few minutes later told the true story, which her mother related at trial. Affirming, the Court held that admission of most of the testimony was error, but harmless. It rejected the government's argument that the testimony was admissible to explain why the mother contacted the police, because the testimony was not restricted at trial to this purpose and was admitted for its truth. In United States v. Brown, 560 F.3d 754 (8th Cir. 2009) , a drug conspiracy case, a shooting victim gave a statement to a police officer that accused a person named "Clean" who was accompanied by a man named Charmar. The officer who took this statement testified that he entered "Charmar" into a database to help identify "Clean" and the database search led him to the defendant. The Court found no error in admitting the victim's statement, stating that "it is not hearsay when offered to explain why an officer conducted an investigation in a certain way." The defendant argued that the purported nonhearsay purpose for admitting the evidence "was only a subterfuge to get Williams' statement about Brown before the jury," but the Court responded that the defendant had not argued at trial that the prejudicial effect of the evidence outweighed its nonhearsay value. Further, the Judge twice instructed the jury that the statement was admitted for the limited purpose of understanding why the officer searched the database for Charmar. Finally, because the statement was not offered for its truth, "it does not implicate the confrontation clause."

United States v. Cesareo-Ayala, 576 F.3d 1120 (10th Cir. 2009) : Soon after the defendant's coconspirator was arrested and agreed to cooperate, he received a call from the defendant setting up another cocaine transaction. Statements by the coconspirator in that conversation that implied the defendant was dealing were admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). Affirming a conviction for cocaine trafficking, the Court held there was no error in admitting the statements, as they were not hearsay but only provided the context for the defendant's statements in the conversation that strongly suggested he had been involved in another transaction. The concurring Judge thought that the coconspirator's statements were inadmissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) because his statements were not in furtherance of the conspiracy after his arrest, and thought that the contents of the statements and the manner in which they were admitted supported an argument that they were admitted for their truth and thus hearsay, but that any errors were harmless. In United States v. Ledford, 443 F.3d 702 (10th Cir. 2005) , in a felon firearm prosecution, the Court found no error in admitting a statement made by the defendant's wife to an officer responding to a domestic violence call. The wife stated that she was afraid that the defendant might kill her for calling the police -- then she led the officer to a bedroom and gave him a handgun from a dresser drawer. The Court found that the wife's statement was not hearsay, because it was not offered to prove that the defendant actually threatened his wife. Rather, it was offered to explain why the wife led the officer to the bedroom and retrieved the gun.

United States v. Jiminez, 564 F.3d 1280 (11th Cir. 2009) : The defendant was convicted for participating in a marijuana-growing operation with his brother. Affirming, the Court found no error in the admission of an agent's testimony that the brother had told him the defendant was involved. The statement was not hearsay because it was offered on redirect only to explain why the agent had re-interviewed the defendant, after cross-examination of the agent had suggested that there was something improper about the repeated interviews of the defendant. A concurring Judge suggested that the better practice would have been to give an instruction about the limited purpose for which the brother's statement was being admitted.

[vi] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Employment Discrimination Cases

Vazquez-Valentin v. Santiago-Diaz, 459 F.3d 144 (1st Cir. 2006) : In an employment discrimination case, the defendants, members of the municipal administration employing the plaintiff, sought to justify her demotion on the ground that she had been illegally promoted by a previous administration. The Judge excluded, on hearsay grounds, an audit that the Comptroller of Puerto Rico had completed during the last months of the previous administration, which indicated improprieties in employment practices. The Court held that the documents, which warned "that the Mayor and his administration would be liable under the Commonwealth's ethics laws if they did not take measures to remedy the hiring abuses" that were found, did not constitute hearsay because they were "offered as an explanation for the personnel actions undertaken by the defendants rather than for the truth of the personnel irregularities described in the documents."

Blair v. Henry Filters, Inc., 505 F.3d 517 (6th Cir. 2007) : Reversing summary judgment for the employer in an age discrimination case, the Court held that a supervisor's statement that the plaintiff was "too old" was not hearsay because it was offered for the fact that it was said, not to prove that the plaintiff was actually too old for the work. Likewise, testimony that the supervisor stated that "he needed to set up a younger sales force" was not hearsay, because the statement was not offered for the truth of the matter asserted.

[viii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- False Statements

United States v. Tann, 532 F.3d 868 (D.C. Cir. 2008) : Affirming fraud convictions arising from embezzlement, the Court held that the checks that the defendant forged as part of the embezzlement were not offered "for their truth," but only to prove that they were created by the defendant.

United States v. Jimenez, 513 F.3d 62 (3d Cir. 2008) : Affirming conviction for bank fraud and mortgage fraud, the Court held that tax abstracts and tax records from the IRS were not hearsay because they were offered not to prove the taxpayer's actual income but only to prove that tax return copies submitted with loan applications were fabricated because they differed from the tax returns actually filed with the IRS.

United States v. Barraza, 576 F.3d 798 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for kidnapping resulting in death, finding no error in the admission of a statement by the victim that she and her son were going to Disneyland, when in fact they planned to go to Mexico with the defendant to import drugs. Although the statement was admitted under Rule 803(3) as evidence of the victim's state of mind, the Court held that because it was a false statement and not offered to prove the victim's intent to go to Disneyland, it was properly admitted because it was nonhearsay.

[ix] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Impeachment

United States v. Burt, 495 F.3d 733 (7th Cir. 2007) : At a trial on child pornography charges, a government witness testified about his online relationship with the defendant but denied that the defendant had ever sent him photos of naked boys. The prosecution was then permitted to prove that the witness had made statements inconsistent with that denial when he was interviewed after his arrest. Affirming, the Court held that the prior inconsistent statements were not inadmissible hearsay because they were offered only to impeach the witness' testimony and the jury was given careful limiting instructions to that effect.

Garner v. Missouri Dep't of Mental Health, 439 F.3d 958 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a judgment in a Title VII action against a plaintiff who claimed to have been wrongfully discharged, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony about unsubstantiated allegations against the plaintiff. The allegations were not admitted for their truth but to explain why the supervisor had suspended the plaintiff and started an investigation that ultimately led to the plaintiff's termination on unrelated charges.

[x] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Information Automatically Generated

United States v. Lamons, 532 F.3d 1251 (11th Cir. 2008) : Affirming the convictions of a former flight attendant for making a threatening telephone call regarding a bomb and setting fire to the lavatory of a plane, the Court held there was no error in admitting over hearsay and confrontation objections a compact disc of data made from telephone calls to the defendant's airline and a call report created from the disc. Neither piece of evidence was a "statement" under Rule 801(a), since "the statements in question are the statements of machines, not statements of persons." The Court observed that "the best way to advance the truth-seeking process with respect to [machine-generated] statements is not through cross-examination of the machine operator but through the process of authentication as provided for in Federal Rule of Evidence 901(b)(9)."

[xi] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Knowledge and Notice

[A] Rule 801(c) -- Civil Cases

Biegas v. Quickway Carriers, Inc., 573 F.3d 365 (6th Cir. 2009) : The plaintiff's decedent was killed when a tractor-trailer sideswiped his truck while he had stopped it on the shoulder and was inspecting the load. The Court reversed partial summary judgment granted for the defendant on comparative negligence, but found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the passenger accompanying the decedent had within minutes following the accident told other witnesses who had stopped that he had told the decedent prior to the accident to "get out of the road, he was going to get hit." In the Court's view, what the declarant told the decedent was not hearsay because it "was not offered to prove that [the decedent] was in fact standing in the travel lane at the time of the accident, but rather to prove that [he] had been put on notice that he was in imminent danger and should have been aware of the risk he faced." When the declarant recounted this warning to the other witnesses, his statement was admissible as an excited utterance, since he had just witnessed a terrible accident that dismembered and killed his friend and employer and his statement was made before there was an opportunity to fabricate or misrepresent and while he was still under the stress of the excitement.

Marseilles Hydro Power, LLC v. Marseilles Land & Water Co., 518 F.3d 459 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed judgments in consolidated appeals arising from the collapse of a wall of a canal. It held that a letter from a power company to a canal company was not hearsay, because it was offered only to show notice and thus indicate when the clock began to run on the statute of limitations.

[B] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Knowledge and Notice -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Brown, 553 F.3d 768 (5th Cir. 2008) : Two pharmacists were convicted of conspiring with physicians to distribute large quantities of pain medications under cover of false prescriptions written by the physicians. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of extensive testimony recounting the Texas Pharmacy Laws and Regulations, which every Texas pharmacy is required to maintain and which discusses diversion of prescription drugs to illegal uses. The TPLR was probative of the defendants' states of mind, speaking to their claims that nothing about the circumstances aroused their suspicions as to the illegitimate prescriptions.

United States v. Harper, 463 F.3d 663 (7th Cir. 2006) : Affirming mail fraud convictions, the Court found no error in the admission of a letter sent by the government to the defendant's previous attorney reporting that the defendant had deposited unexplained cash into his accounts. The Court held that the letter was properly admitted to prove "its effect on [the defendant] -- that its receipt spurred him to cover his tracks -- and was strong circumstantial evidence of guilt."

[xii.1] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Opening the Door

United States v. Eagle, 515 F.3d 794 (8th Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for aggravated sexual abuse in Indian country, the Court held there was no plain error in the admission of evidence of a statement made by the victim to his mother, and of another statement made to a special agent who repeated it to the forensic investigator who testified. The defendant had opened the door to both statements through the cross-examination of the mother and the investigator.

[xv] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Receipts, Registration Cards, Invoices

United States v. Serrano, 434 F.3d 1003 (7th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for aiding and abetting distribution of cocaine, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting automobile insurance cards, insurance declarations, and related correspondence found in, or in trash from, the house in which the defendant was arrested. The documents were not offered as proof of their contents but as circumstantial evidence that the defendant was more than a casual visitor to the house, which was a center for the drug scheme.

[xviii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Statements Relied Upon

[A] Rule 801(c) -- Civil Cases

Royall v. National Ass'n of Letter Carriers, 548 F.3d 137 (D.C. Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in an employment discrimination case, finding no error in consideration of depositions recounting complaints regarding the plaintiff's performance. The evidence was not hearsay offered to prove that the complaints were valid; rather, it was nonhearsay offered to illuminate the employer's motives and actions.

McIntosh v. Partridge, 540 F.3d 315 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for a former supervisor sued by a dentist who had worked in a state-operated residential facility for disabled persons but was terminated upon his return from active military service. It held that evidence of an outside expert's report on an investigation into the dentist's alleged misconduct and an internal e-mail reporting the poor condition of residents' teeth in the facility were properly admitted to demonstrate the basis for the supervisor's termination.

Maday v. Public Libraries, 480 F.3d 815 (6th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in a former employee's age discrimination suit, the Court found no error when a supervisor was permitted to testify to accounts she had heard from others about the plaintiff's poor work performance and erratic behavior. The accounts were not hearsay when offered as the basis for the supervisor's taking disciplinary action against the plaintiff.

Jewett v. Anders, 521 F.3d 818 (7th Cir. 2008) : In a civil rights action for false arrest, the Court held that it was error to exclude testimony from the defendant that he had been advised by headquarters to proceed to a Wal-Mart and arrest a person of a particular description. He then went to the Wal-Mart and arrested the plaintiff, who met the description but who was not the person suspected of committing a crime. The report from headquarters to the officer was not hearsay: "The statement is offered to demonstrate the effect of this information on Officer Anders as he encountered Mr. Jewett and to explain the Officer's actions in detaining Mr. Jewett, not to prove the truth of the matter asserted. All that matters is that the statement was made and Officer Anders heard it." In Talmage v. Harris, 486 F.3d 968 (7th Cir. 2007) , an action against an insurer for bad faith failure to fully reimburse an insured for damages caused by a fire, the Court held that reports by appraisers, which estimated the amount of loss caused by the fire, were not hearsay. They were offered not to prove the actual amount of damages, but rather their effect on the insurer's state of mind; the disputed issue in the case was whether the insurer had knowledge or reckless disregard of the lack of a reasonable basis for denying the claim.

[B] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Statements Relied Upon -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Hamilton, 538 F.3d 162 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a marijuana conspiracy conviction, holding that testimony by a special agent that he learned beginning in 2003 that the defendant was living with his girlfriend in California on a particular street where he was found in 2004 was not hearsay, since it was offered to prove the government's efforts to find the defendant following his failure to appear in court after being arrested in 1999, and thus to rebut his claim that his indictment in 2005 was untimely.

United States v. Espinosa, 585 F.3d 418 (8th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse, the Court held that witness testimony about conversations with a child victim was not hearsay, because the witnesses did not testify to the substance of the statements, only that statements were made, and the testimony was offered to prove merely that conversations occurred and that witnesses took actions following those conversations.

United States v. Moran, 493 F.3d 1002 (9th Cir. 2007) : In a prosecution for tax fraud and wire and mail fraud, a defendant sought to introduce evidence that outside financial and legal experts had told her that the tax programs that she promoted were legal. The Court held that it was error to exclude the evidence as hearsay, as it was not offered for the truth of the matters asserted but to show the basis for a good faith belief inconsistent with the willfulness required for tax fraud.

United States v. Padron, 527 F.3d 1156 (11th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a mail fraud conviction arising from a scheme to stage auto accidents and make false insurance claims. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of police reports submitted to obtain advance funding from insurance companies. The reports were not hearsay, as they were not offered for their truth but simply to show how a coconspirator sought to obtain the funding.

[xix] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- State of Mind

United States v. Quinones, 511 F.3d 289 (2d Cir. 2007) : The victim of a charged murder had set up a drug transaction with a defendant; when the defendant was arrested at the scene, the victim used an expletive to express that he was now in serious trouble, observing that the defendant was "going to know" that he had been responsible for the arrest. Affirming racketeering and murder convictions, the Court held there was no error in admitting the victim's statements, as they were nonhearsay circumstantially indicating his then-existing fearful state of mind, which indicated why he made himself scarce after the defendant's arrest and why it took the defendants months to locate him before luring him to his death.

United States v. Hyles, 479 F.3d 958 (8th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a murder-for-hire conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when writing on the back of photographs was admitted. The photographs depicted the defendant, a coconspirator, and a car that the defendant gave to the coconspirator after the murder. The writings were hearsay because they were not offered to prove the facts stated ("Da Pony G 'Ride,' " " '2' of Da Most Wanted"), but as evidence of the importance of the car to the coconspirator and of the association between the men. The Court added that "it is the fact that there is writing on the back of these pictures and that [the men] found the pictures important enough to write on that makes them important; what exactly was written on them does not matter."

[xxii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Tools of the Trade

United States v. Mendez, 514 F.3d 1035 (10th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for drug trafficking offenses, the Court held that a drug ledger listing names with dollar amounts was not hearsay, because it was not offered for the truth of the matters asserted therein but rather as a tool of the drug trade. For that reason, it was also not "testimonial" and thus its admission was not a Confrontation Clause violation.

[xxiii] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Trade Inscriptions and Identifying Marks

United States v. Buchanan, 604 F.3d 517 (8th Cir. 2010) : In a drug distribution prosecution, the government introduced evidence that a key bearing the number "2010" was found on the defendant's person during execution of a search warrant and that the key matched a large safe bearing the same number at an alleged "stash house." Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence over hearsay and best evidence objections. The numbers on the key and the safe were not hearsay because the were simply identifying marks and were neither assertions that the items matched nor offered to such an assertion. As for the best evidence objection, it was within the Judge's discretion to treat the written numbers as simple marks on a chattel identifying it; there was "little danger that the witness would inaccurately remember the terms of the 'writing'," and the numeric inscription was not critical to the case, since the safe was merely collateral evidence of the crime.

[xxiii.1] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Unsuccessful Search of Records

United States v. Mendez, 514 F.3d 1035 (10th Cir. 2008) : To prove that the Mexican-born defendant had not entered the United States legally, an immigration agent testified that he searched a nationwide database of entry documents and found no match for the name and SSN the defendant had provided at his arrest. Affirming, the Court held that the testimony was not hearsay, and thus not a confrontation violation, because the person who conducted the data search testified at trial and no record was received into evidence.

[xxiv] Rule 801(c) -- Examples of Nonhearsay -- Verbal Acts

United States v. Childs, 539 F.3d 552 (6th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to commit murder for hire, finding no error when a witness was permitted to testify that, in the presence of the defendant, an indicted co-conspirator had asked the witness if she "knew anyone who could kill someone for her." Although the statement had been admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(E), the Court found that it was not hearsay at all and was "admissible evidence of a verbal act," offered not for the truth of the matter asserted but for "the fact that the declaration was made."

[3] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Prior Statement by Witness -- Inconsistent
[Go To Main]

[b] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Grand Jury Testimony

United States v. Butterworth, 511 F.3d 71 (1st Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, holding that a witness' grand jury testimony was properly admitted for its truth as a prior inconsistent statement. When the witness contradicted her grand jury testimony on ten occasions, the prosecutor had attempted to refresh recollection; although the witness would then "somewhat reluctantly adopt her grand jury answers, her trial testimony was peppered with claims that she did not know or could not remember the answers she gave the grand jury." The Court reasoned that "testimony need not be diametrically opposed or logically incompatible to be considered inconsistent under the rule."

United States v. Mayberry, 540 F.3d 506 (6th Cir. 2008) : An accomplice testified against the defendant before a grand jury, but claimed a loss of memory when called as a witness at trial. Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held there was no error in admitting the accomplice's grand jury testimony as substantive evidence, as the claimed loss of memory was inconsistent with the testimony, the accomplice was subject to cross-examination by the defense, and the testimony had been given subject to penalties of perjury. There was no Confrontation Clause issue because the witness testified at the trial.

[c] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Inconsistency Required

United States v. Butterworth, 511 F.3d 71 (1st Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, holding that a witness' grand jury testimony was properly admitted for its truth as a prior inconsistent statement. When the witness contradicted her grand jury testimony on ten occasions, the prosecutor had attempted to refresh recollection; although the witness would then "somewhat reluctantly adopt her grand jury answers, her trial testimony was peppered with claims that she did not know or could not remember the answers she gave the grand jury." The Court reasoned that "testimony need not be diametrically opposed or logically incompatible to be considered inconsistent under the rule."

United States v. Cisneros-Gutierrez, 517 F.3d 751 (5th Cir. 2008) : An accomplice of the defendant in a methamphetamine distribution conspiracy was arrested and interviewed and had signed a factual resume saying that "[h]e agrees that" the defendant had delivered drugs to him. When the accomplice pleaded guilty, he admitted during his plea hearing that the contents of the factual resume were true. Just before the defendant was brought to trial several years later, the accomplice told the prosecutors that he did not want to testify and that he was having problems remembering things. At trial he exhibited extensive memory problems and the government was permitted to treat him as an adverse witness and to use leading questions. When he testified that the defendant had not agreed to deliver drugs to him, his factual resume was admitted. Affirming, the Court held that the factual resume was admissible as substantive evidence under Rule 801(d)(1)(A). "The breadth and depth of [the witness'] claimed memory loss is facially suspect to say the least," so his testimony was opened to inconsistent statements. The direct testimony denying agreement to deliver was "not a per se repudiation of the factual resume," but statements "diametrically opposed or logically incompatible" are not required. And the witness had admitted under oath at the plea hearing that the factual resume was "true and correct in every respect," so the resume was adopted in "testimony ... given under oath subject to the penalty of perjury at a trial, hearing, or other proceeding"; it was not simply a statement found in the notes, reports, or affidavits prepared by law enforcement officers, which have been found to fall outside the Rule.

[e] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Memory Problems; Vague Testimony

United States v. Mayberry, 540 F.3d 506 (6th Cir. 2008) : An accomplice testified against the defendant before a grand jury, but claimed a loss of memory when called as a witness at trial. Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held there was no error in admitting the accomplice's grand jury testimony as substantive evidence, as the claimed loss of memory was inconsistent with the testimony, the accomplice was subject to cross-examination by the defense, and the testimony had been given subject to penalties of perjury. There was no Confrontation Clause issue because the witness testified at the trial.

United States v. Tran, 568 F.3d 1156 (9th Cir. 2009) : Although it reversed marijuana convictions on other grounds, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a statement in a plea agreement by a codefendant whose testimony at trial was "reluctant," "vague," and "evasive." It noted that "trial judges must retain a high degree of flexibility in deciding the exact point at which a prior statement is sufficiently inconsistent with a witness's trial testimony to permit its use in evidence."

[g] Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Other Proceedings

United States v. Cisneros-Gutierrez, 517 F.3d 751 (5th Cir. 2008) : An accomplice of the defendant in a methamphetamine distribution conspiracy was arrested and interviewed and had signed a factual resume saying that "[h]e agrees that" the defendant had delivered drugs to him. When the accomplice pleaded guilty, he admitted during his plea hearing that the contents of the factual resume were true. Just before the defendant was brought to trial several years later, the accomplice told the prosecutors that he did not want to testify and that he was having problems remembering things. At trial he exhibited extensive memory problems and the government was permitted to treat him as an adverse witness and to use leading questions. When he testified that the defendant had not agreed to deliver drugs to him, his factual resume was admitted. Affirming, the Court held that the factual resume was admissible as substantive evidence under Rule 801(d)(1)(A). "The breadth and depth of [the witness'] claimed memory loss is facially suspect to say the least," so his testimony was opened to inconsistent statements. The direct testimony denying agreement to deliver was "not a per se repudiation of the factual resume," but statements "diametrically opposed or logically incompatible" are not required. And the witness had admitted under oath at the plea hearing that the factual resume was "true and correct in every respect," so the resume was adopted in "testimony ... given under oath subject to the penalty of perjury at a trial, hearing, or other proceeding"; it was not simply a statement found in the notes, reports, or affidavits prepared by law enforcement officers, which have been found to fall outside the Rule.

[4] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Prior Statement by Witness -- Consistent [Go To Main]

[d] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Corroborating Witness' Testimony

United States v. Eagle, 498 F.3d 885 (8th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for involuntary manslaughter in Indian country, but it held it was error to permit an officer to testify to statements made by three witnesses who were in the defendant's car at the time of the accident that resulted in death. The statements were offered as consistent with the witnesses' testimony, but there was no claim that they had recently fabricated their testimony.

[i] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Prior Statement of Cooperating Witness

United States v. Chang Da Liu, 538 F.3d 1078 (9th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for sex trafficking, finding no error in the admission of prior consistent statements by cooperating witnesses. The defendant had challenged the witnesses' credibility by presenting evidence that they had received financial assistance from the FBI and implied that they fabricated their testimony in order to receive the assistance. The Court commented that admitting testimony about the content of statements made before the FBI began providing financial assistance was "a textbook example of when to apply Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(1)(B)."

[j] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Rehabilitation Use Only

United States v. Al-Moayad, 545 F.3d 139 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court vacated convictions for conspiring to provide material support to designated terrorist organizations (Hamas and Al-Qaeda). The defense relied on an entrapment defense, and the focus of the case was on the defendants' predisposition. The Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit a key informant-witness' handwritten notes purporting to memorialize the contents of his initial meeting with an FBI agent, since the notes were not shown to have been made before a motive to falsify arose. The Court added that the notes would probably have been inadmissible even for the limited purpose of rehabilitating the witness' credibility, since the defendants did not impeach the witness with prior inconsistent statements and the notes had no rebutting force beyond the mere fact that the witness had repeated on a prior occasion a statement consistent with his trial testimony.

United States v. Hoover, 543 F.3d 448 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for using a firearm in connection with a drug trafficking offense. It held that, whether or not witnesses' prior statements were made before a motive to falsify arose, there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the statements to show that there was really no inconsistency between the prior statements and the trial testimony. The jury was properly instructed that the statements could only be used to evaluate the witnesses' credibility, insofar as they might explain the alleged inconsistencies.

[n] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Suggestion of Fabrication

[ii] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Suggestion of Fabrication -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Washington, 434 F.3d 7 (1st Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for distribution of cocaine base, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting the prior consistent statement of a government witness. Defense counsel had suggested that the entirety of the witness' statement was false, that the witness was a habitual liar, and that he had a motive to lie to please the DEA. This was a sufficient attack, said the Court, to justify admission of a prior consistent statement.

United States v. Burden, 600 F.3d 204 (2d Cir. 2010) : In a RICO prosecution arising from a drug trafficking and murder conspiracy, after a witness testified that he had seen one defendant commit a shooting, the defense introduced a statement the witness made to police in October 1999 in which he said he was not sure the defendant was the shooter. In response, the government introduced a November 1999 statement in which the witness identified the defendant as the shooter. Affirming, the Court held that the latter statement was properly admitted as a prior consistent statement offered to rebut the defense suggestion that the witness' testimony was a recent fabrication.

United States v. Frazier, 469 F.3d 85 (3d Cir. 2006) : A police officer's testimony at the trial of a crack cocaine case was far more damaging to the defendant than was his suppression hearing testimony. The defendant contended that the officer was telling the truth at the suppression hearing, and on cross-examination inquired into the discrepancies between the suppression hearing testimony and the trial testimony. The government offered statements made around the time of the defendant's arrest that were consistent with the officer's trial testimony. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the prior consistent statements. It rejected the defendant's argument that he had not raised a charge of improper motive or recent fabrication, noting that defense counsel asserted on cross-examination that the witness could not have been merely mistaken in giving two different and detailed accounts of how he discovered the crack cocaine; that he repeatedly asked the witness about all the preparations he had made to testify truthfully and accurately at the suppression hearing; and that he acted skeptically to the witness's explanation of why he left matters out of his account when testifying at the suppression hearing.

United States v. Gonzalez, 533 F.3d 1057 (9th Cir. 2008) : At the trial of a sheriff's officer for acting under color of law to deprive three women of their right to bodily integrity by committing sexual assaults upon them, one of the women delivered her testimony in Spanish through an interpreter and then a police officer who interviewed her retold in English the story of the assault as she had told it to him. The Court held the officer's testimony was not an admissible prior consistent statement, as cross-examination of the woman regarding her civil suit against the defendant to bring out discrepancies in dates was not a sufficient suggestion of fabrication, but the error was harmless. The Court also held that an officer's account of another victim's statement was admissible rebuttal under Rule 801(d)(1)(B) because references to a pending civil case in the defense cross-examination of that victim were not incidental but made to suggest a mercenary purpose to her testimony.

[o] Rule 801(d)(1)(B) -- Timing of Prior Consistent Statement

United States v. Jahagirdar, 466 F.3d 149 (1st Cir. 2006) : The victim in a sexual abuse case was cross-examined regarding a motive to fabricate -- specifically, that she had contacted lawyers to try to obtain money damages from the defendant. The government responded by introducing a statement describing the assault that the victim made to the police shortly after the incident. Affirming, the Court concluded that any difference between the statement made to the officer and the victim's testimony at trial was superficial and that both statements were consistent in including the central point in dispute, i.e., whether the victim had been penetrated. The Court also rejected an argument that the statement to the police officer was made after the alleged attack and so did not precede the motive to falsify; it found that the motive to falsify arose after the victim spoke to the police officer and concluded that there was "no indication that [the victim] had a civil suit in mind when interviewed by the trooper not long after the incident."

United States v. Al-Moayad, 545 F.3d 139 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court vacated convictions for conspiring to provide material support to designated terrorist organizations (Hamas and Al-Qaeda). The defense relied on an entrapment defense, and the focus of the case was on the defendants' predisposition. The Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit a key informant-witness' handwritten notes purporting to memorialize the contents of his initial meeting with an FBI agent, since the notes were not shown to have been made before a motive to falsify arose. The Court added that the notes would probably have been inadmissible even for the limited purpose of rehabilitating the witness' credibility, since the defendants did not impeach the witness with prior inconsistent statements and the notes had no rebutting force beyond the mere fact that the witness had repeated on a prior occasion a statement consistent with his trial testimony.

United States v. Frazier, 469 F.3d 85 (3d Cir. 2006) : A police officer's testimony at the trial of a crack cocaine case was far more damaging to the defendant than was his suppression hearing testimony. The defendant contended that the officer was telling the truth at the suppression hearing, and on cross-examination inquired into the discrepancies between the suppression hearing testimony and the trial testimony. The government offered statements made around the time of the defendant's arrest that were consistent with the officer's trial testimony. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the prior consistent statements. It rejected a defense argument that the party seeking to admit the prior consistent statement should have the burden of proving the specific point at which the witness's motive to falsify arose, as nothing in the Supreme Court's Tome decision imposed such a burden. The question of when a witness's motive to falsify arose is to be left to the Trial Judge, whose "determination of the premotive requirement -- which should be made after an examination of the parties' positions, the record, and the Court's own judgment -- will not be reversed unless no reasonable person would adopt the district court's view." In this case, because the defendant argued that the officer was telling the truth at the suppression hearing, the motive to falsify must have arisen some time after that testimony, so there was no error in the finding that the consistent statements, made around the time of the arrest, predated the motive to falsify.

United States v. Bercier, 506 F.3d 625 (8th Cir. 2007) : Reversing sexual abuse convictions, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to permit a doctor at the hospital to testify to an extensive interview he conducted with the victim on the morning after the alleged assault. The hearsay statements were not admissible as prior consistent statements of the victim, because the defendant argued that the victim fabricated her story of non-consensual contact immediately after leaving his bedroom, so the statements made to the doctor the next morning did not pre-date the motive to falsify. In United States v. Gettel, 474 F.3d 1081 (8th Cir. 2007) , although it affirmed firearms convictions, the Court held that it was error to admit evidence of a witness' prior consistent statement to police officers regarding the defendant's involvement. The defense had contended that the witness was lying and implicating the defendant in order to get a break on his own charges by cooperating with the government. Because the consistent statement was made while the witness was incarcerated and facing those charges, it was not made before the motive to lie arose.

United States v. Washington, 462 F.3d 1124 (9th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for armed bank robbery, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting an agent's statements that during an early interviews with the cooperating witnesses, they had identified the defendant as one of the bank robbers. Defense counsel, in cross-examining the witnesses had asked questions suggesting that, because of their plea agreements, the two men had colluded with each other to make up stories implicating the defendant. Because the statements to the agent were made months before the witnesses' plea agreement, they were admissible as prior consistent statements to rebut the accusations of recent fabrication and improper motive.

McInnis v. Fairfield Communities, Inc., 458 F.3d 1129 (10th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a Title VII gender discrimination action, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of emails written by a supervisor. The statements were not admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(B), because they were made after the controversy, and thus the declarant's improper motive, arose.

United States v. Vance, 494 F.3d 985 (11th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for knowingly attempting to travel in foreign commerce for the purpose of engaging in illicit sexual conduct, finding no plain error in the exclusion of a statement the defendant made to his cousin as to the purpose of his going to Costa Rica. At the time the alleged statement was made, the defendant had already sent an e-mail to an undercover officer expressing his interest in engaging in illegal sexual activity with minors, which meant he mad a motive to falsify when he spoke to the cousin.

[5] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Prior Statement by Witness -- Identification [Go To Main]

[c.1] Rule 801(d)(1)(C) -- Nontestifying Declarant

United States v. Baker, 432 F.3d 1189 (11th Cir. 2005) : Reviewing convictions for a cocaine distribution conspiracy, the Court held that two statements of identification were inadmissible hearsay, because the declarant was not present for cross-examination at trial.

[6] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Admission by Party-Opponent -- Party's Own Statement [Go To Main]

[b.1] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Class Action

Pierce v. County of Orange, 526 F.3d 1190 (9th Cir. 2008) : In this class action brought on behalf of pretrial detainees, the Court found no error in the admission of hearsay statements by class members under Rule 801(d)(2)(A). The Court explained:

> For an absent member of a Rule 23(b)(2) class to be treated as a party -- and, hence, as a party representative of the class as a whole -- for Rule 801 purposes there must be some mechanism to ensure that he or she will represent the interests of the class... . [P]laintiffs disclosed the identities of forty-five inmates they expected to have testify regarding prison conditions... . We are satisfied that, on the facts of this case, reliance on statements by detainees who had been disclosed by plaintiffs' counsel as potential witnesses adequately protected the class from the risk of having the class's interests undermined by unrepresentative class members.

In a footnote, the Court emphasized that class members' statements will not always satisfy the "party-opponent" requirement of Rule 801(d)(2)(A). It noted that absent class members "are considered parties for some purposes and not for others."

[d] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Constitutional Problems

In re Terrorist Bombings of U.S. Embassies in E. Africa, 552 F.3d 93 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for al Queda terrorism in 1998, finding no Bruton violation in the admission of an FBI agent's report of an interview with a codefendant, where the defendant's name had been redacted and the defendant could be identified as being incriminated only through other evidence introduced at trial. The Court also held that coconspirators' post-arrest admissions were properly admitted only against the declarants and not for the purpose of establishing the existence of a conspiracy or conduct in furtherance, although Circuit precedent at the time of trial (pre-Crawford) would have permitted admission for the latter purpose against non-testifying conspirators.

United States v. Harper, 527 F.3d 396 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug offenses, finding no violation of a defendant's confrontation rights when his nontestifying codefendant's confession to police was admitted into evidence. The Court noted that the confession was "testimonial" under Crawford, but concluded that Crawford's historical approach to the confrontation right did not seem to have replaced the "pragmatic" approach of Bruton, Richardson, Cruz, and Gray in resolving whether jury instructions preclude a Sixth Amendment violation. Because the codefendant's statements did not directly or obviously implicate the defendant in the absence of other evidence, the jury instruction to admit the statements only against the declarant was sufficient under Richardson. In United States v. Harper, 527 F.3d 396 (5th Cir. 2008) , a drug prosecution, the Court held it was error to admit testimony by an agent regarding a non-testifying codefendant's statements that he owned some of the narcotics and firearms found in the house where the defendants were arrested. Although the jury was instructed not to consider the statements as evidence against the defendant, the Court held that, under Crawford, the codefendant was a "witness[] against the accused" because his statements were "testimony ... for the purpose of establishing or proving some fact." The error was harmless, however, because there was no " 'overwhelming probability of [the jury's] inability to' follow the judge's admonition to consider the statement as evidence only against [the codefendant]."

United States v. Vasilakos, 508 F.3d 401 (6th Cir. 2007) : Two defendants in a five-defendant trial appealed their convictions for defrauding their employer, an insurance company. At trial, the Judge admitted redacted deposition testimony previously given by the three other defendants in a civil action brought by the insurance company against all five. Those depositions were offered as party-admissions against each deponent; the term "another person" was substituted any time the deponent referred to one of the appealing defendants by name. The two appealing defendants argued that the admission of the redacted deposition testimony violated their right to confrontation, but the Court held that the redactions were sufficient to ensure that the deposition testimony would not be used against either of the defendants. The Court reasoned that "[b]ecause the government was prosecuting multiple defendants for participation in an alleged conspiracy to defraud CICA, the declarant-codefendants' deposition statements did not ineluctably implicate Vasilakos or Lent. The effect of the redaction methodology used in this case is distinguishable from the circumstances in Gray [v. Maryland], in which the Supreme Court noted that the inferences at issue referred 'directly to someone, often obviously the defendant, and which involve inferences that a jury ordinarily could make immediately, even were the confession the very first item introduced at trial.' "

United States v. Tolliver, 454 F.3d 660 (7th Cir. 2006) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy to distribute crack cocaine, the Court held there was no Confrontation Clause violation when tape recordings of a drug transaction between a defendant and a confidential informant were admitted. The defendant's statements were party admissions, which, as nonhearsay, are not subject to the prohibition annunciated in Crawford. Furthermore, the defendant did not make the statements with any expectation that they would be used against him in a criminal trial -- if anything, he believed the exact opposite -- and they were not recitals of past events but "candid, real-time comments about drug transactions in progress," so they were not "testimonial" under Crawford and Davis v. Washington, 547 U.S. 813 (2006) . The confidential informant's statements were not admitted for their truth, but only to put the defendant's admissions into context, so they were not hearsay and not subject to Crawford and Davis.

United States v. Singh, 494 F.3d 653 (8th Cir. 2007) : Affirming convictions for methamphetamine distribution, the Court rejected the defendants' argument that there had been a Bruton violation in admitting a statement by his non-testifying codefendant that tended to incriminate him. The statements were admissible as coconspirator statements under Rule 801(d)(2)(E), and " Bruton ... does not preclude admission of otherwise admissible statements by a co-conspirator under Rule 801(d)(2)(E)." The Court also held there was no Crawford violation, as the statements were not testimonial.

United States v. Ramirez, 479 F.3d 1229 (10th Cir. 2007) : Affirming convictions for drug trafficking offenses, the Court rejected a defendant's argument that there had been a Bruton violation in admitting evidence of conversations between two codefendants that tended to incriminate him. The conversations were admissible as coconspirator statements under Rule 801(d)(2)(E), and " '[t]he Bruton doctrine does not rule situations ... in which the evidence is admissible under a well recognized exception to the hearsay rule.' " The Court also held there was no Crawford violation, as the statements were not testimonial.

United States v. Brown, 441 F.3d 1330 (11th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a capital murder conviction, the Court held that a statement the defendant made to a bystander, identifying himself just before the murder, was admissible as a party-admission under Rule 801(d)(2)(A). Admission of the statement did not violate the Confrontation Clause, because a party "cannot seriously claim that his or her own statement should be excluded because it was not made under oath or subject to cross-examination."

[e] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Depositions and Prior Testimony

Creative Consumer Concepts, Inc. v. Kreisler, 563 F.3d 1070 (10th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a former employer who sued to rescind a settlement agreement on the ground that the former employee altered the agreement before signing and returning it to the company to be signed. The Court held that the company was properly permitted to read portions of the former employee's deposition at trial. Because the deposition testimony was an admission, no showing of unavailability was required.

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Interrelated Statements

United States v. Valerio, 441 F.3d 837 (9th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting a tape recording containing statements by a confidential informant in a conversation with the defendant. The informant's statements were introduced only to provide context to the defendant's statements, which were admissions, and the jury was instructed not to consider the informant's statements for their truth.

[p.1] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Receipts

United States v. Miller, 547 F.3d 718 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed firearms convictions, holding that a folder of receipts showing that one defendant had ordered and paid for gun parts was admissible as an admission to the extent that they embodied the defendant's statements, and as business records to the extent that they reflected the seller's business records.

[s] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Statements Offered in the Declarant's Favor

Agere Sys., Inc. v. Advanced Environmental Tech. Corp., 602 F.3d 204 (3d Cir. 2010) : Vacating the judgment in a CERCLA contribution action, the Court held it was error to admit a proposed stipulation against a party who had refused to sign it. Although the stipulation was properly an admission against the party who proposed it, it was only inadmissible hearsay with respect to the party who refused to sign.

[s.1] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Substantive and Impeachment Use

United States v. Disantis, 565 F.3d 354 (7th Cir. 2009) : Affirming the conviction of a police officer for depriving a suspect of the right to be free from unreasonable seizure, the Court held that an inconsistent statement by the defendant in a police report was admissible as a personal admission. The defendant complained that an instruction to the jury that it could use the statement for its truth and also in deciding on the truthfulness of the defendant's trial testimony unduly emphasized the defendant's inconsistent statements as compared to other witnesses, but the Court pointed out that the Rules of Evidence treat a party's admission differently from most out-of-court statements by non-parties, by giving them both substantive and impeachment effect.

[t] Rule 801(d)(2)(A) -- Summary Judgment Use

In re McLain, 516 F.3d 301 (5th Cir. 2008) : A bankruptcy trustee sought to reopen a discharge for failure to disclose pre-petition assets, but the Trial Judge granted summary judgment to the debtor on the ground that a ledger sheet offered by the trustee was insufficient to create any genuine issue of material fact because it was insufficiently authenticated as a record of all the debtor's transactions during a particular period. Reversing, the Court held that the ledger sheet, which had been attached by the debtor to his summary judgment motion, was a party admission authenticated by the consistency of its entries with both bank records and a spreadsheet drafted by the debtor and admitted into evidence.

[7] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Rule Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Admission by Party-Opponent -- Adoption or Belief in Truth [Go To Main]

[e] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Adoption by Silence

United States v. Duval, 496 F.3d 64 (1st Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no error in the admission of testimony by an informant that a codefendant had said that he and the defendant wanted to sell firearms in their possession. The conversation between the informant and the codefendant took place in a small room, in the presence of the defendant, from which it could reasonably be inferred that the defendant heard his accomplice's statements. The defendant's silence when the statements were made gave rise to a reasonable inference that he adopted them, making them admissible against him as party admissions.

[g] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Documents Offered in Court or Arbitration

United States v. Hernandez-Hernandez, 431 F.3d 1212 (9th Cir. 2005) : The Court held there was no error when the Judge finding a sentencing enhancement relied on a stipulated document that served as the factual basis for the defendant's state guilty plea. Although a Judge dissenting in part argued that the defendant did not specifically confirm the facts in the document at his plea hearing, the Court noted that "criminal defendants are bound by the admissions of fact made by their counsel in their presence and with their authority."

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Insufficient Showing of Adoption

United States v. Williams, 445 F.3d 724 (4th Cir. 2006) : In a trial for felon firearm possession, the prosecution proved the defendant's possession of the weapon (which was never found) through evidence circumstantially linking the defendant to a murder. One witness testified that the defendant had been acting strangely, and when the asked him what was wrong and "did he, you know, did he kill somebody or what?," the defendant "didn't say anything. He was blank." Affirming, the Court agreed with the defendant that his silence was not admissible as an adoptive admission because the question was not accusatory. The jury could not reasonably view the failure to answer as an adoption of an implicit accusatory statement. However, admission of the interchange was not error, since neither the question nor the silent response was being offered for its truth but only as circumstantial evidence of the defendant's strange behavior around the time of the murder. If admission were error, it would be harmless as cumulative, since another witness testified that when she asked the defendant whether he had killed the victim, he responded that "[i]t was none of [her] concern," and that "what you don't know won't hurt you."

Tober v. Graco Children's Products, Inc., 431 F.3d 572 (7th Cir. 2005) : In an action brought by parents whose child was asphyxiated while in an infant swing, the plaintiffs offered a letter sent by the Consumer Product Safety Commission to the manufacturer, which letter stated that the Commission had made a preliminary determination that the swing presented a substantial risk of injury, as an adoptive admission, because the manufacturer never responded to the letter. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the letter. The Commission had made only a preliminary determination, and that the letter did not mandate any corrective action; under these circumstances, "failure to respond was not so unnatural as to support an inference of acquiescence to the commission's preliminary findings."

United States v. Missouri, 535 F.3d 844 (8th Cir. 2008) : Affirming in part a judgment for the defendant state in a suit by the United States alleging that the state was in violation of the National Voter Registration Act, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the Judge excluded the substance of responses by local election agencies to a survey by the Election Assistance Commission. The state had "merely passed the LEA's survey responses along to the federal government, with no indication that the state was adopting the truth of the responses," and it had indicated that additional time was needed.

United States v. Ramirez, 479 F.3d 1229 (10th Cir. 2007) : Affirming convictions for drug trafficking offenses, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit as adoptive admissions two cellular phone receipts possessed by one defendant at the time of his arrest. The receipts were dated only a week earlier, indicating only a short time of possession; there was no evidence that the defendant possessed the phones to which they related; the defendant's name was not on the bills; and the registrants of the phones and the individuals who paid the bills were never identified. "Because the facts fail to tie Mr. Vasquez to the receipts other than by possession, we conclude he did not adopt their contents," and their admission into evidence was error.

[k] Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- Police Interrogations

United States v. Lafferty, 503 F.3d 293 (3d Cir. 2007) : The Court reversed a conviction for burglarizing a federally-licensed firearms dealer because statements made by an accomplice during a joint interrogation had been erroneously treated as admissible as adoptive admissions. The Court held that the defendant had not waived her right to remain silent, so considering her silence when the accomplice made incriminating statements as being an adoption of those statements violated her Fifth Amendment rights.

[8] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Statements Which Are not Hearsay -- Admission by Party-Opponent -- Authorized Statement [Go To Main]

[e] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Interpreters

United States v. Vidacak, 553 F.3d 344 (4th Cir. 2009) : The defendant was convicted of lying on his immigration application, by failing to report his service in the Serbian Army during the Bosnian War. He argued that statements from a Serbian interpreter, who had translated statements he had made to an investigator, were hearsay of his statements to the investigator. Affirming, the Court noted that "an interpreter is no more than a language conduit and therefore his translation does not create an additional level of hearsay," absent unusual circumstances casting significant doubt upon the accuracy of the translation. The Court found none of the factors that have been cited in applying the exception: an interested party supplying the interpreter; an interpreter with a motive to mislead or distort; an interpreter whose qualifications and language skills are questionable; and actions taken subsequent to the conversation inconsistent with the statements translated.

Germano v. International Profit Ass'n, Inc., 544 F.3d 798 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed summary judgment for an employer sued by a job applicant who claimed a violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act when he was denied employment as a tax advisor because of his severe hearing impairment. It found error in the exclusion of testimony by the plaintiff as to statements made by an agent of the defendant during a telephone conversation in which the plaintiff used a telecommunications relay service's communications assistant to assist him to communicate. The defendant argued that the use of the communications assistant amounted to hearsay, but the Court noted that it had long presumed the trustworthiness of statements reported by an interpreter or translator, and it pointed out that the plaintiff did not supply the communications assistant, the assistant had no motive to distort or mislead, the assistant's qualifications and language skills are prescribed by federal regulations, and the defendant's actions after the conversations were consistent with the translated statements.

United States v. Sanchez-Godinez, 444 F.3d 957 (8th Cir. 2006) : When the defendant was interviewed by a DEA agent following his arrest and indicated a preference for speaking in Spanish, an ATF agent served as interpreter. The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of marijuana with intent to distribute, but noted that the DEA agent's testimony regarding the defendant's interview raised hearsay concerns. Generally an interpreter is viewed as an agent of the defendant, but in this case the ATF agent testified that he was acting as both a translator and a federal law enforcement agent and thus he was more than a "language conduit." The Court concluded, however, that even if the DEA agent's testimony was hearsay, it was harmless error in view of the fact that the ATF agent testified to the interview and the defendant was sufficiently proficient in English that he was able to understand the ATF agent's translation and assure its accuracy.

[g] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Personal Knowledge

Grace United Methodist Church v. City of Cheyenne, 451 F.3d 643 (10th Cir. 2006) : This opinion supersedes the one annotated in the Main Volume of the Manual.

[g.1] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Proving Authority

Carlisle v. Deere & Co., 576 F.3d 649 (7th Cir. 2009) : In a breach of warranty action against the manufacturer of an engine used on a commercial tree grinder, the plaintiffs sought to prove that the defendant had installed a critical component on the engine by introducing evidence from the dealer that had replaced the grinder's original engine with the engine at issue. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the dealer's statements were not admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(C) because the warranty on the engine explicitly provided that no dealer had any authority to make any representations on behalf of the manufacturer, and the statements were not admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(D) because the dealer was not the manufacturer's agent, as the latter did not have control over the former's day-to-day operations or otherwise make it an agent.

[h] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Statements by Counsel

Butynski v. Springfield Term. Ry., 592 F.3d 272 (1st Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a judgment finding the defendant negligent and the plaintiff contributorily negligent in an FELA case. It held that the defense had not in its opening statement and summation admitted that the plaintiff was not negligent, since counsel had not in either argument made a clear and unambiguous concession regarding the plaintiff's due care.

Gill v. Maciejewski, 546 F.3d 557 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an arrestee against a university police officer in an action claiming use of excessive force. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a statement made during the underlying criminal trial by the arrestee's attorney: "So almost four months after this incident we still don't know if it was Officer Maciejewski or Sergeant Reineke or Officer Hermes who did the knee drop. No one has accepted responsibility." The Court held that the defendant, Maciejewski, took unwarranted liberties in offering the statement, because when considered in context it was clear that the arrestee's attorney was not suggesting that the arrestee did not know who assaulted him but was calling attention to Maciejewski's failure to attend and testify at the criminal trial.

United States v. Hernandez-Hernandez, 431 F.3d 1212 (9th Cir. 2005) : The Court held there was no error when the Judge finding a sentencing enhancement relied on a stipulated document that served as the factual basis for the defendant's state guilty plea. Although a Judge dissenting in part argued that the defendant did not specifically confirm the facts in the document at his plea hearing, the Court noted that "criminal defendants are bound by the admissions of fact made by their counsel in their presence and with their authority."

Rooms v. SEC, 444 F.3d 1208 (10th Cir. 2006) : Affirming an SEC decision barring Rooms from participating in the securities industry, the Court noted: "A pleading prepared by an attorney is an admission ... because the attorney presumably speaks for the litigant."

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(C) -- Trial or Deposition Testimony

In re Hanford Nuclear Reservation Litig., 534 F.3d 986 (9th Cir. 2008) : Reviewing the trials of claims by bellwether plaintiffs alleging that radioiodine emissions by plutonium producers at a nuclear facility caused cancers and other life-threatening diseases, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendants were permitted on retrial of one plaintiff's case to cross-examine an expert with testimony he had given at the first trial. The testimony was an admission of a party opponent under Rule 801(d)(2)(C), so the plaintiff "cannot now exclude trial testimony that she, herself, proffered."

[9] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Admission by Party-Opponent -- Agency Relationship [Go To Main]

[f] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Examples of Agents' Admissions

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Employment Discrimination Cases

In re Rodriguez, 487 F.3d 1001 (6th Cir. 2007) : In an employment discrimination action, the Court held that statements made by a supervisor to a lower-level supervisor, regarding the reason for the supervisor's refusal to promote the plaintiff, were admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(D).

[ii] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Examples of Agents' Admissions -- Other Cases

United States v. Yi, 460 F.3d 623 (5th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for trafficking in counterfeit goods, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of statements by the defendant's employee tending to show that the declarant knew the goods at issue were not of regular merchantable quality. The Court held that the statements "fall squarely within Rule 801(d)(2)(D)" and that if, because the statement's spoke to the employee's knowledge and not the defendant's, there was any Crawford-type error, it was harmless.

Thomas v. Cook County Sheriff's Dep't, 604 F.3d 293 (7th Cir. 2009, amended 2010): The Court affirmed in substantial part a judgment for the plaintiff in a § 1983 deliberate indifference action, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of deposition testimony that a nurse at the jail had told him that the plaintiff's decedent was "just 'dope sick.'" The statement was made by a County employee in the course of employment to show that the County employees were deliberately indifferent to the decedent's illness and had a widespread practice of ignoring medical requests.

[g] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Government Agents and Employees

Wilburn v. Robinson, 480 F.3d 1140 (D.C. Cir. 2006) : The former interim director of the D.C. Office of Human Rights sued the mayor's chief of staff in his individual and official capacities, alleging that she had been denied the position permanently as retaliation for exercising First Amendment rights in protesting D.C. salary policies. The plaintiff's only evidence of retaliation was contained in a conversation with her direct supervisor, a deputy mayor. The Trial Judge ruled that the supervisor's statements were not admissible as agency admissions because the employer, the District, was not a party, and granted summary judgment to the defendant. The Court found the ruling to be error (but harmless) because the District was a party by virtue of the claim against the chief of staff in his official capacity.

McDonough v. City of Quincy, 452 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 2006) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in a Title VII retaliation action, the Court found no error in the admission of hearsay statements from two City officials concerning the decision to place the plaintiff on administrative leave. The City argued that the statements were improperly admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(D), because the declarants were not "policymakers." But the Court held that the employee's "station is not relevant to the Rule 801(d)(2) analysis." Rather, the question is whether the statements concerned a matter within the employee's scope of authority. In this case, the statements were clearly within the scope of the officials' responsibilities for personnel management, and the statements related to a possible personnel action against the plaintiff.

United States v. Garza, 448 F.3d 294 (5th Cir. 2006) : In a drug case the defense proffered a report by a government investigator which concluded that a police officer who testified for the government was an untruthful person, based on an investigation for the Department of Justice conducted after receiving a report that the police officer had made representations to a United States Attorney that were not true. Affirming, the Court noted a split of authority about whether reports of government agents are admissible against the government in criminal cases. But even if Rule 801(d)(2)(D) were applicable to the government in criminal cases, it would not be applicable in this case. The Court explained that the investigation related to a different case; the results of the investigation were never adopted by the Department of Justice; and no prosecution was recommended. Accordingly, "[i]t hardly seems within the spirit of Rule 801(d)(2)(D) to admit Grimes' opinion regarding Officer Ragsdale's veracity as an admission by the government."

[h] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Government Attorneys

United States v. Ford, 435 F.3d 204 (2d Cir. 2006) : The Court held in a bribery prosecution that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding an alleged extra-judicial statement by an Assistant U.S. Attorney describing a key prosecution witness as "a dirty dog and he's got no credibility." A government attorney's statements are not admissible against the government when they do not involve assertions of fact inconsistent with similar assertions at trial and when they are not the equivalent of testimonial statements made by the client.

[k] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Independent Contractors

United States v. Bonds, 608 F.3d 495 (9th Cir. 2010) : In a perjury prosecution against a professional baseball player for falsely denying steroid use before a grand jury, the defendant moved in limine to preclude introduction of blood analysis reports for failure to establish that the blood had come from the defendant. A witness who could have made the connection refused to testify, so the government sought to introduce that witness' out of court statements. Affirming on interlocutory appeal the grant of the motion in limine, the Court held the statements were properly not admitted as agent's admissions because the record indicated the unavailable witness, a friend who served as the defendant's trainer, was an independent contractor and was not acting as the defendant's agent in delivering the blood samples. One Judge dissented, arguing that the record indicated that the witness was not only an agent but also an agent authorized to speak on the defendant's behalf.

[n] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Judicial Admissions

Roger Miller Music, Inc. v. Sony/ATV Publishing, LLC, 477 F.3d 383 (6th Cir. 2007) : Arguing for summary judgment in a copyright infringement action, the defendant had conceded that a particular renewal copyright had vested in the author's widow and children and not in it. However, following the Trial Court's decision, the defendant moved to alter or amend the judgment, arguing that the Judge had incorrectly interpreted the governing statute, which gave ownership to the defendant. The motion was denied on the ground that the defendant had made a judicial admission regarding the ownership, but the Court reversed, holding that the defendant's statements dealt with legal conclusions rather than matters of fact, so it was error to treat them as judicial admissions.

Sullivan v. Randolph, 504 F.3d 665 (7th Cir. 2007) : In an ERISA action by trustees of a multi-employer pension plan against a construction company, the Court affirmed summary judgment for the company. One question in the case was whether the company was bound by a collective bargaining agreement. In its initial answer the company admitted that it was bound, but was permitted to file an amended answer in which it withdrew the admission. The Court observed that an admission made in a pleading is ordinarily a "judicial admission" that is binding, but that it may nonetheless be withdrawn if the Trial Judge, as here, allows the filing of an amended pleading.

[q] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Personal Knowledge

Marra v. Philadelphia Housing Auth., 497 F.3d 286 (3d Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs in a suit alleging that the housing authority unlawfully retaliated against them for their roles in a Title VII lawsuit against the authority, finding no error in the admission of one plaintiff's testimony that his immediate supervisor constantly stated that there would be repercussions against any supervisor or management level employee who testified against the authority. The Court stated in a footnote that personal knowledge "was not a necessary predicate to the admission of his remarks under Rule 801(d)(2)(D)."

Mister v. Northeast Ill. Commuter R.R. Corp., 571 F.3d 696 (7th Cir. 2009) : In an FELA action arising when the plaintiff slipped on ice in an area where he parked, the Magistrate Judge excluded a report prepared by the defendant's safety officer, which said there was "a similar incident less then [sic] a week earlier in the same spot," because it was based on multiple hearsay and the safety officer had no personal knowledge on which to make the statement. The Court disagreed, noting that the Rule does not require personal knowledge or internal verification, but only that the report be made in the usual course of business by a person acting within the scope of his responsibilities. However, it affirmed the judgment for the defendant, finding no abuse of discretion in excluding the report under Rule 403 as unreliable because of its basis in multiple levels of hearsay and lack of precise factual statements.

United States v. Santisteban, 501 F.3d 873 (8th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conspiracy conviction arising from a scheme to import and misbrand prescription drugs, the Court held that a statement in a prosecution memorandum, provided to the defense before trial to outline the government's case, was not admissible to prove the truth of a statement contained therein, that a fake letter from the Pfizer pharmaceutical company that the coconspirator testified the defendant created had actually been created by an associate of the coconspirator. The Court reasoned that "[b]ecause the government employee who authored the memorandum could not have had personal knowledge as to who created the letter from Pfizer, the author was in no position to 'admit' that [the associate of the coconspirator] had forged the document." The paragraph of the memorandum containing the statement that the defendant tried to introduce had three levels of hearsay: (1) the author's statement, (2) the statement of the investigator to the author, and (3) the statement of the coconspirator to the investigator, which the investigator relayed to the author. The Court reasoned that, even if the author's statement was viewed as an admission, the other two levels of hearsay were not covered by an exception. We question this reasoning: If a person acting within the scope of employment accepts as true statements of others and makes an assertion, that assertion is held admissible in many cases notwithstanding the absence of personal knowledge by the declarant.

[r] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Proving Agency

Carlisle v. Deere & Co., 576 F.3d 649 (7th Cir. 2009) : In a breach of warranty action against the manufacturer of an engine used on a commercial tree grinder, the plaintiffs sought to prove that the defendant had installed a critical component on the engine by introducing evidence from the dealer that had replaced the grinder's original engine with the engine at issue. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the dealer's statements were not admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(C) because the warranty on the engine explicitly provided that no dealer had any authority to make any representations on behalf of the manufacturer, and the statements were not admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(D) because the dealer was not the manufacturer's agent, as the latter did not have control over the former's day-to-day operations or otherwise make it an agent.

United States v. Docampo, 573 F.3d 1091 (11th Cir. 2009) : In a trial on drug conspiracy charges, one Lorenzo testified that the defendant had made a threatening phone call. Because the call was taken by Lorenzo's girlfriend, and Lorenzo only heard the purported threat as it was related by the girlfriend, the girlfriend's statement about the threat was hearsay to prove the threat was made. The government argued that the girlfriend was acting as the defendant's agent in relating the threat to Lorenzo, but the Court found that "the government did not lay a foundation that Lorenzo's girlfriend was acting as Docampo's agent or that Docampo authorized the statement." The Court noted that even though the girlfriend's statement in context may have provided an indication of intended agency, the hearsay statement alone is insufficient to prove agency under the terms of Rule 801(d)(2).

[t] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Scope of Agent's Employment

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Employment Cases

Davila v. Corporacion De P.R. Para La Difusion Publica, 498 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the employer in an age discrimination case, finding no error when the Judge refused to give weight to the plaintiff's affidavit in which he asserted that unidentified co-workers had told him his supervisor believed he was "too old to hold the position." While statements by the supervisor might qualify as vicarious admissions, the absence of any evidence as to the employment status of the co-workers kept their statements as to what the supervisor said from being admissible. See also Bennett v. Saint-Gobain Corp., 507 F.3d 23 (1st Cir. 2007) (unsworn grievances referencing discriminatory remarks allegedly made by supervisor were hearsay inadmissible on summary judgment motion).

Marra v. Philadelphia Housing Auth., 497 F.3d 286 (3d Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs in a suit alleging that the housing authority unlawfully retaliated against them for their roles in a Title VII lawsuit against the authority, finding no error in the admission of one plaintiff's testimony that his immediate supervisor constantly stated that there would be repercussions against any supervisor or management level employee that testified against the authority. The Court rejected the defendant's "mistaken premise that personal involvement in the employment decision being litigated is an absolute prerequisite to the admission of a statement by an employee against his employer under Rule 801(d)(2)(D)." The Court reasoned that "[t]here is no question that DiPiero, in his capacity as DiGravio's immediate supervisor was authorized to speak with DiGravio about his perception of PHA's disciplinary practices, formal or otherwise, and thus his opinion that those employees who testified adversely to PHA would face 'repercussions' concerned a matter within the scope of his employment."

Stephens v. Erickson, 569 F.3d 779 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the employer in an action claiming retaliation for making discrimination complaints. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony regarding statements by the promoting authority's administrative assistant. Her statements about her boss's attitudes did not come within the exemption for agent's statements because her duties did not involve any component of the promotion process and she did not have any authority regarding any employment action; her statements about her own feelings toward the plaintiff were irrelevant to the plaintiff's claims. In Simple v. Walgreen Co., 511 F.3d 668 (7th Cir. 2007) , the court reversed summary judgment for the employer in an action by an assistant manager who was not offered a manager's position in a higher income white area that was given to a white woman with less experience. It held that another store manager's statements that the area "was possibly not ready to have a black manager" and the plaintiff "may not have been very happy working there" were admissible against the employer as vicarious admissions. The declarant had been consulted by the supervisor making the decision when the white woman was appointed and she was explaining her understanding of the criteria utilized by management in making the employment decisions. In Keri v. Board of Trustees of Purdue Univ., 458 F.3d 620 (7th Cir. 2006) , a black assistant professor who was not reappointed sued under Title VII. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court upheld the exclusion of statements about the racial climate at the university made by other professors. The statements did not relate to the declarants' teaching or other functions of their jobs and the declarants did not have decision-making authority regarding other faculty members' employment.

Rowell v. BellSouth Corp., 433 F.3d 794 (11th Cir. 2005) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendant in an ADEA case, the Court held that statements by the plaintiff's supervisor indicating that the ranking system in a proposed reduction in force was based on a company decision to keep younger employees was not admissible to support the plaintiff's claim. The supervisor had no participation in the employment decision or the employer's policy, and the plaintiff admitted that the supervisor was reflecting only his own personal opinion, not anything that he had been told by a senior person or upper management.

[ii] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Scope of Agent's Employment -- Other Cases

Ahlberg v. Chrysler Corp., 481 F.3d 630 (8th Cir. 2007) : The plaintiff's decedent was killed when he attempted to stop a Dodge Ram from rolling down a driveway after his two-year-old grandson, who had been left alone in the truck with the key in the ignition and the engine running, apparently shifted the gear out of park. In an action against the manufacturer, the plaintiff alleged that the truck was defective because it did not have a brake-shift interlock device requiring the brake pedal to be depressed in order to shift out of park. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by a former Chrysler employee that during a 1994 meeting, members of a safety leadership team stated that vehicles without BSI devices were unreasonably dangerous and that Chrysler vehicles should have been equipped with BSI devices. There was no showing that statements made by members of a SLT charged with evaluating minivan safety were within the scope of their employment when speaking about Ram safety.

[u] Rule 801(d)(2)(D) -- Statements by Counsel

United States v. Jung, 473 F.3d 837 (7th Cir. 2007) : In a prosecution for mail and wire fraud arising out of the defendant's management of a hedge fund, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit statements made by the defendant's former counsel to the person who started the hedge fund and to its special counsel, in which counsel stated that the defendant had engaged in improper and illegal trading. The Court noted that an attorney " may be the agent of his client for purposes of Rule 801(d)(2)(D)" but "the unique nature of the attorney-client relationship demands that a trial court exercise caution in admitting statements that are the product of this relationship." In prior cases the lawyers spoke to witnesses to develop a defense strategy and took a risk that the witnesses would testify as to their contact, but here the lawyer was not acting in an investigative capacity and "[t] is is not a case where an attorney's pre-trial tactical decisions backfired." It concluded that the government "achieved the equivalent of having Jung's former attorney stand with the prosecutors and vouch for his indictment." In holding that the former attorney's statements were inadmissible, the Court reasoned that "[f]rom a policy perspective, defendants will be chilled from sharing information with their attorneys, defense attorneys will be deterred from vigorous advocacy and the attorney-client relationship will be impaired if statements like [the defendant's former attorney's] regarding Jung's criminal liability are admissible."

Gill v. Maciejewski, 546 F.3d 557 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an arrestee against a university police officer in an action claiming use of excessive force. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a statement made during the underlying criminal trial by the arrestee's attorney: "So almost four months after this incident we still don't know if it was Officer Maciejewski or Sergeant Reineke or Officer Hermes who did the knee drop. No one has accepted responsibility." The Court held that the defendant, Maciejewski, took unwarranted liberties in offering the statement, because when considered in context it was clear that the arrestee's attorney was not suggesting that the arrestee did not know who assaulted him but was calling attention to Maciejewski's failure to attend and testify at the criminal trial.

[10] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Statements Which Are Not Hearsay -- Admission by Party-Opponent -- Coconspirators [Go To Main]

[b] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Appellate Review

United States v. Dowdell, 595 F.3d 50 (1st Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a cocaine distribution conviction and found no error in the admission of coconspirator statements. It noted that a Trial Judge's findings on foundational facts will be reversed only if they are clearly erroneous, and that findings cannot be clearly erroneous if they involve the choice of a plausible interpretation of the evidence. In United States v. Aviles-Colon, 536 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed drug and firearm convictions, and reiterated that to preserve an objection to coconspirator statements a party must renew the objection at the close of all of the evidence. Failure to renew results in only plain error review.

[c] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Availability of Declarant

United States v. Gardner, 447 F.3d 558 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine, the Court held that the Confrontation Clause does not require that the government show that the declarant is unavailable in order to offer a coconspirator statement. Contrary Circuit precedent predated and was overruled by United States v. Inadi, 475 U.S. 387 (1986) (see Main Volume of the Manual, § 801.03[10][c], [g]).

[f] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Civil Cases

Gunville v. Walker, 583 F.3d 979 (7th Cir. 2009) : Affirming summary judgment for state officials sued by former employees who alleged that their termination violated their First and Fourteenth Amendment rights, the Court held that testimony by an assistant to a state personnel manager that the manager told her that voter records were "pulled" for certain personnel decisions was hearsay because it was offered to prove that the records were in fact pulled. The Court rejected the argument that the manager's statement was admissible as a coconspirator statement because there was no showing of a conspiracy; the plaintiffs' speculation of an undocumented, implicit conspiracy was not enough to establish the foundation required under Rule 801(d)(2)(E).

Champagne Metals v. Ken-Mac Metals, Inc., 458 F.3d 1073 (10th Cir. 2006) : In an antitrust action against distributors of aluminum products, the plaintiff offered statements by representatives of aluminum mills under the coconspirator exception. The Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the representatives' statements without making a preliminary factual determination whether a conspiracy existed between the defendants and the mills.

[g] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Confrontation Concerns

United States v. Stewart, 433 F.3d 273 (2d Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed convictions for making false statements to government officials, finding no Confrontation Clause error in admitting statements made by the conspirators in their interviews with government agents against their coconspirators. Although the statements were made in a context that was otherwise "testimonial" under Crawford v. Washington, they were made with the intent of furthering a conspiracy to obstruct justice and thus admissible on an agency theory as coconspirator statements, which are not considered "testimonial" under Crawford.

United States v. Stover, 474 F.3d 904 (6th Cir. 2007) : The Court held that under the Supreme Court's decisions in Crawford v. Washington and Davis v. Washington, "co-conspirators' statements made in pendency and furtherance of a conspiracy [are] not testimonial" and therefore that the defendant's right to confrontation was not violated when a statement was properly admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). In United States v. Lopez-Medina, 461 F.3d 724 (6th Cir. 2006) , the Court found no Confrontation Clause violation in the admission of scraps of paper that testifying agents characterized as drug ledgers. Because the government had established by a preponderance of the evidence "the existence of a conspiracy, [defendant's] involvement in the conspiracy, and the drug ledgers' use in furtherance of the conspiracy, admission of the documents at issue did not violate [defendant's] rights under the Confrontation Clause."

United States v. Hargrove, 508 F.3d 445 (7th Cir. 2007) : The defendant, a police officer, was charged with taking part in a conspiracy to rob drug dealers. One of his coconspirators had a discussion with a potential member of the conspiracy (in fact an undercover informant) about future robberies. The Court rejected the argument that the coconspirator's statements were testimonial, holding that "Crawford did not affect the admissibility of coconspirator statements." The Court specifically rejected the argument that Crawford somehow undermined Bourjaily, noting that in both Crawford and Davis, "the Supreme Court specifically cited Bourjaily -- which as here involved a coconspirator's statement made to a government informant -- to illustrate a category of nontestimonial statements that falls outside the requirements of the Confrontation Clause."

United States v. Sturdivant, 513 F.3d 795 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court held that because hearsay was properly admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(E), " Crawford is inapplicable and the testimony did not violate Sturdivant's confrontation rights." In United States v. Gardner, 447 F.3d 558 (8th Cir. 2006) , the court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine, holding that the Confrontation Clause does not require that the government show that the declarant is unavailable in order to offer a coconspirator statement. Contrary Circuit precedent predated and was overruled by United States v. Inadi, 475 U.S. 387 (1986) (see Main Volume of the Manual).

United States v. Underwood, 446 F.3d 1340 (11th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, the Court held that a coconspirator statement made to a confidential informant was not "testimonial" under Crawford. The statement was not made in a formal setting, but to arrange a drug transaction, and it was not made in circumstances that would lead the declarant reasonably to believe it would be available for use at a later trial.

[h] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Conspiracy Not Charged

United States v. Washington, 434 F.3d 7 (1st Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for distribution of cocaine base, finding no plain error in the admission of statements by co-venturers. Even though a conspiracy was not charged, the Court noted that statements of coconspirators are admissible if made during and in furtherance of a conspiracy. The Court also stated that it considered "statements of joint venturers in a criminal scheme as equivalent to statements of co-conspirators for purposes of application of Rule 801(d)(2)(E)."

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Declarant's Participation in Conspiracy

United States v. Young, 553 F.3d 1035 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for a marijuana conspiracy, finding no clear error in the admission of certain coconspirator statements. Although a buyer-seller relationship is not by itself sufficient to make someone a participant in a conspiracy, there was evidence that the defendants had fronted drugs to the declarants and that the quantities involved were significant, so there was a sufficient foundation that the declarants were coconspirators and their statements were in furtherance of the conspiracy.

United States v. Engler, 521 F.3d 965 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed methamphetamine convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting photographic images of text messages sent via cellular telephone to a defendant by an unknown person while law enforcement officers were about to execute a search warrant. The Court reasoned that "the very content of the text messages establishes by a preponderance of the evidence that the sender was a coconspirator."

[k] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- During the Conspiracy

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Hargrove, 508 F.3d 445 (7th Cir. 2007) : The defendant, a police officer, was charged with taking part in a conspiracy to rob drug dealers. A recorded conversation, in which one of his coconspirators had a discussion with a potential member of the conspiracy (in fact an undercover informant) about future robberies, was admitted against the defendant under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). The defendant claimed that he had withdrawn from the conspiracy by the time the conversation took place, but the Court held the defendant's having "retired" and moved out of town did not by itself mean that he had withdrawn from the conspiracy. "Inactivity alone does not mean withdrawal; to withdraw from a conspiracy, the defendant must terminate completely his active involvement in the conspiracy, as well as take affirmative steps to defeat or disavow the conspiracy's purpose." Here, there was no evidence that the defendant had taken any affirmative steps to withdraw, and in fact the evidence indicated that he "was still getting a cut of the take after his move to Las Vegas."

[ii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- During the Conspiracy -- Statements After Declarant's Arrest

United States v. Martinez, 430 F.3d 317 (6th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed convictions arising from a drug-trafficking conspiracy, finding no error in the admission of an anonymous letter found during the search of the apartment belonging to a defendant's girlfriend, which referred to conspirators who had been cooperating and to documents that had been disclosed to defense counsel in a prior case against the conspiracy and which warned the recipients to "cut off" their associates and not delay "like we did." Although the author was apparently incarcerated when the letter was written, the contents of the letter -- promoting the objectives of the conspiracy by providing information about the government's investigation -- indicated that he had not terminated his involvement in the ongoing conspiracy.

United States v. Cesareo-Ayala, 576 F.3d 1120 (10th Cir. 2009) : Soon after the defendant's coconspirator was arrested and agreed to cooperate, he received a call from the defendant setting up another cocaine transaction. Statements by the coconspirator in that conversation that implied the defendant was dealing were admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). Affirming a conviction for cocaine trafficking, the Court held there was no error in admitting the statements, as they were not hearsay but only provided the context for the defendant's statements in the conversation that strongly suggested he had been involved in another transaction. The concurring Judge thought that the coconspirator's statements were inadmissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) because his statements were not in furtherance of the conspiracy after his arrest, and thought that the contents of the statements and the manner in which they were admitted supported an argument that they were admitted for their truth and thus hearsay, but that any errors were harmless.

[iii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- During the Conspiracy -- Statements After Defendant's Arrest

United States v. Townley, 472 F.3d 1267 (10th Cir. 2007) : Affirming cocaine and methamphetamine convictions, the Court held that a tape-recorded conversation between a coconspirator who was cooperating with the police and another coconspirator was properly admitted even though the defendant had been arrested, because the non-cooperating coconspirator's statements indicated an attempt to continue the conspiracy.

[l] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Existence of Conspiracy

United States v. Gewin, 471 F.3d 197 (D.C. Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for securities fraud, rejecting a defense argument that coconspirator statements had been admitted improperly because there was no finding before their admission of an unlawful conspiracy. Because Rule 801(d)(2)(E) is founded on concepts of agency and partnership law and is applicable in both criminal and civil trials, the foundation requires showing only action in concert toward a common goal.

United States v. Al-Moayad, 545 F.3d 139 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed convictions for conspiring to provide material support to designated terrorist organizations (Hamas and Al-Qaeda). The Court found an abuse of discretion in the admission of a mujahidin form during the government's rebuttal case that purported to show that one of the defendants had sponsored a fighter to attend a training camp. Although the form was properly authenticated, the Judge failed to make any findings about the existence of a conspiracy in which the defendant against whom the form was offered participated. The Court likewise found an abuse of discretion in the admission of a video of a wedding speech as a coconspirator statement, given the lack of evidence that the declarant and the defendants were involved together in a conspiracy. Finally, it was an abuse of discretion to admit the last will and testament of a mujahidin fighter, given the lack of independent evidence that the fighter and a defendant were members of a conspiracy.

[m] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Foundation

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Conditional Admission of Statement

United States v. Colon-Diaz, 521 F.3d 29 (1st Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for drug distribution, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the testimony of an informant regarding a request she made to the defendant's stepson, since her statement put the stepson's statement (admitted as a coconspirator's statement) into context and was not offered for its truth. As for the stepson's statement, the Court observed that, to preserve an objection on appeal to admission of a coconspirator's statement, a defendant must at the close of the evidence request a determination by a preponderance whether the declarant and the defendant were members of a conspiracy and whether the declarant's statement was in furtherance of the conspiracy. In this case, the defendant objected to the stepson's statement only on the ground that it was not in furtherance of the conspiracy, so that was the only issue preserved. The Court found no abuse of discretion in overruling the objection, and found no plain error in the ruling that the other elements of coconspirator rule were satisfied.

United States v. Harris, 585 F.3d 394 (7th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a cocaine conviction, the Court noted that "[t]his Circuit requires that a district court make a ruling on the admissibility of a coconspirator's statement prior to their introduction at trial," but it added that "a failure to make the required findings does not necessarily doom the district court's decision to admit the testimony." It concluded that although the admissibility of the statements "presents a close question," "the preponderance of the evidence on record does support the existence of a conspiracy" because the defendant's actions and the surrounding circumstances corroborated the declarant's statements concerning a conspiracy.

[iii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Foundation -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Mangual-Garcia, 505 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2007) : Affirming cocaine convictions, the Court held that there was no plain error in the admission of coconspirator statements despite the Trial Judge's failure to make a final determination at the close of the evidence that the declarant was a member of the conspiracy when the statements were made. The Court noted that an FBI agent provided a "certification letter" that the declarant was a cooperating witness for the FBI before and after the statements were made, but not at the time the statements were made. Although the agent did not testify, a Trial Judge may consider any evidence other than privileged information in making a Rule 104(a) determination as to a preliminary question of fact.

United States v. Conrad, 507 F.3d 424 (6th Cir. 2007) : In a prosecution for methamphetamine possession, the Court remanded the case because the Trial Judge had failed to make a finding whether the declarant was still a conspirator and whether the statement was "mere idle chatter" before determining that the statement was made in furtherance of the purposes of the conspiracy and had used a "prima facie" rather than the proper "preponderance of evidence" standard when determining the admissibility of a purported coconspirator's statement.

Champagne Metals v. Ken-Mac Metals, Inc., 458 F.3d 1073 (10th Cir. 2006) : In an antitrust action against distributors of aluminum products, the plaintiff offered statements by representatives of aluminum mills under the coconspirator exception. The Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the representatives' statements without making a preliminary factual determination whether a conspiracy existed between the defendants and the mills.

[v] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Foundation -- Rulings

United States v. Fuller, 557 F.3d 859 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, finding no error in the Judge's failure to make an explicit ruling as to the various elements supporting admission of a coconspirator's statements. The rulings required by United States v. Bell, 573 F.2d 1040 (8th Cir. 1978) , need not be made explicitly, as long as the Judge "substantially complies with Bell's procedures."

[n] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Independent Evidence of Foundation

United States v. Mitchell, 596 F.3d 18 (1st Cir. 2010) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, the Court held that testimony by a cooperating witness was sufficient extrinsic evidence to prove the conspiracy and the declarant's and the defendant's roles in it.

United States v. Liera, 585 F.3d 1237 (9th Cir. 2009) : Reversing convictions for bringing aliens into the United States, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit testimony by an alien whom the defendant attempted to smuggle into the country that while he was in China his mother told him what it would cost to have a person smuggled into the United States. Aside from the mother's statements, there was no independent evidence that the mother was involved in a conspiracy involving the defendant.

[o] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Informants' Statements

United States v. Cesareo-Ayala, 576 F.3d 1120 (10th Cir. 2009) : Soon after the defendant's coconspirator was arrested and agreed to cooperate, he received a call from the defendant setting up another cocaine transaction. Statements by the coconspirator in that conversation that implied the defendant was dealing were admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). Affirming a conviction for cocaine trafficking, the Court held there was no error in admitting the statements, as they were not hearsay but only provided the context for the defendant's statements in the conversation that strongly suggested he had been involved in another transaction. The concurring Judge thought that the coconspirator's statements were inadmissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) because his statements were not in furtherance of the conspiracy after his arrest, and thought that the contents of the statements and the manner in which they were admitted supported an argument that they were admitted for their truth and thus hearsay, but that any errors were harmless.

[ii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required

[A] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Efforts To Conceal

United States v. Diaz, 597 F.3d 56 (1st Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring to engage in the sexual trafficking of children, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a statement by one conspirator telling another to stop talking to a police officer, even though the two conspirators had already been arrested. The Trial Judge could properly find that the statement was intended to prevent law enforcement officers from terminating the sex trafficking operation and therefore was in furtherance.

United States v. Weaver, 507 F.3d 178 (3d Cir. 2007) : On interlocutory appeal in a fraud conspiracy prosecution, the Court vacated a ruling in limine that precluded the government from introducing a recorded telephone conversation between a conspirator and her sister. The Court held that if the Judge determined the sister was also a conspirator, statements in the conversation providing information about the state of the conspiracy satisfied the "in furtherance" requirement. Even if the sister was not a member, statements to conceal the conspiracy were intended to further it and would be admissible under the coconspirator statement exemption.

United States v. Ihsan Elashyi, 554 F.3d 480 (5th Cir. 2008) : Affirming conspiracy convictions, the Court observed that efforts to conceal an ongoing conspiracy obviously further the conspiracy by attempting to assure that it will not be brought to an end.

[B] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required -- Information to Conspirators

United States v. Carson, 455 F.3d 336 (D.C. Cir. 2006) : The Court upheld convictions of five defendants in a case it described as "a story of mayhem and disorder in and round the 200 block of K Street, Southwest, in the District of Columbia from the 1980s until 1998." The case involved a large narcotics distribution ring that "led to an astonishing amount of violence and a seemingly complete repudiation of civil society and respect for human life." The Court found no error in admitting hearsay statements of coconspirators, as they were not "mere narrative or idle chatter" but rather part of an effort to update another coconspirator on the conspiracy's status and motivate his continued participation.

United States v. Weaver, 507 F.3d 178 (3d Cir. 2007) : On interlocutory appeal in a fraud conspiracy prosecution, the Court vacated a ruling in limine that precluded the government from introducing a recorded telephone conversation between a conspirator and her sister. The Court held that if the Judge determined the sister was also a conspirator, statements in the conversation providing information about the state of the conspiracy satisfied the "in furtherance" requirement. Even if the sister was not a member, statements to conceal the conspiracy were intended to further it and would be admissible under the coconspirator statement exemption.

United States v. Martinez, 430 F.3d 317 (6th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed convictions arising from a drug-trafficking conspiracy, finding no error in the admission of an anonymous letter found during the search of the apartment belonging to a defendant's girlfriend, which referred to conspirators who had been cooperating and to documents that had been disclosed to defense counsel in a prior case against the conspiracy and which warned the recipients to "cut off" their associates and not delay "like we did." It was apparent from the content of the letter that it was written with the intent to promote the objectives of the conspiracy by providing information relating to the government's ongoing investigation, warning that some of its members could no longer be trusted, and advising caution in future dealings.

United States v. Ragland, 555 F.3d 706 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for distributing heroin that resulted in death, finding no abuse of discretion in a ruling that statements made by one conspirator identifying the defendant as his source of drugs were made to promote sales and ensure the continuation of the conspiracy. In the Court's view, this theory of admissibility of the statements was not entirely convincing, because most of the people in the conspiracy were friends who frequently gave drugs to each other, so the identity of the defendant as a particular supplier would not have done much to further the conspiracy. Nonetheless, because giving and sharing drugs is prohibited by law, a tacit understanding to do so even on a social basis constitutes a conspiracy to distribute, and "comments passing between [the participants] concerning sources of supply and the quality of the product available to each of them are made in furtherance of that continuing conspiracy." In United States v. McKay, 431 F.3d 1085 (8th Cir. 2005) , the court affirmed drug distribution convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by two cooperating witnesses that one defendant told each of them that he was purchasing drugs from his codefendant. In one case the statement was made to bring the witness up to date on changes in the conspiracy while he had been in prison, and in the other the information was provided in an effort to have the witness pool funds with the declarant in order to obtain more drugs to sell.

United States v. Larson, 495 F.3d 1094 (9th Cir. 2007) : A panel of the Court had affirmed convictions for conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting coconspirator statements identifying a defendant as the source of the drugs because the statements kept the conspirator to whom they were addressed abreast of the conspiracy's activities, and they were responsive to his likely concern, given the danger of the endeavor, about knowing with whom he was dealing. United States v. Larson, 460 F.3d 1200 (9th Cir. 2006) . On rehearing, the en banc Court held that the District Court had abused its discretion in barring the questions, but also held that the resulting error was harmless, because defense counsel did explore the witness's "criminal past, history as a drug user and seller, and desire to obtain a lesser sentence through his testimony against his co-conspirators. We note, too, that the court instructed the jury that it should view the testimony of the cooperating witnesses with greater caution than that of other witnesses."

United States v. Siegelman, 561 F.3d 1215 (11th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions in a public corruption case, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of statements by one conspirator to another that informed the latter that their plan had worked and that the latter's involvement had helped, and which also affected the conspirators' future dealings by encouraging future cooperation.

[C] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Rodriguez, 525 F.3d 85 (1st Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug and firearms conspiracies, finding no plain error in the admission of coconspirator statements that, by identifying the defendant, directed potential customers to the source of narcotics and thus furthered the conspiracy.

In re Terrorist Bombings of U.S. Embassies in E. Africa, 552 F.3d 93 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for al Qaeda terrorism in 1998, finding no error in the admission of coconspirator statements made for purposes of providing reassurance or information about the current status of the conspiracy, maintaining trust and cohesiveness, and inducing the listener's assistance.

United States v. Davis, 457 F.3d 817 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to distribute crack cocaine, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony regarding statements by a coconspirator that the defendant was his supplier. "Coconspirators' statements that discuss the supply source for the illegal drugs or identify a coconspirator's role in the conspiracy are considered statements made 'in furtherance' of the conspiracy."

United States v. Moran, 493 F.3d 1002 (9th Cir. 2007) : In a prosecution for tax fraud and wire and mail fraud, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting financial data recovered from a computer seized from the home of a defendant. Although the codefendants argued that the records were kept for the defendant's own purposes, the facts tended to show that the records were used to keep track of transactions that were part of the conspiracy's fraudulent schemes and were thus in furtherance of the conspiracy's purposes. In United States v. Bridgeforth, 441 F.3d 864 (9th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a drug conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of statements by a coconspirator to a potential drug buyer that the declarant's supplier was present. The statements were in furtherance of conspiracy and were not mere idle conversation, because they informed the buyer that the declarant was in a position to obtain and deliver drugs.

[D] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required -- Obtaining Assistance

United States v. Gardner, 447 F.3d 558 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine, the Court held that a coconspirator's statement concerning efforts to recruit other conspirators is in furtherance of conspiracy.

[E] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required -- Reassurance, Encouragement, etc.

United States v. Carson, 455 F.3d 336 (D.C. Cir. 2006) : The Court upheld convictions of five defendants in a case it described as "a story of mayhem and disorder in and round the 200 block of K Street, Southwest, in the District of Columbia from the 1980s until 1998." The case involved a large narcotics distribution ring that "led to an astonishing amount of violence and a seemingly complete repudiation of civil society and respect for human life." The Court found no error in admitting hearsay statements of coconspirators, as they were not "mere narrative or idle chatter" but rather part of an effort to update another coconspirator on the conspiracy's status and motivate his continued participation.

United States v. Mooneyham, 473 F.3d 280 (6th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed cocaine and methamphetamine convictions, holding that statements by a coconspirator to an undercover officer concerning the defendant were admissible as statements made in furtherance of conspiracy. The statements were intended to assure a possibly recurring customer as to the reliability of the defendant as a supplier.

[F] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Admissible or Admission Required -- Statements to Undercover Agents or Informants

United States v. Rodriguez-Velez, 597 F.3d 32 (1st Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to possess drugs with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of statements made by coconspirators to a government witness, since they were invitations to the witness to wait until the defendant got to a certain place to replenish the drug supply and so were in furtherance of the distribution.

[iii] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Excludable or Exclusion Required

[B] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- In Furtherance Of -- Statement Excludable or Exclusion Required -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Warman, 578 F.3d 320 (6th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a drug conspiracy conviction, the Court held that it was error (but harmless) to admit statements by a member of a motorcycle club involved in drug trafficking who told confidential informants that he was the defendant's partner in the drug trade. The statements were not made in furtherance of the conspiracy, as the declarant was not inducing the informants to participate in the conspiracy or providing them with information that would assist in carrying out the conspiracy, but was only "bragging." By contrast, the Court held that testimony by a confidential informant that a member of the club told the informant about witnessing the murder of another informant was made in furtherance of the conspiracy.

[o.1] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Lawful Combinations

United States v. Brockenborrugh, 575 F.3d 726 (D.C. Cir. 2009) : Affirming a conviction for wire fraud and conspiracy that arose from a scheme to file a fraudulent deed to obtain a property, the Court found no error in the admission of statements made by one alleged conspirator to the lawyer for the executor for the property, which stated that the defendant wanted to buy the property. It explained that "Rule 801(d)(2)(E) allows for admission of statements by individuals acting in furtherance of a lawful joint enterprise," and concluded that the Judge was correct in finding that the declarant and the defendant were in a "business relationship" when the statement was made.

[p] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Multiple Conspiracies

[i] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Statement Admissible

United States v. Ihsan Elashyi, 554 F.3d 480 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for illegally exporting computer equipment to Libya and Syria. It observed that the conspiracy that forms the basis for admitting coconspirator statements need not be the same conspiracy charged in the indictment, as long as the declarant and any defendant against whom the statements are admitted were members of the same conspiracy and the statements were made during and in furtherance of that conspiracy. In United States v. Elashyi, 554 F.3d 480 (5th Cir. 2008) , the defendants were convicted of a conspiracy to illegally export computers to Libya and Syria. Affirming, the Court found no error in the admission of statements by several conspirators, indicating an attempt to evade export requirements and avoid detection, against all the defendants at trial. Although these statements were made after the export conspiracy charged in the indictment had ended, the Court noted that the conspiracy that forms the basis for admitting coconspirators' statements need not be the same conspiracy for which the defendant is indicted. In this case, the statements were made pursuant to a conspiracy to make false statements, of which all the defendants were members.

United States v. Matthews, 431 F.3d 1296 (11th Cir. 2005) : This opinion supersedes the one annotated in the Main Volume of the Manual.

[t] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Relationship to Other Rules

United States v. Schalk, 515 F.3d 768 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to distribute marijuana and cocaine, the Court observed that "[a] government's informant's statements are not admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) because he cannot be a conspirator; however, they are admissible if they provide context or were adopted by the conspirator during the course of the conversation." It found that a government informant's statements were properly admitted to provide context for a coconspirator's statements; when offered for context, the statements were not hearsay.

[x] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Unidentified Declarants

United States v. Ayala, 601 F.3d 256 (4th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed convictions for offenses arising out from participation in a violent street gang, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of coconspirator statements. The Court noted that "it is not necessary for the offering party to identify the declarant by name" and the government need only show that the declarant was more likely than not a conspirator. It also remarked that a statement need not be made to a conspirator; a statement to a non-conspirator qualifies as long as it was made by a conspirator in furtherance of the conspiracy.

United States v. Martinez, 430 F.3d 317 (6th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed convictions arising from a drug-trafficking conspiracy, finding no error in the admission of an anonymous letter found during the search of the apartment belonging to a defendant's girlfriend, which referred to conspirators who had been cooperating and to documents that had been disclosed to defense counsel in a prior case against the conspiracy and which warned the recipients to "cut off" their associates and not delay "like we did." The location in which the letter was found and its contents supported a finding that the letter was more likely than not written by a member of the alleged conspiracy.

[y] Rule 801(d)(2)(E) -- Use by Accused

United States v. Rivera-Hernandez, 497 F.3d 71 (1st Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for money laundering arising from a scheme in which a contractor building a juvenile facility under the defendant's authority paid money to the defendant for work never done. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony that the defendant told his father that he was providing consulting services to the contractor, but as a public servant he could not hold other employment and thus was having the payments made to his father's company. Although the statement might have been made in furtherance of conspiracy, it was not offered against the defendant; it was offered by him and therefore did not qualify as an admission.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 802 RULE 802

4-802 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 802.syn

§ 802.syn Synopsis to Chapter 802: RULE 802

802.01 Official Text

802.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Basic Rule

[2] Relationship to Residual Exception

[3] Statutory Exceptions

802.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Appellate Review Standard

[2] Bench Trials

[3] Exceptions in Other Rules

[4] Opening the Door to Hearsay

[5] Statutory Exceptions to Hearsay Ban

802.04 Legislative History

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 802 RULE 802

4-802 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 802.01

802.01 Official Text

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by these rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

10 of 176 DOCUMENTS

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 802 RULE 802

4-802 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 802.02

802.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Basic Rule

This Rule provides for the standard exclusion of hearsay evidence; hearsay is simply inadmissible unless an exception is applicable. The significant thing about the Rule, however, is that hearsay exceptions can only be provided by the Federal Rules of Evidence or by "other Rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress." The Rule is plain, therefore, that unless an exception to the hearsay rule is provided by statute or in these Rules or in other Court rules, the Supreme Court and lower Federal Courts are not free to create new categorical hearsay exceptions without engaging in rulemaking. In other words, whereas Rule 501 explicitly permits the law of privilege to be changed by adjudication, hearsay rules can only be changed by rulemaking. It must be kept in mind that Rule 801(d) provides exemptions from the ban on hearsay evidence. Thus, one must consult that Rule, in addition to Rules 803, 804, and 807, to ascertain whether out-of-court statements offered for their truth may be admitted.

[2] Relationship to Residual Exception

This restriction on the development of hearsay exceptions represents the result of one of the great struggles during the codification process. The Advisory Committee had drafted Rules 803 and 804 to give the Federal Courts discretion to create new hearsay exceptions whenever there were sufficient circumstantial guarantees that extrajudicial statements were trustworthy. Fearful that this gave too much discretion to the Courts, some members of Congress fought to ensure that the Courts would have little discretion to expand on the hearsay exceptions. Those advocating flexibility pointed to the dangers of wooden rules, while those desirous of controlling the use of hearsay evidence pointed to the responsibilities of Congress to supervise the Courts. As Rule 807 specifically provides, Federal Courts can admit hearsay statements not specifically covered by another hearsay exception, but only if the requirements set forth in detail in Rule 807 are satisfied. Hence, there is some flexibility, but if the requirements of Rule 807 cannot be met, Rule 802 mandates exclusion unless the Rules are amended or a statute is passed. As we will discuss more fully in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 807, however, most Federal Courts have applied the residual exception more broadly than Congress appears to have intended, in effect adding new exceptions to the hearsay rule in some kinds of cases.

[3] Statutory Exceptions

Congress can provide for admissibility of evidence by stating in a statute that certain evidence is admissible for a specified purpose. For example, 18 U.S.C. § 4245 provides that a certificate by the Director of the Bureau of Prisons stating that there is probable cause to believe that a convict is mentally incompetent at the time of trial "shall be prima facie evidence of the facts and conclusions certified therein." It does not matter that the word hearsay is not used; Congress has made its will known with respect to the admissibility of the evidence. Federal statutes are replete with provisions that certain evidence is admissible for specified purposes. n1

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., 15 U.S.C. § 1115 (providing that certain trademark registrations shall be admissible in evidence); 38 U.S.C. § 8506 (providing that an affidavit setting forth the time and place of a posting of notice of sale of property shall be admissible).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 802 RULE 802

4-802 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 802.03

802.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Appellate Review Standard

Trepel v. Roadway Express, Inc., 194 F.3d 708 (6th Cir. 1999) : The Court noted that because of the Supreme Court's statement in General Elec. Co. v. Joiner, n1 that "[a]ll evidentiary rulings are reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard," it would disregard its "heretofore well-settled precedents that hearsay evidentiary rulings are reviewed de novo," and would review rulings on whether evidence is hearsay or whether the foundation requirements for hearsay exceptions have been met for an abuse of discretion. We respectfully observe that the Joiner quotation comes from the Court's paraphrase of the respondent's argument, not the Court's statement of applicable law, and that the issue involved in the case (admissibility of expert testimony) is one that traditionally has been subject to abuse of discretion review, which both parties in Joiner agreed was the applicable standard.

[2] Bench Trials

Moore v. United States, 429 U.S. 20 (1976) : At a consolidated hearing on a motion to suppress evidence and a trial on the merits for possession of heroin with intent to distribute, the Trial Judge admitted hearsay evidence that the defendant possessed heroin and relied upon the hearsay in adjudging the defendant guilty. The Supreme Court found "unpersuasive" the government's argument that the error was probably harmless because the defendant was convicted in a bench trial and remanded the case to the Trial Court for a determination of whether the error was harmless.

[3] Exceptions in Other Rules

Ueland v. United States, 291 F.3d 993 (7th Cir. 2002) : The Court reversed a judgment for the United States in a Federal Tort Claims Act action brought by a prisoner after the prison van in which he was riding struck another car. The plaintiff proffered the deposition, taken in a separate lawsuit, of another prisoner in the van, who corroborated the plaintiff's account. The deposition was excluded on grounds of hearsay, but the Court held that the deposition was admissible under Fed. R. Civ. P. 32(a)(3). The Court noted that "Rule 32(a), as a free-standing exception to the hearsay rule, is one of the 'other rules' to which Fed. R. Evid. 802 refers."

[4] Opening the Door to Hearsay

United States v. Brown, 921 F.2d 1304 (D.C. Cir. 1990) : In a trial for PCP possession, an arresting officer testified on cross-examination that an informant had said she had previously met the defendant, but the officer had not recorded that fact in his notes. On redirect, he testified that the informant could identify the defendant from previous dealings of PCP. The Court held that mention of the PCP dealings was error, as that was hearsay not rehabilitating the officer's credibility, and defense counsel had not opened the door because the cross-examination testimony was admissible under the prior identification exemption.

United States v. Candelaria-Silva, 162 F.3d 698 (1st Cir. 1998) : At the trial of a drug case, the defendant improperly asked a witness on direct examination what the witness had heard about the defendant's brothers and about the defendant. The witness' testimony suggested that the brothers, not the defendant, were involved in drug distribution. In light of this testimony, the Court found that the doctrine of curative admissibility permitted the government to ask whether the defendant was known to have participated along with his brothers. In Polansky v. CNA Ins. Co., n2 the Court reversed a judgment against an insurer that claimed that a building fire was arson, and held it was error to admit a letter written by the plaintiff's public adjuster that related a hearsay statement allegedly made by an official working for the insurer. Although the plaintiff argued that the letter was offered in response to a hearsay statement to which he did not object, the Court declined "to approve the following rule: if plaintiff does not object to evidence possibly admitted against the rules of evidence, then plaintiff gets a free shot to violate those same rules."

United States v. Rosa, 11 F.3d 315 (2d Cir. 1993) : After a cooperating witness in a major narcotics and racketeering case testified, on the basis of what he had been told by others, that there was $1.1 million more cash in his apartment at the time of his arrest than the police accounted for, the prosecutor sought, in order to forestall a defense argument that officers had stolen the money, to ask the witness whether he had been told the apartment had been burglarized after his arrest. When defense counsel refused to agree not to cross-examine on the point, the Trial Judge permitted testimony as to the amount of money in the apartment and the burglary and advised the jury that it was hearsay and could be discounted. The Court held that the defendants had not waived their hearsay objection to mention of the burglary by refusing to forgo cross-examination, nor had that opened the door to inadmissible evidence. The hearsay statement about the amount of money was admissible as a coconspirator's statement, so the hearsay about the burglary was not responding to inadmissible evidence. More importantly, even if the amount statement were inadmissible, the government could not thereby open the door for itself. However, any error was harmless.

[5] Statutory Exceptions to Hearsay Ban

United States v. Garcia Abrego, 141 F.3d 142 (5th Cir. 1998) : The Court held, in a CCE prosecution, that foreign bank records meeting the criteria of 18 U.S.C. § 3505 were not precluded from admission by the hearsay rule.

United States v. Aikins, 946 F.2d 608 (9th Cir. 1990) , amended (9th Cir. 1991): Although reversing convictions for drug possession on the high seas, the Court held that proof of Panama's consent to enforcement of United States law was sufficiently supplied under 46 U.S.C. App. § 1903(c)(1) by the Secretary of State's certificate.

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. General Elec. Co. v. Joiner, 522 U.S. 136, 141 (1997) .

(n2)Footnote 2. Polansky v. CNA Ins. Co., 852 F.2d 626 (1st Cir. 1988) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 802 RULE 802

4-802 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 802.04

802.04 Legislative History

Advisory Committee's Note

The provision excepting from the operation of the rule hearsay which is made admissible by other rules adopted by the Supreme Court or by Act of Congress continues the admissibility thereunder of hearsay which would not qualify under these Evidence Rules. The following examples illustrate the working of the exception:

Federal Rules of Civil Procedure

Rule 4(g): proof of service by affidavit.

Rule 32: admissibility of depositions.

Rule 43(e): affidavits when motion based on facts not appearing of record.

Rule 56: affidavits in summary judgment proceedings.

Rule 65(b): showing by affidavit for temporary restraining order.

Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure

Rule 4(a): affidavits to show grounds for issuing warrants.

Rule 12(b)(4): affidavits to determine issues of fact in connection with motions.

Acts of Congress

10 U.S.C. § 7730: affidavits of unavailable witnesses in actions for damages caused by vessel in naval service, or towage or salvage of same, when taking of testimony or bringing of action delayed or stayed on security grounds.

29 U.S.C. § 161(4): affidavit of proof of service in NLRB proceedings.

38 U.S.C. § 5206: affidavit as proof of posting notice of sale of unclaimed property by Veterans Administration.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
Supp. To CHAPTER 802 RULE 802

4-802 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 802, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 802. Hearsay Rule	Rule 802. The Rule Against Hearsay
Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by	Hearsay is not admissible unless any of the folthese rules or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or by Act of Congress.

following provides otherwise:

- a federal statute;
- these rules; or
- other rules prescrib

ed
by
the Supre me
Cou rt.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 802 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
Supp. To CHAPTER 802 RULE 802

4-802 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 802.03

Supp. to § 802.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[4] Opening the Door to Hearsay [Go To Main]

United States v. Lopez-Medina, 596 F.3d 716 (10th Cir. 2010) : In a prosecution for possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute, a police officer testified on direct regarding the search of a truck, and on cross-examination defense counsel elicited that the officer suspected the truck because of information from a confidential informant, whose absence from the trial counsel emphasized. On redirect the officer testified over Confrontation Clause objections as to statements from the informant. Affirming, the Court held that the door had been opened when defense counsel went beyond asking the officer if he received information from the informant to asking what that information was. The Court also held that the door had been opened to the admission of statements implicating the defendant, which had been made by a codefendant at a change-of-plea hearing, when the officer was questioned about the codefendant's conviction in a way that suggested the codefendant had claimed full and sole responsibility for the crime.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 803 RULE 803

4-803 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 803.syn

§ 803.syn Synopsis to Chapter 803: RULE 803

803.01 Official Text

803.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Unavailability Irrelevant

[2] Rule 803(1) -- Present Sense Impressions

[a] Foundation for Exception

[b] Present Sense Impressions -- Corroboration Requirement

[3] Rule 803(2) -- Excited Utterances

[a] Foundation for Exception

[b] Excited Utterances -- What Is a Startling Event?

[c] Excited Utterances -- Timing of Statement

[d] Excited Utterances -- Responses to Questions

[e] Excited Utterances and Present Sense Impressions -- Unidentified Declarants

[4] Rule 803(3) -- Statements of Then Existing State of Mind or Physical Condition

[a] Foundation for Exception

[b] State of Mind -- Statements Looking Backward, Statements Looking Forward

[c] State of Mind -- Statements Offered to Prove the Subsequent Conduct of a Nondeclarant

[d] State of Mind -- Possibility of Fabrication

[5] Rule 803(4) -- Statements Made for Purposes of Medical Treatment or Diagnosis

[a] Foundation for Exception

[b] Statements Made for Purposes of Medical Treatment or Diagnosis -- Statements of Medical History, Causation, and Fault

[c] Statements Made for Purposes of Medical Treatment or Diagnosis -- Statements Made in Anticipation of Litigation

[d] Statements Made for Purposes of Medical Treatment or Diagnosis -- Statements by Nonpatients

[e] Statements Made for Purposes of Medical Treatment or Diagnosis -- Statements to Psychologists and Psychiatrists

[6] Rule 803(5) -- Prior Recollection Recorded

[a] Foundation for Exception

[b] Prior Recollection Recorded -- Two Party Vouching

[c] Prior Recollection Recorded -- Multiple Hearsay

[d] Prior Recollection Recorded -- Expansive Approaches

[7] Rule 803(6) -- Records of Regularly Conducted Activity

[a] Foundation for Exception

[b] Records of Regularly Conducted Activity -- Definition of "Business"

[c] Records of Regularly Conducted Activity -- "Business Duty"

[d] Records of Regularly Conducted Activity -- Foundation Requirements

[e] Records of Regularly Conducted Activity -- Regularly Conducted and Recorded

[f] Records of Regularly Conducted Activity -- Computerized Records

[g] Records of Regularly Conducted Activity -- Trustworthiness, Preparation in Anticipation of Litigation

[h] Records of Regularly Conducted Activity -- Opinions

[8] Rule 803(7) -- Absence of Records of Regularly Conducted Activity

[9] Rule 803(8) -- Public Records

[a] Foundation for Exception

[b] Public Records -- Which Reports Are "Public"?

[c] Public Records -- Law Enforcement Reports Offered by Criminal Defendants Against the Government

[d] Public Records -- Law Enforcement Reports Offered Against Criminal Defendants

[e] Public Records -- Relationship to Rule 803(6)

[f] Public Records -- Factual Findings and Investigative Reports

[g] Public Records -- Official's Lack of Personal Knowledge

[h] Public Records -- Judge and Jury Findings

[10] Rule 803(9) -- Records of Vital Statistics

[11] Rule 803(10) -- Absence of Public Records

[a] Foundation for Exception

[b] Absence of Public Record -- Scope of Search

[12] Rule 803(11) -- Records of Religious Organizations

[13] Rule 803(12) -- Marriage, Baptismal, and Similar Certificates

[14] Rule 803(13) -- Family Records

[15] Rule 803(14) -- Record of Documents Affecting an Interest in Property

[16] Rule 803(15) -- Statements in Documents Affecting an Interest in Property

[17] Rule 803(16) -- Ancient Documents

[18] Rule 803(17) -- Market Reports

[19] Rule 803(18) -- Learned Treatises

[a] Foundation for Exception

[b] Learned Treatises -- Not Received as Exhibits

[c] Learned Treatises -- Charts, Films and Tapes

[20] Rule 803(19) -- Reputation Concerning Personal or Family History

[21] Rule 803(20) -- Reputation Concerning Boundaries or General History

[22] Rule 803(21) -- Reputation as to Character

[23] Rule 803(22) -- Judgments in Felony Cases

[24] Rule 803(23) -- Judgment as to Personal, Family or General History, or Boundaries

[25] Residual Exception

[26] Confrontation Clause and Rule 803 Exceptions

[27] Specificity of Objection

803.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Rule 803(1) -- Present Sense Impression

[a] Rule 803(1) -- Constitutional Concerns

[b] Rule 803(1) -- Copyright Cases

[c] Rule 803(1) -- Interested Witness

[d] Rule 803(1) -- Interpretative Statements

[e] Rule 803(1) -- Personal Knowledge

[f] Rule 803(1) -- Relationship to Other Rules

[g] Rule 803(1) -- Reports of Conversations

[h] Rule 803(1) -- Responses to Questions

[i] Rule 803(1) -- Tape-Recorded Impressions

[j] Rule 803(1) -- Timing

[k] Rule 803(1) -- Valuations

[2] Rule 803(2) -- Excited Utterance

[a] Rule 803(2) -- Accidents

[b] Rule 803(2) -- Assault Victims

[c] Rule 803(2) -- Codefendant's Statement

[d] Rule 803(2) -- Constitutional Concerns

[e] Rule 803(2) -- Criminal Defendant's Statement

[f] Rule 803(2) -- Foundation

[g] Rule 803(2) -- Identifications

[h] Rule 803(2) -- Personal Knowledge

[i] Rule 803(2) -- Response to Questions

[j] Rule 803(2) -- Shooting Victim

[k] Rule 803(2) -- Scope of the Rule

[l] Rule 803(2) -- Threats

[m] Rule 803(2) -- Timing

[n] Rule 803(2) -- Unidentified Declarant

[o] Rule 803(2) -- Witnesses to Crimes

[3] Rule 803(3) -- Then Existing Mental, Emotional, Or Physical Condition

[a] Rule 803(3) -- Constitutional Concerns

[b] Rule 803(3) -- Customer Confusion

[c] Rule 803(3) -- Facts Reflected in State of Mind

[d] Rule 803(3) -- Intent

[i] Rule 803(3) -- Bearing Upon Motive of Another

[ii] Rule 803(3) -- Intent -- Inference from Present to Past State of Mind

[iii] Rule 803(3) -- Intent -- Miscellaneous Cases

[iv] Rule 803(3) -- Intent -- Proving Acts of Declarant

[v] Rule 803(3) -- Intent -- Proving Acts of Nondeclarant

[vi] Rule 803(3) -- Intent -- State of Mind

[e] Rule 803(3) -- Mixed Present and Past States of Mind

[f] Rule 803(3) -- Past Acts or State of Mind

[g] Rule 803(3) -- Present State of Mind

[i] Rule 803(3) -- Civil Cases

[ii] Rule 803(3) -- Present State of Mind -- Criminal Cases

[h] Rule 803(3) -- Requirement of Relevance

[i] Rule 803(3) -- Spontaneity

[j] Rule 803(3) -- Statement of Accused

[k] Rule 803(3) -- Statement of Belief or Memory

[l] Rule 803(3) -- Statement of Mental Condition

[m] Rule 803(3) -- Statement of Physical Condition

[n] Rule 803(3) -- Surveys and Opinion Polls

[4] Rule 803(4) -- Statements For Purposes Of Medical Diagnosis Or Treatment

[a] Rule 803(4) -- Abused Child

[b] Rule 803(4) -- Constitutional Concerns

[c] Rule 803(4) -- Medical Opinions

[d] Rule 803(4) -- Nonpatient Declarants

[e] Rule 803(4) -- Patient's Statement of Other Doctor's Opinion

[f] Rule 803(4) -- Statements Explaining Cause or Attributing Fault

[g] Rule 803(4) -- Statements for Purposes of Treatment

[h] Rule 803(4) -- Statements to Nonphysicians

[i] Rule 803(4) -- Summaries of Medical History

[5] Rule 803(5) -- Recorded Recollection

[a] Rule 803(5) -- Contemporaneous Recording Required

[b] Rule 803(5) -- Diaries

[c] Rule 803(5) -- Expert's Report

[d] Rule 803(5) -- Foundation

[e] Rule 803(5) -- Fresh in Memory When Statement Made

[f] Rule 803(5) -- Intoxicated Declarant

[g] Rule 803(5) -- Invocation of Self-Incrimination Privilege

[h] Rule 803(5) -- Memory Problems

[i] Rule 803(5) -- Not Receivable as Exhibit

[j] Rule 803(5) -- Personal Knowledge

[k] Rule 803(5) -- Police Reports

[l] Rule 803(5) -- Refreshing Recollection

[m] Rule 803(5) -- Two-Witness Voucher

[n] Rule 803(5) -- Weight

[6] Rule 803(6) -- Records Of Regularly Conducted Activity

[a] Rule 803(6) -- Affidavits

[b] Rule 803(6) -- At or Near the Time

[c] Rule 803(6) -- Audit Reports

[d] Rule 803(6) -- Bills and Invoices

[e] Rule 803(6) -- Computerized Records

[f] Rule 803(6) -- Diaries

[g] Rule 803(6) -- Electronic Mail

[h] Rule 803(6) -- Estimates

[i] Rule 803(6) -- Financial Statements

[j] Rule 803(6) -- Foreign Records

[k] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation

[i] Rule 803(6) -- Circumstantial Evidence or Judicial Notice

[ii] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation -- Custodian or Qualified Witness

[A] Rule 803(6) -- Civil Cases

[B] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation -- Custodian or Qualified Witness -- Criminal Cases

[iii] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation -- Examples

[A] Rule 803(6) -- Admissible Records

[B] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation -- Examples -- Inadmissible Records

[iv] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation -- Nonbusiness Purpose

[v] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation -- Procedure for Laying Foundation

[vi] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation -- Produced in Discovery

[l] Rule 803(6) -- Incomplete Records

[m] Rule 803(6) -- Internal Memoranda

[n] Rule 803(6) -- Internet Postings

[o] Rule 803(6) -- Investigative Reports

[p] Rule 803(6) -- Laboratory Reports

[q] Rule 803(6) -- Opinions

[r] Rule 803(6) -- Oral Proof of Missing Records

[s] Rule 803(6) -- Personal Knowledge

[t] Rule 803(6) -- Records Created by Another Entity

[u] Rule 803(6) -- Regular Practice To Make and Keep Record

[v] Rule 803(6) -- Relationship to Other Rules

[w] Rule 803(6) -- Source of Information

[i] Rule 803(6) -- Business Duty

[ii] Rule 803(6) -- Source of Information -- Hearsay Exception

[iii] Rule 803(6) -- Source of Information -- Miscellaneous Cases

[iv] Rule 803(6) -- Source of Information -- Statutory Duty

[v] Rule 803(6) -- Source of Information -- Third Party Complaints

[vi] Rule 803(6) -- Source of Information -- Unidentified Source

[vii] Rule 803(6) -- Source of Information -- Verification

[x] Rule 803(6) -- Special Situations

[y] Rule 803(6) -- Tax Records

[z] Rule 803(6) -- Trustworthiness

[i] Rule 803(6) -- Trustworthiness -- Miscellaneous Cases

[ii] Rule 803(6) -- Trustworthiness -- Records Made in Contemplation of Litigation

[7] Rule 803(7) -- Absence Of Entry In Records

[8] Rule 803(8) -- public Records And Reports

[a] Rule 803(8) -- Administrative Findings

[i] Rule 803(8) -- Administrative Findings -- Investigations

[A] Employment Cases

[B] Rule 803(8) -- Administrative Findings -- Investigations -- Other Cases

[ii] Rule 803(8) -- Administrative Findings -- Quasi-judicial Proceedings

[b] Rule 803(8) -- Agency Manuals, Records, and Reports

[c] Rule 803(8) -- Congressional and Legislative Findings

[d] Rule 803(8) -- Constitutional Concerns

[e] Rule 803(8) -- Court Records

[f] Rule 803(8) -- Factual Findings

[i] Rule 803(8) -- Accidents and Defective Products

[ii] Rule 803(8) -- Factual Findings -- Accompanying and Supporting Material

[iii] Rule 803(8) -- Factual Findings -- Civil Rights Cases

[iv] Rule 803(8) -- Factual Findings -- Employment Discrimination Cases

[v] Rule 803(8) -- Factual Findings -- Evalutive Findings and Opinions

[vi] Rule 803(8) -- Factual Findings -- Medical and Scientific

[vii] Rule 803(8) -- Factual Findings -- Miscellaneous Cases

[g] Rule 803(8) -- Foreign Records

[i] Rule 803(8) -- Civil Cases

[ii] Rule 803(8) -- Foreign Records -- Criminal Cases

[h] Rule 803(8) -- Foundation

[i] Rule 803(8) -- Included Hearsay

[j] Rule 803(8) -- Judicial Findings

[k] Rule 803(8) -- Law Enforcement Reports and Matters Observed by Officials in Criminal Cases

[i] Rule 803(8) -- Admissible

[ii] Rule 803(8) -- Law Enforcement Reports and Matters Observed by Officials in Criminal Cases -- Inadmissible

[iii] Rule 803(8) -- Law Enforcement Reports in Criminal Cases -- Offered by Defense

[l] Rule 803(8) -- Matters Observed by Officials -- Civil Cases

[m] Rule 803(8) -- Nongovernmental Agencies

[n] Rule 803(8) -- Opinions

[o] Rule 803(8) -- Police Reports -- Civil Cases

[p] Rule 803(8) -- Preliminary Memoranda

[q] Rule 803(8) -- Relationship to Other Rules

[r] Rule 803(8) -- Relevance Requirement

[s] Rule 803(8) -- Reports Setting Forth Activities

[t] Rule 803(8) -- Screening Panels

[u] Rule 803(8) -- State Department Reports

[v] Rule 803(8) -- State Law

[w] Rule 803(8) -- Statistical Reports

[x] Rule 803(8) -- Statutes and Regulations

[y] Rule 803(8) -- Transcripts and Minutes of Hearings and Meetings

[z] Rule 803(8) -- Trustworthiness

[i] Rule 803(8) -- Computerized Records

[ii] Rule 803(8) -- Trustworthiness -- Miscellaneous Cases

[iii] Rule 803(8) -- Trustworthiness -- Presumption of Trustworthiness

[iv] Rule 803(8) -- Trustworthiness -- Report Admissible or Required To Be Admitted

[v] Rule 803(8) -- Trustworthiness -- Report Excludable or Required To Be Excluded

[A] Rule 803(8) -- Civil Cases

[B] Rule 803(8) -- Trustworthiness -- Report Excludable or Required To Be Excluded -- Criminal Cases

[9] Rule 803(9) -- Records Of Vital Statistics

[a] Rule 803(9) -- Birth Certificates

[b] Rule 803(9) -- Death Certificates

[10] Rule 803(10) -- Absence Of Public Record Or Entry

[a] Rule 803(10) -- Confrontation Issues

[b] Rule 803(10) -- Errors in Search

[c] Rule 803(10) -- Examples of Admissible Statements

[d] Rule 803(10) -- Foreign and International Searches

[e] Rule 803(10) -- Incomplete Search

[f] Rule 803(10) -- Intelligence Agency Searches

[g] Rule 803(10) -- IRS Searches

[h] Rule 803(10) -- Relationship to Rule 803(8)

[i] Rule 803(10) -- Relevance of Search

[j] Rule 803(10) -- Scope of Search

[11] Rule 803(11) -- Records Of Religious Organizations

[12] Rule 803(14) -- records Of Documents Affecting An Interest In Property

[a] Rule 803(14) -- Contents of Records

[b] Rule 803(14) -- Deeds

[13] Rule 803(15) -- Statements In Documents Affecting An Interest In Property

[14] Rule 803(16) -- Statements In Ancient Documents

[a] Rule 803(16) -- Business Records

[b] Rule 803(16) -- Deeds and Official Certificates

[c] Rule 803(16) -- Foundation

[d] Rule 803(16) -- Letters

[e] Rule 803(16) -- Newspapers

[f] Rule 803(16) -- Official Records

[15] Rule 803(17) -- Market Reports, Commercial Publications

[16] Rule 803(18) -- Learned Treatises

[a] Rule 803(18) -- Charts

[b] Rule 803(18) -- Not Receivable as Exhibits

[c] Rule 803(18) -- Reliable Authority

[d] Rule 803(18) -- Relevance Requirement

[e] Rule 803(18) -- Videotape

[17] Rule 803(19) -- Reputation Concerning Personal Or Family History

[a] Rule 803(19) -- Birthplace

[b] Rule 803(19) -- Family Relationship

[c] Rule 803(19) -- Names

[18] Rule 803(20) -- Reputation Concerning Boundaries Or General History

[19] Rule 803(22) -- Judgment of Previous Conviction

[a] Rule 803(22) -- Accomplices' Convictions

[b] Rule 803(22) -- Fact of Conviction

[c] Rule 803(22) -- Foreign Judgments

[d] Rule 803(22) -- Forfeiture Proceeding

[e] Rule 803(22) -- General Verdict

[f] Rule 803(22) -- Judgments of Acquittal

[g] Rule 803(22) -- Misdemeanor Convictions

[h] Rule 803(22) -- Plea Agreement

[i] Rule 803(22) -- Relationship to Other Rules

[j] Rule 803(22) -- State Judgments

[20] Rule 803(24) -- Other Exceptions

803.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] 1997 Amendment Committee Note

[3] 2000 Amendment Committee Note

[4] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 283 (1999)

[5] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

[6] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

[7] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

[8] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

[9] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 803 RULE 803

4-803 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 803.01

803.01 Official Text

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

(1) Present sense impression. -- A statement describing or explaining an event or condition made while the declarant was perceiving the event or condition or immediately thereafter.

(2) Excited utterance. -- A statement relating to a startling event or condition made while the declarant was under the stress of excitement caused by the event or condition.

(3) Then existing mental, emotional, or physical condition. -- A statement of the declarant's then existing state of mind, emotion, sensation, or physical condition (such as intent, plan, motive, design, mental feeling, pain, and bodily health), but not including a statement of memory or belief to prove the fact remembered or believed unless it relates to the execution, revocation, identification, or terms of declarant's will.

(4) Statements for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment. -- Statements made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment and describing medical history, or past or present symptoms, pain, or sensations, or the inception or general character of the cause or external source thereof insofar as reasonably pertinent to diagnosis or treatment.

(5) Recorded recollection. -- A memorandum or record concerning a matter about which a witness once had knowledge but now has insufficient recollection to enable the witness to testify fully and accurately, shown to have been made or adopted by the witness when the matter was fresh in the witness' memory and to reflect that knowledge correctly. If admitted, the memorandum or record may be read into evidence but may not itself be received as an exhibit unless offered by an adverse party.

(6) Records of regularly conducted activity. -- A memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, in any form, of acts, events, conditions, opinions, or diagnoses, made at or near the time by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge, if kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity, and if it was the regular practice of that business activity to make the memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, all as shown by the testimony of the custodian or other qualified witness, or by certification that complies with Rule 902(11), Rule 902(12), or a statute permitting certification, unless the source of information or the method or circumstances of preparation indicate lack of trustworthiness. The term "business" as used in this paragraph includes business, institution, association, profession, occupation, and calling of every kind, whether or not conducted for profit.

(7) Absence of entry in records kept in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (6). -- Evidence that a matter is not included in the memoranda, reports, records, or data compilations, in any form, kept in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (6), to prove the nonoccurrence or nonexistence of the matter, if the matter was of a kind of which a memorandum, report, record, or data compilation was regularly made and preserved, unless the sources of information or other circumstances indicate lack of trustworthiness.

(8) Public records and reports. -- Records, reports, statements, or data compilations, in any form, of public offices or agencies, setting forth (A) the activities of the office or agency, or (B) matters observed pursuant to duty imposed by law as to which matters there was a duty to report, excluding, however, in criminal cases matters observed by police officers and other law enforcement personnel, or (C) in civil actions and proceedings and against the Government in criminal cases, factual findings resulting from an investigation made pursuant to authority granted by law, unless the sources of information or other circumstances indicate lack of trustworthiness.

(9) Records of vital statistics. -- Records or data compilations, in any form, of births, fetal deaths, deaths, or marriages, if the report thereof was made to a public office pursuant to requirements of law.

(10) Absence of public record or entry. -- To prove the absence of a record, report, statement, or data compilation, in any form, or the nonoccurrence or nonexistence of a matter of which a record, report, statement, or data compilation, in any form, was regularly made and preserved by a public office or agency, evidence in the form of a certification in accordance with rule 902, or testimony, that diligent search failed to disclose the record, report, statement, or data compilation, or entry.

(11) Records of religious organizations. -- Statements of births, marriages, divorces, deaths, legitimacy, ancestry, relationship by blood or marriage, or other similar facts of personal or family history, contained in a regularly kept record of a religious organization.

(12) Marriage, baptismal, and similar certificates. -- Statements of fact contained in a certificate that the maker performed a marriage or other ceremony or administered a sacrament, made by a clergyman, public official, or other person authorized by the rules or practices of a religious organization or by law to perform the act certified, and purporting to have been issued at the time of the act or within a reasonable time thereafter.

(13) Family records. -- Statements of fact concerning personal or family history contained in family Bibles, genealogies, charts, engravings on rings, inscriptions on family portraits, engravings on urns, crypts, or tombstones, or the like.

(14) Records of documents affecting an interest in property. -- The record of a document purporting to establish or affect an interest in property, as proof of the content of the original recorded document and its execution and delivery by each person by whom it purports to have been executed, if the record is a record of a public office and an applicable statute authorizes the recording of documents of that kind in that office.

(15) Statements in documents affecting an interest in property. -- A statement contained in a document purporting to establish or affect an interest in property if the matter stated was relevant to the purpose of the document, unless dealings with the property since the document was made have been inconsistent with the truth of the statement or the purport of the document.

(16) Statements in ancient documents. -- Statements in a document in existence twenty years or more the authenticity of which is established.

(17) Market reports, commercial publications. -- Market quotations, tabulations, lists, directories, or other published compilations, generally used and relied upon by the public or by persons in particular occupations.

(18) Learned treatises. -- To the extent called to the attention of an expert witness upon cross-examination or relied upon by the expert witness in direct examination, statements contained in published treatises, periodicals, or pamphlets on a subject of history, medicine, or other science or art, established as a reliable authority by the testimony or admission of the witness or by other expert testimony or by judicial notice. If admitted, the statements may be read into evidence but may not be received as exhibits.

(19) Reputation concerning personal or family history. -- Reputation among members of a person's family by blood, adoption, or marriage, or among a person's associates, or in the community, concerning a person's birth, adoption, marriage, divorce, death, legitimacy, relationship by blood, adoption, or marriage, ancestry, or other similar fact of personal or family history.

(20) Reputation concerning boundaries or general history. -- Reputation in a community, arising before the controversy, as to boundaries of or customs affecting lands in the community, and reputation as to events of general history important to the community or State or nation in which located.

(21) Reputation as to character. -- Reputation of a person's character among associates or in the community.

(22) Judgment of previous conviction. -- Evidence of a final judgment, entered after a trial or upon a plea of guilty (but not upon a plea of nolo contendere), adjudging a person guilty of a crime punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year, to prove any fact essential to sustain the judgment, but not including, when offered by the Government in a criminal prosecution for purposes other than impeachment, judgments against persons other than the accused. The pendency of an appeal may be shown but does not affect admissibility.

(23) Judgment as to personal, family, or general history, or boundaries. -- Judgments as proof of matters of personal, family or general history, or boundaries, essential to the judgment, if the same would be provable by evidence of reputation.

(24) [Transferred to Rule 807]

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 803 RULE 803

4-803 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 803.02

803.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[Go To Supp]

[1] Unavailability Irrelevant

This Rule defines hearsay exceptions that are applicable whether or not the declarant is available as a witness. The rationale for dispensing with an unavailability requirement is that a statement falling within one of the Rule 803 exceptions is actually as reliable or more reliable than any in-court testimony that could come from the declarant. For example, a business record of a sale is frequently more reliable than any in-court testimony, replete with faded memory, of the person who made the sale. Each section of Rule 803 is considered separately below.

While these exceptions are based on reliability, this may not be enough to satisfy the right to confrontation of an accused. The Supreme Court's decision in Crawford v. Washington, discussed in detail in § 803.02[26], held that hearsay that is "testimonial" can only be admitted in a criminal case if the declarant has been or can be cross-examined. Under Crawford, if hearsay is "testimonial" it doesn't matter how reliable it is -- there must be cross-examination. It follows that some hearsay that is admissible under the Rule 803 exceptions might nonetheless be inadmissible under the Confrontation Clause after Crawford -- specifically that hearsay fitting the Court's still-in-development definition of "testimonial." While a full discussion of the impact of Crawford is reserved until the end of this Editorial Explanatory Comment, the reader should keep in mind that as each hearsay exception is discussed, the admissibility of any statement under that exception may be affected in criminal cases after Crawford.

[2] Rule 803(1) -- Present Sense Impressions

[a] Foundation for Exception

Rule 803(1) adopts a hearsay exception for statements describing or explaining an event or condition made while the declarant was perceiving the event or condition or immediately thereafter. In most common-law jurisdictions, such statements would be excluded without some excitement qualifying the statement as an excited utterance. The theory underlying Rule 803(1) is that "substantial contemporaneity of event and statement negative the likelihood of deliberate or conscious misrepresentation." n1 The critical element, therefore, is contemporaneity; the statement must be made at the time that the event or condition is being perceived or immediately thereafter. n2 If the statement is made right at the time of the event, it is assumed that the declarant had no time to lie about it. Moreover there is little chance of misstatement due to loss of memory.

While contemporaneity is critical to admissibility, there is in fact no talismanic time period for admission as a present sense impression. Admissibility is determined on a case-by-case basis, in which the Court investigates the circumstances of the statement to determine whether the declarant had some time for reflection so that the statement is no longer spontaneous. n3 If there is no evidence, circumstantial or otherwise, as to the time lapse, there is no foundation to admit the statement. n4

[b] Present Sense Impressions -- Corroboration Requirement

Professor Waltz, in The Present Sense Impression Exception to the Rule Against Hearsay: Origins and Attributes, 66 Iowa L. Rev. 869 (1981), carefully traced the present sense impression from early American cases through the early Federal Rules decisions. He indicated that the history supports some sort of corroboration requirement for a present sense impression -- that is, a requirement that before the statement is admitted, there must be evidence independent of the statement itself to prove that the event described actually occurred.

Most Federal Courts (as shown in the Annotations, § 803.03) have read a corroboration requirement into Rule 803(1). The corroboration can be found in the in-court testimony of the declarant, or testimony of another person who also saw some of what the declarant saw, or simply circumstantial evidence that the event occurred. Imposing a corroboration requirement is a sensible approach. Under the plain language of the Rule, the proponent must show that the declaration was made at the time of, or immediately after, an event, and that the statements explained or described that event. To satisfy the timing, relationship, and event requirements, the witness in Court is probably going to have to be able to corroborate to some extent that the event actually occurred, unless the declarant is present to so testify or there is some other source of corroboration. In the absence of some proof other than the hearsay statement itself, a Trial Judge should conclude that the proponent has failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the event occurred the way the declarant described it. Otherwise, the admissibility requirement is proved solely through the hearsay statement itself -- something that is not allowed, for example, with coconspirator hearsay statements. See Rule 801(d)(2)(E). While the hearsay statement itself may certainly be considered as proof of the admissibility requirement that an event occurred (see Rule 104(a)), some corroboration must be provided for the statement to be admissible under Rule 803(1).

The Advisory Committee Note to Federal Rule 803(1) stresses that present sense impressions are reliable in large part because the witness who testifies to the declarant's statement "may be examined as to the circumstances" described by the declarant. This indicates that the drafters intended a corroboration requirement for this exception, i.e., that the person who heard the declarant's statement was also at the event and could give his own account of it at trial. But this statement should not be taken to mean that a present sense impression is only admissible if an in-court witness can testify that the event occurred exactly as the declarant described it. While a witness who was in the same position to view the event as the declarant would certainly be able to provide sufficient corroboration, a requirement of equal percipience would rob the Rule of much of its practical effect; the declarant's hearsay statement would to some extent be cumulative if the witness could provide the same statement in court. The Rule should be and has been construed to permit corroboration short of equally percipient testimony.

A case that illustrates the correct approach to the corroboration requirement is United States v. Blakey, 607 F.2d 779 (7th Cir. 1979) . The defendants in Blakey were charged with extortion. The government offered the victim's hearsay statement that "stuff like tonight cost me a thousand dollars." The statement was made immediately after the victim and the three defendants came out from a short meeting in the back of the victim's shop. The defendants argued that the statement could not be admitted under Federal Rule 803(1) because there were no witnesses, other than the declarant and the defendants, to the relevant event -- the purported exchange of $1000 in the back of the declarant's shop -- and the declarant was no longer available to testify. The Court held, however, that the statement was properly admitted because "there were several witnesses who could testify to the events leading up to and following the meeting" in the back of the shop. These witnesses would testify that the defendants acted in a very intimidating manner before going to the back of the shop with the declarant, and that after the defendants and the declarant briefly met in the back of the shop, the defendants came out looking "satisfied." The Court concluded that "it is not necessary that the witnesses be in the same position to observe as the declarant; it is only necessary that the witnesses be able to corroborate the declarant's statement." In other words, the government, through corroborative witnesses together with the hearsay statement itself, proved by a preponderance of the evidence that an "event" occurred as the declarant described it, and therefore satisfied that admissibility requirement of Rule 803(1).

[3] Rule 803(2) -- Excited Utterances

[a] Foundation for Exception

Rule 803(2) codifies the well-established common-law excited utterance exception to the hearsay rule. n5 There is obviously some overlap between this exception and the present sense impression exception. For example, a statement describing a murder, made immediately after the event, could rationally qualify under either exception. Yet the two exceptions are based on different admissibility requirements, and it is not uncommon for a hearsay statement made shortly after an event to fit one of the exceptions but not the other. The most significant differences between the two exceptions are that: (1) an excited utterance must relate to a "startling" event or condition while a statement of present sense impression may describe any event or condition; (2) the present sense impression must "describe" the event, while the excited utterance need only "relate" to the event -- the excited utterance exception thus allows a broader scope of subject matter coverage than does the present sense impression exception; n6 and (3) the excited utterance exception does not contain an express contemporaneity requirement, as does Rule 803(1).

Statements made while under the influence of a startling event are considered reliable because excitement is thought to still the reflective capacity and give rise to trustworthiness. Commentators have noted that excitement may also give rise to error, but this has generally not detracted from the admissibility of these statements. Once the excitement passes, however, statements made are not within this exception.

[b] Excited Utterances -- What Is a Startling Event?

In most cases it is not seriously disputed that the event to which the excited utterance relates is in fact a startling event. Occurrences such as accidents, fights, and physical crimes are generally deemed startling events. n7 However, admissibility under the Rule is not limited to events describing such clearly upsetting occurrences. The Courts have been quite expansive in finding that an event that triggered a startled statement is in fact a startling event. n8 Often such liberal treatment is used to admit a statement relating to a past event as to which the "under the influence" requirement cannot be satisfied at the time the statement was made. For instance, in United States v. Napier, 518 F.2d 316 (9th Cir. 1975) , a pre-Rules case, the declarant had been attacked and injured by an unknown assailant. About a week later, the victim saw the defendant's picture in the newspaper, and became upset and identified the defendant as her attacker. The Court, citing Rule 803(2), held that this statement was properly introduced as an excited utterance. Of course, the attack itself was a startling event, but the statement was too far removed from the attack for the declarant to have remained continuously under the influence of that startling event. The Court found, however, that the relevant startling event was the victim's recognition of her assailant in the newspaper. The statement was clearly made under the influence of that startling event, and the Court assumed that the statement was sufficiently related to that event to be admissible under Rule 803(2). n9 Recall that unlike a present sense impression, an excited utterance need only relate to the event, it need not actually describe the event.

Some Courts have held that an event cannot be startling if the declarant has planned for the event to occur, and the event occurs as planned. n10 This presumes, however, that all the factors leading up to the event are within the declarant's control; if not, the element of surprise may create excitement when the event occurs. A person may plan for an event to occur, but if the occurrence is outside the person's control, it may well be startling when the event actually occurs. n11

For example, a person has to plan to win the lottery in order to win, but actually winning the lottery is certainly a startling event.

[c] Excited Utterances -- Timing of Statement

There is no hard and fast rule prescribing the amount of time that may elapse between a startling event and an excited utterance. The closer in time the statement is to the startling event, the more likely the declarant is still to be under the influence of the event. Ordinary experience teaches that the stress of excitement tends to dissipate with time. n12 The issue, however, is not the passage of time as such but the state of mind of the declarant -- specifically whether the declarant has been excited during the entire time between the event and the statement. Even statements made an hour or so after the event can qualify for the exception if the proponent can establish by a preponderance that the declarant was under a continuous state of excitement during the entire period between the startling event and the making of the statement. n13

There are several circumstances that are relevant to admissibility even though a significant amount of time has passed between the event and the statement. These include:

(1) The nature of the startling event. Some events are more startling than others; a declarant could be expected to be under the influence of a high impact event for a longer period of time. n14

(2) Whether the declarant in fact appeared to be excited during the time between the event and the statement. n15

(3) The nature of the declarant. Some declarants, especially children, can be expected to be under the influence of a startling event for a longer period than others. n16

(4) The fact that the statement is self-serving to the declarant, while not dispositive, certainly raises the possibility that the declarant had time to reflect. n17

(5) If the statement describing a previous event also predicts a future event (e.g., "something bad is going to happen"), such a prediction generally shows deliberative thought, not excitedness.

[d] Excited Utterances -- Responses to Questions

Responses to questions, as opposed to spontaneous statements, are viewed with some suspicion because the process of answering involves at least sufficient reflection to respond appropriately to the question. However, statements made in response to questions are not by that fact alone disqualified from admissibility under Rule 803(2). Questioning is a factor that the Court should consider in determining whether a statement is sufficiently spontaneous. It does not, in itself, conclusively negate spontaneity -- so long as there is a sufficient showing that the declarant remained in a continuous state of excitement. n18 If the questions are leading or found to have caused the answers to have been made, however, there will generally be an insufficient showing of excitedness.

[e] Excited Utterances and Present Sense Impressions -- Unidentified Declarants

One question that has arisen concerning admissibility of present sense impressions and excited utterances is whether the declarant must be an identifiable person. The Advisory Committee's Note on Federal Rules 803(1) and 803(2) mentions cases in which Courts had refused to admit the hearsay statement of an unidentified bystander. n19

There are two possible concerns that a Court might have when a witness testifies that a present sense impression or excited utterance was made by an unidentified declarant. One is that if the declarant cannot be identified as a real person, there is a possibility that the declarant never even existed; the witness may be creating a "phantom declarant" in order to manufacture a hearsay statement ready-made to fit the present sense impression or excited utterance exception. For example, a plaintiff in a personal injury action might testify to an unidentified bystander's contemporaneous description of an accident, which just happens to track the plaintiff's version of the events, and the defendant may do likewise.

We submit, however, that any concern over fabricated hearsay statements does not present a hearsay problem, and therefore it should not result in exclusion of present sense impressions or excited utterances made by unidentified declarants. The concern over phantom declarants is that the in-court witness may be lying, i.e., testifying about hearsay statements that were never really made. This raises a question concerning the credibility of the in-court witness. Credibility of trial witnesses can be assessed by the traditional methods of oath, cross-examination, and the jury's opportunity to view the demeanor of the witness. Consequently, a statement proffered under Rules 803(1) or 803(2) should not be excluded simply because of the possibility that an unidentified declarant has been fabricated. The hearsay rule does not prohibit all lying; it simply provides that if a person is going to lie, it must be done on the witness stand so that he or she can be tested by the in-court guarantees of trustworthiness.

A more legitimate concern with respect to unidentified declarants is that it may be difficult to determine whether the declarant had personal knowledge of the event described. n20 If the declarant does not have personal knowledge of the event, then the statement describing the event is inadmissible under Rules 803(1) and 803(2). n21 This is because Rule 803(1) requires that the statement must be made "while the declarant was perceiving the event or condition, or immediately thereafter," and Rule 803(2) requires that the declarant must be "under the influence" of the startling event. These requirements cannot be met in the absence of the declarant's personal knowledge of the event. More fundamentally, as discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 602, § 602.02[2], hearsay declarants in general must have personal knowledge of the facts related in their statements (with the exception of admissions).

Identification of the declarant will often be helpful in establishing that he or she had personal knowledge of the event described. But this does not mean that identification of the declarant is a precondition to admissibility. The statement itself, or circumstantial evidence, may create an inference that the declarant perceived the event. Illustrative is United States v. Medico, 557 F.2d 309 (2d Cir. 1977) , where a bystander relayed the license plate number of a getaway car to a security guard who was locked inside a bank that had just been robbed. The bystander was never identified, but his personal knowledge was established by the fact that the guard saw him look in the direction of the getaway car as he relayed the license number. The Court held that the bystander's statement was admissible as a present sense impression. n22 In sum, if the declarant's personal knowledge can be established, the declarant need not be an identifiable person for purposes of Rules 803(1) and 803(2).

[4] Rule 803(3) -- Statements of Then Existing State of Mind or Physical Condition

[a] Foundation for Exception

Rule 803(3) provides an exception for statements of present state of mind, emotion, or physical condition. The theory of trustworthiness supporting the admissibility of these statements is that they are based on unique perception; that is, the declarant has a unique perspective into his or her own physical condition, feelings, and emotions. There is also an argument that state of mind statements are spontaneous, because in order to be admissible under the exception they must be reflective of a "then existing" state of mind. Statements of a past state of mind or physical condition are not admitted. However, as applied to statements of a declarant's state of mind, the spontaneity requirement does not really guarantee sincerity. It is impossible to tell how spontaneous a state of mind statement really is, because it describes an internal event; a declarant's "then existing" state of mind could well be the product of days of contemplation and fabrication. n23 This is unlike, for instance, the present sense impression, where it can be determined through reference to an external event that the declarant did or did not have time to fabricate.

[b] State of Mind -- Statements Looking Backward, Statements Looking Forward

Rule 803(3) does not permit a statement of memory or belief to prove the fact remembered or believed. The "statement of memory or belief" exclusion is a codification of the holding in Shepard v. United States, 290 U.S. 96 (1933), where the Court held that a statement of the defendant's wife, accusing him of poisoning her, could not be admitted under the state of mind exception when offered to prove that the defendant had actually poisoned her. The Shepard exclusion is considered necessary "to avoid the virtual destruction of the hearsay rule which would otherwise result from allowing state of mind, provable by a hearsay statement, to serve as the basis for an inference of the happening of the event which produced the state of mind." n24

While a state of mind statement cannot be offered to prove that a past event occurred, it can be offered in some cases to prove the occurrence of an event subsequent to the statement. n25 The Advisory Committee states that Rule 803(3) preserves the rule of Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Hillmon, 145 U.S. 285 (1892), allowing a hearsay statement by a declarant to prove the declarant's state of mind, when probative that the declarant subsequently acted in accordance with that state of mind. In Hillman, evidence a declarant's hearsay statement about his intent to go to a certain place was held admissible to prove that the declarant actually went there. n26

An example may help to illustrate what is included within the exception and what is not. If a declarant (D) states, "I am going to New York tomorrow," and subsequently disappears, the statement may be introduced as probative that D went to New York; intent to do an act in the future is probative that the act occurred. If, on the other hand, D states "Two years ago I went to New York," the statement may be said to reflect the state of mind called "memory," but the statement is not admissible under the state of mind exception, because that exception precludes a statement of memory when offered to prove that the fact remembered is actually true. If D says, "I am going to New York tomorrow because Joe stole my money and I have to get it back from him," the statement cannot be used to prove that Joe stole money from D, because that would be using the state of mind statement to prove the truth of a past fact, which is prohibited by Shepard. n27 But it could be used to prove that D went to New York, because that is permitted by Hillmon.

Where the state of mind statement is offered to prove future conduct of the declarant, the hearsay rule poses no bar, but the declarant's statement must be scrutinized under Rule 403 (and of course a specific objection must be made under that Rule to preserve a claim of error on appeal). Exclusion under Rule 403 could occur if the inference from state of mind to subsequent action by the declarant is weak; n28 if there is no dispute about the declarant's subsequent conduct; n29 or if prejudice, confusion, or delay is created that substantially outweighs the statement's probative value as to the declarant's future course of action. n30 The most obvious risk of prejudice is that the jury will consider the hearsay statement not as proof of state of mind and the subsequent conduct of the declarant, but rather for the truth of the facts that are related in the statement. For instance, in State v. Charo, 156 Ariz. 561, 754 P.2d 288 (1988), a state case decided under a rule identical to Federal Rule 803(3), the defendant was accused of murder. The defendant denied the murder and presented evidence of an alibi. The prosecution offered the victim's out-of-court statement to the effect that she feared the defendant as the result of the defendant's prior sexual attack upon her. The Arizona Supreme Court held that if the statement was offered under Rule 803(3) to prove that the prior sexual attack occurred, it was clearly inadmissible under the "memory or belief" limitation of the Rule. To the extent the statement was offered to show the declarant's fearful state of mind, the Court held that the statement was inadmissible under Rule 403. The victim's state of mind was not at issue in the case; nor was the statement probative for any inference that could be drawn about the victim's subsequent course of conduct. There was no dispute about the victim's conduct in the case. The Court stated: "While there may be times when fear of the defendant is both admissible hearsay and relevant, the victim's statement in the present case is irrelevant unless the defendant asserts a defense which makes her feeling relevant." n31

In contrast to the facts of Charo, it is possible that a statement by the victim putting blame on the defendant might be admissible to prove the declarant's subsequent conduct if that conduct is in dispute and if the statement is relevant to prove that conduct. For example, assume a murder case in which the defendant claims that he killed the victim by accident. The defense is that the defendant and the victim were rabbit hunting together; the victim was walking ahead of the defendant to scare up rabbits; and the defendant tripped on a log and his gun accidentally discharged, killing the victim. The prosecution proffers a hearsay statement from the victim, made three days before his death, in which the victim told his mother that he was afraid the defendant was going to kill him because the victim still owed the defendant a large sum of money from a drug deal. This statement should be admitted under Rules 803(3) and 403, with an instruction that the jury is not to use the statement for the fact that the victim owed the defendant money from a drug deal or that the victim had reason to fear the defendant. Rather, it is admissible to show that the victim feared the defendant, whether that fear was reasonable or not. This fearful state of mind is probative of the victim's subsequent conduct; it makes it much less likely that the victim would be walking voluntarily ahead of a person he feared while that person was carrying a loaded gun. The hearsay statement is prejudicial because the jury may use it for the truth of the facts related even though instructed not to do so. But, a Trial Court would certainly be within its discretion in finding that the prejudicial effect does not substantially outweigh the probative value of the statement in proving the victim's disputed actions. n32

[c] State of Mind -- Statements Offered to Prove the Subsequent Conduct of a Nondeclarant

The legislative history of Rule 803(3) fails to resolve whether, as in the famous Hillmon dictum, a declarant's statement of state of mind can be used to prove the subsequent conduct of someone other than the declarant. For example, if the declarant says, "I am going to meet Joe to buy some drugs from him," can the statement be used to prove the subsequent conduct of both the declarant and Joe? n33 The answer should be "no." The rationale for extending the state of mind exception to prove the subsequent conduct of a nondeclarant is dubious. Recall that the basis for admitting state of mind statements is that the declarant has a unique perspective into his own state of mind. This rationale obviously does not apply to the declarant's conclusion about the state of mind of someone else. A declarant might have unique perception of his own state of mind, but he has no special perspective into the thoughts and feelings of another person. n34

The report of the House Judiciary Committee stated that the Committee intended that Rule 803(3) be construed to limit the Hillmon doctrine "so as to render statements of intent by a declarant admissible only to prove his future conduct, not the future conduct of another person." The Senate Report made no mention of this limitation.

The Federal Courts have interpreted this ambiguous legislative history in differing ways. n35 Some Courts have adopted the House limitation and refused to admit a statement that the declarant intended to meet with a third party as proof that the declarant and the third party did indeed meet. n36 One Court has permitted the declarant's statement to be used to show another's conduct, at least where the Trial Court gives a limiting instruction that the statement cannot be used to prove the intent or conduct of another but can only be used for the inference that the declarant carried out his intended action (though that instruction seems to work at cross-purposes with the holding that the state of mind statement can be used to prove the conduct of a nondeclarant). n37 The Second Circuit has taken a compromise approach, allowing a declarant's statement of intent to be admitted to prove the conduct of a nondeclarant only "when there is independent evidence which connects the declarant's statement with the non-declarant's activities." n38

It will often occur that the declarant's statement will refer to another person, directly or indirectly, but the statement is not in fact offered to show that the nondeclarant had a certain state of mind or acted in accordance with a particular mental state. For instance, a statement of the victim that he planned to go to the defendant's house to deliver a package contains a reference to a third party, but it does not refer directly or indirectly to that third party's state of mind or action. In such cases, the statement is admissible under any view of Rule 803(3) to prove that the declarant went to the defendant's house, because the statement is offered only to show that the declarant acted in accordance with his or her own mental state. As a result, there is no reliability problem of determining the state of mind of a nondeclarant, as to which the declarant has no unique perception. n39

[d] State of Mind -- Possibility of Fabrication

As stated above, Rule 803(3) does not guarantee that the declarant's state of mind will be spontaneous in any meaningful sense. Indeed, there is a substantial risk under the Rule that a declarant will be able to fabricate a state of mind. For example, in United States v. Lawal, 736 F.2d 5 (2d Cir. 1984) , the defendant arrived at Customs after a flight from Nigeria, and drugs were found in his luggage. At that point, the defendant made a "spontaneous" statement of anger at being "set up" and duped by a person in Nigeria. At trial, the defendant offered this statement to prove that he had no intent to smuggle drugs. The Trial Court excluded the statement on the ground that it was unreliable. But the Court of Appeals held that this was error. The Court reasoned that the statement expressed the declarant's then existing state of mind, and this is all that the Rule requires. The Court concluded that statements that fit the definition of Rule 803(3) cannot be excluded as hearsay, even if they are self-serving and made under untrustworthy circumstances; the Rule does not give the Courts discretion to exclude untrustworthy statements. The untrustworthiness of a statement of the declarant's existing state of mind affects the weight and not the admissibility of the statement. n40

Despite the apparent categorical approach taken by the Federal Rules in general and by Rule 803(3) in particular, some Courts have reasoned that statements of a state of mind made without spontaneity and with the likelihood of fabrication are not admissible. They reason that spontaneity is an inherent part of the rationale for the exception, albeit not stated in the text of the Rule. Exclusion in these Courts is particularly likely with respect to exculpatory statements of criminal defendants made under suspicious circumstances. n41 The problem with this reasoning is that, while trustworthiness may be a part of the rationale for Rule 803(3), the Rule as written does not contain a provision for excluding untrustworthy statements that would otherwise fall within the hearsay exception -- in contrast to some other hearsay exceptions such as Rule 803(6), which contain specific language excluding untrustworthy statements. All that is required under Rule 803(3) is that the statement must be of a "then existing" state of mind; and the defendant's statement in a case like Lawal clearly meets this requirement. Finally, the self-serving nature of a criminal defendant's expression of an innocent state of mind such as that in Lawal is subject to a clear attack as to weight. The lack of sincerity in such a statement can easily be understood by the jury, so it makes little sense for the Trial Judge to exclude the statement on trustworthiness grounds where to do so is contrary to the language of Rule 803(3).

For all these reasons, we believe that it is inappropriate to superimpose a trustworthiness requirement on the provisions of Rule 803(3); a statement of a present state of mind should be admissible if it passes the probative value-prejudicial effect balancing test of Rule 403. n42 Of course, if the declarant's statement describes a past, rather than present state of mind, or is used to prove either a past state of mind or a past event, it is inadmissible under the terms of the Rule. n43

[5] Rule 803(4) -- Statements Made for Purposes of Medical Treatment or Diagnosis

[a] Foundation for Exception

Rule 803(4) is based on two independent rationales that purportedly guarantee trustworthiness. First, a patient has a selfish interest in providing truthful information in order to be correctly treated or diagnosed. If the patient lies to medical personnel, the joke will be on the patient. n44 Second, a statement is reliable if a medical expert would rely upon it as a basis for diagnosis or treatment. Thus, if the statement is "pertinent" to medical diagnosis or treatment, as the Rule requires, it is the type of statement upon which medical personnel would rely; if it is reliable enough for medical work, it is reliable enough for trial work. n45

Most Courts subject statements proffered under Rule 803(4) to a two-part reliability test. First, the declarant must have a motive consistent with obtaining medical care or diagnosis, or at least have the awareness that truthfulness is required to further such care. Second, the content of the statement must be such as is reasonably relied upon by medical personnel for treatment or diagnosis. n46 This two-pronged test reflects the policy justifications that support the Rule, and it is consistent with the Rule's language.

[b] Statements Made for Purposes of Medical Treatment or Diagnosis -- Statements of Medical History, Causation, and Fault

Rule 803(4) breaks with prior practice by admitting statements regarding past symptoms, medical history, and those that relate to the cause of the injury, whenever these statements are pertinent to treatment or diagnosis. Traditionally, statements of past symptoms and medical history were admissible only as part of the factual basis of expert testimony. Statements of cause (e.g., "my back hurts because I slipped on some ice") were excluded as inherently unreliable. The Advisory Committee took the position that statements of medical history and causation are likely to be reliable at least insofar as reasonably pertinent to treatment or diagnosis, given the motive for making the statements, and the reliance thereon by medical personnel. n47

On the other hand, statements attributing fault (e.g., "my back hurts because I slipped on some ice at a poorly maintained bus stop") are ordinarily excluded under the Rule, because they do not further and are not pertinent to the patient's treatment or diagnosis. The Advisory Committee provided a pertinent hypothetical: "A patient's statement that he was struck by an automobile would qualify, but not his statement that a car was driven through a red light." Adding the reference to the red light will not affect the treatment, nor would the patient expect it to have any effect on treatment.

A major exception has developed to the principle that statements attributing fault are not within the exception: cases involving child abuse. A statement from the child-declarant to medical personnel concerning abuse is ordinarily held admissible under the Rule even when the declarant identifies the abuser. The rationale is that the "pertinence" prong of the Rule is satisfied because a statement of identification is pertinent to treatment of the child-victim; the doctor must be concerned not only with the child's current physical condition, but also with the child's future welfare and safety and psychological well-being. n48 As to the "treatment motive" prong of the Rule, most Courts require a showing that the child understood that she was speaking to medical personnel and needed to tell the truth in order to get properly treated. n49 Other courts are more flexible and look to the circumstances to determine whether the child was seeking treatment or diagnosis. n50

Courts have occasionally extended the principles established in child abuse cases to other cases involving domestic abuse, allowing statements from an adult-declarant identifying the perpetrator to be admitted under Rule 803(4). As the Court put it in United States v. Joe, 8 F.3d 1488, 1494 (10th Cir. 1993) :

> [T]he identity of the abuser is reasonably pertinent to treatment in virtually every domestic sexual assault case, even those not involving children. All victims of domestic sexual abuse suffer emotional and psychological injuries, the exact nature and extent of which depend on the identity of the abuser. The physician generally must know who the abuser was in order to render proper treatment because the physician's treatment will necessarily differ when the abuser is a member of the victim's family or household ... . [T]he domestic sexual abuser's identity is admissible under Rule 803(4) where the abuser has such an intimate relationship with the victim that the abuser's identity becomes reasonably pertinent to the victim's proper treatment.

Similarly, the principle from the child sex abuse cases can be applied to cases involving sexual abuse of adult-victims. Because of the possibility of sexually communicated diseases, the victim's identification of the perpetrator is pertinent to the victim's treatment.

[c] Statements Made for Purposes of Medical Treatment or Diagnosis -- Statements Made in Anticipation of Litigation

Rule 803(4) marks a departure from the analogous common-law exception in its coverage of statements made to nontreating physicians. At common law, statements made to a doctor consulted solely for diagnostic purposes (such as in anticipation of litigation) were not considered sufficiently trustworthy to escape hearsay proscription. Rule 803(4), however, permits patient statements to a nontreating physician as substantive evidence. The reasoning of the Advisory Committee was that the doctor who is consulted for litigation purposes would at any rate be able to testify to the nature of statements given by the patient as a basis for forming an opinion under Rule 703. The Advisory Committee believed that despite instructions to the contrary, juries would tend to treat evidence admitted under Rule 703 as proof of the facts stated, so it made little practical sense to continue with a hearsay proscription. This rationale carries less power after the 2000 amendment to Rule 703, which substantially circumscribes the ability of a proponent to introduce hearsay under the guise of offering it solely to illustrate the basis of the expert's opinion. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 703, § 703.02[4]. If not for Rule 803(4), there would be a good chance that the jury would never hear statements made to a litigation doctor.

A Trial Court might understandably be reluctant to admit statements to medical personnel who are retained by the party solely to prepare a case. However, most Courts have held consistently with the Rule that even if the doctor is retained solely to testify as a witness, statements made to that doctor are admissible under Rule 803(4), so long as they are pertinent to diagnosis. A doctor consulted for litigation purposes is retained for "diagnosis," and the Rule abolishes all distinctions between doctors consulted for treatment and those consulted for diagnosis. n51 The fact that a statement was made to a doctor for purposes of litigation is a matter of weight and not admissibility.

[d] Statements Made for Purposes of Medical Treatment or Diagnosis -- Statements by Nonpatients

A statement offered under Rule 803(4) need not refer to the declarant's own medical condition. If the declarant relays information about another person for purposes of treating or diagnosing that person, then generally speaking the same guarantees of trustworthiness exist as when the declarant is seeking treatment for himself. n52 Accordingly, statements by bystanders, family members, and others, made for purposes of treating an injured person and pertinent to that treatment, have often been admitted under Rule 803(4). n53

The Court in United States v. Yazzie, 59 F.3d 807 (9th Cir. 1995) , cautioned, however, that statements by nonpatients should be strictly scrutinized in child abuse cases. The Court explained as follows:

> The plain language of the Rule does not limit its application to patient-declarants. In most circumstances, we believe that statements to a doctor by a parent of an injured child could easily qualify as a statement for the purpose of obtaining a proper medical diagnosis.
>
> A parent's statement to a doctor identifying the assailant in a child molestation case must be treated as suspect ... . In the drama that unfolds during the medical examination of a child molestation victim, a parent or guardian's motive for casting blame may or may not be in the child's best interest or for the purpose of medical diagnosis. For example, a parent might misidentify the assailant in an effort to protect the other spouse, to avoid reprisal from the other spouse, to avoid having suspicion cast upon him or her, or to incriminate falsely the other spouse for personal motives.
>
> Since child molestation cases challenge our assumptions about why certain statements might have been made, inquiry into the declarant's purpose must be exacting. When a party seeks to introduce the statement of a parent or guardian identifying a sex offender, the proponent must demonstrate from the context and content of the statements that they were made for the purpose of medical diagnosis or treatment.

The Yazzie Court applied its exacting scrutiny to two statements made by the mother of a nine-year-old victim, which identified the child's stepfather as the perpetrator. The first statement was made to a doctor when the mother brought the child to be examined for sexual abuse. The Court noted that the mother expressed concern for her son, and that she had specifically brought her son in to be examined for signs of sexual abuse. The Court found this statement properly admitted.

The second statement, made shortly after the first one and also to the doctor, implored the doctor to conceal the accusations from the victim, for fear that the victim would report this to the defendant. The Court noted that this statement "appears to have been motivated by fear of retribution from Yazzie, not a desire to obtain proper medical treatment for the victim." The Court concluded that while the mother "probably had good reason" for making this statement, "the victim's medical diagnosis and treatment does not appear to have been that purpose." Therefore, the second statement was not admissible under Rule 803(4).

[e] Statements Made for Purposes of Medical Treatment or Diagnosis -- Statements to Psychologists and Psychiatrists

Rule 803(4) is not limited to statements made for treatment of physical ailments. Statements to mental health professionals also fall within the Rule. n54 We believe, however, that statements made for purposes of psychological treatment should be more strictly scrutinized for reliability than statements made in the course of treating a physical ailment. A person seeking psychological treatment may be subject to various infirmities that inhibit his truthtelling. Indeed, the very reason for seeking such treatment may indicate some impairment of memory, perception, or credibility that creates a problem with which the hearsay rule is concerned. Moreover, fabrication of physical ailments is ordinarily easier to detect by empirical tests than is a fabrication of psychological symptoms. Finally, a central guarantor of reliability of Rule 803(4) is that the statement is reasonably pertinent to diagnosis or treatment. But, while a doctor relies only on reliable information to treat a patient for physical ailments, a psychiatrist relies on all information, truthful and untruthful, to treat the patient.

For all these reasons, we believe that Trial Courts confronted with statements made for purposes of psychological treatment should make sure that the treatment or diagnosis was based on the practitioner's assumption that the declarant's statements were truthful. Such a finding can be made on the basis of testimony by the person to whom the statement was made, or through testimony of other mental health professionals as to what they would deem pertinent in light of the treatment that was undertaken.

[6] Rule 803(5) -- Prior Recollection Recorded

[a] Foundation for Exception

Rule 803(5) is the familiar exception for prior recollection recorded. If a witness cannot remember facts about the case in which he is called to testify, but at one time had knowledge of the facts that is reflected in a memorandum or other record made or adopted by the witness when the matter was fresh in memory, the memorandum or record may be introduced in evidence.

The first thing that must be shown under this Rule is that the witness has an impaired memory. n55 Ordinarily, it is to be expected that counsel will show the memorandum or record to the witness and ask whether or not the witness' memory is refreshed so as to permit testimony from present memory. If the witness cannot do so, the requirement is probably satisfied.

It also must appear that the record was made when the witness had the matter fresh in mind. n56 But it need not be the witness who made the record. It is sufficient if the witness adopted the record. It appears from Rule 803(5) that the witness cannot adopt the statement for the first time on the witness stand. If that were possible, then it would seem that the witness's memory is adequate for testimony from present memory. The adoption should have taken place when the recordation was made or shortly thereafter -- the same contemporaneity requirement that applies if the witness prepares the memorandum herself.

To prevent a jury from giving too much weight to a written statement that cannot be effectively cross-examined, the Rule provides that the memorandum or record may be read into evidence but may not itself be received as an exhibit. n57 This is because the record is only a substitute for trial testimony; as trial testimony is not brought to the jury room, the record should receive the same treatment. However, if the party against whom the testimony is offered wishes to have the document introduced, it may be introduced.

[b] Prior Recollection Recorded -- Two Party Vouching

Congress made an unfortunate drafting error in revising the Supreme Court's version of Rule 803(5). Under the version of the Rule approved by the Court, it was rather clear, in the light of the Advisory Committee's Note, that a recorded statement could qualify for admission if it reflected the recollection of an observer of the event and was recorded by another party, even if the observer did not actually adopt the writing after it was made. At common law, the way this was done was to call the observer to establish that although the observer had insufficient recollection at the time of trial, the statement made by the observer was made at a time when matters were fresh in mind and the matter was described accurately. In addition, the recorder of the statement was called to testify that the observer's statement was accurately transcribed. According to the Note of the Advisory Committee, the sufficiency of the foundation in particular cases would be scrutinized by the Trial Judge. Congress amended the Rule to make clear that statements adopted by a witness would come within the Rule. (They would have anyway, of course, under the Supreme Court version.) Unfortunately, the language chosen by Congress suggests that unless the witness made the record himself or actually adopted the record of another, the statement does not qualify for admission. In our view, Congress simply intended to make clear that the Rule was to be read broadly. There is no indication that Congress wanted to narrow the Supreme Court's version. We note that the Courts have readily held that a two-person vouching system is permitted by the Rule, so long as both the person with personal knowledge and the recorder testify and the foundation requirements of the Rule are otherwise established. n58

While two-party vouching is therefore permissible under the Rule, a problem arises if the observer and the recorder are at odds over the accuracy of the recorder's account. As one Court put it: "Where the witness differs with the recorder in regard to whether or not the recorder's transcription of the witness's statement is correct, Rule 803(5)'s requirement that the report be made or adopted by the witness has not been satisfied." n59

The authorities are not clear on what is required to show adoption of a statement recorded by someone else. Factors on which Courts may focus include whether the declarant inspected the statement recorded by the other person; whether there was a working relationship between the declarant and the recorder; and whether any formal recognition such as initialing the statement was involved. n60

[c] Prior Recollection Recorded -- Multiple Hearsay

It can occur that a memorandum offered as past recollection recorded may involve multiple levels of hearsay. That is, the recollection that is recorded may contain extrajudicial statements, each of which must separately satisfy the hearsay rule if they are offered for the truth of the matter asserted. See Rule 805. For example, the prosecution may wish to offer a statement made to and recorded by a police officer. The officer does not remember the statement made to him, so the record prepared by him is offered as past recollection recorded. The officer could testify as to the accuracy of what he heard based upon his record of the interview. However, in such circumstances, each layer of hearsay must satisfy an exception to, or exemption from, the hearsay rule. In the above situation, if the memorandum recorded the defendant's statement, it would be admissible as an admission in a past recollection recorded. If the recorded statement were that of a witness and were offered for its truth, a separate hearsay exception would have to be satisfied, or else the statement in the record could only be put to a nonhearsay use.

[d] Prior Recollection Recorded -- Expansive Approaches

As discussed above, a record is ordinarily qualified under Rule 803(5) through testimony by the person with knowledge of the facts recorded, who testifies that he lacks present memory of the events but that the record is an accurate reflection of the event. However, admissibility under Rule 803(5) is not limited to this procedure. A case that illustrates a broader use of Rule 803(5) is United States v. Porter, 986 F.2d 1014 (6th Cir. 1993) . Porter was indicted and ultimately convicted on narcotics and explosives offenses. His girlfriend, Niswonger, had given a very detailed written statement to the FBI; the statement related various personal experiences with Porter involving drugs and explosives.

The statement made it clear that Niswonger was afraid of Porter, and that he had threatened her. On the witness stand, Niswonger said that while she recalled giving the statement to the FBI and signing it, she did not remember much about what she said in the statement, because she was confused and on drugs at the time the statement was made. The Trial Judge, over the defendant's objection, then allowed the statement to be read into evidence as past recollection recorded. The Judge found that Niswonger, in attempting to distance herself from her statement to the FBI, was being "disingenuous" and "evasive" and was acting either out of her recently professed desire to marry Porter, or out of fear of Porter. Thus, the Judge considered Niswonger's lack of memory to be feigned.

On appeal, Porter argued that the Trial Court had erred in admitting Niswonger's statement as past recollection recorded, because, among other things, Niswonger had never actually testified that the record accurately reflected her knowledge at the time. But, the Court held that "Rule 803(5) does not specify any particular method of establishing the knowledge of the declarant nor the accuracy of the statement. It is not a sine qua non of admissibility that the witness actually vouch for the accuracy of the written memorandum."

The Court in Porter relied on circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness to conclude that the written statement to the FBI was an accurate reflection of Niswonger's knowledge. The Court noted the following factors: (1) Niswonger admitted making the statement; (2) the statement was made soon after the events described; (3) the statement was signed by Niswonger on each of its five pages; (4) the wording of the statement had been changed and initialed by Niswonger eleven times; (5) the statement was made under penalty of perjury; (6) the statement contained considerable detail that was internally consistent; and (7) Niswonger made the statement at a time when she was fearful of reprisal from Porter, and yet implicated him anyway.

The above factors are the same kinds of circumstantial guarantees that have been relied upon for admissibility under the residual exception to the hearsay rule. The Porter Court's use of Rule 803(5) rather than the residual exception is more advantageous for the proponent of the record, however; the proponent is then freed from having to satisfy the other admissibility requirements of the residual exception: most notably, that the record is more probative than any other evidence reasonably available, and that the nonoffering party be given notice of intent to offer the statement and its particulars. We think that the flexible approach of Porter is preferable to unnecessary use of the residual exception, and that the Porter Court correctly viewed the language of the Rule as flexible.

Porter also challenged the admissibility of Niswonger's written statement on the ground that the prosecution had not shown that Niswonger's memory was sufficiently impaired at the time of trial. The Porter Court rejected this argument as well, stating that the Rule merely requires that the witness have "insufficient recollection to enable the witness to testify fully and accurately," and that Niswonger's insufficient recollection was established by her own testimony. According to the Court, it made no difference whether the insufficient recollection was "by virtue of mind-altering drugs or by intentional design." This is certainly an expansive interpretation of the Rule, given the Trial Judge's finding that Niswonger's professed lack of memory was completely implausible. Once again, the ruling makes sense. It is similar to the rulings, discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 801, § 801.02[3][d], which hold that a prior statement under oath can be admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(A) when a witness has a bad-faith memory loss on the stand. A witness should not be able to preclude the use of an otherwise reliable statement or record by the simple expedient of a convenient loss of memory.

[7] Rule 803(6) -- Records of Regularly Conducted Activity

[a] Foundation for Exception

Rule 803(6) is derived from the traditional business records exception. This exception is based on the premise that the reliability of business records is "supplied by systematic checking, by regularity and continuity which produce habits of precision, by actual experience of business in relying upon, or by a duty to make an accurate record as part of a continuing job or occupation." n61 To qualify under Rule 803(6), a record must be kept in the course of a "business" activity and it must be the regular practice of the preparer to make the record. n62 While the organization's reliance on the records is a basis for the reliability of the exception, the proponent need not in fact show that the preparer of the record actually relied upon it: The Rule by its terms requires only that the record be kept in the course of "business" activity, pursuant to a regular practice of recording. n63

[b] Records of Regularly Conducted Activity -- Definition of "Business"

Rule 803(6) broadens the traditional business records exception. As promulgated by the Supreme Court, the Rule extended the exception to all records made in the course of any "regularly conducted activity," n64 not just a "business" activity in the colloquial sense. The House and ultimately the House-Senate Conference Committee confined the exception to "business" records, but expansively defined the term business "to make it clear that the records of nonprofit institutions and associations like schools, churches and hospitals are admissible under this provision." n65 It is notable that the caption of the Rule describes the exception as covering records of "regularly conducted activity." It seems clear from all this that the term "business" should be given an expansive reading. In the end there is no significant difference between the Advisory Committee's proposal and the Rule as adopted.

One question that has arisen is whether public reports that are made in the course of regularly conducted activity can qualify under Rule 803(6). Does the term "business" cover government activity? Most Courts have taken the view that public records, such as police reports, prison reports, and the like can qualify for admission under Rule 803(6), if the records are kept in the regular course of a regularly conducted activity. These Courts, in accord with the clear language of the Rule, do not read the term "business" in an overly restrictive manner. n66

The term "business" in Rule 803(6) is, we think, broad enough to cover any type of organized activity, including that of public agencies. n67 However, for the records of such activity to be admissible, they must satisfy all other requirements of the Rule, i.e., they must be made pursuant to a regular course of recordkeeping of regularly occurring events, and without the presence of untrustworthy circumstances.

Of course, records of public officials may also be admissible under Rule 803(8), which does not require a showing that records are regularly kept. If a public report is admissible under Rule 803(8), there is no requirement that the report also meet the regularity requirements of Rule 803(6). On the other hand, the admissibility requirements under Rule 803(8) could theoretically be stricter than those of Rule 803(6) in certain cases, such as where police reports are offered against criminal defendants. Most Courts (although there is conflicting authority) have held that if a report is specifically excluded under Rule 803(8), the exclusionary policies of that Rule cannot be evaded by showing that the public record was regularly kept under Rule 803(6). n68 Such a conflict between the Rules is in any event unlikely, because public reports ordinarily suffer exclusion under Rule 803(8) only if they are untrustworthy -- and thus would be excluded under the trustworthiness criterion of Rule 803(6) as well. n69

[c] Records of Regularly Conducted Activity -- "Business Duty"

There is an important drafting error in Rule 803(6), which defines a business record as one "made at or near the time by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge, if kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity." This might be read as abolishing the business duty requirement for the person transmitting the information. The common-law business duty requirement covers the situation in which the party who prepares a business record has no personal knowledge of the underlying event record, but is relying on a source of information who does have personal knowledge. Under the business duty requirement, the record is not admissible unless the party reporting the information to the recorder of the information had a business duty to do so; i.e., was reporting the information in the regular course of regularly conducted activity. The business duty requirement was thought necessary to address the problem of double hearsay that arises when one person relates information offered for its truth to a person who records the information in a business record. The business record exception guarantees that the recording party recorded reliably, but an extra guarantee is necessary to assure that the party with personal knowledge of the underlying event related it accurately to the recorder. n70

It is true that the Rule on its face appears to suggest that the business record must be kept in the regular course of the business, but that anyone can contribute information to the record as long as the information is based on personal knowledge. However, we conclude that Congress never intended to abandon the business duty concept. It is quite clear that the Advisory Committee intended to retain the concept. It is just as clear that Congress was concerned with the breadth of the Advisory Committee's term "regularly conducted activity," not with business duty. The only reference in the legislative history to the concept is in the Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, which makes it clear that the person who supplied the information comprising the business record need not be specifically identified. But, there is not one word in the Report to suggest that the person need not be under a duty to the business.

In light of the strong statement by the Advisory Committee, we believe that the only correct approach is to continue to follow the business duty concept -- that all those who report information included in a business record must be under a business duty to do so, or else the hearsay problem created from the report by an outsider must be satisfied in some other way. n71 To abolish the business duty requirement (or some other means of satisfying the hearsay problem created by information related by those outside the business) would lead to the introduction of double hearsay by way of a business record, in violation of Rule 805. n72

The concern addressed by the business duty requirement is that the person with personal knowledge of an event may not be reporting accurately to the person who eventually records the information. If the reporter is operating under the same or similar "business" duty (i.e., duty to report accurately) as the recorder, then the risk of inaccuracy is substantially reduced -- the same guarantees of reliability apply to the observer and the recorder. n73

However, the existence of a business duty is not the only way to solve the double hearsay problem created when a business record is prepared by one who is relying on the personal knowledge of one outside the "business." There are three ways in which a business record can qualify for admissibility even though the reporter has no duty to report accurately to the recorder.

First, if the recorder actually verified the information for accuracy, the record would be held by most Courts to be admissible. n74 A case arising rather frequently is where the government offers Western Union records to prove that one person sent a wire transfer to another. Of course, the Western Union agent has no personal knowledge of the identity of the sender or the recipient, and neither the sender nor the recipient has a duty to report their identity accurately. However, Western Union, for obvious reasons, demands that the recipient produce valid identification. Therefore, it has been held that Western Union records can be offered to prove the identity of the recipient. On the other hand, Western Union does not verify whether the sender has accurately identified himself -- therefore the record cannot be offered to prove the truth of the sender's identity. n75

Second, if the underlying statement satisfies an independent hearsay exception, the double hearsay problem is satisfied. n76

Third, if the underlying statement is offered for a non-hearsay purpose, there is no double hearsay problem at all. The record is admissible if the proponent establishes a regular recording of regularly conducted activity. A good example is provided by United States v. Cestnik, 36 F.3d 904 (10th Cir. 1994) . In a prosecution for narcotics and money-laundering offenses, the government introduced Western Union "to-send-money" forms to support its charges that the defendant laundered money. The forms did not reveal the defendant's name as the sender. But, the government introduced independent evidence to show that the senders' names were aliases of the defendant. The Court held that the forms were properly admitted under the business records exception. To the extent the records were offered to prove the amount of money spent on a specific date, they were qualified under the Rule by the custodian of records for Western Union. The Court noted that the records would not have been admissible if offered to prove that the person named on the form was the actual sender, because "Western Union agents do not verify the information filled out by the sender."

However, since the government offered the senders' names "not to prove the identity of the sender but as circumstantial evidence linking the false names to the money transfers," the names were not hearsay and therefore the records did not present a "source of information" problem. In other words, the fact that someone knew enough to use the defendant's aliases in wiring the money was itself evidence of a conspiratorial association; the government did not offer the record to prove that the defendant himself actually wired the money. n77

[d] Records of Regularly Conducted Activity -- Foundation Requirements

While a records custodian is a proper witness for establishing the foundation requirements of a business record, Rule 803(6) provides for a much more expansive class of witnesses who can establish this foundation. A witness is a "qualified witness" if he or she has acquired knowledge of how the records are kept, and can testify that they are kept in the ordinary course of regularly conducted activity. n78 The foundation witness must know something about the recordkeeping process, but the witness need not have personal knowledge of any particular recording or how it was made. n79 Moreover, the foundation witness can obtain knowledge about the recordkeeping process from the statements of others who are familiar with the recordkeeping. That this may be hearsay information is not disqualifying, because Rule 104 allows the Trial Court to consider hearsay in determining whether admissibility requirements are met. n80 It follows that a finding that records were recorded in the ordinary course of business activity can be based at least in part on the records themselves, e.g., that they were organized, precise, and looked routinely recorded. n81 In criminal cases, these flexible standards for determining the qualifications of a foundation witness have led Courts to conclude that a law enforcement agent can give proper foundation testimony for business records of an entity engaged in criminal conduct. n82

The foundation requirements of the Rule need not be established by in-court testimony. Under an amendment effective December 1, 2000, the qualified witness may establish the foundation "by certification that complies with Rule 902(11), Rule 902(12), or a statute permitting certification." The amendment is intended to limit unnecessary cost and inconvenience, by permitting a qualified witness to provide the foundation for business records by way of affidavit in lieu of in-court testimony. The amendment does not eliminate the need for a qualified witness, nor does it change the type of qualifications that have been found necessary for a witness to be able to establish a foundation for business records. It simply provides that the qualified witness can establish the foundation without being called to testify.

The Advisory Committee considered it necessary to amend the Rule to provide for a unified practice in the Federal Courts. Before the amendment, foreign business records offered in criminal cases could be qualified by affidavit under the terms of 18 U.S.C. § 3505. However, qualified witnesses were required to testify before foreign records could be admitted in civil cases and before domestic records could be admitted in any case. This disparity in the practice made little sense; the amendment provides for a unitary practice along the terms of section 3505.

The amendment to Rule 803(6) provides for an alternative means of establishing admissibility under the hearsay exception. It does not, of course, purport to solve any problem of authentication. Authenticity questions are considered under Rule 902. Whether the affidavit procedure comports with the accused's right to confrontation in criminal cases is a question taken up at the end of this Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 803.02[26].

[e] Records of Regularly Conducted Activity -- Regularly Conducted and Recorded

To qualify a business record, it must be shown that the information recorded is the type of information that is recorded in the ordinary course of a regularly conducted activity, and that it is the regular practice of the business to record such an event. n83 If the event recorded is an isolated incident, or if it is a recurring event that is not recorded as a matter of regular practice, the guarantees of reliability supporting the business records exception do not exist. n84

Some Courts have applied the "ordinary course" and "regular practice" requirements liberally. These Courts state that while Rule 803(6) does not extend to activity or recording that is "casual or isolated," some degree of discontinuity or selectivity is permissible, and affects only the weight of the evidence. n85 Most Courts, however, strictly construe the requirements of "ordinary course" and "regular practice," on the ground that this language was carefully considered by the drafters of the Rule and the requirements are important guarantees of the trustworthiness of the record. In these Courts, the record is excluded if the event recorded is unusual, or if the event when it occurs is not recorded in the ordinary course of the organization's activity. n86

[f] Records of Regularly Conducted Activity -- Computerized Records

Courts generally do not require any extra foundation testimony for computerized records. n87 Despite the fact that computerized records are often easier to tamper with than traditional records, the standards for admitting computer-generated records are ordinarily no more stringent than those for admitting other business records. n88 However, testimony by a witness about the accuracy of the software and reliability of the computerization will certainly bolster the minimal foundation that ordinarily suffices for both computerized and noncomputerized records.

If the record is a computer printout, it is not problematic that the printout was made in anticipation of litigation, so long as the data compiled in the printout was entered into the computer at a time when there was no suspect motivation. n89

Information taken off the Internet can potentially qualify as a business record. While the medium for the information is different, the same foundation requirements apply. For example, if information is found on a website and is offered for its truth, the proponent will have to establish through a qualified witness that the information is the type that is ordinarily posted in the course of regularly conducted organizational activity. At least one Court has held that postings to a website cannot be admitted as the business record of the Internet service provider, because such providers are simply conduits and not recordkeepers. n90 For a full discussion of the admissibility issues pertinent to Internet and email evidence, see the article by Gregory Joseph in Part Four of this Manual.

[g] Records of Regularly Conducted Activity -- Trustworthiness, Preparation in Anticipation of Litigation

Even if all of the foundation requirements of the Rule are met, the Trial Court has the discretion to exclude a business record if the source of the information contained in it or the method or circumstances of its preparation indicate a lack of trustworthiness. Documents prepared for litigation are prime candidates for exclusion as untrustworthy, at least where the report is favorable to the party who prepared the record. n91 The reason for exclusion of such reports as untrustworthy is that the motivation of the preparer is suspect, given the anticipation of litigation. n92 But if the report is unfavorable to the party who prepared it, it will be admissible because no inference of suspect motivation can be drawn. n93

The fact that records are trustworthy is not itself enough to warrant admission under Rule 803(6). Even a trustworthy record must satisfy the other admissibility requirements of the Rule: there must be a regular practice of recording an event that occurs in the ordinary course of a regularly conducted activity. n94 If a record of a certain event is not regularly kept, it is inadmissible under Rule 803(6) upon objection, even if there is no dispute that the particular record is trustworthy. n95 This is because the Federal Rules have established admissibility requirements for each hearsay exception that must be met for a statement to fit under the respective exception. The Rules specifically reject an approach to hearsay that admits a statement whenever it is trustworthy under the circumstances. Such an argument is permissible only under the residual exception.

On the other hand, if the proponent of the record has shown that the admissibility requirements of the Rule are met, the proponent need not make an independent showing of trustworthiness. It is up to the objecting party to show that particular circumstances render the records unreliable. n96

[h] Records of Regularly Conducted Activity -- Opinions

Opinions and diagnoses contained in business records can qualify for admissibility under the terms of Rule 803(6). It must be remembered, however, that Rule 803(6) provides that a Trial Court must exclude untrustworthy business records. This means that untrustworthy opinions will be excluded, just as they would be if the declarant were to testify at trial. See the discussion of Daubert in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 702, § 702.02[5]. Problems of untrustworthiness especially arise when the person who states the opinion is unqualified to do so, or draws an opinion from an insufficient basis of facts or data. Any record prepared by such a person must be excluded. Like any other opinion, an opinion in a business record must be helpful to the finder of fact under the standards of Rules 701-704. n97

[8] Rule 803(7) -- Absence of Records of Regularly Conducted Activity

Rule 803(7) provides that the absence of an entry in records covered by Rule 803(6) may be introduced to prove the nonoccurrence or nonexistence of a matter, if the matter was of a kind for which a memorandum or report would have been made had it occurred. Although the absence of a statement would not qualify as hearsay in most common-law jurisdictions, and although it probably is not within the definition of hearsay in Rule 801, the Advisory Committee and Congress apparently wanted to be certain that such evidence is admissible over a hearsay objection.

Rule 803(7), unlike Rule 803(6), does not specifically require foundation testimony from a custodian or other qualified witness. However, the first step in any analysis under Rule 803(7) is to determine whether the record qualifies under Rule 803(6) because, if it does not, Rule 803(7) cannot be used. Thus, admissibility is dependent upon an adequate foundation concerning the records from a qualified witness sufficiently familiar with them.

[9] Rule 803(8) -- Public Records

[a] Foundation for Exception

Rule 803(8) is one of the most complex of all the Federal Rules. The exception is divided into three parts and each is slightly different in its reach. Part (A) permits any record, report, etc., setting forth the activities of an office or agency to be admitted. It applies in both civil and criminal cases and allows any party to take advantage of it. n98 Part (B) covers matters observed by public officials pursuant to duty imposed by law when there is also a duty to report these matters; this Part does not on its face appear to allow anyone to use this exception in a criminal case to admit reports of matters observed by police officers and law enforcement personnel. Thus, (B) appears to apply to both sides equally in civil and criminal cases. In criminal cases it permits both the government and the accused to utilize the exception for some public reports, specifically reports of matters observed by someone who is a public official but not a law enforcement officer, but would seem to limit both sides by barring law enforcement reports from admission into evidence. Part (C) covers findings resulting from an investigation made pursuant to legal authority. It applies in both civil and criminal cases, but appears to state that only the defendant can utilize it in a criminal case. This is apparently a judgment that the government should be bound by its own findings, but that the defendant is protected by confrontation principles from being similarly bound. n99

There are two reasons for creating a special hearsay exception for public records. First, it is assumed that public officials perform their duties properly and that, given their multiple duties, it is unlikely that they will be able to remember the details of individual transactions independently of their records. Second, the exception often eliminates the need for public officials to testify or prepare for a trial, freeing them to spend more time performing their public duties. These twin rationales account for the major differences in admissibility requirements between Rules 803(8) and 803(6): (1) public records may be reliable and admissible even though they do not satisfy the regularity and contemporaneity requirements of business records, n100 and (2) public records may be admitted without the testimony or even the affidavit of a foundation witness. n101

One question that has arisen is whether the trustworthiness clause in the Rule applies to all three sections of the Rule, or only to (C). The former reading is preferable in our view; it is most consistent with Rule 803(6), in which the trustworthiness exclusionary clause is applicable to all records. Most Courts have held that the trustworthiness criterion applies to all reports offered under Rule 803(8). n102

Because of the strong presumption of reliability accorded to public reports, the burden of proving untrustworthiness is borne by the party seeking exclusion. n103 The nonoffering party must make an affirmative and particularized showing that the preparation of the report was contrary to the general standard of public service that makes such reports reliable. n104

[b] Public Records -- Which Reports Are "Public"?

Rule 803(8) does not define what constitutes a public record. It is clear, though, that the Rule requires that the record or report must be prepared by a public office or agent. If the preparing party is not "official," the report might be admissible under some other hearsay exception, but it cannot be admitted as a public report.

Thus, in Marsee v. United States Tobacco Co., 866 F.2d 319 (10th Cir. 1989) , the plaintiff offered a report prepared by the International Agency for Research on Cancer, and another report prepared by the Consensus Development Conference of the National Institute of Health. Both reports concluded that smokeless tobacco caused oral cancer. The Court held that the reports were inadmissible under Rule 803(8) because "[neither] document reflects the findings of a government agency authorized by law to report on the adverse health effects of smokeless tobacco." These agencies were not public agencies within the meaning of the Rule. They had official sounding names, but they were not in fact affiliated with any government body.

Still, the definition of a public agency is potentially a broad one; and it may well occur that a public agency could delegate, pursuant to government regulations, its duty to report on a certain matter. If the report is thereafter adopted by the government agency, it will be considered a public report for purposes of Rule 803(8). Thus, in United States v. Central Gulf Lines Inc., 974 F.2d 621 (5th Cir. 1992) , the Court held that quarantine certificates kept by the Commodity Credit Corporation were properly admitted as public records to prove cargo damage, even though the reports were prepared by foreign port authorities that were not themselves authorized by law to report. The Court stated that "the duty to prepare the report can be delegated, under government regulations, to an independent agency or to a foreign government without the report losing its character when submitted through the appropriate United States agency, as a report of a department or agency of the United States."

[c] Public Records -- Law Enforcement Reports Offered by Criminal Defendants Against the Government

Despite the way that Rule 803(8)(B) appears to apply in criminal cases, some Courts have interpreted both subdivisions (B) and (C) to allow the admission of law enforcement reports when they are offered to exculpate a criminal defendant. United States v. Smith, 521 F.2d 957 (D.C. Cir. 1975) , for example, interpreted part (B) of the exception as providing as much protection for defendants in criminal cases as does part (C).

Smith was convicted of robbery prior to the effective date of the Rules. In an opinion delivered after the effective date, the Court of Appeals held that an exculpatory police officer's report and broadcast transcript were admissible on the defendant's behalf. The Court cited Rule 803(8)(B) as support for its view, but it noted that "on its face" that Rule appears to exclude all law enforcement reports in criminal cases -- even those offered by the accused. But the Court held that the Rule should not be read literally:

> We are convinced, however, that 803(8)(B) should be read, in accordance with the obvious intent of Congress and in harmony with 803(8)(C) [which excludes only law enforcement reports offered by the government] to authorize the admission of the reports of police officers and other law enforcement personnel at the request of the defendant in a criminal case.
>
> ... [T]he apparently absolute language of 803(8)(B) had its origin in congressional concern that use > of reports against defendants would be unfair ... . Since there is no apparent reason to allow defendants to use the reports admitted by 803(8)(C) but not those governed by 803(8)(B), we conclude that a police report, like that of Officer Carr, is an exception to the new hearsay rules when introduced at the request of the defense.

We agree with the Court's sensible construction in Smith. There is no reason to treat (B) reports differently from (C) reports when they are offered to exculpate the accused. There is an obvious overlap between the subdivisions: a report setting forth "matters observed pursuant to duty imposed by law as to which matters there was a duty to report," could also be a report containing "factual findings resulting from an investigation made pursuant to authority granted by law." Congress could not have intended Courts to make a categorical distinction in admissibility for reports that could fairly be placed in one subdivision or the other. We note, however, that at least one Court has read Rule 803(8)(B) literally to exclude law enforcement reports offered to exculpate a criminal defendant. n105

[d] Public Records -- Law Enforcement Reports Offered Against Criminal Defendants

One of the most difficult recurring issues under Rule 803(8) concerns the admissibility of laboratory or similar scientific reports prepared under police auspices and offered in criminal cases. In the famous case of United States v. Oates, 560 F.2d 45 (2d Cir. 1977) , a defendant was convicted of possession of heroin with intent to distribute and of conspiracy. On appeal these convictions were reversed because the Court of Appeals was convinced that the Trial Judge erred in allowing the government to introduce two documentary exhibits purporting to be the official report and the accompanying worksheet of the United States Customs Service chemist who analyzed a white powdery substance seized from Oates' codefendant. In a lengthy opinion, the Court held that the reports were inadmissible against the defendant under the exclusionary clauses in Rule 803(8). The Court construed the 803(8)(B) language "other law enforcement personnel" so that it included at least "any officer or employee of a governmental agency which has law enforcement responsibilities." Having made this decision, the Court engaged in a lengthy analysis of the legislative history and determined that it was "manifest that it was the clear intention of Congress to make evaluative and law enforcement reports absolutely inadmissible against defendants in criminal cases."

We respectfully believe that the Oates Court overstated the breadth of the exclusionary language of Rule 803(8)(B) and (C). It is true that the legislative history indicates that police reports and the reports of government investigative officers were thought to present serious confrontation problems. In adding the exclusionary clauses, Congress was responding to one dominant concern: that law enforcement officers would create dossiers purporting to describe accurately the actions of criminal defendants and that these dossiers would be offered in lieu of live testimony. The legitimate fear is that an overbroad Rule 803(8) would result in the admission of an entire police file prepared in anticipation of a criminal prosecution, without any opportunity to cross-examine anyone. But it is clear that many law enforcement reports present no serious danger of being generated against accuseds in such a way as to impair their rights.

Most Courts have read the Rule 803(8)(B) and (C) exclusionary language in a far more limited fashion than the Court in Oates. Under the predominant view, the exclusionary language covers only those police-generated reports that are prepared under adversarial circumstances, and so are subject to manipulation by authorities bent on convicting a particular criminal defendant. n106 Where the risk of manipulation and untrustworthiness is minimal -- in particular where the report contains unambiguous factual matter prepared under nonadversarial circumstances -- Courts have held that the report should be admitted despite the apparently absolute language of the Rule. n107 Even the Second Circuit, in which Oates was decided, has held that a routine tabulation of serial numbers prepared by law enforcement personnel was admissible against a criminal defendant. n108

While a report that is ministerial in nature and made without contemplation of specific litigation is ordinarily held admissible, those law enforcement reports that are adversarial and evaluative in nature are ordinarily excluded, consistent with the exclusionary intent of Rule 803(8)(B) and (C). n109

Most Courts have held, correctly we think, that the law enforcement exclusion in the Rule is inapplicable if the public official who prepared the report actually testifies at trial. The confrontation concerns that give rise to the statutory exclusions are allayed where the declarant is subject to cross-examination at trial. n110 It should also be noted that some public reports can be offered in a criminal case because they are reports of "matters observed" by public officials other than law enforcement personnel. Neither the terms nor the concerns of the exclusionary language will apply to reports prepared by officials without law enforcement responsibilities. The problem with law enforcement reports is that police officers are in the competitive enterprise of ferreting out crime; in the heat of battle, a law enforcement officer might shade or falsify a report in such a way as to prejudice a particular criminal defendant. However, this concern does not arise with officials outside law enforcement; it cannot be presumed that every government official has an adversary motive against a criminal defendant. So for example, autopsy reports prepared by public medical personnel have been held to be admissible against criminal defendants under Rule 803(8)(B) because these medical personnel have no law enforcement objectives. n111

[e] Public Records -- Relationship to Rule 803(6)

In criminal cases, the argument has sometimes been made that a report that is inadmissible due to the exclusionary language of Rule 803(8)(B) and (C) can nonetheless be admitted as a record of regularly conducted activity under Rule 803(6). However, if the exclusionary language is properly applied so as to exclude only those law enforcement reports that are subjective and made under adversarial circumstances -- which is the position taken by most Courts, as discussed above -- then there is no conflict between the Rules. This is because records that are prepared in anticipation of litigation are excluded under the trustworthiness criterion of Rule 803(6); and those are, in effect, the only records that are excluded under the prevailing view of Rule 803(8). n112 Accordingly, under the predominant approach to Rule 803(8), the issue of whether a law enforcement report excluded under Rule 803(8) can nonetheless be admitted under Rule 803(6) does not arise. Such a report is by definition untrustworthy and inadmissible under both Rules. n113

[f] Public Records -- Factual Findings and Investigative Reports

A difficult question under the Rule has been the appropriate scope of the term "factual findings" in subdivision (C). Some Courts had held that "evaluative conclusions" were not included, but the Supreme Court decided in Beech Aircraft Corp. v. Rainey, 488 U.S. 153 (1988) , that "statements in the form of opinions or conclusions are not by that fact excluded from the scope of Federal Rule of Evidence 803(8)(C)." Rainey was a wrongful death action arising out of a military plane accident. The defendant offered the investigative report of a JAG commander, concluding that the crash was caused by "pilot error." The Lower Court held that this conclusion had to be excluded because Rule 803(8)(C) permitted the admission only of "factual findings." The Supreme Court gave five reasons for concluding that the Rule does not categorically exclude all opinions in a public investigative report:

(1) Most importantly, the Rule does not state that only "factual findings" are admissible, but rather that reports setting forth factual findings are admissible; thus, opinions in a report are not automatically excluded so long as the report itself contains factual findings. The term "factual findings" modifies the term "reports" and explains what type of reports are admissible; the term is not in the Rule to limit the admissible contents of the reports.

(2) There is nothing in the legislative history of the Rule to indicate that Congress had in mind a dichotomy between fact and opinion.

(3) The opposing party does not need an arbitrary exclusion of opinion in order to protect itself from unreliable information in a public report; protection is given by the provision that excludes evidence offered under Rule 803(8) if it was made under untrustworthy circumstances. Moreover, the term "reports based on factual findings" will still exclude the most suspect investigative reports: those that do not contain any factual findings, and thus are unlikely to be based on factual investigation. n114

(4) The line between fact and opinion is exceedingly hard to draw, and is essentially arbitrary. There is no policy reason for drawing such a line; if the concern is that an opinion is untrustworthy, that concern can be addressed on a case-by-case basis under the trustworthiness clause.

(5) A broad approach to admissibility under Rule 803(8)(C) is consistent with the general tenor of the Federal Rules, which relax the traditional constraints on opinion testimony. Much of the liberalization of opinion testimony, particularly as to lay witnesses, occurred in response to the ambiguous and arbitrary line between fact and opinion. The Supreme Court concluded: "We see no reason to strain to reach an interpretation of Rule 803(8)(C) that is contrary to the liberal thrust of the Federal Rules."

After Rainey, a Court may not exclude an opinion in an investigative report merely because it is an opinion. n115 Yet even after Rainey, there are several limitations on the admissibility of opinions, as well as factual findings, contained in investigative reports. Most of these limitations are imposed by the Courts pursuant to the trustworthiness clause of Rule 803(8). n116 The most important limitations are:

(1) An opinion, to be admissible, must be made by a qualified person using reliable methods, and must be based upon sufficient information and investigation. As applied to opinions of public officials, the standard of trustworthiness in Rule 803(8) is parallel to those contained in Federal Rules 702-704, which regulate the opinions of experts testifying at trial. The reason for imposing these requirements is that the opinion of a government investigator is likely to be treated by the factfinder as tantamount to an expert opinion. The proponent should not be better off by introducing the report instead of live testimony from an expert. If the government official would not be able to satisfy the standards for expert testimony at trial, there is little reason to admit the official's hearsay statement. n117

(2) For similar reasons, opinions that are nothing more than legal conclusions are ordinarily excluded. The Court in Rainey expressed no view on the admissibility of legal conclusions contained in public reports. However, most Courts have excluded such conclusions, as they would with similar in-court testimony, on the ground that legal conclusions are unhelpful to the jury and usurp the role of the Judge in instructing the jury on the law. n118 See the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 704, § 704.02[3].

(3) If the report is not a final report, but is merely preliminary or tentative, the report is not admissible, because it is not considered to contain "factual findings" as that term is used in the Rule. In other words, "factual findings" are final statements made at the end of the investigative process. Otherwise, an entire agency determination process would be piggy-backed into a trial. n119

(4) If the report has been revoked or superseded by the agency that prepared it, it no longer contains factual findings within the meaning of the Rule. n120

(5) Exclusion of the report is possible if the report appears to have been made under a suspect motivation. For example, if the public official or body who prepared the report has an institutional or political bias, and the final report is consistent with that bias, the report is subject to exclusion for untrustworthiness. n121

(6) Factual findings and conclusions made after a hearing are, for good reason, considered more trustworthy than findings made without a hearing. While the lack of a hearing is not dispositive, it does cut against admissibility. n122 And if the report is based on ex parte submissions to which an adversary has no opportunity to respond, such one-sidedness is a strong indication that the report is untrustworthy. n123

(7) The timeliness of an investigation is a factor in any inquiry into trustworthiness. If the time between the event and the investigation is so long as to render the underlying information stale or untrustworthy, the public report is subject to exclusion. n124

(8) Even if an investigative report is otherwise admissible under Rainey, it may be excluded by a special statute. For instance, probable cause determinations and other conclusions by the National Transportation Safety Board are excluded from all actions for damages pursuant to 49 U.S.C. § 1441(e). n125

[g] Public Records -- Official's Lack of Personal Knowledge

A public official usually does not have personal knowledge of all of the facts reported in an investigative report. An official who investigates the cause of a car accident may determine the angle of impact through her own personal investigation; but she is not likely to have personal knowledge about how the cars looked and sounded at the time of the accident. Often the official must rely on information from bystanders and others with personal knowledge pertinent to the investigation. The question is whether this reliance renders the official's factual findings and opinions untrustworthy.

Where the official who prepared the report receives his or her information from others, a hearsay-within-hearsay problem exists. n126 As applied to secondhand information contained in public reports, Rule 805 would seem to require that the statements by private persons to public officers must ordinarily be found independently reliable and admissible. So, for example, in Bemis v. Edwards, 45 F.3d 1369 (9th Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed a judgment for police officers alleged to have used excessive force, holding that a 911 tape describing the beating was properly excluded because the citizen caller's statement was not independently admissible or verifiable. The Court recognized that hearsay statements on a 911 tape can be admitted into evidence as a public record. But it noted that citizen callers are not under any duty to report correctly (unlike public officials who have such a duty) and that the official who made the record could not verify the accuracy of the citizen's description of the event. In the absence of a duty to report or some means of verification that the statement was true, the Court concluded that "a recorded statement by a citizen must satisfy a separate hearsay exception."

The Bemis Court acknowledged that a 911 caller might be reporting a present sense impression or an excited utterance, but it held that both of those exceptions require that the declarant have personal knowledge of the events described. In Bemis, the plaintiff had failed to show that the citizen caller had personal knowledge of the events related in the 911 call. n127

Yet it is fair to state that most Courts have considered the multiple hearsay problem somewhat flexibly under Rule 803(8), given the strong presumption that public reports are reliable. Thus, if the Court finds that the person with firsthand knowledge had no reason under the circumstances to misrepresent information to the public official, the report will probably be found admissible -- even though there was, strictly speaking, no duty to report to the public agency or means of verification, and even though no specific hearsay exception or non-hearsay use is applicable.

For example, in Ellis v. International Playtex Inc., 745 F.2d 292 (4th Cir. 1984) , a report by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention concerning toxic shock syndrome was held properly admitted, even though it was based upon information compiled from doctors throughout the country concerning the symptoms suffered by their patients. The Court recognized that the reporting doctors had no absolute duty to report reliably to the Centers for Disease Control, that the doctors' reports were not verified for accuracy by the CDC, and that the doctors' statements were not subject to a specific hearsay exception.

Nonetheless the Court found that under the circumstances, there was no conceivable motive for the reporting doctors to misrepresent information or to lie to the CDC. Therefore the defendant could not overcome the strong presumption of trustworthiness attached to the public report. n128

A flexible approach to secondhand information makes good sense, because a public report is treated at trial as tantamount to an expert's conclusion; and experts at trial are permitted under Rule 703 to rely on hearsay if that reliance is reasonable. As the Court stated in Moss v. Ole South Real Estate Inc., 933 F.2d 1300, 1310 (5th Cir. 1991) :

> [Many] government reports, as with many expert witnesses, have to rely in part on hearsay evidence, and the reports are not generally excluded for this reason. Under Rule 703, experts are allowed to rely on evidence inadmissible in court in reaching their conclusions. There is no reason that government officials preparing reports do not have the same latitude. n129

In contrast, where a report is based on statements from persons who are biased or politically motivated, it will ordinarily be excluded because of the unreliable sources on which the report is based. Thus, in Faries v. Atlas Truck Body Mfg. Co., 797 F.2d 619 (8th Cir. 1986) , the Court held that an accident report prepared by a police officer was inadmissible under Rule 803(8). The report was untrustworthy because the officer prepared his report after talking to only one of the drivers.

[h] Public Records -- Judge and Jury Findings

It might seem odd that Rule 803(8)(C) does not appear to admit Judge or jury findings, although it plainly allows admission of findings that are probably less reliable. n130(Compare Rule 803(22).) However, there is a good reason for excluding Judge and jury findings from the coverage of the Rule: Whenever Rule 803(8)(C) allows findings to be admitted, it leaves an opposing party free to challenge the reliability of the findings. Were Judge and jury verdicts to be similarly treated, Judges and juries would be subject to much more attack than at present. See, e.g., Rule 606(b).

[10] Rule 803(9) -- Records of Vital Statistics

Rule 803(9) is similar to many existing statutes. It provides that records or data compilations of births, deaths, or marriages are admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule if the information was prepared by a public officer pursuant to legal requirements.

One question about the scope of this exception is whether it is only the fact of the reported vital statistic that is admissible (e.g., the fact of death or marriage), or whether the exception also covers collateral facts contained in the record (e.g., the cause of death or the date of marriage). Most Federal Courts have held that records of vital statistics are admissible for both the fact of the vital statistic and for the collateral facts contained in the record. n131 This broader view has much to commend it. Like public records, records of vital statistics are trustworthy because they are made pursuant to a legal duty; moreover, such records are usually, though not always, recorded in the ordinary course of a regularly conducted activity. There is no reason to think that these significant guarantors of reliability would be applicable only to the vital statistic itself and not to the collateral facts in the record. n132

[11] Rule 803(10) -- Absence of Public Records

[a] Foundation for Exception

Rule 803(10) is similar to Rule 803(7). This Rule provides that the absence of a public record or entry may be introduced to prove the nonoccurrence of an event if the record is of a type that would ordinarily record the event if it occurred. The Rule abandons the common-law position that proof by a certificate of a lack of a record or entry cannot be admitted. Under the Rule such a certificate can be used, or testimony can be introduced, to prove that a diligent search failed to disclose the entry or record. This Rule extends to situations in which the absence of a record may itself be the ultimate focal point of inquiry, and is not limited to proof of nondispositive facts. n133 Whether this certification process is consistent with the right to confrontation of an accused is a matter taken up at the end of this Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 803.02[26].

Whether proof is offered by way of certification in accordance with Rule 902 or by testimony, the key to satisfying Rule 803(10) is evidence that a diligent search failed to disclose the existence of the absent record. The diligence requirement insures reliability, and reliability is the basis for the hearsay exception. If there is a substantial doubt as to the diligence of the search conducted, evidence of the absence of the record is subject to exclusion. n134 Thus, if proof is by way of affidavit, a conclusory statement that a diligent search was conducted tells the Court little about the breadth and reliability of the search. At a minimum, the affidavit should describe factually the method of the search and the safeguards undertaken to prevent an error. n135 It is not necessary that a Rule 803(10) certificate be prepared in any particular form or specifically employ the phrase "diligent search failed to disclose the record." It is necessary, however, to set forth in the certificate the relevant circumstances which reflect that a diligent search was made. n136

[b] Absence of Public Record -- Scope of Search

An affidavit offered to prove the lack of a public record may not be admissible if the scope of the search and the nature of the information sought are so far-ranging and value-laden as to create concerns about the reliability of the public official's investigation. For example, in United States v. Nicely, 922 F.2d 850 (D.C. Cir. 1991) , the government alleged that the defendant had committed fraud by representing to a client that he would obtain for the client a government contract to provide computers for a new government currency reform program, when in fact no such program was ever considered by government officials. To prove that a currency reform program was never considered, the government offered affidavits of Treasury Department officials, stating that they had checked the records for evidence of consideration of a currency reform program, and no such evidence was found. These affidavits were offered under Rule 803(10). The Court of Appeals, granting a new trial on another issue, strongly intimated that these affidavits should be excluded on retrial. The Court stated that, "unlike routine searches of easily pinpointed data compilations that courts have upheld in the past," the Treasury Department affidavits were "based on a far-ranging review of different Department files for any evidence that the government considered a currency reform proposal." Thus, the vast scope of the search, as well as the ambiguous nature of the information sought, created significant questions about the reliability of the searches. The Court declared that if proof under Rule 803(10) is to be made by way of affidavit, the nature of the search must at least be limited to a mechanical view of localized records. Otherwise, the official who checked the records must be produced for cross-examination.

[12] Rule 803(11) -- Records of Religious Organizations

Rule 803(11) deals with religious records concerning births, marriages, divorces, deaths, and similar facts of personal or family history. Records of financial transactions are not covered by this exception. n137 Some records that qualify for admission under Rule 803(11) would also be covered by the business records exception. But, Rule 803(11) goes beyond Rule 803(6) by providing that evidence of births or deaths or marriages, etc., based on information supplied by someone not in an employment or other formal relationship with a religious organization, and therefore under no duty to that organization, is admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule. Thus, there is no business duty requirement as there is under Rule 803(6).

The records covered by Rule 803(11) are considered reliable because it is in the interest of a religious organization to keep reliable records of important events conducted by it; also, the exception requires a showing that the records are regularly kept. However, there is a good argument that records of religious organizations are not uniformly reliable enough to justify a hearsay exception independent from Rule 803(6). The term "religious organization" is broad; religious organizations have proliferated in modern times; and experience indicates that many organizations titling themselves as religious are in fact a front for bizarre, or criminal, activity. Perhaps the solution would be to include a trustworthiness clause in this Rule, similar to that found in Rules 803(6) and (8).

[13] Rule 803(12) -- Marriage, Baptismal, and Similar Certificates

Rule 803(12) provides a hearsay exception for statements of fact contained in certificates marking marriages, baptisms, confirmations, bar mitzvahs, and similar events of a religious or, in some instances, civil nature. There is some overlap here with Rule 803(8) but the significance of this particular section seems to be that it covers religious officers as well as public officers. The rationale for the exception is that a certificate of an important event would not be issued by a religious organization unless it was reliable. A certificate fitting the requirement of the Rule can be offered to prove the fact of marriage, death, etc., as well as lineal relationship.

[14] Rule 803(13) -- Family Records

Rule 803(13) provides that statements of fact concerning personal or family history contained in family Bibles or on rings, or in inscriptions on family portraits, are excepted from the hearsay rule. The Rule is expansive in the openendedness signified by the final phrase, "or the like." It is also expansive in that the proponent need not show that the records were prepared by a family member or by somebody with personal knowledge of the facts recorded. The rationale for the exception is that trustworthiness is assured by the unlikelihood that family members would allow incorrect records to be prepared or retained.

[15] Rule 803(14) -- Record of Documents Affecting an Interest in Property

Rule 803(14) recognizes that with the advent of recording statutes, it is necessary that the record of any document that purports to establish or affect an interest in property should be admissible to prove the content of the original recorded document and its execution and delivery by each person by whom it purports to have been executed. Trustworthiness is based upon the prerequisites to filing -- which generally include a specified procedure to ensure execution and delivery -- that are set forth in the statutes that authorize the recording of title documents.

One may wonder at first glance why the same problem is not presented here that was presented in the Supreme Court draft of Article V on privileges. The question is whether this is a federal statute that attempts to override state law in an area traditionally left to the states. The last sentence of this section seems to provide the answer. Rule 803(14) is only applicable if the record is a record of a public office and an applicable statute authorizes the recording of documents at that time in that office. The thought of the Advisory Committee was that the entire purpose of recording must be to have a ready means of evidence concerning what happened with respect to property interests in the past.

[16] Rule 803(15) -- Statements in Documents Affecting an Interest in Property

Rule 803(15) provides that any statement in a document purporting to establish or affect an interest in property is excepted from the hearsay rule if the matter stated was relevant to the purpose of the document. The exception does not apply where the property has been the subject of dealings after the document was made that are inconsistent with the statement or the purport of the document. The rationale for the exception is that the circumstances under which documents disposing of property are executed, coupled with the requirement that any fact contained therein be relevant to the purpose of the document, constitute adequate guarantees of trustworthiness, especially since there is an exclusionary safety valve if subsequent dealings with the property are inconsistent with the document. The exception covers dispositive documents respecting the disposition of real as well as personal property, and unlike Rule 803(14) there is no requirement that the document be recorded or recordable.

[17] Rule 803(16) -- Ancient Documents

As the discussion of Rule 901(b)(8), § 901.02, will demonstrate, evidence that a document meets the requirements of an ancient document is enough to authenticate it. In most common-law jurisdictions, the only impact of qualification as an ancient writing is authentication. Some common-law Courts have gone further, however, and provided that if a writing meets the requirements of an ancient writing, statements made therein are admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule. Rule 803(16) takes this latter, broader approach. The Rule also reduces the number of years necessary to qualify as an ancient writing from the traditional thirty or more to twenty.

According to the Advisory Committee, ancient documents are sufficiently reliable to justify an exception because the danger of mistake is minimized by authentication requirements, and age affords assurance that the writing was made well before the present controversy. While this is generally true, it should be noted that the Rule does not require an explicit showing of trustworthiness, nor does it contain a trustworthiness exclusionary clause such as can be found in

Rules 803(6) and 803(8). n138 So, for example, newspaper accounts of an event, which are ordinarily excluded as hearsay subject to no exception, can be admitted under Rule 803(16) if they are old enough. n139 Perhaps this is a function of necessity. n140

[18] Rule 803(17) -- Market Reports

Rule 803(17) provides a hearsay exception for market quotations and directories or other published compilations used and relied upon by the public generally or by persons in particular occupations. n141 The Rule does not apply unless the proponent establishes that the reports are relied upon by the public or by people in a relevant field. n142 This is because the trustworthiness of these reports is premised on the use and reliance by the public at large or by particular professionals, and from the compilers' consequent motivation to be accurate in order to be competitive and to satisfy the needs of their customers. Sales of a telephone book will not be strong if many of the numbers printed are wrong.

[19] Rule 803(18) -- Learned Treatises

[a] Foundation for Exception

Rule 803(18) greatly expands common-law doctrine. This is a very important exception and should be read in conjunction with Rules 702 and 703, and the Editorial Explanatory Comments accompanying them. As indicated in the discussion of those provisions, common-law jurisdictions do not permit an expert to rely explicitly on treatises or professional literature, because such items are deemed to be hearsay. Yet, common-law jurisdictions do permit some sort of cross-examination of an expert witness based on treatises. If it turns out that an expert did consult a treatise and relied upon it in forming an opinion, the treatise can be explored on cross-examination in most common-law jurisdictions, but solely for impeachment purposes.

Rule 803(18) permits statements from learned treatises to be admitted for the truth of the matters asserted, not just for impeachment purposes. The learned treatise exception is premised upon the "high standard of accuracy which is engendered by various factors: the treatise is written primarily and impartially for professionals, subject to scrutiny and exposure for inaccuracy, with the reputation of a writer at stake." n143 Another important guarantor of reliability is that the treatise must be credited as authoritative by an expert testifying in the case, or else the authoritative nature of the treatise must be so generally known that it may be judicially noticed. To avoid the danger of misapplication and misunderstanding of the treatise by the jury, the Rule limits the use of treatises as substantive evidence to situations in which the expert is on the stand and available to explain and assist.

The Rule works in tandem with Rules 702 and 703. Now, the expert can be asked about a learned treatise on direct examination. The method for using treatises on direct is simple: The expert on the stand testifies that the treatise (book, pamphlet, article or otherwise) is recognized as a reliable authority in the field and that he or she has relied upon it in forming the pertinent expert opinion. Then it can be read to the jury. Of course, Rule 403 must be satisfied. In particular, the learned treatise exception was not intended to turn a trial into a seminar; long discourses on extraneous or confusing material can be excluded. n144

Even if the expert does not rely on a treatise on direct examination, if the cross-examiner can establish that the treatise is reliable -- either by the testimony of the witness being examined, by some other expert, or by judicial notice -- statements from the treatise can be introduced.

For a learned treatise to be admissible for its truth, the proponent must establish that the expert recognized the specific publication as authoritative. So, for example, the fact that a magazine is "highly regarded" does not mean that every article it publishes can be read into evidence under Rule 803(18). Each article offered must be verified as authoritative. n145 It is clear that the Rule will not apply in the absence of any showing of authoritativeness, unless it is so obvious that judicial notice can be taken. n146

One advantage of the Rule is that it requires the jury to be informed, at the time a treatise is read into evidence, of some reason to rely or not to rely on it. It prevents a plaintiff from wasting judicial resources by forcing a defendant to put on a case to rebut the possible implications of a generally reliable treatise that no expert would rely on in a particular case. Presumably the experts will explain when they are asked about authoritativeness why the treatises are or are not helpful, and it is hardly likely that the plaintiff will gain much from a treatise without an expert willing to rely on it. The treatise is of no help under the Rule unless an expert is testifying when the treatise is used. n147

[b] Learned Treatises -- Not Received as Exhibits

Rule 803(18) provides that when a learned treatise is admitted, it is read into evidence but it cannot be received as an exhibit. Statements from learned treatises receive treatment similar to prior recollection recorded. This is to ensure that the evidence, which is simply a testimonial substitute, is not given more weight than actual trial testimony. n148

Judge Grady, in a letter to the Advisory Committee, has suggested that the Rule's limitation on use of a learned treatise in the jury room should be rethought. He analyzed the problem as follows:

> I have a question in regard to the "Learned Treatise Exception" to the hearsay rule contained in Rule 803(18). I think it is an excellent rule and have used it fairly often in cases involving technical or scientific questions. The rule lets the treatise in as substantive evidence on the direct or cross examination of an expert witness. As the Advisory Committee noted at the time the rules were adopted, "[T]he rule avoids the unreality of admitting evidence for the purpose of impeachment only, with an instruction to the jury not to consider it otherwise." So far so good. My problem is with the last sentence of the rule ... .
>
> The problem I have with the limitation is that it doesn't work very well. In a trial of any length, there is no way the jury can possibly remember what was read to them from the treatise (or treatises; there could be several). Usually, the precise language of the treatise is critical. Without the treatise, or a verbatim excerpt from it, counsel and the jury are substantially limited in making effective use of the substantive evidence the rule permits. For this reason, the last sentence of the rule is often ignored. In my experience, the last sentence is invoked only by a party who thinks he has come out on the short end of the battle of the treatises. It would obviously be error to defy the language of the rule, so where counsel insists that the treatise not be physically received in evidence, it doesn't come in except by way of the recitation during the examination of the witness. On the other hand, where both sides think they have gained an advantage from the treatise material, copies of the treatise language are usually received without objection, sometimes in the form of blowups which are used in final arguments and sent to the jury.
>
> My suggestion is that the Committee consider eliminating the final sentence of the rule. If it is thought necessary to take more precautions with treatises than with other kinds of evidence, perhaps the last sentence could be replaced with language giving the court discretion as to whether the material will be received as a physical exhibit and sent to the jury. (I would include the "sent to the jury" idea to avoid the argument lawyers frequently make to the effect that an exhibit that has been received in evidence doesn't necessarily go back to the jury for use in their deliberations.)

The Advisory Committee considered Judge Grady's suggestions, but decided against amending the Rule. The reasoning of the Advisory Committee is set forth in the minutes of the April 2000 meeting of the Committee:

> Judge Shadur [the Committee Chair] stated that one of the reasons often mentioned for preventing learned treatises from being admitted as an exhibit is that the jury might rummage through the treatise in the jury room, without proper guidance. He and other Committee members noted, however, that any risk > of rummaging could be alleviated by redacting those portions of the treatise that have not been admitted. One Committee member pointed out that the point of any amendment would be to permit the jury to review the learned treatise in the jury room. However, it would be inappropriate for an Evidence Rule to specify how a piece of evidence should be handled in the jury room, since that is a question of trial practice, not admissibility.

>
> Judge Shadur and other members pointed out that the most important reason for the second sentence of the Rule is that learned treatises may be given undue weight if they are admitted as trial exhibits. For example, the jury is not ordinarily permitted to bring the transcript of an expert's testimony into the jury room, because the testimony is not an exhibit. Since learned treatises essentially operate as expert testimony, it would be inappropriate for the jury to be allowed to bring a treatise into the jury room because the treatise might receive more weight than the equivalent expert witness testimony. It might even occur that a learned treatise offered to impeach an expert witness would receive greater attention from the jury than the expert's testimony itself. An even greater danger might be posed by allowing learned treatises to be considered by the jury without the benefit of contemporaneous explanation by an expert.

On balance, the Committee decided that the current rule prohibiting use of a learned treatise as an exhibit was appropriate. As Judge Grady notes, the parties may and often do by stipulation waive the protection that the Rule provides.

[c] Learned Treatises -- Charts, Films and Tapes

Rule 803(18) does not on its face extend the learned treatise exception to evidence in electronic form, such as a video or a website. The Rule refers only to written material, and the last sentence of the Rule provides that the written material is to be "read" into evidence. But, the Second Circuit has upheld the admission of a videotape under the learned treatise exception. Costantino v. David M. Herzog, M.D., P.C., 203 F.3d 164 (2d Cir. 2000) . Judge McLaughlin, writing for the Court, addressed the argument that the Rule's silence on the matter precluded its applicability to videotapes. The plaintiffs, who had contested admissibility, relied on the "plain language" of the Rule and argued that to add videotapes to the list set forth in the Rule would constitute "judicial legislation." Judge McLaughlin responded as follows:

> Uttering the dark incantation of "judicial legislation" is to substitute a slogan for an analysis. Indeed, we are exhorted in Rule 102 to interpret the Rules of Evidence to promote the "growth and development of the law ... to the end that the truth may be ascertained." ... Because judges cannot escape the responsibility of filling in gaps which the finitude of even the most imaginative legislation renders inevitable, the problem is not whether the judges make the law, but when and how much.
>
> In this case, we are compelled to "make law." For we agree with [the Trial Court] that it is just "overly artificial" to say that information that is sufficiently trustworthy to overcome the hearsay bar when presented in a printed learned treatise loses the badge of trustworthiness when presented in a videotape. We see no reason to deprive a jury of authoritative learning simply because it is presented in a visual, rather than printed, format. In this age of visual communication a videotape may often be the most helpful way to illuminate the truth in the spirit of Rule 102 ... . Accordingly, we hold that videotapes may be considered learned treatises under Rule 803(18).

Judge McLaughlin has adopted a sound approach to determining questions on which the text of a Federal Rule of Evidence is silent. It is the approach that most Courts have used in filling the gaps in the Evidence Rules. The Courts consider the rationale for the Rule itself, and apply that rationale expansively to matters on which the Rule is silent. In this way the Courts "make law" consistently with the goals of the Evidence Rules -- to secure fairness and a just determination of the proceedings. n149

[20] Rule 803(19) -- Reputation Concerning Personal or Family History

Rule 803(19) provides that reputation evidence is admissible to prove personal or family history, and that the reputation can be established by members of the family or by close associates. n150 In some common-law jurisdictions, this would be a modification of existing law, which may be more restrictive in requiring unavailability of the declarant or in limiting the kinds of reputation evidence that might be presented.

The rationale for the exception is that "the natural effusions of those who talk over family affairs ... are fairly trustworthy." n151

[21] Rule 803(20) -- Reputation Concerning Boundaries or General History

Rule 803(20) codifies and expands two related hearsay exceptions for certain reputation testimony. The first extends to the location of property boundaries, and the second covers matters of general history. The Rule dispenses with the requirement, found in some prior case law, that the reputation attested to be ancient or be effectively the sole source of evidence available. By definition, of course, the reputation must arise before the controversy.

The rationale for the exception is that general reputation about facts of interest to the community is probably trustworthy; it is considered unlikely that a falsehood could become generally accepted as truth in the community, where the matter is of importance to the community. Of course, this would mean that Abner Doubleday really did invent baseball in Cooperstown, and that George Washington slept practically everywhere. In fact, reputation as to certain "facts" in the community may represent significant community-based and historically engrained self-interest.

To qualify for admission under Rule 803(20), the testimony must report a general consensus in the community, an assertion of the group as opposed to one or a few of its constituents. The fact that the information has been considered by and was subject to the general scrutiny of the community is an essential guarantee of reliability for the exception. Consequently, if the statement is a personal assertion of a single declarant, it will not be admitted under Rule 803(20).

Rule 803(20) covers reputation concerning "events of general history important to the community," as well as reputation concerning property boundaries and customs. To qualify under this prong of the exception, the proponent must make a showing that the matter on which reputation is offered is one of general concern throughout the community. Otherwise, the discussion within the community, on which reliability is based, may not have been sufficiently considered. n152

[22] Rule 803(21) -- Reputation as to Character

Rule 803(21) excepts from the hearsay rule the kind of reputation evidence that is provided for in Rules 405 and 608. Reputation is based in large part on what other people have said outside of Court, so there are hearsay problems with reputation evidence. This exception alleviates the problems.

[23] Rule 803(22) -- Judgments in Felony Cases

The rationale for admitting judgments of serious criminal convictions is that they are reliable, given the presumption that a guilty verdict is based upon a just determination pursuant to extensive procedural safeguards, and subject to a beyond-a-reasonable-doubt standard of proof. n153 Although the Advisory Committee recognized that the Rule might leave the jury with the evidence of conviction but without means to evaluate it, the Committee concluded that the jury would give substantial effect to the conviction unless the defendant offered a satisfactory explanation.

It is not certain that the Advisory Committee and the Congress pondered the practical problems of implementing this Rule. n154 Some cases are easy. For instance, if a defendant is charged with rape on federal land and is convicted, the rape victim will be able to introduce the fact of conviction in a subsequent suit for damages arising out of the sexual assault. Any jury will be able to figure out how to use the rape conviction in connection with the assault case, because the elements involved in the two cases will be very similar. Other cases may be more complex, however. Assume a defendant is convicted of rape on a federal installation somewhere in the San Francisco area on March 22, 1988. If the same defendant is subsequently sued in a diversity action for damages arising out of some other assault on March 22, 1988, somewhere near San Francisco, may the rape conviction be introduced to prove that the defendant was in the geographic area of San Francisco on the date in question (assuming the defendant denies this)? If the answer is yes, then the previous criminal conviction may be highly prejudicial to the defendant. Ostensibly introduced to prove presence in the area, it may identify the defendant as a rapist and result in his losing the civil case irrespective of the merits.

We believe that the best solution in a circumstance like this is for the Trial Judge to tell the jurors something like the following:

> The defendant in this case has previously been charged with criminal activity arising out of his action on the day in question in the case before you. I would like to emphasize that the previous criminal case has no particular relationship to this case except the one that I am about to describe. In the criminal proceeding, the defendant was charged with a crime that was allegedly committed in the San Francisco area. His conviction was based in part on the finding that he was in the area on the day specified. You are entitled to consider this fact in deliberating whether or not defendant was in the area on the same day and therefore possibly may have committed the act for which he is being sued in this case.

The advantage of this instruction is that it does not get into the specifics of the crime for which the defendant is charged. The first sentence of Rule 803(22) suggests that the judgment itself can be introduced into evidence, but it also implies that the purpose is to establish certain facts that were presumably decided in the criminal case. It must also be remembered that a conviction admissible under Rule 803(22) may nonetheless be excluded, or redacted, under Rule 403 if it is unduly prejudicial. An instruction such as the one described above may minimize prejudice, and if not, the Court should consider a redaction of inflammatory material.

Only convictions of a certain degree of seriousness are covered by Rule 803(22); the Rule is limited to crimes punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year. The one-year limitation excludes convictions for less serious crimes on the theory that the defendant's incentive to defend may have been limited, thus bringing the reliability of the conviction into question. Proof of conviction of an offense not covered by the Rule is purely hearsay, and it is not substantively admissible unless it falls within another exception (e.g., the residual or the public records exception), n155 or is used for a nonhearsay purpose (e.g., collateral estoppel or impeachment).

The pendency of an appeal does not, by the terms of Rule 803(22), affect admissibility of the conviction. The theory is that sufficient reliability flows from a conviction of a serious offense at the Trial Court level. Of course, the pendency of an appeal can be shown for the purpose of limiting the weight to be given to the conviction.

Rule 803(22) does not provide a hearsay exception for judgments of acquittal. n156

[24] Rule 803(23) -- Judgment as to Personal, Family or General History, or Boundaries

Rule 803(23) covers some of the same ground as Rules 803(19) and (20). It provides that judgments may be used to prove matters of personal, family, or general history, or boundaries if such matters were essential to the judgment and the same matters would be provable by evidence of reputation. According to the Advisory Committee, the process of litigating a case presents sufficient guarantees of reliability to equate a judgment with reputation evidence. The Advisory Committee recognized that this argument might suggest a broader area of application for judgments, but did not attempt to go further in this particular Rule.

[25] Residual Exception

Two residual hearsay exceptions were contained in the Federal Rules as initially adopted. These exceptions were designed to permit the admission of trustworthy hearsay that did not fit under any of the categorical exceptions. The residual exceptions were identically worded; one was placed in Rule 803 (subdivision (24)), and the other was placed in Rule 804 (subdivision (b)(5)). In 1997, the residual exceptions were transferred out of Rules 803 and 804, and combined in a single exception, Rule 807. This was done to facilitate additions to Rules 803 and 804. No change in meaning was intended. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 807, § 807.02, for a discussion of the residual exception. All of the Annotations to the residual exception, including cases decided before the effective date of the amendment, are set forth in § 807.03.

[26] Confrontation Clause and Rule 803 Exceptions

Assume that a hearsay statement is admissible under a Rule 803 hearsay exception. If the hearsay statement is offered against a criminal defendant, a further question arises: Is the statement admissible under the Confrontation Clause? Before the Court's decision in Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004), the answer to that question was "yes." This was because the Court in Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56 (1980), held that the Confrontation Clause guarantees that only reliable hearsay can be admitted against an accused, and that hearsay fitting within a "firmly-rooted" hearsay exception automatically satisfied the constitutional reliability requirements. And cases after Roberts had essentially held that all of the Rule 803 exceptions are "firmly-rooted."

But the Court's analysis in Crawford complicates that answer somewhat. What follows is a short discussion of Crawford, and then a discussion of how statements admitted under Rule 803 square with Crawford.

Crawford:

The Court in Crawford held that the defendant's right to confrontation was violated because uncross-examined "testimonial" hearsay was admitted against him at trial under a state hearsay exception for declarations against interest. Crawford involved a statement made by the defendant's wife to police officers that implicated the defendant and herself. Under the jurisprudence established in Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56 (1980), a hearsay statement satisfies the Confrontation Clause if (1) it fits a "firmly-rooted" hearsay exception, or (2) the statement carries "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness" that assure its reliability. The State Courts found that Mrs. Crawford's statement to police officers satisfied the "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness" prong of Roberts, reasoning that Mrs. Crawford was not trying to shift blame, and that she was relating relatively recent events to a "neutral" police officer.

The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Scalia, rejected the Roberts structure for determining whether a hearsay statement satisfies the Confrontation Clause, at least if the hearsay is "testimonial." Justice Scalia engaged in an extensive historical analysis and determined that the original intent of the Confrontation Clause was not to exclude unreliable evidence per se, but rather to exclude "testimonial" evidence that had not been cross-examined by the accused.

The bottom line from Crawford is that "testimonial" hearsay statements cannot be admitted against an accused unless the declarant is unavailable and the accused has or had the opportunity to cross-examine the declarant. Unless these two requirements are met, the "testimonial" hearsay statement must be excluded even if it is clearly reliable and even if it fits into a standard hearsay exception. An example of a statement that would qualify under Crawford is testimony from a prior trial in which the defendant was subject to the same charges, and the witness is unavailable for the subsequent trial.

On the other hand, if the hearsay statement is not "testimonial," the Courts after Crawford have uniformly held that the Roberts test continues to regulate the admissibility of the hearsay. While the Court in Crawford at least implied that there would be no constitutional regulation for non-testimonial hearsay, and was no fan of the Roberts reliability requirement, the Lower Courts after Crawford have reasoned that Roberts applies to non-testimonial hearsay until the Supreme Court specifically rules otherwise; and it did not so rule in Crawford, which involved only "testimonial" hearsay. n157

So a critical question after Crawford is whether a hearsay statement is "testimonial" or not. Surprisingly, the Court did not try to define the term "testimonial." The closest the Court came to a definition is set forth in the following passage:

> Various formulations of this core class of "testimonial" statements exist: "ex parte in-court testimony or its functional equivalent -- that is, material such as affidavits, custodial examinations, prior testimony that the defendant was unable to cross-examine, or similar pretrial statements that declarants would reasonably expect to be used prosecutorially," Brief for Petitioner 23; "extrajudicial statements ... contained in formalized testimonial materials, such as affidavits, depositions, prior testimony, or confessions," White v. Illinois, 502 U.S. 346, 365 (1992) (THOMAS, J., joined by SCALIA, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment); "statements that were made under circumstances which would lead an objective witness reasonably to believe that the statement would be available for use at a later trial," Brief for National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers et al. as Amici Curiae 3. These formulations all share a common nucleus and then define the Clause's coverage at various levels of abstraction around it.
>
> **...
>
> ... Whatever else the term ["testimonial"] covers, it applies at a minimum to prior testimony at a preliminary hearing, before a grand jury, or at a former trial; and to police interrogations. These are the modern practices with closest kinship to the abuses at which the Confrontation Clause was directed.

In another part of the opinion, the Court indicated that statements taken at guilty plea allocutions are testimonial:

> Courts have invoked Roberts to admit other sorts of plainly testimonial statements despite the absence of any opportunity to cross-examine. See United States v. Aguilar, 295 F.3d 1018, 1021-1023 (CA9 2002) (plea allocution showing existence of a conspiracy); United States v. Centracchio, 265 F.3d 518, 527-530 (CA7 2001) (same); United States v. Dolah, 245 F.3d 98, 104-105 (CA2 2001) (same); United States v. Petrillo, 237 F.3d 119, 122-123 (CA2 2000) (same).

While the precise definition of "testimonial" is not clear, n158 what is clear is that Crawford provides some limitation on the use of hearsay by the prosecution in federal criminal trials.

Statements Admitted Under Rule 803 and the Confrontation Clause:

It seems clear after Crawford (even given the uncertainty about the meaning of "testimonial") that admissibility under the Confrontation Clause must be analyzed on a statement-by-statement, rather than exception-by-exception basis. If the statement is "testimonial" it is excluded in the absence of cross-examination, no matter how reliable it is. On the other hand, if the statement is not testimonial, then it by definition will satisfy the Confrontation Clause for such statements, i.e., the Roberts test, because Rule 803 exceptions are firmly rooted.

While it is difficult to generalize in the absence of a clear definition of what "testimonial" means, a preliminary analysis of the major Rule 803 exceptions indicates the following:

Present Sense Impressions and Excited Utterances:

Most statements fitting under these exceptions will not be testimonial, because they are made in spontaneous situations, outside the context of any possible criminal litigation or investigation. But some statements will present Crawford problems, most importantly statements made by crime victims to police officers, e.g., officers responding to a 911 call. The Supreme Court has taken two state cases in the 2005-6 Term for review to determine the scope of Crawford as applied to 911 calls and statements to responding officers.

State of Mind Statements:

A declaration of a person's state of mind is not usually made in anticipation of use in a criminal prosecution or investigation, and as such it will not ordinarily fit even the broadest definition of "testimonial." n159 However, it is not beyond the realm of possibility that a state of mind statement could be made under "testimonial" circumstances.

Statements for Purposes of Treatment or Diagnosis:

Most statements made for medical purposes will not be made in anticipation of use in a criminal prosecution or investigation, and as such they will not ordinarily fit even the broadest definition of "testimonial." n160 However, under some circumstances a statement made to a medical investigator might be found to be testimonial. An example is United States v. Bordeaux, 400 F.3d 548 (8th Cir. 2005) , a child sex abuse prosecution, in which the Trial Court admitted hearsay statements made by the victim to a forensic investigator. The Court reversed the conviction, finding among other things that the hearsay statements were testimonial under Crawford. The Court likened the exchange between the victim and the investigator to a police interrogation. It elaborated as follows:

> The formality of the questioning and the government involvement are undisputed in this case. The purpose of the interview (and by extension, the purpose of the statements) is disputed, but the evidence requires the conclusion that the purpose was to collect information for law enforcement. First, as a matter of course, the center made one copy of the videotape of this kind of interview for use by law enforcement. Second, at trial, the prosecutor repeatedly referred to the interview as a "forensic" interview ... . That [the victim's] statements may have also had a medical purpose does not change the fact that they were testimonial, because Crawford does not indicate, and logic does not dictate, that multi-purpose statements cannot be testimonial.

Past Recollection Recorded:

Under certain circumstances a past recollection recorded will be "testimonial" -- for example, a police officer's record of a criminal investigation, or an officer's record of a witness statement. But the admission of the record will not violate the Confrontation Clause, because in order for the record to be admissible under Rule 803(5), the person who made the record must testify and be available for cross-examination. Under Crawford, testimonial hearsay is admissible if the declarant is available for cross-examination. And even if the declarant lacks memory, he is considered sufficiently subject to cross-examination for purposes of the Confrontation Clause. n161

Business Records:

The Crawford Court specifically mentioned a business record as a classic example of nontestimonial hearsay. Indeed, if business records are prepared with an eye toward litigation, they are not admissible under Rule 803(6). Because Rule 803(6) is also firmly rooted under Roberts, it follows that records fitting within the exception will not violate the accused's right to confrontation.

While the business record itself complies with Crawford, there may be a problem with the affidavit procedure that can be used to qualify business records after the 2000 amendment to Rule 803(6). If an affidavit is prepared by a qualified witness for the purpose of establishing the foundation requirements against an accused in a criminal case, the affidavit appears to be "testimonial" and prohibited by Crawford. Yet it is hard to see how the Confrontation Clause is implicated by the introduction of a pro forma, ministerial affidavit such as that embraced by Rule 803(6). Accordingly, at least two Circuits after Crawford have held that the Confrontation Clause is not violated by the admission of ministerial affidavits used to qualify records under a hearsay exception. n162

Public Records:

Law enforcement reports are not admitted under Rule 803(8) if they are prepared under adversarial circumstances. Thus it would appear that the only kinds of public reports that could be found testimonial are those that are not admissible under Rule 803(8) anyway. It follows that if a report is admissible against an accused under Rule 803(8), it is also very likely to be admissible under Crawford (and Roberts).

Absence of Public Records:

The public records as to which there is an absence are not prepared in anticipation of litigation and so the underlying records are not testimonial. The evidence of the absence of the records presented at trial, however, is a certification specifically prepared for the accused's prosecution. Like the affidavit procedure for Rule 803(6), however, the Rule 803(10) certification can be argued to be ministerial. And at least two Courts after Crawford have found Rule 803(10) certifications to be nontestimonial. n163

Learned Treatises:

Learned treatises are by definition not prepared in anticipation of a specific criminal prosecution or investigation. As such, they are not testimonial under even the broadest definition floated in Crawford.

[27] Specificity of Objection

Does an objection to an out-of-court statement on hearsay grounds also preserve a Confrontation Clause objection? The question is an important one because a violation of the hearsay rule is treated under a different standard of harmless error than a violation of the Confrontation Clause; that is, it is easier to establish prejudicial error for a violation of the Confrontation Clause than it is for a violation of the hearsay rule. n164 The Courts have split on whether a defendant's objection to hearsay is sufficient to preserve the constitutional question. n165 If the two issues are in fact identical, we think that it is excessively formalistic to require the defendant to object specifically on both grounds. None of the policies behind the specific objection requirement of Rule 103 are implicated when two admissibility questions are in fact decided by an identical test. However, especially after Crawford, which holds that the hearsay exceptions are not necessarily contiguous with the Confrontation Clause, it is prudent practice for defense counsel to make a specific objection on both hearsay and confrontation grounds.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. Federal Advisory Committee Note to Rule 803(1) and (2).

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Brewer, 36 F.3d 266 (2d Cir. 1994) (testimony of a police officer concerning eyewitnesses' failure to identify the defendant was not admissible as a present sense impression; the statements of the identifying witnesses were not made immediately after the event -- the relevant event being the robbery itself and not the failure to identify the defendant); United States v. Cain, 587 F.2d 678 (5th Cir. 1979) (statement made at least 10 minutes after the event is not sufficiently contemporaneous).

(n3)Footnote 3. Compare United States v. Blakey, 607 F.2d 779 (7th Cir. 1979) (substantial contemporaneity requirement was satisfied even though the time lapse may have been as long as 23 minutes), with Hilyer v. Howat Concrete Co., 578 F.2d 422 (D.C. Cir. 1978) (statement made 15 to 45 minutes after the event was held not contemporaneous and thus inadmissible under Rule 803(1); but the statement was admissible under Rule 803(2) because it was made under the stress of excitement). See also United States v. Parker, 936 F.2d 950 (7th Cir. 1991) (skycap's statement that the defendant had just given him the suitcase he was transporting was properly admitted as a present sense impression; the statement was sufficiently contemporaneous with the event, because the time elapsed was only that taken by the skycap in carrying the suitcase from the train to the baggage claim area).

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., Cody v. Harris, 409 F.3d 853 (7th Cir. 2005) (newspaper account of a libelous statement was not admissible as a present sense impression: "Cody has not provided enough information to evaluate whether these criteria [i.e., immediacy and spontaneity] have been met. For example, we have no idea whether [the reporter] wrote the article with 'calculated narration' nor do we know what the time lapse was between the statement and the writing of the article."); United States v. Cruz, 765 F.2d 1020 (11th Cir. 1985) (statement by a deceased officer to his superiors concerning the source of a cocaine sample was inadmissible where it was unclear how much time passed between the receipt and the statement).

(n5)Footnote 5. For an incisive analysis of the excited utterance exception, see Aviva Orenstein, A Feminist Critique of the Excited Utterance Exception to the Hearsay Rule, 85 Calif. L. Rev. 159 (1997).

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., United States v. Moore, 791 F.2d 566 (7th Cir. 1986) (statement referring to something that preceded the startling event does not describe the event, but is related to the event and hence admissible under Rule 803(2)); David v. Pueblo Supermarket, 740 F.2d 230 (3d Cir. 1984) (statement in slip and fall case that "I told them to clean it up two hours ago" does not describe the slip and fall for purposes of Rule 803(1), but does relate to the event for purposes of Rule 803(2)).

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., United States v. Collins, 60 F.3d 4 (1st Cir. 1995) (declarant's statement that he had been physically threatened was properly admitted as an excited utterance).

(n8)Footnote 8. See, e.g., David v. Pueblo Supermarket, 740 F.2d 230 (3d Cir. 1984) (watching another person slip and fall is a startling event). But see United States v. Wolak, 923 F.2d 1193 (6th Cir. 1991) (declarant's learning after the fact about a career felon's arrest "is hardly calculated to produce the spontaneous outburst that the rule envisions").

(n9)Footnote 9. See also United States v. Beverly, 369 F.3d 516 (6th Cir. 2004) (wife's identification of her husband in a surveillance photograph of a bank robbery was properly admitted as an excited utterance; the wife had no idea her husband was involved in the robbery and so viewing the photo was a startling event).

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., United States v. Knife, 592 F.2d 472 (8th Cir. 1979) (preplanned shooting of a police officer cannot be startling when it occurs).

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Moore, 791 F.2d 566 (7th Cir. 1986) (secretary planned to expose her boss as a bribe taker if and when she found evidence; actually finding the evidence was a startling event because the event was not within the declarant's control; even though hoped for, it was nonetheless a surprise when the event occurred).

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., United States v. Wesela, 223 F.3d 656 (7th Cir. 2000) (wife made statement to police officers two days after her husband threatened her with a knife; it was error to admit this statement as an excited utterance because of the lengthy time period between the startling event and the statement; the declarant had regained her composure and made the statement while at work); United States v. Winters, 33 F.3d 720 (6th Cir. 1994) (statement made by a shooting victim to police officers, two days after the victim was shot, was held not admissible as an excited utterance; the statement was made so far after the shooting that it was "the product of conscious reflection").

(n13)Footnote 13. See, e.g., United States v. Hefferon, 314 F.3d 211 (5th Cir. 2002) (statements by child-victim of sexual abuse, made within two hours of the abuse, were properly admitted as excited utterances); United States v.

Scarpa, 913 F.2d 993 (2d Cir. 1990) (statement of a beating victim was admissible under Rule 803(2); the victim named the defendants as his assailants five or six hours after the beating, while he was being treated in a hospital emergency room and his sister screamed that one of the defendants had come into the emergency room; there was little doubt that the declarant was still under the stress of excitement caused by his beating and by his sister's screams).

(n14)Footnote 14. See, e.g., United States v. Rivera, 43 F.3d 1291 (9th Cir. 1995) (victim's statement, accusing the defendant of raping her, was properly admitted as an excited utterance; while the statement was made more than 30 minutes after intercourse, the victim was still under the influence of the startling event; the victim was only 15 years old, she reported the rape to her mother at the first opportunity to do so, and she was in a "semi-hysterical" state at the time she made the statement); United States v. Hartmann, 958 F.2d 774 (7th Cir. 1992) (statements by a declarant to two lawyers, stating that his wife and her boyfriend were going to kill him, were admissible under Rule 803(2); it was not clear how soon the statements were made after the victim heard the plotters, but the Court held that hearing one's wife and her lover plotting one's own death is clearly a startling event, and the lawyers testified that the victim was in a state of panic when he related the story to them).

(n15)Footnote 15. See, e.g., United States v. Moore, 791 F.2d 566 (7th Cir. 1986) (statement made 20 minutes after an event was held admissible under Rule 803(2) where the declarant was "running around like a chicken with her head cut off" for the entire time).

(n16)Footnote 16. See, e.g., United States v. Sowa, 34 F.3d 447 (7th Cir. 1994) (statement made by a child-declarant 20 minutes after he was beaten, identifying the defendant as the perpetrator, was properly admitted as an excited utterance; the Court noted that the child had cried for the entire period between the beating and the statement); Morgan v. Foretich, 846 F.2d 941, 947 (4th Cir. 1988) (child's statements were held admissible under 803(2) when they were made within three hours of the child's first opportunity to speak with the mother, even though the alleged abuse had occurred more than a day earlier); United States v. Iron Shell, 633 F.2d 77 (8th Cir. 1980) (child's statements concerning sexual assault were admissible when they were made to a police officer between 45 and 75 minutes after the assault; the Court emphasized "the surprise of the assault, its shocking nature and the age of the declarant" to find a continuous state of excitement).

(n17)Footnote 17. See, e.g., United States v. Sewell, 90 F.3d 326 (8th Cir. 1996) (the defendant was stopped for a traffic violation; when a search of his car uncovered a gun, the defendant said the gun was not his; this statement was not admissible as an excited utterance; where "incriminating evidence is discovered in one's possession, it requires only the briefest reflection to conclude that a denial and a plea of ignorance is the best strategy. This hardly comports with the spirit of disinterested witness which pervades the rule.").

(n18)Footnote 18. See, e.g., United States v. Alexander, 331 F.3d 116 (D.C. Cir. 2003) (response to a single question during a 911 call did not diminish the declarant's excitedness and therefore did not disqualify the response as an excited utterance); United States v. Joy, 192 F.3d 761 (7th Cir. 1999) (finding statements made in response to questioning to be admissible under Rule 803(2), where the statements were made in a 911 call only minutes after the defendant had waved a gun at the declarant in an argument).

(n19)Footnote 19. The Advisory Committee's concerns received extensive discussion in United States v. Medico, 557 F.2d 309 (2d Cir. 1977) .

(n20)Footnote 20. See, e.g., Meder v. Everest & Jennings, 637 F.2d 1182 (8th Cir. 1981) (a portion of a police officer's report concerning the cause of an accident was not admissible under Rule 803(1), where the officer was unable to identify the source of the information, making it impossible to determine whether the declarant was an eyewitness to what occurred at the scene).

(n21)Footnote 21. See, e.g., Bemis v. Edwards, 45 F.3d 1369 (9th Cir. 1995) (911 tape was not admissible either as an excited utterance or as a present sense impression, because the citizen-caller apparently lacked personal knowledge of the events that he was reporting; the Court noted that the proponent of a hearsay declaration has "the burden of establishing personal perception by a preponderance of the evidence").

(n22)Footnote 22. Compare Miller v. Keating, 754 F.2d 507 (3d Cir. 1985) (statement by an unidentified declarant was held inadmissible as excited utterance, because the defendant was unable to show the requisite personal knowledge and spontaneity to meet the requirements of the Rule; in some instances the substance of the statement itself might reveal perception, but the statement in the instant case did not).

See also United States v. Mitchell, 145 F.3d 572 (3d Cir. 1998) : Police responding to a 911 call found the getaway car used in a bank robbery. On the seat of the car was an anonymous note indicating that the robbers had switched to another car; that other car was connected to the defendant. The Court held that the anonymous note was erroneously admitted under Rules 803(1) and (2):

> Both Rules 803(1) and (2) share certain requirements. One of the principal requirements is that the declarant personally observed the event or condition about which the statement was made ... . Although the government argues that a common sense reading of the note suggests that the person writing the note was perceiving the event and in close proximity, the record here is devoid of circumstances indicating by a preponderance that the author of the anonymous note actually saw Mitchell change cars. Thus, the requirement of personal perception necessary for both the present sense impression and excited utterance exceptions to the hearsay rule is not satisfied.

(n23)Footnote 23. See, e.g., United States v. Lawal, 736 F.2d 5 (2d Cir. 1984) (the defendant's statement of anger at being "set up," made at the time drugs were found in his suitcase in a Customs search, was admissible under Rule 803(3) as a statement of a then existing state of mind even though there was a likelihood of fabrication; the defendant had time during a long airplane trip to think up a story should he be caught).

(n24)Footnote 24. Advisory Committee Note to Rule 803(3). See also United States v. Cardascia, 951 F.2d 474 (2d Cir. 1991) (Rule 803(3) could not be applied to admit statements of the declarant's state of mind with regard to conduct that occurred eight months earlier; a contrary rule would significantly erode the hearsay rule, beyond the intended breadth of the hearsay exception).

Under the Rule, a statement of memory can be offered to prove a fact relating to the execution, revocation, identification, or term of the declarant's will. There are no particular assurances of trustworthiness that justify creating an exception for will cases. But as the Advisory Committee Note states, this provision represents an ad hoc judgment that finds ample support in the decisions, and rests on practical grounds of necessity and expediency. Not surprisingly, the "will exception" receives minimal application in the Federal Courts.

(n25)Footnote 25. See, e.g., United States v. Tokars, 95 F.3d 1520 (11th Cir. 1996) (statements of one defendant's wife that she intended to divorce the defendant were admissible to show a motive for the defendant to murder her).

(n26)Footnote 26. See also Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. v. Thien, 8 F.3d 1307 (8th Cir. 1993) (where insurance coverage depended on whether or not the declarant was acting within the scope of his employment, the declarant's statement that he was going on a flight to take a vacation was improperly excluded; the statement was "offered to prove [declarant's] present intention to do something in the future" and was thus admissible under Rule 803(3)).

(n27)Footnote 27. See, e.g., Stelwagon Mfg. Co. v. Tarmac Roofing Sys., 63 F.3d 1267 (3d Cir. 1995) (in a Robinson-Patman Act case, the Trial Judge improperly relied upon testimony of the plaintiff's employees that customers said they purchased products from a competitor at a lower price; the customers' statements were admitted under Rule 803(3), and therefore could be used only to prove the state of mind of the customers; the statements could not be used to prove the truth of the statements; thus, the Trial Court erred in admitting the customers' statements as proof of actual antitrust damages in the form of lost sales); United States v. Liu, 960 F.2d 449 (5th Cir. 1992) (no abuse of discretion in excluding a defendant's hearsay statements that he had participated in a crime because he feared a police officer he thought to be corrupt; the Rule admits statements as to the declarant's fear, but not as to why he held that state of mind or what he believed induced it); Grove Fresh Distrib., Inc. v. New England Apple Prods. Co., 969 F.2d 552 (7th Cir. 1992) (in an action brought against a competitor for misrepresentation of orange juice, the plaintiff was properly permitted to offer statements by customers that they switched to the defendant's juice because it was cheaper; the statements were not admissible to prove the fact of underpricing, but they were admissible to show the customers' motives for no longer dealing with the plaintiff).

(n28)Footnote 28. See, e.g., United States v. Williams, 704 F.2d 315 (6th Cir. 1983) (statement of the defendant that he intended to satisfy a tax indebtedness when his mother sold her house, offered to explain his possession of a large amount of cash upon arrest, was admissible under Rule 803(3) as a statement of intent to prove subsequent conduct; however, the statement was properly excluded on relevance grounds because the intent to perform the future act was conditioned on the sale of the house, and this condition had not been met). Compare United States v. Veltmann, 6 F.3d 1483 (11th Cir. 1993) (defendants charged with setting a fire in which their wife and mother, respectively, died, claimed that she committed suicide; it was error to exclude testimony that the decedent had talked about the possibility of her death and mentioned suicide several times).

(n29)Footnote 29. See, e.g., United States v. Scrima, 819 F.2d 996 (11th Cir. 1987) (in a prosecution for income tax evasion, the defendant attempted to rebut the government's "net worth" theory by offering the testimony of someone to whom the defendant had boasted, prior to the relevant tax years, of having a large sum of money to invest; this testimony was inadmissible, because the defendant's state of mind was not relevant to any subsequent conduct at issue in the case; the only relevant fact was whether the defendant actually had the money, and his out-of-court boast was hearsay with respect to that fact).

(n30)Footnote 30. See generally the discussion in United States v. Brown, 490 F.2d 758 (D.C. Cir. 1973) (principal danger is that the jury will consider the declarant's statement for the truth of an out-of-court event, such as a prior threat by the defendant; such inferences are improper, and must be weighed against the probative value of the declarant's statement as tending to prove the declarant's subsequent course of action).

(n31)Footnote 31. See also United States v. Fontenot, 14 F.3d 1364, 1371 (9th Cir. 1994) :

> The state-of-mind exception does not permit the witness to relate any of the declarant's statements as to why he held the particular state of mind, or what he might have believed would have induced the state of mind. If the [memory or belief] reservation in the rule is to have any effect, it must be understood to narrowly limit those admissible statements to declarations of condition -- "I'm scared" -- and not belief -- "I'm scared because [someone] threatened me."

(n32)Footnote 32. See also United States v. Hartmann, 958 F.2d 774 (7th Cir. 1992) (a homicide victim's wife and others were charged with defrauding life insurance companies by, inter alia, fraudulently listing the wife as the husband's beneficiary on life insurance policies, and subsequently killing the husband; the husband's statements describing the dismal state of his marriage, his desire to replace his wife as beneficiary on his insurance policies, and his fear of being murdered by his wife and her lover were admissible as evidence of his state of mind and were relevant to prove that the declarant would not have listed his wife as beneficiary); United States v. Green, 680 F.2d 520 (7th Cir. 1982) (in a prosecution for kidnapping with intent to commit murder, statements by the victim concerning her attitude toward the defendant were properly admitted because they tended to negate the defendant's contention that she accompanied the defendant voluntarily).

(n33)Footnote 33. In Hillmon, the Court received the letters of a third party (Walters), to the effect that he was going to Colorado with Hillmon, to show that Hillmon went to Colorado with Walters.

(n34)Footnote 34. It is true that the Court in Hillmon stated that the letters were competent evidence to prove that Walters went to Colorado with Hillmon. However, the actual precedential import of that extension of the state of mind exception is subject to doubt. All of the cases relied upon by the Hillmon Court, except one, were cases in which the state of mind exception was used to prove only the conduct of the declarant (e.g., to prove that the declarant took a certain train at a certain time). Almost all of the analysis in the Hillmon opinion considers the use of the state of mind exception to prove the declarant's conduct. Discussion of using this exception to prove the conduct of someone other than the declarant is clearly an afterthought. Finally, the entire evidentiary discussion in Hillmon is, at least technically, dictum, because the Court reversed judgments for the plaintiff not on the ground that evidence was improperly excluded, but rather on the ground that the insurer-defendants were entitled to separate verdicts.

The Court in Hillmon cited the old New Jersey case of Hunter v. State, 40 N.J.L. 495 (1878) , where that Court allowed the state of mind exception to prove that a meeting between two people took place. But the reasoning in that case was peculiar, to say the least. The Hunter court stated that "a reference to the companion who is to accompany the person leaving is as natural a part of the transaction as is any other incident or quality of it. If it is legitimate to show by a man's own declarations that he left his home to be gone a week, or for a certain destination, which seems incontestable, why may it not be proved in the same way that a designated person was to bear him company?" This "analysis" amounts to an assertion that if one part of a statement is reliable, all parts of a statement must be admitted, no matter how unreliable those parts may be. Such a proposition has been rejected time and again by the United States Supreme Court, and would amount to an exception to the hearsay rule for "partly reliable narratives." See Williamson v. United States, 512 U.S. 594 (1994) (rejecting the notion that an entire narrative can be admissible simply because part of the narrative is reliable, and noting that "one of the most effective ways to lie is to mix falsehood with truth").

Finally, even if Hillmon were a holding that state of mind statements can be used to prove the conduct of a nondeclarant, this is a holding based on the common law. It is not a controlling discussion of the Federal Rules of Evidence, enacted almost 100 years later.

(n35)Footnote 35. See generally Note, Federal Rule of Evidence 803(3) and the Criminal Defendant: The Limits of the Hillmon Doctrine, 35 Vand. L. Rev. 659 (1982).

(n36)Footnote 36. See, e.g., Gual Morales v. Hernandez Vega, 579 F.2d 677 (1st Cir. 1978) (excluding a witness' statement that "I intend to see [the defendant]" when offered to prove that the witness met with the defendant); United States v. Jenkins, 579 F.2d 840 (4th Cir. 1978) (accepting the House limitation on Hillmon but also finding that the declarant's statement, "I'm on my way to see Jenkins," was admissible as nonhearsay for the impeachment purpose of attacking Jenkins' testimony that he had left his house to see a friend other than the declarant; the dissent argued that the statement was in fact admitted to show that Jenkins met with the declarant and that such admission was error).

(n37)Footnote 37. See, e.g., United States v. Astorga-Torres, 682 F.2d 1331 (9th Cir. 1982) .

(n38)Footnote 38. See, e.g., United States v. Delvecchio, 816 F.2d 859 (2d Cir. 1987) (an informant's statement that he was going to meet Delvecchio to complete a drug transaction was inadmissible where there was no independent evidence of Delvecchio's presence at the meeting). Compare United States v. Sperling, 726 F.2d 69 (2d Cir. 1984) (an informant's statement that he planned to meet Sperling to complete a drug transaction was admissible where the declarant's statement of intent to meet with the defendant was confirmed by later eyewitness testimony that the meeting actually took place).

(n39)Footnote 39. See, e.g., United States v. Donley, 878 F.2d 735 (3d Cir. 1989) (in a first-degree murder prosecution a government witness testified that the victim said, in the presence of her husband the defendant, that she was moving out of the marital home and separating from him; shortly thereafter, the victim was found dead; the testimony was properly admitted to show the existence of her intention and plan and the defendant's awareness of it, from which could be inferred a motive for the killing; the statement did not purport to express an opinion about the nondeclarant's state of mind).

(n40)Footnote 40. See, e.g., United States v. DiMaria, 727 F.2d 265, 271 (2d Cir. 1984) (exculpatory statement of state of mind made under untrustworthy circumstances is admissible under Rule 803(3): "False it may well have been but if it fell within Rule 803(3), as it clearly did if the words of that Rule are read to mean what they say, its truth or falsity is for the jury to determine."); United States v. Peak, 856 F.2d 825 (7th Cir. 1988) (an exculpatory statement by the defendant was held admissible under Rule 803(3) despite the contention that the defendant had an opportunity to fabricate a then existing state of mind).

(n41)Footnote 41. See, e.g., United States v. Reyes, 239 F.3d 722 (5th Cir. 2001) (no error in excluding an exculpatory statement by a criminal defendant; the defendant suspected that the person he was speaking to was a government informant and that the conversation was being monitored; the defendant's statements "were more self-serving than candid" and lacked the spontaneity required for admission under Rule 803(3)); United States v. Faust, 850 F.2d 575 (9th Cir. 1988) (an exculpatory letter written by the defendant was not admissible under Rule 803(3) since the defendant had time to reflect in drafting the letter, and thus any evidence of state of mind provided by the letter was unreliable).

(n42)Footnote 42. See, e.g., United States v. Partyka, 561 F.2d 118 (8th Cir. 1977) (an exculpatory statement by the defendant was admissible under Rule 803(3) despite the contention that the defendant had an opportunity to fabricate a then existing state of mind; the Federal Rules provide a categorical approach, and if a statement fits within the terms of a hearsay exception, it is admissible even if made under untrustworthy circumstances).

(n43)Footnote 43. See, e.g., United States v. LeMaster, 54 F.3d 1224 (6th Cir. 1995) (the Trial Judge properly excluded a statement the defendant made a day after being interviewed by the FBI agent; to the extent that the statement communicated that the defendant may have answered questions mistakenly, it was a statement of a past, not a present state of mind).

(n44)Footnote 44. See generally Robert Mosteller, Child Sexual Abuse and Statements Made for the Purpose of Medical Diagnosis or Treatment, 67 N.C. L. Rev. 257 (1989), for a thorough discussion of the reliability of statements admitted under Rule 803(4).

(n45)Footnote 45. See, e.g., United States v. Iron Shell, 633 F.2d 77, 84 (8th Cir. 1980) ("This principle recognizes that life and death decisions are made by physicians in reliance on such facts and as such should have sufficient trustworthiness to be admissible in a court of law.").

(n46)Footnote 46. The leading case establishing the two-pronged approach to admissibility of statements under Rule 803(4) is United States v. Iron Shell, 633 F.2d 77 (8th Cir. 1980) ; accord United States v. Nick, 604 F.2d 1199 (9th Cir. 1979) .

(n47)Footnote 47. See, e.g., United States v. Pollard, 790 F.2d 1309 (7th Cir. 1986) (a statement of a patient describing how his arm was twisted was admissible because the cause of arm pain was reasonably pertinent to treatment, and the declarant made the statement with a motive to obtain treatment). Compare Cook v. Hoppin, 783 F.2d 684 (7th Cir. 1986) (a statement that a patient fell from a third-story stairway while wrestling was not admissible under Rule 803(4) to prove that the patient was wrestling; the cause of the accident was not pertinent to treatment because the doctor would treat a patient who fell from three stories the same way no matter what the cause of the fall).

(n48)Footnote 48. See, e.g., United States v. Yazzie, 59 F.3d 807, 812 (9th Cir. 1995) :

> Generally, statements of fault are not admissible under this exception. However, this Circuit has adopted a special rule for sexual abuse cases because sexual abuse involves more than physical injury; the physician must be attentive to treating the victim's emotional and psychological injuries, the exact nature and extent of which often depend on the identity of the abuser. Thus, a child victim's statements about the identity of the perpetrator are admissible under the medical treatment exception when they are made for the purposes of medical diagnosis and treatment.

See also United States v. Provost, 875 F.2d 172 (8th Cir. 1989) (a statement identifying the defendant as the perpetrator was pertinent to treatment where the defendant occasionally lived in the victim's home).

(n49)Footnote 49. See, e.g., United States v. Renville, 779 F.2d 430 (8th Cir. 1985) (child's statement attributing fault is admissible under Rule 803(4) only "where the physician makes clear to the victim that the inquiry into the identity of the abuser is important to diagnosis and treatment, and the victim manifests such an understanding."). See also United States v. Sumner, 204 F.3d 1182 (8th Cir. 2000) (child's statement to doctor accusing the defendant of sexual abuse was erroneously admitted under Rule 803(4): "Although Dr. Zitzlow explained that he was a doctor, he did not discuss with [the victim] the need for truthful revelations or emphasize that the identification of the abuser was important to Dr. Zitzlow's attempts to help her overcome any emotional trauma resulting from the abuse to which she had been subjected."). Compare United States v. Pacheco, 154 F.3d 1236 (10th Cir. 1998) (placing the burden on the defendant to provide evidence that the child-declarant did not understand she was being treated by doctors and needed to be truthful).

(n50)Footnote 50. See, e.g., Danaipour v. McLarey, 386 F.3d 289 (1st Cir. 2004) (rejecting as "unnecessary inflexible" the rule that statements by children are admissible only where the physician makes clear to the child that truthfully identifying the abuser is necessary to diagnosis and treatment: "There are many ways in which a party wishing to enter into evidence as statement under Rule 803(4) can demonstrate that the statement was made for the purpose of diagnosis and treatment.")

(n51)Footnote 51. See, e.g., United States v. Whitted, 11 F.3d 782 (8th Cir. 1993) (statements were admissible even where a doctor was consulted only for the purpose of providing expert testimony in a criminal prosecution); Morgan v. Foretich, 846 F.2d 941 (4th Cir. 1988) (the term "diagnosis" is intended to refer to a doctor who is consulted only in order to testify as a witness). See also Mosteller, Child Sexual Abuse and Statements for the Purpose of Medical Diagnosis or Treatment, 67 N.C. L. Rev. 257, 260 (1989) ("The rule admits statements made to a doctor consulted only for the purpose of diagnosis, when no treatment is anticipated by the declarant. The archetypal statement involved here is one made to a physician who is consulted for the purpose of the doctor giving expert testimony at trial.").

(n52)Footnote 52. See, e.g., Lovejoy v. United States, 92 F.3d 628 (8th Cir. 1996) (statements by a child's mother concerning attempted sexual abuse of the child by the father were properly admitted; the statements were made to a nurse; the child could not speak more than a few words; and the mother had attempted to convey details as to what the defendant had done in order to aid in diagnosis and treatment of the daughter).

(n53)Footnote 53. See, e.g., Bucci v. Essex Ins. Co., 393 F.3d 285 (1st Cir. 2005) ("There is no requirement, either in the text of the Rule, or the case law, that the speaker be the patient himself"; the question is whether the declarant's motive is to promote treatment or diagnosis of the patient); Cook v. Hoppin, 783 F.2d 684 (7th Cir. 1986) (statements by nonpatients can qualify under Rule 803(4) where they are pertinent to the patient's treatment or diagnosis). Compare Stull v. Fuqua Indus., 906 F.2d 1271 (8th Cir. 1990) (a statement in a medical record that the plaintiff "apparently" jumped from a lawn mower and got his foot caught in it was held not admissible under Rule 803(4); while Rule 803(4) allows statements from nonpatients, there was no showing that this statement was made by a nonpatient for the purpose of treating the patient: "Here the word 'apparently' in the hospital record indicates that the statement may not have been made by [the patient]; it may instead represent conjecture on the part of the person filling out the record.").

(n54)Footnote 54. See, e.g., United States v. Newman, 965 F.2d 206 (7th Cir. 1992) ("Is psychology medicine? For purposes of this rule, it is. The idea behind the rule is that a person who believes he or she may be ill or injured has a strong incentive to tell the professional from whom he seeks diagnosis or treatment the truth about his medical history, symptoms, etc., because if he doesn't it will be harder for the professional to diagnose his problem and treat it effectively. The rationale applies as forcefully to a clinical psychologist as to a physician, and warrants us in reading 'medical' broadly."); Morgan v. Foretich, 846 F.2d 941, 949 n.1 (4th Cir. 1988) ("Statements to psychiatrists or psychologists are admissible under 803(4) the same as statements to physicians.").

(n55)Footnote 55. See, e.g., Collins v. Kibort, 143 F.3d 331 (7th Cir. 1998) (the plaintiff was erroneously permitted to introduce a diary recording his version of various episodes at issue in the case; the plaintiff did not state that he could not recall the events recorded -- in fact, he gave testimony recalling those events in detail -- so the proper foundation was not laid for the diary as past recollection recorded).

(n56)Footnote 56. See, e.g., Cathey v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 776 F.2d 1565 (6th Cir. 1985) (a list of products that the plaintiff was allegedly exposed to while on the job cannot be admitted under Rule 803(5), where the list was prepared at least five years after the plaintiff's exposure to the products). Compare United States v. Smith, 197 F.3d 225 (6th Cir. 1999) (no abuse of discretion in admitting a statement given by a cooperating witness to a detective 15 months after the incident described in the statement; Rule 803(5) has no contemporaneity requirement; the defendant showed no reason why the matter was not fresh in the witness' memory when the statement was made, and the Rule's requirements were otherwise satisfied).

(n57)Footnote 57. Research Sys. Corp. v. IPSOS Publicite, 276 F.3d 914 (7th Cir. 2002) (documents admitted as past recollection recorded may be read to the jury but not received as an exhibit).

(n58)Footnote 58. See, e.g., United States v. Williams, 951 F.2d 853 (7th Cir. 1992) :

> Where a person perceives an event and reports it to another person who records the statement, both must ordinarily testify to establish that the statement is a past recollection recorded under rule 803(5). The person who witnessed the event must testify to the accuracy of his oral report to the person who recorded the statement. The recorder must also testify to the accuracy of his transcription.

Compare Ricciardi v. Children's Hosp. Med. Center, 811 F.2d 18 (1st Cir. 1987) (notes prepared by a doctor about problems occurring during an operation are not admissible as a recorded recollection where the doctor had no personal knowledge of the events recorded, and the proponent did not produce those who reported to the doctor who prepared the notes).

(n59)Footnote 59. United States v. Schoenborn, 4 F.3d 1424 (7th Cir. 1993) :

> It is undisputed that Coleman would not put his name to Staedtler's report when it was first shown to him, and that he subsequently disavowed its accuracy on the witness stand. The district court erred in finding that Coleman had adopted Staedtler's report, and consequently abused its discretion in admitting the report as a past recollection recorded under Rule 803(5).

(n60)Footnote 60. Compare United States v. Benson, 961 F.2d 707, 709 (8th Cir. 1992) ("The two interviews with [the witness] were not reported verbatim and they were unsigned and unsworn by [him]. Thus, both reports constitute inadmissible double hearsay and should not have been admitted into evidence" as past recollection recorded), with United States v. Porter, 986 F.2d 1014 (6th Cir. 1993) (adoption was found where, among other things, the witness admitted making the statement, had made the statement under penalty of perjury, had signed the statement on every page, and had changed and initialed the wording of the statement several times).

(n61)Footnote 61. Advisory Committee Note to Rule 803(6).

(n62)Footnote 62. See, e.g., Waddell v. Commissioner, 841 F.2d 264 (9th Cir. 1988) (an appraisal report was not admissible under Rule 803(6) where no showing was made that it was the regular practice of the preparer to make such a report).

(n63)Footnote 63. See, e.g., United States v. Catabran, 836 F.2d 453 (9th Cir. 1988) (the fact that printouts were not relied upon for inventory purposes does not prevent admissibility where the printouts provided accurate inventory figures and were kept on a monthly basis as a routine business practice; Rule 803(6) does not require that the business actually rely on the record in any specific way).

(n64)Footnote 64. 56 F.R.D. 183, 301 (1973).

(n65)Footnote 65. This legislative history is set forth in §§ 803.04[5], [8].

(n66)Footnote 66. See, e.g., United States v. Box, 50 F.3d 345 (5th Cir. 1995) (records of arrests prepared by the County Attorney's office were properly admitted under Rule 803(6)).

(n67)Footnote 67. See, e.g., Abdel v. United States, 670 F.2d 73 (7th Cir. 1982) (Department of Agriculture transaction reports were properly admitted under Rule 803(6) as proof that a supermarket was engaging in improper food stamp transactions; the Court rejected an argument that only Rule 803(8) could be used to admit public records).

(n68)Footnote 68. See, e.g., United States v. Cain, 615 F.2d 380, 382 (5th Cir. 1980) (a report of a prison escape that was inadmissible under Rule 803(8) due to its adversarial nature cannot be admitted under Rule 803(6) by establishing a foundation of regularity); United States v. Orellana-Blanco, 294 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 2002) ("When public records are used against a defendant in a criminal prosecution, the public records exception is the exclusive applicable hearsay exception.").

(n69)Footnote 69. The dispute respecting the relationship between Rule 803(6) and Rule 803(8) occurs because a few cases have stated that Rule 803(8) absolutely excludes all law enforcement reports offered against criminal defendants. See United States v. Oates, 560 F.2d 45 (2d Cir. 1977) . Under that view, the issue of admissibility of law enforcement reports under Rule 803(6) is of great import. In fact, however, most Courts have held that police reports offered against criminal defendants are excluded only to the extent that they were prepared with an adversarial motive, in anticipation of litigation. See, e.g., United States v. Orozco, 590 F.2d 789 (9th Cir. 1979) (customs records of border crossings are admissible under Rule 803(8) because they are ministerial and not prepared under adversarial circumstances). Records prepared with an adversarial motive would, under this view, be excluded under the trustworthiness provisions of both Rule 803(8) and Rule 803(6). Thus, for the majority of Courts, which take a less drastic view of the exclusionary effect of Rule 803(8), the issue of whether a record excluded under Rule 803(8) can nonetheless be admitted under Rule 803(6) will not arise because the Rules are coextensive in these circumstances. See United States v. Bohrer, 807 F.2d 159 (10th Cir. 1986) (IRS contact card excluded under Rule 803(8) because it was prepared under adversarial circumstances is also excluded under Rule 803(6) because adversarial circumstances of its preparation show a lack of trustworthiness). For a further discussion of this point, see the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 803(8), § 803.02[9][e].

(n70)Footnote 70. See United States v. Vigneau, 187 F.3d 70 (1st Cir. 1999) (noting that business records are admissible because businesses have incentives to keep accurate records, "but no such safeguards of regularity or business checks automatically assure the truth of a statement to the business by a stranger to it").

(n71)Footnote 71. See, e.g., Cameron v. Otto Bock Orthopedic Indus. Inc., 43 F.3d 14 (1st Cir. 1994) (product failure reports submitted to the manufacturer after the plaintiff's accident were inadmissible; the reports were submitted by prosthesists who typically obtained their information from patients; the patients were under no business duty to the manufacturer and the reports were inadmissible hearsay).

(n72)Footnote 72. See, e.g., United States v. Vigneau, 187 F.3d 70 (1st Cir. 1999) ("despite its language, the business records exception does not embrace statements contained within a business record that were made by one who is not a part of the business if the embraced statements are offered for their truth"); Bemis v. Edwards, 45 F.3d 1369 (9th Cir. 1995) ("[h]earsay statements on a 911 tape can be admitted into evidence as either a 'public record,' Fed.R.Evid. 803(8)(B), or a 'business record,' Fed.R.Evid. 803(6)," but citizen callers are not under any duty to report and thus "a recorded statement by a citizen must satisfy a separate hearsay exception"); Gray v. Busch Entertainment Corp., 886 F.2d 14 (2d Cir. 1989) (a record containing a statement of the plaintiff's daughter to an attending nurse about how an accident occurred was held inadmissible under Rule 803(6): the daughter "was not acting in the regular course of business, and the record of her statement was thus inadmissible unless it fell within some exception to the hearsay rule. See Rule 805").

(n73)Footnote 73. See, e.g., United States v. Turner, 189 F.3d 712 (8th Cir. 1999) (hearsay upon hearsay problem was excused where both the source of information and the recorder were acting in the regular course of the organization's business).

(n74)Footnote 74. See, e.g., United States v. Reyes, 157 F.3d 949 (2d Cir. 1998) (no abuse of discretion in admitting prison logbooks showing that certain individuals visited the defendant in prison; the visitors had no business duty to provide truthful information about their identity; however, the foundation witness testified that the employees preparing the logbooks checked identification in order to verify the identity of the visitors); United States v. Bland, 961 F.2d 123 (9th Cir. 1992) (identity of purchaser of a firearm can be proved by form filled out by gun-seller; because federal regulations required sellers of firearms to verify the name of each purchaser, and purchasers are under a legal duty to provide truthful information for Form 4473, the information transmitted by the buyer to the recorder was considered by the Court to be transmitted pursuant to a duty that guaranteed a reliable transmission of information). Compare United States v. Patrick, 959 F.2d 991 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (reversing a conviction in which the government offered a sales receipt to prove the defendant's address; the receipt was prepared by the merchant, and the government made no showing that the merchant had personal knowledge of the defendant's address, or that the merchant had verified the address in any way). See also United States v. Vigneau,187 F.3d 70 (1st Cir. 1999) (expressing doubt about verification as a means of solving the double hearsay problem).

(n75)Footnote 75. See, e.g., United States v. McIntyre, 997 F.2d 687 (10th Cir. 1993) (Western Union money orders were properly admitted to prove the name of the person receiving them, because verification was required, but they were erroneously admitted to prove the names of the senders, where verification was not required; motel records from two different motels were offered to show that the registrant stayed in the respective motel; one record was improperly admitted where there was no testimony that the name on the register was verified for accuracy, and there was no guarantee of trustworthiness in the giving of the name; the other record was properly admitted where there was testimony of verification). See also United States v. Mitchell, 49 F.3d 769 (D.C. Cir. 1995) (the government was allowed to introduce Western Union money transfer records to prove cash flow among the conspirators; a Western Union employee testified that a sender's identity is not verified, but that in order to receive the money a person must either show identification or answer a test question prepared by the sender; the District Court had found that both the identification process and the test question process constituted adequate verification by Western Union of the recipient's identity; the Court of Appeals was, however, "more dubious than the district court that the test question procedure adequately verifies the actual identity of the recipient"; the fact that a recipient answered a question posed by the sender indicates only that he "is the sender's intended recipient, not that he actually bears the name presented"; but any error was harmless, because 80 of the 84 recipients in the records admitted were verified by identification rather than by answering a test question).

(n76)Footnote 76. See, e.g., Sana v. Hawaiian Cruises, Ltd., 181 F.3d 1041 (9th Cir. 1999) (memorandum contained several levels of hearsay; to be admissible, "each level of hearsay must satisfy an exception to the hearsay rule"; in this case, each level was satisfied; some statements to the recorder were admissible under Rule 803(3) and some were admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(D)); Bondie v. Bic Corp., 947 F.2d 1531 (6th Cir. 1991) (medical report was admissible because it was made and kept in the ordinary course of business and the included statement of the mother of the patient was a party admission; Rule 803(6) does not require that the underlying declarant have a business duty to supply the information recorded, so long as that declarant's statements come within a hearsay exception or exemption and recording such statements is part of the regularly conducted activity).

(n77)Footnote 77. See also Hoselton v. Metz Baking Co., 48 F.3d 1056 (8th Cir. 1995) (an accountant's notes containing statements made by others during a negotiation session were admissible as business records; as to the statements included in the notes, the Federal Rules "do not require each level of hearsay to meet the requirements of the same exception"; the statements in the accountant's record were not hearsay because they were not offered to prove the truth of the matters asserted; rather, they were offered to show that the plaintiffs were on notice of certain expectations that the defendants had in negotiations).

(n78)Footnote 78. See, e.g., United States v. Lauersen, 343 F.3d 604 (2d Cir. 2003) (doctor was a qualified witness to establish the admissibility requirements for medical records; the doctor designed the procedures for maintaining the records and observed them being implemented); United States v. Box, 50 F.3d 345 (5th Cir. 1995) (records of arrests prepared by the County Attorney's office were properly authenticated by a County Attorney; even though the authenticating witness had not worked at the office during the time the particular records were prepared, he was able to explain the system of record-keeping, he could recognize the records as those of the office, and he testified to the other requirements of the business records exception; the witness "need not have personal knowledge of the record keeping practice of the circumstances under which the objected to records were kept"); United States v. Childs, 5 F.3d 1328 (9th Cir. 1993) ("The phrase 'other qualified witness' is broadly interpreted to require only that the witness understand the recordkeeping system."); United States v. Jakobetz, 955 F.2d 786 (2d Cir. 1992) (toll receipts incorporated into corporate expense records could be authenticated by a custodian of the corporation that prepared the expense records: "Even if the document is originally created by another entity, its creator need not testify when the document has been incorporated into the business records of the testifying entity"; here the custodian testified that toll receipts were regularly submitted in expense reports and regularly incorporated into the business records of the corporation for general accounting purposes; the custodian was a qualified witness within the meaning of the Rule).

For cases in which a foundation witness was found unqualified under the Rule, see, e.g., United States v. Riley, 236 F.3d 982 (8th Cir. 2001) (lab reports erroneously admitted; foundation witness could identify the reports but had no knowledge of how they were prepared or maintained and thus could not testify that the reports had been kept in the ordinary course of regularly conducted activity); Collins v. Kibort, 143 F.3d 331 (7th Cir. 1998) (hospital records erroneously admitted; the Rule does not require a foundation witness to have prepared the record or to have personal knowledge of the entries in the record; however, in this case the witness did not have knowledge of the hospital's regular business practices in making and keeping the record); Belber v. Lipson, 905 F.2d 549 (1st Cir. 1990) (one doctor is not a qualified witness with respect to the records of another doctor, where he merely received the records from an attorney who knew nothing about the other doctor's recordkeeping process).

(n79)Footnote 79. See, e.g., United States v. Franco, 874 F.2d 1136 (7th Cir. 1989) :

> A qualified witness is not required, however, to have personally participated in or observed the creation of the document ... or know who actually recorded the information ... . We broadly interpret the term "qualified witness" as requiring only someone with knowledge of the procedure governing the creation and maintenance of the type of records sought to be admitted.

See also Dyno Constr. Co. v. McWane, Inc., 198 F.3d 567 (6th Cir. 1999) (person laying the foundation need not have personal knowledge concerning the preparation of the records: "All that is required of the witness is that he or she be familiar with the recordkeeping procedures of the organization.").

(n80)Footnote 80. See, e.g., United States v. Franco, 874 F.2d 1136 (7th Cir. 1989) (a witness was held qualified where he learned about recordkeeping through conversations with others familiar with the process: "The court relied on hearsay to determine whether Agent Garza understood the accounting system ... but that is clearly permissible under the Federal Rules of Evidence").

(n81)Footnote 81. See, e.g., United States v. Franco, 874 F.2d 1136 (7th Cir. 1989) ("The records themselves confirm that contemporaneous entries were made with each transaction because the records ... showed neatly written daily entries and notations."); United States v. Draiman, 784 F.2d 248 (7th Cir. 1986) (entries in the document itself may help to establish foundation).

(n82)Footnote 82. See, e.g., United States v. Hathaway, 798 F.2d 902 (6th Cir. 1986) (FBI agent could provide foundation testimony on the admission of company records).

(n83)Footnote 83. See, e.g., Wilander v. McDermott Int'l, Inc., 887 F.2d 88 (5th Cir. 1989) (statement concerning an accident, taken on an ad hoc basis by a barge captain, was not recorded in the ordinary course of regularly conducted activity; it was not the regular practice of the barge captain to make such a report).

(n84)Footnote 84. See, e.g., Waddell v. Commissioner, 841 F.2d 264 (9th Cir. 1988) (an appraisal report was inadmissible where no showing was made that it was the regular practice of the preparer to prepare such a report).

(n85)Footnote 85. See, e.g., Kassel v. Gannett Co., 875 F.2d 935 (1st Cir. 1989) (contact reports of complaints are admissible even though a report is not filled out every time a complaint is made).

(n86)Footnote 86. See, e.g., Pierce v. Atchison T. & S.F. Ry., 110 F.3d 431 (7th Cir. 1997) (memorandum recording an "unusual" incident "was not created with the kind of regularity or routine which gives business records their inherent reliability"); United States v. Strother, 49 F.3d 869 (2d Cir. 1995) (a bank memorandum indicating that an overdrawn check for $82,000 was covered by the bank was held inadmissible as a business record; this type of event was not one which routinely recurred; the Court stated that it was "reluctant to adopt a rule that would permit the introduction into evidence of memoranda drafted in response to unusual or isolated events").

(n87)Footnote 87. See, e.g., United States v. Briscoe, 896 F.2d 1476 (7th Cir. 1990) (foundation requirements for computerized records are the same as those for other records; proponent is not required to show that computers are tested for internal programming errors); United States v. Sanders, 749 F.2d 195 (5th Cir. 1984) (foundation requirements for computerized records are no different from requirements for other business records); United States v. Young Bros., 728 F.2d 682 (5th Cir. 1984) (accuracy of software need not be specifically established); United States v. Catabran, 836 F.2d 453 (9th Cir. 1988) (presence of inaccuracies in computer records, as in other records, is a question of weight).

(n88)Footnote 88. See Peritz, Computer Data and Reliability: A Call for Authentication of Business Records Under the Federal Rules of Evidence, 80 NW. U. L. Rev. 956 (1986) (critical of the fact that "federal judges substantially agree that computer output should be qualified like any other business record," and expressing concern that "computer systems store, retrieve, and manipulate information in ways significantly different from earlier manual or mechanical systems").

(n89)Footnote 89. See, e.g., United States v. Briscoe, 896 F.2d 1476 (7th Cir. 1990) :

> We note that the fact that the actual computer printouts presented at trial were prepared specifically for this case ... does not preclude their admission under Rule 803(6). It is sufficient that the data compiled in the printouts was entered into the computer contemporaneous with the placing of each call and maintained in the regular course of business.

See also United States v. Hernandez, 913 F.2d 1506 (10th Cir. 1990) (so long as the original computer data compilation was prepared pursuant to a business duty in accordance with regular business practice, the fact that the hard copy offered as evidence was printed for purposes of litigation does not affect its admissibility).

(n90)Footnote 90. See, e.g., United States v. Jackson, 208 F.3d 633 (7th Cir. 2000) ("The fact that the Internet service providers may be able to retrieve information that its customers posted or email that its customers sent does not turn that material into a business record of the Internet service provider.").

(n91)Footnote 91. This is the teaching of the famous case of Palmer v. Hoffman, 318 U.S. 109 (1943) , where the Supreme Court held that records prepared by a railroad after an accident occurred were inadmissible because they were made in anticipation of litigation, and were favorable to the railroad. See also Certain Underwriters at Lloyd's, London v. Sinkovich, 232 F.3d 200 (4th Cir. 2000) (report not admissible under Rule 803(6) where "the primary motive for initially preparing the report was to prepare for litigation"); Scheerer v. Hardee's Food Sys., Inc., 92 F.3d 702 (8th Cir. 1996) (in a slip and fall suit, the Trial Judge erred in admitting an "incident report" by a restaurant employee who described the surface of the parking lot where the fall occurred as dry; the record "had been prepared in anticipation of litigation" and "it was not made in the ordinary course of business but instead with the knowledge that the incident could result in litigation"); Weaver v. Phoenix Home Life Mut. Ins. Co., 990 F.2d 154 (4th Cir. 1993) (an affidavit prepared for litigation purposes, describing opinions of doctors, is not admissible under Rule 803(6) because an "affidavit prepared for trial is not a record of regularly conducted activity").

(n92)Footnote 92. See, e.g., Lust v. Sealy, Inc., 383 F.3d 580 (7th Cir. 2004) (manager's memos explaining why he hadn't promoted the plaintiff were not admissible under Rule 803(6); the only purpose of the memos was to create evidence for use in the employee's anticipated discrimination suit); Timberlake Constr. Co. v. United States Fid. & Guar., 71 F.3d 335 (10th Cir. 1995) (Trial Judge erred in admitting letters written by the plaintiff's president and the company's lawyer, which had "all the earmarks of being motivated and generated to further Timberlake's interest, with litigation actually not far around the corner"); Broadcast Music, Inc. v. Xanthas, Inc., 855 F.2d 233 (5th Cir. 1988) (letters from proprietors of establishments where jukeboxes were located were not admissible as business records in a copyright infringement action: "the forms were not completed by the proprietors as part of the systematic course of their business; their primary utility, rather, is for litigation").

(n93)Footnote 93. See, e.g., Yates v. Bair Transp., Inc., 249 F. Supp. 681 (S.D.N.Y. 1965) (reports of doctors retained by the defendant in a personal injury litigation were admissible where they were favorable to the plaintiff).

(n94)Footnote 94. See, e.g., United States v. Blackburn, 992 F.2d 666 (7th Cir. 1993) (even though a report is trustworthy, it may not be admitted under Rule 803(6) where it was prepared in anticipation of litigation rather than in the ordinary course of business; however, the report was admissible under the residual exception).

(n95)Footnote 95. See, e.g., United States v. Pelullo, 964 F.2d 193 (3d Cir. 1992) (wire transfer documents prepared by various banks were held not admissible under Rule 803(6) because no qualified witness ever laid a foundation for their admission; the government argued that the records should be admissible because they were trustworthy; but Rule 803(6) does not permit admission of a record simply because it is trustworthy; the evidence offered for foundation must show that the records were made in the regular course of business, were regularly kept, and were made at or near the time of the event recorded); United States v. Freidin, 849 F.2d 716 (2d Cir. 1988) (an isolated document was inadmissible under Rule 803(6) even though there was no reason to think that the document was untrustworthy; trustworthiness is not the only precondition to admissibility).

(n96)Footnote 96. See, e.g., United States v. Moore, 923 F.2d 910 (1st Cir. 1991) (ordinary business circumstances described by Rule 803(6) "suggest trustworthiness, at least where absolutely nothing in the record implies the lack thereof. If counsel had some special reason for thinking the information untrustworthy, he failed to call it to the court's attention.").

(n97)Footnote 97. See, e.g., United States v. LeRoy, 944 F.2d 787 (10th Cir. 1991) (an opinion in an otherwise admissible record should not have been admitted where it did not satisfy the standards of Rule 701); United States v. Anthony, 944 F.2d 780 (1st Cir. 1991) :

> If the author of the notation had been present at trial, he would not have been allowed to give his opinion until it had first been shown that such opinion was rationally based on his perception. Such being the case, it would have been a bit incongruous to admit the notation, with no basis therefor, when the author was not present at trial.

(n98)Footnote 98. See, e.g., United States v. Hardin, 710 F.2d 1231 (7th Cir. 1983) (DEA statistical report showing the average retail price and purity of cocaine purchased by DEA undercover agents, offered to show the defendant's intent to distribute the large amount of cocaine he was arrested with, was admissible under Rule 803(8)(A); the report set forth an activity of the DEA and was prepared for congressional review).

(n99)Footnote 99. As discussed in § 803.02[9][c], [d], the exclusionary language in Rule 803(8)(B) and (C) has not been applied as strictly as it actually reads.

(n100)Footnote 100. See, e.g., United States v. Versaint, 849 F.2d 827 (3d Cir. 1988) (a public record prepared one month after the event described in the report was admissible, so long as no affirmative showing was made that the report was untrustworthy; Rule 803(8) does not require that a report be made at or near the time of the event it is describing).

(n101)Footnote 101. See, e.g., United States v. Loyola-Dominguez, 125 F.3d 1315 (9th Cir. 1997) (Rule 803(8) does not require a foundation by a qualified witness).

(n102)Footnote 102. See, e.g., Nachtsheim v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 847 F.2d 1261 (7th Cir. 1988) (the trustworthiness criterion was applied to exclude a report offered under subdivision (B)).

(n103)Footnote 103. See, e.g., Ellis v. International Playtex, Inc., 745 F.2d 292, 301 (4th Cir. 1984) :

> Placing the burden on the opposing party makes considerable practical sense. Most government-sponsored investigations employ well-accepted methodological means of gathering and analyzing data. It is unfair to put the party seeking admission to the test of "re-inventing the wheel" each time a report is offered ... . [I]t is far more equitable to place that burden on the party seeking to demonstrate why a time tested and carefully considered presumption is not appropriate.

See also Boerner v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Co, 394 F.3d 594 (8th Cir. 2005) (reports on smoking by the Surgeon General were properly admitted under Rule 803(8); the reports were prepared pursuant to a legal obligation, and the defendants made no affirmative showing that they were untrustworthy); Ariza v. City of New York, 139 F.3d 132 (2d Cir. 1998) (the party opposing the admission of a report under Rule 803(8) has the burden of showing untrustworthiness).

(n104)Footnote 104. See, e.g., United States v. Versaint, 849 F.2d 827 (3d Cir. 1988) (a public report was properly admitted where the government made no showing that the preparer of the report had any reason not to be accurate in setting out what he knew; the mere fact that the recording occurred a month after the investigation does not overcome the presumption of trustworthiness); Johnson v. City of Pleasanton, 982 F.2d 350 (9th Cir. 1992) (the Trial Court excluded a public report offered by the City on the ground that the City had not come forward with supporting affidavits detailing the expertise of the officials who prepared the report; this was error, because public reports are presumed trustworthy, and "a party opposing the introduction of a public record bears the burden of coming forward with enough negative factors to persuade a court that a report should not be admitted"; because the plaintiffs offered no evidence to indicate that the report was unreliable, the City was under no obligation to establish the expertise of the reporting officers).

(n105)Footnote 105. United States v. Sharpe, 193 F.3d 852 (5th Cir. 1999) .

(n106)Footnote 106. See, e.g., United States v. Bishop, 264 F.3d 535 (5th Cir. 2001) (in an income tax evasion case, the Trial Court erred in admitting IRS agents' notes describing meetings they had with the defendant; such notes are inadmissible under Rule 803(8) as they are generated under adversarial circumstances against a particular criminal defendant); United States v. Enterline, 894 F.2d 287 (8th Cir. 1990) ("It is clear that the exclusion concerns matters observed by the police at the scene of the crime. Such observations are potentially unreliable since they are made in an adversary setting, and are often subjective evaluations of whether a crime was committed.").

(n107)Footnote 107. See, e.g., United States v. Enterline, 894 F.2d 287 (8th Cir. 1990) : Computerized lists prepared by police of vehicles reported stolen were admissible despite the exclusionary language in Rule 803(8)(B) and (C):

> The computer report does not contain contemporaneous observations by police officers at the scene of a crime, and thus presents none of the dangers of unreliability that such a report presents. Rather, the report is based on facts: that cars with certain vehicle numbers were reported to have been stolen. Neither the notation of the vehicle identification numbers themselves nor their entry into a computer presents an adversarial setting or an opportunity for subjective observations by law enforcement officers.

See also United States v. DeWater, 846 F.2d 528, 530 (9th Cir. 1988) (a breathalyzer report was properly admitted under Rule 803(8)(B) because "the preparation of this report is a routine, non- adversarial act made in a non-adversarial setting ... . [N]othing in the record reveals a motivation to misrepresent the test results or records."); United States v. Dancy, 861 F.2d 77 (5th Cir. 1988) (a fingerprint card in a penitentiary packet, offered to show that the defendant was a convicted felon, was properly admitted under Rule 803(8)(B) because the preparation of the card was unrelated to a criminal investigation; the Rule excludes only records that report the observation or investigation of crimes).

(n108)Footnote 108. United States v. Grady, 544 F.2d 598 (2d Cir. 1976) (admitting reports recording firearms serial numbers on the ground that they were records of routine factual matters prepared in a nonadversarial setting).

(n109)Footnote 109. See, e.g., United States v. Pena-Gutierrez, 222 F.3d 1080 (9th Cir. 2000) (Trial Court erred in admitting into evidence "the on-the-scene investigative report of a crime by an INS official whose perceptions might be clouded and untrustworthy"); United States v. Bohrer, 807 F.2d 159 (10th Cir. 1986) (an IRS contact card was excluded under Rule 803(8) because it was prepared under adversarial circumstances and because information included therein was subjective rather than ministerial in nature, thus subject to manipulation).

(n110)Footnote 110. See, e.g., United States v. Hayes, 861 F.2d 1225 (10th Cir. 1988) (where the authoring officer testifies, the report is admissible against a criminal defendant because the in-court testimony protects against the loss of confrontation rights, which is the underlying rationale for the exclusionary language in Rule 803(8)); United States v. King, 613 F.2d 670 (7th Cir. 1980) (same).

(n111)Footnote 111. See, e.g., United States v. Rosa, 11 F.3d 315 (2d Cir. 1993) , holding that a medical examiner's autopsy report was properly admitted under Rule 803(8)(B). The Court reasoned that a medical examiner is not "law enforcement personnel" as that term is used under the Rule:

> Unlike Customs, which has responsibility for enforcement of, inter alia, customs and narcotics laws, the Medical Examiner's Office is required simply to investigate unnatural deaths; it refers a death bearing any indicium of criminality to the appropriate district attorney and has no responsibility for enforcing any laws ... . Further, though law enforcement activities are typically accusatory and adversarial in nature, a medical examiner's reported observations as to a body's condition are normally made as part of an independent effort to determine a cause of death.

(n112)Footnote 112. See, e.g., United States v. Bohrer, 807 F.2d 159 (10th Cir. 1986) (an IRS contact card, excluded under Rule 803(8) because prepared under adversarial circumstances, was also excluded under Rule 803(6) because adversarial circumstances of preparation show lack of trustworthiness).

(n113)Footnote 113. See, e.g., United States v. Brown, 9 F.3d 907 (11th Cir. 1993) (property receipt properly held admissible under Rule 803(6); while Rule 803(6) cannot be used to evade the exclusionary language of Rule 803(8), a property receipt is not the type of law enforcement report that is excluded under Rule 803(8): "The police custodian in the instant case had no incentive to do anything other than mechanically record the relevant information on the property receipt. We believe that this is the type of reliable public record envisioned by the drafters of Rule 803(8).").

(n114)Footnote 114. See, e.g., Ariza v. City of New York, 139 F.3d 132 (2d Cir. 1998) (holding that a public report was properly excluded; the report was the product of a research project in which three groups of 12 to 15 police officers each convened to participate in guided group discussions; the report summarized the discussions and made generalized recommendations regarding future departmental behavior; the report did not and was not intended to set forth factual findings based on a factual investigation; its stated purpose was to identify and explore some of the prevailing attitudes, perceptions and opinions of police officers).

(n115)Footnote 115. See, e.g., In re Aircrash in Bali, 871 F.2d 812 (9th Cir. 1989) (FAA report on a crash was not inadmissible under Rule 803(8)(C) simply because it included evaluative or normative findings, citing Rainey).

(n116)Footnote 116. See, e.g., Hines v. Brandon Steel Decks, Inc., 886 F.2d 299 (11th Cir. 1989) (opinions in an OSHA investigator's report concerning a construction site accident could not be automatically excluded; however, opinions still must be trustworthy, and the Trial Court can take into account the expertise of the reporting official, whether a hearing was held, whether the conclusion was a legal conclusion, and other pertinent factors to determine whether the opinion is trustworthy).

(n117)Footnote 117. See, e.g., Jenkins v. Whittaker Corp., 785 F.2d 720 (9th Cir. 1986) (conclusions in a report respecting the cause and responsibility for explosion of an atomic simulator were properly excluded where the person who made the report had no competence or experience with atomic simulators and did very little investigation); Matthews v. Ashland Chem., Inc., 770 F.2d 1303 (5th Cir. 1985) (conclusions in a report respecting the cause of a fire were properly excluded due to insufficient investigation and the public official's lack of qualifications). Compare Simmons v. Chicago & N.W. Transp. Co., 993 F.2d 1326 (8th Cir. 1993) (state trooper's accident investigation report was admissible in a FELA action, because the trooper was experienced and skilled, and the report was prepared after an investigation shortly after the accident so the underlying information was fresh).

(n118)Footnote 118. See, e.g., Hines v. Brandon Steel Decks, Inc., 886 F.2d 299 (11th Cir. 1989) :

> Rule 803(8)(C) does not provide for the admissibility of the legal conclusions contained within an otherwise admissible public report ... . Legal conclusions are inadmissible because the jury would have no way of knowing whether the preparer of the report was cognizant of the requirements underlying the legal conclusion and, if not, whether the preparer might have a higher or lower standard than the law requires.

(n119)Footnote 119. See, e.g., Smith v. Isuzu Motors, Ltd., 137 F.3d 859 (5th Cir. 1998) (staff report not admissible under Rule 803(8)(B) because the agency declined to accept the position set forth in the staff report; the Court notes that its conclusion was "in accord with other circuits that have held that interim agency reports or preliminary memoranda do not satisfy Rule 803(8)(C)'s requirements"); Smith v. M.I.T., 877 F.2d 1106 (1st Cir. 1989) (internal memoranda of EEOC investigators are not factual findings within the meaning of the rule); Brown v. Sierra Nev. Mem. Miners Hosp., 849 F.2d 1186 (9th Cir. 1988) (preliminary staff reports, and interim reports by outside consultants, are not reports containing factual findings, because they are not final determinations, and Rule 803(8)(C) covers only final reports); United States v. Gray, 852 F.2d 136 (4th Cir. 1988) (tentative internal IRS report, which did not purport to contain agency factual findings, was not admissible under Rule 803(8)(C)); City of New York v. Pullman Inc., 662 F.2d 910 (2d Cir. 1981) (where a report "did not embody the findings of an agency, but the tentative results of an incomplete staff investigation," it was not admissible under Rule 803(8)(C)). Compare Vining v. Enterprise Fin. Group, Inc., 148 F.3d 1206 (10th Cir. 1998) (report prepared by staff of the state insurance department concerning the defendant's business practices was properly admitted under Rule 803(8)(C); the report was sufficiently final because it was attached to and incorporated by reference into an order subsequently issued by the Insurance Commissioner, who was head of the agency).

(n120)Footnote 120. See, e.g., Nachtsheim v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 847 F.2d 1261 (7th Cir. 1988) (FAA release concerning ice buildup on certain planes was not admissible where release had been canceled ten years earlier); Haynes v. American Motors Corp., 691 F.2d 1268, 1273 (8th Cir. 1982) (Trial Court did not err in refusing to admit a federal standard relating to requirements for utility vehicles, where that standard was rescinded before the date of the accident).

(n121)Footnote 121. See, e.g., New Jersey Turnpike Auth. v. PPG Indus., 197 F.3d 96 (3d Cir. 1999) (directives issued by the State Department of Environmental Protection, notifying the defendant that it was responsible for hazardous substances that needed to be removed, were not admissible under Rule 803(8)(C); the Directives were in the nature of notice pleading, and thus were prepared in anticipation of litigation); Pearce v. E.F. Hutton Group, Inc., 653 F. Supp. 810 (D.D.C. 1987) (the plaintiff in a libel suit could not rely on a draft report of a congressional subcommittee in opposing a summary judgment motion; the Court commented that it was dealing "with documents produced by the Congress -- a politically motivated, partisan body"; the report was not based upon an adjudicatory proceeding and was not drafted to resolve a factual dispute; the report lacked trustworthiness because of the political nature of the investigating body; and the report would be excluded under Rule 403 even if it satisfied the hearsay exception). Compare Kehm v. Procter & Gamble Mfg. Co., 724 F.2d 613 (8th Cir. 1983) (no error to admit reports of epidemiological studies conducted by the Centers for Disease Control and various state agencies that analyzed the statistical relationship between tampon use and Toxic Shock Syndrome; the Court relied upon "the timeliness of the investigations, the special skills of the agencies conducting them, and their lack of any motive for conducting the studies other than to inform the public fairly and adequately.").

(n122)Footnote 122. See, e.g., Hines v. Brandon Steel Decks, Inc., 886 F.2d 299 (11th Cir. 1989) (on remand, the District Court "might consider how the fact that no hearing was held in making the report affects its trustworthiness"); Denny v. Hutchinson Sales Corp., 649 F.2d 816 (10th Cir. 1981) (Civil Rights Commission's findings on discrimination were properly excluded where the ex parte investigation lacked formal procedures such as the opportunity to cross-examine witnesses).

(n123)Footnote 123. See, e.g., Anderson v. City of New York, 657 F. Supp. 1571 (S.D.N.Y. 1987) (report by a Subcommittee of the House of Representatives that summarized testimony concerning police misconduct in New York City was inadmissible; only one side's evidence was heard, the Subcommittee lacked personal knowledge of the events that were the subject of testimony, and the witnesses were self-interested; the Court observed that "hearings and subsequent reports are frequently marred by political expediency and grandstanding").

(n124)Footnote 124. See, e.g., O'Dell v. Hercules, Inc., 904 F.2d 1194 (8th Cir. 1990) (EPA investigative report on a chemical manufacturing plant, implicating the defendant, was held inadmissible because the investigation was not conducted until ten years after the defendant had terminated its operations at the plant, and others had operated the plant in the interim).

(n125)Footnote 125. See, e.g., Travelers Ins. Co. v. Riggs, 671 F.2d 810 (4th Cir. 1982) (conclusions in a National Transportation Safety Board report could not be admitted because 49 U.S.C. § 1441(e) explicitly prohibits the use of conclusions in such a report in an action for damages).

(n126)Footnote 126. See, e.g., United States v. Pena-Gutierrez, 222 F.3d 1080 (9th Cir. 2000) (INS investigative report containing statement of a deported witness was erroneously admitted under Rule 803(8): "Even if we were to find the report itself admissible, the statement of the deported witness it contained was inadmissible hearsay.").

(n127)Footnote 127. See also FDIC v. Mmahat, 907 F.2d 546 (5th Cir. 1990) (in an action against an attorney for an insolvent savings and loan association, the Court held that regulatory agency examination reports admissible under Rule 803(8) satisfied Rule 805 as to included hearsay because the statements were party-admissions made by a person who, at the time they were introduced, was a defendant in the action). Compare Miller v. Field, 35 F.3d 1088 (6th Cir. 1994) (in a suit by a prison inmate claiming that official indifference led to his being raped, state police reports concerning the investigation of the alleged rape were improperly admitted; the statements in the report by alleged assailants and the local prosecutor were not admissible, because they were hearsay contained within a public record).

(n128)Footnote 128. Compare Nachtsheim v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 847 F.2d 1261 (7th Cir. 1988) (while the public official personal knowledge requirement must be interpreted flexibly, the report of an aircraft incident was properly excluded where the author of the statement incorporated into the report was unknown); United States v. Lanese, 890 F.2d 1284 (2d Cir. 1989) (an exculpatory statement by a biased declarant, recorded in a police report, was held not admissible under Rule 803(8) because the source of the underlying information indicated lack of trustworthiness).

(n129)Footnote 129. See also In re Air Disaster at Lockerbie Scotland on Dec. 21, 1988, 37 F.3d 804 (2d Cir. 1994) (Scottish investigator's report on an airplane bombing, which concluded that the bomb had been placed in an unaccompanied bag, was properly admitted under Rule 803(8)(C); the report was prepared largely by compiling computerized records of passenger baggage, which records were amassed from reports of passengers' and crew members' friends and relatives; while some of this underlying information was hearsay, the defendant could not prove that the report was prepared under untrustworthy circumstances; it was not necessary, under the Rule, for the Trial Court to make an explicit finding that the report was trustworthy).

(n130)Footnote 130. See, e.g., Herrick v. Garvey, 298 F.3d 1184 (10th Cir. 2002) (judicial findings of fact in an unrelated case cannot be admitted under Rule 803(8)); Nipper v. Snipes, 7 F.3d 415 (4th Cir. 1993) (judicial findings of fact are not admissible under Rule 803(8)(C); that Rule applies to factual findings resulting from an investigation: "A judge in a civil trial is not an investigator, rather a judge. In fact, a review of the advisory committee note to Rule 803 makes it plain that the drafters intended this portion of the rule to relate to findings of agencies and offices of the executive branch.").

(n131)Footnote 131. See, e.g., Vaughn v. United States, 536 F. Supp. 498 (W.D. Va. 1982) (a death certificate was properly admitted to show the time of death); Burton v. Johns-Manville, 613 F. Supp. 91 (W.D. Pa. 1985) (a death certificate was properly admissible to show the cause of death).

(n132)Footnote 132. The merits of the broader view of the exception are discussed in Martin, Records of Vital Statistics, N.Y. L.J., April 14, 1989, p. 3.

(n133)Footnote 133. See, e.g., United States v. Combs, 762 F.2d 1343 (9th Cir. 1985) (in a prosecution for possession of an unregistered firearm, absence of registration is an element of the crime and is proven by a report indicating the absence of registration under Rule 803(10)).

(n134)Footnote 134. See, e.g., United States v. Yakobov, 712 F.2d 20, 24 (2d Cir. 1983) (where the defendant's name was misspelled in the certificate, the certificate on its face shows that the search of the records was casual and unlikely to uncover the relevant record, and the affidavit was therefore inadmissible).

(n135)Footnote 135. See, e.g., United States v. Yakobov, 712 F.2d 20, 24 (2d Cir. 1983) (the diligent search requirement was not met merely because the certificate stated in a conclusory fashion that a "diligent search" was conducted: "The diligence requirement is one of substance, not form.").

(n136)Footnote 136. See, e.g., United States v. Wilson, 732 F.2d 404, 414 (5th Cir. 1984) (although preferable, the affidavit by the public official need not contain the specific statement that a "diligent search failed to disclose the record": "It suffices that the affidavit, and all relevant circumstances, reflect an adequate search.").

(n137)Footnote 137. See, e.g., Hall v. Commissioner, 729 F.2d 632 (9th Cir. 1984) (the Trial Court properly rejected proffered church records, because they were not shown to be business records, and statements of contributions to a church did not qualify as religious records under Rule 803(11)).

(n138)Footnote 138. See, e.g., George v. Celotex Corp., 914 F.2d 26 (2d Cir. 1990) (if a document is authenticated as an ancient document, lack of trustworthiness is a matter of weight, not admissibility, since there is no independent trustworthiness requirement in Rule 803(16)).

(n139)Footnote 139. See, e.g., Ammons v. Dade City, 594 F. Supp. 1274 (M.D. Fla. 1984) (the Court received newspaper articles that were more than 20 years old for their truth, but held that more recent newspaper accounts could not be admitted for their truth), aff'd, 783 F.2d 982 (11th Cir. 1986) .

(n140)Footnote 140. See, e.g., Compton v. Davis Oil Co., 607 F. Supp. 1221 (D. Wyo. 1985) (statements in ancient documents are admissible due to the necessity arising from the disappearance of other evidence and a combination of two trustworthiness factors: that recitations in documents remove risks of mistransmission of information associated with oral statements, and that the time gap between subsequent litigation and the statements lessens the likelihood of conscious or unconscious falsehood).

(n141)Footnote 141. See, e.g., United States v. Cassiere, 4 F.3d 1006 (1st Cir. 1993) (a listing of land sales that was used by real estate brokers, insurance agents, and appraisers, was properly admitted under Rule 803(17)).

(n142)Footnote 142. See, e.g., Crane v. Crest Tankers, Inc., 47 F.3d 292 (8th Cir. 1995) (the Trial Judge erred in admitting into evidence a "Future Damage Calculator," which was "a slide rule-type device which has life expectancy and work life expectancy tables on one side, and a 'present value' table on the other"; there was no showing that "the exhibit is generally used or relied upon by the public or persons in the legal or other professions"); White Indus. v. Cessna Aircraft Co., 611 F. Supp. 1049 (W.D. Mo. 1985) (various forms and a prospectus filed by a company with the SEC were not market reports under the Rule, since they were not used by others).

(n143)Footnote 143. Advisory Committee Note to Rule 803(18).

(n144)Footnote 144. See, e.g., Ellis v. International Playtex, Inc., 745 F.2d 292 (4th Cir. 1984) (Trial Court properly held that an expert for the plaintiff could not read during direct examination from an article published in a medical journal; the article referred to a procedure that was not employed in the case, and might have dealt with a product different from that involved in the case; thus, the Trial Court properly concluded that it might invite jury speculation and cause confusion).

(n145)Footnote 145. See, e.g., Meschino v. North Am. Drager, Inc., 841 F.2d 429, 434 (1st Cir. 1988) ("In these days of quantified research, and pressure to publish, an article does not reach the dignity of a 'reliable authority' merely because some editor, even a most reputable one, sees fit to circulate it.").

(n146)Footnote 146. See, e.g., Dawsey v. Olin Corp., 782 F.2d 1254 (5th Cir. 1986) (National Institute of Occupational Health and Safety manual was not admissible when there was no testimony that the manual was a reliable authority).

(n147)Footnote 147. See, e.g., Dartez v. Fibreboard Corp., 765 F.2d 456 (5th Cir. 1985) (the Court held that various articles were improperly admitted under Rule 803(18); the articles were not used in connection with the plaintiff's expert testimony and therefore were hearsay).

(n148)Footnote 148. See, e.g., Graham v. Wyeth Labs., 906 F.2d 1399 (10th Cir. 1990) (AMA special report was sufficiently authoritative to qualify for admissibility under Rule 803(18), but the Trial Court erred in submitting the report to the jury).

(n149)Footnote 149. See Daniel Capra, Case Law Divergence from the Federal Rules of Evidence, 197 F.R.D. 531 (2001) , for a discussion of case law that rejects the plain text of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

(n150)Footnote 150. See, e.g., United States v. Jean-Baptiste, 166 F.3d 102 (2d Cir. 1999) (Rule 803(19) "plainly contemplates that members of a family may testify with regard to the common understanding as to the firth of another family member.").

(n151)Footnote 151. Johnson v. State, 737 S.W.2d 901, 905 (Tex. App. 1987), aff'd in part and vacated on other grounds in part, 784 S.W.2d 47 (Tex. Crim. App. 1990) (en banc) (construing state counterpart to Federal Rule 803(19)),.

(n152)Footnote 152. See, e.g., Ute Indian Tribe v. State of Utah, 521 F. Supp. 1072 (D. Utah 1981) (reputation in a non-Indian community as to Indian boundaries is not admissible under Rule 803(20), because the subject matter is not of sufficient interest to the community), aff'd in part, rev'd on other grounds in part, 716 F.2d 1298 (10th Cir. 1983) .

(n153)Footnote 153. Rule 803(22) covers only convictions, not acquittals. In United States v. Kerley, 643 F.2d 299 (5th Cir. 1981) , the Court concluded that a prior acquittal on a state charge was inadmissible because "it does not prove innocence but rather merely indicates that the prior prosecution failed to meet its burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt at least one element of the crime." Also, said the Court, if the evidence were relevant, it would still be excluded under Rule 403 where the elements of state and federal offenses were different. See also United States v. Irvin, 787 F.2d 1506 (11th Cir. 1986) (Trial Judge properly barred the defense from mentioning the defendant's acquittal and those of his three alleged coconspirators in a prior trial; the judgments of acquittal were inadmissible hearsay).

(n154)Footnote 154. See, e.g., Columbia Plaza Corp. v. Security Nat'l Bank, 676 F.2d 780 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (in a claim by a corporation and its wholly owned subsidiary that the defendants exhausted the proceeds of a construction loan before an office building was completed, exclusion of judgments in two criminal cases involving two of the defendants was proper; the Court found that because general verdicts were rendered in the criminal cases, it was impossible to tell which overt acts the juries found had been committed).

(n155)Footnote 155. See, e.g., United States v. Loera, 923 F.2d 725 (9th Cir. 1991) (while docket entries of misdemeanor convictions are not admissible under Rule 803(22), they are admissible under Rule 803(8), because they are reliable, routine, and nonadversarial reports of a public official).

(n156)Footnote 156. United States v. Gricco, 277 F.3d 339 (3d Cir. 2002) .

(n157)Footnote 157. See, e.g., Horton v. Allen, 370 F.3d 75 (1st Cir. 2004) (non-testimonial hearsay should be evaluated under the Ohio v. Roberts test to determine whether it violates the defendant's right to confrontation); United States v. Holmes, 406 F.3d 337 (5th Cir. 2005) (with respect to nontestimonial hearsay statements, "Crawford leaves in place the Roberts approach to determining admissibility."); United States v. Franklin, 415 F.3d 537 (6th Cir. 2005) ("the Supreme Court did not explicitly overrule its prior Confrontation Clause jurisprudence with its holding in Crawford" insofar as it applied to nontestimonial hearsay; "Consequently, with respect to non-testimonial hearsay statements, Roberts and its progeny remain the controlling precedents.").

(n158)Footnote 158. The Court may provide a further indication of what it means by "testimonial" in the 2005-6 Term, as it has granted certiorari in two state cases involving the admissibility of 911 calls and reports to police officers after Crawford.

(n159)Footnote 159. Horton v. Allen, 370 F.3d 75 (1st Cir. 2004) (accomplice's statements of intent to commit a crime "were not ex parte in-court testimony or its equivalent; were not contained in formalized documents such as affidavits, depositions, or prior testimony transcripts; and were not made as part of a confession resulting from custodial examination ... . In short, Christian did not make the statements under circumstances in which an objective person would reasonably believe that the statement would be available for use at a later trial.").

(n160)Footnote 160. See, e.g., Evans v. Luebbers, 371 F.3d 438 (8th Cir. 2004) (statements of victim made for purposes of medical treatment were not testimonial).

(n161)Footnote 161. United States v. Owens, 484 U.S. 554 (1988) .

(n162)Footnote 162. United States v. Cervantes-Flores, 421 F.3d 825 (9th Cir. 2005) (Certificate of Nonexistence of Record was prepared in anticipation of litigation, but it was not testimonial because it was nothing like the examples of testimonial hearsay listed in Crawford); United States v. Rueda-Rivera, 396 F.3d 678 (5th Cir. 2005) (the affidavit "admitted into evidence in this case, reflecting the absence of a record that Rueda-Rivera had received consent to re-enter the United States, does not fall into the specific categories of testimonial statements referred to in Crawford. We decline to extend Crawford to reach such a document.").

(n163)Footnote 163. Id.

(n164)Footnote 164. See, e.g., United States v. Owens, 789 F.2d 750 (9th Cir. 1986) (violation of hearsay rule did not constitute prejudicial error, but violation of the Confrontation Clause did constitute prejudicial error), rev'd on other grounds, 484 U.S. 554 (1988) .

(n165)Footnote 165. See, e.g., United States v. Arambula-Ruiz, 987 F.2d 599 (9th Cir. 1993) (the government at trial proffered a coconspirator's hearsay statement, and defense counsel objected on the ground that the statement was not in furtherance of the conspiracy; this was sufficient to preserve the confrontation question for review, because the requirements for admission of statements under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) are identical to the requirements for such statements under the Confrontation Clause). Contra United States v. Perez, 989 F.2d 1574 (10th Cir. 1993) ("where a Confrontation Clause objection is not explicitly made below we will not address the constitutional issue in the absence of a conclusion that it was plain error for the district court to raise the constitutional issue sua sponte.").

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 803 RULE 803

4-803 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 803.03

803.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Rule 803(1) -- Present Sense Impression

[a] Rule 803(1) -- Constitutional Concerns

United States v. Jones, 299 F.3d 103 (2d Cir. 2002) : At the defendant's trial for violation of supervised release, a witness testified that his wife, who was standing at a front window of their house, told him that there was a man in the lobby of the apartment building directly across the street who had been masturbating and giving their 15-year-old daughter "catcalls." When the witness then spoke to his daughter, she gave the same account and told him that she was "scared." Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the statements from the wife and daughter as either present sense impressions or excited utterances, since the events were certainly startling enough, the statements were nearly contemporaneous with the events described, and the daughter reported being scared and the wife appeared agitated, calling the witness to "come to the front, quick, quick, quick." The Court also held there was no Confrontation Clause violation under the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts analysis in admitting the statements. We note that under Crawford v. Washington the statements seem not "testimonial," so there would be no Confrontation Clause issue.

People of Terr. of Guam v. Ignacio, 10 F.3d 608 (9th Cir. 1993) : The three-year-old victim of a criminal sexual assault complained of pain in her vaginal area when her older sister was giving her a regularly scheduled bath on the evening of the molestation. The Court found no confrontation violation under the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts analysis in admitting the statement as a present sense impression, because it was made while experiencing the pain and it had sufficient indicia of reliability from the nearness in time to the molestation, the naturalness of the situation in which made, and the expression of severe pain (akin to the self-interest rationale behind the medical exception). We note that under Crawford v. Washington the statement seems not "testimonial," so there would be no Confrontation Clause issue.

[b] Rule 803(1) -- Copyright Cases

MCA, Inc. v. Wilson, 425 F. Supp. 443 (S.D.N.Y. 1976) , aff'd, 677 F.2d 180 (2d Cir. 1981) : Finding for the plaintiff in a copyright infringement action, the District Judge relied upon the present sense impressions of cast and audience as some proof of improper copying.

[c] Rule 803(1) -- Interested Witness

United States v. Ruiz, 249 F.3d 643 (7th Cir. 2001) : Two undercover officers, one at the front and one at the back, maintained surveillance of a house suspected as a drug trafficking location. The defendant was arrested after an apparent drug transfer at the back of the house was interrupted by one of the officers. When that officer testified, his partner recounted what he had been told by radio about the incident as it was happening. The Court held the testimony was admissible as a present sense impression, since the declarant's statements were being made as he observed the events. The facts that the witness was not disinterested and there was no independent corroboration of the declarant's statements were only credibility problems going to the weight of the evidence.

[d] Rule 803(1) -- Interpretative Statements

United States v. Woods, 301 F.3d 556 (7th Cir. 2002) : In a trial for distributing narcotics, the government introduced a tape recording made when a confidential informant, outfitted with a wire, set up and consummated a drug sale. The tape included some narrative statements that the informant made about the surroundings and events as he was waiting for the seller to show up. The Court held that the informant's "simple descriptions of events as they occurred" were properly admitted as present sense impressions, but the statements clearly addressed to the FBI agents listening in via the microphone were calculated interpretations of events and not admissible under the exception. Any error was harmless, however.

[e] Rule 803(1) -- Personal Knowledge

Brown v. Keane, 355 F.3d 82 (2d Cir. 2004) : Brown was convicted in State Court for shooting at a police officer, after the officer testified that Brown fired at him when Brown came out of a bar. The prosecution introduced a 911 tape from an anonymous caller, who stated that a man fitting Brown's description was firing a gun, trying to shoot at the door of the bar. Reversing denial of Brown's habeas corpus petition, the Court held that admission of the 911 tape as a present sense impression violated Brown's right to confrontation, because the statement lacked any indication that the caller actually saw the shooting. The inconsistency between shooting at the door and shooting away toward the officer, and the failure to mention that the officer was shooting strongly suggested that the caller was not actually viewing the scene. In an inmate's § 1983 action against prison guards, Hynes v. Coughlin, 79 F.3d 285 (2d Cir. 1996) , the defendants offered a "Use of Force" report prepared by one of the guards purporting to describe the beginning of the altercation, although she testified that she had not seen the incident until she heard a scream and observed another guard holding his genitals. The Court said the report was not admissible under Rule 803(1) because the witness did not have personal knowledge of the start of the incident and, in any event, there was no indication that she made the report at or immediately after the event recounted.

United States v. Mitchell, 145 F.3d 572 (3d Cir. 1998) : Police responding to a 911 call found the getaway car used in a bank robbery approximately 45 minutes earlier. On the seat of the car was an anonymous note indicating that the robbers had switched to another car, which was connected with the defendant. The note was admitted as a present sense impression or an excited utterance or under the residual exception. The Court vacated the conviction, holding that the note was not admissible as a present sense impression or an excited utterance because there were no circumstances shown in the record indicating that the author of the note actually saw the change of cars.

Greene v. B.F. Goodrich Avionics Sys., Inc., 409 F.3d 784 (6th Cir. 2005) : In a wrongful death action brought after a helicopter crash, the plaintiff introduced a taped statement made by the pilot to ground control just before the crash: "Okay, I think my gyro just quit." The defendant argued that this statement could not be admitted as a present sense impression, because the pilot could not actually see the gyroscope -- he could only see the readings inside the cockpit. The Court found no error in admitting the statement, since it was "untenable" to suggest that the pilot must actually view the gyroscope to have personal knowledge of its failure -- the readings in the cockpit were sufficient to supply personal knowledge.

Bemis v. Edwards, 45 F.3d 1369 (9th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in an arrestee's civil rights action, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a 911 tape of a call made by a neighbor during the incident, as the caller was not witnessing the events he described but was relaying descriptions from other people who were observing them.

[f] Rule 803(1) -- Relationship to Other Rules

United States v. Jones, 299 F.3d 103 (2d Cir. 2002) : At the defendant's trial for violation of supervised release, a witness testified that his wife, who was standing at a front window of their house, told him that there was a man in the lobby of the apartment building directly across the street who had been masturbating and giving their 15-year-old daughter "catcalls." When the witness then spoke to his daughter, she gave the same account and told him that she was "scared." Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the statements from the wife and daughter as either present sense impressions or excited utterances, since the events were certainly startling enough, the statements were nearly contemporaneous with the events described, and the daughter reported being scared and the wife appeared agitated, calling the witness to "come to the front, quick, quick, quick." In a prosecution arising from a bank robbery, United States v. Brewer, 36 F.3d 266 (2d Cir. 1994) , the defendant sought to prove that eyewitnesses to the robbery failed to identify the defendant in a photo array. The defendant called the police officer who conducted the array, and argued that the officer could testify to the witnesses' failure to identify the defendant as a present sense impression. However, the Court held that the statements of the identifying witnesses were not made immediately after the event -- the relevant event being the robbery itself and not the failure to identify the defendant. The Court concluded that the admissibility of a failure to make an identification was covered by Rule 801(d)(1)(C) and not by Rule 803(1).

[g] Rule 803(1) -- Reports of Conversations

Citizens Fin. Group, Inc. v. Citizens Nat'l Bank of Evans City, 383 F.3d 110 (3d Cir. 2004) : In a bank's action for a declaratory judgment that it was not infringing a competitor's trademarks, the Judge established guidelines to ensure that "confusion log" entries prepared by the defendant's employees satisfied the Rules before being admitted. The guidelines required exclusion of log entries that reflected "the thought process, conclusion, analysis or interpretation" of the employees who recorded the entries. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the guidelines, since statements do not satisfy Rule 803(1) when they are "conclusions based upon information [the recorder] had processed rather than contemporaneous or spontaneous statements that [are] inherently trustworthy." In any event, the guidelines did permit written hearsay that reflected "an explanation or description of the event rather than a narration."

Phoenix Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Adams, 30 F.3d 554 (4th Cir. 1994) : In an action to determine the beneficiary of a life insurance policy, the Court held that a note made by a personnel officer contemporaneously with a telephone conversation with the insured was properly admitted as a present sense impression to prove the insured's intent to change his beneficiary. In United States v. Portsmouth Paving Corp., n1 the Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to rig bids and fix prices in connection with highway construction, holding that testimony by a witness that another person described a telephone call immediately after it occurred was admissible under Rule 803(1) to prove the contents of the call.

Michaels v. Michaels, 767 F.2d 1185 (7th Cir. 1985) : In a securities fraud action, the Court held that a telex sent immediately after a conversation, which reported the conversation, was admissible as a present sense impression.

Vitek Sys. v. Abbott Labs., 675 F.2d 190 (8th Cir. 1982) : In a trademark infringement action the Court found that the District Court properly excluded as hearsay a written memorandum prepared by one of the plaintiff's employees that reported a meeting with a customer and contained the employee's evaluation of the customer's thought processes rather than a record of present sense impressions of the customer.

[h] Rule 803(1) -- Responses to Questions

United States v. Narciso, 446 F. Supp. 252, 284 (E.D. Mich. 1976) : In this prosecution for murder and other crimes arising from a series of cardiopulmonary arrests at a V.A. hospital, the District Court held that Rule 803(1) would not support the introduction of a note, made in response to questions from an attending physician, in which the declarant wrote the initials possibly representing the nickname of a person who allegedly gave him an injection several hours earlier, prior to a respiratory arrest. The Court focused on the delay between the injection and the statement, the fact that the initials came in response to interrogation, the ambiguity in the use of initials, and problems with the capacity of the declarant.

[i] Rule 803(1) -- Tape-Recorded Impressions

United States v. Obayagbona, 627 F. Supp. 329 (E.D.N.Y. 1985) : Denying posttrial motions by a defendant convicted of conspiracy to distribute heroin, the Court held that an undercover officer's statements, recorded on tape immediately after he made an arrest, were admissible under Rule 803(1).

United States v. Andrews, 765 F.2d 1491 (11th Cir. 1985) : In a prosecution for illegal trafficking in food stamps, the Court upheld the admission of a tape that recorded an undercover police officer's visual impressions while looking through the window of the defendant's home. The tape was a present sense impression.

[j] Rule 803(1) -- Timing

United States v. Guevara, 277 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring to distribute heroin, holding there was no error in excluding exculpatory transcripts of six tape-recorded conversations involving the defendant, a paid government informant, and a Colombian woman who hired the informant to transport heroin. The conversations took place after the defendant was arrested and while he was attempting to cooperate with the government against his alleged coconspirators. The Court found no abuse of discretion in refusing to admit the Colombian woman's statements as excited utterances or present sense impressions, "because they were conclusions based upon information she had processed rather than contemporaneous or spontaneous statements that were inherently trustworthy." In an inmate's § 1983 action against prison guards, Hynes v. Coughlin, 79 F.3d 285 (2d Cir. 1996) , the defendants offered a "Use of Force" report prepared by one of the guards purporting to describe the beginning of the altercation, although she testified that she had not seen the incident until she heard a scream and observed another guard holding his genitals. The Court said the report was not admissible under Rule 803(1) because the witness did not have personal knowledge of the start of the incident and, in any event, there was no indication that she made the report at or immediately after the event recounted.

United States v. Mitchell, 145 F.3d 572 (3d Cir. 1998) : Police responding to a 911 call found the getaway car used in a bank robbery approximately 45 minutes earlier. On the seat of the car was an anonymous note indicating that the robbers had switched to another car, which was connected with the defendant. The note was admitted as a present sense impression or an excited utterance or under the residual exception. The Court vacated the conviction, holding that the note was not admissible as a present sense impression because there was no showing that the author of the note made the statement before s/he had time to reflect and fabricate.

United States v. Jackson, 124 F.3d 607 (4th Cir. 1997) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in a firearms possession case when the arresting officer testified that upon the officer's arrival at the scene, the defendant's mother stated that the defendant was threatening to shoot family members. The declarant was describing an event that was, from the officer's evidence, ongoing as well as startling.

First State Bank v. Maryland Cas. Co., 918 F.2d 38 (5th Cir. 1990) : To show that the insured was not at home when a fire destroyed a house he owned, which with other proof tended to show he set the fire, the defendant in an action on a fire insurance policy offered testimony by a police dispatcher that she called the listed number for the insured to notify him of the fire, that an unidentified person answered the phone and identified it as the insured's residence, and the person answering said after checking that the insured was not home. Affirming a judgment for the insurer, the Court held the response was sufficiently contemporaneous for admission under the Rule. In United States v. Cain, n2 the Court overturned a Dyer Act conviction on the ground that the Trial Judge erred in admitting into evidence the testimony of a state trooper that he received a CB radio transmission regarding two white, shirtless males leaving an abandoned truck. The Court held that the statement was not admissible as a present sense impression because the distance that the defendant was found from the truck and the timing of the statement made it "impossible to determine whether the declaration ... was made immediately following the observation or not."

Cargill, Inc. v. Boag Cold Storage Warehouse, Inc., 71 F.3d 545 (6th Cir. 1995) : In a manufacturer's action for negligent storage of frozen turkeys, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting typed notes that had been taken by an investigator for the plaintiff. The investigator had taken notes of events as they had occurred, and there was no indication he had changed them in any way when he typed them up. His notes had also incorporated findings from another investigator, who had also recorded his observations contemporaneously, so those statements were admissible hearsay within hearsay.

Cody v. Harris, 409 F.3d 853 (7th Cir. 2005) : In a defamation action brought against his former employer, the plaintiff alleged that he was slandered by a statement that a supervisor made to a newspaper reporter. As proof that the statement was made, the plaintiff offered the published newspaper account. The Court found no error in the refusal to admit the statement as a present sense impression, since the plaintiff did not provide enough information to determine whether the reporter "wrote the article with 'calculated narration' nor do we know what the time lapse was between [the supervisor's] statement and the writing of the article." In United States v. Santos, 201 F.3d 953 (7th Cir. 2000) , the Chicago City Treasurer was convicted for illegally soliciting political contributions from banks and securities firms. Reversing, the Court held that a handwritten note containing incriminating material, which was attached to a typewritten draft prepared contemporaneously with the events it described, was an untimely reflective summary rather than a spontaneous reaction to an immediate sensation admissible under Rule 803(1). In United States v. Parker, n3 the Court affirmed a conviction for possession of cocaine and PCP, holding that a redcap's statement that the defendant had shortly before given him a suitcase was properly admitted under the Rule. As the time elapsed was only sufficient to carry the suitcase from the train to the baggage claim area, the statements were sufficiently contemporaneous to be a present sense impression. In a Hobbs Act case, United States v. Blakey, n4 the Court held that a tape-recorded conversation between the victim and a witness that took place 23 minutes after the victim gave cash to the defendants was admissible as a present sense impression.

United States v. Manfre, 368 F.3d 832 (8th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for an arson conspiracy, the Court held that a statement by a conspirator to a friend that he was late because he had been talking with the defendant, but could not disclose the contents of that conversation, was improperly admitted as a present sense impression, because too much time had passed between the conversation and the statement. However, the Court held that the part of the statement refusing to disclose the contents of the conversation was admissible as a statement of a coconspirator in furtherance of the conspiracy's purpose of concealing its nature from an inquisitive acquaintance. In United States v. Beck, 122 F.3d 676 (8th Cir. 1997) , the defendant, appealing from a conviction for felon firearm possession, argued that it was error to permit a law enforcement officer to testify about statements made to the officer by a government informant. The informant had turned over marijuana and firearms to the officer, and told the officer that he had just purchased these items from the defendant. Affirming, the Court held that the informant's statements were properly admitted as present sense impressions. The statements were made immediately after the purchases and "were part of a single, continuous event." In United States v. Hawkins, n5 the Court affirmed convictions for drug and weapon offenses, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a 911 phone call, where it was made a few minutes after the events recounted and circumstantial evidence indicated its reliability. In United States v. Cammisano, n6 the Court affirmed a conviction for obstruction of justice, holding it was harmless error to admit hearsay statements regarding events three days earlier.

United States v. Cruz, 765 F.2d 1020 (11th Cir. 1985) : The Court held that a statement by a deceased officer to his superiors concerning the source of a cocaine sample was inadmissible where it was unclear how much time passed between the receipt and the statement.

[k] Rule 803(1) -- Valuations

Makuc v. American Honda Motor Co., 835 F.2d 389 (1st Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a defendant sued by an injured motorbike rider. It held that testimony by witnesses that a mechanic told them it would cost $325 to repair a motorbike was admissible as a present sense impression of the mechanic.

[2] Rule 803(2) -- Excited Utterance

[a] Rule 803(2) -- Accidents

David v. Pueblo Supermarket, 740 F.2d 230 (3d Cir. 1984) : In an action for personal injuries suffered when a pregnant woman slipped and fell in the defendant's supermarket, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly permitted the plaintiff's husband to testify that after the plaintiff fell, another woman stopped and stated that she had informed "them" an hour and a half ago that there was a foreign substance on the floor. The Court found that the woman's statement was an excited utterance, since the declarant saw an eight-months pregnant woman fall directly on her stomach, and the substance of her statement, which was unsolicited, was made within seconds of the fall.

[b] Rule 803(2) -- Assault Victims

United States v. Cruz, 156 F.3d 22 (1st Cir. 1998) : Appealing convictions for drug and firearms offenses, the defendant argued that it was error to admit a statement made by his former girlfriend when she arrived at a battered women's shelter four hours after having been beaten by the defendant. The evidence indicated that she was unable to escape from the defendant for some time after the assault occurred, and that she was upset and traumatized when she arrived at the shelter. The Court affirmed the convictions and found no abuse of discretion in admitting the statement as an excited utterance.

Morgan v. Foretich, 846 F.2d 941 (4th Cir. 1988) : In an action by a four-year-old child and her mother alleging child abuse on the part of the child's father and his parents, the Court reversed a judgment for the defendants, concluding that statements made by the child within three hours of the child's being returned to the mother following visits with the defendants should have been admitted as excited utterances. The Court held that a child's out-of-court excited utterances are admissible whether or not the child would be competent to be a witness.

United States v. Hefferon, 314 F.3d 211 (5th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a conviction for sexual abuse of a seven-year-old, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission as excited utterances of statements by the victim. The statements related to a startling event, and all were made within one-to-two hours of the encounter, while the victim was still highly traumatized. In United States v. Lawrence, n7 the Court affirmed a conviction for assaulting a mail truck driver, finding no error when the officer who arrested the defendant was permitted to testify that the victim told him that "he (the victim) was a dead man." The statement was properly admitted as an excited utterance even though the statement came after the arrest.

United States v. Baggett, 251 F.3d 1087 (6th Cir. 2001) : When the defendant's wife was found hysterical, bruised, and bloodied near the dock where her husband's truck was being unloaded, she said that her husband had beaten her on three occasions over three days. Reinstating a jury verdict finding the defendant guilty of interstate domestic violence, the Court said that it would not have been an abuse of discretion to admit the testimony despite the time lapse between the beatings and the statements.

United States v. Marrowbone, 211 F.3d 452 (8th Cir. 2000) : The Court held in a sexual abuse prosecution that it was error (but harmless) to admit the victim's statement to tribal police officers that the defendant had molested him. The statement was made three hours after the incident, the victim was 16 years old, not a small child, and there was no evidence of continuous excitement or stress from the incident to the making of the statement. In United States v. Phelps, 168 F.3d 1048 (8th Cir. 1999) , the Court affirmed a conviction for assault with a dangerous weapon and using a firearm during a crime of violence, finding no error in the admission of hearsay statements from the defendant's girlfriend, in which she declared that the defendant had shot at her and her children. The statements were made to a 911 operator, a friend, and a police officer; all were made within 15 minutes of the event; and testimony indicated that the declarant was crying, scared, and upset during this period.

United States v. Rivera, 43 F.3d 1291 (9th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a rape conviction, the Court held that the victim's statement accusing the defendant of raping her was properly admitted as an excited utterance. While the statement was made more than 30 minutes after intercourse, the victim was still under the influence of the startling event. The victim was only 15 years old, she reported the rape to her mother at the first opportunity to do so, and she was in a "semi-hysterical" state at the time she made the statement. In People of Terr. of Guam v. Ignacio, 10 F.3d 608 (9th Cir. 1993) , the Court held that complaints by the three-year-old victim of a criminal sexual assault were properly admitted as excited utterances. Molestation by an adult family member was likely extremely traumatic, so it may be assumed the child was still under the stress of it when the statements were made within the hour.

United States v. Golden, 671 F.2d 369 (10th Cir. 1982) : Affirming a conviction of a police officer for wilfully depriving a person of his civil rights, the Court upheld as an excited utterance the admission of the victim's statement to his grandmother after being struck by the defendant. The statement was made after the victim drove approximately 120 miles per hour to his grandmother's house and told her that he feared for his life, 15 minutes after his altercation with the defendant.

[c] Rule 803(2) -- Codefendant's Statement

United States v. Vazquez, 857 F.2d 857 (1st Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, as it found that one defendant's statement accusing a codefendant of leaving him holding the bag was admissible as an excited utterance when the two were in custody.

United States v. Tocco, 135 F.3d 116 (2d Cir. 1998) : The defendant appealed from convictions for arson and related crimes, challenging the admission of a statement made by his alleged accomplice, who had run to a friend's house three hours after the defendant's business establishment had burned and people had been trapped inside. The Court held that the accomplice's statement to his friend that he had set the fire for the defendant was properly received as an excited utterance. The fire may itself have constituted a startling event, "but even if not, certainly [the accomplice's] subsequent realization that people could be trapped inside the burning building, which he had helped set, would comprise a startling event." Moreover, the accomplice was "all hyped" and "nervous" when he made the statement.

[d] Rule 803(2) -- Constitutional Concerns

United States v. Brito, 427 F.3d 53 (1st Cir. 2005) : Affirming a conviction for firearm possession by an illegal alien, the Court held that statements made in a 911 call were properly admitted as excited utterances and did not violate the defendant's right to confrontation. The caller stated that she had "just" heard gunshots and seen a man with a gun, that the man had pointed the gun at her, and that the man was still in her line of sight. The Court declared that the relevant question in determining whether a statement is "testimonial" under Crawford v. Washington is whether the statement was made with an eye toward "legal ramifications." Thus, statements to police made while the declarant or others are still in personal danger are ordinarily not testimonial, but once the initial danger has dissipated the declarant is more likely to comprehend the larger significance, so even an excited utterance can be testimonial. Here, the caller was in "imminent personal peril" when the call was made, so it was not testimonial. The Court also found that the 911 operator's "single off-handed question" did not make the answers testimonial.

United States v. Arnold, 410 F.3d 895 (6th Cir. 2005) : In a trial for felon firearm possession, the prosecution introduced evidence that Gordon called 911 and stated that the defendant had threatened her with a gun. After police arrived, the defendant showed up as well, and Gordon became upset and identified the defendant as the man who threatened her. The Court held that Gordon's identification qualified as an excited utterance, but it concluded that admitting the identification violated the defendant's right to confrontation after Crawford v. Washington. The identification was "testimonial," under a test of "whether a reasonable person in the declarant's position would anticipate his statement being used against the accused in investigating and prosecuting the crime."

United States v. Brun, 416 F.3d 703 (8th Cir. 2005) : At a trial for assault with a deadly weapon, the prosecution introduced three excited utterances: a 911 call from the defendant's 12-year-old nephew, indicating that the defendant and his girlfriend were arguing, and requesting assistance; another 911 call 20 minutes later from the defendant's girlfriend, indicating that the defendant was drunk and had a rifle, which he had fired in the house and then left; and the girlfriend's statements to officers when they responded and found her in the kitchen crying, in which she said that the defendant had been drunk and had shot his rifle in the bathroom while she was in it. Affirming, the Court found that all three statements were properly admitted as excited utterances. The Court found that the nephew's and the girlfriend's 911 calls were not "testimonial" within the meaning of Crawford v. Washington, as they were not the kind of statements that were equivalent to courtroom testimony; they were "emotional and spontaneous rather than deliberate and calculated." The Court also found that the girlfriend's later statement to the police was not testimonial, because the conversation "was unstructured, and not the product of police interrogation." Finally, the Court stated that the constitutional admissibility of non-testimonial hearsay continued to be governed by the Ohio v. Roberts reliability-based test, which was satisfied by the statements, as they fell within a firmly-rooted hearsay exception.

Leavitt v. Arave, 383 F.3d 809 (9th Cir. 2004) : In a habeas corpus proceeding by a state prisoner convicted of capital murder, the Court concluded that excited utterances by the victim in a call to police were not testimonial statements within the meaning of Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . The victim, not the police, had initiated their interaction, and she was in no way being interrogated by them but instead sought their help in ending a frightening intrusion into her home.

[e] Rule 803(2) -- Criminal Defendant's Statement

United States v. Esparza, 291 F.3d 1052 (8th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a cocaine conviction, finding no error in the exclusion of the defendant's statement, made at the time of his arrest, that he did not know that drugs were in his trailer. The statement did not qualify as an excited utterance, since "[p]olice discovery of contraband is not ordinarily the kind of 'startling event' to which this exception applies." When "incriminating evidence is discovered in one's possession, it requires only the briefest reflection to conclude that a denial and plea of ignorance is the best strategy." In United States v. Sewell, 90 F.3d 326 (8th Cir. 1996) , the defendant was stopped for a traffic violation and consented to a search of the trunk of his car. When he was informed that a gun was in the trunk, the defendant stated that the gun belonged to his brother and he had not known it was in the trunk. The Court affirmed his conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no error in the refusal to admit the statement as an excited utterance.

United States v. Alarcon-Simi, 300 F.3d 1172 (9th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a bank fraud conviction, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the defendant's exculpatory statement made at the time of his arrest. The statement did not qualify as an excited utterance because it referred to past events, not any incident that occurred at the time of the arrest.

[f] Rule 803(2) -- Foundation

United States v. Brown, 254 F.3d 454 (2d Cir. 2001) : The officer who arrested the defendant while he was brandishing a pistol testified that a minute or so before the arrest he had been approached by two unidentified men, who were very excited, very nervous, and hopping around, and who said there was a man waving a gun at people and threatening to shoot somebody. Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held that the officer's testimony was properly admitted as an excited utterance. The hearsay statement itself can be sufficient proof of the required exciting event without resort to independent corroborating evidence.

[g] Rule 803(2) -- Identifications

United States v. Beverly, 369 F.3d 516 (6th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions for bank robberies and firearms offenses, rejecting the claims of one defendant that it was an abuse of discretion to admit evidence that the defendant's wife identified him from a surveillance photograph taken during the robbery. The Court held that the wife's viewing of the photograph was a startling event, as the wife had no idea that her husband was involved in a bank robbery. Moreover, the wife was clearly upset when she saw the photograph.

[h] Rule 803(2) -- Personal Knowledge

Brown v. Keane, 355 F.3d 82 (2d Cir. 2004) : Brown was convicted in State Court for shooting at a police officer, after the officer testified that Brown fired at him when Brown came out of a bar. The prosecution introduced a 911 tape from an anonymous caller, who stated that a man fitting Brown's description was firing a gun, trying to shoot at the door of the bar. Reversing denial of Brown's habeas corpus petition, the Court held that admission of the 911 tape as an excited utterance would violate Brown's right to confrontation, because the statement lacked any indication that the caller actually saw the shooting. The inconsistency between shooting at the door and shooting away toward the officer, and the failure to mention that the officer was shooting strongly suggested that the caller was not actually viewing the scene. The Court concluded: "An assertion of fact based on conjecture and surmise, to which the declarant would not be allowed to testify if called to the witness box, does not become admissible under an exception to the hearsay rule merely because it was uttered out of court in a state of excitement." In United States v. Tocco, 135 F.3d 116 (2d Cir. 1998) , the defendant appealed from arson convictions, challenging the admission of a statement made by his alleged accomplice, who had run to a friend's house three hours after the defendant's business establishment had burned and people had been trapped inside. The accomplice's statement to his friend that he had set the fire for the defendant was admitted as an excited utterance. Affirming, the Court held there was a sufficient showing that the declarant had personal knowledge of the inculpatory facts. The property burned was the defendant's clothing store, and the evidence indicated that the declarant entered the store with a key. Thus, "[a] trier of fact could reasonably believe that Tocco obtained the key from the store owner and therefore was aware that the arson was committed at the owner's direction."

United States v. Saada, 212 F.3d 210 (3d Cir. 2000) : The defendants attempted to defraud an insurance company by breaking a sprinkler head, causing water damage to insured merchandise in their warehouse, and claiming that it had happened accidentally. To prove the sprinkler head was broken by accident, the defendants offered evidence that just after the incident a vice-president of their company had run into the company kitchen and exclaimed that one of the defendants had just done something very stupid. The exclamation had been admitted under Rule 803(2), but the Court noted the personal perception requirement was not satisfied because the declarant was not in the warehouse when the sprinkler head was broken. In United States v. Mitchell, 145 F.3d 572 (3d Cir. 1998) , police responding to a 911 call found the getaway car used in a bank robbery approximately 45 minutes earlier. On the seat of the car was an anonymous note indicating that the robbers had switched to another car, which was connected with the defendant. The note was admitted as a present sense impression or an excited utterance or under the residual exception. The Court vacated the conviction, holding that the note was not admissible as a present sense impression or an excited utterance because there were no circumstances shown in the record indicating that the author of the note actually saw the change of cars.

Greene v. B.F. Goodrich Avionics Sys., Inc., 409 F.3d 784 (6th Cir. 2005) : In a wrongful death action brought after a helicopter crash, the plaintiff introduced a taped statement made by the pilot to ground control just before the crash: "Okay, I think my gyro just quit." The defendant argued that this statement could not be admitted as an excited utterance, because the pilot could not actually see the gyroscope -- he could only see the readings inside the cockpit. The Court found no error in admitting the statement, since it was made "while under the stress of the event that nineteen seconds later resulted in his death," and that the cockpit readings were sufficient to supply personal knowledge.

United States v. Joy, 192 F.3d 761 (7th Cir. 1999) : In a felon firearm possession case, the government proffered a tape of a 911 call made by the defendant's brother, indicating that the defendant was brandishing a gun and had just pulled some burglaries. The Court held that the statements made in the 911 call were properly admitted under the excited utterance exception, noting that "there was more than enough circumstantial evidence to show that Paul Joy could have inferred his brother committed a burglary, and that this inference was reasonable."

Bemis v. Edwards, 45 F.3d 1369 (9th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in an arrestee's civil rights action, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a 911 tape of a call made by a neighbor during the incident, as the caller was not witnessing the events he described but was relaying descriptions from other people who were observing them.

[i] Rule 803(2) -- Response to Questions

United States v. Alexander, 331 F.3d 116 (D.C. Cir. 2003) : Affirming a conviction for unlawful possession of a firearm and ammunition by a felon, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting a statement made in a 911 call by the defendant's girlfriend that the defendant threatened her and had a gun. The statement, made 15 or 20 minutes after the threat, was made under the stress of excitement and qualified as an excited utterance. The fact that the declarant phoned her mother before calling 911 did not disqualify the statement, nor did the fact that the declarant was responding to a dispatcher's question when she clarified that the defendant had a gun.

United States v. Joy, 192 F.3d 761 (7th Cir. 1999) : In a felon firearm possession case, the government proffered a tape of a 911 call made by the defendant's brother, indicating that the defendant was brandishing a gun. The Court held that the statements made in the 911 call were properly admitted under the excited utterance exception. The call was made only minutes after the declarant had been in a heated argument with the defendant, and the defendant had waved a gun around. The Court did not find it problematic that most of the brother's statements were in response to the 911 dispatcher's questions. "On the contrary, it is possible for someone to be too excited to volunteer pertinent information (as Paul Joy appeared to be) and thus the inherent guarantee of truthfulness supporting the admission of excited utterances applies equally to declarations made in response to an inquiry."

People of Terr. of Guam v. Cepeda, 69 F.3d 369 (9th Cir. 1995) : Within a few minutes of an armed robbery, the victims gave police, through an interpreter and in response to questions, a description of the robber and the robbery. The Court found no error in admitting the statements, since the fact that a statement is made in response to a question is but one factor to weigh in considering admissibility; in this case, the victims remained in an excited state, stilling reflective thought, when the statements were made.

[j] Rule 803(2) -- Shooting Victim

United States v. Baptiste, 264 F.3d 578 (5th Cir. 2001) : Upholding the convictions of defendants for a drug trafficking conspiracy and weapons offenses, the Court held that a hearsay statement of a shooting victim identifying the defendant as his attacker was properly admitted as an excited utterance. The statement was made as the victim was lying in a pool of blood at the scene of the attack.

[k] Rule 803(2) -- Scope of the Rule

United States v. Napier, 518 F.2d 316 (9th Cir. 1975) : This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 803.02[3][b].

[l] Rule 803(2) -- Threats

United States v. Alexander, 331 F.3d 116 (D.C. Cir. 2003) : Affirming a conviction for unlawful possession of a firearm and ammunition by a felon, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting a statement made in a 911 call by the defendant's girlfriend that the defendant threatened her and had a gun. The statement, made 15 or 20 minutes after the threat, was made under the stress of excitement and qualified as an excited utterance. The fact that the declarant phoned her mother before calling 911 did not disqualify the statement, nor did the fact that the declarant was responding to a dispatcher's question when she clarified that the defendant had a gun.

United States v. Collins, 60 F.3d 4 (1st Cir. 1995) : "Renewing an old and unfriendly acquaintance," the defendant got into an argument with Albizu. When Albizu's burly brother arrived at the scene, the defendant left, but vowed to come right back to shoot Albizu. Albizu called the police and when the defendant did return, he was arrested and a gun was found. Affirming a firearms conviction, the Court found no error in the admission of Albizu's statement to the police that the defendant had threatened him. The statement was properly admitted as an excited utterance. Albizu experienced the startling event of being threatened, and he was visibly upset and agitated when he made his statement.

[m] Rule 803(2) -- Timing

Hilyer v. Howat Concrete Co., 578 F.2d 422 (D.C. Cir. 1978) : A judgment for a defendant in a wrongful death action was affirmed on appeal, as the Court held that a statement of a co-worker of the deceased to a police officer was admissible as an excited utterance. The opinion discusses the difference between the "timing" requirements of paragraphs (1) and (2) of Rule 803.

United States v. Taveras, 380 F.3d 532 (1st Cir. 2004) : The defendant's supervised release had been revoked on the ground that he had threatened a woman with a gun and assaulted her. As proof of the threat and the assault, the government introduced the woman's hearsay statement made to a law enforcement officer. The Court held that the introduction of the hearsay was error, and vacated the judgment, noting that the hearsay statement was not an excited utterance, because there was a substantial delay between the threat/assault and the woman's statement -- the act occurred at night and the statement was made late the next morning. "Thus, the extended delay in this case was long enough to allow Pabon to reflect on the alleged events of the previous night and possibly to fabricate or alter the story that she related to [the officer]."

United States v. Guevara, 277 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring to distribute heroin, holding there was no error in excluding exculpatory transcripts of six tape-recorded conversations involving the defendant, a paid government informant, and a Colombian woman who hired the informant to transport heroin. The conversations took place after the defendant was arrested and while he was attempting to cooperate with the government against his alleged coconspirators. The defendant argued that the Colombian woman's statements were admissible as excited utterances or present sense impressions. The Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the statements, "because they were conclusions based upon information she had processed rather than contemporaneous or spontaneous statements that were inherently trustworthy." In United States v. Scarpa, 913 F.2d 993 (2d Cir. 1990) , the government offered testimony in a RICO prosecution that a beating victim named the defendants as his assailants five or six hours after the beating when the victim was being treated in a hospital emergency room and his sister screamed that one of the defendants had come into the emergency room. The Court held there was no error in admitting the statement, as there was little doubt that the declarant was still under the stress of excitement caused by his beating and by his sister's screams.

United States v. Lawrence, 349 F.3d 109 (3d Cir. 2003) : In the hospital the day after he was shot, the victim mentioned a man's name to his sister, which the defendant claimed was an identification of the other man as the assailant. Affirming a murder conviction, the Court held that the purported identification was properly not admitted as an excited utterance, since the lapse of time indicated it was not the direct result of the exciting event.

United States v. Jackson, 124 F.3d 607 (4th Cir. 1997) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in a firearms possession case when the arresting officer testified that upon the officer's arrival at the scene, the defendant's mother stated that the defendant was threatening to shoot family members. The declarant was describing an event that was, from the officer's evidence, both ongoing and startling. The Court also held that the mother's statement that the defendant had a gun which she had secured upstairs was properly admitted, as it was made immediately after the officer had separated the declarant and the defendant, who had been yelling and was very aggressive toward her.

United States v. Arnold, 410 F.3d 895 (6th Cir. 2005) : The Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession because a 911 call in which the declarant, Gordon, declared that the defendant had threatened her with a gun was erroneously admitted as an excited utterance. There was no evidence as to when the alleged incident occurred, so there was no basis for determining whether there was time to contrive or misrepresent before the call was made. For the same reason, the statements made by Gordon to the police officers who responded to the 911 call were improperly admitted as excited utterances. In United States v. Schreane, 331 F.3d 548 (6th Cir. 2003) , the defendant was charged with felon firearm possession after an officer, responding to a burglary in progress, stopped the defendant's car. Another occupant, the defendant's nephew, yelled "he's got a gun," referring to the defendant. The Court held that the statement was properly admitted as an excited utterance. The short length of time between the burglary and the statement, or the stop and the statement, plus evidence that the nephew was excited, established that the statement was made under the stress of a startling event. In United States v. Baggett, n8 when the defendant's wife was found hysterical, bruised, and bloodied near the dock where her husband's truck was being unloaded, she said that her husband had beaten her on three occasions over three days. Reinstating a jury verdict finding the defendant guilty of interstate domestic violence, the Court said that it would not have been an abuse of discretion to admit the testimony despite the time lapse between the beatings and the statements. In a murder-for-hire prosecution, United States v. Winters, n9 the Court found no error in the exclusion of a statement by the victim to police officers, made two days after the victim was shot. In the statement, the victim speculated as to who might want to hurt him, and identified several people other than the defendant. The Court held that the defendant's proffer of the victim's statement as an excited utterance was properly rejected, because the statement was made so far after the shooting that it was the product of conscious reflection.

United States v. Wesela, 223 F.3d 656 (7th Cir. 2000) : In a felon firearm possession case arising from an incident over almost two days in which the defendant had been threatening to kill his wife, the government offered a statement made by the wife during an interview with detectives an hour after police arrived. The Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit the statement as an excited utterance, since it referred to events occurring almost two days before; she had apparently regained her composure about the earlier events, since she was at work and away from the defendant for a full workday in the interim. In United States v. Hall, 165 F.3d 1095 (7th Cir. 1999) , the Court affirmed a conviction for kidnapping and illegally transporting a teenage girl, and upheld the exclusion of proffered testimony concerning statements attributed to a third party upon whom the defendant sought to cast the blame for the crimes. The Court reasoned that one statement was made two days after the girl's disappearance and that it was unclear that the abduction was a startling event that triggered the statement; moreover, the time gap militated against a finding of spontaneity and there was no showing that the statement related to the abduction. Affirming a conviction for civil rights violations in United States v. Sowa, n10 the Court held that a 20-minute delay between a three-year-old's observation of a beating and her identification of the assailant was not excessive for admission of her statement as an excited utterance, where she cried the whole time and there was no reason to believe she had been coached regarding the ramifications of her statement. In Webb v. Lane, n11 the Court affirmed the denial of habeas relief to a prisoner convicted of murder, holding that statements made by the victim in response to police questioning more than an hour after the shooting were sufficiently spontaneous, as the tremendous shock and stress and consequent pain may well have postponed the declarant's opportunity to reflect. In United States v. Hartmann, n12 a man was murdered as part of a scheme by his wife and others to defraud life insurance companies. During the trial, evidence was introduced of separate statements by the victim to two lawyers in which he said that his wife and her boyfriend were going to kill him. Without specifying how soon the statements were made after the victim heard the plotters, the Court held there was no plain error in admitting the statements, as hearing one's wife and her lover plotting one's own death is a startling event and the lawyers testified that the victim was in a state of panic when he related the story to them.

United States v. Marrowbone, 211 F.3d 452 (8th Cir. 2000) : The Court held in a sexual abuse prosecution that it was error (but harmless) to admit the victim's statement to tribal police officers that the defendant had molested him. The statement was made three hours after the incident, the victim was 16 years old, not a small child, and there was no evidence of continuous excitement or stress from the incident to the making of the statement. In United States v. Phelps, n13 the defendant was charged with assault with a dangerous weapon after he shot at his girlfriend and her children. Affirming his conviction, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of statements made by the girlfriend to a 911 dispatcher, a relative, and an investigating officer between two and thirty minutes after the incident, since each witness testified that the declarant was very upset when she made the statement. In United States v. Moses, n14 the defendant fled after an assault in which another inmate was badly cut on the neck. He was followed by a third inmate who, without any inquiry from an officer he encountered, blurted out an obscenity identifying the defendant as the assailant. The Court held the statement was properly admitted, since the seriousness of the victim's wound and the brief time between the assault and the statement made it evident that the declarant was still under the stress of excitement. Although it recognized that the issue was close, in United States v. Iron Shell, n15 the Court upheld the introduction of statements made by a nine-year-old victim of assault with intent to rape to a police officer 45-75 minutes after the assault. The Court emphasized "the surprise of the assault, its shocking nature and the age of the declarant" to find a continuing state of excitement.

United States v. Fontenot, 14 F.3d 1364 (9th Cir. 1994) : The defendant, charged with hiring someone to murder his wife, sought to introduce as exculpatory evidence his statement shortly after a telephone conversation that "they are going to kill [my wife]," and another statement made four days later that he had to go to San Francisco and that his life was in danger by going but in even more danger if he did not go. The Court held there was no error in excluding the statements, as they were hearsay offered to prove the facts asserted. The second was clearly not an excited utterance, and even if the phone call before the first was as "extraordinarily terrifying" as defense counsel said, any error in excluding it was harmless. In United States v. Lim, 984 F.2d 331 (9th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed drug convictions, holding that a statement by a coconspirator immediately after his arrest was admissible as an excited utterance. In United States v. Sherlock, n16 the Court held that statements that they had been raped made by the school-girl victims more than one hour after the crime were erroneously (but harmlessly) admitted. Both had spoken to several other persons in the interim and had time to think about their actions and to invent an excuse about their late arrival at their dorm with alcohol on their breath. In Pau v. Yosemite Park & Curry Co., n17 a wrongful death action arising out of a bicycle accident in a national park, the Court said there was no clear error or abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the decedent, after two days in a coma, wakened, asked to go to the bathroom, and stated that "the brakes failed." As the case was being remanded for a new trial, however, the Trial Judge was urged to consider carefully the applicability of the excited utterance exception.

[n] Rule 803(2) -- Unidentified Declarant

United States v. Mitchell, 145 F.3d 572 (3d Cir. 1998) : Police responding to a 911 call found the getaway car used in a bank robbery approximately 45 minutes earlier. On the seat of the car was an anonymous note indicating that the robbers had switched to another car, which was connected with the defendant. The note was admitted as a present sense impression or an excited utterance or under the residual exception. The Court vacated the conviction, holding that the note was not admissible as an excited utterance because there was no showing that the author of the note was under the stress of excitement when s/he made the statements. In Miller v. Keating, n18 the Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in an automobile accident case, finding it was error to admit as "res gestae" a statement by an unidentified declarant at the scene of the accident which amounted to an accusation that the plaintiff was at fault. The Court stated that "[t]he old catchall, 'res gestae,' is no longer part of the law of evidence" and examined the statement as an excited utterance. It found that the defendant was unable to show the personal knowledge, spontaneity, and excitement required under the Rule.

United States v. Hall, 165 F.3d 1095 (7th Cir. 1999) : Affirming a conviction for kidnapping and illegally transporting a teenage girl, the Court upheld the exclusion of proffered testimony concerning statements attributed to a third party upon whom the defendant sought to cast the blame for the crimes. The Court reasoned that the evidence as to one statement was unclear as to who made it or when it was made, and thus it failed to demonstrate any indicia of an excited utterance.

[o] Rule 803(2) -- Witnesses to Crimes

United States v. Bailey, 834 F.2d 218 (1st Cir. 1987) : The Court held it was not error to admit, in a prosecution for corruptly endeavoring to influence a juror, the testimony of a neighbor as to what the juror told her about the defendant's overture. The juror's statement to the neighbor was made approximately three minutes after the event at a time when the juror still appeared to be upset by the defendant.

United States v. Jones, 299 F.3d 103 (2d Cir. 2002) : At the defendant's trial for violation of supervised release, a witness testified that his wife, who was standing at a front window of their house, told him that there was a man in the lobby of the apartment building directly across the street who had been masturbating and giving their 15-year-old daughter "catcalls." When the witness then spoke to his daughter, she gave the same account and told him that she was "scared." Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the statements from the wife and daughter as either present sense impressions or excited utterances, since the events were certainly startling enough, the statements were nearly contemporaneous with the events described, and the daughter reported being scared and the wife appeared agitated, calling the witness to "come to the front, quick, quick, quick."

United States v. Boyd, 620 F.2d 129 (6th Cir. 1980) : The Court found that it was not error to admit as excited utterances statements made to a police officer by unidentified persons while a defendant was running from apartment to apartment with stolen mail.

United States v. Water, 413 F.3d 812 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a murder conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony from an officer regarding statements made by the defendant's brother, a witness to the shooting. The statements were made less than five minutes after the incident, the declarant was "excited, nervous, and fidgety," and while he was intoxicated, there was nothing in his demeanor or the circumstances to indicate he had a motive to lie, according to the officer.

[3] Rule 803(3) -- Then Existing Mental, Emotional, Or Physical Condition

[a] Rule 803(3) -- Constitutional Concerns

See White v. Illinois, discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment at § 803.02[26].

Horton v. Allen, 370 F.3d 75 (1st Cir. 2004) : At the petitioner's state trial for drug-related murders, the prosecutor offered evidence that Christian, the petitioner's accomplice, had told a friend that he was broke, that he had asked a drug supplier to front him some drugs but the supplier declined, and that he thought the drug supplier had a large amount of cash on him. These statements were offered under the state of mind exception to show the intent to murder and the motivation for murdering the drug supplier shortly thereafter. Affirming denial of a habeas corpus petition, the Court held that Christian's statement was not "testimonial" within the meaning of Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) , because it was not made in circumstances "in which an objective person would reasonably believe that the statement would be available for use at a later trial." Evaluating the statements under Ohio v. Roberts because they were non-testimonial, the Court found that the state of mind exception was "firmly-rooted," so there was no constitutional violation.

[b] Rule 803(3) -- Customer Confusion

Fun-Damental Too, Ltd. v. Gemmy Indus. Corp., 111 F.3d 993 (2d Cir. 1997) : The Court held in a trademark infringement case that evidence of dealer complaints that the infringing product was being sold at a lower price to other retailers either was not hearsay or was admissible under the state of mind exception. The evidence indicated the dealers' state of mind and was being offered to prove the existence of customer confusion, not differential sale prices.

Freddie Fuddruckers, Inc. v. Ridgeline, Inc., 589 F. Supp. 72 (N.D. Tex. 1984) , aff'd, 783 F.2d 1062 (5th Cir. 1986) : The Court found that a restaurant owner was entitled to injunctive relief barring a competitor from using similar "trade dress." It held that hearsay statements of customers were admissible to prove their state of mind. This was probative of customer confusion.

[c] Rule 803(3) -- Facts Reflected in State of Mind

United States v. Hernandez, 176 F.3d 719 (3d Cir. 1999) : The defendant in a hijacking case told arresting officers, when they approached him, that "he was there unloading a truck and expected to be paid for his labor." The Court found no error in exclusion of the statement, since it was relevant only because of the implied assertion that the defendant was not involved in the hijacking, and was therefore hearsay. The Court distinguished the Second Circuit decision in United States v. DiMaria n19 on the ground that the expressed state of mind in DiMaria was relevant to the declarant's guilty knowledge. Here, the first part of the statement did not refer to a state of mind, and treating the second part as somehow a denial of guilty knowledge was precluded by Third Circuit precedent, United States v. Palma-Ruedas, 121 F.3d 841 (3d Cir. 1997) . In Palma-Ruedas, a kidnapping and cocaine conspiracy case, a defendant argued that his greeting, "Nice to meet you," tended to rebut a contention that he had previously attended a meeting with the person greeted. The Court held there was no error in excluding the statement as hearsay because it was offered for its implied assertion that the defendant had never previously met the person. It was not admissible under the exception for state of mind, which cannot be used to prove the truth of the underlying facts asserted. In Stelwagon Mfg. Co. v. Tarmac Roofing Sys., n20 a Robinson-Patman Act case, the Court held that it was error to conclude that there was sufficient evidence to support a jury's finding of antitrust injury based upon testimony by the plaintiff's employees that customers said they purchased products from a competitor at a lower price. The customers' statements were admitted under Rule 803(3), and therefore could be used only to prove the state of mind of the customers; they could not be used to prove the truth of the facts asserted, so it was error to treat the customers' statements as proof of actual lost sales constituting antitrust damages.

United States v. Newell, 315 F.3d 510 (5th Cir. 2002) : The defendant was charged in connection with a money-laundering scheme that involved billing a customer for expenses charged to American Express by an executive of the customer without proper documentation. The government introduced notes prepared by the defendant's in-house accountant, which expressed her concerns and described what had prompted her to confront the defendant about the billings. The notes were prepared after the confrontation, but while the events were still "fresh in her mind." The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the notes to prove the accountant's state of mind around the time she confronted the defendant, since whether the accountant become concerned was relevant to whether the executive's expenses were of such a suspicious nature that the defendant ought to have known of their falsity. Statements in the notes about rumors that had been circulating were offered to show why the accountant confronted the defendant, not to prove the truth of the rumors.

Grove Fresh Distrib., Inc. v. New England Apple Prods. Co., 969 F.2d 552 (7th Cir. 1992) : In an action brought against a competitor for misrepresentation of orange juice, the Court held the plaintiff was properly permitted to offer testimony as to statements by customers that they switched to the defendant's juice because it was cheaper. The testimony was not admissible to prove the fact of underpricing, but it was admissible for showing the customers' motives for no longer dealing with the plaintiff.

[d] Rule 803(3) -- Intent

[i] Rule 803(3) -- Bearing Upon Motive of Another

United States v. Donley, 878 F.2d 735 (3d Cir. 1989) : The government offered testimony in a murder prosecution that the victim said, in the presence of her husband (the defendant), shortly before she was killed, that she was moving out of the marital home and separating from him. The Court held that the evidence was properly admitted to show the existence of her intention and plan and the defendant's awareness of it, from which could be inferred a motive for the killing other than the one he claimed.

United States v. Calvert, 523 F.2d 895 (8th Cir. 1975) : The widow of a deceased inventor was permitted to testify that, shortly before his murder, her husband declared that he intended to speak to the defendant about canceling the insurance and ending the partnership. This was deemed admissible under Rule 803(3) because it tended to prove that the husband carried out his intent and may have prompted the defendant to seek to quickly arrange the murder.

United States v. Tokars, 95 F.3d 1520 (11th Cir. 1996) : Affirming two defendants' convictions arising from a cocaine-distribution ring that engaged in murder and other crimes, the Court concluded that statements by one defendant's wife that she intended to divorce the defendant were admissible to show a motive for the defendant to murder her.

[ii] Rule 803(3) -- Intent -- Inference from Present to Past State of Mind

United States v. Cianci, 378 F.3d 71 (1st Cir. 2004) : During a public corruption investigation, an FBI agent who was posing as a businessperson taped a conversation with one of the defendants. In the conversation the defendant (not prompted to any discussion of corruption) referred the agent to another person with the recommendation that the other was "honest as the day is long" and an injunction that if the agent was asked for anything to call the defendant, who would have the man arrested. The defendant sought to introduce this tape as evidence of his state of mind, but the Court upheld its exclusion. The statements were at best relevant of the declarant's state of mind at the time they were made, and even that was doubtful, since later in the conversation, in introducing the agent to another person, the defendant said that "He's [i.e., the agent] probably an FBI agent."

United States v. Giles, 246 F.3d 966 (7th Cir. 2001) : In the prosecution of a Chicago Alderman for, inter alia, receiving bribes from a government mole, the defendant was precluded from introducing a tape-recorded conversation between himself and the mole. Although the defendant argued that the tape tended to prove his then-existing state of mind, the Trial Judge reasoned that the crime was complete when the defendant took the first payment, the conversation the defendant sought to admit occurred three weeks later, and the three-week gap offered an opportunity for reflection. Although it found no abuse of discretion, the Court said: "We think the February 11 tape should have been admitted, especially in this case where Giles was going to (and did) testify. The government's argument that the tape was a product of Giles' reflection -- an attempt to cover his tracks in case he got caught -- should have been made to the jury, not the judge. On a close evidentiary call like this, we think it's best to err on the side of inclusion rather than exclusion if an error at all is to be made." In Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Wise, 184 F.3d 660 (7th Cir. 1999) , the insured on a life insurance policy had filed a change of beneficiary form after his divorce, but had left the beneficiary line blank rather than inserting the name of his parents. In an interpleader action between the parents and the former wife, the principal issue was whether the insured had done all he reasonably could do under the circumstances to effectuate his intent to change his beneficiary election. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting into evidence the insured's suicide note, which stated that he was "leaving everything" to his parents, including the life insurance. The statement of his belief that the beneficiary change had been made was "evidence of his intent to make the beneficiary change and that his intent had not changed. The fact finder in this case was not required to determine whether the statement was true or false, only to recognize that the statement was made."

[iii] Rule 803(3) -- Intent -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Williams, 704 F.2d 315 (6th Cir. 1983) : In a trial for attempting to possess cocaine, the evidence included testimony that $3,400 was confiscated from Williams when he was arrested, money the government claimed was to be used to make a cocaine purchase. Williams offered testimony of an IRS employee that Williams had stated that he owed $3,300 in taxes and had expressed an intention to repay that amount if his mother sold a house and gave him the money. Williams' statement to the witness qualified as a statement of a present intention to do a future act, but the statement was inadmissible absent evidence that the mother had sold the house and given him money. Without this additional evidence, the statement was not probative.

United States v. Hughes, 970 F.2d 227 (7th Cir. 1992) : To prove his theory of defense, the defendant offered testimony as to his numerous prior statements that he intended to go to the location of the charged narcotics distribution conspiracy just to purchase drugs for personal consumption. Affirming the defendant's conviction, the Court held that it was error (but harmless) to admit only the part of the statements indicating where he was going, but not the part telling why, as both reflected his then existing state of mind.

United States v. Silverman, 861 F.2d 571 (9th Cir. 1988) : Although the Court held that conspirator statements were improperly admitted in a drug-related prosecution, it also held that statements by the defendant's sister that she was going to call her brother were admissible to prove her intent to make a call, which was offered to show a connection between them.

[iv] Rule 803(3) -- Intent -- Proving Acts of Declarant

United States v. Torres, 901 F.2d 205 (2d Cir. 1990) : To prove he was at the scene when arrests were made only to borrow a car, one defendant in a massive heroin distribution conspiracy sought to have his common-law wife testify to his statements of the previous day that he would stop to pick up a car and then take her to the beach. The Court held that exclusion of the testimony on the ground it was untrustworthy was error (but harmless), because a statement of intent offered to prove subsequent consistent conduct is categorically admissible under Rule 803(3) regardless of trustworthiness. In United States v. Margiotta, n21 the Court found that a witness' testimony concerning his father's stated intention to engage in a certain plan qualified for admission under the Rule.

United States v. Sebetich, 776 F.2d 412 (3d Cir. 1985) : The Court held that statements by a third party of his intent to rob the banks that the defendants allegedly robbed should have been admitted, but that their exclusion was harmless error where the statements would not have established the defendant's innocence.

Phoenix Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Adams, 30 F.3d 554 (4th Cir. 1994) : In an action to determine the beneficiary of a life insurance policy, the Court held that evidence of statements by the insured that he wished to make his new wife his beneficiary were properly admitted to prove subsequent conduct in conformity with his stated intention.

United States v. Calvert, 523 F.2d 895 (8th Cir. 1975) : The widow of a deceased inventor was permitted to testify that, shortly before his murder, her husband declared that he intended to speak to the defendant about canceling the insurance and ending the partnership. This was deemed admissible under Rule 803(3) because it tended to prove that the husband carried out his intent and may have prompted the defendant to seek to quickly arrange the murder.

United States v. Veltmann, 6 F.3d 1483 (11th Cir. 1993) : The defendants, charged with setting a fire in which their wife and mother (respectively) had died, alleged that the victim had committed suicide. The Trial Court had excluded the videotaped deposition of a man who testified that the victim had blackmailed him for 25-30 years, that in a conversation a few months before her death, she talked about the possibility of her death and mentioned suicide several times, and that on the day of her death, he refused in no uncertain terms to send her any more money. Reversing, the Court held the evidence of suicide threats was unquestionably relevant and should not have been excluded because of remoteness or uncertainty as to their exact date. Furthermore, the conversation on the day of her death was relevant to her state of mind and intent on that day.

[v] Rule 803(3) -- Intent -- Proving Acts of Nondeclarant

United States v. Best, 219 F.3d 192 (2d Cir. 2000) : Best was head of a division of an insurance company, and his codefendant was the CEO. At Best's trial for fraud in connection with the company's improper allocation of private business costs to the Medicare program, the government introduced a hearsay statement by the CEO, which indicated that he was going to talk to Best and ask Best to create a fraudulent document. Affirming the conviction, the Court noted that Second Circuit case law permits state of mind statements to be admitted to prove the subsequent conduct of a person other than the declarant, so long as there is "independent evidence that connected the declarant's statement with the non-declarant's activities." In this case, there was ample independent proof that the CEO and Best actually conferred about preparation of the fraudulent document.

[vi] Rule 803(3) -- Intent -- State of Mind

United States v. DiMaria, 727 F.2d 265 (2d Cir. 1984) : The defendant was convicted of possessing stolen, contraband cigarettes and of conspiracy. The Trial Judge prevented him from eliciting from the FBI agent who arrested him that he said at the time that "I only came here to get some cigarettes real cheap." Reversing, the Court held that this was a statement of present state of mind and should have been admitted. The Court relied upon DiMaria in United States v. Lawal, n22 finding error (albeit harmless) in the exclusion of statements made by a defendant while he was detained during an investigation by drug enforcement agents at an airport. The statements might have shed light on his state of mind at the time of his arrest.

United States v. Serafini, 233 F.3d 758 (3d Cir. 2000) : The defendant was charged with perjury after he denied that he had been reimbursed for campaign contributions in violation of federal election law. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting statements, made by the drawer of a check that the defendant had denied was for reimbursement, in which the declarant indicated he intended the check to reimburse the defendant. The declarant's state of mind was relevant and the statements were admissible under the state of mind exception.

United States v. Jenkins, 579 F.2d 840 (4th Cir. 1978) : The defendant was convicted for making false material declarations to a grand jury that was inquiring into activities of one Lyles relating to the illicit distribution of narcotics, especially with one Johnson. The prosecution introduced evidence of a telephone conversation involving Lyles and Johnson, which indicated that Johnson intended to purchase narcotics from Lyles. Shortly after the conversation, the defendant appeared with Johnson at Lyles' residence. The Court ruled that Johnson's expressed intention to go to Lyles' residence was admissible as a state of mind declaration and said that "the jury might reasonably infer, from the fact that Johnson and Jenkins appeared at Lyles' residence very shortly thereafter, that Jenkins drove there because Johnson ... had asked him to do so."

United States v. Hartmann, 958 F.2d 774 (7th Cir. 1992) : A man had been murdered as part of a scheme by his wife and others to defraud life insurance companies by, inter alia, fraudulently listing her as beneficiary of his policies. During the trial, evidence was introduced of the victim's statements describing the dismal state of his marriage, his desire to replace his wife as beneficiary on his insurance policies, and his fear of being murdered by his wife and her lover. The Court held there was no plain error in admitting the statements as evidence of his state of mind and intent relevant to whether he would have listed her as beneficiary. In United States v. Hogan, n23 the Court held that out-of-court statements that the declarant wanted to give some money to the defendant, a Judge charged with bribery and corruption offenses, and could do so if it were a gift, were properly excluded when offered to prove that payments the declarant subsequently made were not a payment for services because they were not a reliable indicator of the declarant's state of mind at the time he actually gave the money.

[e] Rule 803(3) -- Mixed Present and Past States of Mind

United States v. Mandel, 437 F. Supp. 262 (D. Md. 1977) : In an excellent discussion of the question whether a statement that impliedly refers to past, present, and future events runs afoul of Rule 803(3)'s prohibition against testimony about facts remembered to prove the facts remembered or believed, this opinion compares the approach of Annunziato v. United States, 293 F.2d 373 (2d Cir. 1961) , with the approach of critics of that decision. Making a tentative ruling to exclude proffered evidence, the Mandel Court focused on the lack of a pressing need for the testimony and the danger that introduction of statements that refer not only to a present state of mind, but also incorporate past conduct of the declarant and others, would threaten the continued existence of the hearsay rule.

United States v. Liu, 960 F.2d 449 (5th Cir. 1992) : In a prosecution for bribing a public official, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a defendant's hearsay statements that he had participated because he feared a police officer he thought to be corrupt. The Rule admits statements as to the declarant's fear, but not as to why he held that state of mind or what he believed induced it. In United States v. Cohen, n24 the Court held that the exception "does not permit the witness to relate any of the declarant's statements as to why he held the particular state of mind, or what he might have believed that would have induced the state of mind."

United States v. Fontenot, 14 F.3d 1364 (9th Cir. 1994) : The defendant, charged with hiring someone to murder his wife, sought to introduce as exculpatory evidence his statement shortly after a telephone conversation that "they are going to kill [my wife]," and another statement made four days later that he had to go to San Francisco and that his life was in danger by going but in even more danger if he didn't go. The Court held there was no error in excluding the statements, as they were hearsay offered to prove the facts asserted. The statements did not fall within Rule 803(3) because they contained belief statements as to why the defendant was fearful.

[f] Rule 803(3) -- Past Acts or State of Mind

Colasanto v. Life Ins. Co. of N. Am., 100 F.3d 203 (1st Cir. 1996) : An interpleader action over the proceeds of a life insurance policy pitted the insured's estate against his former companion. The insured had notified the company to change a group policy to an individual policy in the companion's name, but had not completed the company's forms by the time he died. To prove that the insured had not intended to make the transfer, the estate offered letters written shortly before the insured's death. Affirming a judgment for the companion, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the letters, as they were written several months after the insured had evinced a donative intent in letters to the insurer and subsequent to a bitter falling-out between the insured and the companion. Thus, they were not probative of the insured's intent and state of mind at the time he wrote to the insurer.

United States v. Cardascia, 951 F.2d 474 (2d Cir. 1991) : Affirming convictions for bank fraud offenses, the Court held there was no error in excluding a letter by one defendant in which he explained why he was thereby resigning. To admit statements of one's state of mind with regard to conduct that occurred eight months earlier would significantly erode the hearsay rule.

United States v. LeMaster, 54 F.3d 1224 (6th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a conviction for making false statements to an FBI agent, the Court held that a statement the defendant made a day after being interviewed by the FBI agent was properly excluded. To the extent that the statement communicated that the defendant may have answered questions mistakenly, the Court found that it was hearsay and was inadmissible, since the defendant "had an opportunity to reflect and possibly fabricate or misrepresent his thoughts." In Cincinnati Fluid Power Co. v. Rexnord, Inc., n25 the Court reversed a judgment for a distributor who alleged promissory estoppel against a manufacturer on the basis of conduct by its officials. It found, inter alia, that the Trial Judge erred in permitting a witness to testify to out-of-court statements by a landlord concerning future rents to be received. The statement did not qualify as state of mind, because it was offered to prove the fact remembered, i.e., the amount of the future rents.

United States v. Neely, 980 F.2d 1074 (7th Cir. 1992) : Affirming convictions for racketeering acts involving staged automobile accidents and fraudulent insurance claims, the Court upheld the exclusion of a letter written by one defendant two and a half weeks after he received a letter from a participant who blamed the scheme on the defendant. The Court reasoned that "[t]wo and a half weeks is more than adequate time to reflect (and perhaps fabricate) one's thoughts." In United States v. Harvey, 959 F.2d 1371 (7th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed mail fraud convictions, holding there was no error in limiting cross-examination of a postal inspector about statements from the defendant that his funding sources were "hustlers," as the statements were made when he had time to reflect and perhaps misrepresent his thoughts and were, in any event, not relevant to his intent in connection with the charged acts two years previously. In United States v. Carter, n26 the Court affirmed robbery convictions, holding there was no error in excluding the defendant's statement that he confessed only to protect his girlfriend, as it was hearsay not coming within the state of mind exception because it was made at least an hour after the confession. Affirming racketeering and fraud convictions in United States v. Binder, n27 the Court held that a defendant's statement concerning the reasons that he claimed to be in a daze was a statement concerning past acts and was properly excluded. Moreover, the Court found that the portion concerning being in a daze was irrelevant when offered to prove a past state of mind.

United States v. Naiden, 424 F.3d 718 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed convictions for attempting to entice a child to engage in and travel for unlawful sexual activity, finding no error in the exclusion of testimony by a friend of the defendant's who would have said that the defendant told him that he had met someone on line who said she was 14, but the defendant did not believe she really was only 14. The statement was not within the state of mind exception because his communication with the girl occurred the day earlier, and the exception does not cover declarations about "a past attitude or state of mind." A concurring Judge argued that the defendant's statement was admissible to prove his state of mind at the time he made the statement, and that state of mind was relevant because it existed at the time of the alleged offenses. In Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. v. Thien, 63 F.3d 754 (8th Cir. 1995) , a declaratory judgment action to determine whether a fellow-employee exclusion in a liability policy applied to a fatal crash of a company plane, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding statements by the decedent that he had been or was going to be laid off from his employment, as the statements were offered to prove the facts remembered or believed, not the declarant's state of mind.

United States v. Emmert, 829 F.2d 805 (9th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed drug-related convictions and held that a coconspirator's testimony that one defendant had declared that he was scared and felt compelled to complete a narcotics deal because of threats made by government agents was properly excluded, because the defendant's statement referred to past events and was not confined to a present state of mind. In United States v. Faust, n28 the Court, affirming convictions for embezzlement and forgery, upheld the exclusion of a letter written by the defendant that was offered to support his claim that he was blackmailed into backdating an endorsement on a check. The Court observed that the defendant was permitted to testify concerning his state of mind and stated that "Faust's opportunity to reflect in drafting the letter ... weighs heavily against admission."

United States v. Tome, 61 F.3d 1446 (10th Cir. 1995) : On remand after the Supreme Court held that hearsay statements made when the declarant had a motive to falsify could not be admitted as prior consistent statements (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 801, § 801.02[4][c]), the Court held that statements by the child sexual abuse victim to her baby-sitter, stating that she did not want to return to her father because he "gets drunk and he thinks I'm his wife," were not admissible under the Rule as expressing fear, but instead were inadmissible statements of memory offered to prove the fact remembered. In United States v. Joe, 8 F.3d 1488 (10th Cir. 1993) , a murder prosecution, the Court held it was error to admit under the Rule the victim's statements that she feared the defendant because he had threatened her, as the portion about why she was afraid was a statement of memory or belief. In a drug prosecution, United States v. Rodriguez-Pando, n29 the Court held that a tape recording of the defendant's statement on the day following his arrest, in which the defendant claimed that he had been coerced to act, was inadmissible, since it was a statement of memory of past events and beliefs.

United States v. Samaniego, 345 F.3d 1280 (11th Cir. 2003) : In an interpleader action to determine ownership of championship belts allegedly stolen from a former professional boxer, the Court held it was error to admit under Rule 803(3) statements by the alleged thief expressing remorse, apologizing for, and asking forgiveness for having stolen the belts. The Rule expressly prohibits using a statement of a then-existing state of mind to prove a past fact. However, the error was harmless because the statements were admissible under Rule 804(b)(3) as declarations against interest.

[g] Rule 803(3) -- Present State of Mind

[i] Rule 803(3) -- Civil Cases

Southex Exhibitions, Inc. v. Rhode Island Builders Ass'n, 279 F.3d 94 (1st Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a suit alleging that the defendant and the plaintiff's predecessor had established a partnership and the defendant had breached its fiduciary duties to the plaintiff. It found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the president of the plaintiff's predecessor told the head of the defendant company that he did not want an ownership interest in the home shows that he was producing. The statement reflected the declarant's state of mind before signing a contract.

Callahan v. A.E.V., Inc., 182 F.3d 237 (3d Cir. 1999) : Opposing a motion for summary judgment in an antitrust action by small beer distributors, the plaintiffs offered their deposition testimony that certain customers stopped purchasing from them and had stated that they did so because the defendants' stores had cheaper beer. The Court reversed in part summary judgment for the defendants, holding it was error to exclude the deposition testimony as inadmissible hearsay. The customers' statements were not being offered to prove the plaintiffs' actual loss -- that evidence was provided by the plaintiffs' own testimony that the customers no longer traded with them -- but only for the limited purpose of proving the customers' motive, a present state of mind admissible under Rule 803(3). The Court also noted that it was not important that some of the declarants were unidentified, since the relevance of the statements depended on the fact that the declarants were the plaintiffs' customers, not their particular identities, and knowing the identity of the declarants would not make the statements more trustworthy evidence of the declarants' descriptions of their states of mind.

Hydrolevel Corp. v. American Soc'y of Mech. Eng'rs, Inc., 635 F.2d 118 (2d Cir. 1980) , aff'd, 456 U.S. 556 (1982) : In a private antitrust action, the Court said that the statements of the plaintiff's potential customers as to reasons for not dealing with the plaintiff came within the hearsay exception.

Wolfson v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 455 F. Supp. 82 (M.D. Pa. 1978) , aff'd, 588 F.2d 825 (3d Cir. 1978) : Denying a motion for a new trial, the District Court held that statements by a deceased insured to his spouse concerning representations made to him by an insurance agent were admissible under the state of mind exception to the hearsay rule to show his good faith in filling out an insurance policy.

Morris Jewelers, Inc. v. General Elec. Credit Corp., 714 F.2d 32 (5th Cir. 1983) : Affirming a judgment that the credit corporation had mishandled accounts, the Court found that the Trial Judge properly admitted letters from customers and testimony by Morris' employees concerning oral complaints to show the state of mind of customers whose accounts were handled by the credit corporation. The evidence was relevant to prove loss of goodwill.

Forro Precision, Inc. v. International Bus. Machs., 673 F.2d 1045 (9th Cir. 1982) : In a damage action arising out of the search of business premises by police accompanied by IBM employees, the Court held that out-of-court statements made during IBM's investigation into misappropriation of trade secrets were admissible to show the company's state of mind when it contacted the police and were properly admitted as central to the defense in the case.

[ii] Rule 803(3) -- Present State of Mind -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Wright, 783 F.2d 1091 (D.C. Cir. 1986) : In a kidnapping case, the Court found that a statement to the victim allegedly made by one defendant who raised a duress defense should have been admissible as state of mind evidence. The error in excluding it was deemed harmless, however.

United States v. Ouimette, 753 F.2d 188 (1st Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a conviction for illegal receipt of a firearm. Police officers testified that the defendant dropped the gun when they entered a bar, thinking that a robbery might be in progress. The defendant claimed to have been standing away from the place in the bar where the police said the gun was dropped, and alternatively, that no gun was dropped at all. He offered the testimony of a woman who had been in the bar to the effect that after the police entered the bar and made arrests, they searched her purse and looked elsewhere for a gun. She heard the police ask, "Where's the gun?" The Court found that exclusion of her testimony was improper, since the police officers' statements were admissible to show the officers' state of mind. It concluded that if the jury had heard and believed the witness, it could have inferred that no gun had been dropped. In United States v.

Kelly, n30 the Court upheld admission of statements showing an extortion victim's fear in a Hobbs Act case in which fear was an element of the offense charged.

United States v. DiNome, 954 F.2d 839 (2d Cir. 1992) : In a massive RICO prosecution the Court held there was no error in admitting statements by murder victims indicating their suspicions about the illegality of a defendant's business, as the statements indicated the declarants' then existing state of mind and were relevant to show the defendant's motive to kill them. In United States v. Puglisi, n31 the Court affirmed narcotics convictions, finding that postarrest statements by the defendants, which might have indicated an intent to cooperate, were properly excluded. They did not prove a state of mind. In United States v. Southland Corp., n32 the Court affirmed convictions of a corporation and a lawyer of conspiring to defraud the United States. It found that notes made by the corporation's general counsel were properly admitted, either as nonhearsay under Rule 801(c) or as state of mind evidence under Rule 803(3), to prove counsel's understanding of the purpose of certain payments. In a narcotics case, United States v. Terry, n33 the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony that defendants refused to supply palm prints pursuant to a Court order, while excluding statements made by the defendants that they wanted their lawyers present when the prints were taken. Although the Court found that the statements were not required to be admitted under Rule 106 since they were oral statements, not writings, it found that they qualified for admission under Rule 803(3).

United States v. Taglione, 546 F.2d 194 (5th Cir. 1977) : The Court held that a defendant charged with having made extortionate demands for return of lost credit card invoices should be able to elicit evidence that he asked his attorney if he could negotiate for a reward on the lost items that he found. This was not offered to prove reliance on advice of counsel as a defense, but to prove state of mind and was admissible under Rule 803(3).

United States v. Hartmann, 958 F.2d 774 (7th Cir. 1992) : A man was murdered as part of a scheme by his wife and others to defraud life insurance companies by, inter alia, fraudulently listing her as beneficiary of his policies. During the trial, evidence was introduced of the victim's statements describing the dismal state of his marriage, his desire to replace his wife as beneficiary on his insurance policies, and his fear of being murdered by his wife and her lover. The Court held there was no plain error in admitting the statements as evidence of his state of mind and intent relevant to whether he would have listed her as beneficiary. In a drug conspiracy prosecution, United States v. Peak, n34 the Court held that it was error to exclude testimony by one defendant-brother as to what the other defendant-brother said in a telephone conversation. The testimony, the Court held, was state of mind evidence that should have been admitted to negate the government's theory as to intent. In United States v. Green, n35 a prosecution for kidnapping with intent to commit murder, the Court upheld the introduction of statements by the victim concerning her attitude toward the defendant. These statements, offered to prove her feeling toward the defendant, tended to negate evidence that she accompanied the defendant voluntarily. See also United States v. Tuchow n36(a victim's statements were admissible to prove state of mind in an extortion case).

United States v. Dolan, 120 F.3d 856 (8th Cir. 1997) : In the prosecution of an attorney for aiding and abetting in concealment of bankruptcy estate property, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a statement by the debtor, made to his office manager shortly after returning from a meeting at which he had paid the defendant $50,000, that he "had [the defendant] by the balls." The statement showed the debtor's then existing state of mind regarding his transactions and relationship with the defendant. In United States v. Udey, n37 the Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy and harboring and concealing a fugitive. It upheld the exclusion of statements made by two defendants after their arrest, finding that the statements were not relevant to their state of mind two days earlier when the offenses charged against them occurred. In United States v. Adcock, n38 the Court affirmed convictions on Hobbs Act and income tax charges, holding that statements of a victim were admissible in an extortion case to show state of mind, an essential element of the charge.

United States v. Miller, 874 F.2d 1255 (9th Cir. 1989) : The Court held that statements by a defendant two hours after taking a polygraph examination were not admissible as evidence of a present state of mind, since the time lapse gave the defendant time to fabricate an explanation.

United States v. Grassi, 783 F.2d 1572 (11th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed extortion convictions, finding that out-of-court statements by a victim concerning his fear of the defendants were properly admitted to prove his frightened state of mind.

[h] Rule 803(3) -- Requirement of Relevance

United States v. Williams, 704 F.2d 315 (6th Cir. 1983) : In a trial for attempting to possess cocaine, the evidence included testimony that $3,400 was confiscated from Williams when he was arrested, money the government claimed was to be used to make a cocaine purchase. Williams offered testimony of an IRS employee that Williams had stated that he owed $3,300 in taxes and had expressed an intention to repay that amount if his mother sold a house and gave him the money. Williams' statement to the witness qualified as a statement of a present intention to do a future act, but the statement was irrelevant absent evidence that the mother had sold the house and given him money.

Hong v. Children's Mem. Hosp., 993 F.2d 1257 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the employer in an employment discrimination case, holding that an employee's deposition testimony that her brother-in-law told her that the employer said the plaintiff should move back to Korea was hearsay and not admissible under Rule 803(3) because the brother-in-law's state of mind was irrelevant. In United States v. Harvey, 959 F.2d 1371 (7th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed mail fraud convictions, holding there was no error in limiting cross-examination of a postal inspector about statements from the defendant that his funding sources were "hustlers," as the statements were made when he had time to reflect and perhaps misrepresent his thoughts and were, in any event, not probative of whether he had an intent to defraud. In United States v. Jackson, n39 the Court affirmed fraud convictions arising from a scheme to steal fuel from a trucking firm, holding that statements by defendants to a former employee of the firm denying participation in the theft were properly excluded as hearsay. The statements were made two years after the theft, the defendants had a motive to make self-serving statements, and that the defendants' state of mind at that time was not relevant.

United States v. French, 900 F.2d 1300 (8th Cir. 1990) : The Court held that a defendant's statement of an intent to sell his gun on the day he was arrested in a cocaine deal should have been admissible under Rule 803(3), but there was no error in excluding it, as it was irrelevant to a charge of carrying a gun in relation to drug trafficking in light of undisputed evidence he was carrying a gun at the time of the charged cocaine transaction.

United States v. Scrima, 819 F.2d 996 (11th Cir. 1987) : In a prosecution for income tax evasion, the defendant attempted to rebut the government's "net worth" theory by offering the testimony of someone to whom the defendant had boasted, prior to the relevant tax years, of an intent to invest a large sum of money. The Court affirmed the ruling below that the testimony was inadmissible, since the defendant's state of mind was not relevant; the only relevant fact was whether the defendant actually had the money, and his out-of-court boast was hearsay with respect to that fact.

[i] Rule 803(3) -- Spontaneity

United States v. Reyes, 239 F.3d 722 (5th Cir. 2001) : In a prosecution arising out of a sting operation, the Court found no error in the exclusion of statements made by the defendant in a conversation with a person cooperating with the authorities. The statements appeared to indicate that the defendant had no criminal intent. However, at the time he made the statements, the defendant suspected that the person he was speaking to was a government informant and that the conversation was being monitored. Thus, the defendant's statements "were more self-serving than candid" and lacked the spontaneity required for admission under Rule 803(3).

[j] Rule 803(3) -- Statement of Accused

United States v. Bishop, 264 F.3d 535 (5th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a conviction for income tax offenses, the Court found no error when defendant's tax lawyer was permitted to testify that Bishop hired him in 1996 to assist with a 1996 civil audit, but was not allowed to say that Bishop said he did not expect the scope of the matter to be any greater, that is, he did not expect he would face criminal charges. "Bishop's statements ... did not reflect his then current feelings or plans, but rather were self-serving assertions that he did not have the requisite intent for the crime now charged."

[k] Rule 803(3) -- Statement of Belief or Memory

United States v. Bishop, 264 F.3d 535 (5th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a conviction for income tax offenses, the Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence that the defendant's former bookkeeper had said she knew Bishop received a $400,000 fee in 1994, that it was her fault it was omitted from the books used to prepare his tax returns, and that she did not know why she failed to record the fee. The statements were not an explanation of the declarant's current state of mind, "but rather was a recitation of her memories of what she did and thought at an earlier date."

United States v. Sayakhom, 186 F.3d 928 (9th Cir. 1999) : The Court held in a mail fraud prosecution arising out of an unlicensed insurance sales scheme that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a tape recording of a meeting between the defendant and state Department of Insurance investigators. The defendant's statements of her belief (that she was not violating the law) to prove the fact believed (that she was acting in good faith) were inadmissible hearsay under Rule 803(3).

United States v. Eisenstein, 731 F.2d 1540 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court reversed convictions for conspiracy and violations of currency transaction reporting requirements because the Trial Judge erroneously excluded as hearsay testimony concerning the statements made by one defendant to counsel concerning his business. The defendants claimed that they had relied on the advice of counsel, and the Court concluded that the statements were admissible to show full disclosure of information to counsel. The Court cited Rule 803(3) in support of its holding. Actually, the testimony was not hearsay if offered to prove only the extent of the disclosure. Rule 803(3) would be the appropriate reference, however, if the defense intended to argue not only that the statements were made, but also that they were true.

[l] Rule 803(3) -- Statement of Mental Condition

Moss v. Feldmeyer, 979 F.2d 1454 (10th Cir. 1992) : In a malpractice action against a physician for alleged misdiagnosis leading to death from a heart attack, the defendant testified that he had encouraged the patient to enter a hospital and that she, directly and through her husband, had refused. The Court held that the statements of the patient and her husband were properly admitted as statements of her then existing mental condition.

[m] Rule 803(3) -- Statement of Physical Condition

Wolf v. Procter & Gamble Co., 555 F. Supp. 613 (D.N.J. 1982) : The Court ruled in limine in an action against the manufacturer and distributor of a vaginal tampon to recover for toxic shock syndrome that plaintiffs could not offer evidence of complaints made over the telephone and in letters to the defendants. Such evidence was hearsay and there was no showing that the complaints were made immediately after the complainants suffered pain or injury.

[n] Rule 803(3) -- Surveys and Opinion Polls

Schering Corp. v. Pfizer Inc., 189 F.3d 218 (2d Cir. 1999) : The plaintiff and defendants, manufacturers of competing antihistamines, had entered a settlement agreement in which the defendants had agreed not to advertise their product as "nonsedating" or "low sedating." Seeking an injunction against violations of the agreement and the Lanham Act, the plaintiff offered five surveys in which physicians were asked to relate their memories of communications made by the defendants' sales representatives. The Judge excluded the surveys and denied the injunction. Reversing, the Court held that the two surveys that polled physicians' impressions of the communications should have been admitted under the present state of mind exception.

[4] Rule 803(4) -- Statements For Purposes Of Medical Diagnosis Or Treatment

[a] Rule 803(4) -- Abused Child

Danaipour v. McLarey, 386 F.3d 289 (1st Cir. 2004) : In an action by a father seeking to have his daughters returned pursuant to the International Child Abduction Remedies Act and the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, the mother claimed that they would be at grave risk because the father had sexually abused them. At trial a psychologist to whom the girls had been brought for treatment recounted statements by the mother and others repeating what the girls had said to them about the abuse. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the testimony under Rule 803(4). Quoting this Manual, it noted that statements by family members and others, made for and pertinent to treatment of an injured person, are often admitted under the Rule. The Court rejected as "unnecessarily inflexible" the rule elsewhere that statements by children identifying abusers are admissible only where the physician makes clear to the victim that the identity of the abuser is important to diagnosis and treatment, and reasoned that "[t]here are many ways in which a party wishing to enter into evidence a statement under Rule 803(4) can demonstrate that the statement was made for the purpose of diagnosis and treatment."

Morgan v. Foretich, 846 F.2d 941 (4th Cir. 1988) : In an action by a four-year-old and her mother alleging child abuse on the part of the child's father and his parents, the Court reversed a judgment for the defendants, concluding that statements the child made to a psychologist in which she identified her abusers were admissible under Rule 803(4), whether or not the child would be competent to testify as a witness. Justice Powell, sitting by designation, dissented in part. In his view, doubts about whether the child realized the psychologist was treating her made the trustworthiness of the evidence questionable, so deference should have been given to the Trial Judge's discretion in excluding the evidence.

United States v. Cherry, 938 F.2d 748 (7th Cir. 1991) : The Court held in a sexual abuse case that the victim's statements to a treating physician that the defendant had told her not to tell anyone were properly admitted, as the task of a physician treating the victim of such an attack requires attention not only to the physical but also to the psychological manifestations of trauma.

United States v. Bear, 357 F.3d 730 (8th Cir. 2004) : The Court reversed the defendant's conviction for aggravated sexual abuse of his children because a 12-minute videotape recording of an interview of one child by a forensic interviewer was erroneously admitted. The interview took place after the children had been taken into custody by the department of social services; it was conducted at a center for child evaluation before a physical examination by a doctor. In it the child (aged three years and ten months) identified her abuser and provided descriptive details of the abuse. The Court found that there was insufficient evidence that the child understood that the inquiry into identity was important to diagnosis and treatment; there was no evidence that the child was aware she had an injury or that she understood that telling the truth was important to the treatment of that injury. In a prosecution for sexual abuse of a minor, United States v. Gabe, 237 F.3d 954 (8th Cir. 2001) , the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit a hearsay statement identifying the defendant as the perpetrator, which the victim made to a doctor. The Court stated that a statement identifying the abuser is admissible under Rule 803(4) only where "the physician makes clear to the victim that the inquiry into the identify of the abuser is important to diagnosis and treatment, and the victim manifests such an understanding." It was not sufficient to presume that because the victim was 15 when she consulted the doctor, she understood the need to tell the truth in order to obtain proper treatment; "not even an adult necessarily understands the connection between a sex abuser's identity and her medical treatment." In United States v. Sumner, n40 the Court reversed convictions for aggravated sexual abuse because hearsay statements made by the alleged child-victim to a clinical psychologist were improperly admitted. Although the psychologist explained to the declarant that he was a doctor, he did not discuss the need for truthful revelations or emphasize that the identification of her abuser was important to his attempts to help her overcome any emotional trauma resulting from the abuse to which she had been subjected. In United States v. Beaulieu, n41 a child sexual abuse case, the prosecution was allowed to introduce testimony by a nurse practitioner and a psychologist that the victim had told them of abuse by the defendant. Reversing, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit the evidence to prove the identity of the abuser, when there was no evidence that either practitioner explained to the victim that the identity of her abuser was important to diagnosis or treatment; further, the victim's testimony showed she understood the purpose of her visits with both practitioners was "[j]ust to get evidence." Compare Lovejoy v. United States, n42 where the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting statements by a sexual abuse victim's mother to a nurse examining the victim a few days later that when she was awakened by noises from the bed in which the defendant and the victim were sleeping, she saw the defendant standing by the victim with an erection and the victim's underwear was down and her tee shirt was up. The declarant made the statements on behalf of her daughter, who could not communicate orally or in writing on her own, to a medical professional investigating allegations of sexual abuse, and the statements helped pinpoint the area of the body to be examined. In United States v. Balfany, n43 the child victim was examined by a physician and interviewed by a psychologist and a social worker more than six months after alleged abuse. All three of them gave testimony recounting the child's descriptions of the assaults and identification of the defendant as her attacker. The Court held the testimony was properly admitted for purposes of diagnosis and treatment, even though a general practitioner with little experience in abuse cases had previously examined the victim and found no evidence of abuse. The later examinations by experienced specialists were not simply designed to generate evidence for trial and were not shown to be untrustworthy. See also United States v. Yellow n44(a clinical psychologist was permitted to testify to statements made during diagnosis and treatment of a 13-year-old sister and her disabled brother, who were raped by the defendant); United States v. Longie n45(the identity of the victim's father as perpetrator of child sexual abuse was relevant to treatment and recommendations for counseling). In United States v. Whitted, n46 the Court noted that a child victim's statements about her physical condition made to a doctor consulted only for the purpose of providing expert testimony in a criminal prosecution for sexual abuse would be admissible under the Rule as statements for diagnosis.

United States v. Yazzie, 59 F.3d 807 (9th Cir. 1995) : In a child sexual abuse case, the Court held there was no error in admitting notes and statements identifying the defendant as the perpetrator that were given by the victim's mother to a doctor examining the victim. Although a parent's statement to a doctor identifying the assailant in a child molestation case must be treated as suspect, the circumstances in this case compelled the conclusion that the statements (except one imploring the doctor not to tell the victim, for fear of retribution from the defendant) were made for medical purposes. Error in admitting that one statement was harmless, however. In People of Terr. of Guam v. Ignacio, 10 F.3d 608 (9th Cir. 1993) , the three-year-old victim of a criminal sexual assault disclosed the assault and identified the defendant in statements to a pediatrician and to a social worker. The Court held that the statements to the doctor pertained to the cause of the injury and were pertinent to diagnosis and treatment. By contrast, the statements to the social worker were aimed only at ensuring the child's safety, not treatment, so they did not come within the medical statements exception. The error in admitting the statements to the social worker was harmless, however. In a sexual abuse case, United States v. George, n47 the Court held that statements by the 12-year-old victim to her physician identifying the defendant as her abuser were admissible under the Rule. The identity of the abuser is pertinent to the diagnosis and treatment of emotional and psychological injuries and of sexually transmitted diseases. In United States v. Nick, n48 statements of a three-year-old child to a doctor regarding an assault on his person, which omitted the name of his assailant, were held to be admissible under Rule 803(4).

United States v. Edward J., 224 F.3d 1216 (10th Cir. 2000) : The defendant, convicted of juvenile delinquency for sexually abusing females under the age of 12, argued that it was an abuse of discretion to admit testimony of an examining physician under the medical history exception without establishing that the child understood the medical importance of telling the truth, as the Eighth Circuit requires (see annotations supra). The Court stated that "we have specifically rejected this presumption against admission of hearsay evidence under the Rule 803(4) exception in the case of children. See [United States v.] Pacheco," n49 and held the testimony properly admitted. In United States v. McHorse, 179 F.3d 889 (10th Cir. 1999) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a seven-year-old witness' statements detailing abuse by the defendant, made to a family practitioner during a routine physical and to a psychotherapist after a year of counseling. The statements were likely reliable because a patient's medical care depends on the accuracy of information she provides to her doctors, so she has a motive to be truthful. In United States v. Norman T., n50 the Court affirmed a juvenile delinquency adjudication for aggravated sexual abuse, finding no error in the admission of statements made by the five-year-old victim to medical personnel when she was taken to the hospital after complaining about vaginal pain. There was no indication that the victim did not understand she was seeking medical treatment, and the statements were reasonably pertinent to diagnosis or treatment of the pain of which she was complaining. In addition, when the doctor first met with the victim, he discussed with her the difference between telling the truth and telling a lie. Finally, the defendant had an opportunity to cross-examine the victim when she testified. In United States v. Tome, n51 the Court held that statements by the child sexual abuse victim identifying the defendant were properly admitted under Rule 803(4) when made to two physicians examining her for diagnostic purposes after an abuse complaint was made, as the identity of the abuser is reasonably pertinent in virtually every domestic sexual assault case. Similar statements in a pre-examination interview by a physician examining her for treatment of a skin rash in the vaginal area that was unrelated to any abuse were likewise admissible, as the interview was conducted to make the child feel comfortable, which contributed to the adequacy of the examination. However, similar statements made to a Child Protective Services caseworker were not admissible under the Rule, because the caseworker did not diagnose or treat the child, but only made an investigation before referring her to other professionals. In United States v. Farley, n52 the Court affirmed a conviction for aggravated assault on a child, holding that statements by the victim to a psychologist were admissible under Rule 803(4) and could also be relied upon under Rule 703 to explain the doctor's opinion.

[b] Rule 803(4) -- Constitutional Concerns

White v. Illinois, 502 U.S. 346 (1992) : The Court's decision, holding that the Constitution does not require production of a declarant who makes a statement admissible under Rule 803(4), is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment at § 803.02[26].

Idaho v. Wright, 497 U.S. 805 (1990) : The Court's decision, holding that corroboration is irrelevant under the Confrontation Clause, is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 807 at § 807.02[8].

People of Terr. of Guam v. Ignacio, 10 F.3d 608 (9th Cir. 1993) : The three-year-old victim of a criminal sexual assault disclosed the assault and identified the defendant in statements to a pediatrician. The Court held that the statements to the doctor pertained to the cause of the injury and were pertinent to diagnosis and treatment and that under the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts analysis there was no Confrontation Clause violation because they came within a firmly rooted hearsay exception. We note that under Crawford v. Washington the statement seems not "testimonial," so there would be no Confrontation Clause issue.

[c] Rule 803(4) -- Medical Opinions

Field v. Trigg County Hosp., Inc., 386 F.3d 729 (6th Cir. 2004) : The Court held it was error in a medical malpractice action when the defendant physician testified that he had consulted unnamed doctors at a major medical center and they told him he was following appropriate treatment for the plaintiff. The rationale for Rule 803(4), that statements gain reliability from the declarant's desire to receive proper care, does not apply to statements that are not made by or on behalf of the person seeking care. Thus, the statements from consulting physicians to the treating physician did not come within the exception.

Gong v. Hirsch, 913 F.2d 1269 (7th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a medical malpractice suit, holding that a postoccurrence letter from the patient's family physician was not admissible under the Rule because it reflected only the patient's conclusions about the appropriate medical diagnosis, not symptoms, objective data, surrounding circumstances, or similar factual data that a reasonable physician would consider relevant in treating or diagnosing a medical condition.

Stull v. Fuqua Indus., 906 F.2d 1271 (8th Cir. 1990) : The Court held in a product liability action for injuries suffered when the plaintiff's foot became caught beneath a riding mower that a statement in a hospital record that he was "apparently" injured when he jumped off the mower after encountering wasps was properly excluded, because it may have represented the conjecture of the person filling out the record rather than a statement made by the plaintiff.

[d] Rule 803(4) -- Nonpatient Declarants

Bucci v. Essex Ins. Co., 393 F.3d 285 (1st Cir. 2005) : In an action denying insurance coverage because a nightclub patron was a victim of a battery, the Court found no error in admitting portions of medical records containing descriptions of the specific contacts that caused the patron's injuries, where the statements had been made for purposes of the patron's medical treatment by the patron, a witness to the attacks, or unidentified declarants. Citing this Manual, the Court declared that "[t]here is no requirement, either in the text of the Rule, or the case law, that the speaker be the patient himself," so long as the declarant's motive is to promote treatment or diagnosis of a patient. In Danaipour v. McLarey, 386 F.3d 289 (1st Cir. 2004) , an action by a father seeking to have his daughters returned pursuant to the International Child Abduction Remedies Act and the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, the mother claimed that they would be at grave risk because the father had sexually abused them. The Court found no abuse of discretion when a psychologist to whom the girls had been brought for treatment recounted statements by the mother and others repeating what the girls had said to them about the abuse. Quoting this Manual, it noted that statements by family members and others, made for and pertinent to treatment of an injured person, are often admitted under the Rule.

Wilson v. Zapata Off-Shore Co., 939 F.2d 260 (5th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in an action brought by a former employee alleging sex discrimination under Title VII and claims for emotional distress under the Jones Act, noting that a hospital record reporting a statement by the plaintiff's sister to a social worker recording that the plaintiff had always been a habitual liar could be admitted under the Rule. As the treating psychiatrists in this case were concerned with learning about the plaintiff's background and life-style, and it was important for them to know whether she was a credible informant, statements by her sister recorded two days after her admission to the hospital could be appropriate and helpful background information for the psychiatrist to consider in diagnosis and treatment of the plaintiff's complaints.

Lovejoy v. United States, 92 F.3d 628 (8th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed a sexual abuse conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting statements by the victim's mother to a nurse examining the victim a few days later that when she was awakened by noises from the bed in which the defendant and the victim were sleeping, she saw the defendant standing by the victim with an erection and the victim's underwear was down and her tee shirt was up. The declarant made the statements on behalf of her daughter, who could not communicate orally or in writing on her own, to a medical professional investigating allegations of sexual abuse, and the statements helped pinpoint the area of the body to be examined.

Moss v. Feldmeyer, 979 F.2d 1454 (10th Cir. 1992) : In a malpractice action against a physician for alleged misdiagnosis leading to death from a heart attack, the defendant testified that he had encouraged the patient to enter a hospital and that she, directly and through her husband, had refused. The Court held that the statements of the patient and her husband were properly admitted as statements of her then existing mental condition and as statements made to a physician for purposes of treatment.

[e] Rule 803(4) -- Patient's Statement of Other Doctor's Opinion

O'Gee v. Dobbs Houses, Inc., 570 F.2d 1084, 1089 (2d Cir. 1978) : The Court noted in this personal injury action that Rule 803(4) allows a nontreating doctor to recite his patient's statements relevant to diagnosis, but added that "[n]owhere does the commentary on Rule 803(4) indicate ... whether the Rule was intended to go so far as to permit a doctor to testify to his patient's version of other doctors' opinions." The Court implied that it had serious reservations about this procedure, although in the instant case it had no need to resolve the question since the information supplied by the patient was also supplied to the doctor in the form of medical records.

Bombard v. Fort Wayne Newspapers, Inc., 92 F.3d 560 (7th Cir. 1996) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendant on claims under the Americans with Disabilities Act, the Court held that the plaintiff's testimony that his physician had said he would be able to work half time was incompetent evidence of his ability to perform his job with accommodations, since Rule 803(4) excepts statements by a person seeking medical attention, but not statements by the person providing the medical attention, from the hearsay bar.

Bulthuis v. Rexall Corp., 789 F.2d 1315 (9th Cir. 1985) : Although it reversed a summary judgment for the defendant in a suit by a woman who claimed that her cervical cancer was a product of a drug injected into her mother during her pregnancy, the Court held that the mother's deposition testimony that her attending doctor told her that she was being given a certain drug did not fall within Rule 803(4). It was a statement to, not by, the patient.

[f] Rule 803(4) -- Statements Explaining Cause or Attributing Fault

See also annotations under § 803.03[4][a].

Ramrattan v. Burger King Corp., 656 F. Supp. 522 (D. Md. 1987) : In a ruling on in limine motions in an automobile accident case, the Court held that a statement in the plaintiff's medical records as to the circumstances of the accident were not made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment and were inadmissible.

Rock v. Huffco Gas & Oil Co., 922 F.2d 272 (5th Cir. 1991) : A summary judgment was granted for the defendants in a negligence suit for injuries allegedly suffered by an employee of an offshore catering service. The Court held that statements as to how the accident happened that were given by the since-deceased employee to a treating doctor were properly excluded because the particular cause of the alleged fall was not pertinent to treatment.

Cook v. Hoppin, 783 F.2d 684 (7th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a judgment for a landlord in a suit by a tenant's visitor who sustained injuries in a fall from an exterior stairway, finding it was error to admit statements in medical records indicating that the plaintiff had fallen from the stairway during a shoving or wrestling match. This was not the kind of information generally relied upon by doctors in providing treatment. In United States v. Pollard, n53 the Court reversed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, holding it was error to exclude portions of medical records indicating that the defendant reinjured his previously broken arm during an arrest and suffered pain. These portions of the report were relevant to whether a confession by the defendant was voluntary. The Court also held that portions of the records identifying the arresting officer as the person who twisted the defendant's arm were not admissible.

United States v. Iron Shell, 633 F.2d 77 (8th Cir. 1980) : In a prosecution for assault with intent to commit rape, the Court concluded that statements concerning the cause of vaginal injury made by the victim to a doctor were sufficiently related to treatment to qualify for admission. In United States v. Iron Thunder, n54 the Court reversed convictions for rape and assault with intent to commit rape because of the improper use of confessions, but it held that statements by the victim to a doctor that she had been raped were admissible under Rule 803(4). They were responses to questions that were intended to shed light on her physical, emotional, and mental condition and related to treatment she sought. The Court noted that the statements did not point to the persons responsible for her condition and did not contain facts irrelevant to medical diagnosis or treatment.

[g] Rule 803(4) -- Statements for Purposes of Treatment

Willingham v. Crooke, 412 F.3d 553 (4th Cir. 2005) : Reversing a judgment for a police sergeant sued by an arrestee who claimed that her arrest violated the Fourth Amendment, the Court held that the plaintiff's statements to her treating physicians following her arrest, indicating that the officer pointed a gun at her, were admissible under Rule 803(4). The plaintiff was suffering from pain and emotional trauma, and the statements were relevant to diagnosis and treatment of the emotional trauma. However, the plaintiff's statements to a physician describing her actions prior to the arrest were properly excluded because they were not relevant to diagnosis or treatment of any injury.

United States v. Matta-Ballesteros, 71 F.3d 754 (9th Cir. 1995) , amended, 98 F.3d 1110 (9th Cir. 1996) : The defendant, charged in the kidnapping of a federal agent, offered the report of a prison psychologist to prove that he was illiterate. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the report, since the defendant had been ordered to see the psychologist and did not believe he had any reason to do so, and therefore had no special incentive to be truthful.

United States v. Tome, 61 F.3d 1446 (10th Cir. 1995) : On remand after the Supreme Court held that hearsay statements made when the declarant had a motive to falsify could not be admitted as prior consistent statements (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 801, § 801.02[4][c]), the Court held that statements by the child sexual abuse victim identifying the defendant were properly admitted under Rule 803(4) when made to two physicians examining her for diagnostic purposes after an abuse complaint was made, as the identity of the abuser is reasonably pertinent in virtually every domestic sexual assault case. Similar statements in a pre-examination interview by a physician examining her for treatment of a skin rash in the vaginal area that was unrelated to any abuse were likewise admissible,

